OFFICIAL REPORT

Thursday, January 17, 1935

SIXTH SESSION—SEVENTEENTH PARLIAMENT—OPENING

The parliament which had been prorogued from time to time to the 17th day of January, 1935, met this day at Ottawa, for the dispatch of business.

The house met at three o'clock.

Arthur Beauchesne, Esquire, M.A., K.C., C.M.G., the Clerk of the House, read to the house a letter from the Governor General's secretary informing him that the Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, would proceed to the Senate chamber on Thursday, the 17th of January, at 3 p.m., to open the session.

SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE

RESIGNATION OF MR. GEORGE BLACK AND ELECTION OF MR. JAMES LANGSTAFF BOWMAN

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): It is my unpleasant duty to announce to this house that the Honourable George Black, our Speaker, has resigned by writing dated the 15th January, 1935, as follows:

Sir:

I find it necessary to ask the House of Commons to allow me to retire from the chair.

In laying down the great office to which the House of Commons has called me, I trust that I can hand down its traditions unimpaired. If I have been able to discharge my official duties with any degree of success, it is because I have received the help and support of all my colleagues, for which I desire to express my sincere thanks.

Yours sincerely,

George Black.

I of course am not permitted by the rules of the house to address my remarks to any official, for as members of the House of Commons we all stand on an equality. It will therefore be necessary for us to proceed with the election of a speaker, which we shall do in due course after the formalities which have obtained through the centuries have been complied with.

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Members of the House of Commons:

His Honour, the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the house went up to the Senate chamber, when the Speaker of the Senate said:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I have it in command to let you know that His Excellency the Governor General does not see fit to declare the causes of his summoning the present Parliament of Canada, until the Speaker of the House of Commons shall have been chosen according to law, but this afternoon, at the hour of three-thirty o'clock in the afternoon, His Excellency will declare the causes of calling this parliament.

And the Members being returned to the Commons Chamber:

ELECTION OF SPEAKER

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Beauchesne, the unfortunate circumstance to which I have already alluded renders it necessary that this Commons House of Parliament should proceed with the election of a Speaker.

I therefore, propose, seconded by Mr. Guthrie:

That, James Langstaff Bowman, member representing the electoral district of Dauphin, do take the Chair of this House as Speaker.

I need hardly remind hon. members that the office of presiding officer of this House of Commons is one of the greatest importance. It involves the discharge of great responsibilities, holding the scales of justice even between contending parties, and the administration of the rules of the house in a manner that accords with the traditions and customs of parliament. It is not difficult to maintain order in the House of Commons—it should not be. That portion of the duties of a Speaker is easy to discharge. But the administration of the rules, which are nothing more than the means by which the members of parliament have themselves determined that their proceedings shall be governed and their deliberations controlled, is sometimes most difficult. In moving that Mr. Bowman, the member for Dauphin, do take the chair as Speaker, I believe that we have in him a fairminded gentleman who will administer the rules of this house fairly, dispassionately, and in a manner consistent with the great traditions of this parliament and of the mother of parliaments, whose rules in part govern where ours are silent.

I will not longer detain the chamber than to express my trust that the nomination which has been made may commend itself to the members of the house as a whole and that in the discharge of his onerous duties he may have the assistance and good-will of every member of this chamber.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I have much pleasure in endorsing what the right hon. the Prime Minister has just said with respect to the qualifications of the hon. member for Dauphin for the position of Speaker of this house. Hon. gentlemen opposite will have observed from the applause which greeted the nomination that all hon. members on this side very cordially approve of the choice which evidently accords with the mind of the government from the fact that the Prime Minister made the motion. I am sure the hon. member for Dauphin will feel that it is quite an exceptional compliment that, having been a member of this house for but one parliament, his conduct in the course of debate and his demeanour in the house generally have been such as to inspire that unanimous regard to which expression has just been given. I can wish him nothing better than that he may fill this high office in accordance with the best of its traditions.

The Clerk of the House declared the motion carried in the affirmative, nemine contradicente, and Hon. James Langstaff Bowman, member for the electoral district of Dauphin, duly elected to the chair of the house.

Honourable Mr. Bowman was conducted from his seat in the house to the Speaker's chair by Right Hon. R. B. Bennett and Hon. Hugh Guthrie.

Mr. SPEAKER-ELECT said: Fellow members of the House of Commons, may I say that I deeply and sincerely appreciate the very flattering remarks of the Prime Minister of Canada and the kindly and generous words of the leader of the opposition.

I beg respectfully to thank hon. members of the House of Commons for the honour they have conferred upon me in unanimously electing me as their Speaker, and I can assure the house that I will use my best endeavours to discharge the duties attached to my office with justice and impartiality. I appeal to hon. gentlemen on both sides of the house when I say that I feel sensible of my inability efficiently to discharge those duties, and I ask hon. gentlemen for their earnest, kind cooperation in the preservation of the rights, privileges and duties attached to the House of Commons.

OPENING OF THE SESSION

Mr. SPEAKER read a communication from the Governor General's Secretary announcing that His Excellency would proceed to the Senate chamber at 3.30 p.m. on this day for the purpose of formally opening the session of the dominion parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, is it not customary for His Honour the Speaker to read prayers every day at the meeting of this house before any business is entered upon? I believe that such is in accordance with the rules of the house. The observance of this rule would appear to be especially appropriate and desirable on the first day of a new session.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have been informed that there is not time on account of His Excellency being received at any moment. It is a question of time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no time like the present.

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:—

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And the house being returned to the Commons chamber.

Prayers.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that when the house did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes I have obtained a copy which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I welcome you at a time when our country stands upon the threshold of a new era of prosperity. It will be for you, by your labours, to throw wide the door.

During the past year the grip of hard times has been broken. Conditions show marked improvement. Employment is increasing. Our trade is expanding. The national revenues are higher. These evidences of recovery attest the wisdom and efficacy of the measures you have taken. In these improved conditions, there may now successfully be carried forward those great tasks of reform upon which the well-being of this country depends.

In the anxious years through which you have passed, you have been the witnesses of grave defects and abuses in the capitalist system. Unemployment and want are the proof of these. Great changes are taking place about us. New conditions prevail. These require modifications in the capitalist system to enable that system more effectively to serve the people. Reform measures will therefore be submitted to you as part of a comprehensive plan designed to remedy the social and economic injustices now prevailing, and to ensure to all classes and to all parts of the country a greater degree of equality in the distribution of the benefits of the capitalist system.

Upon this plan you have made a beginning.

Reform measures approved by you at the last session of parliament are already in successful operation. I observe with especial gratification the manner in which the Natural Products Marketing Act and the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act are already serving the great and urgent needs of agriculture and other primary industries. You will be invited to consider amendments to these acts which will extend the sphere of their usefulness. The organization of the Bank of Canada is nearing completion, and it will commence operations at an early date. My ministers are convinced of the value of this institution as an instrument of national policy to direct the better utilization of the credit resources of Canada.

Legislation enacted at the last session of parliament respecting the metallic coverage of our note issue and the initiation of the public works program have eased credit conditions and stimulated business enterprise.

Better provision will be made for the security of the worker during unemployment, in sickness, and in old age.

The measures taken respecting public and private debts have done much to lighten the burden of the taxpayer and to improve the position of the farming community. My ministers are now engaged upon a survey of the national debt structure to determine what action may be practicable and advisable to effect further improvement in it.

You will be invited to enact legislation to extend existing facilities for long term and intermediate credit.

During the past year, wider markets for our products have been secured. A supplementary trade agreement has been negotiated with the Republic of France. The trade agreement with Austria has been renewed. Negotiations with the government of Poland, which it is hoped will lead to the conclusion of a comprehensive commercial convention, are in progress. It is the policy of my ministers to pursue vigorously every opportunity by which our world trade may be increased. The policy of my government of consolidating and expanding empire markets will be vigorously pursued.

A royal commission has been appointed to advise my ministers upon the steps which should be taken to implement the findings of the Duncan commission.

Pursuant to the agreement made between the government of Canada and the governments of Saskatchewan and Alberta, royal commissions have been appointed to determine what, if any, compensation is payable to these provinces in respect to the period since 1905, in which their natural resources were under the control of the government of Canada.

My ministers are cooperating with the governments of the prairie provinces in a survey of those areas which have been stricken by recurring periods of drought, for the purpose of determining what steps may be taken to provide a permanent solution to this grave problem.

Action will be taken to ameliorate the conditions of labour, to provide a better and more assured standard of living for the worker, to secure minimum wages and a maximum working week, and to alter the incidence of taxation so that it will more directly conform to capacity to pay.

You will be invited to enact measures designed to safeguard the consumer and primary producer against unfair trading practices and to regulate, in the public interest, concentrations in production and distribution.

You will be invited also to enact measures to provide the investing public with means to protect itself against exploitation.

You will be invited to enact legislation to amend and consolidate the acts relating to patents and inventions.

My government has under consideration the adoption, throughout the penitentiaries of Canada, of a system similar to that which is known in England as the "Borstal System," and is making investigations as to its operation.

My ministers have under preparation a plan for the reorganization of the government services so that they may be better equipped to discharge the onerous duties which devolve upon them. You will be invited to consider measures, the purpose of which will be to authorize the first stage in this plan of reorganization.

[Mr. Speaker.]

You will be invited to authorize the constitution of an economic council, the functions of which will be to advise my ministers upon all economic questions which concern the national welfare.

The four hundredth anniversary of the landing of Jacques Cartier was fittingly commemorated in the chief centres connected with his voyages of discovery. Representatives of the governments of the United Kingdom, France, and the United States, took part. The celebration and the visit of a large and distinguished mission from France knit new bonds of understanding.

The maintenance of peace and the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends, have been the constant concern of my ministers. There are definite signs that the political tension and unrest in Europe which have intensified rivalry in armaments and economic restrictions, are lessening, largely as a result of the renewed determination to make use of the agencies of conciliation and cooperation provided by the League of Nations. It will be the object of my government to support this policy and to work towards the progressive reduction of armaments and the stabilization of international economic relations.

The year 1935 will be memorable for all subjects of His Gracious Majesty King George V. On the 6th of May, we shall celebrate, throughout the British Empire, the 25th Anniversary of His Majesty's Accession to the Throne. On that day, all of us will wish to unite in an act of thanksgiving to Almighty God for having thus preserved His Majesty, whose wisdom and devotion to the well-being of his subjects have proved so inestimable a blessing. My ministers are considering means, shortly to be announced, by which the people of Canada may be afforded an opportunity of suitably commemorating this great landmark in the history of our empire, and of testifying their loyal devotion to their beloved Sovereign.

Members of the House of Commons:

The public accounts for the last fiscal year, and the estimates for the coming year, will be submitted to you at an early date.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I know you will be diligent and resolute in the country's service. Though the problems which confront you are, in essence and degree, far different from those which in the past you overcame, I know that these present ones you will surmount with the same spirit of faith and determination which has carried Canada to a forward place among the nations.

May God give you strength to support, by your unremitting labours, this great movement towards happier days.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister moved:

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration on Monday next.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the select standing committees of this house, under standing order 63, said committee to be composed of Messrs. Rhodes, Dupré, Simpson (West Algoma), Stewart (West Edmonton), and Casgrain.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) presented the following message from His Excellency the Governor General:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an approved minute of council, appointing the Right Honourable Sir George H. Perley, Minister without Portfolio; the Honourable Donald M. Sutherland, Minister of Pensions and National Health; the Honourable Thomas G. Murphy, Minister of the Interior and Superintendent of Indian Affairs; and the Honourable Maurice Dupré, Solicitor General, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of chapter 145 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, intituled, "An Act respecting the House of Commons."

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to lay before the house the report of the joint librarians of parliament.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 5.05 p.m.

Friday, January 18, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

ELECTORAL LISTS

On the order for motions:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, on the order for motions, may I be permitted to reply to the inquiry made by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) at yesterday's session. Pursuant to the provisions of section 46 of the Dominion Franchise Act of last session, the dominion franchise commissioner commenced on November 20 last to deliver to the king's printer copies of the lists of electors for the several electoral districts of Canada as they were severally prepared, with directions to the king's printer for the printing of the same.

These lists comprise approximately 6,000,000 names of electors, of which about 1,000,000 names are now set up in type, although the printing of departmental reports, in English and French, for presentation to parliament, has been given precedence over other work. The printing bureau, in addition to its other work, is now setting up in type about 75,000 names per day, so that in the ordinary course, without grave accidents to the equipment of the bureau, the composition should be completed early in April, and the printing of the lists should be completed about April 15 next.

This date will permit the printed electoral lists to be distributed to the registrars of electors in the several electoral districts, so that, as provided in section 20 of said act, the annual revision of the electoral lists may commence on May 15 next.

MINISTERIAL CHANGES

On the order for motions:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I desire to advise the house that during the recess the Hon. H. H. Stevens, Minister of Trade and Commerce, resigned his office, and that on the 17th day of November last Mr. R. B. Hanson, member for York-Sunbury, having been previously sworn of the privy council, was appointed Minister of Trade and Commerce. The Hon. Murray MacLaren resigned his office as Minister of Pensions and National Health, and on the 17th November the Hon. D. M. Sutherland, the then Minister of National Defence, was appointed Minister of Pensions and National Health. On the same date the Hon. Grote Stirling, member for Yale, having been previously sworn of the privy council was appointed Minister of National Defence. The correspondence I now table.

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a point of order. Would it not have been proper to make that statement before the ministers tabled the reports of their departments?

Mr. BENNETT: Undoubtedly it would have been, and I intended to do so, but a minister rose before I could speak. There is no point of order, however; it is purely a matter of the custom of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Did not the Prime Minister himself as Secretary of State for External Affairs table the first report?

Mr. BENNETT: I did, yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I thought the Prime Minister tabled the first report.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but the hon. member referred to "ministers" and "reports of their departments." The point was that before they addressed the house the Prime Minister should have intimated the changes.

Mr. POULIOT: If they rose before they should have, it shows they have no discipline

Mr. McINTOSH: We will discipline them all right.

TRIBUTES TO DECEASED MEMBERS

THE LATE JOSEPH ARTHUR DENIS—THE LATE HON. WILLIAM ANDERSON BLACK—THE LATE WALTER DAVY COWAN—THE LATE GEORGE BRECKEN NICHOLSON

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, since last we met the grim reaper seems to have gathered a greater harvest than usual. In the interim four of our members have passed to the great beyond. I must first offer my sympathy tc the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his colleagues in the loss of one of their members, namely the late member for St. Denis. I was not privileged to know Doctor Denis very well, but I used to see him frequently and upon those occasions passed the time of day. I believe however one might state truthfully that he was a very constant attendant in this chamber and followed the debates with great interest and care. That he was a loyal party man there can be no question, and that he was held in high esteem in the community in which he lived is evidenced by the fact that he was returned as the member for the constituency of St. Denis in 1921, 1925, 1926 and 1930. He was thirteen years in this house and in point of service was becoming one of its oldest members. On behalf of the government and myself I should like to express our very warm sympathy to the family in the great bereavement they have suffered by reason of one so young having been called. I offer also to the leader of the opposition and to his colleagues the sympathy of those sitting on this side of the house in their loss of a loyal and devoted colleague.

In point of time the next of our members who passed was the senior member for the city and county of Halifax. The late Hon. William Anderson Black was the oldest member of the House of Commons. Although he did not come to parliament until late in life he had been a very active business man and was closely associated with the growth and development of the city of Halifax and the province of Nova Scotia. He was interested in all commercial pursuits, had a strong individualist turn of mind, and was always frank in expressing his opinions. He was an authority on shipping, and as a governor of Dalhousie university he took a keen interest in educational matters and especially in the commercial department of that institution of learning. The late Mr. Black was held in the highest possible esteem not only by the citizens of his own community and the people of the province in which he lived, but by those throughout Canada who knew him. For a short period of time he served the crown as a minister, and although he had then passed the three score years and ten he showed great interest and activity in the discharge of the duties of his office, indicating that his years did not in any sense determine his age or his outlook upon the problems of life. He will be missed not only by hon. members on this side but, I believe, by all members in this house who had the privilege of knowing him, and by those who had met him in that wider sphere of business activity in which he had continued as long as his health permitted. His place will not easily be taken. I express the opinion of my colleagues to which the hon. member sitting to my left (Sir George Perley) has already given public expression when I state that in the death of Mr. Black we have lost a very valuable friend, a devoted supporter, and a great citizen of the province in which he lived and of the dominion of which he was so proud.

In point of date the next hon. member who passed from our midst was Doctor Walter Davy Cowan, who sat for the constituency of Long Lake. When I first went to the city of Regina in 1898 to attend the sittings of the Northwest legislature the late Doctor Cowan was a resident of that city. A more kindly hearted man it would be difficult to conceive, and I believe he was much misunderstood by some of our friends in this chamber. He was a tolerant and broad-minded man, but one who held strong convictions which he never for a moment failed to express. I believe the kindliness of his disposition might best be explained by a little story which I shall now repeat. He was a practising dentist, occupying a very high position in his profession, and when the dental organization became dominion wide for a long time he held the position of secretary. By reason of his office he found it necessary to relinquish much of his practice. I learn from what I regard as sound authority that when his books of account were examined after the late member's death they found that in order that there might be no possible chance of those whom he had attended being harassed he kept their names in his books of record in terms such as this: "The man with the grey overalls." Some service had been rendered to that man, but the entry had been made as I have indicated so that by no chance could his personal representatives after his decease determine the name of the debtor or endeavour to secure payment of the outstanding account. That I believe is typical of the man. He was warm hearted and conscientious, he was a good citizen and one who occupied a very important position in the dental profession of our country. The late Doctor Cowan will be mourned by a very wide circle of friends in the communities in which he had lived. I suppose it is within the knowledge of hon members that when he lost the devoted companion of many years of his life he ceased to take a great interest in public affairs, and I am quite certain the death of his wife hastened his own demise.

The last of our members to leave us was George Brecken Nicholson, the late member for the constituency of East Algoma. Born in Prince Edward Island, early in life the late Mr. Nicholson came to what was then called the western part of Canada. In those days any part of the country beyond the northern boundaries of New Brunswick was known as Canada West. He had been associated with the building of a section of the Canadian Pacific railway, and had always been proud of the fact that he continued to carry his union card. I believe that for a short period he was a fireman, and rejoiced in the fact that he retained his standing in the union organization. The late member was deeply interested in the growth of the community in which he lived, namely, the town of Chapleau. His business expanded to the point where in the latter days of his life he controlled a very large enterprise employing great numbers of men. He was a man I think at times much misunderstood. He was blunt of speech, strong in his convictions, determined in his ways, those who knew him and lived in the community in which he resided or in the district which he represented always spoke of him in warm and kindly terms. I recall reading in an Ottawa newspaper a letter from a correspondent written after he had passed, and I thought then, as I still think, that if any of those who knew us could speak in terms such as that correspondent used, we must indeed have been something out of the ordinary to warrant it. In public affairs Mr. Nicholson was, of course, deeply interested. He was a strong adherent of the church of his choice and took a very active part in organizing many funds which will long ensure his being remembered. In this house he took a fair part in debates, and expressed himself in terms as strong as were warranted by the convictions which he held. To those of us who sit on the right, news of his death brought to us a sense of real, personal sorrow. I might add that in the last conversation I had with him, only a few days before he passed to the great beyond, he was discussing a means by which he could better serve the country and assist the party to which he belonged.

I cannot take my place without indicating that one of the saddest circumstances connected with the office of the Prime Minister is that year after year as we gather here we realize how great the mortality is amongst our members. I think that since we were elected we have lost twelve members of this house—that is my recollection—out of 245, a rather large number. It reminds us not only of the uncertainty of life but also, and especially in view of the fact that at least one of them was a fairly young man who was called suddenly, that members of parliament are subject, it seems to me, to perhaps a higher mortality than a similar number of men engaged in the ordinary vocations of life.

I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to convey to those who mourn, the sympathy of this house in their great bereavement, and I am sure that I voice the sentiments not of a party but of all of us when I say we deeply regret the passing of our colleagues and hope that they have passed to a reward which is not dependent upon popular favour.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has just referred in feeling terms to the extent of the mortality of the membership of this house. He has mentioned that in the course of the present parliament no less than twelve members have been taken from our midst. His remarks come with added emphasis when we recall that no fewer than four of that number have been taken away in the short time that has elapsed since the prorogation of this house in July last. I am sure that none of us assembled here at that time ever thought that there would be owing to death such a number of vacancies in the membership of this House of Commons when parliament reassembled. I do not remember a year when the house in the interval between sessions suffered so large a loss in its membership.

It is, I think, worthy of note that all of those who have been taken were members for a considerable period of time. All four had been in parliament during two or more parliaments, and occupied seats in this house for eight or more years. In the case of one, there was a membership of eleven years, and of another of thirteen. All for a much longer period of time had been active, and had participated in many party conflicts. It can be said that, without exception, each had given a considerable part of his life to public service in one representative position or another, and that each occupied a very prominent position in the affairs of his party in his native province, and, one of the number, a quite exceptional position in the public and business life of the dominion.

It is not without significance that the Angel of Death, in his flight over the membership of this house, should have been no more the respecter of provinces, than of persons. We meet to-day under the shadow that his wing has cast across the sea-girt provinces of the east, the highly industrialized central provinces of Quebec and Ontario, and the prairie provinces of the great west.

Of the four, to whose memories we would pay our humble tribute before entering upon the duties and controversies of the session, three were members of the Conservative party and have been taken from the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite. I hasten to express to the Prime Minister, as he has kindly done to me, my deep sympathy for him in the loss which he has sustained in the passing of so many loyal and able colleagues, and that sympathy I should like to extend upon behalf of the entire official opposition to all hon. members of his party in what is also their loss. To them the loss is political as well as personal. We on this side who enjoyed in greater or less measure the friendships of one or other or of all three, will share what they experience of personal loss; and we are glad to join in the tribute deservedly paid by the Prime Minister to their public service and achievements.

What that service has been, and what these accomplishments were, you have already heard in part. I shall not attempt to repeat the record. With respect to each of the late members I should, however, like to add just a word.

As the Prime Minister has said, the late member for Halifax, in point of years though not of membership in the house, enjoyed, at the time of his death, the distinction of being Canada's oldest commoner. It was a distinction of which anyone might be justly proud. It was something more than a distinction where, as in the case of the Hon. William A. Black, it crowned a life that already was full of years, and full of wide and varied disinterested public service.

In these days, when many are beginning to lose their respect for years, and the experience and wisdom which comes with years, it is worth while to recall that it was at the age of 76 that Mr. Black entered federal politics; that, between the ages of 76 and 86, when he died, he had participated in no less than four political contests, three of them general campaigns, and been returned four times as a member of parliament, and that, until his days on earth were ended, he never ceased to be active in the affairs of his party and the country, and never ceased to enjoy the admiration and great regard of members of all political parties in the house.

The late member for Long Lake, Doctor Walter D. Cowan, was scarcely less of an example of high and persistent endeavour. It was not because of labour continued to a great age, though he lived and remained remarkably active up to the age of 68, but because of the fortitude with which, after many years of unselfish service in a variety of directions, he bore one handicap after another in his determination not to permit bodily suffering or infirmity to conquer a spirit devoted to public service and the well-being of his fellowmen. And it was not his fortitude only, and his persistence that were so praiseworthy, but the cheerfulness with which everything in the nature of misfortune or suffering was borne. It never embittered, but if anything softened his nature. I share in all that the Prime Minister has said so feelingly about the late member for Long Lake.

Dr. Cowan knew that most of us on this side had a cordial dislike for some aspects of his politics, and enjoyed provoking him at times into a retort, but he knew equally that this was in order to have the benefit of his quick repartee and that we were always appreciative of his unfailing and kindly humour. We shall all much miss the spontaneous and original wit with which at times he enlivened the debates of the house, and I for one shall much miss the doctor himself.

I was not as well acquainted with the late member for East Algoma, Mr. George B. Nicholson, as with Mr. Black and Dr. Cowan, and therefore cannot speak as intimately of his personal qualities. I believe, however, that those who knew him well were strong in their admiration of his zealous concern for his party's interests; and of a zeal no less great for the well-being of those whose interests he sought to serve in parliament. He began his life in the work of railway construction, and later became interested in the timber business in northern Ontario. These associations brought him into immediate contact with large numbers of workingmen on railways and in lumber camps, and with the many needs of a pioneering community. To be a friend and neighbour to those in humble circumstances was, we are told, the constant endeavour of his life. In this endeavour he seems to have largely succeeded. I had the pleasure, as the Prime Minister had, of reading this article to which he has referred. It appeared, I think, in the Journal of this city shortly after Mr. Nicholson's death and was by a former citizen of Chapleau who had been a life long friend. My feelings upon reading it were similar to those to which my right hon. friend has given expression to-day. It closed, if I recollect aright, with the words: "Those of us who knew him best, liked him more." After all that is the one real test and the highest tribute that can be paid to the worth of a friend and a neighbour; it is a tribute that in Mr. Nicholson's case many will believe is worthily bestowed.

To all of us who are of the official opposition, the death of Doctor J. Arthur Denis, the late member for St. Denis, Montreal, means the loss of a deeply valued colleague as well as friend: to myself personally it means the loss of one of the most loyal and devoted supporters that any leader of a political party could wish to have.

Though the youngest in years of the four members who have been taken away since our last session, Doctor Denis was the oldest in point of membership in the house itself. He entered parliament in 1921, in his forty-first year, and represented the constituency of St. Denis continuously up to the time of his death on the first of October last, when he was in his fifty-fourth year. His popularity in his own constituency could not have been better attested than by the huge majorities he received at each of the four contests at which he was a candidate, and which varied from 6,500 to 18,000. These majorities were by no means the result wholly of the exigencies of politics. They reflected in a very true way the place which Doctor Denis held in the hearts of the people of his constituency. He was a man devoted in his sympathies to the poor; and being a medical doctor practising in a thickly populated industrial community, his profession brought him into close contact with the conditions of thousands of workers, many of them possessed with little or nothing of this world's goods. To one and all in need he ministered as best he could, and, as may well be assumed, with little in the way of remuneration. He took a special interest in young people, and sought to encourage their participation in politics. For a time, a club which he formed to this end, met every week in his own home.

Few members have been more ardent advocates of their political faith. Liberalism to him, as to many another, was a gospel. When not practising his profession he was immersed in politics; indeed, his profession, save as a means of furthering charitable ends, came to hold a wholly secondary place, and its rewards were sacrificed to politics. He died as he lived, a poor man with large family obligations.

In this House of Commons, Doctor Denis was most regular in his attendance. He participated freely in the debates, especially where social and industrial questions were under discussion. As opportunity presented he never failed to say the word which he believed might be helpful to the people he represented and the cause he had at heart. I really believe that the strain Doctor Denis experienced in seeking to serve both at home and in parliament the needs of a working class constituency in these years of depression was responsible more than all else for the heart affliction which occasioned his death, and his passing at the early age of fifty-four. It was a strain which was also felt by other of our late colleagues, and is a strain which I believe is felt in considerable measure by most men who take part seriously in public affairs to-day. Doctor Denis' death has occasioned an irreparable loss to those he served so well by his profession and in parliament. It is a loss which will be much felt in this House of Commons, and in times such as the present, a very real loss to the country.

I join with the right hon. the Prime Minister in expression of the desire that the sympathy of this House of Commons be appropriately conveyed through His Honour the Speaker to the immediate members of the families who since our last meeting together here have been so greatly bereaved.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is hardly necessary that I should follow the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in a review of the careers of the four members who have been called away. I desire, however, to associate this group with the tribute of respect which has been expressed by the other groups in the house to our fellow members who have passed on. Sometimes I wonder, when we can find admirable qualities in all of those, even our political enemies, who have gone from us, whether this should not lead us to be a little more charitable to those who still are round about us.

We desire to express to the friends and relatives of the late Mr. Black, Doctor Cowan, Mr. Nicholson and Doctor Denis, our very great sympathy with them in their bereavement.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 3.50 p.m.

Monday, January 21, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE RESPECTING CONSIDERATION OF GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

On the order for motions:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last the Prime Minister moved and this house adopted a resolution to the effect that the speech of His Excellency the Governor General, delivered at the opening of parliament, would be taken into consideration to-day, but the resolution did not state that consideration of His Excellency's speech should have precedence over the other items on the order paper. It was rather the expectation of hon. members of the house that such would be the case, and unless the government's intention is to the contrary I think a resolution to that effect would be in order.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I intended to have the questions asked, because some of them will become orders for returns and they require to be advanced; then to take the notices of motion for the production of papers, which are all starred notices, in order that they might be passed and the work commenced on them. Then it was intended to proceed one step with the two government notices of motion so that we may be able to discuss them when the time comes; this is merely the formal notice that they will be moved in committee of the whole. It is intended to omit the notices of motion and have them stand. That is substantially what the right hon. gentleman has in mind, I take it.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

TRADE WITH UNITED STATES

STATEMENT MADE BY SECRETARY OF STATE OF THE UNITED STATES

On the order for motions:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Before proceeding further I think it would be well to make the following statement to the house. The Secretary of State of the United States of America has made, this afternoon, the following announcement in Washington:

> Pursuant to section 4 of an act of congress approved June 12, 1934, entitled "An Act to amend the Tariff Act of 1930" and executive Order No. 6750 of June 27, 1934, I hereby give notice of intention to negotiate a trade agreement with the government of Canada.

Under the act of congress in question it is provided that, before the conclusion of any foreign trade agreement, interested persons in the United States shall have an opportunity of presenting their views for the consideration of the government of the United States. The announcement of the Secretary of State goes on to set March 11 and March 18 for the reception of written and oral representations, respectively, by the committee appointed by the president for this purpose.

There is attached to the notice a general review of the statistics of trade between Canada and the United States in recent years, and tables showing for the years 1929 and 1933 the volume and value of the trade in the principal commodities which are exchanged between the two countries. When the formal note has been transmitted to the Department of State I will lay it on the table.

EMPIRE DEFENCE PLAN

INQUIRY BY MR. MACKENZIE KING AS TO ACCURACY OR OTHERWISE OF PRESS REPORT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the Prime Minister as to the accuracy or inaccuracy of a statement which recently appeared in a prominent newspaper in London, England, with respect to a new plan for empire defence which, it is alleged, has been worked out and was discussed with Sir Maurice Hankey on the occasion of his recent visit to Canada. The article to which I refer appeared in the Sunday Express, of London, England. The headlines are as follows:

New Plan For Empire Defence
Dominion Chiefs'
London
Visit
A Common Pool
Sunday Express Political Correspondent

The article is as follows:

Vitally important discussions on the defence of the empire will take place in London in a few weeks.

The Prime Minister and other leaders representative of all the dominions will be in this country in connection with the King's jubilee celebrations, which open in May, and the opportunity will be taken to hold an informal imperial conference.

An elaborate scheme of empire defence has already been worked out by the committee of Imperial Defence, on which sit technical experts and the heads of all the fighting services.

This scheme has been submitted to the dominion governments by Sir Henry Maurice Hankey, Secretary of the Cabinet, and of the committee of Imperial Defence, who returns to London this week from a tour of the empire.

I understand that the plans Sir Maurice has discussed with the dominion governments propose that the various parts of the empire should contribute to empire defence as a whole in finance, personnel and equipment.

Particular attention will be paid to defence against aerial attack.

It is not improbable that technical experts will accompany the dominion statesmen when they come to this country.

The article is dated January 6, 1935, and the question I wish to ask the Prime Minister is this: Was the recent visit of Sir Maurice Hankey to Canada made the occasion of a discussion or consideration of any plan of empire defence by any member of the government, or by any official or officials of the government, acting under the authority of any minister of the crown?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, ordinarily I should say that a question of that character should stand until further opportunity was given to examine into its several implications, but in order that there may be no delay in dealing with so absolutely false a statement I take the immediate opportunity of stating that it is wholly without foundation. I shall examine the situation in detail to see if there is any phase of it to which any other answer should be given, but so far as the general statement and the statement made in the newspaper are concerned they are wholly without foundation.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

CAMPS FOR SINGLE, HOMELESS MEN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre) I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Stirling) how many of the single, homeless, unemployed men left the National Defence camps in the province of British Columbia during the month of December, how many of them have returned, and if any investigation has been held into their complaints.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) was good enough to give me notice of his question, and I think the best way in which I can answer it is to read to the house a telegram to the premier of British Columbia dated December 28, 1934:

You are of course aware that the camps established by the Department of National Defence for single homeless men were to ease the burden on the provinces, and to ensure that homeless men should not be without food, clothing and shelter, which are furnished by the federal government, together with a small daily allowance for necessities not provided in kind. No powers of compulsion are exercised and discipline is maintained only for the purpose of preserving the orderly conduct of the camps. The work is such as will prevent the deterioration of young men who are free to accept any employment that may offer. When work offered involved transportation, cost thereof is furnished by the Defence department.

All the provinces in which the camps were established are aware of these conditions.

On the seventh of December a delegation from the camps was received by you. On the invitation of your Minister of Labour, representatives of headquarters military district number eleven were present. The demands of the delegation were made known by one Shaw, alleged to be secretary of a camp workers' union. You explained the situation to the delegates who retired.

On Monday, the tenth, false rumours were circulated as to the action that was to be taken by your government. On Tuesday, the eleventh, it was apparent that a considerable number of men had left the camps and were congregating in Vancouver. On investigation it appeared that scrip had been issued, giving the men from the camps room and lodging at the Salvation Army headquarters for one week. Later a conference was held between Attorney General Sloan, Mr. Griffiths, provincial administrator, and a representative of military district number eleven, at which it was made clear that the only means for keeping men in the camps was the guarantee that they could not obtain relief elsewhere. It was pointed out that if relief were given, as had already been done in the case of several hundred who had congregated in Vancouver from the camps, it would almost be impossible to persuade men that by leaving the camps they would not obtain relief in Vancouver.

Your Minister of Labour gave written assurance that relief would not be provided to those who had left the camps for cause or of their own accord, and stated that the relief which had been given would be automatically cancelled from the fifteenth instant and not renewed.

We think it most undesirable that agitators should destroy the value of the camps which have been provided for homeless single men, and we seek your earnest cooperation to the end that the agitators may be dealt with by the attorney general's department as provided by law. In this regard please see my telegram of twenty-fifth February last to Attorney General Sloan. I trust you realize that but for the assistance given to the few who left the camps, the large numbers would not have congregated in Vancouver.

No investigation is necessary for the press and citizens have been invited to visit these camps ever since they have been established, and of one hundred and thirty applications which have been made for reinstatement in the camps, one hundred and twenty-three have been reinstated, which indicates the sympathetic disposition of the officers in charge to the problem with which they are dealing. The so-called black list included the names of those who have been told to leave the camps because their further presence involved the destruction of the very camps which have been established for the benefit of those who are the victims of propaganda.

R. B. Bennett.

That covers the situation at the end of December last, but to bring it up to date let me further add that the most recent report as of the seventeenth of January last is that there are at present no troubles in Vancouver. The men decided to go back into the camps and continue their organizing there. The revised figures are:

(a) Total discharged for cause or walked out during disturbances (covering month of December)	748
(b) Total applications for reinstatement, which includes men previously discharged	867
(c) Applications approved	628
Applications not approved	86
Applications held for further enquiries	153
Total	867

Every application for reinstatement is being carefully reviewed, and wherever there is reasonable probability of proper behaviour in future the man is accepted.

The records show conclusively that the officers in charge of this work have carried out their duties in a most sympathetic manner.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPRESENTATIONS OF EMPLOYEES RESPECTING EQUIPMENT CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask a question of the Minister of Railways. I have under my hand four communications, two letters and two telegrams, from different associations of the Canadian National Railway employees in the city of Stratford, and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I propose to read the shortest of the telegrams which will take only a moment. It is addressed to me at the House of Commons, and reads as follows:

> Press reports indicate that new equipment for Canadian National Railways may be constructed by private companies. Canadian National Railways employees protest such contracts as equipment can be advantageously constructed in Canadian National repair shops. Respectfully request that you use your influence for this work to be done by the Canadian National Railways in their own shops, whereby former employees may be returned to work. A reply would be appreciated.
> J. Thomas.

My question to the minister is this: Is he prepared to-day to make any statement to the house and to the country in connection with this matter, or would he prefer to make it to-morrow or within the next two or three days.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, the same telegram I assume came to me among many others. There were many telegrams and letters from various sections of the country that were based upon a statement in the press which was not an official statement of any kind, and my reply to all the telegrams and letters has been that the matter has not been decided upon by the government; that there have been proposals put to the government for equipment by railway car equipment companies, but that no decision of any kind has been arrived at.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau). Is the shipping bill, as passed last session, in effect in Canada, and if not would the minister be good enough to make a short statement why it has not been proclaimed?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): The query of my hon. friend will be taken as a notice of question, and I shall give an answer within two or three days.

FIRST NARROWS BRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. MUNN (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works if, after some delay, they have yet arrived at a conclusion in regard to the application respecting the First Narrows bridge?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I will answer that question, Mr. Speaker, because it is not a matter affecting the Department of Public Works; it is a matter affecting the Department of External Affairs.

The First Narrows bridge, as I explained last year, is to cross the entrance to the harbour of Vancouver. The harbour of Vancouver has been constructed, and the facilities made available, largely at the expense of the taxpayers of Canada. It is a national port, the only port of consequence upon the Pacific coast able to take care of large traffic. The port of Prince Rupert has not been available for traffic to the extent that was originally thought, and Vancouver cares for most of the traffic on the Pacific slope. The ratepayers of North Vancouver, which is the name of the territory on the north side of the fairway or entrance to Vancouver harbour have approved of the construction of this bridge—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And those of Vancouver too.

Mr. BENNETT: The ratepayers of Vancouver city proper, on the south side of the fairway or entrance, have also approved. The whole area may be called Greater Vancouver.

The proposals contemplate a wire suspension bridge. The only question that this government has to consider is whether or not in the public interest it shall agree to the plans. It has no concern with respect to the arrangements made by the private interests who are promoting the undertaking, nor with the attitude of the communities with respect to its construction. But all Canada is vitally interested in the facilities at the port of Vancouver. The fairway or entrance to the harbour there is narrow, and it is impossible to make it much wider, for on the south side is Stanley park, and on the north side you have the solid foundation of the territory called North Vancouver. It follows therefore that the only question was how far north the pier should be constructed to which the suspension bridge is to be attached on the north side. The government requested the private interests promoting this enterprise to satisfy them that the pier could not be constructed any farther north than was proposed. For if it were not as far north as was physically possible, having regard to the surrounding territory, it followed that the fairway could not be widened, as no dredging could take place between the pier and the north shore. The question is purely one of the public interest. We were not unaware of the great responsibility that attaches to approving of a scheme that would render it impossible for seventy-five years to widen the fairway at the entrance to Vancouver harbour. Recently it has been indicated to the government that the north pier might possibly be constructed fifty feet or more farther north, and that owing to the physical conditions that exist on the southern side, that is in Stanley park, the pier there might be erected a little farther north, with the result that the fairway might be slightly widened. The matter is still under consideration, but I thank the hon. gentleman for bringing it to the attention of the house. It is in no sense a matter of public works or marine and fisheries or anything of the sort, it is a matter of the welfare of the whole of western Canada, and in part of eastern Canada also, and we are fearful lest any mistake be made that would limit the usefulness of Vancouver harbour by lessening the possibility of making a very narrow fairway as wide as possible, to serve the commerce of the world.

HALIFAX-DARTMOUTH BRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): May I ask the Prime Minister what the position is as to his promise of 1930 in regard to a bridge from Halifax to Dartmouth?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I am happy to be able to advise the hon. gentleman that that proposal has been abandoned by those who made it. And it may interest him to know that recently the residents of that part of Nova Scotia residing on the Dartmouth side of the harbour of Halifax have suggested another scheme which engineers of the Department of Railways and Canals are now investigating.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. W. E. ROWE AND SECONDED BY MR. C. N. DORION

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. W. E. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe) moved:

That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, to offer the humble thanks of this house to His Excellency for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both houses of parliament.

He said: Mr. Speaker, before asking the indulgence of this house to consider His Excellency's most gracious speech, may I take this opportunity to thank the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) for giving me the privilege of speaking on this occasion, and also to express to him the appreciation of the people of the riding of Dufferin-Simcoe which I have had the honour to represent in this house during the past ten years. I am sure that there are many things that we all hold in common in this house and that despite the disagreements and differences of opinion that we may have had concerning other speeches from the throne, we are agreed that at this time we have to consider one of the most important ever presented to parliament. However, I am sure that we are in common agreement in extending our thanks, and good wishes to His Excellency, as His Majesty's loyal representative in Canada, and also to Her Excellency Lady Bessborough for the coming year. They are not only noble representatives of the crown but also descendants of the two great races that were so conspicuous in the development of Canada in the earlier years.

Let me also congratulate the hon. members who have been so recently elected to this parliament. I extend my felicitations—it is a pleasure indeed to do so—to the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Stirling) and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson) on their appointment to these high offices, and I congratulate the government as well on selecting two such admirable representatives, one from the historical province of New Brunswick, and the other from the beautiful province of British Columbia. I am sure that those who have been closely associated with these hon. gentlemen appreciate the combination of ability, long experience and integrity that they bring to the discharge of their responsible duties, thus giving additional strength to this government.

I also congratulate the Prime Minister on returning to this parliament in such apparent good health and vigour after a year of great activity. It is I believe generally recognized throughout Canada that with respect to energy, ability and integrity he is unsurpassed by any Prime Minister in the history of Canada. I also extend my compliments to the leader of His Majesty's loyal opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). I am glad to see that he has returned to this parliament evidently restored to health and vigour. I have always had a good deal of sympathy with the leader of the opposition, lately especially, because I feel that even though his silence has been most conspicuous his task is none the less difficult.

The speech that has been presented to this parliament is indeed an outstanding one. Frankly, it is the most important document that I have ever heard read to this house since I entered it in 1925. It has indeed arrested the imagination of the Canadian people.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWE: I am glad that those who sit to the left of the Speaker say hear, hear; at any rate the speech has arrested their surprise. It gives a vivid report of a government that has courageously met the national necessities by advanced legislation which has been presented in rapid succession during these years of crisis, and I have no doubt that when this house considers the speech from the throne from an unbiased point of view it will accept it as a fair plan of assured progress in the future. Moreover, when our people throughout the country read it they will be satisfied, I have no doubt, not only with the proposals that are therein contained but more particularly with the fact which it indicates, that this is not the beginning but the continuance of reform measures that are already on the statute books.

I should be derelict in my responsibilities, especially representing as I do a riding which is engaged chiefly in agriculture, and seeing that I am myself and always have been engaged in agriculture, if I did not thank His Excellency for the reference to the evidences of this government's continued interest in that great basic industry. I believe that I speak not only for the farmers of that part of Ontario but for those who are engaged in this great industry from one end of Canada to the other, when I say that they deeply appreciate what the government has endeavoured to do to assist agriculture in these very difficult years. The farmers in the drought area of Saskatchewan, and to a lesser extent those in Alberta and Manitoba, must fully appreciate the assistance which the government has extended to them in their hour of greatest need. I am sure they are also fully conscious at the present time of the intention of the government to extend its services and the assistance it has given to agriculture through the extension of the credit system, by a survey of the whole debt structure of the country, and by amendments to the different acts which have been passed. I have no doubt that those who have benefited, thousands in western Canada and hundreds in the eastern provinces and in old Ontario, fully appreciate what has been done under The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, which is the first attempt that any government has made to give the farmer a second chance in order that he may relieve himself of his burden of debt.

I am satisfied, further, that those who are interested in the expansion of agriculture, not only individually but from the general standpoint of the community, will greatly appreciate the amendments to the Farm Loan Act of last year as well as the proposals contained in the speech from the throne at the present time. And probably I speak on behalf of a wider range of the population when I express appreciation of this interest in agriculture, especially in view of the benefits derived from the imperial trade agreements, and the assurance which the speech from the throne gives us of an expansion of empire markets. I do not think that there are any members in this house, even those who sit to the left of the Speaker, who to-day would vigorously condemn the imperial trade agreements. I am satisfied that after they have learned, as every other citizen of Canada has learned, that we have developed through the imperial trade agreements a freer trade arrangement within one-quarter of the whole world—than at any other time in the last quarter of a century—they will join with the farmers of these old provinces in the east, the mixed farmer, the live stock producer, the bacon hog producer, in appreciation of the benefits that have been derived from the imperial trade agreements. I am gratified to know that the government is still desirous of expanding these markets by treaties with other countries and by consolidation of the arrangement with the mother country, with a promise to renew the agreements. This is not confined only to the live stock breeders of eastern Canada; I know that the apple producers of Nova Scotia as well as those of other parts of Canada realize what it means to them to have the advantage of $1.25 per barrel in the British market. I know that the wheat producers of the three western provinces, notwithstanding that in the drought area some of these districts have not been producing as abundantly in the past, appreciate the preference of 6 cents a bushel in the British market. There are of course some who will smile at this, but may I recall for their benefit the reason why the farmer so deeply appreciates these advantages.

I did not intend to refer to this matter, but I feel that there has been a misapprehension throughout the dominion and possibly a misunderstanding even in this house. Many people have believed and have endeavoured to have others believe that the high tariff reforms of the present government, put into operation in 1930 had something to do with the closing of markets overseas; and many have sought to convey to the public the impression that the imperial trade agreements had also something to do with the closing of those markets. It is needless for me to remind the house, however, that this is further from the fact than anything could be; it is the reverse of the fact, because the tariff reforms that were found necessary in 1930, and the imperial trade agreements which were inaugurated in 1932, were the consequence of markets having been already closed to the farmers of Canada. Between the year 1922 and the year 1930 practically every great market of the world had been closed to the products of our farmers. Take Czechoslovakia for instance; wheat had been entering free and a tariff of $1 a bushel was put on, before this government came in. The tariff in Germany was raised to 98 cents, it was raised in France from 12 cents to 85 cents, and in Italy it was raised to 73 cents. In Japan the tariff against our bacon was raised from ½ cent to 5 cents per pound. The tariff against wheat entering China and Japan was raised to 40 cents a bushel. There was not a solitary market left to Canadian agricultural products in 1930 save the United Kingdom.

them was enlarged, giving to Canadian products a preference which has meant an annual increase in exports of over $40,000,000 and has saved Canadian agriculture from absolute ruin. I need not go over the advantages, for they are felt by everyone living on the land from one end of the country to the other. The benefits are felt by the fur producers of Prince Edward Island as well as by the fruit and poultry producers of British Columbia. They extend to the other primary industries of Canada. The lumbermen of British Columbia exported more lumber during the year following the agreements than they had done in any year since 1921. I am satisfied that the mining interests of old Ontario and Quebec as well as of other parts of Canada fully appreciate the fact that they have trebled their exports to the United Kingdom since the coming into operation of the imperial trade agreements; nor have I any doubt that every one who is interested in Canadian progress at the present time feels that those trade agreements should receive approval, especially in view of the fact that an increase of over 50 per cent in trade has been brought about as a result entirely of the agreements. I am not surprised therefore that those who vigorously opposed the imperial trade agreements when they were presented now reluctantly approve of them in the country.

In the speech from the throne it is true there are many proposals of reform. There are proposals to extend the advantages that have been given to agriculture and as one interested in agriculture I believe those proposals will tend to bring about an all-round improvement. I have always been strongly of opinion that if we are to have any guaranteed insurance for the future prosperity of agriculture, it must be to no small degree through the expansion of the mining, lumbering and industrial activities of this dominion. The survey relative to our debt structure and proposed extension of credit will, I hope, stimulate not only agriculture but industry. I believe the reforms that are proposed will be more equally divided among those who are labouring in those industries so that our whole standard of living may be improved, thereby automatically bringing about an improvement in every industry in this dominion.

I am very much impressed with the fact that in these proposals we have evidence of the sincerity of the government. Some of them are now on the order paper; many are already on our statute books and while some may challenge the right of the present government to bring about the enactment of these reform measures, when one considers that the present government have had enacted more measures of reform, more advanced legislation, during the last year than any other Canadian government in five years, I think that is a good reason that the present government should have the right to continue.

It is an old and true adage that "the best of integrity is in one's day of adversity." Canada has been severely tested during the last four or five years. In order to review the progress that she had made we should recall the period that immediately preceded the advent of the present government. We recall the period of 1929 when every store-house in every importing country of the world was overstocked with unsold commodities. We remember the great stock market crash prior to 1930 when approximately four billion dollars worth of Canadian securities disappeared and thousands and thousands of fortunes were lost. We appreciate how in that period of world economic depression by 1932 world trade had shrunk to one-third and thirty million men stood idly by looking for jobs. Canada, it is true, had a share in that depression and while the government of the day were busily engaged in meeting those gigantic problems changing from day to day, with new and advanced measures of legislation, there were many in the country who preferred to put the blame for the whole situation on the present Prime Minister or the government of the day. May I suggest that when since 1932 and 1933 we have seen a general improvement, a general incline upwards, when we have seen an unfavourable balance of trade which the government accepted when it assumed office, of $65,000,000 in 1929 jump to $159,000,000 in 1930 and then gradually diminish until to-day we find we have a favourable balance of $140,000,000 in visible trade and approximately $240,000,000 in trade visible and invisible, if there are still those in Canada who are so blind they will not see, they will surely read with graciousness the report of the League of Nations stating that Canada and the United Kingdom were leading the world back to prosperity. Therefore those who have blamed the present government for conditions prior to 1932 should in fair play extend to the Prime Minister and his government some credit for leading the world back to prosperity.

I know this has not been achieved in any easy manner; I know the credit is not all due to the government of to-day; as one who has been closely associated with agriculture and deeply interested in labour conditions in this country, while the present situation may be considered and claimed by those who support the government to be a tribute to it,

I realize it is also a glowing compliment to the hardihood of the Canadian people. We believe that with their rugged character they have endured hardships in a way that no other people in the world have done. On the other hand we are also aware of the fact that when it was necessary to bring in new measures of reform the government was not sitting idly by, it had not a policy of do nothing, of letting the law of supply and demand govern, of laissez faire, of letting things find their own level, but steadily with one step forward after another, it passed a constant succession of new measures. In 1930 the government passed the tariff reform measure and the relief measures. This was followed in quick succession by an emergency act for peace, order and good government, by the Farmers' Creditors' Arrangement Act, the Natural Products Marketing Act, the imperial trade agreements, an amendment to the Farm Loan Act, the price spreads investigation, and all the other measures that may be of minor concern but are still of great importance. Is it any wonder that the man who has been at the head of the government for four or five years and who was accepted in Canada in 1930 as the man of the hour has since been admired by the world as a man of action?

In this year of 1935 I feel not only is the speech from the throne important because it contains a more favourable report and more proposals for progressive legislation in the future than any other speech from the throne to which I have ever listened, but it is more important because it comes in this year—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROWE: —and after all the Canadian people stand behind the government in their authority. I am glad to see my hon. friends still smiling despite their hopeless outlook.

In this country there are three lines of political thought and I know they will be investigated and seriously considered during the coming year. There are two or three, sometimes more, but particularly three distinctive lines of political thought in any country that carries on a similar party system of government. We have that radical line of thought which would suggest inflation, which would socialize industry. In Canada as in every other country there is that radical element that would say in the time of crisis: We will break down the whole structure, we will cast it all aside. Then there is that other element, very often called liberalism, that all through the ages has shown that it sticks to a fixed principle, that its followers believe in an endeavour to cling to the old order of things.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROWE: Hon. gentlemen may laugh but if they will read English history they will find that what I say is absolutely true. Having sat in this house for some years I am more convinced than ever that what I say is true despite the fact that my hon. friends opposite may endeavour to smile it off. I know we have been impressed in this house as others have been in the British house, how liberalism has endeavoured to cling to a form of rigid constitutional repose when any reforms are suggested. So far as the other line of political thought is concerned, that which I believe is truly represented by the government of the day, I believe the Conservative party in Canada, as has been the case in the old land has proven that it has to its credit a list of social reforms, regulation of business and financial acts that stands as a credit to its record. I think Lord Tennyson well said:

> That man's the true Conservative
> Who lops the moulder'd branch away.

I know that at present in this house and throughout the country there are many who would not agree with that idea. May I remind you, Mr. Speaker, of the spectacle we saw in this parliament during the period of crisis; I know that everyone within the sound of my voice will bear me out when I say that from what we saw coming from this side of the house, Tennyson was right. This government has passed more advanced legislation than has been put through in the last twenty-five years. But what has been the sentiment of hon. gentlemen opposite during that time? I well recall when we passed the measure relating to the maintenance of peace, order and good government during those days of emergency. I remember how the leader of His Majesty's loyal opposition, and others behind him, fought for days because they thought the measure unconstitutional, and they said we must not put through that act. I also recall, when the farmers from one end of Canada to the other were pleading for relief, how these same constitutional barriers were brought up. I remember that when the farmers had their backs to the wall and faced insolvency the farmers-creditors relief measure was put through parliament, and I remember that hon. gentlemen opposite called it unconstitutional also. I also recall the Natural Products Marketing Act and, as a farmer, I believe I speak for the most successful farmers in Canada when I express their appreciation for the most advanced, important and beneficial piece of legislation, so far as agriculture is concerned, that has been passed by this parliament since confederation. I well recall, when that act was before us, how the leader of His Majesty's loyal opposition and his supporters, who smile to-day, argued that the measure was unconstitutional and should not be passed.

I could go on down the line and give many more examples, but I ask, who has the right to reform; who has the right to continue? This is no rapid change. This is no new policy. This is the continuation of a policy whose sincerity is attested by more reform measures than have been placed upon the statute books by any other government.

I have no right to anticipate what action will be taken by hon. members of this house with regard to the speech from the throne, though I have a good idea of how it will be treated. I do know, however, that there are those who sit to your left who have indicated, by interviews in the press, that they believe that this reform is coming too late. I know that there are those who ask why this did not come two or three years ago, while I am sure there are some, quite close to the leadership of the opposition, who believe it is coming too soon. I know that on the street corners throughout this country—and perhaps in parliament, because sometimes they speak more frankly on the street corners than we do in parliament—it will be said that the Conservative party has stolen the policy of the Liberal party. I know that will be said on many occasions. Well, if that ever was their policy they never followed it. I know that people throughout the Dominion of Canada, and especially the younger people, the boys and girls who are coming out of our universities, who have learned that science leads the way to the very heart of things, will ask if it is not time that science was allowed to unfold the theory of greater social justice. I know that these boys and girls, who have read the speech from the throne with interest, will read the record of the present government, and will ask their seniors to consider carefully this year, or whenever they may be called upon to consider it, whether we do not want the reform that is outlined. I know they will say that, from the national necessities that confront us, their only hope for wider opportunities for themselves and their fellow Canadians not only in the way of employment but also in the way of security against old age and illness, is through more legislative reform than we have had in the past. I know they will say that it is now their duty to take an interest in public affairs and say who is to form the government for the future, and I feel satisfied that they will say that it is not only their duty to consider the record of the government of the day and carefully weigh their proposals for the future, but that it is also their duty to scan the record of those who seek authority. To do that I am sure they will go to the library and look up the political platforms of 1893 and 1919, but they will search in vain for any sign of social reform. After they search they will find that only two outstanding reforms in Canada can be credited to the opposition. They will find first the railway commission, which was established in 1905 for a noble purpose indeed. The Liberal party established that commission to solve a problem of their own creation; it has laboured ever since, but the problem is greater than ever. They will find that among the policies proposed in 1919 was the enactment of the famous Combines Investigation Act, and they will find that this was the only reform policy carried out from 1921 to 1930. They will know how that has worked in the interests of the common man, how it has worked to help the labouring man, how it has worked to protect us against combines and monopolies, which were organized more rapidly during those nine years than during any other twenty-five years in the history of Canada. In that time we had five hundred smaller concerns amalgamated into one hundred and twenty large concerns, many of which recently have been investigated.

I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that when these young people take all these points into consideration they will conclude that the government which now proposes further reform has given a clear indication of its sincerity by those measures to which I have referred, which already have been placed on the statute books.

At the same time, as I have already said, I believe there are matters in which we meet on common ground. I believe I speak for all hon. members of the house when I compliment the government on having so fittingly commemorated the landing of Jacques Cartier on this continent. That celebration recalls what an important part the members of his great race have played in the development of Canada, and it also reminds us how short a time one hundred years is in the development of a country. We realize how the old prejudices and differences of class, race and creed have been superseded by mutual understanding. We realize also that the original two great races have become, together with the other races in Canada, a solidly united force working for a common progress.

We contemplate with similar pleasure and satisfaction the coming celebration of the silver jubilee of the reign of His Majesty King George. I am sure that we feel that the bond of our allegiance to the empire has meant a great deal in the past, and I feel that it is stronger than ever at the present time, due perhaps to the times through which we have been passing. We have watched, with satisfaction and pleasure, the influence of the British empire throughout the world at various times when the forces of dissatisfaction seemed to threaten our very civilization. So we have every confidence in the future, and we believe that our children's children will appreciate to a greater degree what that allegiance stands for, because the test of that appreciation comes in our days of adversity.

I do not propose to keep this house longer. It is my pleasure to move, seconded by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Dorion) that an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General to offer the humble thanks of this house to His Excellency for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both houses of parliament.

Mr. C. N. DORION (Quebec-Montmorency) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it is a redoubtable honour to be called upon, one of the very first, to open the debate on the Address in reply to the speech from the throne. I feel that this honour falls to the lot of the official minority of the country as well as to those kindly constituents who, in 1930, were good enough to charge me with representing them on the floor of this parliament. Heir to a mandate that so many illustrious names have made famous, that brought to this Chamber the Chauveaus, the Carons, the Fitzpatricks, the Pelletiers, the Casgrains, I should like at least as a modest disciple, to be the bearer here of something of the convictions that always guided their every act in public life. Those great public men took real pleasure in visiting as frequently as possible this riding with its twenty-five parishes scattered about the foothills of the Laurentides and on the Ile d'Orléans, where the inhabitants, more than elsewhere, have kept intact their pride of race and the nobility of their customs. Hence it is in their name, on behalf of the thousands of workers and farmers who go to make up almost the entire voting strength of the riding, on behalf of the salaried workers and their employers, the relations between whom are at the very foundation of justice and equity, and particularly on behalf of a numerically strong, and courageous youth whose ideals are still vibrant with the breath of life, that I intend to take part in the debate which has just begun.

It is meet that I should first express our regret at the resignation of him who, during the last four years, has presided with so much dignity and the freest independence over the deliberations of this honourable house. Always at his post, armed with a profound knowledge of parliamentary law, ever anxious to uphold for every one of the members the exercise of his rights and the enjoyment of his privileges, illness suddenly struck him at his task and forced him to retire to his member's seat. Those were the conditions under which you were called upon to succeed him, Mr. Speaker. The confidence thus shown you proves more eloquently and better than I might ever do, the extent to which your qualities are known and appreciated. Just as to your honourable predecessor we express our hope for his prompt recovery, in the same way are wafted up to you, sir, our homage and our heartiest congratulations.

It is also fitting to recall that with the year 1935 we are approaching the 25th anniversary of the coronation of Our Gracious Sovereign. The entire membership, I feel sure, will permit me to renew, in all humility, the expression of our attachment, of our loyalty and of our admiration. What a glorious reign, and how pregnant with history! What a fruitful and active career! What a series of imposing events have passed before our eyes since, on the death of Edward VII, His Majesty George V ascended the throne, and took in hand the rudder of the British Empire! While in other countries, throughout the universe, the most varied political systems were made and unmade, turned topsy-turvy; while here and there thrones that appeared as solid as a rock, were overthrown in tumult amid the violent shocks of revolution; while immediately after the armistice certain countries let down their masters, laid down their arms and launched headlong into the most venturesome experiments, the British Empire, thanks to Our Sovereign, thanks to wise guidance and the flexibility of British institutions, has remained intact and unshakeable.

Descendent of a Basque who, towards 1680, left France to till the soil at Charlesbourg, offspring of eight generations of ploughmen who remained faithful to their rights, to their language and to their traditions, a number of whom served as militia captains under the English regime, I am none the less proud to belong to a British nation and to have a share in the freedom, whose supreme safeguard, may I say, is the Royal Family. And if, at times, we Canadians of French origin, have had to fight for the maintenance of our rights; if we have had to defend our heritage against the encroachments of the conqueror, our well-intentioned English-speaking countrymen, and they are greatly in the majority, will assuredly bear witness to our unflinching fidelity to the flag, to our treaties and to the constitution of this country.

Protected by that flag, relying on the substance of those treaties, and on the spirit as well as the letter of our constitution, we will never cease to demand justice and to exact the full blossoming of our liberties. If certain bureaucrats are still tainted with a spirit of francophobia; if, in certain departments we, of French origin, are obstinately refused the representation to which we are entitled; if, in certain places there be some who persist in the attitude of conquerors, we shall never cease to recall that we are at least the descendants of those who first occupied this country and hence are entirely at home here, not only in the province of Quebec, but throughout the length and breadth of Canada, repeating to ourselves the well-known sentence uttered by our chief himself: "You, gentlemen, are true Canadians."

Before speaking these words, the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada had accomplished certain things which gave proof of his broad-mindedness and which, quite properly, brought the applause of my compatriots. Despite the political partizanry of certain of our opponents, the Conservative party, with the support of such outstanding personalities as the hon. member for Labelle, enacted at the last session a bill, the purpose of which was the centralization of the federal translation services. It is pursuant to this act, that henceforth, as the hon. Solicitor General stated in Montreal, all the reports of the various departments, as also the debates of parliament, will be published simultaneously in English and in French. Of all the monuments that, on the occasion of the 400th anniversary of the discovery of Canada, have been erected to the glory of Jacques Cartier, this law and the results it has brought us this year are assuredly the most eloquent and the best fitted to perpetuate the work and the memory of the great navigator from St. Malo.

Mr. Speaker, last week it was given us to listen to the very moving speech from the throne. With religious attention we listened to a description of the present situation in this country and to the reforms that the government fully intends to bring about. Certain of our colleagues in this chamber have sat here for a great many years as the representatives of their constituents. I do not believe a single one of them will contradict me when I say that never, since confederation, has a speech from the throne been more imposing, more substantial, more fitted to revive confidence and to satisfy the legitimate demands of all the classes of our society. It was truly meet that the eminent statesman who, in 1931, came home from England with the Statute of Westminster, the definitive charter of our constitutional liberties, should gratify us now with another charter, no less important for the life and the salvation of our country, the great charter of our social freedom and economic liberation.

Like the more intelligent governing authorities of our time, the right honourable Prime Minister of Canada has grasped the very grave nature of the present situation. As he recalled during the very first of his series of speeches which raised to the highest peak the confidence of Canadians, and left speechless the most loquacious of our opponents, the economic system must be reformed whatever the cost: "Great changes" (I quote) "social as well as economic, have taken place in the life and in the organization of every people, grievously upsetting the operation of the established system. What we call the crash of 1929 was in reality the crash of the system: the mechanism was worn out."

A brilliant French economist, Lucien Romier, has told in striking fashion the story of the evolution of capitalism, the road it has followed since the war, the disgraceful state it is falling into to-day. He recalls that in olden times credit had but one source: thrift. The undertakings thus born kept their individual or family characteristics, they were free and independent. At the head of them were to be found real employers, people who were directly interested, whose invested capital did not come from the small savings of lesser people, but was their own money, fruit, very often, of the toil and thrift of several succeeding generations.

Before launching into divers enterprises, more or less certain, before risking fortunes acquired through so much toil and honesty, they weighed things carefully and measured in advance the consequent responsibilities. Before taking a single step forward they would quietly feel with their foot the path before them, to make sure that there was no hollow space anywhere beneath, no hidden bog to entrap them.

All was measure, balance, honesty. A good reputation was as important in such undertakings as was the capital itself. There was no question of turning out goods beyond the consumer's needs, of setting up machinery far too costly and of a useless luxury, to experiment ceaselessly. I know of certain businesses in the city of Quebec which were founded on these methods; they have waxed wealthy thereby and during the present depression they have been a shining example. I could mention many of these men in commerce and in industry, who are well known and solidly established, who never had recourse to the thousand and one tricks that are fashionable in the world of high finance, and which the royal enquiry begun last year has shown up in all their hideousness, together with their baleful consequences.

By the side of, and to the detriment of, this sound, honest, worthy capitalism, has sprung up another form of capitalism, infinitely less appealing; it brought with it a host of fraudulent, shady tricksters, who, often under cover of our laws, have exploited the people, deceived the public, and lived opulently at their expense. In this way the multitude of individual fortunes and of independent enterprises, with their character of personal liability which was their guarantee, have been replaced little by little, by groups of capitalists, banking syndicates, industrial mergers, and combines of all kinds, sometimes, but not often, of public necessity—like the railways for instance—but generally to the direct detriment of the masses.

Under the false pretense of developing industry, of opening up natural resources, of improving trade and commerce, even those entrusted with the responsibility of government were caught in this net, offered the schemers the credit of their names, the grace of their privileges and even the help of their laws. In the province of Quebec, which was a veritable paradise for this sort of thing, our raw materials, our water-powers, forests, mineral deposits, in a word all that might ensure our well-being fell into the hands of a few people, whose sole object to-day is to exploit our population. It is with unmentionable cynicism and sans-gêne that the Taschereau administration threw away our inheritance, in return for the appointment, as corporation directors, of several of their ministers.

In one of his speeches prime minister Taschereau himself gave the following figures which tell quite a story about such business methods: In 1920 we had 100 paper mills, and 109 in 1930. The production, in 1920, was valued at $100,000,000; by 1930 it had more than doubled, reaching $215,000,000. But here is the interesting side of the story: In 1920 this industry represented an investment of only $22,000,000; but by 1930 the figure had risen to $714,000,000, some thirty-three times the original capital. A little figuring will show you that if production had increased, in 1930, in proportion to investment, it would have reached the fabulous sum of $3,245,000,000. As to salaries, there was no change whatever: In 1920, 31,000 employees received $45,000,000; and in 1930, 33,000 employees received the same amount, $45,000,000.

To me these figures appear overwhelming. While they indicate a shameful overcapitalization, encouraged, authorized, legalized, by those entrusted with political power, they show, at the same time, to what extent such business practices are prejudicial to the workingman, and how little the latter is protected. It is exploitation not only of money-capital; it is especially, as has been said, the exploitation, or rather the enslavement, of human capital.

Last year serious trouble occurred in the Abitibi lumber camps; and a few individuals were sentenced to prison. Is it really surprising that such seditious occurrences should take place when these corporations, under cover of our laws, obtain their labour on derisive terms, take advantage of unemployment and of the supreme necessity for the worker to earn his livelihood, and really speculate on extreme poverty and human misery? To remedy such a state of things the Canadian people have never been able to rely on the disciples of Liberalism who, forgetting the facts and the pitiable state of our proletarians, prate—like Mr. Taschereau, for example—of the uselessness of all social legislation and upbraid all interference, by the state, in business.

It remained for a Conservative government to champion at last the radical remedies needed to cure these ills and to bring back to the minds of these egotists the great laws of justice and of social charity. The speech from the throne informs us that we shall have a Minimum Salary and Wage Act, and that the hours of labour will be strictly controlled. Contrary to the opinion of Liberal economic theorists, the old law of supply and demand is, in the matter of wages, most unfair and the cause of disorders of the worst kind. It is not sufficient to ensure the worker a certain remuneration, even if he accepts it; what must be done is to pay him a decent wage, a fair salary, one that will allow him to provide for himself and his family.

I have mentioned the paper industry to illustrate the kind of capitalism that this Conservative government intends to fight to the bitter end. What shall we say, now, of the innumerable corporations which go to make up the power trust, against which our own economists have launched one of the most ardent and most vigorous campaigns? In a most painstaking study Dr. Hamel, of Quebec, proved, figures in hand, that the Montreal Light, Heat & Power Company pockets a return of 70 per cent on an investment that has already been repaid four times over.

A last example among a hundred: the organization of Canada Power & Paper. With assets of $58,000,000 distributed among several companies already overcapitalized, they have found some way to set up a new company with an alleged capitalization of $168,000,000, without adding one bit to the real assets of the company or increasing their value in any way whatsoever.

This unhealthy capitalism, born of the greed for gain and the absence of all Christian spirit, has been upheld partly by the perversion of our economic system and the favour of certain legislators too irresolute or too weak-willed to react vigorously and legislate in such a way as to punish the malefactors and make them desist from their immoral practices. Last year the Conservative government made radical amendments to our federal Companies Act, made it better, more drastic, more in consonance with the immutable laws of justice. This year the speech from the throne takes up this theme once more. In accordance with his plan of social and economic restoration, the right hon. Prime Minister of this country intends to protect the thrifty against exploitation and to put an end to the evils which were in large measure responsible for the crisis through which we have just passed. The issuing of shares with no par value, source of the most fraudulent dealings, should be prohibited, and all who transgress the law, instead of being merely made to pay a fine, should be treated as common criminals.

The dual jurisdiction, provincial and federal, sets up very real obstacles, a problem that our legislators should strive to solve. What would be the use of our federal statutes respecting companies if speculators can still invoke our provincial legislation? Uniformity in such matters is imperative. It would be absurd to declare criminal what elsewhere would barely be thought illegal.

At the time of the inquiry into the affairs of the Beauharnois we had occasion to realize how disastrous could be the consequences of this dual jurisdiction. Millions of dollars were literally swallowed up by this gigantic undertaking, so carefully promoted by unscrupulous financiers, and organized and brought into being through the connivance of venal politicians and thanks to the unpardonable approval of Liberal governments at Quebec and at Ottawa. As is usual in such matters, the investigation conducted by the Conservative ministry brought out the fact that part of the money taken from the people's savings had been diverted from its proper purpose, had gone to fatten campaign funds, to purchase influence and satisfy the appetites of certain friends of the party in power. Rumour has it that this same company is presently striving to obtain further privileges from the federal authorities. We have full confidence that the government, before granting this request, will exact all the necessary guarantees for the protection of what is left of the money already invested in the enterprise, and will make doubly sure that any such new powers will not further encourage the development of the Power Trust that dominates the province of Quebec.

It will always be to the honour of the Conservative government of 1930 that, with uncommon persistence, it turned the searchlight full on the darkest corners of our commerce and of our industry. Following the probe into the affairs of the Beauharnois Company, an enquiry no less interesting was ordered by the hon. minister of Labour, into the organization of the Coal Trust and the scandalous profits it had amassed on the border-line of the Act respecting combines. It is to be noted, Mr. Speaker, that this form of exploitation is not of very recent origin. On February 13th, 1923, under a Liberal administration, when the federal parliament was amending the act, the hon. member for Winnipeg denounced the trust on the very floor of this house, and begged the government to intervene. Despite the magnificent promises made in reply by the right hon. leader of the opposition, then Prime Minister, we had to wait for a change of government before, at long last, the voice of the people was heard, heeded and respected.

Nevertheless the inadequacy of the said Act of 1923 has been more than proven. Rather than make the guilty parties common criminals as suggested by the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, the act allowed them to avoid any unpleasantness with the courts by paying a fine which might reach as high as $25,000. Once the thing was done, the companies had merely to resume their combine practices so prejudicial to the public interest. The Coal Trust, in our province, has been condemned; but prices to-day are higher than ever before, and independent competitors find organization and development impossible. On this question also the speech from the throne makes precise statements which will doubtless prove very tiresome to the masters of finance, but which will surely bring rejoicing to the common people who want freedom and honesty in business.

The royal commission instituted last year and which, since that time, has pursued a relentless inquiry into the spread between production and consumption prices, has enriched the government of this country with a mass of substantial and fruitful evidence. With prejudice toward no one, but also without fear or favour, this governmental commission has done its utmost to discover the deep-lying causes of economic unrest, to bring to the searching light of day the why and the wherefores of the faulty distribution of wealth, and to provide the authorities of our country with all the information necessary for the emendation of our social and economic legislation, which thus will be brought more in consonance with the dictates of justice.

On this point, as on many another, reforms have already been instituted, reforms that our Canadian public have promptly taken advantage of. The Natural Products Marketing Act met with an enthusiastic reception from all classes of our population, but more particularly from the farming community, the members of which have up to now been the victims of parasitic enterprises, promoted against the interests of both producer and consumer, which strove to widen the gap between the two, and kept the cost of living abnormally high at a time when prices paid the producer were relatively low. To these reforms the Conservative government intends to add another by putting the benefits of these laws within reach of a still greater number of our citizens.

At a time of trying stress like that through which we have just passed, when nations everywhere put aside temporarily all internal dissension, we have witnessed in Canada the shocking spectacle of a narrow-minded, obstinate and, at times, senseless opposition to every governmental proposal. There must be criticism, opposition, destruction, at all costs. As was so eloquently recalled by the Prime Minister, those who under their administration had allowed the development of a false and artificial prosperity, the growth of a disgraceful and unwholesome capitalism, pushed their impudence to the extreme of trying to prevent the application of the remedies that their very own policy had made necessary.

Mr. Speaker, if we had not had to face a faulty distribution of wealth; if wise enactments had made the organizing of trusts and monopolies impossible; if as early as 1920 the doors had been closed to immigration; if the whole system of legislation initiated by the honourable leader of the Conservative party in 1930 and continued since had been established just after the war; when the honourable leader of the opposition came into power; in short, if honourable gentlemen opposite had been equal to their task, instead of being so lavish of vain words and thoughts about the happiness of mankind or universal disarmament, I sincerely ask you: Would the depression subsequent to the crash of 1929 have occurred? Would we have had, in so rich and so vast a country in relation to its population, to suffer so severely from the crisis?

As a matter of fact our Liberal friends are prone to forget that it was in 1929, under their own regime, that illusion started to vanish. It was indeed in 1929 that the masses became frantic, that business suddenly diminished, and that the plague of unemployment started to show its effect. The evil was done when the Conservative party came into power in 1930. However, thank God, the Canadian people had understood how serious the conditions were and called to their bedside a doctor possesed of remarkable strength and intuition. He set about the task with vigour and fully determined to overcome the evil, sparing neither his time nor his health, leaving aside all that was not in the sphere of his public duties, and risking, if need be, his popularity, better to accomplish the task which had been entrusted to him.

Commenting on the speeches which he delivered early this month, a newspaperman from L'Action Catholique, of Quebec, Mr. Eugene L'Heureux, wrote these most significant words: "Since he presides over the destinies of this Dominion, Mr. Bennett appears to us as a man uncommonly well gifted with intelligence and courage. Our sympathy for Mr. King and some of his colleagues does not prevent us from considering the present prime minister as a man uncommonly well fitted to govern in these very hard times." To those who may reproach him with his policy, we need but point out its benefits and excellent consequences in every field of national activity. If we are at last recovering; if the economic condition of the dominion improved to an unexpected degree, more especially since the last eleven months; if our farm production has increased by more than fifteen per cent; if our manufactures have been able to register an increase of at least eighteen per cent, we most certainly owe it to that system of agreements entered into by the various parts of the British Empire and to the various treaties that Canada made with other nations.

Employment increased by twenty-four per cent. The building trades recorded an advance of thirty-five per cent. Car loadings increased by fifteen per cent, which enabled our railways to improve their position and to raise their revenues by 11·5 per cent in the case of the Canadian National Railways, and 10·4 per cent for the Canadian Pacific Railway. Our international exchanges, importations and exportations, have increased 52 per cent over last year, leaving a trade balance of more than $124,000,000 in our favour.

Logically the tendency to improvement is bound to become stronger. The Bank of Canada will undoubtedly play a great part and is bound to be of great value to us. The farmer, on his land, feels better protected against the uncertainties of life and the difficulties with which he has been left so long to struggle. The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act is perhaps, among the good deeds of this government, that which produced the best results, and best served to restore courage and confidence among the creditors as well as the farmers themselves. One of my constituents who took advantage of the act, assured me that for the first time in three years he felt at ease, and that he never so heartily took to his daily labour.

Last year, in that same respect, we amended the Farm Loan Act in order to facilitate loans and thus to keep on his own land the most essential worker of our economic system, I mean, the toiler of the soil.

The speech from the throne informs us that we will do still better this year. I wonder whether we should not take away the administration of this act from the provinces. This duplication of jurisdiction does not appeal to me. How many times, in Quebec, did they try to throw certain cumbersome responsibilities on the Dominion government? How many legitimate requests were denied? How many inhuman proceedings were taken against poor farmers who were temporarily unable to meet their obligations. We should have a purely federal organization, absolutely free, and above all political parties, to which the working and carrying out of that law would be left entirely.

There are probably many more suggestions just as practical which could be made in connection with this government measure and also with many equally interesting problems. To give these problems, whether they be of a general or particular nature, a quick, adequate and really effective solution, the authorities have a right to depend on the co-operation of specialists, selected among the various business and social activities. It is with that understanding that the government informs us of the creation of a national economic council, "medium of deliverance and salvation," to use Mr. Eugene L'Heureux's words, who added the following very interesting comments in L'Action Catholique of January 16:

> "An era distinguished by a more intensive and more refined production than the preceding one, but in the course of which the proportion of men being a public charge increases, is not an era of progress; it is a backward step for civilization and a disgrace for the Christian world. None but satiated egotists could tolerate such disorder. The people responsible for that disorder are certain financiers, dictators of trade and industry, tormentors of the farmers and often bribers of public institutions. Until we have taken away from pretentious and incompetent people the control of the economic world to place it in the hands of the governing authorities acting on the advice of the best economists and sociologists of the nation brought together in an organization such as the Economic Council, that disorder will continue, with its hardships, its atrocities, its instigations to revolt. . . . That is why the prospect of an Economic Council at Ottawa really is cheerful."

The situation thus depicted by Mr. L'Heureux, who cannot be said to be a socialist, is that which I have attempted to describe in this already very long speech of mine, and it justifies more than ever the intervention of the state and the substitution of its power to that of the money interests. With the Liberal economic doctrine we had been used to leave to the individuals some prerogatives which essentially belong to the state and to ignore certain principles of government. If the people put themselves under the authority of a concrete power, of a master, it is because they have always felt the necessity of a proper equilibrium between the various classes of their community. The great theorist of the Thomistic school, in some pages still very much of present interest, although they were written in the thirteenth century, thus described the part of the government: "The state is the collective power that protects the free development of the individual faculties and sees that none usurps the right of another."

The plan put forward by the honourable Prime Minister and the reforms asserted in the speech from the throne will at last enable the state to recover the part which properly is its own. It will thus more easily promote the common welfare, correcting what is faulty and improving what is good. No more futile opposition, opposition of words and purely of a political nature. In the exceptionally peculiar circumstances that we are going through, in the face of these proposed reforms which the whole country has welcomed with joy and enthusiasm, and which are after all the logical sequence and like the completion of the government's achievements during the last five years, under the authority of a leader whose superior intelligence and courage all independent minds are pleased to acknowledge, we must necessarily work in unison, leave aside our respective prejudices, gather together in one alliance all the men of good will in the country.

It was to the men of good will that He who was bringing to mankind a cure for its miseries was addressing His message, twenty centuries ago. He came to revise the great truths of the Decalogue, which had been too long forgotten, as in our time. They were however, just as they are to-day, the only expressions of social justice, the only ones capable of reviving in this world the thoughts of peace, justice and charity.

Let us hope that we may honour again these prescriptions and recover these fundamental notions with their full christian meaning. Let us hope that we may contrive that the community recover its balance, that the state make use of its rights with regards to the rich and poor alike, that it be more and more the champion of the weak, of the common people, of the oppressed, the arbiter of uneven battles between the oppressor and his victims, the stern guardian or order against the forces of disorder. Let us hope that we may come back to the notion of a really humane capitalism, that shares in the moral virtues of thrift and loss, and will drive into contempt all these enterprises which persist in acting contrary to the dictates of justice.

And it is because I am confident that the reforms proposed in the speech from the throne are based upon these principles and calculated to bring happiness to our Canadian homes, that I have the honour, Mr. Speaker, of seconding the address of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is customary for the leader of the opposition, when he follows the mover and seconder of the address to extend his cordial congratulations to the hon. members upon the manner in which they have discharged their duties. This custom, like all other customs of parliament, has its foundation in a substantial reason. It is the rule, where the government can find it possible so to do, to ask newly elected members of the House of Commons to move and second the address, and this gives to the leader of the opposition the privilege of being the first to extend to political opponents his congratulations upon the manner in which each has delivered his maiden speech. Well, the fact is that, since parliament last assembled, we have had five by-elections, and as hon. gentlemen opposite know only too well, there is but one member out of the five who has been returned to the house who now occupies a seat on the government benches. The fact that this new member has not been asked to be one of the number either to move or second the address to my mind rather suggests that perhaps his speech would not be as welcome to the government as that of the gentlemen who have been selected for this purpose.

I might further draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to another fact, and that is that apart from the five vacancies which have been filled, this house meets to-day with four vacancies in its membership. They are vacancies in the constituencies of Halifax; St. Denis, Montreal; East Algoma, in Ontario; and Long Lake in Saskatchewan. There are, as I say, these four vacancies. Why is it that we have not had some newly elected member of the house from one or other of these constituencies to move and second the address? There are two possible reasons. One is that up to the present time the government has not seen fit to bring on by-elections to fill those vacancies, and the reason the government has not brought on those by-elections is that it feared that if they were brought on the results would be what they were in the last five by-elections. In other words, the government has lost confidence in itself, and lost so much confidence in the support it is likely to receive in the country that it would not venture even to bring on by-elections to fill vacancies that occurred—two of them in the month of September last, one of them on the first of October last, and the recent one on January the first. With respect to the last mentioned it would not be expected that that vacancy would be filled by this time, but with respect to the other three there can be no justifiable reason or excuse why this House of Commons should assemble for another session without its representation being as full and complete as it is possible for the government to make it. Had there been members returned from those constituencies I have no doubt the government would still have had to go to the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) and the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Dorion) to move and second the address, because in all likelihood the gentlemen who would have been returned would have now been sitting on this side of the house. Perhaps in the circumstances my hon. friends on the government side who have moved and seconded the address will pardon me if I am not too profuse in my congratulations in respect to what they have said. They are both becoming old members of the house. While I cannot congratulate them on what they have said, I can at least congratulate them on the rapidity with which they have followed their leader in making a volte face in relation to the policies which they have supported and advocated up to the present time. The new regime of regimentation in thought as well as in political action is being demonstrated very effectively by what we have thus far heard.

Now Mr. Speaker, may I thank the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe for his kindly reference to the health of the Prime Minister and myself. I am happy to say that I am in the best of health, and am happy to see the Prime Minister in such good health; I think we shall each require in the next few months all the health that may be vouchsafed us by a kindly Providence.

My hon. friend remarked that I had been conspicuous by my silence. I must thank him for drawing the attention of the house and the country to that circumstance. His leader has been telling the public over the radio that he encountered nothing but opposition from the leader of the opposition, that every time he has risen to put forth a reform, or has discussed anything in parliament for the well-being of the people, the leader of the opposition was there opposing him, and that his government had been opposed and opposed by those who sat opposite to them. Well, my hon. friend has at least drawn attention to the fact that as far as the Prime Minister's radio broadcasts are concerned he has had an open field, and had it all to himself. I cannot imagine anything that could be more congenial to him than a monopoly in any field, unless indeed it were in every field.

I should like to join with my hon. friend and his seconder in extending congratulations to the two hon. gentlemen who since our last gathering here have been appointed ministers of the crown, my hon. friend the member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) and my hon. friend the member for Yale (Mr. Stirling). Both these gentlemen have been members of this house for a long time. I could not help thinking when I read of their appointment how relieved they must have been to recall that early in this parliament the government, realizing its own weakness, had taken care to see that any hon. member who might be appointed to the government would not have to go back to the country and get the endorsation of his constituents. These gentlemen had not to follow that old custom. After all it was not such a bad custom. I had a certain sympathy with the idea of not obliging ministers to seek re-election immediately after a general election, but in cases for example, where appointments are made after a government has been in office three or four years and has failed during that time to carry out any of its promises, I think that the old custom of allowing the electorate an opportunity to express their views of the administration in as many ways and at as many times as may be possible is one that might well have been preserved. However, may I say that I think all of us on this side of the house are pleased that these hon. gentlemen have received at last such marked recognition of their abilities and their political services. I extend to them our very warm and cordial congratulations. If they will permit me to give them one little word of counsel as well, I would say that as from the signs of the times it would appear that their tenure of office is not likely to be very long, they should do all they possibly can in the time at their disposal to enhance their reputation as ministers of the crown, because this may be the last chance they will have.

My hon. friend, the former Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. MacLaren), the hon. member for St. John-Albert, who has retired, is I understand to receive in the course of a short time an appointment to a very high office in the gift of the crown as a reward for his resignation. That appointment might perhaps have been made sooner but for the fact that if thereby a vacancy had been occasioned a by-election would of course have been expected; but now we have reached the last session where it is the case that a vacancy may remain unfilled, provided it has not occurred prior to the session. So no doubt we shall be seeing the hon. member for St. John-Albert receive the high appointment which we understand is coming to him. May I say that when that appointment comes he will have the best wishes of all hon. members on this side of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We hope he may be long spared to fill the high office, as we believe he will, with every credit to himself and to his native province.

As to the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), we shall probably hear so much in the course of this session as to the circumstances surrounding his resignation that it may be as well for me not to comment upon it at the moment. There is, however, one pertinent circumstance which I think must be apparent to all, and that is that not only has the government realized the extent to which it has lost the confidence of the country as indicated, from its unwillingness to fill vacancies that already exist, but that the minister who resigned did so because he had no confidence in his prime minister. The ministry to-day is without the presence of the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce for the simple reason, as he has publicly stated and as is set forth in the correspondence which the Prime Minister tabled the other day, that he had not confidence in the Prime Minister's intention to carry out any reforms worthy of the name. These are all interesting circumstances and bear immediately upon the situation with which above all others this session of parliament is faced.

At this point I shall have to cease the compliments and come more immediately to the circumstances which have brought us together.

We have been told by the Prime Minister that the old order has gone. I must confess that when I think of what had occurred since the beginning of this new year, it seems that perhaps what the Prime Minister says is correct, that the old order has gone. But let us distinguish carefully as to what phase of the old order we refer. The old order is a pretty big order, if I may use that expression, embracing social conditions, industrial conditions, political conditions. Most of us as members of a British parliament had, I believe, rather hoped that the old order of parliamentary government as carried on under the British crown would be an order that would be preserved in this country, and not an order that we would discover was gradually disappearing, if not already gone. Let us stop for a moment to consider the old order of things as those of us who are members of this house recall it.

Usually when His Excellency the Governor General announced that he was summoning parliament and wished to have the attendance of hon. members in order that he might communicate to them the business for which he had called them together, hon. members waited until parliament was summoned to learn what the business was. They have felt that that was a courtesy at least that was owing to the sovereign or his distinguished representative. That custom as far as I am aware is one that has been followed in British parliaments everywhere, until this year. But someone greater in his own estimation than the crown's representative has appeared, and we are now beginning a new method of having the contents of the speech from the throne disclosed to the general public, before they are made known to hon. members of parliament. Is it not a time honoured custom, Mr. Speaker, that the speech from the throne is supposed, and rightly so, to be the first intimation to be given to hon. members of parliament with respect to the business for which they have been brought together at the call of the sovereign or his representative. Hon. members of parliament have not in the past become acquainted with the subjects which they were to discuss through the medium of newspapers or over the radio—by no means. They have usually waited—not very long; only a few weeks—until they had the privilege of meeting the sovereign's representative and hearing from his own lips what were the measures which upon the advice of his ministers were to be submitted to parliament. That old order apparently has gone, and I do not know that because of this fact we in Canada are any better off.

Further, it is customary where through the speech from the throne a government makes a statement of policy, or many statements of policy, for the ministry to have had ample opportunity carefully to consider and to mature the various plans proposed in the several policies. Whatever is contained in the speech is supposed to represent the carefully matured views of a united ministry, views that have been discussed in the cabinet, and which have been so formulated as to leave room for no possible divergence of opinion between colleagues. I wonder if that is the case to-day with respect to what appears in the present speech from the throne.

But let me go a step further, speaking of the old order which the present Prime Minister tells us is gone. Under the old order, when a prime minister put forth far-reaching policies, he was supposed to have sought and obtained the substantial backing of the members of his own party voluntarily given, not a backing that had been brought about by some order or command as under a Fascist regime. He was supposed to have had the benefit of the carefully thought out views of his party as expressed either at a convention or in conference or in the party caucus, so that he would be able to state without equivocation that the views and policies he was setting forth were those of the members of his party. Is it not true also that under the old order members of parliament, when they came together to discuss with ministers of the crown what were to be the policies, sought more or less to represent the views of the constituents who were members of their political party, and that in presenting those views they interpreted their party as meaning something more than simply their own membership. Is it not true that those for example who had been supporting them for years in the press as journalists, those who had been assisting them in various other ways to become a party in office and to be given the opportunity to make the laws of the country, were supposed to have been consulted? But what have we to-day? All this is completely changed.

The old order has gone, the Prime Minister tells us; yes, it has gone in regard to some of the things that are best, some of the things that make for security. The speech from the throne has a paragraph or two respecting the Prime Minister's plans with reference to social reform and security. But what is to become of the services and security that are to be given workers and industry if the very foundations of government are being made insecure by the method that is being taken to attain these alleged ends?

I would ask whether it is not a fact that, before His Excellency the Governor General had had any opportunity of acquainting hon. members with what was to be the business which they were called together to consider at this session, the Prime Minister of Canada himself had not declared over the radio in a broadcast that the speech from the throne would contain such and such measures, such and such policies, mentioning in specific language that they would be set forth in the speech from the throne. It may be that that is part of the new order, but I confess that, in these particulars, I rather like the old order, under which some courtesy is still extended to the crown, and some recognition taken of the crown's position in matters of the kind.

But let me go a step further. Do we not meet here to-day with statements of policy set forth in the speech from the throne, which members of the government themselves have had no opportunity carefully to consider? It is an open secret that many of the things which the Prime Minister said in his radio broadcast as to the policies of the Conservative party had never been the subject of discussion with his colleagues in council, that he was speaking on his own, giving his own plans? And in justice to my right hon. friend, it must be said that if you read his speeches you will find that he does not speak of the plans as being those of the government, but as "my plans". And we find the same thing with regard to the designation of the government. In all his speeches my right hon. friend talks about "my government". I have in my hand a copy of the speech from the throne and I find that His Excellency the Governor General has this expression, "My government has under consideration." Whose government is it anyway, may I ask? Is it the government of the present Prime Minister or is it the government of His Majesty's representative in this country, the Governor General of Canada? I suppose, as to which it is, is a matter of the new or the old order.

Now these by some may be said to be small things, but they indicate the difference between the old order and the new. Under the old order there was such a thing as collective responsibility of the ministry; ministers held office from the crown itself and were responsible to those who were elected as the people's representatives in the house. But under this new order which we are entering upon it is "my government"; not spoken by the king or his representative but by the Prime Minister. It is not "the government" but "my government", "my ministers". That is very significant; it is exactly what we see in Italy and in Germany. We find the leader of a political party there talking about "my government", "my ministers" and the like. As one German chancellor said with respect to some of his ministers and the conditions of government as carried on in a time of autocracy, "Everyone is free to speak his own mind, but God help the one that does." As I look at the vacant seat where the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce should be sitting to-day, I cannot help thinking that someone ventured to speak his mind but probably spoke a little too quickly. However, there is the position.

I say, the ministry has not considered this so called reform policy, has not been united upon it, knew nothing about its scope or extent or its implications, until it was announced by the Prime Minister himself. And I go a step further and say that apart from the ministry, hon. members opposite have not so much as been consulted; yet they are all members of the Conservative party, returned to this house as members of parliament and as such immediately responsible for the policies of their party. We are told that they are having a caucus. When? To-morrow morning. They are having a caucus to discuss these policies, and to-morrow they will learn the reasons why these particular policies are what they are. And they will be told exactly how they must face, and what they must say, and what they are to do, from now on. That is the new order.

But even when that step in regimentation is over there will still remain the bringing into line of the supporters of the Conservative party throughout Canada; and until we know that the Conservative party as such has favoured all these plans and is prepared to stand behind them and see that they are put into force if the party is returned to power, we shall not know whether, when the Prime Minister says, "This is Conservative policy," he speaks for his party or only for himself. These things are, I think, most significant. They may be considered as a prelude to what is to follow.

There was another part of the old order which, I believe, was important, and that was that a ministry which admitted its policies had failed and found it necessary to create new ones, before seeking to implement new policies by legislation went to the country and placed its policies before the people so as to give the people a chance to consider the new policies and to judge of their value. A ministry which had reason to believe that it had lost the confidence of the people, under the old order of the British system of government usually tendered its resignation to the crown; though some ministries, I will admit, have hung on to office for a longer time than they should. The whole spirit of the British system of government is that government is carried on, not by arbitrary powers secured by a mechanical majority, but by the consent of the governed as known, and when there is reason to believe that consent is withdrawn and that the government no longer enjoys the confidence of the people, then any government that is worthy of the name, any government that is at all true to British traditions in matters of responsible administration of public affairs, will forthwith tender its resignation, and ask that another ministry be formed, or will ask for immediate dissolution.

Can there be any doubt as to the present government not enjoying the confidence of the people? What is the present government's position in that regard? The surest way of knowing is the results of the by-elections. We have had several by-elections since the Imperial Economic Conference which was held in Ottawa in the summer of 1932 and which was referred to by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), and what has been the result? Since then, there have been ten by-elections altogether, and of the ten held in all parts of Canada the government has not carried a single by-election, with the—

An hon. MEMBER: What about Three Rivers?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was part of ancient history. I am speaking of the period since the meeting here of the economic conference in 1932, and this is 1935. Since then the government has lost every by-election with the exception of one, that of East Toronto, where the Conservative candidate succeeded in getting in by a minority of the votes cast, by taking the position that he was not very enthusiastic about his leader, and by having as his chief support the ex-minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) who has since been obliged to leave the ministry.

May I say it is the more remarkable that the old order should have changed so suddenly in that the Prime Minister himself only a few months before took a sort of recognition at least of a part of the old order when he reprimanded his then Minister of Trade and Commerce for having violated what is one of the old established practices and rules of this house, namely, that of not discussing in public matters which are still within the purview of a committee of the house more especially where, as in the case of the ex-minister, he was chairman of the committee. The Prime Minister also criticized his former minister of Trade and Commerce for attempting to proceed as a royal commissioner after having made public statements, some of which, if I am not mistaken, the Prime Minister alleges were incorrect. Further, the ex-minister was asked to apologize before continuing his work as a commissioner, in order that some of the old order might still be maintained and that there might continue to be confidence in a public servant discharging a public trust. Having lectured his colleague to the extent of causing him to feel that there was nothing to do but to resign, the Prime Minister himself might have been a little more careful about preserving some of the customs and constitutional usages which are very dear to the hearts of all who love free institutions and want to see them perpetuated in this country.

But are we so sure that the old order has gone? That the old order with respect to British parliamentary methods in this parliament has gone is apparent; it has been apparent in the last few sessions. On occasions in the past the Prime Minister has criticized me and hon. gentlemen on this side for having taken up a considerable amount of the time of the house in discussing constitutional questions. May I say that we have done so because we have looked upon the constitution of our country as the safeguard of its liberties and as the home of its freedom. When I have seen steps taken which I have believed were gradually dismantling the constitution, gradually destroying the home of the freedom and liberties of the people, I have opposed them just as strongly as I possibly could, and I shall continue to do so no matter by what name measures of the kind may be designated. I shall continue to look with a great deal of care, not upon the alleged but upon the real purpose lying back of each and every measure as disclosed by some of its provisions. That has been the occasion of such opposition as the Prime Minister has had in this house to any measures he has introduced. The opposition has not been to what was good in any measure; it has been to what there has been of stealthy alienation of the authority and control of parliament over many aspects of public affairs. I shall not at this time enumerate them; I may however, follow the Prime Minister's example by saying a few words over the radio some evening and on that occasion I shall attempt to set forth some of these alienations of the authority and control of parliament, and to answer some of the Prime Minister's statements.

It was hardly a chivalrous thing on the part of the Prime Minister to take advantage of the period between the first of the year and the assembling of parliament, notwithstanding the violation of all precedents, to go on the air for six nights in succession, with an interval of, I think, one evening between each broadcast, and, in this favoured position, not only to state his own policies, but to undertake to state what were the policies of the Liberal party and what the Liberal party had and had not done. The most extraordinary of all his performances was the last one of the series delivered over the radio, in which the Prime Minister engaged in that heroic shadow-boxing with myself which entertained the public from one end of Canada to the other. We all know his love for monopolizing the powers of the legislature and the functions of the executive, but in this recital he appeared in a new role; this time he undertook to monopolize the functions of the judiciary. I am not surprised at that; I am not surprised at anything the Prime Minister may do in the way of monopoly effort of one kind or another. He must have the stage to himself, even though all his colleagues be crowded out of sight. The Prime Minister has said that he thought the judiciary was a more important branch of government than the legislative or the executive branches. I must say that I thought it was an extraordinary position for the head of a government to take. However, that is what he has said; so I was not surprised when, the other evening, I saw the importance he was attaching to the judiciary.

What did he do? Well, not satisfied with being the presiding judge, he began at once to act as prosecutor. As leader of the opposition, I was the poor victim, the prisoner in the dock. He started his prosecution, but he went a step further. He constituted himself also counsel for the defence, and began to defend me. I confess that, as I listened at the radio that night, I said to myself, "Heaven help me if I am in that man's hands for defence. I do not believe, however, the public will be quite so dense as to believe that what he is saying about my party and myself is correct, or that all the admissions he is making on my behalf are accurate." But that was not all; he was the jury as well. He presented the case to the jury, both as prosecuting attorney and counsel for the defence. Then, after the jury had retired in this imaginary scene, he came in as judge and pronounced that the Liberal party stood for laissez-faire, that it never stood for anything else, and that what Canada needed to-day was government control of all industry, that there must be a policy of interference with industry, a policy of state intervention. This was to be called reform; reform, that was to be the issue. Well, that may be part of the new order, but I tell the Prime Minister that it is a pretty cheap order.

But again may I ask are we so sure about the passing of the old order? We know that much that was best in it is passing, but what about the worst? What was the old order? Essentially, in the minds of the people, the old order is that order of things which pertained to the days of feudalism, an order that stands for autocracy in government, in industry and in social relations. Feudalism with its various embroideries and accessories of one kind or another. I wonder if the restoration of titles in this country is a part of the new order, these knights and ladies that the Prime Minister is determined to bring back to the scene, as the all important personnages in our midst, knights and ladies of the order of St. Michael and St. George, of the Order of the Bath, of the Order of the British Empire. Are all these part of the old order that has gone, or are they part of the new deal, the new order that we are to have? I must say that I think there is need for careful consideration of just how this new order is being constituted, more particularly when we recall that the decision that there should be an end to titles in Canada was a decision of this House of Commons, set forth in the form of a resolution, a resolution which even yet has not been rescinded, though the old order we are told is gone. The old order did pay some attention to resolutions of the House of Commons which were supposed to be expressive of the will of the people, but the new order expresses apparently only one will, and that according to the Prime Minister's view is his own.

May I say just a word with regard to the new and the old order in relation to industry. The Prime Minister says the thing that, above everything else, needs to be reformed to-day is the capitalist system, yet he is going to reform the capitalist system by bringing in legislation which, while possibly very necessary, only touches the fringe of some of the evils of the system. The legislation proposed keeps very carefully away from the heart of the system which in the main is responsible for those evils; it does not touch that, but it touches the fringe of some of the evils. What is the very essence of the capitalist system? It is that industrial policy is controlled by capitalists; that the capital investor, the man who puts his money into the business, to the exclusion of all others, formulates industrial policy. He is the one to say what the hours are to be, who is to be employed, what is to be paid. He is the one who says how large production is to be and when production is to increase or decrease. Under the present system, these things are for the capital investors to decide. But what about the labour investors? What about the man who invests his life? What about the man who invests his skill in industry? Is he to have no consideration in the new order of things? In the new deal, is he to receive no consideration in the shaping of industrial policy? I tell the Prime Minister that, if he wants to reform the capitalist system, the way to begin is by sharing between labour and the community as well as capital, the control of industrial policy. Let labour and the community, which are as essential to industry as capital, be represented around a common board to determine the policy that is to govern, and very soon these questions of maximum hours, minimum wages, sweat shops and other evils that unfortunately prevail only too generally, and have done so for generations, will be remedied in the one effective way, namely, by the parties themselves who are directly concerned having an effective voice in the determination of the conditions under which they shall work. No changes of the capitalist system which keep the capital investor secure in his position as the controller of industrial policy will ever in this world bring about any reform worthy of the name. It is going to take more than minimum wage laws passed by parliament, or maximum hour laws, or laws against sweat shops, to bring about the change that is essential in that regard.

I have not arrived at my views on this question by thinking them over very seriously for the last two or three years. I have thought over these questions all my life, and the view I am expressing now is no deathbed repentance on the eve of a general election.

An hon. MEMBER: What did you do?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will tell you what I did. I put these views in a book—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —which was written so clearly that he who runs may read. For the past eighteen years my views have been before the public, and may I repeat they were not given on the eve of a general election. During the time I have sat in this House of Commons, the views I put in the book to which I refer I have given expression to in a hundred and one practical ways. I did not do as hon. gentlemen opposite evidently had in their minds when they laughed a moment ago: I did not give expression of views on social and industrial reform to serve the purposes of a general election. I placed before the public of Canada, at a time when I was not in parliament, views which I believed were essential to the improvement of industrial conditions and the transformation of the industrial system as a part of industrial reconstruction in post-war days; these views, as opportunity has afforded I have given expression to in legislation. The underlying note in that volume from beginning to close is that where industry and humanity are in conflict, the interests of humanity, not the interests of industry, must be served. More than that, I have set forth clearly my conviction that, while in our political institutions we may have worked out a system of democracy whereby not merely the crown but the different classes are represented in the making of our laws, equally we must secure in the government and control of industry a system which will not be autocratic but democratic. The only way we can bring about an effective transformation in industry is to do away with what remains of autocracy and substitute therefor a real democracy in industrial control. These views are on record; they have stood and will continue to stand the test of years.

I will venture a step farther and state that anyone who has read the speech from the throne and the broadcasts of the Prime Minister will discover that possibly within the last few weeks the Prime Minister himself has been reading that book.

Mr. BENNETT: No, no. I could say, "Oh that mine adversary had written a book!"

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the right hon. gentleman and other hon. members have not read it, they reveal how slight their interest in these matters really is when they have neglected this very valuable source of information.

To conclude this part of my remarks I should like very clearly to bring out one feature. You may have democracy in government combined with democracy in industry. You cannot have democracy in government combined with autocracy in industry. The latter two are as ill mated as the former are congenial. And as long as the capitalist system remains—and we find by reading between the lines in the speech from the throne the evident intention that it is to remain—a system whereby industrial policies will be exclusively controlled by capitalist investors, parliament intervening here and there to correct incidental evils only, just so long you will have no reform that is fundamental or far-reaching. The only reform worthy of the name is that which I have already described, namely reform whereby in the determination of industrial policy you give to the labour investor and to the community representing amongst others the consumers, rights equal to those of the capitalist investor.

Let me say—it would be better if the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) would not say "all poppycock" quite so loudly.

Mr. MANION: I did not use any such words, or any words resembling them. I am afraid something is wrong with the right hon. gentleman's hearing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I accept the minister's statement, but there are others who heard it. And may I add—

Mr. MANION: Nobody heard those words. The Prime Minister heard the words I said; I was speaking to him, not to the right hon. gentleman opposite.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not any desire to enter into a discussion with my hon. friend.

Mr. MANION: I think I might have said it, though, and quite truthfully.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That comes nearer to being in line with the old order, yes. My hon. friend is running true to form.

Let me now return to the subject we were discussing previously, namely the procedure usually followed when a ministry no longer enjoys the confidence of parliament. If a ministry true to the British system of government finds it no longer enjoys the confidence of the public, it resigns or secures a dissolution and enables the people to decide for themselves whom they wish to have carry on the affairs of the country. That is doubly so where, as in the case of the present government, a ministry in addition to confessing a failure of its policies, as has been done by the Prime Minister, introduces entirely new policies which have never received the approval of the people, which are not the policies upon which those who support the government have been returned to power, but are policies of an entirely different nature. Are we in Canada to adopt the view that a ministry returned on certain policies may, if it fails, turn round and adopt diametrically opposite policies and still be entitled to carry on the government of the country? It is not possible to defend a system of government carried on in that way. No one will dispute the fact that so far as legal and technical rights are concerned, under the British North America Act, the parliamentary term is fixed for five years. But that term of five years is designated not as the period during which the ministry must hold office, but the period beyond which without a renewal of confidence on the part of the electorate it cannot continue to hold office. If such a clause were not in the act this government would never leave office, they would stay on from day to day, from month to month, from year to year, for all time. The rule and procedure is that where a ministry has not been successful in its policies, it shall make way for some other ministry capable of so doing, a ministry at all events which the people may desire.

I have said there is no doubt about the loss of confidence in the present government; I do not think I need prove that statement, the truth is everywhere known, and generally admitted. I wish however to place on record some figures which serve to indicate how emphatic the voice of the electors has been in the by-elections which have taken place. In the by-election held in South Huron on September 26, 1932, the Liberal majority was increased from 349 to 1,989. In the by-election held on October 23, 1933, in Yamaska the Liberal majority of one was increased to 84. In Mackenzie on the same date the Progressive majority of 3,076 was changed to a Liberal majority of 1,614. In Restigouche-Madawaska, also on October 23, 1933, the Conservative majority of 548 was changed to a Liberal majority of 6,472. In the by-election of April 16, 1934, held in the constituency of South Oxford, the Liberal majority of 55 was increased to a majority of 1,493. On September 24, 1934, in the by-election held in West Elgin, the Liberal majority was increased from 1,437 to 2,893. In the by-election held on the same day in Frontenac-Addington the Conservative majority of 3,371 was changed to a Liberal majority of 2,651. That is the first time since confederation a Liberal candidate has been elected for Frontenac. In the constituency of Kenora-Rainy River on the same day the Liberal majority was increased from 502 to 6,165. In North York on the same day the Conservative majority of 298 was changed to a Liberal majority of 3,687. In the 1930 elections the Conservative majority in the consituency of Toronto East amounted to 7,075, and in the by-election of 1934, which was held also on September 24, the Conservative party retained the seat. As I have stated however they retained it by a minority of votes; their candidate polled 2,143 votes less than the Liberal and Cooperative Commonwealth Federation candidates combined. In the face of those figures representative of the feelings of the people how can a government say it has the right to continue in office? How can it do so? By what right does the government at this time bring in new policies and seek to put other legislation upon the statute book?

May I point out another fact: It has been customary in the past for the government of the day to notify His Honour the Speaker of vacancies as they arise in the membership of this house so that writs may be speedily issued in order to complete its representation. This administration immediately after coming into office did give notice of one or two vacancies, but every vacancy that has arisen in this house in the last three years, notwithstanding that in many cases the vacancies were on the Conservative side, has been notified to the Speaker by Liberal members of this house, showing that the government has so little confidence in the support it enjoys throughout the country that it is unwilling to fill vacancies created by loss even in its own membership. These things make it perfectly clear that what the country had expected rather than another session of parliament was a general election, a general election in which the people themselves would have had an opportunity to express their views. Why then, have we this additional session?

Well, the Prime Minister has told us. He let the cat out of the bag in one of his broadcast speeches. In his fourth broadcast speech on the ninth of January my right hon. friend spoke as follows:

> As I have said, you will be fully notified by me of the precise nature of these reforms and their estimated effect when the appropriate legislation is presented to parliament. I know you will carefully and earnestly think over all that I have said. Effective action depends upon your steadfast support. Ultimately your approval of my reform program can only be given by your support of me at the polls. That naturally I want.

In other words, "I want votes," that is why the Prime Minister to-day brings in this platform of social reform so-called, on the eve of an election, after having made all kinds of promises five years ago; after saying "I will end unemployment;" after saying "I will blast my way into the markets of the world;" after making promises in every part of the country with respect to every conceivable thing that could influence an electorate. Having failed to carry out those promises and having to admit he has failed, the Prime Minister brings in on the eve of a general election an entirely new set of policies and claims that these are the policies of the party of which he is the head and says: "I want you to give your support to these policies"—or rather "I am giving you these policies because I want your votes."

Well, my right hon. friend will not be able to cover up his record of the last four and a half years quite so easily as that. The people of Canada have too intimate a knowledge of what they have had to endure during the last few years through the failure of his policies, and his failure to fulfil any of his promises, to allow any other policies he says he will put into effect to influence their judgment very much.

Now may I point out the position we are in with respect to a general election? I have said that one of the supreme efforts of this administration has been stealthily to alienate the authority and control of parliament, to take power into its own hands and away from parliament with respect to many of the important affairs of the nation. This government has succeeded at last in that effort to the extent of taking away from parliament itself the power of securing for the people, whose representatives its members are, an immediate election. If there is one right above another which the people's representatives should at all times have, it is that of declaring at any moment and at all times that a ministry no longer enjoys the confidence of the country and that an immediate dissolution of parliament is necessary in order that an immediate general election may be held. If there is one right above another which the people of Canada should enjoy it is to have available at all times the machinery that is necessary for the immediate conduct of a general election.

Well, what did we receive in answer the other day from the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) to the question I asked as to the date by which we could expect to have the lists printed?

As hon. members will recall, at the last session the old Dominion Elections Act was repealed. That act had served for many years wholly satisfactorily, and there was no demand for its repeal; at any rate there should have been no final repeal of the act until the machinery under the new measure was in such shape as to make it possible to have an immediate election at any time.

Mr. CAHAN: Did you ever suggest that during the discussion?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to the Secretary of State that I am not the government; I am not responsible for the government's legislation. Over and over again I have been told that by the Prime Minister. What I did ask was, whether we might expect to be able to hold a general election at any time the country might desire it. More than that, as leader of the official opposition I put faith, as I was obliged to do, in what was told me and told this house by the minister of the crown who on behalf of the government brought in the new elections act and franchise act. I accepted his word, as it was my duty to do, when he introduced the new measures. And what did he say? The statements are very clear. I have in my hand the Hansard of June 13, 1934, and at page 4257 the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) said:

> It has been thought by the government that it would be well to devise some improved method to bring on a general or by-election in this country in much less time than is necessary at present.

There was the motive alleged for that act, to have the machinery, an improved method, to bring on a general or by-election in this country in less time than was necessary under the old Dominion Elections Act. That was the whole purpose of it, we were told. The minister went on to speak of completing the voters' lists, which he said "shall be available at a moment's notice in any part of Canada should a general election or a by-election take place." Express provision was made that the by-elections would continue to be held under the old elections act, but we were told when this new measure was introduced that we would have a measure which would enable elections to be brought on more speedily—brought on, to give the minister's own words "in much less time than is necessary at present"—referring to the situation as in June, 1934, and "at a moment's notice in any part of Canada." As to the availabilty of the lists, at a moment's notice in any part of Canada the lists were to be available when necessary for a general election.

Mr. CAHAN: That is exactly what you will have. May I say to the right hon. gentleman, if he will allow me to interrupt—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, my hon. friend may speak in the course of the debate. I have here what my hon. friend (Mr. Cahan) gave me as an answer the other day, and I am going to do him the courtesy of reading it in just a moment. But what else did the Minister of Justice say in introducing the new elections act last year?—"that a basic list shall be undertaken immediately after the prorogation of the present parliament." It was not undertaken immediately, as I shall show in a moment. Those are the statements that were made by the Minister of Justice at the time of introducing the bill last year.

Now what had my hon. friend the Secretary of State to say when I asked him whether the lists had been printed, that were to be available at any moment the country might want to have a general election, and that were, if necessary, to enable an election to be held more quickly than formerly? My hon. friend said at page 5 of Hansard of this year, referring to the Dominion Franchise Act of last year:

> The dominion franchise commissioner commenced on November 20 last to deliver to the king's printer copies of the lists of electors for the several electoral districts of Canada as they were severally prepared, with directions to the king's printer for the printing of the same.
> These lists comprise approximately 6,000,000 names of electors, of which about 1,000,000 names are now set up in type, although the printing of departmental reports, in English and French, for presentation to parliament, has been given precedence over other work. The printing bureau, in addition to its other work, is now setting up in type about 75,000 names per day, so that in the ordinary course, without grave accidents to the equipment of the bureau, the composition should be completed early in April, and the printing of the lists should be completed about April 15 next.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the hon. gentleman allow me?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend can make his remarks when he speaks later.

Mr. CAHAN: I say that is correct in the ordinary course of the work.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What does my hon. friend say?

Mr. CAHAN: I say that those lists can be completed any time within thirty-five days, but we are now doing the work in the ordinary course.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why aren't they ready now?

Mr. CAHAN: Because the hon. gentleman as leader of the opposition agreed to a different arrangement for a different form of revision at a different date. He is as much responsible as any member of the government for the condition of which he complains.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend may seek to shift responsibility on to the leader of the opposition, but may I tell him that a government has to take responsibility for all the legislation it introduces and the consequences thereof.

Mr. CAHAN: And so has the leader of the opposition to take responsibility for acts of parliament in which he concurred.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I point out to my hon. friend that last summer when I saw that the government was deliberately delaying—

Mr. BENNETT: I ask the right hon. gentleman to withdraw that word. There was nothing done deliberately.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then it was done without deliberation.

Mr. BENNETT: That is right, because it was in the hands of the franchise commissioner, who appointed franchise officers sixty per cent of whom were opponents of the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I take the Prime Minister at his word, at the moment. Without deliberation; I have no doubt done by himself—

Mr. BENNETT: No, I was out of the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it not a heroic thing on the part of the Prime Minister to seek to condemn the franchise commissioner and put the responsibility on him especially when the franchise commissioner is a public servant and unable to be here to speak for himself? But it is not true the franchise commissioner was at fault in any way. What was the reason? The franchise commissioner proceeded the very moment he was able to proceed and did his work as expeditiously as it could be done. The reason he was delayed for a couple of months in beginning the enumeration was that the government of the day at the last session saw fit to repeal that section of the old act which provided for returning officers being in office continuously, and for the sake of party patronage introduced a measure which gave to themselves the appointment of returning officers. The franchise commissioner could not commence his work until he knew the limits of the constituencies, which were to be set forth by the returning officers, who were appointed, not by the franchise commissioner, but by my right hon. friend.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When the house rose at six o'clock I was discussing with the Prime Minister, if I may use that expression, the question as to who was responsible for the delay in the printing of the lists. Until the lists are printed there can be no general election in this country, and the Secretary of State advised us as late as Friday last that it would be April 15 before the lists would be printed, assuming that there were no mishaps of any kind, such as a breakdown in the machinery of the printing bureau, which was one of the possibilities which he mentioned. I said that in my opinion the government was responsible for the delay in the printing of the lists, and I was rather surprised that the Prime Minister should take the ground that the franchise commissioner, who is not here to speak for himself and who is a public servant, was responsible.

Fortunately I had some correspondence with the Prime Minister on this matter last summer, because I rather anticipated that this issue would be raised. I did not think it would be raised with respect to a general election that might come in April, but it did occur to me that it might be raised during the by-elections which were to take place in the month of September, and that one of the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite would be, as in fact it was during the campaign, that, even supposing their candidates were defeated, it would make no difference inasmuch as in view of the fact that the lists would not be printed there could not be a general election.

The by-elections were fought on the issue whether the government enjoyed the confidence of the country or not. The overwhelming majorities against the Conservative candidates made clear the view of the people, particularly when one considers that all by-elections were held in what used to be called the old Tory province of Ontario. Even that province has lost all confidence in this administration.

I have here the correspondence, which will speak for itself; it will settle the question as to whether the government itself has been responsible for the delay or whether the responsibility lies with the franchise commissioner, who is not here to answer for himself. I wrote to the Prime Minister as follows:

House of Commons
Canada
Leader of the Opposition
Ottawa, August 20, 1934.

The Right Honourable
R. B. Bennett, P.C., K.C., M.P.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa.

My Dear Prime Minister:

When the franchise bill was under discussion in the house, we were given to understand that, as soon as the bill was passed, the franchise commissioner would immediately be appointed, and that the preparation of the basic lists, under the provisions of the new act, would be proceeded with at once. Apparently, up to the present time, notwithstanding the immediate appointment of the franchise commissioner, there has been no appointment of the enumerators who have to do with the preparation of the lists.

I should have mentioned that parliament prorogued on July 3.

Under the provisions of the act, it would appear that the franchise commissioner cannot proceed with the preparation of the basic lists of voters until after the returning officers for the different constituencies have been appointed. The boundaries of the polling subdivisions being defined by the returning officers, it is, apparently, impossible for the enumeration or registration of voters to commence until the returning officers have completed this preliminary work.

The appointment of the returning officers now rests with the government, the former appointees no longer remaining continuously in office, as was provided in the act which was repealed last session. It would appear, therefore, that the delay in having the basic lists, demanded by the new act, immediately prepared, is not due to any neglect on the part of the franchise commissioner, but is something for which the government itself is responsible.

The delay in the preparation of the basic lists is the more to be regretted in that the old Dominion Elections Act having been repealed, save in so far as its provisions have been made to apply to by-elections held prior to a general election, it will be impossible to hold a general election until the basic lists have been prepared under the provisions of the new Franchise Act. I think you will agree that the electorate should not be deprived of its right to have available at any and all times the machinery necessary for the holding of a general election. It was the expectation of members of the House of Commons that the preparation of the basic lists would not be delayed beyond the summer months. Obviously, their completion should not be delayed beyond the month of September. In the circumstances, I have felt that I should write you without further delay in order to ascertain definitely how soon the country may expect the appointment of all returning officers, and within what time thereafter it may be reasonable to expect that the basic lists will be completed.

I am aware of course that the franchise commissioner has certain powers which he is free and expected to exercise wholly and apart from any action or control on the part of the government. My first thought was to write to the franchise commissioner, asking him for an explanation of the delay in the preparation of the basic lists. Having ascertained, upon inquiry, that the returning officers had not yet been appointed, and it being apparent from the provisions of the act that the franchise commissioner is necessarily restricted in hastening procedure until after their appointment, I have felt that, before communicating with the franchise commissioner, I should address this communication to the government.

Yours sincerely,

W. L. Mackenzie King.

I received the following reply:

Office of the Prime Minister
Canada
Ottawa, August 22, 1934.

The Rt. Hon.
W. L. Mackenzie King, C.M.G., M.P.,
Leader of the Opposition,
Ottawa.

My Dear Mr. King:

I am in receipt of your letter of the 20th instant which I have read and referred to my colleagues. It is our view that, having regard to the size of this country and the difficulty in obtaining the necessary information, there has been no unreasonable delay in appointing the returning officers for the 245 constituencies. The list is now practically complete and a special Gazette will be issued within the next few days.

I quite agree with you that the machinery for the conduct of a general election should always be upon the statute books, but the amount of effort required to make effective the provisions of the legislation passed at the last session was far greater than I expected. However, from the inquiries I have made, I believe that everything that can reasonably be done is being done and that the preparation of the basic lists will not be unduly delayed.

Yours faithfully,

R. B. Bennett.

That was August 22 1934. We are now told that these lists will not be in readiness before April 15, 1935. I had stated in my letter to the Prime Minister that in my opinion it was obvious that the lists ought to be completed by September, having in mind the likelihood, which I thought he himself would realize, of his own candidates being defeated, and that the country would expect a general election thereafter. But what I anticipated at that moment was, as I have already said, that we should be told that somebody else had been responsible for the delay and for the lists not being in readiness. I wish therefore to make it quite clear, as the Prime Minister himself in his acknowledgment conceded, that the franchise commissioner was in no way responsible, because up to the time the Prime Minister's letter was written on August 22 no returning officers had been gazetted, and the franchise commissioner could not begin his work until after that time.

Let me direct attention to the wording of one paragraph of the Prime Minister's reply. Perhaps the Prime Minister will see in it why I have just a little suspicion about the value of any or of all his social legislation or, indeed, any legislation that he might seek to have put upon the statute books. In my letter I made the statement:

> I think you will agree that the electorate should not be deprived of its right to have available at any and all times the machinery necessary for the holding of a general election.

That was a statement of the right of the electorate to have, not on some statute book but available and ready at all times, the machinery necessary for the holding of a general election. How does the Prime Minister answer me? He begins with the words: "I quite agree with you," but the agreement is not with me at all; all he agrees to is as follows: "That the machinery for the conduct of general elections should always be upon the statute books." There is a great deal of difference in having machinery on the statute books, and having it available and ready. The machinery is on the statute books now, but according to the statement of the Secretary of State the lists will not be available till April 15 and we cannot have a general election until that date. I say that the answer given there by the Prime Minister was a sidestepping of the real issue and, may I say, it accounted for my answer to him this afternoon, that I thought the delay in the preparation of the lists had been deliberate. The Prime Minister knew as well as anyone that the franchise commissioner could not begin his work until after the returning officers had been appointed. The Prime Minister knew as well as anyone possibly could that when I spoke about having lists available at any and all times for a general election I meant exactly what I said. I did not mean having them on the statute books but that the provisions in the statute should be such that the electorate would have available at any and all times whatever machinery was necessary for the purpose. We have not those lists available, and, apparently, according to what has been stated, we cannot have a general election before April 15.

In these circumstances I am confronted with this situation: If I do what I should like to do, what I said at the end of last session I would do, that is, move an amendment to the motion that has been proposed and seconded this afternoon, to the effect that this government does not enjoy the confidence of the people and that we should have an immediate dissolution, I shall be told that such procedure is very heroic on my part, knowing full well from what the Secretary of State said the other afternoon, that we cannot have any election until at least April 15, if not later, and that all my talk about the government not enjoying the confidence of the people and the need for a general election is perfect nonsense, and beside the mark. Before I close I shall indicate what I think wise in the circumstances.

Having cleared up that point, let me say a word in regard to the Prime Minister's broadcast. I hope hon. members will observe that he has made no less than six nation-wide broadcasts, each running over half an hour, in which he has set forth his policies and also attacked the opposition, and that in addition we have to-day before us for the first time since Thursday last the speech from the throne, with which as leader of the opposition, I am expected to deal at some length. I am supposed, I imagine, by hon. members and the country, to deal also with the speeches of the Prime Minister. Obviously I cannot in any short compass of time begin to attempt to answer many of the misleading statements that have been made, and, therefore, this evening I do not purpose to attempt to answer many of the things the Prime Minister has said. I shall reserve that for a later occasion, and, if I can be as fortunate as he appears to have been in getting the wherewithal to have nation-wide broadcasts, I shall undoubtedly avail myself of the opportunity to speak to the people of this country through the medium of the radio.

May I immediately deal very briefly with what the Prime Minister has said in the broadcasts is to be the real issue in the general election. Speaking on January 2, the Prime Minister, having said that reform was to be the issue, gave his definition of reform. He said that reform means government intervention; that it means government control and regulation; that it means the end of laissez-faire. May I say to the Prime Minister in all frankness that I think in speaking thus of government intervention and laissez-faire he does not understand the meaning of the terms, and that he has mistaken what is a means for an end. He has said that the end of reform is state intervention. That is a new definition of reform. My understanding of laissez-faire is "to let alone." My understanding of state intervention is "to interfere." In dealing with the relation of the government to public ffairs the extent to which it is advisable to leave alone will be determined by the nature of the questions which are before the government and country for consideration, and the extent to which it is advisable to interfere will likewise be determined by the nature of the questions that are before the government and country for consideration. May I say that no political party of which I have knowledge has at any time had a monopoly of the one means or of the other. Both means have been available and made use of by all parties, true enough in the case of each to serve its own ends. It is quite true that sometimes the Liberal party has availed itself more of a policy of laissez-faire than of intervention; at other times it has availed itself more of a policy of state intervention than of laissez-faire. The Liberal party intends to continue to avail itself of both means, and of the two, the one perhaps most necessary at the present time in one direction and equally necessary with any policy of state intervention in another if we are going to make possible these reforms about which the Prime Minister alleges he is so much concerned, is a policy of more in the way of laissez-faire with respect to matters of trade and trade barriers and restrictions.

What has this country witnessed since the present government came into office? Instead of the unemployed numbering 117,000 as was the case when the Prime Minister came to office, the numbers, according to latest estimates stated to be receiving direct relief, have become 1,000,000. What is responsible for conditions in Canada being as depressed as they are more than the excessive intervention with the course of trade, a policy of state intervention? When the government came into office, they began to raise the tariffs. That was state intervention. Every tariff is an interference on the part of the state with the regular course of business. They began to increase the tariff out of all bounds; they interfered by means of dumping duties; they interfered by means of embargoes, by means of quotas, by means of artificial valuations, they interfered by fixing exchange rates. All along the line, in fact clear across this country there is to-day a network of barbed wire entanglements in the nature of restrictions upon trade that will have to be torn away if in this dominion we are to have greater freedom of trade. I do not mean to say that any party would advocate the abolition of all tariffs, but, if we are to have trade and any possibility of improvement of conditions, we must take away from this ministry or, indeed, from any ministry, the power of arbitrarily interfering with the laws passed by parliament, of making tariff rates by order in council, and of creating by order in council those other restrictions which prevent the natural flow of trade. Where the Liberal party has thought it advisable in greater or less measure to get rid of restrictions of this kind, it has followed, and will continue to follow, a policy of laissez-faire, not absolutely, but relatively in comparison and contrast with what has been done by way of government interference with trade by the present administration.

In regard to intervention I shall indicate a little later some of the instances in connection with social legislation in which the Liberal party has thought it advisable to interfere, and where its policy has been consistently one of intervention on the part of the state. But where the policy has been one of intervention it has not been for the sake of intervention itself; it has been intervention for the sake of preserving freedom, or giving a larger measure of freedom.

Here may I just point out the difference between the two parties in their use of these methods in obtaining their ends. Study the history of Liberalism and what do you find it to be? It has been an effort at all times to subject the particular interest to the general interest. Wherever it has been found that the general interest is being made subordinate to some special privilege or some particular interest, there Liberalism has come along and, either by laissez-faire or by state intervention, has sought to secure a larger freedom by preserving the general interest in its control over the particular interest. But what has been the history of Conservatism, of the Tory party? It has been the very opposite; it has been to see that particular interests were made superior to the general interest, that the general interest should be subordinated to particular interests.

That is exactly what you have in regard to all these protected industries to-day; every one is a matter of special privilege; every one is a matter of giving to particular interests a superior place, and of subordinating by means of state intervention the general interest to the particular. Is that the end the present government has in mind when it says state intervention is to be the objective hereafter? It may be so. I shall be very much surprised if there is much in the way of laissez-faire in any of its policies so far as the tariff is concerned; I think we may expect more and more in the way of state intervention in that regard if certain particular interests have to be served.

But now let us see just how sincere hon. gentlemen opposite are in their views—or perhaps I should limit it to the Prime Minister for the present—in the matter of state intervention in industry which is the reform to be brought about in the future. What is the largest single industrial enterprise we have to-day in this country? If I am not mistaken it is the Canadian National Railways, the government owned railways. How has the present Prime Minister revealed his confidence in state intervention as a means of reform in dealing with the Canadian National Railways? If I recollect aright, the changes that have been made by this government since it came into office, with respect to the Canadian National Railways, have all been of a nature designed to put the Canadian National Railways farther and farther away from any authority or control on the part of parliament, from any possibility of state intervention. They have appointed a board of trustees; they have fixed terms during which those trustees are to remain in office. The chairman of the railways has been placed in office for I have forgotten for the moment just how many years; I think it is for a period of either seven or ten years. Perhaps the Prime Minister can tell me.

Mr. BENNETT: Seven years.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The chairman of the board has been appointed for a period of seven years, and care has been taken to see that he cannot be removed from that position except by a resolution of both houses of parliament. When we talk of the control of parliament to-day the general public have in mind the control that is exercised by the elected representatives of the people sitting in the House of Commons. I wish to say, however, to this house and to the country that so long as we have an all-powerful Conservative majority in the upper house which is able to defeat any measure that may come from this house; so long as it is within the power of the upper chamber to prevent any particular reform that may be desired by this house, you cannot say that this House of Commons has any final or necessarily effective authority or control over the business of the country.

That is the position with respect to the Canadian National Railways. I might say a great deal more on the subject, but I think I am quite within the statement that was made over and over again by the ministry that business of that magnitude ought to be put beyond the power of interference by the government. I am not at the moment debating the question or discussing whether or not a particular course is wise; I am simply directing attention to the contradiction between the statement of the Prime Minister with regard to state interference as being synonymous with reform and the action of the government itself with respect to the Canadian National Railways. In the matter of the largest business in this country the one that touches the people in the most intimate way—except for one other that I shall mention in a moment—the Prime Minister has put the control of that enterprise beyond parliament, and he has alienated the authority and control of parliament in respect thereto.

I said I would speak of one other business. It is most important in connection with this reform which is to be brought about, as the Prime Minister says, through the regulation of business by parliament. In broadcast No. 3, on January 7, he defines in another way the reform which he says is to be the issue: the reform of the capitalist system effected by state intervention. Here is how he introduced the subject. He said:

> The keystone of the capitalist arch was the profit system, and the profit system still remains.

The capitalist system is to be reformed by the interference of the state, and the Prime Minister says that the keystone of the capitalist arch is the profit system, which still remains. May I say to the Prime Minister that I think the keystone of the capitalist arch is the private control of a nation's credit and currency. The keystone of the capitalist arch is that particular symbol in the capitalist structure that stands for money control and money power, and how that money control and money power are to be exercised, how that credit and currency are to be controlled. In the capitalist system it is to be carefully and securely kept in the control of capitalists.

How has the Prime Minister dealt with that question? Last session we had a bill before this house, and by the way he tells the country now that this is part of the reform program, part of the program that has to do with reform by means of interference by the state in business. How has he dealt with that matter? Some three years ago the Liberal party put forward in specific terms as one of its policies the establishment of a national central bank as an agency for the control of credit and currency considered in terms of public need. We proposed that the bank should be an agency of control in the interests of the country's social as well as industrial and financial needs; in other words that credit was a public matter, not of interest to bankers only but of direct concern to the average citizens. To that end we put forward repeatedly the necessity of a central bank properly constituted for that purpose. A properly constituted central bank for the purpose of controlling currency and credit to meet social needs necessitated in our opinion that to some extent at least—just what extent might remain a matter of difference of opinion—the government representing and responsible to parliament and the members of parliament should have some control over the central bank; that with respect to currency, banking and those matters that have to do with credit, the voice of the people, through their representatives in parliament, should be heard with respect to such policies as might be thought necessary, should be felt and should be capable of being made effective. How did the Prime Minister show his faith in government intervention then? He brought before this house a bill establishing a central bank. On the second reading his Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) said that the question whether it should be publicly or privately owned was a perfectly open question which might be discussed in committee, and that the views of the committee and of hon. members composing it would not be prejudiced in any way by hon. members on the second reading voting simply for or against a central bank as the only principle involved. It was stated at that time that the government would allow on this question of public or private control the freest discussion in committee itself. Well, the bill went to the committee, and when it got there what was discovered? It was discovered that members of the committee belonging to the party opposite were opposed to any bank that would be other than privately owned and controlled, and that they stood as a unit for a privately owned and controlled bank. Wat that because they believed in state intervention and interference in business, or was it because they entirely and absolutely disagreed with any such policy call it reform or whatever you like, and did not approve of it? When the measure came back to this house it was found that the Liberal members of that committee had made a very strenuous fight to secure control on the part of the government and parliament over that central bank. They were prepared to consider any steps that would admit of any degree of control, but the government was adamant in the matter. During the discussion on the third reading of the bill I spoke with great emphasis as to the importance of allowing the government to have some control over this central bank. I pleaded with the Prime Minister to at least allow one or two directors to be named by the government, but I pleaded in vain. This bank was to be a private corporation and was to be removed entirely from all government authority or control. That was the objective, and that is how the Prime Minister then viewed reform of the capitalist system—at all costs to keep free of intervention the keystone in the arch of the capitalist system.

What was the position before this central bank came into being? The control of the currency of the country was in the hands of this parliament. Control of social credit was in the hands of parliament. The securities of the country, the gold of the country, were in the treasury of the country. Where are they to-day? They have all been taken out of the public treasury and put into the vaults of this private corporation. Are all the gold and securities of the country to-day subject to the control of parliament or are they in the vaults of this privately owned bank removed altogether from government control? Who has charge of the issue of the currency to-day; who has control of the currency? That responsibility has been handed over by this government to the central bank. Yet the Prime Minister comes along and talks about some scheme of planned economy which will help to reform the capitalist system. I tell him no program of planned economy can succeed if it is not based upon the intelligent public control of national currency and credit. I say as long as we have a government standing solidly behind the principle of a privately owned and controlled institution such as the central bank is, a private corporation controlling the currency and credit of the country, we can have no faith whatever in any profession made by the government when it states that government intervention in its mind is an all important objective. So much for what the Prime Minister professes, let his professions be judged by his actions.

Speaking in Montreal a short time ago the Prime Minister revealed what he has in mind in proposing social legislation. He gave away his hand pretty clearly. I have already stated that I believe it is an election scheme, and I hold that belief very strongly. I did not think however that the Prime Minister would be prepared to go quite so far towards seeking to make it an issue fraught with all kinds of possible dangers to the unity of this country. It was quite apparent however, he had something of the kind in his mind when only a few evenings ago he spoke in the city of Montreal. That was his last address; I believe it was on January 15, only two days before the opening of the session. I heard him saying—and I have no doubt many other people heard him—"Do you want minimum wages and maximum hours of work? If you do not, then vote for Taschereau and King." Then he went on to say, "Do you want your old people not cared for? Well, if you do not, then vote for Taschereau and King." These were the terms used by the Prime Minister in addressing the people of Montreal.

First of all, remember that these statements were made over the radio. They were not made in parliament where there is opportunity to reply. The Prime Minister referred to Mr. Taschereau. He, by the way, is not a member of this chamber and cannot appear on its floor to speak for himself.

An hon. MEMBER: Over the radio.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Over the radio? My hon. friends talk about radio. Well, they may have a fathomless chest into which to dip for radio purposes, but other people have not.

May I proceed to follow up the Prime Minister's statements. I have not the slightest doubt about Mr. Taschereau being able to take care of himself; he will in his own way and at his own time; to-night I do not purpose to speak either for or against Mr. Taschereau. I am not dealing with absent personages; I am concerned only with those in front of me. I shall confine my remarks to the Prime Minister's attack upon myself.

What else did the Prime Minister say? "When they had a chance did they do anything about these things?" "When they had a chance"—in other words when Mr. King had a chance did he do anything about minimum wages, maximum hours, old age pensions and other social problems? I suppose we will hear the Prime Minister and some of his followers answer, "Yes, he wrote a book, and he put his principles and ideas in that book." I purpose this evening, even if it takes me a little longer than I had intended, to show that before the book was written many of the principles and ideas therein set forth found expression in legislation. I shall show that after its publication many more of the principles and ideas therein set forth found expression in legislation and I shall support my statements not by my own assertions merely but from the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite. There are some fortunately amongst us who have a sense of chivalry and decency in public life and who do not make statements about others when they are not present to answer or to refute what is said about them. There are some who like to see fair play in public life. I admit we have very little of that practice at times, but I believe it is well to encourage it when we can.

Even before the Prime Minister had made these statements in Montreal and before his remarks had been broadcast over the radio network he had been accusing the Liberal party, and particularly myself of having done nothing on behalf of labour. I hold in my hand a copy of an editorial which appeared in the Montreal Gazette.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am pleased to see in his seat tonight, although I am sorry to see him sitting on the government side, a former distinguished editor of the Montreal Gazette.

Mr. WHITE (Mount Royal): And who retired from the editorial chair nine years ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is why I used the expression "a former editor"; I was not referring to the present editor. I was seeking to make it quite clear that the Montreal Gazette is not an organ of the Liberal party but is one which throughout this country has been regarded as the stalwart of the stalwarts among Conservative organs. At any rate it is perfectly clear that when the editorial to which I am referring was written the Montreal Gazette was not holding any brief for me, because the paragraph I am about to read began with those very words. It is as follows:

> We hold no brief for Mr. Mackenzie King, but when the Prime Minister refers to Liberal history and speaks of child labour, sweatshops, slave wages and so on as being among the faults and injustices of the capitalistic system it is impossible to disregard the appeal for fair play which has been made. It is a matter of record that Mr. King personally has always interested himself very keenly and practically in these evils and that it was in fact his crusade against them that brought him into public life, that resulted in the creation of the Department of Labour and in the enactment of remedial legislation of various kinds; and this happened many years before Mr. Bennett himself awoke to the imperative necessity of a reform policy on the eve of a general election.

Mr. BENNETT: What date is that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: January 12.

Mr. BENNETT: This year?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, this year.

Some hon. MEMBERS: The new order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Montreal Gazette is not the only Conservative organ which has recorded the part I have taken in these industrial matters and in the matter of legislative reform. I might quote many comments, but upon this occasion I shall confine myself to only one further extract. I now refer to the Ottawa Evening Journal of January 18, 1935. This is not a reference to something which has happened on the eve of an election; it finds its place in that column of the Journal which goes under the heading "Ottawa 25 years ago." Quoting from the Journal of January 19, 1910, it states:

Hon. Mackenzie King, Minister of Labour, introduced a bill to provide for the investigation of combines, monopolies, trusts and mergers which may enhance prices or restrict competition to the detriment of the consumer.

At that time, some twenty-five years ago, the Ottawa Journal, a Conservative organ, was recording some efforts of mine in this parliament to further investigation into industrial abuses, and the reference was as I have given it.

But that is not the first time I had anything to do with the matter of the investigation, or reforms of this kind, all of which, may I say, were in the nature of state intervention. What I am dealing with now is the charge that the Liberal party has been a party of laissez-faire, that it has not been a party of state intervention where state intervention was necessary.

I have in my hand a copy of a document which bears the imprint of the Ottawa government printing bureau, 1898. That is nearly forty years ago, and when the Prime Minister says, "If you do not want minimum wages, then support Mr. King;" "if you do not want maximum hours, then support Mr. King;" "if you are in favour of sweating, then support Mr. King"—and so forth and so forth, I think in these circumstances perhaps I am justified in pointing out to the Prime Minister and to hon. members just when I began publicly to assert in relation to Canadian government work the necessity for state intervention. This report is headed, "A report to the hon. Postmaster General on methods adopted in Canada in the carrying out of government clothing contracts, by W. L. Mackenzie King, M.A., LL.B." That report, as I have said, was presented to the government on January 5, 1898, and that report, I may say, associated as it was with the interviews that I had with members of the government of the day, was the report that led to the adoption in this House of Commons of what is known as the fair wages resolution of the House of Commons, under which all government contracts relating to clothing, contracts with the Post Office department, with Militia and Defence, with the mounted police, and subsequently contracts in the nature of public works, all come to contain provisions setting forth maximum hours for the workers, and the minimum rates of wages that were to be paid, and the conditions under which the work was to be performed.

I shall not attempt even to mention what is stated in the report itself. Hon. members will be able to see that for themselves if they wish. I shall read, however, the concluding paragraph because it indicates whether, as a matter of fact, as a Liberal I believe in state intervention and whether the Liberal party believes in state intervention; because, remember, these reforms were introduced by a Liberal administration, the Liberal administration of the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Thirty-seven years ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Thirty-seven years ago, as my colleague remarks. This was my conclusion:

I need scarcely add that the existence of such conditions, apart from any other attendant evils of the sweating system, constitute emphatically in the words of your communication "sufficient grounds for government interference in order that future contracts may be performed in a manner free from all such objectionable features." The step in this direction which has already been taken by your department cannot fail to bring about a much-needed reform and be productive of great and lasting good to the industrial classes of this country.

I have the honour to be,
Your obedient servant,
W. L. Mackenzie King.

May I come now to one other matter? I shall not attempt to enumerate the different instances that I might of government intervention by Liberal administrations. I shall confine what I have to say to-night to just what was referred to by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) himself on Friday last when he tabled the report of the Department of Labour. I was quite interested in noticing what the Minister of Labour said when he presented his report. He did not simply say, "I present the report of the Department of Labour for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1934," but he went a step further than his colleagues, and a step further than he generally goes, and he gave the contents of the report in part. I thought at the time that he did so in an endeavour to make apparent the extent in his department of government intervention through social legislation and with respect to labour.

I find in the votes and proceedings of January 18, 1935, the following:

> Mr. Gordon, a member of the King's Privy Council, laid before the house, by command of His Excellency the Governor General,—Annual Report of the Department of Labour for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1934, which includes reports of proceedings under the following statutes: Labour Department Act, Conciliation and Labour Act, Fair Wages and Eight Hour Day Act, Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, Government Annuities Act, Employment Offices Co-ordination Act, Technical Education Act, Combines Investigation Act, Old Age Pensions Act, and relief measures.

That is the statement. Now, Mr. Speaker, let us take a look at these various statutes, all of which are in the nature of state intervention, and see where they came from. I will say now that, with the exception of one, all owe their existence to Liberal initiative and Liberal administrations. The one exception is the relief measures, which as the Prime Minister said over the radio are wholly of an exceptional and emergency character and are, to use his characterization, "in the nature of priming the pump." These measures were necessary only because the government's policies in other directions have wholly failed and because times were so bad that constructive measures were not even thought of, let alone introduced. Let us see where the other measures came from.

Take first the Labour Department Act. The Labour department was established originally in the year 1900. The Labour Department Act was not a Conservative measure; it was introduced by the government of the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, a Liberal government, and the Labour department was established as a department of government to emphasize from a Liberal point of view the necessity of state intervention in labour matters. Speak of all the reforms you wish, but where was it possible to introduce on behalf of labour in parliament a greater measure of reform than to establish a department of government to be concerned with the problems of labour to the exclusion of all others? That was a reform introduced by a Liberal government. Perhaps I may be pardoned for reminding the house that I was honoured by the then Postmaster General, who was the minister of the Crown who introduced the measure, the Right Hon. Sir William Mulock, to-day Chief Justice of Ontario, by being invited to come to Ottawa and, under his direction, to organize the Department of Labour of Canada and to become the editor of the Labour Gazette, which was to contain the records and information which would be a guide for future legislation and which would assemble material which would be of assistance to legislators dealing with these matters. I accepted this position. I came to Ottawa and began in the year 1900, now nearly thirty-five years ago, the organization of the Department of Labour in Canada, and for eight years I held the office of deputy minister of that department. During those years I edited the Labour Gazette, a publication which continues to be published, and of which now there are something like thirty-five annual volumes. In that time I outlined more or less the particular subjects that were to be investigated by the department, the methods to be adopted in collecting and disseminating information on labour matters, and I find on looking at the report that the minister laid on the table last week, and at copies of the Labour Gazette, that they all continue to follow the lines then charted out.

There was another act passed at that time, the Conciliation Act, which concerned the Department of Labour. It was the first act of this federal parliament for intervention in industrial disputes—not compulsory, but voluntary intervention by the government—with machinery for bringing opinion to bear on any existing dispute. During the time I was deputy minister I intervened I think in something like forty at least of the most important strikes of that time. The record will speak for itself as to how successful I was. Out of the experience of those eight years in a practical and immediate way with labour questions, I believe I learned a few things supplemented later by wider experience and study that it was worth while to pass on to others in the form I have already indicated.

The next act referred to here is the Conciliation and Labour Act. That reminds me that there has been a consolidation of the measures since, but there was another conciliation act dealing with disputes on railways. It was known as the Railway Disputes Arbitration Act. It was introduced as a compulsory measure, but at the time of its introduction the minister of the day indicated that he did not intend to press it at that session because he was not sure that compulsion was acceptable either to employers or to employees, and that he would re-introduce it at the next session in the form thought most desirable. At the next session it was introduced, not as a compulsory measure but nevertheless as a measure of state intervention in labour disputes on railways.

Then another measure is the Fair Wages and Eight Hour Day Act, which is nothing more than the embodying in the form of a statute of the fair wages resolution to which I have referred, and the various orders in council by which its provisions have been extended. The right hon. gentleman says: "What did Mr. King do when he was in office in regard to these matters?" I have indicated what I had to do with the beginnings. Here is one of the things I had to do towards the end; as Prime Minister I supported and endorsed the Minister of Labour of the day, the Hon. Peter Heenan, in introducing this act respecting fair wages and an eight hour day for labour employed on public works of the Dominion of Canada. That was on the 30th of May, 1930. May I pause to say that it has always been assumed—I say always; possibly within the last month or two there has been a change in the mind of some—that most of these matters of social legislation come exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provinces. At least that is the opinion that has been given by the law officers; it may be that the government has since received some later opinion. The reason that many of these measures have not been extended by this parliament has been that all members of this house, those of the Conservative party, of the Progressive party, of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and the Liberal party, have understood that these measures came exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provinces except in so far as they related to federal work. As far as they related to federal work Liberal administrations, either that of Sir Wilfrid Laurier or of the government which I had the honour to lead, put these measures on the statute book, and in so doing set an example to the provincial governments. Except in Ontario, which under a Liberal government in the same year as the federal department of labour was created, established a bureau of labour, there were no bureaux of labour in any of the provinces at the time the federal department was established. There were no fair wages resolutions or laws. These fair wages resolutions fixing minimum wages and maximum hours have extended to provinces and municipalities through the example set under a Liberal administration in this country. What we have to-day in many of the provinces in the way of minimum wage boards and the like have been in large part the outcome of the example set by the Liberal administration at Ottawa.

The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act is the next mentioned here. The Act was passed in 1907; it has remained upon the statutes ever since. It has been amended here and there, but essentially the act is what it was at the time it was passed by this house. I think it is an open secret that, while the act was introduced in this House of Commons by the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, who was Minister of Labour at the time, I was the one who drafted the act. I was still at the time deputy minister of the department. I am not taking that credit to myself, because time and time again that credit has been given publicly by Mr. Lemieux himself.

Mr. BENNETT: The privy council declared it ultra vires.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend says the privy council declared it ultra vires. Well, it is still on the statutes and is being enforced by his own government. May I say to the Prime Minister that I think he does not mean the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act but the Combines Investigation Act or the Fair Prices Act.

Mr. BENNETT: No, the Combines Investigation Act was sustained.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, the best answer I can give to the Prime Minister that the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act is not ultra vires is that I have here the report of his own Minister of Labour giving an account of what was done under the act last year.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman knows that the provincial legislatures enacted certain measures.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is a federal measure and has nothing to do with the provincial legislatures.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, everything. It was declared ultra vires.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Minister of Labour is administering the act to-day, and there have been I do not know how many different boards established under the act within the past year. The act is still in force, it may have required amendment as the result of some appeal to the privy council. If however, as the Prime Minister says, it had been declared ultra vires, it would be all the more reason why he should proceed very carefully with any industrial legislation and make sure that he gets in advance an opinion of the law officers or of the supreme court or any other authority available as to the intra vires of any legislation he may attempt to introduce.

Now we come to another act, the Government Annuities Act, a further piece of social legislation. Who was responsible for that act? It was passed in 1908 under the Liberal government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and the minister who introduced it was Sir Richard Cartwright, Minister of Trade and Commerce at the time. The annuities branch was organized under the Department of Trade and Commerce but was later transferred to the Department of Labour.

The next measure mentioned is the Employment Offices Coordination Act. One might think we were getting somewhere near the point at which the Conservative party could claim something, but this act was passed in 1918. At that time we had no longer a Conservative administration but a union government composed of both Liberals and Conservatives, and this act I have no doubt owes its existence to the Liberals who were members of that government.

Then we come to the Technical Education Act, 1919. What was the genesis of that measure? The Technical Education Act embodied in legislation certain recommendations of a royal commission on technical education. Here again may I say, when the Prime Minister asks, "What has Mr. King done?" and hon, gentlemen say, "What has he done in these matters," that, in addition to having been deputy minister of Labour, I was for two or three years Minister of Labour in the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and when I was Minister of Labour I was responsible for some measures which I thought would be helpful in improving social and industrial conditions. One was the appointment of a royal commission on technical education. That commission made an extensive study of the question, made its recommendations, and it was on the basis of the recommendations of that commission that the Technical Education Act was subsequently enacted. The war intervened between the time the report was made and the time the legislation was enacted, but the legislation was enacted not by a Conservative government but by a union government in 1919 carrying out recommendations arising out of the report made by the Commission appointed by the previous Liberal administration.

The next measure mentioned is the Combines Investigation Act. That act has an interesting history. The Combines Investigation Act was first introduced in this parliament by myself as Minister of Labour. It was a measure for the drafting of which I was responsible. It was as far as I know the first measure that was at all effective as a means of investigating alleged anti-social practices of large businesses in the nature of combines, monopolies, trusts and mergers. That act was passed in 1909, and remained on the statutes until a Conservative administration came into office. In 1919 when the Union government had begun to lose its union complexion and became more and more a Conservative government, the act was repealed, and in its place was substituted what was called the Fair Prices Act as well as the Board of Commerce Act. The Prime Minister talks about measures being declared ultra vires. Both those measures were declared ultra vires. The Combines Act had been previously repealed, so that the country was left without any measure to investigate the anti-social practices of large commercial institutions in the nature of combines, monopolies, mergers, trusts and the like. When, however, a Liberal government was returned in 1921, there being no legislation of the kind, a measure of state intervention providing for the investigation of combines, monopolies, mergers, trusts and the like, was at the time I was holding the office of prime minister re-introduced and re-enacted. It was introduced by the then Minister of Labour the Hon. James Murdock, who brought in the measure at the instance of the government.

The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) this afternoon said, "We had a lot of mergers during the period that act was on the statute books." Certainly there were mergers, because mergers were the order of the day all over the world. This act was not aimed against mergers as such. They were in the same class under the act as combines, monopolies or any other agency that might operate in restraint of trade. The provisions of the act were not intended to prohibit parties in Canada from combining or forming a merger or anything of that sort wherever business endeavoured to hold its own in competition with similar concerns in other provinces or in other parts of the world. They were, however, intended to cope with the inimical effects of large combination where its operations were against the public interest. It was because large combination was so powerful, because it could in one way or another take advantage of those in unprotected spheres of life, that this measure was enacted. I will not go into the details at present because the question will undoubtedly come up for discussion on another occasion.

Hon. gentlemen say, "What did Mr. Mackenzie King and his government do, while in office, in the way of furthering social legislation? I have spoken of the Combines Act, of the Fair Wages and Eight Hour Day Act, enacted the one in 1923, the other in 1930. I might have added that we gave to labour a place on the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways, but there was one measure more important than all the others. It is the Old Age Pensions Act, enacted in 1927. We began to work toward that end in 1924. If anyone will give careful study to the question of social insurance and of social legislation generally, he will realize that the place to begin with legislation of that kind is with the older members of the community, those who have spent their lives in industry and who because of age, because of the introduction of machinery as it is used to-day, demanding extreme exertion, are prevented from continuing in their work and are consequently thrown out of employment—thrown out, through no fault of their own but simply as a result of the way in which industry is operated. Now, these are the persons for whom first of all the state ought to care.

But before legislation of the kind can be introduced and made operative something else is necessary, and of this I am afraid the present government is losing sight. You may have all the social legislation you please, old age pensions, insurance for sickness, invalidity, unemployment, and so on; but, unless you have money wherewith to make the payments necessary, you cannot carry out that legislation. I shall be able to show that hon. gentlemen opposite have themselves given that reason for not carrying out legislation which they have passed. The first thing is to make sure of where the money will come from.

I have always held the view that we could not have much in the way of prosperity in the country if we had not much in the way of trade; and, therefore, as part of the policy of the Liberal administration, seeking to improve industrial conditions, I have always endeavoured, as the basis of Liberal legislation, to introduce measures that would further rather than restrict trade, measures that would help to develop the trade of the country and, by developing its trade, provide employment in the natural and proper way.

What good are minimum wages to men who have no work? What good are maximum hours to men who have no work? The sweating system is usually to be found where there is very little work. How are old age pensions to be paid if there is no general employment? How are you to take care of the sick if you have insufficient revenues out of which to meet the necessary disbursements? Can you go on developing all these services on borrowed money indefinitely and not have the credit of the nation suffer? Can you carry on any scheme of social legislation unless you have the wherewithal to do so?

In that view of things will be seen the foundation of Liberal policy on social legislation as well as much else; and if the Liberal party in the federal field, during the time I had the honour to be Prime Minister, did not introduce more in the way of so-called social legislation than it did, it was in the main for two reasons, one of which I have already indicated, namely, that up to the present time, until within the last few weeks, it has been understood that practically all legislation of a social character came exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provinces, the other reason being that we did not know where we should obtain the wherewithal to carry out these policies until we got rid of the cumulative deficits which we had inherited when we assumed office.

We started out with a policy of balancing the budget; a policy which would develop trade by reducing the duties on the implements of production in the basic industries; by reducing the tariff on many of the necessaries of life which enter so largely into the budget of the working classes; and by lowering other tariffs which would further trade by means of reciprocal agreements, and in other ways. As a result of these policies, we not only succeeded in putting an end to the deficits, but for seven years we had surpluses instead. Equally, we felt the necessity of reducing taxation, and our policies were the means, as hon. gentlemen know very well, of bringing down very materially the taxation of this country in a way which helped industry and all classes connected with industries. The sales tax, which at one time was 6 per cent, was brought down to one per cent before we went out of office. The rate of the income tax was lowered with respect to the lower incomes, while small incomes were wholly exempted. The various nuisance taxes, so-called, were completely abolished. The postage rate, which had been 3 cents, was brought down to 2.

All these measures were part of a policy designed to make possible the development of trade and to improve social and industrial conditions throughout the country in order that work might be provided, that the revenues themselves might be increased and that we might have the means whereby to carry out some of our social ideas.

Let me recall the Prime Minister's question asked at Montreal: "If you don't want your old people cared for then vote for Taschereau and King?" Here is my answer to the falsity of an assertion of that character. In April 1924, on the records of the house, there is a statement that a special committee was appointed on the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King to make inquiries into an old age pensions system for Canada. It was recommended that the provinces should be communicated with in that connection. In other words, the Liberal party proceeded, as it always has in social as well as in other matters, on the basis, not of seeking to stir up enmity between the dominion and the provinces, not of making such appeals as, "Are you going to support Taschereau and King," but of endeavouring to have the provinces and the dominion work harmoniously together for the purpose of furthering great social objectives. We have sought to communicate with the provinces and to secure their good will in matters of the kind. We succeeded in getting it with regard to old age pensions, but we had to act within the lines that the officers of the crown told us were possible. On May 1, 1925, the special committee was again appointed. On June 16, 1925, the committee recommended in favour of setting up a scheme but also that an effort be made to receive cooperative action on the part of the provinces. In 1926 the bill, after much debate and criticism from the then Conservative opposition, was adopted in the house. The Conservative party, however had a majority in the Senate and the bill was defeated in that chamber. Such was the initial fate of this Liberal measure of social reform. I wonder what the fate is going to be of these measures of social reform, when they go to the Senate, should they ever get through a Conservative majority in the house. I hope the electorate will bear in mind the complexion of the Senate as it was all the time the late Liberal administration was in office and is likely to be for many years to come, and I hope it will remember the Senate's action on the first extensive measure of social reform that was introduced by a Liberal government—an old age pension measure passed by the House of Commons under Liberal administration and defeated in the upper house by a Conservative majority. The matter, however, was not allowed to drop there. The following year, after the general election of 1926, a bill identical in terms was introduced in this house by the then Minister of Labour, Mr. Heenan. After considerable discussion it passed both houses and received royal assent on March 31, 1927. There in part is my answer to the Prime Minister as to whether as a Liberal I have done my share as opportunity has presented itself to further social and labour legislation in this house and in the country, and as to whether, when I was Prime Minister, I sought to give practical effect to the principles laid down in the work on industrial reconstruction to which I referred this afternoon.

There is one other measure to which I should like to refer but which is not mentioned by the Minister of Labour in his report. It is significant that it is a measure of social legislation. With the exception of the relief measures, it is the only social legislation that this government has passed since it came to office. I refer to the Act for the promotion of vocational education in Canada passed by the House of Commons on July 23, 1931. There are some of us here to-day who well remember the discussion on that measure. At the time it was introduced I said to hon. gentlemen opposite that I thought they were in for a pretty large outlay in connection with their unemployment relief schemes; that they had better have a conference with the provinces to discuss the financial relations between the provinces and the dominion and the financial circumstances of the provinces and of the dominion in regard to these matters; that before they went in for making further grants in aid of one kind or another to the provinces, they had better find out if they were prepared for the taxation and revenues necessary to meet those obligations. But, no, they were persistent, they were going to have this measure upon the statute books. Well, it is there, just as the Prime Minister said it was important that the people should have on the statute books an act pertaining to elections whether its provisions were available for use or not. What happened in regard to the vocational education measure? In the report of the minister there is no mention of the act. It is not there because it is buried. The government sent a communication privately to the different provinces to say it could not be carried into effect. There was to be a payment of $750,000 annually for fifteen years; that was what they were committing themselves to. I do not know how much they are going to commit themselves to on their social projects; probably they may run into many millions of dollars, but if they do not mean more than this measure, let the Lord help those who are expected to benefit by them and those who are in suffering and in need. Here is what was said about this act in a letter dated September 15, 1931, from the deputy minister of labour at Ottawa to the provincial governments:

I am instructed by the minister, however, to advise all provinces that after careful consideration by the government it has been decided to postpone the operation of the act until such time as the economic conditions of the country warrant expenditures being made in connection with the work to be promoted under the terms of the act.

I suppose that is what we shall hear in regard to any more social legislation hon. gentlemen opposite may introduce. If they are going to attempt all this social legislation and at the same time keep up the tariff walls of this country and restrict trade as they have been doing, I am afraid all the social legislation will go by the boards just as this measure in regard to vocational training has gone and for the same reason. So much by way of reply for the present to the Prime Minister's question to the people of Canada as to whom they should support, when they came to consider matters of social and industrial legislation, whether they should support him or support me.

I said this afternoon that I thought the Prime Minister might have been reading this book of mine on Industry and Humanity and obtained some of his social views from that perusal, but he shook his head, so I conclude that he has not yet seen it and that somebody has told him about the contents.

Mr. BENNETT: Not yet. I have not seen anybody that has read it; that is the trouble.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is one document, however, with which I know the Prime Minister is familiar and that is one embodying the statement that I made in this house, not just on the eve of an election but on February 27, 1933, two years ago, when I set out the position of the Liberal party in regard to some immediate problems. My right hon. friend has been saying that the Liberal party has no constructive policy; he has passed the word around among his followers that the cry is to be that the Liberal party has no policy. He has said as much in his radio broadcasts. He says however, that our policy is at once activity and inactivity. That is pretty much the line he takes all through; he gets in the opposites on all occasions, so that the compass will be boxed on all sides. While he did say that we had no policy at all, there is one thing I feel a little pleased about and it is that in the speech from the throne the Prime Minister has embodied amongst his measures a good many that have been put forward as their policies by the Liberal party. There can be no dispute on this fact, as all that is needed by way of comparison with what appears in the speech from the throne is a reference to Hansard of February 27, 1933, where there is set forth an exact statement of what those policies are.

I shall take a few minutes to refer to those parts of the speech from the throne which deal with the matters which the Prime Minister says constitute a part of his reform program. The speech otherwise is not so important. Part of it has pleasant references, I am glad to see, to the Jacques Cartier celebration and also to His Majesty's silver jubilee. Then there are references to some administration measures and references to some agreements and commissions which are to be further dealt with, which by the way happen to be also Liberal measures. The Duncan commission to which reference was made was appointed by a Liberal administration and a large part of its findings were implemented by the late Liberal administration. The agreements with Saskatchewan and Alberta were part of the agreements made by the late Liberal administration with the western provinces, including Manitoba, whereby the natural resources of these provinces were returned to them. There are a few matters of that kind, and one or two administrative measures that we may hear about during this session. Apart from that the speech from the throne relates to proposed social legislation.

Where, may I ask, do these proposed measures come from? We read this in the speech:

In these improved conditions, there may now successfully be carried forward those great tasks of reform upon which the well-being of this country depends . . . reform measures will therefore be submitted to you as part of a comprehensive plan designed to remedy the social and economic injustices now prevailing, and to ensure to all classes and to all parts of the country a greater degree of equality and the distribution of the benefits of the capitalist system.

The first of these—and it has to be read along with one which appears a little further on—relates to the social matters that I have just recited:

Better provision will be made for the security of the worker during unemployment, in sickness and in old age.

Also:

Action will be taken to ameliorate the conditions of labour, to provide a better and more assured standard of living for the worker, to secure minimum wages and a maximum working week, and to alter the incidence of taxation so that it will more directly conform to capacity to pay.

I think I have already indicated where part of the policy there outlined has come from. May I indicate where the rest of it has come from? Here, as elsewhere, I wish to cite a part of Liberal policy which is not being put forward to-day for the first time on the eve of an election but which has been our policy from the start. It is the policy which I advocated years ago and at the first session of this parliament and which I have advocated every session since, as hon. members well know. What is the first item which appears in the published statement of Liberal policy?

Unemployment of First Concern

The Liberal party believes unemployment is Canada's most urgent national problem. It would deal with the present emergency conditions through a representative national commission, which would cooperate with the provinces and municipalities in the administration of unemployment relief, and in an endeavour to provide work for the unemployed.

That is a step which, if it had been taken at the time, or if it had been taken in any year up to the present, would have served to coordinate all the efforts that are being put forth by the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities to provide work for the unemployed. It would have saved a waste of millions of dollars and would have helped relieve the situation to a degree to which it has not begun to be relieved. The Prime Minister has no constructive plan of that character even yet, and he has not put anything of that kind in the speech from the throne. Again I say to him that if he wants to deal with this problem as it should be dealt with, he should have a representative national commission to deal with this matter. What else might have been done? What did I point out at the time I was advocating this step? I pointed out that such a commission could, amongst other of its duties, gather the necessary data on which to base an unemployment insurance scheme. Had this step been taken we would have known ere this who were the men and women best qualified to hold positions in connection with any national commission dealing with these questions.

What else is set forth in this statement of Liberal policy?

As permanent measures the Liberal party is pledged to introduce policies which will serve to provide employment by reviving industry and trade; and to introduce a national system of unemployment insurance.

Does the Prime Minister claim that this is his policy, a national system of unemployment insurance? We have been advocating it since 1930. Why have we had to wait until 1935 to have it even mentioned that it is to be part of the policy of the Prime Minister?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Now let me come to the next matter mentioned in the speech:

My ministers are now engaged upon a survey of the national debt structure to determine what action may be practicable and advisable to effect further improvement in it.

Where did the Prime Minister get that? I read here, from the same statement of the position of the Liberal party on some immediate problems, the following:

The Liberal party believes the aim of every government should be the balancing of its budget.

It would seek to effect that end, by retrenchment of public expenditures, by reduction of principal and interest on the public debt, by a reduction in taxation, and by increasing revenues through the encouragement of trade.

It will seek to effect a reduction of the cost of government in Canada by a careful inquiry into federal, provincial and municipal costs.

In all of these matters, as the house will observe, the Liberal statement of policy is a much more comprehensive and extensive statement than anything embodied in the speech from the throne.

Now let us come to the next point in the speech:

It is the policy of my ministers to pursue vigorously every opportunity by which our world trade may be increased.

Where did the Prime Minister get this idea with regard to world trade? I find in the Liberal statement of policy, as given by me in this house in 1933 and as urged from the outset, the following:

The Liberal party believes that trade is the basis of industrial and commercial development, and that Canada needs trade.

It will promote trade with all nations—

That is what the Prime Minister is just now saying here, that the policy of the government is to encourage world trade:

—and negotiate trade agreements with any countries willing to trade with Canada on a reciprocal basis.

This afternoon we had from the Prime Minister a statement telling us that now, at the end of this parliament, just on the eve of an election, his government and the government of the United States are negotiating with regard to a reciprocal trade agreement. For years we have been advocating that some steps should be taken in that direction. Over and over again we have asked the Prime Minister whether any progress was being made in negotiations with respect to a reciprocal agreement between Canada and the United States. I am not so sure that he has got very far even yet. If I caught his statement correctly this afternoon it was to the effect that it would be March or later before the United States would be able to say definitely what they were going to be able to do. At any rate the Prime Minister will hardly say that a reciprocal agreement with the United States has not been a part of the Liberal policy at all times. If there is in the offing the negotiation of an agreement with the United States with respect to reciprocal trade with Canada, it is all the more reason why the people of this country should be given the opportunity immediately of saying who they wish to negotiate that treaty, whether they wish it to be negotiated by a party that defeated reciprocity when a reciprocal agreement had been arrived at, now many years ago, or whether they want it negotiated by a party which was prepared to sacrifice, and did sacrifice, its political life in order to obtain a larger measure of freedom in trade between these two countries. I am reminded of the cry with which we were met when the Liberal party negotiated that agreement; it was that there should be no truck or trade with the Yankees. Now my right hon. friend, who was perhaps loudest in his objections to the reciprocal agreement, is the one who says he is negotiating with the United States.

What is the next paragraph in the speech from the throne?

> You will be invited to enact measures designed to safeguard the consumer and primary producer against unfair trading practices and to regulate, in the public interest, concentrations in production and distribution.

Where did the Prime Minister get that idea? I find under the heading Liberation of Internal Trade, among the policies laid down as those of the Liberal party, the following:

> The Liberal party will seek to end artificial price control, and agreements in restraint of trade. Price fixing by agreements restrict and hamper trade internally. The internal trade of our country has become honeycombed and enmeshed by secret understandings and agreements.

There, in other words, as in the other instances I have cited, is a more comprehensive statement than is embodied in what I have just read from the speech from the throne.

Then what is next? The speech says:

> You will be invited also to enact measures to provide the investing public with means to protect itself against exploitation.

What did we say a couple of years ago, in specific words, in our statement of policy with regard to the control of investments?

> The Liberal party believes the financial mismanagement of industry is largely responsible for many conditions obtaining to-day.
> To prevent exploitation of the public through the sale of watered stock and worthless securities, it believes an investment control board should be established, with supervision of issues of securities by companies incorporated under federal charters.

Yet on top of all this the Prime Minister says the Liberal party has no policy.

Now may I come to another reference. After speaking of the government's renewed determination to make use of the agencies of conciliation and cooperation provided by the League of Nations, the speech from the throne continues:

> It will be the object of my government to support this policy and to work towards the progressive reduction of armaments and the stabilization of international economic relations.

Just to show that his is not the only party favourable to the League of Nations and policies advanced by the League let me read what appears under International Relations in the statement of the position of the Liberal party.

> The Liberal party will seek to further wherever possible those courses in international relations which make for peace and good-will among nations, and promote friendly intercourse between them. It will seek to further the work of the League of Nations.

I have read from statements that appear in the speech from the throne, the whole of the program of social reform, as it is put forth there by the Prime Minister, and which are the most important of the measures he is bringing before the house this session. Naturally if these measures are at all in accord with what we had in mind in our statement of policy, they will receive very sympathetic consideration from this side of the house, but may I say that some things are wholly wanting in the declarations which appear in the speech from the throne. Their omission in any statement of policy by the Prime Minister is just about as significant as is their inclusion in the Liberal statement of policy. In the one case it means that the government opposite intend to do nothing, whereas in the other case it means that a Liberal administration stands in addition for these things as part of its policy. I have read only one part of the statement of the Liberal position with regard to trade. Let me read the whole statement as it is set forth, and remember that these are policies for which the Liberal party stands, for which it has stood in the past, and which it will put in force if it is returned to office. I might add they are all policies which have received the unanimous endorsation of the entire Liberal parliamentary party, and in addition the unanimous endorsation of the National Liberal Federation which represents the Liberal party as organized in associations and clubs throughout the country.

Here is the statement in regard to trade:

The Liberal party believes that trade is the basis of industrial and commercial development and that Canada needs trade.

It will promote trade with all nations and negotiate trade agreements with any countries willing to trade with Canada on a reciprocal basis.

It will abolish the extravagant increases in the tariff made by the present administration, which have had the effect of strangling trade, exploiting consumers and robbing railways of business.

It will abolish all unwarranted extra taxes on imports, such as the exchange and dumping duties, as imposed by the present administration.

It will end the making and altering of tariffs by executive action.

It will substitute stability for uncertainty in the administration of customs laws.

It will continue the Liberal policy of British preference by a percentage reduction in existing tariffs rather than by a percentage increase against foreign countries in existing tariffs.

It will grant to British imports a real preference.

I have already referred to the liberation of internal trade. Let me now read the Liberal policy with respect to the development of primary industries:

The Liberal party, by its policies, will continue to further the development of agriculture, lumbering, mining and fishing by effecting reductions in the costs of production of Canada's basic products, by obtaining wider markets therefor, by encouraging export trade, and by state assistance in the marketing of natural products.

Looking at the speech from the throne and listening to the speeches of the Prime Minister over the radio I have come to the conclusion that his policies are a sort of omnium gatherum, they are intended to take in a little of everything he can discover in anybody's policy. He has a little from the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation; he has a great deal from the Liberal party, but he has very little that is new, so far as his own party is concerned. However I can see pretty clearly the trend of affairs. He has told us that his policy is going to be a continuing affair; these promises are not going to stop now. They are to go on, on, on, on, until the moment of the last hour of the election. The promises which have not been redeemed are to be redeemed by promissory notes carrying other promises. That is the effect of it. I want to say here and now, and particularly after what we have heard this afternoon, what I think will happen before an appeal is made to the people. We see appearing the thin edge of the wedge of reciprocity with the United States. That much is brought forth at this stage to carry along what may appear as, up to the right moment, the government's intended course of action. If it does not suit the Tory party to have the terms of any agreement made known, or to have the agreement itself submitted to parliament, or to have any agreement entered into before the election, the prospect will be kept dangling along as a sort of half realized promise. We will also find that on the question of tariffs there will also probably be a conversion on the part of the Prime Minister which will bring him in the direction of the Liberal camp. He will come along and perhaps offer free agricultural implements or possibly free motor cars, or very considerable reductions in tariffs on implements and motor cars and other commodities. Let me say to the Prime Minister here and now that all of these are Liberal objectives, and have been right along. If he wishes to join us in our endeavour to get the duties lowered or taken off some of these things which are unduly protected, now is the time to come over here and help to advocate such changes—not wait until the last moment of the election.

Let me now refer again to another matter of Liberal policy namely the control of credit. Here is what the Liberal party advocates—not a central bank put into the hands of a private corporation, but a properly constituted central bank. I read again from the statement made in this House on February 27, 1933:

Liberalism believes that credit is a public matter, not of interest to bankers only, but of direct concern to the average citizen. It stands for the immediate establishment of a property constituted national central bank, to perform the functions of rediscount, and the control of currency issue, considered in terms of public need. A central bank is necessary to determine the supply of currency in relation to the domestic, social and industrial requirements of the Canadian people; and also to deal with the problems of international commerce and exchange.

Then we come to the National railways; let me make clear the Liberal policy in that regard. I read from the same statement of policy under the heading Safeguarding of national railways.

The Liberal party stands for the maintenance of the integrity of the Canadian National Railways, as a publicly owned and publicly controlled service.

Not as some private enterprise, but as a publicly owned and publicly controlled service.

Now, let me read our statement of policy on the democratization of industry, a phase of industrial reconstruction upon which I touched in my remarks this afternoon, but which is far ahead of anything suggested by the Prime Minister in the way of an improvement in industrial conditions.

The Liberal party believes that industrial reconstruction is the problem of the future.

It will seek in industrial relations as opportunity offers, to give to workers and consumers a larger share in the government of industry.

Then I come to what has grown to be an even more urgent matter of policy, the restoration of responsible government, a reform which is becoming increasingly important.

The Liberal party believes that the present crisis has been made an excuse for the usurpation of the rights of parliament and the assumption of autocratic powers by the executive. Liberalism stands, as always, for the principle of a free parliament, and for the supremacy of parliament. To this end it would repeal the legislation enacted by the present administration, which deprives parliament of its control over expenditures and taxation, and invests the executive with unwarranted arbitrary powers, as for example:

(1) legislation permitting the executive to enact measures by order in council for peace, order and good government, and

(2) legislation providing the executive with a "blank cheque" for expenditures of any kind.

And equally and increasingly important our policy with respect to the reassertion of personal liberty:

The Liberal party believes that under the excuse of the present crisis, the rights of the individual have been violated. Liberalism stands, as always, for the British principle of free speech and free association, and to this end will repeal section 98 of the Criminal Code, and end the present practice of arbitrary deportation.

Then there is the party policy with respect to electoral reform, a timely subject in view amongst other things of costly expenditures for radio purposes, especially nation-wide broadcasts:

The Liberal party stands for electoral laws which will ensure a true parliamentary representation of the Canadian people, and such legislation as may help to reduce the cost of election campaigns.

Finally I come to what I regard as next to our trade policies the most important of all, our policies with respect to the more equitable distribution of wealth, which covers the matter of social legislation:

The Liberal party recognizes that the problem of distribution has become more important than that of production, and believes that personality is more sacred than property. It will devote itself to finding ways and means of effecting a fair and just distribution of wealth with increasing regard to human need, to the furtherance of social justice, and to the promotion of the common good.

Let me repeat these statements of policy are not statements put forward in a speech from the throne in the present year. They are not something which has been sent broadcast by means of the radio within the past few weeks. They are policies upon which all the by-elections to which I have referred have been fought.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are policies amongst others upon which the general election will be fought.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There are other policies which at the present time I have not time to mention.

The point above all others to be considered at the moment is this: In view of the circumstances with which we are confronted, what should be the attitude of the Liberal party? We are informed that there can be no general election until April 15, unless as a result of what has been said this afternoon and this evening the government should change its mind; I trust it will. At any rate, we have all been summoned and are now assembled together in parliament. I do not propose to move any amendment which might protract or delay proceedings, but I do propose to suggest to the Prime Minister and hon. gentlemen opposite that we should lose as little time as we possibly can in taking into consideration all these measures of social reform which are so urgent. We have been called together to consider these matters; we have been told over the radio by the Prime Minister that the main purpose of this session is the reform of the capitalist system, and the enactment before its close of the measures necessary to this end.

Well then, let us see if we cannot manage at least that much. Let the government come forward with their measures. If the measures are of a character which are likely to ameliorate and improve conditions in any effective way, I can say immediately that they will receive the very hearty support of hon. gentlemen on this side of the house. But we will reserve to ourselves the right to consider very carefully on its merits every single measure, and every provision of every bill. We do not propose, under the guise of legislation to help the working classes, to have further reactionary legislation passed by this House of Commons, or to allow the government to put through legislation of a character which is going to make more difficult than ever the solution of the great problems with which the country is faced.

As a means of expediting and hastening the consideration of these matters, I would ask the Prime Minister when he gets up to speak this evening, as I hope he will, to tell this house whether as leader of the government, knowing that a question will come up immediately as to the jurisdiction of this parliament and of the provincial legislatures in matters of social legislation, he has secured an opinion from the law officers of the crown or from the Supreme Court of Canada which will be a sufficient guarantee to this house to proceed with these measures as being without question within its jurisdiction.

I want to make it perfectly clear that I do not feel that a matter of jurisdiction should be allowed in the last analysis to stand in the way of anything in the nature of a national reform that may be generally recognized as necessary and urgent. If it be found that jurisdiction does interfere, that it is an obstacle, then I think the proper step should be taken to see that the British North America Act is so amended as to make possible the enactment of such legislation. In taking any step of this kind I think we should remember that perhaps the most serious subject with which parliament at any time can be called upon to deal is one which raises a question of the relationship between this dominion and the provinces, and in all such matters we must consider very carefully the views the provinces may hold in regard to what are their rights and the views which this dominion may hold in regard to what are its rights. For my part I believe that through conference and good-will it will be possible to obtain by reason and consent—though not by coercion—whatever is needed by way of amendment to the British North America Act. But I do say that any effort to secure social reform by means of coercion of one or more of the provinces by the dominion, rather than by an endeavour to secure the consent of all, is going to make the situation in this country much more difficult than anything we have thus far faced. It is a situation that cannot be watched too carefully at the present time. I do not mean that with respect to all matters the consent of all the provinces should be necessary to any amendment. That has never been the case. A reasonable formula can I believe be worked out as a result of a conference between the provinces and this dominion which will serve to meet the situations that are likely to arise, but such a conference would have to be one worthy of the great objective being sought; not any two-day affair.

I make this statement now for this reason, that the Prime Minister to-day gave us an earnest of his desire to proceed rapidly with these measures by moving forward one stage, a resolution with regard to a bill on employment and social insurance which stands on the order paper in his name. The resolution moved by the Prime Minister this afternoon was as follows:

> That to-morrow the house take into consideration the following resolution:
> That it is expedient to introduce a bill to establish an employment and social insurance commission; to provide for a national employment service; for insurance against unemployment; for aid to unemployed persons, and for other forms of social insurance and security, and for purposes related thereto; and to provide for such contributions as may be necessary to carry into effect the proposed legislation.

The reason I have asked the Prime Minister to state as soon as he can to this house on what authority he is proceeding with these measures is that I find that in the past both he himself and his ministers have taken the view that this parliament is not competent to deal with many of the matters that are mentioned in his resolution. Now I am not making that contention. I am not setting forth any attitude other than what the government itself has taken in stating its position from time to time. Sir Henry Drayton, when the old age pensions bill was under consideration—he was one of the Conservative leaders in the House of Commons at the time and had been Minister of Finance—said on March 26, 1926, as will be found at page 1943 of Hansard:

> Simply this: if you make the scheme contributory you enter at once upon the domain of property and civil rights, and that is absolutely in the hands of the provinces.

He was referring to the contributory feature, which is a feature the Prime Minister has in his resolution, where it speaks of providing for such contributions as may be necessary to carry into effect the proposed legislation.

Sir Henry Drayton went on:

> The whole thing is provincial, and my hon. friend's point is well taken. No contributory scheme, no insurance nor anything of that kind could be worked out through the agency of the dominion. It must be left to the provinces.

I am not giving that as my opinion, but as the opinion of one who was a Conservative minister of finance in his day.

Let me give the Prime Minister's own statement on these matters. This is very important, I think. The present Prime Minister, speaking in this house on March 26, 1926, said, at page 1970 of Hansard:

> In the first place, it is quite clear, although it has never been exactly determined, that the provinces have perhaps sole jurisdiction with respect to the granting of old age pensions, and secondly, that this parliament has power by the grant of money to supplement the action of the provinces in that regard.

Later on in the same debate the present Prime Minister said:

> Faulty legislation placed upon the statute books the effect of which is to bring about chaos is very much to be deprecated. Anyone who has followed the course of legislation in any country, especially legislation of this character, will realize that where you rely solely and entirely upon experiments you have nothing but political action, following political action and what was intended to be a great benefit has in many instances been a positive disadvantage to the very class it was intended to benefit.

Holding that view myself, I think it is very important that this whole question of jurisdiction should be cleared up in a manner which can give cause for no occasion either of doubt or debate. For that reason I want to ask the Prime Minister if he has obtained from the law officers of the crown an opinion different from any that has been given in the past, or if he has obtained an opinion from the supreme court in these matters. I say the law officers of the crown because at the time when the old age pensions matter was before parliament we had an opinion from them in the matter. It was an opinion given to the committee which was considering the bill, and it is an opinion which has governed parliament ever since in matters of social reform. It will be found in the votes and proceedings of June 16, 1925, and from it I will quote just this one paragraph:

In view of the position taken by several of the provinces and more particularly by Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, and having in mind what the British North America Act, under sections 91 and 92 defines, your committee resolved to obtain an authoritative opinion from the Department of Justice in respect of the points thus raised, and on the twenty-third of May last, the Deputy Minister of Justice replied as follows:—

"Referring to your letter of the twelfth instant, asking to be advised with regard to the authority of parliament to legislate on the subject of old age pensions, I may say that this subject does not fall specifically within any of the enumerated subjects given to the dominion under section 91 of the British North America Act, but does in my judgment fall within the subject "Property and Civil Rights in the Province" committed to the provinces under section 92. I am of opinion, therefore, that the subject matter of pensions has been entrusted to the provincial legislatures rather than to parliament. I do not mean to suggest that parliament has not the power to legislate upon the subject so as to assist the provinces or to establish an independent voluntary scheme, provided that in either case the legislation does not trench upon the subject matter of property and civil rights in the province, as for example by obligating any province or person to contribute to the scheme.

The enactment of such legislation would, however, involve the assumption by the dominion of obligations involving heavy expenditures with regard to a matter which does not fall specifically within the dominion field of legislation."

Until we get that opinion authoritatively reversed it seems to me we will be at sixes and sevens discussing what may or may not be possible under the legislation that is being introduced.

May I point this out to the Prime Minister and the government? It has evidently been seen by previous parliaments that questions of this kind would arise. The wisdom of not inviting debate on the subject on the floor of parliament in any acrimonious fashion and of avoiding steps which might create dissension between the provinces and the federal government, has been recognized in the Supreme Court Act. I would ask the Prime Minister whether he has obtained, under the provision of this statute, any opinion from the supreme court. If he has not obtained an opinion, may I suggest to him now, before we begin a discussion of this matter, that in order to ensure all the expedition possible in the light of certainty, he ask the supreme court to give him an opinion with respect to the question of jurisdiction in any of these social matters that may be introduced, and to oblige parliament by giving that opinion in the shortest order possible. The provision to which I refer is section 55 of the Supreme Court Act, chapter 35, revised statutes, 1927, which reads as follows:

55. Important questions of law or fact touching—

(a) the interpretation of the British North America acts, or

(b) the constitutionality or interpretation of any dominion or provincial legislation; or

(d) the powers of the parliament of Canada, or of the legislatures of the provinces, or of the respective governments thereof, whether or not the particular power in question has been or is proposed to be exercised;

may be referred by the governor in council to the supreme court for hearing and consideration; and any question touching any of the matters aforesaid, so referred by the governor in council, shall be conclusively deemed to be an important question.

(2) When any such references is made to the court it shall be the duty of the court to hear and consider it, and to answer each question so referred; and the court shall certify to the governor in council, for his information, its opinion upon each such question, with the reasons for each such answer; and such opinion shall be pronounced in like manner as in the case of a judgment upon an appeal to the court; and any judge who differs from the opinion of the majority shall in like manner certify his opinion and his reasons.

(6) The opinion of the court upon any such reference, although advisory only, shall, for all purposes of appeal to His Majesty in council, be treated as a final judgment of the said court between parties.

If that step has been taken, I think we shall be on sure ground. If it has not, I think it is the obvious duty of the government to take it at once. I wish to make it clear that not only have some Liberal provincial governments been questioning the right of the federal government to interfere with provincial rights, but Conservative provincial governments equally have been jealous of their rights. My right hon. friend will recall what happened at the time of the enactment of the Statute of Westminster; how the present high commissioner, Hon. Howard Ferguson, his own representative in London, then Premier of Ontario, took very strong exception to any course being taken by the federal government which might in any way interfere with the rights of his province. I have here a copy of an article from the Montreal Gazette of September 20, 1930, when the matter was under consideration. It states that a memorandum was given to the Prime Minister in which Mr. Ferguson said:

> I am deeply interested in the deliberations of the conference because I have been battling to prevent the destruction of the whole fabric of the Canadian constitution.

So apparently I am not the only one who is trying to save the constitution.

> The memorandum deals with provincial rights under the British North America Act and various treaties and amendments since its inception.

Mr. Ferguson went on to say:

> The result of these precedents has been to undermine the constitutional right of the provinces to be consulted. . . .

He said further:

> —the right of the various provinces of Canada to an equal voice concerning any contemplated changes in the law or the constitution of the dominion rests upon fundamental facts, which are as binding to-day as ever they were upon all the parties to confederation.

That was Mr. Ferguson's view. I am not saying it is right, but it is the view taken by a Conservative premier of Ontario when he was in office. What about another Conservative government, a Conservative government in Saskatchewan which made its voice heard at the same time? On September 19, 1930, the attorney general of Saskatchewan had this word to say:

> "We in this province," said Hon. M. A. Macpherson, attorney general and acting premier, "will endorse Premier Ferguson's attitude that the constitution should not be interfered with in any way until the individual provinces have been given ample time for consideration of any such changes, and the entire matter has been given consideration at an interprovincial conference."

I wish again to say that I think the British North America Act has been a marvelous achievement; thus far it has served its purpose remarkably well, but I wish to make it clear that I think the British North America Act requires amendment in some particulars, and the first amendment that should be secured is the recognition of the right of this country to amend its own constitution. Canada, as far as I know, is the only British dominion that has not that right. There ought to be an amendment arrived at as a result of agreement, as I believe it can be, which will enable this parliament to amend this act with regard to many subjects which will become increasingly national in their character as time goes on. But, I repeat, I believe the way to effect that change is by conference and by securing consent and agreement if at all possible. At all events that should be the first step.

There is one more reason why I think it imperative that this government should quickly let us have a definite statement on these matters; it is that members of the government themselves have been questioning the right of the government to deal with them. My hon. friend the Secretary of State has been active to some extent in the debate this afternoon. Speaking in Montreal as recently as November 27, he is reported in the Montreal Star of that date to have said:

> Political and social propagandists, blind leaders of the blind, were persistent in efforts to induce Parliament to exercise illegal powers inseparably vested in the provinces. No purpose could be served by an illegal attempt by either parliament or the provinces to exercise powers vested in one or the other.

That must be the position of the ministry, if collective responsibility means anything. The Secretary of State was speaking as a minister of the crown, and he made his position very clear. May I add that the Prime Minister himself has been hardly less emphatic on this very point. Read the correspondence, placed on the table only on Friday last by the Prime Minister, the correspondence that passed between himself and the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce, the hon. member for Kootenay (Mr. Stevens). What did the Prime Minister say in writing Mr. Stevens at the time of the latter's resignation? Here is one passage taken from the correspondence:

> We pointed out to you the danger of creating in the minds of those interested, especially in retail business, the impression that parliament could provide a remedy for the conditions of which they complained in view of the decisions of the courts as to the jurisdiction of provincial legislatures over contracts and price fixing.

Now there is the position, and I repeat that it is all-important that there should be no doubt left with respect to the authority of this parliament concerning anything that it may do or attempt to do in regard to this most important matter of social legislation.

In conclusion let me say this word, that important as all of these matters are, important as all the suggested social legislation may be, consideration of these things should not be permitted to sidetrack what still remains the most pressing of all problems to-day, namely how those who are unemployed at the present time are to be provided for. Legislation of a nature which requires men to contribute to an unemployment insurance scheme can be of no service whatever to men who have nothing to contribute. Before these contributory schemes for unemployment insurance, for sickness, for invalidity, accident and the like, can work you have to have in the pockets of the people who are to contribute the means of making the necessary contributions. You cannot either effectively begin these schemes or maintain them unless you have in the public treasury money sufficient to enable them to be carried out. Therefore I say that while the matters we have mentioned here are important, all of them relate to the future; they may even go on the statute books, but they may remain there just as the vocational act, passed three years ago, has remained, embalmed for the time being, good for nothing. The provinces may again be told, "Yes, we have legislation, but we are sorry we cannot put it into force because we have not in the treasury the means to carry it out." I therefore say that whatever we do in these matters must be secondary to the immediate need, which is becoming increasingly imperative.

The Prime Minister says that conditions are better to-day than they were in 1932. It would be extraordinary if there were not some improvement, when we consider the millions of dollars spent out of the public treasuries artificially to provide work in this country and in the great country to the south of us. But prosperity brought about by the expenditure of millions of dollars in the form of revenues derived from taxation or borrowing is not real prosperity, for once these expenditures cease the last stage may be worse than the first. What is spent, moreover, will have to be paid for by some incoming government later on. The present problem is how to provide for those people who have no work to do. The numbers of them were 117,000 when the present administration came into office; the numbers on direct relief to-day are over 1,000,00. They are not as great as they were two years ago; then they were 1,240,000 but they are still well over 1,000,000, and relief is being paid out by the dominion, the provinces and from other sources.

Let this House of Commons direct itself first and foremost to dealing with the problem of unemployment. The Prime Minister said in 1930 "I will end unemployment;" and he had the nerve to say over the radio the other evening, "Yes, I said I would end unemployment and I stand by it". If he stands by it, let him end it before this session is over. At any rate, I say to him now that so far as we of the Liberal party are concerned, any reasonable and defensible legislation that will help to ameliorate the situation, whether in the present or in the future, will be received sympathetically. But we well know that the Prime Minister will, if it suits his purpose, allow one measure after another to be brought forward here which has nothing to do with unemployment, and have discussion take place on the estimates from day to day as well as time consumed by the discussion on private members' resolutions, and hold off dealing with unemployment and these government measures of social legislation until well on towards the month of March or April, just as the reciprocity measure is to be held off, and then suddenly dissolve parliament and say, "I should like to have gone through with these measures but the opposition would not let me, and I am going to appeal to the country to allow me to end unemployment and carry this social program through".

I say to the Prime Minister that we are here dealing not with a theory but with a condition. We are assembled at the summons of His Excellency, the Crown's representative, and we are to be here, according to the Secretary of State, at least until the 15th of April. Let us therefore, between now and that time, take as first measures those dealing with the problem of unemployment and social reform and give to them our undivided attention from day to day so that, working together, we may, if at all possible, produce something in the way of a solution. I suggest that to that end this debate be permitted to end very speedily after the Prime Minister and the leader of the third party have spoken, unless there is something controversial in what they say. At any rate, so far as the members of the Liberal opposition are concerned, we are prepared in order to deal with the question of unemployment to end the discussion at once. And in order to get on with the program of social legislation in this and other particulars, and the reform of the capitalist system I say further that we shall be in favour of a motion which will postpone the consideration of private members' resolutions until after we have completed this program. We shall be quite prepared, with respect to supply, to allow the matter to remain over while we are considering these social measures, and if we can get these measures through, I for one will do what I can to join with the Prime Minister in making some arrangement with respect to supply, so that that part of our proceedings will not occupy too much time.

Let the Prime Minister no longer declare that he has met only with opposition in this house. I ask him to join with the Liberal members of this house, and with myself, in seeking to supplement those measures of social and industrial reform; measures in which I have been interested, not on the eve of an election only, but throughout my life.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I assume that the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie King) knew that during the latter part of his discourse he was entirely out of order, for our rules provide that the subject matter of a future debate may not be discussed in the present debate. But owing to his assumption of wide knowledge, as explained in his book, I thought it undesirable to intervene.

I do not know that I have listened to anything that more clearly demonstrated the soundness of the views I have put forward in the last few weeks than the speech which we have just heard. Nothing more clearly indicated the necessity for the reforms I have proposed, nothing more clearly indicated the urgent need of them, than the speech to which we have just listened. But the difference between the two parties is readily explained in one sentence of the right hon. gentleman. He said, "I put these things in a book".

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is more than the Prime Minister has ever done.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman now makes it clear that the book he referred to is Industry and Humanity. Well, I have always found it a little difficult to discover what Job meant when he said he wished his adversary had written a book, until I heard the speech this afternoon, and then I realized the full meaning of the observation. But I turned to a more modern and relevant comment to be found in Revelation:

> And I went unto the angel, and said unto him, Give me the little book. And he said unto me, Take it, and eat it up; and it shall make thy belly bitter, but it shall be in thy mouth sweet as honey.

Mr. DUFF: Let the Prime Minister read verse 11 of the same chapter.

Mr. GRAY: Bitter or sweet, the right hon. gentleman has swallowed the book.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sorry to see that an observation from Scripture so disconcerts hon. gentlemen opposite, but it was to be expected. Now, let us have a clear understanding. I said in the broadcast addresses to which reference was made that my concern is with the Liberal party in Canada since the war. My concern is with the Liberal party in Canada since the war, confronted with conditions such as have never been known in the world. I endeavoured to inquire, and I now propose to inquire, just what the right hon. gentleman did—besides putting it in a book—with respect to the problems to which he has referred. To start with, he came into office in December, 1921. He was in power during 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926 with a short break, 1927, 1928, 1929 and part of 1930. During the latter part of his term of office this country was in a higher degree of speculation than it had ever before been in its history, and as a result of the failure of his government to take adequate measures to safeguard the public interest, thousands of people became bankrupt and were ruined. Further, the very friends upon whom he relies and upon whom he has relied were those who accomplished those purposes. That is the reason I say that the times cry for reform and that the right hon. gentleman is wholly incapable of effecting reform, because during the period when he had the opportunity in the full flush of power, when he appealed to the electorate in 1925, when he did not receive the majority he sought, and when he came back in 1926, the only reform he put upon the statute books in that year, the measure to which he referred to-night, was a reform forced upon him by the hon. gentlemen who sit to his left. The record of Hansard shows conclusively that that is so and the issue is plain and simple: Are these evils to which he has referred, these evils which we see all about us and which are known to every one of us, the result or not of the capitalist system as it flourished during those years? That is the question. Are they or are they not the result of capitalism as it flourished during those years? If ever there were a case proven it has been by the evidence given by the right hon. gentleman himself to-night. With the amplitude of his power, with all the surrounding he had, he sat quietly by and let those evils flourish to the extent of thousands of his fellow citizens being ruined, and yet his voice was not raised against those evils.

That is not all. When in 1928 I ventured in this chamber to point out the way in which we were proceeding what happened? Those hon. members who may be interested will read in Hansard that on June 9, 1928, I used these words:

> It is true that we have a vast, untouched estate, and that new wealth may be produced much more readily from that than from an old and cultivated estate. But it is also true that where we cultivate, it is necessary that we should sell, and if we find a curtailment and shrinkage of trade among the nations of the world, we find a limitation placed upon our ability to dispose of that which we produce. The minister knows that. He has been told time and time again by the great heads of financial institutions to be cautious, to look ahead. Every thoughtful business man is doing it; everybody is shortening sail except the speculators. Do you realize, sir, that this great speculative era that we now have on the American continent is one fraught with possibilities of the gravest disaster for this country? The brokers' loans alone in New York last week were over $5,000,000,000, an unheard of figure. In this country speculation is rampant. Some people imagine that trading in pieces of paper upon which there are engraved words and figures constitutes the creation of new wealth. It is not so. The new wealth of the country is being created by the application of labour and capital to the natural resources of the country, and this trading in stock certificates, this great era of speculation in this country and on this continent, is one fraught with possibilities of the gravest danger to Canada, because we have not as they have in the United States a vast accumulation of wealth that will enable us to meet the approaching conditions with ease.

Look at the movement of securities; look at the movement of gold; look at every indication there is with respect to speculation in this country. I know great brokers' houses that have declined to take new accounts in this country for over twelve months, one perhaps the greatest brokerage house in this country, because they fear what they see in the distance. But no one in the government seems to care, and if we point out the conditions we are "pessimists," if we venture to direct attention to the conditions we are "decrying our country." That is the talk that hon. gentlemen opposite hurl at us and before the country. But I recall the language of one who was regarded in after years as one of the very greatest of British statesmen, who observed that when this orgy was through, when they had at last recovered from the debauch in which they were then enjoying themselves, possibly then in their sober and quiet moments they would look back and recall the warning that had been given by those who looking into the future as best they could, guided by those economic signs that were apparent, and by beacon lights, warning of the future, had pointed out the conditions as they also had come to pass. You perhaps will look back upon our warnings, and perhaps remember with at least some degree of fair-minded justice the observations that were made by those of us who have pointed out the national disaster that is inevitable if this orgy of mad expenditure continues.

It is for these reasons, sir, that we make this motion—

And so forth. In 1928 those observations were made by me in this chamber. Were they listened to? I recall one of the ministers that night while walking down from the house with another member and myself, saying: "Why is it that you always talk blue ruin about these matters?" I said to him then that I did not know whether this would come to pass in my time or not. I was reminded again the other day by the third person that it was inevitable disaster would come if we pursued the course we were pursuing. That was the time that action should have been taken with respect to the capitalist system in this country. I urged it then. I urge it now. Not until this time have I had power or opportunity to carry into effect the necessary reform. I have not had the time to deal with the matter during the four long years I have been endeavouring to the best of my ability to sail this ship of state safely into the harbour through the dangers that have been encountered by us. Reference has been made by the right hon. gentleman this afternoon to what has been said by others. I can name leading Liberals in this country who have indicated to me in my office how grateful they were that I was at the head of affairs during those four years.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The right hon. gentleman has made statements like this before. It is about time that he gave us the names.

Mr. BENNETT: One of them is Mr. Burton, the head of the Simpson Company. I could give my right hon. friend a dozen others.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let us have them all.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not going to waste the time of the house in doing so. They are the very men who by reason of their general attitude toward public matters have ranked as Liberals, but they have rejoiced in the fact that we have been enabled to deal with the problems of this country as we have. I shall always regard it as a great privilege that in the period of greatest stress through which this country has ever passed, I have had an opportunity of rendering some service to the state.

There is not an hon. member in this house who does not know that during the last four years we were concerned with problems of recovery. We were concerned with the problem of saving the financial, the industrial structure of Canada. We were concerned with the problem of saving this country from absolute ruin, from bankruptcy. Day in and day out, week in and week out, month in and month out, year after year our concern has been the safety of Canada, the preservation of this country, the introduction of such measures of recovery as would enable us to pass through the stress and storm we encountered. It is a matter of satisfaction to me at least, if not to hon. gentlemen opposite, that other countries bear testimony to the fact that Canada emerged from this crisis better than did any other country in the world. So I say that when the evidence became clear that the greatest danger of the depression had passed, that the country was on the upward grade and moving towards complete recovery, I conceived it to be my solemn duty to introduce into this house such measures as I believed would prevent a recurrence in part of those dangers which we had encountered and those difficulties which we had to overcome. Have I had any opportunity to do this before? Has this government had any opportunity to do it before? Every hon. member knows in his soul better than that. He knows as a matter of fair play and justice that those were not the times when we could deal with these matters. That time was only when this country had shown some sign of emerging from the valley, not of humiliation but of depression and was coming back to prosperity. Now, with the opportunity—because if we have not a majority in the house we have not the opportunity—we are proposing to press forward those reforms in the capitalist system which, had they been passed in the years when the right hon. gentleman was in power, would not have left this country in the condition in which it was in 1930.

Is there an hon. member opposite who is not fair enough to realize the conditions that we faced in 1930? Does he recall the language of the then Prime Minister when he said there was no unemployment in Canada, when he read statistics to prove it? Does he recall that? Does he recall the trade balances of this country? Did he see our exports diminish and our imports increase by hundreds of millions of dollars? Did he see this country sliding down to bankruptcy and insolvency? Was there a thoughtful man who did not see it and know it? Any country is like an individual; when its adverse balances increase there comes a time when they can no longer be redressed by borrowings, and ruin and disaster are the result. Is there a fair minded man in this house to-night who does not realize that this was the condition we faced?

When we had to succeed to those conditions there were before us two pathways; we had to deal with two matters. One was the immediate problem of employment and relief to the people of the country. I was not on the inside until August 7, but when I came into power on that date and we formed a government I learned what the real conditions were after I made the examinations, after I ascertained what the balances really were, when I learned of the contracts that had been let during the last ten days of the life of the administration that had preceded me, and after I realized the obligations and debts that had been created and that we must meet. Almost as soon as we took office we were confronted with the necessity of raising a loan of $100,000,000. Was that a light undertaking just at the time when conditions were breaking all over the world? We had to save the credit and solvency of Canada; we had to raise $100,000,000. One hundred million dollars was a large sum of money. We raised it in New York, and it cost us something over four per cent. It was a difficult task. On the one hand we had the increasing deficits of the railways. We had increasing unemployment. Relief measures were being demanded, and we had adverse trade balances which threatened our solvency. We borrowed that money and then we did the other thing; we passed legislation to provide for the immediate wants of the unemployed and for public works and undertakings to give employment, so far as might be possible, to those who required work. We did not know or understand then, as we did later, that this was not a continent-wide but a world-wide condition, that it was growing worse from day to day, that in every part of the globe those conditions prevailed, that those who should have foreseen such conditions in this country had taken no steps at all to deal with them. In fact from time to time—and I will deal with the tariffs now—they had rejoiced, at Geneva and elsewhere, because Canada had lowered its tariffs twice since 1921. Yet, sir, when this government came into office, the markets of the world in all the great countries were more closed against Canada than they had been at any other period in her history.

Let me repeat that. The markets of the world were closed more against Canada when we came into power in 1930 than they had been at any time in the history of this dominion. Think what that involves.

Mr. RALSTON: And we exported more goods.

Mr. BENNETT: We did not export more goods. As soon as the depression began we exported less goods, and the last tariff that was placed against us by the United States of America radically changed our exports, as the hon. gentleman should know. The tariffs placed against us by France in 1930, while hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, limited and restricted our exports. The tariffs of Germany restricted our exports. In all the great countries of the world there was a complete restriction of our exports going on from day to day, reaching its full height in the years that came after, while there had been no changes in the tariffs of those countries until we were able to secure better terms from them than prevailed when we came into office. Let it be known that the restrictions that France raised against us reached their very highest when we came into office. Let it be known that a treaty has been negotiated with that republic under which we receive preferred treatment with respect to many commodities. Let it be known that we have negotiated treaties with Germany, with Austria and with other countries in Europe under the same conditions, and now we are negotiating a treaty with the United States of America.

This afternoon the right hon. gentleman suggested that this was a deathbed effort on our part. Let me ask him this: When he was in office, in that very year when the United States was raising its tariffs against Canada higher than they had been at any time in our history; when our people were suffering as they had never suffered before, because of the loss of that market to our agriculturists and others, what did we find him doing? He was standing in this very place, and the right hon. gentleman dared to say to the Canadian people, "Do not provoke them; we must not raise our tariffs against them." Let there be no misunderstanding.

Mr. HANBURY: It did not take you long to provoke them.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not so, for there has been no increase in the tariffs of the United States against us since we came into power.

Mr. HANBURY: I would ask the right hon. gentleman if there was not an excise tax.

Mr. VENIOT: What about the increase in the duty on lumber?

Mr. BENNETT: There was no tariff increase on lumber, for there has been no touching of the tariffs by the congress of the United States since we came into office. Any hon. gentleman who takes the trouble to read the records knows that.

Mr. HANBURY: Just an excise.

Mr. BENNETT: There was not a tariff increase against lumber.

Mr. HANBURY: That is a play on words.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no play on words; the president of the United States has put himself clearly on record as stating that there was no interference with tariffs by congress after 1930.

Mr. RALSTON: Just a $3 tax.

Mr. BENNETT: There was an excise tax, of course, of which I am aware, but I would point out to this house that there was no tariff legislation; that is a fact.

Now let us go a step further. We opened up markets for lumber in the United Kingdom on a scale that had never been known before, and this gives me an opportunity to say what I want to say just here. By the introduction into the Ottawa agreements of a provision with respect to unfair competition we were able to secure for this country a favoured position. Now I come to the attitude of the right hon. gentleman opposite, who this afternoon said that the majorities secured by his recently elected supporters were obtained after the Ottawa agreements had been in force. Those agreements expire shortly, and we are told by those who are urging upon the British government the necessity for action that the lumber people say that the leader of the opposition in Canada says he is the man who should be in power, and that he has embarrassed and hurt this country in its dealings with the lumber industry. Not only has he embarrassed Canada but he has destroyed, to a very large extent, through the representations made by him and his friends, that which we were able to secure.

We will continue to fight that sort of thing, for I do believe that the Canadian people are coming more fully to realize just what has been meant by the opposition of hon. gentlemen opposite to the Ottawa agreements. In season and out of season they have exerted their force against them. They have said, as I shall show presently, that if they were in office they would repeal them, that they would destroy them. The fact is that they have endeavoured, and to a large extent succeeded in doing so, to build up in the old country the idea that the Canadian people are opposed to those agreements and that therefore they are no longer sought or desired. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, do you wish these agreements or not?

Mr. HANBURY: We wish better ones.

Mr. BENNETT: Then why did you not get them during the nine years you were in power? I will not trouble this house by reading the records that I have, not only from this house but also from the hustings, as to what the right hon. gentleman and his followers have said they would do with these agreements if they came into power. I ask them now, are you prepared to rescind the Ottawa agreements? Are you prepared again to vote against those agreements? Well, you will have the chance. Are you prepared to do so? We will see.

The right hon. gentleman was endeavouring to anticipate many things to-day. I am not going to anticipate any debate upon the matter, but I just ask each hon. gentleman here if he is prepared to vote against these agreements, because it is vital to Canada that we should know. If the operation of these agreements has done this country any good, then those abroad with whom we deal must know, because the negotiation of the lumber agreements was not included in the agreements themselves. They were arrangements made with the British government through the board of trade in pursuance of powers that were secured in the agreement against unfair competition with Russia. And the opportunity is necessary, nay it is imperative, that this house should say whether or not we in the representations we have been making speak for the Canadian people. Whether or not Canada desires these agreements, or whether with respect to lumber and matters of that kind we no longer require this provision and desire that it should be destroyed.

Let us go a step farther. With respect to the United States of America we found conditions that we could not alter for the simple and obvious reason that the president at that time, Mr. Hoover, was holding office, and his congress had enacted the legislation which had imposed this tariff against Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: A Tory government.

Mr. BENNETT: A Tory government?

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Then we will leave it at that; but it was a government that the leader of the Liberal party, the then Prime Minister, would not provoke. I shall not stop now with merely making the statement; I shall read from Hansard of April 9, 1929:

> In the condition of prosperity which Canada is to-day enjoying would it be desirable on the part of the administration to take any action with respect to the tariff in Canada at the present time which could be regarded as provocative by those across the line who may be interested in seeking to raise the tariff in that country?

That is the high-minded type of caring for the welfare of Canada which was manifested by the then government, and the Liberal party say the same thing to-day. I quote further:

> I say that were we to do what hon. gentlemen opposite by their amendment apparently wish us to do, namely raise the tariff, we would be creating in the minds of the American people the very sentiment which would cause them to raise their tariff higher perhaps than it was ever their intention to raise it. We do not intend to take any action of that provocative character.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad the hon. gentleman cheers that sentiment, because it marks him as just what I know him to be, namely one whose concern is for the capitalist system and not for his country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to the Prime Minister, as this is a matter of record, that I did not cheer at all; I sat perfectly quiet.

Mr. BENNETT: I was referring to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie). I am sorry the right hon. gentleman put on the cap, but I was referring to the other leader.

Now, let me go a step farther. Not content with that, they enacted countervailing duties and permitted Washington to control the tariff of this country. When the new president came into office he indicated at once his willingness to enter into discussions concerning a trade agreement with Canada. At his invitation we discussed the matter, but he did not secure from congress power to deal with it until June, 1934. Under the statute which he did secure, an act of congress, he is enabled to enter into an agreement, first giving notice of intention so to do, and then fixing the date within which it is possible not only to lodge written or printed briefs but also to permit verbal representations by citizens of the United States for or against certain action being taken. The government of the United States to-day gave notice of their intention so to do. That is the end of the negotiations which we have been carrying on all these months since June, 1934, when the statute was passed. They have now given us notice that they will proceed to negotiate a trade agreement with Canada. And further, they have fixed a date within which written briefs and oral representations may be made for and against the proposals. The proposals cover every kind and form of commodity, natural products as well as others. We will proceed to that discussion in the same manner as we proceeded in connection with the treaty with France and in the same manner as we proceeded to negotiate the empire agreements. To speak frankly, I believe that if the Canadian people have to choose between one who has stood up for his country in the face of great opposition and one who is fearful of provoking someone, they will choose the man who has stood up for them. I am willing to leave that issue to the Canadian people.

An hon. MEMBER: Make it soon.

Mr. BENNETT: We are now discussing a trade agreement with the United States. I repeat that if we are permitted to negotiate a trade agreement with the United States I have no intention, as the right hon. gentleman has suggested, of endeavouring to terminate the agreement, as was done in 1911—terminate it by an election at the moment. I have no such thought; I propose to go forward as we did with France and with other countries, and as we did in connection with the empire agreements, and negotiate on the basis of this country being able to take care of itself and not being afraid to negotiate with another country.

Let me go farther. I have it on the authority of United States officials that it was the tariff action Canada took in 1930 and under the Ottawa agreements of 1932 which induced the United States to want to lower their tariffs and deal with this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would the Prime Minister give us the names of the officials? He should not make a general statement of that kind.

Mr. BENNETT: If the right hon. gentleman will read the statements made by the Secretary of State in London, the statements made in New York and in Washington, he will have no difficulty in understanding what I mean. The United States has no hesitancy in saying, under its present administration that with respect to its tariffs they are high, but it is impossible to reduce tariffs in the United States just by saying so. I am sorry to say the time in which the agreements may exist is limited to three years from the date of their being made, with power, of course, that they may be continued if notice is given. Congress has reluctantly enabled the president thus to deal with the matter. The president knew that if he had to appear before the committee of ways and means it would be quite impossible to effect the purpose; that is known by everyone who takes the trouble to understand the conditions. So congress has given him the power to deal with the matter as I have indicated. What is more, we propose to do what, after all, the right hon. gentleman suggested should be done in his day; he placed upon the statute books legislation enabling members of the government to make negotiations to become effective with the United States. We propose to carry on our negotiations as a responsible executive.

I repeat what I said previously—allow me to remind you of it again—that there is no bargain good enough for me which would involve the sacrifice of my country. I am not prepared to do that, whether it be with the mother country or with the United States of America. My duty, my obligation and what I conceive to be the duty of this government is to negotiate agreements fair to all parties, agreements which do not sacrifice Canadian interests to foreign or external interests, whatever they may be, and that impels us to insist that justice and fair play must be the basis of any agreement we make.

I have dealt with the matter of trade—

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Blasting your way.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes blasting our way into the markets of the world.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): "No truck or trade with the Yankees."

Mr. BENNETT: No; it was Sir Wilfrid Laurier who said, "No more pilgrimages to Washington." You might remember that. I am not to-night reviewing this matter, but I desire to remind hon. members that there may be some within the sound of my voice who heard him when he made that observation at Brandon—"No more pilgrimages to Washington."

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): It was the Tory party that said, "No more truck or trade with the Yankees."

Mr. BENNETT: It well may have been that there are members of the Conservative party who made that observation, but the leader of the Liberal party made this statement, "No more pilgrimages to Washington." That is the position, and I shall not do more to-night than to leave it just there, with this additional observation.

The other day Mr. Lloyd George made a statement, and I wonder if hon. gentlemen will take the trouble to observe what he said about tariffs. He spoke of the use of tariffs exactly as I have spoken in this house of the use of tariffs, just as I spoke of them when I was dealing with them in Winnipeg, just as I have spoken of them when we were dealing with them in this house on previous occasions. I shall take the trouble to read what Mr. Lloyd George said in order that there may be no misapprehension as to what the views of that venerable statesman are as to the use of tariffs at such a time as this, because it is strange, in all this discussion that has gone on during the years and having regard to the attitude he took with respect to these matters in the days of Mr. Asquith, that now in his old age, offering to his people a plan to take them further out of the slough of despond and give them greater opportunities for expansion, Mr. Lloyd George should see fit to refer to tariffs in the terms in which he did. I shall just read the extract as reported in the Ottawa Citizen of January 18, 1935, in these words:

Since Britain now had tariffs he would use them ruthlessly as a means of inducing removal of or at least reductions in trading difficulties with other countries, said Lloyd George.

There is the considered judgment of an elder statesman, a Liberal statesman. Why has he changed his viewpoint? Because he saw all about him throughout the world tariff barriers, and he was going to use this instrument for the purpose of effecting the prosperity of his people. Is there anyone within the sound of my voice to-night who does not know that had we not taken the action we did in 1930 we would not now be in a position to negotiate with our great neighbour? Everybody knows that that is so, and what is more, had we not done it, we could not have remained a solvent people. I shall elaborate that statement because, in view of the observations made this afternoon, I think it is desirable that I should do so.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

Tuesday, January 22, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

PRICE SPREADS AND MASS BUYING

INQUIRY AS TO CONCLUSION OF COMMISSION HEARINGS AND PRESENTATION OF REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister if he is in a position to advise the house as to when the royal commission on price spreads and mass buying is likely to conclude its proceedings and how soon the house may expect to receive its report? I think the Prime Minister will agree that if there is legislation to be based upon the report the house should have it as soon as possible.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government has no control over the price spreads commission nor has it sought in any way to limit or restrict its operations or to suggest to it the course of action it should pursue. I was last advised that the commission was endeavouring to close its business by the date of the opening of the house. That however was impossible. My last information was that they were now endeavouring with every expedition to prepare a report for submission not to this house but, as it will be recalled, to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson). By that minister the report will be laid upon the table of the house.

I quite agree with what the right hon. gentleman has said as to the desirability of having the report concluded as soon as possible in order that the government may take cognizance of its contents, and determine to what extent legislation may be introduced founded upon the recommendations that are made. But I believe for the same reasons the right hon. gentleman will realize it would not be proper for the government to indicate to the commission how or when it should determine its hearing, but that we should rather leave it to the discretion of the commission as to the manner in which it would discharge its duties.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I agree with the Prime Minister in his concluding remarks. He will observe however that all I wished to know was whether or not it would be possible for him to ascertain from the commission when it might be in a position to report so that we may be guided in our actions accordingly.

BANK OF CANADA

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF COMMENCEMENT OF BANKING OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) when we may expect the Bank of Canada to commence functioning?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I am not in a position to make an announcement definitely, but it is anticipated it will be somewhere in the neighbourhood of March 1.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPRESENTATIONS OF EMPLOYEES RESPECTING EQUIPMENT CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) based on a telegram I received this morning from the city of Stratford. It is as follows:

Lodge 103 International Association of Machinists at Stratford with over 400 members protests that contracts for new equipment for Canadian National railways be let to private companies while railway shops have worked only sixteen days a month for the past three years.

W. Lyons,
Recording Secretary,
73 Dufferin street, Stratford.

My question to the minister to-day arises out of his answer yesterday to a similar question. I could not quite hear the minister's reply to my question yesterday and I did not know what his answer was until I read it in Hansard this morning. He says that the government has not come to any decision with regard to this equipment which is to be made either by private companies or in the railway shops, but that the matter has been considered. My question of the minister to-day is how long will it take the government to make a decision, and when they do make a decision, will the minister immediately inform the house and the country what it is?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any answer coming to the hon. gentleman. The government, if it makes a decision on this question, will submit it to the house at the proper time.

RADIO BROADCAST OF OPENING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau). I should like to ask if the statement appearing in the Vancouver Province of January 17 is correct, that millions of listeners-in in Great Britain were deprived of hearing the broadcast of the opening of the Canadian parliament because the Canadian Radio Commission did not consider the broadcast momentous enough to send outside of this country.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): The article referred to has not come under my notice, but I shall be glad to take cognizance of it and give the answer I shall receive from the radio commission.

ELECTORAL LISTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): I should like to direct a question to the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) arising out of the statement he made on Friday last, appearing on page 5 of Hansard, to the effect that the electoral lists would be completed about April 15. In that connection may I point out that under the Dominion Franchise Act a very important work begins on April 1, namely, that of clearing the electoral lists of names of persons who are dead or who have moved, and so forth. The only time at which objections to names on the basic electoral list can be made is during the month of April, and I put it to the Secretary of State that if the lists are not received by hon. members and their organizations until after the fifteenth day of April, it will be extremely difficult to proceed with the important work of clearing the lists. My question to the Secretary of State is as to whether it would not be possible, at least in the congested urban constituencies, to supply the lists earlier so that this important work may begin at the time provided for by the statute, namely, on the first of April.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): As at present advised I do not think there will be any difficulty in supplying the urban lists and placing them at the disposition of the franchise commissioner at such time or times as are necessary for him and the revising officers appointed by him to carry out the terms of the act.

Mr. POWER: May I point out, as perhaps the Secretary of State has misunderstood me, that this is a non-controversial matter and that it affects all members from urban constituencies. The act by section 25 provides that notices to objections to names on the list shall be made during the month of April, not at the time of revision in the month of May, but during the month of April, in writing. Now if the lists have not been circulated and are not in the hands of members and their organizations during the month of April it will be extremely difficult for them to take means to register their objections. That is the point I wish to lay before the Secretary of State. I would ask him to make a further study of the Dominion Franchise Act in order to ascertain whether the point I bring before him is not well taken.

Mr. CAHAN: The point which the hon. gentleman makes may be considered well taken, but these lists are being printed from day to day and week to week, and I think there is no doubt that from time to time the urban lists will be placed in the hands of the franchise commissioner for distribution probably during the months of February and March.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, January 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. E. Rowe for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose last night I had been referring to some figures with respect to trade, and the position which Canada occupied, and the efforts that had been made to expand our trade during the great depression.

It is somewhat satisfactory to be able to point out this afternoon that Canada occupies fifth place among the nations of the world, although at one time she had fallen to sixth place. It is important that we should bear in mind that comparisons of incomparable things are very unfair and do not lead to any sound conclusion. From time to time I have observed throughout the country, and particularly by hon. gentlemen opposite, an endeavour to make it appear that the trade of Canada had suffered more than that of any other country, and they would compare the figures of 1928 and 1929 with the figures of 1932, 1933 and 1934. Such a comparison, of course, is not only unfair but I consider it to be more or less of an insult to the intelligence of the people to whom it is directed, for it is perfectly obvious that if you want to be fair you must compare the figures that existed amongst other countries of the world with the figures of Canada at the time to which reference was made and to-day.

The fact is that this country has more than maintained its position among the countries of the world as a trading country during the depression. Notwithstanding all that has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite with respect to restrictions and barriers against trade, this Dominion of Canada has continued to maintain its position amongst the nations of the world in a rather more forward position than other countries of the world. The truth is, according to the figures supplied by the Bureau of Statistics, that at the end of December, 1934, we took fifth position, exceeded only by the United States, Great Britain, France and Germany.

It is also true that during the depression at times we dropped to sixth place by reason of Japan or Belgium exceeding the volume of our trade. But it is, I repeat, a matter for satisfaction that we now occupy the position which we do. Our empire trade has expanded in a phenomenal manner under the operation of the Ottawa agreements. To take up the time of the house this afternoon in giving the percentages of increase, the extent and volume of our trade with our sister dominions and with the motherland would serve no useful purpose, and I shall not take up the time to do it as opportunity will be afforded later on.

I once more say, notwithstanding all the attacks made against the Ottawa agreements, notwithstanding the fact that the Liberal party as represented in this house stood in its place, with one exception, and voted against those agreements, notwithstanding that they have declared from time to time in this house and elsewhere that the agreements were worthless and useless and not satisfactory, and in one instance declared that they would repeal them if the opportunity came, the fact is that this country by these agreements has been saved from national bankruptcy. What is more, when I make that observation I make an observation which is supported by the statements of economists and others who realized that this country had one certain market during the depression, one market to which it could turn under all conditions, one market in which we had a preference over other countries of the world, a market to which we had free access as against the payment of duties by other countries. Had it not been for the markets thus afforded in Great Britain and in other parts of the overseas dominions we would not under the conditions that obtained have been able to survive. I think that is fair, yet in season and out of season hon. gentlemen opposite have seen fit to decry these agreements and to render it difficult indeed particularly with respect to one commodity, lumber, to maintain the position of Canada with respect to the English importer. We were told that the agreements and the arrangements with respect to preference did not represent the view of the Canadian people; that is what the traders were representing, and that the real view of the Canadian people was that put forth by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Well, sir, I trust that once more the opportunity will be afforded hon. members of this house to record their opinions as to whether or not the operation of these agreements has been in the public interest. I am curious to see whether, in the light of what has transpired, hon. gentlemen opposite will say these agreements have been favourable or unfavourable to the welfare of this country. That is for them to say, and I do not believe that the misrepresentations that have been made with respect to these agreements have been based on an appreciation of their real value. I believe that hon. gentlemen opposite, when they begin to realize that value, will take a forward course, renounce their past, deny their vote and support the agreements in their constituencies. That is what I believe will happen. In fact signs are not lacking that they are already thinking of doing so, if one is to attach any importance to an observation made by the leader of the opposition a short time ago. In the midst, I think, of a speech on disarmament. I believe the right hon. gentleman desired to make it known to the people of Canada that they now would be disarmed from the opposition which he had previously taken against the agreements which have served this country so well.

So I say that on all counts, if ever a country should be proud of its achievements in a period of great depression—and you will observe I say a country—under the policies of a government that was not slow to realize the difficulties and dangers that threatened our whole commercial fabric, that country is Canada. Most Canadians, I think, feel that sense of pride and express it except when they are on the hustings or in this chamber. Then they think it their duty to decry Canada by decrying the government; they decry the government and so decry Canada, and preach blue ruin and ruin of all kinds to this dominion. I think no good purpose is served by that. It certainly is not the position that was taken by the opposition in my time. I do recall, and I say it with great frankness, that when this country went off the gold standard owing to the export of $40,000,000 of gold, it is a matter of record amongst my own supporters at that time that I asked caucus not to make any observations in the house lest they might embarrass the administration and the country. That is a fact that can be verified by reference to any hon. member who was then in this house. There are times when matters arise which are far more important than any question of party advantage. When I find this country being held up to the people of the world as a country whose trade has fallen off and been destroyed through the actions of the government; then when I turn to the figures supplied by the League of Nations and other independent statisticians and find that these ten and a half millions of people occupy fifth position among the trading nations of the world, I say to hon. gentlemen opposite that they should be ashamed of themselves for putting forth observations of that sort.

That reminds me further that yesterday the right hon. gentleman twice referred to the fact that there are a million unemployed in this country, whereas there were only a hundred thousand unemployed in 1930. The figures given in 1930 were the best that could be supplied at that time, and it was indicated by the department supplying them that they were very uncertain. However, it is clear that the million referred to were those receiving relief, men, women and children, not the unemployed. On the contrary the figures show that the number of employed in this country, as indicated by the reports from industrial and other sources, has steadily increased instead of decreasing during the last few months. There is no evidence to support any such figure as one million, for as I have said that includes men, women and children receiving some form of relief in this country, from any source. It is well known that 160,000 people or thereabouts are receiving relief in the drought areas of Saskatchewan. They should not be regarded as unemployed in the real sense of the word. That condition was not brought about by the government, though I understand that an effort has been made to induce the people of those areas to believe that the government was responsible for the drought.

I recite that fact merely that it may be clear in the minds of the people that when he spoke of 1,000 000 unemployed in this country the right hon. gentleman was doing his country an injury and a wrong, for there is no warrant for any such figure unless you include every babe in arms and every child from babyhood to the age of sixteen or seventeen as being among the unemployed.

Mr. YOUNG: What are the correct figures?

Mr. BENNETT: It has been exceedingly difficult, the department states—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: It is less than half a million in any event, but the department states that it is exceedingly difficult to make any statement that would be exactly correct, because we have no method by which we can make such a computation. Mr. Cudmore of the statistical department has made a report in which he has indicated his view as to the number of unemployed, from the information in the hands of that department. He says:

> In view of the uncertainty mentioned above an effort was made at the census of 1931 to collect complete information on the matter, as for the date of the census by securing from every wage earner in the country a statement whether he was or was not working on June 1, 1931, together with the reason for not being at work. On that date approximately 395,000 of the 2,570,000 wage earners of Canada had no job while 43,000 more were temporarily laid off. This figure of 395,000 gives us a basis for subsequent estimates as to the number of unemployed, though certain observers claim that the 43,000 temporary lay-offs should also be considered as unemployed. On the basis of the combined figure of 438,000 on June 1, 1931, it was estimated in a paper prepared by Professor Jackson and others of the University of Toronto that 726,000 were unemployed in March of 1932. This bureau, however, has always questioned the propriety of the addition of persons temporarily laid off to those with no job, but it was certainly the case that from 600,000 to 650,000 must have been out of employment in March, 1932, and probably 750,000 at the same date of 1933 when employment was about at its low point and when the total number of employees on the staffs of the firms making monthly reports to this bureau fell to about its lowest level at 698,000 on April 1, 1933.

Since April 1, 1933, the number of employees of reporting firms has been steadily increasing, with slight seasonal exceptions. Between April 1 and December 1 of 1933, 147,000 persons were added to the employees of the firms making monthly reports to the bureau, while between December 1 of 1933 and December 1 of 1934 an additional 75,000 were added, being a total addition of 222,000 to the staffs of reporting firms, some of which was due to the inclusion of additional firms in the records and some to the increase of employees in the unemployment camps maintained by the Department of National Defence and by certain provincial authorities. After making allowance for these two elements in the situation, it would appear that the number of unemployed wage earners in the country as a whole has been reduced from 750,000 at the worst point of the depression to something like 400,000 at the present time.

That is the position with respect to that.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the Prime Minister state whether or not the numbers of unemployed include those employed on relief works for which money was voted by this parliament?

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. gentleman had followed me and had not been listening to the suggestion of his leader that he should ask this question, I read these words—

Mr. RALSTON: Is the question still good?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and I am reading the answer, as I gave it before the question was asked:

After making allowance for these two elements in the situation—

That is, those who were working in the camps, the number of which is not given, and those covered by the additional firms reporting.

After making allowance for these two elements in the situation, it would appear that the number of unemployed wage earners in the country as a whole has been reduced from 750,000 at the worst point of the depression to something like 400,000 at the present time.

I submit that this is something of which the Canadian people should be proud. Why should anyone, in politics or elsewhere, desire to show to the world that the number of unemployed in this country was 600,000 greater than it actually is? That is the question which I ask. The information could have been obtained at any time on application to the same source from which I obtained it, the statistical department; it was open to anyone who desired to receive it. Allowance was made in consequence of the suggestion made last year by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in respect of single homeless men in camps maintained by the National Defence department as well as by the provincial departments, and those are the conclusions of the statistical department of Canada. I know of no reason to cast reflections on the accuracy of its figures; they have stood up against any statements made to the contrary anywhere or by anyone. I should think therefore that those who are seeking power in this country would desire at least to leave with the outside world, where the credit of Canada is important, an impression in accordance with the facts. It is not desirable to paint your country's reputation any darker than it is. Why blacken the reputation of this dominion amongst the nations of the world? I say that members of parliament, whether supporting the government or in opposition, should rejoice in the fact that the number of unemployed has been reduced from 750,000 at its highest to 400,000 as it stands now. That I think is a fair statement. It is necessary to say that the figure given yesterday does include men, women and children, and includes those in camps and elsewhere. To be exact, the figure is slightly less than 1,000,000, but it was at its highest point 1,500,000—that is to say, the number of those on relief, those receiving as low as one meal up to complete relief, or relief in some form. The number has fallen to something less than 1,000,000.

That is all I propose to say with respect to that matter, because while I regard it as important I feel bound to make the statement at this time in order to prevent that erroneous impression going abroad to the world to blacken our record. It was only a short time ago that an American paper made a review of conditions in this country and took that figure as the one that represented the unemployment in Canada. Is there any good purpose on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite in making statements of that kind when by a little effort they could satisfy themselves that such statements are incorrect? Why rejoice because you believe that there are more men unemployed than in fact there are?

That has been the course followed by the opposition since the depression began. Does it serve any purpose? When I suggested that the policy of the Liberal party was activity against every measure proposed by this government and against any improvement made in this country, when I made that statement in the broadcast, I was simply stating a simple fact. What is more, there is not an hon. member who heard the right hon. gentleman's address yesterday who does not realize how sound was that statement which I made. I repeat, why blacken Canadian history? Why disparage the position of this country amongst the peoples of the world? Why endeavour to make it appear that this country is suffering to a greater extent than it is, when people outside Canada, who are viewing the situation here dispassionately, observing our progress, and seeing what we are doing, point to Canada and say, "That country occupies the brightest position of any nation in the world to-day."

Here are hon. gentlemen wailing, wailing, wailing while foreigners who look on disinterestedly and see our progress are glad to think that this country in the northern half of the American continent has made the progress it has. It is time that hon. gentlemen opposite realized the fact that the people of Canada fully appreciate this progress and are thankful for it. Why therefore should hon. gentlemen wish, in their reckless opposition to the government, regardless of what happens to the reputation of this country, to blacken Canada's position in order to maintain their thesis that this government is all bad and entitled to no credit for any good. That is their position.

Further, when attention has been directed to these matters in times past they have not desisted but have rested their case on an effort to vilify and libel and slander and attack, by every means in their power, the leader of the government. That is what they have done. In constituency after constituency they have gone out and endeavoured to do—what?

Mr. HANBURY: Win elections.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly. And then the right hon. gentleman talks about chivalry, as he did yesterday. Let him read the speeches made by his principal supporters; let him read the statements that have been made on the public platform, and then let him talk about chivalry. Chivalry! Why, it is a word unknown in his vocabulary except to mouth in this house for the purpose of advancing his own political fortunes—a word misunderstood and unknown. Yesterday afternoon the right hon. gentleman spoke of our having shown disrespect to the crown in introducing these measures in the way in which we did. Well, I will say this, Mr. Speaker. If the right hon. gentleman desires to deliver any lecture on that point, I suggest that he go to Queens park, Toronto, and address his remarks to his right lieutenant. And if he has any qualms of conscience about doing that, let him cast his memory back over the past and think of the general election of 1926 in which his supporters went to and fro throughout the country, trying to make the people believe that Downing street was interfering with the domestic affairs of the Dominion of Canada, when he himself, on the 28th day of June, had written a letter to the then Governor General, Lord Byng, asking him to refer a matter to Downing street, which His Excellency refused to do. The right hon. gentleman talks about disrespect and discourtesy to the crown. Let there be no talk of discourtesy to the crown, nor any talk about chivalry when it comes to a matter of that kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the Prime Minister read the letter he has referred to?

Mr. BENNETT: He will read this part of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Read the whole of it.

Mr. BENNETT: No, he does not intend to read the whole of it; he will just read such part as that to which he referred:

> If there is anything which, having regard to my responsibilities as Prime Minister, I can even yet do to avert such a deplorable and possibly farreaching crisis, I shall be glad so to do, and shall be pleased to have my resignation withheld at Your Excellency's request pending the time it may be necessary for Your Excellency to communicate with the Secretary of State for the Dominions.

The right hon. gentleman, by a single word, could have stopped that agitation against the representative of the crown; he could have read that letter. But he fed on it, he lived on it, he appealed on it to the passions and the prejudices of the Canadian people.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On a question of privilege. When the Prime Minister says I made use of any letter which at any time I wrote to the Governor General—

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —I say that I made no reference at any time during the campaign referred to, to any communication, nor did any member of the party other than members of the ministry have any knowledge of any communication, that passed between the Governor General and myself, and I still ask the Prime Minister to read the entire letter, from which he has quoted only an excerpt. I regarded the correspondence at the time as confidential.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no question of privilege in what the right hon. gentleman says. I repeat, he could have stopped that agitation by one single wave of his hand; by reading the letter he could have done so. But he kept it secret. From time to time, throughout the country, the papers were filled with columns of attacks against the Governor General, and the suggestion was made—he was looking at hon. gentlemen opposite—that Cromwell was endeavouring to do so and so. You will find all this in the newspapers of 1926. By a single lifting of the hand, however, the right hon. gentleman could have stopped the agitation. But he said, "I wrote a letter to Lord Byng and asked him to do this; was it done"? But did he read the letter then?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I never made such a statement.

Mr. BENNETT: Where was the chivalry then? Where was the discourtesy to the crown? I am compelled to make these observations because an endeavour has been made by hon. gentlemen opposite to make it appear that the government of the day has been derelict in its duty. I submitted to his Excellency, as I believed I should do, the fact that I proposed to make the broadcast addresses I did before the meeting of parliament; I conceived that to be my duty and I did so. The fact that speeches that have been made by public men and the causes and policies they have advocated have been included in speeches from the throne will be found alike in the lives of Gladstone and Chamberlain. Every hon. gentleman knows or should know that that is so. It has never been the practice of prime ministers to refuse to indicate what they have in mind with respect to large policies merely because they have not had an opportunity to put them in a speech from the throne before discussing them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the Prime Minister leaves that part of his remarks, as he has referred to Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Chamberlain, would he tell us where Mr. Gladstone or Mr. Chamberlain ever informed the public in advance of the speech from the throne as to what was to appear in the speech from the throne when it came down.

Mr. BENNETT: I repeat, when Mr. Gladstone, for instance, went down to Greenwich to make the famous speech he did, he dealt with matters that were subsequently placed before parliament for its consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Where did he say what mention of these matters would appear in the speech from the throne?

Mr. BENNETT: I do not know what the right hon. gentleman means except that Mr. Gladstone put it in the speech from the throne. That is the answer. He did not put it in his little book but he put it in the speech from the throne.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister had not written any book to put anything in.

Mr. BENNETT: The only difference between my right hon. friend and me is that he put these things in a little book; I put them on the statute books.

May I proceed to point out in addition that it was observed yesterday that there had not been any consultation with the party such as was necessary for the purpose of enabling the legislation to be brought down that is contemplated by the speech from the throne. The solicitude of the right hon. gentleman for the party which I have the honour to lead was very great. It was almost as great as his solicitude for the British preference in 1919 and 1923, but I should remind him that the very purpose of the broadcast messages was that the people of this country should be informed of what was proposed so that they might communicate with their members before they came here and the members would then be able to make known their views. That is something which I know hon. gentlemen opposite would not understand, but it was to afford that wide opportunity to the people to know exactly what was proposed so that their members when they came here would come informed and with an opportunity to express their views. I am delighted and honoured to say that the Conservative party, true to its great traditions and its mission, is prepared to carry forward the reform measures which are indicated in the speech from the throne.

It is true that they expect to meet opposition as usual. The right hon. gentleman yesterday pledged the support of his party, but he surrounded it with conditions as usual and limitations as usual, in such a way as would interfere with the government of the day in the transaction of its business. He suggested that we should join with him for reform. When did an opposition ever reform anything? Why should we join that opposition to bring about any reform?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Because the Prime Minister is masquerading as a Liberal.

Mr. BENNETT: Now the cat is out of the bag. I put these things in a book, he says. Masquerading as a Liberal! If that be so, there should have been no objection on the part of the right hon. gentleman to placing these reforms upon the statute book when he had the opportunity. Why did he not do so?

Mr. DONNELLY: There was no need for them.

Mr. BENNETT: There was no need for them! Go and ask the thousands of people who have been bankrupted by the speculation that took place during the regime of the late government.

Mr. DONNELLY: Who is speculating in wheat to-day?

An hon. MEMBER: "My government."

Mr. BENNETT: Then the right hon. gentleman raised an objection to the use of the word "my." How short his memory is! I suppose it is because he has no government that he now forgets. It is true it is not usual to refer to "my opposition," and I judge if he did so, it would not meet with universal approval. There are not lacking signs of that too, if one can pay attention to the remarks made and the gossip one hears from time to time, carefully guarded though it may be. I merely remark that the use of the word "my" has been common for at least two hundred years. Anyone who will take the trouble to look at the lives of any of the eminent British statesmen will find that that word is used in Hansard. So far as my investigations go, it has been used frequently in this country by all prime ministers and I presume it will be used again by whoever is fortunate enough to become a leader of the government from the opposition side although I see no sign of anyone there yet. Be that as it may, I merely mention the fact that the reference made in the speech from the throne by the representative of the crown to "my ministers" is certainly the only form that is ever used, either "my government" or "my ministers." Usually the two forms are used in the same speech from the throne, either "my ministers" or "my government," and they are used alternately.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is correct. I never took any exception to His Excellency the Governor General using the expression either "my government" or "my ministers."

Mr. BENNETT: May I say to the right hon. gentleman that yesterday he did raise that objection.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, he did not.

Mr. BENNETT: Then he objected that I had used the expression with respect to the government and I had spoken of it as "my" government. Later on I think I shall give him the number of times he used that term in at least one speech of his. Incidentally he also suggested that the time had come when the government should terminate its life by resigning or precipitating a general election. Let us review the situation so far as this government's support is concerned. If we take the general election in 1930, as compared with to-day it has exactly the same support from British Columbia as it had on that occasion; there is no change. In Alberta it has increased its support by one. In Saskatchewan its support has not changed although the Liberal party have added one to their number by defeating a Progressive. In Manitoba there has been no change. In Ontario the Liberals succeeded in the old seat of North York, which is normally Liberal and which was held by the late Mr. Lennox for purely personal reasons, as everyone knew, and they also succeeded in Frontenac-Addington. There were two Liberal gains. The Labour candidate carried the Hamilton vacancy, which was a further loss to the government. In Quebec we gained one seat since the general election —Three Rivers. Therefore up to that point there were three losses and we had gained two, or a net loss of one seat as compared with the standing at the general election. Then we went down to New Brunswick and lost a seat there under circumstances that are well known to every man who knows the history of that province. In Nova Scotia there was no change, in Prince Edward Island no change, and the net result over four years has been that the government has lost two seats. That is the position.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the Prime Minister if with four vacancies existing he has the same number of supporters to-day as he had when he took over the government?

Mr. GOTT: Another interruption!

Mr. BENNETT: I will deal also with that, but first I desire to point out to this house and country that the net position of the government is that after four years of the greatest depression the world has known the government has lost two seats out of 245 in the House of Commons.

With respect to the vacancies I think there is a general, almost a universal rule that to precipitate a by-election, with the expense incident thereto, when a general election is not far distant has not been the course usually followed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all.

Mr. BENNETT: Yesterday the right hon. gentleman himself said it would not be expected that a by-election would be held in the case of the recent vacancy in the constituency which was represented by the late Mr. Nicholson.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not say anything of the kind. I said it would not be expected that by this time that particular by-election would be over. I would have expected the writs would have been issued immediately.

Mr. BENNETT: I suggest to the right hon. gentleman that he will have opportunity to make speeches in due course.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But the Prime Minister must not misrepresent what I say.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not misrepresent. I desire to point out that it is the course that has usually been followed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not.

Mr. BENNETT: I go further, and state with very great frankness that there is no evidence that this country wants a general election.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: Not only is that true, but the fact is that the business people of this country are wholly opposed to a general election at this time, as is well known—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: —not only by hon. gentlemen on this side of the house but by hon. gentlemen opposite. But in addition I say there will be a general election in due course. It will come, just as all other general elections have come, in an orderly and proper manner. But when the charge was made yesterday that there had been a deliberate attempt on the part of the government so to arrange the Dominion Franchise Act passed last session as to secure some benefit from it, I say to the right hon. gentleman and those who supported him that they must have overlooked the provisions of the statute to which they took no objection when passed by this house; not only that but provisions to which they subscribed.

Parliament was prorogued on July 3, 1934, and the Dominion Franchise Act was among the bills assented to on that day. The Dominion Franchise Act was proclaimed in the Canada Gazette of July 6, 1934, and came into force on that day. Section 14 provided that not later than six months after the act came into force the dominion franchise commissioner should publish in the Canada Gazette a proclamation calling for a general registration of electors to commence and end on respective days to be set in the proclamation. Therefore the position was that the right hon. gentleman was a party to the enactment of a section that gave to the franchise commissioner six months from July 6 to commence registration. That was arrived at by common consent. The hon. gentlemen within sound of my voice were parties to it. Then why come to this house and endeavour to make political capital of that to which the right hon. gentleman and his followers were parties?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say to the Prime Minister that the attitude of the opposition was based upon the assurance given by the minister of the crown who presented the measure.

Mr. BENNETT: And I assume that with his high intelligence the right hon. gentleman understood the English language. Six months from July 6 was the time given to the franchise commissioner within which to commence to make his lists.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We were assured that he would commence immediately after prorogation.

Mr. BENNETT: Then the franchise commissioner, Colonel Thompson, having under the terms of the act published this proclamation, proceeded with his work. The names of the returning officers for electoral districts were published in the Canada Gazette extra of August 25, 1934. These returning officers proceeded as required by section 13 to divide their electoral districts into polling divisions. No complaints of any delay in their work have reached any member of the government or the office of the Secretary of State. Two weeks after the returning officers were appointed, that is in the Canada Gazette of September 8, 1934, the dominion franchise commissioner published the names of those appointed by him as registrars of electors. In the meantime the dominion franchise commissioner with the assistance of the chief electoral officer was engaged in preparing all the forms under the act and instructions in English and French for the use of registrars of electors and of the enumerators appointed by them. Listen to the work he had to do. All these forms and instructions had to be printed at the printing bureau for distribution, and required approximately seventy-five tons of paper. The registrars also procured at local printing offices the printing of the public notices in form 4, and over this printing the government had no direction or control. On September 22 the dominion franchise officer published in the Canada Gazette a proclamation pursuant to section 14 that the registration of electors would commence on October 15 and end on November 17, 1934. It will be observed that from the date he made his proclamation, which was two weeks after the returning officers had been appointed, the matter was entirely in his hands and the government had no responsibility whatever. None whatever. On November 20 the dominion franchise commissioner commenced to deliver lists of electors to the king's printer for printing, and on the same day the king's printer began the printing. On November 3, the dominion franchise officer published a notice in the Canada Gazette that all appeals from decisions of the registrars of electors should be adjudged by December 22, 1934.

There is the story, told from the records, showing that the government itself not only had no responsibility, but no opportunity to control the matter, for the publication of the names of returning officers was not made until two weeks after they were appointed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to interrupt the Prime Minister if he prefers that I should not—

Mr. BENNETT: Go ahead.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When he says the opposition was a consenting party, may I ask whether this opposition did not very strongly oppose the striking out of the section in the old election act which required that the returning officers who had been appointed during good behaviour should be continued?

Mr. BENNETT: That is another statute altogether, another provision.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But it had an immediate effect on the question as to the time at which the franchise officer would be in a position to begin his duties.

Mr. BENNETT: That does not in any sense militate against the soundness of the position which I submit to this house, which cannot be challenged, namely, that the law granted six months within which the dominion franchise officer was to commence his duties, and he only took two months, he proceeded promptly with his work, and immediately after he issued his proclamation, which was two weeks after the returning officers were named. It was no light job, he had to print something like two million documents, involving the use of some seventy-five tons of paper. I mention that because it is not desirable that it should be thought that the government of the day were seeking any advantage with respect to these matters; they were not. It is well known that in the appointment of franchise officers the chief franchise commissioner gave forty per cent to each of the two older parties and twenty per cent to the other groups, as a result of which, although the government of the day had the majority of members in the house, instead of taking the recommendation of each of the members, forty per cent of the recommendations made by members on this side were accepted, forty per cent by members on the other side, and twenty per cent from parties who sit opposite to my right, so it may be that part of the delay arose because of difficulty in connection with that, to which possibly reference may later be made. But that is the fact. It is not desirable I think that the impression should be left in the public mind that any effort was made by the government to interfere with the preparation of these lists, or that they had any object in mind in dealing with this question other than that a fair list should be prepared. And when it is remembered that six million names are on these lists one gets some conception of the magnitude of the task imposed on the chief franchise officer as well as those responsible in the several constituencies.

I confess to having been surprised when I found that there were 6,000,000 names or thereabouts on the lists, a greater number than I had believed possible with a population such as ours. The fact is that with so many names on the lists the work involved has been very much greater than was thought, I believe, by any of us. I do say to the right hon. leader of the opposition that I think a little fairer attitude than that which he has indicated is desirable for this reason: I suggested that I thought a basic electoral list should be prepared. The right hon. gentleman opposite expressed himself as being wholly in accord with that view. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) who had charge of the bill met with representatives of the party opposite and it was concluded that a basic list was desirable. Everybody seemed to think it was desirable, and in the effort to secure it there was not the slightest indication of any intention to bring about any favouring or to grant any concessions, benefits or privileges to the government of the day. Rather it was the intention that we should have a basic list upon which elections could be honestly conducted in Canada without scandal, as has happened in some cases. That was our object and I do deprecate more than I can say that the right hon. gentleman should endeavour to leave the thought in the minds of the people of this country that the government desired in thought, word or deed to do anything which would in any sense impugn the validity of these lists, or would endeavour to secure any benefit through their creation and in their revision. That I think would be action which would not be calculated to advance democracy. It was for the purpose of enabling democracy to speak with a somewhat more certain voice than it had done that a basic list was suggested and agreed upon. If in the preparation of that bill six months was given to the chief franchise officer to commence to do his work it was done because it was realized he had before him a heavy task and one which he could not rapidly perform. If he took only two months to do it he would do it in a shorter time than parliament thought might be necessary. I do not know of anything in any way shape or form connected with the preparation of the lists as they stand which will leave them open to any charge levelled against those who have prepared them or any charge of dishonesty in so doing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I never have questioned the accuracy of the lists or the efficiency of any work the franchise commissioner has performed. It is the government's action I have questioned.

Mr. BENNETT: Naturally. Anything the government proposed would naturally be opposed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The right hon. gentleman has just said I agreed with him in this measure.

Mr. BENNETT: Now the right hon. gentleman desires to indicate his complaint against the government in connection with something to which he was a consenting party. That is all that can be said about it. I must say that is not a new position for the right hon. gentleman to take. It is nothing new, and never will be, because the difficulty is to find any position which he takes at any time which he will take at another time in connection with any question of any kind which may come up.

Yesterday further reference was made to the question of the platforms of the contending parties, and promises made by the Conservative party in 1930. When it met in convention in 1927 at Winnipeg it laid down a certain platform; certain policies were set out and I endeavoured to the best of my ability to bring them to the attention of the Canadian people. I did so. And I say this: If you will look at those policies as declared at Winnipeg and then look at the statute books of this country together with what appears in the speech from the throne concerning this session's program you will find that since confederation there has not been any government which has carried out in such detail its ante election promises to a greater extent than has the present government.

I hold in my hand the platform of the Liberal party of 1919 in national convention assembled. That is the convention which brought into being the right hon. gentleman as leader of that party. I ask any hon. member of the house to take the trouble to read the platform of the Liberal party of that day, the party which brought him into being, and then ask himself if after having been in office for nearly ten years any political party has failed to the same extent as has the Liberal party to implement the promises made in a political document.

Yesterday the right hon. gentleman read his trade policy. Yesterday he read his policy with respect to the British preference. But what did he say? He used the word "substantial"—that is not what he said in the House of Commons only a few short months before. He said if they came into power they proposed to bring into being the Dunning budget and a British preference of 50 per cent of the general tariff. I repeat the expression: 50 per cent of the general tariff. I read in this document of 1919, mark you—not 1935—the following words:

> Resolution on the tariff: That the British preference be increased to 50 per cent of the general tariff, and the Liberal party hereby pledges itself to implement by legislation the provisions of this resolution when returned to power.

You will find that those are the words under which they sought power. In 1923 when they went to England to attend the economic conference the English, the British people, expected that the then government, pledged as it was to bring into being a 50 per cent preference, if they had the power, would proceed to do so. Did they have a chance to do it? Did they have an opportunity to do so? Have they done it? Did they do it? Did hon. members observe that yesterday the right hon. gentleman did not refer to "50 per cent," but referred to "substantial." When did he change from "50 per cent" to "substantial"? During the debate which took place on the Ottawa agreements, to which I shall presently refer, time after time he referred to bringing into effect a 50 per cent British preference. He promised that as his platform. One of his new members stood in his place and read the platform of the Liberal party. I shall read something of the extracts from parliamentary debates. I will ask him what he means. There was his promise in 1919; there was his pledge in 1919; there was his majority to carry out his pledge from 1921 to 1930. Did he do it? Did he attempt to do it? Did he endeavour to do it? Did he suggest that it should be done in any way, shape or form? Why, why, why to-day does he espouse the cause of capitalism? Why to-day is he so anxious about his friends the capitalists? Why to-day is he so concerned about what will happen if the reforms we have suggested should come into being? Why? Because he knows if he puts into force a provision of that kind, namely a 50 per cent preference on the general tariff, the effect would be to close up 60 per cent of the industries in Canada. His friends the capitalists have warned him what will happen. The big interests have told him what will happen. And so yesterday he appeared in this chamber reading from the Montreal Gazette his certificate of character. St. James street forever,—the Gazette, the Free Press and the Financial Post; by these we swim! In hoc signo vinces! Is it not time that we had secured an understanding of what he means? What does he mean?—"50 per cent" or "substantial"? What does his pledge to the electors of Canada mean? What does it mean? What is meant by it? The right hon. gentleman attaches a great deal of importance to trade, and rightly so. In 1921, 1925, 1926 and 1930 he condemned platform after platform of the Conservative party; he condemned our Canada first policy. Why did the right hon. gentleman forget his promise of a 50 per cent preference? He and his colleagues went to England in 1923 to attend an economic conference; while there he proposed a preference, but it was not a 50 per cent preference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He did not do anything of the kind.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, he put it this way: He said, " Far be it from me to suggest to you what you should do, but I will tell you what we will do"—and so he put it in the little book. There you have it. That is as far as he got. There is the story.

Now, sir, let us go a step further. It has been contended in this house by hon. gentlemen opposite that the government of the day have erected barriers against trade. The League of Nations in its pamphlet recently issued pointed out that the whole trend of affairs during the last ten years has been towards tariffs. Why? Because it was the only way by which countries could prevent the destruction of their industrial fabric and their national life when other countries were producing goods which they were willing to dump upon the countries of the world that did not protect themselves. I wonder what my right hon. friend meant when he said that we took steps to prevent dumping in this country. Does he favour dumping? Does the Liberal party favour it? I want to know. Does the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young)—oh, I see he is not here. Do hon. gentlemen opposite believe in dumping? Now is the time to answer. Do not be silent in both languages. Rather speak in both, yes or no. Do they believe in dumping or not?

Mr. DUPUIS: We want to dump the government.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I thought. We are getting a lot of truth out of them this afternoon. That is something. That is all he cares about. He is not interested in anything else.

Mr. DUPUIS: It is high time to do it.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman from Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) says: We want to dump the government. But do they believe in the dumping of goods on the markets of Canada? That is the question, and now is the time to get up and answer it. If they do not believe in it, and we must take it for granted that they do not, then what follows? The only methods by which dumping can be prevented in this country were the methods pursued by this government. What have you to say about that? That is what we put to the opposition. We took steps to prevent dumping by the methods that were indicated by the Minister of Finance, by tariffs, by fixing values, and by protecting our people from the depreciated currencies of other countries. Do you believe in protecting this country from the depreciated currencies of other countries or not?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Answer.

Mr. BENNETT: Do you believe in depreciated currencies being the basis upon which Canadians have to compete? Did my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) say something?

Mr. RALSTON: I say, make your own speech.

Mr. BENNETT: I am doing that, but I am seeking an answer to pertinent questions raised by the right hon. gentleman. These questions were raised in this house yesterday, and now I ask an answer. I ask you whether or not you believe in this protection that has been afforded to Canadians, or do you believe in affording to those who manufacture so cheaply that our people cannot compete with them, facilities that they would not otherwise enjoy?

Mr. REID: What about the cheap wages in this country?

Mr. BENNETT: I put this to the hon. gentleman. Only last week we had to deal with a problem of great magnitude, great in one sense but not in another. Rubber and cotton and other things go into the production of tennis shoes. They are made in very large quantities in Czechoslovakia. There you have one of the greatest, if not the greatest, shoe-producing industries in the world, the original proprietor of which was killed, as hon. gentlemen may recall, in an airplane accident. They have a branch now in England. Bear in mind this fact, that rubber is not indigenous to Czechoslovakia, cotton is not indigenous to Czechoslovakia. Therefore they were producing tennis shoes in Czechoslovakia under substantially the same conditions as to importing the raw materials to produce them as Canada, and they were putting them into this market at a few cents a pair, relatively—the exact figures I do not carry in mind. Were we to allow that to continue and destroy Canadian industry? Does the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) believe that that should be done? Do hon. gentlemen opposite believe that this foreign manufacturer should be permitted to strike Canadian industry under such conditions, or do they believe that we should take adequate steps to protect Canadian labour from that form of competition. They have to buy their raw products; we have to buy ours, and let me say that there has not been a day when the Canadian rubber industry has taken advantage of the full extent of the tariff. Everyone knows that.

Now shall that shoe industry in this country be destroyed or not? This government gave long and careful consideration to the matter.

Mr. DUFF: What about the consumer?

Mr. BENNETT: The consumer? Well, there would not be any consumers if you destroyed every possibility of production. That is the answer.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. DUFF: And there would be no producers if there were no consumers. You have the horse by the wrong end.

Mr. BENNETT: They condemn provisions against dumping, against depreciated currencies and against these other things. But I say, Mr. Speaker, that we have taken the only course provided by our institutions to protect Canadians. And yet I hear these means reviled in this house, spoken of as barriers to trade. Yet the League of Nations says that barriers to trade naturally have increased during the last few years. Can the Canadian people of ten and a half millions be sacrificed as an example to all the nations of the world? That is the problem.

I have indicated this so frequently that it is not desirable for me to do so again beyond making this simple statement, that I have never believed in high tariffs.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. BENNETT: I have never believed in high tariffs except when we use them as an emergency measure to prevent this country from becoming insolvent, and we did use them that way. We have recorded our belief with respect to tariffs. We have recorded it time and time again. I could not in the broadcast addresses discuss the question of tariffs. Why? Because we were then carrying on our negotiations with our great neighbour to the south, and there is not an hon. member here who does not realize that we could not discuss these matters at such a time without injuring our case. There are many, of course, who would like to see our case injured, and judging from the speeches made in this house I would say that a good many of them will be found on the other side of the chamber.

Mr. DUFF: Why didn't you put to a vote the resolution that I moved last session? You were frightened to put it to a vote.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I think possibly the hon. gentleman might keep order. I have concluded what I desire to say with respect to that matter. I shall only add this, that it has never been the custom in this or any other country to discuss publicly a question that may have a prejudicial effect upon the negotiations the country is carrying on. Usually all parties are agreed upon that, and the very nature of the matter was such that I have refrained from any specific discussion of these matters for months, during which time we have been carrying on these negotiations.

Now may I refer to two other matters that I regard as of some importance because they are mentioned in the speech from the throne? One is the Marketing Act and the other the Farmer's Debt Adjustment Act. How is the opposition's mind now upon the Marketing Act? Does it believe in it or not?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BENNETT: It has promised to repeal that act if it gets into power.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): It will amend it all right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When did it promise that?

Mr. BENNETT: It did not say amend, but repeal. I read in the press in Ontario that they said that if they were returned to power the act would be repealed, but I am glad to see signs of repentance now and recantation, as usual, with respect to anything that has proved to be useful to the people themselves. Last year day after day they opposed this act, this act that was proposed for one purpose, namely, to enable the producers of natural products to cooperate with one another for the sale of their products just as labour has cooperated, just as capital has cooperated, just as other forces have cooperated to do the best they could for themselves. They have opposed it. They have placed themselves on record as being opposed to it, yet they also opposed the provision that the government of the day might, in case of emergency, take measures for the preservation of peace, order and good government. They opposed that provision, yet I lived long enough to see the Premier of Quebec and the Premier of Ontario send a delegation to the government of the day asking them, through the combined force of the peace, order and good government provision and the marketing act—which did not apply—to take such steps as they might suggest to save the newsprint industry from demoralization. The very emergency which we thought might occur did occur; the emergency arose and the executive power was clothed with authority from this parliament to take the necessary steps.

When I hear the right hon. gentleman talk of the derogation of the rights of parliament I am surprised. I do not know that I am so much surprised as astonished, for it seems impossible that anyone who has been in this house as long as my right hon. friend has been, who has seen bills introduced and given first, second and third readings and passed through both houses of parliament, that conferred upon given individuals the authority and power to exercise certain functions if the occasion should demand, should know better than to say that this is a usurpation of the powers of parliament. What has happened is this: Parliament, in the manner known to all, by enacting legislation has conferred those powers upon specific individuals, to be exercised in time of emergency. It will always be so, for you cannot keep parliament in session all the time to exercise its powers. So it grants or confers these powers upon the executive or upon named individuals. The power may be conferred upon the railway commission; it may be conferred upon a marketing board or some other board. It matters not; these powers are delegated by parliament to the individuals or boards that may be named. And more; the courts have declared time after time that unless and until parliament has so delegated its power there is no validity or strength in any order that may be made by any executive or board that is not clothed with such power. The privy council decided that long years ago. There must be a delegation of authority by parliament or by the dominant power to its agent or to the delegated authority which may exercise that power. That has been done on every occasion, regularly and properly, and in accordance with the institutions of this country. It has been done time after time. It always will be so until the parliamentary institutions themselves vanish. When it is suggested, as it has been; when it is whispered, as it has been, that this government or its leader desires to deprive parliament of its power, I say that the leader of the government on all occasions has not only set forth but has demanded that parliament shall, in specific terms, clothe the executive with the powers which it is desired should be exercised, before they can exercise them.

But, sir, that has not always been the case with the right hon. gentleman opposite. He set up an advisory board on tariffs and taxation, and when I asked the Minister of Justice for the power and authority to do so he had to admit that no such authority had been granted by this parliament. So we had a body that had no authority behind it for its creation, a body that was without authority for its creation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Parliament voted the money for the constitution and salaries of a tariff advisory board.

Mr. BENNETT: Parliament voted money, but the right hon. gentleman knows that did not create it. Parliament pays it, but it does not confer authority upon it to do any particular thing or exercise any power. The order in council in that case is just as harmless as the order in council, for instance, conferring the title of "Honourable" upon somebody while those passing the order in council object to someone else conferring a similar title upon some other person. It is almost unthinkable that a student of the constitution should endeavour for a moment to make it appear that this parliament has done other than clothe certain named individuals or boards or bodies or organizations with power. The marketing board stands as a body created by this parliament, clothed with the powers and authority delegated by this parliament, for the benefit of those for whom the board was created.

Now, I fancy there will not be the same violent opposition to that board that we found a little while ago, and why? Because it has succeeded; because it has discharged the function for which it was created. Those who sit opposite are always anxious to agree that they had a part in the making of that which functions properly, while if it fails they take credit for having said "I told you so." That is the position with respect to that. Let them stand up one after the other, those who voted against the creation of that board, and say they are opposed to it to-day. Let them go back to their constituents and say they are opposed to the marketing act. Let them go back and say they are opposed to the adjustment of farm debts in this country. These are the acts in connection with which we say we have made a movement towards reform, having regard to the conditions that exist in this country.

I did not think the right hon. gentleman would have had the hardihood to mention the central bank. What did he do on the third reading of that measure? He desired to be on all sides of it, so he moved a resolution stating that one of three things should be done; there should be government ownership, government control or part one and part the other. When his motion was found to be out of order he had to vote as St. James street indicated, for his former Secretary of State arose in his place and said, "Why do you not follow the advice of the bankers of St. James street, Montreal?" Then, one after the other, they got up and voted against the third reading of the bill. Sir, there never has been a measure in this country in connection with which the government has had more power than it has with respect to that bill. The comment that is urged by many is that the government has too much power.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In connection with the central bank?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; it is said by many that the government has too much power, for in the hands of the governor and the appointees of the government rests a responsibility and power that many think entirely too great. But having regard to the conditions to which I referred the other day, I still believe that the only method by which it could function successfully is to confer upon those three officers, the governor, the deputy governor and the assistant deputy governor, the powers that are indicated, the Deputy Minister of Finance being the liaison officer between the government and the bank. But let us see, after listening to the right hon. gentleman yesterday, what he said on April 26, 1932, when the hon. gentlemen who sit opposite me and to my right moved a subamendment, stating:

> That in the opinion of this house, as a first step towards general economic reconstruction, our financial system should be nationalized—

The right hon. gentleman laughed at that. He said:

> That is the substance of the subamendment. It suggests two things: First, the nationalization of our financial system and, second, the direct adoption of a policy of inflation. May I in the first instance ask this question of those who have moved this subamendment: If our financial system is to be nationalized, whom are you going to entrust with that work? Are you going to entrust the government opposite with it? Are you going to entrust hon. gentlemen opposite, who have dealt with the tariff in the manner in which they have, under the freedom which has been given them, to nationalize the finances of this country? Yet that is what this amendment is suggesting, because it is addressed to parliament as it exists at the present time. May I ask another question? Were a Liberal administration in office would you entrust a Liberal administration with that task? May I ask still another question? Were you in office yourselves, would you undertake the work of nationalizing the finances of the country? I do not believe that any group of persons who have given thought to these matters would attempt a task of that kind in Canada at this time.

Yet what did he mean yesterday? Either he had seen the light and adopted the argument of the hon. gentlemen who sit to his left, or his words meant nothing. He talked about the direct government control of credit. That is what the hon. gentlemen opposite and to my right said; that is what he jeered at a few months ago. But now, because a central bank is coming into being which will function under officers appointed by the governor in council, with a liaison officer in the person of the Deputy Minister of Finance between the bank and the government, thereby securing all the benefits that come from independent private ownership in an institution directed in the manner I have indicated, with the control of the government such as it is under that statute, stronger than I can possibly conceive under any other method, with the government itself nationalizing and going into the credit business, now he finds this political factor. That was what the right hon. gentleman said in 1932. What does he mean by what he said yesterday? What is his policy? He speaks of the nationalization of credit. Does he mean that a political party is to determine what individual credits shall be, or what the credits of the customers or of the banks shall be? If he does not mean that what does he mean?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the Prime Minister if he regards nationalization and control as one and the same thing?

Mr. BENNETT: I am only reading what the right hon. gentleman said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, but he is putting a wrong interpretation on the words.

Mr. BENNETT: He said:

> And, if we ourselves would not undertake a scheme such as this, what would be thought of Canada by other countries if it were announced to-morrow that this House of Commons had attempted any such task as the one indicated in the subamendment?

Now, the subamendment which I have read in part contemplates the very thing which the right hon. gentleman yesterday said he supported.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it relates to nationalization.

Mr. BENNETT: No, it did not stop at nationalization, but control of credit. And this government has endeavoured by every means within its power to prevent credit and politics being mixed, the one with the other. We have endeavoured to secure for the people of the country the widest possible credit facilities, based not on inflation, not on the principles of nationalization and of the granting of credit on any terms whatever, but upon a comprehensive appreciation of the importance of finance in the life of a country such as this. I confess that after listening to what the right hon. gentleman said yesterday, and comparing it with what he said in 1932, I find it somewhat difficult to understand just what his observations really mean. I suggest that possibly they are not unlike the observations he made when the matter was under consideration in the house before, namely, the suggestion on third reading that we should beyond all question straddle the fence and have three policies so that peradventure he might be able to get someone to support him on each. That is about all that can be made of it.

I have here statements made from time to time with respect to these matters, but I will not trouble the house to deal with them at this time. I simply say this. If the right hon. gentleman is correct in the statements he made yesterday as to the attitude of the Liberal party in the past towards reform, then why were reform measures not passed? The time to pass reform measures is when conditions are prosperous.

It has been suggested that I have changed my attitude towards these problems. That is what has been suggested.

Mr. RALSTON: Stated.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what is stated, then. Those who have stated it are not aware of the facts. When the world economic conference was called into being, over two years ago now, I told my colleagues, as I told caucus, if I might refer to that, that if the conference failed—if it failed—it would be the duty of this government itself to propose reform measures for Canada. Those who are familiar with my own course in parliament and who will consult Hansard of 1913, those who care to look into my attitude on the railway question, when I broke with my own party and voted against the action taken then, will realize that I at least had a clear appreciation of the dangers of exploitation of the Canadian people in the manner in which they have since been exploited.

Let us consider the suggestion made yesterday. The suggestion was, "Don't legislate; just let the people get together".

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There was no suggestion of the kind.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, I may have misunderstood the right hon. gentleman but he said, "Let the community and labour and capital meet together and arrange matters to their mutual satisfaction." For, he said, the community had an interest, capital had an interest and labour had an interest. Now, I have read a little of history and I have always been interested in the life of one great man, Lord Shaftesbury. It is very difficult at times to mention the name of that great man, especially on an occasion such as this, because his greatness was such that even to refer to it should, it appears to me, induce every hon. gentleman who hears it to pause a moment. What did he find? Labour, capital and the community,—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not working together.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly not. How were they brought together?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They were not.

Mr. BENNETT: But they were.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They were not.

Mr. BENNETT: They were brought together by statute.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They were not and are not yet.

Mr. BENNETT: They were brought together by statute, because it was realized that they would never come together so long as capital was in the position in which it was. And so legislation was enacted that curbed its power. Even those who recall Morley's Life of Gladstone will remember how he objected, as a breach of the tenets of Liberalism, that there should be no interference with the free power to contract, even with respect to hours of labour. That was the Liberal doctrine, in the days of free competition and open markets, the days before combinations of capital made it impossible to have the one or the other. And so parliament has been asked to intervene. Why do we ask the intervention of parliament, why do we invoke the regulatory power of parliament? Because parliament represents all the people and not a few of the people; and the interests of all must be protected by that institution set up in the state, called parliament, for the purpose of enacting laws for the protection of all who may suffer from the inequalities of freedom on the part either of capital or of labour.

Lord Shaftesbury found it so; others have found it so. Others have said that it is not desirable nor necessary that there should be any interference with the power of men to conciliate with one another. That might have been so once, it is not so now. There must be the collective power of the state, as indicated by its laws, to curtail the power of capital, which, unbridled and unrestrained, means ruin absolutely to the community in which it flourishes. Is there any one who has any doubt about that? If so, he has only to read the history of Canada from 1920 to 1930. All he has to do is to read the history of mergers and combines and the exploitation that took place by men sitting close in council to the right hon. gentleman. They were not curtailed; their power was not lessened; they were not restrained but encouraged, because the Combines Investigation Act was circumvented—how? By mergers, which took the administration of business out of the control of those who had built the business and knew it, and placed it in the hands of the exploiter. If you have any doubt about it, you might read the proceedings before the tariff board in a very important case which it is not necessary for me to mention.

I have in my hand the Life of Shaftesbury. The right hon. gentleman has asked me from what source I have derived such impetus as is given my mind to survey these problems. I say, it has come from reading the lives of great reformers—not reformers who have been content to put these things in a book but who have insisted that parliament should legislate and enact them in the statutes of the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Where did the right hon. gentleman get his knowledge of the views of these reformers if not out of books?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly. I found their views recorded in the pages of Hansard. Those who remember Lord Ashley's speeches in the House of Commons, or his speeches after he succeeded as Earl of Shaftesbury in the House of Lords, will find his position indicated in his public addresses—recorded, it is true, in books, but not books such as the one to which the right hon. gentleman has referred. His views are recorded in a book though he had an opportunity for nine years to place them on the statute books. But he declined to do so and permitted capitalism, untrammeled and uncontrolled, to destroy thousands of our citizens.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister told us yesterday that he had not read the book; how does he know what is in it?

Mr. BENNETT: No, pardon me; I did not say that. He suggested that I had gathered my ideas from his book. I did not. I disclaimed that, as I disclaim it now. But years ago I did read part of his book. I cannot say I read it with great care, but I did read it and I congratulate him on his industry. Not for a moment would I decry his industry, but I do say this, that in the realm of actualities and realisms, fine spun theories in books will not accomplish reforms. Shaftesbury put the matter in this way, according to his biographer:

> Finally, Shaftesbury's creed never ceased to emphasize the sanctity of personality over property; and to urge the God-imposed duty of cleansing the atmosphere from all vicious diseases, mental and physical, "spawned in the cesspools" of social corruption. Hence he pointed, with shame, to the incongruity that society treated many "as swine when children, and later expected them to walk with the dignity of Christians." To Britain's foremost reformer it was a primary demand of Christianity that society create an environment conducive to symmetrical growth; and for him symmetrical growth meant such development as that of the child Jesus, who "increased in wisdom and stature, and in favour with God and man." During his half century crusade for child welfare, Shaftesbury never wavered on this point.

If from that source and from others I have learned that it is my solemn duty and obligation, when I have the power and authority, to introduce those measures of reform which are referred to in the speech from the throne, I shall go forward; we shall go forward with that work to the end that this country may be purged of the inequalities and iniquities that have grown up under the system which, unrestrained and unregulated, not in all cases but in many, now finds its protagonist and support from those who on the one hand whisper of disdain and contempt and on the other say: We support it; on the one hand seeking support from the sources from which those iniquities have grown and on the other condemning them with their tongues in their cheeks. Not with such half measures will we carry forward our efforts. With those efforts for the improvement of society, for the overcoming so far as it may be of the inequalities to which I have referred, we shall endeavour by every means in our power to bring about those reforms.

I am convinced that the good sense and high intelligence of the Canadian people who have suffered long and patiently from the circumstances to which I have alluded, who have seen their savings taken away by speculation unbridled and uncontrolled, who have seen their properties lost, who have seen their children impoverished by reason of that speculation, will give to those measures that warm support and allegiance which will be found far beyond, shall I say, the range of parties but in the hearts of the people themselves.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, now that both parties have seen the light, there remains very little for us to do. I have sometimes wondered, as I have listened to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in his denunciation of the evils of capitalism, whether if he could appreciate how fundamental those evils were and how inherent they were in the system itself, he might not become a fine soap boxer for us.

The speech from the throne makes reference to the maintenance of peace. May I call attention to an incident that a few years ago would have provoked an international crisis? It is one of those things of which all parties may very well be proud. I refer to the settlement of the I'm Alone incident. A few years ago we would have had an outcry that we had to maintain Canada's national honour. Fortunately wiser counsels prevailed and the case went to arbitration. Now we find that the commission have declared that although it was a British ship of Canadian registry it "was de facto owned, controlled and at critical times managed, and her movements directed and her cargo dealt with and disposed of, by a group of persons acting in concert who were entirely, or nearly so, citizens of the United States." It was actually handled by Dan Hogan of New York and the late Marvin J. that is "Big Jim" Clark, a roving former convict, on a profit sharing plan. The arbitrators decided that an apology which I think has been tendered, was due to Canada by the United States for the sinking, and of Canada's damage claim, $25,000 was granted. The opinion of the international jurists is revealed in their conclusion there should be no compensation to the owner of the ship or indemnity for its cargo. An incident of that kind, the significance of which was hardly noted by our press, should encourage us greatly as to the possibilities of international arbitration and other methods of bringing about peace.

Last night the Prime Minister won a great deal of applause when he rather ridiculed the idea that anyone should avoid taking action that might be considered provocative in character. It is that very attitude that has so often caused international complications. I wonder if I might read a paragraph in a speech recently delivered by the United States Secretary of State, the Hon. Mr. Cordell Hull, who said in that country:

> Just as we set the vicious example of erecting the trade barriers of high tariffs which induced others to follow us, so now we are asking other nations to join us in an attempt to undo the damage our collective action has worked. We wish to break down all the artificial and excessive impediments put in the way of world commerce, not only in our own interest but for the benefit of all others as well, since only by restoring the whole world can individual countries hope, in this day of rapid communication and interdependence, to remain economically healthy long. A hermit nation means a hermit civilization.

If we are to have better conditions in Canada we must be willing at times to make some immediate sacrifice in order that we may ultimately attain a position which will be of advantage both to Canada and to the world at large. In this connection may I quote another statement, really not inconsistent with the preceding but emphasizing an important aspect of the problem. Henry Wallace,

United States Secretary of Agriculture, recently said this:

There can be little doubt that the trouble traces, in whole or in part, to a maldistribution of income. That doctrine is implicit in our new deal, which seems to me to rest on irresistible logic. We are trying to build up consumption per capita at home as a substitute for the continual search for new consumers abroad. Our new method involves a planned redistribution of the national income, in contrast with the unplanned redistribution that takes place regularly, usually unhappily, in every major economic crisis the civilized world over.

I suggest that it is only as we get away from the idea that we must solve our problems by a larger measure of trade—and as I understand that is essentially the position of both the Liberal and the Conservative parties—that we shall begin to set our feet on the road that will lead to a permanent solution of our economic problems.

As I listened to this debate I thought that perhaps it was time to get down a little nearer to the realities of the situation. The speech from the throne, as is frequently the case, opens with phrases like this:

...our country stands upon the threshold of a new era of prosperity.

During the past year the grip of hard times has been broken. Conditions show marked improvement. Employment is increasing.

How does that square with the statement made by the Prime Minister a few days ago in his first radio speech. In that statement he was nearer the facts. He said:

The truth is disturbing. The world is in tragic circumstances. The signs of recovery are few and doubtful. The signs of trouble are many and they do not lessen.

I turn to unemployment, which for many years we have been trying to bring to the attention of the house. Let me read the figures as given recently by the council of child and family welfare, which I think works in very close cooperation with the government.

While Canada's December bill for unemployment relief will likely prove to be not less than $5,800,000 with an estimated number of 1,150,000 dependent on relief aid...

Is that a satisfactory condition, even though unemployment was a little greater a few months ago?

At least 200,000 heads of families, probably more, are still receiving unemployment relief.

Some of us know what that means to one individual family. Think of the misery and degradation involved in 200,000 such families in this country. Further:

...over 20,000 able-bodied employable men are in relief camps...

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Again let me ask whether, even in spite of fair food which we are told is given in these camps, it is a satisfactory condition that large numbers of our young men should be forced to spend months, yes, years now, of their lives under such circumstances, with no hope whatever in life? Then it is stated that there are:

—perhaps 25,000 to 30,000 men temporarily engaged in relief works. There are probably 25,000 more single or homeless men idle in their own communities.

The Prime Minister may tell us that Canada now has the proud honour of holding fifth place among the nations of the world in trade matters, but does that compensate for the fact that we have these enormous numbers of our young people not having a chance in life?

There are an unascertained number, at least not less than 200,000 youths and girls, say 16 to 25 years of age, who are idle, unemployed, and receiving relief either in their own homes or as "single persons."

More than that there are:

—hordes of homeless young graduates of the business and technical schools, and of the colleges and universities, unplaced, idle, drifting to dependency.

The Prime Minister made a few weeks ago a very fine statement. He said:

When because of fluctuations in industrial conditions, the worker is thrown out of employment, he should not be punished when the fault is that of the machine. For whatever is the cause of these depressions, whoever is to blame for them (if anyone is to blame), assuredly it is not the workman.

Yet to this day the workman is bearing the brunt of the depression.

I went the other day in my own city to where the men were receiving relief, and I think they were being treated there as well or perhaps better than in most cities of Canada. They were receiving two meals a day costing 5½ cents a meal. Is that a satisfactory condition? Is that the kind of thing that should prevail in Canada? Is the fact that we are the fifth trading nation and according to the Prime Minister better off than other nations, consistent with permitting these hundreds of thousands of our fellow citizens, who confessedly are not to blame, to go on under conditions of this kind?

Let me give one incident. I know of many more, some among my own personal friends, but I give one that attracted considerable attention a few weeks ago in my own city. It is rather a typical case, although the tragic circumstances may be somewhat exceptional. I read from the Free Press of December 18, 1934, the front page:

Valour Road Man Returns Home to Find Baby Boy Drowned in Bathtub, Five-year-old Daughter Strangled, and Wife Poisoned.

With thoughts of a poverty-stricken Christmas gnawing at her mind, a 28-year-old Winnipeg mother, Monday afternoon, took the lives of her two little children, aged 18 months and 5 years, and then committed suicide.

She had just completed the hanging of Christmas decorations in her little home.

Then with the home bravely adorned, and spotlessly clean, she strangled one child, drowned the other in the bath, and killed herself by drinking a powerful germicide.

There had not even been enough money in the house to buy the poison that killed her. She left a farewell note on the kitchen table bearing this out.

"I owe the drug store 44 cents; farewell," it said.

She had, according to neighbours, become despondent over continued poverty. Her husband had not had steady work for a long time and they had been forced to accept relief. . . .

They came to Winnipeg from England about four years ago. He is an electrician by trade. He got some work and the future looked bright. Then he lost his job. They moved away from their neighbourhood. No work came. Finally they were forced to accept relief. Then the baby, William Edgar, was born.

I should like to turn for a moment to the jury's verdict on that case. They recommended that:

—powerful disinfectants which contain a large quantity of carbolic acid be placed upon the poison list by statute.

Is that a solution of the problem—to put a few more bottles on the list of poisons? Yet it is typical of the way in which we treat our major problems of to-day. Further the jury found:

—that the five-year-old daughter, Margaret Constance, died from asphyxia induced by strangulation, and that the two-year-old boy, William Edgar, died from asphyxia induced by drowning.

And that the mother was of unsound mind. Is that any solution or any real explanation of that occurrence? None whatever. It is simply that that woman, weighed down by despondency after months and months of the treatment she had received, finally could bear the strain no longer. One other recommendation the jury brought in:

The jury further recommended that through the medium of the newspapers a subscription list be opened for the purpose of receiving contributions from the public to relieve the distress of the husband who is at present in very straightened circumstances.

Yes, we are going to put an extra label on certain bottles. We find that the mother has been driven to a state of unsound mind, and under those circumstances we are advised to support a newspaper subscription to help out a husband whose wife has committed suicide. Under such circumstances is that all the help we can offer? Possibly that is an extreme case, in view of its tragic outcome, but I want to say there are tens of thousands of families in our cities to-day living under as distressing conditions.

I submit we cannot maintain our self respect as Canadian citizens unless we take immediate action to deal with such matters.

Immediately below the story on the front page to which I have called attention I find the following item:

Conditions in textile trade investigated. It was apparent from the auditor's report that the cotton industry had weathered the depression successfully, The three largest companies, Dominion Textiles Company, Limited, Montreal; Canadian Cottons, Limited, Cornwall, Ontario and Wabasso Cotton Company Limited, Three Rivers, Quebec, had bigger sales and higher percentage of gross profit in 1934 than 1933. The three largest companies which dominate the Canadian industry had a trading profit of 8·7 per cent in 1934, the highest since 1929. At the same time wages stood at the lowest percentage, 24·5, in the period.

And again:

In 1934 the Wabasso Company in Three Rivers, Quebec, paid 25 per cent of its 1,256 employees 18 cents an hour or less. Three employees were paid less than nine cents an hour; 52 between nine and ten cents; 53, 10 to 11 cents; 11, from 11 to 12 cents; 12, from 12 to 13 cents; 21, from 13 to 14 cents; 74, between 14 and 15 cents; 38, between 15 and 16 cents; 47, between 16 and 17 cents and 7, between 17 and 18 cents.

The managers of these corporations objected to their names being given publicity. I do not much wonder. Further than that one of them had the audacity to say that conditions in the mills of this country were superior to those existing in Japan, where silk workers were paid 18 cents a day.

Mr. Speaker, I can scarcely speak with restraint when I realize that while year after year we have brought such conditions to the attention of this parliament practically nothing has been done to improve them. We drift along, sometimes passing a little bit of legislation, but spending the greater part of our time in acrimonious party debates. I must say I do not see that in the present session there is any very great tendency to alter the situation. Of course in the speech from the throne we have outlined a long program of reforms, and no matter what their motives may be I should like to congratulate the government upon bringing these matters forward for consideration. This speech contains more than any other speech I can recall during the period I have sat in this house since 1921. There are some twenty items of important measures, but at present I shall not take time to list them. No wonder this program has fairly taken away the breath of the public.

Of course one must reserve judgment until the bills are introduced, but I think that at this stage several observations are pertinent. First of all, why has the government waited until the eve of the election? The Prime Minister's explanations are not convincing Again, unless some method is evolved of settling the matter of jurisdiction it is not fair to introduce legislation which may be challenged in the courts. I am not a constitutionalist, as a good many people would testify, but I do not think it is wise to plunge into a long legislative program which in the end may mean nothing to our people. But having said that I think we are surely in a very happy position to-day. The Conservative party has pledged itself to these reforms. The Liberal party states that they were pledged back in 1919; I hope they are still pledged. Then it would seem that we are all pledged, and the reforms should be passed in the present session.

In his radio addresses the Prime Minister said that he is going to reform the capitalist system, and that his legislative program will solve our troubles. I want to say that that program offers no solution of our major economic problems. If in spite of constitutional difficulties and opposition, the government is able to carry out 100 per cent of the reforms it has listed in the speech from the throne, I would say that Canada would come up only to the position in which Great Britain stood in the days of Lloyd George's famous program of social insurance, or to the point Germany had reached before the war. I hope the reforms are carried out but in such event, let me repeat, we would then only be in line with the more civilized nations of the world. I hope no hon. member in this house or any person outside will be deluded into the belief that this program constitutes a reform of capitalism. Capitalism still stands as a menace to the Canadian people and to the world.

I take it the speech from the throne must be read in the light of the Prime Minister's speeches over the radio. His earlier broadcasts were very startling; we were led to believe that capitalism was doomed and that Mr. Bennett was about to administer the coup de grâce. I believe that was the general feeling. Later speeches rather descended to a vigorous criticism of the Liberal party and the laissez-faire policy which had been adopted by it. I am inclined to think the criticism was fairly well done, because although to-day Liberals may disclaim the term their record shows that on the whole they have been opposed to government interference. If I may take the Winnipeg Free Press as an example of Liberal policy—and it is generally considered such—I would state that almost every issue is devoted to a denunciation of those who put forward regulatory policies.

The speeches also advocated certain specific reforms which are very desirable. If they are passed they will not in any sense undermine the capitalist system; on the contrary I think they will bolster it up. However, even in that case they may help out a number of individuals who to-day are in very bad circumstances. Whatever his motives may be I take it that the Prime Minister has made a great contribution to political discussion in Canada. There will probably be several permanent gains. First of all, the capitalist system is no longer sacrosanct. Whenever in the past anyone has spoken in denunciation of the capitalist system he was apt to have hurled at his head the cries of "radical," "bolshevist," "dangerous man." Now Mr. Bennett heads the procession in denouncing some of the evils of the capitalist system.

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Perhaps I should not have said Mr. Bennett, but Mr. Bennett has been speaking outside, and I was not speaking of what the Prime Minister had said in the house but of what Mr. Bennett had said outside.

The Prime Minister further declared, and I want to give him credit for this, that the capitalist system must be considered on its merits. In the past, most of us have taken the capitalist system for granted. It had come into existence before we did, and we grew up with its development, and so we never thought of questioning it, much less of suggesting that there could be any other system. But now the Prime Minister has said that it is a system of comparatively recent growth, that its most dangerous evils manifested themselves since the war, and that we should consider that system on its merits. All that is to the good, and I hope we shall do that in this house in the days to come.

Again, I would point out that the Prime Minister made a great contribution when he declared definitely for the regulation of industry. Anyone who has read the history of the last hundred and fifty years, especially of the last half century, must have recognized that the situation to-day is very different from that which existed in the earlier days of capitalism. Then the policy of laissez-faire may have been a very good one, the policy of reducing interference by government to a minimum; but now even the leader of the opposition is obliged to concede that there are circumstances in which there must be a great deal more of government regulation. Twenty-five years ago the present leader of the opposition stood for government regulation of a rather mild type, but since the evils of capitalism have developed a great deal since that time, we must go a great deal further. I know that the idea of government regulation of industry is anathema to the old line Liberals, and a great many of them will never swallow it. A man said to me the other day: "You never can force us by legislation to do those things." I simply point out that there are a hundred and one things that we are being forced to do to-day, all sorts of things in our civic affairs, for instance. You cannot drive as you please, left or right; you have to drive to the right. You have to stop and go with the signal lights, and so on. We are accustomed to these things, but we have not yet carried them into the sphere of larger industry. Regulation is almost instinctively opposed by the children of the old pioneers, and as one of them I understand their feeling. We have been so accustomed in the simpler forms of society to going our own way that we hate to be regulated. I confess that I hate to obey the traffic signals on the street; in face, I can hardly see them. I like to go in spite of them, and yet I know perfectly well that the traffic of a modern city cannot be kept moving on the old uncontrolled basis. We cannot get through to our destination unless we observe the rules of the road.

We must recognize the changed conditions of business. We talk about individual freedom and individual initiative, but there is not a business man or a professional man or a labour man to-day but recognizes that in practice very few persons do have much individual freedom or individual initiative. They can hardly call their souls their own. Even university professors are being told they cannot enter politics. Labour people are being told that if they speak on their job against the party of the boss they will be fired, and with their wives and children dependent on them they hardly dare take the risk. I should like to ask what freedom in practice is left even to the branch bank manager, much less to his clerks. What freedom is left to the employee of a great commercial firm like Eaton's or Simpson's?

Mr. IRVINE: Freedom to starve.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, freedom to starve. In practice what freedom is left to the individual in a great industrial concern? Very little, and political freedom becomes absolutely futile unless we have freedom in the economic world. I think that has been amply demonstrated by the revelations of the price spreads and mass buying commission. Big business takes advantage of the old time psychology to urge freedom, but I submit that what we call freedom from government restraint means in practice that the big industries and the big commercial concerns control us body and soul.

It is a curious thing that to-day a great many business men are saying: We should have less government in business. Do these people stop to think that Canadian business to-day is almost entirely dependent upon government support? What about our railways with their charters, their grants, their subsidies, and more recently their guarantees? Yet if you were to talk about wages on the railways immediately the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would get up and say: We must not have any interference by government with business.

What about those gaining control of the natural resources of the country, the timber limits, the mineral resources and the water powers? A few years ago we had Beauharnois, and I noticed in the papers only a few days ago that the Sifton estate was to receive $50,000 from Mr. Sweezey because of the services that Mr. Sifton had rendered in securing from the government the right to go ahead with that development. Is that the way we treat the people who come here lobbying, and getting $50,000 for persuading the government to do what the government never should have done? And now the natural resources are gone

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Was there not also mention of having a lobby of members of parliament, apart altogether from the government?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is just as bad.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, certainly. I agree with my hon. friend's point of view. The whole business is bad.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is bad to have the members lobbied, but of course the government really has control, and that is why I refer to the government.

Mr. SPOTTON: It was done by order in council, was it not? Why should members be lobbied? It could only have been the government.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I need not refer to what big business has been able to secure from the government in the way of company incorporations and charters through which they have been able to exploit the public. I need not refer to the tariffs under which a great many of our big manufacturers have been enabled to charge the people sometimes double what they ought to be charged for protected products. I need not refer to the bank charters which have given practically a monopoly of the financial affairs of this country into the hands of a group of private individuals. Such is the situation and yet to-day the bankers and these big business people have the assurance to come to us and say that there must not be any government regulation in business. I give the Prime Minister credit for challenging that position. I think we can never go back to the old position.

The fundamental weakness of the Prime Minister's speeches seems to me to be that his proposals would stabilize the present capitalist system. He divides people into producers and non-producers, and incidentally I would point out that he leaves out most business men and professional men who are not usually classed by economists as producers. He says the producers are those who live by investments on money, either earned or given to them. I want to say here that in my judgment the big fortunes of this country have not been earned by the sweat of the brow. Some of the big fortunes have been founded on war profiteering; others have been built up by a series of special privileges. They came out of the public; there was no other place from which they could come. The Prime Minister did not suggest that any of these big fortunes should be investigated, so I take it for granted that he assumes that they are to remain much as they are to-day.

As to fortunes that have been inherited, let me say that if we in this house had been doing our duty for the last few years there would not have been these big inherited fortunes at all. What does an inherited fortune mean? It means that if I inherit a fortune my children have a claim on your children before the children are born. It means that the man who inherits the fortune has the right to the services of others in the community, and while I am just as anxious as anybody can be to look after the widows and children, I want all widows and children to be looked after. The time will come when the position will be as it was very well put in the first labour manifesto issued years ago in Great Britain, that after comparatively small allowances are made for the immediate dependents, it should be that naked the man came into the world and naked he shall go out again.

What about these great fortunes? I take it that according to the Prime Minister we are to continue to have two classes of people, first of all the people who live by owning and secondly the people who live by working. That is where I part company with the Prime Minister. He would stabilize society with its present two classes, the people who live by owning and the people who live by working. The people who live by owning form a very small proportion of the people of Canada. I know there are the small investors, but not so very many. When we consider that less than two per cent of the people of Canada are wealthy enough to pay the federal income tax we begin to realize how small a proportion of the people are benefited by the present arrangement.

Mr. GRAY: Do you not think the owner works?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not talking about the owner; I am talking about the two classes into which the Prime Minister has divided society, the people who live by working and the people who live by owning. If the owner is working he comes into the class of producers. If he is living on the earnings of other people he comes into the class of non-producers.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that he has exhausted his time.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think by the clock I have two minutes left.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: With the permission of the house I will go on for another five minutes; as hon. members know, I have only forty minutes.

With regard to the specific proposals, I think we shall all be glad to support those having to do with minimum wages and maximum working hours. The British North America Act has been held to be an obstacle, but many times in this house I have said, and I thoroughly believe, that where there is a will there is a way, and I am quite confident that there is some way around the British North America Act. If not, it can be amended.

With regard to unemployment insurance, we have advocated that for years. It is a good idea, but may I suggest that you can build up reserves, we will say, for a fire insurance scheme when there is a time of tranquillity, with no big fires. If you have your reserves you can pay the loss when one house burns. If another house across the city burns you can pay that loss also, but when the whole city is going up in flames it is not time to begin to build up the reserves necessary for a fire insurance scheme. The same is true with regard to unemployment insurance. How can the people who are now out of work contribute to such a scheme? How can the poorly paid people of to-day do so? It cannot be done. Under these circumstances I would say that the measure as proposed does not solve the problem of the half million people who are now out of work.

Mr. NEILL: We have not seen the measure yet.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It will not solve the problem, because it is on a contributory basis. If the so-called dole is to be abolished, the relief as we give it at present, the latter state will be a great deal worse than the first, because I think we all recognize that a number of our provinces and many municipalities are practically bankrupt.

With regard to old age pensions the same might be said. With regard to any provision for health insurance, again we are heartily in accord with that step. I remember a slogan adopted a good many years ago by the women of Alberta; "The hospital as free as the public school." By all means let us have the hospital as free as the public school. I think it must come. When we were at war and a man was injured did we wait until he could secure a private doctor to take care of him? Did we wait until the ambulance man was assured that his fee would be paid? Not a bit of it; we said it was in the interests of the army as a whole that the man should be looked after. I believe that what is true in war time is equally true in peace time, and that it is to the interests of the community as a whole that our sick should be looked after.

How are such schemes to be financed? I submit that under the present system this is going to be extremely difficult. Does it mean new taxes?—surely our people generally cannot stand very much more in the way of taxation. Does it mean that the cost is to be borne by the bondholders? I have advocated that for years, but the proposal has been frowned upon and we were told that those are sacred obligations. I have tried to say that the obligations to the men, women and children of this country are much more sacred than those to the bondholders; perhaps now the Prime Minister is willing to take that view. Does it mean that the burden is to be passed on to the business men of this country, then I urge that business is hardly in a position to stand the additional load.

Now I come to the main problem, on which I should like to say just a word. How can we increase the prosperity of the country? Everyone says "increase trade," but that trade must be either foreign or internal trade. We can sell either abroad or at home. The Prime Minister has well said that the open market is a thing of the past. I do not think he has quite so clearly realized that the world market, the expanding market, is also a thing of the past. All the nations to-day that have adopted this capitalist system are producing in huge quantities and seeking markets. Under those circumstances we are not going to get the market abroad which we would all like to see. So we come to the home market, and the only way in which we can increase the purchasing power of the people is by putting into their hands a larger measure of purchasing power in the form of services and wages. In the past, instead of doing that, the government has tended to curtail both the wages paid its own employees—thus setting an example to the outside community—and the services rendered. That is the difficulty we face to-day.

Years ago, I remember reading the older socialist economists who pointed out that we had to face certain inherent contradictions in the capitalist system. I confess that formerly I was not able to understand that, but I understand it to-day. We have reached the point when such contradictions are evident. The very steps the government ought to take to save the situation they cannot take and meet their obligations. The very steps the business community ought to take in the way of putting into the hands of the people increased purchasing power they cannot take because of the huge capital indebtedness which has been piled up.

So now we face the need for a new social order. I think the Prime Minister was right, in words at least, when he said the old order is gone. Yes, I said "in words," because I do not believe the Prime Minister with all his knowledge—and he has a capacious mind—has yet realized that the present economic system is doomed. If he had realized that he would not have talked about a few of these reforms saving the system. We are facing one of the world's great crises, and while we attempt to do these things, which some of us feel pretty sure cannot be accomplished under the system, we might as well frankly face the larger issues. I believe that in this election, as in no previous election the issue that will face the people of Canada is this: capitalism on the one side and a new social order on the other.

Mr. GRAY: Democracy and socialism.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Democratic socialism, if you like.

Mr. GRAY: I said democracy and socialism.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is the issue which we have to face in the days to come. I wish to thank the house for having so kindly extended my time for a few minutes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege. In the course of his speech this afternoon the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) quoted from a letter which I had written to His Excellency the former Governor General in 1926. The Prime Minister quoted only a part of the letter and I asked him to read the entire letter so that the paragraph which he quoted should not be misconstrued.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am speaking to the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: I object to its being raised as a question of privilege, which it is not.

Mr. SPEAKER: The leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), as I take it, has the right to rise to a question of privilege. I have not yet heard the question stated.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When a communication of an hon. member has been partly quoted in this house in the course of debate, and he asks the member quoting it to read the entire communication, in the event of the member who is speaking refusing to comply with that request, has not the writer of the letter the right to have the entire communication put on the record?

Mr. SPEAKER: No, I think not. The right of a member to speak again is confined strictly to an explanation in order that there may be no misunderstanding or misconstruction by some other member of anything that he has said. There is however no authority of which I am aware that permits the subsequent reading by an hon. member on a question of privilege, of the entire communication, a part of which has been quoted, or of some statement made on a previous occasion. The right hon. gentleman, if the Prime Minister in his remarks misconstrued something which he said, has the right to correct such an error; but I certainly know of no rule that authorizes the step which the right hon. gentleman proposes to take.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My point is, Mr. Speaker, that by reading one paragraph of the letter, divorcing it from its context, the Prime Minister has misconstrued and misrepresented my attitude, and the only way in which that attitude can be correctly represented is by reading the full text of the letter. As a member of this house I claim the right to have the entire letter placed on the record, seeing that, the Prime Minister having quoted only a portion of it, he has in so doing misrepresented the main purport and intent of the communication.

Mr. SPEAKER: That, I regret to say, is not my interpretation of the rule. May has covered the point with respect to explanations that may be made by one who has exhausted his right to speak. At page 313 of the 13th edition he states:

> The proper time for explanation is at the conclusion of the speech which calls for it:—

That is one point on which perhaps the question of privilege is not correctly raised at this time, although I should not be inclined to rule in that regard.

> —but it is a common practice for the member desiring to explain to rise immediately the statement is made to which his explanation is directed,—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did.

Mr. SPEAKER: Quite true.

> —when, if the member in possession of the house gives way and resumes his seat, the explanation is at once received: but the explanation cannot then be offered, if the member who is speaking declines to give way.

That is as far as the rule goes. So far as my limited experience and knowledge go, it certainly does not afford the right to the right hon. gentleman to read the rest of the communication, a part of which has been quoted. That would be my ruling.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Your Honour having occupied the chair only for the past few days, I will not attempt to appeal from your ruling. I do submit however that hon. members will be placed in a very embarrassing position if it is free to any member to quote from a communication any paragraph he chooses, unless the member whose communication is quoted from is given the right to have the entire communication read. I think Your Honour, by referring to the other rules of the house, will find that this is a privilege enjoyed by hon. members of this house.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I avail myself of this opportunity to congratulate you on your elevation to the very ancient and responsible position which you now hold. Your appointment was the one oasis of unanimity which a parched house has come across in a week of wandering in the desert of controversy. You are not unfitted by temperament and experience for the difficult position which you have assumed, and I am sure that in the discharge of those duties which are incumbent on your office you will receive all the support which the house invariably gives to the fearless and the fair.

It is not my intention to take a very extended part in the debate. I do wish however to refer to a reform which has not been specifically mentioned in the speech from the throne and which I believe would bring great relief to the section of the country which I represent. The farm loan board has come under some criticism. It may be that the officers who are in charge of the operations of that bureau are carrying out the law. It may be that loans from that source are to be made as a private lending corporation would make them. If that is the case, then it is true that little can be said in criticism of the board's administration. But many of us had thought that the farm loan board was an agency to which had been allotted the task of coming to the succour and rescue of a very substantial and important element in our community which had been sadly smitten by the events of the past few years.

I must say that the operations of the farm loan bureau in the province of Quebec have been absolutely futile. The bureau has made practically no loans in the past year, and, instead of refusing categorically to make loans, has pursued a policy of attrition, aggravation and embarrassment to the applicants for relief. It seems to me that if this agency is to fulfil any useful function the spirit which animates those who direct it, and the policy which they pursue, must be modified or radical changes made in the law to permit of a broader and more sympathetic program of operation. In the eastern townships I have discovered that at least one hundred applications from one county have gone without any effective response whatever. The result is that the would-be borrowers have come to the conclusion that in so far as Quebec is concerned the farm loan board is without point, without purpose, and gives no aid whatever to the necessitous farmer. It is true that in Quebec there are disabilities which are inherent in our legal system. By the amendments passed here last session the board was authorized to lend on security which may not be accepted as security in Quebec. We have not in that province the chattel mortgage, and as a consequence, unless and until the legislation of this parliament is implemented by legislation by the Quebec legislature, that particular type of loan may not be made. Whether the provincial legislature will seek to aid the farmers of that province by enacting the necessary legislation remains to be seen but I have observed nothing in the newspapers to indicate that such legislation is on the program of the legislature for the current session.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) announced yesterday that a trade treaty with the United States was now a possibility. I can only say that the border counties of southeastern Quebec, which for many years supplied to a great extent the large centres of New England with dairy products, will greatly welcome any reentry to that market. It is difficult for people who are not familiar with populations that suddenly find all outlet for their product cut off, to realize how greatly has that element suffered. Rivers of milk and cream were dammed back at the border and literally flooded the local market. If the market for butter, milk, cream and meats can be reopened, much will be done to rehabilitate the farming community of southeastern Quebec.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has commended the government on the speech from the throne. Naturally he found somewhat inadequate the program of reform which has been enunciated by the leader of the Conservative party. I suppose it is natural that he should not be entirely satisfied with any program which aims at correcting and maintaining the capitalistic system. There are, however, many who believe that system, despite the many abuses which have crept into it, is useful and one which can be made yet to serve a happy and satisfied population. Until recently many thought the capitalistic system was the one best suited to all civilized peoples and the surest vehicle to a permanent golden age. The vehicle has been ditched, some think because the driver was blind to danger and deaf to warning. The government, without wishing to discard the system, has decided that the driver shall be disciplined and that new rules of the road shall be enacted. I believe everybody who forms part of the Conservative party will hail with pleasure any legislation that will tend to bring relief to many and put an end to the disorders from which we are now suffering. It is plain to everybody that, where there are so many people unemployed, where there are so many plants shut down, an attempt must be made by somebody to regulate the system and to bring order out of disorder. Order is unity arising from the apt arrangement of a plurality of objects. It cannot be left longer to hazard; it cannot be left longer to the so-called forces of nature and much less to unrestrained competition. I believe this session will see many of these ills cured, the old system greatly revived and our country much benefited by these reforms.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne and the addresses made by the leaders of this house upon that subject are so comprehensive in character and so all-embracing in the number and importance of the matters discussed that it is impossible for any man in the space of forty minutes to deal with them as a whole. Therefore I make no apology for confining myself at this time to one phase of the situation as we find it in this country, and to one reference in the speech itself. I refer to the Natural Products Marketing Act, to the attitude of the producers towards that act as far as I have been able to ascertain that attitude, and to the plans which thus far have been brought forward and presented by the producers under its provisions.

Lest I should be challenged as to my familiarity with that subject may I make this brief statement; upon my return home after prorogation, I found interest among the producers so intense that in view of some familiarity on my part with the bill itself I was in receipt of numerous invitations to speak on the subject throughout the west, particularly in Alberta, and I availed myself of as many of those invitations as was possible. In addition I have had the pleasure of being associated with various committees and boards which the producers themselves set up in Alberta and throughout the west for the preparation and presentation of their plans, and I have taken part in their discussion and consideration. At the request of the poultry producers of the three prairie provinces and of the live stock producers of Alberta I have assisted in presenting those plans before the federal board in Ottawa. I make this statement for one purpose and one only, which is to indicate that I have had some opportunity of acquainting myself with the general reaction amongst the producers in respect to this act, and with the work done and the plans in process and in contemplation by the producers under the provisions of the legislation.

Wherever you go throughout Canada to-day among the farming population, and certainly in the province of Alberta and throughout the west generally, you find this question being asked, and asked with increasing interest and increasing vehemence: Why it is that during this and all depressions, when general business is curtailed and meets difficulties through restriction of sales and through falling prices, the agricultural industry and agricultural products have been the greatest sufferers? This question does not embody an argument; it embodies a statement of fact. It is generally recognized that the farming population has suffered more than others not only in the falling of prices but in something which is more important, namely the relative exchange value of their products when translated into terms of those goods and services which they must purchase. It makes comparatively little difference, apart from the payment of debt and interest, whether wheat, for instance is fifty cents a bushel or two dollars; what counts is how many bushels of wheat it takes to purchase a given quantity of machinery, of household effects, of personal necessities. That is the question that is asked. It was in seeking an answer to that question that I believe this act was introduced, and it was because of that question that this intense interest has been aroused amongst the producers themselves. In the opinion of most of those definitely and directly affected, the chief factor which has brought about that differentiation and that lack of parity in exchange value is that during modern times there has been a disposition on the part of most productive enterprises gradually to centralize the control of their operations. The merging of small factories into larger, the centralization of production and control has proceeded. With this I am not quarelling; it may be sound; it may be in the interest of efficiency; at any rate it certainly is the tendency at the present time. But you find this also, that as business becomes centralized, and as the controlling executives of the various industries become fewer and fewer, it becomes more and more simple for them to control by agreement both the production and the merchandising policies of their industries. And because of that they have been able to withstand, in some degree at least, the shock of the depression in relation to their price levels.

Now we turn to agriculture. Whatever the future may bring—and I am no prophet—up to the present time as far as we can ascertain the individually owned and operated farm has been the most efficient form of agriculture; it certainly is the one most in vogue in this country and on the North American continent. With that also I have no quarrel, but based on that fact we find this, that throughout the prairie provinces alone there are scores of thousands of individuals who themselves control not only their production policy but their merchandising policy also. You find also—and again this is not stated as argument but admitted and acknowledged as fact—that when this is the position the basic price of the commodity produced is set not by the strongest man, the man most competent in merchandising, the man who financially is best able to choose the time and manner of his sales, but by the weakest man, the man who is forced to sell and who may be driven to the lowest possible price. The price he will accept controls the basic price of the entire production. Upon the recognition of this fact was based the response of western Canada at least, and the producers of western Canada, to this act. They saw in it a possibility of removing that disability by their own effort and of placing themselves on a parity as far as sales management is concerned with those industries with which they must do business.

The act itself I shall not discuss, for every member of this house is familiar with its terms and provisions. The charge has been made that it is complex, that it is drastic, and that it is an interference by the state with the personal rights and personal business of individuals. Yet if properly understood the principles of this act and of all the plans formulated and brought forward under it are neither complex nor difficult. They embrace one principle, which is this—I will put it in the form of a question: Is there any productive industry in Canada outside of agriculture which is without a sales department as a part of that industry, functioning in the interest of that industry, and disposing of the product of that industry to the distributing trade? I think the answer will be that there is none. Indeed, I think it will be admitted by those engaged in other industries that they could not possibly function without such a sales department. Imagine for a moment every manager of every branch factory of some great manufacturing industry making sales to the trade on his own initiative, without coordination, without executive control, each manager of each unit and branch competing with the other units and managers in the same industry for the sales to be made. The answer would be that such a situation would bring about bankruptcy. Then, when we turn to agriculture we find that there are not a few unit branches, not a few independent managers, but scores of thousands of independent managers each making his own independent sales with results such as I have indicated. That is the principle of the act, and the principle of every plan so far formulated under the act, namely to create for the agricultural industry sales departments which will place that industry upon a parity with others with which it must do business. At the present time I am referring only to agriculture, but I have in mind the fact that the act is possible of broader implications.

Of the plans thus far brought forward I think that the two presented from western Canada—and I say western Canada advisedly because the three prairie provinces are embraced—are perhaps by far the most important, the most comprehensive and most all-embracing. As a matter of fact it is not too much to say that the poultry plan which was the first to be presented on the part of all three prairie provinces was the first plan brought forward under the act taking advantage of all its provisions. I believe when the plan is outlined it will commend itself to the sympathetic understanding of every hon. member. The producers found many difficulties: they were largely unorganized; they were without full knowledge of what the act implied and in many cases they had no basis upon which to commence their operations. In each of those provinces what were known as provisional boards or committees were set up. In some instances the movement was inaugurated by the pools then in existence. In other instances, as happened in Alberta, the Minister of Agriculture in that province was asked after discussion with and in cooperation with the various organizations in the poultry industry to appoint a board which would be representative of the industry as a whole. To this board certain limited functions were allocated, namely to prepare a plan, to organize at least in some degree, to call a meeting of the producers themselves and to lay before that body either for endorsation or rejection the plan they had formulated. This took place and in each case—and I say "in each case" advisedly—the plans were identical in form, because each of the three prairie provinces recognize the fact that their problems are the same and that their organizations must extend beyond the bounds of their own territory. Those plans were presented to the bodies of poultry men, the men and women engaged in the poultry business, and in each case received the almost unanimous endorsation of the assemblies.

Then another step could be taken. Those gatherings authorized the temporary or provisional boards to make the initial presentation of their plans to the federal board in Ottawa, and eventually the plans were presented. They were scanned and examined; they were submitted to the law officers of the crown; they were approved as being sound and practical; they were approved as being within the provisions of the act and therefore legal. Then, referring to the poultry plan, in order that absolute fairness might be observed, a period was set aside for public advertisement during which time anyone in opposition to the plan or anyone who might have an amendment to suggest was invited to present his opposition or amendment before the federal board. At the conclusion of that period another hearing was held at which those opposed were invited to be present and indeed were present. The plans were again discussed in the light of representations made, and after some changes in wording and some slight amendments, were given final approval by the board.

I think hon. members will agree with me that up to that point the utmost fairness and the soundest business practice was followed. Then the question arose as to whether or not those plans did or did not have the real approval of the producers themselves. It followed that the local boards, the bodies responsible for the introduction and presentation of the plans, asked that an opportunity to cast a vote should be given to every producer whose product had come under the operation of the plan. In this arrangement the minister concurred. An order in council was to be passed which would create under the terms of the act what would be known as a registered producer. In the case of the poultry producers every poultryman in the three prairie provinces having a flock of twenty-five birds or more would be included; in other words every producer whose product might be subject to the plan would be affected. The list having been prepared a proclamation would be issued. Every producer within the provinces whose product would be affected would be given ample opportunity to register, thus attaining a threefold objective: first, to designate those whose products would be handled by the boards; second, to provide on the same basis a list of those who would be entitled to vote, and third, in the event of a plan coming into operation, to provide a definite summary or definite detailed statement of the amount of poultry products which might be raised or sold from every farm in western Canada. As I understand it arrangements have now been made under which the producers will be entitled to vote by ballot under the jurisdiction not of an interested party, not of those who have organized the plans, but of a tribunal set up and created by the government, as in every other election or provision which is made for voting. I believe no one may cavil at the fairness of the proposal. Now the promoters themselves have asked that only after a substantial majority of the producers pronounce themselves in favour of the plan shall such plan come into effect.

The live stock men followed a somewhat similar procedure. I might add, however, that in these plans each province will have a local board to be elected and reelected by the producers. The three provinces will then combine to create a sales agency which they shall control, and which shall designate and carry into effect the various sales policies of the producers. As to live stock a similar plan was followed, the minister was asked again to appoint a board of fifteen or seventeen men representative of every phase of the live stock industry. In that connection something happened which might almost be called a minor miracle—of course I am speaking more particularly of Alberta although the plans in Saskatchewan are on identically the same terms. Hon. members who are familiar with the history of the live stock industry know that there has always been a complete lack of understanding between the individual producers, the large ranchers and the small cooperatively organized farmers. I was delighted to see this board, composed of representatives of the largest live stock producers in Alberta or in Canada, representatives of the cooperatives, of the breeders' and feeders' associations, agree unanimously as to the objectives to be achieved and the plans to be effected. This committee devised a plan under which they hope their business may be operated. When that had been done a public meeting was called in the city of Calgary to which something like 160 live stock associations in that province were invited to send delegates. There were present some two hundred delegates representing about 140 organizations and about thirty or forty of the largest individual ranchers, and by a vote of 195 to 5 they approved of the plan and empowered the provisional committee to present that plan before the federal board. That will indicate, Mr. Speaker, the steps which have been taken and the unanimity which has prevailed throughout those industries in respect of this undertaking.

These producers have in mind certain objectives, which are very clearly defined. They may be stated in a sentence: to create in that department of the industry a sales department which for the first time will function in the interests of the industry, and give the producers an effective voice in the sale and in the manner of the sale of their products.

It has been suggested that this is wholly unnecessary, that the present system, with a little control, a little checking, a little renovating, will amply serve its purpose. May I place before the house one illustration of the situation as it exists?—for I shall not labour the point. It is an illustration that is familiar to every member of this house and to every producer in Canada. Thirty-five years ago as a young man I was in the business of raising cattle and I sold my cattle, as everyone did in those days, on the one basis of $30 a head for three-year old steers on the hoof, and we sold them by the bunch. That was the basic price which was graded down for females and small stuff. A short time ago one of my neighbours who has been raising that class of beef cattle for forty-five years made a sale, and he netted $15 for three-year old steers of the same class and quality that thirty-five years ago brought $30. So in thirty-five years the price of that product has fallen by one-half, while in the same time the cost of producing these animals has doubled. Thirty-five years ago we raised our stock on the open range and to-day they are raised upon privately owned and municipally taxed land, and, as well, the price of many of the things that we must purchase from our proceeds has greatly risen.

I think the house and the country will perceive at once that no industry can carry on under those conditions, and that for us to remain in our present position is intolerable and impossible. The conditions in part, of course, are beyond our control, but there is a part that we believe is within our control, within the control of the producers themselves. They propose by their plans to eliminate the factor by which those purchasing our products are able to bid one against the other, gradually beating the price down until finally the weakest man accepts the lowest price, which is then set as the market price for the entire product.

We speak of the law of supply and demand, and I will admit at once that inherently and inevitably the law of supply and demand must function. But does it function? I have come to this conclusion, as have those for whom I speak, that the law of supply and demand can function only as between parties of equal strength. It cannot function as between organized purchasers on the one hand and unorganized agriculture on the other, no more than it can function as between organized employers in industry and unorganized labour; hence the rise and growing strength of trade unions. If the law of supply and demand is to function it is necessary that there be some parity of bargaining power between the two parties who are doing business together.

As I have stated, the purpose and objective of the plans of which I have spoken is to create this sales department. We go a little further in these plans than voluntary co-operation of industry itself has gone. On the one hand these producers and the producers' boards have the power of licensing the trades which are dealing in their products, and anyone who is familiar with the trade dealing with poultry and live stock is aware of this, that attached to that trade and an incubus upon it is what is known as the bootlegging section, those unethical operators who evade all laws, federal and provincial, and who will act in any way which may suit their purposes which are to bring to themselves greater profit —operators who are the curse of the trade and of those dealing with the trade. Only through some power of licensing can we confine the handling of our products to those who are legitimately engaged in the business and carrying on the business in an ethical way for the advantage of producer and consumer. So licensing is necessary.

On the other end of the scale, we find that principle which is commonly referred to as that of compulsion. Compulsion, yes, in a degree; that is to say, the power of a substantial majority of any branch of the agricultural industry to lay down and to enforce the methods and regulations and practices under which their sales shall be made.

May I call this to your attention, Mr. Speaker—and it is something which is overlooked by many who are opposed to this legislation and to these plans: Compulsion is not brought into effect or exercised by governments or by government officials or by the state or by anyone save the majority of those who are engaged in that same line of industry; and who else has a better right? It is the expansion into the field of farm marketing of the democratic principle which is accepted in almost every field of human endeavour, namely, the right of a majority to lay down the rules under which society shall be governed, and to force, if necessary, the minority to obey those rules. I will ask you, Mr. Speaker, what development could ever have taken place, what organizations could have been achieved under civilization—could even civilization itself been brought about—had not that rule been applied?

Democracy does not mean the unrestricted right of the individual to do as he likes. Democracy, I say again, implies the right of a majority within a community in any country and in any industry to lay down the rules and regulations under which that industry shall function. And this compulsion, so called, can be exercised only in the interests of the producers themselves, of those engaged in that particular industry; because anything which will redound to the benefit of the great majority must inevitably redound to the benefit of all. All sell on equal terms, all sell in the same markets, all are affected by the same conditions, and all receive the same advantages. So much for that.

The next thing to which I should like to call your attention, sir, is a question which has been discussed very widely throughout this country, namely, the capacity of the producer to handle and administer his own business on so gigantic a scale. Those who are opposed to this plan—I do not mean politically opposed; I am speaking now of those who are economically opposed because their interests may be affected deleteriously, those who have been battening upon and profiting from the farming industry—these people question the administrative ability of the farmer himself to handle this business. They say in effect that all the experience, all the wisdom and knowledge of market conditions are to be found in the ranks of those who are at present carrying on that business; that is, in the ranks of those who are doing the packing and processing and dealing in these various products. They have intimated that during all these years they have been acting in the interests of the producer. They have been functioning as the producers' sales agents, and they say that the interests and advantage of the producer have been their chief motive. To that I simply answer that you can judge the efficiency of men only by the results which they have achieved, and if those at present engaged in this business have been acting to the best of their ability in the interests of the producer, then, when under their administration we see the conditions which have been brought about and which are familiar to everyone here, conditions which are depressing and ruining the agricultural industry, I can only say, Mr. Speaker, that the producers of Canada are not unduly impressed by their assumption of efficiency, and they feel that a few years more of that kind of efficiency will see the live stock and poultry producers put out of business. They are, therefore, prepared to take over that responsibility. They believe, and they have so stated, that the only men really familiar with the problem are those who live with it; that the only men genuinely interested in the solution of the problem are those whom it affects; that the only men who can really understand and put into effect beneficial policies are those in whose interests such policies shall be administered and those who have lived with and understood those problems and suffered from a lack of their solution. They are prepared, therefore, to put these remedial policies into effect.

May I say also that two of our cattle men came down to Ottawa, representing the live stock producers, in order to present their plans. They included the largest single producer in Alberta—and when I say in Alberta that means in Canada—a rancher who runs about 12,000 head of stock. At present he is the chairman of our board. With him was the manager of the largest and most successful cooperative in our province dealing in live stock products. Those men came into contact with some of the leading men in this city, men in the highest branches of the civil service, men in government and business circles, and everyone who met them formed the impression that they were men competent to administer any business with which they were familiar, men competent to deal with, to handle and to control their own affairs. Indeed it is not too much to say that any man who has carried on the live stock industry for thirty-five years without going absolutely bankrupt is a business man of very high efficiency indeed, and is quite competent to deal with any further problems in respect of his own industry. That, at least, is the opinion of the producers, themselves, both of live stock and poultry.

Naturally I have discussed with those boards what their policies and objectives should be. I find that, with unanimous voice, they fully realize the limitations placed upon them. They realize that the final effective factor in connection with prices received is the ability and willingness of the consumer to buy and consume their goods. Their objective is not to sell a part of their product at a high price and restrict consumption, but to sell all their products at a reasonable price. Their objective is not to enhance the price to the consumer, but to eliminate the chaos and the losses incident to the manner in which their business is now carried on; to eliminate many of the charges and so-called services; to eliminate or control many of the exorbitant profits, and to secure for the producer his reasonable and legitimate share of the consumers' dollar.

But may I suggest this to you, Mr. Speaker. Assuming that this plan did raise the prices of some commodities to the consumer, as perhaps it might; I do not know, but supposing it did; I am going to ask any man in this house who is familiar with labour conditions to say when labour in this country was in the best position. Was it during the time the farmers were receiving little or nothing for their products, or was it during those periods when the farmers were receiving fair prices and therefore were in a position to buy the products of their toil? I ask any labour man or any business man; I think anyone will say, if he is an honest man—and most of us are—that the country is always more prosperous, wages are always more satisfactory and work is always more plentiful when the farmer is receiving a fair remuneration. That is all they anticipate; that is their objective; that is all they are asking. That is the purpose of their organization.

I think there is no man in this country who is familiar with conditions, no business man, no producer of farm or other products, no citizen of Canada and above all no member of this parliament who would not welcome and support anything which, legitimately and properly put into effect, would improve the situation of the agriculturist. I think it is recognized as one of the outstanding facts of this time that any policy, sound in principle, properly administered, which would improve that position and raise that standard is one which should merit the support and cooperation of everyone. But I am going to ask this further question; if I repeat it, it is because of its importance. Who is the man best qualified to say what measures will bring about that situation? It is the producer himself, and under the terms of every plan suggested it is only if the majority of the producers have come to that opinion as their confirmed and settled belief that those plans will become operative. I would ask every man who is a good citizen—and that embraces every member here—to leave it to the producers, to give them every encouragement to cooperate and organize and to support them if those producers come to the confirmed opinion. I think that is not too much to ask.

Other questions, of course, arise in connection with the details of such plans, and care is being taken in that regard by those who have drawn up and presented them, since they all are producers. No one save a legitimate producer may have a place on the board; every member has had years of experience in the business. They know the intricacies of the trade, and plans are carefully drawn in detail to meet the minor difficulties which might arise. For example, in connection with poultry care has been taken that nothing shall interfere with the mutually beneficial trade carried on between the producer and the individual consumer, that sale of poultry, eggs and so forth which is made directly by the producer to the consumer. It is true that those carrying on such trade must secure a permit from the board, a permit which costs nothing and which, in the words of the plan, may not be unreasonably withheld. Anyone familiar with the business will recognize the necessity for that permit system, because without it, under the guise of selling directly to the consumer the bootlegging trade would find its source of supply. In connection with breeding, hatching, incubating and all that sort of thing, all the details are taken care of and the proper exemptions made. The purpose is not to interfere with that business; the purpose—and these plans specifically set out that purpose—is to deal with and control the product which comes on the commercial market, that and no more.

In connection with poultry, if these plans come into operation the poultry producers may reasonably anticipate real success, for the three prairie provinces provide the entire surplus in Canada for interprovincial and export trade so far as poultry and poultry products are concerned. Other provinces, large producers, consume more than they produce and must import, and the total surplus is found in those three provinces. That augurs well for success if these three provinces coordinate their efforts.

In connection with live stock the situation is somewhat more complex, but I am sure that if these plans fructuate and achieve success, even if it is only a modicum of the results which reasonably might be anticipated, you will find throughout Canada a gradual movement towards that organization until, for the first time, we will have a national policy in dealing with live stock, which this nation has lacked in the past and the want of which has been so deleterious to our national wellbeing.

Someone asked about wheat. I am not discussing wheat, which, with its enormous sales on the world market, stands in a different position to that of any other farm product. I am speaking of live stock, of poultry and of dairy products, the organization of which will follow the organization of the first two commodities if they succeed. I am speaking of those commodities in which, in each case, you will find from ninety-five per cent to ninety-eight per cent of the entire product sold within Canada. I should like to ask this question: Why should the Canadian market be demoralized and brought to chaos; why should Canadian farmers be ruined in connection with ninety-five per cent of their market for the sake of the five per cent exported? Our producers will have to extend their export trade. They purpose, through their own organization and their own efforts, to put forth various improvements as to grading standards and quality, and as to assurance to the customer, which is lacking at present, that when he pays for a number one article he can be sure of receiving that article. No government law or regulation so far has been able to bring about that result.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to appeal to this house and to the country to give sympathetic consideration to the efforts of those producers who, under the authority of law, now for the first time are striving to bring themselves out of their difficulties and place themselves upon an equality with other industries, and to make a real contribution to the welfare of Canada. I need not perhaps appeal to the producers to consult their own best interests, not to listen exclusively to those in the trade benefiting by the troubles, benefiting by the chaos, who are the instigators and promoters of every petition which so far I have read and which has been presented to the producers for their signatures against the plan. I suggest that they study the plan on its own merits, make up their own minds, and vote in their own interests.

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): In view of the many reforms suggested in the speech from the throne and of my very great interest in most of them, extending over many years, I feel that I should take some time to discuss my reaction to them. It is often said that a man cannot be a good debater unless he has come to the conclusion that those opposed to him are a gang of scoundrels. Now I am not going to take that attitude; I am going to take what I consider to be a positive attitude towards these many reforms, the attitude of men who have been in the movement to which I have had the honour to belong almost since my birth. That will be my approach this evening.

I do not intend to discuss the trade policies either of this government or of other governments that come into contact with it. I believe that we are just about emerging from that debauch called economic nationalism which has characterized the various countries of the world, and all the nations are coming to the realization now of its utter futility and are moving in the direction of saner trade policies one with another. I am not going to discuss the problems of the farm, because there are in this house men who are much more capable of doing so than I am. I was greatly interested in the observations made by those who have preceded me in this debate on the manner in which the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) used the radio quite recently.

Frankly, I believe the Prime Minister's position was absolutely sound, and I think it would be well if all the leaders of the respective avenues of thought within the orbit of this parliament met their constituents, if I might say so, in a form of shadow boxing, as the leader of the opposition humorously described it, and discussed with them the problems of the country and the way in which they propose to deal with them. But I do not think that this policy should be predicated upon the ability of any party leader or group to finance such an undertaking. I believe it comes expressly within the practical policy of the government of this country to provide that it should be done purely as a public service. It seems to me that the leader of every political party in this house should be given that opportunity and should not be barred because of lack of financial resources. It should be looked upon as a service rendered to the state in approaching the problems of the country. It would be an advance in the public education of the country. Such a policy, I submit, should be based upon an appeal to reason.

I do not think we have sufficiently caught the vision of the possibilities of the radio in the political life of this dominion. After all, the basic problems of government are comparatively simple. While in their incidentals they may be complicated, I do not believe it is beyond the intelligence of the average Canadian to understand them provided they are put to him in plain, everyday English. And after all the members of this House of Commons are not superintellects superimposed on the body politic but just plain, everyday human beings like the people outside, except that through good luck or otherwise they have been placed in the position of directing the legislative destiny of the nation in the best interests of the people as a whole. In a policy of broadcasting such as I suggest we should be able to avoid the alibi, if I might say so, of blaming the newspaper men for being misquoted; the citizens of the country would be their own newspaper men.

To-day and yesterday as well we have heard a good deal of talk about platforms. I think it is generally conceded that platforms are usually constructed to get in on, and I do not believe that all the virtues or all of the vices are incorporated in any one political party; we are all more or less guilty, and we all more or less wake up to the fact that the reality rarely matches the dream. And of course this goes for all revenues of life.

Political platforms, I sometimes think, are rather like courtship; they are merely the bait which we put on the hook to get the prize; and of course most members of this house have lived through that practical experience, although the leaders of the older political parties have not had the experience. It is a fair observation to make however that they have been at any rate fairly sucessful so far as the political field is concerned. Speaking of courtship, the man is not always to blame; he is pressed by the women folk; and in political life the political parties are not always to blame, because they are pressed by their constituents.

I think it would be well to give the political platforms of both the older parties. This has not been done in this house this session and I will start with the 1919 platform of the Liberal party. That platform declared for:

Limiting hours of work to an eight hour day and forty-eight hour week, along with a weekly rest of at least twenty-four hours;

Abolition of child labour and the imposition of limitation of the labour of young persons to assure their proper education and physical development;

Abolition of sweatshops by setting legal standards for conditions of labour which should have due regard for the equitable economic treatment of all workers;

Industrial control to safeguard workers' interests and shape industrial policies;

An adequate insurance against unemployment, sickness, dependence in old age and other disabilities;

Steps to overcome questions of jurisdiction between the dominion and the provinces on these matters;

Government action to deal with the high cost of living and prevent profiteering;

Payment of a wage sufficient to maintain an adequate standard of life;

The right of association for all lawful purposes for both employees and employers;

That labour shall not be regarded merely as a commodity or article of commerce;

Enforcement of laws and regulations for the protection of the employed, etc.

Then we have the Conservative platform, enunciated in 1927 at Winnipeg. It dealt with:

Limitation of hours of work to an eight hour day and forty-eight hour week, and a weekly rest day of at least twenty-four hours;

Abolition of child labour and limitation of the labour of young persons;

Fixing of conditions of labour with due regard to the equitable economic treatment of all workers;

Encouragement of industries that afford reasonable continuity of employment;

Abolition of child labour by preventing the working of children under sixten years of age;

Social legislation designed to control human life and health and to relieve distress during periods of unemployment, sickness and old age.

Other parts of their platform dealt with the development of labour exchanges, or employment offices as we call them; greater cooperation between governments, capital and labour, and consultation with representatives of employers and employees on matters affecting both parties in common.

As I said before, these platforms achieved their purpose. They aroused the imagination of the working people of the dominion, making it possible for the different parties to get into power. I think tribute should also be paid at this time to the Labour group in this corner of the house and their associates for pressing for these measures at a time when they were not so popular as at present. There must be a radical or a progressive driving force within any legislative body if it is to move forward. I believe that the Labour group in this corner has made a distinct contribution to the life of this dominion by the attitude it has taken towards public measures that have been adopted from time to time by the predominant political parties. It is a responsibility that has to be taken by all forward-looking individuals. The predominant parties naturally have their ears to the ground. They use their best judgment to catch the expression of the desires and needs of the people, and to launch suitable measures when the opportune time comes. The records of this House of Commons are full of the efforts of the Labour group to press forward what they considered the very necessary policies that are to-day incorporated in the speech from the throne.

Then of course tribute must be paid to outside organizations that have made possible the move towards these policies, such organizations as the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada. I have before me a pamphlet showing that as long ago as 1882 reforms similar to those incorporated in the speech from the throne were embodied in the policies of that organization. Then of course other labour and progressive organizations have helped to make possible this approach. I think it is fair to say that at the moment we have a paradox in the political life of this country. It is customary for political parties to die in harness, or, to use another figure of speech, of dry rot; I think that is a fair observation to make. The opposition generally gets into power by trading on the disabilities and weaknesses of the party in power. There is nothing new about that; we have seen it in countries quite close to us, and in other parts of the British dominions. I have no qualms in saying that I have come definitely to the opinion, having taken some part in the movements of the working people of this dominion, that we do not care who does it so long as it is done. We must not miss the opportunity; if this is the psychological moment when the foundation stone-merely the foundation stone—of these reforms is to be laid, then we should avail ourselves of it. If the government of the day can be the instrument of policy for the launching of these reforms, God speed them! That is why the addresses of the Prime Minister created such a profound effect upon the Canadian people; not because his suggestions were new, or came through some divine vision, but because of their source and the time at which they were enunciated. The Prime Minister said very definitely—perhaps it is a bad habit for men in public life to say these things too definitely; we have seen that in the last couple of days—that the old order is gone never to return; that the time for reform and government control and regulation has come. He said, I gave a promise in 1930 to end unemployment, and by that I stand." He will have to get a move on. Then to give effect to this program he enunciated the following policy:

Establishment throughout Canada of a uniform wage and a uniform maximum working week;

Abolition of child labour and sweatshop conditions;

Creation of a permanent system of sound and scientific unemployment insurance and abolition of the dole;

Present obsolete Old Age Pensions Act to be replaced by a new, scientific scheme of old age pensions;

Health, accident and sickness insurance to be developed;

Further taxation of non-producers who derive their incomes from securities, mortgages and other wages of money;

Protection against exploitation of producers by monopolistic purchasers and certain types of middlemen and distributors who are "economic parasites";

For consultation with other groups and the establishment of a national economic council.

What has been the reaction to the speeches of the Prime Minister? Some people say that the promises and the projected policy of the leader of the government stand in the same relationship to his political program as those of 1930. Some say that the policies enunciated smack of fascism, some say they are bolshevism, and one of the ministers of one of our provincial governments said they are pure Marxism. I have had some experience among radical thinkers in this country and in the old land and can count on my fingers the number of men who have been able to wade through the three volumes of Marx. Frankly I believe that these last observations were merely a smoke screen to frustrate the possibility of forward movement by this House of Commons. I speak now of all the political parties; because the government has enunciated its policy, the leader of the opposition has agreed with him in connection with these suggested measures, and I am doing the same thing, so it seems we are almost in line for a national government. I am not making that as a suggestion, but merely as an observation. There is not a great deal to fight about, on the principles at least.

The other day I was reading the autobiography of Philip Snowden. I do not often quote from books in the House of Commons, but after the nasty names that have been given to the Prime Minister, it might be just as well to read this. This happened before Philip fell from grace; I am speaking of the time when he fell from grace from the viewpoint of many of the active Labour lights in the old country. This was before he went to the great beyond in the House of Lords; it was when he was a real radical in Great Britain, and it just shows how hard the way of the reformer is. I quote:

The views on the budget—

This is speaking of the historic budget of Lloyd George of some years ago when some of the reforms we have in mind to-day were introduced in the British House of Commons.

The views on the budget expressed in the lobby after Mr. Lloyd George sat down were very diverse. The Labour party welcomed the budget as the first real effort the government had made to grapple with the problem of wealth and poverty. Many Liberal members did not conceal their dismay at the prospect opened up by Mr. Lloyd George's first essay in finance.

That reads pretty true in connection with some of my friends on the other side—I am not speaking of members of the house—if the newspapers are to be believed.

One Liberal member, who considered the budget from the point of view of how it was going to touch his pocket, declared grimly: "He will never introduce another budget! His reputation is gone."

No budget in prewar days ever exposed so many vulnerable points of attack. It was bound to excite the bitter opposition of a large number of vested interests. The opposition of the income taxpayers would be incurred by the proposed increase in the tax.

The liquor interests would fight the increase in the licence duties to the utmost of their powers. One brewer asserted that these increased licences would mean ruin to half the brewers of the country!

They are still doing pretty well over there.

The city was up in arms against the increases in the stamp duties, and, of course, the landed interests were infuriated by the proposed land taxes. Next morning the press took a party view of the budget. It was denounced in the Tory newspapers without reserve under such headings as "the Red Flag Budget."

That sounds familiar.

The Liberal newspapers in their commendation of the budget varied according to the degree of their radicalism. One thing everybody agreed upon, that the budget was so controversial that it was doubtful if it would be carried without modifications.

We might almost imagine this written in the month of January in the year of Our Lord 1935.

Mr. COOTE: What was the date of that?

Mr. MITCHELL: That was in 1911.

The Labour party gave a warm welcome to the budget, and their general support to it was assured. We regarded it as chiefly noteworthy because it was largely based on the idea that socially created wealth must contribute more generously to national purposes.

I have always maintained that men are the instruments of policies and not policies the instruments of men. Frankly, I believe Lloyd George will go down in the history of the British commonwealth as one of its greatest statesmen in the last fifty years. He practically redistributed the wealth of Great Britain through the instrumentality of the social insurances without any of the consequences that to-day are visible in many of the countries of Europe. What I like about him is that he did things; he moved. I know one classic example of a prime minister of Great Britain who, in my judgment, attained that office on the basis of his good looks and poetry. When he got the instrument of policy in his hands he did not know what to do with it and he had to go over to the Tories to help him out. One does not need any imagination to know who that was. I have always maintained that you cannot justify inefficiency or lack of action on the basis of good intentions.

I want to say this also very frankly to the government, that if for some reason this might be merely the instrument of getting into power again, they are tampering with the very democratic institutions of this country. The working people and farmers of the dominion have been very patient under the adverse circumstances through which they have passed, because after all is said and done they were not responsible for the depression; they were not consulted about it. Those who thought the stacks of paper they had in 1928 represented real wealth were, of course, badly disappointed. As I have said before, the inevitable windstorm came along and blew it out on to the street. That was inevitable, because unless the operatives in our industrial and agricultural life can buy back the products of their labour, I do not care what policy any government initiates, we are bound to pass through periods of very severe depressions such as we are passing through at the moment. After all, the real wealth of this and every other country can be expressed only in the ability of its people to engage in productive labour to such an extent and of such a character as to permit them to buy back the products of their labour.

I cannot at this time pursue a discussion of the various proposed measures except to say that while at the moment I am agreeing with them in principle, of course I reserve the right to criticize the details. I am not unmindful of the tribulations that surrounded the development of unemployment insurance in Great Britain and, for that matter, in every other country in which it has been established. Those who in their unguarded moments think unemployment insurance is a solution of the unemployment problem are just kidding themselves, and we might as well be frank about the matter. But I believe it is a constructive policy to meet the problem of unemployment, to meet the very difficult situation in which the municipalities find themselves at the moment, the end of which has not of course yet been reached. Whatever system exists, some insurance against the ravages of unemployment is necessary, because change in its very essence under any system of government creates an unemployment problem. Last year when I was in Great Britain they celebrated the twenty-first anniversary of the doctrine of social insurance by a dinner given to Mr. Lloyd George at which were represented the leaders of all political thought in Great Britain. It is necessary sometimes to say these things in view of the enthusiasm that has been developed in connection with certain forms of legislation, and I might point out that the British act has since its first passage undergone twenty-eight major operations. They have been moving in the direction of trial and error in their own way to make the legislation more nearly fit the needs of that country. I say this because I believe we must not get ourselves into the mental condition that because we are setting in motion these policies, the very grave question of unemployment may be shelved and dismissed from the minds of the members of this house and other governmental institutions in this country. Some means must be found whereby we can tie up production to consumption; some means must be found whereby we can put a suit on a man's back and permit him to work and earn the necessary money to pay for it without its being an act of charity.

Comment has been made to the effect that the British North America Act stands in the way of many of these suggested policies. If such action is necessary I believe it is the duty of this government to seek the cooperation of the provincial governments. I hold the view that it is the patriotic duty—and I do not often use that word—of all governments in Canada to lend their aid towards bringing the British North America Act to the point where it may meet the requirements of the present century. I have no criticism to make of the framers of the act. They acted in the light of conditions existing at that time and possessing only that limited vision possible to mortal humans. They could not have contemplated the tremendous developments that have taken place in transportation, communication, industrialization and agriculture. To those who stand in the way of any movement towards amendment of the act I should like to say that after all is said and done it was passed for the benefit of the Canadian people; it was passed to meet their everyday needs and to make possible the legislative functions of government. With the changes in the functions of governments it is inevitable that there must be changes in our constitution. Among people from one end of Canada to the other the opinion is crystallized to the point where they believe one of the greatest requirements is the amending of the act.

I believe it was the leader of the opposition who raised the discussion concerning the Senate. I am making reference to all these points because I believe one would do better to put his finger on the spot where the sand may be put into the machinery. The right hon. gentleman has said that we have a Tory Senate. If I gather anything from the temper of the Canadian people, and if it is the policy of the Senate to put sand into the machinery, then we will have to reform the Senate. The time has long since passed when the Senate should be used as unemployment insurance for many of those in political life. I am of the opinion that anybody charged with preparing legislation should be responsible to our people. This has been a question of wide discussion for many years; if I remember correctly both political parties have discussed it sympathetically. I am not making these observations in a spirit of criticism of members of the Senate, because I believe if they stand in the way of reform there will be plenty of time to do that.

I see that the time allotted to me has almost expired. In conclusion I should like to make one or two observations. It has taken me twenty-five years to learn some things; that is one of the tragedies of life. It takes us a long time to learn anything, and then we pass out of the picture and our children have to learn all over again.

Mr. BOURASSA: Unless you write a book.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, unless you write a book. I remember a very good Liberal once saying to me, "Humphrey, never write a book." I do not think I ever will. I am not unmindful of the part played in the history of this dominion by legislative bodies, nor do I forget the real progress which has been made since I came to this country about a generation ago. I want to say to the labour men and farmers of Canada that there is no substitution for organization among those engaged in their occupation. To the working people I say there is no substitution for a free trade union. Lawyers and doctors learned that many years ago. If the Canadian people think that by giving three cheers at a political meeting their problems may be ended, they are only fooling themselves. It is essential that people vitally interested in the passing of certain legislation should have some form of organization capable of speaking for them, one which can take care of the changes found necessary to protect their interests. No matter how good the intentions of the government may be, it is quite necessary that through organizations interested parties attend to their own well being and destiny. We have seen that on many occasions. I believe the leader of the opposition referred to the vocational education bill; if some organization had been interested in carrying out the policies laid down in that legislation, something might have been done, and that applies to all legislation.

I should like to state that I will support the proposed reforms so long as they are in conformity with the opinions I have long held. And may I add that I would be most unfair if I failed to congratulate the government upon at least attempting to lay the foundation stone of reforms which have been successfully carried out in other sections of the British commonwealth

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, while agreeing entirely and unreservedly with the suggestion to shorten the debate, made by the leader of the opposition, may I be pardoned if for a few moments I take the time of the house? Once more the views I wish to express are not those of any party or group in the chamber, but they are held by a number of people, difficult to count and living in all parts of the country, who consider me as their representative.

I do not purpose entering into a consideration of the various subjects contained in the speech from the throne. When they appear before us in the form of bills I shall register my votes and perhaps express my opinions in connection with them. The idea of speaking to-night has been suggested to me not so much through arguments urged in this debate as by the impression created on my mind by the two remarkable addresses of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) respectively. That impression I propose to state frankly to them and to their friends; not that any feeling I may have is of any importance, but because I sincerely believe that my reaction is that of a large number of people throughout the country, whether they belong to one party or the other, or to no party at all.

I have listened to the whole speech of the leader of the opposition, and to part of that of the Prime Minister, and I propose to read carefully to-morrow the rest of it. As to my friend the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group I unfortunately did not have the pleasure of hearing him, but I shall read his speech also. Only, a little while after he had taken his seat, a friend of mine, not belonging to his group, told me: "Woodsworth has spoken and has been very reasonable," which did not surprise me. Seeing that the leader of the government is rapidly preparing for the evolution of the Tory party towards socialism and that the leader of the Liberal party is inviting the leader of the Tory party to join his ranks in order to enhance Tory socialism, I suppose my friend to my left (Mr. Woodsworth) is preparing to lead the remaining Conservative forces of Canada; all of which shows that political principles and programs are very changeable things indeed. But let us leave that for the time being.

May I say, first, that I am a sincere and personal friend of both leaders? I have known both for many years. I really believe that I know them more intimately perhaps than many of their followers. For them both I have an equal sympathy and admiration. I have known the leaders of parliament and of government in this country for forty years. As a boy I assisted in the galleries of the old parliament to the last encounter between Sir John A. Macdonald and the then new leader of the Liberal party, Mr. Laurier. In the years following, as a member of the house, I have been a witness to the debates led by Laurier on the one side and Tupper on the other, and then Borden and the able men accompanying him. After having left parliament I still followed the course of men and things pretty closely. Now I say with all sincerity that, although Macdonald and Laurier may stand high above the other statesmen we have had in this confederation since its inception, we have not possessed two abler men, two men more sincere in their respective ideas and policies, or two men more capable of giving service to their country, than the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition. I believe equally in their sincerity; but I must tell both of them and their followers quite frankly that the number of people who are ceasing to believe in the sincerity of their leaders and of public men generally is fast increasing. If the debates that are going to take place in this house, as a preface to the debates that will take place before the nation in the next few months, are to be carried on in the same manner, with the same bitterness, with the same attacks and counter-attacks between the leaders and followers of both parties, the respect of the nation for its leaders and the belief of all sincere Liberals, Conservatives and independents in the sincerity of party leaders will fast diminish.

I have not heard by radio the five speeches which the Prime Minister delivered preceding the session. I never listen to the radio; I have none. But I have read those speeches most carefully. I have annotated them for my own use and benefit; and I am free to admit now what I will repeat elsewhere, if necessary, that they contain much that is good, many suggestions which I hope will be adopted by parliament, whatever party is in power, and carried out for the benefit of the people of Canada.

It has been suggested that the Prime Minister is not sincere and that this is only pre-electoral talk. I hold no brief for the Prime Minister. I am glad for five minutes that he is not here. I am not a follower of his. I have fought his policies in the past; but when I hear his sincerity being challenged I feel bound to protest. Not only do I believe, but I know that he is sincere. He may have been mistaken in having waited so long to suggest these reforms. Some of them stand in dire contrast to the policies of his party and his own policies in the past; but I know that these thoughts have been in his mind for months and for years; and when it is suggested all over the country that the Prime Minister is a selfish financier, associated with St. James street, and that this is only a smoke screen to prevent other parties from bringing in true social reforms, I know it is untrue. I know that the pontiffs in the financial circles of Montreal and elsewhere dread the effective power of R. B. Bennett, if I may be pardoned for naming him, more than that of any other man.

But that being said, I am bound to say that, after reading his speeches, I deeply deplored the observations made by the Prime Minister against the leader of the opposition. He has spoiled his own argumentation. He has diminished himself and his policy; and moreover he has been unfair to an opponent who is equally worthy of respect with himself. The leader of the opposition I have known for a longer time than the Prime Minister. With some of his policies, I have both agreed and disagreed. As to his sincerity in the views which he held long before he was a member of the house, when he was the youngest official in the service of this country, I know how sincerely bent he was in bringing about reforms in the social and economic structure of this country. Much laughter has been raised in this house because the leader of the opposition said: "Nineteen years ago I wrote a book." I suppose the joke will go on. No wonder. If a Conservative had said the same thing—

Mr. McINTOSH: It takes a real man to write a good book.

Mr. BOURASSA: Pardon me if I give it in my own way—my Liberal friends would have exploded with laughter, just as the Tories did when the leader of the opposition said that. Will that little and cheap joke take with the people of Canada? Maybe. We are the worthy representatives of a young and childish nation that makes much noise over very little thinking. It is but too unfortunate that we have so few men in the service of the nation who have had the intelligence and the energy, the knowledge and the proper study to write books from which, from whatever source they come, we could derive some useful information. There are names standing in the annals of all nations, of people who never did anything but write books, and some of them only one book; yet from that one book flowed rivers of thought which inspired men of action. Great matters of policy, national or international, social or economic, are attributed by the casual reader of history to this politician or that, to this business man or that great captain of industry; but the original thought creating those reforms will be found, by those at least who know how to read, in some one book or perhaps in some speech.

Not only that; not only has the leader of the opposition done service to the country by writing that book. By his acts, first, as a humble servant of the crown, then, later on, as a member of his party and as leader of the government, he has done many things in conformity with his principles. The Conservative party would lose nothing of the credit due them on account of the mental energy, the true and proven patriotism of their leader and, I say without hesitation, his disinterestedness—and I insist on the word because of the prejudices that have been broadcast from Cape Breton to British Columbia against what is perhaps the most admirable quality of that man—by admitting that the leader of the Liberal party is also a good Canadian who has done service to his country.

That is what I have had in my heart, because I love both of them; but I have had another thought in mind also. The more I travel and come in contact with people of all races and creeds in this country, the more I am convinced that what I am now going to say, as next to the dean of this house, is a bit of useful and friendly advice to all hon. members. We are on the eve of a general election. Within a few months this country will be flooded with oratory, over the radio, with articles in newspapers and speeches of various kinds on all the platforms of this country. It will be called "appealing to the reason of the people," but hon. gentlemen must admit that the average politician—and I have committed this sin long enough myself to confess it—does not appeal to reason. He usually appeals to sentiment and interest, and unfortunately these two chords are much more responsive than reason, conscience or intelligence, even in the triumph of democracy which is very often the triumph of stupid mobocracy. Well, what I have to say to my Liberal friends is that they have the chance of their lives to do their country a service which perhaps their party has not been able to do before. You know you are going to win this election.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOURASSA: Of course; it would be ridiculous not to admit it. You know you are going to sweep the country. As a personal friend of the leader of the opposition I said to him at the end of last session; "My dear friend, I am praying to God that you do not come back with too big a majority!"

Therefore what reason could you have, from even the smallest, narrowest or basest point of view, to carry on a campaign of slander, of bitter attacks against Bennett, Cahan, or this one or that one? I would go further, or perhaps lower down: what interest would you have in carrying the election in the same way that your opponents carried the election five years ago? The main reason which will bring about the defeat of the Conservative party will not be the policy of the government. On the whole I think their policy has been fairly good. I will go further: because of the mental power, the energy, the persistency and, I repeat, the personal disinterestedness of the Prime Minister, the policy has been better than it would have been if the government had been led by an ordinary man; and it has not been as bad as it could have been, having regard to the past record and principles of the Tory party. So I repeat the question; why will they be snowed under this summer? It will not be because of their policy. It will be because there are thousands and hundreds of thousands of people in this country who will not listen to argument or reason; they will simply say; "We trusted the Tories in 1930. They deceived us. We do not trust them any more." That will determine the votes of thousands of men and women all over the country. Not only will the Liberals who voted for the Tory candidates five years ago return to the fold; many Conservatives will do the same thing in connection with this government that many Liberals did in connection with the Liberal government in 1930.

I am sorry for that, in a sense. I hope I will have nothing to do with the election, that I will be altogether out of the scrap. My sincere wish for the welfare of the country would be that one party or the other, it does not matter to me which, should be returned with a very small majority and that a sufficient number of members should be returned in this corner to hold the balance. I do not say they should blackmail the government. There ought to be enough intelligent men among them to realize that a blackmailing minority may gain something immediately, in one way or another, but that it soon loses the confidence of the people. If they also consider the possibility of one or two of their leaders becoming associated with the reigning party, either by going into the cabinet or becoming members of the Senate, as happened to two or three of the past leaders of the Progressive party, they will soon realize why, having come to this parliament some 69 in number in 1921, they dwindled down to the number returned at the last election.

As an old man, an old Canadian and, may I say, as a Christian, my appeal to all my colleagues is this: Let us resolve now to carry on this campaign, first in this house and later throughout the country, in a broad spirit of citizenship and Christianity. It can be done. You should do it in your own interests. You need not sacrifice the basic principle in your policies, if such thing exists; you need not sacrifice any article of your program, or to use the American slang expression, any plank in your platform. You could suggest your arguments to the people and endeavour to prove that your policy is better than the other, without saying that the other party have never done anything good, without saying that your opponents are not sincere, without saying, as the Tories did in 1930, that the Liberals had done nothing for the people during ten years and that the Conservatives alone could save the country. They ought to have known then, as I said last year in this very chamber, that no party, no man, either yesterday or ten years ago, or to-morrow, or five or ten years hence, could or can save the country through the efforts and cooperation alone of men belonging to one party, if they antagonize the rest of the country or create such a feeling of bitterness in their opponents that in their turn those opponents will profit by any accident of political fortune, or by any crisis, economic, social or international, to turn the game against them.

That brings me back to my starting point, which will be my conclusion. My Liberal friends will win. But I say to them, make no mistake. The votes that will be added to your actual majorities, the votes that will give you back the constituencies which you have lost, and many others, will not be given to you because the confidence of the country in the Liberal party has been restored. It will be one of the last tests, perhaps the last test which a rapidly increasing number of Canadians will make of the party system. If you win this election by outdoing your opponents, by promising to undo all that they have done and to replace it by perfection; if you win the election by promising more butter than bread, when the people come to realize, two or three years from now, that it is the same old story, then you, Liberals, as the Tories four years ago, will have done more not to advance the interests of this group, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, but to further social unrest and future revolutions and true bolshevism, which lies not at the door of my friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) but at the door of the true communists who have been continually attacking that hon. gentlemen, whom they rightly regard as the most effective obstacle to social revolution. That advice which I have already given I offer especially to my good friends from the province of Quebec or, broadly speaking, to my French and Catholic fellow members. To them I say: In the principles of your faith, in the traditions of your race, to which so many of the leaders of this country, of Protestant faith and of British origin, have rendered testimony, in these two great moral forces there lies your greatest strength to save the country. And it is acknowledged now. I was reading only to-day an admirable pamphlet issued by a social committee of the United Church in Toronto, a pamphlet which I commend to the reading of every member of this house. It is published under the signature of Sir Robert Falconer and of the secretary, whose name I forget. I shall write to them as a Canadian and as a Christian, thanking them for that admirable program of social reform. What pleased me profoundly was to find therein a paragraph endorsing the opinions expressed by Pope Pius XI in his great encyclical. Do you not see that tremendous spiritual force, which has been dormant in Canada for so many years, now rising? Could the old men in this house imagine that a time would come when a gathering of Methodist or Presbyterian ministers would render testimony to the teachings of the Pope in Rome? I am afraid that some of my dear old friends of the house in the past must have trembled in their tombs, some of those stout leaders of the Orange order, if they have read an expression of opinion, in the name of the whole United Church, endorsing the views held by the Anglican bishops in Lambeth Palace last year and the views expressed by the Pope.

Now are we, responsible in some sense to the people of Canada for their spiritual and moral welfare as well as for their material good, going to neglect that tremendous spiritual upheaval? Nothing is further from my thought than to suggest that any party should exploit the opinions either of the Pope or of the United Church or of any other church for party ends. I have always deprecated the introduction of religion into politics —which unfortunately has been done for so many years in this country by all parties— by making use of clerics or of clerical opinions as a means of bringing votes to one party or another. It is a thing to be despised and condemned. But surely the spiritual forces which might be used to bring the people of Canada to think of these matters, social and economic, from the highest point of view, a point of view higher than the mere material interest of the labourer, the working man, the merchant or the land owner, should be considered rather than neglected by all men responsible for the laws and the government of this country.

Would it not be possible for the Conservatives to expound their program and for the Liberals to expound theirs without bitterly attacking one another? It is perfectly fair for the Liberals to say, as my friend from East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) said to-night, that a good deal of the reforms proposed by the government can be laid at the door of their own party and that therefore they should be given credit for them. That is quite legitimate. It is quite legitimate for the Liberals to point out to the electors that promises made in 1930 have not been fulfilled. It is quite legitimate for the Conservatives to reply that their task has been rendered much more difficult because of the lack of vision of the Liberal government prior to 1930—and it would be quite true. I well remember that during the session of 1930, I, as a humble independent member, warned some of the Liberal ministers against the dangers that were coming—the depression, unemployment and the crisis. I told them that they ought to take means right then to meet that situation. But no; it was a small passing matter; Dunning would settle that in his little budget. Well, that delusion was as great as the delusion of the Conservatives at the present time, that the sole pronouncement made by the Prime Minister is going to save them from the consequences of their language in 1930. Chickens come home to roost every time; sometimes it takes four years and sometimes ten years, but they always come back.

Mr. SPOTTON: Pretty old chickens.

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes, and sometimes they are the worst.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Why did you betray Laurier?

Mr. BOURASSA: If my friend knew something more about the political history of the country he would know that I fought Laurier when he was at the height of his popularity. When the Tory party was denouncing him from the Atlantic to the Pacific as the instrument of Catholicism and French domination, I stood by him. When he was the idol of Quebec, I stood almost alone against him in defence of the principles for which I have fought all my life. But when he was betrayed by his Liberal friends, when he was downtrodden during the war, I came to him and freely tendered him a helping hand, not to carry but to go through the elections of 1917. But since I have been provoked by a gentleman who may or may not be in his senses I will add this. The last letter which Laurier wrote in his own hand, he wrote to me, to express his sympathy for the most cruel bereavement I have had during my life; and the answer I wrote came to him the day after his attack and two days before his death. But he knows now that although I fought him because of differences in principle, I loved him all my life; and he knew it then. The day I passed in his house in 1917, when he was betrayed by men whom he had covered with honours and favours—I never received anything from him and never asked—that day he pressed me on his bosom and said to me: "Bourassa, what has happened to me to-day you predicted eleven years ago. I know now where my true friends are to be found." May I be pardoned for having disclosed that feeling of intimacy? Perhaps much may be pardoned to an old man in his closing days; but this is as sincere as the sentiments I have expressed with regard to the present Prime Minister and the present leader of the opposition. If I go out of public life with one feeling, with one conviction, it is this: a deep regret for many bitter words that I have used in my life, deep and sincere repentance for all my violences of language; but I hope they will be forgiven me by God and man because not once in my life have I attacked anybody unjustly, from my point of view at least, and without believing it was my duty to do so.

Mr. T. A. THOMPSON (Lanark): I wish to congratulate the mover (Mr. Rowe) and the seconder (Mr. Dorion) on their splendid addresses; they have maintained and upheld the high traditions of this house. The speech from the throne was the most comprehensive and far reaching that has been delivered in this chamber since confederation. It clearly indicates that a new consciousness has arisen in the hearts of the Canadian people and that henceforth first things in this country will have first place and the welfare of the masses of the people will have first consideration.

There are many questions that must be dealt with by the Canadian people in the near future, questions of vital importance to our national welfare. One of them is our railway problem; another is our national debt, and another is government reform. We have too much government in this country. It is nothing short of financial suicide that ten and a half million people should continue to support ten governments. We have more governments to govern ten and a half million people in Canada than Great Britain has to govern forty-five million. I am quite sure that one government would suffice for the western provinces and one for the maritimes, but whatever alterations are to be made, the question must be solved by the Canadian people in the near future, because we cannot continue to support the multitude of governments that we have at the present time, and nothing, whether it is the British North America Act or any other act, should be permitted to stand in the way of promoting the happiness and welfare of our people. Conditions are constantly changing and changed conditions must necessarily bring new remedies, but any alteration in the economic life of a nation to be productive of the greatest good must be made with a wholesome distrust of the unknown and a love of the old familiar paths, coupled with a reverence for religion and authority and the protection of our civil and property rights. It is true that the dead branches must be pruned from the tree and new branches grafted on to it, but great care must be exercised that the life giving trunk and roots of that tree are not destroyed.

Under our present capitalistic system there have developed social and economic injustices that must be remedied, but this does not mean that the capitalistic system is to be destroyed or that individual initiative is to be suppressed. There is no greater motive power known to man that will develop in him the faculties which his Creator gave him than the profit system, but that profit system must not be permitted to run wild; it must be regulated and it must be curbed. When a man contemplates making an important change in his own private business, if he is wise he does two things: he looks back to see what has caused him to make those changes, why it was necessary that he should make them so that he may avoid similar pitfalls in the future, and he looks ahead to ascertain if possible what the result of those changes is going to be on his future welfare. A survey of our national life in Canada at the present time is dictated by both wisdom and by common sense.

The difficulties confronting the Canadian people at this time did not arise yesterday or the day before or last year or ten years ago; they are the product of many, many years. They began when machinery, the steam engine, electricity, the automobile, each in its turn drove the human element from almost every walk of life. At first we noticed the handicraft workers in our towns and villages closing their doors, having been forced out of business by the factories. Those dislocations were easily adjusted in the earlier stages, but as industry developed there grew up, almost imperceptibly and unnoticed, evils in our economic and financial systems, and under cover of the unwarranted prosperity of war time those evils ate into the very vitals of our economic system and imperilled our national life. During the years that followed the war we saw nation after nation engaged in a mad scramble to save their economic life, raising insurmountable barriers around their borders, making it impossible or almost impossible for other nations to trade with them. We saw the United States of America closing their markets to our products; we saw England, the mother and the home of free trade and the champion of sea-going commerce, take her place among the protected nations of the world, until economic nationalism stifled international trade. We also had to contend with the products of Russia, of her slave camps, her forced labour, her mines, her wageless farmers. These were dumped on our markets, depriving our own people of the Canadian market. Between the years 1921 and 1930, while the markets of the world were being closed to our Canadian exporters, our friends of the Liberal party sat idly on the treasury benches and permitted the markets of Canada to be made the dumping ground for the surplus products of every nation of the world. During the nine years immediately prior to 1930 there were formed in this country 120 mergers, which gathered into their relentless maw hundreds of our small well-organized industries and formed them into over-capitalized stock watered companies that bled the investors of this country of their hard earned savings. Surely these things must be purged from our national life if Canada is to live and prosper. It was with a view to eradicating these evils that the price spreads committee made their investigation.

When the present government took office the depression was well under way. There was an adverse trade balance of around $100,000,000. There was an immigration policy that was adding thousands to our already large number of unemployed. This government took charge of the economic life of Canada in that very diseased condition and immediately set to work to revive our industries and protect and open up markets for us. They increased the tariff against countries that had raised their tariffs against us, they cut government salaries by ten per cent, they initiated the Ottawa trade agreements which put millions of dollars into the pockets of our farmers and also protected them against profiteers in marketing. I do not know what answer our Liberal friends who voted against these agreements will make to their farm supporters, in view of the statement made under oath by Mr. MacLean, president of Canada Packers, before the price spreads commission that there had been distributed among hog growers in Canada for bacon shipped to the old country $36,000,000 more than they would have received had these agreements not been in effect. The government also revived the textile business and put new life into the lumber business. They instituted the central bank; they passed the Natural Products Marketing Act and the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. All this legislation was passed against the bitter opposition of our Liberal friends, who opposed all these acts brought in by this government in an honest endeavour to raise this country out of the slough of depression into which it had come; and this without one constructive suggestion being made by the opposition as to what should be done in the existing emergency, when Canada was fighting for her national existence.

It may be asked why the government did not bring in some measures of reform during those trying years. Our friends ask why the government did not perform a major operation upon the country when she was struggling for existence and almost at her last gasp. I answer, for the same reason that the skilled surgeon will not operate on a patient in a weakened and dying condition. They must administer palliatives, they must build up the body until it is in a condition that it can be operated on. So it was with Canada; the present government has nourished this country back to at least some degree of prosperity and into such a condition that it can stand being operated upon. The government has decided that it is necessary to change our system. We shall be asked to give our consent to a reform that will assure our old folk that they have no longer to look forward to a destitute old age. We shall be asked to consent to a reform that will assure the wage earners that they will no longer be obliged to work for starvation wages. You will be asked to give your consent to a reform that will lead to a more just and honest distribution of both the wealth and the taxation of the people of Canada. You will be asked to give your consent to a reform permitting the farmers to make a decent living from the products of the soil and the labours of their hands, and that in the marketing of their products will protect them from the exploitation of get-rich-quick racketeers. You will be asked to consent to a reform that will ensure the honest industrialists of this country against being crushed by unfair and unjust competition of men whose only interest in business is to heap up wealth for themselves with utter disregard for the human element, which in every phase of our national life must be protected if we are to continue to exist.

There are those who tell us that the evils we now have arose during the last five years. I will ask them to take what consolation they can from the fact that these evils reached their height in 1929, the last year that our friends opposite were in power. To those who say that the proposed reforms will lead to fascism, I say that fascism is the very negative of the reforms proposed. Fascism is not government-controlled business, it is business-controlled government. I ask you to search out the hidden power behind a Mussolini, behind a Hitler, behind communistic Russia, and you will see the iron hand of big business with its world wide, interlocked directorates, crushing the very lifeblood out of the people without any thought or regard for the welfare of the masses. In this country we must come to a true conception of the ideal progress of a nation, realizing that true progress does not consist in superabundance piled up for the enjoyment of a few, but in plenitude honestly distributed for the welfare of all. Students of history tell us that the downfall of the Roman and the Grecian empires began with the oppression of the common people. They forgot the true elements of national greatness and their glory faded because they forgot the humanity of their people.

We must realize that if our industries are to prosper we must make it possible for them to sell their goods. Their products must be consumed or prosperity would be impossible. Clothing manufacturers cannot succeed if thousands of our people are underclad; our food manufacturers, our millers and bakers cannot prosper if thousands of our people are hungry. There can be no prosperity in Canada until the purchasing power of the farmer and the working man is materially increased. The proposed reform in our economic system is not an attempt to make the rich man poor; rather it is an honest effort to make the poor man rich or to give him at least a fair share of the wealth his labours have produced. It is not a levelling down to a common mould, as our socialistic friends would describe it; it is not an effort to make all men on a common basis, but it is a levelling up from the undertrodden. In Canada the body politic has been nursed back to a state of convalescence, and health has been so far restored that blood is again circulating in the veins of our industries and the body politic is in a position where it can stand a major operation. The people of Canada will shortly be asked to decide who shall perform the operation. Will they pass the patient back to the care of the laissez-faire rugged individualist opposite whose blundering had brought it to the point of death? Or will they not rather trust to the hand of the skilled surgeon who has so cleverly nursed it back to its present condition?

The democratic control of industry will I am sure bring about a wider distribution of the nation's wealth which, after all, is the product of the labours of all the people. The day is past, long past, when we can cry with Cain, "Am I my brother's keeper?" No man can live to himself, nor can any nation live to itself. Then let us march forward into a new era of security and peace, an era of decent standards of living for all. In the introduction of these important reforms we are this session taking one of the most forward steps the Canadian people have taken in many decades. Why not let us be united in our efforts? Let us throw aside our political differences. Let us discard our sectional bitterness and march with an united step towards the horizon of a brighter and happier day.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I had not thought the debate was so near conclusion and must speak without preparation. I believe I can put in a few sentences the observations I wish to make. Before doing so, however, I should like to say a few words concerning the remarks of my deskmate, the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). He indicated his intention not to aspire to be a member of this house again. I hope he will reconsider that decision, we could ill spare him. We could better spare a better man, as the saying goes. He fills a niche in this house which, due to his vast store of knowledge of the long past and his association with the leaders of those days, can never be filled. It is an inspiration to have him among us. During his observations he described himself as an old man and a Christian. I am sorry I cannot adequately qualify to compete with him in that regard, but I do not think he is sufficiently either one or the other to prevent his conducting a campaign and, I trust, being elected. He struck a note of pathos in his concluding remarks when he said he hoped the house would forgive him for any harsh statements of which, as he put it, he had ever been guilty. As the hon. member is not in his seat at the moment I might reveal a different aspect of his character. What a man says when he is on his feet sometimes reveals a side of his character different from that known to the man sitting beside him. I have upon many occasions been impressed with the friendly, courteous and tolerant opinions the hon. member expressed to me concerning those who apparently were bitterly opposed to him. There was one hon. member who sat on the opposite side of the house who used to attack the hon. member for Labelle in what I can only describe as a mean manner. I used to be indignant on behalf of my deskmate, but he would check me up, and if upon occasions I suggested retaliation he would simply reply that the hon. member was entitled to his opinions. When misfortune and illness overtook that man the hon. member for Labelle was one of the first to show his sympathy in a practical way. I know the man's inner feelings are much more tolerant than the remarks he sometimes makes politically in a debate.

I am not quite so sure that I join with him in his absolute conviction that the next election will establish the Liberal party in power. The right-about-face of the Prime Minister and the promises he has made and proposes to carry out have attracted a great deal of attention throughout the country. I must warn him, however, that he will be judged not upon anything written in the speech from the throne or spoken over the radio, but simply and solely by that portion of the program he puts into effect this session and which is passed not only in this house but in the other house, for whose actions, should they defeat any legislation passed in this chamber, he with his political affiliations will be held responsible. On that and on that alone will he be judged.

I believe the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) struck a very fine note yesterday when in order that a free hand would be given to the government to bring forward the reform measures, he forgot his constitutional objections and waived the motion of want of confidence which he promised last session. I appreciate that attitude, because before leaving home while speaking with my friends I stated that was the stand I hoped he would take. If the Prime Minister and his party are sincere in bringing forward these reform policies the very best way the Liberal and other groups in the house could serve the country would be to facilitate their passage.

I wish to call attention to only one or two lines in the somewhat lengthy speech from the throne. I quote as follows:

> Better provision will be made for the security of the worker during unemployment, in sickness, and in old age.

[Mr. Neill.]

The reference to unemployment undoubtedly has reference to some form of unemployment insurance which the Prime Minister promised three years ago when discussing a motion introduced by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) and seconded by myself. He promised that before leaving office he would crystallize into legislation, his investigations into the matter. From statements appearing in the press and from his radio talks it would appear that the plan would be accompanied by a system of contributory insurance. I am quite willing to follow him in that connection because in the eight years I have advocated the measure I have stated that would be necessary. My hon. friend from East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) said to-night that unemployment insurance was in no sense a cure-all for unemployment. I quite agree. Certainly it is not, any more than life insurance prevents people from dying; but both are a palliative when trouble comes. It helps to absorb the shock of the blow of unemployment just in the same way as the old age pension, which took ninety thousand people off the unemployment dole, was a useful help.

Then there is the suggestion of better provision for old age. That is somewhat ambiguous. Judging from the notice of motion which the Prime Minister gave the other day, although it is mixed up with several other subjects, there is almost the suggestion that the old age pension might be connected with a contributory system also. If that is the intention I very much regret it, and would feel compelled to oppose it, and I will oppose it to the bitter end. It is no use telling men or women who are old and destitute and feeble that they should have done something in their younger days— that "if you had done something, as I did, or somebody else did, when you were young you would not be in this position to-day, and because you did not, you must starve now." That is not the view that humanitarianism suggests. You have the old and destitute people on your hands and you have to take some care of them, and my suggestion would be—I hope this will be developed into the policy when the bill is brought down—to reduce the age for receiving the pension from seventy to sixty. I know that that would add enormously to the expenditure. To reduce the age from seventy to sixty-five would also add very considerably to the expenditure, but is it not better to have a man from sixty to seventy years old idle, even though we are paying him an old age pension, than to have the young man from twenty to thirty years idle in a camp? The man who has worked until he is sixty will not get into any mischief, and a rest is at that time of life appropriate, but the young man of from eighteen to twenty-eight, if he has not learned to work by then, will never learn to work; the only thing he will learn will be to become either a hobo or a criminal. I can speak feelingly of that because I have passed through the experience of being idle as a young man, and there was no relief and no dole then. I learned from my own experience and that of my friends how insensibly one can deteriorate in a period of idleness. In six weeks a man becomes a potential hobo, in six months a potential criminal. I say again, let the old man lay off and receive an old age pension. That would be far better and far cheaper than having the young fellow of from twenty to thirty years idle in a camp, learning nothing but everything that is bad. But whatever age is decided upon, I repeat that the scheme will have to be on a non-contributory basis after a certain age, because we have to deal with things as they are and not with them as they should be.

Then again the speech makes reference to action that will be taken—> —to ameliorate the conditions of labour, to provide a better and more assured standard of living for the worker, to secure minimum wages and a maximum working week, and to alter the incidence of taxation so that it will more directly conform to capacity to pay.

With regard to the minimum wage I must be on the alert, coming from British Columbia, to say that unless it is arranged in the form of a sliding scale I would be compelled to criticize it very strongly. There would have to be recognition of the fact that our standards in British Columbia are very different from those in the province of Quebec. I do not suggest that they are inferior in Quebec; I merely say that the cost of living is higher in British Columbia, and we cannot afford in that province to accept as a minimum a standard that would be acceptable in the province of Quebec. I am not in a position to quote ordinary articles of food, but take a cheap car, for instance: it costs from $200 to $250 more in British Columbia than in the province of Quebec. That is only an illustration. We cannot afford in British Columbia, with our high cost of living as compared with Quebec and the eastern provinces, to accept the same minimum wage standards.

Reference is also made to the adoption of a maximum working week. I am heartily in favour of that. I have advocated it for years as the real solution for the unemployment caused by intensive machine production. During the war the production by machinery was speeded up to such an extent that it far overtook the hours of work. The hours of work were not shortened in accordance with increased production by machinery. In the past that was done gradually, but during the war machinery was so speeded up that the shortening of hours did not keep pace with it, and it is decidedly a very necessary thing to adopt maximum working hours. It is one of the biggest things that could be done to promote better conditions.

But I cannot read that sentence without thinking of the conflict that is inevitable in connection with provincial and federal jurisdiction. It is all very well for people to get on the platform and say, "If the constitution gets in the way, so much the worse for the constitution." That sounds very nice, but we do not want to be put in the position they are in across the line where almost a catastrophe will happen if the decision of the supreme court in the gold case is against the policy which the United States government has adopted. These things must be considered. It is no use passing legislation and having a nice catchy policy if later on it is going to be ruled out by the supreme court or by the privy council.

The speech goes on to say that measures will be enacted to safeguard the consumer and the primary producer. I am glad to hear that the consumer is going to have a look in, because I did not see much provision for him in the marketing act, for instance, that we passed last year. The primary producer is certainly entitled to have recognition. I would rather have seen notice given by the government that they proposed to make substantial amendments to the marketing act in order to render it workable, which I submit it is not. We have heard a great deal about the benefits conferred by the act, but they are all in the future. What particular product in Canada to-day has been materially benefited by the enforcement of the Marketing Act?

Mr. HACKETT: Tobacco.

Mr. NEILL: It may be so. I will not oppose the hon. member's suggestion, because that is not a matter with which I am familiar. As far as I know the only progress made in British Columbia under the act is to appoint half a dozen people with high salaries, and apparently there is some provision for getting government assistance for propaganda. Imagine those who want to get up an agitation for some particular form of marketing board being subsidized by the very people who are opposed to that propaganda! They on the other hand, without cohesion and without union or funds, have to oppose it as best they can, and very often they are in practical ignorance of the thing until the paid propagandist who hopes to get a position under the particular scheme, has put it over.

I had also hoped to see in the speech an intimation that the government proposed to amend the Canada Shipping Act which was introduced last year and which was flopped through the house without anything like due consideration. I predicted then that we would be meeting this year to amend it, as it certainly needs amending. I myself have brought matters before the Minister of Marine, urging his earnest and immediate attention, and if it is not too late yet, I would like to see proper amendments made to that act this session.

I have just a few other words to say, and I do not think I would have troubled the house at all if it had not been for the notice given by the Prime Minister the other day that the United States propose to negotiate a trade agreement with the Dominion of Canada. That is one of the most vital things I think to the whole of Canada, but certainly to British Columbia. I remember three years ago, or it may have been two, advocating reciprocity between the two countries, and I remember some of the British Columbia papers alluding to my action as if I had taken my life in my hands and had shown a great deal of courage, indicating that I had rather more courage than sense. What I then pleaded for and urged to be considered was reciprocity in fish and lumber, and I might add copper and some forms of paper. I know that the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) when Minister of Fisheries, was fully seized of the advantages of having a reciprocal deal in the matter of fish. I believe that had he remained Minister of Fisheries possibly something of that kind would have benn achieved. At any rate, I want to be the first, so there may be no doubt or obscurity in the matter, to bring to the attention of the Prime Minister, British Columbia's needs in the way of reciprocity along those lines.

Of course by the word "reciprocity" I do not mean that they should let our fish in and we should let their fish in, because naturally when there is a movement from one country to the other there is hardly likely to be any movement of the same commodity in the opposite direction; it would have to be compensated for by allowing some United States product of a different character to come into our country. But I repeat that if the Prime Minister could negotiate a treaty giving us access to the United States market with our fish and lumber, we would forget all about the Russians wanting to sell lumber to Great Britain. That would give us a market right at our door, where we can sell the kind of lumber we want to cut, and where we can send it cheaply and profitably. Wages in the British Columbia lumber camps would go up to-morrow if it were believed that we would have reasonable access to the United States markets.

I believe the same is true, though now I am speaking of something with which I am not so familiar, in connection with copper. There is a threatened shut down at present of one of the largest copper mines in British Columbia, largely, I believe, due to our inability to ship copper to the United States market. I believe newsprint is allowed free entry to that market, but I understand there are some forms of paper as well as pulp on which there is a duty. If the Prime Minister could give us a reciprocal deal of which our fish, lumber, copper and some forms of paper and pulp would form a substantial part, I can assure him that we in British Columbia would rise up and call him blessed.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker, owing to the lateness of the hour and the sparseness of the attendance in the house, I would ask you to call it eleven o'clock.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: I can hardly call it eleven o'clock except with the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take advantage of the opportunity afforded by this debate to draw attention to the forgotten man. I am referring now to the men in the national defence concentration camps. This matter was brought to the attention of the house yesterday by a question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie), to which the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Stirling) replied. Having taken some interest in these men and having been closely connected with them when they came to Vancouver some time in December, I wish to direct the attention of the house to the situation which prevailed there and to the situation prevailing in regard to the men in these concentration camps.

The telegram which was read yesterday by the Minister of National Defence was from the Prime Minister of Canada to the attorney general or the premier of British Columbia, I am not sure which; in any case it went to the government of British Columbia. That wire shows that there was an arrangement, a conspiracy if you like, between the federal and provincial governments to force these men, by starving them, to go back into the camps without having any of their complaints investigated. In that telegram I find this statement:

> Later a conference was held between Attorney General Sloan, Mr. Griffiths, provincial administrator, and a representative of military district number eleven, at which it was made clear that the only means for keeping men in the camps was the guarantee that they could not obtain relief elsewhere.

That is a striking point. We are dealing with men, with human beings like ourselves. Yet at this conference, which vitally affected these men, they were not called in, though they had representatives who might very well have been invited to participate. That is a point which substantiates the statement I made, that these men were forced to either go back to the camps or to starve on the streets. Very fortunately, possibly, these men came into the city of Vancouver at about the Christmas season, when possibly we are inclined to have a little greater feeling of humanity than ordinarily may be the case, a time when peace and good will towards men is more prevalent than it is at other times. Very shortly, and possibly immediately, after the men came to the city of Vancouver the council of social agencies, not a radical organization at all, interested itself in the men and made provision for keeping them. That is what the wire of the Prime Minister objects to more particularly.

Very shortly after that, these men came to an organization to which I belong and asked for our assistance in order to help them rectify some of the conditions which they maintained prevailed in the camps. We took up this matter, and here may I say that in taking it up we had the wholehearted cooperation of the Liberal members of parliament for greater Vancouver, of the Liberal members of the legislative assembly, and of the Vancouver city council. It was quite easy to see that the military authorities, with the cooperation of the federal and provincial governments, were trying to create a situation under which these men would be driven back to camp by force. It was only through the intervention of those I have already mentioned, together with other citizens, that a reasonable and satisfactory solution was reached, under which these men went back to camp without some trouble occurring.

The men asked for an investigation. It was stated that anyone could go and investigate these camps. We had a similar situation in regard to the penitentiaries, and the same statement was made. Now we find, according to the speech from the throne, that some reform is to take place in connection with our penitentiaries. Surely when complaints are made the easiest way to ascertain whether or not they are well founded is through an investigation by reputable citizens. That is all these men were asking.

The Prime Minister also states in his telegram:

> We think it most undesirable that agitators should destroy the value of the camps which have been provided for homeless single men, and we seek your earnest cooperation to the end that the agitators may be dealt with by the attorney general's department as provided by law.

It is the easiest thing in the world to call a man an agitator if we are not in accord with what he says, but we have various kinds of agitators. As a matter of fact we had a very able agitator in this dominion prior to the election of 1930, but instead of dealing with him as agitators are usually dealt with we made him prime minister. We had similar agitators in the province of British Columbia, and we made them the government of that province.

I have listened to the complaints of some of these men. It was suggested that when they asked for a little more syrup on their mush in the morning they were considered agitators. Well, I know the consternation that takes place in institutions of this kind when someone asks for a little more of something. Those of us who have read Oliver Twist will remember the consternation that was caused in the workhouse when he asked for more soup. What a terrible thing it was! Possibly Oliver Twist and others needed the soup, and possibly these men needed some more syrup and other things mentioned. But we cannot find what the needs are unless an investigation is held by reputable investigators.

Now as we are on the verge of having what may be called a new deal, I suggest that the first movement in a new deal is to treat human beings as human beings regardless of their station in society. We shall have to treat the unemployed man as a human being just as we treat members of the chamber of commerce or of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association; otherwise there is nothing to our so-called new deal or reforms.

I am of course greatly pleased at the evident swing to the left which has taken place in this dominion during the last few weeks. Possibly we in this corner of the house should feel gratified that many of the contentions which we made are to-day substantiated by those who at other times opposed us. I think it was towards the end of the session of 1932 that the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) asked the Prime Minister whether it was his intention to put legislation on the statute books to institute a six hour day. The Prime Minister remarked on that occasion that the government had no intention of doing anything of the kind. He said that as we were an exporting nation it was impossible for us to shorten the hours of labour and compete with the rest of the world in the world's export markets. He made the same statement in Montreal after his return from Great Britain in 1933, in reply to a question as to whether we could expect in Canada something similar to the NRA in the United States. In 1932, after he had made that statement, I made a prophecy which has to some extent been fulfilled. I said. Hansard, 1932, P. 3429:

> While the government at the present time state that they have no intention of bringing down legislation with respect to a six hour day, let me say that this administration are doing many things that they had no intention of doing in 1930, and they will do many things in the next few years that they have no intention of doing this year. And still they will not be able to keep ahead of the game.

That is, keep ahead of collapsing capitalism. And they will continue doing it. The longer that capitalism continues the more will these reforms be necessary. It is quite amusing to see how easily the words "capitalism" and "capitalist" roll off the Prime Minister's tongue at this time, but I have been waiting for someone to give us a definition of capitalism. So far as the people outside are concerned, it might be some sort of breakfast food. We have not heard what it is. What are the particular faults that are developing in it? As I look over the many members of the Conservative party I think particularly of my friend from Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol), who stood up last session and maintained that these conditions which are causing us so much concern were not the fault of the capitalist system, which was perfect. However, when his leader tells him that the system is not perfect he agrees quite heartily and there is no more about it.

But what is this capitalist system, and in what respect does it differ from other social systems that have existed heretofore? What are the peculiar characteristics that make it inoperative at the present time? It is rather difficult to find in the dictionary any very concise definition of capitalism, but I have a definition which I believe can be accepted by hon. members:

> Capitalism is a system under which the instruments of production are privately owned by a limited class, and most men get their living by selling their labour to an employer for a wage.

It goes on to say:

> Modern capitalism is based on large scale power production and the gathering of capital (means of production) into large masses under joint stock ownership.

This definition is taken from How Capitalism Works by G. D. H. Cole. I think there is a slight error in the last part of the definition. What the wage earner sells to the capitalist is not his labour but labour power. Labour is the misery he goes through while delivering his labour power, as clearly demonstrated by the evidence brought out before the price spreads and mass buying commission. What the labourer sells is his life's energy, his labour power—and this he sells at a price, wages, in order to make a living.

What are the peculiar characteristics of capitalism which have caused the dislocation of ordinary business such as we find all about us to-day? One of the first characteristics is that there is continually and ever present a tendency towards concentration of capital in fewer and fewer hands, and in this dominion as well as in other parts of the world that concentration has almost reached its limit. The total wealth of Canada as represented by the assets of all its transportation systems, its utilities, mines, construction equipment, pulp and paper and industrial plants of all kinds and wholesale and retail stores, according to the latest statistics available at the end of 1933, amounted to $10,662,526,000. The survey of corporate securities of Canada published by the Financial Post of Toronto lists 325 corporations operating in these fields, which alone account for $8,800,000,000, or all but a small fraction of the total wealth of this dominion in the means of production which I have just indicated. The one hundred largest non-banking corporations in Canada have total gross assets amounting to seventy-five per cent of all the wealth in this country, represented by all enterprises, whether corporate or non-corporate, engaged in transportation, construction, mining, public utilities, merchandising and manufacturing of all kinds. Those one hundred largest non-banking corporations dominate every major and essential Canadian industry upon which we depend for food, clothing and communication. Someone suggested this afternoon that the alternative at the present time was between socialism and democracy. This would seem to imply that we can have democracy under capitalism. Is this democracy when the great bulk of the means of wealth production, the means by which the people in this country live, is concentrated in the hands of very few people, less than one hundred, in this dominion? I said less than one hundred; it is approximately fifty men or, as someone has called them, Canada's fifty "big shots" who through interlocking directorates control the majority of those one hundred large corporations and their numerous subsidiaries.

Just to show the house how this concentration has been going on and the power that is vested in the hands of a few people, I will give a few figures. I believe it was mentioned yesterday that the key to a solution of our problems was control of the money power, whatever that means. I suppose we have a money power in this dominion but we also have control of industry in almost the same hands as the control of finance. For instance, let us take Sir Charles Gordon a banker. Does anyone suggest that if you took the power of Finance away from Sir Charles Gordon he would be any more benevolent as an industrialist? Would he deal as an industrialist any more kindly with his employees than he does as a financier with the rest of the Canadian people? One can say the same thing about the rest of them. Let me give a few instances of the power wielded by a few of those individuals. Sir Herbert Holt is a director of the Royal Bank of Canada; until recently. I believe, he was president of that bank. He is a director in eleven financial institutions, three insurance institutions, five transportation institutions, seven public utilities, two pulp and paper organizations, four merchandising and sundry institutions, six mining organizations, three construction institutions, fifteen manufacturing institutions, in all a total of fifty-six companies representing a total capital of $4,764,577,000. That is one man, controlling almost one-half of the capital of $10,000,000,000 which I have already mentioned. Then we have the second one, William A. Black, a director of five financial institutions, one transportation, three pulp and paper, one merchandising and sundry, two mining, one construction, seven manufacturing, or twenty institutions in all, representing total assets of over $1,000,000,000. Then we take the next one, Sir Charles Gordon, also a banker, I believe, president of a bank, a director of five financial institutions, three insurance, two transportation, one public utility, one pulp and paper, one merchandising and sundry, three mining, fourteen manufacturing, with total capital assets of $3,735,000,000. These figures give some indication of the concentration of capital that is going on and has gone on within this dominion, and that almost completely controls the whole of our industrial life—the lives of our people controlled by less than one hundred men. That is one of the peculiar characteristics of capitalism, the characteristic that differentiates capitalism from all the other systems of society that have preceded it.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: What is capitalism?

Mr. MacINNIS: I have already twice stated the definition of capitalism, and if my hon. friend cannot catch my words, he can wait until to-morow when he can read them in Hansard. Why is capitalism falling down at the present time? What are these faults that have grown up in capitalism in the last few years? As a matter of fact there is not in capitalism to-day a single fault that is not inherent in the system, that was not in it from the first beginnings of it and will continue as long as capitalism continues. But certain things are necessary for capitalism to continue, and while I am dealing with this I do not wish to say that capitalism has not performed useful functions; it has some achievements to its credit. Possibly it was necessary as an evolution in social organization, because without capitalism we might never have been able to advance to a better form of organization than we now have. It has built up the capital structure by which human society lives possibly better than any other system could or would have done. In any case it has done that and for that reason we may thank capitalism for what it has done for us. But just because capitalism served us well at one time, and just because comparatively few people in the social organization are benefiting from it even now, is no reason why capitalism should continue. I submit that no matter how favourably we may receive the proposals put forward by the present Prime Minister in the speech from the throne, they are nothing but an attempt to rescue capitalism and to try to make it work.

I shall continue my remarks at the next sitting.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, January 23, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUGGESTED PROCEDURE TO EXPEDITE CONSIDERATION OF MEASURES RELATING TO SOCIAL AND INDUSTRIAL REFORM

On the orders for motions:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): As the order for "Motions" is called may I avail myself of this moment to ask the Prime Minister if he has considered favourably the suggestion that I made the other evening that government orders be given precedence over all other orders and especially those relating to the motions of private members, so that this house could have before it at as early a moment as possible those measures of the government which relate to social and industrial reform.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I tried to make quite clear to the right hon. gentleman that I had no intention of depriving any members of this house of their rights, and further, in answer to a question which the right hon. gentleman asked yesterday, I tried to make it abundantly clear that until the report of the price spreads commission had been made it would be impossible to conclude the matters that we had in hand with respect to legislation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say, Mr. Speaker, that as far as the price spreads investigation is concerned I am not referring to it at the moment, but to the legislation on social insurance of which notice has already been given. As to depriving private members of their day I realize that any motion to give government orders precedence must be by unanimous consent. I believe if it were understood that private members' motions were simply being postponed in order to let the government proceed with its own reform measures, such a motion would receive unanimous consent; at least I can speak for the official opposition when I say that we would be unanimous in our acceptance of such a motion.

Mr. BENNETT: We are not unfamiliar with tactics such as these, and we have no intention, Mr. Speaker, of departing from the rules of this house.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1935-36

RESTORATION TO CIVIL SERVICE OF HALF OF TEN PER CENT SALARY DEDUCTION

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1936, was presented by Hon. E. N. Rhodes (Minister of Finance) and read by Mr. Speaker to the house.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in moving that these estimates and the accompanying message be referred to the committee of supply, as I now do, I beg to say that to facilitate the preparation of these estimates and to enable them to be presented to the house at the earliest possible moment, they have been prepared on a basis of the current year containing a provision for a salary deduction of ten per cent for those who receive salaries in excess of $1,000 per year.

As stated to the house on previous occasions, it is the desire of the government to make complete restoration at the earliest possible moment, the governing factor being the revenues available.

In view of the present state of the revenues, the government proposes to submit a measure which will provide for a restoration of one-half of the deduction from April first next.

The government is fully aware that salary deductions have in many instances caused inconvenience and in some cases perhaps hardship, and it is, therefore, most appreciative of the manner in which on the whole the position has been accepted by the civil service.

Motion agreed to.

PRECIOUS METALS MARKING ACT

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 2, to amend the Precious Metals Marking Act 1928.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as every hon. member is aware the Precious Metals Marking Act is a very technical piece of legislation and has to do with the protection of the public in connection with the markings on articles made of precious and other metals. There are a number of changes all of which are technical and minor in character, and one section relative to the subject matter of evidence.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INTERPRETATION ACT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 3, to amend the Interpretation Act.

He said: The purpose of this bill is to amend the section of the Interpretation Act which defines the word "holiday." In the definition in the present act Remembrance day is omitted and this bill is merely to place Remembrance day on the list of public holidays.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

REPRESENTATION ACT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 4, to amend the Representation Act, 1933.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is to amend that section of the Representation Act which deals with the two ridings known as East Hamilton and West Hamilton appearing in the act passed in 1933. At the time of the passage of the act in that year it was assumed that the boundaries of the city of Hamilton were those which had appeared in the former act passed by this house. As a matter of fact the city of Hamilton had changed its boundaries in the interval, and the division made of the city of Hamilton in that act is not in accordance with the actual boundaries of the city. This amendment is to correct the error.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 5, to amend the criminal code.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the object of the proposed amendment to the criminal code is to adopt in the province of Saskatchewan in criminal cases a jury of six instead of a jury of twelve, the provision which pertains in all provinces save in the province of Alberta. Because of an amendment to the criminal code, for a period of about fifteen years a jury composed of only six members has been used in the trial of criminal offences in the province of Alberta. The attorney general of Saskatchewan has requested on behalf of his government that a similar amendment be made to the code providing for a jury of six in the trial of criminal cases in that province.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PENSION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 6, to amend the Pension Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, under the Pension Act as it now stands there is power to appoint up to twelve pension commissioners, but for a period of only seven years. The pension commission tell me the work is such that more help is needed, but they do not think it will be necessary to have that help for seven years. In this bill power is asked to appoint a certain additional number of commissioners.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. BOULANGER

Mr. OSCAR L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse): I rise to a question of privilege which concerns not only myself but every member of this house. I refer to the right of members of the House of Commons of placing questions on the order paper, and I have in mind two questions which appear under my name, No. 13 and No. 14, in which I ask whether the Admiralty Act of 1934 and the Canada Shipping Act of 1934 have been put into force. What appears on the order paper is only half of the questions which I sent to the clerk of the house to be placed on the order paper. Half of my question has been removed. The questions have been amputated and mutilated without my knowledge or consent. Of course, I understand that any question of mine or of any other member of the house must conform to the rules of the house before it appears on the order paper. But whether any question is in conformity with the rules of the house is for you, Mr. Speaker, to decide and for no one else; and it is for you to decide the matter in the House of Commons and not in camera in order that, if I am not satisfied with your decision, I may appeal from you to the house. I was not interested in ascertaining whether these acts had been put into force or not—I knew that already. I was interested to know why, for what reasons they have not been put into operation; and that part of my inquiry has been omitted from my question without my consent or knowledge. I submit that this practice, which has obtained for a long time in the house, is not a proper practice; it is not the regular practice, it is not the legal practice, and it is not the courteous practice.

Mr. SPEAKER: With much of what the hon. member has said I quite agree. I thank him for calling the matter to my attention, and it will receive the consideration which it deserves.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is a good decision.

A CANADIAN FLAG

PROPOSAL FOR A NATIONAL EMBLEM ON WHICH UNION JACK SHALL BE CONSPICUOUS

Mr. C. H. DICKIE (Nanaimo) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, a national flag representing the Dominion of Canada should be adopted; and that in any design for a Canadian flag the union jack must be conspicuous.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I anticipate that objection will be taken to this resolution by some hon. members, by contending that the union jack is ample for the requirements of Canada. The seconder of this resolution, the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. White), and I have lived at least as long as anyone else in this assembly under the aegis of the union jack and there is in the house no one who has a greater appreciation of and a more profound regard for the union jack than have the mover and seconder of this resolution. We consider, however, that having reached the full status of nationhood, Canada should have a distinctive flag of her own. People will say that the union jack is good enough. This does not detract in any way from our regard for the union jack, but we think we should have a distinctive flag that we can call truly Canadian.

Australia and New Zealand under practically the same conditions as we are, years ago decided that they should have distinctive flags of their own, and no objection was raised to their doing so. Each of them has now a beautiful, artistic flag of which they are very proud. New Zealand and Australia have each a blue flag with the union jack in the upper corner and the beautiful constellation of the Southern Cross on the fly. I contend that we have a perfect right, without any regard to the College of Heralds, to have a flag somewhat along those lines. At the present time the only flag we have for Canada is that known as the red ensign. In 1892 the Dominion government passed a regulation allowing the arms of Canada to be placed on the red ensign for mercantile purposes. It has since been contended by many that we have no legal right to fly the red ensign on land as we are doing at present, so why not have a flag that we can be proud of, that we can fly on all occasions, and especially when our doing so will not detract one iota from our regard for the union jack?

Obviously, if this resolution should carry, as I hope it will, a committee will be appointed to consider the design of a flag. It is premature at this time to consider what that design would be more than what I have suggested in the house. I am, however, impelled to say that my opinion would be that a flag consisting of a bright delphinium blue ground on which would be placed the union jack in a dominant position in the upper corner next the staff and on this blue fly an autumnal-coloured maple leaf, would be artistic and beautiful, would appeal to all our citizens, and would be a source of inspiration to our school children. We would be pleased indeed to see a flag along some such lines adopted. The design however is to be a matter for further consideration and it is not necessary to take up any more of the time of the house now. When this debate closes I of course reserve to myself the right to make explanations and perhaps enlarge further on arguments in favour of the resolution before the house.

Mr. R. S. WHITE (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I can add little to the remarks of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) and to those addressed to the house on this subject in previous sessions. I am well aware that in a matter of sentiment that dearly touches the heart of every British subject, logic has a poor chance of success. But I would say to those who think so, it is not proposed by the resolution in any way to destroy, weaken or detract from the flag under which we have lived for many centuries and which we reverence in our hearts.

There is nothing new in this suggestion. Canada to-day has a Canadian flag floating upon the sea and differing in appearance from the union jack of Great Britain by reason of having upon the fly the dominion coat of arms. If there be no objection in sentiment or for any other reason to a distinctive flag upon the sea, what objection in logic can be made to a distinctive flag upon the land? Other parts of our empire have their own distinctive flags. South Africa, Australia, New Zealand and for all I know, possibly some other parts of the British commonwealth have their own distinctive flags, and if we in Canada desire to have a union jack which, upon some part of it will indicate that it represents that portion of the British commonwealth which we call Canada, we are certainly not parting with a flag we reverence and we certainly are not breaking the bonds of empire.

I recall, in speaking of the flag, a remark of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie who for five years was Prime Minister of this country, and who attended a dinner given in the city of Saint John in 1876 to the United States consul of that city. At this dinner was present Mr. James G. Blaine, subsequently a Republican candidate for the presidency of the United States. Behind the head table was displayed the flag of the United States and the flag of Great Britain. Mr. Mackenzie in referring to them said, I hope that the amity and peace which the two countries have enjoyed for so many years will continue in perpetuity, and their flags be entwined in harmony, the one bearing upon it the evidence of the might of the Creator, the starry heavens, and the other the emblem of His greatest work, the redemption of man. A very beautiful description, it seems to me, of the flags of the two countries. I would be among the last to suggest or approve any action that would in any way whatsoever mutilate that flag.

The union jack itself is a product of evolution. It has not always been the flag that it is to-day. Cross upon cross has been added. All that is proposed is that upon the union jack there shall be placed, instead of the coat of arms of the dominion, which is indecipherable and not by any means a thing of beauty or a joy forever, some emblem such as the maple leaf that will typify Canada, so that the flag will proclaim to all who view it that it represents that part of the British empire which is called Canada.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, the resolution moved by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) and seconded by the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. White) is not anything new in the way of a flag resolution in the House of Commons of this country. Practically the same resolution has been before the house for years. Last year there was a vote taken on the question. In 1933, and for years before, I had the honour to move a resolution with regard to the same subject. The position I took in 1933,—the same as the position I take to-day,—was that because of the economic situation prevailing in Canada the question of a distinctive national flag for Canada might remain in abeyance at least for a year or more. My reason, as put on record at that time, was that we ought to devote ourselves with all earnestness and expedition to ameliorating social and economic conditions in the country. To-day all I desire to do is to draw the attention of the house to the fact that the resolution is not a new resolution. I might say that in one regard the resolution now before us is weaker than the one last year, because in the last line the hon. member for Nanaimo would appear to be compromising on the position of the union jack in Canada's national flag. I wonder if that is part of the government's reform program.

Mr. ERNST: Do you want the resolution carried in regard to a Canadian flag?

Mr. McINTOSH: What I want is, as expressed in the resolution of other years, that the union jack occupy the position of honour. With that view practically every member of His Majesty's loyal opposition voted last year for the resolution as moved by the hon. member for Nanaimo, but this year as I have mentioned it would appear that he is compromising on the importance of the union jack in Canada's national flag.

In conclusion may I say that I am not going to debate the matter at present, all I want to say is that the program of social and economic reform mentioned by the Prime Minister and backed apparently by the government should be brought down in this house without a moment's delay, and that we are ready to back that platform as far as it is correct and in the interests of all the Canadian people. I am in conformity with the statement of my leader when I say that there should be no time lost, that program of reform ought to be brought down promptly, and because of the urgency for action in this regard, this flag resolution should be held in abeyance for the time being.

Miss AGNES MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker, just in order to make it unanimous I wish to say how very heartily I approve, and I am sure all in this corner approve, of a national flag for Canada. The fact that we have not had one I think is an indication of our lack of nationhood, that we are still toddling and not walking. If we were not afraid of being ourselves I think we would have had a national flag some time ago. I for one do not think that it would have affected Canadian loyalty to the British empire. I think that now everyone has arrived at that conclusion, that we really can have a flag of our own and still not declare to the world that we fear that by doing so we shall endanger the British empire. Therefore, I just wish to say these few words in support of the motion. Possibly to take a vote on it will occupy such a little time that it would not unduly delay the reform program.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Toronto Northwest): Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the house is, as the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) said, one that has been introduced here before for a number of sessions. It is getting to the stage of becoming a hardy perennial. If this country were not in the state that it is at the present time, along with all the rest of the world, such that we should be devoting every moment of our time to the consideration of matters designed to relieve unemployment and other pressing questions, it would be all right to spend time on a resolution of this nature, one that is more or less educational. However, as the resolution is on the order paper I believe that it should be discussed, and I say right at the beginning that I am opposed to the resolution.

An hon. MEMBER: He is from Toronto.

Mr. MacNICOL: Some hon. gentleman on the opposite side said something about my home city. It is a great city, and I do not need to rise in this house and express its sentiment in this regard. That sentiment is for the union jack, as I believe is well known. Each city has as much right to its own opinion in regard to our flag or in regard to any other matter as any other city. I do not look upon this as a question to be discussed from the standpoint of the city from which a member comes, or from the standpoint of patriotism either.

A moment ago it was said that logic will not enter into this discussion. I propose to use only logic in arguing that the situation in Canada, so far as the flag is concerned, should remain as it is at present. I have made some study of the origin of flags, as perhaps other members have. So far as I can ascertain the first mention of flags, emblems or ensigns is in the second chapter of Numbers, verses 1 and 2:

> And the Lord spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying, Every man of the children of Israel shall pitch by his own standard, with the ensign of their father's house—

As I see it, the flags that we fly in Canada pertain to the flags of the houses of the fathers of at least the two great major races in this country, and there is nothing on those flags to offend any other race.

Mr. DUFF: They might put on a burning bush.

Mr. MacNICOL: Such a design might be offered if this question went to a committee. Later on I will point out what happened when resolutions of this nature were sent to committees of other houses, and designs came from those committees.

Lately I have noted that the university expeditions to Egypt to search into the antiquities of that country, as well as those to Syria, have discovered that away back before Father Abraham went to Egypt, which was long before the reference I gave to Moses and Aaron, the countries of that day did have emblems and ensigns. So far as our ensigns and emblems are concerned, the cross of St. George which appears on our flag was introduced into England by the Norman-French king Richard I in 1194. On that cross as the previous speaker said, the other two crosses of St. Andrew and St. Patrick later were superimposed.

Reference has been made to the flags of the other commonwealths of the British empire; it has been inferred here that the other dominions have flags that are distinctive of the particular country or nation concerned. I believe that I will be able to prove that this statement is not one hundred per cent correct. Let us take, for instance, the commonwealth of India. After the debate in the house last session I took the trouble to write to all the various commonwealths so that I would have the latest information when this hardy perennial came up again this year, and I hope that after this debate the question will not come up in this house again for some considerable length of time. In India they have several flags. In 1863 the governor general of India was given a special flag of his own which consisted of the union jack defaced with the star of India and the Tudor crown. I do not like the expression "defaced"; I would rather use the word "superimposed", but the official description is as I have given it. About 1920 the governor general's flag of India was decreed to be the official land flag of India, and the flag to be flown wherever Indian representatives were in residence outside the borders of that country. But over the courts and the district sessions of India the official flag is the union jack; that flies on land in that country. Over the government marine of India, which in 1928 was ordered to be of the combatant class, they fly two flags. At the head of the mainmast they fly the royal navy emblem; from the gaff they fly the viceroy's flag, called the union viceroy flag of India. On the Indian merchant marine, however, we have the identical flag that is flown on ships sailing from Great Britain. They have nothing superimposed on the flag in that case; perhaps they are not as well off as we are, if there is any choice. So in India they have the union jack and the union viceroy flag, while on water they have the regular red ensign of Great Britain.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Someone said something about New Zealand. It is a fact that both New Zealand and Australia have changed their flags. Personally I like them both. I like our own Canadian flags better, but so long as those flags suit the New Zealanders and Australians it is quite all right. It has been said that we want a distinctive flag. Will anyone say that the flag of New Zealand or the flag of Australia is peculiarly distinctive to those commonwealths? On each flag they have a southern cross, as they see it. It is different on each flag. But the southern cross applies to every nation in the southern hemisphere. South Africa, Chile, the Argentine, or any other southern nation would have as much right to place the southern cross on its flags as our two sister commonwealths have. The official land flag of New Zealand is the blue ensign with the New Zealand southern cross on the fly thereof which consists of four five-pointed stars. On this blue flag they use red stars with white borders, and it is their government marine flag, too. The red ensign with the same cross is their merchant marine flag. Australia uses the same flags, but on the Australian flags appear the Australian southern cross, which consists of five white stars; then beneath the union jack itself they place a sixth star. They fly their blue ensign on land and on government marine, and their red ensign on the merchant marine. In the case of Australia, however, there is a slight difference from New Zealand. In Australia, wherever the governor general or the lieutenant governors of the states are in residence, they fly the union jack. So in Australia, as I understand it, they have two official flags, though the one generally recognized is the blue ensign.

I believe, though I am not sure, that something was said about South Africa. The situation is not so happy in that country. A resolution of this nature was sent to a committee in South Africa, and they recommended a design which, while it is the official flag, according to my information is not one hundred per cent popular in that country. It seems to me I read somewhere that when the debates were taking place in the house in South Africa one member after another rose and said: "We must have the union jack occupying a large portion of the flag we propose to fly." We hear that same kind of talk in this house, but, Mr. Speaker, there is no telling what sort of report and what sort of design a committee would recommend to this house. In South Africa the committee recommended the adoption of this flag which I hold in my hand, and which is now one of their two official flags, and how much of that flag does the union jack occupy? Only one eighty-first part, and no one can tell how little space the union jack would occupy in a design that might be recommended by a committee of this house.

I have here pictures of flags from all over the world, and many of them are simply bars of various colours. Very few of them have anything distinctive of their respective countries. I have pictures of the flags of Guatemala, Cuba, Bulgaria, Albania, Czechoslovakia, Germany, France, Manchukuo, The Netherlands, Jugoslavia, the Soviet republic, and Spain, and there is nothing on any of these flags, as I see them, that is particularly distinctive of the country over which they fly. The Irish Free State has a flag of its own, but it is not distinctively Irish. It consists of three perpendicular bars. I say again, Mr. Speaker, that once a resolution of this kind is sent to a committee there is no telling in advance what sort of flag that committee will recommend for adoption by parliament, no more than could be told of several other parliamentary committees in other parts of the world which have reported on a similar resolution.

Newfoundland, which is the oldest of all the dominions, has identically the same flags as Canada, barring, of course, the shield on the fly. The shield on the fly of Newfoundland's merchant marine is the shield of Newfoundland, and so is the shield on the fly of their government marine flag, just as the Canadian merchant marine flag and the Canadian government marine flag have on the fly of each the shield of Canada.

I want to say a word about the shield of Canada. It was stated a moment ago by a previous speaker that our coat of arms was not a thing of beauty or a joy forever. I have made a survey of the coats of arms of most nations, and in my humble opinion —I say it with all due respect—the coat of arms, the shield of which is on the Canadian marine flags is one of the finest coats of arms in the world, and the tradition of which goes farther back into history than almost any other. It goes right back to the very dawn of our official flag.

On the shield of our coat of arms in the upper left-hand canton are depicted the three golden lions of Normandy, brought from the ancient French province of Normandy with William the Conqueror, and first inscribed on our flag by Richard I of England. I am told that a large percentage of that great race of people who settled and developed and now inhabit our great province of Quebec can trace their origins back to old Normandy in France. Certainly the upper left canton of our coat of arms thus goes right back to France. In the upper right canton we have the lion of Scotland; in the left centre canton we have the harp of Ireland and in the right centre canton the fleur-de-lis, first placed on the British flag by Edward III in honour of the French princess who was his mother. Beneath these four cantons we have something else that is distinctively Canadian, more Canadian than the southern cross is distinctive of Australia or New Zealand. We have the three maple leaves, representing Canada, and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that without question it is a most historic and a most beautiful shield, and it is placed on the fly of each of the two marine flags of Canada.

To revert to South Africa, South Africa has two official flags. They have the South African union flag, which I have in my hand, and the union jack. The law of South Africa provides that the two flags are to fly side by side. But their marine flags are identically the same as ours, apart from the fact that the South African shield appears on the fly of each.

In Great Britain itself they have the red ensign for merchant marine use, the blue ensign for their government marine service, and the white ensign for the navy, and on land the union jack.

This movement for a new flag is one that was introduced into this house by the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh), and it has now crossed, I am sorry to say, from your left, Mr. Speaker, to your right. The agitation has continued for some little time. I wish now to read one or two letters in connection with it. The first is a letter sent by the Native Sons of Canada to the Sons of England Benefit Society, Toronto, as follows:

Dear Sirs,—

In view of the need of a distinctive Canadian national flag, the national council of the Native Sons of Canada presents for your consideration and for the purpose of discussion the enclosed design.

Here is the design, two bars with a maple leaf imposed on a star in the centre. The maple leaf itself is not altogether distinctive of Canada because the United States has maple leaves too; this design is not as distinctively Canadian as the shield that is superimposed on Canada's two marine flags, on which there are three maple leaves, and the fleur-de-lis, representing one of the great races that have been mainly instrumental in settling this country.

What was the reply to that letter? The Sons of England Benefit Society wrote under date of February 5, 1934, as follows, in reply to the letter from the Native Sons of Canada:

The copy of the proposed Canadian national flag was duly received and considered, and I was instructed to advise you that the members of the supreme council of the Sons of England Benefit Society are strongly opposed to any change in our flag, feeling that the union jack is good enough for Canada and is a flag that we are proud to live under.

I should like to read a letter in reply to the foregoing which may give an insight into what may be behind this agitation, although I should like to have it understood that I am not imputing any particular motive. I would ask hon. members to listen to this letter:

Toronto, February 6, 1934.

Supreme Secretary,
Sons of England Benefit Society,
Toronto.

Dear Sir:—

We wish to thank you for your letter of February 5 in which you state that you are strongly opposed to any change in our flag, feeling that the union jack is good enough for Canada and is a flag that we are proud to live under.

So far, we have not raised any question in regard to the union jack but, as you bring the matter up, we would like to point out to you that there has been a change in the constitutional position of Canada in the past few years because on December 11, 1931, was passed the statute of Westminster which established the British commonwealth of nations and as a result of which Canada is no longer a part of the British empire.

Canada, Mr. Speaker, is a part of the British empire, and I hope it will long remain part of it.

An hon. MEMBER: Who signed the letter?

Mr. MacNICOL: It is signed by Frank G. J. McDonagh, national secretary. But I have not read all of it; the rest of it may provoke further questions. The letter continues:

Canada is no longer a part of the British empire but is a nation member of the British commonwealth of nations and an equal partner in the same. There is a distinct feeling in Canada that there is nothing in the union jack in any way Canadian in the sense that a national flag should represent the sovereignty of the people.

Our flag goes back a long way into the history of the two great races which early formed this country. The first cross on our flag, St. George's, came from Normandy and was placed there in the year 1194 by the Norman King of England, Richard I. The letter continues:

The union jack represents the sovereignty of the people of the united kingdom and neglects anything concerning Canada, when it is considered as a flag that is good enough for Canada.

Listen to this:

Some years ago, when there was a discussion as to a Canadian flag, certain organizations, among which I believe was your own, took the stand that the union jack should be the sole national flag for Canada and the thought occurs to me that possibly, because of the stand of your organization and some others, the union jack may be forced off the Canadian flag.

What would happen to a resolution of this kind if it were sent to a committee a principal member of which had in his mind forcing the union jack off the Canadian flag? I have great respect for the views expressed by other hon. members in this connection. I know that they are as loyal as any people could be, and I do not approach the subject from the standpoint of loyalty; that does not enter into the discussion. I take the stand that our marine flags are distinctively Canadian, perhaps more so than the flags of either Australia or New Zealand are of those dominions, and just as distinctive as one of the flags of India. One Indian flag has superimposed upon it what represents the sun, and the sun shines over the whole of the earth's surface. The two Canadian marine flags are not only distinctive of our national races but emblematic of Canada.

If the union jack which flies across Canada were in competition with the flags of other countries on this continent there might be some cause for agitation to pull it down and place another in its place. But there is not. The fact is that there is no competition in the north half of America with the union jack. We are told that because of necessities of our three legations we should change our flag. I communicated with the Department of the Secretary of State and was informed that our Canadian merchant marine flag, the red ensign with the shield of our coat of arms upon it, is the flag which flies over those legations, including the high commissioner's office in London. I should be very sorry, Mr. Speaker, to see pulled down that flag which has flown over this country for so long, merely to meet the fancied needs of our legations.

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Laprairie-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time simply to give to hon. members sitting to your right some advice which may shock the Prime Minister. I should like to tell them in this connection to follow the policy of laissez-faire. It is all very well to talk about flags and to advance a policy of flag waving for the next election, but to my mind there is something higher and more important than the emblem, no matter how interesting and worthy of respect it may be. We must think of bread and work, and money in the pockets of our Canadian people. If hon. members opposite have any flag to offer I will suggest that they place upon it a loaf of bread, a pie and a shovel.

It is easy to understand the tactics adopted by hon. members opposite. I shall take my seat very shortly and they may proceed to do whatever they wish, but I must say it would appear that they are not prepared to proceed with their policy. Our revered chief urged them to proceed, but they have not done so. I say they have not because they are not ready. Hon. members sitting on this side are ready to do something for the Canadian people, but our friends opposite talk about flags because they are not ready. So far as the flag is concerned I would suggest that for the time being we let well enough alone. Let us at this time follow the policy of laissez-faire, so far as the flag is concerned and do something for our Canadian people. Some hon. members urge that this is not a government motion. Hon. members sitting around me know very well that our friends opposite are simply talking about nothing at all so they may have time to proceed with their policy. Why did they not adopt the motion of last year which was presented by an hon. member on this side of the house?

Mr. ERNST: He did not make it last year.

Mr. DUPUIS: Yes he did.

Mr. ERNST: No, he did not; it was made by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie).

Mr. DUPUIS: He made it two, three and four years ago.

Mr. ERNST: And before you were in the house.

Mr. DUPUIS: During those years the misery of the Canadian people was not as great as it is this year. We need work; we need bread; we need something that will rescue the Canadian people. Do it now and leave the flag alone.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (East Toronto): I am surprised to see that a resolution of this kind should come before the house, and I am equally surprised that my old friend from Mount Royal (Mr. White) should second it. The old flag, the old leader and the old policy were good enough for the Liberal-Conservative party of this country and it should be good enough now. This house may pass all the resolutions it likes with regard to changing the flag, but the people of Ontario will continue to fly the union jack whether this house likes it or not.

This is not a new subject in this house. It came up ten years ago when the Liberal government of that day appointed a commission of several civil servants to bring in a proposal with respect to changing the flag. There is no demand in Canada for a new flag. This is the first private members' day and it might as well be the last so that we may get down to the business of the country and do something to hoist the flag that will restore the hope, character and livelihood of thousands of farmers, industrial workers and miners and their families.

I am opposed to this resolution as I was opposed to a similar proposal thirteen years ago, and I am opposed to it especially at a time like this when the union jack should be Canada's only flag. At the present time Canada has only one flag, and she has only one national anthem, namely, God Save the King. We have these two essentials to-day and I hope it will be a long time before they are changed; because after all the country does not belong to those who inhabit it to-day: it is an inheritance from the past. It is a possession for the present and a trust for the future. I doubt whether some hon. gentlemen who are supporting the resolution to-day would be sitting in this house if they had advocated it in 1930.

Let us first get rid of the red flag of communism in this country; secondly, let us get rid of the black flag of unemployment; and let us restore Magna Charta. I often wonder whether there is any real Magna Charta to-day, when I see on York street and on many other streets in the city I come from the red flag of the bailiff hoisted up not only over retail stores but in the homes of the people in York and in many other counties throughout Ontario.

It would be far better for this house to get down to business and do something practical than trying to discuss academic theories such as this. The old union jack was good enough for 500,000 Canadians who went to France and Flanders, and of whom 100,000 lie buried in that land; and if it was good enough for the soldiers who fought the battles of this country, for you and me, it should be good enough for those who stayed at home and now propose a new flag.

I find no demand in the country for this resolution. We have been told that our wonderful merchant marine—part of the bankruptcy of the Canadian National Railways—has a distinctive flag. Well, it has also a red flag, written in red in the bookkeeping of the Minister of Finance. Let us get down to brass tacks and do the thing for which parliament has been called, namely, to solve the economic abuses that exist in this country. Everyone is agreed that the old world has got itself into the greatest muddle in its history. We are all full of complaints and want changes; no one is satisfied; people all want to be reformers and each has a different solution. We have proposals to coordinate, nationalize, internationalize and denationalize all at one and the same time, and to many people in this house the past is nothing but error.

As I said before, this is not a new question. It came up on June 17, 1925 as will be found in Hansard of that year at page 4364, from which I quote the following:

National Flag for Canada

Mr. Church:

1. Will the government lay on the table of the house the text of a copy of order in council appointing a committee to select a distinctive Canadian flag for use ashore?

2. Who is asking for such a Canadian flag and for such a change, and why?

3. Is the union jack not Canada's only official flag, and was it not the one used by the Canadian expeditionary forces overseas in France, and since Canada has been a British possession?

4. Will an opportunity be given to the house to discuss such an unnecessary innovation in view of Canada having no land army and no fleet whatever except the proposed Petersen fleet?

5. Is such a change of policy not for parliament to decide instead of the governor general in council?

6. Will any legislation be introduced as to such a proposed change this session?

7. Will the government also introduce legislation or rules to regulate the use of American and other foreign flags in Canada?

Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King: No committee has been appointed for the purpose of selecting a Canadian flag. A committee of public servants has been appointed to consider and report upon a suitable design for a Canadian national flag, but the government has taken no action of any kind towards committing either the government or parliament to the adoption of a national flag. I will read to the house the text of the order which it has been requested to have laid on the table:

Certified copy of a minute of a meeting of the committee of the Privy Council approved by His Excellency the Governor General on the 23rd April, 1925.

The committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 21st April, 1925, from the Minister of National Defence, stating that a distinctive Canadian flag has been authorized to be used by Canadian government-owned vessels and by other vessels of Canadian registry, and that there is throughout the country a desire that there should also be adopted for use ashore a distinctive flag which shall be recognized as the flag of the Dominion of Canada.

The minister, therefore, recommends that a committee be appointed to consider and report on the most suitable design that should be adopted for a Canadian national flag for use ashore, and that this committee be composed of the following:

G. J. Desbarats, Esq., C.M.G., Deputy Minister of National Defence, Chairman.

Thomas Mulvey, Esq., B.A., K.C., Under-Secretary of State.

A. G. Doughty, Esq., C.M.G., LL.D., Dominion Archivist.

Commodore Walter Hose, C.B.E., A.D.C., Director of the Naval Service.

Major General H. A. Panet, C.B., C.M.G., D.S.O., Adjutant General.

Group Captain J. S. Scott, M.C., A.F.C., A.D.C., Acting Director of the Royal Canadian Air Force.

The committee concur in the foregoing recommendation and submit the same for approval.

The leader of the Liberal party is in the house at the present time and it is only fair to read what he said then, because I do not believe that he would have supported such a change at that time.

Hon. members will see that all that has been done has been to refer to this committee of civil servants the question of considering a suitable design for a national flag. Representations have been made to the government from different quarters that there are throughout the country a considerable number of people as well as various organizations who feel that Canada, like Australia, South Africa and other of the self-governing dominions, should have ashore a distinctive Canadian flag as she already has on the high seas.

She may have a distinctive Canadian flag on the high seas, but she has no fleet to protect us in time of trouble, no fleet to protect our trade routes.

The government has simply referred, and intends to refer to this committee, for purposes of study and report, the different suggestions that have been or may be made in that regard. I might mention, for example, that the Native Sons of Canada, an organization, I understand, having headquarters in British Columbia, has offered a prize for the best suggestion as to a suitable Canadian national flag. A short time ago, during the present session, I had a letter from the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding, Minister of Finance, expressing very strongly the view that Canada should have a flag of her own and accompanying the letter was a flag which Mr. Fielding himself had designed and which he said he would like to have considered when any discussion with respect to the possibility of a Canadian national flag might come up. I think I need only mention Right Hon. Mr. Fielding's name in this connection to indicate clearly that those who have views with respect to a Canadian national flag along lines similar to those adopted by other of the self-governing dominions are not to be assumed as in any way wanting in sympathy with, or loyalty to, the mother country in the matter of the flag.

Le me make it clear that this committee is simply a committee to study and report.

Well, we will be reporting on the black flag before long if we do not do something to aid employment. I was glad to see this party the other day hauling down the old flag of laissez faire in this country and adopting a flag for doing something for the workers. After all is said and done, the Conservative party, the founders and authors of protection, should not see it made the farce it is, and the consumer and labourer should be protected. We want something more practical like that, a flag emblazoning as a party policy the old square deal flag of Theodore Roosevelt and the new deal flag of Woodrow Wilson.

I am absolutely opposed to any change in the flag we have. It is only fair to the leader of the opposition (Mr. King), the then prime minister, that I should read the last two or three paragraphs of his reply, because I might be doing him an injustice if I did not read them at the present time in view of what has gone on before. He said:

> Let me make it quite clear that this committee is simply a committee to study and report. The government has no intention of taking any action in this matter without taking parliament fully into its confidence. Any report that is made will be submitted to parliament at a time when this matter may come up for discussion. There is, I think, on the order paper at the present time a resolution in the name of an hon. member suggesting that the house should consider this matter. It may be of advantage to the house to have before it, when a motion of this kind is being debated, the different suggestions that may have been made, and something in the nature of a report on the part of a representative committee such as the one here referred to. That is the sole and only object of the order I have read to the house. I do not hesitate to say that the government would not for a moment consider adopting a national flag other than by resolution of this house and the full sanction of the parliament of Canada. But surely that question can be referred to in a calm manner as one worthy of consideration. . . . Speaking for myself, may I say that while I am able to sympathize with the point of view which would have for Canada a distinctive national flag, just as Australia, South Africa and other of the self-governing British dominions have their national flags, I would be proud and happy to have Canada continue in the future as in the past to have the union jack recognized as the national flag, moreover, I would not lend my support to any proposal which did not include the union jack as the most distinctive feature of any national flag that at any time it might be proposed to adopt.

Those are the views of the Liberal leader. This putting of the union jack on a new Canadian flag is simply the thin end of the wedge; it is what has been done in this country in the past ten or fifteen years and what in this house some twelve years ago I called separatism. The only ties that bind us to the mother land are those of race and blood; that is all. I might also mention the appeals to the privy council which some would like to eliminate as well. We are not a nation. It was said that Sir Wilfrid Laurier made us a nation. We are not a nation because we cannot protect our trade routes. We are to-day sponging upon the British taxpayers for our maritime freedom; we are depending upon them for their boats to keep open our trade routes. While we are talking of getting more trade, in time of trouble we have to run to the motherland. Nearly 100,000 Canadian ex-soldiers last August were in the city I come from for a week, and it was said in the hotels that $5 would cover all the damage they did while they were there. They were consulted on this matter and they were practically unanimous against making any change in the flag which they carried in Flanders and France for the people of this country.

I am absolutely opposed to the resolution and I doubt even if this parliament passes it, whether it would be recognized by any large body of public opinion in this country. I doubt whether they will even fly the flag on St. James street, Montreal. There are more important matters that might be considered instead of wasting the time of this honourable house in academic discussions about a flag, especially when we are not a nation and we have no navy to protect our shores except a few boats about the size of those one sees in the canal outside the Chateau Laurier. That is the type of boat the people of Canada have for preserving maritime freedom, yet we are talking about adopting a flag for our merchant marine. I have never been on the high seas. True it is, many hon. members have taken the opportunity in the recess of parliament to become international statesmen by going over to the League of Nations and possibly they have seen the flag of the merchant marine flying on the Atlantic, the Pacific, the South Australian ocean and all the oceans bordering on the seven seas, but this is no time for the passing of this resolution and if it is passed I believe the new flag will never be flown to any extent in the soldier province of Ontario.

Mr. W. G. ERNST (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, the only consideration that impels me to take part in the debate at this time is the attitude of the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol) and the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Church). May I first make a passing reference to the specific suggestion made by the hon. member for East Toronto? He said in his rambling address, "Let us restore the Magna Charta to this country," and I noticed that those across the way applauded, led by the ex-Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I can quite understand that, because I know the leader of the opposition is familiar with the Magna Charta and the whys and wherefores of it. He knows it has long since been disproved that the Magna Charta was a charter of liberty to the people at large and that it was only a written guarantee for the privileges of the barons. I understand the applause of hon. gentlemen opposite.

With reference to the attitude taken by the hon. member for Toronto Northwest and by the hon. member for East Toronto, they tell us that they are interpreting public opinion in the city of Toronto. I prefer to believe and to hope they are not, but if they are, I can only say: Good Lord, deliver us!

Mr. MacNICOL: On a point of privilege, I did not at any time during my remarks say that I was representing public opinion in Toronto. Someone on the opposite side said something about Toronto and I said that the question was not one of Toronto at all.

Mr. ERNST: I am glad the hon. member says that he was not representing Toronto public opinion, because I am satisfied he was not.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. gentleman may like to quibble a little bit, but I did not use that expression at all. I represent a riding in Toronto. What I said was that I was not speaking as representing the public opinion of Toronto. Toronto has its own public opinion and the people there can speak for themselves.

Mr. ERNST: To come back to the subject, it seems to me that when those who talk against a Canadian flag say they are talking logic they are begging the issue. I have as much regard for the union jack, despite my name, as any other hon. member. Indeed, I am rather proud of the name, because I believe the name itself goes to show that those who originally came from foreign lands, or the descendants of those who came some generations ago, can make as good Canadians as those born in Great Britain, and speak English as well; I might flatter myself that they sometimes speak even more intelligible English than those born north of the Tweed.

There are two reasons, which seem to me unanswerable, why this country should have its own flag. The hon. member for Toronto Northwest touched on one. He said: We have four legations. Over those four legations we are flying the emblem of the Canadian merchant marine, which has no sanction and no validity from this parliament. We are flying that emblem in order to distinguish our legation from the British embassy or legation. I wonder if it is any more illogical or unreasonable to ask the people of Canada to have a flag of their own than to represent in Tokyo that a flag which is not the flag of Canada is the flag of Canada. That is what we are doing when we fly the red ensign. Is it any more illogical to tell the people of the United States when we fly a flag which is not the flag of Canada that it is the flag of Canada, than to have a flag which is truly the flag of Canada and which we can honestly fly? Anyone with vision must see that this country, having embarked on a policy in foreign affairs, having ventured outside its own doors, having established legations in Paris, Tokyo and Washington, must go further and that as time goes on we shall be having legations in practically every country of the civilized world. If that does come to pass it will irresistibly follow that this country must have a flag to tell these people that it is the flag of Canada. I for one believe that that flag ought to have as its chief and most conspicuous part the union jack, and no one can say that the resolution does not say that. The hon. member for Toronto Northwest is in a state of fear and trembling lest some committee be appointed that would not include the union jack as part of the flag, although the last paragraph of the resolution says:

> And that in any design for a Canadian flag the union jack must be conspicuous.

Not one eighty-first part, as he gave by way of illustration, but conspicuous. I know there are strong feelings in the matter in some parts of the country, but I am satisfied that what the people who hold these strong feelings are afraid of is not that we shall have a Canadian flag, but that we shall do away with the union jack. They do not want to have a Canadian flag in which the union jack is not predominant. What they desire is that we shall have in that flag something which is symbolic of empire, and the reverence for the union jack is a reverence for empire.

I come now to my second reason why this country should have a flag of its own. We are a great but scattered country. I believe even those who come from Toronto will admit that there are eight other provinces in Canada and that without them it would not be Canada. Those provinces, stretching as they do across this great country from ocean to ocean, have conflicting interests. It is impossible to have one common economic interest from Halifax to Vancouver. The interests of Nova Scotia cannot be identical with those of Ontario—

Mr. COTNAM: How do you explain that?

Mr. ERNST: I do not want to elaborate. They are identical in that they are Canadian, but I am speaking now in a purely and technically economic sense. The interests of Ontario or British Columbia are not identical with those of the prairie provinces. And when those interests conflict, as they sometimes do, it is necessary, and must be as long as Canada is to remain a country, to bind it together by compromise. Under these circumstances I conceive that a common symbol which we all recognize as Canadian is something worth while, and a flag is such a symbol.

The same thing applies to race. We have in Canada two great races. Much of the tradition behind them differs, but the future which lies ahead ought to be a common future. If we had a flag to which they both could look, typifying Canada, it would help to weld those two great races in Canada into one. No policy can work in this country if, as has happened in the past—some of us here are not free from sin, and some hon. gentlemen on the other side also have tried to do it—we play one part of this country against another. If we go on doing that we shall destroy it. I for one want a flag to make my people realize that they are part of Canada and not of Nova Scotia alone.

When I hear the hon. member for Toronto Northwest talk about the five hundred thousand Canadian troops overseas, may I say that I was one out of the many. It is true we marched under the union jack, but of all the tunes to which we listened there was none that gave the thrill or throb of O Canada. I venture to say further that had we had a flag which was typically Canadian we would have been proud of it, and would have carried it with the same distinction with which we carried the maple leaf upon our shoulders. I do not want to discard the union jack; I believe firmly in the empire as being a benefit to the world and necessary to peace, but if Canadians are to be Canadians they must be Canadians as well as British citizens. If this country is to endure we need some symbol which is Canadian and Canadian only.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): Mr. Speaker, I had no desire to intervene in this debate but at the same time there are a few words I wish to say. The previous speaker has given only one reason why there should be any change in the flag of this country. He says there are four legations in foreign countries which fly a flag which is not rightly nor legally theirs. Who is objecting to this? The people in Japan or France or any of these other countries? I have heard of no objection from any of them. They are quite content to use the Canadian legation in those countries whatever flag flies over it.

For many years this proposal has been a hardy annual in this parliament—a great many more years perhaps than I care to look back upon. It has always been brought forward by hon. gentlemen who had some particular flag in their mind, and we have been pressed and harassed for years by people seeking our approval of their designs. Well, I do not claim to represent people as intelligent as they perhaps have in some parts of Nova Scotia, who can teach us how to speak English and that sort of thing, but I have yet to find a man in my riding who has any desire for a change in this flag. It is recognized in Canada that on our merchant ships we have the emblem sanctioned by parliament, and that our flag for use on the land is the union jack. We who went overseas were glad to go under that flag, we were proud of the flag, as are Canadians and Britishers the world over. A man who has been in a foreign country, and who, on approaching his own, sees for the first time the flag waving on the shore, is proud of his British connection. If he is a Canadian he does not need any distinctive flag for that purpose. With all this in my mind, and the union jack having been our flag for so many years, I still admit that something might be done to ease the mind of those who are so anxious for a change. Consequently I personally would be agreeable to amend the motion now before the house. Therefore I would move, seconded by Mr. Garland (Carleton):

That the motion be amended by striking out the last paragraph; and Adding to the first paragraph the words "which shall be the union jack, upon which for use on marine vessels and for extraterritorial places the word 'Canada' and/or such national emblems as this parliament may approve may be placed, but such word and/or emblems shall not occupy more than one-eighth of the surface of the flag.

Mr. DAVID SPENCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I think it is regrettable that so much time should be lost in this house in discussing unimportant questions of this kind, and I call this matter unimportant. It has been introduced repeatedly since 1921 from both sides of the house but, as some hon. members have said, I do not think there is any demand for a change except from one or two hon. members themselves. I very much regret having to go against the two estimable gentlemen who moved and seconded the resolution, but I have opposed this proposal on all occasions and I intend to oppose it again to-day, without regard to who moved and seconded it. Some may have thought that because the resolution was moved from the other side of the house in other years I was opposed to it for that reason only, but that is not so.

I have travelled over a large part of this world by land and sea; always I have been proud to be a Britisher and under the old union jack. I see no reason why we should not be satisfied with that flag. I do not think anything of an irritating nature should be introduced in this house at this time. This is the wrong time for that sort of thing. Changing the flag is not going to bring better times. We should be devoting our time to improving the conditions of the good people of Canada. God knows they need it. This depression is lasting too long. I do not believe it is with the approval of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) that so much time is being lost in the discussion of the question of whether or not we should change our flag. We should be satisfied with what we have, as the hon. member for Toronto North-west (Mr. MacNicol) and the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Church), have said. My hon. friend from Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) made a very good speech, but I cannot agree with all he said. I think we should get down to business and do something in the interests of Canada instead of losing time talking about a new flag that will not put a bite in the mouth of anyone who is hungry.

Mr. GEORGE SPOTTON (North Huron): Mr. Speaker, as this is my first opportunity let me congratulate you on your appointment to the position of Speaker of this house, for which you are eminently fitted by training, talent and temperament.

I do feel that if I remain silent at this moment I might be misunderstood by the people of my county. I have heard no one in the county of Huron suggest that he was too good for the union jack or that the union jack was not good enough for him. While I have remained silent year after year when this question was under discussion, believing there was no danger of any action being taken, because of the temper of the chamber to-day I feel that I must place myself on record on this occasion. It is only too true that we might be better engaged in doing something which would relieve the suffering of our people, instead of being engaged in this discussion, but since this matter is under consideration I feel that it is of sufficient importance to warrant my taking up some of the time of the house.

I notice that hon. gentlemen opposite are very impatient and, indeed, are determined that they shall direct the course of this house. They forget, of course, that there was an election in 1930; they think they are still in the saddle. They are trying to tell this house what it shall take up and when, and during the recent by-elections in the province of Ontario they were trying to tell this government when the next election should be held. I well remember in the session of 1930 that when the then Prime Minister gave notice that he was going to dissolve the house and appeal to the country I said to one of his ministers, "Do you not think you are making a mistake in going to the country now, when conditions are not good?" He said, "Oh, no—

Mr. SANDERSON: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPOTTON: —"we are just on the slide down, and conditions will be much worse next year. Therefore we are going to the country now."

Mr. SANDERSON: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. SPOTTON: Then when it comes—

Mr. SANDERSON: My point of order is that the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Spotton) is entirely out of order in discussing, on the resolution now before the house, when an election will or will not take place. He is not speaking to the resolution at all.

Mr. SPOTTON: I am explaining the attitude of the speakers on the other side of the chamber.

Mr. SANDERSON: I want your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. member has been out of order as yet.

Mr. SPOTTON: I was going to say, Mr. Speaker, that I presume this government will settle the matter of an election when they get ready. It is their job.

Mr. SANDERSON: On another point of order, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the hon. member for North Huron is entirely out of order in discussing when an election may take place, on a resolution such as this.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am still of the opinion I expressed a moment ago, that the hon. gentleman is in order.

Mr. SPOTTON: Consequently, after we have sat here for the last four years and allowed His Majesty's loyal opposition to fill the press of this country, to poison the wells of information, to scatter about this land misrepresentations of my leader, during this session I propose on every occasion to tell the people of this dominion what this administration has done. Hon. gentlemen opposite went to the country because conditions were going to be worse.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPOTTON: Now they wish us to go to the country because they fear conditions are going to be better later on.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The resolution—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will please speak to the resolution before the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the point.

Mr. SPOTTON: Having finished that, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I am proud to be a citizen of Canada, if that will meet with the approval of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). I am also proud to be a citizen of the British empire, and having a dual citizenship, of which I am thoroughly proud, and having lived under no other flag, I cannot follow two flags. The union jack is good enough for me and I propose to do everything I can to oppose any insidious attempts to weaken the British connection. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I shall be called to task for this, but since we are discussing the flag, and since members of the opposition are trying to direct me in the manner in which I shall speak, let me say that we have long been told that trade follows the flag.

Mr. POULIOT: The manner or the banner?

Mr. SPOTTON: Trade follows the flag. A wayward child who leaves a good rural home and goes to the city may forget to write home or to visit his parents. Having found new friends with whom he dines and wines, everything is fine as long as he has money to spend, but it usually happens that when he gets out of work he starts to write home and—I am not ridiculing him for it—comes back and puts his feet under the parental table. During the last regime practically all the trade routes of this country were closed. We lost the market to the south of us; we lost markets all over the world. Nation after nation erected trade barriers, quotas and the like, and then in times of dire distress we as a nation, which is just a collection of individuals, did like the individual of whom I have spoken—we turned our eyes to the motherland and the union jack. When the outside world turns its back upon us we can only look to the motherland, and, sir, they came over, with the union jack. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, I shall have to do like the radio announcers do, call out the station now and then in my remarks, but my subject for the moment is that trade does follow the flag. Consequently trade follows the union jack. As a result of the bringing together of the family of nations of the British commonwealth, first in the old land and then here, we had the empire trade agreements, and the union jack was the flag that was flying over them.

To prove that trade follows the flag, and particularly the union jack, so far as Canada is concerned, I wish to compare our exports to the motherland in 1934 as against 1933, to prove as I say that trade follows the flag. I did not propose to take this strain until my speech was attempted to be directed for the first time in my life by friend or foe, and so I think I am perfectly within my rights.

The answers are inspiring in so far as Canada is concerned; and very significant in so far as the Imperial Trade Agreements go. It is enlightening to deal item by item with several of these scheduled commodities, showing the increase in values of exports to the United Kingdom in the period of a single year:

Commodity—		Exports, 1933		Exports, 1934
Fresh apples	bbls.	1,677,000	bbls.	3,057,000
	$	6,930,000	$	11,400,000
Canned pears	lbs.	3,900,000	lbs.	7,180,000
Canned salmon	$	1,985,000	$	2,600,000
Bacon and ham	$	3,430,000	$	12,360,000
Eggs	$	4,000	$	400,000
Butter	$	350,000	$	665,000
Fish (fresh and frozen)	$	410,000	$	790,000
Timber (including partially manufactured wood)	$	5,066,000	$	11,950,000
Copper (primary forms)	$	4,460,000	$	6,635,000
Copper (rods, sheets, etc.)	$	1,370,000	$	3,170,000
Pig lead	$	1,810,000	$	3,280,000
Zinc (and products)	$	1,900,000	$	4,300,000
Asbestos	$	85,000	$	315,000

An hon. MEMBER: What about lobsters?

Mr. SPOTTON: They mostly remained at home. Then mark this: Of bacon and ham we exported $3,430,000 worth in 1933 and $12,360,000 worth in 1934. Of eggs we exported $4,000 worth in 1933 and $400,000 worth in 1934. Of butter we exported $350,000 worth in 1933 and $665,000 worth in 1934. Of timber we exported $5,000,000 worth in 1933 and almost $12,000,000 worth in 1934. Now if there is no further suggestion as to the direction of my speech I shall finish that part of it, but if not, I shall leave it aside for the moment. We might be better engaged at the moment if there was no danger of unholy hands being laid on the union jack.

I think, sir, that Tennyson in the long ago, looking beyond the hills, foresaw the recent drawing together of the commonwealth of nations. You know there have been Liberal speakers in the recent by-elections who twitted some of us because we never mentioned the name of Bennett. Well, if that did happen it certainly did not happen with me. As an old Presbyterian I believe that the Lord has always raised up a man in every crisis in the British empire who has been big enough to pull that part of the empire through, and I believe verily that he always has a man in the making. It may be that Bennett's work might be soon finished, like Lloyd George or Kitchener, or many other men I might mention, but for the moment let me just say this. The mover of this resolution said how enthusiastic it would make the school children of this dominion for Canada to have a flag of her own. I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that the mover and seconder of this resolution have not been in touch with school houses or school children for a long time because love of the flag and loyalty to the flag is interwoven in all our school literature. Tennyson long ago said:

> Sharers of our glorious past
> Brothers must we part at last?
> Shall we not through good and ill
> Cling to one another still?
> Britain's myriad voices call
> Sons be welded one and all,
> Into one imperial whole,
> One with Britain, heart and soul;
> One fleet, one flag, one throne
> Britons hold your own!

Mr. SANDERSON: Will the hon. member permit a question? I would ask the hon. member for North Huron, now that he is travelling all over the map on this resolution, to tell us what he has to say about the restoration of titles.

Mr. SPOTTON: Mr. Speaker, I was going to say that our school books would have to be rewritten—

Mr. SANDERSON: I asked the hon. member about titles, not school-books. He made a speech two years ago.

Mr. SPOTTON: Children and other people ask a lot of questions.

Mr. SANDERSON: Titles.

Mr. SPOTTON: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for South Perth will allow me to proceed I shall do so. When interrupted I was proceeding to say that our children love and have been taught to love the songs in our school-houses and the union jack which floats over every public school in my county. That love will not be supplanted by any new-fangled flag. The pioneers who came to my county never thought they would raise a generation which for one moment would even suggest or hint that the union jack which they brought with them was not good enough.

There is a danger I should like to mention, Mr. Speaker I have not a word to say about any person who has come to this country from any land. Every citizen of our country has been permitted or invited to come consequently we should treat them as brothers and sisters; but I do say if it had not been for the million of immigrants who came in between the years 1921 and 1930, and particularly the half million which came during the last three years of the King administration we would not have as great a problem as we have to-day. We talk about assimilating races. Well, you start first with your sons and your daughters. Start in a practical fashion and then talk to me about the assimilation of races. It will come, through a long period of time, but the point is that most of these races do not wish to be assimilated. I do say however they should know that when they come to a part of the British empire they will have all the privileges afforded by our flag, the union jack. The new member from Toronto has stated that we have unprotected trade routes. Speaking in a church not long ago I discussed the flag, a subject which has been brought up many times and a returned missionary said the only protection he carried was the union jack on his breast. I must say that at this time I have more sympathy for the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) than I had before. I thought he was perhaps the only man in the house who would bring up this subject. I believe I told him once that as an old teacher he should look up the old school-book where I believe it was Barbara Frietchie who loved her flag so much that:

> She leaned far out on the window-sill,
> And shook it forth with a royal will.
> "Shoot, if you must, this old gray head,
> But spare your country's flag," she said.

I would to God that that might be the spirit which could be inculcated in every youth in our country.

Upon other occasions in this session I propose to do my full measure of battling, I have decided we should not let these foolish arguments go unchecked this session as we have done in the past four years.

Mr. A. J. ANDERSON (Toronto-High Park): Mr. Speaker, this question seems to have centred about the city of Toronto and the province of Ontario. I have not practised flag waving at all. As other hon. members have said I hope I am a good British subject and a first class Canadian citizen. It seems to me that what we require in Canada is cooperation in extending and building up a finer Canadian spirit than has sometimes been exhibited.

This motion is for the purpose of establishing a national flag. I must say I do not know the particular object which could be served by having another flag. People of this country so far as I can ascertain have not in any way shown any dislike for the union jack. For many years the dominions in all parts of the globe have spoken imperially and in the different conferences we have always stressed the point that we desired to continue to remain a part of the British commonwealth of nations. Up to the year 1926 we had considered our status in the empire from a legal and constitutional standpoint. It appeared to many people including myself that the tendency was toward separation rather than a continuation of a connection with the British empire. I think that feeling was apparent throughout the empire. The result was that when in 1930 representatives from various parts of the commonwealth assembled in London there was a desire, as evidenced by the addresses, to strengthen the British connection. It was urged that we had attained a certain amount of national or inter-imperial independence which greatly extended the powers of the dominions. There was a feeling however that something was lacking, and the result was that all the representatives at the conference stressed the necessity for something to bind the various parts of the empire together. It may be that that conference did not produce a great deal, but we find that later on those same dominions joined in an effort to strengthen their connection with the result that the agreements of the year 1932 showed conclusively the dominions desired to remain closely connected with the motherland and with one another. In all our conferences and throughout our history our progress has been made under the union jack as it exists to-day.

For a few moments I should like to refer to those tragic days between 1914 and 1919. We saw a large army, to a great extent voluntary, proceeding across the seas to assist the motherland in her efforts to establish what she considered right. Those 500,000 men were assembled under the flag of Great Britain. So far as they were concerned there was no desire to have a distinctive flag over them. That was not necessary in order to ensure their loyalty and allegiance to the principles of British institutions and British justice. They did their best for the empire and in their great effort probably did more to advance Canadian sentiment or Canadian consciousness than had been done previously in our history. It is unfortunate that an event of such a tragic nature was necessary in order to bring about that sentiment. An observer whose statements I have read recently has said that one day he was standing near Poperinghe in the war region when a division of the Canadian army was marching towards the Somme. He states that for the first time in his life he felt a real thrill when he saw those men marching along to Canadian tunes and Canadian songs with the union jack at their head. He then began to feel that Canada had a sentiment. And that is the sentiment we ought to try to continue to-day. In my riding, which is part of the city of Toronto, there is no desire for a new flag. The sentiment is that the union jack is quite sufficient for all purposes; it represents the best there is in British traditions and in the history of the British people. It represents the best that is meant by the words Britain and British.

As regards the proposal to make the flag distinctive, we do not need anything of the kind in Canada. It might be advisable and in the interests of this country, for the sake of distinctiveness, that on the union jack there should be some design that would not to any great extent encroach upon the design of the flag as it stands now—merely something to bring out the distinctiveness of the flag as appropriate to Canada itself. But that would apply only to extraterritorial purposes, for instance, for use overseas by our embassies, in legations and so on. At any rate, so far as my own constituency is concerned, the sentiment there is that the union jack is quite sufficient for Canada and that any change that might be made should be simply an addition in a small way to make it distinctive of our country when it is flown abroad.

Mr. W. F. GARLAND (Carleton): I second the motion of the hon. member for Parry Sound for this reason. I am very much in favour of the union jack being left as it is, and speaking for the county of Carleton I can say that there has been no agitation to have the flag changed. In fact, if there has been any agitation in the county the feeling has been that the flag should be left as it is. I deem it my duty as the representative of that county to voice the opinion of the electors to this effect.

The amendment moved by the hon. member for Parry Sound in which he strikes out the last paragraph provides:

> That the motion be amended by striking out the last paragraph; and
> Adding to the first paragraph the words "which shall be the union jack, upon which for use on marine vessels and for extraterritorial places the word 'Canada' and/or such national emblems as this parliament may approve may be placed, but such word and/or emblems shall not occupy more than one-eighth of the surface of the flag."

That to my mind would cover everything that has been stated this afternoon. So far as Canada is concerned, the union jack would remain as it is, except that for marine and extraterritorial purposes some emblem could be added as suggested. That would cover some of the objections raised by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst).

I do not want to take up the time of the house because I realize that we have more important matters to discuss; indeed, I do not see why this subject was brought up at all. The flag as it stands is good enough. It has been good enough for every Canadian since 1867 and before, and as the hon. member for East Toronto said, it is the flag under which the soldiers fought, and the flag under which they will fight again should the occasion arise.

I am very much in sympathy with the amendment and I will support it. Should the amendment be lost I will oppose the resolution as it stands.

Mr. H. A. MULLINS (Marquette): I have lived under this old flag probably as long as any man in this chamber, and God forbid that there should be any change in it or that we should have any new method or doctrine such as is proposed by the younger men like the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie). While I was travelling in the United States a short time ago I was asked to address a service club and in the room the union jack and the stars and stripes were placed side by side. I then quoted these lines:

> Your flag, my flag—how much they hold.
> Your land and my land are safe within their fold.

The union jack stands at the top of this tower and God forbid that the day should ever come when it is taken down, at any rate so long as I occupy a seat in this chamber.

I am going to be brief because I do not want to take up the time of the house, but I do not want any change in the old flag—certainly not during the period that is left to me to be a member of this house.

Mr. W. E. TUMMON (South Hastings): Notwithstanding all the arguments that have been advanced by those who have spoken in favour of a change in the flag, I am yet to be impressed that Canada needs a change in the flag, even though in any design that might be chosen it were provided that the union jack must be conspicuous. The argument put forward by hon. gentlemen that other parts of the empire have adopted a national flag does not carry great weight with me. Because one person does a certain thing is no reason why I should do it; because my neighbour intends to keep up with the Joneses is no reason why I should do the same.

I have seen numerous designs submitted by those who are in favour of a national flag for Canada but I have yet to see a design for which I should be content to vote, even if I were in favour of a change, which I am not. If those who advocate a national flag for Canada are sincere why should they not submit to this house a design and let the house decide between that design and the union jack? If that were done then we should have something definite to vote upon. But why ask this house to vote for a resolution which, if carried, implies that the house is no longer satisfied with the union jack, when those who propose the change offer nothing to take the place of our flag. Let me say to those who submit this resolution year after year that until they bring forward something better than the union jack I for one will continue to vote against their proposal.

Mr. S. C. ROBINSON (West Essex): Mr. Speaker, before this resolution goes to a vote, I wish to register my protest against any change in the union jack. In the part of the country from which I come there is no agitation for a change; there is only an agitation by an organization of persons calling themselves the Native Sons of Canada and if anybody could see the abortion of a flag they have there to take the place of the union jack, he would be surprised; it is enough to make the majority of hon. members in the house vote against the resolution. From reading reports of their meetings I am convinced the Native Sons of Canada is an anti-British organization; it is certainly not a Conservative one. In South Africa they have had a bitter controversy about the flag and the result is that now it is the law of that country to fly the British flag with the South African. We do not want to have any of that bitter controversy in this country. I may say that there are very strong social organizations and especially the returned soldier bodies who are bitterly opposed to any change in the union jack and unless there is a more pronounced agitation than there is at the present time for a change, I do not think we should vote in this house on the resolution which has been brought before us this afternoon. If we do so a wrong impression may go out of the country and, as the previous speaker has said, the world will think we are dissatisfied with the union jack.

In 1929 I went up the Peace river a hundred miles beyond Head of Rail and what impressed me in that country more than anything else was that during the two or three days I was up there I never saw a flag flying from the masthead anywhere except the union jack. All foreigners who come to this country know what the union jack stands for and they are glad of its protection. If we make some new design of a flag for this country, it will take centuries to know what it stands for.

The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst), speaking about the legations, mentioned the foreign legation. London, England, I would like to inform him, is not a foreign legation; it is a British legation. I do not know that there is anything more I can add to what has already been said against the resolution.

Mr. ONESIME GAGNON (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take part in this debate, but I am more or less prompted to do so by the speech of the hon. member for West Essex (Mr. Robinson) who has preceded me. Referring to the development of public opinion which in Canada is certainly very great in favour of the adoption of a national flag, he said something which was not very complimentary to the order of the Native Sons of Canada which he qualified as being an anti-British organization. I have in the past belonged to the Native Sons of Canada; I have no mandate to speak for them, but I believe they are as loyal as any order to which the hon. member may belong. I may add this: not only the Native Sons of Canada but many other associations have expressed themselves to be in favour of the adoption of a Canadian flag and I shall recall to the hon. member who represents the city of Windsor (Mr. Robinson) a convention of the Kiwanians held in that city in 1931 and attended by thousands of members coming from different parts of Canada. I have before me a resolution which was there and then unanimously adopted by the members present at that convention. With your permission, sir, I shall read that resolution:

Whereas, in the last few years, an ever increasing number of associations, public bodies and individuals have advocated the adoption of a distinctive national flag for Canada, which would distinguish our dominion from other parts of the British empire.

Whereas, the union jack is the only official Canadian flag on land and, among the majority of citizens, there is a widespread idea that the Canadian merchant marine red ensign is the flag of Canada, an idea formed by the action of the Dominion government in authorizing its official use on Canadian public buildings, outside of Canada, to distinguish Canadian from British diplomatic headquarters.

Whereas, all British dominions, except Canada, have officially adopted distinctive national flags, so as to distinguish their country from other dominions of the British empire, supplementing the union jack which stands for empire unity.

Whereas, the government of Canada, in 1925, has judged this question important enough to name a committee to study and report on the adoption of a national flag, but the project was indefinitely postponed, although over one hundred designs for a new Canadian flag were considered by the committee.

Whereas, the above facts reflect a powerful opinion, throughout the Dominion of Canada, for the adoption of a distinctive Canadian flag, a flag which would designate Canada, Canadian institutions and Canadian people, and make for better Canadian citizenship one of the objectives of Kiwanis.

Be it resolved that the Kiwanis club of Quebec adopts the principle of a distinctive national flag for Canada, believing that it will promote Canadian citizenship, patriotism and goodwill among all classes, races and peoples of Canada and, without suggesting a design insists that no distinctive Canadian flag should be adopted which does not, in its design, give first place to the union jack, symbol of empire unity.

Be it further resolved that this resolution be presented to the members of Kiwanis in convention at Windsor, Ontario, and sent to committee on public affairs for Canada, so that necessary steps will be taken to ask the Dominion government to reconsider the question of adopting a national flag for the Dominion of Canada.

That resolution was moved by Mr. Owen Callary, president of the Montreal club, and seconded by Doctor A. A. Hicky of the Ottawa club.

Not only did the Kiwanians unanimously pass a resolution in favour of adopting a national flag for Canada, but the Association of Canadian Clubs which, if I understand aright, is not at all a disloyal institution, has also approved of the adoption of a national flag. I happen to be vice-president of the Association of Canadian Clubs, and therefore I know whereof I speak. In 1929 in the Canadian Nation, published by the Association of Canadian Clubs in Ottawa, there is the following article:

Flag Question

There are, it is said, some sixty-four flags in the British empire. One of them is the marine flag, the red ensign of Canada. But on land, Canadians have not a flag of their own, though they frequently use the marine flag for land purposes. What reason is there that makes it impossible for Canada to have a flag which may be properly and legally flown? Surely, there is no reason which would not also apply to the royal navy, to the commonwealth of Australia, to the province of Nova Scotia, to the crown colonies? In Canada, the reason there is no Canadian flag is, it would appear, the totally unfounded fear held by a minority that any combination of the union jack with some Canadian symbol means a weakening of Canada's attachment to the British empire. Essentially, and, as a matter of course, Canadians want the union jack to be a major part of their flag on land, as it already is on sea. That being so, there is no argument that holds water against having such a flag. What argument is there that would not also apply to sixty-four other British flags? To the fact that Canadians have a flag so soon as they leave Canada? If, as the dubious feel, the empire, which has withstood the onslaughts of Louis, Napoleon and imperial Germany, will totter the moment Canadians have a flag as much their own as the Australian flag is Australian's, why did the empire not totter when the red ensign floated from the parliament buildings, as it did for many years? Why were Canadians not accused of a want of imperial loyalty when the Canadian corps in France flew a distinctively Canadian flag? When Bernier carried a Canadian flag to explore the arctic? There is no weight in the argument of disloyalty.

Canadians are proud to be British subjects and always have been. But do they not also want a flag, a symbol of their own to show their own pride in their own part of their own empire? We are not speaking categorically on this subject. We are only attempting to reflect an opinion which is undoubtedly powerful throughout the dominion.

In 1933 I had the honour of being invited by the Canadian Bar Association to address their annual convention at Ottawa. I chose as the title of my address, The Evolution of Canadian Autonomy, and I beg to quote a passage from what I then said:

Who has forgotten the stand taken by Sir John A. Macdonald in selecting a Canadian flag which, as you know, was

"The red ensign of the British merchant ships with the Canada coat of arms in the fly."

There I quoted Mr. John S. Ewart, a distinguished lawyer of Ottawa, who in The Kingdom Papers wrote as follows:

After floating for thirty years over every dominion public building in Canada it was through foolish misapprehension displaced and the union jack restored.

And I went on:

South Africa, New Zealand, the Irish Free State have each a national flag. Canada has none yet. So long as it has none, can it be said to be a sovereign state? Mr. Ewart says no. I do not quite agree with him, but I submit that it is not indicative of much national pride. It is, therefore, opportune that appropriate steps be taken to satisfy the aspirations of the majority of Canadians who are desirous of having a national flag which will embody the aspirations of the French and English elements and be symbolical of the heroic deeds of our great dead and the great aspirations of our young generations.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to compliment myself by saying that that passage received the unanimous applause of all the lawyers present, irrespective of race and party. I desire only to show that really there is in many quarters in Canada, in every province, a strong sentiment in favour of the adoption of a distinctive Canadian flag. I need not say that those who are in favour of the adoption of a national flag are not at all desirous of displacing the union jack in the love and affection which every Canadian citizen feels for it, but they wish, as did the citizens of Australia, South Africa and of all the British autonomous dominions, that Canada shall go forward, that Canada adopt a national flag which, as I said before, shall be symbolical of the heroic deeds of our great dead and of the aspirations of the young generations.

Mr. J. H. MYERS (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to have to disagree for once with my hon. friend the member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon). In the province from which I come we have bodies that are very active: we have a branch of the Canadian legion; we have also boards of trade that take a very keen interest in any and every question affecting the welfare of our province and of Canada in general. But never on one occasion have I yet heard this flag question raised in the province of Prince Edward Island. Down there we are satisfied to go on as we have for many years under the grand old union jack, and I cannot see that any good purpose would be served by mutilating the surface of that flag either by additions or by taking anything away. It is a well known fact that Canada is entirely under the protection of the British navy, over which the union jack flies, and it is my impression that at least for many years to come we should remain as we are and keep the grand old union jack as the flag of Canada.

I shall therefore feel it my duty, in view of the fact that no move has been made in our province, so far as I am aware, to change our flag, either by additions to the union jack or by the substitution of an entirely different flag, to oppose any move towards a change in this matter.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): The department over which I have the honour to preside is called upon very frequently to decide on the use of the flag on official occasions, and we have received during the past four years more or less correspondence with regard to the adoption of a national flag. In the hope that if the consideration of this question is further deferred—not postponed indefinitely—during the present session I may be able after consultation with my colleagues to make some definite constructive suggestion in the matter—in the hope but not in the sure confidence that I may be able to do so—I move, seconded by Mr. Guthrie, the adjournment of this debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Get on with social reform.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think it is reasonable to call it six o'clock. I therefore move that the house do now adjourn.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not see why we should adjourn. The next motion on the order paper is one that relates to housing and the necessity of some program of reconstruction—

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then I withdraw my motion. We will go on.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think we ought to get ahead with the social legislation as fast as we can.

An hon. MEMBER: For ten years you did nothing.

Mr. McINTOSH: This is not an adjournment session; this is a business session.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Adjourn and go to the country.

HOUSING POLICY

PROPOSED NATIONAL POLICY OF BUILDING AND RECONSTRUCTION AS ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL NECESSITY

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (East Toronto) moved:

That in the opinion of this house Canada should inaugurate at once a national housing, building and reconstruction policy adapted to its circumstances, and that such a policy is an economic and social necessity and in the best interests of the people of our country.

He said: I think this resolution is a most important one for the house to consider at the present time. It proposes that Canada shall inaugurate at once a national housing, building and reconstruction policy, adapted to its circumstances. I do not propose that we should go as far as they did in England or the United States, but rather that a survey might be made by the Department of Trade and Commerce or the Department of Labour to find out in what way the federal authority could deal with this problem. Such a policy is at the present time an economic and social necessity in the interests of the people of Canada. Unemployment is linked up with this problem, so is the health of the community. One of the reasons for the mother country recovering far faster than either the United States of America or Canada is the fact that she has taken up many of these economic problems in a big way. For example she has had sickness and unemployment insurance and old age pensions for twenty-three years, with the result that when the depression came on she was better able to deal with the evil. Also nearly one hundred years ago Lord Shaftsbury introduced his legislation to eliminate child labour and sweat shops. Those are among the main reasons why the mother country is recovering to-day more rapidly than either the United States or Canada, although they have largely the same problems.

It is the duty of a Christian country, a Christian community, to do all in its power to see to it that its citizens live in healthy homes. Housing cannot in any locality be separated from the problems of roads, light, water, sanitation or other similar questions.

One of the evils of to-day is the high mortgage rates that are charged. They are retarding progress and recovery. As I say, I cannot emphasize too strongly the necessity of the government taking some action to reduce these mortgage rates which are bearing so heavily on the poor people. In the city from which I come many old workers are losing their little homes because they cannot pay the high mortgage rates which are asked. I hope that in some way perhaps through the provinces and the municipalities, the government may take some action so that loans may be made at reasonable rates of interest to aid the reconstruction of old buildings and the construction of new houses. I believe such a step will be in the right direction, that it will stimulate the building industry and create more jobs and greater employment. If such a step should be taken I believe property owners should be given the right to renew their mortgages at lower rates without the payment of any bonus. Obviously it is unfair to permit people to borrow money on new buildings at lower rates than are charged on existing mortgages. Such an arrangement in my opinion would give an unfair advantage to one class of people in selling their property in competition with others. It stands to reason that if lower rates of interest were provided a great majority of the existing mortgages would not be disturbed; the mortgagees would renew the mortgages at lower rates.

In Great Britain the Tory administration has done a great deal towards solving the housing problem. The government has definitely accepted responsibility for providing adequate housing for every working family in the land at rents within the ability of the worker to pay. There the objective is to put every family in an adequate house, and to abolish all slums. The things that Great Britain has done since the war in regard to housing are simply amazing. Local authorities and specially chartered private enterprises have built houses for 1,160,294 families of workers in the last few years, while unassisted private enterprise has built 1,150,520 more houses, some of them, though not all, for workers. So we find that nearly 3,000,000 new dwellings have been put up by old, conservative, slow-going England since the war. In Washington there are hundreds of these wretched shacks within sight of the capitol dome, occupied at very high rents, many of them unfit for human habitation, yet nothing is being done.

I believe that housing will do more than any other agency to put men back at work. In the constituency of East Toronto which I now represent there are some 300 large and small industries. I was asked to bring this question to the attention of parliament. I admit that under the British North America Act it is hard to solve any of the economic problems of this country. I think it might very well be called the passing the buck act, because that is about what it amounts to in regard to getting anything done in a practical way to relieve the workers of this country under the economic conditions from which they have been suffering for years. Among those who have been driven to the wall in these days of economic stress and strain are many skilled workers, bricklayers, plasterers, carpenters, lathers, plumbers and others. Many of these men are losing their small homes through lack of employment. This question has been studied very carefully in many of the cities of this country, as well as in the United States and in England.

Since it is almost six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I should be glad to postpone the remainder of my remarks until to-morrow, if it is another private members' day, though I am ready to go on now. I am just coming to a report of housing conditions in the city of Toronto, to which I should like to refer for a few minutes. In Toronto a committee was appointed to make a survey, and that committee found conditions which should not exist in any large city, though the city council of Toronto is one of the most active and progressive councils to be found in any part of the British empire. I move the adjournment of the debate until to-morrow.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought what the hon. member meant was to call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, January 24, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

EMPIRE DEFENCE PLAN

INQUIRY BY MR. MACKENZIE KING AS TO ACCURACY OR OTHERWISE OF PRESS REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): On Monday I asked the Prime Minister a question with regard to an article that had appeared in an English newspaper in reference to an empire defence plan and the right hon. gentleman replied to the effect that it was a question that ordinarily ought to have been placed on the order paper in order that time might be given to look into it. He gave a definite answer with regard to the article itself but did not answer at the time, and I imagine was not in a position to do so, the specific question I asked, which was:

> Was the recent visit of Sir Maurice Hankey to Canada made the occasion of a discussion or consideration of any plan of empire defence by any member of the government, or by any official or officials of the government, acting under the authority of any minister of the crown?

The Prime Minister said that he would examine the situation in detail to see whether any further reply should be made than that which he gave. May I say to him that I shall be glad to put the inquiry in the form of a question on the order paper if he prefers to have further time for consideration before giving an answer. If, however, he is prepared to give a definite reply with respect to my question, and the implications conveyed by the article to which I referred that would be more satisfactory.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): As I indicated, I had no notice of the question, but I felt that it was one that should be answered immediately in order that no wrong impressions might be given to the people of Canada. The answer to the question as put is, no. I know of no conversations with respect to empire defence, in the sense in which I assume that term is used, which were carried on by Sir Maurice Hankey with any officer or officers of any of the departments, with the authority of the government, or with anyone else, so far as I know, except, as I found on inquiry, that Sir Maurice Hankey did see the chief of the general staff, saw the camps at Rockcliffe, and matters of that sort. I think he called on the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs and sat with him for an hour, and I believe he accepted the hospitality of the right hon. gentleman opposite. He had many conversations with friends whom he had met in previous years, and I had a few words of conversation with him—not an extensive conversation—and certainly there was no discussion of empire defence in any sense, as far as I know. Nor was any such discussion authorized by the government on the part of any official or officials of the departments in Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I notice that the Prime Minister in his reply says, "So far as I know." Perhaps he will not object if I put on the order paper a question which would specifically cover the knowledge of other ministers. It is quite true that when Sir Maurice Hankey was here some of us had the pleasure of renewing old friendships with him and conversing with him, and I am happy to have been one of the number; but apart from these personal relationships, there is a general impression that matters pertaining to defence were discussed by officials of the department of National Defence with Sir Maurice when he was here. On that point I should like to get exact information.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that is the proper course and the one which the right hon. gentleman should have followed at the beginning instead of asking without notice a question of that character. I think he will agree that if he were Prime Minister he would not care to have a question of that kind asked without notice, with the obvious implications which it carries and in view of the effect it is calculated to have on certain people in the community who have strong views. Now, I did make inquiries, and I repeat that while Sir Maurice Hankey did discuss everything connected with our own country, asked questions, and carried on a general conversation that had no official character, so far as I know, with various people whom he met, he did not discuss with nor was any official authorized to carry on with him any conversation other than the ordinary conversation which one would expect to take place between a man of Sir Maurice Hankey's experience and attainments and any person whom he might meet in any of the services of Canada and whom he had previously known.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In view of what the Prime Minister says, I will not place any question on the order paper; I shall accept the statement he has made.

MARKETING OF POTATOES

On the orders of the day.

Mr. B. F. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I wish to direct two questions to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir). First, in view of the depressed condition of the potato industry in the maritime provinces, and in fact throughout the whole of Canada, what steps have been taken, if any, by the Department of Agriculture or the Dominion Marketing Board to explore possible outside markets? Secondly, what progress is being made toward the formation of a potato marketing board covering the five eastern provinces of Canada?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member notified me that he would ask these questions. A committee has been set up under the eastern Canada potato marketing scheme to explore the possibility of any further markets and also to investigate the question as to what additional use might be made in different ways of the by-products of potatoes. A board has been created with jurisdiction in the three maritime provinces and also in Ontario.

Mr. MARCIL: Can the minister give any information with regard to Quebec?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The province of Quebec had the matter under consideration for some time and it was thought that they would go into it, but finally they decided not to do so.

Mr. MARCIL: Can the minister give the names of the members of the committee?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I shall be glad to do so.

HORNBY SETTLEMENT PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): Will the Minister of Immigration lay on the table of the house copies of the schemes for local settlement under the Hornby plan in the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta?

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): The minister is not in the house at the moment; the question will be drawn to his attention.

RICHELIEU CORPORATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. GRAY (West Lambton): I have a question which I should like the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson) to answer. The question arises out of an item that appeared in the Toronto Globe of Tuesday, January 22, from London, Ontario, under the heading:

Federal subsidy given Richelieu Co., accountant says
Evidence in cattle fraud charges open at London

The paragraph to which I direct attention particularly reads:

Subsidy of $7,392 to outfit a cattle ship was paid by the Bennett government to the Richelieu Corporation, now defunct, at a time when the company's finances allegedly were in jeopardy and the corporation was in debt to Ontario farmers for cattle, declared Charles Sears, chartered accountant, in evidence here to-day at the preliminary trial of three ex-officials of the company on fraud charges.

The question I want to ask is this: Is the sum of $7,392, mentioned in the article, in addition to the $13,000 that was admitted to have been paid by the government, by the former Minister of Trade and Commerce, when this matter was under discussion last year? If so, at what stage of the company's life was the sum mentioned paid?

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): This question is one which properly speaking should have been placed on the order paper, but as the hon. gentleman was courteous enough to give me notice of it, I desire to give him an immediate reply. The answer to the first is in the negative; the answer to the second question is in the affirmative, with this limitation, that the investigation into the company's status was made prior to the payment.

CANADIAN SILVER DOLLAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Can the Minister of Finance tell us when we may expect the new Canadian silver dollar to be ready?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): It is anticipated that the new silver dollar will be ready and widely distributed on the 6th of May, the anniversary which it is intended to commemorate.

Mr. McINTOSH: That will be the election date.

BANK OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): When will the government announce the appointment of the deputy governor of the Bank of Canada?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): As soon the bank is in a position to function.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE GIVEN TO PUBLIC BILLS AND ORDERS OVER MEMBERS' MOTIONS

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I note that public bills and orders to-day precede notices of motions. Is it not usual on Thursday, for the first four weeks of the session, for private members' motions to be taken? Personally I should like very much to have the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Church) given an opportunity to go on, but it is not in keeping with the regular practice.

Mr. SPEAKER: Might I point out to the hon. member that the first motion coming under public bills and orders is a public order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is quite true, but that does not altogether accord with the regular procedure, I think, because the first motion is in reality the continuance of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I think the practice is that which has prevailed in this house for many years. The motion of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) has now become a public order and appears on the order paper in accordance with the statements contained in the rules of the house as to the business to be taken up on each particular day. The hon. member will recall that the order is not the same each day nor the same each day for private members and the course pursued in making up the order paper is exactly the course indicated in the rules we have followed for many years.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let us agree to the address and then we can go on with the order.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) will refer to standing order 15 he will find that the order of business is given for the first four weeks of the session and the order paper is prepared pursuant to that rule according to which on Thursdays public bills and orders come before notices of motion.

STATEMENT BY MR. SPEAKER RELATING TO PRACTICE FOLLOWED IN PLACING QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. SPEAKER: With the permission of the house, I intended when questions were being submitted, to make a statement in connection with a point of order raised yesterday by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger), and I should like to make a short statement in that connection.

The hon. member for Bellechasse on a question of privilege yesterday brought to the attention of the house certain matters relating to the practice followed in placing questions on the order paper. I have not as yet had an opportunity of giving full consideration to the statements made by the hon. member. With the approval of the house I shall at the next sitting of the house make a statement in connection with the points raised.

Before the debate on the address is proceeded with, may I make another observation? I would just remind hon. members of the acoustic qualities of this chamber. When an hon. member is speaking, will he bear that in mind so that others in all corners of the house may hear him.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, January 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. E. Rowe for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned at eleven o'clock on Tuesday evening I was trying to explain some of the peculiar characteristics of the present capitalistic system. I was endeavouring to point out some of the reasons it did not operate at the present time as it had for some considerable time in the past. I also pointed out that the proposals in the speech from the throne were an attempt as it were to try to eliminate some of those factors in order to make the capitalistic system work. The position I take—and I think it is the one that anyone who makes an extensive study of the capitalistic system must take—is that certain conditions are necessary to its operation, and if those conditions are not there, it does not make any difference what reforms we make, the system will not work. One of the first things that is absolutely essential to the orderly and efficient functioning of capitalism is a foreign market because—and I would like hon. members to take note of this—under this system the producers of wealth never receive in return for their labour enough of that wealth to enable them to consume the product. That is, they never receive in return for their labour enough to enable them to consume all they produce. That immediately raises the point that in every particular locality or community the wealth produced therein cannot under capitalism be consumed in that community. That is the fundamental point we have to deal with. Through the development of capitalism the whole world has taken on the aspect of a community and the more we approach that stage, the more difficult it will become to find foreign markets for the products of each particular country.

Let us look back a little way in history. Capitalism had its beginning—I think this is the position most economists take—in Great Britain about one hundred and sixty years ago when steam was first used as the motive power in production. At that time Great Britain was the only country in the world producing in that way. First of all, let us say that Great Britain herself was able to absorb the commodities produced and the machinery of production for the manufacture of those commodities. But the moment she began to sell the machinery of production to the other countries of Europe, to the United States and eventually to the colonies and to the more backward nations, they began to produce and consequently destroyed the market Great Britain depended upon for her existence. While we may rave against economic nationalism, the nations are compelled to adopt that to save themselves from the evil effects of capitalism in its natural development. I have not now time to develop this point as I would like, but anyone who may wish to develop it or to follow it up a little further may see my speech on the budget of last year and for a more extensive study will find a voluminous literature in the library of parliament on the subject.

Another factor that is absolutely essential to capitalism is a continually widening market for the investment of new capital. It requires that field for new investments for the same reason that it requires foreign markets, because of the surplus produced by the working class who cannot consume it on account of the smallness of their wages. Therefore every capitalistic country is continually looking for new fields where it can invest the surpluses that are produced within its own borders. In the past when the champions of protection told us about the benefits to be derived from protection, they always drew our attention to the United States and pointed out how that country had grown up under a protective system. When the protagonists of free trade wanted to tell us of its benefits they would point out how Great Britain had developed under free trade. It must be noted that possibly seventy-five or a hundred years ago Great Britain began extending her foreign investments and it was not until quite recently that the United States began to look for fields for foreign investments. By 1914 Great Britain's foreign investments had amounted to over £4,000,000,000 or approximately $20,000,000,000, while the United States foreign investments at that time were practically nil, but at the present time the United States have foreign investments equal to if not exceeding those of Great Britain. We are now in the position where neither Great Britain nor the United States can find investment for new capital abroad. Nor can they find investments in their own country. I have before me the report of the recent annual meeting of the Royal Bank of Canada; this is what the president, Mr. Morris W. Wilson, has to say in connection with capital available for new investment:

> An extraordinarily easy credit situation has been built up and money is a drug on the market, but it is not yet flowing in normal business channels.

In a report from the old country a few days ago I saw the same thing. Wherever we look to-day we find that every capitalist country of any importance has funds available for foreign investment or investment at home, but that investments are not available.

Then we come to the next reason why the capitalist system cannot function; that is because it is a debt-creating system. It is a debt-creating system for the same reason that it depends upon foreign markets and needs ever-widening fields for the investment of new capital. It is a debt-creating system because there is no way in which the surplus values produced by the working class can be disposed of except by creating debt. I would like those who believe that they can make the capitalist system work to explain away these fundamental economic facts.

Let me show you how in Canada's most prosperous years the debt burden of this country has increased—and may I say that the more prosperous we are the more is it necessary under capitalism that we go into debt.

In 1914, the total federal debt was $544,000,000. By 1932, it had increased to $2,832,000,000.

The annual interest had increased from nearly $13,000,000 in 1914, to over $121,000,000 in 1932.

The provincial debt followed the same course. In 1916, the total debt of the nine provinces was only $240,000,000. By 1932, it had increased to $1,363,000,000; and the yearly interest had increased from nearly $8,000,000 in 1916, to $49,000,000 in 1932.

My own province of British Columbia alone has now a yearly interest bill greater than all nine provinces had eighteen years ago.

Then we come to the municipal debt. The total for the dominion in 1919 was $701,000,000. By 1931, twelve years later, it had increased to $1,275,000,000, and the annual interest had increased from $42,000,000 in 1919 to $76,500,000 in 1931.

Remember that these increases took place in perhaps the most prosperous period that Canada has ever had. If under capitalism debt cannot be reduced in a prosperous period, how are you going to reduce it in a period of depression? Yet, while debt is increasing by leaps and bounds, capitalism has no other means to set the wheels of industry moving than to increase it still further. These are the reasons, very briefly put, why the capitalist system cannot operate.

I say now that while there is no reason why the proposals in the speech from the throne should be opposed by anyone, yet there is no reason why we should feel any elation over them, because they cannot and will not improve the conditions of the great mass of the people at the present time. Unemployment insurance, as has already been pointed out, is of very little benefit to those who have no employment at all. A contributory scheme of unemployment insurance cannot be of any benefit to those who are now unemployed and who have been unemployed for the last four years and have no opportunity to build up reserves for that purpose. I am convinced that there is only one solution for the problem that confronts us; that is the social ownership of the means of production, and their co-operative operation by the people as a whole. A government cannot do anything for or give anything to the wealth-producing class of the country. The farmers in the country and the workers in the city produce the total wealth of the country, and if the farmers or the working class receive anything they can only receive at least part of what they have themselves produced. All that a government can do for a working class, for a wealth-producing class, is to see that the wealth that they produce is not stolen from them. The evidence that has been brought out before the price spreads and mass buying commission is proof positive that neither have any of the provincial governments nor any dominion government seen to it that the wealth which the people produce was not stolen from them. While I suppose it is not in order to comment upon the evidence that has been adduced before that commission, and I do not wish to do so at this moment, it came out that Canada Packers made a profit in the last four years of depression of $13,500,000. I wish to point out that Canada Packers did not make that profit. The farmers who produced the cattle and the packers who packed the meat made that profit of $13,500,000, and all that Canada Packers did was to take it. They performed no useful function that the farmers and the workers who did the work could not perform for themselves. We are quite convinced that the changes necessary to bring about a social order that will meet the needs of the people of Canada on a basis having some relation to the natural resources of the dominion, the industrial equipment at our disposal and our own willingness to work, cannot be brought about in a day. So these ameliorative measures are of value if at the same time we set about building up that new system.

I will conclude by pointing out, as we did in the emergency section in the Regina program of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, that:

> Emergency measures, however, are of only temporary value. For the present depression is a sign of the mortal sickness of the whole capitalist system and this sickness cannot be cured by the application of salves.

There is nothing more than salves in the proposals put forward by the Prime Minister.

> These leave untouched the cancer which is eating at the heart of our society, namely the economic system in which our natural resources and our principal means of production and distribution are owned, controlled and operated for the private profit of a small proportion of our population.

I pointed out on Tuesday evening the smallness of that proportion, about one hundred corporations in this country who own and control the means by which the great masses of the people must live. There can be no solution to our problems until that ownership and control are restored to the people of this country, and the means of production are operated for the benefit of the people of Canada and not for the private profit of a few owners.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended taking part in this debate, but there are one or two points on which I should like to make a few remarks, so I shall take this opportunity of doing so. I notice that the following words have been put in the mouth of His Excellency, in the speech from the throne:

> In the anxious years through which you have passed, you have been the witnesses of grave defects and abuses in the capitalist system.

Certainly this is a great admission and one which we are very glad to see, because we have claimed that the system has been defective for a great many years. Further on in the speech from the throne I find these words:

> These require modifications in the capitalist system to enable that system more effectively to serve the people.

I was delighted, in reading one of the Prime Minister's radio speeches, to find that he made the statement that the system was made for man, not man for the system. Up to the present time—and this has been very true, as the last speaker stated—the people have suffered a great deal at the hands of the system because a real effort was being made to make that system work even though it might be at the expense of the public. Therefore it is a great step in the right direction, it seems to me, to have the Prime Minister of this country publicly admit, both outside and inside this house, that the system under which we are working is not satisfactory, and that it must be altered in the interests of the public at large.

In the speech from the throne reference was made to the Natural Products Marketing Act. I am not going to deal with that measure beyond saying a few words, because that matter was thoroughly dealt with a short time ago by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman). I do want to say, however, that I think this is one of the most constructive acts ever brought before this house, and I believe that the more it is understood in the country, and the more we are able to make proper use of it, the more we will realize the value of that legislation, and the more we will come to believe that when it was passed a year ago a very great step was taken in the right direction.

Reference was also made to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and I rose particularly to say a few words with regard to that legislation. I think that measure, which was designed to enable the farmers in particular to get out from underneath a certain amount of their load of debt, because of the impossibility of the farming population carrying on under the load they are now attempting to carry, was very badly needed. The machinery set up makes it possible for the debtors and creditors to come together to find ways and means of reducing the total amount of the debt owing. It was surmised and hoped that the creditors would meet the debtors and reduce the sum total of debts to a figure which would enable the farmer to carry on his work and retain his home. When the debts were cut down to that figure it was presumed that the farmer then would be on a sound financial footing and would be able to get financed by the farm loan board so that he could pay off his creditors.

If the act had worked out in that way I think we would have done a very fine piece of work, but we find that in some provinces —I do not say all—the farm loan boards do not see their way clear to advance the money to the debtors which would enable them to pay off their creditors. In those circumstances it does not matter in what position the debtor farmer is left, at the will of the creditors, if the farm loan board refuses to allow him to make use of its facilities. In such cases this measure will not be the success we hoped. In certain provinces we find that those in charge of the administration of the farm loan boards have taken the very definite stand that they are not going to be very enthusiastic in trying to make that act work in order to meet the needs of the debtors, even after the debts have been cut down considerably. In that case it means that the debts have not been cut down sufficiently. If the farm loan boards cooperate there are great possibilities in this legislation, and with the power given the Minister of Finance a year ago to buy upwards of $40,000,000 of farm loan bonds, a very serious situation with regard to agriculture can be readily met.

The speech from the throne further goes on to speak of the Bank of Canada as an instrument of national policy to direct the better utilization of the credit resources of Canada. I do hope that this is not what we might term lip service, because here there is a chance to make the greatest possible use of our national credit. I hope there will be no hesitation in doing so. In the speech from the throne we find advocated many measures in the way of reform. There is no doubt that if these reforms are brought about they will entail considerable expenditure. I do hope that the necessary money will not be collected from taxation, except to the extent that the very large incomes may be more heavily taxed; I hope the fullest use may be made of the national credit in order that these reforms may be carried out.

It is suggested that better provision should be made to protect the worker from unemployment, and in sickness and old age. This has been advocated from this corner of the house for a number of years, and I am delighted to see it in the speech from the throne. It has occurred to me, as it must have occurred to all hon. members of this house in the last few years, that it has been strange to find so many old men still hanging on to their jobs, perhaps because they are not seventy years of age or because they have not been in the country long enough to become entitled to the very small old age pension we now give our old people. In those circumstances they have refused to give up their jobs, because they would be put on the dole. As a result we find our younger population out of work in very large numbers, and we have had to open camps all across Canada to take care of these able, virile and in some cases well educated young men. It does seem to me that we are doing something entirely wrong in keeping the old men at work while we put these young, healthy men into camps. If this statement in the speech from the throne means anything I certainly hope it means that we are going to alter that state of affairs in order to give men, say over sixty, an opportunity to take things a little easier through an old age pension, and at the same time give the young men of the country an opportunity to find work.

According to the speech from the throne a survey is to be made of the national debt structure. I am very glad to see this statement. The house will remember that last year we in this part of the house introduced a resolution along this very line. So we are glad to find this statement in the speech from the throne, for it makes us believe that something is really going to be done in this respect.

I notice in the speech from the throne that there will be an extension of the facilities for long term and intermediate credits. I sincerely hope something will be done to make the farm loan board more operative and give better service than it is giving at the present time. The reference to minimum wages and a maximum working week is I believe a step in the right direction. Hon. members to my right will correct me if I am wrong when I state that that was one plank in the Liberal platform of 1919. I had the privilege of sitting in this house for nine years when that party happened to be in power, yet we do not find any mention of this legislation until the year 1935. I trust nothing will hinder the passage of any legislation along these lines.

A further statement in the speech from the throne refers to necessary alterations in the incidence of taxation so that it will more directly conform to capacity to pay. That is a move in the right direction. I am reminded of the budgets brought to this house in the years 1927 and 1928 when we found that the government of that day decided to decrease the income tax on large incomes a procedure which I have always thought was a distinct mistake. In good times, when money is plentiful and business is brisk we should keep up our taxation so that we may put something by for a rainy day, that is create a sinking fund. It is much easier to collect extra money in good times than to collect it when times are bad and cash is scarce.

Turning again to the speech from the throne I find there are to be safeguards for the consumer and primary producer against unfair trading practices. When he grows stock or grain the farmer finds himself in the position of a producer. We know only too well about the miserably low prices he has had to accept for his farm produce in the past few years. On the other hand we find he is in the position of a consumer when he must buy his repairs, machinery or binder twine. He is a consumer when he has to buy food, and particularly that food which although originally from the farm has been processed in a factory and is returned to him at a very greatly enhanced price. I am quite certain those people living on the farms will view with a great deal of interest this particular clause in the speech from the throne because they stand to benefit not only as producers but as consumers, if the legislation introduced reflects the spirit we hope will be manifested.

We find in the speech from the throne that we will be invited to enact measures to regulate, in the public interest, concentrations in production and distribution. No doubt some legislation of that sort will be introduced when we receive the report from the price spreads commission. At the present moment I am not going to make special reference to that commission because I hope we shall have plenty of opportunity at a later time to discuss the work it has been doing and the findings it has made.

We find further we will be invited to enact measures to provide the investing public with means to protect itself against exploitation. This I believe has particular reference to watered stock. I shall simply remind the house that not only during the life of the last government but in the early years this government held office the matter of watered stock was discussed by hon. members sitting in this corner of the house with the object of reform but nothing was done at either time. Although such action is late I am pleased the government has placed in the speech of His Excellency a statement intimating that they are going to attempt to solve the problem.

Turning again to the speech from the throne we find there will be introduced a reform in our penitentiaries system, and that consideration is being given to the Borstal system. I have no doubt the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and other hon. members who for many years past have recommended reforms in our penitentiaries will appreciate this clause, despite the fact reforms are overdue. We shall watch with a great deal of interest the legislation which will be introduced by the government, and will be pleased to learn how far they intend to go in their reform program.

It gives me pleasure to note that there is to be a reorganization in the government service. Whether or not we happen to agree with many of the Prime Minister's policies we have to give him credit for making very necessary and worth while changes in the Department of Finance during the time he was minister of that department. I am quite sure no one could be better qualified to take the initiative in a reorganization of our whole civil service than is the present Prime Minister of Canada. I note further in the speech from the throne that an economic council will be set up to advise the ministers upon all economic questions concerning our national welfare. Here again I am pleased to welcome the suggestion, one which has been made at least twice from this corner of the house. Upon each occasion it was recommended on our behalf by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman).

Hon. members in this part of the chamber are not greatly interested in what political party places legislation on the statute books; we are far more interested in seeing legislation placed there. If the present government is prepared to place upon our statute books the legislation mentioned in the speech from the throne I am quite sure it will receive the fullest support from hon. members in this corner of the house on any legislation we have suggested in the past. People have been looking for some action, and I am not going to blame the Prime Minister if some think he has made a volte face. If he is doing something worth while or constructive he should not be criticized. Very often a change is a sign of progress. I agree with the hon. member who preceded me that many of the suggestions are salve; I am ready to admit that. At the same time it is better that a doctor should recognize the sickness of his patients and be prepared to administer a salve and follow with a real remedy than not to recognize the sickness at all. The present government apparently recognizes that the nation is sick and it is prepared to take some action. If in the nine years it held office the late government had had the courage to come forward with these reforms I would have paid it the same compliment and would have given it the same hearty support as I shall give the present government on the reforms suggested in the speech from the throne.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, there are a few observations I wish to make at this time. I wish particularly to address myself to certain questions that were raised by the Prime Minister in his radio addresses and in the speech from the throne to which I have given a good deal of attention during the years I have been a member of this house.

The present session reminds me somewhat of the session of 1926. I think those hon. members who were members of the house at that time will bear in mind the legislation that was passed during that memorable session, and one of the pieces of legislation which made such a lasting impression on the country was the old age pension act. We got the old age pension act through parliament during that session and it became the law a year or so subsequent. To-day there must be approximately 40,000 people throughout the Dominion of Canada who are receiving the benefits of that legislation. I said that there was some similarity between that session and this session of 1935. In 1926 the government was not a very stable government; they had a very small majority in this house, and it appears now that the present government is not very stable. It appears further that about the only time that we can expect to have enacted social legislation that is worth while is when we have not a stable government in power; and there, Mr. Speaker, is the similarity between the two sessions.

Now on the eve of an election we are to be favoured, and I am very pleased to see it, with some social legislation which I hope will confer equal benefits and advantages upon the people of Canada as did the old age pension act of 1926.

It has been suggested by the Prime Minister and those associated with him that there is going to be a series of drastic reforms in the economic structure of this dominion. The fact that these proposals have been made, that these reforms have been suggested to parliament and the country, is in the first place, in my humble opinion, a clear admission that the policies pursued by the government for the past four years have been a failure so far as relieving the economic conditions that have prevailed in this dominion. It is an admission that high tariffs have not proven a remedy for the evils from which we are suffering, that the dumping laws have been no remedy, that the public works that have been inaugurated to relieve unemployment and the dole which has been given to millions of our people have not proven a remedy for the economic ills of this dominion.

But there is this one thing at least that I am thankful for to the Prime Minister, and that is that he has brought a reality into the situation that was formerly lacking in all the public discussions throughout Canada. Now it appears that the problem of employment and the problem of unemployment are about to become the paramount issues. I am very glad that such is the case, for during the past nine or ten years that I have been a member of this house, year in and year out I have brought to the attention of parliament proposals in the nature of reforms and various suggestions that have been made by the small group of which I happen to be a member and which received at that time only scant consideration. If time will permit I hope to put on the records of this house some of those proposals.

The government's new proposals include unemployment insurance, insurance against sickness and invalidity, and insurance against old age. They promise to bring in legislation to regulate the hours of labour and also wages. There are also to be a number of relief works instituted in various parts of the dominion. But at the very best, Mr. Speaker, relief works and the dole are only temporary in their character, and if we are to deal fundamentally with this problem of unemployment we have to go far beyond merely providing relief works for those who happen to be out of work.

The other day the Prime Minister made reference to a loan of $100,000,000 which he had obtained in the United States in the year 1930 for the purpose of giving relief to the unemployed of this country, and for the purpose of carrying on public relief projects. I had no objection at that time, in the short session of 1930, to the Prime Minister going to New York, and if I remember correctly to the firm of Morgan and Company and obtaining this loan for the dominion, but it did seem to me an anomalous procedure, and I would not have referred to it to-day except that the Prime Minister brought it to the attention of the house in his speech during this debate.

That money was required to give to the men and women who were out of work in this country sustenance and relief. A portion of that money was earmarked for what has been termed the dole, to provide food, clothing and shelter to the men, women and children of Canada who at that time most unfortunately were without these necessities. It seemed so ridiculous to me because we had food, clothing and shelter in this country in abundance. Out on the prairies we had more wheat and more food than we knew what to do with. Our warehouses were full of clothing, and our carpenters and builders were walking the streets anxious to construct homes for the people to live in, and yet Mr. Speaker, before our people, before the great masses who were out of work and hungry in this country could eat the foodstuffs which they themselves had produced, they had to get permission from Morgan and Company in the city of New York. If you can show me a more anomalous and ridiculous situation than for us to have to go to a foreign country to get permission to eat the foodstuffs which we ourselves have produced, and are not allowed to consume I would like to know where you could possibly find it.

It has become quite a common and almost a fashionable thing during the past few months to condemn the capitalist system. This afternoon I am not going to condemn capitalists. I have condemned the system quite long enough now. The Prime Minister in his addresses has spoken on more than one occasion of the defects of the capitalist system, and I have been very anxious to hear him speak more particularly on what in his opinion were the defects in the system and what exactly would be done to relieve the situation. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that we can get rid of unemployment and the evils of unemployment within the confines of the capitalist structure.

May I here refer for a few moments to what they have been doing in the United States during the last couple of years. There they had a vast army of unemployed, the same as we have had here, and for a period of two years they have been pumping into the economic structure of that country approximately thirty billions of dollars—a staggering sum of money which the average human mind can hardly realize. And yet in spite of the fact that they have pumped into the economic life of that country thirty billions of dollars, conditions in the United States are hardly any better to-day than they were two or three years ago. There must be a reason for that. If the pumping of so much money into their economic structure can have so little effect, then naturally one is impelled to ask: Why is it that in spite of all these efforts that have been made in the United States there still persists this unemployment problem which as yet they have hardly touched? Here may I say that in discussing this question in this house a year or so ago I made observations to this effect: I said that what they are trying to do in the United States is to create a cooperative structure within the confines of the competitive capitalist structure, and I said that it was impossible to have a structure which was at one and the same time both competitive and cooperative. I claimed that sooner or later one must give way to the other, and much sooner than one might have expected the cooperative efforts of the government of the United States have given way to the competitive system, and probably within a comparatively short time we shall find the United States proceeding on completely different lines in a further attempt to solve the unemployment conditions that prevail to the south of the line. Therefore, if there has been no basic improvement in conditions to the south of the line as a result of the spending of the vast sums of money to which I have referred, it means that if we in this country are to end or even to alleviate unemployment we shall have to look in some other direction than that which has been followed in the United States. At all times we have looked in the direction of creating more work to provide more employment. I submit that our first and basic consideration should be to provide not more work but more consumption of goods among the people of Canada. There is to-day no lack of productive capacity if the people were given an opportunity to consume; but there is that great lack of consumptive opportunity amongst the great masses of our people. We have found during the past few years that there has been a wide spread between actual production and actual consumption, and unless we can get a reasonable balance between consumption and production then we shall continue to have unemployment and poverty on our hands and in our midst just as we have at the present time.

As a member of the labour group in this house, I say that we are strongly opposed, bitterly opposed, to the curtailment of production. And we have opposed it from the very first. I well remember that when the Minister of Finance was over in Europe a year or two ago he spoke about the people there consuming more of our wheat, and this expression I lauded. But why reserve that increased consumption for the people of Europe? What about our own people in Canada? Have they no prior consideration to our own production in the dominion? Why should they not be entitled to consume more than they have the opportunity of doing at present? I submit that our whole effort should be to increase the consumptive opportunities of the people of Canada; or, to put it another way, there must be a more equitable distribution of the wealth produced in Canada than there has been up to the present time.

The plans, either of this or of any future government, if the economic situation is to be relieved, should be considered from this particular angle, because I hold that it is only as we increase the actual consumption of goods by the people of the country that we shall make any impression upon the economic distress now prevalent. Unemployment is inherent in the capitalistic system. I want to see unemployment and all that it implies in the way of poverty and so forth entirely eliminated. But if we cannot have it eliminated immediately I am prepared to do all I can as a member of this house to alleviate and mitigate conditions with the ultimate objective of completely eliminating unemployment from our midst.

Now what the average citizen of Canada is looking for is some security in life. This he has not at the present time. The million or so who to-day are on relief have no security and very little hope for the future. The other day the Prime Minister gave the house some figures in reference to the unemployment situation. He claimed that between 1932 and the present time, from a peak of 750,000 those out of work had decreased to approximately 400,000; I do not know very much about these figures and I have not had time to examine them, but I presume they have been prepared by competent statisticians. I do know however that in the large industrial centres where unemployment is prevalent, where there are so many people on relief and where the relief figures bear eloquent testimony to the unemployment situation as it exists in most of those large centres, the decrease in the number on relief is approximately 10 per cent. If this is the case there must certainly be a most serious problem confronting us at the present time.

When I look at the government's proposals I want to see how they fit in with some of the suggestions I have made. How would they give the average Canadian more security in life than he has to-day? How would they give him a better standard of living than he now enjoys? How would they give the man or woman out of work an opportunity to obtain a livelihood and work?

Coming to unemployment insurance, I may point out that this is a matter to which I have directed the attention of the houses for the past nine years as the records of Hansard will show. To my way of thinking, unemployment insurance is a very desirable objective. It is a proposal which I will support provided the bill meets the essentials of what I should regard as a comprehensive scheme of unemployment insurance in this dominion. But to-day we have reached a stage in the economic life of this country where any scheme of unemployment insurance if it is on a contributory basis will take care, not of those who are out of work at the present time—they will be left alone—but of those who are to-day employed and who may a year or two hence find themselves out of work. If therefore we deal with the unemployment insurance problem any measure such as that is not going to alleviate the immediate distress among our Canadian citizens who are at present out of work.

With regard to sickness and invalidity, any bill which is brought in and which will ensure against these evils will without the slightest doubt receive my unhesitating support. But there is a question which I must ask with regard to old age pensions. It has been foreshadowed by the Prime Minister in somewhat ambiguous terms that he is going to bring into being a system of contributory old age pensions. I say his language is rather ambiguous because I hardly understand what he means when he speaks of a contributory system of old age pensions. If he implies that he is going to place on a contributory basis the pension system which is now in effect in Canada, then I will strongly oppose any bill of that kind. Any pension which is received under the provisions of the act of 1926 is given as a right: in fact, in my opinion, it is more of a right than the pensions given generals, judges and officials of the government. But if the Prime Minister's statement implies that he is going to follow in effect the system in Great Britain, then I am prepared to give it the sympathetic consideration which such a proposal naturally deserves. For in Great Britain there is a dual system of old age pensions. Between the ages of 65 and 70 it is on a contributory basis; after 70 the entire cost of the pension becomes a responsibility of the government. If there is going to be a contributory old age pension in Canada, I do hope the first thing the Prime Minister will do will be to bring down the age level of those who are entitled to its benefits and thereby perhaps help somewhat to relieve a congested labour market.

I now come to minimum wage laws and a maximum work week. I attach more importance to a minimum wage law and a maximum work week than I do to the proposed measure dealing with unemployment insurance. I attach far more importance to that aspect of his proposed legislation than I do to anything else appearing in the speech from the throne, for if the Prime Minister or the government wills and parliament wills, by establishing a low maximum working week and a high minimum wage, he can do more to relieve the unemployment situation than anything else he has done during the whole time he has been in office. The time has come when there should be a complete revision of our maximum working week and minimum wage laws. Our minimum wage laws are altogether too low and our working week is altogether too high. If we are ever going to absorb the masses of our unemployed into the productive life of this country, this can be done only by a restriction of the hours of labour. I know there are many hon. members, possibly on both sides of the house, who have a strong objection to both minimum wage laws and a maximum work week. Well, those laws have been in effect in this country for quite a number of years, but I believe by attempting to put a national law into effect, one that will be the same in all the provinces as regards both wages and a maximum work week, we can go a long way towards doing something for those who at the present time are unemployed. I know it will be said that this will have the effect of increasing price levels. I know it will also be said that it is pretty hard to do all these things within the confines of the existing economic structure. I realize such a law, that is for a maximum work week and a minimum wage, may have the effect of cutting very deeply into the profits of many of our corporations, but if I have to choose between the profits of our corporations and providing for the well-being of the masses of our people, I am going to be on the side of the masses. As I said before, the spread between wages, which in many ways means consumption, and production must be reduced, and one of the few ways by which we can reduce that spread is by insisting on and maintaining a high minimum wage level in our industrial life.

I come now to another point in the discussion concerning the problems with which I have just dealt: I come to the question of the attitude of the provinces. I know some of our provinces are very jealous of their rights. I am not going to blame any of them for that jealousy, but I think there comes a time in the life of possibly all of us when something of great importance must transcend our own personal interest. So now in the life of the Dominion of Canada there has come a time when the enactment of legislation as foreshadowed by the government must take precedence over certain of the rights of the provinces. It has been realized time and time again that as regards the questions of minimum wage laws, maximum working week, unemployment insurance and so on, there must be in the dominion a centralized authority, because without such an authority we could have no successful scheme in operation of any of these laws. Instead of there being opposition from the provinces at this juncture, I hope every one of the nine provinces will attempt to cooperate with parliament and the government, however one cares to put it, so that there may be brought into effect in the dominion something that will be of lasting benefit to our people. The common weal of the Canadian people at this time transcends in importance some of the constitutional issues that may be raised by those who are not in favour of this form of legislation and who no doubt will be opposed to it. No province can isolate itself from the rest of the dominion any more than the dominion can isolate itself from the other nations of the world. So I sincerely hope the provinces will join the central authority, namely, the federal parliament, in its corporate capacity to bring about legislation that will at least leave, as I said before, a lasting impression on the social and economic life of the dominion.

I said previously a word or two in regard to the efforts that have been made by hon. members in this corner of the house to further social legislation. I am glad to see that after all these thirteen years of effort by various members of the independent groups we have at last reached a stage where the feeling is practically unanimous that legislation along the lines we have suggested should be put upon the statute books. I hope when the legislation comes before the house none of us will be disappointed. I accept the assurances of the government that the legislation will be of such a character that it will accomplish something worth while.

May I now go back to give a brief synopsis of the situation. In 1919, after the war, when there was a great deal of unrest in the dominion, the then government appointed a commission to inquire into industrial unrest and it was asked to make as speedy a report as possible on many of the problems of that day. That commission reported that among other matters, industrial unrest was caused by unemployment and the fear of unemployment. In other words, they felt that unemployment and the fear of unemployment caused amongst the workers a sense of insecurity and this was more the cause of unrest than anything else they were able to ascertain during the period of investigation. So they recommended another committee to investigate the whole question of unemployment, sickness and invalidity insurance with a view to early legislation and with, of course the federal government acting in the matter.

A few months later at a convention of the Liberal party, they embodied the proposals of this royal commission in one of the planks of their platform. If I may read the exact plank of the platform of the party, it is as follows:

> That in so far as may be practicable having regard for Canada's financial position an adequate system of insurance against unemployment, sickness, dependence in old age and other disabilities which will include old age pensions and maternity benefits should be instituted by the federal government, in conjunction with the governments of the several provinces, and that on matters pertaining to industrial and social legislation an effort should be made to overcome any question of jurisdiction between the dominion and provinces by effective cooperation between the several provinces.

Now let me turn from this plank in the Liberal platform of 1919 and jump to the Conservative platform of 1927, adopted at the convention held in Winnipeg in the fall of that year. The following resolution under the heading Capital and Labour was adopted and inserted in its platform:

> So far as is practicable to support social legislation to design and conserve human life, health and temperance, to relieve distress during periods of unemployment, sickness and old age.

It will be observed that there is a good deal in common between what the Conservative party proposed in 1927 and what the Liberal party proposed in 1919.

Then I come to the parliamentary session of 1926. There we find in the records of the house some of the earliest efforts made to get social legislation enacted by parliament. On January 7, 1926, my hon. friend the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) wrote certain communications to the then leader of the house, now the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and to the then leader of the opposition now the leader of the government in the Senate Mr. Meighen. These communications have been put on the records of the house so often that I shall not weary the house with them at the present time, and will just say that we received communications in reply from both the leaders. From the then leader of the opposition, Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, we received replies most evasive and unsatisfactory in regard to unemployment insurance and old age pensions, but we received from the then Prime Minister, now the leader of the opposition, a reply more definite and satisfactory; and as a result no doubt of our efforts during that period we had legislation introduced in 1926 which subsequently became law. I am informed by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) that the number of old age pensioners in Canada to-day is approximately 87,000. I had put the figure at 40,000. I am glad of the correction; it goes to show how beneficial that legislation was and how worthwhile were the efforts of my hon. colleague for Winnipeg North Centre and myself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to interrupt, but is it not a fact that two years before the communications to which the hon. member refers were written the house had already appointed a committee at the instance of the Liberal government of the day to inquire into the question of old age pensions and to study the question of jurisdiction and report upon it?

Mr. HEAPS: That is true, but that report was never adopted by the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But the old age pension legislation was a direct outcome of it.

Mr. HEAPS: No, as I said at the outset when the right hon. gentleman was not present, we get this good legislation when we have not got stable government. If we had a stable government in power now we might have had an election a year ago and might have been spared the legislation now proposed. That is a surmise, but I feel that when parties in the house are nearly balanced and the government is not certain of its tenure of office we are more likely to get something for the benefit of the country than when we have stable government.

Mr. MUNN: Is it not true that old age pension legislation was enacted by the provincial government of British Columbia years before it was put into effect in this house?

Mr. HEAPS: No, I think the provincial government of British Columbia was the first to take advantage of the legislation passed in this house. But it was not effective there before the act was passed in this parliament. However, I am not going to quarrel over that aspect of the question.

On March 15, 1926, my hon. friend the member for Winnipeg North Centre moved in this house the following resolution:

That, in the opinion of this house, a wage sufficient to provide for a reasonable standard of living should constitute a legal minimum wage.

I am glad to say the whole house consented to it, but of course we have had no definite action until now.

Mr. MUNN: We had in British Columbia.

Mr. HEAPS: I am speaking of the federal government. I know that British Columbia is a remarkable province, has a remarkable contingent in this house and some remarkable legislation.

On Wednesday, March 16, 1927, the following resolution was introduced in the house by myself:

That, in the opinion of this house, the committee on industrial and international relations be instructed to investigate and report on the establishment of a system of insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity.

This motion was talked out on that occasion, on a Wednesday afternoon, which I remember very well and about which the less I say the better.

In the following year, on February 16, 1928, I again introduced the same resolution word for word, but the government of the day, now the opposition, accepted the motion and it was referred to the committee on industrial and international relations. For the rest of the session of 1928 and the session of 1929 the matter was under review by that committee. However, before it went back to the committee, on February 14, 1929, I asked that the same resolution as I moved the year before be adopted by the house in order to give the committee the opportunity of considering it during the session of 1929.

In both years the committee made a report to this house. That report was in many respects somewhat ambiguous. They favoured the principle, but I have long since come to the conclusion that a little bit of action is worth more than many resolutions in the House of Commons.

On June 1, 1928, the committee submitted to this house its first report, recognizing the necessity of providing some form of unemployment insurance, and that it would have to be dealt with before very long. It also recognized the question of jurisdiction as between the provinces and the dominion in clause 3 of the report. I think we all recognize that there is this question of jurisdiction as between federal and provincial authorities, a very important issue.

On May 1, 1929, when the second report came before this house, I was not satisfied that the committee had gone as far as it could. It is not enough merely to point out the difficulties inherent in our constitution in connection with this sort of legislation. On Thursday, May 23, the chairman of the committee submitted the report in the house for its approval, and I asked by way of amendment that the report be referred back to the committee on industrial and international relations with the following instruction:

That the said report of the select standing committee on industrial and international relations be not now concurred in but that it be referred back to the select standing committee on industrial and international relations with instructions that they have power to amend the same by adding thereto a clause recommending that all the provinces of the dominion be requested to pass legislation under which the jurisdiction in relation to legislation providing for unemployment, sickness and invalidity insurance based on compulsory contribution and which is now claimed to be within or subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces be vested in the dominion government.

My purpose at that time, in moving that the report of the committee on industrial relations be amended, was to have the house take concrete and definite action. It is quite true that in 1929 the unemployment situation was not as serious as it is at the present time, but we knew that as surely as night follows day, cycles of depression follow cycles of prosperity. So I wanted the report referred back, with the idea of bringing in some legislation which could be adopted by the provinces exactly as they have adopted the federal legislation in regard to the old age pension measure.

At that time my amendment was ridiculed; lawyers on both sides of the house rose and told me how badly it was drafted, how impossible it was, and how it was ultra vires of the constitution. When the matter came to a vote we saw all the Liberals and Conservatives vote against the amendment, with only eighteen or twenty members of the house supporting it. My amendment was defeated, and that was the last we heard about unemployment insurance for some little time. However, the unemployment situation became worse, and on March 31, 1930, the following year, on going into supply I moved:

—in the opinion of this house the government should take immediate action to deal with the question of unemployment.

Again I raised the question of unemployment insurance.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. HEAPS: I am sorry that my time is up, Mr. Speaker, but I shall take the opportunity, perhaps when one of the bills is before the house, to present the remainder of the data I have before me respecting efforts made to secure action respecting social legislation.

Motion (Mr. Rowe) agreed to.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That the address be engrossed and transmitted to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of the house as are of the honourable the Privy Council.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved:

That this house will, at its next sitting, resolve itself into a committee to consider of a supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is just giving notice that to-morrow the motion will be moved?

Mr. RHODES: No, I am moving it now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think notice has to be given.

Mr. RHODES: I think not, according to the rules.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is my hon. friend quite sure of that?

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. leader of the opposition raises the question of whether notice is required. I am advised that it is not. Rule 57 reads as follows:

The house will appoint the committees of supply and ways and means at the commencement of every session, so soon as an address has been agreed to, in answer to His Excellency's speech.

No notice is required or ever has been given, I am advised.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was rather surprised that the government did not give notice at a previous sitting.

Mr. BENNETT: My right hon. friend will remember that last session I brought in the motion before the address was adopted. Probably that is what he has in mind.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved:

That this house will at its next sitting resolve itself into a committee to consider the ways and means for raising the supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1935-36

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the estimates tabled on the 23rd instant, together with the accompanying message of His Excellency, be referred to the committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSING POLICY

PROPOSED NATIONAL POLICY OF BUILDING AND RECONSTRUCTION AS ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL NECESSITY

The house resumed from Wednesday, January 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Church:

That in the opinion of this house Canada should inaugurate at once a national housing, building and reconstruction policy adapted to its circumstances, and that such a policy is an economic and social necessity and in the best interests of the people of our country.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (East Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to detain the house for more than a few moments this afternoon in discussing the motion which I introduced at about twelve minutes to six yesterday afternoon.

I have had many requests for the introduction of such a resolution from the riding I now represent. Mine is an industrial constituency with over 300 large and small industries. In that constituency there is a great deal of unemployment among the old citizens; many plasterers, carpenters, bricklayers and builders of all kinds are out of work. May I say that I agree with the remarks made by the distinguished Prime Minister in the city of Montreal last night. This is a most involved problem affecting the whole country, but as a people I say we cannot go into it in the wholesale manner the motherland has adopted. Over there about £400,000,000 have been invested in a housing scheme, leaving a burden on business which posterity will have to pay.

I must say however that there are some features of the problem which as a House of Commons we should consider. My personal view is that interest rates on mortgages should be substantially reduced. I do not approach this matter from a party standpoint but have adopted only the economic point of view. It is a question which I think should commend itself to all parties in the house. In adopting a decrease in interest rates on mortgages we would be marching along with the times and following the vigorous leadership given by the federal, provincial and municipal governments which have very materially reduced the interest rates on new bond issues. Those governments are finding no difficulty in having the rates cut almost in two and having their loans taken up.

Although the banks have not reduced the rates on call loans, and although they are still receiving seven or eight per cent they have cut the rates on deposits from three per cent to two per cent. This action in my opinion releases large sums which could be made available for builders and other investors. Builders have great difficulty in paying seven per cent or eight per cent in these depression years. Last year one hon. member stated that shark loan companies had been operating in the city of Toronto from which I come and that those companies had been charging from 25 per cent to 45 per cent on money for second mortgages. The payment of rates of seven per cent or eight per cent during depression years involves a very heavy bunden on small loan mortgagors who are heavily taxed. There have been great numbers of sales for taxes in almost every municipality in Canada and it is my opinion money cannot earn the high rates it earned before. Some action could be taken along these lines. Investors who got seven or eight per cent on their money will have to be satisfied with smaller returns on their investments, and in that connection there should be some government regulation established.

Undoubtedly reduced money rates would lead to greater building activity, something which is badly needed. It would aid any reconstruction policy and would have the effect not only of erecting new buildings but of renovating the old ones which for many years, due to high rates, have been allowed to go into a state of disrepair. The old rates of six and a half, seven or eight per cent are too high. In view of the borrowings large public bodies have been able to make at low rates the investor or the mortgagee ought to be satisfied with a reasonable return of five or five and a half per cent.

Under the British North America Act, particularly the section relating to public debt and property I believe a bonus, subvention and subsidy policy along certain standard lines might be possible. Such action would aid any housing program, the money being given to the provinces and distributed by the local agencies. In my view local agencies are a far better medium than would be a national housing commission which would cost a lot of money and might do very little or nothing to relieve the situation. The housing commission in England has resulted in a burden of untold dimensions upon the shoulders of the taxpayers. Thirteen years ago in this very house I introduced a motion respecting national coal supply, providing bonuses, subventions and subsidies for the industries in the maritime provinces. The same motion had to do with the man who grows grain on the prairie provinces. That motion was almost laughed out of the house and was voted down, although the party to which I belong supported it consistently, due to the fact that it has always been a protectionist party. I believe the policy along these lines which the Conservative party adopted away back in 1922 or 1923 has done a great deal to help tide this country through the depression years. I may mention the present leader of the government was one of the most outspoken in support of that policy which affected the miners of the province of Alberta.

I am suggesting that a change might be made in that section of the British North America Act having to do with public debt and property, and provision could be made the same as it has been made for old age pensions, and other things. Local authorities should concentrate on the elimination of slums in the larger cities, and the rehousing of those people displaced through the improvement in conditions. In my view private enterprise should not be opposed by state aided competition, except under rare and exceptional circumstances. There is no reason why one citizen rather than another should obtain a subsidy from the taxpayer to help him pay his rent. The situation would be different if the country decided that a housing scheme should be considered a public service, and be treated in the same way as education. Under such circumstances such a general policy would be logical. It should then be for the general good and be for the benefit of everybody, not just the newcomers. However for a country with a debt as high as that of Canada such a scheme would be an absurdity.

Any help we gave should be given only after adequate inquiry by the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Department of Labour, and only after a careful survey. The money should be given to municipal authorities under a carefully defined plan. As I have stated I am opposed to and believe there is no necessity for a national housing commission. My belief is that already we have too many commissions spending money. Any plan which might be adopted should also include rural housing. In many rural communities this matter is one of vital importance. Particularly is that true of northern Ontario, that part of the province where the Dionne family live. Only a short time ago owing to the illness of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) I had the privilege of speaking at the town of Bracebridge. On my way home I had an opportunity to see some of the shacks in which those rural people have to live during the winter months. I can say only this, that if we had not spent so much money on railways and state aid for privately owned railways, and had spent a million dollars of that money in a housing scheme for those people we would have done something much more to our credit.

The first duty of a government is to look after the health, comfort and welfare of its people. This motion is wrapped up with the subject of public health, because I believe housing and public health are subjects closely connected. Further, any housing scheme would be a boon to the unemployed.

We should make an effort to erect small houses, to rent at low rentals. The particular problem is local, as I see it, and is closely wrapped up with the problems of good roads, transportation, water supply, lighting and drainage. There should be power to levy rates for these purposes. In 1917 the city of Toronto started a housing policy largely to relieve unemployment. Toronto has been a pioneer in housing under its medical officer of health, the late Doctor Hastings, a man who did more for public health in this country than any man I know. He established a health department in Toronto which was a model for the whole country. He was strongly of the opinion that we should do something in the matter of housing, believing that it would be a good step forward in public health and in caring for the welfare and comfort of the people especially the children and infants. Toronto has spent a large sum of money erecting houses in the constituency which I now represent in this house. It was not a financial success because we required federal and provincial cooperation, which we were unable to get. At that very time hundreds of millions of dollars were being voted in this house for railways which are to-day bankrupt and a burden on the people. It would have been far better to divert a part of those millions to housing and to the elimination of some of the slums that exist in this country to-day. A wave of emotion seems to be sweeping our country on the subject of slums, and we shall have to be very careful to see that a proper survey is made and that our policy is adapted to our special circumstances. It will need oversight if we are to benefit to the full from a public policy on housing. We shall have to consider whether the people who move into these new dwellings will be able to pay the new rents. We must also beware lest the big heritage of debt be so heavy that posterity will have to pay it. The debt of this country is composed largely of the war debts and railway debt. It is a great burden at the present time on business. The Conservative party sitting on this side of the house has always resisted any effort to place on business any heavier burdens than business was able to bear, and it has tried to avoid placing any artificial barriers in the way of the small business man who feels so heavily the burden of debt and taxation.

The people of England brought down in their budget last year the sum of £16,000,000 which the taxpayers of the motherland were asked to provide for a housing scheme to cover the twelve months of this year. As I said in this house yesterday, in reply to my hon. friend from Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) I refer to Magna Charta in this connection because of the unemployment and the high taxes and the high mortgage interest that many men have hanging over their heads to-day. I do not see the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) or the hon. member for South York (Mr. McGregor) or the hon. member for West York (Mr. Lawson) at the moment, but I have passed along the highways in their constituencies and many times I have seen the red flag of the bailiff flying over the homes of poor men who have lost their property. Even to-day we are imprisoning people for debt. I have seen people taken from the city hall in Toronto and placed in jail for debt.

I say here and now, Mr. Speaker, that the statesmen of the Edwardian and Georgian eras must bear before the bar of history some of the blame for their failure to deal with this question of slums, for their failure to cope with the problems of housing and unemployment, and with the effect on unemployment caused by the advancement of science and the use of machinery. The people of this country, as I said the other day are becoming very largely a nation of machine minders. A woman can mind a machine as well as a man, and the result has been that we have a large increase in female unemployment and a decrease in male employment. I believe that there can be no liberty when man is at the mercy of economic conditions which are beyond his control, and which react upon the women and children of the country. Unemployment, it is well known contributes to the deterioration of our whole people and the losses it causes amount to hundreds of millions of dollars a year. So far-reaching are its effects that generations yet unborn will have to pay for this disaster of unemployment which has come upon the men and women of this country.

In 1930 I brought this question of housing before the house, but no attention was paid to it. Just a few days before the house prorogued in 1930 I asked a question of the then Minister of Labour, now in the Ontario house, and he told me that unemployment was a matter for the provinces and the municipalities. We are paying now, Mr. Speaker, for thirty years of neglect of this problem of unemployment, with which the housing problem is wrapped up more closely than any other.

England has recovered more rapidly from the depression probably than any other country, and that was because they were ready for unemployment. They had a housing policy, and they have had unemployment and sickness insurance for the past twenty-three years, as well as many other forms of assistance which have helped them to tide over the depression. Their recovery has been much faster than that of the United States or Canada, which are faced with similar problems. The mother country is a pioneer in abolishing slums. What they have done in that direction is marvellous. Several million new homes have been constructed in the motherland in the fifteen years since the war.

I might refer to the budget that was presented to the British parliament on April 17th last. I quote from an article The Budget and Slums by B. S. Townroe, M. A.:

> In the budget presented to parliament on April 17, provision is made for over £16,000,000 to be taken out of the pockets of the taxpayers for housing subsidies.
> This heavy levy on public funds is only a part of the bill in connection with housing. In addition, every ratepayer in the United Kingdom has to contribute his quota of the rates towards these housing subsidies, and helps to meet weekly losses on nearly a million municipal dwellings. Every year sees a steady increase of the loss, and in the years to come our children and grandchildren will still be paying for houses, which by then will be obsolete in design, and in certain cases have already deteriorated into slums.
> Some idea of the rapidity of the increase was given by Mr. Chamberlain, who stated that the total amounts paid by the state on account of housing subsidies were £13,668,333 for 1930-31; £14,520,831 in 1931-32; and £15,214,726 in 1932-33.
> No one can estimate with certainty the extent to which the public purse will be further burdened owing to the very generous subsidies now being offered by the National government in order to stimulate slum clearance. The ascertainment of the capital value of the various subsidies offered is by no means easy, for it alters from one-half year to another according to the rates of interest.
> The truth of course, of the position is that, not only in Leeds, but elsewhere, municipal tenants have become so accustomed to receiving an indirect dole in the form of an unduly low rent, that they very naturally resent any attempt to dislodge them from their privileged position.
> Under the Addison scheme of 1919, 173,000 houses were built. The loss on each of these dwellings amounts to about 15s. per week, paid by taxpayers and ratepayers, and this debt, a legacy of the Coalition, will not be wiped out entirely until after 1982. We shall, in short, go on paying, dependent to a limited extent on rates of interest, nearly £40 a year, for half a century, for each Addison home.

As I say, I do not urge such a scheme on the people of this country because the country could not stand it. But the provinces and municipalities with the active cooperation of the government might urge the loan companies, the banks and the insurance companies to take some action. They have received a great deal of state aid in Canada, and a great many of the policyholders of the large insurance companies find to-day that they cannot pay the rates that now prevail. But these large companies have a good deal of money hoarded, money which they hold in trust for the public, and I suggest that instead of losing a lot of money in common stocks throughout the world they might very well lend a small portion of it at a low rate of interest to the small policyholders. Had this been done long ago it would have been a blessing to the people of Canada. Owing to the rapid strides which preventive medicine has made in the last twenty-five years, through surgery and science, the death rate has been reduced very materially per thousand and the people have not received the benefit of this in connection with their insurance. I say therefore that the banks and insurance companies might be urged to do something along the line I suggest.

I have here a copy of a report submitted by a committee of investigation which has been looking into housing conditions in the city of Toronto. I do not agree with all of its conclusions, some of which are extravagant; but this commission has been certainly a great boon to the public. It has brought to light, in one of the pioneer cities of Canada, conditions that need remedying. I quote the following from the report:

> Our survey of Toronto housing conditions reveals that there are thousands of families living in houses which are unsanitary, verminous, and grossly overcrowded. The committee confidently estimates that the number of dwellings which for these and other reasons constitute a definite menace to the health and decency of the occupants is certainly not less than 2,000 and may be more than 3,000. In addition there are probably half as many houses again which, while not in the same sense menacing, nevertheless lack the elementary amenities of life.
> Bad houses are scattered all across the city; but they have clustered in down-town districts, conspicuously in Moss Park and the Ward. Here the evils of the houses themselves are aggravated by the incessant traffic and by the proximity of factories and warehouses. Here the problem of reconstruction is most urgent.
> Bad houses are not only a menace: they are active agents of destruction. The committee is satisfied from its investigations and inquiries that they destroy happiness, health and life. They destroy morality and family ties. They destroy the basis of society itself by their destruction of self-respect and their promotion of delinquency and crime.

These conditions are bad enough, but they are not as bad in Toronto as in any other city. There is however urgent need to do something to meet this problem. In the early days the average citizen owned his own house or a cow or a store. To-day we are becoming a nation which is divided into the haves and the have nots, and those who have are very few. The means of production are in the hands of a few people. In the old days of Macdonald and Brown and Cartier the people at large owned some property. To-day, under modern capitalism it is far different. In my opinion the aim of this house should be to provide a job for every man. As I say, most Canadians in the early days were property owners; they owned real estate, their own homes, farms or small factories, and ownership was the basic institution in Canada's life. But big business has been destroying the traditional Canada of which I speak. I am glad therefore to see that the Conservative party is now doing something to rectify conditions and solve the question of distributism, so that we may restore Canada to the status it held under Macdonald, Brown and Cartier, when this was a land of free homes, artisans and farmers owning real property. Private property was the basis of our life then.

I am glad to see that a reconstruction policy is to be undertaken. We have in Canada a capacity of 42 million horse power but so far we have developed only one-sixth of it. Now in my opinion we should long ago have had a housing and a reconstruction policy in Canada. I think that a hydro electric policy to distribute power to the two central provinces as well as the other industrial areas of Canada would be an excellent thing. I was asked by a deputation of my constituents to bring this matter to the attention of the house, and I promised to do so. While our powers are limited, there is no reason why we should not make a study of the British system as well as of what is going on in the United States and in other parts of the world. We cannot undertake things on the elaborate scale we find in the motherland, but I suggest that there might be a generous subsidy to the provinces, distributed for the following among other purposes: First, to encourage rebuilding and reconstruction in urban, rural and suburban territories; second, to encourage reconditioning and rebuilding as well as renovations in urban and suburban areas, and third, to encourage the small home owner and private builders, it being necessary to do something to reduce rates. Further, I urge the necessity of clearing down all slums and encouraging private enterprise to build homes, with or without state aid, through building societies or through loan companies, so as to abate overcrowding and reduce mortgage rates along the lines I have indicated.

I wish to compliment the leader of the government on what he has done in getting our party back to the masses where it belongs. Macdonald and Laurier did not have to contend with the conditions that confront him and I congratulate him on the announcement he made last night in Montreal that there is to be a reconstruction policy, which I understand from the newspapers will involve some $40,000,000. I am glad also that something is to be done with regard to housing, commensurate with the needs of the country and the ability of the taxpayer to pay, in view of the state of the country's finances. There is no reason why this policy should not be supported by the Progressive and the Liberal parties, for it is good Liberal doctrine. It seems to me that the government in the old country is to be commended. While it is true that it may be called a Labour government, it is supported by the Conservative party there, and it is certainly to be congratulated on the reforms which it is carrying out. I believe all parties in the house should unite and do something to try not only to cure this defect but to help to remedy this unemployment that is bearing so heavily upon our people.

The hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) will second the motion.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): Mr. Speaker I have supported the resolution of the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Church) from a partly different viewpoint. I am not altogether in favour of every argument he has advanced in support of this resolution, but I have a vivid recollection of 1919 when the then dominion government decided to appropriate an amount of, I think, $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 for the purpose of a housing scheme. The result of this was to give employment to a great number of men. The money was distributed, as I remember, according to population and as a result the government has received back from most, if not all of the provinces, the total amount of the capital expenditure. This scheme at that time produced certain results that were beneficial to the country as a whole.

We must remember, too, that the building industry as such is composed of at least ninety to ninety-five per cent of labour and I say that after careful study of the situation. We have, for instance, the steel industry in Canada which supplies the wants of most of our Canadian building industries. We have the cement industry, the brick industry, the lumber industry and all those others that combine to make a house for an ordinary man in an ordinary situation. In every one of these cases it will be found that on the average the labour costs are at least ninety per cent of the whole. Therefore, any policy that might be enunciated by any government in Great Britain or any other country, would have the advantage of giving employment to the extent of ninety to ninety-five per cent of the total expenditure.

There is no doubt at the present time the building situation in Canada as in many other countries is at an absolute standstill. We have not the ordinary amount of capital flowing from our insurance companies or from other sources which are willing to accept mortgages at the present mortgage rates. The result is that the building industry in cities like Toronto, Montreal and many others is at an absolute standstill and two and even three families are being crowded into premises which originally were designed to house only one. I am not interested in this proposition except perhaps from this viewpoint, that I represent a riding which is concerned largely with the lumbering industry and partly with the other industries connected with the building program. We also wish to build more freely and under better conditions, just the same as the city of Toronto does. I am sure this is equally true of Montreal, Sorel or any other city in Quebec, and it is equally true in the western provinces. I am desirous of having this government if possible enunciate a policy which will tend to relieve the situation and which will give an impetus to the building of homes for our people throughout the dominion. There is no question about the fact that, as I have already stated, this money will eventually go to the extent of ninety-five per cent into the hands of our wage earners. I can conceive of nothing which would do more to better the present situation than a proposal of this kind.

I represent a riding which is partly lumbering, partly farming. During the winter the farmers depend to a great extent upon the lumbering industry, and this has been cut off, not because of hard times, but simply because the building industry has been strangled by one means or another; and I have no intention of saying what those means are. But I believe if the government would accept a policy of this kind and do what is possible, as was done in 1919, to relieve the housing situation, they would accomplish a great deal and would be doing it in the right way.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Church) for introducing the resolution which is now before the house. It is one of the most sensible which he could have introduced and naturally I should commend it seeing that I urged such a project upon the government in 1932 and introduced a resolution somewhat similar in character a year ago. The fact that Great Britain and the United States have both engaged very actively in the construction of houses for their people during the last two or three years lends a good deal of added weight to our request or demand for government action along this line at this time.

I believe this is what a housing project at the present time would mean; it would be bringing idle men and idle equipment together and employing them on our natural resources to create real wealth in the shape of houses that are very much needed in Canada.

Mr. ST-PERE: There is no shortage of houses in Montreal.

Mr. COOTE: I would like to stress the need of good homes in Canada because of the climate in which we live, and while I do not want to advertise our climate as not being a good one, it is such that our people should be able to enjoy the benefit of good warm modern homes whereas about one-half of our houses are not of that type. A large percentage of the people in our part of the country are living in what we call shacks, and a large percentage of those in the cities are living in what are termed slums. The bureau of statistics, I know, has considerable information upon this subject, information that was gathered when the census was taken in 1931. Unfortunately, that information has not yet been made available to us in pamphlet form. I understand it will very soon be available and I regret it has been so long delayed. Of course I realize that is because the bureau has been a little short of help in compiling the statistics in that form. I know there is a need for many more rural homes—and I say "homes" advisedly, because as to many of the places in which our people are living it is a little difficult to call them homes, they are so inadequate. Only five per cent of the farm homes in Canada are equipped with bathrooms with running water. Six hundred and fifty thousand farm homes in Canada should be equipped to-day with modern facilities, and in any housing project which may be started should take cognizance of that situation. In other words, the project should be such that many of these houses in the country could be changed into modern homes. I mean that in addition to building new houses it should be possible to have a scheme for financing the rehabilitation of a lot of houses that now exist.

I have here a few facts gathered by a housing commission in the city of Halifax a few years ago. I placed them on Hansard in March, 1932, and seeing that no steps have been taken, as far as I know, to remedy these conditions I would like to quote two or three of them again. I am sure they are indicative of conditions that exist in other cities of Canada as well. They showed that in one case, for one room in a cellar occupied by five persons, a monthly rental of $10 was being collected. In another case people were paying $6 a month for one room in a cellar occupied by seven persons. In another case $12 was being paid for living quarters in the loft of a barn occupied by six persons. Seven rooms were occupied by twenty-eight persons at a rental of $150 per month. In another case two cellar rooms occupied by eight persons cost $10 per month. In one case one dark room with door only was occupied by three persons for which they paid $10 a month. Many other somewhat similar instances are quoted in that report. I say again I do not think this applies only or particularly to the city of Halifax; it is a situation that can be duplicated in many of our cities. I am simply trying to make the point clear that houses are needed both in the cities and in the rural communities. We have in Canada everything necessary for the construction of houses—concrete, brick, stone, lumber; I think all kinds of building material and building hardware is manufactured here. I presume even the window glass can be made in Canada, or if not we certainly could trade wheat with Belgium for it.

Mr. QUINN: Will the hon. member permit a question? Will he tell me if these rentals just quoted are charged for properties under the control of the housing commission in Halifax?

Mr. COOTE: Oh, I do not think so. I did not want to create that impression. I said these facts were published in a report issued by a local commission appointed to investigate housing conditions there.

As I say, we have all these materials; we have the architects, the engineers, the artisans, the labourers; and leaving money and credit out of account there is theoretically no impossibility about using our natural resources, our equipment and our men to construct houses for the people. These houses would be an asset on which the credit, or money, whichever you like to call it, which is necessary for the instituting of this work could be created.

I hope that if such a program is undertaken it will be financed at a very low rate of interest, because the rate of interest charged for the construction of these buildings will largely determine whether or not the people can buy them. The difference between eight per cent, which people are now paying on houses bought on the instalment plan—in one case I know of ten per cent is being paid or attempted to be paid—the difference between those rates and a rate of two per cent, which is available, I believe, in some cases in the United States, in itself would enable these people to pay for their houses over a reasonable term of years. There has not been a time for many years when construction costs were so low, that is when houses could be constructed at as low a capital cost.

I would like to emphasize the point, brought out by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs), that housing provides more employment than most other kinds of work in relation to the amount of money expended. I have here an article from Collier's, dealing with the construction of houses in the United States, which gives some particulars of where the dollar goes. It says:

> The public works administration has tried to estimate the destiny of the dollars spent in low cost housing. Here is the way it works out: Out of every dollar spent, six cents goes to the architect, superintendents, foremen, clerks, et cetera. Thirty-eight cents goes to the building trades workers; twenty cents to the workers in the mills which make lumber, bricks, cement, plumbing, electric wiring and other fabricated materials. Another seven cents goes to workers in the raw materials industries—forests, iron, coal, et cetera. Four cents goes to workers on railroads and trucking for transporting goods et cetera. This makes seventy-five cents paid out to labour in wages. And what becomes of that? Remember the private life of the dollar I told you of. This building dollar goes to stores for shoes, hats, radios, etc., to factories, to workers in factories, to farmers and so on.

And then he says:

> Imagine two billion dollars living private lives like this.

In Canada I do not suppose we would go to the extent of two billion dollars, but whatever amount we invest in a housing scheme will largely go through the hands of labour, to circulate as indicated in that quotation.

On another page of the same article there is given a picture of some low priced homes which have been built in the United States. It shows one set of buildings and says that the average cost, including a barn in this case and a three-quarter acre plot, was $2,150.

Mr. ST-PERE: Is that in the southern states?

Mr. COOTE: It is in the state of Virginia.

Mr. ST-PERE: No wonder it would cost only $2,150.

Mr. COOTE: We could put a few hundred dollars more on that and build a good warm house. I hope if we do engage in a housing scheme the houses will be insulated to make them suitable for a climate such as we find in Ottawa to-day. These houses could be sold to the people on easy terms; under the new policy which is to be brought in I think we might expect that the people from now on will be guaranteed an income, and I do not see why under that policy every family should not in time be able to own a home. I think that should be the objective in regard to housing in Canada—every family owning a home if they want one. I see nothing impossible about carrying that out if we have the right idea in regard to the financing of such a project.

Again I say that the houses themselves will furnish an asset against which the credit necessary to finance the scheme can be issued. I hope that before this session is over the government will arrange for commencing at least what we might call an adequate housing program for the people of Canada.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker, I want to say how thoroughly I am in sympathy with this resolution. I am not, however, going to devote the short speech I intend to make to the building of houses, but rather to the repairing of houses, and not only houses but buildings in the country—country houses and farm buildings. In Ontario anyone who has been watching the countryside with an observant eye will have noticed that in the last ten years or more the buildings, including the dwelling houses, have been deteriorating. Roofs are leaking—they need new roofing; the buildings need painting; the stables in many cases need repair or replacement; the houses are almost without the conveniences that houses should have—plumbing, sanitary conveniences, and lighting fixtures. As I listened to-day to the several speeches made on the address in reply, excellent speeches, that much as I find myself in agreement with the social legislation now proposed, I have become more and more alarmed with regard to the position of the farmer. Many of these proposals, good as they are, are for those other than agriculturists, and unless something is to be done to guarantee to the farmer if not a fixed price at any rate a price level that will take care of the cost of production, including wages for the farmer and all the members of his family who work with him, I really view the future for agriculture with a good deal of misgiving.

The rural buildings in the province of Ontario need repair terribly. I am familiar with this province; as I go over it and see the sections and counties that were really beautiful ten or fifteen years ago, and contrast with that their present condition, I cannot help but become saddened by it, as I am sure other hon. members of this house must be. I feel that if we are going to have a housing scheme, part of that scheme must have relation to the repair of such existing buildings as should be repaired, and the needs of the farmers must be particularly considered. All hon. members, as politicians, must be familiar with farm houses; some of you must have stayed in them, particularly hon. members who have constituencies which are partly rural. You know without being told how much the farmer is doing without. You know, as I do, something of what he is putting up with, the lack of reasonably good housing, of decent lighting, of sanitary conveniences, of comfortable furniture, of adequate reading material and of almost everything that goes to make up the sum total of human happiness. So, much as I favour the housing program, I want to say as emphatically as possible that any program that does not provide for the repair of such farm buildings as already exist, as well as the installation of conveniences in farm homes, is insufficient. It is a fact that many farmers who are still struggling to pay their debts, who still call themselves independent and who resent any suggestion of what they still call charity, are living below the level of people on relief. There is no doubt of it; they are living in worse homes, they have poorer food and clothing and less recreation.

That brings me to the question of the cost. The farmers cannot afford much unless farm prices are raised, and I read the speech from the throne in vain for assurance that would give me hope that this is to come about. If farm prices are not raised then any interest rates that the farmer may be required to pay must be very, very low. I do not believe that agriculture in the province of Ontario to-day can afford to pay interest rates of more than three per cent either for repairs, for mortgages or for the requirements of the farm. I believe three per cent is the limit. So, in supporting the proposal advanced by the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Church) I want to stress the need for low interest rates. It seems to me that if the chartered banks can pull figures out of thin air which they call money, there is no reason at all why the dominion government cannot do the same thing. They should be able to lend vast sums of money to municipalities at exceedingly low rates of interest, and I believe this plan would work out better if the municipalities are closer to the people. Conditions vary so much as between municipalities and provinces that I feel that a central commission could not handle the whole scheme anything like as well as it could be handled by the municipalities themselves, with of course, some supervision on the part of the government. But the financing must be done by the central source, the federal government, and it must be at extremely low rates of interest.

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make one or two observations with regard to the resolution moved by the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Church). I believe that if he has done nothing else he has made a distinct contribution to the present session of parliament by moving this resolution, which may result in a crystallization of opinion from one end of the dominion to the other as to the vital necessity of a housing policy at least within the confines of the larger centres.

An hon. member representing a Montreal constituency said that there was no shortage of houses in that city. That may be true, but I think it is only fair to say that I know of no city in the dominion that needs a housing policy more than it is needed by the city of Montreal. I do not say that in any spirit of criticism; to a lesser degree the same might be said of the city of Toronto, and from my practical experience in the city of Hamilton I certainly believe it is needed there.

One of the most important problems confronting us in negotiating any building policy under private enterprise is the enormous height to which interest rates have risen in the last three or four years, making it economically unsound to launch a building program of any description. The hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) spoke of houses that needed repair. I speak of houses that are beyond repair. Conditions exist in most of the larger cities of eastern Canada which, in my judgment, constitute a challenge to the vision of those responsible for the housing of our population. Last year I spent some time in England and on the continent, and I was amazed at the real progress that has been made there in connection with housing schemes, most of which have had assistance from the various governments. Even where I lived in England as a boy I noticed a tremendous difference, with the development of garden cities and other developments that were economically sound because they were revenue producing.

I was very much impressed with the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) last night in Montreal. If the right hon. gentleman was reported aright he intimated that he had in mind some policy designed to meet the situation as it exists in Canada at the moment, particularly in the larger centres. Frankly I believe it is economically sound, because most of these properties will be revenue producing. Many guesses have been made this afternoon as to the proportion that is paid in wages in connection with building projects. Actually 80·2 per cent of all money spent in building goes in wages alone. I give that quotation from the joint conference of building construction industries in Canada, held from May 3 to May 6, 1921.

I also think a tribute should be paid to the lieutenant governor of the province of Ontario. He has given real assistance in moulding public opinion, and his observations have been divorced from the everyday arguments we hear in political discussions. During the last year he has intelligently and in a concise manner advocated a clearance of slums. I remember listening to an address he delivered before the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, one which for soundness and clarity was unequalled by some of the best speeches made in this house. He indicated that in the city of Toronto there were 1,500 houses which should be torn down in order to provide satisfactory shelter for the people living in them.

Quite recently in my home city of Hamilton a paper was delivered by Doctor James Roberts, the medical health officer dealing with conditions in that city. He indicated that bad housing brought about an increase in the sickness rate, in the general death rate, in the infant mortality rate, in the tuberculosis death rate, and in the incidence of anaemia and rheumatism; in an increase in the incidence of rickets through lack of sunlight, and, what is often the concomitant of bad housing, ignorance and lack of vitamins and industrial inefficiency.

In 1921 and 1922 an inspection of 4,666 premises was conducted under Doctor Roberts' direction. The finding was that the location, faulty or bad original construction and irremediable structural defects rendered most of those, even with the expenditure of large sums for repair, impossible of being regarded as proper homes. It was particularly noted that where a person owned his own home he took a greater pride in keeping it sanitary and in good repair. In November, 1933, another inspection was made, and the following are some of the details of the findings:

Home No. 1. Attached stucco cottage, 5 rooms, occupied by two adults and 10 children ages 16, 15, 13, 12, 10, 9, 7, 6, 4, 2½ years and 11 months. Rent $12 per month paid by tenant.

Home No. 2. Frame cottage, 5 rooms, occupied by three adults and 5 children ages 14, 13, 10, 6, and 4 years.

I could go on almost indefinitely giving similar examples. Since March, 1919, England and Wales have built over 2,060,000 new homes. During this same period Canada has built approximately 230,000, or on a per capita basis, about forty-five per cent of the number built in England. Toward the building of these houses £148,500,000 in subsidies were subscribed by the state and municipalities.

I believe this government would do well to make some investigation having in view the ending of intolerable housing conditions which at this moment exist in some of the larger centres in Canada. I am not unmindful of the troublesome time through which we have passed, but I should like to point out that ninety per cent of the building tradesmen have been out of work for more than two years, and in view of the vast amount of building money which goes into actual wages a building program would be beneficial. I could quote the opinion of John Maynard Keynes and other economists of Great Britain, men who were the driving force from an expert point of view in the present government policy of that country, which would substantiate my views as to the soundness of an undertaking of this character. A building program would differ somewhat from the public works policy initiated last year by the government. I am not making this statement in any spirit of criticism. A home building program is economically sound because interest charges and other costs are met.

In bringing this matter to the attention of the chamber, if for no other reason, the hon. member for East Toronto has rendered a signal service. The question is a social one in which all political parties should be vitally interested and which all parties should thoroughly discuss.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is the sixth session of this seventeenth parliament. If the suggestion that was made by the opposition in the first session with respect to the appointment of a national commission whose duties it would be to supervise all efforts at relief and methods of securing employment for the unemployed had been adopted, this motion would not have been necessary at this time because its objectives would have been attained long before this.

Hon. members I think will recall that at the first session of this parliament, the so-called special session, and all subsequent sessions, I stressed very strongly the desirability of the government, in dealing with the problem of unemployment, appointing a national commission or committee, a body that would be representative of the more important industrial and philanthropic interests in the country, of employers and employees, of railway companies, of such organizations as chambers of commerce, the manufacturers' association, the trades and labour congress, the Salvation Army, the Red Cross and bodies of that sort, which national commission would be a body formed for the purpose of administering expenditure of federal appropriations for relief purposes and supervising and linking up all efforts at relieving unemployment and providing work by coordinating whatever might owe its origin to funds provided by the federal government, provincial governments and municipalities or other bodies.

The government at that time, I believe, thought the depression was not going to be of long duration, and, as members will recall, the vote of $20,000,000 was asked for. It was voted in a lump sum without any indication being given to the House of Commons as to how that money was likely to be spent, other than that it was in the nature of a grant in aid to the provinces in connection with public works which they themselves might undertake. I think it was to be one-third of what might be given by the provinces and by the municipalities themselves.

Session after session that same method was adopted of voting large sums of public money. In fact we reached the point the very next session, I think it was, where money was voted under what is known as the blank cheque system, the government taking what it pleased out of the treasury to give to the provinces as grants in aid in the name of relief or for the purpose of providing employment for the unemployed, this was given to those provinces which were assisting municipalities requiring on their side a contribution by the municipalities.

Well, that was tried for a while, and then we came to have a program of construction, more or less indefinite, but after a lapse of a year or so at the last session made fairly definite, when a bill was passed appropriating public moneys for the construction of public works and public buildings.

In addition to those methods there was also for a considerable time, and is yet, what we speak of as the dole, simply the giving out of sums of money to be paid to families that are in need of immediate direct relief. But at no time has the government had any policy that could be called such, a policy with respect to providing work and administering relief which from beginning to close was consistent and continuous.

I might read again what I read on monday last as the statement of Liberal policy on this matter, as it was outlined at the first session and subsequent sessions and as it was placed on record along with other matters of Liberal policy in one comprehensive Statement in this house on February 27, 1933:

> The Liberal party believes unemployment is Canada's most urgent national problem. It would deal with the present emergency conditions through a representative national commission, which would cooperate with the provinces and municipalities in the administration of unemployment relief, and in an endeavour to provide work for the unemployed.

"In an endeavour to provide work for the unemployed." If we had had in Canada a national commission of the kind operating during the last three, four or five years, does any hon. member believe it would be necessary at this time for a private member of this house to bring in a resolution pointing out the necessity of the government having a policy on housing? Would not the housing question have arisen in connection with any national scheme of providing work? You have these large public buildings that are being put up here and there, but, as everyone knows, in municipalities the need for proper housing conditions is very great indeed. In Toronto within this last year an important committee has been at work on the housing question in that city. His Honour the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario is chairman of the committee that was appointed to deal with the matter, and the report which the committee has submitted is an excellent one, disclosing as it does the development of slum conditions in the city and the need for proper housing conditions for many of the citizens of Toronto. I am sure that similar conditions exist in Montreal, and to a lesser extent in all the larger centres throughout the dominion. Does anyone suppose for a moment that a national body administering federal moneys for purposes of providing relief to the unemployed and supervising the work of the provinces and of the municipalities and of the dominion, where public moneys were being spent from all three sources, would not have, long before this, developed in connection with any such scheme a housing plan which would be part of a nation-wide plan?

My right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and myself had the privilege and the pleasure of visiting Great Britain last year. I am sure he was impressed, as I was, with what is to be seen there of the immensely improved conditions as respects housing for the industrial classes throughout Great Britain. There is nothing quite so much in evidence as to what has been and is being done in the way of improving the living conditions of the people during this period of hard times, as is to be seen in the improved housing conditions. The better housing schemes have served two purposes. To begin with, they have enabled the unemployed to find work, and in the second place they have permitted that work to be of a class which would help to serve the special needs of great industrial communities. Two birds, in other words, have been killed with the one stone; public moneys, in helping to provide employment, have also helped to provide better housing conditions. I had the privilege also of visiting one or two other countries in Europe, and I must say that what I saw, especially in Italy, in the way of what the government had accomplished during this period of unemployment by putting to work unemployed men on housing schemes, park and recreational developments and the improvement of conditions generally in the cities and around the homes of the working classes was the most impressive of anything I saw while abroad.

In the working out of a national housing, building and reconstruction policy, there is no need of any question of jurisdiction arising. The plan that was suggested by the opposition was offered as a plan which would avoid the necessity of any question of jurisdiction being raised, because it did not suggest more than that the commission's work should be carried on with the voluntary cooperation of the provinces and the municipalities. I remember at the time that the Prime Minister stated that he did not think any moneys paid out of the federal treasury to the provinces should be supervised even by the auditor general—that it would be an insult to ask that the auditor general be given the right of seeing how federal moneys which had been turned over to the provinces to assist in unemployment relief had been spent. Well, I think the Prime Minister has seen—he has confessed it—that there was enormous waste of public money as a result of failure to adopt that precaution of having all public expenditures out of the federal treasury supervised by the officer of this parliament who has been appointed for that purpose.

Not only has this money been in large part wasted, but many of the municipalities have found themselves well-nigh driven into a position of bankruptcy, simply because for a long time they felt that the only way in which they could get a share of federal or provincial moneys was by agreeing to contribute more for public expenditures on relieving unemployment than they would otherwise have felt they were in a position to afford.

I am sure that a body of the character which I have suggested would have been of great service. It was suggested every session, first at the short session, then at the second, the third, the fourth and the fifth, and now at this sixth session I am going to suggest it again as the proper way of dealing with this question, namely, the appointment of a national commission to supervise the whole matter of the expenditure of public moneys on relief and in providing means of employment. That is the step that should be taken if this work which is nation-wide in extent is to be carried out effectively. It is essentially effective cooperation and coordination in all effort that looks to providing employment that is needed in dealing with a great problem, such as this problem has been all along through these past five years.

During the time of the war, when we had a national patriotic fund to be administered, a national committee was appointed under federal act for the purpose, and the auditor general or a member of his staff was appointed in connection with the supervision of all outlays. Some of the moneys were federal, some were provincial and some were moneys raised by municipalities and voluntary organizations of one character or another. But the whole fund was administered and supervised as one, the actual disbursements being made of course locally, but the fund ran into many millions of dollars. When the committee's work was completed, and the auditor general's department made its report on the expenditure of the moneys every cent of the moneys contributed from different sources was accounted for. As far as I recall, and I was a member of the national committee, there was not a single dollar of money that had been contributed to the patriotic fund which was not fully accounted for, and it was all spent for the purpose of caring for families in need, where the head of the family or the ones upon whom others were dependent were serving overseas, or had been killed or wounded in the war. To that example and precedent I have directed the attention of the house at the different sessions which I have mentioned, pointing out that it ought to be sufficient in itself as an example to guide the government in matters of this kind.

I will not say more on this subject now because it is more important to get these things done than to talk about them; but I hope the Prime Minister this evening will speedily assure the house that the government is wholeheartedly in support of this resolution which asks that the government have some policy on housing, building and reconstruction. I know that every hon. member on this side would welcome such a step and regrets that some step leading to this end was not taken six or rather five sessions ago instead of at this last moment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Some hon. gentlemen opposite are laughing; I do not know at what they are laughing.

An hon. MEMBER: Fifteen years ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, and a nice position we should have been in to take this step fifteen years ago.

Mr. BENNETT: The Union government did fifteen years ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, but I am not responsible for anything they did or did not do. I am responsible for the position I have taken on the matter, and I repeat that, reviewing it calmly, it will be seen that what I have suggested is the one satisfactory and sensible method of dealing with this question. And it is the only method which escapes the vexatious question of jurisdiction and at the same time affords effective means of bringing about that coordination which is absolutely necessary if the work is to be extensively and efficiently performed and, at the same time, performed without colossal waste of public money.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The resolution which was moved this afternoon by the hon. member for Toronto East (Mr. Church) deals with a problem that is not new to this house. In 1919 or shortly after—I forget the exact date—the government of the day made certain advances to the provinces to enable them to deal with the housing problem. Many of the provinces accepted the proposals that were made, borrowed the money and used it for housing purposes in their respective territories: In Great Britain, immediately after the war, in 1919, a scheme of providing for new houses was launched and the treasury subsidized the effort. I observe from an item in The Times of January 10, 1935 that between 1919 and the end of 1934 £700,000,000 had been expended in Great Britain for that purpose. There was a commission that made the grants for the purpose of determining the extent to which the subsidies should go for the housing plan in Great Britain. Here, following the same plan as was adopted by many countries, as a matter of fact, immediately after the war, we made grants to the provinces by way of loan and the provinces, whose primary responsibility it is to deal with these matters, determined the extent to which the loans should be made. Some of them have been repaid; some have been repaid in part. But the term over which the loans were to be repayable has not yet expired. So that it may be said that we did try in this country the plan of advancing moneys at a low rate of interest to enable the provinces to carry forward plans for housing peoples in cities and towns that came into being by legislation of the provinces themselves.

My right hon. friend's government did not deal with the matter in that way, and no further grants were made after the Union government went out of office. In 1930—I do not think the right hon. gentleman is quite correct in saying it was at the short session; it was at the regular session—he made the observations to which he now refers. But it will be remembered that in the early part of 1930 he said that after a most careful survey he had satisfied himself that there was no federal unemployment problem in the country. I was looking at Hansard the other day and I saw it. So that so far as the unemployment problem in Canada is concerned, he was not impressed at that time that it was a federal matter. He is quite right when he says that the magnitude of the disaster that has overtaken the world was not generally understood. The other evening I said in a broadcast that had there been someone who could have foreseen the terrible abyss toward which we were travelling, and raised his hand to indicate to us that we must beware or we would be engulfed in ruin, the world would have been very grateful. But no one foresaw the extent of the disaster that overtook us.

There is always room for differences of opinion with respect to most questions of a public character. Confronted with the situation that we have in this country, where we have a federal system as distinct from the system of government in Great Britain and where provinces are jealous of their rights, the right hon. gentleman knows quite well that he had to meet that very situation when he dealt with old age pensions, and instead of auditing the old age pensions in the sense in which he now refers to the matter, he will recall that what happens is that the provinces under the statute that he enacted receive from the dominion fifty per cent of the sum that was paid out for old age pensions—it is now seventy-five per cent—and the auditor general does not examine or scrutinize or audit the payments to individuals; all he deals with is the payments that are made to the provinces to meet demands which they say they must liquidate under the terms of the measure in question. The grants that have been made to provinces under those circumstances are many, and the reason for such grants being made is apparent. The provinces are very jealous of their jurisdiction; especially is that true with respect to some of the older provinces, and they will not calmly or in any other way submit to their jurisdiction being taken away from them and exercised by the federal authority. Some of the newer provinces occupy somewhat the same position with respect to matters of this kind.

It has been common ground between the right hon. gentleman and myself that the primary obligation with respect to relief under our constitution rests with the small community, whether it be a municipality, a village, a town or a city. The second liability rests with the province that brought those organizations into being, and if the question is of a national character the dominion must assist. The extent of and the manner in which that assistance shall be given has been heretofore a matter of arrangement between the provinces and the dominion. Each of the provinces during the last three or four years has looked upon these payments in a somewhat different way. In a rich and old province like Ontario they carried forward a large number of public works and undertakings for the reason that, being well to do, the municipality was able to pay a portion of the cost; then the province made a contribution and the dominion paid a certain part of the labour cost or made a grant in aid. The result is that there have been constructed in Ontario, in cities, towns, in organized districts such as villages and what are called rural communities, in counties, large undertakings to which all three have contributed. To suggest at any time to the province of Ontario that some commission would determine how municipalities or towns or other communities or the province itself should expend given money is a matter to which they have not listened favourably; at least they did not in my time. They may have changed.

In Quebec the greatest difficulty was of course in the city of Montreal. There a commission was set up by the province, but the manner in which it administered its duties was not at all times satisfactory to those who created it, and they have had many difficulties to overcome. In the western provinces commissions were set up for the purpose of determining how assistance could be granted, to what extent work might be possible, and I shall point out that in the part of the country where unemployment was very noticeable, that is because of crop failures and other conditions that obtained, there were seasonal difficulties, very cold weather, which made it impossible to carry on building and many other operations that could be carried on in warmer climates. A construction program was the first one the late Senator Robertson initiated and organized from one end of the country to the other. He provided for the elimination of level crossings on railways, which he hoped might do much to provide employment and do away with a common danger which we all recognize. That did not give employment to the extent that was expected, and the expenditures were not in the main, shall I say, very much appreciated by the communities in which they were made. Then the question of the construction of highways seemed to be the only method by which public moneys could afford employment to the class which appeared to be at that time, because of lack of crops, suffering very considerably. The result was that roads were constructed; that is, assistance was given to the province to enable roads to be constructed, and from Manitoba to the Rocky mountains a considerable number of miles of road were constructed and improved, giving employment to men, teams, and in every way doing something to lessen the evils of unemployment. In British Columbia the Parks branch expanded the program that had been outlined by our predecessors in office and in the other national parks the same thing took place. The result was that a considerable number of people found employment, but in all these cases the provinces outside the national parks claimed the right to exercise their jurisdiction and to determine where, so far as it might be possible, work could best be done for the purpose of providing employment. I do say to the right hon. gentleman that there were no greater abuses, having regard to the amounts involved in the expenditures of the moneys to which the dominion contributed, than there has been in respect to old age pensions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is not correct.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say that it is.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure it is not.

Mr. BENNETT: What is more, the investigation we have made shows the situation to be even worse in regard to old age pensions than it is in regard to unemployment relief, except in a few isolated cases where laxity was so apparent as to necessitate criminal proceedings being taken, not by the dominion but by the communities themselves that were defrauded of their moneys by those receiving benefits.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Did the right hon. gentleman himself not find it necessary two years ago to pass an order in council providing that the auditor general should audit these very moneys that were being handed over to the provinces?

Mr. BENNETT: An order in council was passed with respect to public works and undertakings, not of the type to which the right hon. gentleman has referred, but of the type where contributions were made to the cost of the ultimate undertaking providing that the auditor general should examine and determine whether the moneys which had been granted were properly expended. I was able to point out to the right hon. gentleman by the production of a sample sheet that had been approved by the comptroller of the treasury that no moneys thus expended were expended so far as the issuing of the cheque was concerned unless and until there appeared upon the sheet the initials of two auditors of the auditor general's department as a preaudit of their correctness, a certificate by the municipality itself that the moneys were expended in the municipality, and a certificate by the province in which the moneys were expended, so that whatever might happen, if there were fraud or deception practised, the dominion would be always in a position to secure from the province or municipality any moneys that had been improperly used. I am informed that there was no single case in which the comptroller of the treasury issued a cheque in which there was not, prior to the cheque being issued, a certificate not only of the province but of the lesser organization, whether it be a town or a city or a municipality, in which the money had been expended, as to the correctness of the expenditure. I mention that because in connection with matters of that kind, it is quite clear the situation is entirely different from the granting of, let us say, $100 for municipal aid. If there is need for municipal aid of $100, it is obvious the manner in which the municipality may expend that money is not a matter into which the auditor general could inquire, except to see that the municipality had properly received it, if it were a grant in aid.

A construction program with respect to roads, with respect to railway crossings and other matters was settled and determined by the late Senator Robertson on the first tour he made to the Pacific coast and back. During that fall a substantial number of men were employed at that kind of work, but of course when the cold weather came on such work could not proceed in the prairie provinces. In every case, however, the next year and the next, the character of the undertakings was determined by conferences with the provinces.

The difference between the suggestion which the right hon. gentleman makes and the policy pursued by the government is this; we endeavoured by cooperation with the provinces —not having any contact with the municipalities, they being the creatures of the provincial legislatures—to assist the provinces in the discharge of their duty, having regard to the national character of the problems with which we had to deal. The right hon. gentleman suggests that a commission or committee might have been set up which would be able to deal with all the provinces. We believed that the problem in each province was somewhat different, and that the provincial governments and local authorities cooperating with the dominion could determine how the problem should be dealt with, what works should be done, and moneys expended, by agreement between the provinces and the dominion better than by any commission that might be appointed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am afraid my right hon. friend, in making a comparison between his plan and mine, if I may use that expression, has not caught the significance of what I have suggested. I have never suggested that a commission should take out of the hands of the federal government its obligations beyond supervising and administering in part federal expenditures of public employment relief moneys in accordance with a definite plan. What I have suggested is that there should be a national commission which would cooperate with the federal government, with the provincial governments and with the municipalities, which would endeavour to coordinate the efforts of all and which would report its doings and recommendations in a manner that all these bodies would have a complete picture of all public efforts for the purpose of providing employment and affording relief with a view to having these coordinated, on a voluntary basis of course. Being in a position to say on what conditions federal relief moneys would become available to the provinces and municipalities, and how their expenditure should be audited, such a commission would have little difficulty in effecting coordination.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the right hon. gentleman realizes that it is not in accord with the general rules of the house that he should make another speech in the midst of mine.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But if my right hon. friend is going to state what my policy is I must be permitted to correct him if he states it wrongly.

Mr. BENNETT: I am content to leave myself entirely in the hands of the house as to whether I have not correctly stated it. I listened with much attention to the right hon. gentleman. He stated that he thought there should be a commission or committee, and the duty of that committee would be to coordinate the efforts of the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Supervise everything, administer federal relief funds and do what it could to coordinate the several activities.

Mr. BENNETT: In other words they would be a fifth wheel to the coach. I did suggest that to deprive the provinces of their powers, to endeavour, by voluntary effort, if you will, to determine how each province should expend its money, was something that the provinces did not indicate any desire or willingness to agree to. They felt that the problem was primarily theirs, although we were giving them assistance, and they were willing to discuss and consider and determine what was best and most urgent and most desirable to be done and how their public moneys as well as ours could best be expended. That was a recognition of their position as sovereign legislatures within the scope of their activities; at the same time the dominion was discharging its obligation to them by giving the assistance I have indicated. That was a recognition of the right of the provinces to continue their activities. It is under that power that Saskatchewan continues to exercise its powers, contending that they can do it better, more reasonably—and I might add, more politically—than could otherwise be done.

Then there came the position in the province of Quebec. That province contended that they knew far more about the immediate necessities for road construction and various undertakings that should be gone forward with in the province at a particular time than any commission could learn, because a commission must necessarily turn to the provincial government to obtain the information in question. Any commission, however well informed, would never be quite as well informed as the government itself. So the government undertook the responsibility of coordinating its efforts. I should like this to be clearly understood: in every instance where works were undertaken there was an agreement indicating that the province and the dominion had arrived at a conclusion that the given undertaking should be gone on with and that the dominion would make a contribution of a given amount to the cost and the province would determine what it should pay. As I say, sometimes municipalities, the rich province of Ontario for instance, made large contributions because they were getting necessary undertakings constructed or completed in a manner that lessened the obligation which would otherwise have been imposed on the ratepayers. To the extent that they received assistance from the dominion or the province the obligation on the ratepayers of the municipality was lessened. When you look at the returns already tabled you will find that in a rich old province such as Ontario they spent very much more money relatively than other provinces, and obtained larger sums from the dominion because their municipalities were in sufficiently good circumstances financially to enable them to undertake such works. The province fixed a figure in all cases that they would give in the way of assistance, either a percentage of the cost of the entire undertaking or a percentage of the labour cost. And in every instance the cabinet determined, the minister having first made a recommendation of what he thought should be done in the way of payment by the dominion, to assist in works of that kind. Of course in unorganized territories where work could not be carried on and where the province had the burden of direct relief, they sought and obtained from the dominion assistance from time to time, sometimes through the medium of a commission which they themselves set up, sometimes directly without the intervention of a commission, the province itself assuming the responsibility. But in every case there has been agreement between the province and the dominion. In every case the dominion has taken the position that it could not deal with the municipalities as such, for the municipalities were the creature of the legislatures and the only contact between the dominion and the municipalities was through the provincial governments that called them into being.

That has resulted in very large numbers of public works and undertakings being constructed. When hon. gentlemen study the returns that have been filed they will be amazed, as I have been, to find the extent to which in the old municipalities of various parts of Canada sewer works, streets and sidewalks have been constructed and repairs undertaken; and they have also dealt with, shall I say, some factors of the housing problem. But we did not feel that we were in a position financially during those days to undertake any large scheme of housing such as had been contemplated in Canada in 1919, or in Great Britain. Necessarily many things that one would like to have done could not be done because of the restrictions imposed upon us by our financial position, largely because with the accentuation of the depression, the slackening of earnings by the Canadian National railway system imposed a larger burden upon the taxpayers to meet the interest charges upon securities guaranteed by the dominion. That is a fact.

Now conditions have improved. Last year we offered to the house a public works program based upon two facts: one being that conditions were improving; the other that the increased price of gold, with the corresponding application of the principle unanimously adopted at the world economic conference as to the extent to which metallic coverage should be provided for our currency, enabled us to offer a program involving an expenditure of forty to fifty million dollars for public works. I say, as I said last night, that it has had a very excellent effect. It has stimulated business and improved credit conditions. But the full effect of the works will not be felt this year, because the preparation of plans and designs and preparation of the sites for the work has taken time, but all this and the acquisition of materials has gone on and conditions have greatly improved.

Now the question is what shall be done with respect to housing. It may surprise the right hon. gentleman, as it surprised me, I may say very frankly, to learn that with respect to one city we were very anxious to try out a form of tenement construction that certainly appealed very strongly to me. It was of concrete and stone, with a central heating plant; water, gas and light all were provided from a central point, and streets were laid out in an orderly fashion. But to our surprise petitions came to us asking that we should not go forward with the work, because it might interfere with the renting of private properties in the city in question, and stating that the time was not ripe to carry forward a housing program of that character.

This afternoon it was suggested in this house that painting, glazing and the improvement of the exterior as well as the interior of many of our farm houses would be desirable. I wholly agree, but there are many farmers in this country who, being thrifty souls, would not care to incur the financial obligations involved in connection with that work. I say that very frankly, because that suggestion has been contained in statements that have been sent to me from time to time with respect to the matter. But the government realized its obligation and, as will be recalled, set aside a sum of money for the purpose of painting, repairing, glazing and putting into proper condition all the public buildings owned by the crown. Commencing at Vancouver and going through to Cape Breton, that work was carried on. All the necessary work could not be accomplished, but most of it was done, and the effect upon the communities was very considerable. People who had the means themselves began to make their places look a little better, to replace the broken windows, repair the sills and put the houses in better condition. But when it comes to the question of telling individuals that you wish them to make changes, either inside or outside their buildings, on the part of most Canadians there is a tendency to say, "We are the best judges as to the extent of the money that we should spend, or the amount of the debts we should incur."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They do not like state interference.

Mr. BENNETT: They are perfectly willing to be interfered with provided it does not cost them anything; when it comes to the point of paying for it, then it is a different matter.

Now let me proceed, if I may do so without becoming tedious, to point out the position with respect to housing. It is rather a reflection upon us, is it not, that a new country such as this should be talking about housing and slum conditions? It is rather a reflection upon our civilization, according to my view of things, that less than seventy-five years after becoming a dominion we should be talking about slum conditions. As one of the hon. members was speaking this afternoon I recalled a conversation I had many years ago with the secretary of the late Bonar Law. She had been born in Poland, and she said, "Nothing has more impressed me than the fact that, for some strange reason, we never seem able to get away from slums." She added, "Do you realize that the east part of the city of London was completely wiped out by fire in the closing part of the seventeenth century, but that now the worst slums in London are to be found in the area that was then burned clear? Somehow or other slums have a way of growing up." She went on to say that some of the younger generation had given the matter a good deal of thought but had not been able to arrive at any conclusion. I recall also something else that was said at that moment; she said that for some reason slums are usually to be found in the east section of cities. I do not know how correct that is, but that is the observation that was made to me at that time.

In the cities of Toronto, Montreal and Winnipeg—even a new city like that—as well as in some of our older communities such as the city of Halifax, which was mentioned this afternoon, there are buildings which, in my judgment, are not of the type that our people should occupy, from the standpoint of health and happiness. How is that situation to be overcome? In days gone by private capital was always ready and willing to embark on the construction of buildings, because usually that has been a very profitable investment. In the old country it has been one of the favourite forms of investment, but it has not been so in latter days, for reasons into which I need not go this evening. At all events, in 1919, we made up our minds that we would supply the provinces with certain sums of money to enable them, as was their constitutional duty, to deal with these problems. In Saint John, New Brunswick, a city of one hundred and fifty years old or more, there are certain slum clearances going on now. In the city of Halifax, as the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) might have recalled this afternoon, a great disaster occurred, and the conditions that obtained in connection with those buildings that were not completely levelled were somewhat different from the normal conditions prevailing in other communities.

What are we to do about it? That is the real problem. The commission appointed by His Honour the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario went into the matter rather fully and, as the right hon. gentleman has said a very admirable report was made. I was appalled, however, to find—I am now speaking subject to correction; perhaps my memory is not quite as good as it should be—that the report suggests that the sum of $12,000,000 would be required to provide proper dwelling houses for a certain class in that community who now live in buildings that should be condemned, and that this amount would not be self liquidating. Therefore we have two conditions to deal with. The first is the condition where you have the investment self liquidating. In that case if you set up proper machinery and the money is advanced at a reasonable rate of interest, provision is made for amortization and the properties will pay for themselves in a given number of years. That number of years should be the usual expectation of life of the structure, brick or stone or wood as it may be, with the amortization based upon a given percentage being paid from year to year, so that at the end of the period the building stands free and is supposed to be still in a reasonably decent condition allowing for both obsolescence and depreciation.

That is a simple condition; there is not a tremendous amount of difficulty in dealing with that. It can be done in one of two ways. It can be done in the manner in which we have heretofore dealt with it, namely by securing for the provinces a certain sum of money at low interest rates to enable them to deal with the matter at first hand, or we can set up a commission to deal with it ourselves. It does not seem to me that it was ever intended to be the function of a national government to deal with matters of that kind in the communities. Therefore I still think the method adopted by the government of 1919 or 1920 was the sound method. As a matter of fact inquiries have been made by the government during the last few months, especially in view of the reports coming from Montreal, whence we have received very excellent suggestions looking towards the establishment of homes with little bits of land attached to them. It seems to me that, however small it may be, if there is an area in which a kitchen garden can flourish, with room for a few flowers in front, it adds greatly to the happiness of the persons who have to live in those homes. Similar suggestions have come from other cities in Canada, and of course the condition in Vancouver is well known. They have their difficulties in connection with clearing land when you go out certain distances from the city, but the land close to Vancouver I think may be said to be fairly clear and available for housing purposes.

The second case is one presenting much more difficulty; it is that class of case which is not self liquidating in which we know perfectly well that, with the standard of wages that has prevailed for the last fifteen, twenty, twenty-five or thirty years, it would not be possible to provide the artisan with a dwelling that we think would be decent, on which he would be able to pay the rental necessary in order to liquidate the cost. That is a different problem altogether. It involves a contribution by the state which will not be repaid and which is a voluntary effort made by the central or provincial power, as the case may be, to add to the happiness and contentment of those who inhabit a certain type of dwelling.

I have a proposal to make. We have given a good deal of thought to this matter, and have received a very large number of suggestions. Obviously no government can adequately deal with all of them. That is the reason I am suggesting that we set up some body which would be able to cull through the suggestions and make recommendations to the government. I purpose placing the matter entirely in the hands of the house, and suggest either the selection of a committee to examine into the matter or that the committee on banking and commerce examine into and make a report to the house, having regard to the conditions to which I have referred which have not to do with the financial side of it, and also with the financial side as well. Whichever view the house thinks desirable the government is only too anxious to accede to.

For the moment I suggest that the hon. member withdraw his motion, and I say to him that I will prepare a proper resolution of which notice will be given to refer the matter either to the committee on banking and commerce or to a select committee. Sometimes there are difficulties in connection with a select committee, and it may be found easier to handle the matter with a standing committee where from time to time all members may attend. However we shall be glad to do whatever the house thinks most desirable.

In a new country such as ours this is an important problem, because we cannot afford to permit a condition develop in Canada such as has obtained, for instance, in the old city of Glasgow. That may be taken as a very good illustration of what I mean. If the condition which developed in Glasgow had been curbed at the start it would not have grown to such large proportions. If we take hold of the matter now, while we have not at the moment all the resources necessary to enable us to do all we may desire to do, we believe we shall be able to grapple with it in such a way as to make a continuance of slum conditions impossible, and certainly to prevent any increase of the kind of tenement and small buildings to which reference has been made to-day.

I have one word more to say with respect to public works and undertakings. Obviously we cannot deal with these matters on a very large scale. We have dealt with them from two standpoints. The first standpoint is the extent to which employment may be given directly or indirectly. When I use the word "indirectly" I refer to materials which have to do with the construction and carrying on of undertakings, and to the primary and secondary and other industries connected with it. Closely—nay, I might say almost inevitably linked to that factor must be the second one, namely the necessity for the undertaking. I think if my right hon. friend and hon. members of this house will look through the list of public works and undertakings authorized last year, and any additions which may be made to that list, they will realize how necessary every undertaking was, not only for the community affected but for the country as a whole. There were wharves, breakwaters and constructions of that kind required. These were really essential to the well being of the communities, but for obvious reasons we had not heretofore been able to deal with them. That is the attitude of the government with respect to these matters, and we are entirely in the hands of the house as to whether the banking and commerce committee or a select committee should deal with the problem and make a report. We will be satisfied to place it in the hands of whichever body will best serve the interests of our country at this time.

Before resuming my seat may I say that my right hon. friend is hardly fair in his reference to the patriotic fund. The patriotic fund was one of which the Minister of Finance was honorary treasurer and the auditor general honorary auditor. It had nothing to do in a public way in any shape or form with the conduct of the business of the country, but was a fund created by the government, and largely by private subscriptions. In the ultimate administration—for in the part of the country in which I live I personally had something to do with it—individuals themselves were dealt with by a committee which was appointed. The honorary auditor, the auditor general himself saw that all the moneys received from every source were available for the expenditures which were made, but he did not undertake at any time to examine as to whether or not John Smith who in Calgary was said to have received a given sum of money had actually received it, nor did he satisfy himself as to its necessity. The committee made a report upon that, and that report was acted upon. The general executive here in Ottawa dealt with the large problems of policy, the determination of the extent to which moneys which had been paid might meet the demands made upon the fund, with the interest which had accrued. As the right hon. gentleman knows, the fund is now practically exhausted. However it has been so splendidly administered and has been so great a source of assistance to those who otherwise would not be cared for that I think we may all look upon its administration with great pride. It was administered not as a public fund, but as a public trust for those who received moneys. I was honorary treasurer for the period I happened to be Minister of Finance, and the present Minister of Finance is now honorary treasurer of the fund.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Was it not a public body established by act of parliament?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: For the purpose of supervising the work?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is exactly what I said.

Mr. BENNETT: It was a public body created by statute of this parliament for the purpose of having a corporate existence or an existence as an organization to receive contributions and to disburse them for the purposes mentioned in the act, namely as a patriotic fund.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is exactly what I proposed in regard to unemployment moneys, only instead of receiving and spending direct with the exception of federal relief appropriations which it would administer directly or through the federal departments of government, it would supervise and seek to coordinate all employment relief plans, reporting upon them to each of the bodies concerned.

Mr. BOURASSA: Before the right hon. gentleman closes his remarks may I offer a suggestion? It seems to me that a select committee composed of the various representatives of larger centres in which the need is greatest would be a proper committee to set up. But in case the government, after an understanding with the opposition, would prefer a standing committee, it seems to me that the committee on industrial relations would be better qualified than the committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. BENNETT: I thank the hon. member for Labelle for his observations. I shall submit a resolution to the house and leave it for the chamber itself to determine whether or not the standing committee I mention shall be chosen, the one mentioned by the hon. member or a select standing committee. I think there are many parts of the country in which the matter is not of very great importance, but certainly the larger centres are deeply interested. If a select committee will best serve the purpose the motion will be for such a committee. However I shall offer the motion in a form which will enable, shall I say, the opinion of the majority of members ultimately to prevail.

Mr. CHURCH: I shall gladly accept the suggestion made by the Prime Minister, and ask permission to withdraw the motion.

Motion (Mr. Church) withdrawn.

FEDERAL HEALTH POLICY

PROPOSED ADOPTION OF POLICY IN COOPERATION WITH THE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I beg to move, seconded by Miss Macphail:

That, in the opinion of this house, the federal government should adopt a definite health policy which could be carried on in cooperation with the provincial governments.

A year ago, Mr. Speaker, I introduced a resolution in this house along somewhat similar lines. At that time, however, I suggested that the resolution should go to the committee on industrial and international relations for consideration and report. The Minister of Health at that time, although having no objection to the principle of my resolution, objected to its going to that committee or to any committee and therefore refused to consent to the resolution passing the house. Although I believe the minister at that time was entirely wrong, nevertheless in introducing the subject this session I have omitted all reference to a committee of this house so that that objection cannot be put forward, and in the hope that the resolution will be accepted by this chamber.

There is no doubt in my mind that hon. members in this house appreciate to the full the importance of this subject of public health. It is brought home to us when we realize that during the last six years we have had the subject brought before the house no less than seven times. It is true I was responsible for bringing it before the house in 1930, 1931 and 1934, and I have no apology to offer to the house for introducing it again this session.

It is recognized, I know, that the matter of public health comes under the jurisdiction of both federal and provincial authorities. The British North America Act, by which we are governed, does not indicate under which government this subject shall come, but it has been the practice of the provincial governments very largely to carry the load, and they have spent a great deal of money in the carrying on of public health work. But although nothing is said in the British North America Act as to whose is the responsibility, we recognize that consideration is given in the act to questions which are interprovincial in character. Under the act these come under federal jurisdiction. We have to recognize that sickness and disease do not stop at any provincial boundary, and I therefore feel that the federal government has a definite responsibility in this matter.

Studying this subject of public health the other day I came to realize that there were at least five problems with regard to public health that really should come under federal jurisdiction: such sicknesses as tuberculosis and cancer; the prevention and control of insanity; venereal diseases; child and maternal welfare. I appreciate the fact that certain grants have been made in past years and are made to a certain extent to-day in connection with these matters, but the load of responsibility and expense has been left very largely to the provinces. The federal government takes over complete control of immigration, complete control of the examination of immigrants coming into this country, and has spent public funds lavishly in this regard in past years. That being so, I feel I am justified in suggesting that child welfare and maternal welfare should come largely under federal jurisdiction.

Last year I pointed out that it is only at a time of great crisis that the country recognizes the enormous loss which it suffers through not having a proper health system. I pointed out that during the great war it was not until volunteers were called for that we had a situation on our hands that showed us quite clearly that owing to the lack of a proper health policy a very large number of our people were not physically, if mentally fit. Of the volunteers who came forward no less than one-third were unfit for service at the front. When it became necessary to put conscription in force the figures were still worse, because of those called to the colours no less than two-thirds were found to be unfit for military service. This meant the loss of a huge sum of money running into millions of dollars which might have been saved if we had had in effect prior to that time a thoroughly workable and coordinated health policy.

I also pointed out last year that over 46,000 Canadian children die every year under the age of five years. This in itself is a tragedy. Everyone will admit that it is the most terrible tragedy we have to face, and I am sure the whole house will be one in feeling that a stop should be put to this toll of death; because from the very best information we can get, a large proportion, if not the majority, of these deaths could have been avoided if preventive measures had been taken.

From the best figures I can get I would say that sickness costs Canada approximately $300,000,000 a year, and when we take into account the indirect loss, the value of the lives lost—for each life has a value—the loss is upwards of a billion dollars. But let us take the figure of $300,000,000 as the direct loss through sickness. We are spending on public health through all governmental sources, federal, provincial and municipal, the sum of only $6,000,000. Surely it would be real economy to spend more in preventive measures, and so cut down this enormous cost of sickness—in other words, reduce the high cost of sickness.

I take it that most members will agree with me when I say that sickness and death are inversely proportionate to the amount of money spent on health measures. Society, it seems to me, has two responsibilities with regard to sickness: one is the adoption of curative measures, and the other is the adoption of preventive measures. Up to the present time we have paid more attention to curative than to preventive measures, and we have not achieved the results which I hope will ensue when more attention is paid to prevention. When we recognize that there are no less than 180,000 people sick daily in this country—sick enough to prevent them from working—it will be seen that we have a great problem on our hands and one that should be faced. If it were faced I am sure we should get splendid returns. We spend more in curing people than it would be necessary to spend in preventive medicine, and many people owing to the high cost of medical attendance have to go without attention owing to the high cost of medical care. I am not blaming the doctors, because they have to do a great deal of work free; but because they have to do this it is necessary for them in self-defence to increase their fees to those who they think can pay. The result is that thousands of people do not call in any medical practitioner, or do so very often only when it is too late. It is not fair either to the patient or to the doctor, but under our setup that is the position we find ourselves in.

Preventive medicine is growing, but it is growing all too slowly, I am afraid. In preventive medicine we have the full time health unit method and the state health insurance method. In the full time health method, in other words the full time health unit, there is a service which I am glad to see is growing, not as rapidly as we should like to see it, but still it is growing and showing great results. I understand that it is growing fastest in Quebec and British Columbia, and other provinces are making experiments along the same line. I will not go into details to-night with regard to full time health units except to say that I visited the headquarters of one at Red Deer, Alberta, last summer and was delighted to see the progress being made.

I realize that the drawback in the full time health unit is that though they are helped on their feet for the first three years by the grant from the Rockefeller foundation, after the three years are up the responsibility has to be carried either by the provinces or by the municipalities interested; and owing to their limited capacity for raising money either through taxation or by borrowing they hesitate to enter into any obligation when they know that within three years that obligation will be increased. In 1934 when I spoke on the subject I recommended then, as I strongly recommend to-day, that the government should give consideration to the question of carrying on the grants of the Rockefeller foundation after the third year. I feel sure that if this were done these full time health units would develop rapidly and cover the country from coast to coast.

I know the question of cost will be considered and someone will raise the point as to where the money is to come from. My reply is that if we are to-day losing at the rate of $300,000,000 a year as the result of spending only $6,000,000, if we could double or treble the amount we spend in preventive medicine it would not be a case of spending money but saving money in the long run. We can therefore well afford to spend money not only on investigation but in helping to a large extent those provinces or municipalities which up to the present time have taken the initiative and developed full time health units as far as they have gone.

I am informed that the hospitalization of a patient at Keith, Alberta, comes to $858 a year, of which the province pays $310 and the municipality $548. I am also informed on the best authority that in certain provinces forty per cent of the mental patients in the hospitals would not have had to be there if the cases had been taken in hand in time and properly and scientifically treated. There again you come to the argument for preventive medicine. It seems to me therefore that preventive medicine has far more to be said for it than the suggestion that we should leave matters alone. A forward-looking government with an able and progressive Minister of Health, such as I trust we have at the present time—indeed, I take the opportunity now to congratulate him on filling such an important position—will in every way encourage any scheme intended to keep the people healthy.

I regret to say that in the last twelve or thirteen years we have not had from the federal Minister of Health very much help in health matters. We have not had much help from the Health department, and I say that advisedly. I have taken a great deal of interest in this matter, and if there is one person who has thrown cold water on schemes suggested for the betterment of the health of the people it has usually been the Minister of Health. I take it that our new minister will have an entirely different attitude to the subject, and if he takes a forward step I shall be the first one to congratulate him most heartily.

We must recognize that to-day, with nations as with individuals, it comes down to the survival of the fittest, and if Canada does not take care of her people and raise their standard of health to its maximum, equal to that of any other country, she will certainly fall by the wayside. Health, when all is said and done, should be recognized at its full value, and not only from the human point of view but on the economic side as well we must realize that money spent is money saved. It is only the uninitiated who will quarrel about spending public money in caring for the health of the people. Surely no one thinks that we can afford to go on losing money as we are doing to-day from year to year in connection with sickness simply because we are spending so small an amount publicly in the matter of prevention. Most of the provinces are doing splendid work.

For instance, they are largely financing or helping to finance a number of hospitals; they are equipping travelling clinics and are paying attention and subscribing to regular health inspection of school children. It all costs money. The provinces are limited in their spending powers. They can raise money only by taxation or by borrowing, and during these hard times they have had great difficulty in their finances, with the result that they have had to cut down many health services. The federal government is in a different position. Not only has it the same powers of getting money as the provinces have, but it also has the right, which the British North America Act does not allow the provinces and the municipalities to exercise, of monetizing its own credit.

For many years we have looked upon education as a national asset and we punish people who disobey our educational laws. I wonder how long it will be before we recognize that health is a national asset. If anything, it is more important than education, because unless a child has health it is not much use to attempt to cram education into it. How long will it be before we recognize that health is a national asset and punish people for not being healthy? But before we punish them we must give them the very best chance of keeping in good health.

At the present time we have an army of people who are scientifically trained in the matter of taking care of health. Unfortunately, on the one hand owing to a lack of organization and coordination between our various services and on the other owing to a lack of purchasing power among the people, we find many of these persons who are well qualified to look after health, either underemployed or even amongst the unemployed. I have not the slightest doubt we could employ every scientific man or woman to-day and engage others besides, had we a really worthwhile system to go by.

I am proud of the province from which I come for the fact that it has gone a very long way in regard to health matters. I have under my hand some figures in regard to what has been done in my province. Probably some of the other provinces can show some figures just as good, and I hope they can. In the last twenty years maternal mortality in Alberta has been cut in half. In 1913 infant mortality was 120 per 1,000, but in 1933, owing to the work that had been done, the percentage of mortality had been reduced to 57 per 1,000. As the birth rate of that province, which has not a big population, is some 17,000, this means that we are saving the lives of 1,071 children per annum. Going back for a moment to the expenditure we used to incur in trying to increase the population of this country by immigration (I admit that in the last three or four years money has not been spent so lavishly for this purpose), but previously to that we were spending in the gross about $3,000,000 a year to try to increase our population. Would it not be a very much better investment—put it like that if you wish —to improve our health organizations and thus save by the thousands every year the lives of our own people born in this country? The matter is only one of organization, it seems to me, because we are assured by some of the best medical authorities that if proper and careful attention had been given in time, a very large proportion of our annual loss of life, particularly that of children, would have been quite unnecessary. I find that from all the diseases to which I am going to refer we are losing a large number of people each year; although I am glad to say that from the first disease I intend to mention we are losing less. I refer to diphtheria, smallpox, scarlet fever, tuberculosis, typhoid and whooping cough. I shall be glad to have the contradiction from any doctor in the house if I am wrong, but I am informed by medical men that if proper care were taken and taken in time by preventive measures, we need not ultimately have any deaths from these diseases. We have a long way to go before we reach a proper system of health if these diseases, these sicknesses that can either be prevented or cured, are bringing about the number of deaths that we unfortunately have to record at the present time.

With regard to annual medical examination, some people think it is rather an exaggerated idea to suggest such a thing, but how many of us to-day realize it is imperative for us in our own behalf to pay visits annually to our dentists? More and more people are realizing that. While they believe their teeth are in perfect shape they annually go to their dentists for examination. How long will it be before we realize that it is just as necessary to go to our doctor? I am not going to suggest that there be a monopoly of one type of doctor, as there are several schools; but it is just as necessary for every man, woman and child to go annually to those who know scientifically how to look after them and can check them up carefully so far as health is concerned. An annual examination of everybody would, in my opinion, be a very important factor in preventing communicable diseases, for in preventive practice lies the salvation of the nation. It seems to me that we have to look at this matter of health not only from the human point of view, which I think should be intensified, but also from that of business, and from the latter alone, so far as spending money on health is concerned, we can increase the dividends enormously over what we have done in the past. There is something wrong, for instance, when in Canada some 25,000 children die each year before they are a year old, and most of them from preventable sicknesses.

Before I close I want to congratulate the various provinces, some of which are doing better work than others, on the work they have done. As I said before, they are all handicapped in the matter of finances. I hold in my hand a magazine entitled Health, published, I believe, under the auspices of the Canadian Social Hygiene Council. This is a body of private people, well-wishers for the better health of the Canadian people, who through a very considerable volunteer effort have probably done more than most other organizations to bring before the public and the different governments, the necessity of doing better and better work with regard to the health problem. I understand the Prime Minister some time ago suggested that at the next dominion-provincial conference the subject of health should be considered. I have here a statement from the Hon. J. A. Faulkner, Minister of Health for Ontario; another from Mr. Taschereau, Premier of Quebec; another from Hon. W. J. P. MacMillan, Premier and Minister of Public Health of Prince Edward Island; another from the Hon. F. R. Davis, Minister of Public Health of Nova Scotia; another from Hon. Weir, Provincial Secretary of British Columbia; another from Mr. Bracken, Premier of Manitoba; another from Hon. George Hoadley, Minister of Health for Alberta; another from Hon. Uhrich, Minister of Health in Saskatchewan, and lastly, one from Hon. H. I. Taylor, Minister of Health and Labour of New Brunswick. They all submit that this is the proper place in which to bring this subject up. They all make worthwhile statements in regard to the necessity of giving more attention to health, but I am only going to take time to quote a wire from one of them, which is very similar to the rest. In reply to a wire asking whether they were agreeable to taking up the matter of health at this suggested conference, Mr. Weir, Provincial Secretary of British Columbia sent this telegram:

> The government of British Columbia is anxious to cooperate with the federal authorities in the promotion of public health which we regard as the very cornerstone of national well being and hence as a matter of national responsibility. Sporadic provincial attacks on cancer, venereal disease, tuberculosis, mental hygiene and child welfare, for instance, can never be so effective as coordinated measures under enlightened federal leadership. From a standpoint of scientific public health provincial boundary lines have little significance. It would be premature to discuss the possible details of health insurance before the meeting of the conference.

I have referred to these letters because they show that those responsible for health in the different provinces are all anxious and of one accord in their desire to do something with the aid of the federal government to bring about a national health plan. I therefore trust that the resolution that I have submitted will be favourably considered by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Sutherland) and that in the course of this evening it will be accepted by the house.

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I have listened with attention to the very interesting summary of health matters made by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Spencer). I congratulate him on the interest that he has taken in this important subject during his time here as a representative of his constituency. I think, however, he has painted rather too gloomy a picture of the health of the people of Canada, because as a general rule I believe the health of our people will compare very favourably with that of those of other nations. No matter what is done, sickness cannot be entirely prevented; it is going to be with us no matter what measures are taken, or by what bodies. But it is also undoubtedly true that preventive steps have been and will be taken with a very beneficial effect indeed on the health of the nation. It has been said that good health is an individual's greatest asset, and that the health of its citizens is a nation's greatest care. I think that is true.

There has been a great change in the practice of medicine since the middle of the last century. This seems an excellent opportunity to glance over those changes, and I think the time spent in so doing may be profitable, because we are representatives of all parts of the country and represent many professions and callings. Therefore I should like for a few moments to indicate the changes that have taken place in the conduct of medical affairs during recent years.

Anesthesia, perhaps the greatest boon that has come to the surgeon and his patient, was discovered only during the last century. Antiseptic and aseptic surgery also came into being within the memory of almost everyone here. These developments have made possible a tremendous advance in the treatment of disease. The advances that have been made in medical science have been along three lines; that of prevention, that of diagnosis and that of treatment. In the field of prevention perhaps the greatest advances have been made in the case of some of the diseases mentioned by the hon. member. Tuberculosis, diphtheria and smallpox were at one time prevalent in this country, and one of the outstanding examples of what science has done in the prevention of disease is the combating of yellow fever which was formerly very prevalent in southern countries. I should like to give a few figures as to the improvement there has been lately with regard to some of these diseases—I am taking recent years, because compared with fifty years back there would be a tremendous change. The improvement is continuing: every year there has been a change for the better, as is shown by the following figures:

Year:	Disease	Deaths
1926	Tuberculosis (resp'y)	6,485
1933	Tuberculosis (resp'y)	5,656
1926	Diphtheria	913
1933	Diphtheria	239
1926	Smallpox	33
1933	Smallpox	6

Another disease which the hon. member mentioned, which is a scourge of very young children, and often leaves severe complications is whooping cough. The figures on that are as follows:

Year:	Disease	Deaths
1926	Whooping cough	1,242
1933	Whooping cough	552

These figures show that the continuous fight which is being put up by public bodies and public health institutions throughout the country is producing most excellent results.

In the realm of diagnosis there has also been very great improvement. On the early and accurate diagnosis of disease depends the treatment and, very largely, the outcome. In that field science has made great advances. It has given us the X-ray, which is of inestimable value. The microscope has made possible numerous refinements of diagnosis applying to many diseases, and is of the greatest benefit in the cure of the patient. As to treatment, there have also been great changes both in methods and in instruments used. In the treatment of tuberculosis and pneumonia the idea of the patient getting plenty of fresh air has saved many lives. Then take cancer; the discovery that radium, properly used in properly selected cases, is of great benefit to those suffering from cancer has been one of the most important and most beneficial discoveries ever made in connection with that disease. Another discovery, perfected in our own country, was the use of insulin, which was developed by Doctor Banting in Toronto. A comparison of figures showing the deaths from coma in diabetes is instructive, and shows the great advances that have been made in the treatment of that disease. In 1898, which was long before insulin was heard of, sixty per cent of those dying from diabetes went into a coma before death. The coma is the toxic stage, and in those days there was practically no hope of getting a patient out of that condition. In the period from 1930 to 1933, however, less than five per cent of those dying went into that incurable stage of coma, and as the use of this important medical agent is further perfected undoubtedly the results will be even more beneficial.

So in those three great departments of medicine, prevention, diagnosis and treatment, great changes for the better have been made. The advances I have mentioned have almost revolutionized the practice of medicine. My father was a doctor; I have always lived in a doctor's home, and I know that in the old days practically all the medical attention given throughout the country was given by the general practitioner. That situation has greatly changed, however; it has become almost impossible for the general practitioner to keep himself acquainted with all the new products and inventions of science. Just here, perhaps, I might digress to pay a tribute to one general practitioner who has brought high honour to himself, to his profession and to Canada. I refer to Doctor Dafoe, of northern Ontario. One day he went out on a case which appeared to be a very ordinary incident in the life of a country doctor, but he conducted himself so well that he earned a victory never before earned by an obstetrician in the history of the world. To bring those five northern babies up to the age of seven or eight months, as he has done, has been a wonderful feat, and as Minister of Health I wish to express to Doctor Dafoe the great admiration of the medical profession as a whole for the wonderful work he has done.

These new conditions that I have indicated have necessitated new agencies in dealing with disease. One that I might mention is the public health nurse. In most of our cities and towns at the present time we have the public health nurse. In Ontario part of her salary is paid by the province and part by the municipality. She pays regular visits to the schools and makes suggestions as to whether or not the children need treatment. The work that has been done by these nurses has been very beneficial and very protective.

I take it that the mover of the resolution would like to see something done along these lines, only to a greater extent.

Then there is another public body which renders useful service to the sick throughout the country; I refer to the Victorian Order of Nurses. I think perhaps from a doctor's standpoint the Victorian Order of Nurses does more good and is of more actual benefit to the sick people than any other similar institution in the country. Personally I regard that body as doing very excellent work throughout the country.

Then in certain parts of the country we have health units, which were mentioned by the hon. member who moved the resolution. This is another means of medical activity which I value very highly. In a general way the object of a health unit is to extend public health activities to rural districts, so that they really have a clinic available to them to give advice on medical subjects, principally in the preventive sphere. They educate the public with regard to the best methods of preventing disease. As they move about the homes they see improvements that might be made, perhaps in connection with drainage or something along that line, and they also have to do with the children both of the pre-school and the school age. They visit the schools and examine conditions there; they also examine the younger children and give advice to the parents as to what might be done for the children. Another important function of the health clinic is the education of mothers, both before children are born and in the post-natal period, as to the care that should be exercised. That work, in certain parts of the country, has had wonderful results. Probably the province of Quebec has made greater advances in connection with health units than have been made in any other part of the country, and I think that province is to be congratulated on the way it has supported the movement and on the benefits that have accrued from it.

Those associated with these health units also carry on a campaign against the various contagious diseases and, in cooperation with the doctors of the community, epidemics can be stamped out much more quickly than was possible in the past. They also have to do with the distribution of sera and vaccines. They inoculate the children against smallpox and diphtheria, and in some parts of the country, as a result of the work of these health clinics, practically all the children have been inoculated against that disease, with most beneficial results.

The great strides that have been made in connection with medicine have gradually made the people feel that they must cooperate in order to get the full benefit from these advances, since a serious and prolonged disease is very costly. Perhaps the first step in the way of cooperation in order to secure medical attention was made by the fraternal societies. In practically every town and village throughout Ontario there were one or two fraternal societies which, as a part of the benefits extended to their members, included the free services of a doctor. Sometimes that worked well, sometimes not so well, but it indicated the effort being made by the people to cooperate along these lines. Then various large industries throughout the country started schemes of mutual assistance, the workman putting up so much of the money and the industry supplying the remainder. In that way the members of the industry, the workmen, had an opportunity to get medical assistance without the financial burden being too heavy.

Great advances have been made both in the number of hospitals in Canada and the efficiency with which they have helped to combat disease. Most hon. members can recall the time when there were very few hospitals; particularly those living in the rural sections found it difficult to obtain hospital treatment. To-day with the exception of some few rural districts the country is well provided with hospitals. At the present time there are in Canada 893 modern fully equipped hospitals with 87,645 beds. The hospitals are of various types, including maternity, pediatric, orthopaedic, isolation, and other kinds which I shall not take the time to mention. In addition we have in Canada to-day 59 mental hospitals. The hon. member who preceded me mentioned preventive treatment in mental cases. May I say to him that that is a science the study of which to-day is more or less in its infancy but undoubtedly there is a great opportunity for further research. Constant effort is being made to treat mental troubles in their early stages. Every person connected with the medical profession is hoping that work along that line will be carried to a successful conclusion.

Throughout the country, beginning in the small municipalities, we have boards of health. In the small municipalities the boards of health are sometimes good, sometimes not so good, and in my judgment sometimes useless. Particularly in townships where by law they are forced to have a medical health officer I believe a great deal of money is wasted. In many instances they have some official who is medical health officer in name only, who gets practically no salary and who cannot be expected to do and in fact does not do very much.

I am of the opinion that there must be a development such as was mentioned by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) and to which I have referred, namely that of health units. I believe that if the money which has been spent for the various township bodies in western Ontario had been lumped and doctors and nurses had been employed the effect would have been much better.

On the other hand in our larger cities we have some first class boards of health doing creditable work. Many people say that the city of Toronto has the best health department in the world. If that is not quite so it is undoubtedly true that Toronto ranks very high in health protection. Many people who are interested in preventive medicine have come from different parts of the world to that city in order to learn firsthand their method of working. The provinces are doing excellent work, some better than others. The hon. member has referred to Alberta; I am in a position to know that the health departments in that province are doing splendid work and are preparing to take still further steps to improve the conditions under which their citizens are living. Most of the provinces are to be congratulated upon the excellent work they have been doing.

I should like now to refer to the subject of periodical health examination. If it were possible to have people take those examinations the results would be excellent, but of the 245 members who compose this House of Commons I venture to suggest no more than ten per cent have an annual examination, or even one every two years. They do not lack the money, but they do lack interest. I believe that is characteristic of well-to-do people throughout the country. In general practice I have found that there are very few who make a practice of periodical examinations. I am convinced that such examinations would be of the greatest benefit but we cannot go out on the street and force people to go into doctors' offices for examination. They have to use their own common sense, and if they do not their action will be to their own disadvantage. Were it possible to have periodical examinations certain diseases would be discovered through diagnosis.

I have mentioned certain diseases in connection with which great improvement has been shown. There are others, however, in which the figures are not so encouraging. In 1926 there were 7,614 deaths from cancer whereas in 1933 there were 10,646. Cancer is one disease which if situated in certain parts of the body could be discovered by means of periodical health examinations. Particularly is that true of external cancers, where cures could be effected if treatment were begun earlier. It is largely due to the fact that the disease is not found early enough that the death rate is gradually mounting higher and higher. In the year 1926 there were 11,415 deaths from heart disease, whereas in 1933 there were 15,483. These figures show a very great increase. Heart disease is another ailment which could be discovered in its early state and treatment or suggestions as to mode of life given which would be found very beneficial. Last summer in nearly every paper one read he would find an account of some well known person who had dropped dead on a golf course, or on the street or at home. Some of those men were in the prime of life, between the ages of forty-five and fifty. Undoubtedly these ailments had developed insidiously but could have been discovered had there been periodical health examinations. I cannot urge too strongly my approval of the hon. member's observations concerning the necessity for such examinations.

Despite all the advances in the science of medicine and despite the splendid service medical practice can give, the difficulty is to make those advances available to the great masses of the people. I believe that is the gist of the hon. member's resolution; undoubtedly he would like to see measures taken to make the results of modern medical science available to every one. That brings before us the question of state medicine. As there are some who entertain doubts as to the meaning of that term, perhaps I might read what the Canadian Medical Association believes to be the purpose of state medicine. I quote from a report made by a committee of doctors:

> The ultimate purpose of any plan is to make available for every Canadian the full benefits of curative and preventive medicine, irrespective of individual ability to pay, and, at the same time, to assure the practitioners of medicine and others associated in the provision of medical care a reasonable remuneration for their services.

The purpose first stated in this quotation is, I think, what we are all aiming at, namely to make the full benefits of curative and preventive medicine available to all. But in any move of the kind which a government, either federal or provincial, might make, it is essential to consider the matter and discuss it with the medical associations, because on their cooperation the success of the whole thing depends. The Canadian Medical Association, realizing that this subject was becoming a very important one to the provinces, to the dominion and to all our citizens, appointed not long ago a committee to go thoroughly into the matter. The committee has made a comprehensive report considering the subject, I think, from every angle, and the present situation is this: The Canadian Medical Association has sent that plan to each provincial body, and the provincial bodies in turn have sent it to every individual doctor throughout the country for his observations and any suggestions he desires to make upon it. The comments and suggestions which the individual doctors make will come back through the provincial bodies to the Canadian Medical Association and from their replies and the original plan it will be possible for the association to evolve some plan which they can recommend to some government. It does seem to me that until that plan is evolved and ready to be presented to a government, steps should not be taken in the matter, because there is no use going into a thing of this kind at random and without seeing just where you are going. Of course it is the desire of all governments to get all the information they can along these lines.

One part of the motion which the hon. member for Battle River has presented has to do with cooperation between the dominion and the provinces. We have cooperation at present along those lines. That is the policy of the federal Department of Health, to cooperate in every way with the provinces. We have at the present time the Dominion Council of Health which consists of the chief medical officer of health for each of the provinces, together with a representative of labour, a representative of agriculture, a representative of the urban and rural women's organizations, one scientific adviser, and the deputy minister of the Department of Pensions and National Health. The council is brought to Ottawa twice a year at the expense of the dominion government, when they go thoroughly into the various problems that each has met with in his own part of the country. One of those meetings has been held since I came to this department, and I know that it was very beneficial. Some of the representatives of the provinces who were present have written that they considered the meeting this year of great benefit to them and to the people of their provinces. That activity will be continued, of course, and we expect great benefits to come from it.

But there is another step which I intend to take. It is my purpose to invite at some mutually convenient time within the next two or three months the ministers of health of the various provinces to come to Ottawa and discuss with me their problems, with the idea, just as the hon. member for Battle River suggests, of furthering cooperation between the federal and provincial bodies, because I am firmly convinced that any advances that are to be made will be made only along the lines of that cooperation. In extending that invitation to the provincial ministers of health I am in hopes that much good will come of our meeting.

I have endeavoured, Mr. Speaker, to give a general summary of the position in regard to public health in Canada at the present time. I have no objection to this motion passing because I am quite in sympathy with it. Our policy at the present time is cooperation and anything that I can do to further that policy I shall be only too glad to do during the time I hold this office.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker, I have been very much interested in the speeches made by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) and the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Sutherland). The hon. member for Battle River deserves a great deal of credit for bringing before the House of Commons year after year this matter of a national health program.

Lest I forget it may I say at once that I do not agree with the statement made by the minister that the Canadian Medical Association should be the one to evolve a health policy, or that the federal government should make no move until the medical association had decided what should be done. I do not think that is so at all. In the first place, doctors are trained at very great expense to the provinces, because the universities are certainly not self-sustaining. In a measure doctors are public servants; they have shown that magnificently during these trying four years. I am sure they can offer valuable suggestions, but I do not for a moment think that the federal government should wait for the pronouncement of the medical association. The federal government itself should evolve a health policy, whether it be one with many branches, such as health insurance and county health units, or whatever it may be. The federal government, I say, should do the evolving, perhaps with the cooperation of the provinces and the Canadian Medical Association.

In my opinion the main reason why medical science is not available to all the people is the lack of money on the part of the people. I notice in this little pamphlet which the Canadian Social Hygiene Council has sent to us, entitled Canada at War, the statement is made that public health officials agree that sickness costs the people of Canada over $311,000,000 a year, and that almost nine-tenths of this represents a direct charge upon the individual. Well, I think the direct charge upon the individual is greater than the individual can bear, and people are going without the benefits of medical science simply because they cannot afford to pay for it. It causes the death of many of them, which I suppose is just as much expense, but the particular individual affected does not need to worry about that expense.

In confirmation of that, I notice that in an article in the Canadian Home Journal of May, 1934, Norma Phillips Muir makes this statement with reference to maternal mortality:

> One doctor whose professional life has been pretty well given to studying public health and preventive medicine has stated that actually there is no maternal mortality problem in Canada—that it is a problem of dollars and cents because the deaths can to a very great extent be prevented if the pregnant woman and medical and nursing services are brought together.

I think what is true in regard to maternal mortality is true also of many diseases. The very rich can afford to have care for the prevention and cure of disease whenever they desire. It is also true that the very poor in cities like Toronto, as mentioned by the Minister of Health, are given very good care indeed. But there is a large middle class between the rich and the poor who actually cannot afford to have good care when sickness comes. I know there are splendid hospitals and doctors and nurses, but what does that matter when the people cannot get into the hospital without guaranteeing payment, and when they have not the money to pay for care in the hospitals? In the city of Owen Sound people have actually been kept waiting on the steps of the hospital until the hospital authorities could be assured there was going to be full pay for their hospitalization. Everyone in this house knows of innumerable instances where people have not been able to secure hospital treatment or the care of a nurse in their own home simply because they could not afford to pay for it. There are hundreds and thousands of nurses out of work in Canada who would be only too glad to take care of the sick, as the sick would be only too glad to be taken care of. But there must be dollars to bridge the chasm between unemployed nurses and uncared for sick.

I was very glad to notice that Ontario has this year established its first health unit, as reported in the Ottawa Journal of Thursday, December 13. That unit will cover the counties of Stormont, Glengarry, Prescott and Russell. The Rockefeller foundation is making a grant of $33,000 and the unit will employ five nurses. The administrative officer and his nursing staff of five will conduct health administration, education, sanitation, public health nursing and the control of communicable diseases. At present 2,000 children in the four municipalities have received dental attention and one hundred per cent have received immunization from diphtheria. After the three year period the grant of $33,000 ceases and the cost must be borne by the counties and the provincial authorities.

I am particularly concerned about having county health units in all counties because they can do a great deal to prevent disease and I think it is better both from the point of view of human happiness and from the economic standpoint. In the long run it costs less and certainly people are much happier when well. In my opinion a great deal can be done by preventive medicine. Perhaps I might take a moment to say what has been done in Owen Sound particularly, through the work of Doctor Murray, who has devoted his attention to prevention. He has made a particular study of preventive medicine. In Owen Sound they now have free clinics for the early diagnosis of tuberculosis and for venereal disease. They have a free child clinic and last year they had a free dental clinic for school children. It is interesting to know that two or three years ago the death rate in Owen Sound among children under one year of age was the lowest in Ontario and the second in Canada, being excelled by Victoria, British Columbia.

Everyone interested in this matter feels that other municipalities could obtain similar results if they followed similar methods. I should like very much to have a county health unit in Grey county, for this reason particularly, that that county is as beset with contagious diseases and other ills as any other county and suffers in addition the disability of goitre to a greater extent than in any other county. I said once in public that fifty per cent of the people in Grey county suffered from goitre in some form and I was laughed to scorn. Well, Doctor Murray of Owen Sound and Doctor Carefoot of Markdale made a careful analysis, each over a certain area, and they found that it went well over fifty per cent; they said that the figure I gave was too low. And yet that terrific responsibility must be carried by the people of Grey county. It is entirely unfair and, what is more, they are not able to do it. From my own personal experience this year among my own friends I know of at least ten people in the late fifties who no doubt died of goitre. Possibly on the death certificate goitre would not be given as the cause of death, but the doctors attending them assured me that it was, having resulted in a heart condition which was the actual cause of death, or in an anaemic condition, or in some other of the complications that ensue. Unless you attend a great many meetings, picnics and one thing and another and see people in large numbers you will not believe how prevalent it is. I do feel that it is not fair to ask the individual to pay for the treatment of a disease which is caused by deficiency in the soil of the district. If we are to have health units in any part of Ontario it is not unreasonable to urge that Grey county and possibly Bruce as well should be the district in which experimentation is carried on.

I have asked the federal Department of Health as well as the provincial government to make a survey of the county to see whether or not goitre is as terrible there as we who live in the county think it is, but in both cases an investigation of any sort has been refused. If the governments in Canada are not going to take the responsibility who is to assume it? One would be almost humiliated to go to New York and ask the Rockefeller people to make the survey, because surely it is a responsibility that lies within this country. In supporting this general resolution asking that the federal government adopt a definite health policy to be carried out in cooperation with the provincial governments I am not thinking only of this one particular area, but I am thinking of it especially because the need is so great.

Hon. R. D. MORAND (East Essex): It is with a great deal of pleasure that I congratulate the mover of this motion (Mr. Spencer) on the humanitarian stand he has taken and on the very interesting and definite method he proposes of correlating the work of medicine in Canada.

Medicine has made rapid strides when one looks back over history and realizes that it has grown to a very comprehensive science from early beginnings of empiricism and a great deal of superstition. It has been certainly an individual science, and its advance has been entirely an individual matter. It is an individual type of occupation and consequently the organization of medicine has probably not advanced or kept step with the organization of other fields of activity.

On could very well divide the value of medicine into two distinct and different fields. First of all there is the preventive and then the curative. Then again one could divide preventive medicine into two distinct subdivisions, that which applies particularly to the public or to the state and the community, such as the control of contagious diseases and the control of those diseases that come under the supervision of public health officials, and then the preventive measures which are entirely individual, in relation to those diseases that are not communicable but if taken in hand early may be prevented from the natural consequences which follow unless proper treatment is given.

In the first division, diseases that are communicable and generally within the community, most of the necessity is not so much within the field of medicine as it is within that of education. It is education that is needed to teach the people the value of preventives now at hand. Education is necessary to teach them how to prevent some very simple conditions and I was very much interested in listening to the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) when she spoke of thyroid in her particular county. It seems to me that that trouble, its cause and prevention, are now so generally known and the prevention is so simple, that I am amazed that within that county the authorities now in charge have not seen fit to advise or educate their people in the very simple matter of taking of a few drops of iodine once or twice a month, which would entirely prevent the condition which now exists. I shall not attempt to enumerate all the very many good works that have already been accomplished by preventive means, such as the control of typhoid, scarlet fever, diphtheria, whooping cough and other communicable diseases which to-day have almost disappeared and would be still further controlled as a result of a simple and general education among the people.

The part of preventive medicine from which it seems to be the most difficult to secure the maximum benefit is that which applies to the individual himself. The minister a few minutes ago spoke about heart diseases and other conditions. Those are conditions which are essentially individual and the question is not one of cost; it is a question not of necessity but of driving home to the people the importance of constant supervision by their medical men. On the other hand, the part that interests me most is the securing of the maximum benefit that is available within the science of medicine to those who are unable to pay for it. Strange as it may seem, it is not the poorest who are unable to pay; it is that large class of people between those on relief, those in abject poverty, and the very rich. Medicine has evolved from the simple application of one man's view, one man's ability, one man's science. To-day we have available in the various sciences—electricity, mathematics, medicine, and so forth—large laboratories and expensive equipment, and in the field of medical science these developments have increased the cost of medicine, the cost of treatment and cure and, more particularly, the cost of diagnosis, beyond the ability to pay of the average man who is trying to carry on for himself.

As regards those who are poor, I was astounded to learn that in some hospitals they are permitted to stand on the steps because they cannot pay. In twenty years' rather active practice I have yet to find a hospital refuse to take a patient because he could not pay. But there is a large class of people who, because of small salaries, because they are anxious to pay their way, find it impossible or are very reluctant to spend the necessary money to secure the diagonsis and the maximum that science has to give. X-ray is very expensive; laboratory tests are expensive; heart treatment and heart diagnosis instruments are to-day quite expensive. Day after day people come into our offices where the aid of these branches of science is necessary to make a complete diagnosis and to give them the maximum that is available within the science of medicine. These people cannot or feel they should not spend the amount necessary to secure the benefit of the science, consequently the maximum benefits of the science are available only to those who are very poor, whom the state now takes care of, or to those who are wealthy and to whom cost makes no difference. But the very large mass of the people, probably the most important class in the community, find themselves only too often unable to secure the maximum benefit that they should receive. This is rather discouraging to a medical man who from day to day has in his office patients who are unable to secure the full benefit that science can offer. Organization in medicine is undoubtedly necessary at this time. Organization has taken place in every other field of activity, but medicine continues very much in its individual application of the best that each medical man has to offer. Some day within the not very far distant future I hope to see some scheme evolved for that class of people who, too often optimistic in the belief that physical ills will not affect them, and probably because of low salaries or wages unable to set anything aside, find themselves confronted when they least expect it with large bills, perhaps at a time when the head of the house has no earning capacity. I hope to see a scheme put into operation whereby men in receipt of earnings under a certain amount per annum may pool a part of their earnings in order to create a fund, with the aid of the state and the employer, to enable them to secure the maximum that medical science has to offer them. Further, I would like to see them secure aid when they are ill so that they may feel a sense of security during that most trying of times, a security which comes from the knowledge that if they wish to take advantage of it they can avail themselves of what is in store for them within the field of medical science.

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, I have had some experience in this matter, having been a member of the hospital board in my own municipality for the past ten years, and also a member of the board of health for many years. This question is being very actively discussed throughout the North American continent. I was amused by the observation made by the minister that it would be necessary to consult the doctors before any scheme of this description could be launched. If I remember rightly, when Mr. Lloyd George introduced his health insurance scheme in Great Britain, the greatest opposition came from the doctors. Those who have traced the history of its development will well remember the indignation meetings held by the doctors of Great Britain in opposition to the scheme; yet to-day the selfsame people who opposed it so violently are those who admit its soundness and its practicability in that great country. In fact, they have gone so far that in the last three months I understand the medical men of Great Britain have affiliated with the British Trades Union Congress. I hope we shall live to see the day when such a departure is made in this dominion.

Quite recently in the United States they appointed a committee on costs of medical care, which was aided by finances supplied by the Rockefeller or the Carnegie foundation. That committee, composed of representatives of the doctors, of labour, of the teaching profession and others sat for five years and brought in a report in which they eulogized the experiment being made in Saskatchewan in connection with what I suppose may be called socialized medicine. In their third recommendation they say:

> The committee recommends that the costs of medical care be placed on a group payment basis, through the use of insurance, through the use of taxation, or through the use of both these methods. This is not meant to preclude the continuation of medical service provided on an individual fee basis for those who prefer the present method. Cash benefits, i.e. compensation for wage loss due to illness, if and when provided, should be separate and distinct from medical services.

So we can see how in the country to the south they are progressing towards a policy of collectivization in the treatment of the sick.

Two years ago a commission appointed by the government of British Columbia recommended a scheme of health insurance in that province. And we have this committee of the Canadian Medical Association, spoken of by the minister this evening, which is giving leadership to the various medical societies throughout the dominion. This is all in line with a recognition of the responsibility of the community as such for the treatment of the sick. In connection with preventive medicine the state has gone into the field in the matter of insane, and venereal disease, diphtheria, tuberculosis and many other diseases have been practically taken out of the hands of the general medical profession and their treatment placed upon a state basis.

One of the greatest problems at the moment, particularly in connection with this depression, is seen for instance in a city like Toronto where the medical needs of 26,000 families are being cared for by the municipality. It is unfair to expect the general practitioner to render his services on the basis that prevails at present in many localities, that is, free of charge, although I know that in accordance with the traditions of the profession it has been customary for him to give those very necessary services wherever they were required by those unable to pay. What the hon. member for East Essex (Mr. Morand) said this evening is quite true. In my community I know of no instance where any individual has been denied treatment in any of our hospitals through lack of financial resources, whether it be the municipal hospital or St. Joseph's, which is of course a sectarian hospital. I think it is a fair observation to make that the indigent patient in the hospitals of this country receives treatment on a par with the wealthiest, because we insist that the surgeons on the staffs of civic hospitals shall be at the top of their profession in their respective districts. These indigent patients do not have to take the chance, like the great middle class, of getting, may I say, an inferior grade of practitioner. The municipality I come from insists that the best in surgery shall be given to those unable to pay. Nor is it fair and equitable that those who are able to pay should have placed upon them the burden of the care of the indigent. At present they have to bear the expense in a broad way of those unable to pay. Some policy should be worked out whereby the expense is placed broadly on the whole community, and I know of no better system than that set up in Great Britain and in other countries in Europe to deal with the problem.

It seems to me also that having regard to the work being done in our hospital centres, particularly during this depression, the personal touch of the family physician is more or less lost. Under a system of health insurance there would be a movement back to the family physician. The present practice is too mechanized. There is no substitute in the field of medicine for the understanding and care that can come about only through the long continued association of the family physician with his people.

As a matter of equity the medical profession should not be asked to render the enormous services they are being asked to render to-day absolutely free of charge. I have often said that medicine stands to-day in the same relationship to the community as schools did a century ago. In those days in regard to education you paid for what you got. In the evolution of our civilization and the desire of our people for a general educational system the responsibility for education was taken over by the state. I believe that is an inevitable development in regard to medical service in its broadest aspect. I do not mean that everyone should be covered by an insurance system. I think the hon. member for East Essex expressed the idea correctly when he said that that great group in between should have facilities placed at their disposal whereby the tremendous expense involved by ill health should be borne in a co-operative way. I suppose we all know of many families in which a major illness has been a financial tragedy, and any policy that the government or the medical profession can set up that will eliminate the fear of that condition from the lives of that great body of people who like to pay for the services they receive would be a distinct advance. I do not believe that any nation can be built on "something for nothing." A sense of obligation to meet their financial responsibilities has been one of the great driving forces in the development of this nation.

I was glad to hear the minister make the observations he did, that the federal government in connection with the provincial governments and these agencies of public opinion, in combination with the medical profession, should study this question deeply. They can rest assured that the labour forces of the dominion will lend their sympathetic aid to the formulation of a policy not only in the interests of the people but also in the best interest of the medical profession itself, which in the past, and particularly during this depression, has rendered such fine service to the Canadian people.

Mr. J. T. SPROULE (East Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take any part in this discussion, but after listening to my friend the hon. member for East Essex (Mr. Morand) and the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) I wish to say a few words. Some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) touch closely the situation in my own section. I think the hon. member for East Essex was correct when he said that it was not the poorest class nor the richest class that was neglected; there is the in-between class who feel themselves hardly able to pay the doctors' bills. I believe in many cases they neglect their health simply because they remember the last doctor's bill they received, and they remember having to sell the last cow, the last pig or something else in order to get the money with which to pay it. They feel, and rightly, that they should keep the doctor paid up, because they do not know how soon they may need his aid again.

I have a great deal of sympathy for the medical men; I understand that some of them in Toronto last year, after spending a great deal of time and money on their education, had to go on relief. I hope that was not true, but I remember having heard it. On the other hand I know that in the rural district from which I come they bitterly complain that the bills in many cases are too high. The charge now is $5 a call, where possibly when that man was young the charge was only $1 or $2 for the same trip. The farmer did not mind so much when he could sell a bushel of wheat for a dollar and a cow or horse for $100; he walked to the telephone and called the doctor without hesitation. Unfortunately to-day most of the farmers do not have telephones. At one time they were considered necessities, but now they are considered more in the way of luxuries. Perhaps that is something else that might be looked into; to-day the cost of a telephone is the same as it was in the palmy days.

There is no doubt that the poorer class can get medical assistance quite easily, because the health officer or medical board has authority to act, but that is not the case in regard to the man in between, who is not in a position to ask for assistance or who does not feel like asking for it. As a result he neglects the trouble for a day or two too long. The poor people who have been on relief call up the reeve of the municipality, and he realizes that he must take care of them. The other man, however, is not so fortunate; the reeve has to call a council meeting to find out whether or not he has authority to act, and then the chances are that the council will decide that the man can sell another cow or pig and pay the doctor, so they take no action. So I think the sooner something is done along the lines set out in this resolution the better it will be for all concerned.

Just here I would like to say a word about the poor children who are not properly clothed to go to school. Their clothing is not sufficient; their shoes are thin, and in rainy weather their feet must be wet when they get to school. Most of the school teachers take wonderful care of the children, providing them with hot lunches, and so on, but they should not be required to do that.

I was very much amused at some of the discussion in connection with the building scheme that was under consideration this evening. When you really consider it, many of the cities are not nearly so badly off as the small rural communities are. I think perhaps the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) put the matter rather well when she said that while many of the homes looked bad enough from the road, they look worse when you get inside. Hon. members who come from rural districts and who are acquainted with these conditions will agree when I say that, while the health officer perhaps should go to these homes and see that they are kept in a healthier condition, that health officer, in order to do so, would have to pass many other homes of the same class, and it is hardly worth his while. It is too bad the houses and outbuildings have fallen into such disrepair, and it is too bad that something cannot be done about it.

There has been a great deal of agitation in connection with the construction of public buildings, but I can say that the agriculturists at present are more in need of relief than any other class. If they have their health they can put up with a great deal, and I hope something can be done along the line of this resolution. As a rule very little public money is spent in the rural districts; generally it goes to the larger centres, which have better representation in this house. Rural constituencies cover large areas; most of them do not need wharves or large hotels or anything of that kind, and the result is that when the estimates are brought down they contain nothing for the rural constituencies. You look in the blue book to see how much is going to be spent in your district, but you cannot find the name of the place from which you come, so you know that no public money will be spent there. Then when you look around to see where the money is to be spent you find that large amounts are to go to the more thickly populated districts. In most of the rural districts when they speak of money they speak of hundreds of thousands of dollars, but when we come here we speak about millions of dollars. I can say frankly that the man on the back concession does not understand language of that kind; he does not know what it means. If you tell him that he could not live long enough to count it all, after he considers that statement for some time he begins to realize just what it means. Many times I have thought about some of these hotels that have been built here and there, costing millions of dollars, That money would go a long way in preserving the lives of our poor children who are so badly neglected. The chances are that when that hotel is built it will lose a quarter of a million dollars or so a year, and even that amount would do a great deal of good if it were devoted to the welfare of the children. I do say it is very hard to get anything in a rural constituency, and it is hard to tell a man who comes from the city how much in need the people are on these back concessions.

I remember the occasion when I attended the good roads convention in Toronto. I have been a director of the good roads association for some time, and this year I happen to be president. When elected president one of the directors came to me and said, "You are the man who came in here twelve or fifteen years ago and began talking about growing beets and, because of the mud, having to draw them out a quarter of a ton at a time. Have you those mud roads down there yet?" I replied, "They have been very much improved"—and that is a fact. In good times it was easy to get improvements, but when prices dropped and times were not so good we found it more difficult to get improvements. I realize that we are living in one of the most fortunate countries in the world; we are making a speedy recovery, but I do think it is up to the people to realize what those on the back concessions require. It is very difficult to impress members of the House of Commons with what their requirements are, because the average member is not aware of them.

Although the hon. member for Southeast Grey and I do not agree on many questions I will say that she and some other hon. members in that corner of the house have tried on many occasions to stress the needs of the back concessions, and sometimes we have found it difficult to make our wants known. I do not think most people realize how much improvements are needed. It is the duty of the man who comes from the rural district to try to fight his battle as best he can, and if we do not get results as soon as we would like we may get a better footing a little later on.

I am in agreement with other hon. members who have stated that health is a most necessary factor in the enjoyment of life, and I do hope that the present resolution is not dropped. I must say however that I cannot altogether agree with some observations of medical men. In my view the reeves of some municipalities could tell more about actual requirements than some medical men. I do not suppose many medical men will agree with me when I make the statement I am about to make, but I believe I am showing all due respect and am fair to that profession when I observe that there should be some way of knowing what a medical man will charge when he is called. When a person on a back concession calls a doctor he is wondering all the time how much he will be charged. He may be in such doubt that he will delay telephoning or sending word because he wonders if he will ever be able to pay his doctor's bill. It seems to me there ought to be some way of knowing. When we call a taxi we have some idea what the charge will be. Turning again to professional men, we have a good idea what a lawyer will charge us and if we are not satisfied we are free to tax his bill.

Mr. COTNAM: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. SPROULE: I do not know whether it would be wise, because possibly I could not answer it; however I will if I can.

Mr. COTNAM: When the hon. member makes the statement he does, he cannot be aware that there is a definite schedule of fees which has been adopted by the Ontario Medical Association and is available for the study and observation of the hon. member or of any person in this province at any time or in any place. When he states that a person cannot know what the fee will be—

Mr. SPEAKER: May I point out that the hon. member is hardly in order.

Mr. COTNAM: I should like to give the hon. member a little information.

Mr. SPROULE: I am quite content to listen to the information and am very pleased to get it. Some people have had the experience of calling medical men in our section of the country and have been surprised when they have received their bills. I know of one man who asked his medical man for an itemized bill and received a reply to this effect: "The itemized bill will be $15 more because you did not pay it yesterday." I am wondering if there is any possible way of being certain what we must pay. In my constituency I know of a case where a poor lad ran into an electric wire and was badly burned. Hon. members know that the municipalities carry insurance. As a result of his burns some insurance was coming to him, but when his doctor's bill was received he found he had a very little left. The case was taken to court and the judge reduced the fee by $200, but I think if another $200 had been deducted the doctor would still have been paid too much. However, I am very pleased to receive the information from the hon. member and shall be happy to take it back to my friends.

As the representative of the constituency of East Lambton I am going to try to bring the grievances of my constituents before this chamber and make an effort to have some of them ironed out. I do not know how you can check up on a doctor's bill. He may make a dozen calls on a trip, and possibly he may charge $2 for each call. I am not stating the doctors are dishonest; as a matter of fact I believe they are honest, but—

Mr. COTNAM: Just the same as if you had a hundred cows on your round.

Mr. SPROULE: Well, I would like to say—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Eleven o'clock.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What business will be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. BENNETT: We will take the business on the order paper, except the order standing in my name which I do not propose to proceed with to-morrow. If government business is disposed of we will give the opportunity to private members which was taken from them on Monday to proceed with their notices of motion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But with regard to the order in the name of the Prime Minister, the one he mentioned was of such great importance that he had thought it necessary last week to give notice of proceeding with it immediately, what is to be done? It is the one to which we attach the most importance. Could not my right hon. friend arrange to proceed with it to-morrow?

Mr. BENNETT: Which one is that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The one relating to the establishment of an employment and social insurance commission.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not propose to proceed with it to-morrow.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But that is the most important of any.

Mr. BENNETT: It may be, but I do not propose to proceed with it until Monday.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my right hon. friend if the bill related to this resolution is drafted?

Mr. BENNETT: The bill has been printed in complete form for over a month; it has been under consideration by the cabinet on more than one occasion and it will be considered in detail on Saturday. Some amendments have been made consequent upon an actuarial statement by Mr. Wolfenden and others. Do not run away with the idea that this legislation has not been prepared. It was prepared in consequence of information received in England something over a year ago, and we have gone on continuously improving it in the light of the knowledge we have received. So I am sorry to say the right hon. gentleman cannot make any capital out of that. It is sad, isn't it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What puzzles me was the haste of my right hon. friend to give notice of his intention to proceed with the resolution introduced last Monday, and yet his not being able to proceed to-morrow.

Mr. BENNETT: I wanted to have my resolution just where it is now so that I could proceed with the bill. I took steps necessary to do so, and I propose to continue to do so.

Mr. GRAY: That old order has not changed.

Mr. BENNETT: No, and it won't, either; don't make any mistake about that. I am still in control of this house; get that in your mind.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, January 25, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act to provide that military service in South Africa may be counted for the purposes of pension, and to make further provisions in respect to the application of penalties and to contributions to the dependents' pension fund.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

PENSION ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Can the Minister of Pensions tell us, as far as he knows now, whether it is the intention of the government to introduce amendments to the Pension Act in addition to those indicated in the bill now before the house?

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I cannot answer that.

DOUKHOBOR PRISONERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I have a question to direct to the Minister of Justice. What action is the government taking in regard to the Doukhobor prisoners being released or about to be released from Piers island who, having lost their homes and place in their own community—

Mr. McINTOSH: And votes too.

Mr. REID: —have now no place of abode?

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): My hon. friend gave me notice yesterday that he would ask this question and I have endeavoured to obtain the information. Originally at Piers island there were 575 Doukhobor prisoners, males 295, females 280. On the first day of January this year the present population of the island was, males 181, females 190, or a total of 371, so that 204 have already been released. I might mention that under the Penitentiary Act no prisoner can be released between the first of September and the first of April without his consent. Some of them will not give consent even when ticket of leave is offered. Married men among the prisoners object to leaving until their wives are released, and vice versa. The sentences of these prisoners will expire by service of time about the first of July next. It is hoped that by that date we shall be in a position to close the prisons on Piers island. The law provides that on the release of a prisoner he shall receive a ticket back to the point at which he was convicted, and also the sum of $10 in cash. When each prisoner is released from the penitentiary the $10 and the transportation are paid to him. After that, there is no further responsibility upon the part of the dominion government. We do not know where these men intend to go or where they intend to settle. It is true that on one or two occasions the Attorney General of British Columbia has had conferences with members of the Department of Justice staff and various suggestions have been made in regard to the future of these people, but the attorney general has never informed us of any definite plan he has in regard to them and no agreement of any kind has been reached in respect of it. The hope is now that having served their prison terms they may not be in future guilty of the offences of which they were formerly guilty and for which they have served their terms.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): May I call the attention of the house to a change in Hansard and then ask the responsible minister, who I presume would be the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), a question based on that? At the back of unrevised Hansard No. 5 of Wednesday last there appeared two notices, one in English and one in French. On the back of Hansard No. 6, the report of yesterday's proceedings, those notices do not appear. On the front of to-day's Hansard I find the name of Mr. George Simpson as editor, but there is nothing to show that there is a French editor; the name of Mr. Marcel Gabard, editor of French debates, does not appear. I would ask the minister whether that is one of the improvements as a result of his new bureau for translations.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): This is the first time the matter has been called to my attention. I shall look into it and at an early date give an appropriate reply.

PRIVILEGE—MR. DUPUIS

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Laprairie-Napierville): I rise to a question of privilege. In the Montreal newspaper La Presse of January 24 in an article headed "Un drapeau national pour notre dominion," I have been misquoted speaking on that question on the twenty-third. It is very unlikely, but maybe the translation has not been made correctly. On the twenty-third, speaking on this question, I said:

It is all very well to talk about flags and to advance a policy of flag waving for the next election, but to my mind there is something higher and more important than the emblem, no matter how interesting and worthy of respect it may be.

The newspaper quotes me as saying:

(Translation) Mr. Vincent Dupuis, Liberal, Laprairie-Napierville, asked that this question of a flag be forgotten.

I just wish that this should be corrected.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

STATEMENT BY MR. SPEAKER RELATING TO PRACTICE FOLLOWED IN PLACING QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the orders of the day are called I would like to refer to a question of privilege raised on Wednesday by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) in respect to the placing of questions on the order paper. He referred to questions Nos. 13 and 14 appearing on the order paper of January 23. Question No. 13 read:

Mr. Boulanger:
January 21—Has the Admiralty Act of 1934, chapter 31 of the Statutes of Canada, 1934, been put into force?

That is the way in which the question appeared on the order paper. There was a further question, No. 2, being part of that, the question being:

If not, why not?

That was left out on the order paper. Question No. 14 was dealt with similarly. I think it only fair to the clerks of the house to point out the reason the words "If not, why not" were left out in placing those questions on the order paper. As reported in Hansard of March 5, 1930, this matter came up on a question asked by the present Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), as follows:

Mr. Cahan:

1. Is it the intention of the government to introduce to this house a bill confirming the treaty for securing the preservation of the halibut fishery of the north Pacific ocean, which was made between His Majesty the King and the United States of America—

And the question goes on to give the date. The second part of that question was:

If not, why not?

It appears that the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), then leader of the government, immediately raised the question as to whether the "If not, why not" was in order and he quoted standing order 44 which I shall not take time to read to the house, as hon. members are fully aware of its provisions. I shall simply draw attention to these words appearing in the standing order:

But in putting any such question or in replying to the same no argument or opinion is to be offered.

The leader of the opposition went on to say:

I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that if the government were to attempt to answer the question "If not, why not," we might be drawn into the realm of argument with my hon. friend.

And he further elaborated the same point. Then the present Secretary of State asked this question:

Does your honour rule that the question "If not, why not," necessarily provokes discussion?

The then speaker gave his ruling as follows:

Mr. Speaker: The rule is very clear. In the putting of questions, or replying to same, no argument or opinion is to be offered. The purpose of a question which is placed on the order paper is to secure information as to plain matters of fact, and no discussion may arise therefrom. I would rule that the words "If not, why not" are out of order. Questions 3, 4, 5, 6, 7 and 9 are answered, I understand, provided the words "If not, why not" are deleted from the questions.

Following the ruling then made the clerks of the house have since pursued the practice of leaving those words "If not, why not," out of questions to be put on the order paper.

PATENTS OF INVENTION

PROPOSED AMENDMENT AND CONSOLIDATION OF RELATED ACTS

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend and consolidate the acts relating to patents and invention; to provide for the appointment by the governor in council of a commissioner of patents; to provide for the appointment of an assistant commissioner and such examiners, clerks and stenographers as are necessary for the administration of the act; and to prescribe certain additional fees and charges.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

Mr. CAHAN: In moving this resolution I draw attention to the fact that after a very long, debilitating and painful illness the late commissioner of patents died recently. During the course of his illness it seemed inappropriate to undertake any radical reorganization of the patent office, and I was awaiting the time of his retirement, because he had expressed a desire to retire when he reached the age of sixty-five, at which time his pension could be appropriately determined.

The patent office is, I think, one of the most important branches of any department of government. It has a staff at present of ninety-nine officers, clerks and employees. It is not suggested that these officers and employees are to be removed from office, or that there shall be any change in personnel. It will be necessary to appoint a new commissioner of patents, and the reorganization of the office will, I trust, be carried out by the civil service commission by the division of work between those who are now in the office and who in the course of time have acquired technical experience in its administration. With regard to the appointment of the commissioner of patents, I am suggesting in this resolution and in the bill which I hope I shall be permitted to introduce that the commissioner of patents should be appointed by order of the governor in council. The commissioner must be a man of experience in patent work, one with administrative capacity, with technical knowledge, and acquainted with both the official languages of this country. It is difficult to find such a man. It is considered that perhaps the government would be better able to select a man for that office than the civil service commission, but that is a matter for the consideration of the house when the bill comes before it.

The volume of business in the patent office is very considerable. During the past fiscal year there were before it 58,904 official transactions. Applications for patents alone totalled 9,267. The examination of applications by the expert officers of the department resulted in allowing 9,621, and 9,122 patents of invention were issued. A large number of assignments of patents or interests in patents were recorded, the deeds registered totalling 6,577.

Then in the patent office there is the copyright branch. Copyright registrations last year numbered 2,537, and with respect to each application for the registration of copyright or trademark, expert knowledge is required in the administration of the office. The trademark registrations numbered 2,066, and assignments of copyrights and trademarks amounted to 1,143. Cancellations numbering 843 were made under the unfair competition act which this house passed in 1932.

This branch is important from the point of view of revenue. During the last fiscal year net receipts amounted to $429,341.90, and owing to the general financial situation that represented a decrease in net receipts of $109,998.74. The expenditures of the office amounted to $208,133.13. So that the net revenues of the office, the surplus of receipts over expenditures, amounted to $221,208.77.

In view of the very considerable revenue received and the large expenditure required for the maintenance of the office the government were of opinion that a reorganization should take place in the matter of personnel. This resolution proposes such reorganization. If it had not been for the fact that this resolution and the bill founded upon it involve an expenditure of public funds I think it might have been advantageous if the bill had been introduced in the Senate, where a committee might have been set up to deal with the technical aspects of the matter. Such a committee might hear representations made by the expert patent lawyers of the country, who undoubtedly will be more or less interested.

The bill is also a consolidation of the patent laws. It involves one very considerable change in patent administration. At the present time the holder of a patent has a complete monopoly with regard to the production of the patented invention during a term of eighteen years, which is, I think, two years longer than is granted in the United Kingdom. But it has been found in practice that this monopoly has been abused by foreign holders of Canadian patent rights. I remember that when the economic conference met in Ottawa in 1932 complaint was made by industrialists throughout Canada that trade with the United Kingdom in certain mechanical appliances, which were patented, was prevented by the fact that the inventors of the United Kingdom, when making assignments or grants to licensees under their patents, were accustomed to include Canada and the United States in one field of operations. I was not able fully to investigate their complaint, but they stated that when they went to the United Kingdom to buy machinery or other mechanical appliances patented and manufactured there, for importation into Canada, they found that in many cases the inventor had granted the sole right to Canadian territory to manufacturers in the United States. They were told that they could not purchase in the United Kingdom but that they must obtain these appliances for use in Canada at some office on Broadway, New York, or in Dayton, Ohio, or in Pittsburgh or Chicago or some other city in the United States, showing that with regard to patents applied for originally in the United Kingdom and thereafter applied for in Canada under the international agreement, to which both the United Kingdom and Canada are parties, monopolies were set up in Canada which prevented the production of the patented process in Canada, although a considerable demand might exist in the Canadian market.

This proposed bill will grant patentees three years during which they will have a complete monopoly. It will provide also that if at the end of three years they do not work the patented invention or process in Canada then, so long as they fail to work it, they will not be able to bring in the courts of Canada actions for infringement of the patented invention which is not worked on a commercial scale within Canada.

As to the working of the patent we have adopted certain words from the English patent act which it has been suggested are more clear and simple than those formerly included in the statute law of Canada. It is suggested that the inclusion of these words will have this advantage, that the English decisions on the working of patents may be referred to for the advice of our patent officers and for the consideration of our courts when these cases arise.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I should like to ask the minister a question before he leaves that highly important phase of the amendment. He has stated that the patentee will be entitled to protection in Canada for only three years unless he has sold his patent to some Canadian firm for manufacture. Is that practice in vogue in any other country?

Mr. CAHAN: A provision for working has been adopted in many other countries. I am speaking now with certain mental reservations; I should like to go into the question at a later date, but in many other countries if the patent is not worked at the end of three years the governmental authority can compel the granting of licenses to the domestic manufacturers. As a matter of fact, up to the present under our law it has been provided that compulsory licenses might be granted by the commissioner of patents in case of non-working at the end of three years. The difficulty, however, has been in the administration of the office, to ascertain definitely whether the patent is being worked in Canada at the time the issue arises, and I was proceeding to state that this bill will require each patentee to make a report to the commissioner at stated intervals as to whether the patent is being worked within the meaning of the act within the confines of Canada.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I should like to ask one other question while the minister is on that point. In the event of the inventor disposing of his patent and manufacture taking place, is he still protected for the eighteen years?

Mr. CAHAN: If the patentee or his licensee or assignee is working in Canada, the patentee, assignee or licensee—who are called personal representatives in our act—continues to have a complete monopoly so long as he works on a commercial scale to satisfy the Canadian demand. If the commissioner decides that he is not working so as reasonably to satisfy the Canadian demand provision is made for an appeal from the commissioner's decision to the Exchequer Court of Canada, which I think gives reasonable protection.

This is no party measure. It is simply an earnest effort to overcome some existing evils, and when the bill is before the house or a committee of the house I shall be only too happy to receive suggestions from hon. members. It is difficult to discuss, on this resolution, the express terms of the proposed bill, but I think I have explained quite clearly the general intent of the bill which will be founded upon the resolution now before the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend whether it is his intention, after the bill is introduced, to refer it to a committee or to discuss it in the regular way in committee of the whole?

Mr. CAHAN: I am open to the suggestion of the right hon. gentleman. I should have preferred to present this bill to the committee of the whole house for general discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was not making a suggestion; I was just asking my hon. friend which course he intended to adopt. Certainly he should do as he may think best.

Mr. CAHAN: I may state frankly to the hon. gentleman that I would prefer to bring the bill before the committee of the whole house so that the general principles might be affirmed by this house. I have in mind also that when it goes before the Senate, who heretofore have taken a very considerable interest in patent measures, I would be perfectly willing to appear before their committee, as I have in times past, in order that there might be a full examination and investigation by the Senate committee of all matters relating to the proposed bill.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I suggest to the minister that inasmuch as this measure affects a very large number of Canadian inventors it should go before some committee so that those people interested could appear and make their representations. I believe the bill which will be introduced may have a very far reaching effect upon inventors. Usually an inventor has not very much money to defend himself and I believe his case should be heard before some committee. I am not particular whether it be a committee of the House of Commons or one of the Senate.

Mr. CAHAN: I quite agree with the hon. member. I had intended that the bill should be introduced in the Senate in the hope that the proposed amendments might be investigated by a Senate committee, but inasmuch as the measure involves an expenditure of public funds we found it necessary to introduce the measure in this chamber. I shall be happy to leave the matter open and upon second reading of the bill would be very glad to receive any suggestions from hon. gentlemen opposite as to whether or not the bill should go before a committee of the whole house or a select special committee.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: May I ask the minister if he has estimated the number of positions which may be dropped and how many members of the old staff may be dispensed with as a result of the reorganization?

Mr. CAHAN: I would reply to the hon. member that I had not contemplated the bill would displace any members of the old staff. I think it will be necessary for the civil service commission to rearrange their duties so that the present staff may perform the duties with greater efficiency and perhaps in lesser time than heretofore. However I had not contemplated a removal of any of the old staff.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Chairman, at this stage I do not wish to delay the house by any lengthy observations, but I may say at the outset that I look upon this resolution with a good deal of apprehension. There is no doubt the patent law and the law relating to patents of invention ought to be looked into and brought up to date. There could be no question about the wisdom of that procedure, but I believe the appointment of a commissioner of patents by the governor in council would be a procedure laden with tremendous possibilities and for that reason I am somewhat fearful of the consequences.

Of course when the bill is introduced we will have more detail, but at the moment undoubtedly it appears to be the intention of the government to appoint a commissioner of patents by order in council. The Secretary of State has said that the appointee must be a man who has had wide experience in patent law. That may be quite true, but the minister adds that the civil service commission would find difficulty in selecting a man with such qualifications. Here is another instance of an inroad or an encroachment upon the rights of the civil service commission. We have a civil service commission, and it ought to be given the work to do for which it was created; otherwise it should be scrapped. There is no use at every session of parliament either through the estimates or measures of this kind of nibbling away or decreasing the rights of that commission.

There is a provision whereby technical men may be appointed; boards may be set up by the civil service commission, and that commission may select practically any man or officer. I am very much afraid—in fact I am certain that this measure will have the effect of interfering with the commission. I might go as far as to say that I do believe that at this very moment there are in certain circles some who are pretty well aware of who the incumbent of the position will be.

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly he is not known by the department. A number of applications have been received.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That may not be going as far as I have gone, but it is going some distance. Apparently a certain number of applications have been received. Nevertheless it is quite obvious that the present measure involves an encroachment upon the merit system. The former incumbent was a man of vast experience, a civil servant who did credit to his position. He did not step into this particular post, because when Mr. O'Halloran was retired the position was considerably cut down. The late Mr. Richard in recognition of his work and merit was appointed to the position.

Mr. CAHAN: By the government of the day, I understand.

Mr. CHEVRIER: But he was then a civil servant, a man who for many years had been employed in that particular branch of the service. He was not an outsider, and I doubt very much whether under the proposed change the government of the day will appoint any one now in the service to fill this position. Undoubtedly it will be a man from the outside. That point is I think quite clear from the resolution, because in it I find the expression:

To provide for the appointment of an assistant commissioner and such examiners, clerks and stenographers as are necessary for the administration of the act.

Of course when the bill is presented we will know whether or not those appointments are to be made by the governor in council or by the civil service commission. The commission is in office for a purpose and if this government does not want it to operate under the terms of the act why does it not take the responsibility of doing away with it? During the last session a number of appointments were made, and one of the most glaring encroachments upon the powers of the civil service commission was in the dying days of the session. If this government wishes to reform, let it say so in no unmistakable manner; let it say that it is content to abolish the commission.

I reserve the right when the bill is brought down to look into the details. I believe the purpose could be better served by referring the matter to a special committee. The minister knows that some years ago the patent law was reviewed. The copyright law has been reviewed, and I think now is a proper time for a further review of patent law. As any change would have such far reaching consequences for inventors and the general public I believe it should be referred to a select committee.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Will only the chief commissioner and his assistant be appointed by the government, or will all the clerks and employees be so appointed, namely beyond the control of the civil service commission?

Mr. CAHAN: The only proposed appointment by the government is the appointment of the commissioner of patents, and the resolution so states. The entire reorganization which will take place and the fixing of the status of other members of the organization will be under the jurisdiction of the civil service commission.

Mr. CASGRAIN: May I ask the minister if the chief commissioner will be given the status of a deputy minister, and if not what will be his status?

Mr. CAHAN: I should think he would be given the status of a superintendent of a branch of a department.

Mr. CASGRAIN: A director?

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Cahan thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 7 to amend and consolidate the acts relating to patents of invention.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INTERPRETATION ACT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 3, to amend the Interpretation Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Definitions.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Chairman, as I mentioned to the house when this bill was introduced, its object is merely to include Remembrance day in the Interpretation Act. By a statute passed by this parliament in 1931 Remembrance day was established throughout Canada as a public holiday. We had formerly observed the day known as Armistice day, but by the act of 1931 that name was changed, and we now celebrate as a public holiday Remembrance day. But the Interpretation Act did not include Remembrance day in the definitions, and there is no power, I understand, on the part of the government by order in council or otherwise to declare a public holiday. The government may declare a day a public holiday and the citizens may observe it as a public holiday, but there is nothing incumbent upon them to do so unless it is so declared by statute. The object of this bill is to make it certain that Remembrance day in the future will be one of the recognized holidays in this dominion. There are from time to time suggestions that other days should be made public holidays, such as Boxing day, which I believe has been established in some of the provinces as a holiday, but no consideration has been given as yet to suggestions of that kind. The only change by this bill will be to make Remembrance day a public holiday.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

REPRESENTATION ACT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 4, to amend the Representation Act, 1933.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I assume that there is no principle involved other than the need to amend the Representation Act as mentioned when the bill was introduced. In such case I have no objection to offer to the second reading.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I understand that all the hon. members immediately concerned have agreed to this. When the act was passed in 1933 a mistake occurred in regard to the boundaries of the city of Hamilton. The city council with the authority of the legislature had changed the boundaries of the city but that was unknown to the House of Commons when the bill was framed in 1933. This bill merely seeks to conform to the present city boundaries of the city of Hamilton.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): May I ask the minister if it will be possible to move certain amendments to the Representation Act correcting abuses when the bill goes to committee, or must that be done now?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would think not.

Mr. POWER: I did not understand the minister's reply.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He says no.

Mr. POWER: Under the circumstances, if the minister states that it will be impossible to move amendments to the bill in committee I would like to suggest, before this bill receives its second reading, that there is an urgent need for amendments to the Representation Act, the so-called Redistribution Act of 1933, and had we had the time to prepare for it undoubtedly some such amendments would have been proposed at this stage.

However, on the principle of the bill itself, I should like to note for the future that a representation bill may be amended between the ten-year periods during which it has been customary to allow a representation act to remain as it is. A precedent apparently is being created here, and I hope that there will be no objections to this precedent being followed at a later date in other years. But in order to show that perhaps the Representation Act of 1933 does require almost immediate amendment I wish to call the attention of the house to information which was furnished yesterday by the Secretary of State in answer to a question of mine which read:

How many names were inscribed on the electoral lists of each of the constituencies in the province of Quebec as a result of the recent general registration under the provisions of the Dominion Franchise Act, 1934?

It will be remembered that during the discussion of the redistribution bill in 1933 one of the reasons urged on the house for such drastic changes as were made at that time, particularly in the province of Quebec, was that it was considered necessary to alter the boundaries of former constituencies in order to give more equality in representation. Now that we have the list of constituencies in at least one province, showing the numbers of electors inscribed on the list, I think the house will be interested to know that this so-called equality of representation has certainly not been achieved. I do not wish to read the numbers of electors in each of the constituencies but I should like to point this out, that in the province of Quebec the very first name on the list is the constituency of Argenteuil, represented in this house by Sir George Perley. The number of electors in that constituency is 10,390. Another rural constituency geographically alongside Argenteuil is, if I remember rightly, Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm. At the present moment, and before the redistribution act comes into force, this constituency is represented by two members, my hon. friend from Joliette (Mr. Ferland) and the hon. member for L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Séguin), one of the oldest members of this house in point of time of service. These two counties were put together under the redistribution, and the combined population of the county now to be known as Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm is 30,282. That is to say, the voting population; in other words it takes three times more votes to elect one man in this constituency than it does in the constituency of Argenteuil, represented by my right hon. friend the minister without portfolio. I notice also that on the island of Montreal there is no great equality in the distribution of voters. For instance, the hon. the ex-Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) represents a constituency, that of St. James, in which there are 54,617 voters, whereas the present Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) represents a constituency, St. Lawrence-St. George, in which there are 24,570 voters; and my good friend from St. Ann, also on the government side of the house, represents a constituency in which there are 20,638 voters, while my good friend from Jacques Cartier represents a constituency with 20,995 voters. The member for Lévis represents a constituency with 14,512 voters, a constituency which is largely urban and partly rural. He is also on the government side of the house.

Even in the city of Quebec my good friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré), who represents Quebec West, represents 22,759 voters, and I must say that the number in Quebec South is not very much greater, namely, 23,754. I notice also that Dorchester, represented by a very able member on the other side of the house (Mr. Gagnon), has 12,535 voters, and Stanstead, also represented by a member on the other side, has a voting population of 14,406.

I thought it worth while to call the attention of the house to some of these figures in order to show that the protests which were made from this side in 1933 have been found to be in some measure justified, and that one of the strongest reasons urged for the adoption of the redistribution as outlined by the government at that time has not worked out in the manner in which we were led to believe.

In the circumstances, inasmuch as the members on this side do not wish to delay the consideration of the very important measures which we are led to believe are about to be brought down, it is likely that no amendments will be moved. But we wish to go on record as expressing once more our disapproval of the act of 1933.

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): I wish to add a word or two to what my hon. friend has said. I may tell the minister that the same condition that exists in the province of Quebec, about which the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) has spoken, exists in Ontario. I am not going to take up the time of the house to go into any details, but apparently the government thought in 1933 that they were putting over what they considered a fair redistribution bill. As far as Ontario is concerned, in relation to five or six or seven seats, it is manifestly unfair; it is not a redistribution but a gerrymander. I therefore wish to go on record this afternoon, and some time in the future I shall have an opportunity to go into the matter in more detail.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Hamilton East.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not think I have anything to add to what I formerly said, except this. Under section 51 of the British North America Act a census is taken in this country every ten years and it then becomes the duty of parliament to pass a redistribution act or a representation act to conform with the figures found by the census. It is not therefore usual and I do not know whether it is proper until another census has been taken, to change at all the basis of that act.

This bill which I now propose is purely technical; it is really to correct a clerical error or an error made by the committee or those who dealt with the matter on the assumption that they were dealing with the correct boundaries of the city of Hamilton. Subsequently it turned out that they did not deal with the correct boundaries. I was asked to bring in the bill; I consulted the various members interested, the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell), the hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Bell) and the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Wilson) and they all thought the mistake should be remedied. I have also consulted with the chief electoral officer; he has consulted with the franchise commissioner and he says that no difficulty will be involved in the lists; that there is sufficient power now to correct the lists in respect of both the Hamilton ridings.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not intend to offer opposition, but I want to express my surprise at the action of the government and the reason given for the amended sections in connection with the city of Hamilton. Hamilton is not by any means, may I point out to the minister, the only city where boundaries have been ignored. In nearly every city in the dominion boundaries were not taken into consideration. Calgary, the western portion of which the Prime Minister represents, has been cut into three constituencies. Moreover, I want to point out to the committee that upon investigating the redistribution bill after it was passed by the house, I was surprised that some of the arrangements that had been made had not been carried out, but I assumed the matter was settled and settled for ten years and I made no protest. The reason offered by the minister that it is found the redistribution dealing with the city of Hamilton is in error because it does not conform with city boundaries, does not seem to be a valid excuse for opening up or changing this particular constituency. I do not assume any great political advantage will be gained by what is being done, but I am strongly of opinion, unless territory is omitted altogether and individuals are disfranchised, the redistribution should stand as passed by the House of Commons at the last session. As I pointed out before, I cannot see very much in the contention that those two particular constituencies have suffered any injury by the redistribution bill of last year.

Mr. POWER: I am rather interested in the argument of the Minister of Justice which in effect is this, that if a clerical error is found, we may very properly change the Representation Act within the ten-year period, but if a glaring injustice has been committed with malice aforethought, we should not do so.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Might I point out to the minister that the description that is now sought to be changed is a definite description of certain portions of the city of Hamilton. The Representation Act of 1924 which was followed by the act of 1933, provided this description:

Hamilton East consisting of that part of the city of Hamilton lying east of Wellington street and west of Ottawa street.

Clear, definite boundaries, a definite part of the city of Hamilton.

Hamilton West consisting of that part of the city of Hamilton lying west of Wellington streeet, east of Paradise road, and north of Coate's Paradise.

That is a definite section of Hamilton.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The point is they did not include the city of Hamilton.

Mr. ELLIOTT: They did not purport to include the city of Hamilton.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, they did.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There were two parts of the city of Hamilton and the boundaries remain the same. This is a change made in the act which was passed two years ago, and it is a change in direct contravention of the law that changes shall take place only every ten years. If there were a part left out, or if it had not been properly described, I could see the strength of my hon. friend's desire now to make an amendment so that clearly every part would be taken in. But that is not the point in this case. These sections were drawn and it was clearly intended that so far as the two Hamiltons were concerned, there would be no change.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I was not present in the house at the time the Representation Act was passed; I was out of the country; but my understanding was that the city of Hamilton was to be entitled to two seats and when the clause was drafted it was supposed the city of Hamilton had been included in the two seats. Subsequently it turned out that the boundaries of the city of Hamilton had been changed; now the two seats do not describe that city and the object of that bill is to describe Hamilton and to include the city in two seats.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend very fairly states that he is not familiar with what took place. What happened was this: in certain ridings there was to be no change.

[Mr. Power.]

That was set out at the early meetings of the redistribution committee; when the general committee met it was decided that there would be no change in so many ridings, and the two ridings of Hamilton were included among those.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is what we want to make it—two ridings.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The two portions of Hamilton were constituted two ridings. There was no change. The point I want to make is this, that we are making a change now. If this change is entitled to be made, whether it is of advantage or disadvantage to either party is not the point; we are now revising the Representation Act within a period of ten years.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, we are correcting an error.

Mr. MacNICOL: The remarks of the hon. member for West Middlesex are correct to a certain extent, that is as to the opinion of the committee at the time the two ridings of Hamilton and that of Wentworth were considered. The committee understood and agreed unanimously that the boundaries of those three ridings were not to be disturbed, were to remain as they were; but apparently when the measure was drafted the boundaries were disturbed, contrary to the will of the committee. I for one, am in accord with the bill before the house, because it amends the act to read according to the intention of the committee. As the act now reads it does not conform with the intention of the committee. The two members for Hamilton and the member for Wentworth were consulted at the time and they agreed unanimously with the committee's recommendations that the ridings as they were prior to the last redistribution measure were not to be changed, and as I understand it the bill before the committee now restores the boundaries as they were.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is quite different from what the minister said.

Mr. ELLIOTT: May I point out that my hon. friend is under a misapprehension. Let me read the boundaries as they were when the committee decided that there should be no change. Take first Hamilton East; this is volume 4 of the revised statutes—

Mr. BENNETT: It is printed in the bill.

Mr. ELLIOTT: But the Prime Minister will notice that what was decided on two years ago was as the old description is printed in the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: What is printed in the bill, to which reference is made, is a description of the city of Hamilton which was thought to be correct, but as a matter of fact it was not a correct description, the boundaries of the city of Hamilton having been changed. I think a similar course was followed in 1924-25 in connection with the redistribution of 1923, in regard to one item.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Under the explanatory notes the existing boundaries, that is existing at the time this amendment is proposed, are given as follows:

Hamilton East consisting of that part of the city of Hamilton lying east of Wellington street and west of Ottawa street.

That is exactly as it was before the redistribution. There was no change made.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so, those were the boundaries of Hamilton in 1923.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, we are talking of Hamilton East.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, the two together made the city of Hamilton.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is not relating particularly to the boundaries of Hamilton, it is Hamilton East. That would be the part between certain streets. That is the same in both acts. We have Hamilton West, consisting of that part of the city of Hamilton lying west of Wellington street, east of Paradise road, and north of Cootes Paradise. That is exactly as it was in the old act, no change. What is now sought to be changed is the description that was clearly settled at the time of redistribution.

Mr. MacNICOL: My hon. friend knows very well that there was to be no change whatever in those three ridings, Hamilton East, Hamilton West and Wentworth.

Mr. ELLIOTT: And there was not.

Mr. SANDERSON: I would like to ask my hon. friend a question. He talks about arrangements and agreements; were all those arrangements and agreements kept?

Mr. MacNICOL: My hon. friend refers to—

Mr. SANDERSON: Sanctity of the contract.

Mr. MacNICOL: —certain ridings. I told my hon. friend I was very sorry—

Mr. SANDERSON: Spare your sorrow.

Mr. MacNICOL: It was not the fault of the committee.

Mr. SANDERSON: Do not be sorry for me, I can take care of myself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Where is the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote)? The section refers to Cootes Paradise.

Mr. GAGNON: May I be permitted to say a few words in reply to the remarks made by my hon. friend from Quebec South (Mr. Power). In giving some figures about some constituencies of Quebec I am afraid he has, doubtless unwittingly, given the committee a false impression. I ask him to refer to the debates in 1932-33, volume 5, page 5414, English edition where he will find the exact figures of the counties of the province of Quebec. If I may be permitted to quote a few figures he will see that the member for Dorchester has not, as my hon. friend has led the committee to believe, organized a little county for himself.

Mr. POWER: In order that there may be no misunderstanding permit me to correct my hon. friend by telling him that I was quoting the number of electors on the electoral lists furnished to me yesterday by the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) which presumably he had from the franchise commissioner, thus being up-to-date, showing the number of persons having the right to vote in the constituencies of the province of Quebec. I was not referring to population.

Mr. GAGNON: I accept the hon. member's explanation, but I think I might be permitted to add that when the members of the committee dealt with redistribution in 1932 they took into account the exact population of each county. If I may quote the figures given during the debate in 1933 on the redistribution bill he will find that for instance the county of Argenteuil to which my hon. friend referred had a population of 27,885. The county of Dorchester, which is also a rural district, has 27,155. Bellechasse, a neighbouring county to Dorchester, has 27,480, and the county of Levis which is near Dorchester and Bellechasse has a population of 28,548. So there is but a slight difference between the numbers of inhabitants in these three counties. These figures clearly show that the committee dealt with the redistribution of these counties in a fair and equitable manner.

Mr. POWER: We will agree on that.

Section agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Before the title carries I would remark to the minister that I think he is establishing a precedent that may have far-reaching effects. As I have pointed out, the excuse given for this change does not seem to me to warrant opening up the redistribution act. The precedent might be taken advantage of.

Mr. BENNETT: It is quite obvious that under the statute there is only one redistribution to be made; that is consequent upon the decennial census. Taking the population of the province of Quebec and dividing by seventy-five you get your population base, and from that you make a calculation with respect to the other provinces, subject to the provisions of the statute with respect to fractions If this amendment were designed to change the basis of representation I would entirely agree with what has been said. But what happened was that the committee concluded that the city of Hamilton should continue with two members, and the neighbouring county of Wentworth should have one member. And they set down, wrote into the statute, the exact description of the city of Hamilton as it had been in 1924 when the last redistribution was made. The city of Hamilton was not properly described in that statute, that is the city of Hamilton of 1933. Therefore the change is now being made to define correctly the city of Hamilton. That is all.

With respect to the discrepancies in the number of electors on the list, it is hardly fair to take that as a base. The statute says the population is a base for comparison. It might well be that the number on the list of electors might represent a population much larger than that of a neighbouring county that had a smaller number of electors on its list, because the qualifications of electors under the Franchise Act is limited to British subjects of a certain age. If there were residing in a nearby community a large number of persons not qualified to be placed on the list it would obviously follow that any comparison based on the number of people on the voters' list would not be a fair comparison. My memory is—I am speaking subject to correction, I have sent for the statute—that after the last redistribution it was found necessary to correct a technical error, and I believe that on more than one occasion it has been necessary to do so.

I cannot add anything to what has been said by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) nor do I desire to do so. What he said is perfectly clear, namely that he has endeavoured to correct an incorrect description of the city of Hamilton as it appears in the statute of 1933, to define correctly the area that was to be represented in this house by two members.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not want to be misunderstood. A few moments ago I said that city boundaries played no important part in the redistribution of 1933, and I think every member of this house will agree with that statement. I want to point out to the committee and to the minister that to-day you are changing a boundary. You are no interfering with the representation; you are merely changing boundaries on the plea that it is to conform with city boundaries. That being the case I say you are setting up a very definite precedent which might be taken advantage of for party purposes if need be. This is something which, if it was used heretofore, was for the purpose of correcting errors; now it is being used for the purpose of correcting boundaries, and city boundaries have nothing at all to do with the boundaries as set out in the redistribution act, 1933. In some cases you conform to such boundaries, but in many other cases there is no conformation to boundaries at all. That is all I wish to say.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I should like to say just a word in answer to the Prime Minister. The right hon. gentleman is under a misapprehension. The city of Hamilton was not discussed by the committee. What was before the committee was East Hamilton, West Hamilton and Wentworth. There was very little discussion about those constituencies, because they were left unchanged.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 5 to amend the criminal code.

He said: Before the motion is adopted may I say that in introducing this bill I overlooked referring to two of its provisions. I thought the bill contained only a single clause in regard to the jury system in the province of Saskatchewan, but there are two other amending clauses in the bill as well. They are not very important, but I understood that they formed part of another bill, and was not aware that they were in this measure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Do you refer to the amendment with regard to race meetings?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton) in the chair.

On section 1—Race meetings.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Perhaps I had better offer a word of explanation. Last year we amended the criminal code to provide that there might be fourteen days of continuous racing on authorized race tracks instead of two meetings of seven days each. In drafting the bill, however, we did not state that these days must be consecutive. Consequently there has been an attempt on the part of some race track proprietors to say they have had only half a day of racing or no racing at all because of rain or for some other reason, and to spread the period over more than fourteen days. This amendment is designed to make it clear that the fourteen days must be consecutive. The last few words of the section make it clear that there are to be only two meetings, if the fourteen day meeting is not carried on. The two meetings are to consist of seven days each, and they must be twenty days apart.

PENSION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved the second reading of Bill No. 6, to amend the Pension Act.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I desire very briefly to support the principle of this legislation. I could have wished for a specific period to be mentioned but perhaps, because of the uncertainty as to the accumulation of work, that might not be possible. I should like also to take this opportunity of commending the work performed by the acting chairman of the Canadian pension commission since the last session of parliament. I think he has handled his work effectively and with expedition, and I want to take this, the first opportunity, to pay that tribute to him.

When the bill is in committee of the whole I should like the minister, if possible, to give the committee some information with regard to the arrears of work at present confronting the members of the Canadian pension commission, and I should also like the minister's own estimate as to how long it will take to have that work cleared up with the aid of the two or three new commissioners. With these observations I desire to commend the principle of this bill.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton) in the chair.

On section 1—Tenure of office.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Mr. Chairman, in reply to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre may I state that there are 2,938 quorum hearings to be heard at the present time. These figures do not include those cases where the pensions were cancelled or reduced in 1933, owing to change in basis of entitlement, and which were subsequently restored pending a hearing before a quorum. On January 1 of this year there were still 296 of these cases to be heard, together with 64 assessment cases. There were slightly over 100 cases which for some reason or another had been adjourned. The pension commissioner intimates that he is quite sure with the four extra commissioners the work could be completed in possibly a couple of years. That is the nearest estimate he can give.

A CANADIAN FLAG

PROPOSAL FOR NATIONAL EMBLEM ON WHICH UNION JACK SHALL BE CONSPICUOUS

The house resumed from Thursday, January 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Dickie:

That, in the opinion of this house, a national flag representing the Dominion of Canada should be adopted.

And that in any design for a Canadian flag the union jack must be conspicuous, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Arthurs.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, when this resolution came before the house I expressed the hope but not the sure confidence that I might be able to make some definite suggestions which would meet with the approval of those who have conflicting opinions with regard to the adoption of a national flag. I believe it is obvious that the adoption of a flag should be made with a certain degree of unanimity of public opinion, otherwise it is not likely to serve the purpose we have in view, namely that of creating a solidarity of national sentiment. I believe under the circumstances it would be quite impossible in a few days or perhaps during the whole session to reach anything like unanimity of opinion on either side of the house. To set up a committee at this time which could not report and provide for definite action during the present term of parliament would not be sufficient, because there must be very considerable discussion and further action before a national flag may be definitely, permanently and finally adopted.

I find that the question of the continuation of the present marine flag is involved and so there would be very considerable conflict of opinion.

If the house acquiesces I should like to suggest that the mover and seconder of the amendment and the original mover and seconder of the motion might consider the propriety of withdrawing the motion at the present time, because any action which may now be taken is not likely to achieve the end which the great majority of hon. members must have in view, namely the design of a flag which will have unanimity of public sentiment behind it and will be accepted generally as our flag for the future.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): Mr. Speaker, as the mover of the amendment I have the permission of my seconder to withdraw. I can understand readily that in a matter of this kind it is wise to go slowly because of the necessary investigations which must be made. Consequently in view of the fact that we will be having a business session, so far as I am concerned I am content to withdraw the amendment.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if it will help to relieve the government of its embarrassment and let us get on with social reform I shall have no objection to offer from this side of the house to allowing the member who moved the resolution to withdraw it. I must say we witnessed an amazing spectacle when we saw hon. gentlemen opposite take up an entire day in a discussion of this measure. What was even more amazing was the fact that they spent the afternoon differing from each other. Hon. members on this side of the house had gained the impression from what the Prime Minister had said that there was nothing so urgent as the immediate reform of the capitalist system, that we were to have legislation as soon as the house met which would begin to set everything to rights, and that the government would bring in an insurance measure with respect to unemployment and with respect to pretty much everything else that could be mentioned as coming within the classification of social insurance. We have on the order paper the following resolution standing in the name of the Prime Minister:

That it is expedient to introduce a bill to establish an employment and social insurance commission; to provide for a national employment service; for insurance against unemployment; for aid to unemployed persons and for other forms of social insurance and security and for purposes related thereto; and to provide for such contributions as may be necessary to carry into effect the proposed legislation.

According to what the Prime Minister said to the house this matter was so urgent that he felt obligated to have the notice I have read appear on the order paper on the first day the house considered the address, and it is somewhat surprising the resolution has remained unproceeded with ever since. The government is not ready to proceed with it. Last night I asked the Prime Minister if he could not arrange to proceed with the resolution to-day and he said that it would have to stand until Monday. The government has still to consider the legislation which the people of Canada were told by radio broadcasts was all ready and special mention of which would appear in the speech from the throne. They were told that we must have these measures enacted at once. The trend of every speech that the Prime Minister made was that this matter was so important that great haste would have to be made in it. Now we of the opposition have tried to do what we could to expedite the introduction of this legislation. I think hon. members will admit that we have refrained from discussion, for except for one speech there was no discussion from the official opposition of the speech from the throne. With respect to private members' resolutions we have refrained from participating in those debates, rendering our position liable, if you will, to be misconstrued in the public mind as not supporting to the extent that we should these various measures. With regard to the bills that have been discussed this afternoon we have cooperated with hon. gentlemen opposite in getting them through different stages just as rapidly as possible. I think in that regard our attitude has been made very clear.

The other afternoon, when we had only the afternoon to devote to public business, hon. gentlemen opposite took up the entire time of this house from three o'clock to ten minutes to six with a discussion of this flag resolution. There were nineteen members I think on the Conservative benches who participated in that debate. And what did it all amount to? The hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) knew as well at that time as he does to-day that it was going to be a difficult matter to get unanimity in his own party on that question. He only had to sit there and listen to them fighting each other over it.

I want to take exception to one remark my hon. friend made this afternoon when he said that he thought there would be difficulty in having unanimity upon the subject on this side. This question has been before the house before and we have been unanimous from the start, and we are to-day.

I do submit that the whole purpose of that discussion the other afternoon was to give the ministry time to see what it could do in the way of getting together some of the legislation that the Prime Minister said over the radio was all in readiness and must be put through just as quickly as possible. If it is going to help hon. gentlemen opposite to get out of their embarrassment, and more particularly if it is going to enable us to get nearer to the point where we can consider legislation that the country is waiting for, we shall consent to the withdrawal of the resolution, but our consent is on those grounds and those alone.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The right hon. gentleman has availed himself of this opportunity to attack the government with respect to its legislative program and he has made statements that are at variance, I am happy to say, with the facts. The resolution which was debated in this house was a private member's resolution Its subject was more or less a hardy perennial and has been discussed with a good deal of feeling, and sometimes with acrimony. It was not put on the order paper at the instance of the government. It was put on by a private member on his own responsibility, and I may say without consultation with the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I never said that it was put on at the instance of the government. I said that it was debated all afternoon to give the government a chance to make up its mind.

Mr. BENNETT: I will deal with that too. That is not true—that is a short way to put it.

Now let us go a step further. The right hon. gentleman has said that the differences of opinion that manifested themselves on this side of the house with respect to a private member's motion had something to do with the legislative program of the government. As a matter of fact, until I saw in Hansard what had transpired I was not aware of the differences of opinion to which attention has been directed, except for what I was told, for I was engaged in seeing people in the room adjoining. I was not considering the government's legislative program.

With respect to the notice of motion that stands in my name I put it upon the order paper because it had been mooted that the opposition would not discuss the speech from the throne, and I gave notice so that I might advance it one step without having any possible delay.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why has it not been advanced two steps?

Mr. BENNETT: Just because it is not in accordance with the plans we have with respect to it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the very reason. It is the reason which the right hon. gentleman himself gave when he was Prime Minister with respect to some of his legislation.

The debate that took place in this house on the resolution of a private member had no relation in any way, sense or form, direct or indirect, to the consideration of the measure that will be submitted to this house when the resolution standing in my name has been adopted by this chamber. I assure the right hon. gentleman of that, and if he has his usual suspicions with respect to it he can satisfy himself by inquiry that that is so.

The bill about which he talks, and which he insinuated had not been printed, was as a matter of fact placed in form on exactly the last day of March, I think, in 1934. It was discussed with the Department of Justice and the minister prior to that date. When I introduce the bill into this house, and the house understands, as it will, the complexities and the difficulties of this measure, it will realize that there is a good reason for everything that I have said—a very good reason indeed.

When I said, speaking over the radio, that it was important that these matters should not be delayed, the right hon. gentleman knew quite well that I was speaking to an intelligent public which did not expect parliament to meet one day, pass legislation the next, and prorogue the next.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I fear that was the impression they got.

Mr. BENNETT: No, I do not think intelligent people got that impression.

May I go further, because I regard this matter as important? I said that this was the time to introduce the legislation, and that is the reason it is being introduced this session. But there are many things that parliament has to deal with besides a single measure. The method of dealing with it, the time that will be taken up, the maintenance of the public service—all these are matters which the government must have in mind. We have pointed out on more than one occasion that there would be just as small a program of legislation dealing with these various matters as is consistent with the public interest. We have made that abundantly clear from the start. It will not be on Monday that this measure will be dealt with because that is private members' day. It will be dealt with on Tuesday.

There is no necessity for the heroics of the right hon. gentleman. Does he believe for a moment that anyone is deceived by this sort of talk? I wonder if a highly trained mind such as his thinks for a moment that the intelligent people of this country are deceived by these mock heroics? Does he imagine for a moment that anybody is deceived but himself when he talks about his anxiety that this thing should be done, expecting that it might be done in a day or a day and a half, or two days. I have heard some of his own friends suggest why he did not want parliament to rise too soon, that it must sit fifty days at least. But that is not a reason.

We are proceeding in an orderly manner with the legislation that we are submitting to this house. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) is aware of the statement that was made in this house by myself that before this house had finished its life we would introduce an unemployment insurance bill, and from the day that we completed the census, which was long after the time that we might expect, of the number of unemployed, because we put a special schedule in the census returns to ascertain what the number of unemployed was on June 1, 1931—from the completion of that census we have been engaged in the preparation of this legislation, and when it is before the house, the house will realize just what is involved in it and the difficulties that had to be overcome in its preparation. The first mimeographed copy of it I think was completed in the early part of 1934, the basis for the preparation of the act having been obtained in England in 1933, and from that time until this we have been engaged upon that legislation. I said yesterday that the cabinet desired to consider it further on Saturday because the change of a single cent with respect either to contributions or compensation necessitates the making of new actuarial computations, and as the facts develop and further information is obtained questions arise necessitating consideration. I believe that the bill was actually printed, instead of mimeographed, at the time I was making my addresses on the radio, and certainly it has been mimeographed since 1934. It certainly was mimeographed then.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Now I desire to make that observation, because I think it is not deceiving anyone, not even the right hon. gentleman himself, to assume that in the statements that have been made there was any thought that parliament was to meet in the morning pass legislation in the afternoon and prorogue in the evening. That was not the purpose; but in an orderly and proper manner parliament will proceed with the work that has to be done and I have no doubt that in due course it will be passed. But there are other matters. Estimates must be dealt with; the public service must be maintained; there must be provision to deal with the conditions that exist in western Canada where they say that they are so largely dependent upon what they get from us to maintain the lives of their people and the credit of their provinces. These matters have to be dealt with and they will be dealt with. No one suggested that everything else would be dropped in order to proceed with particular legislation. But at this session not at some other session, at this time, not at some other time, we propose to deal with these things and, as the result of that intention, we shall proceed with them in due course.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister suggests that I insinuated something. If he will look at Hansard he will find that I insinuated nothing. I asked one direct and plain question and I put it in the politest terms possible:

May I ask my right hon. friend if the bill related to this resolution is drafted?

Mr. BENNETT: And what was said about not being printed?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was a straight question I asked my right hon. friend. As to its not being printed, I said nothing.

Mr. BENNETT: Last night.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am reading exactly what I said last night:

Mr. Mackenzie King: What business will be taken up to-morrow?

Then the Prime Minister answered.

Mr. Mackenzie King: But with regard to the order in the name of the Prime Minister, the one he mentioned was of such great importance that he had thought it necessary last week to give notice of proceeding with it immediately what is to be done? It is the one to which we attach the most importance. Could not my right hon. friend arrange to proceed with it to-morrow?

Mr. Bennett: Which one is that?

Mr. Mackenzie King: The one relating to the establishment of an employment and social insurance commission.

Mr. Bennett: I do not propose to proceed with it to-morrow.

Mr. Mackenzie King: But that is the most important of any.

Mr. Bennett: It may be, but I do not propose to proceed with it until Monday.

May I pause here to say that in speaking this afternoon the Prime Minister did not say Monday but Tuesday.

Mr. BENNETT: I did say Monday but realized then that Monday is private members' day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought at the time that my right hon. friend was making a mistake though I confess that I did not call his attention to the fact. Then I asked the Prime Minister this question:

Mr. Mackenzie King: May I ask my right hon. friend if the bill related to this resolution is drafted?

The Prime Minister thereupon made a reply, following which I said:

Mr. Mackenzie King: What puzzles me was the haste of my right hon. friend to give notice of his intention to proceed with the resolution introduced last Monday, and yet his not being able to proceed to-morrow.

And that ends all I had to say. Where did I insinuate anything about the legislation not being printed? That is pure bluff, just the kind of thing the Prime Minister has been giving the public over the radio.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman, if he now desires to engage in that kind of discussion, is out of order. He has no right to be making a speech of this kind at this time; he knows that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is the Prime Minister to have the right to misrepresent my position?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What is the business now before the house, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister accuses me of heroics and speaks about the public not being deceived by them. The public will not be deceived by any of his heroics over the radio.

Mr. BENNETT: All I say is that the right hon. gentleman suggested last night that the bill was not drafted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister asks what was said about the bill not being printed. It is bluff, like all the rest. My right hon. friend has been found in the position he now takes too often.

Mr. POULIOT: May I bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the fact that there is a strong odour of grease in the house. It must be the smell of the social legislation which is being fried in the pan in the Prime Minister's office.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house that the amendment be withdrawn?

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the main motion.

Mr. C. H. DICKIE (Nanaimo): I can assure the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) that it was through no desire of mine that the debate on my resolution lasted an afternoon. I considered that it had sufficient merit to be carried through the house in an hour. However, in view of the fact that it has proved highly contentious; and that, being highly contentious, it has given rise to a debate which is likely to be prolonged should it be proceeded with; and because of the eagerness and avidity of the opposition and even of some of our members to have some of the more important economic measures proceeded with, I respectfully ask, with the consent of my seconder, that permission be granted to have the resolution expunged from the order paper.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Not expunged, withdrawn.

Motion withdrawn.

FEDERAL HEALTH POLICY

PROPOSED ADOPTION OF POLICY IN COOPERATION WITH THE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

The house resumed from Thursday, January 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Spencer:

That, in the opinion of this house, the federal government should adopt a definite health policy which could be carried on in cooperation with the provincial governments.

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface): I assure the mover of this resolution that what I have to say will be a word of commendation. I congratulate him on his consistency and persistency and on the many excellent efforts brought forward in the house in this regard; and I am also glad to congratulate him on the fact that now, probably for the first time, his efforts, judging by the remarks of the Minister of Pensions and National Health, are going to meet with success.

This is a worthy subject. I have been a medical man for over thirty years and in that time I have had ample opportunity to realize that there was a great deal of need for a movement along these lines. You may call it state medicine if you like, but it has been long known to most medical men that the cost of medical service has borne and still bears very heavily on a large proportion of the citizens of this country. The well to do have never been concerned, for they could pay the cost; and for those in the lower and more humble walks of life who had no resources from which to pay, there was little concern, for the free clinics and the public wards of the hospitals looked after them pretty efficiently. But for those persons who wished to pay their way, with whom it was an honest desire if at all possible to meet the cost themselves, there was a real hardship; the cost of medical service bore very heavily upon them.

With that thought in mind I was prompted in 1931 to bring before the house a resolution that, in the opinion of the house, a measure of federal state medicine was in the best interests of the Canadian people. That resolution was debated through one entire afternoon and on into the evening. There were about nineteen speakers in the debate, including a good many on the government side of the house; and I think I am stating the truth when I say that, if not in every instance, at any rate in the vast majority of instances, the resolution met with sympathetic consideration. Nearly every speaker spoke in support of it with the exception of the Prime Minister, the then Minister of Pensions and National Health, and one or two others in the house. So I might pause here to assure the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) that his resolution will, I believe, have the undivided support of members on this side of the house, and from what appears to be the situation at present, there will probably be no opposition.

In the next year, 1932, I had the temerity to bring the matter up again under a different heading, namely:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into immediate consideration steps that would: (a) provide for periodic medical examination of the Canadian people; (b) afford medical relief for those suffering from disease.

On that occasion the motion did not reach the house until fairly well on in the session, and although it was given some consideration, it was too late in the session for it to be thoroughly debated. Both of these resolutions and, I believe, the motion of the hon. member for Battle River have in view in some form or another some degree of state medicine, whether it be federal or provincial or a combination of the two. I believe the only way of dealing with the matter to the satisfaction of the people and the medical profession—and the medical profession has a right to be considered—is a measure providing for state medicine.

I would like to bring this feature of the situation to the attention of the house: in greater Winnipeg medical men have for some time had to take what they could get and that was very little, but in the last few months we have had established there relief measures. They amount to this: as regards surgeons, for a major operation for which a surgeon could formerly demand and command a fee anywhere from $100 to $500, he is to-day paid $25. Not only has the ordinary routine medical attendance been considerably diminished, but after a medical man completes his month and has given service in each of the several municipalities of greater Winnipeg, —and there are six or seven of them—running up to $150 or $200, or something of that kind, all he gets for his combined services in all municipalities is $100 a month. It is possible, therefore, if a medical man's patients have to a very large degree fallen on evil days and are now on relief, his entire salary may amount to $100 a month. A salary of $100 a month is, of course, better than nothing but compared with the fees that ordinarily would be paid to a doctor for efficient and intelligent services and the quantity of work of this kind he is expected to do, it does not seem to be an entirely fair way of treating him.

I noticed a remark by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Sutherland) that the purpose of state medicine and these movements generally was to bring efficient medical attention to the Canadian people. That is very true; that was the original idea, but the doctor should get some consideration somewhere. I well remember when I was a youngish man, a good many of the younger medical men had to struggle pretty hard to make a living, while the older men were making good incomes but were overworked. The younger men very often got nothing to do and made no money, and at the same time a large portion of the population went without medical attention. As I said before, for this reason I was prompted to bring these two measures for state medicine before the house. I do not believe any measure of state medicine in Canada will be satisfactory unless it is practically the same for each province. I believe the federal authority should exercise a supervision, requiring uniform conditions in all the provinces, for which the federal authority would be prepared to pay. The federal authority has at its disposal the means of raising funds much more easily than the provinces, and I have no reason to doubt that if it prescribed uniform conditions of this character for the provinces and was prepared to pay for those prescribed conditions, the various provinces would gladly accept the suggestion and the assistance.

Although I believe in the majority of the provinces there is a fairly satisfactory state of affairs so far as medical relief, medical care and even medical research are concerned, still the situation is by no means alike in all the provinces because undoubtedly at this time some of the provinces are spending and are able to spend much more money than are others. I believe what we want in this country—and I may not find many in support—is state medicine, federal state medicine. Let each province have its own machinery of state medicine, but let there be a federal supervision which would prescribe uniform conditions for the provinces and which would extend the necessary assistance to permit those conditions to be brought about.

In discussing this matter for the second time in 1932 I gave a list of benefits that were to be derived, that would accrue to the people of this country by a form of state medicine. That list was not original with me; it was the finding of a commission that had been appointed to inquire into the advisability of the adoption of state medicine.

I thought it was very much to the point, and with your permission, sir, I shall restate the benefits mentioned in that address:

> At present there are in Canada several thousand regularly qualified medical men and many other so-called doctors, in all probably a greater number than is actually required, ... Under state medicine there would be just as many doctors, nurses, masseurs and druggists as were actually required, and practitioners of doubtful value would be eliminated.

I do not think that requires any explanation.

> At present there are in many towns and cities more doctors than are needed, while many rural communities are entirely without medical service. Under state medicine every community would be part of some health district and the service would reach every family in the land.
> At present doctors are competitors of each other and economic pressure makes professional ethics farcical and impossible largely to the cost and undoing of the patient. Under state medicine there would be no need for ethics; professional cooperation would predominate.
> At present doctors in general are poorly paid, fees are irregularly collected and the financial interferes constantly with the professional side. Under state medicine doctors would be paid suitable salaries commensurate with their ability and work. They would strive to secure advancement and would not be harassed with the anxiety of ill-health, a penniless old age or lack of income. These matters would be taken care of by the state.
> At present the medical profession thinks the rich and well-to-do should pay for the services rendered to the poor, but the rich resent being penalized in this manner. Under state medicine all men, rich and poor alike, would receive the best we have to offer.
>
> At present the people consult physicians only in the instance of a known or obvious ailment and often when the disease is well-established. Under state medicine preventive medicine by periodic health examination would overcome this evil and would supplant largely the system of curative medicine now pertaining.
> At present consultations with specialists are expensive and frequently too long delayed. Under state medicine consultations would be free and there would be no cause for delay. Suspected cases of cancer, tuberculosis, and so on, could be promptly diagnosed and given a chance of recovery.
> At present people spend millions yearly in self-prescribed and counter-prescribed medicines, often of no value. Under state medicine there would be no patent medicines, nostrum or other drug traffic.
> At present the medical service is hindered by lack of public confidence, the economic interest of the doctor and the patient being largely opposed. Under state medicine the economic interest of the doctor and the patient would coincide and the service would give full confidence.

I need not read further. There are many other reasons stated in the debate on that occasion. I believe we need state medicine, that is, a combination of federal and provincial medicine, which would provide for the yearly examination of the Canadian people. The Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Sutherland) may say that we could not take a person by the shoulders and drag him to the doctor if he did not want to go; but I think if it were understood that the examination was available to him he would readily go and be examined. It seems to me we require a scheme of federal and provincial state medicine under which the Canadian people can and will be annually examined once or twice, and if found to be the victims of disease will receive suitable treatment. Disease in this country would thus be cleaned up, making of Canada a better and a happier land.

Mr. G. D. STANLEY (East Calgary): Mr. Speaker, may I express my congratulations to the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) upon having introduced this resolution, and upon introducing it in the terms in which it is now before the house. It gives us an opportunity of discussing in a general way questions of health which relate so intimately to our whole population. One of the most necessary and fundamental factors in the success of health activities or health measures is that we should have an educated and rational minded public. Unless we have people who think sanely and are sufficiently educated in health matters to be able to use intelligently the services made available to them, we are not likely to attain much success in respect of any measures forced upon them. Hence the jurisdiction as we find it in this country, giving the municipality or the local health unit certain authority in regard to health matters, and then coming to the provincial organization and then to the federal Department of Health is, I think, rational and logical.

In regard to active, curative medical services extended by medical men to a family we should keep in mind the fact that there must be that close relationship, that feeling of confidence, that spirit of cooperation which will accept in a reasonable and willing manner the services which are extended. Consequently the present arrangement, which leaves in the hands of the municipalities the direction of matters pertaining to health, and which in no way interferes with that intimacy of relationship between physician and patient, is an ideal arrangement and one that must be maintained no matter what reorganization may be undertaken. The success of the treatment depends upon the intimacy of the relationship and the confidence between patient and physician. If one had the time and inclination to go back over the history of the development of medicine, one could show that only during those periods when that relationship of which I have been speaking existed did success attend medical or health activities. When ignorance, superstition and irrational thinking predominated and interferred with the proper and scientific use of health and medical science, then the services degenerated. It is a strange coincidence all through history that during those ages, from the earliest days to the present, when ignorance, superstition and irrational thinking predominated among the people of almost every land medical services and science and health activities were at their lowest ebb.

I have not time to go back over history. One might point to a few of the peaks in the development of health activities, hospitalization and medical science. For instance, from the earliest days until the time of Hippocrates who is looked upon as the father of medical science ignorance and superstitution predominated and no success was attained. But a remarkable change was brought about by the dominating influence of that master mind who lived in a period when, not only in connection with medicine but in almost every other line, people as a whole were more rationally minded. Hon. gentlemen will recall that Hippocrates lived contemporaneously with Socrates, Pericles, Euripides and other outstanding Greek philosophers, and the success which was achieved away back in the time of that civilization was brought about only by the application of rational measures of education to the people who were prepared to accept such measures and such advanced science.

Then you come along to the dark ages, when medical matters, health activities, hospital development, nursing and everything pertaining to medical science became a lost art. That was when the ignorance of the times defeated any spasmodic efforts made by men who happened to take some advanced stand in the promotion of something better. So we come along to the day of John Hunter, when another change took place. The superstition, ignorance and irrational thinking of the general public began to change, and as they became educated so the scientific measures advanced by this man began to exert an influence. So we come on down to the day of Pasteur, Lister and Florence Nightingale. They attained scientific advancement without a doubt, but had there not been a change in the educational attainments of the people in general and a desire for something better, their efforts would have been defeated. There was a change, not only in medical matters but in other spheres of activity as well. If you let your minds go back to about 1800, when this change began to be noticed, you will remember that in almost every line of development, whether it was economics, politics, business, finance or any other line, there was a general, gradual improvement, and with that came the education and enlightenment of the people, who accepted medical science.

Perhaps it was hardly advisable for me to take so much time in discussing this question, but I did wish to give this house and the country in general the important fundamental principle that behind all activity there must be that acceptance on the part of an educated rational minded public. I do not intend this afternoon to discuss state medicine, whatever that may be defined to mean, nor have I any intention of discussing at any considerable length health insurance. I presume that matter will come up for discussion in the future. But one thought must prevail in our minds, and it is that the improvement which has taken place from 1800 to the present time, and the advances that have been made in regard to all matters relating to health and medical science, have been mainly in connection with the prevention of disease. It is true that there have been some very great steps taken in a positive manner in connection with scientific medicine, and all credit is due those who have brought about those reforms and advances. At the same time, however, I think I can safely say that the measures which have been taken with regard to the prevention of disease have saved more lives, have made society healthier and have made citizens more capable and more efficient in their work than all the other measures of a positive nature of which I have been speaking.

One illustration comes to my mind at the moment. Florence Nightingale, with whose work everyone is familiar, by one series of activities was able, at the hospital at Scutari during the Crimean war, to accomplish one of the greatest saving of lives ever undertaken in any military hospital. When she arrived there with her little group of nurses there was a mortality rate of forty-two per cent among the soldiers. In a few weeks under the same field conditions the mortality was reduced to less than two per cent. What measures did she take? Did she have at her command any startling scientific discoveries? No; she simply used the ordinary measures of prevention, and those measures resulted in the reduction of mortality to which I have referred. One could take much time in giving illustrations of the saving of lives.

On the other hand of course scientific medicine has made great advances. I believe the casualties from typhoid fever during the South African war were greater than the casualties from other causes. Yet on the congested fields of France and Flanders deaths from this sickness were almost unknown. We are face to face with the acknowledged fact that preventive medicine has done a great work. So far as this and generations to come are concerned the future in the development of health preservation rests with preventive medicine. I would say the state is faced with its greatest problem, and to-day our chief concern must be to multiply activities in this line of endeavour.

In the provinces and municipalities year after year and decade after decade there has been a constant development of the prevention of disease by medical means. As we have made progress in medical science so have the municipalities, the provinces and the federal authorities advanced in the development of preventive medicine. I realize that to give curative treatment is the human feeling in everyone's breast, and I for one am prepared to say that so far as possible Canada should extend services to those who are disabled and who need medical assistance.

The resolution before us is in general terms; it simply asks that the federal government adopt a definite health policy which could be carried into operation with the help of the provincial legislatures. As it is worded the motion brings up for consideration the relationship which should exist between the federal Department of Health and the departments in the provinces. Last night the minister made a clear explanation as to what has been done and what measures have been taken heretofore. It is difficult to place in words the possibilities for cooperation, coordination and correlating of the activities of the provinces into a nation-wide policy. To do the job thoroughly is not in the opinion of those who are well informed on the subject a spectacular undertaking. It is a gradual, steady process, and is not one which can be bought with money. Such a development is possible only through the unselfish, harmonious and uniform undertaking and activity of those intimately associated with the problem.

For instance, any nation-wide health policy which would not recognize the medical man in his relation to the home as the key of the whole situation would be a failure before it was well started. There must be an activity which will coordinate the efforts of the medical man acting for the family with the efforts of the local or municipal hospitals, the larger urban hospitals and hospitals connected with the universities, the various departments of health, and the medical teaching of the universities.

Let us consider cancer as an illustration. The present hope in connection with this disease does not rest so much in the desire to give active treatment as in the discovery of cancers which in their early stages may be successfully treated. That can be done only through the most active cooperation of the people and the physicians living in the outlying districts as well as of those who live in the thickly populated urban centres. A national policy which would do something of a definite and tangible nature in regard to the disease of cancer would be one that would bring together all the available information on the subject. If we are to progress beyond the point we have now reached in regard to cancer in Canada it can be done only by a united effort, by bringing together every bit of available information that has been obtained through research and that may be used in attacking the disease.

The same is true of heart disease. One of the members speaking yesterday, I think it was the minister himself, mentioned that problem. Heart disease is increasing by leaps and bounds. Heart disease is a very general term, of course, but I think I am perfectly safe in saying that the reason for this rapid increase is that heart disease is not properly understood. We have no national machinery that will enable us to make use of the information which is in the possession of the medical men of our country both in the outlying districts as well as in the more populated centres, and progress in the prevention and treatment of a disease of that nature can be made only when all the available information is brought together and coordinated in order that the disease as a whole may be attacked with the full resources of medical science by those in charge of the health activities of our country.

In the few moments left to me before six o'clock I should like to say a word or two in regard to health insurance. Some of the provinces, at least British Columbia and Alberta, have already made a careful investigation of this problem of health insurance. A competent committee of the Canadian Medical Association, to which the minister referred last night, also investigated the possibilities of the application of health insurance in the provinces. Frequently we see the picture painted that legislation adopting health insurance means that immediately the most up to date and widely recognized medical services will be extended on an equal basis to all the people. That, Mr. Speaker, is the ideal, an ideal which I hope some day will be attained. But there are difficulties to be faced and there is a long road to travel before we attain that ideal.

There are one or two principles which need to be emphasized in any health insurance plan, whether federal, provincial, or of any other kind. The first is this, that the patient or the family must have the choice of their own physician. If that relationship of which I spoke earlier in my remarks is broken; if the family physician is taken away and replaced by an outsider without the consent of the patient, you remove one of the greatest factors in the successful treatment of people for disease. It is not my purpose to discuss that psychological factor, the psychical element which enters into it; but make no mistake about it, that principle must be set down as fundamental to the success of any health insurance scheme, or indeed of any scheme which undertakes to extend medical or health services to the public.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 5.59 p.m.

CORRECTION—MR. POULIOT

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, at the opening of this sitting, I wish to correct the text of Question No. 38. The subject mentioned therein deals with the U.S.S.R., in French the "U.R.S.S., Union des Républiques Soviétiques Socialistes," such as Russia is now called.

In the seventh number of the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons, (French version), U.R.R.S. appears four times instead of U.R.S.S. It is almost as if you said "Cadana" instead of "Canada." There are four errors, two Rs, instead of two Ss, each time.

In the French version of the Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day, under No. 8, that same question No. 38 refers, the first time, to the U.R.S.S.—which is correct—and three other times to the U.R.R.S.: three additional errors, making a total of seven errors in the French version of the Votes and Proceedings and the Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day for the same question. I have here the original text which I compared with these two officials documents that contain seven errors.

Speaking to a question of privilege, I have before me the votes and proceedings of the House of Commons, No. 7 of January 25. I refer to question No. 38 on the orders of the day. The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics is referred to as "U.R.S.S.", but the correct designation in English is "U.S.S.R." and this is the designation we find in the Monthly Summary of the League of Nations. There are six mistakes in that question as it appears in issue No. 7 of the votes and proceedings. "U.R.S.S." is mentioned four times. This is the correct designation in French but it is the wrong one in English. Further, Mr. Maxim Litvinoff is referred to as "peoples Commissary in Foreign Affairs of the U.R.S.S." The word "peoples" should have a capital P and an apostrophe, "People's" and he is not Commissary in Foreign Affairs but Commissary for Foreign Affairs of the U.S.S.R. I take this designation from the Monthly Summary of the League of Nations, issue of September, 1934.

I have just mentioned in French that there were nine mistakes in that question in French; there are six more in the votes and proceedings, making a total of fifteen mistakes. But there are more mistakes than that because in the Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day the same question contains the same mistakes. This is most ridiculous because the French designation of what was formerly Russia is wrong in the French text and the French designation of it has been used in the English text so that it is wrong again. May I draw attention to the fact that in that question there are twenty-one mistakes. I shall not stress this any more because the translator who was responsible has been discharged. But I make one suggestion and it is this: that every piece of translation should be initialed in order that every member might know who is responsible for the mutilation of his text whenever such occurs.

And now, sir, may I have the great pleasure of welcoming to this house our Quebec leader, Hon. Mr. Lapointe.

*CANADA SHIPPING ACT

Mr. BOULANGER:

Has the Canada Shipping Act of 1934, chapter 44, been put into force?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think an oral answer to this question will better serve the purpose.

As the house knows, the Canada Shipping Act, 1934, covers international, inter-empire and domestic matters. As to the domestic matters, such as part V, sick mariners and marine hospitals; part VI, pilotage; part IX, lighthouses, buoys and beacons on Sable island; part X, public harbours and harbour masters; part XI, port wardens, and so forth; it can be proclaimed at any time, and the question of doing so is now under consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Why all the hurry last year?

Mr. DURANLEAU: As to international and inter-empire matters, as this was the first enactment dealing with merchant shipping to be undertaken by any dominion since the passing of the statute of Westminster, it will be utilized as a guide by other dominions when legislating in regard to merchant shipping, so that the desired measure of uniformity recommended by the conference on the operation of dominion legislation and Merchant Shipping Legislation of 1929, and the terms of the British commonwealth merchant shipping agreement of 1931 may be secured. The act I understand is now being examined from this point of view. No other dominions have yet enacted similar legislation. I may also point out that the conclusions of the international conference regarding safety of life at sea and load lines, which formed a large part of the act of 1934, have already been given effect to by this parliament, in August 1931, by chapter 49 of that year, and are in operation now.

I think this statement will serve as an answer to the query of the hon. member for New Westminster on January 21.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. BROWN: Would the minister at the same time answer as to that part of the act dealing with navigation on the great lakes, and the coastal laws?

Mr. DURANLEAU: As I stated, the subject is now under consideration, as to all parts of the act that concern domestic matters.

Mr. DUFF: In other words, in the doldrums. It has been on the statute books two years.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

PROPOSAL FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER AMENDMENTS

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, a special committee should be set up to study and report on the best method by which the British North America Act may be amended so that while safeguarding the existing rights of racial and religious minorities and legitimate provincial claims to autonomy, the dominion government may be given adequate power to deal effectively with urgent economic problems which are essentially national in scope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on March 20, 1924, I introduced a motion urging amendments to the British North America Act. Again on May 11, 1931, I introduced a somewhat similar motion. Perhaps at this time it is hardly necessary for me to cover the ground covered on those previous occasions. Possibly the discussion which took place in 1931 might be summed up by two quotations, one from the speech by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) and the other from the speech of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe).

I think it would be well for this parliament if not at this session, at some subsequent session, to appoint a committee specially charged with the consideration of this question. We must prepare our case here before we call a conference, and it is a case that will require a great deal of preparation. . . . We must know in the first instance what we are prepared to agree on ourselves. Having reached that point I shall heartily favour the summoning of a conference of the provinces with the dominion authorities to see what plan can be worked out so that in the future this parliament may be able to make the necessary amendments to our constitution.

Hon. members will note that on that occasion the Minister of Justice definitely suggested the appointment of a special committee to deal with the question. I am now following his lead and urging upon the house the appointment of such a committee. On the same day the hon. member for Quebec East made the following statement appearing at page 1479 of Hansard:

> Again I say that to insist on having the consent of all the provinces to every change would be asking almost an impossibility; to ask that either British Columbia in the west or Prince Edward Island in the east should be able to block a change with which it is essential for the federal power to go ahead within the limits of its jurisdiction on certain matters, I do not think would be right; but on essential matters, such matters, for instance, as the protection of minorities, of language, of schools, as they are inserted in the British North America Act, I believe it should not be possible to make a change without the consent of all.

Notwithstanding the practical acceptance by the government of my resolution nothing definite has been done in the past four years. It is true that about the end of August of last year the Prime Minister suggested calling a conference to deal especially with this question, but that conference was finally postponed indefinitely. Despite that fact there is now greater need than ever for some amendments to the British North America Act. There is no doubt that jurisdiction disputes involve a great deal of litigation. I shall not go into that matter in detail to-day but would refer the house to my speech delivered in 1931 in which I somewhat exhaustively outlined the jurisdiction disputes which were occurring.

Further, there is a certain amount of overlapping which inevitably involves inefficiency and waste. Now that economy is being stressed it would seem that one way in which we could well economize would be in seeing that there are no unnecessary overlapping of departments. Then, the financial arrangements between the dominion and the provinces are very unsatisfactory. The provinces are called upon to undertake many new services. At the time of the drawing up of the British North America Act it was not contemplated governments would be expected to deal with many matters now being forced upon them. At the present time many social services are given which were not even remotely dreamed of at the time of confederation, and this condition places a burden upon the provinces which they are not able to continue to bear.

Further, the taxing power of the provinces is strictly limited. Hon. members know that they cannot resort to indirect taxation, and we know also that the dominion government has entered the field of income tax. For these reasons it is extremely difficult for the provinces to meet the requirements of the new services being undertaken. I think, too, it is manifest that the wealth has been concentrated in the central provinces. I have sometimes heard representatives from Montreal or Toronto talk as if they were carrying the whole burden of the dominion. It may very well be that residents of the two central provinces, pay a large proportion of the income tax, but I would point out that the central provinces are able to draw to no very small extent upon the west. They have a mortgage, as it were, upon the west, and also to a large extent on the east. Take the banks, for example. The central offices of all the banks in Canada are located in Montreal or Toronto, and thus they can assist in paying taxes here whereas their branches out in either western Canada or eastern Canada cannot be levied upon in the same way. That same thing is true to a very large extent of a great many of our big industrial and commercial concerns. Without going into this matter at any length I would refer to some very excellent articles which appeared in the Canadian Forum of November and December last by N. MacL. Rogers.

Again I would point out that there is need for uniformity in connection with social legislation. With the program which is being introduced at the present time by the government I fancy it will be found necessary, if not to amend the British North America Act, at least to adopt other interpretations than hitherto have been invoked. But whether or not the program of the government can be put through without amending the British North America Act, there are a great many other matters which are very pressing at the present time and which would seem to be halted because of the existence of this antiquated constitution of ours. Anyone who has been present in the house during these past years must know that hardly a measure is ever brought forward looking to greater efficiency in carrying on the affairs of the dominion but what some member on this or the other side of the house will arise and flourish the British North America Act in our faces.

We need to have uniformity with regard to a great many of these social services, and here I would venture to call to my assistance no other than Premier Taschereau himself who, speaking in Montreal on December 17 last, in referring to a complaint that Quebec fruit was competing with British Columbia fruit in the British Columbia market, said:

> As a Canadian I think that the dominion from Cape Breton to British Columbia is my country.

I am glad to hear Mr. Taschereau uttering sentiments of that kind. I hope he will take the same position in regard to various types of social legislation. If we are to have anything like equality of opportunity in trade matters, surely we should have some equality in regard to the conditions under which goods are being produced. Without going into the details of the evidence before the price spreads committee I think it is manifest that if any one province is backward in its conditions of labour, that inevitably makes it very difficult for other provinces to institute reforms. It does seem to me that in recent years we have been permitting the provinces to claim rights that should never have been accorded them. When the British North America Act was drawn up the residual power, as we all know, was placed in the hands of the dominion government. I believe even under the clause dealing with the residual power the dominion government in the past could have done very much more than the former Liberal government or the Conservative government have done. In cases of emergency, the Relief Act, for instance, was brought into force, and although not as much was done for the unemployed as might have been done, there was certain relief given to the bankers and some big industrial concerns.

There is no reason whatever why the dominion government under the residual clause should not act in giving effect to treaties and conventions. Throughout the past years, without going into fine legal questions, I have again and again taken the ground that if the dominion government has the authority to sign a peace treaty, then it surely has the power to see that the provisions of that treaty are carried out, that the treaty is implemented by legislation. I am glad to note that some recent decisions of the privy council seem to give support to this view. Professor F. R. Scott, in speaking of the radio broadcasting case, says this:

> The privy council held that power to enforce these treaties fell within the dominion residuary clause. This may prove to be a judgment of great importance. It seems to leave the way open for dominion control of any aspect of the internal life of Canada, so long as the matter is covered by an international agreement to which Canada is a party ...
> If the dominion government decides to adhere to a trade convention agreed upon by the labour office, there is a strong ground, since the radio case, for supposing that her adherence would give parliament the same power to pass implementing legislation as the radio judgment says it possesses in regard to ordinary conventions.

That statement will be found at page eight of a pamphlet entitled Social Reconstruction, by Professor Scott.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that all sections of the house will agree that the British North America Act needs amending, and that in itself is a considerable advance on the contention that prevailed a few years ago. Further I think it is fairly generally conceded that the consent of the provinces is not necessary, at least from the legal standpoint. There was a time when we were told that we could not amend the British North America Act without the consent of all the provinces, that in fact confederation was something in the nature of a treaty and that it could not be changed without the consent of all parties. I think that theory has been absolutely discarded, and we need not continue to debate it. The Prime Minister, during the debate in this house on the Relief Act, on April 13, 1934, in answer to Mr. Hanbury's question whether any amendment could be made where there was not unanimity, said at page 2163:

> Two answers could be given to that question; one is the political answer and the other is the legal answer. The legal answer is that if this parliament—and that means both houses—adopts a resolution embodying a petition to the sovereign for the enactment of legislation by the parliament at Westminster amending the British North America Act, under the statute of Westminster such legislation would be enacted accordingly.

That is clear, very clear-cut indeed. Let me read the latter part of it again:

> The legal answer is that if this parliament —and that means both houses—adopts a resolution embodying a petition to the sovereign for the enactment of legislation by the parliament at Westminster amending the British North Amercia Act, under the statute of Westminster such legislation would be enacted accordingly.

Mr. GAGNON: Who said that?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That was said by the Prime Minister, speaking in this house on April 13, 1934. The Prime Minister goes on:

> I referred to the political argument the other day. The constitution of Canada is a compromise, and the extent to which variations of that constitution should be effected, if they impinge upon the rights of the provinces that were the original partners to the confederation pact, is a matter that would require careful consideration.

The legal point is clear: It is a matter of expediency, the desire that there should be no injustice done to any one of the parties to confederation. I take it that the leader of the opposition comes very near to that position. Only the other day, on January 21, 1935, at page 67 he admitted that the British North America Act required to be amended in some particulars. He suggested that the first amendment that should be secured was the right of this country to amend its own constitution. He called attention to the fact that Canada was the only country in the British dominions that had not that right, and he said:

> I believe that the way to effect that change is by conference and by securing consent and agreement if at all possible. At all events that should be the first step.

He is not as definite as I should like him to be and as usual he surrounds his speech with a great many safeguarding clauses. But if I read that declaration correctly, it means that he concedes the legal right of parliament to go ahead, though for the sake of expediency a first step would be to secure if possible, as he says, the consent of the provinces.

In the past the procedure has not been altogether clear. The mode of procedure was one of the matters to have been discussed at the conference that was summoned by the Prime Minister. I would point out that the constitution was once amended by the British parliament on the strength of a simple request by the Canadian government without the proposal even coming before parliament. A great many people have the idea that the British North America Act is like the law of the Medes and Persians, that it can never be changed. But we forget the very large number of amendments that have already been made in the act. Once a request which was made by the dominion parliament carried the formal endorsation of eight out of the nine provinces and was opposed by one province. On the other occasions the British parliament acted on the joint request of the Canadian House of Commons and the Senate. The precedents therefore suggest that the British parliament will enact any legislation to amend the British North America Act on the recommendation of the Canadian parliament. That I think is the position we have arrived at. We need not fear opposition from the parliament at Westminster, and if we proceed in this parliament to petition the British government I have not the slightest doubt that that government will accede to the request.

Mr. MARCIL: Is the hon. member able to cite an amendment to the British North America Act, adopted at Westminster, which was objected to by any of the provinces of Canada?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The one dealing with the British Columbia case. Apparently then an address by both houses is sufficient. But the question may arise: Supposing the Senate were not to agree? Supposing we should pass a resolution in this house and the Senate refused to acquiesce? That I admit would be a rather serious situation, but I cannot conceive that for any length of time the upper chamber would be able to thwart the will of the Canadian people as represented by the elected chamber. On this point I was very happy the other day to come across a statement by Mr. Bennett, now Prime Minister. In 1915 in the House of Commons, on the occasion of the Senate declining to agree to an address for an immediate change in representation in that chamber, the present Prime Minister denounced the Senate, as will be seen by reference to page 2338 of Hansard. He referred to the upper house as an "irresponsible body which thwarted the will of democracy as expressed by this House of Commons." I submit that if the Senate should continue to thwart the will of the house, then undoubtedly the Senate would have to be overridden.

My motion is in keeping with the principle laid down in the Quebec resolution of the fathers of confederation:

> That there be a general government charged with matters of common interest to the whole country and local governments for each of the provinces charged with control of local matters in their respective sections.

Now may I call attention to the terms of the resolution. The resolution is so clearly drawn and has such adequate safeguards, and moreover it is so eminently reasonable that I cannot see any reason why any section of the house should not accept it. I ask for a committee because it seems to me that it might very well be that it would help the government and perhaps promote the speedy passage of a measure of this kind if the public could be educated on the many complex questions that may arise. Here in the house we have a chance of discussing the matter, but we cannot very well call in experts who might give us some valuable advice. I have no fear of public discussion of matters of this kind. The more it is discussed the more clear it will be that some kind of amendment must come. I think I have stated the safeguards and I fancy that no one will quarrel with them:

> that while safeguarding the existing rights of racial and religious minorities and legitimate provincial claims to autonomy ...

None of us is asking that any of the minorities shall suffer in any emendation of the British North America Act. Personally I would very gladly have a sort of bill of rights inserted in the very forefront of any constitution that might be drawn up, granting full religious and racial rights to minorities. I do not see where any of our friends from any one of the provinces can object to an emendation which would safeguard minorities in this way. But I would point out that we do need some means of dealing with very many of the practical problems that come before us. I would be among the very first in giving credit to the fathers of confederation for the great work they did in their day. The fact that we want to amend the instrument they drew up is no reflection on the work they did. I submit however that Canada has travelled a long distance in the past sixty-five years. Conditions are very different in this country from what they were sixty-five years ago. A whole series of social problems has arisen in that time. Canada has been linked together by its great railways, and it is intimately linked together by the radio. Companies have branches in every province and commerce flows back and forth. It is thus manifest that along many lines legislation to be effective must be dominion-wide in character. It is for this reason, in order to bring legislation up to the economic development of the time, that I would ask for an emendation of the British North America Act. If the fathers of confederation had ability enough to draw up an instrument which served their day and generation, it seems to me that we their grandchildren ought to have brains and common sense enough to amend it in such a way that it may serve the needs of the people to-day.

Mr. MARCIL: Before the hon. member resumes his seat, did he understand my question or do I take it that he is not answering it? Was any amendment to the British North America Act adopted at Westminster which was objected to by any of the provinces?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There was one dealing with the British Columbia case.

Mr. MARCIL: What case was that?

Mr. LAPOINTE: They added three words which did not mean anything.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There was that case anyway.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the motion which has been placed in your hands by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) raises a subject which is not entirely new to this house. I grant at the outset that it is a very important subject and one quite worthy of discussion by this house or by a special committee, the appointment of which is the object sought in this motion.

The question of amendment of the Canadian constitution involves many considerations and some serious difficulties. I am aware that even in the days when the constitution was drafted, when the original conferences took place, there was a cleavage of opinion. There was a school of thought which advocated in this country a legislative union whereby all provinces should be brought together in one parliament. There was another school of thought which advocated a federal system such as was subsequently established. It can be very ably argued and was argued very forcefully to-day that perhaps a legislative union might have enabled this parliament to solve many of the difficulties with which we are beset from time to time, because under such a system this parliament would have had full power to legislate as it saw fit for all parts of Canada. But the other view, that of a federal system, was finally adopted and an agreement or treaty was executed by the representatives of the various parts of Canada who were assembled at conferences in 1864, 1865 and 1866 providing that a federal system should be adopted in Canada upon certain specific terms. That agreement or treaty was carried into the act of parliament which we know as the British North America Act passed by the parliament at Westminster.

The question arises: How can we amend or change our constitution if we desire so to do? It is a singular fact that in the British North America Act there is no power which will permit the parliament of Canada to amend it and it is most notable that in all subsequent dominion constitutions which have been granted by the parliament of Great Britain to dominions situated in conditions similar to those in which we live, a specific power of amendment has been incorporated in the various acts. The Canadian constitution was the first constitutional act which was adopted by the parliament at Westminster in regard to colonial government, and to a large extent it became the model of all other constitutions which were subsequently granted by the Imperial parliament. It is therefore the more notable that in all subsequent constitutions, namely in those of Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and the Irish Free State there has been included in the various constitutional acts an express power enabling these dominions to amend their own constitutions but with some limitations in regard to some of those enactments. I think it may be assumed from the fact that such a power is not included in the British North America Act that the omission did not arise through oversight but by design. It was a matter that was definitely decided; the power to amend was omitted after consideration and as a matter of agreement. The chief reason for the omission of power of amendment was to be found no doubt in a realization of the fact that Canada was a country populated very largely by two distinct races and considerably divided upon religious questions. It was for the express purpose of protecting the rights of minorities that power to amend our constitution was not granted to the parliament of Canada when the British North America Act was passed.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in his interesting discussion of the subject has intimated that in his opinion the Canadian parliament should have power to amend the constitution subject to certain limitations as expressed in his resolution, and I am to a large extent in accord with the opinion which he has offered in that respect. He has pointed out that in one and perhaps in more than one instance the British parliament has passed amendments to the British North America Act upon the joint address of the House of Commons and the Senate and also in one instance simply upon the request of the government of Canada. I think it has always been admitted that in regard to mere matters of form and matters of procedure the parliament of Great Britain would in all cases pass an amendment to the British North America Act if requested so to do, upon the joint address of the Senate and the House of Commons. However, that is only a minor branch of the subject. Matters of form and matters of procedure are unimportant. In 1895 I think some doubt arose as to the power of this parliament to appoint a deputy speaker of the House of Commons. That matter was referred to the parliament of Great Britain and immediately an amendment was passed by the British parliament confirming the action taken by the parliament of Canada. That might be called merely a question of procedure, and I have no doubt that the parliament at Westminster would at all times respond in such matters to the request of the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada.

But where an amendment is sought which goes to the basis of the original treaty or agreement which was made at the time of confederation, or where the fundamental principles upon which we were originally brought together, are involved, I doubt very much whether the parliament at Westminster would entertain a request of that nature based solely upon an address from the Senate and House of Commons. I know it has been argued by some very able men that the parliament at Westminster would grant any request for amendment made by the Senate and House of Commons irrespective of the views of the provinces. They argue that all the provinces of Canada are represented in this parliament; that all provinces may speak and vote here and that if the House of Commons and the Senate decide that an address shall be presented, such action is binding upon all the provinces through their representatives in this parliament. Personally I do not take that view of the matter. The provinces of Canada constituted by the British North America Act, are in the nature of sovereign states so far as the affairs which have been committed to them by section 92 of the British North America Act are concerned. In regard to the subjects allotted to them they are supreme and their powers are just as plenary and complete as those of this parliament in dealing with matters which have been placed under federal control.

Section 92 of the act sets forth in the first lines that the following named subjects shall be exclusively within the control of the provincial legislatures. If we sought by amendment to alter the basis of confederation, by taking from section 92 any of the subjects given exclusively to the provinces, or by interfering with any subjects exclusively placed under the jurisdiction of the dominion government, we would at once change the original agreement. Would it be fair to assume that a province which has been clothed with exclusive authority in certain matters should now calmly submit to limitation of its powers at the instance of the Senate and House of Commons. Would a province agree to any alteration in regard to its exclusive jurisdiction? I take the view that the provinces should be and must be consulted in regard to any important change in our constitutional act which affects provincial interests. I agree that some constitutional changes are necessary, but I submit that the only way of bringing them about is by agreement between the parties to the original bargain. Of course this statement does not apply to what I discussed a few minutes ago, in regard to matters of form and procedure.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I interrupt? Do I understand that the statement of the minister means that the provinces must agree, or simply that they must be consulted?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think that we would have to have agreement. I do not think the parliament at Westminster would disregard the views of the provinces merely at the request of the parliament of Canada. If the provinces refused to agree upon any fundamental question which concerned their rights I doubt very much if the parliament of the United Kingdom would grant such amendment.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is if one province disagreed it would be impossible for this parliament to proceed?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I doubt if you could succeed in an application for amendment that would modify, alter or restrict section 92 under which specific legislative jurisdiction is given to the provinces, without consent of the provinces.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Unanimous consent.

Mr. MARCIL: May I ask the minister if he is familiar with the case mentioned in regard to British Columbia?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, there was such a case, it related to subsidies. All the provinces agreed to the amendment save British Columbia; British Columbia insisted on some further amendment involving a sentence or a few words, which I believe was not very serious.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Three words.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In that case the act was passed with those two or three words added by way of amendment. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the trend of judicial decisions, particularly the decisions of the judicial committee of the privy council, has in recent years changed considerably. The trend has been entirely towards the enlargement of the powers of the federal government rather than towards restriction of them; notably in the two cases which were decided in 1933 or 1934, the aeronautics case and the radio case, cited by my hon. friend. Those cases raised the question of the right of the federal parliament to bind the provinces by treaties with foreign countries. In the aeronautics case it was argued that aviation was a provincial matter, at least in some aspects, and that the federal parliament had no power to legislate in respect of it. The question arose under section 132 of the British North America Act which provides that:

> The parliament and government of Canada shall have all powers necessary or proper for performing the obligations of Canada or of any province thereof, as part of the British empire, towards foreign countries arising under treaties between the empire and such foreign countries.

It was held in the aeronautics case that the matter of aviation had become of such national importance that it must be placed under dominion control, and that the parliament of Canada, by accepting the international convention in regard to aeronautics, was in a position to bind the provinces under that arrangement.

The radio case was a little different. In that case we had not entered into an international convention to which the British empire was a party. The British empire was not a party to that arrangement. We had entered into a convention with the United States, Mexico, Newfoundland and I think the Irish Free State, agreeing to certain matters concerning radio. We passed an act adopting that convention. That act was challenged, chiefly by the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. The privy council in that case held that radio, like aeronautics, had become a matter of national importance and was under the jurisdiction of the federal authority. They also held that, notwithstanding that the treaty was not one made by the British empire but with foreign countries, it was still within the meaning of section 132 of the British North America Act and that Canada in adopting that treaty by statute was able to bind all the provinces to its terms. These decisions have advanced the matter considerably. I know what the argument of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Center is in respect thereof. Lately we have grown in our national status, and in our national importance; many questions which thirty or forty years ago were not even thought of by our predecessors have now become of great practical importance in this and every other country. I think that one may say that the trend of decisions in the last eight or ten years has been decidedly in favour of some extension of dominion jurisdiction.

My hon. friend quoted a statement by the Prime Minister last session in regard to amendments of the British North America Act, in which the Prime Minister said that there were two ways of viewing the matter, one in its strictly legal aspect and the other in what might be called its political aspect. I think the statement of the Prime Minister in the house on that occasion was an exact statement of the situation. Legally this house would have right to pass an address, have it concurred in by the Senate and presented to the imperial parliament. But I do not look on that as a constitutional right. I do not for a moment believe that a request for amendment which interfered with the basis of confederation or with the legislative powers of the provinces would be acceded to by the parliament at Westminster, without the concurrence of the provinces.

On the other hand there is the political aspect of the case. When these provinces were constituted under the British North America Act they became legal political entities. They are as completely incorporated and authorized as is the parliament of Canada, and unless we can carry their consent and approval in any matter affecting their exclusive rights I do not think we shall have any chance of securing amendments to our constitutional act from the parliament at Westminster. That is what the Prime Minister meant by the political aspect of the question. There may be a strict legal right but the question is, is it politic, is it wise, is it a right of which we should attempt to avail ourselves. Are all the parties concerned agreeable to it? Such are the questions which would most probably be asked, notwithstanding the strict legal right which my hon. friend has pointed out. My hon. friend must realize that there is a distinction between a legal and a constitutional right.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that in my view of this motion it is necessary to enter upon any fuller discussion of the subject. I did note, however, when the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) spoke in this house on Monday last and referred to the question of the amendment of the British North America Act—I am sorry he is not here now—that he made a statement which rather shocked me. I made a mental and also a written note of it at the time. The right hon. gentleman stated broadly that power should be granted to the parliament of Canada to amend its own constitution. However, after carefully correcting and revising his speech in Hansard, I find that he added some words of limitation. I have seen both the unrevised and the revised copies, and I find that he has added these words:

> There ought to be an amendment arrived at as a result of agreement, as I believe it can be.

These words were added after the speech was made. Such is my view of the matter, namely, that an amendment should only be made as the result of an agreement where basic fundamental or important changes are contemplated. I agree that the changes in contemplation outlined by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in his speech today, are basic. There is the question of the incorporation of companies; there is no doubt that there is serious conflict in that regard. There is the whole question of taxation as between the dominion and the provinces. We in this parliament practically have the right to tax anything and anybody in any manner we like. We can impose either direct or indirect taxation, while the provinces are limited to direct taxation within the province. I know that in many of the provinces the revenues do not appear to be sufficient to enable them to carry on all their projects at the present time, and I know that the provinces desire to secure further avenues of taxation if it is possible to secure them.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Then there are many very nice questions which arise under subsection 2 of section 91 of the British North America Act, which provides that this parliament shall have jurisdiction to regulate matters of trade and commerce. That particular section has given rise to more judicial decisions and interpretations than any other section of the act, and perhaps to as many as all other sections combined. I am glad to say that there has been in recent times a general statement of judicial findings by the judicial committee itself which I think will greatly assist in clarifying a good many points which have hitherto been considerably involved. In the aeronautic case the lord chancellor referred to a case which was decided by the privy council in 1930, known as the Fish Canneries case, he said that the judicial committee had held an inquest in regard to a great many of the decisions of the board, and that it had been found that in the case of the attorney general for Canada against the attorney general for British Columbia, which is the Fish Canneries case, four propositions were stated which in his opinion fairly represented the law on the subject. Those propositions came before the court for decision in the case I have just mentioned, in which a statute was attacked as ultra vires under which the federal government had passed regulations providing among other things that, under certain conditions, all canneries on the Pacific coast should secure licences under the act. In the judgment, delivered in 1929, four specific propositions are laid down; they are not long, and I am going to place them on Hansard:

> (1) The legislation of the parliament of the dominion, so long as it strictly relates to subjects of legislation expressly enumerated in section 91, is of paramount authority, even though it trenches upon matters assigned to the provincial legislatures by section 92.
> (2) The general power of legislation conferred upon the parliament of the dominion by section 91 of the act in supplement of the power to legislate upon the subjects expressly enumerated must be strictly confined to such matters as are unquestionably of national interest and importance, and must not trench on any of the subjects enumerated in section 92 as within the scope of provincial legislation—

Note these words:

—unless these matters have attained such dimensions as to affect the body politic of the dominion.

In which event the federal parliament may legislate notwithstanding section 92.

(3) It is within the competence of the dominion parliament to provide for matters which, though otherwise within the legislative competence of the provincial legislature, are necessarily incidental to effective legislation by the parliament of the dominion upon a subject of legislation expressly enumerated in section 91.

(4) There can be a domain in which provincial and dominion legislation may overlap, in which case neither legislation will be ultra vires if the field is clear, but if the field is not clear and the two legislations meet the dominion legislation must prevail.

Such was the decision rendered in the British Columbia fish canneries case in 1929, and this decision has been expressly approved as a statement of the present law upon the subject in the aeronautics and radio cases which have been cited this afternoon by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth).

I agree with my hon. friend that it is high time that some definite step was taken to ascertain if we cannot arrive at some agreement with the provinces in regard to amendments to the British North America Act. I emphasize the word "agreement" because I hold a very strong opinion that we cannot reach any satisfactory conclusion otherwise than by conference and agreement. Therefore I am quite willing to accept this motion on behalf of the government. It has been drawn with the object of safeguarding the rights of minorities in this country. So far as the government is concerned there will be no objection to this motion being adopted and submitted to a select committee of this house.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has raised a most important question, and one which is widely discussed at the present time. As he has stated the act of 1867, though not perfect, has been a good instrument of government, but no one will deny that we have developed beyond the rigid limitations of an act which was well adapted to the conditions prevailing sixty-five years ago. At that time there were four colonies, not very thickly populated, and the people in each lived their own lives with very little concern in regard to what was happening in the rest of the country or, for that matter, in the rest of the world.

To-day Canada is a nation, and each part of Canada influences and is influenced by what takes place in the other parts of the country. The conditions of 1867 certainly were not the conditions of to-day. Now we have a line of autonomous provinces extending from ocean to ocean, and the discoveries of science have transformed the existence of the people. Legislatures have to deal with matters which were unthought of at that time. In the early days who would have thought of radio, aviation or even social questions such as old age pensions, unemployment insurance, and workmen's compensation? The result has been that the division of powers between the federal parliament and provincial legislatures has been the cause of interminable litigations and has resulted in much confusion and uncertainty. Constantly appeals are being heard by the privy council regarding the powers of the federal and provincial authorities; sometimes those appeals are at the instance of the dominion government and sometimes at the instance of provincial governments. I may say the honours have been pretty evenly divided. I do not think the privy council has distinguished itself particularly nor has it shown great consistency in its interpretation of the spirit of the British North America Act. As a matter of fact who among the lawyers of this country does not know that when Lord Haldane was one of the powerful members of the board, perhaps the most powerful, there was a leaning towards the provinces. Since Lord Haldane is no longer there and as there are other strong members on the board the trend has been rather on the other side with the result that in later years the federal parliament has been successful. Clearly this condition is undesirable.

Those two subsections of the act which give the most cause for conflict are that part of section 91 assigning to the dominion parliament powers concerning trade and commerce and that part of section 92 giving to the provinces control over matters affecting property and civil rights. The boundary in those two matters is in most cases very hard to discover, and that is the reason there have been so many litigations with regard to the interpretation of the act.

The Lemieux act passed by this parliament in 1907 was enacted to provide that in cases of trouble or conflict between employers and employees they must resort to a conciliation tribunal and that if they do not a strike or lockout is unlawful. If there is a question national in its scope it is the question of the industrial relations between labour and capital, and if there are strikes throughout the country surely the federal parliament should intervene. On the other side the argument could be urged that troubles are usually caused because of different views concerning hours of labour, contracts between employers and employees and other similar matters which come under that part of section 92 having to do with property and civil rights.

The result was that after operating for about twenty years that piece of legislation passed and enforced by this parliament was challenged in 1926, declared unconstitutional and beyond the powers of this parliament to enact. The same question arises in connection with the insurance problem. No doubt insurance is simply a contract by which a corporation may insure the life or property of the citizen, thereby affecting property and civil rights. On the other hand who will deny that insurance is a matter of national importance? Still, legislation of this parliament concerning insurance has been declared invalid by the privy council.

The two matters to which the Minister of Justice referred, namely radio and aviation, have been decided in favour of this parliament. It is a good thing such decision was made regarding radio, otherwise we might have been prevented from listening to the Prime Minister's reform speeches over the radio. So far as I am concerned that would have been a calamity. The same questions arise when we come to deal with division of revenues between the dominion and the provinces, taxation and other matters.

I believe every person who studies this matter will come to realize the importance of making some changes. What those changes should be, in what manner they should be made and the procedure to adopt before, during and after they are accepted are questions for consideration. I am not one who believes that the constitution, and for that matter the Canadian constitution, is an ark of the covenant which no one may touch or even look at without being guilty of a crime or subject to penalty. In my view the constitution should be adaptable to the changing conditions of a country. I believe no constitutive body, no national assembly meeting for the purpose of establishing a constitution, has any right to prevent future modification of the organism they are creating. I do not believe they have the right to deprive future generations of the competence they themselves have used. If a constitution cannot be changed it is my view that inevitably the change will take place when there is a sufficient trend of public opinion, or a great majority in favour of a change. If those changes do not come along the legal and constitutional lines prescribed by law or by the constitution I am afraid they will come because the will of the people ultimately will always prevail. There must be difficulty; there must be ways adopted and fixed which make it very difficult to change the constitution. To make it utterly impossible, I submit, would not be in the interests of the people of the country which is subjected to that constitution.

As far as Canada is concerned let me say that what has been stated is true; I do not know whether it has been stated to-day but I read in Hansard that it was stated last week that Canada is the only dominion in the British commonwealth which does not possess the right to amend its own constitution. Moreover, it is the only federal state in the whole world which has not the power to change its own constitution. The United States, Mexico, Venezuela, Brazil, the Argentine Republic, Australia, Switzerland—all these are federal countries and each of them has a constitution which provides for the way it shall be amended when the necessity arises.

But so far as Canada is concerned, as it is to-day the British North America Act is a statute of the imperial parliament, and there is no mode of amending it prescribed in the act, which means that to amend it another statute is required. There is no room, there is no established practice as to the way in which such an amendment shall be brought about.

Have the provinces the right to be consulted. This is a question that is being discussed. The provinces have been consulted in some cases, but in most cases they have not been. In 1907 when the case of the new allocation of subsidies to provinces was settled, my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) says that the imperial parliament passed the necessary amendment at that time in spite of the objection of British Columbia. Well, the amendment inserted then did not meet at all the views or wishes of British Columbia. It merely added three words, and did not mean anything. They said in Great Britain at that time that although they were not taking into consideration the objections of Sir Richard McBride, then premier of British Columbia, it did not mean they would always accept the views of the dominion against the provinces if they were not in accord in the future.

However, everybody will agree that the system is uncertain, is vague, is indefinite, and is most unsatisfactory. I personally believe that Canada, like all the other autonomous countries in the world, should have the right to amend its own constitution. I believe that an agreement to that effect between all the parties to confederation is not only desirable but possible. I believe that we should take into consideration the various methods of amending as they exist in the constitutions of all the other federal powers and ascertain which would be more adaptable to our own conditions, with the changes which would be necessary to meet our own conditions. Our constitution must be a living instrument capable of being adapted to our national growth, and it is being faithful to the work of Macdonald and Cartier, and the other fathers of confederation to continue their work and see that it receives its full expansion.

Of course, this will be, and I hope my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre will agree with me, a most delicate task. It is not so easy as all that. First, what changes should be made in the constitution? Some are desirable, but there are two schools of thought in this country as to that. There are those who are in favour of the strongest concentration or centralized power possible, and who would favour giving to the central power most of the authority which is now subject to provincial jurisdiction. There is another school which believes that there are many matters as to which the will, the customs and the mentality of the different sections of the country in the various provinces should be considered first. For instance, reading the resolution of my hon. friend I see that he mentions only the desirability of giving the dominion government adequate power to deal effectively with urgent economic problems, and so forth. I would like him to have added—and to give to the provinces in their sphere that undoubted authority and jurisdiction which they do not seem to have at the present time. There are many fields in which there is overlapping. In some of these fields it would be better that the authority should be given to the dominion parliament, but do not ask that everything should go to the dominion parliament, as is rather suggested in this resolution. I believe that the powers should be clearly defined and determined, but not necessarily that most of the authority should be given to the central power and less to the provinces. In some fields I believe that the powers of the provinces should be stronger, but this should be determined by making the act clearer and giving it better phraseology.

We must not forget, as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has said, the spirit of the agreement in whatever change takes place. When confederation took place the country was on the verge of civil strife. During the two years which preceded the Quebec conference there had been four successive changes of government. The public men of that time all agreed that they had to get together in order to try to save the country and make it a unit by giving to a central government, authority on all things which were national in their scope, and leaving to the provinces authority on things which should rather be dealt with by the local authorities. The provinces agreed to relinquish some of their powers at the time in favour of the central authority. But no one must forget that after all they did exist before the dominion government existed. These colonies were separate colonies, and they got together. They agreed to relinquish some of their powers, but on the condition that they should be left other powers and that the federal government should never have the right nor the power to interfere within their sphere of jurisdiction. There is another thing I wish to emphasize, and that is that the British North America Act is not only the constitution of this dominion; it is not only the charter of the dominion parliament or of the dominion government; it is just as much a charter of the provinces. It is their constitution as well; it is the law under which they have an existence. My hon. friend said they were a political entity. They are even a legal entity, and I must say that I do not agree with the Prime Minister or with the Minister of Justice when he said that legally this parliament could have the right to change the constitution, the British North America Act, when it comes to matters which are certainly provincial in their scope. I do not agree with that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I said there was a legal and a constitutional right; they are very different.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Neither legally nor constitutionally could you pass an act providing that property and civil rights belong to the jurisdiction of this parliament. I do not think that can be done, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister to the contrary notwithstanding. And apart from the question concerning minorities there are many other questions which are strictly within the sphere of provincial jurisdiction and should not be taken away from the provinces without agreement with them.

Thirdly, within the limit of its jurisdiction, a provincial legislature is just as autonomous, just as sovereign in the matters on which it has authority to legislate as this parliament is. There is no difference at all in that right of the provincial legislatures and of the dominion parliament. Why, even the statute of Westminster, adopted three years ago, gives this parliament full powers of government; even if the legislation of this parliament comes into conflict with some imperial legislation, it is our legislation that prevails. There is no limitation to the powers of this parliament to enact legislation, even though it is contrary to an imperial statute. Sub-section 2 of section 7 of the Westminster act says:

> The provisions of section 2 of this act shall extend to laws made by any of the provinces of Canada and to the powers of the legislatures of such provinces.

This means that the imperial parliament cannot invalidate a statute of a provincial legislature of Canada legislating within the sphere of its authority. The provincial legislatures are just as autonomous within their jurisdiction as the dominion parliament is.

Now there has been at various times a discussion as to whether the Act of Confederation is a treaty or a pact, and I do not wish to enter into that discussion now. Whether it is a treaty—and it was called such by Sir John Macdonald, by Cartier, by D'Arcy McGee and later on by Sir Robert Borden and Sir Wilfrid Laurier—whether the supporters of the school of thought which now claims that it was not legally a treaty or a pact are right or wrong, I do not wish to discuss. At any rate everyone will agree that it was an understanding, an agreement as between various legislative bodies in North America and that nothing should be done which changes the terms of that agreement without a new understanding, a new consultation, a new conference and, I would add, a new agreement.

I think that a conference with the provinces is a necessary preliminary step to any change which might be made—and, mind you, I am in favour of a change being made. I will make this statement now, and I pray you, Mr. Speaker, to believe that it is not my wish to inject anything political into the discussion; I would say the same if the men with whom I sit were on the other side. I do not think that it would be for a dying parliament, just before a general election, to change the constitution of Canada. This question, I think, should be taken up and dealt with by a parliament, a government which is fresh from the people, which has a clear mandate, whatever that government might be. And the same with the provinces.

I think we shall have in the very near future a situation in which almost all the legislatures of Canada will be new. There have been many elections recently, there are new legislatures in most of the provinces, there will be three new provincial elections probably this year, and there will be a federal election. I submit therefore that the time for taking up a question like this would be rather when these legislatures, ours like the others, have a fresh mandate from the people.

I hope that this question will be discussed without any political intent or interest or meaning from whatever side. It would be a disaster if the constitution of Canada, if anything concerning the constitution should become a bone of contention between political parties. I see occasionally suggestions of a national government or a union government being formed for the purpose of settling the railway question or methods of taxation. Well, sir, all these questions are merely questions of administration, and any government can settle them if it has the courage and the strength to do so. If a national government were required —and I am not in favour of it—it would be on a question like this; and I am surprised that those who advocate such a body do not give this as a justification for it. But what I would suggest is this. The conference, as there will have to be one to settle the whole question, instead of being a conference of governments, as the other dominion-provincial conferences have been, ought to be more national in scope, just because it is essential that there should not be any division between parties in this matter. I would suggest that the delegates from the dominion to this convention should be selected as our committees are in the house and should include representatives of all parties in the House of Commons. I would suggest also that the representatives of the legislatures which will meet with the dominion body in order to discuss this most important question ought also to be selected from amongst the various parties in the different legislatures. That would be a really national conference and would eliminate many of the possible troubles and causes of friction which would be very dangerous in this matter.

But hon. members may ask me: What would you suggest as a practical method of amending the constitution? This is what I have already suggested both in this parliament and outside it: when we speak of Canada, we mean Canada as including not only the dominion parliament but the nine provinces as well, and I am in favour of Canada having the right to amend its own constitution; but I would suggest that when an amendment is proposed by this parliament, the change should have to be agreed upon by a majority of two-thirds of the members of the house and the members of the Senate and this change should be submitted to the various provincial legislatures for their approval. On ordinary questions, questions of finance, railways, communication and matters like that, I do not think unanimity ought to be required. It would be an absurdity that one province might on a purely fiscal or financial question, a matter of taxation, prevent the will of the immense majority of the people of Canada from prevailing. A clear majority or a majority of two-thirds of the legislatures might be required on most matters. But on questions of vital importance to some sections of Canada, questions of protection of minorities, the question of school or language, unanimity should be required and I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has already stated that that is his wish in the matter. That would be the suggestion I would make to a convention representing the dominion and the provinces for discussion. I do not think it is perfect; it could be improved, but as a subject of discussion it is what I personally would be willing to submit.

So far as the resolution of my hon. friend is concerned, of course I have no objection to its being submitted to a committee, but with that reservation again that it is a little queer that one party to the agreement should study the methods of changing the agreement by itself without inviting the other parties to participate in the discussion.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The committee will do that, I suppose.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is the only reservation I would make.

Mr. MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I am more interested in the humanity than in the legality of the constitution. Both the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) have spoken of the constitution from the legal aspect. The Minister of Justice said that the constitution of Canada has not within itself the means of amending it. Well, some poet many centuries ago had this to say:

> The moving finger writes; and having writ,
> Moves on; nor all your piety nor wit
> Shall lure it back to cancel half a line,
> Nor all your tears wash out a word of it.

If that is so, I suppose those hon. members who have tears to shed should prepare to shed them now, because according to the words of the Minister of Justice we, deprived of the ability to amend our own constitution, will not be able to amend it in the near future. There is a possibility in the same manner as we might tighten the hoops on a barrel so that the barrel might burst, the hoops of the constitution might become so tight on the Canadian people that something in this country might burst. The people have a way of acting like that on occasions.

There is no question of doubt in my mind that this move for constitutional revision is due to the last five years of depression and also to the new philosophy that is at present arising in Canada. The government has launched upon a new political philosophy, claiming that the old order is gone and that we must substitute a new order therefor. Personally I do not feel that we can launch or bring about a new order in Canada until our constitution is changed, because if we try to inaugurate this new order we shall find that so far as the provinces and the dominion are concerned, impediments and obstacles will be placed in the way of constitutional change so as to render it absolutely impossible to make any change in the constitution. Therefore I hold that unless we do change the constitution materially, we shall not be able to inaugurate this new order about which so much is being said, not only in this corner of the house but amongst hon. gentlemen opposite. The people throughout the country ten years ago were not interested in constitutional changes; all they were interested in was a job, and having a job few of them were interested in the constitution at all. It was not until 1929 when the depression and the crisis began that the people at large commenced to think seriously about the constitution by which this country is governed. We have been told in the schools about the infallibility and immutability of the constitution and speakers at various picnics have told us about the supreme wisdom of the fathers of confederation. But people are beginning to doubt that supreme wisdom and at the present time it is very difficult to get a speaker at those picnics and other festive occasions to speak so eulogistically of the men who drafted our constitution. The constitution was a product of the economic philosophy of the times; the laissez-faire philosophy, then in its hey-day. But times have changed since 1867; we now have a new economic philosophy which is held not only by this group and others in the house and throughout the country but to which even the Prime Minister has become a convert. It has been said that we would meet with difficulties in regard to provincial jurisdiction. I have in my hand a report of the case of Snyder v

Toronto Electric Commissioners, in which the province denied the validity of dominion legislation providing for compulsory investigation of labour disputes in public utilities, and it was discovered that the dominion had not the power to implement the signatures of its representatives to the international convention for the eight-hour day.

Suggestions have been asked for. Take the matter of social services, regulation of wages and hours of labour; why can this not be under the control of the federal authorities rather than have the situation that exists today in which we are faced with provincial impediments at every step? I asked an unemployed man the other day what he thought about these attacks on the constitution and on liberty, and this is what he said: So far as those sections of the constitution that are absolutely necessary to safeguard certain necessary rights in this country are concerned the constitution should be upheld, but if it is being used merely as a cloak for some ulterior motive or to prevent essential legislation then I say the constitution should be radically changed. Can you imagine any leader in this country haranguing a crowd of unemployed men and women about the benefits of liberty and the constitution and the dangers of losing both when all the while they are thinking about the condition in which they now find themselves of misery and demoralizing idleness and starvation in the midst of plenty? These are the things about which people are thinking at the present time. They feel that they have been circumscribed by a sort of economic straight-jacket from which they are finding it very hard to extricate themselves.

I have said that the constitution as drafted in 1867 is a reflection of the economic thought of the times. The constitution in 1935 should be a reflection of the economic conditions that now exist. If we are to launch this new order, call it government intervention if you will, I do not think it has much chance of success unless the constitution is radically amended to suit the new order. Let the constitution fit the times and the needs of the people rather than have the people fit arbitrarily into the constitution.

Motion agreed to.

TITLES, HONOURS AND AWARDS

On the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King:

That, in the opinion of this house, the Prime Minister should refrain from recommending to His Majesty the King the conferring of any grade of the peerage or of any order of baronetcy or of knighthood upon any of His Majesty's subjects resident in Canada.

[Mr. Luchkovich.]

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE: The leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) has asked me to ask that this motion should stand, because he does not want to delay the discussion of social reform.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Number 18 stands.

PACIFIC COAST SHIPPING

DESIRABILITY OF ENCOURAGING EMPLOYMENT OF WHITE SEAMEN IN PREFERENCE TO ORIENTALS

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved:

Whereas great numbers of Canadian seamen on the Pacific coast of British Columbia are out of employment and in many cases destitute;

And whereas, owners of ships and vessels of Canadian registry on the Pacific coast of British Columbia give employment in large measure to seamen, cooks and engineers of oriental origin;

And whereas, other countries give greater consideration to the employment of their own nationals on ships and vessels belonging to their own country;

And whereas, the Canadian government grant large sums of money to the owners of ships and vessels by way of subsidies;

And whereas, it is desirable that every encouragement be given for the employment of officers, seamen, cooks and engineers of white Canadian citizenship in preference to those of oriental origin on all Canadian owned and registered ships and vessels;

Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, the government take such steps as will provide for employment of greater numbers of white Canadian citizens on all ships and vessels of Canadian ownership and registry, the owners of which receive grants of money from the public treasury of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, may I say at the outset that this is not the first time I have spoken on this matter in the house, but it is the first time that I have introduced it by way of a resolution. It is unnecessary to elaborate the meaning of the resolution as I think the wording sets out the gist of the matter fairly well.

I would like first to speak of the subsidies paid by the government of this country to the various steamships operating on the Pacific coast, and in passing to mention the total subsidies paid to all shipping by Canada. In the year 1930 the mail subsidies paid to ships operating on the Pacific amounted to $227,080. The figures I am giving are taken from the main estimates. In 1934 the subsidies paid to steamships on the Pacific had risen to almost a million dollars, to be exact, $990,800. In the estimates brought down the other day for 1935-36 the total for the Pacific ocean is $1,180,800. I ask the house to note the great increase in these estimates during the past four or five years. I realize that a private company or an individual in business for himself is free to engage whomever he likes, and it might be going too far for this parliament or government to restrict that individual or company as to whom he should hire. But I claim that when this parliament and the country is granting to steamship companies such large sums, amounting in the aggregate to nearly two million dollars, we should take notice of whom these companies employ. I shall endeavour to prove that the lack of some supervision in this matter is working a severe hardship on our own white Canadian seamen.

As to the numbers employed on steamships operating on the Pacific may I give the latest figures? This information was provided on January 12, of this year. The figures show that orientals engaged numbered 2,590. The number of white Canadian seamen idle in the province of British Columbia, according to up to date figures, is roughly 2,050. A careful survey was made of the unemployment camps in order to secure the occupations of the men there employed, and it was discovered that some 400 of these men had been seamen. In the city of Victoria 550 seamen were idle; 900 were idle in New Westminster and Vancouver, making a total of 2,050. To be complete, of course, that figure has to include the 200 seamen working on part time.

I am sorry to have to discuss this resolution in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, because these subsidies are under his department. When I discussed the matter last year the then Minister of Trade and Commerce used the argument that the orientals engaged on board these steamers operating from the Pacific coast were British subjects. I should like to point out that after careful investigation it will be found that such a statement is very far from the fact. The orientals engaged on these steamers are engaged chiefly from Hongkong and from Canton, and I have before me some information as to the conditions existing in Hongkong, taken from the Encyclopedia Britannica. I am going to quote some of these conditions, because they are very pertinent to the matter under discussion in view of the statement made last year. Hongkong is a depot for an incessant flow of Chinese emigration and immigration, especially in connection with the Straits Settlements. In 1931 there were 100,869 emigrants and 283,890 immigrants. The total population of Hongkong in that same year was 840,473, and of these only some 19,000 were classified as non-Chinese. Immigrants from the Canton delta account for 76 per cent of the total population of Hongkong. The colony is governed by a legislative council consisting of the governor, nine official members and six unofficial members. Eight of these members are nominated by the crown, of whom three are Chinese. The police force consists of approximately 2,110 men. The Chinese section has a system of watchmen, who are paid by the Chinese inhabitants.

One of my reasons for stating these facts, Mr. Speaker, is in order to bring before the house these conditions in an endeavour to prove that it is impossible for anyone to say definitely as to the nationality of these men, apart from the fact that they are hired through Hongkong. The total number of pupils in the public schools in 1931 was 68,500. Of these one-third were in schools in which English was the medium of instruction, while two-thirds were in the vernacular schools, in which Chinese is taught. The five schools for children of British parentage have an average attendance of only 423. Hongkong, being the principal source of distribution in the far east, with a huge floating population and a constant influx from the mainland not only by steam vessels but by local junks as well, it would appear to be no easy matter to keep a real check on the movements of the Chinese in that city. As to the number of those who have become British citizens there is no record available, and such information could be obtained only from the secretary of Chinese affairs. There is no system in vogue by which it would be possible to tell whether or not large numbers of Chinese in Hongkong have become naturalized, unless after a very careful inquiry and close check. I believe the city is divided into two sections, European and Chinese, with a wire fence between which is guarded by Chinese policemen. It is no trouble at all for the Chinese to pass through the European section into the Chinese section or vice-versa, and it is from this section that seamen are engaged on the steamships plying from Pacific ports.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, an investigation was conducted by the Seamen's Association of Vancouver, and they have evidence to prove that the majority of the Chinese on these ships operating from the Pacific coast claim to come from Canton. Here is how they are engaged. On each ship they have a number one boy who is paid $15 per month. Seamen are recruited at Canton by a shore agency which is operated by another agency in Hongkong. When engaged they are directed to the number one boy on the ship, who arranges as to their pay, and so on. This number one boy pays the crew any advances they may desire, and I understand that when the ship is paid off the money is distributed in this way: All the money goes to the number one boy; it is thrown into a pillow case and he takes it below and distributes it pro rata among the men. But I would point out that of the wages paid last year, amounting to something like $19,000, practically nothing is spent in the province of British Columbia. That money is taken home and spent in China. Then another point which bears out my contention that these men are not British subjects is the fact that when the steamers arrive either at Vancouver or at New Westminster, these seamen are not allowed to leave the ship. A guard is placed at the gangway and not one man is allowed ashore. So the contention made last year by the then minister that these men were British subjects is not borne out by the actual facts of the case. If they are British subjects why keep them on board; why put a guard on duty to see that they stay on the ship?

I do not think it is too much to ask this parliament to take care of our own people. Almost every country in the world protects its own nationals. In the United States they insist that the employees on their ships shall be one hundred per cent American. In the event of any ship trading on their coast there is a duty imposed, and the ship and crew must be under American registry and the men must be paid the American scale of wages. France has always protected its seamen by insisting that French nationals shall have preference of employment on all ships under French registry. The same applies to the Argentine and Brazil. Of course we know what has taken place in Australia; ships operating under Australian registry must carry a greater number of white nationals than of orientals, and they will not allow the oriental crews to unload ships. New Zealand has just passed an act from which I am going to read one clause:

> Seamen engaged in New Zealand to be paid current wages.
> (1) Notwithstanding anything in this act, it is hereby declared that where the master, owner, or agent of any ship,—
> (a) Engages seamen in New Zealand; or
> (b) Having engaged them abroad, employs them in New Zealand,—
> those seamen while so employed shall be paid and may recover the current rate of wages for the time being ruling in New Zealand; and in the former case the engagement may be determined in New Zealand at any time after the ship's arrival at her final port of discharge in New Zealand, consequent on the completion of a round voyage, by twenty-four hours previous notice on either side.

[Mr. Reid.]

Other countries such as Germany, Denmark, Norway and Holland have always insisted on some measure of protection for their own nationals. But in Canada we have a group of people receiving well over a million dollars who are not very particular about whom they engage, so long as those men work cheaply enough. I know that at times some people take the attitude that a sort of brotherly love should exist, and that the men employed are human beings, the same as we are. May I point out however that this is not a case of a brotherhood. If the companies affected were compelled to pay the same rate of wages to all men not one of those orientals would be engaged. This is simply a case of sweated, cheap labour. Yet we are handing out over a million dollars to these companies while our own Canadian seamen are walking the streets of Vancouver. As I have pointed out, numbers are kept by the state; four hundred of them are in the relief camps on the coast. May I point out some of the wages being paid by various countries. These rates to which I shall refer were given in the British House of Commons by Mr. Runciman no longer ago than December 19 of last year. To be frank, I was very much surprised when I learned the name of the country paying the highest wage. I was not surprised when I learned which country paid the lowest. Hon. members may be interested to know that next to the United States, the country paying by far the highest wage, stands Holland. The figures I shall give are quotations in dollars in terms of sterling. Holland pays her able seamen $52 per month and her firemen $56. Great Britain pays able seaman $40 and firemen $43. Going through the whole list I find that Japan pays the smallest wage, her able seamen receiving only $11 per month and her firemen the same. The Chinese receive about the same as the Japanese.

In that connection I should like to read what Great Britain is doing and has done in regard to the employment of her own subjects. This matter has received considerable attention in the old country, and while they have not done everything that could be desired they have taken steps to protect their nationals by passing a law stating that no alien shall be employed in any capacity on board a British ship registered in the United Kingdom, unless he can produce a birth certificate. I venture to observe that if we had that law in Canada very few of the seamen engaged in Hongkong would be aboard the ships operating on the Pacific coast. I question if one of them could produce a certificate of birth indicating that he was born in a British country. The British ship owners also have issued the following instructions to masters:

> We expect you and your engineers to ship a British crew whenever it is practicable and to give suitable British men preference at all times over those of all other nationals.

The following regulation has been passed by the Board of Trade of Great Britain:

> Great Britain does not allow foreign ships to unload cargoes in British ports and if they desire to do so they must receive permits from the Minister of Labour.

Reference was made in the House of Commons to this regulation by Mr. Runciman.

When all other countries are endeavouring to hold their places in trade and are seeing to it that every protection and encouragement is given either by law or implication to their nationals I believe we should do the same. If one were to go aboard the ships entering Vancouver or New Westminster harbour he would find Italians manning Italian ships and Swedish nationals manning Swedish ships. The same would apply to ships from Japan and China and to all others.

At this point I should like to indicate something which occurred last year and which to my mind is very strange indeed. Canada had disposed of some of her mercantile marine, and while the ships were not sold directly to Japanese interests the fact is that the Japanese acquired many of them. One of the shipping companies which is receiving a subsidy of about $4,950 a trip from this government, the operations of which company are carried out by still another shipping company, engaged a Japanese firm to carry lumber and other goods from British Columbia. The company in charge of that ship received $4,950 of Canadian money for shipping on one of our discarded boats. It is not exactly known what they paid for the ship, but it would be interesting to know. While presumably the subsidy is given to encourage trade I think the house should know just what that trade is costing the owners who used these subsidized ships.

Mr. MANION: There is no difficulty in knowing it. I shall give the information at any time. It was sold by the Canadian National Steamships, and if the hon. member will put his question on the order paper I shall give him the figures as soon as I can get them.

Mr. REID: I shall be glad to have the figures for those ships. It would also be very interesting to know just what that company paid the Japanese firm for the use of a boat on a trip for which they received $4,950 of good Canadian money from this government. It would be interesting to know that part of the question, too.

I was informed upon fairly good authority that these subsidized lines were charging more for the hauling of lumber than were other steamship companies operating on the Pacific coast, but I learned that after an appeal to the minister the rates were reduced. I was startled to receive that information because it is presumed that the subsidies were given to enable our steamship companies to compete with Japanese, Italian or Chinese lines. I learn however on good authority that better rates could have been obtained from lines which were not subsidized, and I believe it is about time a commission was appointed to investigate the whole matter.

Mr. MANION: To which minister is the hon. member referring when he states that there was an appeal to the minister?

Mr. REID: I am referring to the former Minister of Trade and Commerce. That is one of the reasons I have placed on the order paper a request for all letters and telegrams passing between the then Minister of Trade and Commerce and some of the steamship companies. I am interested enough to want to know if some of the information I have received is true, because it was given me on first class authority from one engaged in the lumber trade. He told me that the steamship company in question reduced their freight rate immediately they learned he was appealing to the government. Formerly however they had been charging a higher rate, despite the fact that there was a subsidy in existence which was supposed to enable them to compete with Japanese, Chinese and other lines.

I have before me a list showing the nationality of employees on some ships, and these figures indicate that while on the Canadian Pacific steamer Empress of Canada 500 orientals are employed, there are only a very few white men. I am not advocating that the whole crew should be one hundred per cent Canadian because I realize there may be Chinese going back and forth who would have to be looked after. But when you find on the biggest liners 500 orientals and only a handful of white seamen, a few key men only, I wonder sometimes what would happen if a catastrophe by storm or fire occurs and the passengers have to look to the five hundred of the Chinese crew for their safety at sea. Are the lives of our people as safe as they should be under those circumstances? I doubt it very much.

There are 495 orientals on the Empress of Japan, 500 on the Empress of Russia, and 500 on the Empress of Asia. In addition, on the coastwise vessels which are receiving subsidies from this government there are approximately 107 orientals carried. With regard to the Union Steamships Limited, which receives subsidies from this government, 90 orientals are employed on their ships, and then I find that our own Canadian National ships, which surely anyone would expect would be free from anything like this, carry approximately 20 orientals. I can go through the whole list and find the same thing. The British-Canadian Steamship Company, which is receiving a subsidy from this government, employ also a great many orientals on their ships. They employ 300 orientals, Mr. Speaker, although they told the seamen's associations that they would endeavour to engage as many white men as possible. Well, apparently they are still endeavouring because that change has not come about yet. And they are employing these 300 orientals to the detriment of our own white Canadian seamen.

We have a motto in front of this building, "The wholesome sea is at her gates, her gates both east and west," but I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, it is not very wholesome around those ships anyway, and it never will be wholesome as long as we neglect our own and engage orientals and so allow our own white seamen to walk the streets idle.

It is surely not an unfair request to ask the government that steps be taken to see that a greater proportion of our white Canadian seamen are employed on these ships, epsecially when we are handing out almost $2,000,000 for subsidies to these shipping companies. The Prime Minister has spoken about changes in the present system. Well, I hope that this is one of the changes that he is going to bring about for the benefit of our own citizens on the Pacific coast.

Canada has entirely neglected her seamen. In passing, Mr. Speaker, may I also make this request, although it is perhaps not exactly within the scope of the resolution before the house, that more note be taken of the idle shipyards that we have in this country. We talked the other day in this house of a building program, of the building and renovating of houses, of which I approve; but did we hear anything said about more work for our Canadian shipyards? Yet this was the country to build the first steamship that crossed the Atlantic. To-day our shipyards are lying idle from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and nothing is being done to provide them with work. No suggestion is made that some encouragement be given to these yards, to build our own ships, to keep our own artisans at work. This country over three thousand miles in extent is bounded on three sides by the sea, and yet shipbuilding is the one industry that is entirely neglected, and not only is it neglected, but no notice at all is taken of the matter of engaging white seamen on ships. I am appealing to the house and asking the government in this resolution to take steps to see that more white Canadian seamen be employed. As I have pointed out, it is not an unfair request. It is a request that I believe everyone in this house can and should support. The resolution does not ask the government to pass a law telling every steamship company that it must at once hire white Canadian seamen but it does request the government, in the case of those steamship companies that are receiving subsidies from the people of this country, to see that greater consideration is given to the matter of employing more white Canadian seamen.

Some of these lines that are receiving subsidies from this government are very cute too. They operate in Canada and receive their subsidies from this government but have their ships registered in London, and what do they do when they want engineers and mates? Do they employ the men in Vancouver and New Westminster who are just as competent as any they bring out? No, they bring out these men from London, England, or even from Scotland.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. REID: The engineers would likely come from Scotland anyway. I am not objecting to these men coming out but I do object to these ships which are subsidizing, and which are making a living from this country, bringing out these men when we have just as competent men here in this country. Our first consideration should be for our own. If we have no men here who can fill these positions, it is all right to go to the old land and bring out these men. Only last year they even brought out a policeman. Just think of it; they could not find in Vancouver or New Westminster a man who could act as policeman, and they had to bring a man all the way from London.

Do these companies give any consideration to Canadians when they are employing ships' musicians? Are the musicians around Vancouver and New Westminster engaged on these ships? No, the bands on board these ships are hired from the Philippine islands. These companies will go anywhere so long as they can get men cheap enough. They will get cheap seamen in China and cheap musicians in the Philippine islands, and put them on board these boats while our own men are walking the streets.

I do not think I need to elaborate further on my resolution. It is before the house and I am asking the house and the government to accept it. I ask the government to take steps to see that more of our white Canadian seamen are employed on these subsidized ships.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words in support of the resolution that has been proposed by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). In fact I will go further than he has gone and propose what in my opinion are the appropriate steps to be taken by this government to bring about the conditions that he has in mind, namely, the employment of more white seamen on ships of Canadian ownership or of Canadian registry.

Listening to the hon. member for New Westminster in his scathing indictment of the way in which these private employers, these private capitalists, employ their help buying it in the cheapest market, I wondered why he was sitting with a party that upholds that particular system, and trying to ease the sores of capitalist exploitation by spreading a little salve over them. Last session or the session before, when these subsidies were up for consideration, I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce if, where the government was granting subsidies to ships, they would consider inserting a fair wage clause in the contract as a condition of granting the subsidy, just as we have it inserted in other government contracts, and the minister of that day said that he would take the matter under consideration. However, I have not heard anything further about it.

I am not particularly concerned as to who is employed on the ships, but I am concerned as to the conditions under which they work. Moreover, I am quite satisfied that white seamen, particularly of the race to which the hon. member for New Westminster and myself belong, would surely get the preference, and certainly from the Canadian Pacific because they have a good eye for business, if a minimum wage was in effect. There should be a fair wage clause or a minimum wage established for sailors and other people employed on these ships. I believe that that is the means whereby we can meet the situation. We should see to it that wherever the dominion government provides a subsidy—I would even go further than that and say that wherever there are ships coming to the ports of this country over which the dominion has any control whatsoever, there should be minimum wage regulations covering the employment of the seamen engaged in any capacity whatever on board those ships, and with that proviso or extension I support the resolution proposed by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid).

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): May I add a word in support of the principle here laid down. I take some exception to one of the whereas clauses, the idea that every encouragement be given to the employment of officers, seamen, cooks and engineers of white Canadian citizenship in preference to those of oriental origin. I do not like it worded just in that form, with the implication that we should exclude those of oriental origin, but I do think that the employment of more of our own Canadian people, residents of Canada, is highly desirable. I think we all agree that the reason so many orientals are employed is simply the fact that they can be secured at a cheaper rate, and I have all along taken the view that the way to exclude orientals or people of low standards was by erecting a high minimum wage barrier.

Many years ago Mr. Paul U. Kellogg said that such a barrier would constitute a sort of immigration tariff, and I think it would. I have said before, and I have been severely criticized for saying it, that in my opinion people resident in this country, and especially people who have been born here, whether oriental or not, should have fair treatment. But I do insist very strongly that our steamship companies which are receiving subsidies ought not to be able to go to Japan and China to get cheap labour, to the detriment of our own Canadian citizens.

A few months ago I happened to be travelling on both Japanese and Canadian liners on the Pacific, and I noticed that the Japanese employed almost exclusively their own nationals whereas the Canadian Pacific employed a very large proportion of Chinese. There seems to be no reason whatever for such a condition. Further than that I am informed that very frequently when repairs are needed on these boats travelling between Vancouver and the orient the repairs are postponed until the boats reach the orient. Sometimes the repair materials are taken on board at Vancouver and carried over and Chinese workmen do the job in Shanghai. Some provision should be inserted to prevent a practice of that sort, which is one means whereby our own Canadian workmen are done out of jobs.

Having stated my position, and rather taking exception to one of the whereas clauses, I can very heartily vote for the proposal put forward by the hon. member.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up much of the time of the house on this question. I have listened to the debate thus far and I have listened particularly to the presentation of the case by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). The principle which he expounded is one with which I think the whole house will agree inasmuch as every hon. member I presume desires that Canadian labour so far as possible should be given the preference on all work done in or connected with this country either by subsidy or otherwise. At the same time the question is not quite so simple as merely the expounding of a principle. There are complications to it, complications in regard to labour itself, transportation, competition for example. My hon. friend, merely to mention one difficulty, stated that Japanese seamen are the lowest paid in the world, yet on the Pacific coast it is quite obvious that Japanese ships are the ones which compete with the very ships about which my hon. friend has spoken. I am simply elucidating the case; I do not want it to be understood that I am opposing the resolution or the principle behind it. I am merely pointing out the complications, and other complications exist such as national and international questions dealing with shipping, which questions cannot to my mind be decided by the House of Commons any more than other questions such as freight rates in the country or matters of that kind can be decided by this house. Therefore, while I am not arguing against or opposing the resolution, I do suggest to my hon. friend with the best intentions in the world that we should submit this to a committee of the house, the committee on industrial relations, with the object of hearing all sides of the question. I have had submitted to me since my hon. friend put the resolution on the order paper, and I assume other hon. members on both sides, perhaps on all sides, have had submitted to them arguments against the resolution by some of the shipping companies, pointing out why, to their minds at least, they cannot carry out, in any case in toto, the proposal submitted by my hon. friend. I think it would be only fair in dealing with a question of this kind to give those companies an opportunity to appear before a committee of the House of Commons and to submit their side of the question. Therefore, without delaying the matter at all, I should like to move in amendment:

That all the words after "that" in the last paragraph be deleted and the following substituted therefor: "the resolution be referred to the standing committee on industrial relations."

The effect of the amendment is merely to submit the matter to the standing committee on industrial relations, to let all parties appear before that committee and to let it make its report to the House of Commons.

Mr. NEILL: For investigation and report.

Mr. MANION: That is obvious.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I want to congratulate the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) for presenting a forceful and cogent case to the house this afternoon in regard to this very important matter. I also wish to congratulate the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion), who this year is speaking in regard to this subject, for meeting my hon. friend at least half way in his request. I have not so far consulted my colleagues, but to my way of thinking the minister is eminently fair. We on the Pacific coast consider this a sincere and earnest grievance and such is the feeling of all the people of British Columbia. We want to give our white seamen a chance, and a very important principle is at stake, that is, when a government subsidy is given to a shipping corporation we feel that our white seamen should be given a preference over any others. If the minister means that this committee will make a report to the house at the present session, I shall be prepared with the concurrence of my colleagues to accept the minister's amendment. Such a procedure on the part of the government will be welcome news to our people in British Columbia and to the hundreds of white seamen who at the present time are unemployed at New Westminster and other ports of British Columbia. So far as I am concerned, I am glad to accept the minister's amendment.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I join with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) in saying we are very glad that the minister and the government are meeting us half way. I would have just this request to make to them, that in the matter of a committee the appearance of the shipping interest is very easily brought about, but while there are in this chamber able champions of the interests of the seamen; on the other hand on account of expense it would be very difficult for seamen to appear before the committee. They would be willing to come, but that difficulty might arise.

Mr. MANION: That matter will be in the hands of the committee.

Mr. REID: With that, I am very glad the government has seen fit to meet us half way.

Mr. NEILL: Will the minister allow the words "for investigation and report" to be added to his amendment? It is no use to refer the matter to the committee unless they report.

Mr. MANION: I think that is understood in any reference to a committee. That is entirely in the hands of the committee. That is certainly my intention, but I do not think it is necessary to add the words to the amendment.

Motion as amended agreed to.

FARM MORTGAGES

PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT TO REDUCE RATE OF INTEREST

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (West Middlesex) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the Canadian Farm Loan Act, and the Canadian Farm Loan Amendment Act, 1934, should be so amended as to make the rate charged on farm loan mortgages four per cent per annum instead of the rate now charged.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. Under government notices of motion there is a notice of motion by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) raising practically the same question that is raised in this motion. According to a decision of the house made, I think, last session or the session before, such a motion cannot be moved when a government notice of motion dealing with the same matter is standing on the order paper. This is a rule of the house; I have forgotten the number.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Which was on the order paper first?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not think that matters.

Mr. VENIOT: It may be a rule of the British house; it is not one of this house.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think it is a rule of this house. I refer to a ruling in regard to a resolution proposed in the session of 1932-33 by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). Although the hon. member's proposed resolution was on the order paper dated November 9, 1932, Mr. Robertson's bill on the same subject dated November 10, was given precedence, a bill always having precedence over a motion, to prevent the opposition from defeating legislation by anticipation. The quotation is from Campion, page 152. The question whether it is a resolution or a bill is of no account; the resolution is the foundation of a government bill on the subject. It is on that point I raise the question of order.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In this case the fact is that the motion which I now desire to move was on the order paper some days before the house met. The other resolution I think appeared only for the first time yesterday. That is material in considering a case of this kind.

So far as the precedent quoted by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) is concerned, I submit it has no application to the present situation. I think that decision went quite as far as it should have gone; however, it is on the records of the house. The point there was that while a bill was on the order paper dealing with a certain subject no resolution dealing with the same subject could be proceeded with. That is a very different thing from a resolution such as that which now appears on the order paper at the instance of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). There may be nothing in the bill when it is introduced following the resolution in the name of the Minister of Finance bearing at all on the subject of the resolution which I am proposing. Mine is a definite motion; let me read it:

That, in the opinion of this house, the Canadian Farm Loan Act, and the Canadian Farm Loan Amendment Act, 1934, should be so amended as to make the rate charged on farm loan mortgages four per cent per annum instead of the rate now charged.

There is nothing whatever in the notice of the resolution of the Minister of Finance to indicate that that question is to be dealt with. There is a suggestion that something will be said about it. A bill is the only precedent Your Honour has, and ordinarily priority is given to the resolution that appears on the order paper first. For both these reasons or either of them this motion is in order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On the point of order raised by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) I submit with deference that the precedent of 1933 does not rule. What happened then was that a bill was called on the orders of the day before the resolution standing in the name of the hon. member for Quebec South. This case is different. The motion of my hon. friend has been actually called and is now before the house. The mere fact that the government has a resolution on the order paper, put there yesterday, does not affect the validity of the motion of my hon. friend. According to the orders of the day the resolution of a private member must have precedence over the government's motion. Otherwise the effect would be that any government, by looking over private members' resolutions on the order paper, could immediately give notice of a motion and make it impossible for a private member to move any motion. That to my mind is an utter absurdity. If we had had a government resolution called preceding that of my hon. friend, the point of order I think would be well taken. If we had a bill on the order paper preceding that of my hon. friend, the point would be well taken. But here is a resolution properly called, and the mere fact that there is a notice of motion by the Minister of Finance cannot affect the validity of the resolution moved by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott).

Mr. SPEAKER: I anticipated before the house rose at six o'clock that some question might be raised as to the calling of the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott), so I took the opportunity during recess of looking up one or two authorities. I must confess that the matter is not without some doubt. At the same time the authorities are fairly clear to the effect that the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for West Middlesex is out of order under the anticipation rule. I should first like to quote from Campion, Introduction to the Procedure of the House of Commons, page 152, under the heading Anticipation in Debate. Before referring to the paragraph which I shall quote, let me say that I do not think there can be any question of doubt as to the similarity of material in the two motions, that standing in the name of Mr. Elliott, and the one which subsequently appears on the order paper. To quote from Campion:

> The anticipation rule, which forbids discussion on a matter standing on the paper being forestalled, is dependent on the same principle as that which forbids the same question being twice raised in the same session. In applying the anticipation rule preference is given to the discussion—

And I think emphasis might be placed on the following words:

> —which leads to the most effective result.

To continue:

> And this has established a descending scale of values for discussions—bills, motions, amendments, etc. Thus a bill or other order of the day must not be anticipated by (or more shortly blocks) discussion of a motion, amendment, or subject raised on another motion, such as that for the adjournment of the house. A motion standing on the paper for leave to bring in a bill blocks discussion of a motion (except for the presentation of a bill), amendments, etc. Any substantive motion standing on the paper blocks the discussion of an amendment, etc. An amendment on the paper blocks the raising of its subject in debate.

Frankly, one question rather worried me, as to what "bill" meant in Campion. In order to follow that up somewhat I find a precedent in May to this effect—see 341 House Debates, 35-762:

> The fact that a bill has not been printed does not withdraw it from the operation of this rule.

The Speaker's ruling on that occasion was as follows:

> The hon. member cannot move the amendment which stands in his name because it raises a discussion of a bill of which notice has already been given by the government.

I take it that the item appearing on the order paper under the head of Government Notices of Motions, standing in the name of the Minister of Finance, is tantamount to a notice such as is referred to in the authority which I have just given. I take it that the word "bill" in Campion is used in the widest sense, embracing the various steps through which a bill must pass before it is finally approved by this house. The first step taken in connection with the bill under consideration is the step set out on the order paper. With the very greatest deference to the opinions which have been expressed to the contrary, I rule that the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for West Middlesex is out of order.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Your honour, I regret that you have come to that decision, but I see that you have arrived at it after having given the matter careful consideration. While I cannot say that I agree with your ruling, I bow to it and do not desire to appeal from it.

TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES

PROPOSED RECIPROCAL ARRANGEMENT FOR EXCHANGE OF NATURAL PRODUCTS

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this house, it is expedient that the government of Canada reopen negotiations with the government of the United States of America with a view of bringing about a satisfactory reciprocal trade agreement between Canada and the United States, whereby the natural products of Canada, that is, the products of the sea, the farm, the mines and the forests, and including fish, lumber, wheat, cattle, etc., should have free entry into the United States in exchange for the admission of certain goods from the United States of America, which in the interests of both countries may be admitted into Canada, free from customs tariffs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, with your consent and the consent of the house, for reasons which I need not explain at the moment, I should like this resolution to stand. Having regard to what has happened in the last few days, with the president of the United States signifying his willingness to discuss with the government of this country a reciprocal trade agreement, perhaps under the circumstances the house will agree that it might be better not to proceed with the resolution at this time. I am also anxious that we should proceed with the other business which we are told is to come before the house, and for these reasons I ask your honour to allow this resolution to stand.

Motion stands.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROPOSED CONSIDERATION OF CAPITAL STRUCTURE BY BOARD OF TRUSTEES

Mr. A. E. MUNN (Vancouver North) moved:

Whereas, the attention of this house has been drawn by the royal commission to inquire into railways and transportation in Canada to the urgent necessity which exists for an early consideration of the capital structure of the Canadian railways (section 84-87 of that report):

And whereas, that commission recognized that a very substantial part of the money invested in the railways comprised within the Canadian National Railway system must be regarded as lost, and that its capital liabilities should be heavily written down, although the said royal commission did not deem the time opportune when making the said report to deal with this important matter, but suggested that the same receive early consideration by the board of trustees;

And whereas, a board of trustees has been appointed by the government;

Therefore be it resolved, that in the opinion of this house, it is of vital importance that the attention of the board of trustees of the Canadian National Railways be directed to this matter, and that this house deems it highly desirable that the said board of trustees shall consider this question and report thereon with the least possible delay as being of vital and primary importance in the interests of all concerned.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this resolution speaks for itself. I introduced this question during the session of 1934; there was very little debate and eventually it died on the order paper. This year I should like to have this matter discussed by hon. members generally. Every year we have this matter of the deficit of the Canadian National Railways thrown up to us, and it is not fair. It is not fair to the people of Canada or to the employees of the system. The money has been lost; the capital assets should be written down. You could easily write off perhaps a billion dollars, and charge it to profit and loss where it belongs. If you did that even to-day the Canadian National Railways would be able to carry its load.

We have a similar case in British Columbia; we have a little railroad with which most hon. members are familiar. I refer to the Pacific Great Eastern railway. To-day the capital structure of that railway is $74,000,000. I have been over every foot of the line; I know the country well, and I estimate the replacement value at possibly $20,000,000. Why should the capital be continued at $74,000,000 when it is worth only $20,000,000, or $25,000,000? If that were written down even that road would pay its way. So I say that in all fairness to the people of Canada, to the shippers, to the employees and to everyone else, this question should be considered very seriously.

This is a big question. Our railways represent the greatest financial problem we must face to-day, and I plead with hon. members of the house to discuss the matter. Let us hear from other hon. members. This is a reasonable business proposition. I am not introducing the matter from any political motive; I am doing so in fairness to the Canadian National Railways.

I need not take up the time of the house at any greater length, but I should like hon. members to pay some attention to and consider this matter for a short time. I may be all wrong in my views; if I am I should like to have it pointed out to me. I still say, however, that if the capital were written down a billion dollars or more there would be no deficit on the Canadian National. I am speaking of the railways, not of the hotels or steamship lines. I plead earnestly with hon. members to say whether I am right or wrong in my argument.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I have read this resolution a number of times with some care, and without meaning any disrespect to my hon. friend I do not see that it is of any practical use whatever. There seems to be so much misinformation in regard to this whole question. If I understood my hon. friend aright he suggested that if we recapitalized the Canadian National railways, writing down the capital by a thousand million dollars, in some way or other we might avoid the yearly deficit.

Mr. MUNN: Set up the capital structure to measure up with your assets.

Mr. MANION: If we set up the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways to-day so as to measure up to our earnings we would not only have to wipe out a thousand million dollars—

Mr. MUNN: I did not say that; I said your assets.

Mr. VENIOT: The physical value.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps I might finish my sentence. If we set up the assets of the Canadian National railways in such a way as to be proportionate at all with the earnings to-day we would have to wipe out a thousand million dollars owing to the government, plus another four hundred million dollars carried on the books of the company as owing to the government, plus practically the whole of the $1,255,000,000 owing to the public investors of the country. It is true that there was a time, in 1928, the peak year, when the Canadian National Railways did earn sufficient to pay the interest of that day. During that year, when world business was booming, the Canadian National did a gross business of $304,000,000, and the net, in other words the profit available for interest amounted to $44,000,000. In other words the sum of $44,000,000 could go towards the payment of interest, and as the interest in 1928 amounted to $41,000,000, in that year the Canadian National railways had a profit, over and above the payment of interest, of $3,000,000. That and one other year, namely 1926, were the only two years in which the Canadian National Railways earned sufficient to pay the interest in the corresponding year. But it must be pointed out that while in 1928 the Canadian National system earned sufficient to pay the interest at that day, which was $41,000,000, it was vastly too little—if I may use what may appear to be a contradiction in terms—to have paid the interest of to-day, because the interest of to-day owing to the public—and this has nothing to do with the interest owing to the government—instead of being $41,000,000 as it was in 1928 is in fact $57,000,000. So it is obvious that even if the Canadian National Railways had obtained in 1934 the volume of business it had in 1928, or if it had the same net earnings, or the same amount to apply on interest, it would still be $16,000,000 short of paying the interest.

I point that out first so that hon. members may understand the situation. I am not arguing against the trustees dealing with this matter, but there has been so much misinformation and misunderstanding concerning the whole problem that I shall endeavour during a few moments this evening to explain the situation as clearly as I can. I do this more for the public than for the house because I am quite sure every hon. member understands the situation thoroughly. However there is a great deal of misunderstanding outside this chamber. For instance quite recently I received a letter from a gentleman suggesting that if we would cut the interest on Canadian National Railway bonds owing to the public from six per cent to a reasonable figure we would save an amount sufficient to pay the deficit on the railway system. Well, his first mistake is that the average interest is not six per cent; in 1934 it was exactly 4½ per cent. He was wrong from that angle. Again and again I see the statement in letters appearing in the newspapers, and sometimes in editorial comments, that if we would recapitalize the Canadian National system by wiping out the government debt we would be putting the Canadian National in a position to carry itself. I repeat that we would have to wipe out the whole government debt, and then we would not get the desired result because the government debt has been accumulating for years. Never in all the years the Canadian National Railways have been in existence has one cent of that government debt been paid off or one cent of the interest on the government debt been paid to the government by the railways. So that even if we wiped out the whole $1,490,000,000, the amount which the Canadian National books show as owing by the railways to the government—I repeat, if we wiped out that sum, amounting to nearly a billion and a half dollars, and if we eliminated it for all time from the books of the Canadian National Railways, it would have no effect whatsoever upon those railways as a going concern. We would still have exactly the same amount of interest to pay to the public who have invested their money—millions of dollars of it—in the bonds of the Canadian National Railways.

In other words there are two debts owing by the Canadian National Railways. First there is the debt about which I have been speaking, namely the one owing to the government and amounting to $1,490,000,000 including interest and other charges. May I say that it is debatable whether or not some of those charges should be charged against the railways, but the fact is they do appear on the books of the company. We must remember that more than half of the $1,490,000,000 owing to the government went into the building of the Canadian National railways as they stand to-day. For example, it went into the building of the Intercolonial railway; it went into the building of the Prince Edward Island railway; it went into the building of the National Transcontinental railway, and it went into additions and betterments of various other branches which the Canadian National system took over at various times throughout the years under different governments. That is the debt upon which, as I have said, nothing has ever been returned to the government either in capital expenditure or in interest. So that has never been anything but a bookkeeping charge against the Canadian National Railway. To-day the interest upon the debt upon which interest is charged amounts to something over $30,000,000 per annum, but it is only a bookkeeping entry and it has never been paid. I want that clearly understood.

Mr. HANBURY: But it is very often quoted.

Mr. MANION: Yes, it is often quoted, but I doubt if the quoting does any particular damage to the railway.

Mr. HANBURY: It does not do any good.

Mr. MANION: It does not do any good, but it is true. I do not know that there can be any advantage in hiding an absolute truth, and I do not think the Canadian National system would be better off from having hidden something from the people of the country.

May I interject that to-day the railways are to my mind efficiently and economically handled, and I do not think they would be any more efficiently and economically handled if that figure were wiped off the books of the company. I do not think that feature has ever made an atom of difference in the handling of the railways either in the past or in the present. It is merely a bookkeeping entry and keeps the picture straight, so far as that figure of $1,490,000,000 is concerned. Some of the charges I think might well be wiped out without doing any damage; anybody will know that some of the charges should not be considered.

The other debt—and this is the debt which counts—is the long term debt owing to the public amounting to $1,255,000,000. That amount is owing to the bondholders in England, the United States and Canada. A large proportion of the bonds, probably from seventy-five to eighty-five per cent, are guaranteed by the people of this dominion, and the only way by which the $57,000,000 of interest upon those bonds can be lowered is by refunding, as is being done from time to time, or by repudiation. The government of Canada is the guarantor of those bonds, and in addition the bonds are a mortgage upon the lines of railway in the Canadian National system. That is really the only debt which counts, namely the debt owing to the investing bondholders. I should like to have that point clear, and, as I have stated, I make it for people outside this chamber rather than hon. members. By no method of bookkeeping could any part of that $57,000,000 of interest, the part which makes the real deficit, be wiped out, except by absorption into the consolidated debt of the Dominion of Canada. That is the only way it could be done. In other words to have an effect to the extent of one cent upon the Canadian National railways one would not only have to wipe out the first debt which I have mentioned, the government debt, and absorb it as most of it has already been absorbed into the national debt of Canada, but in addition one would have to wipe out part of the debt of $1,255,000,000 which is owing to the bondholders in various parts of the world.

Mr. MUNN: What objection would you have to that?

Mr. MANION: I do not know that I have any particular objection, but I shall give reasons why I think the hon. member's resolution is at least to some degree hasty. I do not use that term offensively, but if the hon. member will permit I will endeavour to explain what I mean. I am endeavouring simply to make clear in the public mind the financial position of the railways.

At this point may I emphasize another fact. Sometimes the statement is made by hon. members and sometimes by the public generally that if we could wipe out or recapitalize the Canadian National Railways—and I must observe that what is meant by recapitalization is not clear—we could improve the situation of the employees, the shippers and the federal situation generally. I think hon. members will understand that those points are not really affected by the bookkeeping entry which has existed for years. We must remember that after all we should have a set-up before the minds of the Canadian people concerning the cost of railways in general and the Canadian National Railways in particular. There is no reason why we should hide the facts. If we did hide the facts there would be the disadvantage that once again we would have the probability of all governments, if you like, and all parties forgetting the errors of the past and encouraging greater expenditures of one kind and another. There is this to remember, that in that government debt there are entries which to my mind will ultimately have to be wiped out and so far as that goes I agree with my hon. friend. For example, the Intercolonial railway was not built as a financial proposition at all; it was built for national and intra-empire reasons. It was built for the sake of rounding out confederation, linking up Halifax and the east with central Canada, and therefore something must be charged up to the country generally of that cost of the Intercolonial railway which is included in the debt owing to the government. Then there was the transcontinental railway and various branch lines that were built. Some of them were built for colonization purposes, some to assist settlers in various parts of Canada, just as my hon. friend from Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) urges at the present time that we should build an outlet from the Peace River section to the coast, even if it did not pay its way, in order to serve the people who are living in that very fine but rather far-off section of Canada.

Then again we bought various railway lines which became a charge upon the Canadian National Railway and, through the Canadian National Railway upon the Dominion of Canada. The purchase of some of these lines was certainly brought about by political and public pressure. Certain sections of the country, in fact nearly all sections that had small railway lines, pressed sufficiently hard to get the government or the Canadian National to absorb those lines into the Canadian National system, and so far as public pressure and political pressure was responsible for that result and thereby laid a charge on the Canadian National Railway just so far should a certain amount of that cost ultimately be absorbed into the public debt of Canada. I am giving my own viewpoint at the moment.

In conclusion, I would point out that according to the report of the Duff commission what my hon. friend seeks by his resolution has already been carried out because the Duff commission in their report, speaking of the financial set-up, said:

> This question as well as that previously referred to, dealing with the present involved financial structure of the Canadian National system, should, in the opinion of the commission, have the early attention of the board of trustees, which it is recommended should be entrusted with the control and management of the system.

Therefore since the board of trustees was appointed just a little over a year ago it is obvious, if they are carrying out their duties, and I presume they are, that they are studying this question, and as soon as they feel capable of submitting a report upon it through the railway committee to the House of Commons they will submit that report. I do not think anything is being lost by waiting or that anything is to be gained by haste in this matter. I believe we might well allow the board of trustees as at present constituted to study the whole question thoroughly and submit their report, as soon as they have come to a conclusion upon the matter, and then the House of Commons will be able to deal with the whole question.

In the meantime I suggest to my hon. friend that having brought this question before the House of Commons, and having submitted his reasons for thinking that a little greater haste should be made by the board of trustees than is being made, he might be willing to withdraw his resolution because to my mind there is nothing to be gained by passing it, and on the other hand I think there is something to be gained by allowing the board of trustees, who have many important questions to deal with to take their time in studying what my hon. friend calls this very vital question and making their submissions upon it. I would therefore again suggest to him that he withdraw his resolution after whatever discussion may take place upon it in the house, and I assure him that the resolution will be drawn to the attention of the board of trustees who, I have no doubt, will in the near future make a report on the question to the House of Commons.

Mr. MUNN: Might I ask if the board of trustees are now considering the advisability of cutting down the capital structure? Does the minister know that for a fact?

Mr. MANION: Although I have no direct information regarding it, I have no doubt they are. They were asked by the Duff commission, under whose report they were really appointed, to give their earliest possible attention to the subject, and I have no doubt that they have been giving it a good deal of attention. If my hon. friend, who is on the special railway committee, will permit me to remind him, the auditors last year in their report made a number of suggestions, but that auditors' report was not included in the report of the board of trustees. But the board of trustees will be making a report in the near future when the special committee on railways and shipping meets. Some reports have already been requested of them, and it is quite possible that at that time they may be submitting some suggestions on this question.

Mr. WILFRED HANBURY (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, with most of what the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) has submitted to the house I can express myself in agreement because everything he has said has been a reason why this rewriting of the financial structure or revaluation should be carried out.

The minister gave as his only reason why we should not act on this resolution at the present time the fact that instructions were given to the board of trustees by the report of the Duff commission that they should investigate this question and make a recommendation to parliament. But I would suggest to the minister that he note the particular terms of the resolution, which asks "that the attention of the board of trustees of the Canadian National Railways be directed to this matter." That is what the resolution of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Munn) asks, that this house should draw the attention of the board of trustees of the Canadian National Railways to the matter. That has already been suggested by the Duff commission. The hon. member for Vancouver North thinks it is a matter of vital importance. I agree with him in that respect, and by his remarks to-night the minister shows that he also agrees with him in that respect.

The minister has pointed to the fictitious valuation of the Canadian National Railways as carried on the books of the railway company. That fictitious valuation lends itself day after day throughout Canada to misrepresentation either by those who are opposed to the public ownership of the railway or by those who are anxious to show that the Canadian National Railway is doing worse than it is actually doing, or that the Canadian Pacific Railway is suffering under a great handicap by virtue of the competition of this publicly owned railway. All of these things may be true, but I suggest that the railway has an actual value. It is probably not the value of what we owe outside, not the value of the bonded indebtedness, of what is owing to the Canadian people; it is probably more than that; it may be less, but it has an actual value of some kind, and that valuation cannot be based on its earnings as the minister suggested might possibly be done. If the industries of Canada were to have their valuation based on their earnings to-day there would be very little value in many of them. For that reason I suggest seriously to the minister that he do not ask the hon. member for Vancouver North to withdraw his resolution. We are asking the board of trustees, as trustees for the Canadian people, to place the property on a proper valuation, so that we can accurately visualize what is taking place year by year, instead of maintaining a valuation which we all know to be fictitious. We can get no exact information so long as we maintain this fictitious valuation and so long as we are told that the deficits of hundreds of millions are bookkeeping entries. Let us get away from these bookkeeping entries and get down to business.

Mr. MANION: Might I just ask the hon. gentleman, in view of his statement in regard to not basing the valuation of industries in Canada upon their earning capacity to-day, upon what he would base anything like a just valuation of the Canadian National Railways under present world conditions? That is one of my chief reasons at the present time for submitting that we could not come to a sensible conclusion, and I do not believe that, under present business conditions, the board of trustees could reach such a conclusion on the matter.

Mr. HANBURY: I fully appreciate the representation just made by the minister; it would be a very difficult thing to do. But if it were not difficult this resolution would not be necessary. We have a board of experts who are quite capable of considering all the features which the minister has pointed out, and we are asking them to place the business on a sound basis on which we as shareholders can judge it. We are told year after year that we are millions upon millions behind, but we do not know what it means because the bookkeeping is erroneous. Let us therefore get down to sound bookkeeping. I again suggest to the minister that he do not ask the hon. member to withdraw the resolution but rather allow it to pass so that we may get down to a sound basis.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): I wish to say a few words on the subject, but before I do so I should like the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) to answer a question based on the remarks he has just made. Do I understand that the acquisition of the Canadian Northern and branch lines and the Grand Trunk, those lines taken over to prevent them from going into bankruptcy, involved the guaranteeing of bonds by the Canadian government for the Canadian National Railways? Did the Canadian government guarantee bonds to the public in the taking over of these lines?

Mr. MANION: Take the Grank Trunk for instance. Certain of the securities were acceptable; others were submitted to arbitration and were held to have no value. The ones to which a value was attached were accepted by the government of the day and the interest guaranteed in perpetuity. Those are a charge on the government and the railway.

Mr. VENIOT: As I understand the situation, many of the provinces, especially in the west, having guaranteed certain bonds in connection with the Canadian National and other lines taken over, those guarantees were accepted by the federal authority.

Mr. MANION: Most of them have been absorbed by the federal authority.

Mr. VENIOT: Therefore those are outstanding debts due to the public.

Mr. MANION: A great many of them, yes.

Mr. VENIOT: Well, those are the kind of debts in connection with which a recapitalization of the Canadian National Railways is sought.

Mr. MANION: But those are the ones upon which the railway is charged interest, which the government is paying.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, but I claim that the railways should not be charged interest at all on these advances, because the government of this country, in the interests of Canada as a whole, and to save the credit of the country, took over the railways during the war when they were going into bankruptcy. The government having done that, this should not be a charge against the Canadian National Railways as constituted to-day. That is the point I make, and it is one of the reasons why, I submit, recapitalization should be looked into by the board of trustees or by the railway commission. I submit therefore that this motion is perfectly in order when it asks that the matter be now considered by the board of trustees.

Mr. MANION: It is being considered.

Mr. VENIOT: I doubt it, and I think the minister himself has his doubts.

Mr. MANION: I have doubts as to when they will make their report.

Mr. VENIOT: If this motion were accepted I think it would hasten the report.

There is another point in connection with the minister's statement which I would discuss for a moment. He said that the cost of the Intercolonial railway is included in the debt due by the Canadian National Railways to the government of Canada. Well, this is news to me and I know it will be news to every hon. member from the maritime provinces who knows anything about the terms and agreements under which those provinces came into confederation.

Mr. MANION: It appears in every annual report and has been in the Canadian National balance sheet as long as I can remember, in the eighteen years that I have been in the House of Commons.

Mr. VENIOT: I hardly think the Canadian National Railways has existed that length of time. At any rate it is news to me, and had I been aware of it before, I would certainly have raised the objection which I am going to state now.

Mr. MANION: There is no interest charged upon it.

Mr. VENIOT: I know. But the old Intercolonial railway was built as a bond of confederation and no charge was to be held against it in the operation of that railway as a freight or passenger carrier. And to be told at this late date that it is charged on the books of the government against the Canadian National Railways is certainly news. I should like to know when it was transferred from a non-chargeable asset, if I may use that term, to a chargeable asset. We came into confederation under an agreement, and one of the conditions of that agreement was the construction of the old Intercolonial railway from Levis to Halifax, in order to give the provinces of Quebec and Ontario an outlet to the Atlantic coast. Under that agreement of confederation there was no right to charge that amount against the physical value or the operation of the Intercolonial railway, and to-day, when the maritime provinces are looking, as they have looked in the past, for what are called better terms, if I am to take at its face value what the minister says, we are to be met with this charge, "We obtained this road, involving so much money for the construction of a railway that we did not seek."

Mr. MANION: I will read for the information of the hon. gentleman the clause that appeared in the annual report of the Canadian National Railway system during all the years that he was a member of the government:

> Dominion of Canada expenditures for Canadian government railways:
> Road and equipment included in system investment account, $387,606,701.71.

That was part of the bookkeeping of the Canadian National Railways during all the nine years that my hon. friend was a member of the government.

Mr. VENIOT: That does not make it any better.

Mr. MANION: I will admit that.

Mr. VENIOT: It was made a charge in that way in 1912 under the Conservative government of the day by the then Minister of Railways, Mr. Cochrane.

Mr. MANION: The Canadian National Railways did not exist then.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not say it was made a charge against the Canadian National Railways but against the old Intercolonial railway as a debt due to the federal government.

Mr. MANION: It has been in the books of the government ever since the Intercolonial was built.

Mr. VENIOT: No, it has not.

Mr. MANION: I say it has.

Mr. VENIOT: Not as a direct charge against the Intercolonial railway; it has not been a charge in the way the minister says. Now I wish to protest, if it is not too late, even if I appear to have been derelict in my duty in the past, when a minister of the crown, and even if it appears that the Duncan commission did not discover that item to be a charge in the way suggested—I wish to protest, I say, when the maritimes are now laying their case before a royal commission appointed by this government, against any charge being made against the Intercolonial railway by the federal government as a debt due to the federal government for the construction of that road. We came into confederation at the call and the request of Ontario and Quebec. We were doing very well by ourselves before we came into confederation—and I am not opposed to confederation, as I said once before. No matter what we think it may have brought us, I for one am still a warm supporter of confederation. But let me say to the house and to the Minister of Railways that long before Ontario and Quebec knew what railway construction was, we in the maritimes were building railways for our own business; and under the terms of confederation we handed over those railways to the federal government to help Ontario and Quebec. They told us at that time that they had no Atlantic outlet; that they were at the behest of the United States lines; that the United States lines had a monopoly and that they had to transfer their freight from the old country to the United States railroads. In order to show their loyalty to the old country they appealed to our loyalty to come into a confederation and if we did so they would guarantee construction of the Intercolonial railway from Levis down to Halifax, taking in at that time what they called the old eastern extension and other roads running from Shediac to Saint John, from Saint John to Moncton, from Truro to Halifax and, although I may be in error in this, from Truro to Pictou Landing. That being the case, why should we to-day stand for having the cost of that road charged up against the Intercolonial railway as a debt to the dominion government?

Mr. MANION: Would my hon. friend permit me? I know he is endeavouring to clear up the issue as I endeavoured to do, although if my hon. friends had permitted me to speak last as I had intended, I would have dealt more fully with some of the statements. Does he not consider it fair, when the Intercolonial was handed over to the Canadian National Railways, that it should be entered up as part of their assets and naturally as a charge against the Canadian National Railways to whom the original government railways were handed as a going concern.

Mr. VENIOT: The Intercolonial was never handed over to the Canadian National.

Mr. MANION: For operation.

Mr. VENIOT: It never was. The Intercolonial is not to-day a part or parcel of the national railways.

Mr. MANION: It is operated by them.

Mr. VENIOT: Only for administrative purposes. In 1919 an order in council was passed in which it was stated that the directors of the Canadian National Railways as then organized would be the administrators of the old Intercolonial railway. The accounts of the old Intercolonial railway, if not from Montreal down through Levis and on to Halifax, at least from Levis before the Drummond road was taken in as an extension of the old Intercolonial—at least from Levis to Halifax, Sydney and New Glasgow—are kept separate and apart; they are not in the general accounts of the Canadian National Railways at all. That is the reason why in the question I put on the order paper I asked for information so that I and other members from the maritimes might be in a position to hurl back into their faces the statement of those who say that the Intercolonial has been a sinkhole in the past. I wish to have that information and I am told that it will be brought down, not by the ordinary method but by a return. When shall I get that return in order to defend the position of the old Intercolonial? I wish to hurl back their statement into the faces of those, especially from Ontario, who say, for the purpose of effecting an amalgamation of the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National, that the Intercolonial has been a sinkhole. I want to show by this information that the Intercolonial had surplus upon surplus year after year. In some years there were deficits. I remember that when the old Intercolonial railway was the most prosperous, freight rates were the lowest. It was not until 1912 that the agreement under which we came into confederation was departed from when, the late Hon. Frank Cochrane, then Minister of Railways, increased the freights on the old Intercolonial railway to make them correspond with all the freight rates west of Montreal. After the Grand Trunk Pacific passed down through the province, it is true that freight from the northern section was in many cases diverted from the old Intercolonial railway and in that way deficits did occur. If hon. members will examine the record of what is known as the Atlantic region of the present Canadian National railway system, what will they find? They will find that within the last two years, whatever increase there has been in carloadings the greater majority has been over the Atlantic region of the Canadian National, which is the old Intercolonial. To think we, down in the maritimes, have to stand the brunt of the arguments advanced by members from the two old provinces that dragged us into confederation, when they say that we gave Canada a railroad that is nothing but a sinkhole!

Let me draw the attention of the house to the further fact that the old Intercolonial railway is 225 or 250 miles longer to-day than was anticipated when the fathers of confederation asked the maritimes to come into this association. It was not the will of the maritime provinces that brought about the difference in length of that railway. We were forced to go down by the northern route instead of down the valley of Saint John and across close to the northern section of the state of Maine. The imperial government interfered and for the sake of military strategy they said to the confederation at that time, that is, Ontario, Quebec and the two maritime provinces, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick: We desire that this line shall be built such and such a distance from the United States border in case of trouble with the United States so that our railroad will be safeguarded by distance. The imperial government, in order to induce us to do this, paid a contribution of I forget how many million pounds to aid in the construction of the old Intercolonial railway. It is a wonder to me that those who are instrumental in making that charge an amount due to the government by the old Intercolonial railway did not make that payment or contribution of the home government a charge against the Intercolonial as well. Indeed, that may have been done; I am not too sure that it has not. It may be worth while looking into the matter before we get through with this question.

A great deal more could be said in connection with this railway matter but I am going to defer any more remarks I have to make until I have received the information for which I have asked.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): This is indeed one of the least contentious motions that has ever been submitted to the House of Commons. The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Munn) does not ask the house to define or state any policy; he only expresses the wish that the house submit a certain matter to the trustees of the Canadian National Railways; that is all we find in this resolution. The first paragraph contains a statement of fact. It reads thus:

> Whereas, the attention of this house has been drawn by the royal commission to inquire into railways and transportation in Canada to the urgent necessity which exists for an early consideration of the capital structure of the Canadian railways (section 84-87 of that report):

This nobody can deny. It is a statement of fact, and that fact is admitted.

> And whereas, that commission recognized that a very substantial part of the money invested in the railways comprised within the Canadian National railway system must be regarded as lost, and that its capital liabilities should be heavily written down, although the said royal commission did not deem the time opportune when making the said report to deal with this important matter, but suggested that the same receive early consideration by the board of trustees;

That also was expressed by the royal commission. The royal commission did a certain work, but that work was not complete, especially in regard to labour. If I am not mistaken there was only one paragraph of that report which related to the relations between labour and the company. It was most incomplete. But as the commissioners could not complete their work they directed the attention of the House of Commons to the very fact mentioned in this paragraph. By bringing the matter to the attention of the house the hon. member for Vancouver North tries to have the commission's work completed by the trustees who are now in charge of the railway's business.

The third paragraph is:

And whereas, a board of trustees has been appointed by the government;

This is also a statement of fact which cannot be denied. Then the conclusion is:

Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, it is of vital importance that the attention of the board of trustees of the Canadian National Railways be directed to this matter, and that this house deems it highly desirable that the said board of trustees shall consider this question and report thereon with the least possible delay as being of vital and primary importance in the interests of all concerned.

In this house we have to be informed of facts. It is impossible for any member of parliament to read all the bluebooks thoroughly. We have officials in various spheres who are supposed to do that. For this railway system there are three trustees, who have been honoured with the confidence of the crown and about whom I have nothing to say at present, except that I have got in touch with Mr. Labelle and I was well satisfied with the way I was answered when I wrote to him. What we need here in the House of Commons is full information about the basic facts, then we may draw our own conclusions. A moment ago there was a little discussion between the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) and the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot). They were approaching the matter from different points of view and were not agreeing about the facts. One or other of them is right, but I cannot say which. It is most important to have the facts brought before us from the trustees, and it is most important that their attention should be brought to the matter in order that they, with the experience that they have acquired in that business by dealing with it for a few years, should make that study for us. They would draw their conclusions, but at the same time we should have the facts upon which those conclusions were based, and this house would have opportunity afterwards to form its own judgment on the matter.

The hon. member for Vancouver North is not now asking the government to change its policy in regard to the Canadian National Railways. Often the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) himself has said that Canada has reached the limit of her credit. It has been stated here in Ottawa and elsewhere. We have to know everything about the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways. I shall not repeat what has been said by other members, but it is most important for us to have a report about that matter at the earliest date possible. In what has been said by the Minister of Railways there is nothing in opposition to this resolution. He cannot say anything against it. The government would not be compromised by accepting it. It would not change the policy of the government at all. It is just asking for a report by the persons best qualified to study the whole matter and to report to us. After that report reaches us the government will be able to state their policy in the matter, when they have full information. That is why I congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver North upon having brought this resolution before the house.

There are some complaints about the Canadian National Railways being unable to meet their liabilities. Some of the interest is on bonds held by the government. The government knows very well that it will take a very long time to pay them. On the other hand the Prime Minister and some of his colleagues often speak about the inability of the Canadian National Railways to meet their liabilities just on account of the interest that is due to the government on those bonds. Therefore I do not see how any member of this house should object to getting good, reliable information on a matter of such vital interest.

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): I oppose the resolution for one reason; that it is calculated to make us forget how foolish we have been in years past. That I think is something we should not forget. Neither do I think we should do anything that would tend to that end.

As far as the remarks of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) are concerned, to a very large extent I am in sympathy with the position he takes. There is no question that the mileage of the Intercolonial was needlessly increased by at least three hundred to four hundred miles simply from a military point of view, at the instance of the British government of that day. It is a mistake to suppose that all the branch lines in the maritime provinces were unprofitable. For instance one branch line taken over was in my own county of Pictou. It was some twelve and a half miles long. That road always paid a small return on the capital; it paid the larger amount during the summer months, while in most winters there was a slight loss due to difference in traffic. And there were other roads in the maritime provinces that were earning money.

It is not my intention to discuss this matter at any length, but I repeat that I am opposed to the resolution simply for the reason that I think it is a mistake to do anything to remove from our minds and memories the colossal mistakes we made in this country in regard to railway construction. That loaded us with a debt that neither our children nor our grandchildren will see wiped out. There is no way to wipe it out; we have to pay the interest, and no matter of bookkeeping is going to alter that unfortunate fact. A good many of us would like to forget some other mistakes we made in the last four or five years. It would not help us one iota if we could erase from memory's pages many of the mistakes we made in 1928 and 1929. It is well that we should remember them and profit by them, and the same thought applies to the question of the capitalization of the Canadian National railways.

Mr. MUNN: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would direct attention to the fact that the reply of the mover of the resolution will close the debate. If any other hon. member desires to speak to the motion he should do so now.

Mr. MUNN: I just want to make it clear that I was not criticizing the present management at all; I was simply offering a suggestion in a very civil manner. I know it is a bookkeeping proposition but, as I said before, it is not fair to the people of Canada or to the employees of the railway. We are only fooling ourselves. If you had a factory that cost $100,000 to build; if you had run it for ten years and had not written off anything for depreciation, then would it be fair to put in a new man and ask him to carry on under the old capital structure of $100,000? It would not. I think this should be done in fairness not only to the present board but also to the people of Canada. Every year this deficit of $30,000,000, $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 is thrown up to the employees of the road. The boys go in and ask for a little raise in wages, or the shippers ask for some consideration, but the excuse always is, "Well, we are losing money; we have a deficit every year." I am simply asking that the figures be placed where they belong, and I think the Minister of Railways should allow this motion to pass.

Mr. MANION: I simply say it is not necessary, because the matter is being dealt with and the trustees will report when they find themselves capable of reporting.

Mr. MUNN: Then with the assurance of the Minister of Railways that the matter will be or is being considered, and that if possible it will be reported on at this session—

Mr. MANION: I cannot assure my hon. friend of that, but I can assure him that it is being considered. I cannot say when they will report, but I shall gladly ask, and give the information to my hon. friend.

Mr. MUNN: Then with that assurance I ask that the motion be withdrawn.

Motion withdrawn.

SUPPLY—REFORM MEASURES

AMENDMENT TO MOTION OF THE MINISTER OF JUSTICE FOR COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, no doubt your honour will remember that when the debate on the address took place I offered cooperation with the government on the part of the official opposition in connection with the consideration of all measures having to do with the pressing question of unemployment, as well as those measures of social and industrial reform which we were advised would be the main concern of this parliament at its present session, but I pointed out that as the time of this parliament might be distinctly limited, since the government had it within its power at any moment to bring on a general election before measures of industrial and social reform were properly considered, it would be advisable that those measures should be brought down at the earliest possible moment, and that the time of parliament should not meanwhile be devoted to less important business.

In order that the government might have every opportunity to bring down its legislation at an early date and in as complete a form as possible I said that I would ask hon. members on this side to refrain from participating in the debate on the address, and would seek to have the speeches of the opposition confined to the speech which might be made by myself. Hon. members on this side acted in accordance with that suggestion, and to a certain extent hon. members in other parts of the house restricted the number of their speeches. There were a few speeches by hon. members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, speeches by the independent members, and a few from the government side. Debate on the address was thus brought to a speedy conclusion, and I believe all hon.

members then hoped and thought the way was clear for the consideration, or at least the introduction, of some of the measures of social and industrial reform which we have been called to consider.

I made a further suggestion respecting private members' motions to the effect that with the consent of the house we might forego the consideration of such measures at the present time and if need be consider them later. I was careful to point out that no hon. member should be deprived of his right to speak on any motion he might have on the order paper. I suggested such an arrangement would have to have unanimous consent, and I believe it would have received such consent had not the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) indicated that he did not purpose changing the order of procedure and would not put any motion of the kind. For that reason we have had to consider private members' motions. However hon. members on this side of the house have adopted a self-denying ordinance and have foregone any lengthy discussion or all discussion of the motions appearing in the names of hon. members of the opposition. We have been content to allow other hon. members to indicate their points of view and to indicate ours simply by taking such action as might be necessary to indicate our support or disapproval.

The house has now gone completely through private members' motions. Every number on the order paper has been called and several of the motions have been discussed. A few have been passed by deliberately in order to give the government an opportunity to bring on its measures of social reform. For example I would point to the motion respecting titles standing in my name. I attach a good deal of importance to the discussion of that subject but I have felt that if the motion came before the house a somewhat lengthy debate might be created, that a considerable amount of time might be necessary for discussion and, as a consequence, in case I might be absent when it was called, I asked the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) to inform the chair of my desire to have it stand for the present in order that the house might proceed more quickly with those measures about which the people of the country are very greatly concerned. That was done.

My third suggestion was that if we could proceed with the program of social and industrial reform, with the measures concerning social insurance and with the reform of the capitalistic system I would undertake, so far as supply was concerned, to state on behalf of the opposition that we would have little difficulty in reaching an agreement with the government regarding the voting of supply at a later time. I am now again prepared to give that undertaking. I have looked through the estimates, and with the exception of some of the items in the different departments I think we could agree to their passage. We may find it necessary to discuss some votes where salaries have been considerably increased, but other than that I believe we could agree to pass the civil supply very quickly, once we have had before us all the social and industrial reform measures. As hon. members are aware however, once the house resolves itself into committee of supply, debate may be protracted to any length; supply may be brought up day after day, and we may be kept here doing little more than considering supply one day after another. That is a means governments sometimes take to fill in time when they are not ready with more important legislation.

We have been told by the Prime Minister that the social reform legislation is so all-important that no time must be lost. He has said we must proceed with it with haste. Not only have we been told that but the people of Canada were told the same thing over the radio before parliament assembled. They were told that in part at least they would see the program outlined in the speech from the throne and that the government would go on with the work immediately. In these circumstances—

Mr. GUTHRIE: Where was the word "immediately" used?

Mr. MACKENIE KING: The hon. member has asked when the word "immediately" was used. If he wishes to quibble over a word I shall withdraw the word "immediately" altogether. I will give him the Prime Minister's own words. I believe he did not use the word "immediately" but he did use the word "now," and the expression "as quickly as possible." Further he used the expression "go on without delay," the further expression "speed and determination," and the expression "not any other time, but right now." If I used the word "immediately" as comprehending the lot or synonomous with each I hope exception will not be taken.

When a week ago to-day the Prime Minister introduced the resolution standing on the order paper respecting social insurance he said he was doing so so that "to-morrow" the resolution might be considered.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is a form.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, but the word "to-morrow" means that the matter may be discussed at the earliest possible moment in the order of procedure in which it appears on the order paper. For that reason I do not think I am far wrong when I state the impression left upon the house and country was that these measures were all-important and would be proceeded with at once.

May I draw your attention to a further fact, Mr. Speaker. Not only did I point out that the measures for social reform and reform of the capitalistic system might be all-important, but I pointed out these were matters relating to the future and that important as they might be they should not be so placed as to sidetrack the immediate consideration of the problem of unemployment as we have it today, and the suffering to which as a consequence many people are being subjected. I did that because at every session of this parliament the discussion of the important question of unemployment has been left either to the very end of the session or until a moment immediately preceding an adjournment, such as the Easter recess. Never have we been able to get the government to permit discussion of supply of the Department of Labour or of a discussion of unemployment relief measures until a time approaching the very end of the session when hon. members had little or no opportunity for discussion. I do not think if we are able to avoid it we should permit that sort of thing to happen again. We should not allow the government to take up the time of this house from day to day in a discussion as to what supply the government is to get when at the same time all-important questions concerning the present difficulties of our people remain untouched. In the circumstances I believe we should ask that the all-important measures be proceeded with immediately.

May I draw the attention of the house to the fact that notwithstanding the offers of cooperation to expedite the introduction of reform measures the time of the house up to the present has been consumed by a consideration of measures other than those of the class I have mentioned. We have given first and second readings to an act to amend the Interpretation Act, an act to amend the Representation Act, an act to amend the criminal code and an act to amend the Pension Act. We have reached the second reading of Bill No. 2, an act to amend the Precious Metals Marking Act, and have reached the same stage on Bill No. 7, an act to amend and consolidate the acts relating to patents of invention. We have reached the committee of the whole with respect to one or two resolutions that appear on the order paper. None of these things are part of the all-important program of social and industrial reform.

Mr. MANION: They are part of public business.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are part of public business, but may I tell the Minister of Railways that this house was called for the purpose of considering above all else these questions of social and industrial reform?

Mr. MANION: So it will.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: So it will, but, if it is within the power of some hon. members to have it so, it will do so at the earliest possible date, and not at the last moment.

Now may I make one point very clear, because I think it is just as well the public should understand what apparently the government has in mind, and what remarks such as those we have just heard from the other side of the house would indicate to be the case. The Prime Minister in his first broadcast over the radio on January 2, after intimating that he was going to outline to parliament the various measures of reform that were essential said, addressing the public:

> I will then invite your considered opinion as to whether reform is in fact necessary.

Now this means after the session is all over. Do not forget that, Mr. Speaker. There is no undertaking that any of these measures are to be put into force before a general election. According to the Prime Minister's own statement to the public this house is to be kept going until, to appearances at all events, he can get this legislation on the statute books, and then there is to be a general election:

> I will then invite your considered opinion as to whether reform is in fact necessary, and as to whether my program of reform is wise. If you say yes, then I will not rest until I have put it into operation.

It is quite easy to see what is in the Prime Minister's mind—a program of social reform to be put on the statutes, but none of it put into force. Then when we have a general election, the electorate is to be told: If you want this program of social reform you must support me. But even if they do support him the Prime Minister has not promised even then that he will put the program into force, because he says:

> If you say yes, then I will not rest until I have put it into operation.

Mr. POULIOT: He will perish in the attempt.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the kind of thing he said all through the last election with respect to what he was going to do—that he would see these things were done, that he would not rest. We all agree he will not rest; he never will rest; but that does not mean that as a consequence any or all of these measures will ever be put into operation. I do not think the public should be humbugged with regard to any of this legislation, and so far as it is within the power of hon. gentlemen on this side to see that the situation is properly understood, we shall endeavour to see that the program of legislation is brought down, that it is stated in full, that it is carefully considered, and also that the conditions on which it is being proposed are understood by the public.

May I point out further, Mr. Speaker, that nothing could afford a stronger reason for not proceeding with consideration of supply until we have these measures before us than the Prime Minister's own declarations over the radio. I am going to read a few of these to hon. gentlemen, and I shall leave them and the country to consider whether we are not right in the circumstances in asking that these measures of reform should receive precedence over the less important business of the house, the kind of business my hon. friend the Minister of Railways has just referred to, such bills as those we have up to the present been considering, whether we should not instead give precedence to these all-important measures of reform.

May I point out that these measures, if they are to be what we are told they are to be, are likely to be very, very far-reaching? This house will have to consider these measures very carefully. The Prime Minister tells us that one of them relating to unemployment insurance the government has been considering for over a year past. Well, the government may have been considering it that long, but all hon. members who are not of the cabinet have not had a chance to consider it at all, and we shall want a little time after the bill is brought down to consider its merits and to understand its implications.

It is altogether probable that these measures will involve careful consideration of vexatious questions of jurisdiction. How these difficulties may be most effectively met will have to be a subject of careful consideration. It is also probable that they will involve a very large expenditure of public money. Now where is this public money to come from? How it is to be raised will be an all-important question which the public will wish to have answered before it will be prepared to support or condemn any legislation. We have heard over and over again from the Prime Minister himself the statement that if Canada's credit goes, everything is gone. We have also heard the statement that we cannot have social legislation given effect to to any appreciable extent on borrowed money, that the revenues of the country will have to be sufficient to meet its demands. Well up to the present ever since the present administration assumed office we have done little but add to our public debt very, very considerably every year. We have increased taxation every year, and if these social measures are to be enacted and enforced the country will wish to know whether they are to be put in force on borrowed money or whether the money for them is to come out of increased taxation—at all events where the money is to come from which is to enable them to be effective.

These are matters that cannot be settled in a day or two, and we shall wish to have them very fully discussed here.

I want to make the position perfectly clear. We do not intend if we can avoid it, those of us who sit on this side of the house, to be put in the position of being dallied along from day to day, and week to week, with regard to these alleged measures of reform, only to find ourselves a month or two months hence without any real discussion of the measures, some of them not even then perhaps brought down, faced with a general election suddenly sprung on the country by the Prime Minister on the score that he has been meeting with nothing but opposition to the measures he has brought down. We do not intend to be put in that position. We intend to offer all we can in the way of helpful cooperation to measures that deserve the support of all parties in this house, but we must reserve to ourselves the right, which hon. members of every party should consider an obligation, to have every one of these measures before us in plenty of time to consider its provisions upon their merits and to give a straightforward and unbiased opinion with respect to each.

Having said this much, let me now read from what the Prime Minister said over the radio, because the Prime Minister's own words constitute one of the main reasons why I propose to move an amendment at the conclusion of my remarks, which I hope the house will deem it advisable to support.

Here is what the Prime Minister said in his second radio speech on January 4:

> Now that the time has come to carry through a policy of reform, does any earnest-minded person say we should delay?

Well, we are all earnest-minded here, and we say there should be no delay. We agree with the Prime Minister that these measures should be ready now, and we are prepared to consider them immediately. Next the Prime Minister said:

> Now that we have achieved some measure of control over economic conditions and can operate without fear of imminent disaster, we are going to do away as quickly as possible with emergency relief measures and put in a permanent system of sound and scientific insurance against unemployment.

When a Prime Minister tells the public even before parliament meets, that the government is going to do away as quickly as possible with emergency relief measures I say that the time for us to consider what is going to take their place is right now, not after we have been in supply a couple of weeks or a couple of months, or after a general election, but immediately. That is the most important problem; what is to take the place of relief measures, we want to know what the government's policies are with respect to unemployment relief and finding work for the unemployed. We want to know that as it relates to this year, the present time, and as it affects people throughout this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The Prime Minister says:

> We are going to put in a permanent system of sound and scientific insurance against unemployment.

How long is it going to take that system to get into operation? May I ask this question. How much help is a contributory system of unemployment insurance going to be to the man who has no employment at all and nothing to contribute? These are the people who have to be considered first of all, the people who have no work at all. This is insurance against unemployment in years to come; but what the country has needed during the last five years has been some method of providing work and relief, and we have not had any consistent policy on these two matters since the present government came into office.

Then take radio address, No. 3, delivered on January 7, here is an extract:

> My friends, I have declared for reform. Now that the time for action has come, delay is hazardous. A machine which is out of adjustment must be repaired or it will cease to operate. We have decided that permanent prosperity waits upon reform measures.

Now, can we afford to delay reform measures when the Prime Minister tells us that permanent prosperity waits upon them? Can we afford to delay the consideration of these measures when the Prime Minister says that, now that the time for action has come, delay is hazardous? We are prepared to take him at his word and to consider these measures as soon as the government brings them down. In the same speech the Prime Minister also said:

> I say we must go quickly forward with our reform measures.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: An hon. member on the other side says "hear, hear." Well then, come on with them; we have not had any of the reform measures yet. This house was called together a week ago last Thursday and we are now in the third week of the session, but we have not had so far any of the reform measures though the Prime Minister says that we should go quickly forward with them. I am only taking him at his word. What is another statement he made?

> When some of you ask me, as you may: "why all this haste?" I say that, as a matter of fact, there is no haste at all, either in thought or action. There is urgency, but that is another matter. This is the right time for reform. We are now ready for it. We have been preparing for it.

So when the Minister of Justice asks me why I use the word "immediately", when the Minister of Railways asks, to all intents and purposes, why the haste, seeing that we have other public business on the order paper, I reply in the words of the Prime Minister:

> There is urgency, but that is another matter. This is the right time for reform. We are now ready for it. We have been preparing for it.

Take radio address No. 4, delivered on January 9:

> I have outlined our general policy of reform, and have indicated some of the measures in it which will be undertaken without delay.

That is all we are asking. This House has taken up all private members' resolutions, or at any rate, all have been called and most of them discussed, and we have concluded the debate on the address, so that we come now inevitably again to government measures, which of course have been called earlier than this. But the government is now again calling a government order and we ask hon. gentlemen opposite to call those measures which the Prime Minister says are all important and not to call supply at this stage, since that may mean only a method of postponing the discussion of more important questions. Further on, the same evening, the Prime Minister said:

> We must go forward with our reform program, with speed and determination.

If this language means anything it means that we should not be losing time, allowing one week to pass, and another, and a third week to come without touching a single measure of reform. That is neither speed nor determination. On the same evening the Prime Minister said:

> In my judgment, as I have said, we can expect little more progress without reform. On the contrary, there is a danger that we may go back and go back quickly, if we do not act decisively.

Surely in these circumstances no exception should be taken to a motion which proposes that all-important social reforms should be given precedence over other matters so that we may go forward and act decisively.

Mr. POULIOT: He has the speed of Balaam's ass.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me next refer to radio address No. 5, delivered on January 11, 1935. The Prime Minister in that speech made the following statement:

> You know that my whole program is by no means complete. The first stage has been well begun. The second stage we will immediately initiate.

May I ask the Minister of Justice to listen to this. He asked me a moment ago why I used the word "immediately," and I gave him many synonyms and equivalents in the Prime Minister's language. But the Prime Minister himself used that very word. It was the second stage that was to contain the program set forth in the speech from the throne. The first stage was comprised in those other measures that were referred to as having already contributed towards recovery.

Now I come to the last of the broadcasts from Ottawa, which was on the night of January 15, two days before parliament assembled. It was reported in the morning papers the day before parliament met, and in this broadcast the Prime Minister speaks about what will be in the speech from the throne, and the reason it will be there. And what does he say?

> When the speech from the throne is read Thursday, you will find that we are taking steps to deal with these problems not next year but right now. We cannot accomplish everything at a single thrust but we can start, and we start now.

Well, that being the Prime Minister's wish in the matter, and those of us in the opposition desiring to cooperate with the government in these matters of social reform, I move, seconded by Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver):

> That all the words in the motion after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "This house is of the opinion that the immediate consideration of present conditions of unemployment and the introduction of measures of social and industrial reform should not be delayed or postponed by a consideration of supply in advance of the consideration of government policies with respect to unemployment and the introduction of measures with respect to social and industrial reform."

In moving that amendment, may I repeat what I said at the outset, that at any time, once we have these measures before us and an opportunity given to consider them, if they are brought down promptly, we shall be prepared to have a group of hon. members on this side sit down with a group of hon. gentlemen opposite with respect to supply, to work out some means whereby the discussion of supply may be considerably limited, and the government in no way embarrassed in getting what is absolutely necessary.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): I can only say that I think my right hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) exhibits too much concern in regard to the conduct of business in the House of Commons during the present session. I am inclined to think that he imagines, for some reason or other, that during the present session he is leading the house, but it was made abundantly clear to him by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) a few days ago that the Prime Minister is still leading the House of Commons and proposes to direct the business of this chamber. What is the actual situation? The house undertook the transaction of business one week ago to-day, and to allay any fears on the part of the leader of the opposition I think I can state to him that perhaps the most important, or one of the most important, of the reform measures which have been announced in the speech from the throne will be under discussion in this chamber tomorrow. This is the first time in a long experience in this parliament that I have known an important government measure to be brought down within the first seven or eight days of the session.

Let me point out another matter to my right hon. friend. If any time has been wasted in this house during the past six days of its sitting it has not been wasted by members upon the government side.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What about the flag debate?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is all very well for my right hon. friend to enumerate five or six bills as he did in his speech to-night, and to announce that all those bills have been given a second reading during the past week. The time of the house consumed in connection with all those bills was in the neighbourhood of half an hour, and my right hon. friend himself consumed more than five times that amount of time in a single speech in this chamber last week. If there has been any blocking, if there has been any delay, it is not attributable in any way to the government or to anything members of the government or members on this side of the house have done. There has been no delay; there has been no loss of time, but there has been every expedition on the part of the government to get the business of parliament under way.

I may have been misled during the course of the afternoon but I certainly was informed by one of my colleagues that it was prearranged that we should go into supply to-night for the purpose of opening two or three departments.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Who made the arrangement?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am stating the information that was given to me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Speaking for the opposition I say that no arrangement of the kind was ever made or mentioned.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I may have been misled, but I was certainly informed that by arrangement we would go into supply to-night for the purpose of opening two or three departments in order that later on in the week or later on in the session the house might at all times have business to occupy it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think the hon. member ought to leave any such implication. I think he ought to ask his colleague where he got his information.

Mr. CASGRAIN: There was no arrangement.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My colleague is not in the house at present but I shall ask him. I accept my right hon. friend's denial. I perhaps have been misled but certainly that was my understanding of the situation.

Let me point this out also: My right hon. friend is well aware that this particular bill to which he referred, which is the unemployment insurance bill, is a difficult and complicated measure. He says that as soon as it is introduced the opposition will have to ask for time to consider it. That is reasonable. We were preparing so that in the meantime when the opposition were examining and considering the bill, this house would have something to occupy its time. It was for that particular reason the motion to go into supply was launched to-night, in order that we might be able to consider estimates during any interval which my right hon. friend might require to study the measure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let us get the measure first.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The resolution was placed promptly on the order paper, and unless something unforeseen happens, will be debated in the house to-morrow and the bill will be introduced to-morrow. I have rather gained the impression from the speech which was delivered in the house to-night that my right hon. friend is going through a period of preliminary training for one of the addresses which he is going to make over the radio later on. His speech sounded to me very much as a sort of preparation for something of the kind and did not have what one might call a genuine ring. He knows he cannot make out any case charging the government with delay at this early date in the session. The facts are entirely against him. When this bill is brought down others of a similar nature will follow it in due course and I suppose when they are introduced time will have to be allowed to the opposition for their consideration. In the meantime what business is there to occupy the house? Why not proceed in the usual way with the business of parliament? My right hon. friend may depend upon it that every measure forecast in the speech from the throne, every measure forecast in the radio addresses to which he has referred, will be promptly laid before parliament, and. I can assure my right hon. friend, will be enacted into law by this parliament at this session despite criticisms and despite objections. Why, when we looked in the paper this morning we found that my right hon. friend's chief lieutenant in Ontario, the premier of that province, had already condemned our whole program as unconstitutional and had raised many and various objections to it, I assume that he did so under instruction and I perhaps may assume also that such is going to be the course of my right hon. friend and his party in this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I rise to a point of order. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has made more than an insinuation; he has made a direct charge. May I say to him that I have had no communication whatever with the premier of Ontario with respect to any legislation of this parliament this year or any year.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am very glad to have that assurance, and I certainly will accept it at one hundred per cent. But let me tell my right hon. friend that the premier of Ontario, who was one of his bosom friends and one of his bosom supporters in this house, who according to newspaper reports had been called into conference with him in this city before he became premier and since, certainly on Saturday last made very definite pronouncements against all the reform measures which the Prime Minister proposed to introduce. He even threatened the people of this country with a tour by himself and his lieutenants from the Atlantic to the Pacific in opposition to these reform measures.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend knows all these measures have been broadcast during this year. I have not even seen or written to the premier of Ontario this year.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think it would be better if my right hon. friend would get up and repudiate the position taken by the premier of Ontario, but what I fear is that that gentleman has sounded the keynote of opposition to all these reform measures, not only in Ontario where he spoke but in the House of Commons from the opposition benches. I am not going to be critical about the use of the word "immediate." I think my right hon. friend knows why I interjected that word when I did.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, because it is a substitution for "to-morrow."

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think he knows it had reference to a certain change which he made in Hansard last week.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, the Prime Minister spoke to me of a change in Hansard when he said I had used the word "immediate" and was putting words into his mouth. The word the Prime Minister used when he was introducing the resolution was that "to-morrow" he would introduce a certain resolution. When I read Hansard, that word "to-morrow" was changed to "immediate," because the word "to-morrow" was used a week ago and "immediate" was the word necessary to give the sense required at that time. It was a perfectly legitimate change.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It was in reference to making that change in Hansard, putting words he had never used into the Prime Minister's mouth, that I objected to the word "immediate."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister is referring to something the Prime Minister spoke to me about in confidence, he said, when I explained the change and he understood it quite well. I am glad my hon. friend has come out with what he said.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The Prime Minister has not discussed with me anything he has discussed with my right hon. friend. The matter came to my notice in another way; but that was the reason for the interjection of the word "immediate." The Prime Minister has stated time and again in his broadcast speeches that he is going to lose no time, that he is going to act quickly. To-morrow he will introduce one of the main measures in the house. We have only had one week of actual business sessions; we started a week ago to-day. If that is not prompt enough for anyone I do not know what promptitude is in parliamentary action. No government I ever heard of has brought down measures as promptly as that. This measure will be followed from day to day or every few days by other measures in the reform program. No one in this chamber or out of it will have any cause to complain of delay in regard to these matters. The object and intention of the government is to press these measures with all haste. There will be expedition, not delay. We realize that these measures will probably require much consideration and discussion. But the bills will be offered to the house just as rapidly as it is possible to prepare and submit them. The unemployment insurance bill will be introduced to-morrow. I think probably as far as this side of the house is concerned we shall be prepared to go right on with it, but I am sure that will not suit the convenience of hon. members opposite. Well, what shall we go on with in the meantime unless you proceed with supply and let us consider supply from day to day when not otherwise occupied? The object in moving this motion to-night was merely to have some work on hand in case we are asked to delay consideration of these bills when they come down. But I repeat that up to the present moment there has not been a moment's delay. The work of the house has progressed according to the order paper as it progresses every session, perhaps more speedily than usual. If time has been wasted in the house it has not been by members on this side. If there has been obstruction it has not come from this side of the house.

Mr. McINTOSH: There has been no obstruction.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And if there are any measures that have been passed or considered that are in any way objectionable I do not know of them. We have acted regularly according to the rules and traditions of parliament, and we shall speed up all our reform measures and pass them with all the dispatch that this house will permit. Therefore I say that I think the criticism by the leader of the opposition to-night is entirely unfounded.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Some of us who do not belong to either of the major parties in this house find ourselves in somewhat of a predicament when a motion of this kind is offered. I think we are just as anxious as anyone to have the business of the house speeded up. I think no one will accuse us of doing anything to prevent the earliest possible consideration of such questions as unemployment and social and industrial reform. I know that I personally want those measures brought in at the earliest possible moment. We have been trying to say that for the last four years. I think that the government have been very dilatory indeed in that they have left these measures until the last session of this parliament, but as far as this session is concerned I do not think anyone can say that the government have been slow in bringing down these measures. Due partly to the fact that a good many on this side have refused to take part in the debate on the address we are ready now to go on with them. Now we have a definite assurance from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), representing the government, that this important measure of unemployment insurance will be brought down to-morrow, and that the other measures will be brought down in quick succession; that there will be no delay whatever. Under these circumstances I cannot very well vote in favour of the amendment. Personally I do not like opening up a number of departments, for the reason that in the past very frequently when a number of departments have been opened up we have found that our opportunity to raise questions on going into supply has been curtailed, and further, very frequently the government has passed rapidly from one department to another. That may have been convenient for the government, but it has not been convenient for all the members of the house. In practice most of us find it impossible to attend throughout every session when estimates are being put through. It seems to me there ought to be the fullest information given as to when the estimates of any particular department will be brought down, so that we shall not be absent when some estimate in which we are particularly interested is up for discussion. The number of departments opened at one time ought to be very limited. But it does not seem to me an unreasonable proposal that the minister should open up a department or two to-night so that business could be carried on.

I know it is quite possible that if some of us vote against this amendment we may be accused of lacking interest in bringing in reforms; that kind of party trick has often been played. We may I think face that risk in view of the very definite assurances that have been given us by the Minister of Justice to-night.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I do not feel like sitting quietly here while the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie King) endeavours to impress upon this house the great desire he has at this late time, after four and a half years of opposition, to put into effect reforms which he never proposed, which were proposed by the leader of the government (Mr. Bennett), but which the leader of the opposition now finds so important for this country that he thinks the ordinary business of our nation that every parliament deals with when it meets should be neglected, and we rush forward with every item of legislation which the government has to propose in order to give him a greater chance to criticize and oppose it.

Since this house first met we have had six business days. It is true there was the first Thursday, which was not a business day, and then on Friday there were the obituaries. But last week there were five days and to-day makes the sixth. Yet the right hon. leader of the opposition has the temerity to tell this house and the country that the Prime Minister delays bringing down his reform measures which he and every one except the right hon. gentleman knows to be necessary if this country is to survive and if the capitalistic system, in which I believe, and in which I think the right hon. leader of the opposition and indeed the majority of the people of this country believe, is to survive. The right hon. gentleman, not only to-day but during his speech on the address, has emphasized that his one object is to cooperate in these measures that the Prime Minister has proposed. He has said over and over again: Bring down these measures so that we can cooperate with the Prime Minister and the government in putting them through. But it is quite obvious to any observant person in this house and out of it that it is not his desire to cooperate, but that the desire of the right hon. gentleman is to embarrass. That is his whole object. And the right hon. gentleman knows it.

Mr. CASGRAIN: That is not fair.

Mr. MANION: The trouble with the right hon. gentleman is that he has been scooped by the Prime Minister. For four and a half years the right hon. gentleman led the opposition and during that time neither he nor his party made one constructive proposal. They opposed everything the government proposed; they criticized at all times; they found fault with every piece of legislation that was brought in. They opposed the marketing bill.

Mr. VENIOT: We did not.

Mr. MANION: They opposed the marketing bill when it was brought in. Half the party over there are on record as being opposed to the empire trade agreements, which opposition the right hon. gentleman is now trying to get out from underneath. They opposed practically everything the government brought into the house, but now, when the right hon. leader of the government has had the vision and courage to see that there must be corrections made to remedy the defects of the so called capitalistic system and to bring forward those corrections and propose them to the people of this country, the right hon. leader of the opposition, who had hoped to float into power on a tide of discontent and unrest, finds that he is scooped, and he has not been able to restrain his temper since he came into the house this session.

My right hon. friend now says that these reforms are all important, that we must put them through because the country needs them, and that the opposition wants to help get them through. These reforms, which he now finds so all-important, are the reforms which he never mentioned during the last four and a half years. I cannot say, of course, what he intends to do when the election comes around, but I do know that about a month ago the right hon. gentleman and his party had a conference here in this city. They met right in the city of Ottawa; they were here for two days; they had representatives from all over the country. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) was here; I think the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) was here. There were representatives from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and what was the result?

An hon. MEMBER: A mouse.

Mr. MANION: Yes, the mountain laboured and brought forth a mouse, or two mice in fact. The first mouse was a speech by the right hon. gentleman on world peace—of all subjects, as though there was anyone in God's green world except perhaps a few people in central Europe who wanted anything but world peace. At any rate the right hon. gentleman made a speech on world peace, and then they brought in a resolution condemning and abusing the government and demanding an immediate election, in mid-winter. That was the result of a two day conference here in the city of Ottawa, held about a month ago. Now, however, the right hon. gentleman says these are the all important measures; bring them forward and let us clean them up.

As it happened I have kept a few extracts which I happened to see in some of the newspapers during the last few weeks, since the right hon. Prime Minister submitted his program to the country. From those records let us see what some of the right hon. gentleman's lieutenants thought of these all important measures. Perhaps it would be a good thing to remind the right hon. gentleman and his friends of just what has been said. I have quotations here from speeches by a number of provincial members, but I need not read them. The first quotation I should like to give, perhaps because I like the hon. gentleman best, is by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power).

Mr. POWER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: Here is what he had to say:

> Major Power of Quebec assails "Bennett's buncombe and humbug."

That is what he considered it to be. He thought the unemployment relief measures, the measures having to do with the limiting of hours of labour and minimum wages, and all the other reform measures proposed by the right hon. Prime Minister, were "Bennett's buncombe and humbug," yet the right hon. leader of the opposition stands up to-night and says let us get on with these important measures, so which are we to believe?

The next hon. member I should like to quote, and another whom I like very much also, is the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore). That hon. gentleman is usually very careful in what he says; he is a very able supporter, perhaps the ablest on the other side, of the party which supports laissez-faire.

An hon. MEMBER: He writes books too.

Mr. MANION: Yes, and very interesting books; I read the last two and enjoyed them very much. He says Mr. Bennett's speeches are a very ordinary election appeal. Again these are the measures which the right hon. leader of the opposition says are so all-important. The hon. member for Ontario calls this program a very ordinary election appeal, while his right hon. leader says for God's sake let us get them brought down, let us get at them and put them through, because the country needs them.

Then my genial friend from Vancouver Centre stopped off at every place across the continent to make a speech. He was not satisfied to condemn the Prime Minister and all his words and works out in Vancouver; he got off even in my own city to make a speech. Every time he passes through he honours me by stopping off in Fort William; he likes me so much that he wants to help elect me. I am sure he has been helping me; I know he thinks I am going to be elected, because he told me so. I hope I may be forgiven for quoting him, but he told me so, and I do not know any better proof that I am reasonably sure of election.

Mr. POWER: Perhaps the hon. member introduced him to Miss Lizzie Fair.

Mr. MANION: No, he was not the gentleman. The hon. member got off at Fort William and called Mr. Bennett's proposal "a new deal or a new steal." That was what he termed it; that was his opinion. Even the youngest member of the house, the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) jumped into the limelight and put himself on record as condemning not only the Prime Minister but also his own leader, because his own leader says to-night, as he said on Friday and last Monday and every time he was on his feet, almost with tears in his eyes and with an appeal to this house, "For heaven's sake let us get on with these measures. The country needs them. We are anxious to shove aside all the rest of the business of the house in order to get on with them." But the hon. member for North York says:

"Confederation threatened by Bennett," states Mulock. Condemns Prime Minister for his audacity and impudence.

The hon. member condemns the Prime Minister, forsooth. I am afraid the people of this country will have to decide which is showing the audacity and impudence. According to the report I have, during this speech at Aurora the hon. member said:

Premier Bennett's policies will "break up confederation because his ambition is to set up a dictatorship," charged Colonel W. P. Mulock, M.P. for North York riding at a meeting of prominent Liberals at his farm here last night. "He thought he was the second Barnum—"

He is speaking of Mr. Bennett.

"—but he is going to be mistaken."

Mr. MULOCK: In regard to the statement made by the minister—

[Mr. Manion.]

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Is the hon. member rising to a point of order?

Mr. MULOCK: Yes. I should like to correct the minister. I have no doubt that he is reading the quotation correctly, but I did not make that statement.

Mr. MANION: Then my hon. friend will have to correct the Toronto Daily Star, from which I am quoting.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister should accept the word of the hon. member.

Mr. MANION: Of course I accept my hon. friend's statement, but I have quoted the Toronto Star, and that same newspaper quotes him a little further. He can correct this also if he wishes to do so. He said:

"Let us go out and save these liberties for which our forefathers gave their lives. Fight to make this country what Laurier and Mackenzie King made it."

The hon. member for Laurier-Outremont (Mr. Mercier) also made a speech, in which he said:

It certainly looks as though Mr. Bennett was preparing for the role of dictator.

Yet his leader says that these measures are so important that he wants to put them through without delay, so he cannot believe in this dictator business.

I could go on indefinitely, but I will quote only one other hon. member. These quotations are rather good; they may help my hon. friends in their campaign when the time comes. I have one quotation from Mr. Roebuck of the Ontario government, but I do not wish to read it; his was worst of all. Then even the senators got into it, because we find Senator Graham, my dear old friend George Graham, making statements. The following is an article which appeared in the press:

Asked what significance he attached to Mr. Bennett's failure to extend the attack to include the C.C.F., Mr. Graham believed Mr. Bennett hoped to attract the support of that body to himself, as he appeared to be adopting some of their platforms ... his program as far as one can understand, is in head-on collision with his former policies which, at the present time, are still adhered to by the Conservative party.

So even he found fault. I shall now quote some observations by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Fraser) and then I shall stop quoting. I could go down the list of those who spoke, but I shall not take the time. The hon. member for Northumberland said:

Mr. Bennett's utterances are more fantastic than anything that ever came out of the Arabian Nights.

I should like hon. members on this side of the house to remember what the opinion of the Liberal party as constituted in this house is concerning proposals for reform. That is worth while remembering, and yet in spite of his lieutenants the right hon. gentleman says, "We must deal at once with these matters and put them on the statute books"—on the statute books, not in his book, "We must get them forward and have them in a position to carry them out."

I accept the right hon. gentleman's attitude, namely that these are very fine measures. I can draw only that conclusion, if I believe in his sincerity at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think my hon. friend has quite understood what I have said. He keeps saying that I have said these measures are excellent. I have been quoting the Prime Minister's statement that they are so necessary. What I have wanted is that we may see the measures which are so important, and if they deserve support they will get it. I cannot speak of the measures until I see them.

Mr. MANION: The right hon. gentleman has been taking the stand that we should bring them down hurriedly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: So we can see them.

Mr. MANION: Now he states the reason he has made statements is because he has been quoting the Prime Minister. He is not always so reasonable in taking the Prime Minister's word for things of that kind. He must have some use for them. If the right hon. gentleman does not think these measures are going to be of any use to the Dominion of Canada why is he in such a rush? Why is he trying to embarrass the government even to the extent of blocking supply, and offering an amendment to the motion to go into committee of supply so that the work of that committee may be delayed? Why has he objected to every little bill that has been introduced? Three or four of them were reported one afternoon, and they were passed in much less time than he took while speaking on the address in reply. Yet he keeps pushing things along. Now he wishes to withdraw from his position and apparently stands with the chap who said, "I am their leader; I must follow them." He has heard some of his followers and therefore he is going to follow them instead of precede them.

I say that the Prime Minister has shown vision and courage in bringing forward these reform measures, a vision and courage which everybody, with the exception apparently of the leader of the opposition and some of his colleagues, has recognized. At one time I did accept the right hon. gentleman's sincerity in his attempt to have the measures brought forward, but now it would seem he is trying even to back up from that. Therefore I do not know now whether I can accept his sincerity in the attitude he has taken in the house. I must state that, so far as I can see, his endeavours to hasten the measures of reform are not for the purpose of hastening reform but for the purpose of embarrassing the government. He is doing it for the purpose of killing time. The right hon. gentleman and his followers for the past four years have done nothing in this house but offer criticism during the most terrible crisis the world has ever gone through. In all those four years he has offered nothing by way of constructive suggestion. It is true that he has said on one occasion he suggested an interprovincial conference. Let me tell him we had three or four interprovincial conferences, and in most of them the provincial representatives went away agreeing unanimously with the policy of this government. So far as I can remember, and I speak in all sincerity, I know of no constructive suggestion the right hon. gentleman has offered in those four years. In that time he and his party in this chamber have been just as useful to the country—and no more useful—than the drought in Saskatchewan.

I do not wish to take further time of the house, but I should like to say that the Prime Minister has not only recognized the need for reform, but in the four years in which he and his government have held office they have brought this country through the crisis in better condition than any country in the world. To that statement I make no exception. Not only Canada, but the rest of the world is going forward on the road to progress and prosperity, and the successful issue so far as Canada is concerned is due to the efforts of the Prime Minister. Now he is going to crown his work of four and a half years by these reform measures. I submit again to the right hon. leader of the opposition if he is the sincere friend of the country he says he is—and I wish to accept his statement, because I do not question any man's loyalty—if he is so sincere he will give the Prime Minister proper time; he will not endeavour to embarrass the government instead of attempting to assist it.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, it is always a great pleasure to listen to an address by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion). Hon. members enjoy listening to him. He has the real Irish spirit, and on this occasion the hon. member has excelled himself. If ever there was a party which has swallowed itself, body, bones and breeches, certainly the Conservative party has done it on this occasion. They have not left a thing. They have even tried to steal the policies of my good friends sitting in the corner of the chamber.

Mr. MANION: We couldn't steal yours because you didn't have any.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I say to the hon. member that that is exactly what he is trying to do. The Conservative party is trying to do that, and it is caught in the act. For four long years we have been trying to defend the people of Canada against the present administration. When the hon. member excites himself into one of his tirades I am reminded of the story of the Irishman who got drunk in New York. Being an Irishman the minister will appreciate this story; as it is against my own church and in favour of his I do not think he should object. Having spent the night in debauchery the Irishman decided the proper thing to do would be to go to church, and with that in mind he went to the little church around the corner. As there was a verger in the church the Irishman said to him. "When is mass about to begin?" "Why," the verger replied; "my dear friend, you are in the wrong place; this is not your church; it is an Anglican church." The Irishman looked around the walls and in one corner he saw a picture of our Saviour, and asked, "Is that not a picture of our Saviour up there in that niche?" The reply was in the affirmative. "Is that not a picture of the Mother in that niche?" The reply was again in the affirmative. "Is that not St. Peter over there?" "Yes it is." "Well then," said the Irishman, "since when did them folks become Protestants?" The change of heart my hon. friend has undergone in these four years is I believe described by that story, and in telling it I have had no desire to be profane. We have not heard the new policies yet, and that is why we have shown some anxiety. A few days ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) told us that the most important piece of legislation, which had on a former occasion been mentioned by the party in the corner of the chamber, was prepared as early as last March. Why was it not brought down? Why could it not have been brought down? As usual, did the right hon. gentleman want to do his stalling trick? They want to delay. They need delay; the Lord knows they are going to need a lot of delay before they pass this legislation, because so far as I can discover it merely amounts to some amendments to Liberal policies of 1921.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Well, I shall be glad to see it when it comes down. I will go as far as to state that I will support anything which is in conformity with Liberal policies. Neither my hon. friend nor his leader has any right to go around this country and say that this party or my leader opposed the marketing act.

Mr. MANION: The only member opposite who supported it was the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell).

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It does not make any difference what my hon. friend from Melville said. Time and again during the discussion of the marketing act it was made perfectly clear that we on this side of the house stood for cooperative marketing, but did we stand for the iniquitous provisions set out in that act? No, we did not, and we do not stand for them to-day. Did we stand for a board being set up in British Columbia with power to say, "You shall not ship Alberta butter into British Columbia?" No, we did not, and we do not stand for it to-day. We might just as well face this thing squarely. We are not going to be put in the position of having it said that we opposed the principle of the marketing act. We are not going to have that said either by the leader of the party opposite or by any hon. gentleman opposite. But we did oppose the provisions of that act.

Mr. MANION: You opposed everything.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): And we are prepared to oppose them again, because we opposed them in the interests of the people of this country.

Let me say to my hon. friends on the other side of the house that never in the history of Canada has there been a period of four years in which more damage was done than in the four years they have been in power. More men have lost their homes, not only in the urban centres but in the rural parts of Canada. and they are losing their homes to-day.

Mr. CASGRAIN: And a million people on relief.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): And they are losing their homes on account of the policies of this government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Go out on the prairies and see the procession taking place off the farms daily. In my own city of Edmonton hundreds of people have lost their homes through taxation and their inability to pay as they were unable to secure work. I am told on fairly good authority that over fifty per cent of the land of that city belongs to the municipality to-day. And then hon. gentlemen opposite get up and say that they are the authors of everything that saved the situation in Canada, and that Canada came out of the depression better than any other country. If that is true, and I question it, the people of Canada came out better because of their innate ability to withstand the legislation that this government offered.

Hon. gentlemen opposite get up and criticize my leader and accuse him of a policy of laissez-faire. The leader of the government the other day said that my leader did not know which side of the fence he was on. Lord knows I would like to know which side of the fence the Prime Minister is on. Nobody has jumped the fence quicker than he has done. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to read his Christmas address to the people of Canada, and then to read his New Year's speech, and then his radio broadcasts. Just compare them, and then let us see if any hon. gentleman opposite will stand in his place and accuse anyone on this side of inconsistency. I cannot think of words sufficiently strong, Mr. Speaker, to do justice to the occasion.

My hon. friend the Minister of Railways gets up to-night and proceeds in his usual form to lecture the opposition for their tactics. Does he remember when he sat over here, and his good friend the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens)?

Mr. MANION: I have forgotten that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I sat on the government side of the house when my hon. friend the present Minister of Railways sat over here. Does he remember 1930?

Mr. MANION: Sure I do.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, I know he remembers, and then his right-about-face. He was following then the tactics of an opposition that are doing nothing more or less, and no one did that half as strongly as he and his leader did when they were sitting over here. Our business as an opposition is to scrutinize every piece of legislation that is brought down.

We have had broadcast announcements by the Prime Minister, not once but five times, about the legislation that is all ready, that is going to reform the whole country, and God knows it needs it. In 1930 we had 117,000 unemployed, according to the statement issued by hon. gentlemen opposite, who were then in opposition, and to-day we have well over one million.

Mr. MANION: Nothing of the sort.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): To-day we have one million on relief.

Mr. MANION: That is different.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about there being only 400,000 unemployed to-day. I venture to say to hon. gentlemen opposite, and I am sure I am supported by some of their own friends, that there are twice four hundred thousand unemployed.

Mr. MANION: That is exaggerating.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They have just discovered that the young men coming out of the universities have to have a job. These young men have been out of jobs for four years, as hon. gentlemen know.

Then look at the speeches which the Prime Minister himself has made in previous sessions in favour of sound money and in defence of tariffs. We were told in those days to tighten our belts. That is all the satisfaction the people of this country got out of the situation up until a short while ago, and not until my good friend the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce started his crusade was there any change of heart among hon. gentlemen opposite. He was the first one to see the light—and all credit to him for having seen it—and what happened to him? He is no longer in the government giving advice; but suddenly the government discovered that his program was going to be very acceptable to the people of this country and they thought it about time to make a right-about-face.

Now bring on your legislation. Let us have a look at it. You do not need to pass estimates. You do not require money until the thirty-first of March. But no. You have to admit now, after all this ballyhoo about reform measures—I know no better word, Mr. Speaker—that you do not yet know what you are going to do about this reform legislation. That is the plain, honest fact of the case. You do not know what you are going to introduce, except for the one measure that was prepared in March a year ago; and I am not stretching my imagination very much when I say that. We as an opposition are entitled to know what you propose to introduce. We are entitled to know what you are going to do about it.

We realize the serious situation in this country to-day. I suppose I shall be accused of maligning Canada when I say that I for one believe that Canada is on the verge of bankruptcy. And what have hon. gentlemen opposite done? They have added to the public debt in every direction in the last four years. I say that advisedly, and if they do not change their tactics and stop adding to the public debt of this country we will be bankrupt. I am not saying anything more, Mr. Speaker, than was said by hon. gentlemen opposite in 1930 when they were sitting over here. I have taken the trouble to examine the situation, and I am going to say something more when the opportunity offers, with respect to the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite in 1930.

Here they are trembling on the brink of an election, fearful of the electorate.

Mr. MANION: Not trembling.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): And you have a right to be afraid of the people. We were promised an early election but the latest reports are that the water does not look so good since the session started. Let me say to hon. gentlemen opposite: You are the government, and it is your responsibility to bring down the legislation. It is our responsibility to examine it, to criticize it where necessary and to agree to it when we believe it will help out the situation that is so serious in this country at the present time. I support my leader in everything he said to-night and I shall support him later on in connection with this matter.

I say to hon. gentlemen opposite: Bring on your legislation and let us examine it. The only defence we have, the only weapon we can use, is to refuse you supply until we know what your program is, and that we propose to do.

Mr. GEORGE W. McPHEE (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, with the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) I agree. I happen to have sat on the other side of the house for nine years, and I well recall my red-blooded Irish Canadian friend on the other side of the house obstructing, when he was sitting over here, every bit of legislation that was brought down by the government headed by the present right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King).

My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) to-night boasts that the legislation foreshadowed in the Prime Minister's fireside chats will be brought down immediately. He said the same thing in 1930, because I recall that in that year the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) made the statement in Winnipeg that in three days his leader would end unemployment if he were returned to power.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No; you never heard that, and it never was said.

Mr. McPHEE: His right hon. leader was a little more definite than that. He said, speaking at the same place in June, 1930: "I propose, if elected to power, to call a session of parliament"—one of the two promises he kept—"immediately after July 28, and to introduce national undertakings which will give work to our workmen. I propose to have immediately enacted such measures as will do away with the bogy of unemployment." That was in 1930. I was in Sherbrooke a year ago addressing a meeting there, and I was told by the labouring people of that city that the present leader of the government went there in 1930, a few days before the election, and made an address. In that beautiful city of 25,000 people he spoke as dramatically as he did when he delivered his fireside chats a week ago. They described to me the manner in which he walked out to the edge of the platform at three o'clock in the afternoon and said: "I know what is wrong with the good city of Sherbrooke. These factories, fifty of them built by the industry of its people, are not going full time. Men are being laid off. Put me in office and there will be work and work aplenty for every able-bodied man in Sherbrooke." What was the situation there when I addressed that meeting? There were 2,500 men in that city attending the soup kitchen.

The Minister of Railways boasts about the contrast between Liberal and Conservative governments in their attitude toward labour. Let me give him this illustration. In 1928 when the Liberal government reduced the duty on automobiles from 35 to 20 per cent, a reduction which was fought tooth and nail by the Minister of Railways and everyone on that side, 4,000 workmen from Oshawa came to this city. Those hon. members who were here at the time will remember what happened. They filled two blocks in front of these parliament buildings, and they carried banners. These banners indicated that they were returned men: "We fought for Canada and we want to make Canada our home." They thought that after this reduction went into effect they would lose their employment and would have to go elsewhere for work. What did my right hon. leader do? I want this house and the country to contrast the record of these two men, the present leader of the government and the present leader of the opposition. My leader on that occasion, in conjunction with the late Mr. Robb, then Minister of Finance, hired the largest theatre in the city, the Capitol theatre to which they requested that labour group to retire in orderly fashion. The men did so and they were addressed both by Mr. Robb and by the then leader of the government, the present leader of the opposition. I can hear Mr. Robb telling them, "Go back home, men. They will not close your factories. As a result of the reduction the factories will be working overtime and you will have more work." The men went back and the factories went on. That is liberalism.

Mr. MORAND: It was never put into effect.

Mr. McPHEE: Contrast that with what has taken place in the last four years. What happened when farmers from the good old province of Ontario came here and assembled in the exhibition building? Neither the leader of the government nor any member of his government, nor anyone on his behalf, went to address those men. That is the way they treat the labouring people of this country—and after all farmers are labouring people. It reminds me of the late Sir Sam Hughes, a Conservative, and his attitude to a delegation of a thousand farmers from western Canada. He had the effrontery to describe these men as "this gang of leaders"—men whose wives were at home wearing long boots cleaning out stables and doing other laborious work while the men were down here pleading for lower tariffs on their necessities. Take the labour delegation that came to the House of Commons three years ago. The Prime Minister had promised "Come unto me all ye that labour and I will give you work" and they came to this city and assembled on Wellington street, a thousand strong. What happened? They were not even allowed to pass the gates. Far from being invited to go to a theatre where they could be seated comfortably they were not allowed to enter these grounds. Instead they were met by armed men. That is the contrast between liberalism and conservativism so far as their respective relations with labour are concerned.

And now we have this spectacle of the Prime Minister of this country having promised everything under heaven four years ago, having all his life consistently fought for the capitalistic system, having profited as no other professional man in this country has profited as a result of that system—we find him now, not as Saul on the road to Damascus but as Richard Bedford on the road to his defeat, denouncing the very thing from which he has profited the most of any person in the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Eleven o'clock.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the business to-morrow?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I assume that this dilatory motion will proceed until it is disposed of.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I point out that the government can arrange the order itself. If the government cares to introduce its legislation immediately it may have its effect on this motion.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This dilatory motion may have to be disposed of; otherwise we will go on with government orders, taking up the resolution in the name of the Prime Minister in regard to unemployment insurance, and there is another resolution to follow.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, January 29, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

FEDERAL HEALTH POLICY

RESTORATION OF MOTION DROPPED THROUGH NON-ADJOURNMENT OF DEBATE

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River) moved:

That the motion which stood in my name on the order paper on Friday the 24th instant and which was superseded by the adjournment of the house be restored on the order paper for consideration at the next sitting of the house next after orders to which a special precedence has been assigned by the standing orders of the house.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Explain.

Mr. SPENCER: Last Friday night the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Stanley) was speaking to the motion at six o'clock when instead of the debate being adjourned the house was adjourned, and the motion therefore automatically dropped. I understand that there are several hon. members who wish to speak to the motion. I know one member was ready to move the adjournment of the debate but thought the hon. member for East Calgary was going to move it. I therefore ask that it be restored to the order paper.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at its next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act to facilitate and increase the extension of credit to farmers, to authorize the Minister of Finance to purchase additional bonds issued by the board and guaranteed by the government, and to amend the provisions relating to the constitution of the board, the purchase of capital stock, the rate of interest, the amount of outstanding bonds, and supplementary advances.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION LANDS ACT

FORMAL APPROVAL OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL ISSUED IN 1934

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Minister of the Interior) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That the orders in council which have been published in the Canada Gazette between the 1st day of January, 1934, and the 31st day of December, 1934, in accordance with the provisions of section 75 of the Dominion Lands Act, chapter 113, R.S. 1927, and which were laid on the table on the 18th day of January, 1935, be approved.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY COMMISSION

CHAIRMANSHIP OF BOARD—APPLICATIONS FOR ARBITRAL TRIBUNALS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): I should like to address two questions to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion), or possibly to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). In view of the fact that the chairmanship of the board of railway commissioners has been vacant, can the government give any information to the house as to when we may expect the appointment of a chairman to be made? If I may put my second question now, though perhaps the minister is not prepared to give an answer to-day, I should like to ask if any applications have been made by either of the two railways for arbitral boards under the legislation passed two sessions ago and, if so, if consideration is being delayed by reason of the fact that the board has no chairman.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): In regard to the first question I shall take this as a notice and give the answer to-morrow. In regard to the second question, so far as I know no official indication has been given by either railway of a desire for an arbitral tribunal.

POSTAL TERMINAL IN MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) whether it is the intention of the government to go on immediately with the work in connection with the postal terminal in Montreal or whether the government will content itself with the excavation work?

Hon. ARTHUR SAUVE (Postmaster General) (Translation): If my memory serves me right, last year, in a similar case, I had to request the hon. member for St. James to direct his question to the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. RINFRET: Then I will put my question to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart). I did not know there was friction in the cabinet to that extent.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I ask that that observation be withdrawn.

Mr. RINFRET: I will put my question to the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. BENNETT: I ask that that remark be withdrawn.

Mr. RINFRET: Here is the situation. I put a question to the Postmaster General and the hon. gentleman tells me that I can get the information from the Minister of Public Works. Now I put my question to the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. BENNETT: But that is not what was done or what was said, and I suggest that the hon. gentleman withdraw that statement. The statement made by the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) was that the information would be supplied by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart), and the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) then alleged that there was friction between the two departments. Such an allegation is unwarranted.

Mr. RINFRET: I have no objection to withdrawing the statement. I will ask the Minister of Public Works if it is the intention of the government to go on with the work in connection with the postal terminal in Montreal or whether the work has been only halted.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): The question is one which in the first instance I think might have been directed to the department which has control of the work rather than to the Post Office Department, which really has nothing to do with the construction of the building. The work has not been abandoned; it will be proceeded with in due course.

SUPPLY—REFORM MEASURES

AMENDMENT TO MOTION OF THE MINISTER OF JUSTICE FOR COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

The house resumed from Monday, January 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Guthrie that the house resolve itself into committee of supply, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King.

Mr. GEORGE W. McPHEE (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, at eleven o'clock last evening I was discussing the amendment moved by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), but in view of the definite declaration made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), who was leading the house last evening, that the resolution standing in the name of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in regard to unemployment insurance would be proceeded with to-day, and in order to expedite consideration of that resolution. I have no further observations to make at this time.

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker I should like to dictate to the Hansard reporter a short prefatory note to the so-called social legislation of this government. I am in a privileged position, because I did not listen to the recent speeches delivered over the radio by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), nor have I read them. What I should like to say, however, is that the Prime Minister's political adviser now, Mr. Herridge, the Canadian minister in Washington, is the same gentleman who was his political adviser during the 1930 campaign, when all the humbug promises were made to the Canadian people. This is why I am most doubtful as to the success of this legislation.

I will say more, sir; although my speech will be very short, may I recall some facts to hon. members of the house. Before the special session of 1930 was called a board was created by this government to study the causes of unemployment. There were some eminent gentlemen on that board, but they sat for only a short time before presenting their recommendations to the government. I remember that one member was Mr. J. H. Fortier. Later we came here for the special session, when we were told that $20,000,000 would cure unemployment. That amount was voted. Was the amount expended that had been put in the estimates by the previous government? It was not. Even that amount of $20,000,000 was not spent by this government. We were told also that if the tariffs were raised it would solve the unemployment problem. Were there many unemployed at that time? No, there were not; there were only a few poor people. One of my hon. friends from the province of Quebec told me that on the Indian reservation in his constituency there were 4,500 people who were always unemployed; they never did work, therefore they were then counted among the unemployed at that time.

Then what happened? After we were told in 1930 that by increasing the tariff we would reduce unemployment the Prime Minister told us that he had obtained the solemn promise of the manufacturers that if given an increase in the tariff they would employ more men at better wages, but later we saw the downfall of all hopes, both inside and outside of this house. Then the Prime Minister went over to the imperial conference with one or two of his colleagues, and what did he do? He wanted a tariff wall raised by England against her ordinary trade with other nations, but he failed, and it was then that Mr. Thomas used the expression "humbug." Then, after that pilgrimage to London which proved a complete failure, the Prime Minister came back here and found that the N.R.A. was the only remedy that would solve the problems which he had created in Canada through his tariffs, in order to please those vultures whom we saw in such large numbers in the corridors of this parliament during the special session of 1930, those profiteers who made so much money at the expense of the Canadian people during the war.

The tariff was raised again and again. I remember that my right hon. leader asked the Prime Minister on how many items the tariff had been raised during the session of 1931, and if my memory serves me aright the right hon. leader of the opposition suggested that it had been raised on two-thirds of the items. If I remember correctly the Prime Minister said it had been raised on one-half the items, or a little more than one-half. What was the result? Each month our trade has decreased so much that now the government is afraid to make a comparison with the figures of the last year the Mackenzie King government was in power. Their point of comparison is the year 1932, not because there was an imperial conference in that year but because at that time our trade had reached rock bottom. Why? On account of that silly increase in tariff. That is what happened in 1932, after the increase of tariffs in the special session of 1930 and the regular session of 1931.

Sir, I can speak about it, because when your predecessor was in the chair I was sitting at the other end of this chamber, and when he asked if the tariff increases were approved I said "On division." That fact was noted by the correspondent for Le Devoir and the correspondents for other papers. Therefore as I objected to it at the time I now have the right to censure the increases in tariff made since this government has been in power. Not only that: What did this government do? They passed legislation so that tariffs could be increased by order in council, a most absurd procedure, because when a man buys goods from another country he is not sure he will pay the same price when the goods reach Canada. It proved that the N.R.A. suggested and established by this government, which created walls around the country, was a complete failure. It was just as much a failure, so far as Canada is concerned, as the London conference of 1930.

It was a complete and utter failure, but this government looked ahead to the imperial conference of 1932 when the representatives were gathered in Canada in order to discuss an economic policy. It is all right for the dominions to meet in London so as to have the same constitutional rights, but when it comes to a business proposition it is most absurd for five or ten parties to meet together in order to have a better chance at business. We know, sir, that a man can make a good business deal only by discussing with the other party. The purchaser and the seller must get together, and this is how agreements have been made in the past. The government renounced the Dunning agreements, abolished them and changed them so as to give place for a silly tariff policy. Then they brought Mr. Baldwin and other gentlemen from other parts of the empire to this very room, thinking that by that procedure the future of Canada would be saved.

Sir, 1932 proved the same as 1931 and 1930. Why? Because there was no preparation of the government's policy. It is a well known fact that Mr. Baldwin was ready to go without signing a piece of paper, without agreeing to any agreements or treaties. However his departure was delayed for one day. When the tables at the Chateau Laurier were groaning with food there were upstairs some English experts who knew their business. They were very intelligent, very clever and well trained and experienced British officials who had their proposals ready. They wanted this government to subscribe to those documents. Finally because this government wanted the scrap of paper with the signatures of English and other British representatives upon it they accepted everything submitted to them. It is especially to be noted that they accepted the creation of a tariff board before which England could lodge its complaints, but we had not the same privilege in England. Those agreements bound Canada hand and foot, but England was free to trade with any other country.

After the agreements of 1932 were signed we heard this government saying throughout the country that the future of Canada would be brilliant, and that Canada had nothing to fear. They said that the agreements had saved the life of our country and that this government was doing so well. That, again, was a failure. So much is that the fact that I remember the Minister of Railways, who knew that, saying in the following session, "Let us wait until the world conference next year. Everything will be settled there, and we will have our trade with all the nations of the world." When on October 12, 1932, the Prime Minister explained the agreement which had been signed by this government he mentioned production, and only production. He referred to the production of eggs, the production of potatoes, the production of bacon, the production of hogs, the production of ham, the products of the mines, the production of everything—but he did not say a word about distribution. Why? Probably he did not because Mr. Ferguson was here at the time, and Mr. Ferguson spoke to him about honey.

Sir, let us look forward to 1933 when the world conference was held. We know that the conference in 1930 had been a failure, the high tariffs of 1930 and 1931 had proved failures, the conference of 1932 was an utter failure, and then we saw the members of the government going to the world conference. In the midst of the proceedings of that conference we heard that the Prime Minister of Canada had saved it. But he was such a good doctor that only a few days later the conference died of its own weakness. What did my good friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) say when he came back? He said it had been a delightful conference, and that he had made many acquaintances among the representatives of the sixty-three nations who met on that momentous occasion. The world conference meant more. It meant trade with other nations. Canada could not enter into trade with those nations because she was bound by the agreements of 1932. She was gagged and could do nothing because of the Ottawa agreements.

Let us now come to last year. No one need say a word about the world conference, because so far as Canada was concerned nothing was done there. It was another failure. We hear this government boasting about the great benefits derived from the conference of 1932, the Ottawa agreements. Apparently the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Loucks) is satisfied with them. Does he know that in the years following that conference our trade with Great Britain and with other British countries was much less than in the last year the Mackenzie King government held office. Does he know that? I am sure when he entered this house in 1930 he wanted an improvement in trade. I give him the benefit of the doubt and will say that I am sure he was sincere at that time. He repeated, after his leader, that conditions were bad in Canada at that time.

Mr. LOUCKS: We lost our wheat market in 1929, don't forget that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: Let me continue. In 1930 did the hon. member not say to the people that conditions were bad in this country? If he did not he was not a faithful follower of his leader who made that statement in every parish, every town and every city of Canada. If they thought conditions were bad in 1930 how is it they think they are so good now when, in fact, they are much worse. Not only that but I would remind the hon. member for Rosetown that statements were made by Tory and U.F.A. speakers advising the wheat growers not to sell their wheat because they would receive much more if they waited and left it in the pool. He knows it, and he will not deny it. Let me say to my hon. friend from South Essex (Mr. Gott) that I am not talking about onions; I am talking about wheat. I say that the state of the wheat market in 1929 was due to the pool of which my hon. friend from Rosetown was a member.

Mr. GOTT: Where did you get the information?

Mr. POULIOT: I got it firsthand, but, Mr. Speaker, I carry on a discussion only with people who have manners, and that includes the hon. member for Rosetown.

Last year we heard again about the benefits coming from the Ottawa agreements of 1932, and I asked a question of every member of the government. I asked: If things were so bad in 1930 as the Prime Minister himself said at the time, how is it that things are so good now? They say that things are better. They are not better. They are simply less worse than last year, but conditions are not better than they were in 1930. There is an organized propaganda on the part of this government to deceive people by making the point of comparison the year 1932 instead of the year 1930. President Franklin D. Roosevelt is much fairer than that because he makes his point of comparison the last year of the Hoover administration while this government takes as a point of comparison the year in which our trade reached its rock bottom on account of this government's own policies. That is what is being done by this government at the present time. I have spoken about external trade, and I come now to internal trade.

I see my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), in his seat. He is just as silent now as he was last year when I asked him several times: How is it that the decrease in the consumption of farm products is much greater than it was in previous years? I asked him to explain that; I asked him several times, and finally he told me that the Prime Minister was too busy to look into matters like that. In this good old province of Ontario, in a neighbouring constituency I told him finally: If you tell the truth, you should force the Prime Minister to resign, and, on the other hand, if you do not tell the truth he should force you to resign at once. But there they are still together.

And here we have on the order paper this piece of legislation which is supposed to save this country. What is it? It is only a lifebelt to save the right hon. the Prime Minister. That is all. How can he come and submit to us social legislation when he has not the basic facts upon which to found it? This house is quite full at the moment, and I am sure that all members have heard me ask this question from the government: What is the number of unemployed, according to their trades and professions? How many white-collared unemployed are there in this country? But there was no answer. I asked that question of the Minister of Labour. I asked it from the Prime Minister, and finally the Prime Minister last year after being questioned about it rose in his place and told me that his government was doing its best to secure that information.

My contention is, sir, with regard to social insurance, with regard to unemployment, with regard to any relief for unemployment, that it is most essential that every member should have full and complete information about the number of the unemployed and their previous occupations. During the war men were not all wounded in the same manner. One man would be wounded in the eye, another man would be suffering from gas, and each case called for different treatment and to be considered separately. It was impossible to apply the same remedy to all, and just in the same way it is impossible to offer the same remedy and the same cure for all the unemployed, and just because this government has no information, no precise data, it is impossible for the government to submit any legislation in that regard which will bring any benefits to this country.

I am surprised to hear about a brain trust in this country. What is this brain trust? Is it a brain outside the head of the gentleman whose brain child is the trust? I cannot conceive it. Here, Mr. Speaker, we have legislation which is drafted by third-rate clerks, legislation which is just as bad as some of the legislation that I scrutinized with you, sir, last year in a committee of this house. It is brought to us red hot, but it is very indigestible. It is not made by people like my leader who, if he wrote about economics, did so out of his own experience as a public servant and as a member of the government, and as one who put his theories into application. But hon. gentlemen opposite simply have dreams, and the right hon. the Prime Minister has not the knowledge of the sufferings of his fellow-citizens in this country that he should have. What can the government do? Will this legislation work well? No one knows yet, but everybody knows that hon. gentlemen opposite have no experience in practical legislation of the kind and that what will be submitted to the house has ninety-nine chances out of a hundred of being a complete failure like the London conference of 1930, like the increase in tariffs of 1930 and 1931, like the dumping legislation, like the legislation by order in council, like the Ottawa agreements of 1932, like the world conference of 1933, like every policy which has been submitted to us by this government. That is why, sir, I am most fearful about it, not from a party standpoint, but as a Canadian citizen who has the right to express the views of his electors in this house. I do not wish any harm to any member of the government. Hon. gentlemen opposite know very well that I have many friends amongst them, but what I am sorry for is that they never ask for the basic information on which this social legislation should be drafted. If I ask the right hon. the Prime Minister or any member of his cabinet, "What is the number of white-collared unemployed in each province, in each city, in each township?" what will be the answer? The answer will be: We do not know. Or utter silence will be the answer in this mortuary chamber.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman is out of order in using that word.

Mr. POULIOT: Then I say, in this chamber which is very much alive. What information has the government about farm loans, for instance? The information on that subject is incomplete. I got a little bit of information myself from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics last year about it. I was most interested in the matter, but in a letter signed by the director of that bureau he said: "We cannot certify these figures." And how did they get these figures?? At the time of the census they were asking the farmers what the amount of their debt was. Do you think for a moment that the farmer is going to tell his neighbours or someone in the community the exact amount of his debt? It is absurd. The only way to get at the exact amount of farm mortgages would be to have a careful inspection made in every registry office, with a report based upon that inspection, forwarded to this government through the provincial government. I have frequently asked this government to discuss that matter in the provincial conferences, but I am sure that nothing has ever been done because that information is yet to come. Well, sir, it is all right to be in the clouds, and the Prime Minister is in the clouds. In Halifax, when addressing a gathering of ladies there he said, "My only wish is for eternal salvation." He is in the clouds; he is nearer heaven; but those clouds prevent him from seeing what is going on on earth. He should come to practical facts. Very often, sir, I have asked the hon. gentlemen who surround the Prime Minister to guard against intruders, to prevent all those who are seeking favours from coming into contact with the Prime Minister, all those fellows who are undesirable, so as to give the Prime Minister time to think. Was it done? I am sorry for the Prime Minister and for this country, because his time has been wasted in answering callers who were more importunate than useful from the standpoint of the public good.

And now I have something else to say. One reason why I am most fearful about this legislation is on account of a report which has been made of the speech which was delivered by the right hon. gentleman on Saturday of last week in Montreal. I have here the Montreal Gazette in which it is stated:

> The Prime Minister suggested that his talks with Soviet foreign minister Litvinoff at Geneva, and his study of the views of Sir Stafford Cripps and John Strachey, British radicals, had influenced him to a great extent, while he also pointed out the lessons that could be learned from the French and Russian revolutions.

He is sovietizing Canada now, after the failure of the London conference of 1930, the failure of the increase of tariff idea.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: There are some Cossacks there. After the utter failure of the London conference of 1930, the utter failure of the increase in tariffs in 1931, the utter failure of the Ottawa agreements, the utter failure of the world conference and of every policy which has been submitted to us by the government, this is what we find, as reported in that paper.

Well, sir, I am sorry for this government. They have been talking so much about the alliance that exists between Liberals and the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. Do they not now feel ashamed of themselves? Take the speeches which have been delivered in the province of Quebec by the Quebec ministers; are they not ashamed of themselves for being so much congratulated upon their policies by the leaders of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation? It is the vengeance of the Liberal party. We heard our friend the Solicitor General, we heard the Postmaster General, and we heard the Minister of Marine, in the province of Quebec, saying, "Look at the Liberals. The Liberal party does not exist any longer. We have the C.C.F. and the Tory party, those two great parties which enjoy the confidence of the people of Canada." Well, sir, who won the last by-elections throughout Canada, in each province of the dominion? Who won the provincial elections in Ontario, in Nova Scotia and in the west, in Saskatchewan and British Columbia? Who will win every election? Those who will say, "We are strongly opposed to the federal government which is now in power. We must defeat them." This was said by my noble, generous and capable friend, Mr. Hepburn, in the last provincial election.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: I hear hon. gentlemen laughing, but Mr. Hepburn has been pronounced a great son of the province of Ontario, one whom every father and mother would like to have as a son. I see the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott). Does he not know that the four Hepburn candidates in Essex county, with whom I was standing on the platform in Windsor last year, and the other Hepburn candidates as well were elected? The people of Ontario have seen the light. They knew that this man was true to his principles, that he was a true disciple of Mackenzie King; and when he was in this house he was not afraid, any more than I am myself, to speak the language of truth, which is really the language of friendship, to the Prime Minister and his colleagues. That man was earnest; he was sincere; he was true to his convictions and fulfilled his promises—a thing this government has never done. It was because of his sincerity that he had such a wonderful victory in Ontario, and I say to hon. gentlemen to your right, Mr. Speaker, that they should be proud to see a young man of thirty-eight, if not enjoying their own confidence, at any rate enjoying the confidence of the great majority of the people of his native province, so much so that even in the province of Quebec he is just as popular as he is in any other province of confederation.

I have something very nice to read to this house. It is an excerpt from a speech which was delivered by the then leader of the opposition on June 25, 1930, at Cobourg, Ontario:

> "Anybody could devise a policy for to-day," the opposition leader declared, "to catch votes, but it is our duty, the duty of statesmen—

This is most humble, most modest.

> —to see beyond the horizon."

Is it not delightful, Mr. Speaker? Now, coming to social insurance, it will have to be paid for, and though I cannot quote the exact page of Hansard, I remember distinctly hearing the Prime Minister state in this house that he would accept nothing but a contributory system. Well, how many people do we meet in Ottawa who have not 10 cents with which to buy a sandwich, and how can they pay towards a contributory system of insurance? If this insurance is to solve unemployment, where will the funds come from? Is it true that incomes will be severely taxed above $5,000, to the exent of one-third? People have not the money with which to pay—much less than in 1930. Last year in the Gazette of February 9, 1934, I read a report of a speech delivered by the Prime Minister in the Mount Royal hotel, in Montreal, on Realties—not realty. What did he say? The heading is:

Credit of Canada has reached limit premier declares.

People must face fact, Bennett says, and work for future.

Always for the future. He is ashamed of his past; I mean as Prime Minister, otherwise he is a very nice gentleman.

Default impossible.

Dominion must retain place among nations, Canadian club is told—railway problem discussed.

Here I have something delightful. He spoke about the debt of Canada approximating $3,000,000,000. He said:

This was the sum on which Canada had directly to pay interest. Then there were the sums of money which the dominion had guaranteed.

This is in a Tory paper which had found the policy of the government so bad that it had to repudiate it this year.

"That mere statement," the Premier continued, "is enough to make men thoughtful. Put yourself in my place and wonder where the money is coming from to pay the interest. That is the problem we have to think of. And all the theories in the world, my friends—

He did not then say "men and women."

—will not solve the problem. It is an actuality, a reality."

All the theories about that so-called reform legislation which is not ready and which, when ready, it is impossible to digest, are not a reality. We have to face a reality. A tremendous debt is bearing down upon the Canadian people and it has to be met. It is hard to meet it because the government has closed this country to the markets of the world. Now it comes with views as to the future just the same as we have already had in the past. Do hon. members remember that when Our Lord had fasted for forty days He was brought to a high mountain and the devil said to him; Kneel before me and all these prosperous cities, all these fertile plains that you see will be yours. The answer of Our Lord to Satan was: "Vade Retro Satanas." "Get thee behind me, Satan." This is the answer that this government will get from the Canadian people at the next election.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Salaries, $198,798; contingencies, including the solicitor general's office, $45,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Explain.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): The committee will note that although there is a reduction of some $12,000 in this vote, the reduction is more apparent than real. The reason for the change is that salaries of the penitentiaries staff, including the superintendent and three inspectors, are now removed from the civil government vote and put in the penitentiaries vote. The reason for that is that they are no longer under the Civil Service Act. There is this reduction of $12,000 shown in the vote, but there is really an increase of $1,900 in the whole staff.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What does the increase of $5,000 in contingencies, including the Solicitor General's office, represent?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The contingencies are in regard to increased legal expenses.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In connection with what, particularly?

Mr. GUTHRIE: In connection with litigated matters in the department.

Mr. DUFF: Is this amount made up with the ten per cent reduction or is it the full amount?

Mr. GUTHRIE: With the reduction.

Mr. DUFF: Will the minister be good enough to explain why, in view of the statement made by the Minister of Finance, the estimates are made up with the reduction of ten per cent?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is a bill to be introduced to restore five per cent of the reduction, as announced by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. DUFF: Why were not the estimates made up on that basis?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Because the bill has not been passed yet.

Mr. DUFF: Surely when the estimates were made up the government must have known their intention with regard to the reduction, and the estimates should be made up on the basis of what the government is going to do in regard to salaries.

Mr. RHODES: If I may say a word, Mr. Chairman, in the statement I made on the introduction of the estimates I endeavoured to make it clear that the estimates were set up on this basis in order that they might be brought down in the house at an early date. Their preparation did not involve an immediate decision, which had to be made in the light of the revenue, as to how much if any of the salary deduction could be restored. That is why the announcement was made in the form in which it was, and that is why the estimates were set up on this basis. Otherwise there would have been a delay in bringing them down.

Mr. DUFF: I understand that, but it seems to me that the government should have been in a position, when these estimates were being made up, to decide as to what was to be their policy in regard to the salaries of the civil servants. It seems to me they should have known what their policy was to be. I understand that it will be necessary to introduce a bill, in view of the bill passed last year, but with regard to these estimates it seems to me that the amount should be in accordance with the terms of the bill which the Minister of Finance says will be introduced.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I see there is one senior advisory counsel with a salary of $6,300, and three at $5,940. Would the minister say who they are?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I cannot place them according to seniority. Mr. Bill is the senior.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is he the one receiving $6,300?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, and I am sorry to say that his health has been very indifferent for some time, and for that reason I have been deprived of his services for a great part of the past year. Next in seniority would be Mr. Plaxton, then Mr. Gallagher, then Mr. Fontaine and then Mr. Gibault.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think so

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Miall comes in ahead of the last two named.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I see there is one more than last year.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That one has been taken over from the railway department We found that we were very short handed due to sickness; not only Mr. Bill but Mr. MacNeill has been on leave of absence for a considerable time through ill health, so we transferred Mr. Anderson, who was the legal counsel in the Department of Railways and Canals, to the Department of Justice.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Would the Solicitor General tell me who is his private secretary?

Mr. DUPRE: I have had no private secretary since the first of September last.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is it intended to appoint one? I see there is an appropriation here.

Mr. DUPRE: I have several applications before me but no decision has been arrived at as yet.

Mr. POULIOT: I have an English copy of the estimates, but apparently there is no French copy. Last year when we were discussing the railway bill I remember that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals agreed to postpone the debate due to the fact that there were no French copies of the bill. I submit that we should wait and not continue the discussion of the estimates until we have a French copy.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Shall the item carry ?

Mr. POULIOT: I should like an answer from the government.

Mr. RHODES: I will have an immediate inquiry made. If there are no French copies available it is a matter of accident, certainly not of design. I am rather surprised that they are not available in French at the moment.

Mr. POULIOT: I very distinctly remember that last year the Minister of Railways agreed to postpone the discussion on the railway bill, at the request of my hon. friend from Lotbiniere (Mr. Verville), because the bill was not printed in French. I do not see why the Minister of Finance should not be just as fair towards the French speaking members of this house as his colleague was last year. We were told over the radio by the Solicitor General that every publication, including Hansard and all others, would appear at the same time in French and English. Here is a most important matter, supply, and we have no French translation, so I do not see why the Minister of Finance should insist on going on. We were told that with the organization of the bureau for translations everything would be fine and all publications would come out simultaneously in both French and English, as from a slot machine. Now we have to wait for the translation of the estimates.

As a French speaking member I insist that we follow the precedent established last year by my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals. What he did was well done, and I hope the Minister of Finance will follow the same line. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) is here; the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré), the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé), the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau), the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) and the right hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley), all ministers from the province of Quebec, are here also, and I appeal to them, as representing French speaking people, to tell the Minister of Finance that this discussion should be postponed until the French version of the estimates is tabled. I ask you, sir, to give a ruling on the matter and to decide whether or not we should continue the discussion of supply when we have not the French translation of the estimates.

Mr. CHEVRIER: As one who took a very active part in connection with the translation bill last year I think it only fair that I should say a word about the lack of the French translation. Repeatedly the Secretary of State and the French ministers made the boast that the amalgamation of the translation bureaux was a step in the right direction and that all documents and reports would be published concurrently in the French and English languages. One of the most vital duties we are called upon to perform in this house is the voting of supply; one of the most important documents to be submitted is the estimates, yet at the very first opportunity we find that the estimates are not available in both languages.

This is a most serious and anomalous situation. We have the remarkable situation that after the promises of the Secretary of State and of the other ministers from Quebec, supported by the French speaking members from that province who sit on the government benches, that this step would put the French language on a par with the English language.

yet at the very first opportunity, and in connection with the most important document to be presented to the house, we are furnished with the English version only. What I stated at the time the bill was under discussion has come true. This bill was a farce. It has achieved only one thing, namely, it has necessitated the translators working unearthly and unholy hours under conditions absolutely foreign heretofore. The results are just what we predicted, namely that the change would lead to confusion. I am not prepared to take my seat without expressing the strongest possible protest. I do not speak with hostility. But I have said what I had to say more particularly in view of the promises made last year by the Secretary of State and lately of the declarations made by the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) in Montreal that concurrently all documents would be published, translated and deposited on the table of the house.

I believe we should be told why we have not received the estimates printed in French. I have had my English copy of the estimates for five or six days, and I have awaited this opportunity to make these observations. We now have tangible proof of the accuracy of our statement of last year to the effect that the change in translating services would amount to a huge farce. I am protesting as strongly as is within my power against the lack of expedition in publishing the French version.

Mr. CAHAN: The criticisms levelled at the bureau for translations are not well taken. For the first time I think in the history of this parliament, at least for many years, the departmental reports for the past year were laid upon the table of the house printed in the French language in the first days of the session. Provision is being made for the very early translation of Hansard reports from English into French. Of course, the official report of Hansard is reported in English and French, but we have made special efforts towards publishing the French translation of the official report on the same day as the official report appears, only a few hours later.

Concerning the translation of the estimates may I say that the bureau proceeded with the translation as soon as the copy was received by the department. I do not know why there was a delay, or even if there was a delay in sending the estimates from the Department of Finance to the translations bureau. However the document has been translated and is now in print. The official proofs of the print were sent to-day from the translations bureau to the Department of Public Printing and Stationery. The printing has not yet been completed although the composition is complete. The French translation will certainly be ready to-morrow.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am prepared to accept the minister's explanation, but it just goes to show that I was right. I did not level my criticism against the staff of translators, as the minister must know. I must say however that the minister is and has in the past been ever prone to accept responsibility for anything done in his department. He has shouldered the responsibility. I am not levelling these criticisms at the translators, but I have levelled them at the administration and particularly at those members who are responsible for the administration of the law in question. Last year Hansard was published just as it is published to-day. We had Hansard early in the morning, and we still have Hansard early in the morning. Previously however the translators did not have to work the unholy hours they now must work. They did not have to begin work at eleven o'clock at night and wait until one o'clock in the morning before they could get copy. At that time they did not have to wait until daylight before they could go home, as they do now. These people are working under conditions which may require the application of legislation concerning working hours. Probably we will have to ask that such legislation may be adapted to translators and other civil servants, if the administration is going to continue to administer affairs as it is now doing.

That is the reason I direct my criticism against the administration. Last year we had no trouble, and in the years past we had no trouble. There was no difficulty until the Secretary of State, moved by some motive, turned the whole department into chaos, and turned the whole thing into turmoil by trying to put in a new system, a sort of reform and something new. Now we find that after all these changes conditions are much worse than they were before.

Mr. CAHAN: As Secretary of State I take full responsibility for the administration of my department. So far as the Department of Public Printing and Stationery is concerned may I say that I do not think it has been more efficiently or more economically administered in recent years. The hon. member has said that the French translation of English Hansard was satisfactory to every one last year. I say it satisfied a few people who were willing to receive and accept the French translation four or five days after the official record in English and French was published. Now an effort is being made to bring out the French copy on the same day. If hon. gentlemen persist in staying up a large part of the night reviewing their proofs of English copy it is true that I shall have to keep the translators later to perform their work of translating, in order that the translation in French may be printed, completed and distributed at an early hour next day.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Without any extra pay.

Mr. CAHAN: What extra pay?

Mr. BOUCHARD: For the translators working every night.

Mr. DUPUIS: Yes, for the translators working at night.

Mr. CAHAN: So long as this parliament sits until eleven o'clock at night it will be necessary for those people to work at night who prepare Hansard for the next day.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Then the minister admits there is no improvement?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, there is this improvement, that every public document, which has been delivered to the bureau for translations, has been translated more rapidly and with an efficiency equal to that which prevailed in any year of the past four years.

Mr. ST-PERE: What about the price spreads report?

Mr. CAHAN: I have nothing to do with the French translation of the price spreads commission evidence.

Mr. ST-PERE: Who has anything to do with it?

Mr. CAHAN: The commission itself. The commission must decide as to how rapidly that is to be done. It was more important that I should attend to the expeditious translation of those matters committed to the charge of my department, namely that the translation and printing of the reports for each and every department should be ready at the beginning of the session. That has been accomplished.

I notice that the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), speaking with regard to some others matters, made a statement in his place yesterday about the French translation. I wish to say that the matters of which he complained were never translated by the bureau for translations, were never sent to the bureau for translations to be translated, and further that no translator of the bureau for translations has been dismissed because of inefficiency since the bureau was created.

Mr. POULIOT: But the hon. gentleman will surely not say that the remarks I made yesterday were unfounded, that they had no basis?

Mr. CAHAN: No. I said they had no basis so far as the bureau for translations was concerned.

Mr. POULIOT: I cannot leave it at that, Mr. Chairman. When I gave a question to the assistant clerk of the house as I had done for years past, and the translation, and not only the translation but the question itself as transcribed, and published in the order paper, were wrong, naturally I complained about it. I did not complain about the bureau for translations; I mentioned only one translator. So my hon. friend the Secretary of State is wrong in both instances. He has only to look at the first page of yesterday's Hansard to see what I said. I did not mention the bureau, but one translator. So why should we discuss it further?

What we are discussing is the fact that the estimates are not tabled in French. Whether the French translation is at the bureau or in the Belgian Congo I do not care. The fact is we have not got it in this House of Commons, and as we have not got it here at this very moment, I do not see how the Prime Minister and his colleagues can ask us to consider these estimates. The Prime Minister's colleague who sits to his left, the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) is no longer in the chamber. He should be here when we are discussing this important matter. Nor do I see the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau). He was here at the beginning but he is not here now. He takes no interest in his French-speaking electors, just like the hon. member for Argenteuil who is the Acting Prime Minister in the absence of the Prime Minister. The hon. Minister of Marine is a very important gentleman in Montreal. He is the leader of the bar in his province, a former Bâtonnier général du Barreau. He knows the importance of these matters not only to the French-speaking citizens but to all those who want fair play in this community of ours stretching from ocean to ocean which is called Canada. I am not speaking on behalf only of the French-speaking people of this country but on behalf of all those who want the traditions of this country to be respected. I know very well that the government cannot say anything in reply. The Secretary of State says: Well, the translation is there. But how do we know it is there? It may have been told to him, but he did not verify it himself. He takes the word of those who told him. I have no doubt that he is speaking in perfect good faith when he says that, but who can tell us that he has been rightly informed? That is the point. But there is more than that, Mr. Chairman. By the British North America Act all the official papers of this house shall be in both languages. One of them is missing, the French version of the estimates. There is talk about amending the British North America Act. Is it for the purpose of striking out that provision in the British North America Act which makes both languages official? Is that the purpose of the government? Is that the start in this matter? I ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) who has French-speaking people in his constituency, I ask the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré), I ask the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé)—I ask all of them is the fact that the French version of the estimates is missing a prognostication of what is coming, namely, to strike out that provision in the British North America Act that both languages shall remain official in this country? I speak on behalf not only of the French-speaking people in this country but of all those who want the traditions of this country to be respected, all those who sincerely desire that we abide by the constitution of this country. I say, Mr. Chairman, that we cannot proceed until we have the French version of the estimates.

May I tell you, Mr. Chairman, that I regret very much that the right hon. leader of the government in the Senate, the Right Hon. Senator Meighen, does not sit in this house, because I would look at him with pleasure. Shall I tell you why, Mr. Chairman? It is because he is the only member of this government—mark you, the only member of this government—who ever said "Ready, aye ready."

Mr. DUPRE: Mr. Chairman, I would like to answer immediately in a few remarks, and I will ask the house to consider the actual situation. This is the first session since confederation, since 1867, that we have had so many departmental reports tabled in the house in both languages on the same day. It is the first time also that we have had Hansard in both languages ready and delivered on the same day.

Mr. BOUCHARD: They are not ready.

Sir EUGENE FISET: No.

Mr. DUPRE: They are.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Sir EUGENE FISET: No, we have not got them yet.

Mr. DUPRE: I do not know what has happened to my hon. friend's, but I have received both copies on the same day.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Then you are privileged.

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): Translators are obliged to work all night.

Mr. DUPRE: I will admit that sometimes instead of receiving the English and French versions at the same hour, the French copy has been delivered two or three or four hours after the English copy, but that was due to the fact that, in some instances, corrections had to be made in the original text by the speakers; and I know as a fact that one morning we could not get those corrections before six o'clock. The translators had to wait until six o'clock the following morning before they could commence the translation of the English into the French text. But barring those circumstances we may say that the two texts of Hansards, the English text and the French text, can be delivered on the same day and practically at the same time, and I repeat this is the first time that it has been done since confederation.

Mr. BOUCHARD: It is not done.

Mr. DUPRE: And we do not receive from our friends opposite a word of praise, or appreciation. We are very far from the days of last year when, on the translation bill that was so ably presented by the hon. Secretary of State, we were accused of being traitors to our race and doing things that were injuring the rights of the French language. But this is our vindication. We do not want congratulations; we are not looking for them, but we are doing this year what our friends opposite never did during the nine years that they were in power. When they are in power they are very silent on the rights of the French language in Canada; but that subject is a specialty with them when they are sitting on the opposition benches.

This is only an experiment, Mr. Chairman. We are trying to do what we think is the right thing. Up to now, we have met with some difficulties, but we hope to improve on the work we have already done. Not only is the government full of good will but the translators are also, and in passing I think I should pay a tribute to the translators who for the last eight or ten days have been working all night, some of them going to bed only at eight and even ten o'clock in the morning. We appreciate what they have done, and I want to say so publicly. At all events, as far as the estimates are concerned, as the Secretary of State has said the French part will be tabled very soon, maybe to-morrow, and we are doing everything we can to meet all difficulties and to see that the departmental reports and Hansard are produced on the same day in both the French and English texts.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We have evidently entered upon a very contentious subject, and a debate of this kind may be carried on indefinitely. Those of us in this corner a short time ago voted against the amendment, which professed to be in favour of getting down to the social legislation at the earliest possible moment. The only reason that we voted against that amendment was that it seemed to be part of certain blocking tactics with which we do not agree and against which we want to protest. Now it appears that the same blocking tactics will be used in connection with the estimates. I would say to the government however that the avowed purpose of their bringing down the supply bill has been accomplished. The estimate before us can be discussed on another occasion. The government definitely promised yesterday that the important social legislation relating to unemployment would be brought down to-day, and I would respectfully suggest to hon. gentlemen opposite, who have control of the business of the house, that they ask that this committee rise and report progress and thus enable us to get down to the regular schedule of business for to-day.

Mr. RHODES: There is no disposition on the part of the government to force the matter through committee of the whole house in view of the objection taken. The circumstance that the estimates had not been translated and printed in French was entirely unknown to myself until inquiry was made. But inasmuch as objection has been taken, notwithstanding the fact that the estimates are being printed, are in type and will be available for distribution to-morrow, and that every hon. gentleman opposite, irrespective of what his mother tongue may be, is quite familiar with the subject matter of the resolution before the house at the moment and with the estimates themselves, I accede with pleasure to the suggestion and therefore move that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

PRIVILEGE—MR. POULIOT

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I rise to a question of privilege. In the Ottawa Journal of to-day, the five o'clock edition, there appears this heading:

Pouliot delays division in House of Commons.

If the division was delayed, may I point out that I did not delay the so-called social legislation, because we have none before us, and moreover supply was not ready then.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH AN EMPLOYMENT AND SOCIAL INSURANCE COMMISSION

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a bill to establish an employment and social insurance commission; to provide for a national employment service; for insurance against unemployment; for aid to unemployed persons, and for other forms of social insurance and security, and for purposes related thereto; and to provide for such contributions as may be necessary to carry into effect the proposed legislation.

He said: I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether it would best suit the convenience of hon. gentlemen to consider at the moment the matters that are referred to in the resolution while you are still in the chair, and when questions cannot be asked and answered, or whether it is advisable that you should now leave the chair and the committee be formed at once, so that discussion upon the resolution can take place and I can make a statement and answer questions put to me. I am entirely in the hands of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it would expedite matters if Your Honour were to leave the chair and we got into committee immediately.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not intend to enter into a discussion at any length with respect to the general subject of unemployment insurance; I will do that when the opportunity is afforded under the rules for the introduction of a bill founded on the resolution. The resolution contemplates a bill being submitted to the chamber dealing with the matters that are mentioned in the resolution itself. Sometimes the custom has been followed of discussing upon the resolution the details of a measure founded thereupon. Such I believe is unsound practice.

First of all, the resolution seeks the introduction of a bill to establish an employment and social insurance commission. It is proposed that an unemployment insurance measure shall be introduced, founded upon this resolution, and before I go further I should like to point out that on April 29, 1931, in this chamber, I made this statement:

> I propose, if we are spared as a government and as individuals, that the information we will have before our term of office is ended shall be crystallized into the form of legislative proposals to be submitted to this house. I have never had any illusions as to what is involved; I have none now. I have never had any desire other than that the legislation placed upon the statute book, whether by this government or by some other, shall be legislation based upon knowledge, and not upon mere guesswork.

The next year I made the same observation. I endeavoured to explain on that occasion that any unemployment measure, called an insurance measure, must necessarily imply some understanding of the risk that is incurred by the insurers. That seemed to me to be elementary. The difficulty had been that the census returns, although the report had been made, had not been analyzed for the purpose of ascertaining just what they disclosed with respect to unemployment. I mentioned the other day just what the returns did show as to the numbers of unemployed on the first of June. Now I will not do more than recall what I said in 1931 as to the factors that must be considered and the elements that enter into the preparation of an unemployment insurance measure.

This bill contemplates administration by a commission and an effort will be made by the measure to see that it is freed as far as may be from political control. One of the difficulties in all countries where legislation dealing with unemployment insurance has been introduced has been that the political element has entered into discussions and in a large sense, in more than one country, has frustrated the values attaching to such legislation. It will be observed further that the legislation which will be introduced on this bill, which introduction I shall move when this resolution has been adopted, contemplates the creation of a commission for the purpose of dealing with this matter.

Then the resolution says:

> To provide for a national employment service.

I shall not now follow in detail the various laws that were passed in Great Britain to deal with unemployment insurance beginning in 1911; nor shall I deal with the reports made by commissions that from time to time have considered the matter and determined whether there should be an extension of benefits, an increase in premiums; nor shall I at the moment consider those who are eligible because a resolution does not contemplate that discussion being had before the measure itself is introduced. But I shall say this, that in Great Britain the very foundation of the effort was found in the national employment service. That is, the labour offices, or as we call them in Canada, the employment offices, may transfer labour from one point to another, and provided there is unemployment at one point and requirements at another the labour may be transferred from the point where there is a surplus to the point where it may be utilized. In this country as is known, consequent upon the treaty of peace and the conferences that were held, the setting up of the international labour office, we did provide for the institution in Canada of employment offices. The dominion became a party to those offices being established and in a large sense provides for their maintenance. Those offices have an important part to play in the legislation which will be submitted to the house, an important part to play for the purpose of providing information to the commission constantly as to where there is a surplus of labour, for instance, in a single province where there is a surplus at one point and requirements at another, and the principles that were adopted in Great Britain have been the principles largely followed so far as possible having regard to our area in this country.

Then it will be observed that we are providing for insurance against unemployment. Insurance in essence is an indemnity. Obviously it will be impossible to provide for insurance that will be a complete indemnity with respect to unemployment. There must be first of all the determination of the probable numbers that will be affected. We have taken terms of years; the statistical department has determined what the average would be and from that we have endeavoured to select just what would be the likely number of unemployed in any one year having regard to the average numbers employed during the period to which I have referred, namely, ten or eleven years. Upon that of course, must be determined the premium that should be paid. That is an actuarial computation depending naturally upon the benefits that are to be conferred when the insurance becomes a claim. As regards the part of the resolution providing for unemployment insurance, I shall not go into detail now more than to say that the premium shall be paid by the employer, the worker and the state, the state's contribution being the cost largely of administration, and when the bill is introduced I shall give the history of other countries in that regard. That, however, is how the premium is to be paid. The amount of premium of course will vary with the ages of the insured; it will vary also with the averages of unemployment and employment as shown from the figures which we have obtained from the statistical department and upon which the actuaries have exercised their talents.

That being determined, the next question is a very simple one: What benefits are to be secured from the premium thus paid? Obviously the benefits as in most insurance of that kind issued by private enterprises and companies, are limited as to the period of time during which they will be paid. Sometimes health insurance provides for benefits for thirteen weeks, sometimes for twenty-six weeks, sometimes for a longer period depending upon the amount of premium paid and what the actuarial figures indicate as to the character and nature of the risk. In this instance I shall indicate to the house when I introduce the bill the history of other countries in that regard. At this time for purposes of the resolution it is only necessary to point out that we contemplate the maintenance of those features which differentiate insurance from any other form of contract. There is the payment of a premium by the workman, his employer and the state; those three together are responsible for the premium which is received by the commissioners and which is administered in the way of benefits depending on claims being made by those who come within the terms of the statutory requirements, namely finding themselves unemployed under the conditions that are mentioned in the bill. That of course is a matter to be determined with great care. Whether the period shall be thirteen weeks or fourteen weeks, what number of claims may be made by a workman within a given period of time, what must be his necessary contribution as a minimum before he can make a claim, how his contributions shall accumulate during a given time—all these matters have been considered in all the European countries and we have obtained the benefit of their experience. When I introduce the bill I shall make known to the house what that experience shows so that it may be available on Hansard for hon. members.

After having provided for benefits of that kind, the resolution states:

> For aid to unemployed persons, and for other forms of social insurance and security.

We merely provide for the amplification of that in cases where for exceptional reasons a workman has preferred no claim for a long period of time, say five, six, or seven years, where he has worked continuously, he might then secure larger benefits than he would otherwise be entitled to on the strict construction of his statutory policy or right to claim. That is a very simple matter depending of course upon whether he has been able to maintain his work from day to day and from month to month for a long period of time.

The next point deals with the problem of the payment of the necessary premiums, that is such contributions as may be necessary to carry into effect the proposed legislation. I do not of course consider that on a resolution I am within the rules of the house in endeavouring to discuss what have been described as constitutional questions, but I think I may anticipate what I propose to say on the introduction of the bill by pointing out to the house that I have no doubt whatever as to the constitutionality of the bill which will be submitted to parliament. I have no doubt at all that it is within our legislative powers. Whatever doubts may have arisen in times past—and I confess that I was one of those who had grave doubts as to our constitutional powers with respect to a matter of this kind—I think it is fair to say that there are two reasons why those doubts in my mind have been entirely dissipated, and I trust they are reasons which will be sufficiently strong to commend themselves to the sympathetic consideration and I think approval of every member of this chamber.

In the first place it will be recalled that we entered into a treaty of peace as part of the British empire. It will be recalled that in 1919 Canada executed the peace treaty as a part of the British empire. This parliament ratified that treaty by the Treaties of Peace Act of 1919, and not only in the covenant of the League of Nations but also in one of the articles of the treaty itself express provision is made for matters dealing with questions of labour. It will also be recalled that pursuant to the powers thereby conferred there was called together a great labour conference which met at Washington the very same year when the late Senator Robertson was Minister of Labour, Mr. Rowell, then President of the Council, was Acting Minister of External Affairs, and the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition was one of the advisers who attended as a former minister of labour. That conference determined that certain acts were advisable and that a certain course of conduct should be pursued with respect to labour. I will do no more at present than say that conventions have from that time been drawn up, the various nations of the world have indicated their approval of them, and Canada, although approving of them, has availed herself of that provision of the peace treaty which said with respect to federal communities that if they did not desire to deal with these matters they might instead recommend them to the provinces. Recommendations have from time to time been made by the government of the day to the provinces. But I know of no reason why parliament should not exercise its power under section 132 of the British North America Act and deal as a part of the British empire with the obligations which we accepted and which are created under the peace treaty and by subsequent conferences. Many ratifications have taken place by this parliament of conventions arrived at, and ratifications will be sought with respect to other matters that have to do with social problems and social legislation.

There is another reason which is wider still than that in the narrow constitutional sense. Since we first began to consider these matters there has been, as has been pointed out, a widening conception of the power of the federal authority with respect to many matters. In the aviation case, for instance, it was held that the federal power had exclusive jurisdiction to deal with matters pertaining to the use of the air. In the radio case a similar decision was reached. Therefore we have in the terms of the judgment of the court of last resort a statement in both cases of a widening sense of the power of the central authority, and when those two are coupled with the additional powers that have to do with interprovincial and international trade, peace, order and good government, and the power of taxation for the purpose of making contributions to such a fund, the law officers of the crown have no doubt, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) is clear, that in the light of the decisions as we now have them the legislation in the terms in which it will be offered to this house is within the competence of this parliament.

I do not think I shall make any more detailed statement on this resolution. I realize that on the introduction of the bill founded upon it I shall be expected to make a more elaborate statement as to the conditions in other countries, as to the history of such legislation, especially, in Great Britain, whose act we have largely copied, and the effort that has been made, shall I say, to adapt the legislation of Great Britain to the conditions of this country.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I ask my right hon. friend if on the question of jurisdiction he has secured the views of any of the provincial governments?

Mr. BENNETT: It will be recalled that in 1932, I think it was, I discussed this matter at a meeting of the provincial premiers. There were differences of view as to the respective jurisdictions of the federal power and the provincial legislatures. I have not discussed it with them formally since that occasion, nor have I had any occasion to do so informally except possibly with one or two of them. Therefore the correct answer to that question would be, no, not since the last conference in which the matter was discussed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister has said that this legislation is to be administered by a commission, and that the reason for that was to prevent anything in the nature of political interference. May I ask the Prime Minister if that means that this commission will have such authority in the matter that the authority of and control by this parliament over the subject matter of the legislation will thereby be alienated, to a certain extent at all events?

Mr. BENNETT: I think I should answer that question in the negative. The right hon. gentleman is aware that the railway commission administers the Railway Act in the very broadest sense, but it does not thereby displace the jurisdiction of this parliament. The commission that is called into being will be a commission representative of the workers and the employers, with one other member, for the purpose of administering the statute. Of course at all times it will be subject to the statutory powers conferred upon it by parliament and to the dominant authority of parliament to deal with every creature it creates, and to amend any legislation it may enact.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the Prime Minister inform the house within what time he expects it will be possible to have benefits paid under the scheme of insurance?

Mr. BENNETT: The statute itself will deal with that phase. Generally the act contemplates adopting the principles followed in England, which will be made known when the bill itself is introduced.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the Prime Minister say whether that will be within the next year, or two years, or three years, or within what period of time he expects benefits with respect to the various insurances will become available to contributors?

Mr. BENNETT: To answer that question at the moment would involve dealing with a mass of detail. It will depend upon the number of payments made by an assured within a given period of time. If for instance an assured should make the required number of payments, as provided in the English act, within a year, his right to claim would arise immediately thereafter. The whole theory upon which such legislation is based in other countries—in Great Britain, for instance, whose legislation we have followed, is that within a given time the worker makes a given number of contributions and thereby obtains the right to make a claim. His premium earns him the right to make a claim if he is validly unemployed. If he is not unemployed he is laying up for himself treasure in the future with regard to what may be called supplementary benefits that accrue under the statute.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Can my right hon. friend give the house an estimate as to what he expects will be the probable cost of this insurance scheme, and the contribution of the state in reference thereto?

Mr. BENNETT: I propose to deal with that matter in detail. There is a large mass of figures. It would of course depend entirely on the number of workmen that may come within it. Assuming that there is one and a half million, and payments, say for the sake of argument, are at the rate of twenty cents a week, you would have the sum of $300,000 contributed by the state, which in fifty-two weeks would amount to $15,000,000. It depends upon the facts, upon the conditions arising within the terms and provisions of the bill. I quite appreciate what the right hon. gentleman and others said yesterday, that ample time must be given to read the bill in all its particulars from the time it is printed and given second reading. I could not answer the question in that form without referring to a vast amount of material, which will be available to the house. I propose to offer the reports of actuaries as to, shall I say, the actuarial soundness of the proposals that will be submitted in the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister will recall that in speaking on the address I pointed out that one of the provisions of the Supreme Court Act gave the government the opportunity of submitting any proposed measure to the court for an opinion on the question of jurisdiction. Has the Prime Minister thought of submitting any questions to the supreme court in that regard?

Mr. BENNETT: I indicated in the discussion on the address that I thought it undesirable to discuss in detail any particular legislation or the attitude of the government towards it. The government is satisfied that the legislation is within its competence, it sees no necessity for submitting it to the Supreme Court of Canada either antecedent to or subsequent to its enactment.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Of course the governments that enacted the Lemieux act, the Board of Commerce Act and the various insurance acts were satisfied that those acts were within the competence of this parliament. But unfortunately their validity was challenged by the provinces, and victoriously Does not the right hon. gentleman think that it would be better to try to come to an agreement and understanding on the matter prior to enactment than to take the chance of having the act declared unconstitutional by the court?

Mr. BENNETT: I can quite appreciate the point made by the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). The fact is that the Lemieux act was generally regarded by lawyers who were fairly well informed as being unsound constitutionally in view not of decisions of the moment but, I think, a decision subsequent to the date of its enactment in which, under the late Lord Haldane, there had been placed upon provincial powers an interpretation somewhat widening them from the conception which obtained at the time the Lemieux act was passed. With respect to the insurance acts it will be recalled that, commencing with the Citizens' Insurance Company and Parsons, the privy council decided that statutory conditions could be imposed by provincial legislatures upon policies issued by companies licensed by the federal power. From that decision there followed a long train of decisions terminating in the insurance reference and the various cases that arose subsequent to that by reason of legislation enacted by this parliament as well as by the provinces.

Probably it is within the hon. gentleman's memory that the Lemieux act was not attacked until some twenty years after it had been enacted, if my memory serves me aright, while in the Board of Commerce case the attack was immediate and successful. It was not, I think, until the case brought by Snyder had been dealt with that the Lemieux act was finally dealt with.

We have not the slightest doubt at the moment, and unless the hon. gentleman is able to throw some doubt on it that we have not at the present time we can see no escape from our having jurisdinction, for the simple and obvious reason that section 132 of the British North America Act provides:

> The parliament and government of Canada shall have all powers necessary or proper for performing the obligations of Canada or of any province thereof, as part of the British empire, towards foreign countries arising under treaties between the empire and such foreign countries.

Those words were considered in the aviation and radio cases, and the construction placed upon them is now a matter of record. Therefore, having regard to what has taken place under the peace treaty and having regard to the position taken by this parliament, I do not think there is any doubt as to our position.

As to the second question, with regard to the desirability of discussing the matter with the provinces, when we did discuss this matter the attitude taken by some of the provinces was one of great relief to think that the dominion would undertake a national obligation of this character. Some provinces, however, took the view that this was an interference with their exclusive powers. They said, "We do not desire to discuss the question of the merits of the legislation, for the jurisdiction is either exclusive to us or it is exclusive to the federal power," or in other words to parliament. The question of the obligation under the treaty section so far as I know has not been doubted by any province in the confederation, and if it is not necessary to amend the constitution to effectuate the purpose we have in mind I do not think any good purpose is to be served by doing so. It will be recalled that when this government came into office neither the aviation nor the radio case had been decided. I think perhaps hon. members will remember the observation of a great jurist that the expansion of law by judicial interpretation, even when applied to a modern statute, is that modern conditions may be met even though the statute is of long standing or great age, and the privy council has seen fit to put upon our constitution a somewhat wider interpretation, when dealing with aviation and radio. I think the hon. gentleman will particularly recall the radio case—

Mr. LAPOINTE: And that is the way in which women became persons.

Mr. BENNETT: That is another case, and I thank my hon. friend for reminding me of it, although truthfully I never had any doubt about it myself; I never doubted that the decision would be as it was. The Minister of Justice, together with his entire staff and the law officers of the crown, have given the matter much attention and they are clear that at the moment, unless there is some curtailment of federal power by decisions that may arise hereafter, which I think is not likely, this legislation is within our competence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister has stated that this is to be a contributory scheme, with contributions by the federal authorities, the provinces and the employees.

Mr. BENNETT: Not by the provinces; by the employers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Are the contributions under this act to be voluntary or compulsory?

Mr. BENNETT: These, of course, are compulsory.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Are any classes of the community specifically excluded from the provisions of the legislation?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. I might say to the right hon. gentleman that this was one of the matters I proposed to deal with on the introduction of the bill. He, as an old countryman, will recall that under the report of one of the commissions both the banking and insurance fraternities entirely exclude themselves from the operations of the act. The same principle runs through this proposed legislation.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): I understand that there is no contribution by the provincial authority or government?

Mr. BENNETT: There is none contemplated by the bill.

Mr. HEAPS: I should like to ask if, included in the unemployment insurance act, there will be also measures dealing with sickness and invalidity insurance.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not dealt with in the way of conferring benefits; that is dealt with in a very limited sense, in the view that matters both of relief and of health necessarily must be within the provincial rather than the federal jurisdiction.

Mr. HEAPS: Then do I understand that these are not to form part of the legislation dealing with unemployment insurance?

Mr. BENNETT: They are dealt with in part, but as I say not in the sense of conferring benefits under it for the premiums paid, except in so far as they may constitute the basis of unemployment, if that is what the hon. gentleman means.

Mr. HEAPS: No, I have in mind the British act, under which benefits are paid to those who are sick or who suffer from invalidity.

Mr. BENNETT: Where unemployment follows as the result of the conditions mentioned in the statute, without going into them in detail, the benefits are payable, of course, but there is no system of what you call health insurance such as you have in private enterprise; there is no method by which policies may be secured such as may be had for accident and ill health. That is distinguished from unemployment. The basis of the premium, and the basis of the scheme, is unemployment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Prime Minister knows that under the British act the same statute contains provisions dealing with national health insurance.

Mr. JEAN: Would that be compulsory insurance?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is there any provision in this bill for the men now unemployed?

Mr. BENNETT: Not in so far as it is relief.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is there any supplemental measure in connection with the bill by which those now unemployed will be cared for?

Mr. BENNETT: Not under this bill.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then it seems to me quite obvious that this measure will be of very limited application.

An hon. MEMBER: That is a hope.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, the point is that if the bill is based on the earnings of the workmen, and if only upon those earnings he can base any claim upon the fund, I think it is obvious that there is no provision whatever for the half million people who are now unemployed, involving over a million individuals now in receipt of relief. There would seem to be no provision whatever for this great class of people, including those who are now in receipt of relief in their own homes, those who are housed in the various refuges in the cities and those who are in relief camps of various kinds. I think it ought to be made very clear that there is nothing whatever in this bill to provide for the outstanding evils of the depression, which we now face. Further than that, when the Prime Minister speaks of the claims as being based on actuarial experience his observations would mean that for only a few weeks after a man became unemployed could he draw any unemployed benefits. That may be all very well in normal times, but under the circumstances prevailing to-day it would mean that after a very few weeks indeed a man would be no better off than he was before. His claim would be exhausted.

I understand that contributions are to be obligatory. Undoubtedly that will mean that those who are receiving very low wages—and the price spreads commission has revealed that a great many of our people are in that position—will have their present low wages still further reduced, which will work an extreme hardship upon them and means privation to their wives and children. They are not now receiving a living wage, and the contribution here involved would mean a still further diminution of the small amount they are now receiving. That I believe must be a very serious consideration.

I understand any commission set up is to be so constituted that employers and employees will be represented thereon. We are informed, however, that it will be removed from political control. That may be all very well in the case of railways, where only money is concerned, but I believe it is a more serious consideration when we are dealing with human beings. For instance we are told that administration of the new plan will to a large extent rest upon unemployment offices, and that it may be possible to shift people from one particular point to another. Does that mean that a commission quite removed from political control will have power to shift people from northern Ontario down to Quebec or from Manitoba out to Vancouver, and to insist that those people move whether they like it or not? That to my mind is an important question for consideration.

The Prime Minister has referred to the experience of European countries. The experience of European countries during the depression has been that unemployment schemes have failed to function. That is true in England, where supplementary to the regular unemployment insurance scheme they have had to adopt relief measures commonly known as the dole. I had hoped that in the proposed bill we would find some supplementary provisions which would at least bring us in line with the provision in Great Britain. Apparently, however, there is to be nothing of that kind. The unemployment insurance scheme was originated in Germany some years ago and was carried on in that country very systematically. We recall, however, that as soon as the full force of the depression struck Germany the scheme broke down, simply because, based as it was on the earnings and contributions of the workers, the amounts paid were reduced as also the time during which benefits were paid. The scheme failed to provide for their needs in an emergency.

I welcome the strong stand taken by the government that constitutionally they have the right to do something in this matter. Some of us have pleaded for that for a long time. We have said that if Canada had the right to enter into a treaty she had the right to carry out its terms. I am very glad the government has taken that position, and I hope they will see the matter through. However, when we come to meeting the pressing unemployment situation we are facing to-day I think we must confess that the Prime Minister's statement is most unsatisfactory and most disappointing. It makes no provision for meeting the claims and needs of a vast number of our fellow citizens who for some ten years past have been suffering.

Mr. GRAY: What would the hon. member suggest as the proper way to draft the legislation?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As I have said I agree with the legislation as far as it goes, but I submit that it helps only a very limited number of people.

Mr. GRAY: How is the hon. member going to help those people?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is not a matter to be discussed here. I can quite readily go into it, and shall take an early opportunity to do so. All I want to do on this occasion is to make some general observations and not to go into the matter in great detail. We have not yet the measure before us, but I do think that on the statement made by the Prime Minister it is proper immediately to recognize that, however admirable some provisions in the plan may be, it does not meet the needs of the great mass of the unemployed, and that a considerable time will be required to build up a reserve sufficient to be of much service even to those now at work.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I greatly regret that the hon. member has seen fit to confuse relief and unemployment insurance. There could be no such thing as a provision for voluntary relief or relief being given to those who are not insured. No actuary would talk about a program for insurance if he had no data upon which to formulate his figures or calculations. Relief is one thing; insurance is another. Unemployment insurance contemplates just what it says, namely the payment of benefits dependent as to their amount upon the extent of the premium payments made by the worker, the employer and the state.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That was not the experience in Great Britain when they attempted to extend their unemployment scheme.

Mr. BENNETT: In England you have a unitary system of government. That has been said so often that I repeat it simply because the hon. member is well aware of it. I fear this parliament has no jurisdiction over direct relief in that sense, nor has the treaty anything to do with it, nor have the other provisions of the British North America Act anything to do with it. We are now dealing with a national matter in which we provide that if a worker pays three and a half cents a day, if a like sum is paid by the employer and the state makes a contribution necessary to administer the system—amounting we will say to something slightly less than the amount I have stated or possibly slightly more—the worker secures the benefits because of payments made. The actuarial computations are made upon that basis.

Relief is an entirely different matter, and depends on entirely different circumstances. It cannot be the subject matter of actuarial computations. There is not the scientific data upon which to predicate any degree of assistance. As a result of discussions and conferences between those who have the primary responsibility and this government—or this parliament, I should say—contributions in aid are made to meet extraordinary circumstances under which those people are living.

There is a fact that the hon. member constantly disregards, although I do not think he does it purposely. There never has been a time in Canada when due to seasonal unemployment there has not been a very large number of unemployed. Estimates vary, but an estimate was made in 1930 at the time my right hon. friend held office as to what would be involved under normal conditions. It was learned that there were never less than 150,000 unemployed scattered over the country, after it had reached a population exceeding 10,000,000. There are estimates greatly in excess of that.

In days gone by, before the depression, a workman could accummulate during the summer money sufficient to care for his family during the winter. Some worked only in the winter—or to put it the other way round, worked only in the summer so as to care for their families in the winter. But those reserves have entirely disappeared and been dissipated because there has been no work to enable those workers to accumulate a fresh reserve to deal with the period of unemployment brought about because of the fact that they were seasonal employees. That is the situation that has brought about relief in this country, until that slack can be taken up and employment provided for those who have been seasonally employed, to enable them to provide the reserve to care for themselves and their families as heretofore. It is a problem which the local community, the city, town, municipality and province are dealing with, with the aid and assistance of grants which have been made to all the provinces in, say, some reasonable proportion to their necessities.

But on the next point, as to the condition of the unemployed, that is a matter which we have discussed every year with the provinces. Only a few months ago we discussed it with them, and they may or may not desire to discuss it with us again. Presumably they will desire to do so, in which event parliament will be asked to consider what it conceives to be the best way to deal with it, having regard to the suggestions which the provinces make.

I should like once more to remind the house of the fact that in every instance the manner adopted to deal with the unemployment problem in the several provinces was arrived at by representatives of the provinces in consultation with dominion authorities. There was this limitation, that there were differences as to the extent to which they should secure assistance. Some thought that they should receive a larger sum per month than the sum received, but in every instance the method, using that word in the broad sense, was a method which was approved after a conference between the provinces and the dominion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the Prime Minister suggest that it is beyond the powers of the dominion government to meet a national emergency such as unemployment?

Mr. BENNETT: I have not any doubt that with the change, the diminution of unemployment, that has taken place during the last fifteen or eighteen months, it would be very difficult, if you follow the language of Lord Haldane's judgment, to assert jurisdiction on behalf of the dominion.

Mr. NEILL: I wonder if the Prime Minister would explain this point to enlighten my ignorance. I understood him to quote section 132 of the British North America Act as giving this parliament the dominant power to disregard or ignore the claims of jurisdiction put forward by the provinces in dealing with this matter, but when he read that section it seemed to me that it referred entirely to giving the Dominion of Canada dominance in the matter of carrying out obligations in relation to foreign countries only, and did not deal with domestic relations inside Canada as between the dominion and the provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: The section in question mentioned specifically the province, and the interpretation placed upon the section by the privy council was the foundation of my observations. I would suggest to my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that it is impossible to deal with the questions he raises adequately until he has seen the bill, and this is not the time at which to read sections. There is not a section before the house until such time as an opportunity has been given to introduce the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister has referred to conferences with the provinces and said, if I understood him aright, that whatever was done was done as a result of agreement between the dominion and the provinces. May I ask him, if at one of the conferences, I think two years ago, he did not ask the provinces which of their powers and services they were prepared to surrender? Did he get any answers to that question, and if so, what were the answers?

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman is quite correct. The answer that I gave to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was an answer with respect to relief, which was the subject matter of discussion and agreement. But as to the question of the surrender of powers with respect to social services and whether the provinces desired to surrender their powers to the dominion, different views were expressed by different provinces. Some of the provinces, without naming them, were rather anxious that that should be done; others were not, and the question as to the terms and conditions that some of them might think desirable was vaguely discussed, but no conclusions were arrived at. It was not in any sense upon those discussions that this measure was framed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There was no agreement?

Mr. BENNETT: Oh no.

Mr. POWER: May I ask the Prime Minister what is intended by the words "to provide for a national employment service."

Mr. BENNETT: Was the hon. gentleman in the house when I opened my observations?

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I pointed out that that was an amplification only of an existing statute that deals with unemployment services, and that it came within the declarations made at the first conference of the International Labour Office after the treaty of peace.

Mr. POWER: I take it, then, that it is intended to extend the labour employment offices that we have.

Mr. BENNETT: To utilize them for the purposes of this measure and to extend the scope of their activities.

Mr. POWER: May I ask what is intended by the words "for aid to unemployed persons?"

Mr. BENNETT: I endeavoured briefly to explain that in this sense: After a man has accumulated a substantial reserve by reason of having made contributions, and has not made a claim for benefits, he might be unemployed for a period that was the maximum provided by the statute; and having regard to the fact that he had not made a claim against the fund there is a provision that would enable him to receive benefits as an unemployed person because of the fact that he did not make a claim against the fund commensurate with the premiums that he had paid.

Mr. POWER: Then in reality it would not be insurance that he was receiving.

Mr. BENNETT: It is to make that clear.

Mr. POWER: But a species of bonus?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. In life and accident companies, as the hon. gentleman is doubtless aware, if you have an accident policy and you have not made any claim against it, as no doubt my hon. friend has not done, every year there is added to the amount of the policy probably ten per cent. In this instance, in order to make it conform to the general principles that govern matters of this kind, there has been an attempt to make it plain that there is a clear distinction between the payment of an insurance which resulted from the payment of premiums, and the payment of moneys which have not been exhausted in the payment of benefits that a man has not claimed because of his continuous employment.

Mr. POWER: The Prime Minister also says in his resolution: "to provide for other forms of social insurance and security." I take it that the other forms of security are health insurance. But did I understand the Prime Minister to say that we are not going into the health insurance business?

Mr. BENNETT: Not in that sense.

Mr. POWER: Then what is meant by the words "other forms of security?"

Mr. BENNETT: That arises out of the accumulation of funds which have not been utilized—again it is the same thing—for the purpose of payment of claims that might be made for benefits under the fund. The details set forth in the bill seem to me to warrant the use of those words, "other forms of security." It is really another form of security which is not strictly insurance, and it is brought about by reason of the man's own persistence and sound health, his strength and powers of endurance which have freed the fund from claims.

Mr. POWER: It is all part of the unemployment insurance?

Mr. BENNETT: That is right.

Mr. POWER: It has nothing to do with any other species of insurance?

Mr. BENNETT: Not in that sense.

Mr. EULER: The Prime Minister has made it quite clear that this is an insurance scheme and has nothing to do with relief. The man who does not contribute by way of premiums cannot receive any benefits; I think that is quite clear.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. EULER: That is, those who are not employed now or in the future and do not pay premiums will not receive any benefits whatsoever. My colleague behind me says that it is compulsory, that the man must pay; but I say to him that a man who is not employed and has no money cannot be made to pay.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. EULER: I was going to make a reference to the statement that the scheme is both compulsory and contributory. I was going to ask, although possibly this should be asked later on after the bill is introduced, just what method will be employed for enforcing the contributions. Will the contributions be taken direct from the workman, the man who is insured, or will the payments be exacted from his employer? It occurs to me that if you want to be sure that you get contributions you will probably have to take them from the employer. This question might arise: A man might be making his contributions through his employer over a period of time and then become unemployed, and yet he might still be able to make contributions to continue his insurance. Perhaps the Prime Minister might enlarge on that.

Mr. BENNETT: I can answer one part of the question at once without going into details. Contributions will be made in the first instance by the employer, as the hon. gentleman has well contemplated, and the methods of attaching stamps to cards, and books, and matters of that kind will be dealt with in the act in detail. The general principle however is as he has mentioned.

Mr. EULER: Is there any provision whereby, if he is unemployed, his contributions may be collected?

Mr. BENNETT: If he is unemployed he makes a claim against the fund.

Mr. EULER: But he might still want to contribute to increase the reserve.

Mr. BENNETT: It is contemplated that within a certain number of days he shall make his claim against the fund.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the shortest period before benefits are payable?

Mr. BENNETT: That depends on three things: first, the number of contributions; secondly, the period of time within which they are made; and thirdly, the number of days of unemployment that will enable him to make the claim. I think we have adopted a compromise of nine days, but I will verify that in the bill.

Mr. HEAPS: From the remarks made by the Prime Minister it is obvious that this bill does not begin to touch the fringe of the unemployment situation; in other words, it is a bill that does not deal with unemployment but with those who are employed. It makes provision for those who are employed at the present time but who on some future occasion may be unemployed and who will therefore receive benefits to which they have subscribed. To what extent that will ultimately ameliorate the unemployment situation it is probably difficult to state at the present time, but one thing ought to be made clear to the house and the country, and particularly to the people who are mostly affected by a measure of this sort; whilst we are engaged in what is termed a reform parliament, to grapple with social problems of an immediate nature, this bill will not, either at this session or at any future session, touch the great problem of unemployment. That must be borne in mind. The impression has gone abroad, to a very large extent from statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite, by the Prime Minister and those closely associated with him—

Mr. BENNETT: Point out any such statement.

Mr. HEAPS: I will read a quotation from Hansard yesterday to show the impression that may be—

Mr. BENNETT: That is not good enough. Point out from me; I was not here yesterday.

Mr. HEAPS: I said those associated with the Prime Minister.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman mentioned the Prime Minister.

Mr. HEAPS: When other responsible ministers of the crown make statements to the house they have at least some effect so far as the people of the dominion are concerned, and this legislation has been looked upon as one of the most important items if not the most important item of the government program to be brought forward in the current session. If that is so, I presume that this legislation is intended, or at any rate the impression has gone abroad that it is intended in some way to deal with the problem of unemployment, which I regard as one of the most important problems which parliament has to face. And yet the bill does not touch the fringe of the unemployment situation.

It is quite true, as pointed out by the Prime Minister, that the number of those who are out of work at the present time has considerably diminished in comparison with the number who were out of work a couple of years ago. I remember that in 1932 when I used the figure of 750,000 persons out of work it was scoffed at by members on the government side of the house; they said that we were exaggerating the number out of work.

Now the Prime Minister tells parliament that the figure has dwindled from 750,000 to approximately 400,000. It might show a tremendous drop, but I have been trying in my own way to ascertain the extent of unemployment in the country, and taking the present period and a year ago I find that the number of people on relief, which is a fairly good criterion of those out of work, has diminished in the large industrial areas approximately ten per cent. In one of the largest cities of Canada I took the matter up with one of the aldermen closely associated with unemployment and he told me that the reason there has been a drop in relief is that those not deserving of relief have been cut off. Having made calculations to-day on the basis of government figures, I come to the conclusion that there must be now approximately 600,000 who are out of work. It is quite true that figures can be both construed and misconstrued, but I venture to assert, in view of relief figures which are so obvious to all of us, that the drop has not been from 750,000 to 400,000, but that there are to-day approximately 600,000 people out of work for whom this employment insurance bill offers not one ray of hope.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has my hon friend made an estimate of the number of persons employed on state funds—those who have been given employment by the state or through state aid?

Mr. HEAPS: No, I have not, but according to the bureau of statistics, on September 1, 1929, there were 1,093,735 persons employed. Coming to the low period of employment in 1932 I find that the index number had dropped from 126·8 in 1929 to 86; and in that year, 1932, the number of persons employed was 789,321, and that had increased by September 1, 1934, to 922,339. There had been therefore, approximately, an increase in those two years of 133,018 persons employed. If we had then in 1932 approximately three-quarters of a million people out of work and there are to-day 133,018 additional employed, then the number of unemployed must be a little over 600,000.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton) in the chair.

Mr. HEAPS: When the committee rose at six o'clock I was making a few remarks on this question. I dealt with the unemployed in relation to this bill. For a number of years past the organizations of unemployed of this country have been petitioning I presume members of parliament and the government with a view to the establishment of a comprehensive unemployment insurance scheme whereby those who are out of work might be able to receive some benefits from it. Unfortunately the resolution now before us which foreshadows the proposals of the government deals with legislation from which I am afraid the unemployed themselves have very little hope of benefiting.

I can well realize that within the confines of the capitalistic structure it will be next to impossible to create an unemployment insurance scheme that will be actuarially sound and at the same time take within its compass the vast numbers of men and women at present out of work. In other words, if we are to have any unemployment insurance scheme based on an actuarial computation, one that can support itself, it is bound to have a very restricted number of unemployed within its orbit. If I remember correctly—and I stand subject to correction because I am speaking now from memory—when the unemployment insurance scheme was first introduced in Great Britain, as was pointed out this afternoon by the Prime Minister, the average number of unemployed computed for was round about five per cent. Since then, as a result of the ingenuity of man and the introduction of modern machinery into the modes of production, unemployment has naturally tended to increase to a very large extent, making it more difficult to have any unemployment insurance scheme which will give all those who are unemployed and cannot be employed in industry the benefits of such a measure. Consequently in Great Britain after the war, probably when large numbers were out of work, their scheme became actuarially unsound and vast sums of money had to be transferred from the national exchequer to the unemployment insurance fund to keep it solvent. I do not know if even at this date these sums have been returned from the unemployment insurance fund to the imperial exchequer. So to-day when we are attempting to deal with this scheme of unemployment insurance, if it is going to be sound actuarially as is apparently the intention in the bill to be founded on the resolution, it cannot take into consideration the vast numbers of people who are at present unfortunately out of work.

I would like to refer for a moment or two to the impression that has been left in this country by the speeches made by the Prime Minister during the past few weeks.

Mr. BENNETT: I would point out that no reference was made to unemployment insurance except in reference to this measure.

Mr. HEAPS: I have not associated any statement of the Prime Minister with the scheme of unemployment insurance alone but I have taken his statement as referring to present general social problems.

Mr. BENNETT: I said that an unemployment insurance measure would be introduced in this house at the present session.

Mr. HEAPS: I quite get the distinction the Prime Minister is making at the present time and probably he is quite correct in the strict interpretation of what he says. I am taking his general statement as distinct from the specific, because it is very hard to tell the vast masses of the people that what the Prime Minister had in mind was something different from what is happening here this evening. To give just a few items of what he recently said, I would quote the following:

The old order has gone and will not return.

When we get such a statement from the Prime Minister—and I quote him for that purpose—I do not disagree with him; all I want is performance equivalent to the promise, and I urge that on the Prime Minister and those associated with him and, indeed, upon all members in all parts of the house. He went on further to say:

I am for reform and this means government control and regulation.

If I wanted to take the time to look up the exact terms he used during the course of those addresses to the people of this country I could find dozens of expressions similar to this where he left upon the minds of the Canadian people a distinct impression that this government was going to undertake some heroic measures of reform so that the whole of the capitalistic system could be made to function in such a way as to lessen the evils from which the people are suffering at the present time. I do not think I am stating the case unfairly.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member is. It is a wholly erroneous statement.

Mr. HEAPS: I will take the statement of the Minister of Justice yesterday in the house where he is reported on page 253 of Hansard as saying:

The house undertook the transaction of business one week ago to-day, and to allay any fears on the part of the leader of the opposition I think I can state to him that perhaps the most important, or one of the most important, of the reform measures which has been announced in the speech from the throne will be under discussion in this chamber to-morrow.

I think that is fairly definite.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is right.

Mr. HEAPS: It no doubt relates to the measure we are now discussing; that is, the question of unemployment insurance is the most important, or one of the most important of the reform measures which the government have to present to this house at this session of parliament. If that be the case, then this is to be one of the measures the government intends to bring to the attention of parliament in order to deal with the pressing problems that now confront us. I claim that in so far as it is going to affect the vast numbers of men and women who are at present out of work it will have very little effect upon their status. I am anxious to see the government implement not exactly the promise but the impression that was created upon the minds of the people of this country by the speeches made by the Prime Minister.

For a number of years I have advocated in this house a scheme of unemployment insurance, and when the Prime Minister pointed out this afternoon that in 1931 a resolution on this subject was introduced in this house, it was my resolution and at that time the Prime Minister gave a pledge that during the lifetime of this parliament he would introduce legislation dealing with unemployment insurance. It is apparent that any scheme of unemployment insurance at this time does not deal fundamentally with unemployment, and I am extremely anxious that the government should undertake at this session of parliament such reform measures as will have a lasting effect upon the economic life of this country. As far as this measure is concerned all it will have the effect of doing is to create some scheme of social insurance whereby the employer, the employee and the state will all contribute to a scheme, and when people are entitled to benefits on an actuarial basis they will receive in the form of benefits about the same amount of money they now receive when they are on direct relief or the dole. I prefer this unemployment insurance scheme to the granting of direct relief, the dole as commonly called, but I point out as strongly as I can that the bill as outlined this afternoon fails to deal fundamentally with the unemployment situation, and I am anxiously looking forward to the other legislation which the government have in contemplation on the question of hours of work, minimum pay and so on, which I regard as far more important legislation than that introduced this afternoon.

Mr. BROWN: I should like to discuss this question from a slightly different angle from that followed thus far. The Prime Minister has introduced this as part of his social legislation, and it has been received with acclaim in many part of the country. However I cannot but think that many people have given little consideration to the measure and to its possible effects upon various classes of the community. It has already been pointed out that so far as meeting immediate needs is concerned this measure is utterly inadequate. That is, it cannot be considered as emergency legislation. Legislation of this kind would better be introduced in times of prosperity than in times of depression. It is in the seven fat years that we have to lay up for the seven lean years. Where the blame lies for not having done this sooner I shall not discuss at the moment.

The Prime Minister has said that this legislation is based upon the English act. I think it can be asserted without fear of contradiction that to establish an unemployment insurance act in England was much simpler than to do so in Canada. In England to a much greater extent than in Canada men are tied to a particular occupation and a particular section of the country. It is true that in Canada we have a few industries to which this measure would be of easy application, for example the railroads. When men enter railway service it is generally with the expectation of making it their life work. The same might be true of large industrial institutions, and perhaps of large mercantile institutions. But there is a great mass of smaller businesses to which it seems to me it will be impossible for legislation of this kind to apply. Then to a much greater extent than in England our population is transient; men are in Halifax to-day and in Vancouver tomorrow.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Well, not quite so soon.

Mr. BROWN: An aeroplane would do it; but let us say some intermediate point. The point is that men are not tied to a particular occupation or to a particular locality. With regard to this large number of transients it seems to me that there will be great difficulty in giving them any practical benefit from this scheme.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Whatever I say in criticism of this legislation, I do not wish to seem to be lacking in sympathy for people who through no fault of their own are unemployed. A large number of people who under normal conditions would be earning good wages have through no fault of theirs been forced to accept relief. We must of necessity have pity for people in that position. Then we cannot but think of the tragic position in which the rising generation find themselves, young men and young women growing up having never learned to work, through lack of opportunity. The effect is indeed deplorable.

While I do not wish to seem to offer opposition to the principle of this proposed legislation, yet I think it is necessary for us to consider the matter from some aspects that have not hitherto been considered. The effects of the bill will reach far beyond the people immediately affected, and it is to some of these possible effects that I wish to draw attention. The intention of course is to provide against temporary unemployment. It seems to me it will affect people according to how they are constituted. Legislation of this kind is likely to be a savour of life unto life and of death unto death. There are large numbers of people to-day on relief who feel humiliated by accepting that relief, who feel that it is beneath their dignity, although they are forced to accept it. There was a tragic illustration of this in Winnipeg a short time ago where it was reported that a woman, having been taunted with being on relief, killed her two children and committed suicide. I am happy to believe that there are large numbers of people who, given temporary relief as provided by this bill, would under normal conditions make good and suffer no deterioration from receiving the benefits provided. On the other hand we are compelled to admit that there is another class, and I regret to say that the number is increasing, who are beginning to say that society owes them a living and are determined to get it whether they render any service or not. True, in these times we cannot apply rigidly the principle that if a man will not work neither shall he eat, though that is a very good maxim in normal times. But I regret to say that the number of those who are willing to live upon the community is increasing; we have abundant evidence of it. A very striking article appeared in a recent issue of the Atlantic Monthly, by Newton Baker, entitled The Decay of Self-Reliance. He gave many illustrations of the effect the present depression is having upon people, such as that of a man and his wife who said they were going to the Chicago fair and then going on relief. He stated, and it is undoubtedly true, that one of the effects of the English legislation had been to cause men to debate with themselves whether it was better to take the wages offered them or to accept the dole. I am afraid this legislation will to a very large extent increase the number of people who take that attitude towards life.

I realize the difficult circumstances in which we are placed; I realize that the times through which we are passing call for measures we would not think of adopting in normal times, although as I have said a measure of this kind would be better brought forward when conditions were normal rather than in a time of depression. But this legislation is going to have another effect on another class of people; I refer to the taxpayers, wherever they are. The employer who is to contribute to this fund will add the amount of his contribution to the price of his goods, whatever they may be. To a large extent unionized labour may be able to shift the burden also, but the class of people whom I represent, the great agricultural community, never can shift the burden on to anyone. They have to bear it. The effect of this legislation and of all legislation of this nature will be simply to increase the burden placed upon the farmer. He will have to pay a higher price for the things he must buy and there is nothing in this legislation providing that he will get a higher price for the things he has to sell.

It has been stated in the press, though as yet we have not heard it from the Prime Minister, that this legislation is not to apply immediately to agriculture, lumbering or fishing. I presume we will have to wait until we see the bill to find whether or not that is true. If this is to apply to the farmer as an employer then he is up against a double handicap. Not only that, but he is going to be handicapped in the labour market. To a very large extent the relief measures that have been adopted already have handicapped the farmer in that market. One of the effects of the establishment of relief camps has been to make it almost impossible for the farmer to get the help that he needs in order to carry on his work. The supply of farm labour is continually decreasing and becoming less and less efficient.

As I have said, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to offer opposition to the legislation now proposed, but I do want the house and the country to appreciate some of these effects which perhaps are not apparent to a great many people. I do not wish to discuss the constitutional aspects of the question; I will leave that to the lawyers, but I think perhaps some of us who are not lawyers but who are in close touch with the actual facts and who know our own business can appreciate some of the practical difficulties involved in putting such a scheme into operation. I hope those practical difficulties may not be as great as they appear to me at the moment, but I want to tell the government that legislation of this kind will not be accepted as a substitute for the removal of trade restrictions and the doing of everything possible to facilitate world trade. At the very best, legislation of this kind is called for only because conditions are not what they ought to be, and it can only touch the fringe of the great problems confronting us. The real problems are the removal of trade barriers and, as the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) would say, the question of finance. For my part I am inclined to agree with Cordell Hull, who said the other day that even if exchange were stabilized it would not remain stabilized for one hundred and twenty days unless trade restrictions were removed. At the moment, however, I will not discuss which of those two problems is the more important.

I should like to emphasize once more that the people whom I represent, and the great majority of the people on the prairies, cannot accept legislation of this kind as a substitute for other legislation which we deem necessary in order to bring about the measures of relief that we feel the occasion demands.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Did not the Manitoba government, which represents the farmers of Manitoba, go on record as being in favour of legislation of this nature?

Mr. BROWN: Perhaps they did; I am not saying they did not.

Mr. HEAPS: Then does the hon. member say that he represents the farmers of Manitoba and that the farmer government of that province does not?

Mr. BROWN: I am not saying that the farmers of Manitoba are opposed to this legislation, but it has nothing to offer them directly, and if we accept it it is because we recognize the serious conditions through which the world is passing at the moment. All I say is that we cannot accept it as a substitute for measures which must be brought about if trade is to be freed and prosperity thus restored.

Mr. REID: I believe that the time has come, in the setting up of boards and commissions, when some restrictions should be imposed in order to keep these boards from becoming too expensive. From the Prime Minister's remarks I take it that our act is founded on the unemployment insurance act of Great Britain, and I believe that in that act the overhead expenditure must not exceed six or six and a half per cent. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if there is any provision in this measure to keep down administrative costs.

Mr. BENNETT: This is not the proper time to discuss the details of the sections of the bill, but an effort is being made to limit the expenditure to the lowest possible amount, and to maintain the integrity of the fund by such safeguards as our experience leads us to believe are necessary in this country, as distinguished from other countries.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not think anyone in this country feels that this is going to be the solution to all the problems of Canada. I believe that is a fair observation. If I understood him correctly the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) said that this policy will broaden the basis of taxation in the whole country; at least that was his implication, and he suggested that the farmers would have to bear the burden. I think it is only fair to say that for the last four or five years it has been the other way round. I am not quarrelling with that policy at all; I believe it is a fundamental duty of the state to come to the rescue of those people who, because of circumstances over which they have no control, find themselves under the necessity of having to ask for assistance from the government. If I might give an example I would refer to the drought areas of western Canada. I think it is fair to say that the money for the relief of those areas came out of the general taxation of this country, and I have nothing to say against that.

Mr. VALLANCE: It has to be paid back.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member for Lisgar said that this measure would do something to keep the agricultural industry from getting cheap labour. That was the inference; why not be frank about it? I must absolutely disagree on that point. The hon. gentleman further suggested that the implementation of a policy of this description would cause people to be lazy. If the hon. member would read the evidence given before all the commissions appointed by British governments, whether Labour or Conservative, he would find that it has been explicitly pointed out that the amount of malingering under the legislation there has been of no account whatever.

I am not going to speak at any length, because we are merely discussing the principle of the bill. I do not think this measure is intended to be a solution of our whole unemployment problem. To reach that solution we will have to find an entirely different approach, and in my personal opinion we will have to adopt entirely different legislation. There are two distinct problems. This bill is to deal with the question of unemployment and the payment of men out of work, through an insurance system. There will have to be different proposals. Of course the legislation is based on the English contributory system. I think we should point out further that under the proposed scheme the worker will receive sixty cents for his thirty cents. When the system in Great Britain was inaugurated twenty-one years ago it covered only seven trades involving little more than 2,000,000 employees.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Less than that.

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall not enter into an argument about the figures; I think I am approximately correct. But to-day, after twenty-one years of experience and after twenty-eight major operations on the legislation, over 13,000,000 employees are operating under the English legislation. In the last three or four months they have reduced the age of insured persons from sixteen years to fourteen years, because the board school age in Great Britain is up to fourteen years. Within the last three months they have included agricultural workers within the range of this legislation. With these facts in mind we can see how there has been evolutionary development of this form of legislation. As time has gone on they have, as a result of their practical experience, broadened the range of those who may come under the legislation. I know it would be far better for me to spread all over the map, but it is my candid opinion that if we want to maintain this sort of legislation and if we wish to launch it soundly we must have a sound beginning and then broaden our operations as experience dictates.

I derive the greatest enjoyment from a contemplation of the fundamentals underlying the resolution before us, because it involves a redistribution of income. We will get a great deal more of that before we are through with the policies the Prime Minister has launched. He may not go as far as he had expected to go, but the next government will have to act, whether they like it or not. Present conditions are a direct challenge to our democratic institutions, no matter whether we have a Conservative government, a Liberal government or a government composed of members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. We cannot overestimate or overlook the lessons taught by Europe in the last ten years. The will to live is the strongest instinct in a human being and one which is inevitably expressed in the nation. This is the direction in which mankind is moving; it may be the wrong direction, but undoubtedly that is the way it is going. The other fellow has fallen down on the job and mankind is trying this new tack.

I am not going to be critical, because I believe there is plenty of time for that when the bill is introduced and we are fully aware of what it contains. I believe at the present time we should act as though we were considering the measure from the standpoint of the benefits it may confer upon the Canadian people. I am well aware of the fact that relief measures must be distinct from unemployment insurance. I would remind the government however that it must not make the mistake of making insurance payments lower than the amount a man could get on relief. If that were done the legislation would fall to the ground. I should like to see the government include in the proposed scheme as many classes of working people as possible.

We have heard about the experience of other countries who have pioneered in this type of legislation and we would find it comparatively easy to profit from their experience. The hon. member for North Winnipeg spoke about labour exchanges. I understand they are used in Great Britain and are recommended in the country to the south of us. I should like to observe however that up to the present the only place where planning has been successful, so far as its effect upon human beings is concerned, has been in the prisons, the army, or the navy, where the same kind of clothes are worn by all.

Our approach to this problem must be in conformity with the desire of our people to come along with us. When this legislation is in operation I have no doubt the individualistic characteristics of the Canadian people will show themselves. I shall not say more at this time because I am discussing only the principle of the legislation, and shall reserve my criticisms of the bill until after its introduction.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, there are two reasons why I should like not to be critical in anything I say with regard to this resolution. My first reason is that for many years I have been in favour of a measure of this kind, not because I felt it was a solution for the failure of capitalism but because in some way it could take care of the casualties of capitalism. The second reason why I should like to approach it without criticism is the very forceful way in which my friend from Lisgar (Mr. Brown) opposed the measure.

Mr. BROWN: I did not oppose the measure.

Mr. MacINNIS: I can judge only from what a man states as to whether he is opposing or favouring a measure.

Mr. BROWN: I want that corrected. I did not oppose the measure.

Mr. MacINNIS: I will take the hon. gentleman's explanation, but I shall judge from his remarks. However, I am not satisfied at all with the measure proposed in the resolution. I am wondering why in the world so much fuss was made about it in the radio speeches. I am satisfied the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) was quite correct when he stated the people of Canada had been led to believe that something more far-reaching than the present resolution would be brought down.

Mr. BROWN: Do I understand the hon. member is opposing this measure?

Mr. MacINNIS: The Prime Minister is reported in the Vancouver Daily Province as follows:

> My friends, I have declared for reform. Now that the time for action has come delay is hazardous.

Then he went on to state the extent of the reforms. We have before us to-night a resolution involving measures which were passed years ago in other countries, some of them the most reactionary countries in the world. Let me give to the house some of the dates upon which unemployment insurance legislation was placed upon the statute books of other countries. The legislation was passed in Great Britain in 1911; in Italy in 1919; in Austria in 1920; in the Irish Free State in 1920.

Mr. POWER: That is not a reactionary country.

Mr. MacINNIS: I did not say all the countries I would mention are reactionary countries; I said some of them were. To continue: The legislation was passed in Russia in 1922; in Queensland, Australia, in 1922; in Poland in 1924; in Belgium in 1925; in Germany in 1927. In all these countries there was compulsory national unemployment insurance. Other countries had voluntary schemes, such as France, in 1905; the Netherlands, in 1916; Finland, in 1917; Spain, in 1919; and so on.

Mr. DUPUIS: If the hon. member will allow me a question, has he statistics to show the results of the application of this legislation in the countries he mentions, and the cost of it?

Mr. MacINNIS: No, I have not those statistics. All I can say is that what gave this legislation birth in all these countries still exists as a problem to be solved. Furthermore, whatever the cost has been it is the working class who pay it, because no one else could pay it.

Mr. DUPUIS: Has there been less unemployment because of such legislation?

Mr. MacINNIS: No, there has not, and it is not a solution for unemployment. It cannot be put forward as a solution for unemployment.

Mr. DUPUIS: What is it for?

Mr. MacINNIS: It is to take care of those who are unemployed when they are unemployed. My hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) says: "To elect the government." Everyone has a right to his opinion. But we do know this, that once the law goes on the statute books in any country it is never repealed.

The Prime Minister took exception to the statement of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) that nothing the Prime Minister had said would lead the public to believe that those who are unemployed to-day would not be included in the bill. I have before me the Vancouver Daily Province of January 5 giving a report of the Prime Minister's radio talk of January 4, and I find under the heading, Insurance to Replace Relief, the following report of the Prime Minister's remarks:

> Now that we have achieved some measure of control over economic conditions and can cooperate without fear of imminent disaster, we are going to do away as quickly as possible with emergency relief measures and put in a permanent system of sound and scientific insurance against unemployment.

I claim that that is a definite statement that the purpose of the unemployment legislation to be brought before this parliament was to substitute insurance for the relief measures that are in effect to-day. It means either that or nothing at all. I am quite satisfied that the Prime Minister's statement was very direct and very emphatic, but this resolution and the bill to be founded upon it does not touch that situation at all. The unemployment problem and the relief problem in this country are one. People are on relief because they are unemployed; and to make provision for those who are employed to-day against some period in the future when they may be unemployed is not touching to-day's unemployment problem.

Again, assuming that conditions are improving and that as we go on with these other reforms and when we get the Liberal government in power, things will boom once more, there will be no need for this unemployment insurance; but in the meantime those who are unemployed to-day are suffering, and there is nothing in this legislation that is going to be of any benefit to them.

That is the reason, Mr. Chairman, why I criticize this measure, although I am in favour of the principle of unemployment insurance, not because it is a solution for unemployment, but because so long as we have the capitalist system we shall have unemployment, for it is just as much a part of capitalism as profits. Every time profits are made, unemployment is created as well, so long as we maintain the capitalist system we should inaugurate and carry out measures to take care of the victims of that system, and a comprehensive system of unemployment insurance will do it, I believe, under the circumstances, better than any other way that we know of at the present time.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Chairman, the resolution that is before the Chair is, I take it, the first step in the inauguration of the government's new proposals for reform. May I first of all congratulate the government on what it has proposed to do? I shall, of course, reserve the right to criticize both the principle and the details of such legislation as may be brought down, but at this stage I think congratulations are due the government upon at least having turned its face in a new direction. I think that that is the most significant thing to be observed, not only in respect to this particular proposal, but in respect to the entire legislative program as outlined by the Prime Minister in his radio addresses.

It is strange that some people seem to be sorry that the government has turned its face from destruction and towards something sensible, but I have no criticism whatever in that regard. The fact that the government has turned its face, or that the government have turned their faces—I am never sure whether we should speak of the government as an individual or collectively, but whatever may be the correct term, the government has turned its face in a new direction. That indicates first that the old methods that have been practised by governments in Canada and other governments in the world to meet the growing crises of the collapsing social order have been abandoned, at all events by this government, and have been abandoned because they proved to be inadequate. In the second place it indicates that the new economics which has been espoused from this corner of the house for thirteen years has at last found some justification. I do not know to what extent the proposed legislation will go, but certainly the government proposes to move in the direction which we in this section of the house have advocated for many years.

If I had any criticism at all to offer at this stage it would be in respect to the objective which the government may entertain. The question that is troubling my mind most is this: Does the government propose to try to repair capitalism by methods of this sort, or has it set its face towards the rebuilding of our economic system? I think that is the point that will determine the ultimate success of what the government is undertaking. So far as I am concerned I frankly say that I do not believe any government can successfully and adequately repair capitalism. I am quite convinced that the longer it goes on, the more serious conditions will become, and while I welcome these repair methods in so far as they may be able to alleviate human suffering during the process of getting wise enough to build a new system, nevertheless I do not desire to associate myself with the idea of repairing the capitalistic order. I believe we should begin to rebuild upon entirely new foundations, and however slowly we may go, every step we take should be towards that objective.

The resolution before the committee is a proposal in respect of unemployment insurance. The Prime Minister has explained t in a general way as sufficiently, I presume, as is necessary at this stage. It is an insurance proposal, and that being so, it must necessarily apply only to those who are qualified to come within the scope of its provisions. I do not believe much good can be accomplished by prolonging the discussion here. I think we should hasten to get the details of the bill and then to judge its merits from the actual clauses of the legislation. But may I say that unemployment insurance has a very limited field, and that field becomes more restricted as the industrial system develops. The time for this legislation was twenty-five years ago. Then it would have done some good, for it would have built up a reserve which would have been of tremendous advantage to the Canadian wage workers during the past four years. The best time to insure a man against death is when he is alive. Now the government is being compelled by the pressure of events, by the threatening starvation of multitudes of the people, to introduce an insurance policy against unemployment at a time when unemployment is almost at its peak. That is like insuring people who already have tombstones at their heads. The government is faced with a difficulty. They had to do something to meet the situation, and while they felt that something had to be done, the economic conditions were inopportune for doing it.

This is perhaps one of the worst periods in the history of Canada for the introduction of such a measure as this, and yet it must be introduced. In that connection I think we ought to remind the opposition, in its criticisms of the measure, that in the years of great prosperity, when the Liberal party had power and when a measure of this sort could very well have been introduced, when its value would have been immeasurable, they did not do anything about it. Now we are faced with a very serious situation indeed and are compelled to take a step of this kind. But unemployment insurance—and this is the point I want to make—is inadequate in any country at any time to meet the industrial situation which has developed under the capitalist system. Personally I believe that the introduction of this principle will mark a beginning, if an inadequate one, in the right direction in so far as it will have meant, to a limited extent, the enabling of the working classes within its provisions to build up a reserve against the time when there will be no work for them to do. That may be extended indefinitely as the need develops, and so I say it is perhaps a beginning in the right direction.

But what we really need is insurance against being denied access to the abundance which mechanical invention and scientific methods of production have made available. And while, under a proposal of this sort, the government will make provision for the insurance of the workers of Canada, I would favour a system that would go much further than that and extend the principle to all the people of Canada, a system that would enable them to have access to the abundance which our machinery and natural resources have made available. That is of course a matter of finance; it is a matter of using properly the national or social credit to provide purchasing power so that people may be able to buy the goods they produce. When the right time comes I shall be able to expound that theory further and perhaps move amendments in that connection if necessary. At the moment I only observe this, that there are many difficulties in the way of the government in bringing in legislation of this sort in Canada. There are difficulties to be faced in any country, and more perhaps in this country than in any other. As I have already pointed out, the need of the moment is so great that action such as this is demanded; and yet conditions are inopportune for the inauguration of legislation of this sort. But in addition to that the government has to face certain difficulties in the matter of jurisdiction, with which other countries have not to contend.

I for one therefore propose to place no more difficulties in the path of the government than they have now. I want to congratulate them on what they have done and if they go any distance I will cheer them; if they go still further I will cheer them more, and if the opposition should make still more advanced proposals I should gladly commend them also. I do not care which government brings in legislation of this kind or legislation that has for its object meeting in any way, however small, the economic difficulties of our people at this time. Representatives of labour in Canada have asked for this legislation for nearly twenty-five years and this government has been the first to undertake to provide it. Even if it is not all that we may expect, we welcome it as a beginning, and shall look forward with great interest to the remaining portion of the government's program.

Mr. GERSHAW: The resolution indicates that a fairly comprehensive scheme of unemployment insurance is to be set up. Employees, employers and the dominion government will contribute to this scheme, and it would appear that the provincial governments are being largely left out of the picture. And yet we must remember that the provincial governments have been carrying on a great deal of the social work which has been done in this country. They have administered the Mothers' Allowances Act, the Old Age Pensions Act and particularly the Workmen's Compensation Act. They have therefore a great deal of information which would be of considerable use in carrying out the provisions of this proposed act. They have statistics; they have trained staff; and the workmen's compensation boards in the various provinces have payrolls, so that they are in pretty close touch with the employers of labour and with the employees themselves within their respective territories. It would seem reasonable therefore that, instead of setting up an entirely new organization, these experienced people could be made use of and possibly the act administered by the workmen's compensation boards in the different provinces.

I quite agree with the last speaker that the people generally, particularly in Alberta, are looking for something much more comprehensive. Social credit has certainly taken a great hold in that province and in one town there has been erected a large wooden banner across the main street with the words Vote for Social Credit. I feel that many of these people will be looking for much that is more comprehensive than we have in this proposed measure.

I wish to commend one feature and that is the fact that it is contributory, because I believe that an employee who is contributing to a scheme is in a much better position than the employee who is receiving something to which he has not contributed. He has at least a contract and something that he can depend upon when he needs help.

Mr. McINTOSH: I wish to make just one or two observations with regard to the resolution before the committee. May I say that I have followed the discussion so far with a good deal of interest and I shall reserve any criticisms I may have to make with regard to the measure until I see the subject matter of the bill and the actual facts contained in that subject matter.

This afternoon the Prime Minister discussed the question of jurisdiction, and the impression left with me when he was through was that he was somewhat in doubt. I am somewhat in doubt as to the final jurisdiction of the dominion to deal with a problem of this kind. That is the only angle of the question I wish to touch upon to-night. First there is the international and imperial point of view which the Prime Minister dealt with.

Mr. BENNETT: No, international and interprovincial.

Mr. McINTOSH: Did the Prime Minister not quote section 132 of the British North America Act in regard to dealing with the treaty obligations of Canada which bear upon the problem before us because we signed the peace treaty in 1919. I thought that was the trend of the argument advanced by the Prime Minister, and I notice he admits that I am correct. That section reads:

The parliament and government of Canada shall have all powers necessary or proper for performing the obligations of Canada or of any province thereof, as part of the British Empire, towards foreign countries arising under treaties between the empire and such foreign countries.

That means that so far as any peace treaty or treaty responsibility assumed by the empire with any foreign nation is concerned, since Canada is part of the empire and any province of confederation is a part of the dominion, we are provincially and nationally obligated by that treaty. I quite understand the arguments of the Prime Minister with regard to that provision of our constitution.

Looking at the question, secondly, from a dominion point of view, may I read just a few lines from the report of the select standing committee on industrial and international relations in 1929 when dealing with the question of insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity. That question naturally brought up other questions akin to unemployment insurance, such as old age pensions and sickness insurance. The matter of social insurance came before the government in 1921 as a consequence of certain recommendations and conventions growing out of the international labour convention dealing with labour held at Washington in 1919. In 1921 the then Minister of Justice, Hon. C. J. Doherty, put forward his opinion of unemployment insurance based upon these recommendations and conventions of the Washington conference called by the international labour office of the League of Nations. The point of view put forward was this:

In this view—

That is the view put forward by the Minister of Justice at that time.

—unemployment insurance has a pronounced federal aspect—

Not a one hundred per cent federal aspect, but just a pronounced federal aspect.

—and on the whole the minister thinks the establishment of a system of unemployment insurance is competent to the dominion in the exercise of its residuary legislative powers with relation to the peace, order and good government of Canada.

That is another argument supplementing the one made by the Prime Minister when he quoted this afternoon from the constitution of Canada.

Thirdly, there is another and final thought and it is this—the provincial angle. May I refer to the opinion of one of the law officers of the crown. In 1928, when this subject was before the select standing committee on industrial and international relations, Mr. Edwards, Deputy Minister of Justice, was brought before the committee and dealt with the jurisdiction aspect of this very important problem. Mr. Edwards was asked what he thought about the jurisdiction question and this is what he said. This question was put to him:

Would you say that comes within that?

That is, within peace, order and good government under our constitution, or under section 91 of the British North America Act. This is his answer:

Well, I was going on to say that you could not bring it within peace, order and good government so long as it belongs to any of the enumerated items of section 92—

Which of course defines the jurisdiction of the provinces. He goes on to say:

—and my own view is that it is a subject which falls within the general designation of property and civil rights.

That is of course under the jurisdiction of provinces and not under that of Canada or the dominion at all. I take from what the Prime Minister said this afternoon that he bases his conclusion almost entirely on certain judicial decisions that have been made in the last few years with regard to the two very important questions of the radio and aviation. He feels that on the strength of those judicial decisions the constitution of Canada can be made elastic enough to deal with this important problem. I am wondering whether it can or not; I am not going to say one thing or the other, but I expect the Prime Minister and those supporting him to come forward with further evidence to prove that from a constitutional point of view this question is wholly and entirely within the competency of the dominion government, that is, not solely within provincial jurisdiction.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Bennett thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 8, to establish an employment and social insurance commission, to provide for a national employment service, for insurance against unemployment, for aid to unemployed persons, and for other forms of social insurance and security, and for purposes related thereto.

He said: It may be useful to make some explanation of the bill that I am about to introduce; or possibly the house is sufficiently seized of its subject matter to dispense with any such statement. I am entirely in the hands of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. BENNETT: The matter of course has been discussed for many years in this chamber. It has been the subject of discussion in provincial legislatures as well. Some of the provincial legislatures have expressed by resolution their approval of unemployment insurance; in other cases no action has been taken except the discussion from time to time. The whole problem of social legislation has, I think, engaged the attention of all the provinces from time to time, as well as of this house. It is now nearly four years since I stated that if this government continued to exist it would submit a measure of unemployment insurance for the consideration of parliament.

The question of jurisdiction I do not propose to deal with at greater length than I have already done this afternoon. It is my judgment that the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction with respect to this matter for the reasons I indicated. Those reasons spring from the duty which rests upon us to discharge our obligations under treaty to Canadian labour. They rest also upon the right of this parliament to legislate for peace, order and good government. They rest also upon the fact that legislation of this character affects international and interprovincial trade, and the maintenance of equitable relations between the provinces is undoubtedly affected by such legislation. In addition to that, if one were driven to it, the power to impose taxation is involved in the question of contributions. On all these grounds, and others that need not be discussed, I am clearly of the opinion, having regard to the decisions in the aviation case and the radio case, that this proposed legislation is intra vires. I might mention particularly the radio case in which there was a summary of the effect of all the decisions, notably the decision reached by the judicial committee in 1929 in the case from British Columbia, in which certain propositions were enunciated by the judicial committee which were approved, as I have said, in the latest decisions of that committee upon the cases argued there during the last few years. Therefore I do not propose to spend any further time in discussing that question.

On the broad problem of unemployment insurance it is hardly necessary to say to a house that is so well informed upon the subject as this that in the first instance the trades unions undertook the responsibility of providing unemployment benefits for their members. The out-of-work members of trades unions were provided with benefits from the union funds. I shall not waste the time of the house to go into that at any length beyond saying that as far as our records show, the amount thus disbursed by the unions in 1933 to members out of work was $198,490, a small sum. These arrangements of course were made between members of unions themselves. Apart altogether from these voluntary arrangements that had been made for many years by trade unions with their members, we have two other main classes, so we are informed by the books on the subject, the first being voluntary insurance based on what is generally known as the Ghent system because it was first successfully organized in that city. Under that system the government made a contribution to the trade unions; the trade union unemployment funds were thus supplemented by contributions from either the state or local authorities. Distribution to those out of work was under the control of the employees themselves, further sums being sometimes obtained from the employers to supplement their resources.

Then of course we have what we are now familiar with and have been discussing at some length this afternoon, namely compulsory unemployment insurance. This form of insurance implies contribution from employees, employers and the state. I discussed at some length this afternoon and will not traverse again the point that the very word "insurance" implies, that a sum is paid by some person or persons for the purpose of providing benefits. The extent of the payments to be made to secure the benefits depends of course upon the number that will claim upon the fund, having regard to the average number over a period of years, and to the sufficiency of the moneys that are provided from the sources indicated to meet the form of indemnity or benefit indicated in the terms of the contract with the persons who pay the premiums. The first great step in that direction as far as we are concerned was in Great Britain. The first mentioned system, however, still has its supporters; that is the system by which the state makes its contributions to the trade union funds and the trade union officers become responsible for the distribution of the moneys and benefits that accrue to the workers. For instance I find that in Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Finland, France, the Netherlands, Norway, Spain, Sweden and Switzerland they still have in vogue the system I have referred to as the first mentioned, that is with contributions by the state or community, whether the local community, a canton or a province, or the federal or national government, and the benefits disbursed by the trade union officials.

Compulsory unemployment insurance schemes are now in operation in Austria, Bulgaria, Germany, Great Britain and Northern Ireland, Irish Free State, Italy, Poland, Queensland (Australia) and Switzerland.

On this continent we have had one experiment tried on a rather comprehensive scale. It will be recalled that the state of Wisconsin a short time ago enacted an unemployment statute by which reserves are to be built up by contributions from the employers and their employees, administered by the state. That law came into force last year and is still in force. The Queensland scheme, to which the hon. gentleman referred this afternoon, I can pass by because I can add nothing to what he has already said. In Austria—and all these it will be noted have come into force since the war—wage earners, except those employed in agriculture or forestry, domestic servants, workers employed by several employers at a time, middlemen, workers in rural districts, except in building trades or establishments with more than five workers, rural workers temporarily engaged in public works, and apprentices, were insured. Employers and workers contributed to the fund equal amounts, while the federal and provincial authorities contributed to an emergency benefit fund. A benefit which varies with the wage class and family responsibility may be paid for thirty weeks and an emergency benefit subject to a needs test.

I need hardly direct attention to the fact that the unemployment insurance measures in force in European countries largely owe their origin to conditions that came into existence since the great war. It was not until 1925 that Bulgaria enacted a measure in which the employers and the workers and the state contribute. The benefits were provided for only twelve weeks in a year. In the Irish Free State they had a system somewhat akin to that in Great Britain, the employer paying ten pence, the worker nine pence and the state less than sixpence a week, benefits being fifteen shillings a week with allowances for dependents.

As was said by the hon. gentleman, in Italy they put forward their scheme and passed it into law in 1919. But it was not until 1924 that Poland adopted a scheme calling for a contribution of one and a half per cent of the wage roll by the employer, half of one per cent by the worker and one per cent by the state. Benefits were paid for thirteen weeks or one quarter of a year, and went up to as high as thirty per cent of the wages, with allowances for dependents. I mention these countries, of which of course we have but little knowledge, because since the war they have found it necessary to depend upon this form of social aid to enable them to grapple with the problems that have beset them as a consequence of the great war.

In Great Britain, as has been pointed out, the first statute was passed in 1911. That was the first compulsory unemployment insurance plan and, as has been said, it was limited to certain industries selected for experiment as being subject particularly to unemployment, namely, construction, shipbuilding and engineering. In 1916 the system was extended to cover workers in a number of war industries, including metal, leather and India rubber workers and the chemical and munition trades, as it was feared they might suffer from unemployment at the close of the war. In 1920 a new measure was enacted extending compulsory insurance to all manual workers and non-manual workers earning less than £250 per annum. Certain classes were excepted, the most important being agricultural labourers, domestic servants and certain persons in permanent employment such as permanent civil servants, school teachers and, by certificate of the Minister of Labour, permanent employees of local authorities and railway companies. The reason for that, of course, is fully apparent. They all have their own plans or schemes which have been developed under actuarial direction, and it was therefore felt that they need not be brought within the operations of the act.

The scheme covered between eleven and twelve million persons; as was said this evening it did in fact, I believe, touch almost thirteen million workers in Great Britain. These contributions were shared about equally between the employer and the employee, and the state contributed approximately one-quarter of the total amount contributed by the other two parties. It will be recalled, in connection with the cost of administration, that it was found that administration costs were somewhat higher than had been anticipated, and advances were made by the state to enable the administration costs to be cared for. Under that act—and bear in mind the length of time that has elapsed since the first experiment was made—benefits for fifteen weeks could be drawn in any one year, with not more than one week's benefit for every six contributions. Provision was made that an industry, with the approval of the Minister of Labour, might withdraw from the general scheme and set up a special scheme. I suppose readers of old country papers are aware that in many of the large industries in England there are schemes which have been set up by the employers and the employees, and the operations of the general act no longer apply to those particular industries at those particular points.

Mr. GRAY: Might I ask the Prime Minister if that privilege will be maintained in this act?

Mr. BENNETT: Whether the bill will meet just such a case as has been dealt with in England I think may be open to doubt, but it is desired that the opinion of the house should be expressed with respect to that, and if it is thought desirable that something should be done in order to conform to the action taken in England, we should be glad to do so.

In Great Britain, since 1911 when the statute was first enacted, it has been closely linked, of course, to what you might call employment exchanges. It is quite true, as was said this afternoon or this evening, that it would be very difficult if not impossible to think of transporting or transferring labour from Halifax to Vancouver. The conditions which obtain in a closely settled country such as the United Kingdom, as compared with the conditions existing in Canada, make it too clear to be open to argument that we could not use the same facilities for transferring labour in Canada as are used in Great Britain. Nevertheless these exchanges have played a tremendous part in the success of unemployment insurance operations in Great Britain, and in this country it is proposed to maintain the employment offices that have been subsidized, shall I say, by federal aid and that have been maintained under the control of the provinces and the dominion so that the administration of the act may be close to the people concerned, and the employment exchange offices in the various centres will be in a position to undertake a large share of the responsibility for the administration of the act. That has been found in practice to be an invaluable adjunct to the operation of unemployment insurance in Great Britain.

The British act of 1920, it will be recalled, was based on an average unemployment rate of about six per cent, but of course the grave industrial depression that came about in Great Britain increased that rate of about six per cent to 17 per cent in the first year of the operation of the act. The average from 1921 to 1927 was 12·4 per cent. In 1932 the average was 22·1 per cent and the number of unemployed persons in insured industries, as reported by the British Minister of Labour at the end of January, 1933, had reached nearly 3,000,000, the highest ever recorded.

The act was again amended to provide for the payment of what are described as uncovenanted benefits, to persons whose right to ordinary benefits had been exhausted. I touched on that this afternoon. Dependents' allowances were provided, and the rates of contribution were raised. Again in 1924 the act was amended and the benefit rate was raised, but the insurance fund being unable to cope with the demands made upon it, the borrowings from the treasury by the fund amounted to the enormous sum of £115,000,000 sterling.

In 1925 the then Minister of Labour, Sir Arthur Steel-Maitland, appointed a departmental committee under the chairmanship of Lord Blanesburgh, a member of the judicial committee of the privy council, to consider, in the light of the experience gained in the working of the unemployment insurance system, what changes if any ought to be made in that system.

That was a very comprehensive inquiry. It involved the discussion of many matters incidental, shall I say, to the main issue that was referred to Lord Blanesburgh's committee. It happened that, while that committee was sitting, a member of our bar and myself happened to be in England attending the privy council, and we were asked certain questions as to the practice in Canada in connection with certain types of employment. Lord Blanesburgh asked us if we would mind expressing those views to his committee, and Mr. Rowell and myself gave to the committee such evidence as we could make available to enable them to deal with one of the problems they were considering. That was a matter arising out of certain forms of employment and the engagement of certain officials in public activities.

This committee was made up of representatives of workers, employers and local employment committees and others who had a recognized position in connection with the administration of the poor law in Great Britain. It did not report until 1927, and by one of those fortunate circumstances that sometimes arise they made a report that was the basis for very excellent legislation. The report says:

We have found in all quarters a general agreement that the risk of unemployment should be insured. Nobody has suggested to us that the principle of unemployment insurance should be abandoned. It has been recognized by all who have appeared before us, and we ourselves share the view, that an unemployment insurance scheme must now be regarded as a permanent feature of our code of social legislation.

That was in 1927. Many of those recommendations were immediately embodied in legislation as amendments to the existing law. These included, for instance, the abolition of the distinction between standard and uncovenanted benefits, to which I referred; the scrapping of the rule of one week's benefit for every six contributions, and the substitution of a provision whereby a claimant was entitled to benefit if he had paid thirty contributions in the preceding two years and was "genuinely seeking work." A new class of insured persons, as the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) mentioned, came into being, namely those between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one years, for whom lower contributions and lower benefits were prescribed; then the minister's power was abolished to make special schemes, although the two already established were allowed to continue in operation, and authority was given to the Minister of Labour to make grants out of the unemployment fund towards an approved course of instructions for unemployed juveniles of sixteen to eighteen years of age. That was to endeavour to provide some form of additional technical training for those who would subsequently become insured under the act itself. It was in 1930, however, some five years ago, that the "genuinely seeking work" condition was abandoned and the rules for receipt of benefit were altered to enable the claimant to receive benefits if he had paid eight contributions in the two preceding years, or thirty at any time.

In the fall of that year, 1930, perhaps some hon. members will recall that a new commission was set up under the presidency of Judge Holman Gregory, who, by the way, I suppose many of you met when he was in Canada. This commission was appointed to inquire into the working and provisions of the unemployment insurance scheme. Several reports were made. The interim report of June 1, 1931, recommended:

1. A limit upon the period for which benefit might be paid of twenty-six weeks within twelve months following the date of application.

2. An increase in the rates of contribution to nine pence per week for adult men and appropriate increases for other classes.

3. A reduction in the rates of benefits averaging about 11·5 per cent.

4. The application of a rule that applicants for transitional (uncovenanted benefit) should show eight contributions during the two preceding years, or thirty in the preceding six years.

5. The application of a needs test to certain classes.

I believe there must be some within sound of my voice who recall the circumstances connected with the making of that report. Gross abuses had grown up in some localities, and after the closest investigation it was the opinion of the commission that in certain instances the needs test should be applied in addition to the limitation of benefits which had been payable, for the very reason which was mentioned here this afternoon, namely that because of certain conditions which prevailed with respect to other forms of assistance it paid not to work. Therefore there was an increase in some cases and a curtailment in others of the benefits which were granted.

It will also be within the memory of hon. members that before the final report of the commission appeared, the committee on national expenditures, which was appointed in February, 1931, to make recommendations to the chancellor of the exchequer for reductions in expenditures for supply services, recommended an increase in insurance contributions and a reduction in benefits by twenty per cent, and the application of a needs test to all persons applying for benefit who had exhausted their insurance rights. That of course was the prelude to the legislation which was enacted to provide for the lessening of public expenditure. It brought about the noteworthy protest from the judges; it brought about difficulties in connection with other branches of the service, but it was carried through, and reductions were made in every branch of the civil service of Great Britain. This was carried into effect.

Mr. POWER: May I ask the Prime Minister the difference between a needs test and a means test? It seems to me the means test is important.

Mr. BENNETT: In this instance I have used the words that are used in the report, namely "needs test."

Mr. POWER: What is the distinction?

Mr. BENNETT: I am not sure whether or not the words are used interchangeably.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The words used are "subject to a test of need."

Mr. BENNETT: That is the reason the words "needs test" were used. The words describing the test were "needs test," because it said the needs should be the basis of the right to obtain payment. I think the expression "means test" might have been used in old age pensions cases rather than in cases of unemployment insurance. That is my impression, that the use of the words "means test" was more applicable in connection with old age pensions, and the expression "needs test" was the one used for the purpose of unemployment insurance. That is my present memory of it, but I stand subject to correction, of course.

I was about to say that these economies were carried into effect, because the National Economy Act of 1931 authorized during the period of one month the making of orders in council for the purpose of effecting economies in certain specified services, including unemployment insurance. It will be recalled there was some conflict of opinion on previous occasions as to the action taken by the British authorities, because in their economy act of 1931 they limited the time within which the king in council could pass orders in council providing for economy in all the services. The objection taken by the judges was as to the manner in which their salaries had been reduced. However, as a result of this legislation the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act were modified, the rates of contribution were raised to ten pence per week, and there was a reduction of ten per cent in the rates of benefit. The benefits themselves were limited to twenty-six weeks in twelve months. Transitional benefit payments were abolished and transitional payments subject to a needs test were substituted therefor.

The final report of the Gregory commission was not made until November, 1932. It is signed by all the members except two labour representatives who submitted a minority report. This report is said to be—and I believe upon perusal hon. members will agree—one of the most comprehensive documents on the subject ever issued, because it analyzed the economic causes which contribute to unemployment and the reasons we have for the conditions which exist. I think the report will be found in the library, and if any hon. member desires to read a very comprehensive review of the whole problem connected with unemployment insurance he will find it in that report. They found that the greater part of the unemployment from 1923 to 1929 was not due to trade depressions, but to causes that were not transient, including loss of competitive effectiveness, dislocation of employment caused by labour saving inventions and other technical changes, and the divergent movements of prices and costs. That is, the difficulty of any form of international exchange had brought about such a divergent movement of prices and costs that employment and unemployment were difficult to figure upon from week to week. The conclusion was that while unemployment insurance was an appropriate way to deal with intermittent and occasional unemployment, it was quite inappropriate for dealing with chronic and continuous unemployment, the problem of the latter being one of relief coupled with measures of assisted transfer and training.

That was the report, and it is that report which in times past I have desired and endeavoured to make clear should be always kept in mind, as there is a distinction between what you might call unemployment resulting from the conditions of to-day or to-morrow, and that growing condition in which the individual requires assistance. One is to be placed in the category of relief and the other comes within unemployment insurance. One is something for which the payment of a given premium may insure the payment of certain benefits. The other is something which from time to time may be considered adequate for the purpose of insuring a benefit because a condition that is growing does not yield to any system which may be based upon the necessity, for actuarial purposes, of definite figures or averages.

They went further. A dual system of insurance and relief was proposed and the commission recommended that an independent commission be appointed to act as an advisory body to the minister. The age of entry to insurance was to correspond to the school leaving age, and the limit of income was to be raised from £250 to £350.

With respect to the conditions relating to benefits, the commission recommended in general the retention of those conditions in effect, but favoured the principle of relating the period of benefit to the record of recent insurable employment. They proposed that the maximum period of benefit for workers with a good record would be thirty-nine weeks, and that the benefit period should range from thirteen to thirty-nine weeks, instead of having a uniform limit of twenty-six weeks. In other words, it was found by experience that the premium paid on the average would warrant the benefits being paid for a longer number of weeks than it had heretofore been paid, and it was extended to a maximum of thirty-nine weeks instead of the twenty-six weeks which was the limit at that time.

There was further reference made to the cases I mentioned this afternoon where the individual had a long record of continuous employment without making any claims upon the fund. In adjusting the benefit period account would be taken of contributions paid and benefits drawn in a period of the past five years, and the assistance scheme was to be administered by local authorities. That is, as distinguished from insurance which was a national matter, the assistance or relief was to be dealt with by the local authority, assisted by a body in the form of a statutory committee called the unemployment assistance committee, to determine the rate of payment to be made to the individual for assistance in each case, and to cooperate with the Minister of Labour in providing occupation and training for persons in receipt of assistance.

In England the practice is, at least under this statute, for the person out of employment to register at the employment exchange and then apply to the local authorities for assessment of the rate of payment, or for what may well be described in this country as relief, and payment will be made by the local authority or by the exchange acting as its agent.

The two labour members signed a minority report; they found that the provisions for a dual system were unsound. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) argued this afternoon that insurance and relief should be made part of the same measure. I submit to the house that that is an unsound proposal. That was the view of the majority report, but the two labour members thought it unsound to divorce the one from the other for reasons that were apparent and that need not be discussed. They proposed a scheme administered by the Minister of Labour through the employment exchanges and covering all manual workers and all salaried workers earning less than £350 per annum, and that these persons should be included in the scheme so long as they remained unemployed and complied with the conditions. Obviously such a condition as that could mean nothing but national bankruptcy, and the majority could not agree to it.

This last year, 1934, it will be recalled that the British government introduced a new bill consolidating the existing acts and modifying to some extent by amendments to the old legislation the principle upon which they had heretofore acted. That bill amended the Unemployment Insurance Acts of 1920 and 1933, and provided a new act, the act of 1934. It reconstructed the whole scheme, and it embodies many of the recommendations of the royal commission. I fancy it is the statute which the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) has before him at the moment, and from which he read a moment ago. It embodies in the main the recommendations of the royal commission.

I leave it at that because before this bill was prepared I thought it desirable to communicate with the British authorities and discuss the matter with them in the light of their wide experience. I asked one of my secretaries who is with me at the moment to make the necessary arrangements to confer with the British authorities in connection with their proposed legislation which has since been introduced and passed, and they were good enough to make it possible for us to avail ourselves of the bill which they were preparing and to give us the benefit of their wide experience by way of suggestion and otherwise in connection with the legislation that is now before the house. I shall not do more than mention that, because when the bill is before the house it will be found that many sections are sections taken entirely from the act of last session in Great Britain, so modified as to be applicable to the conditions of a country such as this where you have relatively so small a population scattered over so vast an area.

The German statute I shall not go into at length, except to say that as it now stands it was enacted in 1927. It provided an entirely different scheme, involving a levy of three per cent on the payrolls of industries covered by it. In other words, you covered the scheme by industries, and the fund was created by a flat three per cent levy on the payrolls. It will be within the memory of most members that at least one, if not two, of the provinces have a form of raising revenue for purely local purposes by making a tax upon the payrolls, and that of course, if this scheme were adopted, would mean a double tax upon the payrolls. While the scheme has worked out fairly well in Germany it has been found necessary to increase the percentage levy in order to meet the demands upon the funds. In the first three years of its operation the scheme ran greatly into debt; in fact, at the end of three years it owed the treasury of Germany 1,410,000,000 reichsmarks. The rate of contribution was therefore raised to six and a half per cent, and in the years following 1931 deficits have been turned into a surplus. Contributions as well as benefits in Germany are on a percentage basis. Equal contributions are made by the employers and by insured persons. The state does not contribute to the cost of regular insurance benefit, but may advance money by way of loan. The insured persons are grouped in eleven wage classes, according to weekly wages, and a basic rate is fixed for each class upon which contributions and benefits are calculated.

The waiting period under the German scheme is fourteen days for persons without dependents, seven days for persons with not more than three dependents, and three days for persons with four or more dependents.

I do not propose to deal with other plans at length because I fancy the industry of hon. members of this house has been such that they have read the standard authorities upon the subject and have gone into more of them than I think it perhaps is desirable to mention to the house at this time. But I do mention the Wisconsin plan in passing because Wisconsin has always been in the front rank of states dealing with social problems, and their scheme has only just gone into operation. Whether it will ultimately succeed in the way it was planned I cannot say, especially if the United States government carries forward its plan for a national scheme. In preparing the bill which I seek leave to introduce we have endeavoured to profit by the experience of all countries in which unemployment insurance has been made a part of their system. The international labour office at Geneva came into being, as is well known, not as a part of the League of Nations, but by reason of the provisions of the convenant of the League of Nations, and is maintained at Geneva by all the signatories to the covenant and by the members of the league as well. It has been contended that some may be actively interested in the work of the labour office although they are not members of the league, and notably is that so in the case of the United States of America, but the regulations of the league itself set forth that those countries that are members of the league must as a matter of necessity also be members of the international labour office. The international labour office, which is a clearing house practically of the thought of all the world with respect to questions of this kind, has gone into the matter from time to time with great care, so much so that, as is known, last year they formulated their ideas, as a result of sifting all the information they had received and the suggestions that had been made as to how legislation should be framed, into a convention, which doubtless many members of this house have read.

Now no country has had a genius for dealing with social problems to the same extent as Great British. They have known the times when to take occasion by the hand and make the bounds of freedom wider. They have had great success in dealing with these problems. I have heard men well able to speak with authority say that in their opinion the social legislation of Great Britain was responsible for the measure of tranquility that prevailed in that Kingdom during the darkest days of the depression when there was much agitation and difficulty in other parts of the world. Of course, to compare conditions in Great Britain with those in Canada is somewhat difficult. I do not desire to repeat what I have already said with respect to that unitary system of government with one parliament that deals with domestic problems, with local problems of the smallest character as well as with problems of the greatest magnitude, and with respect to whose enactments no question of constitutionality can ever arise, because there is a different condition to consider there from the condition in which you have nine provinces each enjoying exclusive legislative jurisdiction, under section 92 of the British North America Act, with respect to many matters, and a parliament which is charged with responsibility for the maintenance of peace, order and good government throughout the dominion and which has exclusive jurisdiction with respect to the many matters specifically mentioned in section 91. Then you have the field in which there is concurrent jurisdiction, with the provision that when there is a conflict between the exercise of legislative power by the province on the one hand and the exercise of power by the dominion on the other, the dominion shall prevail. There is a vast distinction between the conditions that exist in a country such as Great Britain and in a country such as this.

Relief, undoubtedly, as has been said so often in this house by hon. gentlemen opposite as well as by members on this side, is primarily the concern of the local authorities, just as in England it is also the concern of the local authorities. There, with a single parliament, the extent to which the poor law shall be administered by grants in aid from the central treasury is a matter to be considered from time to time in the light of the necessities that arise and the requirements of the particular communities; and it is rather difficult to see how it is possible in that great parliament to deal with the smallest matter of poor law aid in some remote community where, with the aid of public spirited men acting in an advisory capacity, and usually if not always in an honorary capacity, they are able to administer the most trivial detail of local necessity through the instrumentality of those local committees and the boards that are set up, and the central treasury at Westminster.

In this country we recognize the fact that the primary responsibility for relief itself rests with the local authorities, the local authorities being largely the creation of the legislatures of the provinces; and in extreme cases, where there has been something of a national character requiring assistance, then we find the dominion making either grants in aid, as has been done in times past on many occasions, or taking over the entire responsibility where you have a drought stricken area in which hundreds of thousands of men, women and children find themselves without any means whatever. There you find the federal authority undertaking the administration in these local communities of relief and assistance.

Now the examination of the report of the British royal commission will indicate at once the magnitude of the problem and the reasons why it is believed that a form of unemployment insurance is necessary. I think one of the speeches this afternoon or this evening sufficiently indicated why this is desirable. I think the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) pointed out, what is well known to be the fact, that this is an effort on the part of parliament to provide that benefits shall accrue to certain named classes, they themselves contributing to the fund that insures the benefit and being assisted by the state; because it is believed to be in the interests of all Canadians that such a form of assistance should be given rather than that they should go on relief. That is true.

With respect to another matter, the hon. member for Lisgar was entirely right when he said that in days of depression you cannot begin to operate an unemployment insurance plan. But, as I have pointed out frequently and again point out to-night, the idea is this —that we are making a movement towards improvement, that we have already improved, that we shall continue to improve, and that we have learned from experience how desirable it is, at the very threshold of improvement, to take advantage of the possibilities of that improvement and to see to it that there shall be adequate provision for self-support on the part of those who are so vitally concerned.

In no captious spirit—because I am not discussing this in any narrow party sense—in no captious spirit, I say, nor yet in any spirit of criticism do I say that if in 1922 this legislation had been enacted, between then and 1930 there would have been this peculiar condition—a continued increase in employment and therefore in volume of the fund and a continued lessening of demands upon the fund as employment increased, so that the reserve would have been very great. In other words, the more prosperous the community grew between 1922 and 1930, because of the great improvement that was going on throughout the world, winding up in the spectacular debacle of 1929-30, you would have had by this fixed assessment upon the employee's wage a very large fund accumulating; and because he was relatively so little out of work during that period throughout the world, and especially in Canada, there would have been a very large reserve available for purposes so much required.

I mention this because it is rather important to keep in mind that fact. That is the reason why at this time we believe it is desirable to prepare this legislation and submit it to the house. It is the reason why in 1931 I indicated to the house that in my judgment it should be done, and it is the reason why I still believe it should be done. Now I will give a few figures with respect to these periods of time. They are figures that have been supplied by the bureau of statistics and they have reference in the first instance to the fact that in the census that was taken we asked every individual enumerated whether or not he or she was out of employment. And you will recall that I gave you figures the other evening from Mr. Cudmore's memorandum as to the number that were wholly out of employment and the number out of employment part time.

It is not possible to arrive at any sound conclusion from one year or two years; you must, I submit, have some average whereby you will be able to draw a fair inference having regard to the general business cycles of the world. We have taken therefore for our actuarial computations the years from 1921 to 1931 inclusive,—that is, eleven years. In the nine years from 1922 to 1930, the number of workers corresponding to those covered by the bill which I now have the honour to introduce averaged 1,605,833 persons. That is, on the average, under this bill, there would be under its operation 1,605,833 persons. Now here is the amazing fact supporting what I have just submitted to the house. The number losing no time at all during that period, 1922-30, was the very large figure of 1,125,689. The number losing some time was 480,144. The percentage losing some time was therefore 29.9 per cent. The average weeks lost by the idle was 18.4 per cent and the average weeks lost by all workers was only 5.5 per cent. The idle percentage for the period was 10.6 per cent.

The figures on which these actuarial calculations are made cover altogether an eleven year period, the years 1921 to 1931 inclusive. In 1921 the average percentage idle was 11·8 per cent and in 1931 it was nearly double that, being 22·5 per cent, the average over the eleven years being 12·5 per cent.

I believe it will be the wish of the committee to have before it the actuarial table prepared by Mr. Andrew D. Watson, chief actuary of the dominion Department of Insurance, and Mr. Hugh H. Wolfenden, a consulting actuary, on which table we have acted in the preparation of the measure which we have submitted to the house. They are both Fellows of the Institute of Actuaries of Great Britain as well as of the Actuarial Society of America, and they enjoy an international reputation. While possibly there is no duty to have these reports printed, it might be desirable to have them printed between now and second reading of the bill so that every hon. member may have before him a copy of the information which has been compiled on the report of the bureau of statistics, based as I have said upon the reporting firms as well as upon the information derived from the census of 1931.

I realize that necessarily there are imperfections in a measure of this character. I do not for a single moment suggest that it is free from imperfections, but as we are all desirous and have expressed our willingness to enact such legislation I can only say that the government will view with the greatest pleasure and satisfaction constructive and timely suggestions from those who sit in any part of the chamber in order that the legislation when completed may serve to the very greatest possible extent the demands and necessities of those whom it is sought to benefit.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the Prime Minister concludes his remarks may I ask him a question? He said that he had some doubt for some time as to the intra vires of a measure of this kind. Can he inform the house how recently he became satisfied in his mind that the measure that he is now introducing would be intra vires?

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think the house is greatly interested in the exact moment when like Saul of Tarsus journeying to Damascus I saw the light. But I have given consideration to the legal aspect of this matter. I once practised law, and I would like to say to the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. McPhee), not with the measure of success he indicated; nevertheless I have given a great deal of study to the matter and I convinced myself that the effect of the treaty statute, to which perhaps I should have directed my attention earlier than I did, and the two decisions of the privy council to which reference was made last evening, warrant the conclusion at which I have arrived.

Mr. GRAY: Before the Prime Minister takes his seat, may I ask him a question?

Mr. BENNETT: This is not the proper time. There is no debate on the introduction of a bill.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister has just said, this motion being one for leave to introduce a bill it is not proper that a debate should take place at this stage, neither is it expected that, on the part of the member of the government introducing a bill, more than a word of general explanation would be given at the time he is asking for leave to introduce his bill. But I hasten to say that I think the review which the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has given to the house of legislation on unemployment insurance in other countries and the history of it in Great Britain will be distinctly helpful to hon. members in their consideration of this measure and it is altogether appropriate that it should have been given at this time. As I have said there is no discussion on the motion for leave to introduce a bill and debate is not expected at this stage unless it is intended to oppose the motion. I wish to say that far from opposing the motion to introduce a national system of unemployment insurance hon. members on this side have long been advocating that such a system should be introduced in this house, and we welcome the introduction of such a measure at this time. We would have welcomed it still more had it been introduced, I shall not say at the first session of this parliament—

An hon. MEMBER: In 1928.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —but at the second or third session, in order that this house might have had opportunity to give to a measure of such magnitude the due consideration which ought to be given to all aspects of a bill of this kind.

The Prime Minister has referred to the genius of the British people in dealing with social questions. If I might agree with him in that, I would add that the reason the British people have a genius in these matters is that they do not proceed by leaps and bounds in dealing with important measures which affect the whole nation, but the British method is that of nature herself which never hastens but also never rests. The British method recognizes the importance of growth in matters of this kind. Had we at least had the question of jurisdiction cleared beyond all doubt at one session, and had we had such conferences with the provinces that we might have known their attitude toward matters of this nature, we would have been in a much better position to deal in a satisfactory way with this legislation some time ago, or than we are at this time. It is regrettable that we have had to wait until the last session of this parliament to consider a national unemployment insurance scheme. But with a measure at last before us, may I say on behalf of myself and the members of the opposition that we shall endeavour in the words of the Prime Minister to be constructively helpful in the passage through this house of such provisions of it as may on their merits commend themselves to us.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is the bill available for distribution?

Mr. BENNETT: It is not available for distribution in the form in which it has been moved. The preamble has been added to it. It was the preamble that I had to deal with on Saturday last, as I explained to the house.

Mr. HANBURY: It has been under consideration for a year.

Mr. BENNETT: It has been under consideration for some time and the preamble has just been settled, but I do not apprehend it will take long to complete the English copy. The French copy may take longer to complete because of translation. The bill will not be moved on its second reading until it is printed in English and in French.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May we expect to-morrow to receive copies of the bill in English?

Mr. BENNETT: I cannot answer that question definitely. I can send the leaders of the parties copies of the bill with the amendments that have been made typewritten in before it is printed, and I shall be glad to do so to-morrow.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the right hon. gentleman will send us copies when the bill is distributed generally, that will be satisfactory.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

EXTENSION OF PENSION PROVISIONS AND DISTRIBUTION OF FINES AND PENALTIES

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act to provide that military service in South Africa may be counted for the purposes of pension, and to make further provisions in respect to the application of penalties and to contributions to the dependents' pension fund.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee—Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton) in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): How many are involved in this?

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is not a very extensive financial operation. Certain persons who served in the South African war subsequently joined the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Members of the militia who served in that war and subsequently became attached to the permanent force of Canada were permitted to count service in South Africa as part of their service for pension purposes, but this course was not adopted in regard to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. There are at most five, possibly only three, members of the mounted police force who would be entitled to count service in South Africa as part of their time for pension purposes. This bill, if adopted, would enable them to do so on payment of the arrears into the pension fund. That is the main feature of the bill. The other is merely to provide for the distribution of the fines and penalties which have accumulated in a fund in the hands of trustees, and to enable contributions to be made from that fund to dependents of members of the force.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have no quarrel with the resolution, but last year in the civil service committee representations were made from various quarters of the civil service about some addition being made to the Superannuation Act for the purpose of extending its provisions to, for instance, the soldier settlement board and other branches of the service to which at present the act does not extend. The government did not see fit to concur in the recommendations of the committee in that regard. This amendment would operate on the line recommended by that committee. I do not see any reason why we should make fish of one and flesh of the other. I hope this may serve as a precedent for the opening of the Superannuation Act so as to extend the same measure of justice to other branches of the government service to which at present the Superannuation Act does not apply.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am afraid I am not in a position to answer my hon. friend's question or give any assurance in the matter. I have a very hazy recollection of the proceedings of the civil service committee; I remember that it did report, but whether its report was adopted by the house I do not know. This is such a minor matter that I do not think it will establish a precedent one way or the other. The commissioner told me today that he thought there were only two men involved, but he said certainly not more than five. It is merely to give them the same treatment as was accorded to members of the permanent force.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have no hesitation in voting for this resolution, but the minister says it is a small matter. That may be, but why not extend the same measure of justice to those who constitute a larger number?

Mr. POWER: Does this measure apply to persons formerly in the civil service who were blanketed into the Royal Canadian Mounted Police by legislation last year or the year before?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, it applies only to those who served in the South African war.

Mr. POWER: But the minister will remember that either last year or the year before a large number of civil servants, employees of the Department of National Revenue, were blanketed into or transferred to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Are the persons affected by this act among those who were so blanketed in, or are they original members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not think they were among those blanketed in. I think these are old members of the force who never were in the customs service at all.

Sir EUGENE FISET: But if any of the men transferred from the excise forces last year are old South African veterans they will come under this bill. I think there were one or two.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Guthrie thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 9, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INTERPRETATION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the third reading of Bill No. 3, to amend the Interpretation Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

REPRESENTATION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the third reading of Bill No. 4, to amend the Representation Act, 1933.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

JURIES IN SASKATCHEWAN—DURATION OF RACE MEETINGS

On the order:

Third reading of Bill No. 5, an act to amend the criminal code.—The Minister of Justice.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, for reasons which I will state in a moment I am going to move that this bill be referred back to the committee of the whole house with instructions to amend the clause in respect of the jury system in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. My reason for making this motion is that since the bill was given second reading the province of Alberta has made representations that it does not want any amendment to the criminal code in respect of that province.

Upon investigation we find that a jury system of six jurors in criminal cases has been in vogue in Alberta since a time prior to the entrance of that province into confederation. It existed under the provisions of the old Northwest Territories Act. That system has been continued as originally started without any amendment of the criminal code whatever, and the law officers of the province of Alberta now ask that there be no interference or change in the criminal code of Canada which would affect the old established jury system of that province. On the other hand the province of Saskatchewan desires the amendment. As the amendment was drawn it applied to both Alberta and Saskatchewan. Now I will ask leave to amend the bill by striking out the word "Alberta" in that section and allowing the amendment to apply only to the province of Saskatchewan. This is at the request of the law officers of the province of Alberta.

I therefore move that the bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole house.

Motion agreed to.

PENSION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved the third reading of Bill No. 6, to amend the Pension Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF*

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Did the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett declare before the Toronto Conservative Business Men's Club on January 19, 1932: "Every cent of the $20,000,000 voted by parliament for unemployment relief at the September, 1930, session had been of incalculable value"?
2. Was that sum of $20,000,000 entirely spent?
3. If not, what proportion of it was spent and why was it not spent in full?

Mr. BENNETT: The other day I pointed out that I cannot answer the first part of this question. With respect to the second part, the whole of the $20,000,000 was not spent, but something over $18,000,000 was expended before the grant lapsed. Without any notice or any chance to check it up I cannot answer a question predicated upon the premise that certain statements were made by any hon. member of this house as long ago as 1932.

BANK OF CANADA APPOINTMENTS*

Mr. RAYMOND:

1. Since July 3, 1934, the date of the enforcement of the Bank of Canada Act, did the government appoint any persons for the management of same; if so, what persons have been appointed and to what positions respectively, where were they residing when appointed and on what dates were they appointed?
2. Are there any other appointments to be made by the government?
(a) If so, why were not such appointments made?
(b) When will such appointments be made?
3. What other appointments of officers or employees have been made by the provisional administrators of the said bank, what are their names, where were they residing when appointed, when were they appointed and what are their duties?

Mr. BENNETT: This question is not in proper form. I would point to the second part of the question reading:

2. Are there any other appointments to be made by the government?
(a) If so, why were not such appointments made?
(b) When will such appointments be made?

These are both questions which this house has indicated should not be asked. I have already answered both questions in replying to a question asked at the opening of the house one day. In regard to the third part of the question, the government has no record at all. I suppose it might be secured, but that would be extremely difficult.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY*

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. How many miles of the trans-Canada highway remain: (a) unconstructed; (b) partially constructed?
2. Of such, how many miles remain to be completed: (a) in Ontario; (b) in British Columbia?
3. What is the total estimated cost of completing the trans-Canada highway?
4. Of such total cost, what is the estimated cost in: (a) Ontario; (b) British Columbia?

Mr. BENNETT: Part of the information in that respect would have to be obtained from provincial sources.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I mean as far as the information is available here.

Question stands.

GARIBALDI PARK*

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. Has the government taken into consideration the requests from British Columbia for taking over Garibaldi park as a national park?
2. Is the government prepared to make any statement with regard thereto?

Mr. BENNETT: The answer to the first question is yes and the answer to the second question is no.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS—RUSSIA*

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Did the Canadian delegation sign, on or about September 15, 1934, an invitation to the U.S.S.R. to join "and bring its valuable collaboration to" the council of the League of Nations?
2. If so, who signed this invitation on behalf of the Canadian delegation?
3. Did the assembly, on or about September 17, 1934, refer to the sixth committee the question of admitting the U.S.S.R.?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is not in his place, and perhaps it might be desirable to have the question stand until he is here. The whole circumstances in connection with the admission of Russia to the League of Nations are covered by the report made by the Canadian delegates to the fifteenth assembly of the League of Nations, laid on the table of the house in English and French a few days ago. They will be found at pages 6 and 21 of that report. That is the answer, but the hon. member may wish to have the question stand.

MR. HERMENEGILDE BOULAY*

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Was a claim made to the government by Mr. Hermenegilde Boulay, of Kedgewick, Restigouche county, New Brunswick, as ex-member of the House of Commons, on his own behalf and of several others, for compensation for loss of property by forest fire at Oliver through negligence alleged by claimants on the part of members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?
2. If so, what is the amount of the claim?
3. Has the claim been paid?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will answer this question verbally. The answer to question No. 1 is yes. The answer to question No. 2 is $2,500. The answer to question No. 3 is no.

TERRITORY OF AFGHANISTAN*

Mr. POULIOT:

As Afghanistan is now a member of the League of Nations, has Canada in its capacity as a member of the league assumed by that fact certain obligations relative to the defence and the integrity of the territory of Afghanistan, and are those obligations reciprocal?

Mr. BENNETT: That also is covered by the report to which I have referred, in which a full statement is made of the circumstances under which Afghanistan was admitted to the League of Nations.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

DUNDURN, SASK., UNEMPLOYMENT CAMP

Mr. SPENCER:

With regard to the unemployment camp at Dundurn, Saskatchewan,—
1. Who does the purchasing?
2. Who supplies the provisions?
3. What are the general prices paid, and on what basis are they agreed upon?
4. Who does the trucking of these supplies?
5. Is the truck used at night?
6. What is the driver's name?
7. Who is the cashier?

BRITISH WORLD TRADE

Mr. POULIOT:

What proportion of the world trade did the strictly British trade represent, that is to say, between Great Britain and the British possessions: (a) from September 1, 1929, to August 31, 1930; (b) from September 1, 1930, to August 31, 1931; (c) from September 1, 1931, to August 31, 1932; (d) from September 1, 1932, to August 31, 1933; (e) from September 1, 1933, to August 31, 1934?

EXPORTS AND IMPORTS

Mr. POULIOT:

From September 1, 1930, was the total amount: (a) of Canadian imports and (b) Canadian exports, each month, larger, equal or smaller than the total amount: (a) of the Canadian imports and (b) of the Canadian exports during each corresponding month, from September 1, 1929, to August 31, 1930?

Mr. POULIOT:

1. From January 1, to December 31, 1934, was the monthly amount: (a) of Canadian imports, and (b) of Canadian exports larger, equal or smaller than the total monthly amount: (a) of Canadian imports, and (b) of Canadian exports, during the same period of 1930?
2. If there is a difference between 1930 and 1934, how much more or how much less is it?

Mr. POULIOT:

Were Canada's imports from and Canada's exports to Great Britain and other British countries larger or smaller in the twelve months ended August 31st: (a) 1931; (b) 1932; (c) 1933; (d) 1934, than in the twelve months ended August 31, 1930?

TITLES, HONOURS AND AWARDS

On the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King:

That, in the opinion of this house, the Prime Minister should refrain from recommending to His Majesty the King the conferring of any grade of the peerage or of any order of baronetcy or of knighthood upon any of His Majesty's subjects resident in Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To-day we have had the introduction of one measure of social and industrial reform, and I suppose that is only the first of a number of measures. I think it is important that possibly the house should give its attention to those questions before it proceeds to the consideration of others. I therefore purpose not to proceed with the resolution which stands in my name at the present time but to give opportunity and time for the immediate study and discussion of industrial and social questions.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Bury): Stands.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I suggest it is hardly fair to members whose resolutions appear on the order paper to have them called at this late hour. To-morrow is the regular day for private members' motions, and I suggest it would be better to call it eleven o'clock, as we already have had a heavy day.

Mr. BENNETT: In order that there may be no misunderstanding, in view of the fact that at least one of these resolutions stood because I was not here yesterday, we will consider we have not called the order for notices of motion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it did not stand because of that.

Mr. BENNETT: No?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it stood for the reasons I mentioned. I was afraid a discussion on titles might occupy considerable time of the house, and I thought it more important that time should be devoted to a discussion of social and industrial problems.

Mr. BENNETT: I agree.

Motion stands.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.35 p.m.

Wednesday, January 30, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. MACKENZIE KING

On the order for motions:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on a matter concerning the privileges of this house I should like to direct your honour's attention and the attention of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to the fact that up to the present time hon. members of this house have not received copies of the unemployment insurance bill. Yesterday we were told by the Prime Minister that we might receive these copies in the course of a day or two, but I observe that the newspapers or some of them have been supplied with copies or, if not with actual copies then with a summary infinitely more detailed and comprehensive than anything that has been given hon. members of this house. That I think is a distinct violation of the privileges of this house. Surely hon. members are entitled to receive the first information as to the contents of any bill; certainly they should receive such information before it is given to the press. We do not know yet when we are to receive the copies of the bill, but in the meantime there has been broadcast from one end of Canada to the other what purports to be its provisions, and they are given in a form which would indicate that the main provisions of the bill have been made accessible to the press in a manner in which they have not been made accessible to hon members of the house. I should be glad to hear what the Prime Minister has to say with regard to the matter.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The right hon. gentleman makes two points. One is an endeavour to have it appear that there has been a delay in connection with the printing of the bill. The rules of this house require that on the first reading of a bill it shall be handed to the clerk either in printed form, in typewritten form or in written form, as the case may be, and that it shall be printed in English and in French before the second reading is moved. I explained last evening that the bill had been printed but that the preamble to the bill had been typewritten and attached to it, there being no preamble to the bill during the period of discussion of the details of the measure, and that doubtless the bill would be completed and distributed at an early day. I do not know just how long it may take to make the changes necessary for the purpose of having that done, but when the printing is completed the second reading will be moved.

As to the second point, I have no knowledge at the moment from what source the information contained in the press was obtained. It was not obtained from me. When I saw it in the press this morning I assumed it was obtained from inspection of the bill that was tabled last night in duplicate. Whether or not that was the case I do not know. I will inquire and acquaint the house with the facts. It may be that a précis was prepared and handed out, but I have no knowledge of that being so. I can only say that I concluded that what I saw in the press had been obtained by the journalists from the copies which were handed in yesterday in duplicate, on the first reading, but I will make the necessary inquiries and advise the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the Prime Minister if he regards the privileges of the house as having been adequately protected when members of the press obtain the details of a government measure before they are made accessible to hon. members themselves?

Mr. BENNETT: Since I have been a member of this house I have had frequent occasion, when the right hon. gentleman was Prime Minister, to complain of what I conceived to be breaches of the privileges of this house, but in these days one cannot be certain that the privileges of the house may not be invaded very frequently. Certainly I will do my utmost to protect the privileges of this house, and I trust that the right hon. gentleman will be as solicitous in the maintenance of those privileges as I shall endeavour to be.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the Prime Minister when his bill will be distributed and made available to hon. members?

Mr. BENNETT: I have already said that I do not know.

TRANSLATION OF ESTIMATES

On the order for motions:

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) raised the question of the estimates not being printed in French. No exception is taken to his having done so, but I thought the brief discussion which followed rather left the impression that the procedure followed this year in bringing down the estimates may have been different from that which has obtained in previous years. As a matter of fact I have made careful inquiry, and I find that the invariable practice in this house has been for the estimates to be submitted printed in English only. It then becomes the duty and responsibility of the House of Commons translation staff to provide for the translation. That is why it was that when the question was raised yesterday I was not in a position to inform hon. members as to whether the estimates were actually at that time printed in French. I have examined the records, and the following figures which I shall place on Hansard will serve to indicate the respective times at which English and French copies of the estimates have been made available:

Year—	English	French
1925-1926	Feb. 16, 1925	Mar. 3, 1925
1926-1927	Mar. 15, 1926	Apr. 9, 1926
1927-1928	Feb. 15, 1927	Feb. 21, 1927
1928-1929	Jan. 27, 1928	Feb. 8, 1928
1929-1930	Feb. 18, 1929	Feb. 26, 1929
1930-1931	Feb. 27, 1930	Mar. 11, 1930
1931-1932	Apr. 13, 1931	Apr. 20, 1931
1932-1933	Feb. 15, 1932	Feb. 22, 1932
1933-1934	Feb. 1, 1933	Feb. 7, 1933
1934-1935	Jan. 26, 1934	Feb. 14, 1934

At this session the English edition was brought down on January 23, and the French edition was available on January 30. As a matter of fact, it is ready for distribution and was distributed early this morning. I make this statement merely to make it clear that no matter what may be said with respect to the propriety of the practice which has been followed, it is a practice which has been in strict conformity with the one which obtained in this house, so far as the records show, in all times past.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, I am speaking to a question of privilege. I do not wish the hon. member to misconstrue my statement of yesterday. I did not complain of the fact that—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is not a question of privilege. If the hon. member would like to ask the minister a question he may do so under a later order on the order paper.

Mr. RHODES: Perhaps the hon. member did not follow my opening remarks.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. RHODES: I said I had no fault to find with the question raised by the hon. member, but that the incident yesterday had served to call into question whether the practice which had been followed this year had been different from that of previous years. It is only to correct the possibility of a wrong impression that I have given these figures.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ACT

PROVISION FOR AMENDMENTS TO FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT, 1934

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 10, to amend the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill provides for four amendments to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934. All of them are designed with a view to improving the operation and efficiency of the act and to enable it to accomplish more fully the purposes which were in mind when the original act was passed.

The first amendment enlarges the period of a stay of proceedings from sixty to ninety days. It has been found in practice that in certain cases official receivers have had before them for consideration as many as 250 applications, and in the nature of things they have not been able to consider them within the sixty day period.

The second amendment is quite important but, as I believe will be found with respect to the others, it is not contentious. As the act stands at present there must be a decision by the full board of review, and there is no provision made for the functioning of the board in the event of one of its members becoming incapacitated either because of illness or for any other reason. This amendment provides that in such circumstances two members of the board may appoint an ad hoc member.

A third amendment is merely to clarify what was originally the intention of the act, namely that the decision of the board of review shall be filed with the clerk of the county court or of the district court, as the case may be. There is an ambiguity in the wording of the act as it stands at present which might make possible the argument that it would be competent for a county court judge to sit in judgment by way of appeal upon a decision of the board of review. This amendment makes it clear that it is intended merely that the decision of the board of review shall be filed for purposes of record with the county court.

The fourth amendment is designed more particularly for the province of Ontario, although by its terms it is applicable to the whole of Canada. It enables the chairman of the board in certain cases to delegate a member of the board to make inquiries in far flung areas and to gather together certain data and statistics for the benefit of the board, placing upon him the duty to report back to the board.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

1. What was the total production of butter and cheese in each of the provinces of Canada during the year 1933?

2. What was the total production of butter and cheese in each of the provinces of Canada during the year 1934?

LEAGUE OF NATIONS—ADMISSION OF RUSSIA*

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Did the Canadian delegation sign, on or about September 15, 1934, an invitation to the U.S.S.R. to join "and bring its valuable collaboration to" the council of the league of nations?

2. If so, who signed this invitation on behalf of the Canadian delegation?

3. Did the assembly, on or about September 17, 1934, refer to the sixth committee the question of admitting the U.S.S.R.?

4. If so, did a Canadian delegate declare before that committee that he would not object, in the public interest, to the admission of the U.S.S.R.?

5. If so, why?

6. Did the Canadian delegation officially meet, in Geneva in September, 1934, Mr. Maxim Litvinoff, People's Commissary for Foreign Affairs of the U.S.S.R.?

7. If so, did the Canadian delegation make any agreements with the Russian delegation, and, if it did, what are these agreements, particularly with regard to exportation of wheat and lumber to Great Britain?

In view of what was said yesterday by the Prime Minister I shall amend the question by striking out paragraphs 3, 4 and 5. The information asked for in the two first and the two last paragraphs is not mentioned in either the report of the Canadian delegates to the Assembly of the League of Nations or the monthly summary of the League of Nations for September, 1934. This is most important, and I should be very thankful if the government would answer it.

Mr. BENNETT The answer to questions 6 and 7 is no, in both cases. The answers to the other questions are indicated in the report of the League of Nations, as I have indicated, at pages 6 and 21. It was tabled the other day.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

BANK OF CANADA—APPOINTMENTS

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): moved:

For a copy of all applications for appointments in the Bank of Canada, and a return showing all appointments made, with names of appointees, salaries paid and previous occupations in each case.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the motion as it stands in its present form is not acceptable. It would call for a return very voluminous in character, although, of course, to that itself there is no objection; but I can see no good reason in the public interest why a person who has applied for a position in a given service should have his name published abroad if he is not appointed. It seems to me that the responsibility of the government has to do with those appointments with respect to which it has taken action, and in those instances of course the fullest information should be disclosed. I am speaking now with respect to those appointments which are within the purview of its authority.

So far as the appointments to the staff of the bank itself are concerned they are not government appointments in any sense. They are made by the management of the bank and I have no hesitation in saying with respect to many hundreds of applications that came to me they are not a matter of record with me at all. All I did with respect to those was to pass them on to the management of the bank for such action as they in their judgment thought wise to take, and so they are not a matter of record at all.

It seems to me that the motion might properly be amended to ask only for that information which is within the possession of the government and with respect to those appointments for which the government is responsible. If the motion was amended to read something like this—for a return showing all appointments made by the government to the Bank of Canada, with the names of such appointees, the salaries paid, and the previous occupation in each case—there would be no objection.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate very much the remarks of the Minister of Finance, but I regret very much I cannot accept his suggestion to amend my motion, for this reason. Last year when the Bank of Canada bill was before this house and also in the banking and commerce committee there was emphasized at every stage by those of us on this side of the house the necessity in the one case of ownership, and secondly the necessity of control by this parliament over the bank. My question raises distinctly and directly the question of control by this parliament, and I submit that this house is entitled not only to know the appointments made directly by the minister or by the government but also to receive the fullest information in regard to all appointments made by the directors of the bank or by the officials of the bank before the directors were appointed the other day. I think there is at least some element of control which should be maintained by hon. members on the floor of this house, and while I appreciate the courtesy of the minister in notifying me of his objection I must insist on my objection to any amendment such as the minister suggests.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the motion is not a debatable one and I do not think that the hon. member upon consideration will think that any government could accept it. It would require a very large staff working I should think continuously for months to satisfy the request now made. For some strange reason, as soon as the Bank of Canada was incorporated, various people throughout Canada wrote letters seeking employment in the bank. I received hundreds of such letters. It would be a very difficult task to get them all together. The Minister of Finance I happen to know received not only hundreds, but thousands of such letters. I think the total number he received was two thousand or thereabouts. I have spoken to my colleagues and I find that they are in exactly the same position as myself, of having received hundreds of such applications. I am also informed that members received them and sent them in to the various ministers. In every instance no action was taken except to indicate that action would have to be taken, when the bank began to function, by those responsible for its operations.

With respect to the others, what the minister has said is all that could reasonably be expected, that is, as to actual appointments made, and the salaries paid. The government will have to oppose the motion as it now stands. It is not in the public interest and would serve no useful purpose to keep a number of people engaged for months copying letters sent in from various parts of the country to various ministers for the purpose of seeking a position in the bank.

Motion negatived, on division.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask the Minister of Finance now, arising out of the decision of the house, if he will submit the information that he was kind enough to mention could be supplied?

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Speaker, I shall be very happy indeed to comply with the request of my hon. friend.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—MONTREAL

Mr. LAURIN:

For a copy of all telegrams, correspondence, letters and other documents, passing between the federal government and the Quebec government and the municipal administration of the city of Montreal, since March 31, 1934, respecting unemployment relief grants in the city of Montreal.

Mr. RINFRET: I would ask the hon. gentleman who is moving this motion if he would object to amending it to read "since March 31, 1932," instead of 1934? Otherwise I shall have to move for another address myself. I think the easier way would be to amend this one, changing the date to 1932 instead of 1934, if my hon. friend has no objection.

Mr. LAURIN: I have no objection, Mr. Speaker, to amending the motion accordingly.

Motion as amended agreed to.

For a return showing the number of names contained in the electoral lists of each of the twenty-one constituencies in the province of Saskatchewan as a consequence of the general registration recently held under the provisions of the Dominion Franchise Act, assented to July 3, 1934, and the required proclamation thereunder issued by the Dominion Franchise Commissioner, September 19, 1934.

SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC RESEARCH

SCIENTIFIC PLANNING IN THE NATIONAL ECONOMIC LIFE

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer) moved:

Whereas, in adopting the resolution moved in this house, which stated as its objective the creation of a national council of social and economic research, this parliament has accepted the principle of the organized application of scientific methods in the consideration of economic problems,

And whereas, the conditions which prevail in this dominion and throughout the world, with the growing burden of debt, the general stagnation of business and the anomaly of wide spread poverty and privation in the midst of an abundance hitherto unknown, would point to the inevitable conclusion that the consideration which has been given to the adoption of those scientific principles should now be implemented by definite action.

Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, the time has arrived, and is long overdue, when a degree of well considered and scientific planning, on a national scale, should be substituted for the present practice of uncontrolled competition and unguided individual effort, in the conduct of the economic life of Canada.

He said: In moving this resolution at this time it is not my purpose to debate the question at any length. In the first place the resolution is largely self-explanatory and, I think, within itself, contains both the purpose and the reason of that purpose; and in the second place the purpose for which this resolution was placed on the order paper has already in part been served and is in the process of accomplishment.

It will be remembered by hon. members that on May 4, in the session of 1931, I moved a resolution asking for the creation of a national council which I suggested might be called the National Council of Social and Economic Research, and indicated as the objective of that motion and the purpose of that council the assistance which might be given such a body in planning the economic life of this nation, so that instead of the chaotic conditions which we then found and still find we might substitute a degree of order and correlation.

At that time the government did not accept the motion and it was rejected. I moved the same motion in identical terms in the session of 1932, and at that time it met with a more sympathetic reception and was accepted by the government, conditionally, and by the house, the condition being that this should not be immediately set up but that sympathetic consideration should be given to the idea and to the purpose, with the possibility and prospect of future action. I waited then for two years, and last session there stood upon the order paper in my name a resolution couched in the same terms as that which I am moving to-day. Owing to sickness I was absent from the house at the time the matter came up so that the resolution was not proceeded with and it was dropped. I again placed it on the order paper for this session, and I may say at once that it was put on the order paper prior to the public announcements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and prior to the statement made over the radio and embodied in the speech from the throne that such a council was in the government program for this session and would be created.

I feel however, and it has been suggested to me, that it might be well to place this resolution squarely before the house with the issue involved, not the issue of the creation of an economic council, but the issue as between well considered national planning on the one hand and uncontrolled private initiative and competition on the other.

I believe this is a question which is agitating the minds of the public at the present time and I think it is a matter in which this parliament should give the lead. I feel therefore that I should be derelict in my duty if I allowed this matter to drop without giving parliament an opportunity of making a pronouncement upon what I conceive to be a most important principle and one having a direct bearing not only upon the situation in the country but upon the program which has been presented for our consideration during this session.

In discussing such a matter I think we must accept certain principles as being involved and inevitably involved in this resolution, and the first is this: the right of the state—and when I use the term "state" I am using it in its widest sense—to indicate the rights of the men, women and children within the confines of Canada who constitute the state, its right to lay down the general rules, to enforce the general principles and regulations under which private business, private industry and individuals shall operate; that the activities of individuals, private business and groups of citizens must in the final analysis be subordinated to the best good and to the real interest of the state itself; and that not only has the state that right but that right carries with it the definite power and responsibility of controlling to the degree necessary the activities of its individual citizens, of encouraging those activities which are beneficial in their application to the state, beneficial to society as a whole, to the men, women and children who live within this country to the state, and of discouraging and either controlling by regulation or prohibiting by law those activities which, while possibly profitable to the individual, are antisocial in their effects so far as the general weal of the state is concerned. I believe that is a principle which should be accepted by the house. It is one which, if applied wisely and intelligently, would assist us in dealing with the problems which beset this country and in bringing to a happy conclusion the troubles which beset the state.

I shall not suggest the personnel or the definite functioning of this body. I can only say this, that I welcome with gratification the announcement by the government that such a body will be created. It has been suggested during the course of various discussions that the government in its program has, to use the term already employed in this house, stolen the thunder or stolen the platform of other bodies. May I say this at once, speaking for myself and I think for my immediate associates, that we do not look upon the matter in that light. We view with pleasure, we receive with gratification the announcement that policies in which we have believed, ideas which we have enunciated, have been accepted by that body which alone is competent to put those policies into effect. We feel that our objective has largely been accomplished when that has been done and that success has crowned our efforts. It matters not to me whether this is done and those ideas accepted by the government now in power or by any other government so long as they are accepted by that body which is competent to give effect to those opinions and principles.

It is unnecessary for me to outline to the house or to the country the conditions which make such a course of planning necessary. The effects of not only the last four or five years but of preceding years which led inevitably to the conditions which we now find, prove beyond a doubt and far more definitely than any words of mine can do our need of some controlling authority and some intelligent guidance. It is not suggested that it would be necessary in following such a course to shackle, confine and regiment the individual initiative of the people of this country; but it is suggested that all of those various activities which together make up the business and economic life of the state, should not be considered as individual units functioning only for themselves independent and thoughtless of all other interests, but should be looked upon in their true light, that of units within a body which is composed of all those units and their effectiveness should be judged not by the peculiar profits made within that particular line of activity but by the manner in which they may be coordinated and correlated with all other activities to produce a state within which the people of the country shall have an opportunity of enjoying to the fullest extent possible the productive capacity of that country; that they shall be servants and not masters of the community in which they reside.

It has been suggested and suggested more than once that if central planning of any kind were carried into effect it would destroy not only the initiative but the intelligent guidance given by those individual citizens. In answer to that suggestion I need only call to the attention of the house that that unguided effort, admirable though its motives may have been, admirable in many cases through the efficiency of those engaged in that unguided effort may have been, has resulted not in the good which was anticipated but in a degree of chaos, disorder and dissatisfaction which no one would desire to see within a country so endowed by nature as is Canada.

I shall not presume to suggest to the government the form of that council; nor in suggesting that such a body may be of great assistance am I in any way detracting from the ability, sincerity or desire to be of service attributable to every government, not only as at present composed but to any government which may succeed it; but I am suggesting that in the very nature of things it is impossible for any prime minister or any executive cabinet, involved, immersed as they are from day to day in their tasks and meeting as they must do, demands upon their time and energy, to devote that thought, that intensive study to the correlation of the various activities within this country which in my opinion is essential. Further—and I think I may suggest this without offense—no matter how a government may be constituted, under what party or under what name, no government will claim that within its own executive ranks will be found all the brains, intelligence and talent of the country itself. I think it will be admitted by everyone that valuable aid may be given, valuable service rendered if to the assistance of that government, whatever it may be, may be called the best brains within the country and outside the government to advise and assist it in its great task.

As I stated, the resolution is self-explanatory. The principle involved is clear and distinct and if I may conclude by repeating my first observation, it is the definite assertion of the principle of the right of the state to lay down to all its citizens the rules, orders, regulations under which they shall function in the best interests of the state as opposed to the philosophy of thought that believes that out of uncontrolled private initiative, out of uncontrolled competition, out of the turmoil and chaos thus created, will eventually emerge in some miraculous manner the perfect state and the greatest happiness to the greatest number.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Toronto Northwest): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) introduced his motion in 1932 for the appointment of an economic council I had the pleasure of supporting it. And to-day I have the pleasure of supporting in a general way the resolution proposed by the hon. member. I believe it was Abraham Lincoln who said that "if we could first know where we are and whither we are tending we could better judge what to do and how to do it." Those words, used by the great emancipator seventy-five or eighty years ago, are just as applicable to-day. I received yesterday from Washington a report of a committee on economic security, appointed by the president of the United States to report to him. In this report I see on the first page a paragraph that I believe is worth quoting. The letter of transmittal is signed by the present Secretary of Labour, Miss Frances Perkins. It begins:

Dear Mr. President:

In your message of June 8, 1934 to the congress you directed attention to certain fundamental objectives in the great task of reconstruction; an indistinguishable and essential aspect of the immediate task of recovery.

And it goes on to say that:

Among our objectives I place the security of the men, women, and children of the nation first.

To my way of thinking any plan for this country's planned welfare must put the security of men, women and children first. To continue:

This security for the individual and for the family concerns itself primarily with three factors. People want decent homes to live in; they want to locate them where they can engage in productive work; and they want some safeguard against misfortunes which cannot be wholly eliminated in this man-made world of ours.

Now, as a follower of this government I am very glad to say that I believe the legislation in hand or projected by it covers those three factors. Earlier in this session we had a discussion on the subject of homes. Anyone who travels across this country visiting our great cities, will find in them many homes not fit for human beings to live in, and not in large cities only but in our towns and villages and hamlets as well. I hope that the resolution moved earlier in the session in reference to the building of houses, and I believe more or less concurred in by all groups in the house, will be carried out.

In reference to productive work I will speak in a moment. As to safeguards against misfortunes that cannot be wholly eliminated, the resolution introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) yesterday, and supported, I believe, in principle in any event, by all parties, namely the resolution and later the bill on unemployment insurance, along with other bills which may be introduced later—although perhaps I have no right to speak of them, at present, will go a long way towards relieving the misfortunes under which the workers now suffer.

When this resolution was before the house on an earlier occasion I believe I said that it was in 1881 that the German Chancellor of that date, Prince Bismarck, first introduced the principle of an economic council and national planning. Germany herself did not do much with that until 1919 when in framing the German constitution at Weimar they incorporated in it that principle. Thereafter some seven or eight other European nations followed in line.

About the time of my visit to the old country in 1928, a special convention of the Liberal party of Great Britain had been planned to meet in Kingsway Hall, London, to discuss the question of industrial planning for that country. I discussed with several great manufacturers there and leaders of labour the subjects that were to come up at the meeting, which took place after I left England. That council was to consider national plans, not only for England but for all parts of the empire that are directed from Downing street. I find in a report of that council many recommendations, one being that a national economic council should be established, and another that a ministry of industry be established, and a council of industry consisting of twenty-five members. The report goes on to review the necessity for such a council and ministry, not to interfere with industry but to assist in developing it.

In 1931 the United States government also appointed a committee on this matter. I had the pleasure of visiting Washington to discuss with those associated with the committee their proposals. I will read one or two paragraphs in the report in reference to remarks made by the present Secretary of Labour at Washington, which I think are of interest in the present discussion. After all, any plan that any country is to use should include planning for work and for the proper housing and maintenance of the working classes. The present Secretary, Miss Perkins, then a witness before the committee, said:

> A system of public employment exchanges would assist us in organizing our labour market, and knowing where we needed to put the public works; people who had been longshoremen, for instance, could be sent into this pick and shovel work, and we would be in a position to take care of others at points where we would have to develop workshops. It would enable us, even in the midst of the depression, to take the best possible advantage of all the jobs there are.

In the operation of the unemployment insurance act in England they have divided the country into districts on a national planning scheme, with the purpose of providing employment in many districts. Miss Perkins describes that scheme in these words:

> The English system is really excellent. In that little country they have 417 principal offices and 700 branches scattered over the country. So every market town has its branch employment agency and knows the needs of that particular locality. That is what has made it possible for the English to drain what they call their depressed areas.

We heard from the Prime Minister last night something of what is already planned by the government, and I congratulate them on it.

Before that committee in Washington many able and outstanding men in industry, finance and commerce appeared, one of whom was Henry I. Harriman, and he is quoted as saying, speaking as an individual:

> I feel that if there had been in existence an economic council having the respect of the country, it would have been its duty to have pointed out the excess of speculation in 1928 and 1929, and the dangers of it, and the inevitable collapse that would follow such excessive speculation.

Whether that comes under a planning scheme I do not know, but certainly there should be some means of preventing what took place in 1928 and 1929 in regard to speculation. He continues:

> I think there should be set up a relatively small economic council.

And further on:

I believe that the council should be appointed by business and supported by business and should be, at the time, at any rate, purely advisory in its character, depending upon the type of men and on the character of its staff for its standing before the country. The problems that it will deal with are fundamental and underlying economic problems of the country, economic and business in their character.

The result of that very exhaustive inquiry into national planning is contained in a few resolutions which I will not take time to read. Reference is made to an examination of the natural resources of the country, as to how they can be best developed and in what association they should be developed. Reference is made also to the location of plants, many of which are located at points far removed from the best transportation facilities in regard to either raw products or the finished article. To my mind the result of the deliberations of that committee will have a beneficial effect on industry and employment in the United States, and I have no doubt that if Canada planned along similiar lines the benefit to employment and industry in this country would be equally great. The American Federation of Labour, at its convention in Vancouver, also endorsed the principle of economic national planning, and I believe it is high time that something should be done in the way of national planning in connection with industry.

Many hon. members are acquainted with the tremendous advances that have been made in Russia. I am not one of those who decry the efforts of the Russians in any shape or form; I am willing to give them credit for anything they have done in the way of providing employment in their country. They have departed, of course, to a considerable extent from their first theory that there should be no increased compensation for ability. To-day in Russia ability is recompensed to an extent, though perhaps not to as great an extent as was the case before the Soviet republic was formed. They have established at Magnetogorsk a tremendous concentration of steel and iron production that must be considered not only by Canada but by the world in general. That concentration of productivity covers twenty-five square miles. They have built a dam 3,500 feet long and 38 feet high across the Ural river, and they develop several hundred thousand horse power. The operation of the plant requires approximately 25,000 tons of material daily. They have eight batteries of coke ovens, each producing a thousand tons daily. To-day they produce 2,600,000 ingots of steel per year. I have been associated with the iron industry, and through it with the steel industry, for many years, and I find it difficult to visualize a plant capable of producing 2,600,000 ingots yearly. At that plant they produce 2,100,000 tons of steel rails per year. We have two or more good steel rail plants in Canada; just fancy a plant capable of producing over 2,000,000 tons per year. They have three large blooming mills of immense capacity, with blowers that produce 115,000 cubic feet of air per minute. That is national planning, even if it is in Russia, and Canada will have to consider doing some national planning along similiar lines. Last year in Russia they produced 10,500,000 tons of pig iron. That was the second largest production in the world, and this year they are aspiring to exceed that amount.

All the planning is not in Russia, however; there has been planning in Canada, and what has been done here has been well done. A year or two ago in our own Department of the Interior we had a branch that planned for all Canada in regard to the development of industry. I am told that this branch is out of commission. Certainly it is not in the Interior department, though it may be tucked away in some other department. That little branch deserved a great deal of credit for what it did while it was in existence. It had something to do with encouraging the development in this country of the immense rayon business that has developed to such an extent in the riding of my hon. friend from Stormont (Mr. Shaver), and it had to do with other lines of industry as well. Our national research council is conducting many effective researches that should be beneficial, but in my opinion, though I may be wrong, their discoveries are not taken advantage of by industry to the extent that should be the case. I am sure that if all their discoveries were carried into manufacturing the result would be a considerable increase in employment.

Now I should like to refer to something that is being done in the city of Toronto, which city has had an industrial commission for some years. That commission has rendered very great and effective service by way of bringing industries to Toronto, thereby giving employment to men and women. The commission has been in operation for only a few years; I believe it was organized shortly before this government came into power. During the last four or five years that commission has been successful in bringing to the Toronto area approximately 125 new plants.

I do not mean that 125 new factories were erected, but the new industries occupy 109 plants, either new or old, which they control. Sixteen of the industries sublet to other companies the manufacturing of their products. In these 125 new concerns, large and small, there are said to be employed 2,834 men, and the wages paid in one year amount to $2,822,000 or more. Perhaps not so much in the past year or two, but in days when they were making more money the great railroads had industrial planning commissions and undoubtedly they were successful in bringing many industries into the country, thereby providing employment. It is my view that if there were some way of coordinating industrial commissions, whether they be controlled by cities, railroads or other organizations, and bringing them under one national planning head we would save a great deal of wasted effort. Factories might not be erected in unsuitable locations. I have in mind a large factory which operates only at intervals and which so far as I am aware is not a financial success. It is forced to ship in its raw products to the plant location, and then must ship its finished product for hundreds of miles to the market for them. I believe if there were some system or scheme of national planning such as that advocated by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) we would be taking a step in the right direction. I do not have in mind any plan which would interfere with industry, because industry does not want interference. I was connected with it for a long time and I believe I know something about it, all the way through. It does however welcome and will accept assistance.

During the recess I visited a number of industries and I was in a position to see where national planning could be made effective. While during the depression Canadian industry has lost a great deal, yet it has benefited through its association with American manufacturing plants. Canadian engineers and managers have learned something through association with men engaged in the same occupations living in the United States. The result has been that to-day in Canada we are manufacturing many lines of machinery we did not make formerly. I visited a large plant at Dundas, in the riding of the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Wilson), a great plant operated by John Bertram and Sons. While there I saw three new machines the company was manufacturing. I have before me a photograph of one machine which is capable of turning out newsprint or rolled paper at the rate of 3,000 feet per minute, the complete roll being four feet in diameter and having a width of 306 inches. By individual effort that company induced the American owners of the patent to permit them to make it in Canada for export to the old country. I have no doubt our tariffs materially assisted, and undoubtedly the Ottawa agreements were in their favour. I am told these machines sell at a price ranging from $35,000 to $40,000, and that already several of them have been shipped out of this country.

While going through many plants it occurred to me that if we had national planning in industry, where industries would not have to spend their time and money experimenting, we would be farther ahead. If there were some national planning scheme to ascertain what could be economically made in Canada, and an effort made to induce Canadian companies to make those products industry would be greatly benefited and unemployment lessened.

The plant of John T. Hepburn Limited is in my riding, and I believe that company is now making some twenty-five new types of machinery, iron and steel appliances, which were not formerly made in Canada. In my talks with Mr. Hepburn we have agreed that if national planning were widely developed industry conditions of employment would be benefited.

Since the beginning of this parliament we have on many occasions heard the expression "the new age." Certainly in reference to production this is a new age; I would call it a power age. One can step into a plant to-day and simply by pulling a switch put the whole plant under operation; by pulling another switch he may set only one machine in motion. Because of automatic thermostats and other mechanical inventions employment is becoming a very complicated problem and I am convinced some planning will have to be developed to take care of the surplus employees who are thrown out of work by automatic equipment.

While we have an effective tariff, one with which I am in hearty accord, I sometimes feel that national planning might continue from where the tariff leaves off. The benefits which we have derived from the tariff and trade agreements might be augmented by some further degree of planning. While in northern Ontario looking over some mines I learned about a large steel order for steel plates which was going to be given to a foreign country. Upon returning to Toronto, through persuading people I knew, I was successful in having the order placed in Canada. That one order meant 21,000 man-days for Canadian workmen. I wonder how many orders for steel equipment and equipment of other kinds go to foreign manufacturers that could just as well be made in Canada. If there were some way of planning to assist industries to obtain these orders I am convinced industry and employment would be greatly helped.

National planning should be, as I said at the commencement, directed towards three ends, namely, decent homes, plenty of productive work and safeguards against the misfortunes of unemployment. After twenty-five years' experience in the industrial field I know that no line of national endeavour gives as much employment as is given by the manufacturing industry. Canada has four billion dollars invested in industrial plants and in normal times, through the brains and experience of industrialists, our plants produce about four billion dollars worth of manufactured products and employ approximately 1,000,000 workers. Having that in mind I am delighted at all times to raise my voice in support of whatever I believe will encourage the development of our natural resources and give employment to our people, and I am happy indeed to support the efforts of the hon. member for Red Deer in this regard.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (East Toronto): Mr. Speaker, coming from a large industrial centre where there is a large number of high schools and technical schools I wish to say a word on this resolution. The people of Canada up to two or three years ago have not been in the forefront of industrial and scientific research, and the result has been that Canada, with a population fifty per cent agricultural workers and fifty per cent industrial workers, stands far behind the mother country and the United States in its plans and methods of scientific and economic research for the benefit of the people of the country, although our problems are in the main the problems of these two great industrial countries.

This whole resolution is wrapped up with the question of research—scientific research, industrial research and social research, and with the main problem of all, unemployment.

For many years from 1921 to 1930 I brought before this house a motion for the appointment of an advisory economic committee for Canada which would deal with economic questions. In February, 1929, I asked the government this question:

1. Has the government any plans for providing employment for the great body of the unemployed?
2. If so, what are they, and what action will be taken, and when?

Again, in March, 1930, I asked the government this question:

1. Has the government any plans for providing useful employment for the great body of the unemployed?
2. If so, what relief will be afforded?
3. Will the government accept the offer of the province of Ontario to provide one-third of the cost of certain forms of relief in conjunction with the federal and the municipal authorities?

I also asked in the same year this question:

What steps, if any, will be taken by the government to promote the effective merchandising of agricultural commodities in inter-provincial, inter-imperial or in foreign commerce, so that the great basic industry of agriculture will be placed on a basis of economic equality with that of other industries?

I also presented to the house the report that was made by a special committee of the ministerial associations of the country, urging away back in 1926 and 1927 the appointment of a joint committee to study these particular problems. I quote from that committee's report:

Your committee is conscious that results will depend upon the birth and cultivation of a public conscience, which shall demand that standard of living in which no worthy citizen or his or her dependents shall suffer from hunger or cold by the operation of economic or other conditions beyond his or their control.

Unemployment is an unsolved but solvable problem. It results generally from the operation of forces beyond the direct control of the wage-earner, and constitutes a menace and challenge to every citizen.

Your committee believes unemployment contributes to the moral, mental and physical deterioration of our citizens, and involves immense annual economic losses.

Your committee believes the burden of responsibility to be a joint one resting upon all citizens, and in particular embracing the federal, the provincial and civic administrations.

I do not wish to offer any criticism of the government, Mr. Speaker, in this connection, because this particular resolution is above party politics. It goes to the very basis of economic and industrial society. The resolution refers to the necessity for scientific planning on a national scale. All industrial society in this dominion was built up in my opinion by Sir John A. Macdonald's policy of protection for agricultural and industrial workers, to provide work for our own workmen and our own markets for our own products.

Some years ago we established a national research council, and I think one of the main objects of that council should be to devise a policy that will provide a job for every man in this country by developing our natural resources, through research, and again research.

The creation of a national research council is all right in its way, as I said in 1929, but we want something more. We want research, and more research, to solve unemployment, which is a problem that has been aggravated by the advancement of science and the inroads of the machine. As I said the other day, I believe that the Edwardian and Georgian statesmen must accept part of the blame for their failure to study the advancement of science and the inroads of the machine and its relation to unemployment the whole world over.

In the United States over twelve years ago, while our Senate was on holidays, the United States Senate—it is never on holidays but works just as long as the house sits—appointed a committee to study the problem of unemployment. That committee, presided over by a very able man, Senator Couzens, former mayor of Detroit, made a study the world over of seasonal, technological and cyclical unemployment, and investigated the question of the contribution to unemployment of science and the machine. Then in 1929 and 1930, when the depression began, the people of the United States had an organization, federal, state and municipal, to cope with the problem because of the efforts of that committee which had been appointed twelve years before. In addition they had a census taken of their industrial workers, and there was a joint effort made by economic councils and various public bodies to solve the problem of unemployment with which they were confronted.

Similarly, Great Britain twenty-three years ago established old age pensions and sickness and unemployment insurance. I just point these things out, Mr. Speaker, to show what other countries have been doing. For nine or ten years in this house I brought this matter up myself, and I was told I was preaching blue ruin when I pointed out what had been done in England and the United States along the lines I have indicated.

After all is said and done, it is far more important that the heads of our families should have remunerative work. Our boards of trade and the federal Department of Trade and Commerce for the last fifteen years have been publishing returns showing an increase in the country's wealth, but without showing how it was distributed. What has been the effect of modern machinery on unemployment? Every new invention that is adopted in industry puts men out of work. Women can mind machines just as well as men, and many men have been displaced by women and the machine.

I believe in fair play between the producer and the consumer, and I think it is the duty of all men to consecrate their powers of mind and skill of hand to the bringing about of a better social order for the common good and not leave it to the government of the day alone to drag the country out of the mire. There is no true liberty for the working man to-day. His whole life and that of his family are at the mercy of economic forces which are entirely beyond the control of the wage earner. We are taught by the Carpenter of Nazareth that God endowed men not for their own good alone but that they might be of service to their fellows, and in the parable of the rich young man he condemned the wrong use of wealth. Profit making cannot be the basis of a purely Christian society; the wellbeing of the community as a whole should be the aim of each of its members.

This resolution deserves credit for bringing the problem to the attention of the house. The other day reference was made to our high schools. A large number of the high schools and collegiate institutes of Toronto are in my riding, and it is most unfortunate to see young men graduating every June merely to lead a jobless life. They do not like to sponge on their fathers and so they leave home and go west, riding the rods, as it is called, in the fall; and I am surprised that the provincial and municipal police authorities prosecute these young fellows. The country has spent some four billion dollars in connection with our railways by way of subsidies and one thing and another, and these young men, who cannot get any work at all, are prosecuted when they ride on the railways in this way. But the question is, Whence come these young men? They come from some of the finest homes in the country, Mr. Speaker, but after they graduate from our collegiate institutes they are left to shift for themselves in a way that should not be tolerated in a country which is supposed to be Christian.

Something should be done by our national and provincial councils along these lines. Our councils of research, national and provincial, are now at the crossroads so far as this problem of unemployment is concerned, and I hope that very soon they will be up and doing; instead of inactively occupying large houses of stone and mortar provided by the country, I suggest that they should do something practical to solve this problem which is wrapped up with many of the other questions which this parliament faces.

Take the universities in the city I come from. They are spending between twelve and thirteen million dollars on public education. Some of the greatest students in this country, coming from the Atlantic and the Pacific, attend the university of Toronto, bright young men. What are these men to do when they graduate in June, in electrical engineering, for instance? They go to the United States, notwithstanding the fact that this country has a potential horse power of 42 million, only one-sixth of which has been developed. If our national council of research were to take up the problem I think something might be done for young Canadians graduating from our universities and from the high schools and technical schools.

Technical education has been a great boon to Canada, but we have not considered the problem that arises from the inroads of the machine and science and technical education into the employment of labour. It seems to me that something must be done to take care of our university students graduating not only in medicine but in various branches of science—mining, mechanical engineering, electrical engineering, civil engineering and chemistry. Why can we not make use of the magnificent resources of the country, using the talents of these young men to develop those resources? Take medicine, for example: Sir Frederick Banting and many others equally gifted were on the verge of leaving this country for the United States. In fact, the large universities of the United States, are to-day staffed to a great extent by Canadian graduates. One might mention the university of Pennsylvania by way of example; and we know that one of the greatest hospitals in the world, that associated with Johns Hopkins, has had very eminent Canadians on its faculty. For instance, Doctor Osler, a great Canadian, was at one time head of clinical medicine there, and he was succeeded by Doctor Barker of Toronto university, by Doctor Cullen and many others. What an advantage it would have been to Canada had these great men remained in this country.

I submit that there has been no planning in Canada commensurate with the growth of the country. We have spent immense sums of money in connection with our railways but without any organized plan. A year ago His Majesty the King spoke over the radio and his words were indeed a challenge to all who heard them. We can learn a good deal from what he said on that occasion, because there are many reforms to which this parliament should devote its attention—reforms economic, industrial, parliamentary and constitutional.

Speaking again last Christmas His Majesty said that the world was still restless and troubled but that the clouds were lifting. We have our anxieties, he said, but if we face them in the spirit of one family we shall overcome our difficulties.

I do not see why our national and provincial research and economic councils could not do something that would help to pull this country out of the mire of depression, because science has affected the working classes very seriously. People want work; that is the only cure. The large corporations of Canada have been given a charter by the Canadian people, a charter carrying certain privileges, and those privileges invlove the assumption of corresponding obligations. They owe a duty to their creator, the public, and on grounds of public policy they should be made to fulfil that duty. If they fail to do so then the community, which has created them, will be justified in stepping in and adopting measures for their regulation and control so that they shall not run counter to public opinion and social justice.

Personally I believe that the new policy of reform will very largely meet the purpose of this particular motion. Canadians must retain their liberty and their dignity; they must declare for the corporate state; they must declare for the reestablishment of the worker's independence and for the principle of private ownership, and they must see to it that there shall be security for all engaged in industry. To this end we must have protection brought up to date, as Sir John Macdonald intended, protection for the benefit of the consumer, protection for the benefit of labour, protection based on principle and not on privilege. I believe the country is hungry for such a policy along the lines of Sir John A. Macdonald's principle of protection brought up to date to meet changed conditions and to march with the times in order to take care of the forgotten man. Such a policy will also establish a much closer union between town and country and much more intimate dealings and trade relationships between Great Britain and her great dominions and colonies than even the great Joseph Chamberlain ever dreamed of.

Such a policy will conserve our natural resources. It will give the business man a chance to function unfettered and afford him real protection from the abuses of competition and restraint of trade, from gigantic mergers and from hostile and destructive competition. The great industrial revolution in England was the work of seven or eight young men, some of them with no education at all and without any of the advantages of the youth of to-day. It sprang from the very hearts of the people themselves where all great inventions, discoveries and great public benefits come, yet it changed the whole life habits of the people of England and converted that country from an agricultural to an industrial nation making it the work house of the world. I believe in such a policy for Canada. I believe the new deal which is enunciated by my leader is a progressive policy, a progressive policy for a progressive party. He said that the Conservative party would now dedicate itself to protecting the consumer and labour from the admitted abuses as revealed by the price spreads investigation, and would write a new national policy and a new industrial magna charta based on it along the lines I have indicated. It would be a policy which would rescue the workers of this country from an industrial slavery as bad as or worse than conditions a hundred years ago in England at the time of the industrial revolution. The rule and day of sweatshops and child labour unregulated has gone forever in this country, and so it should be with the scandalous minimum wages paid in some industries.

I belong to a group of people in this country who have stood up for certain principles in government and who have received much criticism in consequence, because I believe in fair principles as against mere opportunism in government—passing the buck. I remember once a little band of die-hards who were called by even harder names, the old contemptibles, yet they succeeded in saving England, France and the world as well by their tenacity, faith, earnestness and high purpose; and the Conservative party by its tenacity will likewise achieve its purpose.

In the early days of the people of this country, as I said the other day, we were a nation of property owners. In the days of Macdonald, Cartier and Brown everybody owned some property. The suburban or rural worker as well as the white collar worker owned a small home, small garden, perhaps a cow, a building or a small store. To-day, the rights of property have gone in this country; it is divided into a country of haves and have-nots. The whole means of production in Canada is in the hands of the few and the many have nothing. I believe the policy of our party will restore the rights of property in Canada. It is the politics of big business which has been destroying Canada. The Conservative party I believe is going to restore the ownership of property which is the normal want of a family. We have done forever with the doctrine of laissez-faire and we must dedicate ourselves as a House of Commons to a solution of the question of distribution and restore the Canada of Macdonald, Brown and Cartier, Laurier, Whitney and Beck, when Canada was the land of the free and the home of artisans and farmers who owned some form of private and real property.

The day of die-hardism and laissez-faire has gone beyond recall. So has the doctrine of normalcy. We saw what happened to the government in the United States. The square deal of Theodore Roosevelt and the new freedom sought by Woodrow Wilson came to an end in the Harding administration. Mr. Hoover was a man of great ability and one who did a great deal for his country, but we have parted once and for all, and I hope all parties in this house will part once and for all, with normalcy, and consider a policy that will go back to the masses of the country and to the days where the political parties started in Canada, and that we shall have some help from the national research council and the provincial research councils and especially from the church. I have great respect for the churches in this country. I do not believe they have gone as far as they should. Prior to four or five years ago they did not speak out as they should against the exploitation of the humble worker. A hundred years ago in the days of the evangelical movement, the Wesley and Oxford movements, they wakened up the people of England to the conditions that prevailed. In 1847 Lord Shaftesbury introduced the first bill for the ten hour day and for the regulation of sweatshops and other business. Let me in conclusion quote a few lines from Balleine's History of the Evangelical Party, in which he referred to the revolution in England of a hundred years ago:

> The industrial revolution had produced a state equivalent to slavery among many of the men and women and children of Britain itself. The leader of the campaign to end the slavery of his own people was Anthony Ashley Copper, afterwards seventh Earl of Shaftesbury. "I am essentially and from deep rooted conviction," he said in his later life, "an Evangelical of the Evangelicals. I have worked with them constantly, and I am satisfied that most of the great philanthropic movements of the century have sprung from them." This religion he had learned from Maria Millis, a servant in the Shaftesbury household, who had been his nurse for the first seven years of his life. She taught him the great passages of the Bible; and so it came to pass that this poor woman was Shaftesbury's spiritual mother. Without her Shaftesbury never would have fought his fight for the emancipation of the workers.

It is interesting to compare Shaftesbury's motives with those of his contemporary, Karl Marx, the founder and originator of what is now known as Bolshevism. Both men challenged the existing social order. Both pleaded the cause of the weak and disinherited. Both had a vision of a better world. But Shaftesbury believed in the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. He believed that all Christians were called to be co-workers with God in establishing the reign of social justice. His outlook was spiritual and his method persuasion. Marx, on the other hand, agitated for a class war; his creed was materialistic; his method was revolution.

As Balleine says in one paragraph:

It is difficult for us at the present day to comprehend the horrors which were rampant in England less than a hundred years ago.

It would not be difficult after reading some of the evidence recently given on industrial conditions in Canada.

It is difficult for us at the present day to comprehend the horrors which were rampant in England less than a hundred years ago. Lunatics, men as well as women, were chained in dark cells, flogged, dropped into water, sometimes half strangled, and even confined in iron cages. In the factories babes of five were made to stand on stools and feed the great machines for fourteen hours a day. In the mines children were compelled to push trucks through underground passages sometimes only sixteen inches in height. On hands and knees they crawled through what was practically one long living tomb. The men who were placed over them were paid according to the amount of work done, and drove the children to their task with whips and blows and other tortures. But women and children and lunatics had at last found their champion. Shaftesbury had entered parliament in the year 1826. After many years of labour and incessant abuse he saw his Factory Bill placed on the Statute Book in the year 1847. This great victory was the first of many in Shaftesbury's career. Throughout life he fought for the weak and the unprivileged, passing to his reward as late as 1885.

He (Shaftesbury) was a layman to the core; yet no nobler prophet of God is included in the calendar of saints. Cardinal Manning made no rash statement, when, after studying Shaftesbury's endeavours he exclaimed, "I feel that my life has been wasted."

So I say the resolution introduced this afternoon has not been wasted if it can arouse the people of Canada to do something for the high-school population and the industrial workers of the country, for the consumer and the labourer.

Mr. ONESIME GAGNON (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to speak on this resolution, but I am wondering why our Liberal friends on the other side do not appear to take any interest in social plans and reforms.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We want reforms, not debates.

Mr. GAGNON: I am happy to congratulate the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) on his well ordered argument. Although I am not ready to accept all parts of his resolution, nevertheless I agree heartily with its spirit and with almost everything he has said in this house concerning it. I am very pleased to hear my hon. friend become the spokesman of his party and congratulate the government on having announced that they propose to create a national economic council for Canada. This creation is indeed most opportune. May I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that Conservatives have always initiated reforms in all countries of the world. I remember that in the life of Marshal Lyautey, one of the greatest generals of France, the author, André Maurois said that "an intelligent Conservative is always a reformer." I also remember what Senator Thomas Chapais, who is a member of the Senate and the leader of the opposition in the legislative council of Quebec, said about the Conservative party. "Conservatives," he said, "are always traditional and progressive." May I remind the house that in 1933 at the Sherbrooke convention, the Conservative party put forward as one of the main points of its program, the creation of an economic council for the province of Quebec. Not only has the Conservative party of Quebec proposed that reform, but an important wing of the Liberal party of Quebec has recommended lately, jointly with the Conservative party of Quebec, the creation of an economic council for that province, to be substituted for the legislative council. I suppose my hon. friends on the other side know what has taken place in Quebec during the last six months. Not only members of the Quebec House of Assembly and members of the Legislative Council also, but one federal member, my good friend and neighbour, the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Lacroix), have become leaders of the so-called Reform-Progressive-Liberal party of Quebec. These gentlemen agree upon and are to-day advocating the abolition of the legislative council and the substitution therefor of an economic council.

May I say farther, that I agree heartily with what my hon. friend from Red Deer said when he congratulated the government on its proposal to create a national economic council for Canada. No doubt the gentlemen who will become members of that council will be learned in economics, finance, agriculture and industry, and will render great service to the government and the country. The government deserve to be commended for having initiated a great step forward towards the solution of our social problems.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Speakman) who has moved this resolution with his usual clarity of expression that as it has served the purpose of precipitating discussion, he should now withdraw it, for the simple and obvious reason that the general principles to which he refers are included in the speech from the throne, and it is contemplated that action shall be taken along the lines suggested by his resolution. It is true that the resolution goes a very long way, perhaps further than the speech from the throne suggests. But in view of the commission that was set up, and consequent upon the action taken by this house last year dealing with price spreads and unfair competition, I have felt some hesitancy in introducing to this chamber legislation dealing with some of these matters until that commission's report is forthcoming. For the same reason I shall not traverse the ground to-day that has been so admirably covered by the addresses to which we have listened. I can only say this, that sometimes there is confusion of thought with respect to what is called scientific planning for a country. The raw materials from which conclusions may be drawn with respect to a matter of this kind are entirely different from the raw materials dealt with by scientists. The experiments carried on by those who dig and delve in the purely scientific field of research lead to conclusions that are definite, exact and certain. The materials with which men deal when they have to consider the problems to which this resolution relates may be said to be statistics gathered from many sources, and facts, events, circumstances, conditions. From that material men seek to draw inferences and conclusions. The soundness of the inferences, the correctness of the conclusions, may not always be apparent, in the very nature of things cannot be. But one thing is certain, that in this country during the last few years we have had sufficient experience to enable us to realize that we have not availed ourselves of the knowledge which we had in days gone by, nor have we arrived at the correct conclusions from the information we had. It will be recalled that we had a commission of conservation in this country at one time, and that an effort was made to arrive at a definite statement of the conditions under which water power might be produced, and energy generated by which we might be able to increase the productivity of our forests, our mines or other resources. But it was found that at the moment it did not serve the purpose that was intended. The correlation of the knowledge that departments of government have is most important. For instance I can say frankly that not a week goes by that one does not receive suggestions from every part of this country. These suggestions are based very largely upon the experience of the individuals who write to us. They are experiences and conclusions that in many instances they draw from facts supplied by the statistical departments of various governments and countries. What is to be done with them? Are you to acknowledge receipt of them and dismiss them, or are you to give them that measure of thoughtful consideration which your time permits? Obviously untrained minds are not capable of drawing the conclusions that should be drawn from a mass of material such as we have sent to us from time to time. And as the mass of material increases, representing the views of this and that individual, based, as I have said, in some instances upon inferences drawn from known facts and in other instances without any foundation at all, you have a great mass of material that in my judgment should be considered by scientifically trained minds so that they might be able, just as the scientists test the material at their disposal, to draw inferences which the trained minds of men accustomed to draw conclusions from data of this character may be able to secure. But if it is suggested, as I do not think it is or has been by anyone, that a government should undertake to tell John Smith how he should run his business, I think there is unanimity on the part of all of us that we will not accomplish the purpose we have in mind. If you consider John Smith as part of the population of the country, able to draw sound conclusions as to what should be done in order to secure successful results, then to make available the information you have to John Smith and all others I think is a wholly desirable function of government.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps it would be highly improper, in view of the action taken by this chamber, to discuss this matter for the reasons I have given, not only because the speech from the throne contemplates action being taken but because that action is delayed for the moment by reason of the fact that the price spreads commission has not made a report, and that commission is dealing with two or three very important phases of the matters to which the hon. gentleman has directed attention. This house will have to discuss at a later time the recommendations made by that commission and the measure to be introduced by the government following the statement made in the speech from the throne. I do suggest to the hon. gentleman that the purpose he has in mind has been served, and while congratulating him and the other members of the house on the contribution they have made as to the value of scientific knowledge being applied to the nation and its affairs, as scientific ideas are with respect to the transaction of ordinary business by the various concerns carrying on the trade and commerce of the country, for those reasons I think the resolution might be withdrawn.

Mr. WILFRED HANBURY (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, to any resolution intended to encourage the formation of an economic council I would give my support, but in considering this resolution I must place upon it the interpretation which I feel sure was intended by the mover, and not the interpretation which has been placed upon it by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) or those to your right who have spoken this afternoon. I believe I am justified in placing on record my interpretation, and what I feel sure the mover will admit is his interpretation of the resolution. The resolution states:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the time has arrived, and is long overdue, when a degree of well considered and scientific planning, on a national scale, should be substituted for the present practice of uncontrolled competition and unguided individual effort, in the conduct of the economic life of Canada.

I do not think there should be any misunderstanding on the part of hon. members of this house as to just what that means. Hon. gentlemen opposite have interpreted this to mean the establishment of an economic council, which I do not think is the interpretation intended. I submit to the mover of the resolution that the interpretation might be expressed in these words: "That in the opinion of the house the time has arrived when national planning should be substituted for competition and individual effort in the life of Canada." I think hon. members should fully understand what they are going to support or oppose. So far as I am concerned I am quite prepared to support the establishment of an economic council on any reasonable basis, but I am certainly opposed to the elimination from the national life of Canada of competition and individual effort.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: May I say at once, Mr. Speaker, that I have no objection at all to accepting the Prime Minister's suggestion that this resolution now might be withdrawn, particularly as the measure indicated in the speech from the throne will give ample opportunity to discuss and pronounce upon certain of the principles involved in this motion. I should like, however, for a moment to comment upon two statements made by the Prime Minister and upon one statement made by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken.

The Prime Minister pointed out, quite properly, that planning in economic matters differed very materially from planning in what we call technical science, and I can assure him that I fully appreciate that distinction. In dealing with matters of technical science you are dealing with factors that have known and tangible qualities which are unvarying and unchanging and to which, therefore, definite mathematical formulae may be properly applied. But we realize very fully that in dealing with human nature and human activity you are dealing with a factor which is unknown, which is intangible and which frequently varies, and that therefore we must always differentiate between the two forms of planning. I do not think, however, that this detracts from the value of proper guidance and proper control in the management of human affairs, which I conceive to be part of the duty of the state. Personally that is the attitude I would wish to take, and I believe it is the only attitude which would lead to success. You must consider all the factors and all the conditions and then do the best you can to bring about orderly conduct and orderly planning in view of those conditions.

But the Prime Minister went on to say that in his concept of planning while, with the mass of information at the disposal of such a body or of the government, you might assist John Smith in the conduct of his individual business by advising him as to the best course he might pursue, you must not tell John Smith how to carry on his own business. To a degree I follow the Prime Minister in this argument, but there is a point at which we must part company. I believe that every law we have ever had, every law at least inside and some laws outside the criminal code, is directed towards telling John Smith what he may or may not do in the conduct of his own affairs and activities, if he in the conduct of his own business runs counter to the best interests of the community as a whole. I believe that the state is fully entitled to tell John Smith either what he may or may not do in the conduct of his own business if that conduct affects beneficially or deleteriously society as a whole, because I still believe that society as a whole has claims which far transcend the claims of any individual within that society, and that in the final analysis the activities of the individual, that apparently may be his own interests, must be subordinated if they run counter to or conflict with the best interests of the people as a whole. So to that extent, if my understanding of the Prime Minister's statement is correct, I am afraid I must go beyond the Prime Minister in my understanding of the principle of economic planning.

Now I should like to make one reference to what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Hanbury). He stated that his understanding of my meaning was that I would substitute central planning and central control for individual competition and individual effort. I neither said so nor did I intend to indicate any such thing. What I did say in the resolution was that I would substitute central planning and central control for uncontrolled competition and unguided individual effort. In other words emphasis was laid upon the control necessary in respect to competition when that competition became, as it frequently has become deleterious to the best interests of the community. I would guide that individual effort along lines where it might give the best possible service to the whole state. The resolution must be read as it is, and the wording of the resolution must be followed if my meaning is to be understood. I say again that uncontrolled competition and unguided effort have brought about the trouble, not individual effort in itself. Individual initiative is a splendid thing, something which has to be sought and encouraged, but it must not be left unguided or uncontrolled if because of the lack of guidance and lack of control the activities of the individual have a bad effect upon society as a whole. I would say at once that only when the activities of the individual run counter to the best interests of society, or only when the activities of the individual do not give to society the best service they could give, should society directly control that individual. When they reach that point the state has a right to intervene and to speak with effective voice.

At the present time that is all I wish to say. May I thank the house for the consideration it has given the motion. In view of the fact the whole question will be open for discussion, and that the principle will be discussed and decided upon when the measure contemplating the creation of an economic council is brought down, I shall be glad to withdraw the motion. As I said, had I known before the motion was put upon the order paper that an economic council had been promised and would be created the motion would not have been before us to-day. I am content now to withdraw the resolution.

Motion (Mr. Speakman) withdrawn.

TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES

PROPOSED RECIPROCAL ARRANGEMENT FOR EXCHANGE OF NATURAL PRODUCTS

On the motion of Mr. Duff:

That, in the opinion of this house, it is expedient that the government of Canada reopen negotiations with the government of the United States of America with a view of bringing about a satisfactory reciprocal trade agreement between Canada and the United States, whereby the natural products of Canada, that is, the products of the sea, the farm, the mines and the forests, and including fish, lumber, wheat, cattle, etc., should have free entry into the United States in exchange for the admission of certain goods from the United States of America, which in the interests of both countries may be admitted into Canada, free from customs tariffs.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Speaker, it is significant that this motion dealing with a reciprocal trade arrangement between the United States and Canada should come up for consideration on January 30. This is a day of national importance in the United States. To-night some 7,000 charity balls are to be held throughout that great country, the proceeds of which are to be devoted to the care of crippled children. To-day is the birthday of that great statesman in the United States of America, the Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt. Before I direct my observations to what I should like to have done with this motion may I extend my congratulations to the President of the United States and wish him very many happy returns of the day.

When the motion was called on Monday I asked that it stand, in view of the fact that we were told only a few days before that this government and the government of the United States were entering into negotiations with regard to a reciprocal trade agreement. For that reason I felt I should not go on with the motion, and I have not changed my views in that regard. In the future there will be an opportunity either on the budget or at some other time to deal with this matter, and because I should like the Prime Minister to proceed with his reform legislation I am content that this motion now stand.

Mr. BENNETT: Shall this motion be dropped from the order paper?

Mr. DUFF: According to the rules of the house, it being called twice, it is dropped.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Motion dropped.

PENSIONS FOR THE BLIND

PROPOSAL TO EXTEND BENEFITS OF OLD AGE PENSIONS ACT TO BLIND PEOPLE OVER FORTY YEARS OF AGE

Mr. I. D. COTNAM (North Renfrew) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the provisions of the Old Age Pensions Act should apply to blind people over 40 years of age.

He said: Mr. Speaker, due to the fact that in the present session members throughout the house have been unanimous on almost everything that has been introduced I am sure I will be expressing the opinion of hon. members on this side of the house when I endorse the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) respecting the President of the United States. I should like to make that sentiment unanimous.

Mr. DUFF: If the hon. member would allow me may I say that another great man has a birthday to-day; I refer to the gentleman now occupying the chair (Mr. Morand).

Mr. COTNAM: I am sure hon. members on this side of the house will be pleased to express unanimously the same good wishes concerning the gentleman now occupying the chair.

I make no apologies to the house for offering the resolution standing in my name for consideration, namely a motion suggesting that the provisions of the Old Age Pensions Act should apply to blind people over forty years of age. For many years both professionally and socially I have been deeply interested in many of the poor and needy who have been afflicted with blindness.

On March 17, 1929, I had the honour of introducing a resolution calling on the government of the day to nationalize the supply of radium in order that it might be made available for the cure of patients afflicted with cancer. Up until that time no real state action had been taken with respect to the control and cure of that disease. Subsequent to that date, I believe in 1930, the Hon. G. Howard Ferguson who was then premier of Ontario formed a commission which was sent to Great Britain and other countries on the continent of Europe and also to the United States to study the question of cancer, and the application and control of radium for the treatment of that disease. As a result of the report which was made by the Ontario commission cancer centres were established. One was formed at Kingston, another at London, Ontario, another at the university of Toronto and only recently one has been formed in this capital city of Ottawa. Other centres have been established at various points in the dominion for the purpose of studying the control and treatment of cancer through the use of radium and other means at our disposal.

It is interesting to note that at the present time there is a campaign on foot throughout the British empire for the purpose of studying the cancer problem, a problem which is becoming one of the great concerns of the medical world. Subsequent to the time of the introduction of that resolution extensive deposits of pitchblende ore were discovered in northern Canada, near Great Bear lake, by the LaBine brothers. Those brothers came from a township in the constituency I have the honour to represent. Very shortly afterwards a discovery was made by one of the mining engineers in the Department of Mines at Ottawa, namely Mr. W. B. Timm. He, too, comes from the county of Renfrew; in fact his family live within a few miles of the point where the LaBine brothers were born. Mr. Timm was successful in extracting radium from pitchblende ore by a new process. That process of extraction has been carried on at Port Hope in the province of Ontario, and we hope and believe that it is going to be of material benefit in helping to control and cure the scourge of cancer and assist in the campaign which is being carried on at the present time with that object in view.

The first effort at organization in aid of the blind occurred in the fourth century by St. Basil in Cappadocia. Two hundred years later a retreat was established in Jerusalem, and not long afterwards the movement was originated by St. Bertrand in France. In the eleventh century hospitals were founded by William the Conqueror in Normandy. It was not, however, until the eighteenth century that any real attempt was made to educate or train the blind.

Valentine Hauy, who has been called "The father and apostle of the blind," spent his lifetime in furthering the interests of those afflicted with blindness.

In the early part of the nineteenth century the New England Blind Institute was organized and also the Massachusetts School for the Blind. William H. Prescott, the blind historian, was one of the organizers.

In Great Britain, the earliest legislation for the welfare of the blind was enacted in the days of Queen Elizabeth, but it was almost three hundred years later before a royal commission was appointed, in 1886, to investigate the conditions of the blind. This commission reported in 1889 and its report resulted in the passing of the Elementary Education Act in 1893. In 1914, as a result of a resolution in the House of Commons, a departmental committee was set up to investigate into the general welfare of the blind. In August, 1919, the Ministry of Health issued regulations and rules governing grants used out of public moneys to be distributed for the welfare of the blind. In 1920, the Blind Persons Act was passed by which blind persons in Great Britain received the Old Age Pension at the age of fifty years instead of at the age of seventy years. In March, 1927, 14,562 persons in England and Wales were in receipt of a blind pension. Provision was also made for the education and care of the blind children, and, where possible, they were trained for remunerative employment.

Mr. CASGRAIN: May I ask the hon. gentleman what document he is reading from?

Mr. COTNAM: I am reading from information which I have extracted from various sources in connection with the legislation for the blind that has been adopted in different parts of the world.

The English act also provides for the keeping of a register of the blind persons within each area. Voluntary institutions have also carried on work in Great Britain in aid of the blind since 1791.

Blind men and women throughout the ages have carved out for themselves important positions in the world. The story of the education and achievements of Laura Bridgman, who was deaf, dumb and blind, and of Helen Keller, and other deaf, blind mutes is known to almost everyone.

The world war gave a fresh impetus to the movement for the emancipation of the blind in every rank and walk of life, and it was largely instrumental in bringing to public attention the necessity for special recognition of those afflicted with blindness; and as the result of private and public efforts, education and training has been secured to enable blind people to succeed in literature, the arts, the church, law, politics, agriculture, and so forth.

Practically every civilized country in the world to-day recognizes the handicaps under which their blind population exists, and have endeavoured in every way possible to mitigate the tremendous handicaps under which these people carry on. Special legislation has been enacted in Scotland, France, Spain, Hungary, Italy, Switzerland, Finland, Czechoslovakia and the United States to aid their blind.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I rise again to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have listened to the hon. gentleman, and he says that he is quoting from legislation that has been passed in other parts of the world, but judging from what he has read it looks more so if he were reading his speech than quoting the legislation in force in other parts of the world.

Mr. COTNAM: I do not know just what the hon. member means. Would he make himself a little more clear?

Mr. CASGRAIN: The hon. gentleman has stated that he was quoting legislation obtaining in various parts of the world, but judging by the tenor of his remarks, it is rather a history he is giving of the situation instead of quoting what has been done in various parts of the world. I think he is reading his speech, which is contrary to the rules of the house.

Mr. COTNAM: The hon. gentleman sometimes reads his speeches. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, this is purely a technical question and I wish to give the house accurate information on the subject. Perhaps the hon. gentleman does not care to get accurate information. Apparently he is like some others who sit in this house and who are not really interested in social legislation when a matter of this kind comes up. What I am trying to do is to show what has been done elsewhere, and to show also the conditions leading up to the position that Canada is in at the present time with respect to the care of her blind population.

Systems of reading for the blind have been invented, of which the best known is the Braille system, Louis Braille, himself, became blind when he was three years of age. He was born near Paris in 1809. To-day, his system has been adapted even to the Chinese language.

Much has been done towards the prevention of blindness. The necessity for this preventive work is readily grasped when one considers that probably twenty-five per cent to thirty-three and one-half per cent of the world's blindness is preventable.

It would be of interest to note, in passing, the enormous number of blind people that there are in the civilized world, of which we have a record.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I rise to a point of order. I have raised the point of order twice already. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, if it is in order for a member to read his speech as the hon. member is reading just now.

Mr. COTNAM: The hon. gentleman should take a look at his own side of the house sometimes. As I say, this is purely a technical question, and I have here a great many figures that have been gathered from different sources, and I wish to have them placed accurately on the records of this house. The hon. member apparently is not so very careful about the accuracy of his statements sometimes. If I cared to make a speech in this house without notes I think I could make just as good a one as the hon. gentleman who is so ready to interrupt.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I have risen to a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. COTNAM: I object to the hon. gentleman interrupting. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman has stated any point of order. It is just an opinion of his own that he is expressing, and nobody else is worrying about the matter at all.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I have raised the point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it in order for the hon. gentleman to read his speech as he is doing?

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Spotton): I take it that the hon. member is just using his notes, as is the custom.

Mr. COTNAM: The number of blind people of which we have a record is enormous. Perhaps the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) with his fine memory would be able to quote these figures offhand. In England and Wales there are 46,822 blind people; in Scotland, 6,939; Northern Ireland, 1,758; in India there is the enormous total of 479,637 blind people; in Burma, 25,000; Austria, 5,359. In China blindness is very prevalent but government statistics are not available to show the total number of blind people there. Czechoslovakia has 5,000 blind people; France, 29,000; Germany, 35,624; Japan, 100,000; Poland, 16,144, and the United States of America, 75,000.

The world's history furnishes the names of many blind people who became prominent in public and private affairs. John Stanley was born blind in 1713. He studied music and graduated as Music Bachelor at Oxford when sixteen years of age. He was a composer and received the degree of Doctor of Music, and was master of the King's band. Marie Paradis was born blind, but became famous as a pianist and vocalist. Doctor T. R. Armitage was born in 1824. He graduated in medicine and lost his sight at the age of thirty-six years. He afterwards devoted his life to the cause of the blind. Elizabeth Gilbert was born in 1826. She became blind at the age of three years, and devoted her whole life to the welfare of the blind. Sir Francis James Campbell, who was born in the state of Tennessee, became blind at the age of three years. He made many notable contributions to the cause of the blind. Henry Fawcett was accidentally blinded in his twenty-fifth year. He went to Cambridge university and became professor of political economy. He was elected as a member of the British House of Commons and later became Postmaster General of Great Britain. Doctor William Moon lost his sight in his early manhood. He made many contributions to the cause of the blind. Sir Arthur Pearson, the great newspaper magnate, who later became blind, left the stamp of his work for the blind throughout the British empire. He established the National Institute for the Blind in 1913-1914. No résumé of famous blind people would be complete without mention of Fielding and John Milton. The latter ranks with Shakespeare in the writing of poetry and prose. Two of his most outstanding productions that will endure as long as the Anglo-Saxon tongue is spoken were Paradise Lost and Paradise Regained. These works were written after he became blind. Many of the famous musicians of the world were blind, two of the greatest being Bach and Handel, who became blind towards the end of their careers.

Coming more particularly to the position of the blind in Canada, our blind population, according to the records of the bureau of statistics, number about 6,350 people, though some estimates place it as high as 8,000. The total number of blind persons over the age of twenty-one years in Canada is 5,053. Within this classification, we find: mental defectives, 219; Indians, 73; old age pensioners, 221; workmen's compensation board blind, 47; mothers' allowance pensioners, 42; blinded soldiers, 102. These groups are already recipients of financial assistance. In the seventy year and over classification, according to provinces, we find as follows: Prince Edward Island, 21; Nova Scotia, 104; New Brunswick, 57; Quebec, 289; Ontario, 527; Manitoba, 166; Saskatchewan, 147; Alberta, 66; British Columbia, 98; the total number of males blind being 767; females, 698—making a grand total of 1,465. For pensions estimates in this classification, there should be deducted: Indians, old age pensioners, workmen's compensation board cases, mothers' allowance pensioners and mental defectives, totalling in all 314. In the fifty to sixty-nine years classification: Prince Edward Island, 17; Nova Scotia, 112; New Brunswick, 82; Quebec, 293; Ontario, 711; Manitoba, 166; Saskatchewan, 136; Alberta, 56; British Columbia, 122; making a total number of males blind, 1,064; females, 631—making a grand total of 1,695. For pensions estimates in this classification there should be deducted: Indians, workmen's compensation board cases, mothers' allowance pensioners, and blinded soldiers cases, totalling in all 130. In the forty to forty-nine years classification: Prince Edward Island, 5; Nova Scotia, 68; New Brunswick, 27; Quebec, 138; Ontario, 305; Manitoba, 64; Saskatchewan, 68; Alberta, 33; British Columbia, 61; making a total male population of blind 537, and females, 233—or a grand total of 770. For pensions estimates, deduct Indians, mental defectives, mothers' allowance pensioners and blinded soldiers, totalling in all 108. For purposes of record, I shall also furnish an estimate of the number of blind in the various provinces between the ages of twenty-one and thirty-nine: Prince Edward Island, 13; Nova Scotia, 120; New Brunswick, 69; Quebec, 240; Ontario, 399; Manitoba, 103; Saskatchewan, 84; Alberta, 44; British Columbia, 51, making a total male population of 703 and a total female population of 420, or a grand total of 1,123. I have not prepared a classification of those under the age of twenty-one years who are afflicted with blindness.

Canada did little for her civilian blind population until the world war attracted her attention to the needs of the blind. No actual statistical records had been attempted up to that time. In 1916, however, the Canadian National Institute for the Blind was organized. They obtained a federal charter in 1918, which had for its object the amelioration of the conditions of the blind and the prevention of blindness. Federal grants covering administrative expenses only were received, while private contributions and provincial government grants were received to cover the practical work from the Atlantic to the Pacific and including Newfoundland.

Through the National Council for Child Welfare, the national institute locates blind infants and watches their development. Treatment at birth to prevent ophthalmia neonatorum is compulsory. Sight-saving classes have been started in several centres. Technical training as well as educational instruction is provided in Canadian schools for the blind. Training and institutional instruction is given to those who lose their sight between the ages of twenty-one and fifty years.

The Canadian National Institute for the Blind has for its patron His Excellency the Governor General of Canada, and many of the more prominent people in the public and social life of this country are associated in its activities from coast to coast. The work done on behalf of our blind by these organizations cannot be overestimated. The depression has taught us at least one useful lesson, that after all man is his brother's keeper.

In October, 1933, a united memorial was presented to the right honourable the Prime Minister of Canada by various organizations for aid and assistance to the blind. In that memorial reference was made to the fact that the underlying reasons which lead to the provision of pensions for the blind in Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, and elsewhere were precisely the same as those that obtained in Canada. It was felt that voluntary contributions had steadily decreased during the period of the depression, with the result that the whole position of the blind population became accentuated. It was also pointed out that the provisions for general and unemployment relief funds deal only with cases from a destitution standpoint, and greater assistance is required to relieve the destitution of the blind than of persons with their sight; also, the whole problem is not a transient one, resulting from the present economic conditions, but is one of destitution arising from permanent unemployability. Voluntary agents are no longer able to meet the needs of the permanently unemployable adult blind, as sufficient private funds cannot be secured. Under the circumstances, it was pointed out to the government that the only adequate solution was the provision of a state pension or allowance. According to dispatches which appeared in the Toronto Mail and Empire on Saturday, June 30, 1934, the matter had been discussed before the dominion-provincial conference, having been introduced by the Prime Minister of Canada on the request of the National Institute for the Blind and the Canadian Federation for the Blind. The conference itself was held in camera, and it was generally understood that Hon. Mr. Price, then Attorney-General of Ontario, was ready to implement any move that might be taken with a view to further aiding the blind pensioners. It was further stated that the whole matter would be reviewed with the improvement of the general financial situation.

We have in Canada many Canadians who have achieved great distinction in the various walks of life. I shall mention merely two, although there are many, many others. The late Trooper Lorne Malloy, of Prescott, who was blinded during the South African war, later returned to this country, graduating with high honours in arts and law from Queens university. Later he took the law course at Osgoode Hall, Toronto, and practised law in the county of Dundas. Mr. Phillip E. Layton, president of the Montreal Association for the Blind, is himself blind, and to-day he is recognized as one of Canada's greatest Canadians. Through his work and philanthropy he has done much to ameliorate the conditions of our blind.

I feel that the Prime Minister and all the members in all parts of the house are in sympathy with the subject matter of this resolution, and, in my humble opinion, the time has come when as a Christian nation we should give this deserving class of our citizens the benefit of state assistance. The courage and fortitude of those afflicted with blindness has been an amazing revelation to all those who from time to time come into contact with individual cases of blindness.

Our total blind population, if we place it at the maximum figure, is 8,000. Forty per cent of this total, or 3,200, are between the ages of forty and seventy years. If we deduct from this number for pension purposes, blind soldiers, people of independent means, employed blind and workmen's compensation board cases, mothers' allowance pensioners, Indians and mental defectives, all otherwise provided for, totalling 974, this leaves a pensionable balance of 2,026. An estimated pension of $240 per annum would cost this country—

Mr. CASGRAIN: I rise to a point of order. Mr. Speaker, before you took the chair a few minutes ago I had risen twice to a point of order to the effect that the hon. member who is just speaking was reading from a written, previously prepared speech. I was not sustained in the point of order that I raised. I would quote Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, 1927 edition, at page 95, standing order number 41. Paragraph 293 reads:

[Mr. Cotnam.]

Besides the prohibitions contained in this standing order, it has been sanctioned by usage both in England and in Canada, that a member, while speaking must not—

And on the next page among other prohibitions it says:

—read from a written, previously prepared speech.

I have observed the hon. gentleman in making his address has most of the time up to the present been using sheets of paper prepared previously to make his speech. I should like to have your ruling on my point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: There cannot be any question as to the rule, which is well known and recognized by all hon. members. The hon. member who has just raised the point of order knows I was not in the house at the beginning of the address. I note the hon. member who has the floor has quoted a considerable number of figures and has been following his notes very closely. I call his attention to the rule which has been referred to by the hon. member who raises the point of order.

Mr. COTNAM: I bow to your ruling, sir, but may I say that as long as I have been in this house that rule has been honoured more in the breach than in the observance. From ninety to ninety-five per cent of the members read copiously from their notes on every occasion, and as this subject was a purely technical matter, non-controversial, dealing with something in regard to which I thought all the facts should be placed in their proper sequence on Hansard, I felt that I should be very careful in the facts and figures I gave to the house. Some hon. members opposite may not be as much concerned as I am about action being taken in this matter, and if so I am sorry for them; but to me it was a very serious matter to bring this resolution to the attention of the house and I felt that every possible consideration should be given to it in order that the facts should be accurately stated. I am sure the blind people of this country will appreciate the hon. gentleman's efforts on their behalf.

I feel that the passing of this resolution would help to bring a ray of sunshine into the lives of thousands of persons in this country who are deprived of their sight, many of whom have never been able to look upon the faces of their friends and families; who have never been privileged to see the beauty of the flowers or the babbling brooks or the majestic mountain peaks; who have never been able to see the marvels of a sunshine, or the lights and shades of a sunset, or the poetry of the trees, or the grandeur of the sea and sky, and indeed, in many cases have been living in abject want and poverty.

Mr. MacLEAN: The hon. gentleman was just giving the cost. If that was put on record, it would be a good thing.

Mr. COTNAM: Did I not complete that?

Mr. MacLEAN: No.

Mr. COTNAM: An estimated pension of $240 per annum would cost this country approximately $534,240 per annum, and from this amount certain deductions might be made by reason of partial earnings and family responsibility.

I cannot close this speech better than by quoting that immortal sonnet by Milton, On His Blindness:

When I consider how my light is spent,
Ere half my days, in this dark world and wide,
And that one talent, which is death to hide,
Lodg'd with me useless, though my soul more bent
To serve therewith my Maker, and present
My true account, lest he, returning, chide;
"Doth God exact day-labour, light denied?"
I fondly ask: But Patience, to prevent
That murmur, soon replies, "God doth not need
Either man's work, or his own gifts; who best
Bear his mild yoke, they serve him best: his state
Is kingly; thousands at his bidding speed,
And post o'er land and ocean without rest;
They also serve who only stand and wait."

I commend the resolution to the favourable consideration of the house.

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): Mr. Speaker, it is within a few minutes of six o'clock, therefore I shall be very brief. With what the hon. gentleman has said I am in full accord. I have had occasion lately to go rather deeply into this matter of the blind, and I sincerely hope that this resolution will carry and will subsequently be given effect to by an amendment to the Old Age Pensions Act. I do not think one needs to speak at any length to convince this house that something ought to be done for the relief of people who suffer this great affliction.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I desire to express my appreciation to the hon. member (Mr. Cotnam) who brought this resolution before the house. Seeing that the time is almost up I shall not delay it going to a vote, and I hope it will be carried.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to take up the time of the house and so prevent this resolution coming to a vote if it be necessary. Without having made any preparation whatsoever let me just say that I would like to support the hon. member who has introduced this resolution. It seems to me it goes without saying that anyone in this house or outside feels sympathy for people who are afflicted with blindness. The sense of sight is after all the primary one that human beings possess. Its absence certainly takes away most of the enjoyments that are available to human beings. Not only that but those who are deprived of the sense of sight are almost without exception, in spite of the examples given by the hon. member, under an extreme handicap in regard to earning their living.

I have every sympathy with the object of the resolution, and would only say that while I heard the statement that something like half a million dollars would be required as contribution from the treasury to pay pensions to blind people over forty years of age, I should think those who are less than that age are almost as much entitled to some pension as those over forty. I would like to ask the hon. member why he confines it to people over forty.

Mr. COTNAM: That age was only set in a tentative way. It was felt that if the age should be lowered the increase in the cost of such legislation would be great, and also it was thought in some quarters that were a pension paid to the blind during the earlier years—

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I interrupt? There is no question,—

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes, this is quite out of order.

Mr. COTNAM: I was only replying to the question of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MANION: With the consent of the house.

Mr. COTNAM: With the consent of the house; there seemed to be a feeling in many quarters that if pensions for blind people under forty years of age were adopted it might tend to destroy their initiative.

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on this resolution, with which I am quite in accord. If it should come to a vote I would vote in favour of it. I was just going to put the same question as put by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Euler) regarding the age limit. If I raised some objections in the course of the speech of the hon. gentleman it was not with the intention of delaying the proceedings or delaying the passing of this resolution. I did it because I thought it was my duty as a member to do so.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. RINFRET: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Apparently there are several hon. members who wish to speak on the motion, so we might as well call it six o'clock.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): I can say what I have to say in one minute. There is no time left to amplify my endorsement of this motion, but I wish to state that as mayor of Montreal I had many delegations coming to my office pressing for a measure of this kind. I have studied the matter and am quite willing to endorse the resolution. But I am not sure whether it would not be better to have separate legislation rather than link it with old age pensions. I take the motion to mean that provision similar to the old age pensions may be adopted for the blind. With that reservation I am in favour of the motion.

ADJOURNMENT—DECORUM

Mr. SPEAKER: With the indulgence of the house, there is a matter to which I would like to allude for a moment. At times of adjournment there has been a certain amount of confusion. I think we can avoid that if we observe paragraph 5 of standing order 12, which states that:

> When the house adjourns the members shall keep their seats until Mr. Speaker has left the chair.

As a general rule at the close of the sitting the leader of the government announces the program for the next day, if he fails to do so the leader of the opposition generally endeavours to get that information by question and answer, and at that time there is usually a certain amount of confusion. I know that all hon. members are anxious to hear what the leader of the government has to say. Therefore I suggest that we bear this rule in mind at adjournment time so that the house may adjourn without confusion and with dignity and decorum.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, January 31, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. To what extent has the dominion agreed to contribute towards unemployment relief in the province of New Brunswick from June 1, 1934, to March 31, 1935?

2. What sums were paid by the dominion to the province of New Brunswick between June 1, and December 31, 1934, for the relief of unemployment in that province, and under what heads?

Mr. GORDON: Return tabled herewith.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. MacNICOL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Toronto Northwest): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to refer to some headings appearing in last night's issue of the Toronto Daily Star in reference to remarks I made yesterday. The heading of the article reads: "Unemployment ended in Russia MacNicol states." That heading is altogether in error; I made no such statement. Then it continues, "Toronto Conservative says Soviet leads world in national planning." That is an error; I made no such statement. Then, "Mr. MacNicol said Russia is the only country in the world which has been able to abolish unemployment." I made no such statement.

Each and every one of those statements appearing in last night's Toronto Daily Star is absolutely and totally in error.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. MACKENZIE KING

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I drew the attention of your honour and that of the Prime Minister to what I regarded as an evasion of the privileges of this house in the publication in the press of almost the entire text of the bill on social and unemployment insurance before hon. members had been able to receive copies of the bill. Up to the present time the members of the house have not received copies.

Mr. BENNETT: It was distributed this morning.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We have it now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are not on the files of members in the house, as yet.

Mr. BENNETT: I think so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: At least, there is not one on my file for I have just looked.

However, the point I wish to draw to the Prime Minister's attention is this. I am informed on what I believe to be reliable authority that the material that appeared in the press was given to the Canadian Press as long ago as Friday, January 25, that the Canadian Press was given the material at that time and that it was sent at that time throughout Canada. I would ask the Prime Minister if he has inquired into the matter, as he said he would yesterday, and if he can advise the house if that is a correct statement or not. The giving out of any part of a bill and not at the same time giving the public the whole of it is to my mind improper; but what is even more improper is giving anything to the press which is not given in equal measure to hon. members of this house.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I think perhaps, Mr. Speaker, if the right hon. gentleman will carry his mind back to the time when he was Prime Minister—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That does not answer the question.

Mr. BENNETT: It will be answered in a moment. I am not re-writing Hansard at the moment. I am answering a question as I would put it, not as the right hon. gentleman would have it.

I point out, Mr. Speaker, that when the right hon. gentleman was Prime Minister the course followed in this house and the course that has grown up since it was a house at all especially in the case of the budget speeches, by all ministers of finance was this. I have investigated the matter with some care and I find that the budget speech has been and is mimeographed and sent to various parts of the country and remains there to be released on the day the budget speech is delivered in this house.

I am informed that when a bill is read a first time the press have a right to look at it and to take from it such extracts as they think desirable by applying to the clerk's office. Whether that is a custom that has grown up in recent years or not I have not been able to ascertain. But I have been able to consult the older members of the house, and I find that that has been the course followed.

With respect to this measure on unemployment insurance, one of my secretaries prepared a précis of the bill and delivered it I believe to the Canadian Press with the agreement that it was not to be used until such time as the bill had been read a first time, when the information could be used if so desired; and in accordance with that arrangement, after the bill had been read the first time, that information was used. That is as far as I have been able to ascertain. I believe it is the correct and proper course, and there is nothing about it different from the course pursued in days past. It is quite competent for any member to ascertain from the table what the provisions of the bill are. Of course, that cannot be done by all at the same time. So far as the newspapers are concerned, it was dealt with in the way I have indicated, and if there is anything improper about it I cannot see what it is. That has been the custom, and if it is desired that it should not be done I see no way by which it could be prevented, because by applying to the table the information might be obtained after the house had risen. That is the reason, Mr. Speaker, why the précis was prepared as I have indicated, and given to the press for the public.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Might I say to the Prime Minister that if his secretary was able to give a précis of this bill to the press the Prime Minister might have at least directed his secretary to extend the same courtesy to the members of parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: That observation, Mr. Speaker, hardly calls for a reply. And just how that could be done, in view of the fact that I offered to hand the bill in the form in which it stood to the right hon. gentleman and the other leaders, and the right hon. gentleman said that he did not desire to have it—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I said, not before everyone had it. I asked no preference.

Mr. BENNETT: It has never been the custom for the Minister of Finance, for instance, to send a copy of his budget speech under seal to every member of the house. A copy of it is delivered to the former Minister of Finance sometimes and to the leader of the opposition under seal, and when the minister commences his speech, a copy of it is usually sent across the floor of the house in order that it may be followed by whoever is leading opposite, or to the former Minister of Finance in some cases. There has been no departure here from what has been regarded as the established custom of this house; and regard for the privileges of this house I think will be found to be as much exercised by this administration as by any.

I do not think the right hon. gentleman should complain with respect to delays about anything, in view of what transpired by which we were deprived of the use of Hansard until after one o'clock and nearly two o'clock because he had to rearrange his speech on the night on which he delivered it. This deprived us of the use of Hansard, which is against the privileges of parliament, so that we could not deal with the points he had made in his speech because we had not the opportunity to read it. If he thought it desirable to keep Hansard and the employees on duty during the whole night, I do not think that was complying with what he regards as the high privileges of parliament.

TIM BUCK'S OTTAWA MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the Prime Minister whether he or the government have exercised pressure on the owners of halls in this city to prevent Mr. Tim Buck from speaking here?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): As far as I know, Mr. Speaker, the answer would be in the negative to the question that is put.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): May I ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of Labour whether there have been conventions or draft conventions adopted at any international labour conference concerning unemployment insurance, and if so, if they can be laid on the table of the house before the second reading of the bill is taken up?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is wel aware from his position as president of the League of Nations Society of Canada of just what has taken place in connection with these conventions. In 1934 a convention was arrived at which deals with subjects other than unemployment insurance. Had it dealt with unemployment insurance only it would, as the hon. gentleman desires, have been placed on the table of the house. During the discussion of the second reading of the bill reference will be made to that fact. I did not propose to submit the convention because of the fact that it dealt with so many other matters for ratification, but such a convention has been arrived at by the League of Nations.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: There was no convention arrived at by any previous conference?

Mr. BENNETT: Oh yes, there was a convention which dealt with various phases of it but not dealing with it alone in the manner in which it was dealt with in 1934. Other matters were also dealt with in that same convention. Doubtless the hon. member has read the 1934 convention which was arrived at after much discussion, and which deals with other matters as well, and which in its terms could not be applied to this country.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): May I ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) whether he can give any information to the house about the permanent seat which Canada has occupied heretofore on the governing body of the international labour office, and if matters have reached the stage where he can lay on the table the correspondence which has taken place.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, instructions have passed between the government and the government's representative at Geneva with respect to Canada's position. I shall be very glad to look into the question and to lay any communications that are available on the table of the house to-morrow.

BRITISH IMPORTS OF RUSSIAN TIMBER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILFRED HANBURY (Vancouver-Burrard): I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister based upon items appearing in the press to the effect that agreements are being entered into by British importers for a quantity of Russian lumber to go into the old country, and it is stated that the well-known fall clause is to be a part of the contemplated agreements. Can the Prime Minister give any information that would clarify the situation at the present time?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question which the hon. gentleman has asked is not difficult to answer. Timber Distributors, a British firm, the members of which have been indicated previously in discussions of this house, has entered into an agreement at Paris with the Soviet Union of Russia for a supply of timber to Great Britain.

The terms of the contract are not known to the government, but during all the period of time that has elapsed, when a new contract between Timber Distributors and the Russian authorities has been in contemplation the Canadian government has been in close touch with the situation and has urged upon the authorities the necessity of such a clause being eliminated from any contract that might be made.

I think there is much misapprehension with respect to some facts in connection with these contracts. These contracts do not arise out of the Ottawa agreement, but in the Ottawa agreement there was provision that any contracts that might be made between British importers and the Soviet Union that prejudicially affected the preference granted Canadian or other empire products in the British market would be dealt with in the manner indicated in that clause.

Last year representations were made to the government of Great Britain in consequence of a proposed contract between Timber Distributors and the Russian authorities for the purchase of quantities of timber. The quantity was limited by the quota and the fall clause, so called, disappeared. The new contract has not yet reached the point where it is possible to make representations to the government, but they have been made in the meantime, anticipating the possibility of the contract, in the strongest possible terms.

The task has become more difficult for reasons which I need not refer to at this time other than to say that an effort has been made, apparently, to convey the impression that Canadians attach little value to these provisions or to the preference itself, and that has somewhat increased the difficulty of dealing with it from the government standpoint. But every possible step is being taken by representations made by the high commissioner, at the instance of this government, to the British government. When the matter reaches the president of the board of trade more formal representations will be made.

It has been suggested by one of my colleagues that the provision of the clause in the Ottawa agreement dealing with contracts that prejudicially affected the operation of the preference was applicable to all countries and not to any one country, as my statement might possibly imply.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): When the Prime Minister speaks of the government not having information with respect to the proposed import of Russian timber, or at any rate with respect to an arrangement, does he mean the British government or the Canadian government?

Mr. BENNETT: Neither the British nor the Canadian government is concerned in the first instance with a contract, made by a private company known as Timber Distributors, with the Russian authorities. After the contract is made, if it is believed that that contract contravenes in any way the provisions of the section of the Ottawa agreement dealing with the matter to which I have referred, it is competent for the Canadian government to make representations to the British government, which has taken power from parliament to deal with the matter, and then action is taken in accordance with the provisions of the British statute.

RAILWAY COMMISSION

CHAIRMANSHIP OF BOARD—APPLICATIONS FOR ARBITRAL TRIBUNALS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) a few days ago asked a question in regard to the appointment of a chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and I said I would make a statement. I will now do so. Under present railway conditions and with the decrease in cases submitted to the railway commission, it is the opinion of the government that the railway commission is overmanned. There has been no request, officially or otherwise, for an arbitral tribunal, the setting up of which would require a chairman. When any such request is made or any indication given that an arbitral tribunal may be desired by either railway, the government will appoint immediately a chairman of the railway commission.

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Does that imply that no chairman will be appointed unless application is made?

Mr. MANION: Not necessarily, but we feel at the present time that there is no urgency about the matter.

PENSIONS FOR THE BLIND

PROPOSAL TO EXTEND BENEFITS OF OLD AGE PENSIONS ACT TO BLIND PEOPLE OVER FORTY YEARS OF AGE.

The house resumed from Wednesday, January 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cotnam:

That, in the opinion of this house, the provisions of the Old Age Pensions Act should apply to blind people over forty years of age.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): I wish to say a few words in support of this resolution, because I think the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. Cotnam) is to be commended for bringing the matter to the attention of the house. For quite a number of years now the various organizations that have made the welfare of the blind a part of their work have been advocating adequate provision in some way for the blind. Personally I should like to see adequate provision made not only for those blind who are over forty years of age but even for those who have not reached that age, if it were necessary. I am not finding fault with the mover of the resolution for putting it in the form in which he did; in fact, I believe it was necessary to put it in that form in order to get it a hearing in the house. I simply wish to add my word of approval.

Mr. L. W. JOHNSTONE (Cape Breton-North-Victoria): I most heartily endorse this resolution and I think the people throughout Canada will do the same. I know quite well that not only in this house but throughout the dominion it will receive sympathetic consideration. In my long professional career I have come in contact on many occasions with blind people both young and old, and I have been afflicted nearer home than perhaps most hon. gentlemen have been. One thing has always struck me in regard to the blind, something that I have observed more among them than among those suffering from any other affliction, and that is their great earnestness and their willingness to work. We see the blind wandering along the streets, stick in hand, with no other help than their other senses, which no doubt do become more acute, finding their way about, and taking up lessons in music and in other occupations. They are always willing to help themselves. Since its introduction Braille has been of great benefit to the blind. I know of many instances where they both read and write in Braille, and now there are magazines in that system, and they have the benefit of the New Testament. Not only do they read, but they write to one another. I do not wish to take up the time of the house, but I do hope that both the house and the government will fully endorse the resolution and that we may be able in consequence to help the blind, each in his own community.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): I wish to go on record as heartily in support of this resolution. My association with the blind goes back a considerable number of years to the days when I was in the provincial government of Alberta. A school was established in Manitoba for the education of blind persons, and from that time on no one who has come in contact with the blind there can have helped being struck by the fact that something should be done in a public way for people so afflicted. Of course, we must not lose sight of the fact that there are a great many blind people who make a success of their vocations. I have in mind one or two who have succeeded. I know of a young man who became blind during his university career, and he is making a splendid success to-day in the field of insurance, as a solicitor, so that he is able to support himself and his family. In the main however this affliction is a severe handicap to numbers of people throughout the country. No later than last session I was one of those in the House of Commons who pleaded for more consideration by way of grants to the associations that were looking after the interests of blind persons.

I have nothing to add to what was in my opinion very ably put yesterday by the mover of the resolution, except to say that I wish to go on record as being heartily in accord with the idea of parliament taking this matter up and doing something tangible for those unfortunates in our country who are stricken with blindness.

Mr. R. S. WHITE (Mount Royal): I desire merely to record my approval of the resolution before the house. I can imagine no resolution calling for legislation that will appeal to this house in a greater degree than the one moved by the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. Cotnam).

The point has been made by the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) that some persons afflicted with blindness have made a success in life so far as monetary independence is concerned. That of course is true. An outstanding case is probably that of Sir Charles Lindsay who recently received knighthood for his benevolent and charitable work and who has been able by his industry to acquire very substantial wealth. But the proposal of the resolution, as I understand it, is to extend the Old Age Pensions Act to those afflicted with blindness so that they may come under its provisions at the age of forty years. Blind persons who are deprived of sight to view the glories of creation appeal in a special degree to our sympathy and support, but over and above what charity and institutions have done to alleviate the afflictions of those who have never seen the light of day or the glory of the sun, over and above those who are aided in this way there is still a large class of blind people who require assistance from the state and no class of people can more strongly or reasonably look to the state for aid than can the blind.

Mr. S. C. ROBINSON (West Essex): I would like to add just a few words to what has been said respecting the resolution of the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. Cotnam). In the border cities we have a considerable number of blind and every year a delegation waits on me asking me to use my endeavours to assist them by way of a pension as outlined in the hon. member's resolution.

While I am on my feet I wish to say that since the war the Lion's Club, one of the service clubs of Windsor, has been doing yeoman work for the blind, that is in establishing them in vocations that they can carry on and also assisting them financially. If it were not for that organization, the blind would be in a much worse position than they are in to-day. I believe these matters should be drawn to the attention of the house when service clubs are doing such good work on behalf of the country.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): I am very glad to observe the unanimity with which the house has received the resolution of the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. Cotnam). Under the circumstances it will be extremely difficult for the government not to afford some relief to the blind in accordance with the suggestions contained in the resolution now before the house. I understand during this session the government will bring down amendments to the Old Age Pensions Act and my own suggestion would be that the government should incorporate in that act the essence of the resolution under discussion. The blind themselves have for a number of years agitated for a pension at the age of probably twenty-five years and over and I sincerely hope the government will follow the lead given in other countries by other governments and give this unfortunate section of our community that pension which we all agree they ought to have. The expense involved is very small in comparison with the results achieved.

Mr. J. K. BLAIR (North Wellington): The resolution before the house needs very little explanation. I am sure every hon. member will readily recognize the necessity for a movement of this nature. These blind people in many instances are protected and provided for by their parents but when they arrive at the age of forty, ofttimes they are destitute and a consideration of this sort would be a kindly gesture on behalf of those who have been bereft of their sight.

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): I wish to compliment the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. Cotnam) upon bringing up this resolution. He made a very valuable contribution to the literature of the subject in his introduction of it. Blindness in the great majority of cases comes on through no fault of the individual so afflicted. It may come on as a result of accident, nerve disease or as a consequence of infection during a very early age. There are special reasons why blind people should receive help from the state. Probably the first one is that they are unable to compete in the labour market and make a living for themselves; second, by the very nature of their affliction they require extra help, attendance and services and we all know the friends and relatives are often unable to assume the burden of caring for those blind people. I therefore will give the resolution my hearty support.

Mr. G. D. STANLEY (East Calgary): A few minutes ago I received the following telegram which I shall read:

> Local committee of I.O.D.E., Lions Club and representative citizens here respectfully seek your earnest support of resolution favouring application of Old Age Pensions Act to blind persons attaining forty years. We even favour a lower age but will gratefully accept what your government deems opportune.
> A. J. Bartle.

I shall not delay the consideration of the resolution which has now been discussed at some length, but I shall give my wholehearted support to the object of it.

Mr. F. R. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): A few months ago I received from an organization in my city a telegram along similar lines to that which the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Stanley) has just read. I want to lend my support to the resolution moved by the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. Cotnam). I merely intend to congratulate the hon. member upon bringing this matter before the house. I think it is our duty to give the question consideration and support.

Mr. F. W. TURNBULL (Regina): Mr. Speaker, I rise merely to put on record my approval of the principle of this resolution. Having gone that far, my zeal for social reform, which is only equalled by that of my hon. friends the new converts across the way, will not permit me to detain the house any longer.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the observations made by the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. Cotnam) yesterday on this resolution. No one could fail to be impressed by the picture he spread upon the record with respect to those who suffer the great affliction of blindness. There are, of course, and have been for centuries, societies and individuals that have carried on beneficent activities for the relief of those who suffer from blindness. In this country votes of money have been made by the dominion government, and I believe by perhaps all the provincial governments, towards the assistance of such societies and others engaged in helping those who suffer from this great affliction. The hon. member for North Renfrew has for many years given a great deal of thought and study to the subject matter of this resolution.

The resolution suggests that the Old Age Pensions Act should be amended to apply to blind people over forty years of age. As the mover explained, the age of forty years was adopted perhaps arbitrarily, but he suggested, and I think his reasoning was sound, that if an earlier age were fixed it might in some cases act as a deterrent to blind people taking advantage of such opportunities as are theirs to become self-supporting. That might occur in some cases, but I doubt whether it would in the majority of cases. Personally I do not think an amendment to the Old Age Pensions Act would be the most satisfactory method of dealing with a question of this character. The Old Age Pensions Act is legislation of which some provinces avail themselves, others do not. If this resolution results in legislation it might well take the form of a special act, dissociated from old age pensions.

The question of cost has always to be considered in matters of this kind, so I think that feature should be made manifest in order that the house may thoroughly understand what they are embarking upon if legislation is introduced following this resolution. I am sure every member of this chamber agrees with me that we should do everything humanly possible to alleviate the lot of those affected with blindness. This house has been in years past and is presently engaged in many researches in order to help those who by reason of this misfortune cannot help themselves. If there is a class to whom we might well devote some time and some money it is that class to which this resolution relates.

I think the only committee that could deal with the matter would be the standing committee on industrial and international relations—and I would ask the hon. gentleman who introduced the resolution to move that it be referred to that committee in order that they may take it into consideration from the angles I have suggested and others, because it is an important matter. I believe the purpose would best be served in that way. If the hon. member does not care to make the motion I would undertake to move that the resolution be referred to the standing committee on industrial relations.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Before the hon. member closes I would like to say a word in support of this motion. I think the object of it is good, but it should not be confined to the class entitled to claim old age pensions. In the province from which I come, in which I am more familiar with the existing state of affairs, we have some very deserving institutes, the Montreal Institute for the Blind, the Nazareth Institute and other institutes that are also deserving of support. They have been looking after the blind for many years, or generations. I do not think they receive much assistance from the federal treasury, although they receive a certain amount from the provincial government. When the committee take up this question I suggest that it should not be limited to one class but that they look into the matter thoroughly, because if there is a class of people entitled to sympathy and wholehearted support it is certainly those who are deprived of their sight.

Mr. COTNAM: I do not recall, since I have been a member of this house, any question or resolution on which the house seemed to be so entirely in agreement. I do not propose now to discuss the subject matter any further, but only to say that while I am quite ready to acquiesce in the suggestion of the Minister of Labour that the resolution be referred to the committee on industrial relations for further consideration, I would like it to be with the understanding that if at all possible the matter in some form be resubmitted to this house during the present session, in order that the blind may receive financial assistance in the near future.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is moved by Hon. Mr. Gordon that there be added to the motion as an amendment the following words:

And that the question be referred to the committee on industrial and international relations.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion as amended agreed to.

FEDERAL HEALTH POLICY

PROPOSED ADOPTION OF POLICY IN COOPERATION WITH THE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Mr. J. K. BLAIR (North Wellington): Mr. Speaker, in regard to this question of health I do not think we should encourage the duplication of services which we have had in the past, with both the provinces and the federal government taking part. As a result there have been many points at which the work has not been done properly. I think the desire of the federal government should be made known and the work carried on under the provincial governments; I think the provincial ministers of health are quite competent to carry out the work but that it is the duty of this house to outline the course we wish pursued, since we make some grants towards the cost of the work.

One of the branches which, in my opinion, should be considered, is the hospitalization of tubercular patients. In Ontario I believe the poor people and the rich people are well looked after, but there is the middle class who are not able to pay the cost of hospitalization. So we find contagion spreading all the time. We find homes in which there may be tuberculous persons living with children, and conditions of that kind, and I believe that if something could be done to bring about more complete hospitalization of tubercular patients it would mean a great deal to the county in which I live.

In connection with maternity work the situation in Ontario is perhaps different from that of the western provinces. In the west, where the farms are far apart, hospitalization is required in maternity cases, but that is not so in the rural sections of Ontario. I have the statistics in regard to Ontario with the exception of those for the last two or three years. We had an excellent man in Ontario, Doctor McCullough, who furnished us with the statistics so that we might know what was going on throughout the province, but for the last few years that information has not been made available. According to my information, however, the maternal death rate in the cities is two and a half times as great as the rate in the rural parts of the province. I think if the Minister of Health looks into the matter he will find this statement to be correct. So I do not think that the hospitalization of maternity cases would lower the maternal death rate in the rural parts of Ontario; I think the larger hospitals will have to show that they can do better work than is being done in the rural districts before we make any change in that regard. As I say, I am not speaking of the western provinces. People on farms there are further removed from medical assistance, but in Ontario by far the best record is found in the rural districts and villages, where the family doctor practices. I have the statistics for each city and each county for a number of years back, and I think my statement can be proved quite easily.

I might say also that in Ontario, and in fact the whole of Canada, the infant mortality rate is too high. Many other countries surpass us in that regard. I believe the average in Canada is something over 89 per thousand, while in New Zealand it is only 35. Certainly we are not among the leading countries so far as low infant mortality is concerned. According to the last report I have before me the maternal mortality rate per thousand is 5·8 in Canada, while in Italy and some other countries it is only 2·7. But while our maternal mortality is much too high I must say that it is in the rural parts of Ontario, and I presume that applies to the other provinces as well, that we find the low mortality rate of only 2·7, while in the cities it is as high as 7 and 8 per thousand.

Mr. SPENCER: I do not wish to take up the time of the house at any great length, but I should like to refer briefly to the minister's statement in connection with this resolution. First of all I wish to thank and compliment him upon the stand he has taken with regard to this all important matter of health. Early in his remarks, however, he said that he thought my address painted altogether too gloomy a picture with regard to the health of the Canadian people. All I can say in reply is that the statements I made and the figures I gave were actual facts with regard to the health of our people.

I have in my hand a short report by a commission which was formed in the province of Alberta. This commission realized the serious situation with regard to health matters and considered it necessary to draft a plan which would be sufficiently comprehensive properly to look after the health of our people. I should like to take a moment to outline the important part of that plan, as follows:

1. The regular general practitioner service of general medicine, minor surgery, obstetrics, etc.
2. Specialized service, special diagnostic services and major surgery.
3. Hospitalization and hospital facilities such as pathological laboratory services, X-ray services and so on.

4. Dental services.
5. Prescribed medicines; prescribed surgical appliances, and so on.
6. Preventive medical service for each unit.

This service would be a full time service similar to that now available in Edmonton, Calgary and the rural health districts operating in the Red Deer and High River areas.

I mention that plan because in one of the provinces, which I am glad to say has been congratulated by the minister they have realized the tremendous necessity for something more to be done with regard to health matters than is being done at the present time. It is because they realize these remedies should be brought about, and because of the considerable cost to that province as well as to other provinces which may follow a like plan, that I ask the house to give consideration to the necessity for making greater grants and working in closer cooperation.

I was pleased to hear the figures given by the Minister of National Health (Mr. Sutherland) concerning the great improvement which has been made due to the attention given to serious ailments such as tuberculosis, diphtheria, smallpox and whooping cough, and the resulting reduction in death rates from these ailments. I was pleased to note the minister is sympathetic to the idea of full time health units. On the whole I believe this house should be congratulated upon having a Minister of National Health who so wholeheartedly has met a problem such as the present one and who has given us such hope for the future.

The minister made some observations however concerning which I should like to speak. He said that with the exception of certain rural districts we are fairly well supplied with hospitals. That may be true so far as the older parts of Canada are concerned, but the same statement would not apply to the newer parts of the dominion. So far as the western provinces are concerned I know we could do with a great many more hospitals. While enumerating the hospitals in Canada he stated that there were 59 for the treatment of mental cases. In view of that fact it seems to me we have a situation which is more serious than I had at first thought. A condition whereby we have to have no less than 59 hospitals to take care of our mental patients is certainly not complimentary to such a young country peopled with such a robust race. Something must be wrong with our people in this northern country if we have to have that many institutions to take care of our mental patients. In those provinces with which I have been more closely in touch I know there is usually a waiting list of mental cases to enter the hospital, already built.

May I congratulate the Minister of National Health upon his statement that the ministers of health in the different provinces are to be invited to meet in Ottawa at some date in the near future. I should like to congratulate him further upon the address he gave and the hope he has given hon. members and people throughout the country who look forward to a great deal more being done, particularly in a preventive way, to guard the health of our people. I appreciate his observation that he has no objection to the resolution before the house.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: What the hon. member has said is true. The government has no objection to the motion passing, but its passing is subject to what I have said about cooperation and investigations being proceeded with.

Motion agreed to.

EMPIRE TRADE AGREEMENTS

REQUEST FOR OPINION OF MR. SPEAKER ON QUESTION OF PROCEDURE

On the motion of Mr. Harris:

That, in the opinion of this house, the operation of the trade agreements concluded at the imperial economic conference held at Ottawa, 1932, merits the approval of this house.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the first motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough (Mr. Harris) is called I rise, not to take any exception to the house proceeding with it, but rather if possible to obtain your honour's opinion as to the bearing of the decision given by the ex-Speaker, the Hon. Mr. Black, which relates to the same question being raised a second time in the house during the one session.

The motion of the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough has to do with the trade agreements concluded at the imperial economic conference held at Ottawa in 1932, and it is a motion to express the house's approval of those agreements. The discussion on this resolution may occasion pretty full discussion of the Ottawa agreements The question therefore naturally arises whether if this all-important subject is discussed at this stage on a private member's motion hon. members of this house will be free to discuss the agreements at a later stage, and particularly at the time the budget is brought down, when these matters will necessarily come up for consideration.

The ruling of the ex-Speaker is one that was given on May 15, 1934, and appears in the votes and proceedings of this house of that day. I shall not read the whole decision, but sufficient to indicate the important part of it and its relation to the point I am now raising. At page 332 of the votes and proceedings of 1934 the following appears:

Mr. Speaker: On April 23rd, Mr. Ralston moved an amendment to the motion of the Minister of Finance that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself again into committee of ways and means, the following:—

"This house regrets that the proposals of the Minister of Finance give no indication of the intention of the government to abandon the policies of economic nationalism which have proved so disastrous to Canada's trade. It is of the opinion that the immediate substitution therefor of policies which will promote export trade throughout the world is essential to any permanent improvement of conditions in Canada, and to the successful application of other policies respecting credit and employment designed to effect this end."

On April 30th, Mr. Spencer moved a subamendment and on May 7th on a question of order raised by Mr. Mackenzie, of Vancouver Centre, as to the subamendment, I held that the subamendment was not in order as it sought to deal with the question of credit which had been debated on a motion by Mr. Lucas and the matter of credit had been by consent referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce where it is being considered.

It is now agreed that the amendment is not in order and for the same reasons as said subamendment was held to be not in order.

Then, a little further on, making reference to an amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) the following appears:

On February 13th, Mr. Woodsworth moved the following amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne:—

"That the following be added to the motion: We respectfully regret that Your Excellency's present advisers have not taken such steps as are necessary to deal adequately with unemployment, to reduce the burden imposed by the public debt, and to put the agricultural industry on a basis that will ensure the farmer a decent standard of living."

Thereupon, employment was discussed and the amendment was disposed of by the house on a division resulting in 54 yeas and 89 nays.

That amendment dealt with the question of employment generally and the amendment now before the house is to the same effect and so is not in order.

The Speaker went on to say:

My decision is suported by the following precedents.

Bourinot, page 328: "It is, however, an ancient rule of parliament that 'no question or motion can be regularly offered if it is substantially the same with one on which the judgment of the house has already been expressed during the current session.' The old rule of parliament reads: 'That a question being once made, and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again, but must stand as a judgment of the house.' "

Then, not to take up the time of the house by reading it all, and to read only what is most pertinent, let me conclude with the last paragraph:

I therefore rule that the amendment moved by Mr. Ralston is out of order as it is substantially the same as one on which the judgment of the house has already been expressed, and it deals with matters already before the house.

From this decision Mr. Ralston appealed to the house, but the Speaker was sustained. At the time hon. members on this side felt that the decision was one which would materially limit the opportunities of debate and discussion in this house. I think your honour will agree that probably no question just at the present time is more important than that of trade, particularly as affected by the Ottawa agreements.

What I would like to know before we begin a discussion of this motion is as to whether, after the motion has been discussed, hon. members will be precluded from a very full discussion of the trade agreements and their effects when we come to discuss for example, the question of reciprocity or any other question that may come up in connection with the consideration of the budget. I also submit that for the consideration of the Prime Minister because I feel that if the ruling of the former Speaker is to bind this house we might as well give up hope after this afternoon of having any further discussion of the Ottawa agreements in this parliament, and I should not like to think that that was the intention back of this motion.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Toronto-Scarborough): I should just like to bring to the attention of the leader of the opposition this one important point. The resolution as drafted states that the operation of the trade agreements concluded at the imperial economic conference held at Ottawa in 1932 merits the approval of this house. There is no word of policy there, no word of empire markets, and with all due respect to the right hon. gentleman I submit to your honour that my motion is in order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not questioned that it is in order. I have asked the Speaker's opinion.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Obviously the question is whether or not the motion is in order. There can be no decision given by the Chair with respect to any matter until that matter is to be dealt with by the chamber. The Chair cannot give decisions in anticipation of what may happen.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not decisions. I merely asked his honour for an opinion on the matter.

Mr. BENNETT: His honour is precluded from giving his opinion. His honour can only give his judgment upon a matter that is raised, upon a point of order being taken by a member of the house as to the propriety within the rules of discussing any resolution or question that is submitted to the house for its consideration. The Speaker of the house is not an advisory tribunal to express opinions with respect to some contingency that may or may not happen. His duty is merely to administer the rules and preserve order. As to the second there is little difficulty. As to the first, the construction of the rules, there is always some difficulty.

The opinion that was given by the former Speaker is a decision that there shall not be two discussions of a given matter at the same session of parliament. That is so fundamental for the maintenance of the institution itself that one would think there could be no doubt about its soundness.

The right hon. gentleman read from the records to show that this house had distinctly arrived at conclusions with respect to every matter mentioned in the amendment of Mr. Ralston, and a division having taken place and a conclusion having been reached it was not competent again to review that matter in the same session by projecting a new discussion into the house.

But there is also another matter to be considered, and that is that it is always competent for the house to express opinions with respect to a matter that has not been debated during the session, and up to the moment there has been no debate on the question which is now up for consideration. I was reminded the other day when discussing another matter, by my friend the Minister of Justice that just prior to the budget being delivered increasing the British preference, the then member for the city of Halifax, the retired Judge Russell, moved a motion that in the opinion of the house the British preference should be increased by, I think, about 25 per cent. Three days later the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) delivered his budget and increased the preference by 25 per cent. It was one of those motions made by arrangement for the purpose of securing an antecedent expression of opinion, and then finding that the budget itself dealt with the matter in the way I have indicated. But I do say to the right hon. gentleman that it is wholly improper to seek from the chair the expression of an opinion as to something that may be submitted; and, secondly, if there has been no point of order taken, then the debate should proceed without any further question. If the right hon. gentleman raises a question of order and indicates the grounds upon which he makes his point of order, we will discuss that point of order. But until that time does arrive, I submit that there is nothing before the chair to enable it to give an antecedent, shall I say, advisory opinion upon contingencies that may never arise or events that may never happen.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not understand the leader of the opposition to raise any question as to the motion being in order. On the point however that he did mention there is direct authority in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms. In paragraph 108 at page 33 there appears this statement:

> The Speaker decides the questions of order only when they actually arise and not in anticipation.

I would refer the house to Denison and Brand, pages 295 and 296. I think the leader of the opposition has perhaps accomplished the purpose which he had in making his statement, but it is generally agreed that it would be impossible for me to give a decision at this time on a point of order to be raised in the future.

PROPOSED APPROVAL OF OPERATION OF AGREEMENTS CONCLUDED AT IMPERIAL ECONOMIC CONFERENCE, 1932

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Toronto-Scarborough) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the operation of the trade agreements concluded at the imperial economic conference held at Ottawa, 1932, merits the approval of this house.

He said: The operation of the trade agreements concluded at the imperial economic conference in 1932 has been one of the main factors which have made it possible for the League of Nations and indeed all fact-finding bodies to recognize during the last two or three years that Canada has recovered from the world depression probably more quickly than any other country in the world. Not only have all signatories to these pacts been benefited but they have experienced a recovery which is perhaps on a par with anything that is on record and one of which they are very proud. If the man in the street could get some idea of the magnitude of the effect they have had, if he could realize that one quarter of the world's population and perhaps one third of the world's commerce and business have been benefited by these imperial trade agreements, he would begin to form some idea of the greatness of the achievement and would then be able to measure what manner of man we have leading this Conservative party in our day and generation in this house. What a tribute to Canadians to think that there should be focussed on this country the attention of a quarter of the world's population, yea, of the whole civilized world. To think that that attention should focus on Canada with its small population of ten millions and on this city of Ottawa and on those in charge of the affairs of this part of the empire. It has made Canadians once again empire-conscious, as it were. We are thinking, acting and working together and are coming to believe that we as a people are showing the world the way out of its difficulties. These agreements are responsible for that feeling among civilized peoples. In the war we thought, acted and worked together and now in time of peace we are thinking, acting and working together again; and in my opinion when history is written fifty years hence these imperial trade agreements will be regarded as one of the real achievements so far as Canada is concerned.

To those of us who are in business, what a thrill it is to be buying sterling to pay for empire goods, whereas ten years ago we had to buy New York drafts, French marks, guilders, pesos or something else. Now we buy sterling to pay for our imports from other parts of the empire. But that perhaps was not the first duty with which this government was confronted when it came into power. We had to see to it that we got more trade and got it as quickly as possible; for we had staring us in the face at that time an adverse balance of trade of $112,000,000, which was bleeding this country white of any surplus that it had, and that had to be arrested. Although we may have been toddling previous to 1930, this government took charge of the affairs of Canada and put the country on its feet. The first thing to do was to find work for the minds and the hands of all classes, but it was important to stop the efflux from this country of millions of our money, so that from this country, with its great natural resources, there should be a flow of goods to other parts of the world in order that we might have a favourable balance of trade with which to pay the interest on our indebtedness. That has been accomplished in four short years, to the extent that we had a favourable balance of trade on December 31, 1934, for the twelve month period of $146,432,000. That one achievement alone is in my opinion sufficient to grip the imagination of the Canadian people and put back into power the party which is now directing the affairs of this country.

Coming back to the operation of these trade agreements, I would ask you to visualize for a moment the distance that separates the different parts of the empire from one another —Australia, New Zealand, India, South Africa, Canada and then the United Kingdom in the centre. The very fact that these agreements have made possible an expansion of our trade has stimulated the shipping industry to a degree which it is difficult to measure. But not only the shipping industry but trade and commerce generally, all the channels of trade, have widened and deepened owing to the operation of these particular pacts.

Someone will say at once—What about Europe, which finds Great Britain in a sheltered position in relation to the different parts of her empire? Europe cannot get her goods into Great Britain in the same way as formerly. I had the pleasure of spending two or three weeks in Holland, Belgium and France, particularly Holland. A certain reaction has resulted from the fact that when these empire agreements were negotiated these countries could not get their products into Britain in the same manner as they could previously. I said to a good friend of mine with whom I had been doing business for some years, Mr. DeGroot of Scheepmackenshaven, Rotterdam: "What is the answer"? He said: "The answer is that I am not coming to Canada to see you this year. I have been gathering natural products from the Black sea ports and bringing them to the North sea ports and selling them in the industrial parts of France, Belgium and Holland. There I have been manufacturing them, my friends have been manufacturing them into finished goods and they in turn for the last twenty or thirty years have been dumping those goods into England." Yes, and England, that great workshop, is absorbing some of the natural products of those Black sea ports. England was dumping those finished products into North America, Australia and New Zealand. I said: "What are you going to do now that your market in the United Kingdom is a little more difficult to reach"? He said to me: "As regards the teeming millions of people from whom we have been taking natural products in the Ukraine, Roumania, Hungary and Poland, and lumber from Finland and Sweden, these products we are going to deal in; these products will be made into manufactured goods in the industrial part of Europe and my agents and my men are going to take these finished products back to the people from whom they receive the natural products in the first instance, and in another fifty years' time history will tell that the standard of living of the people in the Ukraine, Roumania, Bulgaria, will be raised by the consumption of the manufactured goods from the industrial part of Europe." So, in the final analysis, these imperial pacts which to-day to a degree have stopped the dumping of central European goods of all kinds into the United Kingdom will have the effect of giving back to those people whom I have mentioned finished articles so that they can bring their standard of living more nearly to where they want to have it, and that is on a parity with that which we enjoy in this western civilization.

Last May I cited to the house an example of what happens to some of the natural products of this country due to the sheltered position that these pacts have given to Canada. I informed the house of 500 tons of material such as had never before left the shores of Canada, reaching Luton, England, to be made into manufactured products. Since then I investigated the matter to find out what had happened to the people formerly supplying those goods. I found that the goods had previously come from China. Upon further investigation and correspondence I found that those imperial pacts had stopped China from shipping this particular product to England. What happened to these goods? They went into edible channels in China and to-day the Chinaman is consuming these goods which he should have been consuming right along in his own country. The net result is that in a few years we shall have stronger Chinese

In my remarks of a moment or two ago I mentioned lumber coming from Finland and Sweden. In 1922 one-half of the United Kingdom supply of spruce, pine and fir, representing 2,000 units out of the 4,000 units that are consumed in the United Kingdom, came from Finland and Sweden. What is going to happen to this trade now that Canada has a sheltered position for her lumber in the United Kingdom market? The workshops of Europe are hungry for the lumber of Finland and Sweden; they need it very badly and that trade channel coming down from there into central Europe is opening and widening, deepening and broadening in every sense of the word. In the meantime, we in Canada find that our position is improving by leaps and bounds. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a few of these figures on Hansard.

The lumber industry in Canada shows that in two short years due to the operation of these agreements, whereas in 1932 Great Britain took from us $4,848,000 worth of timber, last year they took from us $17,744,000 worth. Is the operation of these trade agreements to Canada's benefit? I say it is. Let me ask the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Stitt): when he returns home to the Pas and sees two new lumber mills in the Hudson bay area operating that were never operating before and when he sees next summer going out of that Hudson bay port several cargoes of lumber to the United Kingdom, will not he and his people say to themselves that these agreements at least merit the approval of the Canadian people?

What applies to timber applies to a whole list of commodities but I am going to take the time of the house to mention only two or three. Let me take copper, lead and zinc. In 1932 exports of copper to the United Kingdom amounted to $4,854,000 and by December 31, 1934, this had increased to $14,308,000, or nearly four times as much. When the United States put four cents a pound against our copper and due to these pacts we received two pence a pound preference, that was something that was really worth while, and the stimulus given to that industry has been of great benefit to Canada. The same story may be told so far as zinc is concerned. The exports to the United Kingdom increased from $2,277,000 in 1932 to $5,354,000 in 1934. The exports of pig lead increased from $1,849,000 in 1932 to $2,963,000 in 1934. Exports of asbestos increased three times, from $143,000 in 1932 to $452,000 in 1934, and exports of nickel increased from $1,272,000 in 1932 to $10,087,000 in 1934. The mining industry itself has gone ahead by leaps and bounds due to the operation of these agreements.

But we find this benefit not only in that particular industry. I ask my friends from the land of Evangeline and those from British Columbia who know something about the Okanagan valley: Do your people not feel very proud of these agreements when they realize that last year they shipped 2,113,000 barrels of apples to the United Kingdom whereas two short years ago they shipped only 1,386,000 barrels. In a like manner exports to the United Kingdom of canned pears jumped from 4,396,000 pounds in 1932 to 9,752,000 pounds in 1934. When I think of British Columbia I also think of salmon. If hon. members can visualize that canned salmon exports to the United Kingdom increased from $2,523,000 to $3,262,000 worth in two short years they will get some idea of what is transpiring. I am glad to find a few of my hon. friends from the maritimes supporting this resolution. When your fresh and frozen fish exports rose from $355,000 two years ago to more than double that figure, $733,000 for the year ended December 31, 1934, I ask you what is the answer to be from the people down by the sea with regard to these agreements. Then ask any one about bacon and ham; it is common knowledge that these agreements have again opened up to the Canadian people a market for one of Canada's natural industries, the export of bacon and ham to Great Britain. This achievement alone should be sufficient to return this party to power. These exports rose from the products of 300,000 hogs in 1932 to the products of 1,000,000 hogs in 1934. I intend to ask your indulgence in a minute or two while I comment further on that feature. Eggs rose from an export of $3,972 in 1932 to $409,333 in 1934.

But we cannot get along with exports alone. The agreements recognized that fact. To-day we are in the happy position of seeing that more and more of the requirements of this country are being obtained from the workshops of England. With your permission I would like to put on the record these figures, given to me by the bureau of statistics:

Total United Kingdom imports		93,508,143	97,878,232	113,418,569

In 1931 Great Britain only supplied us with 6 per cent of our requirements of mercerized cotton yarns; last year she supplied us with 84 per cent of our requirements. That is worth while. In like manner grey cotton imports from Great Britain in 1932 represented 17 per cent of our purchases, and last year it rose to 45 per cent. The following table will show other examples of similar improvement:

	Percentage of total Imports
	1931	1934
Bleached cottons	25	75
Printed cottons	42	70
Wood fabric	65	93

The total increase in textiles was $20,000,000. Then further:

Leather	16	39
Iron and steel	6	10

The value of the imports of empire tea for 1931 amounted to $1,780,000; for 1934, $3,140,000.

I invite the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) to let his mind run back over the last fifteeen years in connection with the leather industry, and think of his friends in that industry, nearly all of whom were wont to support the Liberal party in days gone by. Where are they to-day? They are thinking of the good that has been done to Canada and to their industry by the operation of these agreements. Two years ago 16 per cent of our imports of fine leathers came from the United Kingdom, we are now getting 39 per cent from there. Let me read a letter from one of our friends in the leather industry. This is dated January 25 last.

With the sentiments which you express in regard to the empire trade agreement, I am in most hearty accord and were I a member of the house would concur most heartily in the motion which you propose. I believe that the trade agreements have been a distinct benefit to Canada as a whole. In the general advantage the leather industry has shared indirectly, but in addition there are certain branches of the leather industry which have benefited very directly by the trade agreement. My father will probably speak in greater detail of the advantage to the calf leather industry; I know that they have found the agreement a distinct advantage there, and certainly some sole leather tanners have benefited by it. Probably the greatest single benefit so far as the leather industry is concerned has come to those producing patent leather. May the Ottawa trade agreement remain and increase in scope and advantage to Canada.

What is the situation in regard to patent leather? Three years ago the United States shipped to the United Kingdom 18,000 hundredweight, last year 7,000 hundredweight. Canada three years ago shipped to the United Kingdom 6,000 hundredweight, last year she shipped 11,000 hundredweight, to the value of £368,422, which money came into Canada to benefit Canada generally and the leather industry in particular.

This is what the father of the gentleman just quoted says, under date of January 29. The letter has just come to my hands. I apologize for not going on with my resolution last Monday but I wanted this information:

I agree with you that the Ottawa agreements have been of the greatest possible value to Canada. Led by the premier of Canada they have operated in favour of the farmers and business generally...

The writer's view is that this is one of the greatest forward steps in the empire. The rapid growth in two or three years, in all parts, together with the understanding of each other better and finding out that what they can exchange to the advantage of both will enlarge our trade as the years pass along. The leather business has been greatly benefited, more men have been employed. The empire demand has grown for our goods. It has increased 125 per cent since the agreements have been passed. We are not looking at this from any political standpoint—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HARRIS:

—but from a business standpoint, in which every citizen should be called to see the expansion, not only in our line, but scores of other lines.

I would like to turn back for a moment to bacon and ham and try to put the picture before you of what has transpired in that industry and how it affects Canadian farmers. When these trade agreements went into effect the average price of hogs in Canada was 4 cents. In Chicago it was a good deal less than 4 cents. Canada produces 6,000,000 hogs per year. What happened inside of twelve months from the consummation of these agreements? The price went from 4 cents to 6½ cents, beyond that in fact, but the average for the year in round figures was 6½ cents. In the United States the price remained stationary below 4 cents. So we have 6½ cents on this side of the line and 4 cents on that side, a difference of 2½ cents a pound. Six million hogs per year, produced in Canada, 2½ cents per pound on a 200 pound hog, represents $5 per hog. For six million hogs it means a total of $30,000,000. Due to these trade agreements you have put into the pockets of the Canadian farmers in that one year $30,000,000 more than they would have received had these pacts not been consummated and had the United Kingdom not seen fit to restrict her imports of bacon and ham. It did not stop there; it went from 6½ cents per pound to 8 cents, in round figures, in December of 1934. If you deduct 6½ from 8 you have a balance of 1½ cents, which on a 200 pound hog means $3, and on a production of 6,000,000 hogs means another $18,000,000 in addition to the $30,000,000 realized within the last two years. That is all due to the action of the United Kingdom in restricting her imports, making it possible for Canada to recover a portion of that market.

But our farmers have not gone far enough. In 1932 the products of 300,000 hogs went to the United Kingdom; in 1933 the products of 600,000 hogs went to that market, and in 1934, the products of 1,000,000 hogs were sent to the United Kingdom, but under these pacts it is possible for Canada to supply a quota equal to the production from 2,500,000 hogs. So we are only about a quarter of the distance that it is possible for us to go. Even since December 31, 1934, the hog market has continued to rise. To-day it is on the basis of 8½ cents, and I say to the Canadian people and the Canadian farmers that this one feature of these pacts will see to it that the Canadian hog will buy the baby a new pair of shoes.

While we were debating these agreements in 1932, my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition said:

They have made trade more difficult in this country than it was before; more difficult as between different parts of the British empire; more difficult as between different parts of the world.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a few figures on Hansard.

CANADA'S TOTAL IMPORTS FROM EMPIRE COUNTRIES
Twelve Months ended December 31

Imports from:	1932 $	1933 $	1934 $	Per cent increase 1934 over 1932
British Empire (Total)	128,058,000	132,684,000	157,067,000	22.7
United Kingdom	93,508,000	97,878,000	113,418,000	21.3
Australia	5,845,000	5,080,000	6,374,000	9.1
British South Africa	4,085,000	4,537,000	3,007,000	-26.4
Newfoundland	576,000	626,000	1,422,000	146.9
New Zealand	856,000	2,013,000	2,893,000	238.0

These figures show that our imports from the British empire have increased 22·7 per cent in two short years. Imports from the United Kingdom have increased by 21·3 per cent, from Australia by 9·1 per cent, from Newfoundland by 146·9 per cent, and from New Zealand by 238 per cent. I ask you if that looks as though trade was more difficult. Our exports, to which I referred a few moments ago, increased as indicated as follows:

CANADA'S TOTAL EXPORTS TO EMPIRE COUNTRIES
Twelve Months ended December 31

Domestic exports to:	1932 $	1933 $	1934 $	Per cent increase 1934 over 1932
British Empire (Total)	217,157,000	255,181,000	335,245,000	54.4
United Kingdom	178,172,000	210,698,000	270,334,000	51.7
Australia	7,133,000	10,208,000	16,870,000	136.5
British South Africa	4,416,000	5,974,000	12,103,000	174.1
Newfoundland	5,645,000	6,025,000	6,597,000	16.9
New Zealand	3,406,000	3,833,000	6,821,000	100.3

Does that indicate that trade has been rendered more difficult by the operation of these agreements? Last December, for the first time in many moons, the United States found itself with an unfavourable balance in connection with its trade with Canada; the balance in our favour amounted to 19 per cent. The facts that I have cited with regard to our trade within the empire, and a study of those facts by our friends in the United States, in my opinion will do more to crystallize public opinion in that country and make them see to it that those in charge of their affairs get more of our trade, than anything that has happened in the last few years. The United States, which has exemplified all the 66 countries that have raised their tariff barriers, seeing us standing on our own feet instead of toddling along, as the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) said the other day, will see to it that trade between Canada and the United States is increased, because we have been able to take care of ourselves.

Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but the quality of our products will create a demand that their markets be opened to us. Canadian cattle on the Chicago market, the first since 1929, sold for $7.75. That is an opening, a start, and when the new agreement is consummated by this government, this year or next, within two or three years we will see a steady flow of Canadian cattle to the Chicago market, which is our natural market for that product. We must realize that it requires only one per cent of the United States consumption of beef and beef products to relieve our market of the surplus of 300,000 cattle which we must move out of the country in order to stimulate our own market, and the day is not far away when that market will be opened to us.

My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition said world trade would be made more difficult. I should like to present some figures showing the distance we have travelled from the low of the depression towards average prosperity. The average prosperity was determined by taking an average of monthly indices in each case for the four years from 1926 to 1929. The figures indicate the distance travelled from that low of depression towards average prosperity:

	Per cent
Exports	50.5
Exports to empire countries	53.2
Imports	36.8
Imports from empire countries	53.2
Physical Volume of business	64.0
Industrial production	67.0
Manufacturing production	75.6
Iron and steel production	53.1
Textile production	141.0
Automobile production	61.0
Electric power production	140.5
Mineral production	184.8
Construction	17.0
Employment	62.6
Carloadings	35.6
Farm products prices	28.7

Our world trade has increased very considerably. I am sorry I have not ten minutes more to speak on that subject, but I am anxious to get to another statement made by the right hon. leader of the opposition, and appearing at page 290 of Hansard for 1932-33:

It is a very serious thing to take any step which will lead to friction between different parts of the empire. I think the British empire suffered sufficient strain during the period of the conference itself. I believe, as one distinguished writer has said, that we are perhaps better off that some agreement was reached than if none had been arrived at. On the other hand, as the same writer has said—

Beware of these men who write books.

—perhaps the British empire would have been much better off if no conference had taken place.

My right hon. friend speaks of friction. I thought agreements were instruments of peace, and I know this agreement has been such an instrument. I know it is one factor that has brought our people in Australia, New Zealand and South Africa closer together. How do I know? Last year I had a thrill when, for the first time, I received Christmas greetings from George Davis, who operates the largest docks south of the equator. He has a large plant at Cockatoo island, and does business in a big way. Does that sound like friction? Here is another greeting from a man who is chairman of about thirty industries in the United Kingdom; he says:

Greetings and hearty good wishes for Christmas and the new year.

Let me read a few extracts from some correspondence it has been my pleasure to receive since these pacts have been in operation. This is a letter from the chairman of about thirty industries in England who has corresponded with a friend in Australia who, in turn, has corresponded with me. The letter states:

The Cockatoo island dock appears to be a big venture. Such courage in these days impels my sincere admiration. I wish Australia every success. I saw the New Zealanders recently. My wife and I had dinner with them a few weeks ago. They are making progress, in the midst of the world trade. One cannot help wondering whether sixty-four nations have a sufficiently common platform to agree on anything concrete enough to deal with the ills from which the world is suffering. I sincerely hope it may be so but things do not look too bright at the moment, and I for one cannot help feeling doubtful regarding the ultimate success of the gigantic experiment which the United States is trying out. I still believe that our best hope for the future—

States my English friend.

—is to move forward in a coordinated effort to the development of the British empire, and to subordinate all other questions of policy to this end. I believe that doing this with our whole heart and soul we should successfully solve most of our problems over a comparatively short space of years and might set an example that in due time would lead the whole world to better things.

This man is the head of a £2,000,000 industry. He continues:

We are having our annual meeting to-day and I send you in confidence a copy of our balance sheet.

Does that sound like friction between the different parts of the empire? What does Australia say? Let me read an extract from a letter from Australia.

We in Australia as a community seem to be cheerful and feeling that the depression is behind us. We are doing better at the dock yards. It looks as though it is going to be a winner. We expect to lay down the keel of a sloop for the Australian fleet and this I hope is one of a number.

This is to haul more merchandise from Australia perhaps to Canada, but surely to the United Kingdom. The letter continues:

Under separate cover I have posted some photographs of the dock at Cockatoo island which is the largest dock south of the equator.

Does that sound like a step leading to friction? Let me read an invitation to visit South Africa:

Many thanks for your letter of August. Acknowledgment has been delayed owing to my absence in New Zealand. In connection with Australia, we are reducing our duties and I am working on this. It is a rather novel position for a manufacturer to ask for a reduction in duty but I am doing so in accordance with the empire agreements.

Listen to that, Mr. Speaker.

I have suggested to the Englishmen that they meet us from Australia in Cape Town, South Africa. We could all drive up to Pretoria and iron out the difficulties that South Africa are having. We could drive through from Pretoria to the Nile and come out at the Mediterranean and go through to England. You could act as neutral chairman between Australia and New Zealand, the United Kingdom and South Africa. Have a talk with Mrs. Harris and see what you think about it.

In Australia the business community is feeling cheerful. This also applies to New Zealand. I hope at some date not too far distant we may have the opportunity to fly the little Australian and New Zealand flags along with the union jack and see if we cannot do even better as one than we did under several.

Does that sound like a step leading to friction between the different unions of the empire? I received from a New Zealand friend a copy of the Auckland Weekly News. What do they say?

New Zealanders affirm trade within the empire.

Then they go on to say:

To do the duty that lies nearest is ever sound policy and we believe in trade within the empire.

I shall close my remarks by referring to a communication which I received on January 17 of this year:

We are delivering one case of mineral waters on instructions from our Australian office and with the compliments of our Australian directors.

Mr. Speaker, I invite the right hon. leader of the opposition to join me in the consumption of these mineral waters which have been sent with the compliments of Australia, a country which believes that we are not having more friction with different parts of the empire, but that we will go on to greater and greater things. In the name of harmony and good will I ask the right hon. gentleman opposite to join me in the consumption of these mineral waters, in the hope that we will have more harmony and he will not provoke the traders of our empire.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity afforded to discuss the Ottawa agreements, because I remember very well just before the vote took place the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) pointing his finger along these rows and daring each and every one of us to oppose the agreements, so that if there had been anything political in it surely we would have heeded the Prime Minister and voted with him on that occasion. But we did not heed him. I felt slightly wrathy at that time, because I never had a finger pointed at me and had never been told in that way before what to do. Coming from that great land of freedom I very much resented it.

[Mr. Harris.]

The last speaker (Mr. Harris) has given figures and percentages, and he has endeavoured to make it appear that since the passing of the Ottawa agreements Canada has been saved from some great catastrophe. During the time at my disposal I am going into the matter a little more closely, and I shall examine what has happened since the conference agreements were signed, and even previous to that time. I shall not go back to the years between 1921 and 1929, but I shall come to a more recent date. Let us deal with the trade of Canada just previous to the signing of the agreements in 1932, and compare the trade of that time with the figures two years later, 1934. I propose to examine carefully just what the agreements have done for the Canadian people, and more particularly for the farmers and workers in industry.

In passing may I observe that in 1930 the total trade of Canada was well over two billion dollars, but in 1933 it had dropped to about $887,000,000. If one wants to find as low a figure as that for Canadian trade he will have to go back a good many years. It is true that in 1934 trade increased a little, but would we not have been in a terrible position if it had not increased. However, even with the increase in 1934, in which year there was a total trade of $1,019,479,094, we have to go back to the year 1914 to get as low a figure even as that. May I point out that in 1914 we had a population of only a little more than 7,000,000 people, while in 1934 we have a population of well over 10,000,000 people. Despite the difference in population in those years the trade figures are about the same.

I shall now turn to the figures for grains, because I believe they are very important. First I shall give the figures showing the total value of grains of all countries. In 1930 we shipped grains valued at $232,763,740. In the year of the Ottawa conference the grains shipped were valued at $132,930,429. That, Mr. Speaker, was the year of the conference. In 1934 however, the total grains exported to all countries were valued at only $128,284,392.

That is fact number one, namely that the value of the total grains exported from Canada has dropped since the Ottawa agreements were signed and since this government came into office.

Now let us examine what happened to our shipments of these grains to Great Britain. In 1930 we shipped over 113,000,000 bushels of wheat to Great Britain, for which there was returned to this country well over $139,000,000.

I ask the house to take note of these figures. In 1932, prior to the Ottawa agreements being signed, we shipped to Great Britain over 110,000,000 bushels of wheat for which we received just over $65,000,000. In order to save time I am giving the round figures only. But please note the difference in value of those two figures.

Mr. ERNST: What happened to the wheat trade?

Mr. REID: You can make your own speech after I am through. I do not want to be discourteous, but I do not want to be interrupted. In 1934, two years afterwards, what were our exports? It will be remembered that the Prime Minister told us that it was necessary for Canada to sign these agreements if Canada was to live and expand her trade, because her trade had gone, and particularly it was held out to this country that Great Britain was our great salvation. Well, let us see if Great Britain was our salvation to the extent that some hon. members are trying to make out in this house and in the country; and, Mr. Speaker, I say again that I welcome very much this opportunity of getting down to the actual facts. In 1934 it is very true that we shipped to Great Britain 112,787,849 bushels of wheat, which was a slight increase over 1932, but a great decrease as compared with 1930. But here is the astounding fact, that for that 112,787,849 bushels of wheat shipped in 1934 we received $75,699,056, while in 1930 we received $139,000,000 for the 113,000,000 bushels that we shipped.

I heard the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough (Mr. Harris) in his speech talking about European countries dumping their goods in Europe. What happened in our case? It is only because we dumped our goods into the old country at less than cost price that we were able to find a market for many of them at all.

I have before me the speech of the Prime Minister when he was talking about wheat, barley and oats, and the great market there was for these products. We raise, as everyone knows, considerable barley in this country, and the province of Manitoba is, I believe, famed for its barley. In 1932 we shipped to Great Britain 8,168,571 bushels of barley. That was just previous to signing on the dotted line the agreement with Great Britain. In 1934, two years later, we shipped to Great Britain only 1,398,043 bushels of barley.

Now take oats, another valuable product of this country. In 1932 we shipped to Great Britain 6,082,621 bushels of oats. After the conference we were going to find a great market in Great Britain for our products, but we shipped to Great Britain in 1934, two years after the conference, only 4,009,382 bushels of oats.

Now let us state the total grains, including rice; it may be news to some that we are shipping rice from this country, and I am sure it must be some consolation to our farmers. In 1932, before the conference, the total of our grains shipped to Great Britain had a value of $71,330,905. That was the total just before the conference. Two years later, in 1934, the total was only $77,600,084. That was the total value of our grains shipped to Great Britain just two years after the conference, but when you take into account the vast quantities of grains that had to be shipped to make up that amount, you will see that the remark I made a moment ago that we are dumping our goods into Great Britain was very pertinent indeed. In 1930, the low year under the Liberal administration, we shipped to Great Britain $149,138,637 worth of grains —quite a difference as compared with 1934.

Now as to rice which, as I say, we are beginning to ship to the old country. In 1932 we shipped to Great Britain $14,000 worth of rice and rice meal, and two years later we shipped $4,256 worth. I am taking all the grains as I go through the list.

Let me come next to rye. The member for Toronto-Scarborough held up a bottle in order that hon. members might see it, and we have to take his word that it contained mineral water. Well, in 1932 we shipped to Great Britain 2,116,572 bushels of rye, and in 1934 we shipped only 241,820 bushels—quite a drop, two years after the conference agreements were in effect.

I notice in reading the Prime Minister's speeches that he says "what a fine country this is for growing peas." In 1932 we shipped to Great Britain 8,685 bushels of peas, and in 1934, 7,429 bushels—a considerable drop.

I come to oatmeal, which must always appeal to those who come from the country north of England which is Scotland. There was a drop in our oatmeal exports. In 1932 we shipped 65,039,500 pounds of oatmeal to Great Britain, and in 1934 we shipped only 40,373,300 pounds.

Take butter. Governments have gone out and governments have come in on this one product. All these commodities I have mentioned are products of the soil and of our farmers. In 1932 we shipped to Great Britain 86,927,000 pounds of butter. Two years later, in 1934, that had dropped to 1,858,304 pounds.

Mr. SANDERSON: Wave the flag.

Mr. REID: When the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough was talking about the wonderful increase in imports from Great Britain to this country I wonder if he noticed that in 1934 we imported into Canada from the old country 1,580,304 pounds of butter. That will be very comforting news indeed to the farmers of this land who are endeavouring at present to find a market for some ten million pounds of a surplus of butter. Our exports of butter to Great Britain dropped from 86,000,000 pounds in 1932 to 1,800,000 pounds in 1934, and in addition we imported from the same country in 1934, 1,580,304 pounds.

Take cheese. In 1932 we shipped to the old country 81,310,600 pounds of cheese, and in 1934 the export had declined to 74,413,300 pounds—quite a considerable drop.

Mr. SANDERSON: Wave the flag again.

Mr. REID: Take milk and its products, another very important item to the farming community in this country. In 1930 we shipped milk and milk products to Great Britain to the value of $16,859,942. That had dropped in 1932 to $12,410,749. After the conference it had dropped to the low figure of $9,504,252, a very considerable drop of nearly $3,000,000 from 1932, and $7,000,000 less than the last year of Liberal administration, which was one of the low years of trade.

I well remember the Prime Minister speaking about honey; I was interested in that because I happen to be a beekeeper. He spoke about having conversations with the Hon. Howard Ferguson, and told how the old country was waiting to eat up our Canadian honey. Well, in 1932 we shipped 1,948,047 pounds and in 1934, 1,853,093. These are interesting figures in view of statements made everywhere by members on the government side that the country's trade had gone down so low that nothing could save it but the agreements; if it had not been for the agreements, we are told, the country would have been sunk, but by their finding a market in Great Britain for our agricultural and other products we were saved.

Let me mention eggs, because this is one of the few articles of the farmer the export of which has increased. I will also mention bacon and hams, and let me say that there would be something terribly wrong if no article had increased. I am not omitting any of the increases during the time at my disposal along agricultural lines. In eggs, I find that while there was a great increase in shipments to the old country, we sold our eggs in 1932 at an average of 22½ cents a dozen whereas our eggs sold last year, 1934, at about 20 cents a dozen. Take dressed poultry. That showed some increase, but if you will look carefully into the figures you will find that we shipped many pounds at a very, very low price.

Coming to bacon and hams, I well remember, when that was under discussion, the Prime Minister telling the members of this house and the farmers that we had an unlimited market in this direction. It may be true we got some concession whereby we might send up to 280 million pounds to a free market, but let us see what advantage has been taken of that concession. In 1932 we sent 15,276,600 pounds and in 1934 it had risen to 94,559,700 pounds. But if you compare the prices of bacon and hams in the old land in 1934 and 1932 with prices obtained in 1930 you will find that the product returned a value of 13 cents a pound in 1934, 11½ cents a pound in 1932 and 22½ cents in 1930. Now these figures are very interesting, because after all it is what the farmer gets that counts, his returns. You can talk about percentages as much as you like, but it does not mean anything to the farmer.

Speaking of pork products I notice another article in this connection and that is dry salted pork. We lost a good deal in that market, because in 1930 we sent 4,627,400 pounds at an average price of 20 cents, which had dropped in 1932 to 1,138,900 at an average of 10 cents per pound. That was the year the Ottawa conference took place, and in 1934 it had dropped to as low as 842,100 pounds, netting us an average of 11½ cents a pound—a considerable difference compared to 20 cents a pound received in 1930.

I come now to the products of our fisheries. This is of considerable interest to two sections of the country, the maritime provinces and British Columbia. Canned salmon is one of the most important of our products in British Columbia. Let us see how it has fared since the Ottawa agreements have been in operation, and during the time of this administration. In 1932 we shipped 20,517,800 pounds of canned salmon to Great Britain, and in 1934, two years later, this had dropped to 12,922,300 pounds, a difference of 8,000,000 pounds, and representing a decrease of over $1,000,000 in value. I would point out in passing that the fish products of the Atlantic coast are mostly in the form of fresh or frozen fish, and the market has been lost owing to the fact that they were unable to ship into the United States, and there is little market in the old country for fresh or frozen fish.

The total of fishery exports in 1930 was $35,697,027, and that had dropped in 1932 to $24,437,078, and in 1934 to $20,779,938, or a drop of $15,000,000 since 1930, and with the fresh fish market of the Atlantic coast producers practically lost. Of the total I will indicate what went to Great Britain, taking the two years again. In 1932 we sent to Great Britain $5,481,301, and in 1934, after the conference agreements had been adopted, it had dropped to $4,685,328, or a drop of nearly $1,000,000 since the Ottawa conference, being almost the same quantity as was shipped in 1930.

Another product is maple sugar, which is consumed almost entirely in the United States. Our exports in maple sugar had dropped by about 1,000,000 pounds in 1934. Now, with regard to importations—

An hon. MEMBER: What about lumber?

Mr. REID: Don't worry; I do not intend to omit that. I wish I had more time, because I welcome this very much. The figures in regard to flour importations will comfort our people. In 1932 we imported 21,967 barrels of flour and since the Ottawa conference the figure has increased to 51,501. I have been endeavouring to get the importations from Great Britain, which I understand were considerably larger during the calendar year 1934.

I come now to lumber and newsprint, which are products of our forests. It may interest the house to know just how these two products are divided in value and in the number of those engaged, because it is important to have these figures before us. In the pulp and paper industry there were 26,669 persons in Canada engaged in 1933, and those are the latest figures that I can secure. There were 22,361 engaged in the lumber industry in the same year, or more persons engaged in pulp and paper than in lumber production. The value of lumber produced in Canada in the same year was $62,927,987 and the value of the pulp and paper was approximately $144,000,000, so that there is quite a comparison between the two. As a matter of fact, the exports from our forests equal 30·4 per cent of the value of all our total exports. I might point out that in the matter of exports newsprint takes second place in value and that only to wheat. Pulpwood comes third and lumber takes sixth place in comparison with wheat. The total unmanufactured wood pulp which was sent to Great Britain in 1930 amounted to $1,407,870. In 1932 that had increased just a little to $1,424,159. We were told however that after the agreements were enacted that trade would increase. In 1934, two years later, exports of unmanufactured wood pulp had dropped to $1,313,243. Exports of wood pulp dropped from $8,196,144 in 1932 to $4,883,318 in 1934.

As regards newsprint, it may interest the house to know that one-half of the total requirements of the United States in the manufacture of all kinds of paper comes from the Dominion of Canada. In 1930 our newsprint exports amounted to $145,610,519; this dropped in 1932 to $103,003,352 and in 1934, two years later, it dropped to $73,238,482, or a fifty per cent drop in total exports and a smaller percentage of that great total going to Great Britain.

An hon. MEMBER: Where was it shipped to?

Mr. REID: As regards the total amount of newsprint exports I gave to the house, it is principally shipped to the United States. Very little newsprint is shipped to Great Britain, and there seems to be very little market in that country for it. But newsprint and the production of paper is by far the largest part of our forest products industry, and I have endeavoured to place before the house the percentages, the total figures and also the number of men employed in both industries. Therefore, when we hear people talking about the lumber industry, they overlook the point that it is just one part. If exports of lumber from British Columbia to Great Britain have increased, I might point out that we were selling the very best lumber for less money than we could obtain for it from other countries, because the average was $17.50 when we were receiving from the United States and other lands an average of $23 for a thousand feet. So when this country is willing to give away their product, and the very best, and dump it into other countries, it is no use bragging in the house that we are doing so very well.

Let me now take the total of wood and wood products including all paper exports. In 1930 our total exports were $289,566,675; in 1932 this had dropped to $175,740,279 and in 1934, two years later, during the administration of my hon. friends opposite, it had dropped to $143,142,398.

As we are going through the whole wood item, there is another little one which is that of railroad ties. Some hon. members will ask: What market is there for ties? It is quite considerable. In 1930 we sold $1,104,835 worth of railroad ties, of which Great Britain took $340,127 worth. In 1934 only $1,153 worth was sold to Great Britain, or practically nothing. The trade to Great Britain had dropped from $340,127 in 1930 to $49,324 in 1932, and two years later to only $1,153.

Another important item is shingles. There is practically speaking no market in Great Britain for our cedar shingles. In 1930 our total exports of shingles amounted to $6,704,494 and in 1934 this had dropped to $3,764,418.

Another matter that I wish to speak on and that has been discussed here, may be debated, if not under this heading, under some other. The other evening, when the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Spotton) was speaking, I noticed that he talked of the great immigration to this country that had taken place during the Liberal administration being left on the doorstep of the present government, and they were compelled to bear the burden of it. I also heard the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) make the same statement in the house last year. I have taken the trouble to go into the figures very carefully and am now placing the facts before the house. I would draw attention to the fact that they are taken from the records, and the years I shall quote are those of the Liberal and the Conservative administrations. The Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden assumed office in October, 1911; Mr. Mackenzie King assumed office in December, 1921. For the ten fiscal years 1911-12 to 1920-21 the total immigration was 1,678,316 of which number 629,464 were British. In the ten fiscal years 1921-22 to 1930-31, the total immigration was 1,217,069 of which number 491,727 were British, or a difference of 461,246 more during the Conservative administrations than during the ten years of the Liberal administration. I think those facts should be placed before the house, because I have listened a good many times to other statements being made. I have gone carefully into these figures and if they are wrong I shall be glad to correct them.

Mr. MANION: Would the hon. gentleman supply the figures for the four years of the present government and for the last four years of the former government, if he has them?

Mr. REID: I have not the figures. I have not the immigration figures for the last four years of the Liberal administration compared with the four years of this government, but I will tell you what I do have. We have heard a lot about Canadians who went out from this country during our administration, but the number brought back was not told. Here is a return for those four years. For the years 1926-1930 Canadians returning from the United States numbered 141,359. For the four years of the present administration the figures are 68,388. For the four years ended 1930 British subjects returning numbered 13,431, while only 4,334 Britishers returned during the four years this government have been in office.

The Minister of Labour has spoken about the type of immigrants. Let me give you one example. During the years 1912-1921, ten years, the Conservative government allowed 36,314 orientals to enter this country, consisting of 29,024 Chinese, and 7,290 Japanese. During the ten years of our administration, 1922-1931, the total number admitted was 7,141. Those living in British Columbia feel very keenly about that.

Mr. C. B. HOWARD (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough (Mr. Harris) one would think that not only were we returning to prosperous times but that conditions in this country were ideal. It is time someone put before this House of Commons what in my opinion is one of the most outstanding and extraordinary situations facing the Canadian people to-day. Who is going to pay the taxes? The position is this; the municipalities all over Canada are obliged to increase taxation in order to get revenues to meet their budgets, even those which are able to meet their liabilities. The provincial governments are driven to finding new sources of taxation. The federal government has got to the stage of bringing down legislation which will increase taxation considerably. Where is the money to come from to meet the increasing taxation with which we are faced at the present time?

Mr. TURNBULL: From the empire trade agreements.

Mr. HOWARD: Most of you know what the small industries of Canada have contributed not only to the labouring man but to the public and the farmers of Canada during the years of this administration. Do we realize that all industries, more especially these smaller industries, employing from ten to fifty men, have daily been apprehensive of being served with a writ of seizure? They have been carrying on business under great difficulty, not knowing where to get the wherewithal to meet their payrolls and obligations.

During the past four years, in order to maintain employment, they have been drawing on surpluses from previous years, and in November and December last some of them for the first time since this government came into power have shown results in the black. In this situation we need someone who will inspire confidence. In the savings banks of this country we have the greatest accumulation of the people's savings that we have ever had in our history. In the reserves of the insurance companies we see the greatest accumulations of the people's savings they have ever had. In the trust companies there are millions of dollars that are not there for safe keeping alone but because people do not know where to make investments, having no confidence in the future; because in Canada to-day we lack that leadership which would inspire the confidence necessary to put this country back upon its feet.

I suppose the empire trade agreements were the carrying out of the Prime Minister's promise that he would "blast" his way into the markets of the world. I am not going to cite figures or otherwise go over the ground that has been covered by my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Reid), who has just spoken, but before I leave the question of taxation as it concerns industry in Canada let me give one example. An industry in my home city paid out during 1934, a year of depression, $350,000 in wages—not salaries. How much do you suppose they paid in taxes during 1934? A total of $126,000—one dollar in taxes for every three dollars in wages. But instead of looking for a remedy for that state of things, we are doing the opposite, and that will destroy the little confidence that is left. Everyone knows that if this country is to be prosperous we must have a prosperous farming population. It may be possible to protect certain industries and make them prosperous to the detriment of others, but if you do not have the farming population in a prosperous condition you cannot have any general prosperity. Let me quote from a paper which I have before me, by way of answer to the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough. Up to the coming into power of this government our farming population had not only a sense of security but a sense of independence. What has been the situation during the last two years? We have heard boasts as to the rise in hog prices, but when I see on the front page of this newspaper what I am going to read I ask the house where we are going:

Charges Hog Prices Set By British Ring

And reading further:

So-called "official prices" are set weekly in England by an agreement between a committee of wholesale agents, who have exclusive control over Canadian consignments, and the wholesalers who purchase them.

What do you think of a condition under which the farmers' hogs are under the control of the English buyers and Canadian packers, working together to fix the price not in accordance with supply and demand but according to the profits they want to put into their own pockets.

Then let us consider butter, another product the farmer has to sell. The farmers of the eastern townships, the best dairy section of Canada, are more interested in the prices of milk and butter than in anything else. The price of butter to-day is 23¼ cents per pound. The price of butter this day last year was 26 cents per pound, or 2¾ cents more. Last year the price of butter went to 31½ cents, while this year the farmers are on top of a volcano. Everyone is sitting tight and maintaining the price of butter, but if one dealer starts to sell at a lower price, butter will fall to the lowest point at which winter butter has ever been sold in the history of Canada.

How did this government handle the butter situation last year, after going through the eastern townships of Quebec where butter had been selling at 32½ cents a pound in 1930 and telling the farmers that the low price of butter was due to the treaty with New Zealand and Australia, under which large quantities of butter came to Canada?

Mr. COTNAM: And you rescinded the treaty.

Mr. HOWARD: You bet we did. The government said, "Put us in power and we will put the price of butter back to 50 cents a pound." The farmers believed them and voted for them. When the next election comes along what are they going to do about the butter question? You fellows that slid in on butter will slide out in the same way.

Mr. COTNAM: Why did you rescind the treaty?

Mr. HOWARD: The duty on butter, under the King administration, was four cents per pound. That treaty was rescinded. This government did not say they would raise the duty; they said they would not allow Australian or New Zealand butter to come into this country to the detriment of the farmers of the eastern townships, and because of that promise they received many votes. Now this government has placed a duty of five cents per pound against butter coming into Canada, but what has happened? The depreciated currencies of those countries, as against the gold standard prevailing in Canada, technically speaking, has enabled them to bonus butter to the extent of five cents a pound, to the detriment of our farmers.

How did this government handle the butter situation last winter? They said to New Zealand and Australia, "If you continue to ship this butter to Canada we will have to do something to stop it." They had done nothing except impose a duty of five cents per pound. Then they said, "This is what we will do. You bring your butter to Canada and place it in bonded warehouses in British Columbia and Halifax. We will tell you when to sell it and when to stop selling it." This was under the administration of the former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) and the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir). Every time butter went up to 31 cents a pound they telephoned from Ottawa to Halifax and Vancouver, saying, "Unload your butter," and that butter was sold until our price dropped to 29 cents. Then Ottawa said, "Stop selling your butter." Then, naturally, our butter went up to 30½ or 31 cents, and the government telephoned again, "Sell some more New Zealand and Australian butter," and when the price dropped below 30 cents they telephoned again and had that sale stopped. Why, Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister was in opposition I heard him abuse the previous government for the instability of their tariff policy. What do you think of what I have just cited as a tariff policy on butter?

Mr. BENNETT: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, it may be well to correct the hon. gentleman by pointing out to him that the holding of butter in warehouses is provided for under a treaty made with Australia.

Mr. HOWARD: I accept that explanation, Mr. Speaker, and tell the farmers of the eastern townships that the butter situation was handled without any tariff, without any consultation with the elected members of this house, but under an arrangement made between the government of this country and the government of Australia. Just here I should like to give a few figures, though as a rule I do not like to quote them. I should like to give our importations of butter during the last few years:

	Pounds
1932	879,670
1933	876,894
1934	2,602,744

During the first six months of 1933 we imported 574,907 pounds of butter, while during the first six months of 1934 our importations amounted to 807,757 pounds.

Mr. MANION: How many pounds in 1929?

Mr. HOWARD: That is a very nice question from the Minister of Railways. In 1929 we imported about 26,000,000 pounds of butter, but the price to the Canadian farmer was 32½ cents. I say that the farmers of the eastern townships would be glad to see New Zealand and Australian butter coming into this country if they could sell their butter for 32½ cents per pound, as they did under a Liberal administration.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HOWARD: Mr. Speaker, a few moments before six o'clock the Prime Minister rose to speak to a point of order and to make a correction. He did so, as he said, just to make the record complete. I hold in my hand a copy of the Sherbrooke Daily Record, an independent newspaper which most of the time has supported the government of hon. members opposite. I shall quote the exact words, as reported in this newspaper, of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) who spoke at a meeting held at Ayer's Cliff which was attended by Mr. John T. Hackett, the member for Stanstead, Doctor F. H. Pickel, the member for Brome-Missisquoi, Doctor J. C. Moore, the member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon, Mr. J. E. Tetreault, the member for Shefford, Mr. Samuel Gobeil, the member for Compton and several others. Referring to this famous agreement, or this telephone tariff policy, the Minister of Agriculture used the following words:

> And to the everlasting honour of the Australian government this undertaking was adhered to in both the letter and the spirit, despite the fact that it was written in no treaty, placed in no memorandum, but merely made by word of mouth between Mr. Maloney and myself.

I leave it to the house to judge the accuracy of the Prime Minister's correction.

Let me illustrate one of the fundamental reasons why the farming industry is in the bad condition in which it finds itself to-day. This condition may be due not so much to low prices—and prices are very low—as to the unbalanced condition between the price the farmer has to pay for what he buys and the price he receives for his produce. About Christmas time I was called to the office of two young men who about that time had purchased an insurance brokerage business and were drawing up their first annual statement. While I was with them the door of their office opened and a gentleman dressed "dans l'étoffe du pays," apparently a real farmer, walked in and inquired as to the amount of his indebtedness. One of the men went to the ledger and said, "You still owe us thirteen dollars." The farmer handed over a five dollar bill and said, "If I can get you another five dollars to pay on the amount still owing will you wipe off the balance?" The insurance man replied, "Well, you must remember the fire insurance premium on your building expired some time ago and we have carried your account for almost three years." The farmer replied, "I appreciate what you have done, but do you know how I got that five dollar bill? This morning I brought to the Sherbrooke market twenty bushels of potatoes and sold them for twenty-five cents a bushel. I have brought you the five dollars to pay on my account."

Such are the conditions the farmers have to face. After that farmer had ploughed the ground, had disc-harrowed it, had fertilized it, had planted his potatoes, had chased away the potato bugs, had dug the potatoes and had delivered to the Sherbrooke market, all he could bring down in one load, he received only enough to pay about one-third of his insurance bill. The consequence is that his buildings are not insured to-day, and if they would be destroyed by fire he would lose their value.

I should like to say a word concerning beef prices and in that connection may I relate an actual incident. After I have finished hon. members will have some idea of what is happening to beef prices on that famous market into which the Prime Minister was going to blast his way. A merchant living at Wotton in the county of Wolfe had to get some money to meet his bills from the wholesaler, and with that in mind he set out on the ranges to interview farmers who owed him money. He went to a certain farmer and said to him, "I must have some money on the account you owe me. I have been reasonable in my treatment of this account, but I really must have money; how much can you pay me?" The farmer answered, "Well now, the interest has not been paid on my mortgage, my taxes are due next month, and I have no money in the house. I should like to pay you, but how can I?" The merchant, who was a fairly keen business man, asked if the farmer had something he could sell. He said, "I will buy anything you have for sale and will be pleased to credit it to your account." They went to the barns and looked over the stock which the farmer did not want to sell but which, in order to meet his obligation, he let the merchant have. They finally agreed on a purchase price for two two-year-old steers, in splendid condition, two farrow cows, well fatted, and one cow still milking. After a great deal of bargaining the merchant allowed the farmer $40 for the five animals. The farmer thought the merchant was stealing them, and the merchant thought the farmer had driven a hard bargain. Next day the merchant sent a truck to the farm and had the five head loaded and taken to the Montreal market, where they were placed in the pens. The cattle were seen by different buyers, fed and watered. The truck had carried them from the farm to the market, a distance of one hundred and forty miles, for $3 per head, a reasonable charge. Finally the statement came through the mail. There was a large sheet checked off in columns showing inspection charges, watering charges, feeding charges, unloading charges, and charges of all kinds. It was shown that the cattle had weighed 2,755 pounds and that they had sold at the price of one cent per pound. The net result was that after deducting the charges, the merchant who had paid $40 for the five head received a cheque from the market for $4.79. I repeat, he received $4.79 for five head of cattle on the market of Montreal, and I have in my hand a photostatic copy of the cheque. I shall not give any names. This government has been in power almost five years, and yet a merchant who sells five head of cattle receives only $4.79. When conditions are as bad as that I say it is time to have a change of government.

Mr. SPOTTON: Tell us the real story.

Mr. HOWARD: The hon. members for Compton, Brome-Missisquoi and Stanstead are taking sides with the farmers—and rightly so. They come from rural constituencies; especially is that true of the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi. What have the members sitting behind the present government obtained for the farmers in their constituencies? They tried to obtain an increase in the price of fluid milk, after our market in the United States had been cut off. However this government did not take any action; it did not get an increase in the price of milk. On the contrary it did absolutely nothing to support the prices farmers in the eastern townships received for their milk. However the provincial government stepped in.

Mr. HACKETT: When?

Mr. HOWARD: About a year ago.

Mr. HACKETT: After a committee had been organized in this house, and they were forced to it.

Mr. HOWARD: Why did you not take that step?

Mr. HACKETT: We had not the authority.

Mr. HOWARD: But according to the Prime Minister you have the authority to do other things you are going to try to do at this session. The price of $1.35 per hundredweight which the farmer received in Sherbrooke was raised to $1.80, and $1.85 in Montreal, with no surplus thrown back, which means an actual increase of practically fifty per cent, and all of this increase went to the farmer. This milk problem may be one for the provincial government; I shall not discuss that question. But I say here and now that the present government did not do a single thing for members in the rural constituencies by way of helping the farmers.

I want to quote an example which to my mind illustrates the situation as well as anything. When this government came into power the basic interest rate in government financing, federal, provincial and municipal, was 4½ per cent. Labour at that time was receiving 40 cents an hour and the price of agricultural products, of pork, for instance, was 10 cents a pound; and mind you, in that situation this country was fairly prosperous. Interest, after all, is only the wages of money that goes to the man who has the money; then there is the wages that go to labour; and the price of agricultural products is the wages of the farmer. Well, what happened? The price of labour went down to 15 cents an hour, and for many there was no work at all, with thousands going on the unemployed list. The price of agricultural products, of pork, for instance, which I mentioned a moment ago, went down to 2¾ cents a pound. But what happened to the interest rate? Not only did the interest rate jump up considerably, but this banner province of Ontario, which boasts of its financial standing, put out a thirty million dollar issue of bonds at 6·15 per cent interest. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the interest rate had stayed where it was or had gone down proportionately with the wages and the price of agricultural products, the situation would not have been so bad; but when a government sits in power and allows the interest rate to go up nearly two per cent while the wages of labour are coming down from 40 to 15 cents an hour, and the price of agricultural products is coming down from 10 cents to 2¾ cents a pound, the government has to do one of two things; it has either to raise the price of labour and the price of farm products—and I say to the government, you have not been able to do that—or decrease the interest rate.

An hon. MEMBER: Or resign.

Mr. HOWARD: Not so very long ago the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) spoke in this house and suggested that interest rates be cut, and cut immediately, and he made a great plea for lower rates. The Prime Minister followed him and made this statement, which you will find in Hansard: "The hon. member suggests decreasing the interest rates. That is a sacred contract." A sacred contract! I want to ask you, Mr. Speaker, if there is any man in this house who is qualified to distinguish between those two kinds of contracts, the contract with the labouring men and the farmer, and the contract with the moneyed man, and then tell this house and the Canadian people that the contract with the moneyed man is sacred but that the contract with the labour man may be broken, that you can just throw him out on the street if you do not need him any more, and that for farm products you can pay the lowest price at which you can get them.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He had not talked with Litvinoff then.

Mr. HOWARD: No, perhaps he had not discussed it with the Russians at that time. But this is a serious question, Mr. Speaker. When we realize, after all this talk about the Canadian National Railways, that there are in the hands of the public over two billion dollars in securities, including the advances the government has made, on which this country is paying five per cent interest, it is obvious that if that debt had been refunded even in 1931 we would have saved the taxpayers of this country two per cent interest on two billion dollars, which is forty million dollars a year.

Mr. MANION: When did the Canadian National Railways owe two billion dollars to the public?

Mr. HOWARD: The Minister of Railways certainly is not serious when he asks that question.

Mr. MANION: I am serious.

Mr. HOWARD: I stated just previously what they owed directly to the public, together with the advances which the government have made to the railway and which are carried in the national debt of Canada.

So what difference does it make? The total indebtedness of the Canadian National Railways, including the money advanced to them, is in excess of two billion dollars, and the minister knows it. I repeat that if that debt had been refunded it would have made a saving of forty million dollars a year. But no, that is a sacred contract.

Mr. MANION: I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that that statement should go out to the public. The bonds owing by the Canadian National Railways are $1,255,000,000, not $2,000,000,0000, and the interest payable is on that $1,255,000,000; so refunding at two per cent less would not make a saving of $40,000,000.

Mr. HOWARD: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to lose part of my forty minutes by debating that question any further. I stated, and I state again, that with the money advanced to the Canadian National Railway—we advanced them, for example, $75,000,000, or something like that last year, and charged it up to the railway—including all those advances made by the Canadian government, the investment in the Canadian National Railways to-day is in excess of two billion dollars, and the Minister of Railways knows it.

Mr. MANION: You cannot refund what is owing to the government.

Mr. HOWARD: But when the suggestion is made that those bonds be refunded, the answer comes back: Oh, you could not call in those bonds because that is a sacred contract. But let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the Quebec Central Railroad in Sherbrooke closed their shop one night, a surprise closing that nobody knew anything about, and threw out on the street men who had spent their lives in the service of that company—one man with twenty-two years' service, and many men whose length of service was from fifteen to eighteen years—and they were thrown out on the street overnight while if they had been allowed to go on they would have become pensionable after a certain date. That was not a sacred contract, but with money it is a sacred contract.

I will go further, Mr. Speaker, and say that every single bond could have been refunded, and the Prime Minister and the government know how to do it. They could have gone ahead and called these bonds, if there was no other way, and there are several. They could have done what we did during the war, formed patriotic committees, because I still have faith in the Canadian people and in the moneyed men in this country, and if you had appealed to them they would have come across and converted their bonds. Somebody gets up and says: Oh, but what about the widows and orphans and the small holders? But I say, Mr. Speaker, with prices as they are to-day, 65 cents of our money to-day will purchase as much as one dollar did in 1929, and therefore the person who is in receipt of interest would not have suffered any real reduction in purchasing power had the bonds been converted.

Furthermore, there would not have been all over this country the agitation that we see to-day and that is carried to the extreme of advocating no payment of interest whatever, the defaulting of obligations, and creating a situation such as has never been seen before in any other country of the world practically except Canada under the present government.

But to come back to the farmers, I want to underline this because I think it is quite important. Our farmers, no matter how they want to cultivate their own farms, no matter how much produce and fodder they want to raise, if they are going to produce milk from dairy herds, must purchase feed in the winter months. What has happened to the feed they have to buy? The price to the farmer of bran, shorts and middlings has increased some five dollars a ton, and I have had telephone call after telephone call to this effect: "Mr. Howard, it is true that we are getting a little more for our milk, but did you see the price of feed to-day as quoted in the paper? The price of feed is going up, which takes away any profit that we might have had." There was no way of getting medium priced feed for fattening purposes. Everybody in the farming game knows that you must have corn for fattening hogs, cattle and so forth. You bring in your corn, as we have been doing for years and must continue to do, from the Argentine and the United States, and what has happened to the corn situation? We imported, in 1931, 9,512,000 bushels; in 1932, 8,700,000; in 1933, 7,300,000; and in 1934, 5,200,000. You may say, those are considerable imports. Yes, but most of it was made into corn flakes and other prepared foods for human consumption. The total imports for feeding purposes under the general tariff were 151,000 bushels, and under the intermediate tariff, 1,345,000. On the corn that was brought in for the farmer to feed his stock he had to pay 25 cents a bushel under the general tariff, while under the intermediate tariff the rate was 20 cents. But the manufacturer did not pay any duty at all.

An hon. MEMBER: What has happened to the barley grower of Manitoba and Saskatchewan?

Mr. HOWARD: There are many other matters I should like to discuss, but I want to say one word with regard to industry, and I think it is only right that I should do so. The Prime Minister, speaking in this house on the address the other day, made some remarks with regard to a delegation, to show how terrible the situation was and how hard it was for the manufacturers to get along. He looked across the floor when he said, as reported on page 78 of Hansard:

> Were we to allow that to continue and destroy Canadian industry? Does the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) believe that that should be done?

And so on. What he was pointing out was that a firm of manufacturers of running shoes, operating in the eastern townships, were meeting with competition in running shoes from Czechoslovakia. Very true; there is no question about it. But when we interrupted him he changed his subject, and do you know why? Because the Canadian manufacturer in the eastern townships making running shoes has to bring in his raw rubber just the same as the man in Czechoslovakia has to import his. But when the raw rubber comes in here what do you do with it? We find sales tax, excise tax and more taxes on our product, on linen thread and cotton, as well as on all the things that go into the manufacture of running shoes. The government taxes the products that go into the manufacture of the article. Well, you can place a tariff around the country and increase internal competition, which will mean a reduction in prices and a reduction in labour, but you will have the conditions which we have experienced during the past four years. And when you increase the cost of the manufacturer's raw product in Canada you may give him his Canadian market, but you will throw him out of the shoe business so far as competition in the markets of the world is concerned. If this country is to get back on its feet it must not only have the Canadian market, which is a wonderful market, but it must pay good wages to labour and also get into the foreign market. And this cannot be done if you increase the price of raw materials.

To sum up, I have only this to say. This government, to my mind, has instituted tariff by telephone, and has given bluff to the farmers and nothing to the workers, and under this last bill it does nothing for unemployment, but leaves it a cost to the municipalities and the provincial governments. It has increased to manufacturers the cost of their raw products with the result that their foreign markets cannot be retained. To business it says, "You are done for now, because government control will be instituted," and to money it has said "good-bye." We have had a good deal of flag waving in this country in theory, but this afternoon for the first time we had a genuine exhibition of it in the House of Commons, using real flags. All I have to say is, we trust it will be the waving for the next election.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I desire to make some observations with respect to the subject matter of this resolution. Hon. gentlemen who have preceded me will, I am sure, not expect me to follow them in their budget addresses which they have delivered in advance. There is one observation with respect to my genial friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) which I should like to make, and it is this. Surely he knows that of the billion and a quarter of bonds issued by the Canadian National Railway Company and guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada, the largest proportion has been domiciled and owned in the United States and it was obviously impossible that they could be called and converted.

Mr. HOWARD: You knew Australia had done it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Australia's debt was domiciled either in Australia or in the United Kingdom, and the British government itself cooperated with the Australian government. I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough (Mr. Harris) on having brought this subject matter to the attention of the House of Commons. There is no doubt about it that in 1932 when these agreements were before the house there was a very marked difference of opinion. I had hoped, however, with the passing of time, with the results which have flowed from the agreements as they have been demonstrated by the trade figures brought down from time to time by the various governmental departments and crystallized into a whole by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, that hon. gentlemen opposite who opposed these agreements, genuinely I believe, would have changed their opinion. And my view in that respect, I thought, had been confirmed by a statement which was handed to the press in November from behind the doors of the Liberal federation which met in this city at that time, in which statement the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in effect, implicitly if not in express terms, performed what I considered a great recantation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): You have a monopoly of recantation on that side.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I may be all wrong in the inference I have drawn from the statement handed out. Certainly we were not taken into his confidence explicitly, but I am satisfied that in the minds of the people of the country there has been left the impression that there has been a marked change in the attitude of the right hon. gentleman; and I venture to suggest that any hon. gentleman in this house, listening to-night and this afternoon to the statements made here by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) and the hon. member for Sherbrooke will be in absolute doubt as to what their opinion is regarding the subject matter of this resolution. So far as the hon. member for Sherbrooke is concerned, I could not, from any single phrase or paragraph of his address, arrive at any conclusion as to whether he was for these agreements or against them.

Mr. HOWARD: Watch the vote.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have no doubt in that regard. The hon. gentleman is always regular; he will wait until his leader has made his statement and then follow suit.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I would not stress that too much.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no doubt that the trade of this country began to decline as long ago as 1929. When hon. gentlemen went out of power in the summer of 1930 they left this country with a declining foreign trade and an adverse balance of trade of $100,000,000. There is no doubt about that; hon. gentlemen will not dispute it. All the reasons for this decline in trade are now after five years quite apparent; they were not so apparent then. But I understand they were twofold: first, all the great nations of the world between 1922 and 1930 had raised their tariffs against this country. Canada did not follow suit but deliberately, as a matter of public policy, announced at the time—and did so, as I recall it, with a good deal of pride—that this was the only country among the great trading nations of the world that had intentionally lowered its tariffs.

Mr. BROWN: Tell that to the western provinces.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understand that to be the case. That is the reason why this country became the dumping ground of all the other trading nations of the world. That was the situation in 1930.

Mr. DUFF: Was the consumer benefited by that?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As I have only a few minutes to go, perhaps the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) will be good enough to hold himself in peace.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. member put himself in the position of being asked that question.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Allow me to proceed. I do not think the Canadian consumer benefited; certainly Canadian industry and labour did not benefit by it, and I suggest that the Canadian labourer is a consumer as well as anybody else. In 1930, 1931, 1932 we were in the grip of the greatest depression the world has ever seen, and international trade, foreign trade, import trade, export trade dwindled from 100 to 33⅓ per cent the world over, free trade or no free trade, protection or no protection. Canada suffered as did every other trading country in the world.

Then came the Ottawa agreements, and I venture to suggest to hon. members that the consummation of those agreements was the vindication of a principle for which hon. gentlemen opposite and those who preceded them in the seats of the Liberal party, and hon. gentlemen on this side of the house and those who led the fortunes of the Conservative party for forty years, had been striving, namely, the principle of mutual reciprocal trade within the empire. I believe Mr. Fielding's chief claim to fame in history—and I desire to accord to the memory of that very great gentleman that which was his due—will be the fact that he brought in the British preferential tariff. But I also believe that Mr. Fielding and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, if they had confessed what was in their inmost hearts, would have admitted that when they made that gesture for empire trade, they also held the firm belief that the government of the United Kingdom would reciprocate. But this did not occur.

An hon. MEMBER: They did.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They did ultimately. Why? Because the whole fiscal policy of the United Kingdom was changed after 1930 and it was not possible for any government to obtain mutual reciprocal trade within the empire before. I do not blame them for their failure. It was impossible for England, committed to free trade as she was during all that long period of years, to have admitted the principle. Mr. Chamberlain at one time would have been agreeable personally to doing it, but he simply could not bring the British people to his way of thinking. After 1930 there was a change in the fiscal policy of the United Kingdom and these agreements which all parties in this country were eager to explore and adopt came into being and ought to have been accepted as the triumph of a great principle for which Canada had stood for forty years.

There is no doubt—and we might as well face the situation fairly—that from 1929, and perhaps prior to that time, down to the spring of 1933 the trade of this country had steadily declined. Hon. gentlemen opposite will say that this was because we raised the tariffs against imports. That has been dealt with so effectively and so many times on the floor of the house that I do not propose to-night to traverse the situation even for a single moment; but I say this, that after the Ottawa agreements had been in force for a few months, after they had been in force for a full two years as they were in November, 1934, the usefulness and benefit of these agreements fully demonstrated themselves and they are to-day the bulwark of Canadian commerce. What happened? Adverse trade balances were changed into favourable ones. Exports increased. We formerly had to export gold or borrow in foreign countries to pay our indebtedness, and to-day this country closed the calendar year, if you include the export of gold as a commodity, with a favourable trade balance of a quarter of a billion dollars. Canada has maintained her place as the fifth trading nation in the world and we have per capita the largest foreign trade, I believe, of any trading country on earth—$54 a head. That is something for Canada and Canadians to be proud of, as compared with $34 per capita in the United Kingdom and $14 per capita in the United States. Surely that is an enviable position for a little country like Canada.

I have with me to-night a statement of just what the trade of this country has been very recently in regard to the empire agreements, and I desire very briefly to lay the facts before the house. During the twelve months ended November 30, 1934, domestic exports from Canada to British Empire countries totalled in value $334,785,000, as compared with $217,203,000 in the twelve months ended November 30, 1932. This is a gain of $117,582,000, or exactly 54·1 per cent.

In 1934 our exports to foreign countries reached a total of $308,181,000 as against $287,245,000 in 1932, a gain of $20,936,000 or seven per cent in the face of all the adverse tariffs that have been raised against this country. The gain is not as large as we would like to see it, but it is a gain and a substantial one. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) this afternoon referred to the decline in the wheat trade. I suggest to him that the figures which I have given and will give a little later showing the character of our trade has changed. But the trade is there. No one knows it better than the hon. gentleman from British Columbia in connection with the export of lumber. If they do not know it we in eastern Canada do. In 1934 the exports to foreign countries from Canada reached a total of $308,181,000 as against $287,245,000 in 1932, a gain of 7 per cent. Imports from empire countries in the same twelve months, ended November 30, 1934, amounted to $156,956,000 as compared with $129,332,000 for the twelve months ended November 30, 1932, an increase of over $35,000 000 or over 21 per cent. May I add that in November alone our total foreign trade was in excess of $115,000,000, or at the rate of nearly a billion and a half dollars for the year. If we keep up the rate of advance that we have established since the empire trade agreements came into full operation we shall soon be back to the two billion dollar mark for foreign trade. Surely that is an achievement of which this country and every citizen in it ought to be proud, in the face of economic conditions to-day.

I have here a table showing Canada's total imports and exports to empire countries for the years 1932, 1933 and 1934, and the percentage of increase in the two year period. I propose to hand this statement to Hansard for inclusion in these remarks.

*The decrease in Canada's imports from British South Africa for the twelve months ended November 30, 1934, compared with similar period in 1932, was practically wholly due to falling off in the imports of corn and sugar, which, during this period decreased as follows:—corn, from $1,636,588 to $887,391, and sugar, from $2,284,368 to $1,366,622. The decrease in the imports of corn was due to partial failure of the corn crop in British South Africa during 1933. The movement of corn from British South Africa is once more in evidence, the imports in October and November amounting to $779,859.

Surely these figures are impressive. Surely they show that Canada is leading the way back to a substantial and healthy foreign trade. Surely they demonstrate the efficiency of the imperial conference trade agreements.

To the hon. member for Sherbrooke I would say that corn is not used altogether in making corn flakes. I am sure the statement he made in that respect was intended only as a joke.

I have been endeavouring to get an exact statement of the trade of this country for the full calendar year ended December 31, 1934. The particulars have been delivered to me in a form in which they are difficult to use, but I desire to put on record a few figures taken here and there from this statement. Dealing first with our total domestic exports to the United Kingdom, these have grown from $178,000,000 in 1932 to $270,000,000 in 1934. The exports under this group comprise many items. I should like to advert to a few which are the products of our primary producers. In 1932 this country exported to Great Britain, 1,386,479 barrels of apples of a total value of $5,639,946. In 1933, the first year of the agreements, that export had just doubled in volume, 2,640,110 barrels with a value of $10,061,000. Surely these figures demonstrate the value of the empire trade agreements to the apple growers of the Annapolis valley. If hon. members have any doubt of that let them ask the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley). He knew the value of these agreements to his people when they were brought down, and as was his duty he voted for the principle of them. I think he was very wise; I think he will agree with that himself. So I cannot understand the attitude of hon. gentlemen who oppose these agreements, having regard to the benefits that accrue to them in their own constituencies.

Let us take lumber. I think I know something about lumber. A man could not be born and brought up in New Brunswick and practise law and be engaged in litigation there and see the operations of the lumber business from day to day without knowing a little about lumber. I know this, that our trade in lumber with the United Kingdom for many years had dwindled to practically nothing. Then after these agreements were brought into effect a start was made in the right direction, and the growth of the trade, while it has not been phenomenal, while probably no great fortunes have been made out of it, has nevertheless been impressive. So impressive has it been that our people in that part of the country at all events are very anxious indeed to consolidate their position in the English market. They are watching very closely the effects of the proposed arrangements between the Soviet republics and the timber distributors of the United Kingdom. I want to say that the very matter in reference to which the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Hanbury) interrogated the Prime Minister this afternoon, is one which has occasioned great anxiety to the lumber producers of eastern Canada, because we desire to sell our spruce to the United Kingdom. We have had under these agreements a sheltered market for many of our products there. Our position is not quite so clear with respect to lumber, but because of the inclusion of article 21, I think it is, in the United Kingdom-Canada trade agreement, we enjoy the privilege of appeal to the government of the United Kingdom in regard to the "fall clause" in the timber agreement with the Soviet republic. That article was included in the agreement at the insistence of this government. Up to the present it has not been necessary to make use of it, but if it should become necessary to do so that provision will be of the very greatest advantage to the timber exporters of the eastern provinces.

I have often wondered, Mr. Speaker, as I have sat in this house—now a good many years—why in matters of this character we should not have unanimous approval, particularly where an arrangement has been made that has the effect of extending our foreign trade. There is a great deal of unanimity with regard to extending our trade with the United States. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough was good enough yesterday to let his resolution go by the board because negotiations are now pending with respect to that very important matter.

Mr. DUFF: I want to see New Brunswick lumber go to the United States, which is its natural market, free of duty.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Contracts of that sort, of course, are not unilateral; they are bilateral. I venture to say that the arrangement we make will be as good as anyone could make under the circumstances.

Mr. DUFF: Then you will not have to ship your lumber to the United Kingdom.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will say, however, that for certain classes of our lumber the United Kingdom is the better market of the two. There has been a great change in the use of lumber in the United States.

Mr. DUFF: No.

[Mr. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the hon. member does not believe me let him get in touch with some of those who are in the export trade; they will tell him that there has been a very great change in that respect. It may be that the appeal I am making will fall upon deaf ears, but the enlargement of our foreign trade and our export trade is so vital that before I take my seat I venture to appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite to change their attitude towards these agreements while there is yet time, and to get behind and support them, as I believe it is their manifest duty to do.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in discussing this resolution, which is in the nature of a private member's motion, I should like first to direct the attention of the house to the nature of the motion and to the circumstance of this subject being debated at this time. The motion reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the operation of the trade agreements concluded at the Imperial Economic Conference, held at Ottawa, 1932, merits the approval of this house.

What, after all, does the resolution amount to? The government has a policy which, as is known by all hon. members in this house and throughout the country, is supported by its following. This resolution asks for the approval of that policy by the house. The fact that the government is in the majority, and is supported by hon. gentlemen opposite to the extent that it is, is evidence that its policy has the approval of the majority of this house. So this means that they are asking their own majority for approval of their own work. We hardly expect that hon. gentlemen opposite are going to vote any disapproval of their own policy. This motion only calls for an expression on the part of this house that the operation of these agreements merits the approval of the majority, which the government has already.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Of all hon. members, not of the majority.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then may I say that my hon. friend will be very much disappointed if he is looking for any such verdict on the operation of these agreements. But may I direct attention to another point. If this motion is intended really to afford an opportunity for a very full discussion of the all important trade policies of the government opposite, and this is the most important feature of their policy, it is extraordinary that the matter should come before the house on the motion of a private member. As I pointed out this afternoon there is a time recognized in the proceedings of this house at which to discuss great questions of trade and the major policies of the administration. That time is when the house is moved into committee of ways and means, when there is ample opportunity for discussing a question of this magnitude. There is no single policy of hon. gentlemen opposite which, in their eyes, is so important as the Ottawa trade agreements, and I do submit that it is an extraordinary thing that we should be asked to discuss this major policy on the motion of a private member.

It is still more extraordinary for the reason that none of us knows what is to be the effect of this discussion at this time. This afternoon I asked his honour the Speaker to enlighten hon. members as to what would be the effect of the discussion of this question on this motion, whether in view of the decision given by a previous Speaker it would preclude any further discussion of the question in the course of the present session. I directed the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to the same point, but the right hon. gentleman informed us that the Speaker was not here to give expressions of opinion and that he, the Prime Minister, would give no expression of opinion either. Yet the ruling of an ex-speaker of this house, given during the present parliament, still stands, that a subject once discussed in this house cannot be taken up again during the same session of parliament.

Is the motive of hon. gentlemen opposite that of stifling further discussion of the Ottawa trade agreements? It looks very much like it. It looks as if, at the very beginning of this session, they are anxious to avoid as much as they possibly can in the way of discussion of the agreements, and they are preparing the way now so that, if it should suit their purpose when we begin to discuss the effect of these agreements on any reciprocity agreement or on trade in a large way, they may be able to look in the direction of the Speaker and point to the previous decision that has been given by a Speaker of this house with regard to a question not being discussed a second time during the same session.

If that is not it, what is the reason? The only other reason would appear to be that hon. gentlemen opposite, who have promised to reform the capitalist system, and the Prime Minister, who has said that he has a large program of social and industrial legislation in the nature of reform, want a little more time in which to get that program worked out, and they rather hope that by a discussion that may continue for a considerable period of time on a private member's motion, this question being so important, we will still further delay the time at which this house can take up the question of unemployment. I say that at this time instead of discussing trade agreements the house ought to be discussing the unemployment problem and means of remedying it. If this government were at all appreciative of conditions throughout the country and what the country expects of this particular session, they would bring forward not simply one measure of social and industrial reform but their entire program; not a program relating to something which is to come into effect a year and a half from now, but a program showing what they purpose doing in the matter of dealing with the situation that now exists, and particularly the distressing condition of unemployment. The fact that we have the motion before us and that hon. gentlemen opposite have chosen this particular course makes their purpose quite clear.

Be the consequences what they may, whether we are to be shut off from further discussion of this question at a later time, or whether the time of the house is to be taken up in discussing matters which for the last two years in this house and on the hustings have been discussed to a greater extent than any others, we will proceed to state our position briefly but clearly. If hon. gentlemen opposite want to know exactly where the opposition stands they cannot call a vote too soon.

I am surprised that hon. gentlemen opposite want to know how the agreements have operated, or rather what approval should be given to them. Since the agreements were brought before the house two and a half years ago they have been before the country and have been discussed and considered at every by-election. They have been discussed more during by-election campaigns than at any other time. I know hon. gentlemen opposite attach great importance to their mechanical majority in this chamber, but we on this side attach greater importance to the voice of the people as it has been expressed in the by-elections. Regardless of the majority they may be able to muster on this or any resolution, let me draw their attention to the fact that there still remains the circumstance that every by-election which has been held since the agreements went into effect has resulted, with one exception, in a Liberal member being returned to parliament. Those Liberal members have been elected, among other reasons, because of the attitude of this party with respect to the trade agreements. The one return to the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite was a candidate who was elected by a minority of votes and, as I have said previously, by the support of a minister who had resigned from the government. The voice of the people so far as these agreements are concerned stands nine to one in favour of the Liberal party. Since the people have expressed themselves as forcibly as that it is evident that what they want is not more discussion in this house on questions such as the one before us but an opportunity to express their views at the polls.

To come more particularly to the motion, may I say that hon. gentlemen opposite seem to feel they can debate the merits of the Ottawa agreements on a basis of statistics. It has been frequently said that one can prove almost anything from statistics, and I doubt if that particular maxim will find more in the way of application than to statistics relating to trade at the present time. May I however draw the attention of hon. members to the way in which comparisons are being made. When the Prime Minister and his following are discussing statistics they state it is not fair to compare present trade with trade as it was in the days of great prosperity under a Liberal regime. They say it is most unfair to make comparisons of trade when it was at its highest point, such as in the year 1928 under a Liberal regime, with trade to-day. On the other hand what do they do? When they make their comparisons they compare trade to-day with trade as it was at its lowest point in the period of the depression, a low point which was reached as a result of their own policy. They compare trade as it was in 1932 with trade to-day. I shall have a word to say as to how I believe trade reached the low level in 1932, and I shall show that it was a result of the trade agreements. In 1932 trade did not go down or just flattten out like a punctured tire, without some definite and specific cause. That is the cause which—

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I am going to ask that you kindly prevent interruptions by hon. gentlemen opposite. I think I am entitled to present our case. I shall not be very long, but I am entitled during the time at my disposal to present it without interruption from hon. gentlemen opposite.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. COTNAM: You just made forty the other day in one speech. Practice what you preach.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman interrupted me forty times.

Mr. SPEAKER: The right hon. gentleman is quite right. If any hon. member wishes to ask a question he should intimate that he is desirous of doing so. Then if the right hon. leader of the opposition, who has the floor, indicates his willingness to answer the question, he will follow the usual procedure of resuming his seat and permitting the question. Otherwise I would ask that the ordinary rules of debate be followed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. May I say with regard to interruptions that if in the course of speaking I make a slight error, as is sometimes inevitable, which I do not notice at the time, or if I make a statement which is not accurate in any particular, I shall welcome my attention being drawn to it. If I make a mistake in regard to a matter of fact I shall be only too happy to correct it. May I say, however, that I shall expect these interruptions rather from the Prime Minister than from a number of gentlemen who apparently are not attempting to do anything else but interrupt. If I have had to interrupt the Prime Minister in his remarks it has been because I have had to draw his attention to the fact that he was misrepresentating my attitude. I shall expect him to do the same when I am speaking, if I misrepresent him, or if I make a statement which is not correct.

Mr. BENNETT: I would be on my feet all the time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad the Prime Minister has afforded his following a little merriment. I could see they were looking pretty grim, the more this question was discussed.

I was pointing out methods of comparison. I believe I have made it clear that hon. gentlemen opposite assert that hon. members on this side of the house should not make comparisons between trade as it is to-day and as it was in the days when the Liberal party held office. However, when they come to a discussion they attempt to show that a great improvement has taken place in the last two years by making their comparisons with trade at the lowest point it has been since they held office. I think the truer comparison, although it is not absolutely accurate, would be neither of these extremes, but the mean which lies between, namely, a comparison of present trade with trade as it was at the time hon. gentlemen came into office in 1930. In other words, if comparisons are to be made at all, that is a much fairer basis upon which to make them.

But even in making comparisons on that basis one has to consider that there are many factors which account for the trade between Great Britain being what it is to-day, factors that are apart altogether from the Ottawa agreements. There are world factors which have affected the whole course of world trade, have had their effect upon the trade between Great Britain and Canada and would have had their effect if there had been no trade agreements. May I say, however, that had there been no Ottawa agreements these world factors would have had a much more favourable effect upon the trade between Great Britain and Canada than has been the case under the trade agreements. Some of these world factors are perfectly obvious. Just to give point to what I have said, may I draw attention to the trade between this country and the United States, showing how it has increased over the same period in which trade between Great Britain and Canada has increased. May I draw attention also to the fact that ever since the present government came into office, and indeed before, we have had a much larger volume of trade with the United States than with Great Britain. When we are discussing the operation of any agreement and its effect upon trade we have to consider the effect upon trade as a whole.

What are the facts with regard to trade between Canada and the United States as compared with trade between Canada and Great Britain since the Ottawa agreements went into effect? I do not think it will be argued by hon. gentlemen opposite that any increase of trade between Canada and the United States was due to the Ottawa agreements. The Ottawa agreements were enacted, amongst other things, to make trade with other countries as difficult in comparison as it could possibly be made. What has our trade with the United States approximated in millions of dollars, giving the figures in round numbers? For the twelve months ended October 31, 1933, our total trade with the United States was $372,000,000. Our total trade with the United States for the twelve months ended October 31, 1934, was $492,000,000, or a gain in that one year of $120,000,000. With the United Kingdom our total trade for the twelve months ended October 31, 1933, was $293,000,000, and in the next twelve months, ended October 31, 1934, it was $383,000,000, or a gain of $90,000,000. In other words, after the Ottawa agreements went into effect our total gain of trade with Great Britain was $90,000,000, but our total gain of trade with the United States was $120,000,000. I submit that nothing more than that is necessary to prove that so far as there has been an improvement of trade in this country, it is due not to the Ottawa agreements but to something else. It may well be that the reason our trade is not greater than it is with the United States, and also with Great Britain, is found in the Ottawa agreements; but certainly it cannot be claimed, in view of the figures that I have given, that the increase of trade between Canada and Great Britain is due in particular to these agreements.

Another factor that should be taken into consideration is the method by which these agreements have been administered, the method by which all our tariff legislation has been administered. We well know that for a time trade came about as nearly to being embargoed as was possible. As I have said, we got down to the flat tire phase in 1932, and then when hon. gentlemen opposite, through their endeavour to restrict trade and to develop a policy of economic nationalism for the country, had pretty nearly ruined the country altogether, they began to see the necessity of easing up on some of the restrictions they had previously imposed and of administering many of the laws very differently from what they had been doing theretofore. That of itself, which made for greater freedom of trade, in other words that step in the direction of Liberal policy, began at once to make itself felt, and as some of the restrictive measures and methods of artificial valuation and the like were made less exacting than they had been, trade naturally responded to this opportunity to flow which previously had been denied to it. I submit that if one had the time to do so, he could show that all the increase in trade that came about was due to some relaxation of the tariff barriers and restrictions which had been imposed by hon. gentlemen opposite under these agreements or under their administration of their terms.

There is another factor so far as trade between Canada and Britain is concerned: it is what has taken place in Britain itself in regard to some of the other countries with which she trades. I shall mention only one. We all know that there has been an unfortunate difference between the Irish Free

State and Great Britain ever since these agreements went into force or shortly after. With what result? With the result that so far as cattle and some other commodities are concerned they were not shipped to the same extent from Ireland to Britain as had previously been the case, and at once there was a demand, not due to the Ottawa agreements in any sense of the word, but due to the situation that had been created between Ireland and Great Britain, whereby trade from Ireland was restricted and lessened, and greater opportunity thereby given to trade from Canada. But that was not in any way the result of the operation of the Ottawa agreements.

May I point out also that since the Ottawa agreements have come into force, our currency has very considerably depreciated. From the time hon. gentlemen opposite came into office up to the time of the Ottawa agreements our currency depreciated. When you are taking account of the figures of trade as they were in the days of the Liberal administration, it is to be remembered that our dollar was valued at one hundred cents, whereas to-day under hon. gentlemen opposite it is valued at around sixty cents. That of itself will account in very large measure for this supposed increase in trade that has taken place in the last few years, and it is something apart altogether from the Ottawa agreements. These are only a few of the things that might be mentioned. Innumerable factors enter into the matter of expansion and restriction of trade; I have mentioned only four, but I think the four are sufficiently obvious to make perfectly clear the point I have been seeking to make.

Apart altogether from statistics, the only way in which a true comparison can be made in respect of the operation of these agreements is to ask ourselves what trade would have been had there been no Ottawa agreements at all? What would trade have amounted to had the policies which were in force when the present administration came into office been continued—had a policy such as that which was laid down by the Liberal administration in the so-called Dunning budget been followed as compared with what we have as a result of the Ottawa agreements? That is the only true basis of comparison. Here may I say that we come to something that is fundamental in the Ottawa agreements, namely that the Ottawa agreements are founded on a policy of protection. They are founded on a policy of restriction of trade, not on a policy of greater freedom of trade; and in estimating how they have operated one has not merely to keep in mind the actual results of the agreements as we see them, but also, as far as we can endeavour to see what the trend would have been, what in all likelihood would have been the result of the operation of the different policies which hon. gentlemen opposite changed when they came into power. Now, this last factor is not capable of being reduced to a definite term. In the nature of things we cannot say exactly that so many hundreds of thousands of dollars or hundreds of millions of dollars of difference would have occurred; but what we can readily see is how entirely different the trend would have been had different policies remained in force.

To understand the Ottawa agreements one has to go back to the first meeting of the imperial conference in London in 1930 which was attended by the right hon. the Prime Minister, and also to what was done at the first session of this parliament; because it was at that time that the Prime Minister began to lay the ground work of his policy of economic nationalism. He began by increasing duties against all countries and against Great Britain before he went to the conference, and then when he got to the conference he told the British people that there would be no preference with Canada unless it was on the basis of a preference granted, not by the lowering of existing tariffs in favour of Britain, as had been done under Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir Robert Borden and every other predecessor of my right hon. friend in this country, but by the raising of tariffs against other countries. More than that, he stated that there would be no agreement entered into until Britain herself changed her fiscal policy. When therefore we endeavour to estimate the effect of these Ottawa agreements upon trade between Great Britain and Canada, We have to ask ourselves what trade would have been had Britain not become a protectionist country but had remained, as she was, a comparatively open market so far as Canada was concerned.

The Prime Minister at the conference in London told the government there that they must change their fiscal policy from one that was in the nature of freedom of trade to one in the nature of protection and restriction of trade. He advocated a ten per cent increase in tariffs and he made it quite clear that he would not negotiate agreements with Britain until that or some change was made. How was that situation viewed? It was because of the attitude of the Prime Minister of Canada that the then Secretary of State in Great Britain said that the suggestions he was making were all humbug and that they could not be entertained. The Prime Minister of Great Britain himself said, "It is impossible; we cannot do the thing we are asked to do." And Lord Passfield made perfectly clear, in a speech in the House of Lords, what was represented as the basis on which alone Canada was prepared thereafter to trade with Great Britain, namely, that the British government must change its fiscal policy. Inasmuch as the British government were unwilling to make any change at that time, the Prime Minister came back without any trade arrangement at all.

As against that position, one has to take the position as it would have been had the attitude proposed by the Liberal party been adopted. We knew that the conference was coming in the fall of 1930. We knew that some countries were adopting policies of economic nationalism. We knew that there was necessity to seek markets with greater effort than ever where there was a possibility of obtaining or maintaining them. We therefore made a special effort to get as large an entry of our products into the British market as possible. The Dunning budget was framed on the basis, that where we were losing trade in one direction because of tariff walls being raised by other countries we should seek to gain trade or at least to maintain what we had within the British empire where we had an open market, practically as it was at that time—the largest market in the world. As I say, we cannot assert definitely what the result would have been; but anyone who stops to contemplate what it might have been will readily see that the trade between Britain and Canada would have been infinitely greater under the arrangement proposed by the Dunning budget than it is under the changes that have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite.

I need not repeat, what is well known to everyone, that trade cannot be carried on all in one direction; and once the Prime Minister of Canada practically closed the door, if not completely at any rate in part, against trade coming to Canada from Great Britain, as was done when he raised the duties against Britain, to that extent he made it more difficult for us to sell our products in the British market. And every step he has taken in dealing with trade matters has been in the direction of raising tariffs higher and higher and making trade more and more impossible, with the result that our great primary producers in this country have had very little chance to get into the British market with their goods.

The reason Sir Wilfrid Laurier adopted the policy with respect to the British preference which he did was this. He saw that trade, in order to be carried on at all, had to flow both ways, and his desire was, not to make trade between Britain and Canada more and more difficult but to make it relatively easier by giving us an opportunity to sell what we could in the British market, by giving Britain an opportunity in our market with respect to the things desired by our own consumers and producers.

I cannot go over the whole story of his negotiations with London, but we know that after the Prime Minister came back he showed Britain, with a stronger hand than ever I presume, that his intention was to go on raising tariffs, against Britain as well as other countries because we had the whole tariff changed in considerable part and duties put up higher than ever at the next session. Then we had the conference in Ottawa.

What took place at the conference here in Ottawa is most significant. When the British delegates were meeting with delegates from other parts of the empire, the British delegation stated in the clearest language possible what they regarded as the course that should be pursued in endeavouring to work out reciprocal agreements between the different parts of the empire; and when we come to ask ourselves how these agreements have operated, how they have affected trade, we must pause and put this question to ourselves: What would have been the position of trade between Britain and Canada to-day and since 1932 had the proposals of the British delegation been carried out, instead of proposals which were diametrically opposite and for which the Prime Minister of Canada was himself responsible? I am not going to say in my own words what the proposals of the British delegation were; I will read what was said in this very chamber at the opening meeting of the conference. I happened to be sitting in the gallery opposite when the Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin, who was head of the British delegation, a former prime minister of Great Britain, made his address at the opening of the conference and set out the policies which he hoped, and not he alone but the British delegation as a whole, would govern with respect to trade within the empire in any agreements that might be made. Here are his words, as reported in the proceedings of the conference at Ottawa on July 21, 1932:

> What then should be the first aim of this conference? It should be to clear out the channels of trade among ourselves . . . we hope that as a result of this conference we may be able, not only to maintain existing preferences, but, in addition, to find ways of increasing them. There are two ways in which increased preference can be given—either by lowering barriers among ourselves or by raising them against others. The choice between these two must be governed largely by local considerations, but subject to that, it seems to us that we should endeavour to follow the first rather than the second course. For however great our resources, we cannot isolate ourselves from the world. No nation or group of nations, however wealthy and populous, can maintain prosperity in a world where depression and impoverishment reign. Let us therefore aim at the lowering rather than the raising of barriers, even if we cannot fully achieve our purpose now, and let us remember that any action we take here is bound to have its reactions elsewhere. His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom therefore place before the conference as its general objective the expansion of empire trade, brought about as far as possible by the lowering of trade barriers as between the several members of the empire.

If hon. gentlemen opposite or the Prime Minister had accepted the objective as set forth by the former Prime Minister of Great Britain, every party in this country as well as every party in Great Britain would have been as one with regard to the agreements that might have been reached. There would have been no difference whatever. The reason that we on this side objected to the Ottawa agreements was that we believed Mr. Baldwin was right in what he suggested, and that the Prime Minister of Canada was wrong. We believe that because Canada did not accept the attitude proposed by Britain, to aim at bringing about preferences through the lowering of tariffs within the empire, instead of bringing about preferences by raising higher tariffs against the world, the greatest mistake was made that has been made in this country at any time. That is where our difference arises with respect to the Ottawa agreements, and that difference goes right to the root of everything respecting them. That is why we have been opposed to these agreements. It is not that we were opposed to an agreement with Britain; we have always sought to further trade with Britain even to a greater extent than with any other country. It was Sir Wilfrid Laurier who was the first to give a preference to Great Britain. The idea of a preference did not originate with hon. gentlemen opposite; it originated with a Liberal prime minister who was anxious to further the interests of his own country and of the empire at the same time. That is exactly what would have happened had the Ottawa agreements been based on policies such as are set forth. But the policies that were made to govern were those, not of greater freedom of trade but of more and more in the way of protection, more and more in the way of restriction as between the different parts of the empire and more and more in the way of restrictions than ever as against the rest of the world.

So far as these Ottawa agreements are concerned, this was not merely an effort to further a policy of economic nationalism for Canada but from the point of view of the Prime Minister it was economic imperialism as well. If he had his way we would have tariffs so high there would be relatively speaking no trade with any other part of the world. It is a very different matter to make your tariff arrangements within your own empire in a way which the nations of the world generally will recognize is right and proper as between members of a great commonwealth from effecting this result in a way which nations generally resent, and which causes them not to hesitate to show their resentment when it comes to their subsequent dealings with your country. That, may I again say, is the real basis of our objections to these agreements. Obviously there is a distinct line of demarcation. Let me repeat: It is not that we are opposed to an agreement with Britain; we have never at any time been opposed to agreements, but we are opposed to a wrong method of negotiation; we are opposed to wrong principles governing, and we are opposed in the negotiations to false actions—actions that are detrimental to our own trade.

What was bound to be the effect of these agreements once they were entered into on the basis insisted upon by the Prime Minister of Canada? It is well known what took place in Ottawa; it is well known that the British delegation were told pretty plainly that they would either negotiate on his basis or there would be no negotiations at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes; hon. gentlemen opposite applaud that attitude and yet regard themselves as the great upholders of the empire. It was not a matter of any consequence to them or to him whether a greater question might be raised within the empire which might serve to create internal dissension of a very far-reaching character or whether there should have been an endeavour to keep all parts of the empire as nearly in unity as it was possible to have them. Once the line insisted upon by the Prime Minister was taken, we began to have the inimical effects of the Ottawa agreements. We have listened this afternoon and evening to one or two speakers, the mover of the resolution in particular, telling how the agreements had operated with respect to one or two industries. May I repeat: we have no evidence that these industries would not have been as well off without the agreements as with them. It would be a surprise to me if agreements of the kind did not give some particular advantage to certain specially favoured industries, but the kind of agreements that Canada needs to-day are not those that are going to work to the benefit of a few privileged interests in one section of Canada, but those that will do justice to all classes in all parts of the country.

The first consideration in this country with respect to every agreement should be its effect upon consumers and producers. May I now pause to show how these agreements have operated with respect to consumers and producers. In this connection I had better at once make clear why, on the basis of the policies which we on this side are upholding in very definite terms, we cannot support these agreements in the terms in which they at present stand. I have said that these agreements are founded on a policy of protection, not of ordinary or moderate protection but of extraordinary, high protection. With what consequence? With the consequence that as a party we have felt that if this country is to be saved and brought out of the depression at all, those high tariff policies will have to go. What has made them more restrictive than ever has been in the manner in which they have been and are administered. So we have laid down the following as our policy in matters of trade:

The Liberal party believes that trade is the basis of industrial and commercial development, and that Canada needs trade.

It will promote trade with all nations and negotiate trade agreements with any country willing to trade with Canada on a reciprocal basis.

It will abolish the extravagant increases in the tariff made by the present administration which have had the effect of strangling trade, exploiting consumers and robbing our railways of business.

It will abolish all unwarranted extra taxes on imports, such as the exchange and dumping duties, as imposed by the present administration.

It will end the making and altering of tariffs by executive action.

It will substitute stability for uncertainty in the administration of customs laws.

It will continue the Liberal policy of the British preference by a percentage reduction in existing tariffs rather than by a percentage increase against foreign countries in existing tariffs.

It will grant to British imports a real preference.

Every one of those statements of policy has a bearing upon these trade agreements and we cannot accept these agreements in the form in which they are at the present time without stultifying ourselves with respect to every one of the declarations therein made. Let me direct attention to just one or two of them again:

It—

That is the Liberal party.

—will promote trade with all nations and negotiate trade agreements with any country willing to trade with Canada on a reciprocal basis.

Mr. COTNAM: More hot air.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the hon. gentleman who interrupted had the floor pretty much to himself yesterday. I sat here for an hour and listened to him read his speech from beginning to end and never uttered a word.

Mr. COTNAM: Just the instructions the right hon. gentleman gave his chief whip. I watched my right hon. friend yesterday.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, to see that my hon. friend keeps his interruptions to himself.

Mr. COTNAM: Just the way the right hon. gentleman did.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I, as I have said, draw attention first of all to the clause in our declaration that the Liberal party seeks to develop trade with all countries of the world. Therein lies one of the fundamental objections to the present agreements with Britain as they stand, that they make more difficult the negotiation of agreements with other countries. I have to pause here to explain one of the subtle things about these Ottawa agreements, something that is perhaps not so apparent but to which notice was drawn at the time we were objecting to them. It is this: that in addition to raising the tariff in the Ottawa agreements, the tariff was so changed as to do away with advantages which had previously obtained in this country under the intermediate tariffs framed as such with the express purpose of affording facilities in the matter of tariff negotiations with other countries. We have had in Canada and we have to-day three tariffs, the general tariff, the intermediate tariff and the British preferential tariff. The intermediate tariff is in some particulars lower than the general, but it is not as low as the British preferential. The principle that underlies these three tariffs is that of giving our main preference to Britain, but giving certain advantages to other countries that are prepared to give us reciprocal advantages, and withholding these advantages from countries which are not prepared to deal with us in a reciprocal way. When the Ottawa agreements were entered into the intermediate tariff was completely changed. It was raised in many cases to the level of the general tariff, so that what there was in the way of bargaining power to effect reciprocal agreements with other countries was in large measure swept away. That was a distinct loss, and it is something of which we cannot and do not approve. We say that as a result it has been more difficult to negotiate agreements with other countries than would otherwise have been the case. Obviously what has most of all made it difficult to negotiate agreements is the height to which we have put our own tariff and the unwillingness of the government to lower tariffs at all. We on this side of the house favour trade with all countries, believing as well that the more trade this country can secure the stronger it will become as one of the nations of the British empire, and the better will be its position to trade with Great Britain itself.

I have read the reference to the abolition of unwarranted extra tariffs on imports such as exchange and dumping duties as imposed by the present administration. I noticed that the Prime Minister the other day asked if we were in favour of dumping duties and exchange duties, and if we were, did we propose to abolish them. This does not say that we propose the abolition of all exchange and dumping duties; it says we propose to abolish all unwarranted extra taxes on imports, such as the exchange and dumping duties as imposed by the present administration. That is a very different thing from these particular duties as imposed under the previous Liberal administration.

Another feature of the administration of these Ottawa agreements has been, as I have said already, the making of tariffs by executive action and the instability that has resulted. I wonder if it is not apparent to everyone that next to the tariffs themselves the trade of this country has been more affected by the uncertainty of the tariff and its administration than by any other single factor. Trade depends upon importers and exporters. Go in any direction you like and ask the importers of this country what they think the effect of the Ottawa agreements and their administration has been, and they will tell you that the whole business of importing has been so uncertain that they have not dared to venture to try to carry on business to any considerable extent. They have never known whether between the time the goods were ordered and the time of their arrival some unforeseen change would be made in the tariff or in regulations respecting it. Take the situation at the present time; the Prime Minister has indicated that he is going to have further changes; importers see him taking one leaf after another out of the Liberal book, and they think that before this session is over he may go in for lower tariffs and further changes in that direction, with the result that importers to-day because of continuing uncertainty are not prepared to carry on trade to any extent, and in consequence business suffers. That has been the condition ever since these agreements have come into force. We used to hear a great deal about the advantages of stability in the matter of tariffs, but instability has been the essence of the whole situation since hon. gentlemen opposite took office, and more particularly so since the empire trade agreements went into effect.

The other day the Prime Minister said a word about the change there had been in the wording of Liberal policy with respect to the preference that the Liberal party was prepared to offer to Great Britain. He said that we had at one time said we would give fifty per cent preference and that now we say "substantial." Substantial is equivalent to real; both words I think are used interchangeably.

Mr. BENNETT: Fifty per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend said we said fifty per cent at the outset, and that now we have changed it to "substantial." May I give the reason? It is very obvious. The whole situation in regard to trade between Canada and Great Britain and the rest of the world has been completely altered as a result of the Ottawa agreements. What might have been an appropriate preference to Great Britain at a time when relatively speaking she had no protective tariff at all, would not be appropriate now that she is a protectionist country. Whether the preferences to be given will be fifty per cent or less or more will now necessarily depend upon negotiations between the two countries. But a policy to give a real and substantial preference remains fundamentally what it has been from the start. The exact extent of the preference will depend upon the circumstances as they exist when the opportunity for further negotiations may present itself.

I said we would abolish the extravagant increases in the tariff made by the present administration, which have had the effect of strangling trade, exploiting the consumers and robbing the railways of business. Let me give an example of the extent to which the consumers have been affected by the Ottawa agreements, and the way in which they have been administered. I cannot begin to go over the list in detail, but I can take one or two commodities that will serve as examples. I will give the present cost of landing a shipment from the United Kingdom based on the rates charged since the agreements came into force in comparison with those charged under the previous administration. As I have said, there are such variations in the administration of the tariff, in the different taxes imposed and the way in which they are administered, that no statement can be made of them as on any one day which with certainty will be applicable a few months later; consequently I have to point out the time for which this compilation was made. This is the situation as it was in November, 1933, about fourteen months ago, and about fourteen months after the agreements came into effect. It will show at a glance just what the effect of these Ottawa agreements has been as far as consumers are concerned. Remember that what affects consumers affects producers as well, because these things all enter into the cost of living and the cost of production. The figures follow:

Commodity	Cost landed under Liberals in percentage	Conservatives
Dyed or printed cotton fabric	19.18	34.
White cotton	16.15	34.
Wool piece fabrics	26.	41.50
Wool overcoatings	26.	65.75
High grade wool suitings	26.	44.
Cheaper grade wool suitings	26.	51.25
Wool hosiery (depending on value)	19.18 to 26.	56.50
Wool blankets, household	21.45	50.75
Axminster carpets	23.75	55.50

Looking at it in another way we may see what this amounts to expressed in terms of dollars, not percentage. Here are nine items. Assume we were importing $1,000 worth of each, bringing the total bill to $9,000; what is the result?

Commodity	Invoice	Cost landed under Liberals	Conservatives
Dyed or printed cotton fabric	$1,000	$ 191 80	$ 340 00
White cotton flannelette	1,000	161 50	340 00
Wool piece fabrics	1,000	260 00	415 00
Wool overcoatings, not less than 18 ozs. sq. yd.	1,000	260 00	657 50
Wool high grade suitings	1,000	260 00	440 00
Wool suitings, cheaper grade	1,000	260 00	512 50
Wool hosiery	1,000	191 80 to 260 00	565 00
Wool blankets, household	1,000	214 50	507 50
Axminster carpets	1,000	237 50	555 00
Total	$9,000	$2,037 10 to 2,105 40	$4,332 50

It may be claimed by hon. members opposite that these imposts helped to raise revenue, but as a matter of fact the duties have been so high that goods have not been coming in; customs duties have fallen off very considerably, and the country has lost revenue. So the producers of these commodities, who formerly had a fairly good time of it and who carried on their businesses quite well, have been put in the position of being able to raise their prices to a level that would meet this importing rate; the consumer has had to carry that, and in addition he has had to raise the taxes to make up the revenues necessary for the conduct of the business of the country. So we begin to see something of the burdens that are on the backs of the people of this country as a consequence of these agreements. What that has meant to trade and to our railways and shipping is only too apparent, and these are some of the reasons why this depression has continued for so many years.

But there is something especially interesting and significant about this matter when one comes to compare the cost of landing these different products, as it was immediately after the present government came into office, with what it had become at the time of the Ottawa agreements, and with what it has become since. I must say that I cannot help but believe there was something in the nature of design in the very high tariffs which were put on at the outset, a design which discloses an intention to see trade brought to as low a level as possible as quickly as possible, so that when we were half way through this parliament there might be a chance to revive trade simply by lifting some of the most obvious of the restrictions. Let us see how that works. Take the fluctuation in the duties on wool overcoating fabric. Prior to September 16, 1930, the total duties and taxes amounted to 26 per cent. After June 2, 1931, they were up to 70½ per cent. After April 7, 1932, which was just before the conference, they were up to 113½ per cent. After October 13, 1932, the conference having come in just between, they were 100 per cent. After April, 1933, they were 83¾ per cent, and after September 20, 1933, they were 67¼ per cent. These figures include customs duties, excise tax, sales tax and dump duties as they have been in force at the different dates given. There is the reason for the unemployment we have had for so long in this country; the tariffs have been so arranged, so added to, so manipulated, so carried along and administered, that with respect to many commodities trade was practically brought to a standstill during 1932. Since then—not by changes that resulted from the Ottawa agreements but by other changes made by the government—some of these restrictions have been removed, and trade has begun to respond. The government claims that this response is due to the Ottawa agreements, I say that the response is due to the removal of some restrictions which never, at any time, needed to be imposed, under the Ottawa agreements or any others.

Now let us take the fluctuations with regard to wool blankets from Great Britain; let us see how those work out. Prior to September 16, 1930, total duties and taxes amounted to 21¼ per cent. After June 2, 1931, they were 60¾ per cent. After April 7, 1932, they were 100¾ per cent. After October 13, 1932, they were 77¾ per cent. After March 22, 1933, they were 64¼ per cent, and after September 20, 1933, they totalled 52 per cent. It is observable again that during 1932 the total duties and taxes were higher than they had been at any other time, and the inevitable result was a period of acute depression.

Before I leave that point let me just direct attention to the difference in the total duties and taxes on wool overcoating fabric as between September 16, 1930, and September 20, 1933. In the former case they totalled 26 per cent; in the latter case they were 67¼ per cent, which represented the lowest point under this administration. Then with regard to wool blankets from Great Britain the total duties and taxes up to September 16, 1930, amounted to 21¼ per cent. After September 20, 1932, the lowest point they reached under this administration, then amounted to 52 per cent. That is the effect of the excessive tariff, in large part, and the way in which the agreements have been administered. As I have said, this is only an indication of what has been true with respect to a very large number of commodities. Consumers and producers in this country have been adversely affected, and that effect has extended to all those engaged in or dependent upon trade in any way.

That covers all I shall attempt to say in detail in connection with specific features. I should like now to mention another reason why we have been opposed to the agreements.

I have said that the Ottawa agreements have made trade negotiations with other countries more difficult. We all know that this government has been trying to effect agreements with other countries. We were told by the Prime Minister a day or two ago that negotiations are to be carried on now with regard to reciprocity; we have hon. gentlemen opposite admitting at last that reciprocal trade with the United States is a desirable and a good thing. At the time of the Ottawa conference, if I am not mistaken, the British delegates were told pretty plainly that if they did not come across in the way this government wished, trade would be speedily turned in the direction of the United States instead of in the direction of Great Britain.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not interrupting, but that is an incorrect statement, and I must at once nail it as being untrue.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am very much obliged to the Prime Minister for so saying, but the impression was pretty general at the time as to what was the basis on which some of the negotiations were effected. The point that I was discussing, however, was the effect of the agreements on negotiations with other countries. I said that hon. gentlemen opposite now are speaking of reciprocity with the United States, and a day or two ago the Prime Minister said negotiations were about to commence. We know, as a matter of fact, that negotiations commenced two years ago; I wonder if the Prime Minister will say I am wrong in that. They have not just commenced.

Mr. BENNETT: I will say that is not a correct statement of what I said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not saying what the Prime Minister—

Mr. BENNETT: I do not desire to interrupt, but the hon. gentleman said I said negotiations were about to begin and they had begun two years ago. If you will read the records you will find that is not correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not say that. I said the Prime Minister had said it was within the last few days negotiations were being begun, and I was saying that there was good reason to believe they had begun two years ago. Does the Prime Minister say that is not correct, and that they were not begun two years ago?

Mr. BENNETT: The Prime Minister will answer the question, since the right hon. gentleman has made a statement which is not according to the record. In June, 1934, which was a little over six months ago, the congress of the United States passed an act which authorized the president to carry out negotiations that are now being carried out.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: 1934?

Mr. BENNETT: Six months ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And this is 1935.

Mr. BENNETT: Six months ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is exactly what I say.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is exactly what I say, that the Prime Minister said negotiations for reciprocity had begun six months ago. That is surely clear.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman must not say that, because I did not say that. Cannot the right hon. gentleman repeat what I said? I did not mention the word "reciprocity;" I said "trade agreement."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My point is not in reference to the particular phrase, whether it be "trade agreement" or "reciprocity." My point is as to when negotiations for better trade arrangements with the United States began, and the Prime Minister —if I have him right at last—has indicated six months ago.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that, even. What is the matter with the right hon. gentleman, that he will persist, not only in this house but outside of it, in changing what I say?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The record is there.

Mr. BENNETT: No, the record is not there. The record as it is made the right hon. gentleman changes—in Hansard, when I am not present, he does it. He proceeds to say what I did not say at all. I said that the president of the United States had no authority until June, 1934. That is what I desire to say—when the act of congress was passed. That is what I desire to make clear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will not take up the time at the moment to discuss with the Prime Minister the question of changes. I say the record in Hansard will show what I am saying now, namely that the Prime Minister has intimated to this house that negotiations with respect to trade arrangements with the United States had taken place within the last six months. I am not trying to misrepresent the Prime Minister. I am trying to say what my understanding of his statement is. I think I am correct in that statement. I say we have it on very good authority that it is not six months ago, but that it is two years ago that these negotiations were going on. We know very well why the negotiations have not succeeded. The reason is that every time there has been an attempt to negotiate with the United States these Ottawa agreements have stood in the way. It has been impossible to make any real agreement or to reach any negotiations —by the way, they have not been reached yet—until it was seen what could be done by way of further modification of these agreements. I will venture to say this, that before this house will see any agreement with the United States we will find further changes in these Ottawa trade pacts which will help to make negotiations possible. I shall name my authority. It is the member of the ministry of my right hon. friend who has been advising the country of what has taken place. I refer to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson) who has just spoken.

Speaking at London, Ontario, on January 28, just three nights ago, he said as reported by the Canadian Press:

Negotiations had been going on between Canada and the United States for two years, the minister told—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:—

—for two years, the minister told the annual meeting of the London Liberal-Conservative Association, and he was convinced there was a wide variety of commodities on which reciprocal preference arrangements could be made.

I am sorry if I used the word "reciprocity" or "reciprocal." That may not have been permissible, but the minister gave me a pretty good lead. I repeat: It is an open secret that the reason an agreement has not been reached before this is the fact that the Ottawa agreements have stood in the way, and they have stood in the way of agreements with other countries. They will continue to stand in the way until those agreements are materially changed.

While I have in my hand the report of the address by the Minister of Trade and Commerce may I read what he said in reference to myself? I quote:

Mr. King had declined to take reciprocal action at that time—

Referring to arrangements with the United States.

—for fear of being provocative, the minister said. "This was the attitude of a traitor."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think I said that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Here it is, in quotation marks.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I deny ever saying that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am pleased the minister denies it, because I must confess I was surprised when I saw it. The dispatch appears in the Montreal Gazette of January 29, and is reported by the Canadian Press. Dated at London, Ontario, January 28, the paragraph reads:

Mr. King had declined to take reciprocal action at that time for fear of being provocative, the minister said.

And then in quotation marks:

"This was the attitude of a traitor."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I deny the use of that language.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am pleased to have the minister state he did not use that language, and I accept his statement. I must confess I was a little suprised when I saw it coming from him, especially after the words of greeting and good wishes I had extended to him in his new office only a few days previously.

I shall leave the question of the effect the trade agreements have had upon negotiations with other countries, but I wish to point out that is another reason why we cannot accept the Ottawa agreements in the form in which they stand.

One of the other main objections to the agreement—and this is another fundamental objection—is that they restrict the fiscal freedom of this parliament. That is a fundamental reason for our objection to them. As long as agreements exist which deprive this House of Commons of its freedom to deal with our fiscal policy as we think best, and as the people of the country consider best, so long will any such agreements not meet the wishes and opinions of hon. gentlemen on this side of the house. Agreements can be and in the past have been drawn which leave parliament perfectly free in the matter of the alteration of the tariff. But as hon. members are well aware these Ottawa agreements peg the tariff at a certain figure, with respect to a large number of items.

When a government seeks to bind parliament for a period of years to a certain tariff it is imposing a tax over the period of time for which that agreement stands. A government so long as it is in office may if it wishes enter into a contract, and having made the contract is in duty bound to stand by it, but it cannot bind its sucessors with respect to their rights in the matter of taxation. No government worthy of being described as a British government, in the true sense, has ever attempted to do anything of the kind. On behalf of the Liberal party I have taken very strong exception to those features of the Ottawa tariff agreement, not merely to the feature which with respect to some commodities pegged the tariff at a particular height but also to the feature which bound us for a period of years to maintain certain rates of tariff. I have said that was alienating the authority and control of parliament over fiscal policy, over taxation, over tariff, and that the Liberal party would not support a principle of the kind. I do not think it was a necessary course to follow, but it has been done, and has been done in order to rivet protection on this country, whether or not a government may be returned to power by a people who have been aroused in their indignation against the excessive protection to which they have been subjected. That feature of these agreements cannot be permitted to remain as it is if another Liberal administration comes into office. The fiscal freedom of this parliament will have to be restored, and I do not think that any British government will take exception to an attitude of the kind. I say that because the British government have admitted that such is the right of any political party with respect to agreements to which they have not been parties.

The Prime Minister said when I mentioned this subject before: "What about the agreement your government entered into with the West Indies? What about the agreement you entered into with France"? I think I pointed out that there is a great difference between an agreement which lessens taxation and lowers tariffs and one which raises both. May I point out this further fact? There is a great difference between an agreement to which all parties in the house at the time it is presented to the house for acceptance are agreed, and an agreement to which exception is taken from the moment of its introduction. There is a difference between an agreement entered into with the West Indies or with France that met with no opposition from the opposition of the day, and these Ottawa agreements. All parties in the house supported the agreement with the West Indies and with France, and as such all were under an obligation to maintain them when they were in office. There may have been a discussion of features of them, but as for a division on them I do not recall any. But, at any rate, if there has been opposition to any agreement the position we take on this side is that the party that has opposed that agreement is at perfect liberty, when it comes into office, to alter that agreement if it so desires, having made its position one of record. But that is a very different position from that which hon. gentlemen opposite are taking with respect to these Ottawa agreements, it is that they must be maintained regardless altogether of the heights to which they have raised tariffs and taxation and the time for which they bind the country. I made the position of the Liberal party on that matter very clear at the time the agreements themselves were being discussed.

Here I wish to draw attention to what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said in the course of his remarks to-night, namely, that I had at a recent meeting of the National Liberal Federation completely changed my attitude with respect to the Ottawa agreements. I have changed nothing in any particular with respect to my attitude toward the Ottawa agreements from the time of their introduction and as I have presented my opposition to them ever since. My attitude remains to-day what it was at the beginning; what I then stated in the house was the attitude which I took towards them. It was stated specifically with regard to this feature in particular, namely, the question of the binding nature of these agreements as they would be viewed by the Liberal party if it came into office.

I know hon. gentlemen opposite have been saying all over the country: Mr. King has said that if he was returned to power he would cancel the agreements. I have said nothing of the kind.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Some hon. gentlemen say, "oh, oh," but I challenge them to show me where I have. I ask them to point to a single instance in which I have made any statement of the kind. I have never at any time, either in this House of Commons or speaking on a public platform, said that if the Liberal party came into office they would immediately cancel these agreements. I have said in this house very clearly that if we came into office there were certain features we would wish to change, and we would reserve the right to cancel the agreements if we wished. But to reserve the right to take a certain step is very different from saying that we would cancel the agreements. May I make clear exactly what I did say? —for I have the record from Hansard here. If hon. members will look at Hansard of November 7, 1932, page 963, they will find that what I said was this:

> I wish to say that I think the parliament of Canada should be free at all times to alter its tariff in any respect that it desires, and that we should not bind ourselves to maintain a certain tariff rate, even if it is fixed only so as to continue a margin of preference; but subsequent parliaments or the same parliament, at subsequent sessions, should at all times be free to alter rates of duty in any and every particular.

That is the statement that I made at the time with respect to these agreements. It is the statement which I adhere to at the present time, and it is going to be the position of the Liberal party so long as I am honoured with its confidence in the matter of its leadership.

May I give another quotation which will make it perfectly clear what was in my mind at the time I was speaking, and has been in my mind all along. It will be found at page 1049 of Hansard of November 8, 1932, and it was apropos the statement which was made by the government at the time these agreements were brought in, namely, that they were ironclad agreements. We were told at the outset that we had to support them as they stood, that we could not make a change in any item. That is why we opposed them so strongly at the outset. We were asked to accept the whole of them without a change, and to do a thing that was not done in the British parliament, namely, to accept the agreements and change the tariff by those agreements before the tariff itself had first been altered after consideration by this house in committee of the whole. We took our stand very definitely. I pointed out that in Great Britain the British government dealt very differently with the House of Commons. The British government did not seek to maintain that it was the duty of an opposition that was opposed to the agreements to continue the agreements indefinitely and without any change when they came into power. What the British government said emphatically was that the obligation was upon the party that made the agreement to continue it as long as it remained in office, but that a party that had opposed it had always the freedom to make any change it might wish in regard to a matter which was contrary to its principles. Here is what I said at page 1049 of Hansard of November 8, 1932:

> May I say to the Prime Minister that I cannot understand why he or his colleague, the Minister of Finance, cannot be just as frank with this House of Commons as the Chancellor of Exchequer and the Financial Secretary in England were with the British House of Commons. The statement was made quite frankly in England that, so far as the government of the day in that country having been a party to the making of it they will feel themselves in honour bound to carry out the agreement. They have said, however, and have made it quite clear, that the House of Commons is free at all times to change duties if it so wishes, and that it cannot be bound legally or constitutionally to maintain any tariff or tariffs of any particular level. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer in England says that Great Britain is bound for five years only in that sense, I say the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance should declare to this house that we are bound only to the same extent as Great Britain is. This parliament is perfectly free at all times to alter any duties that it may think it advisable to alter. As I repeatedly have said, if any time we should be in office and decide that it is desirable in the interests of the country, and in accordance with the wish of the people of this country, that tariff schedules should be changed, we shall consider ourselves free as those who believe in freedom in the matter of fiscal policy, to make such changes in the tariff of this country as we may think necessary. I want to make that very clear, so that there may be no mistake about it now or at any time in the future.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

That was the position that I took. I reserved to this party, should we come into office—and I was making the reservation clear at the beginning—the right to alter any feature of these agreements that we might think desirable. We were not binding ourselves to accept the agreement in the form in which it was drafted but reserved to ourselves the right to make such changes as we wished.

I want to make perfectly clear, Mr. Speaker, what I said at the meeting of the National Liberal Federation, and it indicates what I had in mind at the time I made those statements. If the Liberal administration should be returned to power in the next general election and we have to consider the matter of these tariffs, I do not propose to act towards Great Britain in the manner in which the Prime Minister of Canada acted when he came into office. I do not propose to go to any conference or to any meeting of ministers in England, or to have any ministers of the crown that may be in the cabinet of the day go to any gathering in England and threaten and bully the British people with regard to what is a matter of their concern, when I am trying to make an agreement that will be of mutual benefit to both sides of the empire. I would deal with the British government as I would expect English gentlemen would deal with Canadian ministers of the crown in matters of this kind. I would indicate that so far as these agreements are concerned there are features that are not satisfactory to the Liberal party in Canada; that we should like these objectionable features to be altered, and that we believe the agreements as they stand are not approved by the people of Canada. The fact that we would be in office would be an evidence that they were not approved, and therefore we would wish to negotiate a modification of the agreements in certain particulars. If we could get a modification of the agreements in a manner that would serve the interests of this country and be mutually beneficial, then the agreements as modified would be continued for the period for which they have been drawn. If we could not get these modifications, if we could not get the obvious changes in the agreements which we believe the Canadian people wish to have made, then we would reserve to ourselves the right to say whether we would forthwith cancel these agreements in whole or in part or whether we would allow them to run for the remainder of the time and not carry them on for a further period.

I am making no threats; I am simply indicating the position which I believe is the sound one for any administration to take.

And may I say that if a Liberal administration should be returned to office one of the very first things that would be done would be to get into communication with the British government with respect to what we believe to be necessary modifications in the agreements, on the understanding that there are certain features relating to the tariff which we would wish to have changed in this country, pointing out particularly that we desire to have the fiscal freedom of this parliament maintained. And, as I have said, if as a result of the negotiations we could bring the agreements into conformity with the will and wishes of the people of the country, then, as modified, they would be continued. But if we could not effect a change of that kind then it would be time to decide what further step might be necessary with respect to them.

That is the position I have taken from the start and it is the position which I take now and shall continue to take for the time it may be necessary to speak in public further on these matters. I have every reason in making that statement to believe that the British government will welcome opportunities to modify these agreements. I believe that in all parts of the empire there is a very keen desire to have the agreements quite materially changed. Let me direct the attention of hon. members to what has appeared within the last few days in a despatch to Ottawa as the result of a visit of Premier MacDonald's son to Australia and what he said on his return. I quote from the Montreal Star of January 24 the following:

> London, January 24—(C.P. Cable).—Reports last night indicate that Malcolm MacDonald, British Under-Secretary of State, may urge modification of the intra-empire trade agreements reached at Ottawa in 1932, following a visit to Australia. Mr. MacDonald, son of the premier, returned from Australia last night following informal talks regarding the trade agreements and completion of a report on emigration. The only source of information, which came from competent circles, said that the under-secretary had become convinced of the necessity for changes during unofficial talks with Australian business and political leaders.

Now everyone knows how these agreements are viewed in Australia. I wonder whether hon. gentlemen have seen a petition presented recently in the House of Lords from western Australia praying to be permitted to withdraw altogether from the Australian commonwealth in consequence of the manner in which the agrarian interests of Australia have suffered from these agreements. In December last a delegation went from western Australia to Britain to present a petition to the British parliament, and it was tabled in the House of Lords on December 18, praying for legislation by the British parliament which would restore western Australia to its former status as a separate and distinct self governing colony in the British empire. What reason did they give, among other things? Let me quote from the petition:

> In consequence of the burden of the federal tariff the economic structure of western Australia has already become seriously jeopardized and with the continuance of such burden the state of Western Australia, the primary producers, and the people of that state are faced inevitably with national bankruptcy and ruin.
> The only effective means whereby the people and the state of Western Australia can be relieved from the said burden, and the said wrong can be removed, is the withdrawal of the people of the state of Western Australia from the Commonwealth of Australia and the restoration of Western Australia to its former status as a separate and distinct self-governing colony in the British Empire.

I have nothing to say regarding the effect of the presentation of that petition; I merely direct attention to the effect which has been produced in Australia as a result of high tariffs which have served possibly certain protected interests but which have made the lot of the agrarian classes in that country such that they would prefer to withdraw altogether from the Australian commonwealth. And now may I ask hon. gentlemen whether they think tariff agreements that bring about that kind of sectional difference in a country help either the country or the British empire.

Mr. BENNETT: It has no reference to the Ottawa agreements.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But tariffs are fixed by the agreements.

Mr. BENNETT: Not at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They relate to the tariffs. But I leave Australia and come to Canada, and I say that the way in which my right hon. friend has raised the tariffs in this country, and what he has done under the Ottawa agreements, has gone further in helping to create sectional differences in this country than anything that has happened in many a day past. We have at the present time the maritime provinces drawing attention to the manner in which their rights are being affected as a result of the economic conditions arising from tariff matters, and we have western Canada in a similar position. My right hon. friend knows very well that while these tariffs may serve the interests of a few privileged groups here and there, so far as the great primary producers are concerned they suffer very considerably under them.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman said a few moments ago that he trusted that I would direct his attention to any misstatements. May I point out that both these commissions are sitting under arrangements made originally by the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That may be so, but they are dealing with conditions that have come about under the administration of my right hon. friend, and they are pretty emphatic in what they have to say touching these matters.

I will conclude with this word. My right hon. friend has said that there is an impression in England that has been created there against these Ottawa agreements which is affecting some of those traders who are seeking to further their business interests in London. I think he intimated that there were certain of them who were representing, or had represented that what the Liberal party had been saying about the agreements in Canada was perhaps correct, and that the British people had formed the impression that possibly after all these agreements were not so popular in Canada. May I say to my right hon. friend that the impression that has been created in Britain with regard to these agreements began first of all when Englishmen were here as delegates during the period of the negotiations. That was the first impression. But the impression that has been deepest of all has been that created by the by-elections in this country which have taken place since the agreements went into effect; and if the Ottawa agreements are to-day regarded in England as not being popular in Canada it is because the British government and the British people have recognized that every by-election that has been fought on them since the agreements went into force has resulted in a victory for those who oppose them.

Mr. J. H. MYERS (Queens): I have listened with more than the usual amount of interest to the discussion which has taken place to-day on this all-important resolution moved by the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough (Mr. Harris). It is not necessary to read the resolution; it states simply that the result of the Ottawa trade agreements merits the approval of this house. The resolution might very well have gone a little further than that; it might have said that it merited the approval of the people and especially of the farmers of the Dominion of Canada. My chief reason for taking part in this debate is the fact that while these agreements have perhaps been more beneficial to the farmers of the dominion than to anybody else, not a single farmer in this chamber has to-day been bold enough to raise his voice in defence of them. I hope however before this debate concludes that we shall hear from farmers on both sides of the house because I would at least express the hope that among hon. gentlemen opposite there are some farmers who have a proper sense of justice and can see what a benefit these agreements have been to the farming industry of Canada.

I was particularly amused to-night, more so perhaps than on previous occasions when he has spoken, at the speech of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). His speeches always amuse me; they are in themselves so contradictory, but he excelled himself to-night in the contradictions that were contained in his address.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. MYERS: If the hon. member followed his leader's address as closely as I did, this would be very apparent to him. It was so apparent to me that I was forced to the conclusion that the leader of the opposition is in himself a huge contradiction. He went on to tell us how as a result of the Ottawa agreements trade in Canada had shrunk; that merchants, traders and business men throughout the country by reason of the changes in the tariff—and he was speaking of the Ottawa agreements—were refusing or neglecting or fearful to enter into business contracts in the ordinary business way. Further, he went on to prove what a loss the agreements had caused to the railways and shipping, the carrying trades of the dominion. This evening the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson) showed us, so clearly that anyone, the dullest, could understand, figures to prove the increase in trade that had taken place by reason of the Ottawa agreements between Canada and the other British dominions. The leader of the opposition, in an effort to contradict the minister, while admitting that the figures given by the minister were quite correct—he did not attempt to deny them—quoted an elaborate table of figures to show that the trade and commerce of Canada with other countries, and particularly with the United States, had increased by leaps and bounds, especially within the last twelve months. That in itself was, to my mind, a huge contradiction.

We know now just where the leader of the opposition stands. He went over to the old country this year to try to get his ear to the ground and to find out how the people there felt regarding these agreements. If I remember rightly, from a reading of the newspapers after he returned I would gather that he was still opposed to the Ottawa agreements; that the people of the old country were opposed to them, and that he intended to carry on his opposition. Later on in the fall of the year when he met his supporters in conference in this city to talk over some organization matters and their tactics with reference to the present session of parliament, he apparently had modified his views, and I was led to believe, at least by press reports, that he was now in accord with the Ottawa trade agreements. However, I always doubted that. I remember very well the long drawn out debates on this question during the session of 1932 when we met here to ratify the agreements. I remember very well the undying, persistent opposition that these trade agreements met with at the hands of the leader of the opposition. So when I read in the newspapers that he was coming round and beginning to favour the agreements, I always had my doubts in the matter. My doubts however are completely swept away to-night. So far as I am concerned, the leader of the opposition to-night is just where he was in 1932. He is heartily opposed to the Ottawa agreements. He seems to be opposed to the farmers of this dominion being given a fair chance at all with reference to their own business.

Then he goes on to tell us what the Liberal party will do when, as he says, it is returned to power, which heaven forbid! I have my doubts whether the intelligent electrrate of Canada will again place their business affairs in the hands of the leader of the opposition. But he waxes very eloquent when he says with reference to these agreements: "When we are returned to power we will reserve the right to change, modify or, if we see fit, to cancel the Ottawa agreements." If by any chance the leader of the opposition should succeed in coming back to power he would not need to reserve the right to do anything with reference to these or any other agreements; the majority that he would then have in parliament would give him the right without any reservations whatever.

The leader of the opposition also referred to something else. He was speaking, I think, in connection with the dissension that is now apparent between the two sections of Australia. Well, I have read a good deal about that and so far as I have been able to gather I have never understood that the desire on the part of western Australia to draw away from the rest of the Australian commonwealth had anything to do with the Ottawa trade agreements, or, in fact, with the fiscal policy of Australia. As I have read, it is purely a matter of distance between the two sections of Australia, which are very widely separated. Of course the Prime Minister checked him up on that and he dropped it quickly. Then the hon. gentleman went on to speak of some dissensions that were now taking place in Canada. He mentioned a royal commission that is sitting to adjudicate upon or to try to harmonize the differences existing between the maritime provinces and the dominion. Let me say that that commission is necessitated by reason of the fact that the leader of the opposition failed miserably when his party was in power to implement the findings of the Duncan commission appointed by them to settle the differences between the maritime provinces and the rest of the dominion. We in the maritime provinces had to wait nine years, until the Conservative party came into power, before we succeeded in getting our rights in this regard. The present government and the present Prime Minister gave us this royal commission to settle these claims.

Now as a farmer—and I assume I have as much right to speak from the standpoint of a farmer as any other hon. member in this chamber; my right in that regard has never been challenged—let me say a word with reference to the British preference. The British preference is an old question in Canada. I believe it was first put on the statute books by Sir Wilfrid Laurier's government many years ago. It is possible that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had a different idea regarding the British preference from that which obtained later. As a farmer I have given a good deal of thought and study to this question. I do not believe that there is a man in this chamber to-night who holds stronger views with reference to Great Britain and the ties that bind Canada to the British empire than I do. I am a Britisher first, last and always. Yet I like fair play even from my friends. To my mind the situation is this; under the British preference British manufacturers were allowed to send manufactured goods into Canada. I was very glad to welcome that; I would say nothing against it. But when we sought to send the products of Canadian farms into Great Britain, what preference did we get? Absolutely none. It is true that our butter and eggs, bacon and beef, entered the British market free, but so did similar products from Denmark, Holland and other European countries. And these countries were hundreds of miles distant from the markets of Great Britain but we were thousands of miles. So we were handicapped by freight rates, a handicap that we could not overcome. to-day when we enjoy a preference of ten per cent on these products entering the British market we are still only about on a par with the other countries to which I have referred, when transportation charges are taken into consideration. Let me tell the leader of the opposition that if he should come back into power and should attempt to do away with the ten per cent preference that the farmers of Canada now enjoy, he would meet with the resentment and opposition of the farmers of Canada.

Speaking of trade agreements, I do not know whether hon. members on the other side are frightened of the word "reciprocity." I am not, and I do not know why the Liberal party should be.

Some hon. MEMBERS: We are not.

Mr. MYERS: They had a lot to do with reciprocity in 1911. I believe it is an admitted fact that the Liberal electors of Canada rejected reciprocity—

Mr. SANDERSON: Did the Conservatives vote for it?

Mr. MYERS: No, there was no reason why we should. But there were not enough of us to affect it one way or the other; you know that as well as I do. From 1896 down through 1900, 1904 and 1908, there were too many Grits in Canada for us; there were not enough Tories to affect the thing either way.

Mr. SANDERSON: There will not be many left after the next election.

Mr. MYERS: When the electors finally were offered the reciprocity pact of 1911 it was by the Liberal electors that that treaty was defeated. Let us take into consideration the question of trade agreements with the United States. I shall welcome any good, sensible trade agreement with the United States, absolutely. But at the same time I can see great difficulties. It is true that in June last the president of the United States was given power by congress to negotiate agreements with other countries, Canada included, but so far as I can understand the thought and sentiment with reference to trade matters in the United States they have not undergone any change of heart. The farmer in the United States is just as jealous of a home market for his own farm products as he was in 1930 when the Hawley-Smoot tariff was put into effect to protect him. We must be fair about these things; we cannot blame the United States farmers for that. It is the duty of the American government to protect the American farmer. It is the duty of this government, so far as it reasonably can, to protect the Canadian farmer. And why not? I have often heard the statement made that the United States is our natural market. I believe if I were to ask anyone here to-night why the United States is our natural market the only reply would be, because it is our nearest market. Let us examine that for a moment. At home on my farm there is just a line fence separating me from my neighbours on each side. They are my nearest market. But what is the use of trying to sell a horse to my neighbour on one side if he already has as many horses as he needs? What is the use of trying to sell a cow to my neighbour on the other side if he has cattle of his own to dispose of? That is pretty much the situation that obtains between Canada and the United States. Can any hon. member name anything that we produce on Canadian farms that is not produced equally well and often in greater volume on the farms of the United States? You can go on down the line and include live stock, field crops or anything you care to mention. There is one exception, however, and perhaps I may be pardoned for naming it. In the province of Prince Edward Island we grow turnips that are not equalled in any other country of the world; that goes without saying. With that exception, however, the farmers of the United States produce practically every crop that we produce in Canada, and in addition they produce several crops which I could mention that are not produced in Canada at all. Corn was mentioned to-night, and let me tell my hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) that it is not necessary to feed corn to hogs. I have fed a great many hogs in my lifetime, and I never fed them corn. I see no valid reason why we should allow United States corn to come on the markets of Canada in any great volume, in order to displace feeds grown here that are just as good. Our own Canadian barley and oats are just as good as corn. Someone says they are better, and that is a fact. I suppose the hon. member for Sherbrooke is hardly aware of the fact that the Canadian hog makes much superior bacon than the United States hog, which is always referred to as the soft, flabby, corn-fed hog.

I was saying that in addition to producing all the crops that are produced in Canada the farmers of the United States produce other crops that are not grown here at all. Only a limited quantity of corn is grown in Canada, chiefly for ensilage purposes, while corn is one of the major crops of the United States. Cotton is not grown in Canada at all, but it is the chief crop of the southern United States. In any trade agreement that may be made between Canada and the United States there should be a swap-off. It is true that they require certain commodities at certain seasons of the year, and certain other commodities at all times, that are produced in Canada, but on the other hand there are certain things which we require from them, even among farm products. In connection with these commodities we might have a reciprocal agreement which would work to the advantage of both nations. A matter of that kind must be worked out in a sensible, logical, levelheaded way, rather than as the former government tried to work it out. After years of quietly hushing things up, with the fear that they might offend the United States; after coaxing for years for the opportunity of getting into that market, which did not want and did not need our products, they turned around and threw a brick through the parlour window of the White House at Washington. On that brick was a label called the Dunning budget, which said, "We will build a tariff wall brick for brick with your wall against commodities of a kind produced in Canada coming into this country." That was not a sensible way in which to go about such a matter; there is a much better way.

It is almost eleven o'clock, Mr. Speaker. A great deal more might be said along this line, but as a farmer I just wish to add my voice to what has been said already in support of the Ottawa agreements. Let me assure my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition that if during the next election campaign he tries to lay unholy hands on the first real trade agreements to give protection to the Canadian farmers, he will meet with undying opposition on the part of those farmers.

In conclusion let me say, Mr. Speaker, that as a farmer I appreciate what the Prime Minister has done for the farmers of Canada in bringing about these trade agreements with the mother country.

On motion of Mr. Brown the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.57 p.m.

POWERS OF COMMITTEES

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the select standing committees of this house shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the house and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

INTEREST ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 11, to amend the Interest Act.

Mr. POULIOT: Explain.

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Speaker, the Interest Act as it now stands does not place any limit upon the rate of interest that may be agreed to or that may be collected. Section 1 now reads:

Except as otherwise provided by this or by any other act of the Parliament of Canada, any person may stipulate for, allow and exact, on any contract or agreement whatsoever, any rate of interest or discount which is agreed upon.

The bill which I am introducing proposes to place a limit of seven per cent per annum upon the rate of interest that may be charged and collected. It also contains another provision which would limit the rate of interest which might be collected on mortgages on real estate to four per cent per annum.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

THE KING'S SILVER JUBILEE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it desirable that I should read a short statement to the house in connection with the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the king's accession to the throne:

As announced in the speech from the throne, Canada will join with the rest of the empire in celebrating on May 6th next the 25th anniversary of the king's accession to the throne. In accordance with His Majesty's expressed wish that all unnecessary expenditure should be avoided and that celebrations should be local, the government will not initiate any great national celebration.

It is proposed that the day will be celebrated as a public holiday throughout the dominion, and that a salute shall be fired at Ottawa and at all provincial capitals.

The government will announce a program of proceedings to take place in Ottawa on Parliament Hill on the morning of May 6th, which will enable members of representative national and local patriotic organizations, school children and the public to join in commemorating the king's silver jubilee. His Excellency the Governor General will attend, and will present His Majesty's silver jubilee medals to those of our fellow-citizens in Ottawa, to whom they are awarded.

The lieutenant-governors of the several provinces will be invited to carry out in the provincial capitals programs similar to that which will be adopted at Ottawa. Mayors and reeves of civic and municipal centres, other than Ottawa and the provincial capitals, will be invited to organize local celebrations on similar lines.

Members of the defence forces will be free to participate in any functions arranged by local authorities.

As a special act of thanksgiving on the part of the people of Canada on the occasion of this anniversary, His Excellency the Governor General, on March 1st, will initiate an appeal for the establishment of a permanent fund, to be known, by His Majesty's gracious permission, as the "King George V. Silver Jubilee Cancer Fund for Canada." An opportunity will thus be afforded to every household that is able and willing to contribute to participate in providing a permanent Canadian fund which will promote the welfare of our people in memory of this great historic occasion in the history of the British empire.

In due course it is proposed that both houses of parliament shall submit a loyal address to His Majesty the King.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS ASSEMBLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): With reference to the statement made by the Prime Minister on January 29, 1935, Hansard, page 310, to the effect that the report made by the Canadian delegates to the fifteenth assembly of the League of Nations had been laid on the table of the house, in English and in French, a few days before, may I call the attention of the government to the fact that, on applying for a copy of the report in French from the distribution office, I found that it was not available. I would ask therefore when the French copies of the report will be available.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall inquire at the distribution office; I cannot answer the question now.

TIM BUCK'S OTTAWA MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): May I ask the Minister of Justice whether any instructions have been issued to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to prevent Mr. Tim Buck from speaking in the city of Ottawa?

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): The matter has never been brought to my attention. No instructions have been issued and no discussion whatever has taken place in regard to it.

POTATO GRADING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): Can the Minister of Agriculture provide me with a copy of the regulations regarding the grading of potatoes in the maritime provinces and in Ontario?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): I shall be glad to.

PRECIOUS METALS MARKING ACT

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Precious Metals Marking Act, 1928.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

On section 1—"Mount."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps I should give a brief explanation of the bill. The amending bill and the statute of 1928 itself are designed, first, to protect the buying public in their purchases of articles made of precious metals and, secondly, to protect the dealer and manufacturer. The amendments proposed are minor in character and few in number and should not long detain the attention of the house. The measure itself has been submitted to the manufacturing and retail trades and they have practically unanimously agreed to its terms.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

On section 5—Certificate of master or assayer of royal mint to be evidence of facts stated in certificate.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Has any application ever been made that a referee be allowed under this section? What I mean by referee is this. Wherever assays are made settling any dispute, it has been the custom to have more than one assayer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not understand that such is the case. I would direct the hon. member's attention to section 18 of the act, which provides in effect that the certificate of the assayer shall be final as a matter of evidence. We must have some way of proving the assay, and in all matters where that sort of thing is done in government offices, where analyses are made, in dealing with that class of evidence or testimony the certificate of the government officer is final and conclusive. I have in mind many of the acts relating to temperance, particularly the old Canada Temperance Act, under which I operated for a great many years, as I have no doubt hon. members who were practising at the bar in the old days also did. You could not proceed otherwise, and it has never been suggested as far as I know that there should be a referee. What is sought here is to meet a difficulty which is arising in connection with the act by reason of court litigation.

Mr. CAMPBELL: What I mean by a referee is this. When disputes arise in connection with assays, even although the assays are made very carefully, many times, when another assayer makes an assay by the same method, it is found that there is a slight difference which is apt to cause trouble. That difficulty is usually met, in settlements in connection with the sale of minerals or metals, by what is known in the mining or metallurgical industry as a referee. I am not suggesting the appointment of a referee, but provision that another assayer may come in.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The matter has not been called to my attention. If that principle is feasible, we have in Ottawa the royal mint and their assay should be final. On the broad principle, I should say that for purposes of prosecution under this act the certificate of the government official should prima facie be final in every case. I do not think there is any reason why we should depart from the practice that has heretofore obtained.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That, it is expedient to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act to facilitate and increase the extension of credit to farmers, to authorize the Minister of Finance to purchase additional bonds issued by the board and guaranteed by the government, and to amend the provisions relating to the constitution of the board, the purchase of capital stock, the rate of interest, the amount of outstanding bonds, and supplementary advances.

He said: I am in the hands of the house whether it is preferred that I make a general statement at this stage or we go into committee where there would be a wider opportunity for question and answer in case that might be considered advisable.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I suggest to the minister that we should like a statement now, not too extensive, but giving us a clear explanation of what is intended by the bill to be founded on the resolution?

Mr. RHODES: All right. I shall deal only with the general features and the main purposes of the proposed bill, reserving a more detailed discussion to the time when we are in committee on the bill itself.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps the minister might indicate what changes in interest he has in mind?

Mr. RHODES: I shall deal with that question as I pass on.

Perhaps the chief purpose of the bill is to do away with the dual control, the divided responsibility and of necessity, of course, the conflict of interests which it has been found in practice has arisen by reason of the fact that we have had provincial boards and the dominion board working under the old arrangement. Under the bill which will be submitted founded upon this resolution, the provincial boards will be abolished and there will be one dominion farm loan board, provision being made for the appointment of a representative of the board in each province. Further, if it is thought desirable, there will be appointed an advisory board to act with him should occasion demand. I may point out in this connection that apart altogether from the difficulties which are bound to arise through the divided authority, the dual control of which I have spoken, the difficulties of the board in its operation have been increased by reason of the fact that the act heretofore has never operated throughout the whole of Canada. For example, it has never operated in Saskatchewan, nor in Ontario, nor in Prince Edward Island, the operation of the dominion act being dependent, according to the terms of the act itself, upon legislation being passed by each province in turn; and as I have indicated, so far at all events the act has not been availed of by the three provinces named.

The board as at present constituted is composed of four members, one of whom is the Minister of Finance who is the chairman. I can not see that any good purpose will be served by discussing the broader question as to the wisdom of a minister of the crown attempting to preside over a board of this character, but I will say this, that with the demands upon the time of the Minister of Finance it is physically impossible for him to attend to the detailed work of presiding at meetings of the board and dealing with individual instances of loans. It simply cannot be done and as a matter of fact, during the whole period of time in which I have had the honour to occupy the office of Minister of Finance, I have been able to attend only one meeting of the board and that was on an occasion of special significance, having to do with the matter of dealing with general, broad principles. So, under the new bill we are proposing that the board shall consist of not less than three nor more than five, the chairman of which shall be the commissioner of farm loans.

Another important provision is enlarging the amount available by way of loans. It will be recalled that under the original Farm Loan Act of 1927 the dominion was authorized to advance a sum only up to $15,000,000, but in the amending act which was passed at the last session we enlarged the amount available to the board in the sum of $40,000,000 by way of advance from the dominion treasury plus an additional $30,000,000 to be made available to the board by means of a dominion guarantee of the bonds of the farm loan board. That provision is not disturbed but we have enlarged the amount in each case by $10,000,000, making a sum of $90,000,000 altogether available for the board.

The proposed bill does away with the provision calling upon the borrower to subscribe to five per cent of farm loan stock and it follows that it should also do away with the necessity for the province subscribing to five per cent of the farm loan stock. Inasmuch as we have encouraged such investments there are contracts outstanding in virtue of which the provinces have subscribed in the aggregate to between $400,000 and $500,000 of the stock of the board. There is provision in the bill whereby that amount of money be returned to the several provinces that have subscribed.

My hon. friend (Mr. Elliott) has referred to the question of interest. He will recall that in the original set-up of the act it was clearly outlined that the amount of interest to be charged was to be determined by the cost of money to the board. That principle is not disturbed and it will depend entirely upon the going rates from time to time as to the rate which must be charged to the individual borrower. While prior to September last I think it was, perhaps a little later, the dominion charged five per cent to the board for money which had been advanced from the federal treasury, that rate was then reduced to four per cent, and I may say, having regard to the then cost of long-term money, because it must be borne in mind that the bonds of the farm loan board are issued for a period of twenty-two years, four per cent was a fair rate. Since that time there has been a lowering of interest rates and while I cannot anticipate the action of the government with respect to a given time or a given rate, it rather looks to me as if it would be possible for the government to lower that rate to three and a half per cent, but I can only announce in a general way that it is the policy and the desire of the government to make available to the farm loan board money as cheap as it can possibly be advanced.

The question of spread between the cost of money to the board and the price at which money is loaned to the individual farmer is of course another matter. I do not know that it would serve any good purpose for me to go into that now other than to say that it is the opinion of the commissioner, Mr. MacLean, and his associates that to keep the board on a fair actuarial basis there should be added to the cost of the money to the board two per cent to cover cost of administration and a margin of reserve sufficient to build up a fund which could be drawn upon from time to time to absorb the inevitable losses which occur in making loans. I feel however that that can be reduced, but certainly not below one and a half per cent, because the minimum cost of administration will be one per cent, without any margin of safety whatever. It may be borne in mind however, that as the sum of loans made increases the board's overhead will be spread over the larger total and therefore the percentage of administration cost will tend to diminish. But in any case, if we are to keep the board in sound financial condition I do not think we can safely go below a margin of one and a half per cent.

There are a number of minor amendments to the act, merely to make it fit in with these broad general principles, but speaking generally I have covered the main alterations and the general principles of the measure.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the minister give the names of the members of the board at present?

Mr. RHODES: The board at present consists of Doctor J. D. MacLean, Mr. Charles Duquette and the Minister of Finance. There is one vacancy.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (West Middlesex): perhaps I may be pardoned for taking a short time to point out to the minister in charge of the bill and to the Prime Minister and to the other members of the government who are in the house the immense importance of the subject now under consideration to the farmers of this country. Throughout the country everyone is of one mind in regard to the necessity of making the overhead in the basic industries of production as low as possible. Of these basic industries, all of which are important, I submit that no other is so important as that of agriculture, in which more than fifty per cent of the population of the dominion are engaged. I say to the minister very seriously that while the lot of the farmer has not been easy at any time in the history of this country, it has been much easier at some times than at others. For the past number of years the farmer has been experiencing perhaps the greatest difficulties of anybody engaged in any industry.

I should like to point out something as to the way in which the interest rate has worked in regard to farm loans in, say, the last quarter century. I think I have had fairly wide experience in connection with farm loans. Hon. members will bear in mind that, say, thirty years ago, the loan that was most desired by people who were lending money was what was called a gilt-edged farm loan, one in which the amount loaned was not more than fifty per cent of the actual value of the farm, the value for which it was thought at that time it could be sold at almost any kind of a sale. I recall loans being made to farmers thirty years ago for four and a half and four and three-quarters per cent. Five per cent was quite common. Perhaps the best evidence that could be had of how urgent the present problem is and the great difficulties under which the farmer has been labouring in recent years is the fact that those who were formerly anxious to get farm loans, more anxious, as I say, to get loans on farms than on any other security have practically gone out of the farm loan business in recent years. That has made the position very difficult for the man who has had to borrow money to enable him to carry on his farming business. I submit to the minister that no set of people engaged in any occupation in this country have borne a heavier share of the burdens of taxation and the other burdens incident to pioneer life in this country than the farmers. I think this is the time when the government should take a very generous view with regard to the rate of interest that should be charged. It is a fact that many of those who are lending money in recent years have felt that it was only the fair thing to do, in view of the low prices the farmer was getting for what he had to sell, to make reductions in the interest and to make substantial reductions in the principal. I think that has been fairly general in regard to farm loans from one end of the country to the other. I might point out that nothing is more to the advantage of the lender than to have a rate of interest which the farmers can pay. A high rate of interest is absolutely impossible in recent years. It is much better to have a rate of four per cent and have the farmer feel he can pay it than to charge five and a half or six per cent, and in some cases higher rates—

Mr. VALLANCE: Eight per cent.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, but of course eight per cent does not do much good to the lender because he does not get it paid. It is much better to charge four per cent and get it than to charge eight per cent and not get four. That is about the way it works out. The figures the minister has given show that he expects to be able to borrow the money at three and a half per cent. Allowing two per cent for the cost of administration and the losses that must arise in a lending business brings the rate to five and a half per cent, if I understood the minister.

Mr. RHODES: That is at two per cent, but it may be one and a half per cent.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, if it should be one and a half per cent the rate will still be five per cent. What I wish to point out to the minister and the government is that at the present time five per cent is altogether out of proportion to the prices the farmer is getting for the product from which he has to pay that interest. I should like to make a few comparisons as to what four per cent means to the farmer to-day with what six and a half per cent meant when this act was first put into force, what five and a half per cent meant later on, and what either five and a half or five per cent would mean to-day. May I direct attention to the following figures, which show the relationship of the prices of farm products and manufactured goods in the years from 1927 to 1934 to the prices in 1926. Take 1926 prices as represented by 100:

	Farm Products %	Manufactured Goods %
1926..	100.0	100.0
1927..	102.1	96.5
1928..	100.7	95.0
1929..	100.8	93.0
1930..	82.3	87.3
1931..	56.3	74.8
1932..	48.4	69.8
1933..	51.0	70.2
December 1934.	61.6	72.7

I point out this fact to the minister and the other members of the government in order to show that for what he buys to-day the farmer pays a much higher rate than he receives for what he has to sell. I point it out also in order to show that to-day four per cent is as high a rate as he can possibly pay. It is equal to a rate of six per cent or six and a half per cent in 1927, judged by what the farmer received at that time.

What is the reason for this situation? I ask hon. members if any one has any doubt at all as to the reason why farmers cannot get loans on their properties to-day except through farm loan boards or organizations of that kind. The reason is not that farmers are less thrifty or less industrious than they were fifteen, twenty or twenty-five years ago. It is that the overhead has become so high and the prices for farm products so low, that it is practically impossible to pay taxes and make ends meet on the ordinary farm to-day, even with the farmer and his family working without wages at all. We talk about minimum wages, unemployment insurance, short hours of labour and all the rest of it. These are all admirable in their own place. No doubt they are necessary in the life of a country developing as Canada is, but I should like to point out that the farmer and his wife and family have no minimum hours of labour or minimum wages. As everyone who knows anything about farm life in this country is aware, they work long hours, depriving themselves of most of the luxuries and many of the absolute necessities of life, and at the end of the year they find themselves in many cases unable to pay their taxes. In other cases they are able to pay part of the interest on the mortgage, but during the last few years it has been very seldom that they have found themselves able to pay any principal.

I am in perhaps as good a position as anyone in this house to know just what difficulties have been encountered by the farmers in the last few years. Those who have not been so enterprising as some of their neighbours have fared perhaps better. The man who in 1925, 1926, 1927 or 1928 had enough faith in himself and in his wife and family to buy an additional farm and place a mortgage on it, to-day finds himself not only unable to pay any of the principal on that mortgage but has to exert himself to the utmost to pay the taxes on the two farms. In many cases I know of excellent families, descendants of pioneer stock, who for three or four generations have not known what it was to be sued, who are being driven off not only the second farm but also off the old home farm because of their inability to keep up payments on the mortgage.

I realize the difficulty in balancing the budget; I realize that this is perhaps the most difficult time we have ever had in Canada in that regard, but I do want to urge upon the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and the other members of the government that something must be done if you wish to keep the people on the farms to-day instead of having them move, as many of them have moved in the last few years after their mortgages have been foreclosed, off the farms into the cities, where they swell the bread lines and increase the number of unemployed. If the people are to be kept on the farms you must bring down the rate of interest to at least four per cent. They cannot pay any more. I do not think that will be denied by anyone who is familiar with farm life. If at four per cent there is to be a loss I think at this time the government should bear that loss in the interests of the struggling farmers from one end of this country to the other.

What has taken place in regard to the interest paid on bank deposits? Within the last year the interest on savings bank deposits has been reduced from three per cent to two per cent, a reduction of one-third the former figure or one-half the present amount. The loans that are being floated both by this government and by the Ontario government do not cost nearly as much as they did a few years ago, and of course on short time loans the rate is very much better. I believe that with the utmost care in selecting the persons to whom loans are made the rate can be brought down to the figure I have mentioned. I do not believe any government could grant all the applications that might be made; I think that would be suicidal.

The loans must be kept within reasonable bounds, and the amounts must be such that the farmers can expect to repay, because after all the government do not want a lot of farms on their hands. If they are forced to take over some of these farms they will realize some of the hardships the farms have had to endure in the past few years. I know of one man in a neighbouring county to the one in which I live who was very well off, with a number of mortgages on different farms. I do not know who advised him to do so, but he foreclosed those mortgages when the interest and some of the principal was not paid. As a result that man has had ten or eleven farms on his hands for the last year or two. He was badly enough off before but he is completely bankrupt at the present time. You cannot get anyone to work a farm now at any reasonable rate of rent. As a matter of fact a good many farms throughout the province of Ontario are being rented for taxes at the present time. I expect to have an opportunity later on to say something, but before the bill is introduced I should like to urge upon the minister with all the power at my command, that this matter is most vital to Canada's greatest industry and to the welfare of the Canadian people as a whole. There is not much more that I desire to say now.

We talk about the cost of overhead. No person who knows anything about farming conditions will argue that to-day overhead is not very much greater than it was a few years ago. No one who understands the difficulties with which the farmer who has a mortgage on his farm has to contend will argue that interest is not overhead. Unless we can decrease substantially the overhead to which I have referred we will find many good farms abandoned by some of our very best farmers. That may not be a very bright picture, but it is the truth, and I can see no object in concealing it.

As I understand the situation the government of the province of Ontario believes that at current borrowing rates they can afford to loan money to the farmers at the rate of four per cent; I hope they can.

During the years to which I have referred I placed loans in the district in which I was practising to the extent of many hundreds of thousands of dollars. Those loans were made on only what we call gilt edged security. I believe I reflect the views of the people who loaned the money when I say that during those years even with the low rate of interest a few hundred dollars would pay all the losses that occurred. That has not been the case in recent years.

Perhaps I could not say what I wish to say better than by repeating something I said to the house on a former occasion respecting the plight in which the Canadian farmers now find themselves. Speaking in this house on April 14, 1932, I used words which I believe would apply with equal force to-day and will indicate conditions now existing:

During the last six months more of the best farmers that live in this dominion have come to me and told me that they did not know how in the world they were going to get the money to pay their taxes, than in all the rest of the time I have known them. Many who five or six years ago were among the best, most prosperous and enterprising farmers in that community, are to-day on the verge of bankruptcy because the man who was enterprising and courageous four or five years ago perhaps—bought another farm for his boy or built a barn or got himself into debt.

Increased his indebtedness and increased his mortgages.

There is one thing which has not come down in price in this country, Mr. Speaker, and that is the rate of interest which people have to pay on the money they borrowed some years ago or have to borrow to-day. I know something about the way interest works, and I know that it accumulates to-day just as it did when times were prosperous...

Many of our farmers to-day are not only unable to pay off any principal, but they are also unable to meet the interest and many of them are not able to pay even taxes on their farms.

Before the bill is introduced I am going to ask the Minister of Finance to consider what the cost has been in connection with good loans which have been made by the board in the past, and to ascertain whether or not it will be possible to make a provision by which the farmers of Canada would be assured of money at a rate not over four per cent. If times improve toward anything like the point they reached in the good period, when the farmers were receiving high prices for their products, I think some provision could be made in the act to bring about a closer relationship between the interest the farmer has to pay on his loans from the government and the prices he receives for his products. However, while prices the farmers receive are as low as they are to-day, it would be utterly impossible to pay a rate higher than the rate I have stated. Further, I believe money could and ought to be borrowed at a rate lower than that mentioned by the minister. I know that a very excellent rate has been obtained on some short loans.

Perhaps I may be permitted to record some figures which obtained in the province of Ontario on January 7. There was one issue in connection with the Hydro where the rate was 2·95 per cent on a $10,000,000 loan. On August 27, 1934, there was an issue of $37,000,000 at 2½ per cent, yielding 2·6, 2·7, 2·8, 2·9 and 2·95. On October 15, last, a very short term loan one due in two years, was made at the rate of 2 per cent. Another was made at 2½ per cent, due in five years. I have given these figures to indicate that the rate of interest is to-day very much lower than it has been. Of course, the Minister of Finance must know more than I do about these matters. I do know however that the rate of interest on savings deposits is much lower than it was. I should like to make the further suggestion that the payments on the loans should be received at any time the farmer has the money to pay. Money is always worth practically one hundred cents on the dollar, and with the low rate he would receive in the savings bank he would be much better off to apply the money on hand towards the loan. Otherwise the farmer would have to place his money in the savings bank and receive that low rate for three, four or five months, as the case may be.

I offer these suggestions for the most sympathetic consideration of the minister and other members of the government. I sincerely trust the bill to be introduced will give some encouragement to the debt-burdened farmers so that they may be enabled to continue their struggle until the return of better times.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker, I should like to support the position taken by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott). I too speak for the farmers, and I believe they cannot pay the 5½ per cent interest. I do not think they can pay the interest, much less retire the loan. Possibly the best proof of the fact that Ontario farmers cannot pay the high rate I mentioned is found in the experience the late Ontario government had in connection with loans at that rate of interest. The farm loan board of Ontario was loaning money at 5½ per cent. They have had to foreclose mortgages on many farms, and but for the effect it would have had on public opinion undoubtedly they would have taken action in regard to many others. I have not the figures, but I am sure the Minister of Finance will be able to secure them. I feel sure that if all the farms on which loans were made by the Ontario farm loan board were known it would be a very large number, and it would be very interesting to know just how few of the owners of those farms have been able to repay any of the principal, and what number have been unable to pay even the interest.

During the last Ontario election, and Ontario members well know how true this is, in the country districts a great deal was said about this 5½ per cent interest and about farm loans. It was such an important point that the late Henry government came out and said that the interest would be reduced to 5 per cent, and then they got it down to 4½ per cent, in words, and finally to 4 per cent, but the government was defeated and nothing came of that. The Hepburn government was elected last June, and so far as I have been able to ascertain, from the time they were elected last June until now they have not made one farm loan. At any rate they have not made any for which I applied, and that was quite a number. I have asked many other people, and I am inclined to think that they have not made any farm loans at all. So the Ontario farmer is in a difficult position at the moment. He has not been able to get a loan even at 5½ per cent. The first year or two possibly he would not worry so much about the interest until its cumulative effects became evident, but he will not be able to get a loan from any source now until the snow is off the ground next year, so that will be one year in which the farmers of Ontario were not able to secure loans any place.

I support the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott) in the position he took that governments increasingly will have to finance agricultural operations. The farmer is not able to secure a loan any place else, and the farmers of Ontario are going through real difficulties because of the conditions which I have outlined. They could not get a loan from any government, either provincial or federal, because the federal farm loan board does not operate in Ontario since the Ontario government has never passed the concurrent legislation, and secondly, the Ontario farm loan board has not operated since last June. The consequence is that the farmers of Ontario are in great need of money at low rates of interest.

I think it would be better from the government's point of view to reduce the rate to 4 per cent and have some chance of the interest being paid, and if the price level should be raised there is the possibility also of the principal being retired, but when we remember that the price levels of farm products have fallen 57 per cent from the high of 1928 to the low of 1932, and have not increased much since that time, it is no wonder that the farmers are not able to pay interest rates. It is true that in my constituency there is quite a number, a disturbing number, of farms that have been rented for taxes. The people who own these farms are glad to have somebody go on them and pay the taxes, and they have to work hard even to do that.

I do not want to say anything more on this subject at this time except to urge upon the government that it would be better to fix a rate of interest which would guarantee that the interest would be paid than to fix it at a high rate when it is sure not to be paid.

Mr. ERRICK F. WILLIS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, with the amendments to the Canadian Farm Loan Act brought forward by the Minister of Finance I am well pleased, with the possible exception that I think they might perhaps go further, and that is why I rise at this time to suggest a way in which that might be done.

My complaint against the Canadian farm loan board is not the complaint of the two previous speakers in regard to the rates of interest in particular, but rather the complaint that those whom I represent are not even given the opportunity of paying what seems to us to be a very low rate of interest.

With the statement of the Minister of Finance that the provincial boards are to be abolished I am well pleased. I always did think that the provincial board was one through which the actual blame could be escaped. Sometimes the provincial board would say: Well, it is Ottawa that is to blame. But we would find out from Ottawa it was the provincial board that was to blame, and the poor farmer did not know where he was.

I understand from the statement of the Minister of Finance that there was made available to the board some $90,000,000, which would be quite enough if we could only get a few thousands within my territory.

I wish to indicate the general attitude adopted by the provincial board of the province of Manitoba in regard to applications for loans within the area I represent. I shall quote only a paragraph from a letter by Mr. Martinson, the provincial superintendent of the farm loan board, addressed to an applicant at Hartney, Manitoba:

> Our board feels that under present conditions further loaning is not justified. They are of the opinion that they should make no further loans until there is ample proof of sufficient moisture to produce a crop next year.

I quote also from another letter in which Mr. Martinson writes to a man at Deloraine, as follows:

> Replying to your letter of November 1, you have already been informed on several occasions as to the decision of our board in respect to loaning in your district at the present time.
> You may as well accept this as final until there is a decided improvement in crop conditions in your district.

I desire also to place on the record as a basis for the remarks which I desire to make, a letter which I received from one of the most outstanding farmers in the province of Manitoba, Mr. J. R. McLean of Reston, under date of December 27, 1934. It is as follows:

We have a Federal farm loan board who have not been loaning any money in this territory for some time, although loans have gone through in other districts, and under the new arrangement second mortgages can be secured at low interest rates, for those favoured the last few years with good crops, districts which have been less favored than ours in past years.

I myself have lived in this district for 42 years, having farmed for myself for 31 years. All I own or possess, I have accumulated in 25 years from the farm, the last six years being unprofitable for farmers. I have at least spent $25,000 in improvements, and paid for 2¾ sections of land as well as $10,000 worth of stock and equipment in the said 25 years, and had clear title to everything previous to the depression. My stock has mostly disappeared by sale for living expenses since.

I made application in 1933 for a loan from the Federal farm loan board and had my farm inspected twice, the last time by the superintendent himself from Winnipeg, J. H. Martinson, and my application has been turned down because of conditions in this locality. This has been done, according to Mr. Martinson, by the head office. This is his assertion, and he goes further to state that he has recommended my application. But I have it on good authority, in fact the best, that the head office has turned down applications from this district which is in your constituency, on the advice of the Manitoba board "which is composed of Mr. Martinson and his two colleagues" and that the head office do not approve of any loans in this district until conditions change.

Now, myself and dozens of others who have still equity in our farm cannot carry on without assistance, and the only assistance I need is a loan to straighten up accumulated debts since the depression, and a nest egg to continue and put in a crop in 1935. I am not going to ask for relief nor accept any, but it seems the first function of a government under the circumstances is to help those who are willing to help themselves, people who have got into difficulty through no fault of their own. I think loans should be made to farmers who have the security to offer, at a low rate of interest, so they can proceed to put in a crop next spring. It is not when seeding starts we need money, but before, so we can be prepared when spring opens up. I hope you will give this matter thought and bring it to the attention of the proper authorities.

After living here for most of my life, and knowing the country with recurring dry years, I have not lost faith, remembering the great prosperity we enjoyed in years we had sufficient moisture, and it will return.

Yours truly,

Jas. R. McLean.

Then, as a typical example, I show hon. members a page from the Country Guide of its issue of March, 1930. This page shows the place of this farmer, J. R. McLean, and it points to him as an example to the farming community of Canada. It shows his house electrically lighted, his fine class of live stock, and the buildings which Mr. McLean says cost him some $25,000.

[Mr. Willis.]

Now what I desire to point out first is that in a case such as Mr. McLean's apparently neither the Manitoba board nor the federal board take any cognizance whatever of the past record of the farmer. I would point out that the ordinary farm loans are for the period of twenty-three years, not one or two. It seems to me that the Canadian farm loan board should adopt a businesslike basis, or place the prospects of repayment on the basis of the record of the farmer and the record of his land. Rather, it seems that they ask one question and only one: Did you happen to have any rain last year? They ask no questions in regard to the crops he had in 1926, 1927, 1928 and 1929. They pay no heed to the fact that during these years the district produced the greatest and the best crops in the province of Manitoba. I submit that the board should follow the ordinary banking practice, which is to investigate the character of the individual and appraise his security and his possibilities of making repayment of the moneys borrowed during the length of the mortgage. At the present time it is undoubtedly true that they are making loans in other parts of Manitoba not nearly as productive over a period of ten years; rather they are making loans where for the last two years they have had some rain, whereas these same districts a few years ago, and for a long period of years, were flooded out by water.

The second point I want to make and the second criticism is that the policy of the Canadian farm loan board is hampering the operation of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act brought forward by the government last year. One of the greatest difficulties in that regard is in connection with rates of interest. If the people in my district could obtain loans at 5½ per cent they could, under the machinery of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, obtain a small loan and pay off their creditors, who would be glad to accept cash for maybe 50 or 75 per cent of the amount, and they could start again on the basis of 5½ per cent and be very glad to do it. Moreover, it seems to me that the attitude of the Canadian farm loan board is a direct negation of the policy of the federal government. The federal, the provincial and the municipal governments are pouring into that district moneys for the purposes of relief. These governments, in effect, are saying to the people, "We believe you can make a go of it. We believe this is a phase which will pass, this is merely a dry cycle which you have experienced before, and we will help you to carry on." But the Canadian farm loan board in its great wisdom comes forward and says, "No. We won't even inspect your farm. We care not whether you have $25,000 worth of buildings and want a loan of only $500 and no more, that has nothing to do with us. We have said it will never rain on your farms again." Remember, the period of the loan is twenty-three years.

In my opinion the attitude of the Canadian farm loan board is entirely incorrect. In Manitoba there are two areas; one is known as drought area A, which is the worst drought area in Manitoba, all unfortunately within my territory, and there is outside that drought area B, not so badly affected. While I have not been able to gather evidence, it seems to me that the attitude of the board is simply this. They say merely, "Oh, you are in drought area B," or whatever it may be. May I say to this house and to the Canadian farm loan board as well that within the so-called drought area B there were this last year crops of 40 bushels of wheat to the acre. It is designated drought area B owing to the fact that the division is by municipalities. Now, the municipalities in western Canada are very large, with the result that you may have complete dryness in the south of the municipality, causing it to be designated drought area B, whereas in another section you may have, as in fact we did have last year, ample crops—good returns to the farmer and apparent prosperity. But they simply say to the farmer that he is in drought area B. As the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) knows, in the municipality of Roblin the southern part may be designated drought area B whereas in the northern part there is apparent prosperity.

The Canadian farm loan board points out correctly that it is not loaning money on compassionate grounds. Certainly it should not loan money on compassionate grounds but should loan on a business basis. May I point out to them however that they can do better from a business point of view by making loans at the present time than they could ten years ago because now a man like McLean, owning two and three-quarter sections of land, with $25,000 worth of buildings would be willing to accept a few thousand and give them a first mortgage, and they would have security which they could not have obtained had they lent the money ten years ago. Further, at the present time within these areas, owing to the fact that in the last couple of years they have had no rain, there is great opportunity for anyone from the standpoint of investing money for the purchase of land, because it can be done so easily. Cash is so important at the present time that they are willing to sacrifice what they have in order to carry on. Therefore greater security can be obtained.

In my opinion, at the present time they are loaning moneys to districts in the northern part of the province which have no past record and no great prospects for the future. But in view of the fact that at present and for a short while they have had some rain there is a willingness to loan moneys there at a time when they could do better, from the point of view of security, by placing loans in other sections of the province.

With the amendments outlined by the minister I am pleased, because I think that the abolition of provincial boards will enable us, if I may say so, to place the blame in the proper quarter. The amount of the advance, $90,000,000, seems adequate. It appears to me however, if we can believe the words of these men, that it may be necessary to have a new personnel in the board in Ottawa, to revamp and reorganize it. It may be necessary to retire some of the members and perhaps the commissioner himself. I say that with all kindness. I do not think that at the time the Canadian farm loan board was set up it was ever contemplated that the present personnel would handle $100,000,000; I do not think it was ever contemplated that the present machinery would do so. I am informed that the commissioner has an appointment dated January 1, 1929, for a period of ten years. In that respect he has his rights which should be safeguarded; he came here on that promise and certainly that should be safeguarded also. But if loans are to be passed by those in Manitoba who have inspected the land and know the situation and are going to be turned down at Ottawa simply because, as they say, the individual is in the drought area, then how can you bring about the change unless you change the personnel of the board? I trust that when the necessary changes are made they will be able to place on the inspection in Manitoba men who have had experience there, who understand where the proper security is and where loans can safely be made, rather than do as they have done in the past. It seems to me that direct federal administration will be an advantage. If the same old attitude is to be adopted as was adopted in the past and loans passed by the inspectors before coming here are to be cancelled and not granted; if the same attitude is going to be adopted in regard to the amounts advanced and the way in which the whole administration is carried out, then it may be necessary, safeguarding the interests of the commissioner in every way, safeguarding his rights, that either he be surrounded with a new personnel or—and I say this in all kindness—the commissioner himself be retired or his attitude changed.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Edmonton): I rise not to be critical of the administration of either the Farm Loan Act or any of the amendments that have been made during recent years in regard to the operation of the act itself, but rather, if I can, to suggest something that may be helpful. In my opinion the situation that to-day affects agriculture from one end of Canada to the other is the most critical in our history. I am simply astounded when I come here and listen to statements made by men coming from what we consider the garden spots of the dominion so far as agriculture is concerned, to learn that competent farmers of many years' experience are finding themselves in serious financial difficulties. I have nothing to say with respect to the administration of the farm loan board or any other board that have loans in the so-called drought areas. I asked a question of a friend of mine: Would you loan money under similar circumstances if it were your own money? When I say that may I say to the minister that the situation in Canada is so critical at the present time that the government in charge and, indeed, the House of Commons should be prepared to take extraordinary chances to save the situation. I for one am prepared to support extraordinary efforts to save a situation of this character. We have been forced to guarantee bonds of railway companies in order to save them and no one knows whether the Canadian people may be called upon to make good in some respects some of those guarantees that we have issued. Our experience in the past has been that even in prosperous times the farm loan business has been a bit precarious from the standpoint of receiving returns expected by those who loaned the money. This cannot be blamed upon the agriculturist. His is a very precarious occupation; he does not know when he makes his investment in labour and money in the planting of a crop whether he is going to reap it or not. I for one have had the experience of beginning to reap a crop and having it all destroyed in a period of a few minutes. That of course is not true of all Canada, but it is just an example of what happens in agricultural pursuits in all parts of this country. So I think we are safe in saying that it is a somewhat precarious undertaking or calling.

I felt the same in 1927 and I believe the dominion government in the interest of agriculture, which is so important to the welfare of this country, might by the adoption of a farm loan act be taking some chances on the repayment of the loan. I do not agree with the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis) who has just taken his seat, that the blame can be laid at the door of the personnel of the board. The Liberal government and this government have surrounded the operations of that board by regulations because it was thought they were warranted. Perhaps they were too onerous, but I think if my hon. friend will make inquiry he will find that even in the most prosperous sections in which loans have been made the board has a considerable number of unpaid interest claims. This to me is an indication that despite all the precautions of the board itself and the precautions by the government surrounding the operations of the board, they have not made it immune from the difficulties encountered by others who are lending money under a situation such as this. I make this statement because I do not want to speak in a critical way of either the board or the government itself. Agriculture, in my opinion the most important industry in Canada, is on the verge of bankruptcy and naturally the next thought that occurs to one is: then it must be a very precarious undertaking to loan money to an industry of that character. It is, and I therefore urge the minister and the government that particularly at this time special consideration be given to this matter and, indeed, some chances taken. I believe the government are warranted in taking grave chances, if you will, to save the situation.

As regards Alberta, I am not going to say a single thing about the southern portions of the province; what I have to say and the information I have gathered refers to the northern section where we have never had a crop failure, where every year the farmers have been in receipt of reasonably good returns for their labour in the way of crops. Yet in those favoured localities which are in the constituency which I have had the honour to represent for the last four years—and they are but typical of other sections of the whole of the northern portions of the western provinces—at least 70 per cent of the farmers are facing bankruptcy. That seems a large proportion; nevertheless it is true and seven or eight years ago they were rated among the most prosperous farmers in the country. Conditions however have been such with respect to the price levels that they have been receiving for their produce that they are in that unfortunate position to-day. So bad has it been that the provincial government in their wisdom or otherwise some years ago felt it incumbent upon them to pass what they called a debt adjustment act. It turned out to be nothing more nor less than a debt suspension act and while the creditor could not take action, the unfortunate farmer found himself faced with rapidly increasing responsibilities due to the accumulation of interest and very frequently the accumulation of unpaid taxes. That is the situation which confronts us to-day. Last year we passed in this house a debt adjustment act and under its provisions we were hopeful that some amelioration could be secured for the farmer. That act has a back-fire that perhaps we did not anticipate in the last session of parliament. The man who is most vitally affected is usually the retail merchant in the locality who has granted credit to these farmers. While his credits may be cut down very materially there is no way for him to secure a reduction of his own indebtedness, incurred largely through giving those credits. I mention that in passing to indicate to the government and the house what a serious situation is developing in Canada in this connection, and how hazardous the tenure of ownership or even tenancy on the farms is becoming. To-day no one is prepared to lend money to an individual engaged in agriculture. That cannot be denied. I have interviewed several mortgage companies and life insurance companies engaged in this business and they say: Not another dollar except to protect the investment we already have; and we would be glad to get our money and get out. That is their attitude. I think the government are to be commended for anything they can do by way of improvement of the act and in securing a larger amount of funds to loan to meet this very serious situation. Last year, in conjunction with the Farmer's Creditors' Arrangement Act, provision was made by amendments to this act that loans could be made for the purpose of tiding the farmer over his serious situation while investigation was being made. I do not know how far that has worked out, I have no information as to how much was done, but judging from what I learned in Alberta very little was done by the farm loan board in the way of loaning last year. I am not going to be critical about that. But the situation in a great many cases where composition of debts was being sought was that it appeared that while most of the creditors were willing to compromise in a reasonable way on their debts the main difficulty was the mortgage itself, usually held by some corporation. If my information is correct, the corporations holding the mortgages were quite willing to surrender them at some considerable reduction if they were paid off. That would mean of course the transfer of that mortgage to the farm loan board, they being the only agency through which loans might be secured. But my information is—I cannot say that I know anything personally of this matter—that even with the cutting down by the mortgage companies to a reasonable degree of the principal and accumulated interest as proposed, the amount as so reduced would still exceed the limit of seventy per cent of the present selling value of the land and therefore the farm loan board would be unable to make the loan. I do not blame the farm loan board, but in my opinion we have got to give much more leeway to the board than we have in the past. We have got to modify the regulations. I have never lost a crop on my farms. I had them valued some years ago but if I were asked to-day what they are worth as a productive enterprise I really do not know what I would value them at. And as I say, although we have been frozen, in no year have we lost a crop on those lands and they are typical of a great many others. But if I were sent there as an appraiser to say what the value of a farm is to-day I would have great difficulty. It is all right to talk about the experience of the past, but what is going to be the experience of the future, in the light of what has happened in recent years?

So my whole plea is that a very lenient view be taken of this situation, and that the government take some extraordinary chances in loaning money in order to keep our farmers on the land. The procession of farmers off the land in western Canada, or arrangements with the mortgage companies to farm for the purpose of paying the taxes or on a basis of one-third of the crop, which is the usual rental for farms in that locality, is going on at a tremendous rate. Such a condition breaks the spirit of people who have spent twenty-five or thirty years of their lives trying to build up a competence for themselves and their families. It is useless to go over a recital of what a farmer and his family do in the way of actual labour to secure the returns that they get from a farm even in prosperous years. I do not want to interject a single word that would suggest that I am blaming the policy of the government for the present situation; I may do that at another time, but this thing is too serious to make a political issue out of it. I shall deal with the policy of the government on another occasion, and perhaps deal as harshly as I can with them in order to see if some amelioration will not be granted in that regard. But I say, speaking for myself, that I am prepared to back the government in taking some very grave chances. I welcome to some degree the suggestion of complete control. A common expression in western Canada is that there is too much passing the buck when you have the two bodies operating in this connection. With complete control we could at least know who was to blame if loans are not consummated. I make this suggestion. Perhaps there never has been a more favourable time than the present to borrow money. I have not given this suggestion the consideration it deserves, and I do not know whether it is workable but it is that loans be shortened to a period of five years. If in that time we do not have a change in price levels for farm products it will not make much difference whether we have farm loans or not. Our devout hope is that price levels will rise and then the question of interest becomes not so important. I make the suggestion in the light of our past experience that interest rates be based on basic commodity price levels. For a shorter period I am sure the minister can go into the money market and borrow at a much more favourable rate than he can for a twenty year period. Then let the benefit of this cheaper money, borrowed for shorter terms, with the government guarantee, be passed on to the borrower on a five year loan, which was the usual period of mortgage loans in western Canada made by the mortgage companies. That at least would carry us over the difficulties of the present time. With this perhaps also should go a reduction in interest to the rate suggested by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott). I make this suggestion so that the minister may have a chance to look into it before we come to discuss the details of the amendment.

In conclusion I would say that anything the government may propose, any chance they make take which they themselves deem hazardous, will I think receive the warm support not only of myself but of other members from western Canada.

Mr. W. E. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I am very glad that I can agree with a great deal of what the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) has just said. I am sure there is no member in this house who understands rural problems but will agree that this question far transcends political controversy. I feel that I must support the government very heartily in approving of the suggested amendment to the Farm Loan Act. I feel satisfied that many of the problems mentioned in this house have been rather confused with the debt problem of the farmers. As the previous speaker said, agriculture is in perhaps a more difficult situation to-day than it has been for many years, though I do not think it is as difficult as it was two or three years ago. The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott) suggested that the rate might be lowered to 4½ per cent; personally I would be glad to see it reduced to 4 per cent but, as hon. members know, the Farm Loan Act provides that the rate must be sufficient to provide for the issue of bonds, the building of reserves, and the expenses of administration. I hope that when the bill comes down I may be able to deal more fully with this point and offer some suggestions.

In the province of Ontario I feel that recently the farmers have been in a rather more difficult position with regard to farm loans than has been the case with the farmers of other provinces. In this province we had applications made to the government by over a thousand farmers prior to the last provincial election, to which the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) has referred. Of those applicants over five hundred had paid the inspection fee of $12 but, according to my information, not more than fifty applications were accepted. The nature of the mortgage situation in Ontario and the other provinces is very much as the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) has stated; the fact that the provinces have issued loans in the past has more or less taken that business out of the realm of private enterprise and, as has been stated, the loaning corporations refuse to lend money, especially if the application has been refused by the province or by the farm loan board. In the province of Ontario, in which as the representative of a riding in that province I am vitally concerned, we have something like $55,000,000 in loans to some 17,000 farmers under the farm loan act of the province. In the past when a farmer needed a loan or desired to buy a farm for himself or his son he naturally thought of getting the money from the farm loan board. That was the custom for many years, but those loans were abruptly discontinued just at a time of crisis, when the need was greatest. During the last session of this parliament the Farm Loan Act was amended to provide that loans might be made not to fifty per cent of the value of the farm but to sixty-six and two-thirds per cent of the value of the farm and chattels, and I believe many provinces have taken advantage of that amendment and have passed enabling legislation.

That amendment was passed in this house in June of 1934, when unfortunately the legislature of the province of Ontario was not sitting. On June 19 an election was held; in fact the amendment was passed by this parliament while the election campaign was in full swing. No enabling legislation was passed in the province of Ontario. The legislature has not met since the election, though we expected a session some time ago as was promised. At any rate the result has been that this enabling legislation has not been passed and relief has been withheld from farmers who are in dire distress, on the verge of going into bankruptcy, and, in some cases subject to the risk of losing the results of twenty-five years of work. During the last few months I have had scores of farmers plead with me to see some private interest and try to do something in the way of securing farm loans. The provincial government of Ontario have absolutely refused to issue these loans; they have refused to consider the thousand applications which were before the board at the time of the election, including the five hundred who paid their $12 inspection fee and whose applications had been approved even though in some cases gilt edge security was offered.

I remember one case in particular, that of a man who paid $13,500 for a farm. I know that man very well. He worked as energetically as any man could work; he suffered all sorts of privations, difficulties and hardships, and he paid for the farm with the exception of $3,800. He pleaded with the province for a loan, but his application was refused. I understand that the reason given was that the previous government had failed to pass an amendment to the farm loan act, and the board had not the authority to issue the loan. I leave that example with this house for what it is worth. Everyone knows that the dominion Farm Loan Act was passed in 1927. Everyone knows that the amendments to that act were passed in June of 1934, just a few days prior to the provincial election. Just why the provincial board have absolutely refused to approve or deal with one thousand applications which were made prior to the last election is for that board to state. In the meantime our farmers in Ontario who have been seeking mortgages have found themselves in a more difficult financial condition than has been the case during the last five years. I have had scores of farmers at my home almost weeping, wondering what they could do.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that at the beginning of this session the government have seen fit to step into the breach and bring forward amendments to the act, extending further credit to the farmers of Ontario and of the dominion generally. I am glad that the government propose to take over the administration of the act, so that it cannot be said that we are passing the buck, and I believe they will make these loans at the lowest possible rate of interest. I am glad that those who sit to your left, Mr. Speaker, have intimated that they are prepared to support these amendments, even though they may increase the risk of temporary loss to the government. I wish heartily to endorse the proposed amendment, because it comes when it is most needed in the province of Ontario and fills the gap created by what on the surface appears to be neglect on the part of the provincial government who might have helped thousands of farmers in this province in these difficult times.

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): Mr. Speaker, we have heard from the province of Alberta, the province of Ontario and the province of Manitoba. I was very pleased indeed when I saw this resolution on the order paper:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act to facilitate and increase the extension of credit to farmers—

I remember that last year, when we were dealing with the amendments then before the house, I asked the Prime Minister if this act was operative in the province of Saskatchewan. As the Minister of Finance has said to-day, up to the present time that act has not been in operation in that province. I understand that there is concurring or enabling legislation to make it possible for the farmers of Saskatchewan to come under the provisions of the Farm Loan Act. There are no people within my knowledge who have any greater need of extended credits than the farmers of Saskatchewan. In my opinion the Canadian Farm Loan Act is complementary to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. While going through a portion of the province of Saskatchewan I found many farmers who were anxious to take advantage of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

What is the situation? We find the farmer going to the representative of the adjustment board and making a proposal. He places his cards upon the table and states, "I owe so much to a mortgage company, so much to a machine company, so much to a bank," and so on and so forth. "I would suggest in setting up this scheme that my debt be reduced by 33⅓ per cent and that my interest rate be cut down from its present rate"—which may be 8 or 9 per cent. Hon. members coming from the western provinces are amused when they hear talk about interest rates as low as four per cent, five per cent or even six per cent on mortgages. That does not exist in western Canada. The farmer asks that the interest rate on his debt be cut down to six per cent. Of course the question is,

"What have you to offer?" "Nothing." What is the creditor going to do to me, a farmer, if I come to him and simply suggest that instead of owing him a debt of one hundred cents on the dollar he should accept at some future date seventy-five cents or fifty cents, as has been suggested, and cut the rate down to six per cent. I hope it may be possible under the proposed amendments and through the legislation now contemplated at Regina that the farmer of Saskatchewan may be able to go to the farm loan board and obtain a second mortgage or borrow up to sixty per cent of the value of his land and chattels. If he were able to obtain $1,000 or $1,500 or whatever amount the board saw fit to extend to him he could then approach his creditors and possibly make some adjustment. We find that in the province of Saskatchewan there are very few if any adjustments being made simply through lack of funds to make them. Representing a rural constituency in the province of Saskatchewan I feel that I may endorse all that has been said by the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart). As an individual from Saskatchewan I am prepared to give every assistance to the government in passing the legislation if such legislation is as outlined in the resolution.

Dealing with conditions in Manitoba the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis) directed his remarks to the dried out area. I cannot understand why the farmers in those dried out areas have found it difficult to obtain loans simply because of the fact that over a certain period of time the precipitation has been such and such or so and so. I should like to observe however than when we take a specific period of time between two points, periods of five or ten years, and leaving out the last four or five dry years, we find that the production in that portion of Saskatchewan now known as the dried out area was greater by volume and value than that of the northern areas. All the southern portions need is rain. I know rain cannot be given to them under the Farm Loan Act, but I do believe the act could help the farmers to carry on until such time as they do have rain. It is utterly impossible in many portions of western Canada, and more especially in the dried out areas, for farmers to borrow money, even on mortgages. Going through the country I had farmers tell me that the mortgage companies are not bothering them, the machine companies are not bothering them, and the banks are not bothering them. Why not? Because there is nothing to take. I say that if the farmers of Saskatchewan are contemplating an adjustment of debt now is the time to do it. If Saskatchewan's dried out area ever gets a crop, just watch the mortgage companies, the banks and the machine companies. If those dried out areas, over a period of years, can get back to their former average of production the banks, mortgage companies and machine companies will climb on to the farmers and make it utterly impossible for them to carry on. To-day the farmers are not being bothered, and my suggestion would be that they should get an adjustment of their debts. I think that would be possible. If with the $90,000,000 now at its disposal the board would advance credits to the farmers it would confer a great blessing not only on the dried out areas in Saskatchewan but on the western provinces generally.

My farm is located between the dried out areas and the northern areas. As the hon. member for Souris has said, one-half of the municipality might be said to be in the dried out area because, strange as it may seem, we find the dried out areas are slowly creeping north, annually. We find the grasshopper plague is doing the same thing. In my constituency we hope we will not have in the coming season a grasshopper plague such as we have had in the last two years. I have been in the one community for twenty-eight years, and only in the last two years have we experienced a total crop failure. I feel sure that when the farmers in the west, and particularly those in the province of Saskatchewan, read in the newspapers that the federal Farm Loan Act is to become operative, and that there is $90,000,000 to loan to the farmers, they will be greatly pleased. I hope the board will not deal too strictly with those portions of Canada which have not been so favoured climatically as many others.

Mr. V. C. PORTEOUS (North Grey): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few observations concerning this resolution. Not from a political standpoint, and in all seriousness I want to say that never was there a more cruel decision made than the decision of the authorities in the province of Ontario to discontinue the operation of the Ontario development board. The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott) has said that thirty years ago farm mortgages were a gilt edged investment. As compared with other investments I would say the same is true to-day. I believe if an analysis were made of losses on investments we would find that the percentage of losses on farm mortgages in eastern Canada is very much lower than on other kinds of investments. The same was true, so far as the Ontario development board was concerned. I had considerable experience in negotiating between that board and some of the applicants, and my experience was that upon some occasions the board were not lenient enough. They said they would not take mortgages over fifty per cent of the value of the farm. If that was not a gilt edged investment I do not know what could be.

A good many angles to this problem have been presented this afternoon. One was that we should have a lower rate of interest, especially in the province of Ontario, and with that I agree. Another hon. member believed there was not sufficient credit extended to the farmers at any rate of interest. I believe both those points may be well taken. I agreed further with the hon. member for Souris in his observations concerning the dried out areas. In my view credit extended to the people in those sections of the country where crops are uncertain should be based on a long period, and not a short period of only two or three years. It should be on a long term basis for a period of possibly twenty years, and both from a business and actuarial standpoint the rate should be as low as possible; but, Mr. Speaker, it should be at cost. The farmer as yet is not a charity patient. If you were to base the rate of interest upon his ability to pay, then in some cases, judging by the last few years, the farmer would not pay any interest at all, but the farmers are not asking for that sort of thing because it is charity. I believe that the farmers in some cases have been asked to carry burdens unjustly, but nevertheless they are not going to ask for charity.

The rate of interest should be as low as possible on a business like basis of course, and it should be at cost. That is all the farmers are asking. The cost also should be kept as low as possible. I think myself that a spread of 1½ per cent is possibly too much. I think that with a fair administration of this program there would be very few losses, and I think there would be no losses at all if it is administered properly, in which case the spread could be less than 1½ per cent. I also think that in the near future money will be borrowed more cheaply, and the rate of interest could be arranged so that it would be lower to the farmer than is anticipated at the present time.

I want to make just one more suggestion, and that is that in setting up the machinery to administer this act as amended, the minister should take into consideration the possibility of associating it with the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. I think before long, if we have not got them right now, we shall have some most enlightened receivers so far as the farmers' ability to pay is concerned under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and I think that the advice of those receivers might be a great advantage to the board that might be set up, and I should like to see these two activities associated and carried on together.

As the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) and some other hon. gentlemen have said, the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act is now operative, but it does not go far enough, and if there was some credit available so that those people who have burdens of debt could receive credit, many of them would take fifty or sixty per cent of their debt and make a settlement.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take up very much of the time of the house on this question of amending the Canadian Farm Loan Act, but I should like to call the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) to what I consider is one of the causes why the interest rate is so high, and perhaps it is also one of the reasons why the minister feels that the rate could not be lowered to the point that has been suggested during the discussion this afternoon.

I have had something to do with helping farmers to obtain loans under this act, and I find that the cost is extremely high. Take a farmer needing a loan of $1,000, for instance. He cannot get that loan under a cost of $50. First he has to send in $10 for an appraisal. Then an appraiser is sent out, and when his appraisal is in and the board is considering the proposition of making a loan to the farmer, he is instructed by the local board that he must be prepared to pay $35 or $40 more when the time comes to search the title and make out the mortgage.

Let me give a case in point. An application for a loan of $1,000 was made through the local board in New Brunswick. First we had to send $10 for an appraisal. The appraiser lives within half a mile of the man who was making application for the loan. There was $10, and all the work that that appraiser had to do could be done within three or four hours. The application is considered favourably. In the application you have to give a description of the property as it is on record. The lawyer or the legal firm to whom instructions are given to make out the papers have not much searching of records to do because the whole thing is there before them, and yet it costs the farmer $35 or $40.

Now such costly proceedings must add considerably to the overhead, but if you cut down that overhead, and I believe it could be cut down by 50 per cent on every application, you could also cut down the cost of administration, and that perhaps would give you the opportunity of loaning the money at a lower rate of interest.

I was pleased to hear the minister state that the local boards will be abolished. I understand by that, that the work will be done entirely from Ottawa, with the assistance perhaps of agents in the field. Let me draw the minister's attention to the fact that that will mean a considerable reduction in the overhead if the work is properly looked after. That is another source of reduction in overhead which may make possible the loaning of the money at the rate suggested in the discussion this afternoon.

But I should like to urge on the minister this point: For gracious sake, in naming appraisers, do not have it done in the way it is being done now by the local boards. Why, Mr. Speaker, the appraisers that are named in the province of New Brunswick have no more idea of valuing properties than I have an idea of clinching the moon with my teeth. I know it. I am interested myself, and have been for years, in the valuation of property, as chairman of boards of assessors and as chairman of school district boards, where the chairman and the secretary together have experience in the valuing of properties.

There is another point, although this may not be repeated under the amendment to the act, but in the past when times were very good, appraisers have been named who were interested themselves in loaning money to farmers, and when they went to appraise the property, they simply sent in such a report that the farmer could not get a recommendation from the local board for a loan. The local board was blamed for that, and the head office at Ottawa was blamed for it when it should not have been blamed except for naming such an appraiser. That appraiser, after seeing that he had knocked out the chances of the farmer for getting a loan under the board, would then come forward himself and lend the money. I know cases of that kind, and that is one reason why I am pleased to see that the local board is to be abolished and that the head office here at Ottawa will have charge of the administration of the act. I feel sure that it will result in more efficient administration, with greater satisfaction to the farmer.

[Mr. Veniot.]
