PRIVILEGE

MR. BOULANGER—REPORTED STATEMENTS BY MEMBER FOR LAPOINTE

Mr. Prosper Boulanger (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege pursuant to citation 105(3) of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, as well as citation 108(3), citation 110, citation 111(1) and citation 113.

As a member from Montreal island, I maintain that I have been subjected to an unfair and slanderous attack by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire). That attack on my integrity and competence, which constitutes a breach of my privileges as member for Mercier, follows from an item published in the newspaper La Presse of Tuesday, January 24, 1967, under the signature of Mr. Gilles D'Aoust, in which he quotes the hon. member for Lapointe as having stated in Quebec city recently: "that save for a few exceptions, the representatives from the Montreal area in the House of Commons make the worst membership of incompetents there is". The article also reports other unfounded and malicious accusations along the same lines.

Pursuant to the standing orders, I ask the Clerk to read the excerpts which I find libellous toward some of my colleagues, and I now table this newspaper clipping.

I deny the member for Lapointe any competence and judgment to decide whether or not any hon. member is competent. I may add that this is not the first time he takes the liberty to make such malicious accusations outside the house against his colleagues, which accusations tend to destroy the prestige of this parliament in the minds of Canadians, to the point where many wonder whether these are not, on the part of the leader of this separatist party, tactics intended to destroy governmental institutions in our country.

Therefore, I move that the member for Lapointe be summoned by the house to appear before the committee on privileges and elections as soon as possible to answer for his repeated, unjustified and libellous attacks against myself and several members of the house.

The article appeared only yesterday in the newspaper La Presse and I referred my question of privilege to you at the first opportunity.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Mercier sent me notice of his question of privilege, as required by standing orders, together with the newspaper clipping. According to citation 113 of the fourth edition of Beauchesne, I now ask the Clerk of the house to read the excerpts considered reprehensible by the member for Mercier.

The Clerk:

Federal members from the Montreal area are called incompetents by Mr. Grégoire. However, he makes exceptions for Messrs. Charles Drury, John Turner and Pierre-Elliot Trudeau.

The federal member of parliament for Lapointe, Mr. Gilles Grégoire stated yesterday that, save for a few exceptions, the representatives from the Montreal area in the House of Commons constitute the "worst membership of incompetents" there is.

The M. P. strongly blames the Montreal members for having failed to defend the interests of their region in this matter.

Mr. Grégoire blames the members from Montreal, and the Quebec members generally, for placing the interests of their party ahead of the interests of their region. Apart from a few men like Messrs. Drury and Turner, the members from Montreal, according to him, are not serious.

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (St. Ann): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add a few words on this question of privilege. I shall be brief, but I should like to note certain points of this same statement. The hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) seems to be trying to assume the role of defender of the port of Montreal. I should like to inform him that while he was busy with his personal affairs, we, in the House of Commons, were defending the interests of the port of Montreal. We did not need the ideas of the separatist member to encourage us to work in the interest of our electors. Having been elected in 1957, I was among the first, in 1958, to work on behalf of the port of Montreal. I hope that the hon. member for Lapointe, who considers himself as the hub of the universe, will finally realize the facts.

Reported Statement by Member for Lapointe

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): I listened very carefully to the observations made on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger). I submit this is not a question of privilege. The hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) told a public gathering his impressions of his work here, in the House of Commons and in parliamentary committees.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Allard: This goes to show how incompetent some hon. members are, Mr. Speaker; they do not know parliamentary procedure and do not remain quiet when an hon. member has the floor.

The hon. member for Lapointe voiced an opinion, in his capacity as member of a democracy. He has a right to his opinions, and I would even go so far as to say here that I agree with him when he says that the hon. member for Saint-Antoine-Westmount and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Messrs. Drury and Turner) are exceptions in this respect. I believe they are competent, hard-working men.

As to the hon. member for Mount-Royal (Mr. Trudeau), I have often voiced my disapproval of the opinions he voices outside the house. I submit he does not speak for the province of Quebec, and is in no position to voice the aspirations of Quebec and French Canada in this house.

Mr. Speaker, I wish the hon. Liberal members from Quebec would keep quiet. There is no question of privilege but merely a question of opinion which the hon. member for Lapointe has expressed and which millions of Quebec citizens share.

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, while admitting that the statements made by the member for Lapointe are false, I wish to thank him for having implicitly recognized the extreme competence of the members of the Quebec area.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Beauharnois-Salaberry): Mr. Speaker, although I feel the remarks of the hon. member for Lapointe are not directed against me, I should like to say a few words about the question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker, I can well understand the feelings of the members from the island of Montreal, and I agree with the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger) when he says that those statements are gratuitous and erroneous.

[Mr. Loiselle.]

Still, for the guidance of the hon. members, allow me to make the following suggestion: the best way to deal with people like the member for Lapointe is simply to ignore them, because the member for Lapointe does not serve the interests of the province of Quebec in this house but only his own personal interests. I, therefore, suggest that the members ignore him and continue their work toward the development of our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I say a small word on the question of privilege. My colleagues say I should speak "en français", but if I do nobody will understand me.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Howard: It seems passing strange that there should be all this fuss and furore about the comments of an individual who deliberately has placed himself in the most insignificant location in the house—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howard: —who by his own declaration, should not even be recognized as a member of it and who, by his own design, never intends to return.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to ask that other statements be added to those which should be studied by the committee on privileges and elections, namely that of the member for Hochelaga (Mr. Pelletier) in which he called the Liberal members from Montreal "garbage dregs".

I would also ask that the statement made by the president of the royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism, Mr. André Laurendeau, who called the 75 Liberal members of the last election "75 nouilles", be referred to the committee on privileges and elections. This could also be placed on record. There would be quite a few people to appear before the committee.

Mr. Speaker, before resuming my seat, I merely wish to add that I said that the members of parliament from Montreal, with the exception of a few, seemed to be incompetent. As seen today, those who felt they were alluded to rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think it beneficial to proceed further with this question. As hon. members know, under standing orders, remarks that can be complained of must be of a libellous character in order to constitute a question of privilege. The remarks complained of by the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger), rightfully perhaps, on behalf of his colleagues, may be reprehensible, but I do not think I can consider them as libellous so as to constitute a prima facie question of privilege.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER ON LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement to the house about a proposed program of parliamentary business. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that any program for our centennial year should, if possible, be planned and dealt with so as to permit a summer recess which will enable members to participate in centennial celebrations in their home areas.

Whether there is to be such a recess, however, will depend on the progress we can make in dealing with those legislative proposals on which action is required. This, in its turn, will require planning by the government as well as consultation with and co-operation from opposition parties. In any such co-operation the necessity for adequate parliamentary discussion of every proposal is naturally accepted.

With these considerations in mind I am putting forward for consideration a program of parliamentary action in the first half of 1967 along the following lines. The present session would prorogue on March 10, which would give us 33 more sitting days. The new session would begin on Monday, March 13, with an Easter adjournment from Thursday, March 23 to Monday April 3. The centennial summer adjournment would extend to the end of September, when the autumn session would begin.

The government hopes that before the summer parliament will be able to deal with certain measures which I will indicate. The list I put forward now does not include relatively non-controversial bills which can often, by agreement, be dealt with in broken parliamentary time, as was the case last evening. Nor does it make provision for emergency developments which may take up the time of the commons either for legislation not now anticipated or for other purposes. Subject to these qualifications the following program is submitted as of now for action before the summer adjournment, and I should add that the items will not necessarily be dealt with in the order in which I place them now:

The Canadian forces reorganization bill; The interim budget; Resolution setting up a special committee to study parliamentary rules, procedures and practices, as well as the extension for another session of changes agreed to in the existing rules; Resolution setting up a special committee on the national anthem; The public service bills, when returned from the committee; The Bank Act amendment, when returned from the committee; together with the Quebec Savings Bank bill and the deposit insurance bill; Industrial research and development incentives bill; Immigration appeal board bill; Fiscal arrangements bill, including post-secondary education proposals; Statutory salaries and judges' salaries; Canadian Wheat Board extension bill; Broadcasting legislation; Criminal Code amending bill; Bill to implement certain of the new Nova Scotia coal and industrial development policies; National Housing Act amendments; Canada Development Corporation bill; Film Development Corporation bill; Adult occupational training bill; Bill to amend Canada Corporations Act; Citizenship Act amendments.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Which centennial is the Prime Minister speaking of?

Mr. Pearson: In addition, after prorogation there would be the debate on the speech from the throne; the budget debate, and consideration of the estimates of the departments.

This gives an indication of the work which should be done if we are to consider a centennial summer adjournment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): The Prime Minister's plan for a summer recess which would enable members to take part in the centenary celebrations in their own areas is a good one. However, in outlining the work proposed for the remainder of this session and the following session the right hon. gentleman proceeded to destroy this plan, in fact to make it impossible, by saying that whether such a recess materialized would depend on the progress made with the legislation required later this year and, I presume, during this present session.

The Prime Minister has set out certain dates as goals. The first is March 10 as the prorogation date for the present session. Then he went on to mention that a new session would start on March 13, three days later, and during that session there would be an Easter adjournment from March 23 to April 3. But in setting out the goals for prorogation and recess he failed to give a date when the summer adjournment would begin, although he did mention that parliament would be recalled toward the end of September.

In his statement he has not made it clear whether the program he has listed would have to be dealt with during this session or carried over into the next session. He has listed 23 pieces of legislation, and has said there may be others to be considered that the government is not aware of at the moment.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that the 23 pieces of legislation which the Prime Minister has listed would be sufficient to make up a throne speech at the beginning of a new session which normally would last six to seven months. Included in the list are major pieces of legislation. In addition to the legislation that he has listed he has mentioned a debate on the speech from the throne, another budget debate and consideration of the departmental estimates for the fiscal year 1967-68.

In setting out the dates for the plan he put forward I am sure the Prime Minister must have had his tongue in his cheek, because it is impossible for all this work to be carried out in the next 3 days or the next 66 days. There are such major pieces of legislation as the unification of the armed forces, the national anthem, the public service bills, the Bank Act amendments, the immigration bill, aid to the Nova Scotia coal industry and industrial development policies, broadcasting legislation, Housing Act amendments, the Canada Development Corporation bill—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is that back again?

Mr. Starr: Yes; and there is the film development corporation bill, the Citizenship Act amendments, and consideration of the estimates for the fiscal year 1967-68 which by themselves will take at least 30 days if the new rules are still to be applied. Surely the Prime Minister does not suppose that all these major pieces of legislation will be put through the house allowing for proper discussion before they are finally passed? So far as dates are concerned, the goals the Prime Minister has set are in my opinion nothing but a camouflage in view of the massive program of legislation that has yet to be considered. I think the government should review this program and set out the legislation in an orderly, scheduled fashion.

So far as the official opposition are concerned we are prepared to co-operate, just as we have done during this whole session of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Starr: There are groans and oh's, Mr. Speaker, but only last night it was upon the suggestion of the official opposition that four pieces of legislation were cleared away from the order paper. Our task has been not only to co-operate but to try to lead the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Starr: I say we are co-operating, that we have done so in the past and will in the future, but at the same time we feel it is our duty and responsibility that legislation proposed by the government should receive careful scrutiny and full consideration, and this duty we intend to fulfil.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's outline of a proposed timetable for parliament during this calendar year will be extremely useful. I think it underlines the suggestion we have been making from time to time that each year we ought to endeavour to work out a parliamentary timetable so we can conduct our business in an orderly manner in the time available, without coming to the end of a session and having to discard legislation due to lack of time when, during the session, we spent a great deal of time on less essential legislation.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Therefore I think some type of timetable is very useful. The Prime Minister's suggestion of closing the present session on March 10 and beginning the new session on March 13, with an Easter recess from March 23 until April 3, seems to make good sense. The Prime Minister suggests a summer recess, and that we then return at the end of September. He has not said when the summer recess would begin. I can understand this, because the Prime Minister is not, of course, in a position to know how much progress we will have made at that time. It certainly is difficult, however, to know whether it will be necessary to have a recess until the end of September unless we know when we are likely to adjourn.

Members of this party are anxious to cooperate with the government in its plans to have a proper and adequate celebration of Canada's centennial year. We wish to help in every way we can with these celebrations in our constituencies and throughout the country. However, Mr. Speaker, we are convinced that the first business of parliament is to do the work of the country. We believe there is no better way in which we can celebrate Canada's 100th birthday than to devote ourselves to the problems which confront the Canadian people.

A short summer recess certainly would be advisable, but in our opinion there is no reason for a long summer recess. If we should be able to adjourn by the latter part of June, there is no reason that parliament could not reassemble after Labour day. Two or two and a half months would seem to be an adequate time to enable members to attend to the work in their constituencies and take part in these centennial celebrations.

While I agree that the items the Prime Minister has outlined are very essential, I should like to point out to the house that there are many items which were not listed. There is nothing mentioned about the setting up of a department of consumer affairs which is likely to be recommended by the committee on consumer credit or to deal with the whole question of the rising cost of living. There is nothing mentioned about legislation on divorce or on birth control, both of which have been studied by a committee of the house. There is nothing mentioned about hate literature, which also has been recommended, or about anti-pollution legislation, or car safety.

There is nothing mentioned dealing with the matter of Canada's constitution or dealing with—as I hope will be the case in 1967—the report of the bicultural and bilingual commission. Certainly there can be no more appropriate year than 1967 to begin to grapple with this problem.

I should like to recommend to the Prime Minister at this time that we move with speed in respect of the setting up of the committee to look into the rules and procedures of the house, particularly if we are to get any agreement concerning which of the present rules will be extended into the next session, so that we do not come to the end of this session with the subject unresolved. This would give us the necessary time to explore the whole question of further revision of the rules so we could carry on our business much more expeditiously. Certainly I would hope that out of such a committee would come plans for the setting up of a parliamentary timetable, the first step toward which has been taken by the Prime Minister's announcement today.

I should like to say to the Prime Minister that while we are just as anxious as anyone to get back to our constituencies for a short summer recess, we shall insist throughout this session that the primary responsibility of parliament is to deal with the items the Prime Minister has mentioned and some other items which have not been mentioned. This must have top priority. There is no better way we can serve Canada in its centenary than to devote ourselves to the task of finding some solutions to the many problems which confront the Canadian people at this time.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, in glancing over the timetable which the Prime Minister has given to us for the next few months, it seems to me that if we live on hope we certainly have a lot to live on. As the hon. member for Ontario has stated, there is enough mentioned here to justify a throne speech debate and a full session. I quite agree that it is a step forward on the part of the government and I thank the Prime Minister for having taken this initiative in giving us some chronology in respect of the business of the house. This at least gives us an objective, but the dates which have been mentioned are not realistic and are not fair to the proper handling of the legislation which it is desired should be passed through the house.

My experience in this house has not been very lengthy, but I know that all the items which have been mentioned cannot be pushed through and digested in the short period which is being allowed. Some other measures have been mentioned here by other members who have spoken, and there are the estimates themselves. The study of the estimates can take a considerable time even if we just give two days to each department. I foresee a very long debate on the armed forces bill. I am not attempting to pull the wool over anyone's eyes, but it is going to take quite some time to deal with this matter. Anyone who believes otherwise has been asleep for the past six months. I believe it would be nice if we could get out of here on April 3, but I do not intend to be lured into the position of saying "Well, we are going to get out on the third and be damned with the rest". That is not the point.

The point is that the government has business to do and we have business to do. I think we must take the necessary time to do a good job regardless of centennial year.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam mentioned some other matters which are not set out here and which should be included. One matter which should be considered is the bankruptcy situation. If the Prime Minister thinks this is not too important, he should speak to the Minister of Justice, who stated before the Senate committee that this is one of the most important problems facing this country today because of the tax losses to the government and the losses to everybody else. There are a multitude of problems which might come up and which are not listed in the 20 different pieces of legislation mentioned.

I wish to be realistic in respect of this matter; therefore I say to the Prime Minister "Good luck". In the meantime, however, we will do our job. If it is possible for us to get away for the centennial celebrations, then well and good; but as responsible members of parliament I believe our first duty is to ensure that the administration of this country is not left on the loose after 100 years of work and dropped in a shambles, even if it is only for one year. We know what is involved in attempting to catch up again.

With the amount of work which is before us I cannot see the possibility of a long summer recess. If it is necessary to continue on into July in order to complete our work, then we should do so. On the other hand, if it is possible to complete our work in June then we will be able to get away in June.

When we adjourn will depend on how the legislation is brought in, the number of legislative items and the importance of that legislation. The more items brought in and the more important they are, the more discussion we are likely to have.

I hope the Prime Minister's wish comes true, but I would not bet too much that it will. The chances are pretty slim, and I am sure that if he should win such a bet at all it would be only by the skin of his teeth. I hope my fears turn out to be unfounded in this regard. In the meantime I assure the Prime Minister that we will give him all the co-operation he needs without, however, neglecting our responsibilities.

[Mr. Langlois (Mégantic).]

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the Prime Minister's remarks and the comments of those who have spoken since, I cannot help but think it is a good thing that we in 1967 do not have the responsibilities the Fathers of Confederation had 100 years ago in 1867, because I am sure we would never have got together.

I am in agreement with the Prime Minister that it is essential we have a recess of parliament during the summer months. I do not know what commitments the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has after May 15, but I am aware of my own engagements between that date and the middle of September. Members of the cabinet and other members of parliament I am sure have commitments which will make it practically impossible for them to attend to the normal duties of parliament if it is in session during those months.

In this connection we as members of parliament have a definite responsibility to the people of Canada to share with them the celebrations of our centennial. It is the responsibility of members of this house to assist in a very specific way in making our centennial celebrations what they should and must be if our centennial is to carry the full impact it should and must to the nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Thompson: It is my hope that some arrangement can be worked out among the various house leaders and parties so we can complete the essential work of parliament by the middle of May. This will allow us to fulfil our responsibilities to our constituents and to the nation, at least until the middle of September.

I cannot understand why the Prime Minister continues to hold this situation as a club over members of the House of Commons as he has again today, when he said in the second paragraph of his statement that any recess will depend upon the co-operation he receives in dealing with the legislative proposals the government has in mind.

Certainly a great deal of responsibility in this regard rests on the government in its management of our affairs and the initiative it takes in getting certain legislative proposals under way. For instance, the special committee to study parliamentary rules and procedures will be faced with a major task. That committee should have been set up and become active long before now, because we realize that at the end of the current session the special arrangements under which we now operate will no longer be valid.

As I look over the list of legislative measures enunciated by the Prime Minister I find that in addition to the budget debate there is the defence bill, the setting up of a special committee on rules and procedures, the public service bills, Bank Act amendments, broadcasting legislation, a bill to amend the Canada Corporation Act and Citizenship Act amendments. These are all major legislative items, and to expect that these can be completed in 33 days is absolutely ridiculous. That is impossible.

There must be a meeting of minds in this house in planning our business in order to deal with these items. I can envisage the defence bill going to a committee, and consideration of the bill in respect of Bank Act amendments has not yet been completed by the committee. I am sure each of those two legislative items will take longer than the 33 days left when they are considered by the house, not to mention the time that will be required to deal with the other items to which he referred. In addition there are many other so-called minor legislative items not included among the 20 listed by the Prime Minister.

The items which have been enunciated today might well be compared to the entire contents of a speech from the throne, and may be expected to take up the time of a normal session. I base that statement on the time required in respect of our past accomplishments.

It is my belief that a statement of the kind we heard today only places obstacles in the way of our reaching what I think is the objective of most hon. members of this house, that is to have a lengthy recess during the summer months which will permit participation in centennial activities.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Thompson: Some members say no, but let me remind them that our responsibilities go beyond this house. If ever we had a responsibility to the country, at this time we have a responsibility to participate in centennial activities. A great number of people in this country have had their confidence in this democratic institution shaken in the past few years by our performance in this House of Commons. Their confidence has been shaken in respect of our democratic processes on which our own way of life in Canada is based. I urge the Prime Minister to get together again with the house leaders in order that we may achieve the goals he has outlined.

I cannot see how the program outlined by the Prime Minister can be carried out in the indicated time. The only way we can get together is by serious consultation and cooperation in working out a more realistic approach, with a general acceptance of the objectives outlined by the Prime Minister.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

HOUSING CONSTRUCTION ON INDIAN RESERVES

Question No. 2,079—Mr. Schreyer:

1. What is the departmental allocation for housing construction for 1967 for the following Indian reservations (a) Fort Alexander (b) Hollow Water (c) Berens River (d) Fisher River (e) Sachigo Lake?

2. What is the planned expenditure for 1968 and 1969?

3. How many units are to be constructed in each of these three years?

4. In each of the above cases, will the construction be part of a continuation of existing programming, or will it be as part of a new program for community development on Indian reserves?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Allocation of departmental (public) funds for the fiscal year 1966-67 is: (a) $73,000; (b) $13,000; (c) $20,000; (d) $36,000; (e) $36,000. These are planned expenditures only and are subject to change.

2. The planned expenditures for the fiscal years 1967-68 and 1968-69 for housing construction, by individual reserves, are not yet available. Proposed expenditures, when recommended, will be subject to approval by parliament.

3. The number of units planned for the fiscal year 1966-67 is as follows: Fort Alexander, 24; Hollow Water, 4; Berens River, 5; Fisher River, 8; Sachigo Lake, 6.

A breakdown of housing units to be constructed, by individual reserves, in 1967-68 and 1968-69 is not available at this time.

4. A community plan has been approved for Fort Alexander Indian reserve and the housing construction program is being carried out in conformity with that plan. A planned community is being proposed at Berens River. On the Hollow Water and Fisher reserves the band councils have not asked for community planning and the house construction programs are being carried out in accordance with established practices. At Sachigo Lake the construction of Indian housing is a continuation of existing programming. These housing projects in all cases are part of the $112,000,000 program for physical development of Indian communities.

BUDGET FOR C.B.C. "SUNDAY" PROGRAM

Question No. 2,252—Mr. Flemming:

1. Is the budgeted cost of the program "Sunday" being presented by the C.B.C. on Sunday evening, $30,000 per week?

2. If this figure is not accurate, what is the weekly cost of same?

3. Does the government agree that the spending of any such amount can be justified in view of the protests regarding the program on Sunday evening, November 27, 1966?

4. Is the government prepared to introduce appropriate legislation to deal with the authority of the C.B.C. to produce such programs?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): 1. I am informed by C.B.C. that the program budget of "Sunday", including direct and indirect costs, is approximately $30,000 per week.

2. N/A.

3. The new "Sunday" series is continuing to develop and efforts have been made to eliminate the shortcomings that have occurred in the early programs of the series.

4. No.

*FURTHER REPORT ON ECONOMIC UNITY OF CANADA

Question No. 2,320—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

1. Has the government received any further report from the interdepartmental committee on the study of the economic unity of Canada, subsequent to the interim report dated April 30, 1965, which was tabled in the house on May 7, 1965?

2. If so, when will such report be tabled?

3. If not, when is such report now anticipated?

Mr. John R. Matheson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to starred question No. 2,320 is as follows: Part 1. No.

Part 2. Not applicable in view of the answer to part 1.

Part 3. No further report is now contemplated. The conclusion reached following a preliminary survey by the committee was that the question whether this study should be proceeded with could be given more effective consideration in the context of various studies and inquiries undertaken by other governmental committees and agencies, such as the tax structure committee, the Economic Council of Canada, the royal commission on taxation and the royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism. In the circumstances, it was decided to suspend the work of the interdepartmental committee with the possibility of resuming it at a later date if it seemed desirable in the light of the studies and reports referred to above.

PUBLICATIONS OF ENERGY AND MINES DEPARTMENT

Question No. 2,347—Mr. Laprise:

For each year since 1962, how many publications in (a) French (b) English, have been printed and distributed by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, and by its subsidiary services?

Mr. Jack Davis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources):

1964	184	805
1966	113	645

The above figures include a variety of reports, papers, memoirs, bulletins, etc. all related to the activities of the department and its subsidiary services. Many papers are printed in scientific and technical journals. The majority of English publications carry a French abstract.

*C.B.C. PROGRAM "LE SEL DE LA SEMAINE"

Question No. 2,376—Mr. Blouin:

Was the program "Le Sel de la Semaine", broadcast by the C.B.C. on December 20, 1966, between 10:00 p.m. and 11:00 p.m. and, if so (a) what was the cost of the part of the program during which the leader of the Ralliement d'Independance Nationale de Québec (Quebec Movement for National Independence) was interviewed, i.e., from 10:30 p.m. to 11:00 p.m. (b) what was the fee for persons taking part in this broadcast (c) what was the total cost of this half-hour broadcast?

[Translation]

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the C.B.C. as follows: Yes.

(c) Total cost of the one-hour program was approximately $7,000.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR TRADE WITH EASTERN EUROPE

Question No. 2,378—Mr. Hees:

1. What are the countries in eastern Europe where opportunities exist for greater sales of Canadian products?

2. What additional trade initiatives are going to be used to take advantage of them?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): 1. Eastern European countries in which, on the basis of my personal observations, opportunities exist for increased sales of Canadian products include the U.S.S.R., Czechoslovakia, Poland, Hungary, Bulgaria and Yugoslavia.

2. On two separate trips last summer, officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce and I visited the Soviet union as well as Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland and Yugoslavia. Grain sales are, of course, attracting the most attention, but Canada is, at the same time, gradually expanding and diversifying exports of industrial materials and capital equipment to eastern Europe. Canada's sales of commodities other than grain and flour to these markets have increased substantially over the past two years to a total last year of about $35 million.

In order to provide the framework for further expansion of trade opportunities with eastern Europe, the government has taken the initiative in extending Canada's trade agreements with most of the socialist countries. In Moscow last June a protocol was signed extending the Canada-U.S.S.R. trade agreement for another three years. At the same time, the Canadian Wheat Board entered into a new long term wheat agreement with its Soviet counterpart. In July a long term wheat agreement was renewed with Poland. At present, the government is negotiating with Bulgaria and preparing for negotiations with Hungary with a view to renewing our trade arrangements with these countries. Trade negotiations with Roumania are also presently under study.

The trade fair program sponsored by the Department of Trade and Commerce is an important aid to businessmen in their efforts to develop trade opportunities in the socialist countries. In addition to participating in the leading east European exhibitions, Canada last year for the first time took part in a Soviet trade fair as well. For this year, Canada is planning exhibits at four fairs in the socialist countries including Poznan, Brno and Zagreb.

The government is also taking the initiative in sponsoring trade missions in both directions. This year the Department of Trade and Commerce plans to send a metals and minerals mission and a capital equipment and consulting engineering mission to east Europe. An incoming cattle buying mission from the U.S.S.R. is expected and an incoming nuclear power mission will include representatives from eastern Europe. Missions involving other commodities are also being explored, and our trade commissioners in these countries are being brought back to Canada this spring.

Canadian businessmen are being encouraged to explore personally export potentials being created in the socialist countries as a result of the changes taking place there.

In the open economy, the actual buying and selling is done by businessmen. Accordingly, it is worth noting that, in addition to government activity, chambers of commerce and boards of trade across the country are sponsoring missions to eastern Europe and the number of individual businessmen travelling in both directions is increasing steadily.

PURCHASES OF SCALLOPS BY ARMED FORCES

Question No. 2,382—Mr. Crouse:

How many pounds of scallops were purchased by all branches of the armed forces during 1965 and 1966?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): 1965, 111,310 lbs.; 1966, 110,902 lbs.

WINTER WORKS PROGRAM, NATIONAL PARKS

Question No. 2,385—Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert):

Has the government instituted a winter works program this season in the national parks and, if so, what is the estimated expenditure and employment in each park?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): While the government has not instituted a winter works program, this year, which has applications in the national parks, the department has attempted to relieve unemployment by carrying out projects during the winter season wherever possible.

TENDERS FOR MAIL DELIVERY, ANTICOSTI ISLAND

Question No. 2,388—Mr. Keays:

1. In 1966 did the Department of Transport, marine radio section, request tenders for the transport of mail and delivery to lighthouses on Anticosti island?

Questions

2. If so (a) who were the tenderers (b) on what basis were they invited to call?

3. Was the contract awarded to the lowest bidder?

4. In what amount was the contract?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The district marine agent of the Department of Transport at Quebec, P.Q., called for tenders for the transport of mail and delivery to lighthouses on Anticosti island on October 17, 1966.

2. (a) Air Gaspe Inc., Northern Wings Ltd., Wheeler Northland Airways Ltd. (b) Transportation of mail from Port Menier, P.Q., to the light stations once per month, for five trips, from December, 1966. Prices were to be in accordance with carriers tariff filed with the Air Transport Board.

3. Yes.

4. $1,228.50.

PAYMENTS TO LIGHTHOUSE KEEPERS, BELLEISLE RIVER, N.B.

Question No. 2,407—Mr. Fairweather:

How much money does the Department of Transport pay to each lighthouse keeper or lighthouse attendant on Belleisle river, New Brunswick?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Light caretaker, Hatfield Point, Belleisle river, $60 per annum; light caretaker, Greys Point, Belleisle river, $60 per annum; light caretaker, Long Point, Belleisle river, $60 per annum.

*RELIEF FOR AREAS AFFECTED BY AUTOMOBILE AGREEMENT

Question No. 2,414—Mr. Irvine:

Further to question No. 2,272 answered January 9, 1967 (a) what action is contemplated to provide relief in those specific areas mentioned in the Automotive Parts Manufacturing Association brief as a result of economic pressures generated by the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement (b) what relief is contemplated by removal of the then 11 per cent (now 12 per cent) tax on machinery and equipment for the automotive parts manufacturing industry?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean Chrétien (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): (a) This is a matter of government policy. If any changes are to be proposed to the relevant legislation they will be announced at the appropriate time. (b) Production equipment used by manufacturers that is described in paragraph 1 of Part XIII of Schedule III of the Excise Tax Act is exempt from sales tax.

The increase in the rate of sales tax from 11 per cent to 12 per cent proposed in the supplementary budget on December 19, 1966 is not to apply to machinery and equipment described in Schedule V of the Excise Tax Act. The machinery and equipment described in Schedule V of the Excise Tax Act is to become taxable at only 6 per cent on April 1, 1967 and it is to become exempt from sales tax on April 1, 1968.

REMUNERATION OF REGISTERED NURSES IN ARMED FORCES

Question No. 2,419—Mr. Cowan:

What is the remuneration given to registered nurses who are members of the Armed Services of Canada?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): 1. On enrolment in the Canadian forces, a registered nurse is granted a short service commission as an officer for a period of two to six years as she may select. She is enrolled in the rank of 2nd lieutenant (army) or equivalent and promoted the following day to the rank of lieutenant (army) or equivalent.

2. As a member of the Canadian forces, she is eligible to receive pay for the rank in which enrolled and promoted. The monthly rates of pay are as follows:

Rank	Monthly rates (in dollars)
(Army rank or equivalent)	Basic rate	After two years in rank	After four years in rank
2nd lieutenant	355
Lieutenant	540	580	595

3. When a member of the Canadian forces is provided with single quarters, rations or single quarters and rations, deductions are made from the member's pay based on the following monthly rates: (a) charges for single quarters; (i) for an officer of the rank of 2nd lieutenant (army) or equivalent, $30; (ii) for a lieutenant (army) or equivalent, $40; (b) charges for rations, at the rate in effect for an officer, $55.

4. A registered nurse when enrolled in the Canadian forces, is eligible to receive a one time outfit allowance of $450. She is entitled also to receive other benefits prescribed in the Queen's Regulations and Orders for the Canadian forces for officers of equal rank and status under similar conditions, e.g., overseas allowances, travelling allowances, and responsibility allowance.

SALARIES OF REGISTERED NURSES, VETERANS AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT

Question No. 2,420—Mr. Cowan:

What are the basic rates of pay for registered nurses employed by the Department of Veterans Affairs?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The salaries for a nurse 1 are as follows: $3,750, 3,900, 4,050, 4,200, 4,350, 4,500, 4,650, 4,800, 4,950.

1. Rates $3,750 to 4,950, with increments at annual intervals, are normal rates for all nurse 1 positions except as provided hereunder.

2. Saskatoon, Calgary — Rate $5,100 is to be added

3. London, Ottawa, *Toronto, Vancouver, Victoria — Rates $5,100 and $5,300 to be added

Rates of pay on appointment

Locations	With less than two years experience	With more than two years experience
All locations except those hereunder	Minimum Rate	2nd Rate
Edmonton	2nd Rate	3rd Rate
Montreal, Quebec, Winnipeg, Saskatoon	4th Rate	5th Rate
Calgary	5th Rate	6th Rate
Ottawa, *Toronto, London, Vancouver, Victoria	6th Rate	7th Rate

* At present no nurses are employed by the Department of Veterans Affairs in Toronto.

PERMITS FOR PLACING FILL IN LAKE ONTARIO

Question No. 2,421—Mr. Cowan:

What permits have been issued by the Department of Public Works or the Department of Transport since 1920, under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, for the filling in of lake Ontario between the mouth of the Humber river and the mouth of the Etobicoke creek?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Navigable Waters Protection Act does not contain authority to issue permits. The land below high water mark in this area is the property of the province of Ontario unless alienated by them. Only the owner of the land would have authority to issue a permit to others to use his property for filling.

The Navigable Waters Protection Act provides authority for the minister to consider whether a fill would substantially affect navigation. It does not have any bearing on pollution, riparian rights or on any other factor.

One application was made under the Navigable Waters Protection Act since 1920 for a fill in lake Ontario located between the mouth of the Humber river and the mouth of the Etobicoke river (creek). In this case, the Minister of Public Works made a declaration, dated 14 May, 1966, that the fill did not substantially interfere with navigation and did not exceed $5000 in value. The fill was the property of the Chancellor Motel Limited, 163 Lakeshore road, Humber Bay, Toronto 14, Ontario.

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Would Your Honour please call motion No. 201? I ask that the remainder be allowed to stand.

GEOGRAPHICAL CO-ORDINATES RESPECTING BASE LINES

Motion No. 201—Mr. Barnett:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house a copy of all notes and other communications exchanged between Canada and the United States of America since the enactment by parliament on July 16, 1964, of the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act having to do with the issuance by the governor in council of one or more lists of geographical co-ordinates of points from which base lines may be determined in accordance with the provisions of the act.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the documents which have been exchanged between the two governments are privileged, of course. It would certainly not be in the interests of the negotiations that are under way now between governments are privileged, or course. It the United States, Canada and other countries if there were a disclosure of these communications asked. Therefore I must ask my hon. friend on that account to either withdraw his motion or to consent to it being put over until the opportunity arises for both of us to discuss the matter.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad at least to discover from the minister that there are some documents on the subject matter of this motion. While we may have an argument on the advisability of tabling them at this time I do believe it might be advisable, in view of the circumstances, that we transfer this motion for discussion.

[Mr. Byrne.]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not think this is the way to deal with a matter which obviously concerns privileged documents which, as the house has repeatedly said, should not be tabled, particularly when it is pointed out that important negotiations on that subject are under way.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister knows that the hon. member has the right of option, and that he has asked that the motion be transferred for debate. This being the case the Chair has no alternative but to order that it be transferred for debate.

Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF UNIFICATION BILL BEFORE SECOND READING

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister asked for co-operation today in dealing with the large menu that he placed before the house. In order to ensure that co-operation, would he give favourable consideration to turning over the armed forces unification bill before second reading to the standing committee on national defence so the necessary evidence can be heard? Much of the discussion which will take place in the house will have been avoided by having the committee sit in this regard.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the quickest and most effective way of doing that is to complete within a day or two debate on second reading, and in fact the long discussion on the subject matter, and then refer the matter to the committee in question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There was not too much co-operation in that answer.

FINANCE

CABINET COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN INVESTMENT—MEMBERSHIP OF TRADE MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister with reference to the statement he made the day before last regarding the appointment of a committee of the cabinet to deal with foreign investment. The Prime Minister made note of the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce had announced a number of guiding principles of good corporate behaviour in Canada and the Prime Minister said that the response to these guide lines has provided valuable information and insight into the role and conduct of foreign owned subsidiary companies in Canada.

In view of the Prime Minister's statement may I ask whether it is his intention to appoint the Minister of Trade and Commerce as a member of this committee, in view of the work he is doing with reference to the guide lines for foreign subsidiaries in Canada?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to my hon. friend for advising me on the best manner of constituting a committee of ministers but I will point out to him that this is a small committee and that it will report to the cabinet of which the Minister of Trade and Commerce is a member. The report of that committee will be considered in cabinet. I will point out also that there is an interdepartmental committee working with the task force on which the Department of Trade and Commerce will be represented. I think I can reassure the hon. member that all members of the cabinet will have an important part to play in this work.

Mr. Douglas: I wish to assure the Prime Minister that I was not trying to advise him on the cabinet. If I had, my recommendation would have been much more far reaching. I wish to ask him if the data which has been collected by the Minister of Trade and Commerce regarding the reactions to the guide lines of the various foreign subsidiaries will be made available to the cabinet committee and to the task force?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, it will indeed, Mr. Speaker, as well as data which has been collected by agencies of the government including the Economic Council of Canada.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the exclusion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce from the task force under the chairmanship of the senior Minister without Portfolio, he does not think his views could be put forward in that committee at the same time as in the cabinet after the recommendations have been received?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will ask the hon. member whether he does not think that his question is argumentative?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question which is not argumentative. Is the Prime Minister in agreement with the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition knows that his question cannot be put in this way. An answer cannot be given as to the accuracy of a press report.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was not asking for an opinion on the accuracy of the statement. I am asking whether government policy was enunciated yesterday in San Francisco. I am quoting from the Ottawa Journal of January 25, where the Minister of Trade and Commerce was quoted as saying:

> —some Canadians attitudes on foreign investment giving rise to conflicting reports in the United States. Canada welcomes foreign capital regardless of these doubt-provoking remarks to the contrary from time to time.

Were those remarks representative of government policy and were they made after consultation following the return of the prodigal son?

Mr. Pearson: In reply to the question of my hon. friend I will merely refer him to the old Chinese proverb that he is barking in the wrong camp.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, what we are trying to find out is in what camp this government is camping; is it the Gordon camp, the Pearson camp or indeed the finance camp?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, we are all in the same camp.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

COMPANY OF YOUNG CANADIANS

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—REPORTED EXPULSION OF MEMBER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I wish to ask him whether it is correct that a few weeks ago a member of the Company of Young Canadians by the name of Peter Mussalem, after a disturbing series of court actions, was sentenced to 14 days in prison for supplying liquor to a minor in the Delta area of the Northwest Territories. I believe the territorial circuit court reversed the sentence, but this young man was ordered out of the territory. Can the Prime Minister verify and comment on this?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, I cannot, but I will make inquiries.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORTED U.S. INTENTION TO INCREASE TAX ON CANADIAN INVESTMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if he can report to the house or comment upon a statement from Washington today to the effect that congress is considering an increase in the withholding tax on Canadian investments from 15 per cent to 30 per cent?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): I am sure the hon. gentleman and the house will be pleased to know the exemptions that have hitherto been applied to Canada will remain in existence.

[Later:]

Mr. Winkler: So that there will not be an error in the record, Mr. Speaker, earlier I asked the Minister of Finance a question about an announcement from Washington. I used the term "witholding tax" but I should have used the term "equalization tax". The answer, as I understand it, applied to the equalization tax.

NORTH VIET NAM—SUPPLYING OF MISSILES BY SOVIET UNION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that the minister has told us he has made Canada's position known to the United States government with respect to the cessation of the bombing of North Viet Nam, has the minister made known to the government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics Canada's position with respect to the Soviet union supplying missiles and other weapons in North Viet Nam for the purpose of destroying United States aircraft? I ask this question because of the position of the government of the Soviet Union as co-chairman of the Geneva conference, and the consequent relationship to Canada's position as one of the three members of the international control commission on Viet Nam.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I did not hear all of the question. I will study it and give an answer tomorrow.

Mr. Nesbitt: May I ask a supplementary question for the minister's consideration at the same time. Has the government established a position with respect to supplying missiles and other arms by the Soviet union to North Viet Nam?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, Mr. Speaker, but this is a very important matter and I want to give it careful consideration.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ASSISTANCE TO CARIBBEAN COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Speaker, strictly for the purpose of eliciting information, as usual. On January 16, as recorded on page 11824 of Hansard, the minister mentioned the meeting to be held at Saint Lucia later this month to discuss a certain course of assistance to be given by Canada to the Caribbean countries. In view of the new semi-independent status of several of the islands of the West Indies, and their need for substantial trade and economic assistance, will the minister make a statement tomorrow and inform the house of Canada's plans to co-operate with our friendly neighbours in the Caribbean?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): My hon. friend has not been keeping up with the activities of the government. The statement which he asks to be made tomorrow was made by the Prime Minister and my colleagues who were meeting with the Commonwealth Caribbean countries last July in Ottawa.

Mr. Churchill: I should like to bring the minister into the twentieth century. I am talking about a meeting to be held at the end of January, which is not far away. Would he tell us immediately about that meeting, the plans for co-operation, and what Canada's suggestions are for assisting our friendly neighbours in the Caribbean?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That, Mr. Speaker, is a rather constructive question to which I can readily give a reply. If my hon. friend will read the statement made by the Prime Minister at the conference in July—

Mr. Churchill: I have read it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —he will see it was agreed that we would meet on the official level to take steps to implement the announcement of government policy made by the Prime Minister at that conference.

FINANCE

INSURANCE COMPANIES—POSSIBLE LEGISLATIVE ACTION BY GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Can the minister inform the house whether his meeting or meetings with insurance company officials and others resulted in agreement on necessary legislative action? If so, when may we expect the minister to introduce such legislation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): I had very useful discussions with the general insurance companies, the Canadian companies that write fire, theft and accident insurance, on possible improvements in legislation. They made a number of suggestions to us and we made a number of suggestions to them. My officials are preparing some drafts which will be discussed shortly with the industry. Then I expect I will be bringing forward some legislation. I cannot predict now when that will be. I should add, however, that the Canadian companies, while they felt some improvement in legislation was possible, did not feel the failure of North American General was a serious blow to the reputation of Canadian insurance companies.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the minister's reply, I should like to ask whether his officials are considering legislation concerned with the interests of policy-holders and Canada's economy, or whether they are considering legislation concerned with the interests of general insurance companies?

Mr. Sharp: Needless to say, Mr. Speaker, the interests of policyholders are very much involved in the reputation of the insurance companies themselves.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): May I ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Athabasca. There have been two supplementary questions and we have to move on, since there are only 30 minutes for questions today.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NEW CLASSIFICATION OF PIPERS AS MUSICIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Athabasca): I have a question for the Associate Minister of National Defence. Is it true that the Minister of National Defence has reversed the decision of the defence staff to put pipers into a different category from musicians?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker. An announcement was made today that the decision to separate pipers from musicians in the recently announced new trade classification has been reversed. Henceforth pipers will be in the same category as musicians for all matters, including trades pay. As the immortal Robbie Burns might have put it:

> Their skills and craft hae put me daft,
> They've ta'en me in, and a' that;
> So pipers now musicians are
> Wi a' their blaw and a' that!

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I have a supplementary question for the Associate Minister of National Defence. Now that the Minister of National Defence is in the mood, is he going to make a few more reversals?

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

ROBERT BURNS—REQUEST FOR COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I have a question for the Prime Minister. May I say that I certainly appreciated the accent of the associate minister in his reply; it was excellent. In view of the fact that today is the anniversary of the birthday of that great Scot, Robert Burns, and in view of the fact I am sure the Prime Minister has a very soft spot in his heart for all the Scots who have contributed and are contributing to this country, may I ask the right hon. gentleman if the government would give consideration to issuing a stamp, during this centennial year, as has been done in the past not only by Britain but by the Soviet union, to honour Burns and all the Scots in this country?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Well, of course, nothing would give me greater pleasure than to give consideration to that proposal.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. C. Lachance (Lafontaine): Could the Minister of Transport inform the house if the hon. member for Lapointe, since his return from a holiday in Martinique, has requested the assistance of federal government icebreakers for those winter trips between his constituency of Lapointe and the port of Montreal by way of the St. Lawrence river aboard his $15,000 luxury yacht purchased last summer in Toronto, Ontario.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Lachance: I wish to discuss the matter at ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ITALY—PURCHASE OF DAIRY CATTLE FOR FLOOD RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, may I address my question to the Minister of Agriculture. The question pertains to an announcement made the other day by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the effect that Canada was going to spend $400,000 to buy dairy cattle to help the flood stricken people in Italy. I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if it is a fact that only Holstein cattle are to be purchased for shipment to Italy. If so, can he explain why the taxpayers' money is not being used to purchase other breeds of dairy cattle as well?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am rather astonished to find my hon. friend is prejudiced against Holsteins. I should like to instruct him that the choice of cattle purchased lies with Italy. We provide the funds, but they choose the cattle they wish.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, I would not want the minister to get away with the statement that I am prejudiced against Holstein cattle. I am not, but I am interested in the sale of all breeds of dairy cattle purchased with the taxpayers' money.

[Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria).]

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—PROPOSED FURTHER DEVELOPMENT BY U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources which is of national importance. Has the minister's attention been drawn to press dispatches from Washington to the effect that the United States has taken advantage of the Columbia River treaty agreement to raise the existing Grand Coulee dam capacity from 2 million kilowatts to 9.2 million kilowatts, and that they are frankly curious as to how Canada's remaining hydro resources will be developed? Will the minister make inquiries as to the reason for this jubilation on the part of the United States?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question may be of great importance, but I doubt whether it is acceptable in the way it is now asked. I understand that the hon. member would like to have a statement on the part of the minister. Perhaps the minister will do this on another occasion.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question which is supplementary to the question you have ruled out of order?

Mr. Speaker: I will allow the hon. member to ask another question.

Mr. Herridge: I wish to direct this question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of these unexpected and recent developments with regard to increasing power production on the Columbia in the United States, did the minister anticipate these developments when he was assuring the standing committee on external affairs, when it was studying the Columbia River treaty, that half of the power production on the Columbia in the United States would be returned to Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have the impression that this supplementary or second question is of the same nature as the first one, and therefore cannot be accepted.

BANKRUPTCY

POSSIBLE LEGISLATIVE ACTION FOLLOWING COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question either to the Minister of Finance and Receiver General, or to the President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Registrar General of Canada, or to either one of the parliamentary secretaries with respect to the legislation on fishing vessels.

Is the minister to which my question applies considering the possibility of appointing a parliamentary committee to review the various bankruptcies which have occurred, so that justice may be done to those persons affected by them?

[English]

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will take this question as notice and bring it to the attention of the Acting Registrar General when he returns.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

REQUEST FOR POLICY STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that in this our centennial year our highways will be taxed to the limit, will the Prime Minister make a statement now or within a few days and tell this house precisely where the government stands on the important aspects of highway safety, and what may be expected by way of leadership on the problem?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that it would be appropriate on orders of the day to make a statement of that kind, which would be fairly lengthy. However, I can say that I had a very useful meeting with my colleague the Minister of Industry and members of the Canadian Highway Council the morning before last, when we assured them of our co-operation in the work that they are doing. Perhaps at a suitable opportunity the minister concerned will be able to make a statement in more detail.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO TAXATION COMMISSION REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. When will the Carter report on taxation be presented to the house?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I answer this question because I think I have some later information than the Prime Minister. It is my hope that the Carter commission report, at least the first five volumes, will be submitted to me during the month of February, and I hope to table it as soon as I receive it.

Mr. L. M. Brand (Saskatoon): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of statements made yesterday by one of the members of the Carter royal commission and the chairman of the Canadian Tax Foundation, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he agrees with Mr. Vineberg that Canadians will be profoundly shocked and will suffer pain and anguish from the contents of the Carter report.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, arising out of the question asked by the hon. member for Saskatoon may I ask whether Mr. Vineberg, one of the members of the commission, was correct when he said that the report would be made public on a Saturday, possibly February 11, 18 or 25, to avoid affecting the stock markets during trading hours. Was he also correct in the prediction that he made as to its contents, and the fact that a capital gains tax, not retroactive in effect, would be one of the recommendations?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the right hon. gentleman is more familiar with the views of this commission, which he appointed, than I would be. I have not read this report. I have the same information as is reported in the newspapers about the possible dates, but I really do not know anything more than that.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MONTREAL—REFUSAL TO RECOGNIZE BARGAINING UNITS AT ANGUS SHOPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Since the Canada Labour Relations Board has just refused to recognize normal bargaining units, with regard to the request made by the Angus factory workers, would the government finally agree to amend the federal Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation

Act, so as to allow such normal bargaining units?

[English]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, an inquiry by experts is being undertaken at the present time into the field of labour legislation. Until they make their report to the government it would be premature to say what might or might not be done in this field.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Is the Prime Minister aware that on October 25 last, 35 federal Liberal members from Quebec spoke publicly in favour of normal bargaining units?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is out of order.

[English]

NATURAL GAS

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—SUGGESTED TWINNING OF LINE IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether he has seen the report emanating from Washington today indicating that the examiner for the federal power commission states that the commission will not make a decision on the Trans-Canada application until late this fall, and that there may be another two years delay as a result of commission hearings and court procedures. In light of this, is the minister contemplating asking the cabinet to ask the National Energy Board to reassess the situation with a view to twinning the line in northern Ontario immediately because of shortages of natural gas in both northern Ontario and southern Ontario?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the first part of the question stems either from the imagination of the newspaperman or of the hon. member; the suggestion is not to be found in the examiner's commentaries. With respect to the other point, I am quite sure that the hon. member is aware that an application would have to be made to the National Energy Board to do this. It would be entirely illegal to proceed otherwise.

[Mr. Allard.]

Mr. Peters: A supplementary question. Is the minister not of the opinion that the National Energy Board also has a responsibility to the Canadian government in—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is now asking the minister to express an opinion and this, of course, is not in order.

ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT BOARD

STUDIES HELD UP BY LACK OF QUALIFIED STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I promised to answer a question asked by the hon. member for Prince about possible delays in construction projects undertaken by the Atlantic Development Board. The information that I have from the board is that no construction projects have been delayed because of staff shortages, but some economic planning studies have been held up due to difficulties in obtaining staff with the necessary qualifications. I could give the hon. gentleman a list of those studies.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

AFRICA—REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF EXTERNAL AID OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I wonder whether the Prime Minister might consider contacting his parliamentary secretary, who is now on special assignment in west and north Africa, to see whether his itinerary might be diverted to enable him to visit central and east Africa to meet at first hand some of the 1,000 Canadians in that area who are serving under the external aid branch and CUSO, and who are reported to be complaining bitterly that they are forgotten men as far as the Canadian government is concerned.

May I ask further, if this is not possible, whether the Prime Minister would consider setting up a regional external aid office in the area so these dedicated representatives who serve Canada so ably might have more effective co-ordination and direction, which is so essential.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): My hon. friend's question has undoubtedly been inspired by a story in a morning newspaper. The Prime Minister suggested that I reply to this question. I think there is some justification for the allegations made in that story. In answer thereto I would simply say that the closing of the office in Salisbury has been partly responsible for the problems in Malawi and Zambia. I believe the situation will be corrected by the staff that has been sent to Kenya under the new ambassador.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

APPEARANCE OF MR. VON THADDEN ON PROGRAM "SUNDAY"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, on Monday the Leader of the Opposition asked me whether the question of Mr. von Thadden appearing on C.B.C. television had been considered by the corporation's board of directors.

I am informed by the president of the C.B.C. that no formal reference was made to the C.B.C. board of directors, as the decision to withdraw the invitation to Mr. von Thadden to come to Canada and, instead, to interview him in Germany fell within established policy. In view of the widespread publicity surrounding the matter, C.B.C. management took the precaution of consulting some members of the board individually.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister if the C.B.C. management consulted with members of the board about the name mentioned by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition?

Miss LaMarsh: I have not any such information.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

PORTAGE LA PRAIRIE—AVAILABILITY OF CENTENNIAL TRAIN TO SCHOOL CHILDREN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): May I also answer a question posed by the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa with respect to the confederation train. The hon. member suggested that during the three days the train would be in Portage la Prairie it would not be open all the time. I am informed by the officials in charge that during the three days—Saturday, Sunday and Monday—the train will be in Portage, it will be open for the entire period. I think hon. members should realize that there is only one train. It will be on the road for 331 days this year and will be unavailable to the public only for 15½ days, 10½ of which are to be taken up with travelling and 5, it is anticipated, for servicing.

PENSIONS

LEGISLATION RESPECTING PLANS UNDER FEDERAL JURISDICTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. One of the very few items on the order paper to which the Prime Minister did not refer when he gave the list of business for the remainder of this session is the bill under the ministers name having to do with protecting pension rights and benefits in plans coming under federal jurisdiction. Will that legislation be proceeded with during the course of this session?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Prime Minister did not mean to leave that out. Probably there is the suggestion, by inference, that smaller bills of this kind might be put in at odd times—

Mr. Pearson: Non-controversial items.

Mr. Sharp: Non-controversial matters such as this may be introduced at any time. I am ready to introduce this at any time.

Mr. Knowles: That is the way to make a bill controversial; call it non-controversial.

EDUCATION

ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES TO PROVIDE TRAINED UNIVERSITY PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister based on a statement recently released by the presidents of the universities of Canada, that the most urgent responsibility for universities is to train graduate students as teachers, scientists and professional leaders. Keeping in mind that construction of new buildings has been stimulated by the federal health resources fund of $500 million, also that unless appropriate provisions are made to meet the demands of personnel the new buildings might not have the staff or the scientific equipment with which to operate, can the Prime Minister say whether the federal government will consider aiding the provinces in this urgent manpower need?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I agree with my hon. friend on the importance of the question. At the last federal-provincial conference we made proposals which will result in increased assistance to the provinces. The hon. member may also recall that in the list of legislative proposals I mentioned was a bill for further assistance to post-secondary education. Our proposals will be made at that time, and I hope that will be soon.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Some time before Christmas I asked the right hon. gentleman when the final report of the B and B commission would be available. At that time he felt it would be filed before Christmas. Could he shed more light on the matter at this time?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I can throw a little more light on it, Mr. Speaker. It is hoped that the report of this important commission will be made this summer. I certainly hope it will be.

Mr. Skoreyko: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I hate to disagree with the Prime Minister when he calls it an important commission—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should not argue; he should ask his question.

Mr. Skoreyko: I disagree that the commission—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows he should not say that. He cannot enter into an argument. He may ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Skoreyko: In view of the delay, is the Prime Minister prepared to tell this house how many more thousands of dollars must be spent by the government of Canada on this absolutely ridiculous commission?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question period has expired.

[Mr. Rynard.]

TRANSPORTATION

PROVISION FOR DEFINITION AND IMPLEMENTATION OF NATIONAL POLICY

The house resumed from Tuesday, January 24, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-231, to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other acts in consequence thereof, and to enact other consequential provisions—Mr. Pickersgill—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee resumed consideration on clause 74 and the amendment moved thereto yesterday afternoon, the hon. member for Bow River, on a point of order, rose to speak about the validity of the amendment. A number of committee members made statements for which I am grateful. At the end of these the committee extended to me time to examine the statements made. For that I am also grateful.

I apologize for not having been able to make a ruling last evening. Considering the fundamental rules of procedure involved and the complexity of the bill before the committee I thought it wise to take enough time to read the statements of hon. members, to read the citations referred to, and to compare the two proposals involved. I have done that and am prepared to rule if the committee wishes that I do so.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Does the committee wish me to do that now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can it be understood that clause 1, on which the committee was proceeding last night, shall stand? When Your Honour has made his ruling we shall be on clause 74 and not clause 1.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: The officials at the table advise me that when the committee rose last evening, clause 1 and the amendment of the hon. member for Calgary South were being considered. Is it the wish of the committee that clause 1 stand, and that I proceed with the ruling on the point of order, on clause 74 and the amendment?

On clause 74.

The Chairman: Yesterday, when the amendment proposed by the Minister of Fisheries to clause 74 of Bill C-231 was being considered by the committee, the hon. member for Bow River raised a point of order concerning the validity of the proposed amendment.

In his submission, the hon. member for Bow River contended that a question being made once and carried in the affirmative or negative cannot be questioned again, but must stand as a judgment of the house—particularly in respect of one bill and more particularly in respect of one clause. The hon. member went on to say that the Minister of Fisheries, in his proposed amendment to clause 74, is really trying to repeat what was set out in subsection 329 of clause 50 upon which a decision of the committee had already been taken. The hon. member also suggested that there was not sufficient variance in this amendment to constitute a new question.

Included in the authorities used in support of his point of order, the hon. member referred to citations 284 and 285, Beauchesne's third edition, and to citations 162 and 163 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, which are to be found on pages 136 and 137.

The Chair has read very carefully the submission made by the hon. member for Bow River and the citations to which he referred. Citations 284 and 285 of Beauchesne's third edition are essentially the same as citations 162 and 163 of his fourth edition. I should like to read citation 162 and also 163 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, now, as found on page 136.

A resolution may be rescinded and an order of the house discharged, notwithstanding a rule urged, "that a question, being once made and carried in the affirmative or negative cannot be questioned again, but must stand as a judgment of the house." Technically indeed, the rescinding of a vote is the matter of a new question; the form being to read the resolution of the house and to move that it be rescinded; and thus the same question which had been resolved in the affirmative is not again offered, although its effect is annulled.

To rescind a negative vote, except on the different stages of bills, is a proceeding of greater difficulty, because the same question would have to be offered again. The only means, therefore, by which a negative vote can be revoked, is by proposing another question, similar in its general purport to that which has been rejected, but with sufficient variance to constitute a new question, and the house would determine whether it were substantially the same question or not...

Sometimes the house may not be prepared to rescind a resolution, but may be willing to modify its judgment by considering and agreeing to another resolution relating to the same object. Thus, a resolution having been agreed to which condemned an official appointment, the house by a subsequent resolution withdrew the censure which the previous resolution had conveyed.

May I now proceed to citation 163:

A mere alteration of the words of a question, without any substantial change in its object will not be sufficient to evade the rule that no question shall be offered which is substantially the same as one which has already been expressed in the current session. It is possible, however, so far to vary the character of a motion as to withdraw it from the operation of the rule.

The Chair considers that citation 163 of Beauchesne's third edition, deals explicitly with the second paragraph of citation 285 of Beauchesne's third edition, deals explicitly with the question of order now before the committee.

The importance of this citation to the question now before the committee was underlined by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition when he specifically referred to it in his submission.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, in his contribution considered citation 163 as extremely relevant to the point of order before the committee.

In a most interesting contribution by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, reference was made to citations from Bourinot's fourth edition and May's fifteenth edition. In presenting his supporting authorities the hon. member dealt in the main with the proposition that——a motion or amendment may not be brought forward which is the same, in substance, as a question which has been decided in the affirmative or negative during the current session. The rule may be fully stated as follows: No question or bill shall be offered in either house that is substantially the same as one on which its judgment has already been expressed in the current session.

The Chair has also carefully considered the contributions made by the hon. member for Medicine Hat, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona and the hon. member for Acadia and, of course, the Minister of Transport as well as other hon. members.

In summary it would appear to the Chair that there is no disagreement either from the minister or from the other members who participated in the debate that a question once decided by the committee cannot be raised again in the same form in the same session. The real question is the application of the rules. This was well stated by the hon. member for Peace River when he said this:

> The rules are there and the minister is not quarelling with them. The issue is the application of those rules to the fairly specific facts of this case. With this in mind, Mr. Chairman, what is the real pith and substance, the core or the root of what the amendment is trying to achieve? I submit we must compare the amendment with what the proposed section 329, which was struck out, attempted to do.

What is the rule? After considering all the authorities cited by hon. members it appears that the rule which most specifically applies to the present question is 163 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, at page 137, and I pray the indulgence of the committee for reading it again:

> A mere alteration of the words of a question, without any substantial change in its object will not be sufficient to evade the rule that no question shall be offered which is substantially the same as one which has already been expressed in the current session. It is possible, however, so far to vary the character of a motion as to withdraw it from the operation of the rule.

The problem which the Chair has to decide is whether or not the amendment moved by the Minister of Fisheries is sufficiently different from subclause 329 of clause 50 as to constitute a substantially different question.

In the final analysis the decision must rest on a judgment as to whether the two propositions are similar or substantially different. Hon. members will recognize that due to the complexity of the legislation it has been necessary in arriving at a decision, to make a very careful examination of the propositions enunciated in subclause 329 of clause 50 and the amendment moved by the Minister of Fisheries to clause 74.

In my judgment the two proposals are substantially different and for the following reasons:

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Shameful ruling.

The Chairman: 1. Subclause 329 of clause 50 dealt with statutory rates on the carriage of grain and grain products in western Canada. On the other hand, the proposed amendment deals with the whole field of statutory and other rates. This, in the opinion of the Chair, constitutes a substantial difference.

• (4:10 p.m.)

2. Subclause 329 of clause 50 would have provided for a single review. On the other hand the proposed amendment to clause 74 provides for continuing reviews. I also consider this to be an essential difference.

[The Chairman.]

3. Subclause 329 of clause 50 would have provided for a mandatory review. On the other hand, the proposed amendment to clause 74 provides for reviews on application by the railway companies. I suggest that this is a further substantial difference.

Some hon. members have argued that while these two approaches are different the effect would be the same. This too is a matter of judgment, but not for the Chair.

I was impressed by the submission made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when, in dealing with citation 163 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, he stated that in comparing the two proposals the word "object" was crucial to the discussion. I have given particular attention to this point of view in arriving at my decision, but for the reasons which I have given in my comparisons of the two proposals I am of the opinion that the objects are substantially different in each case. Therefore I propose to accept the amendment and to submit it to the committee.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): A shameful ruling; a partisan ruling.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, the committee is grateful for the care and attention you have given to this ruling but regretfully, sir, I must appeal the ruling to the Speaker.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair, and the chairman of the committee made the following report:

> Mr. Speaker, the question is an appeal to Mr. Speaker from a decision of the chairman of the committee of the whole pursuant to section 4 of standing order 59. In committee of the whole when clause 74 of Bill C-231 was being considered, the hon. Minister of Fisheries proposed an amendment as follows:
> "(a) by striking out lines 35 to 38, inclusive, on page 62 of the Bill, as reprinted, and by substituting therefor the following:
> Reductions continued. "468A. (1) The reductions in rates that, immediately before the coming into force of Part V of the National Transportation Act, were in force by virtue of section 468 continue in force subject to subsections (2) to (4)."
> (b) by striking out line 30 on page 63 of the Bill, as reprinted, and by substituting therefor the following:
> "that are subject to Order No. 96300 of the"
> (c) by adding immediately at the end of page 64 of the Bill, as reprinted, the following:
> Definitions. "470. (1) In this section,
> "Statutory rate." (a) "statutory rate" means a rate for the carriage of any commodity between points in Canada maintained for the public benefit at a rate or level of rates specified in this or any other Act of the Parliament of Canada; and

"Substituted rate." (b) "substituted rate" means a rate fixed by the Commission under this Act or substituted for any rate disallowed by the Commission pursuant to this Act.

Application. (2) Subject to subsection (3), a railway company under the jurisdiction of Parliament may make an application to the Commission to investigate the revenues and costs attributable to the carriage of any commodity by the company at a statutory rate or substituted rate.

(3) No application shall be made under subsection (2)

Limitation. (a) in the case of a statutory rate, until after the expiration of two years from the coming into force of this section, and

(b) in the case of a substituted rate, until after the expiration of two years from the day that the substituted rate became effective.

Report and recommendation. (4) After an investigation under this section, the Commission shall report its findings thereon to the Governor in Council and shall recommend in its report the amount of payments, if any required in the opinion of the Commission to assist the company to meet its costs of operation in respect of the carriage of any commodity at a statutory rate or substituted rate."

Whereupon the hon. member for Bow River raised a point of order to the effect that the amendment endeavoured to reintroduce into the bill a provision which had been set out in subclause 329 of clause 50, and since that subclause had been deleted from the bill by a vote of the committee and that as there was not sufficient variance in the amendment to clause 74 to constitute a new section, the vote on subclause 329 must stand as the judgment of the committee.

The Chair ruled that in his judgment the two proposals are substantially different for the following reasons:

1. Subclause 329 of clause 50 dealt with statutory rates on the carriage of grain and grain products in western Canada. On the other hand, the proposed amendment deals with the whole field of statutory and other rates. This, in the opinion of the Chair, was a substantial difference.

2. Subclause 329 of clause 50 would have provided for a single review. On the other hand, the proposed amendment to clause 74 provides for continuing reviews. The Chair also considered this to be a substantial difference.

3. Subclause 329 of clause 50 would have provided for a mandatory review. On the other hand, the proposed amendment to clause 74 provides for reviews on applications by the railway companies. It was the opinion of the Chair that this too was a further substantial difference.

Therefore, for the reasons just stated, the chair ruled the amendment to be in order. Whereupon the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre appealed the chairman's ruling to the Speaker.

Transportation

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, before dealing with the argument in reference to the appeal which is before you, if it is possible I should like to speak to a point of order within the point of order with reference to the appeal. With the greatest respect, since the ruling is so important, particularly the last part, I should like to ask that we go on with something else until we have a copy of the chairman's judgment. In making my argument I would suggest that this is such a serious matter that it affects not only the Railway Act itself but, in my opinion and in the opinion of many other members to whom I have spoken in the past few moments, the very rules which make up this parliament. In our opinion this action now would allow the minister to do again what he once did. We should like to have a copy of the chairman's judgment, particularly where he differentiated between section 329 and the amendment to clause 74.

We should like to have a copy of that judgment so that we would be in a position to intelligently and logically and properly answer it. I feel there should be an opportunity to have a proper appeal and have the facts laid very carefully before you. As a result of my experience over a period of nine years in this house under different speakers I have a great deal of confidence that you will weigh the facts and the law most carefully. Although this is not criticism of anyone, I am a little surprised that copies have not been made available to members who took an active part in the argument yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: I am not too sure what can be done about circulating a copy of the judgment. I appreciate, however, that it might be difficult for hon. members on both sides of the house to argue either in support of or in opposition to the judgment of the chairman without having that judgment before them. I also would like to have an opportunity to study it. I am open to suggestions from members of the house on this particular point.

Mr. Woolliams: May I make the suggestion that since we still have clause 1 before us, without delaying the proceedings we might, with the consent of the Minister of Transport and other hon. members, go on with that debate while some of us study the judgment so that we will be in a position more intelligently to argue the case on appeal before you. We believe the decision which Your Honour will make will be one which is on something that is very fundamental. We also feel that if the amendment of the minister is allowed to stand, parliament will be usurped.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member for Bow River who has made a very reasonable suggestion, in which I had intended to join him, on reflection would wish to withdraw the last few words he used. If he would do that, I would join with him in the suggestion that the hearing of the appeal be adjourned so that we might carry on with something else, because I feel just as strongly as he does on this matter. After all, it was my motion. This sometimes seems to be forgotten. I think I too should be given the opportunity to judge and weigh this matter. I listened very carefully and the judgment did say that this is a very intricate matter. I agree. I think that all of us who are concerned with preserving the rules of the house would wish that Your Honour should hear a most considered presentation before the appeal is determined.

I am sure the hon. gentleman, when speaking with some warmth, did not wish to reflect on the Chair. I would suggest that Your Honour leave the chair and that we proceed in the way which the hon. member for Bow River has suggested. We could go on with clause 1. There also is an amendment in respect of it which perhaps could be disposed of. Also there may be some further general debate. I am not sure we would wish to carry clause 1 before we finally have determined the other matter, but we might spend some time on it. I fully recognize, as does the hon. member, how important it is that we uphold the rules of the house and have a right decision, whichever way it may go.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I think these suggestions should be carefully considered by Your Honour. We now are dealing with a new rule in respect of appeal to the Speaker. It is on a different basis than it was in recent years. This particular problem of whether the ruling of the Chairman should be placed in the hands of the members is something which has not cropped up before.

Under these circumstances—and this may apply in the future—I think when the house is considering a subject which is as serious as this that we should have a break and that members of the house should not immediately be called upon to argue the point of order before Mr. Speaker, without having a full opportunity to study the judgment of the Chairman. It happens, in this particular debate, that we could go back into committee to deal with clause 1. We may in the future have occasions when we would not have anything quite so convenient to go back to; nevertheless, it is important that we have an opportunity to study the judgment.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member of course is suggesting a change in the rules. I believe however that it would be the part of wisdom to deal with this particular case, which I think is complicated enough, and forget about what might happen in future circumstances.

In this particular instance obviously there is unanimity that hon. members be given an opportunity to study the ruling of the Chairman of the committee of the whole. Therefore I propose to leave the chair, so the committee may resume its work which was interrupted when consideration of clause 1 commenced.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair I wonder whether the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) would withdraw the last few words of his closing sentence, which did not seem to relate to the—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is my understanding that the hon. member for Bow River indicated he meant no reflection on the Chair.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I would be the last to cast reflection. I may have used the words "could usurp parliament". I should like to thank Your Honour for giving us an opportunity to consider this ruling. It is important and I appreciate that generosity exercised within your discretion. I do not know when our remarks will be heard on this subject, but we will have some time to consider it, particularly if copies are made available.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer one point to your honour for consideration in relation to the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill). Because of unusual and important circumstances the question at issue, as referred to in the judgment of the Chairman of the committee, does not actually involve an interpretation of the rules. It is not a question of law but rather a question of fact.

Perhaps Your Honour would consider the suggestion that under similar circumstances when questions of fact must be decided they be referred to members of the house, and that when questions involving only interpretation of the rules are involved they be referred to Your Honour for decision. I just throw that suggestion out for Your Honour's consideration.

And the house having resumed in committee.

The Chairman: The committee will now proceed to a consideration of clause 1 and the amendment moved thereto by the hon. member for Calgary South.

On clause 1—National Transportation Policy.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman's amendment was not actually put to the committee last night. That was at my request, because I wished to consider overnight whether this kind of amendment is competent to be moved under this bill.

I was quite tired last night and perhaps my faculties were not all they should have been, but when looking at the amendment I felt it went beyond the scope of the bill, in the same way the amendment moved by the hon. member for Nickel Belt went beyond its scope.

I realize that this is not strictly speaking a point of order, but there is another problem we must consider, and that is whether or not the amendment seeks to do something which, if it were to have any legislative effect, could only be done after an amendment to the constitution had been made and, perhaps in all cases, could be done only by a provincial legislature. I do not particularly want to enter a discussion on that point, but perhaps your honour would consider it.

This bill seeks to lay down a national railway policy, but does not in any way seek to make any provision in respect of municipal affairs, municipal taxation, the apportionment of municipal taxation or the appropriate burden to be borne by one person in a municipality as compared with another.

As to whether this amendment goes beyond the scope of the bill, it might be argued that clause 1 is only declaratory of principles, and that it has no operative effect, though it is intended to guide those who will make decisions in respect of those clauses which do have an operative effect. It does seem to me that it would be rather difficult for these proposed amendments to be related in any way to any of the operative parts of the bill. Perhaps your honour would consider the question as to whether this amendment does go beyond the scope of the bill.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I am not sure I am entitled to speak to the merits, but before attempting to do so I wish to deal with the point referred by the minister for your honour's consideration. If you read the amendment you will note, as the minister pointed out, that it suggests there be an insertion to the declaration of policy or intent. It cannot be considered that any part of clause 1 constitutes an imperative or mandatory direction to the government. It simply suggests that in the view of this house the national transportation policy should contain certain things, and that the government and the Transport Commission to be appointed should take into account certain things in rendering a judgment.

The hon. member for Calgary South was careful in his amendment and included the words "so far as practicable". That is very important because those words can be stretched far enough to include a direction to the commission and the government to do something so far as practicable within the terms of our constitutional limitations. If an argument in this regard is to be raised in a serious way I hope the minister will direct our attention to the specific statutes which might constitute a constitutional barrier. I think I have an idea what they are.

Not only does the argument in respect of this amendment involve a constitutional aspect, it involves, as the minister has stated more peremptorily, the question as to whether it goes beyond the original scope of the bill.

The amendment in part states:

> (ii) each mode transport, so far as practicable and without prejudice to any single mode, bears a fair proportion of the costs of local government services in those municipalities in which the mode of transport operates.

I think by this amendment the Transport Commission is being directed in its deliberation to bear this in mind. Surely that was the purpose of the hon. member for Calgary South, and it is a very laudable purpose. I can recall that not so very many years ago the city of Winnipeg initiated proceedings, which went as far as the Supreme Court of Canada, and possibly as far as the Privy Council, challenging the right of the Canadian Pacific Railway to exempt itself from the payment of local taxes in this way. I remember that case well because I was involved at that time in a consideration of other aspects which dealt with Crowsnest pass rates.

Many of us in the west feel that if the C.P.R. was right in one instance in insisting on a rigid adherence to the letter of the law, the statutes and statutory contracts, it should adhere to the letter of the law so far as statutory rates are concerned. At that time the railway companies were making a very great "to do" about trying to get out of the Crowsnest pass rates, on the basis that they were not compensatory. This is all that I will say on the merits of the amendment. I strongly support the very reasoned and excellent arguments made by the hon. member for Calgary South.

On the question of the point of order I wish to direct Your Honour's attention to what I have brought out previously on the use of the words "as far as practicable," plus the fact that it is not a mandatory direction to the government or to the board but simply a statement of very sound, sensible and wise policy. Of course in the implementation of that policy the Transport Commission will be guided and bound by the more specific rules which are contained in other parts of the legislation. Therefore I ask Your Honour to rule that the amendment is in order, and that in expressing its views the committee may be divided on this amendment.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words with respect to the point of order raised by the Minister of Transport. I gather that he has raised it seriously and is asking your honour to rule whether or not the amendment moved by the hon. member for Calgary South is in order. In addition to the arguments just made by the hon. member for Peace River, may I ask your honour to take note of subclause (b) of clause 1 which immediately precedes the spot at which the hon. member for Calgary South would insert his additional words. Subclause (b) as it appears on page 12149 of Hansard of January 23 reads as follows:

(b) each mode of transport, so far as practicable, bears a fair proportion of the real costs of the resources, facilities and services provided that mode of transport at public expense; each mode of transport, so far as practicable and without prejudice to any single mode, bears a fair proportion of the costs of local government services in those municipalities in which the mode of transport operates; and...

The hon. member for Calgary South proposed that that paragraph be followed immediately by the following subclause:

It seems to me that there is a substantial degree of similarity between these two subclauses. If the one which the government wishes to appear in clause 1, which is now in the name of the Minister of Public Works, is within the scope of the bill and is intra vires of the powers of the federal parliament, then the same thing follows with respect to the other one. There is a reference in the government's subclause to resources without identifying them, and we know who has the responsibility for natural resources in this country. There is also a reference to facilities and services provided at public expense without specifying at what level of public expense.

If it is in order for the government to ask these points to be considered in relation to areas which may be federal, provincial or municipal, why is it not in order for the hon. member for Calgary South to ask for the same thing? In other words, I think the hon. member for Calgary South is simply making very clear one particular aspect of what is set out in the government's subclause (b). The government might have argued that since the cost of public services is mentioned in subclause (b), what the hon. member for Calgary South is asking for is covered. He is simply asking that it be clarified.

Therefore, taking up the two points that the minister has raised, namely the scope of the bill and the question of whether it is ultra vires or intra vires, I would suggest that on both counts if subclause (b) as proposed by the government is in order, then so is the addition proposed by the hon. member for Calgary South. I would therefore support the request made by the hon. member for Peace River that Your Honour find the amendment in order.

Mr. Olson: I have listened to the statement made by the Minister of Transport in support of the argument that the amendment is out of order, in that it becomes a matter ultra vires of this parliament and of part of the constitution. I do not understand why the content of this amendment would be a violation of the constitution rather than dealing with railway statutes and agreements.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to address myself to that point in direct reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Subparagraph (b), or is it subclause (b)—some day I will take a course in terminology so as to know how to refer to the segments of the bill, and then I will probably be defeated—

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): There may be plenty of time yet.

Mr. Pickersgill: Not on this bill, I hope. Subclause (b), whether or not it can be interpreted in the very ingenious way in which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre sought to interpret it, is designed to deal only with those matters over which parliament has legislative competence. "Resources", as used in this subclause, does not mean natural resources. It means public resources, public facilities and public services that are used by a carrier, such as airports. An airport is a very good example, and so is a meteorological service. I suppose also that the National Transcontinental railway is a good example. It is a public facility belonging to the Crown, used by the C.N.R.

What is meant here is that, so far as practicable, a carrier should bear a reasonable share of the costs of airports instead of that cost being charged to the taxpayers. This is entirely within federal jurisdiction and it is a principle which could be applied in an adjudication by the commissioner or by the courts in relation to matters which are entirely within the scope of the legislative jurisdiction of this parliament.

The C.P.R. case is a special one. In so far as any other mode of transport such as the National Transcontinental railway or the Prince Edward Island railway or any of the Crown-owned railways which do not pay taxes is concerned, it is rather academic to raise this matter because the government has indicated quite clearly that it intends as a matter of policy to pay grants equal to the tax which would be paid anyway, and this does not require any legislation because it is possible for the government to authorize that now.

However, the real problem which I have with this wording is that in any adjudication under the power of the commission, which is supposed to take into account the principles as set out here, there would be an implication that the commission should do something about this, or perhaps it is just a humble prayer and petition to the carriers.

If it is thought that the commission should do anything about it, is this not what would happen? The requirement that each mode of transport, so far as practicable, bear a fair proportion of the cost of local government services in those municipalities in which the mode of transport operates would, it seems to me, place the commission in the position of being required to make a study of what constituted a fair proportion of the cost of local government services. This would of necessity, require the commission to review the cost of local government services, and what others were contributed. Fairness is not something you pick out of the air. Surely, it is something you determine in relation to what somebody else is doing. There would no doubt be a determination of the total cost of services, and the contribution made by taxpayers and groups of taxpayers. It does not seem to me that any of these consequences could flow from the importation of those words into clause 1.

Consequences could flow from the present clause 1(b). It is quite clear the commission could decide that air lines were not paying an adequate proportion of the cost of the services they were receiving from airports or from the meteorological service. I just pick that illustration out of the air as an example of what is really intended—or that the wharfage being paid at ports was not a sufficient contribution by the carriers using the facilities provided at ports. It does not seem to me there would be any way, without intruding into matters that are not within our jurisdiction, of making any kind of inquiry whatever to determine whether the consequences that should flow from this provision would, in fact, flow from it.

If for example a municipality made application to the commission to have an investigation made to ascertain whether carrier X was paying a fair share of the cost of services in the city of Saint John, would the commission be able to hear that application? How would it go about making a determination? How would it go about establishing any jurisdiction to make a determination. It seems to me it is far better to rely upon the laws of those who have the power to make laws that are applicable.

We have the agreement of Canadian Pacific Railway to a constitutional amendment at any time we can get the appropriate constitutional amendment at Westminster or here, if the hon. member for Kamloops should ever be successful in his valiant effort, which I commend and commended at the time, to repatriate our constitution. This would be even better, so far as I am concerned. If such a course was possible, I would be the first to support that action. I understand that in another century this House of Commons used to pass resolutions from time to time in favour of home rule for Ireland. I suppose that matter would scarcely come within the legislative jurisdiction of this parliament. These resolutions were not put into statutory form, it is true. However, I have always been just a little bit allergic to putting these declamatory statements into statutes, although I did vote for some very grandiloquent suggestions of that kind introduced by the right hon. gentleman who now leads the opposition. Perhaps my enthusiasm was more restrained than his was, but I still voted for it.

It may not be very serious to have this declaration in the bill if everyone understands that it was an expression of a pious hope, nothing more. A lot of people do not understand the distinction between our jurisdiction and the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures. I would be a little fearful, although I am sure the hon. member for Calgary South would not have any such intention, that ordinary citizens might think we were going to compel somebody to do something if this provision was in the bill. I just do not like to deceive people because we could not compel anybody to do anything. Whether or not this amendment is in order, I really do not like the amendment very much because it seems to me it could have no positive legislative effect. I think it might arouse hopes and expectations which, because they could not be realized, would tend to discredit us as legislators. I believe it is a sound principle of legislating to try, so far as possible, to make laws that could have some effect, and not to make laws that are merely expressive of aspirations.

Having said that, sir, I really do not feel that the world would come to an end if this amendment was held to be in order rather than out of order. I do feel it is probably beyond the scope of the bill. It does suggest we are trying to enter into a field where it is really beyond the scope of this parliament to legislate effectively. I know that is not against the rules. We could make a law here dealing with property and civil rights if we wanted to do so. However, it would not be law after the courts got at it. There is nothing to stop us from making such a purported law. I believe that the only possible place for the amendment would be in clause 1. I do not know of any other place in the bill in which you could possibly put it.

Clause 1 does set out certain principles. In so far as other public agencies are concerned which make use of the facilities of municipalities, such as railways, the harbours board, post offices and other public buildings, we have accepted the principle that we should not shelter behind the immunity of the crown but should make an appropriate contribution. Perhaps it would not be too much to say we think that pipe lines—and that is what we would be saying—interprovincial bus lines, interprovincial trucking lines, lines of shipping and railways, indeed any form of transport coming under federal jurisdiction, ought to make a reasonable contribution to municipal revenues.

I do not believe such a declaration would be out of accord with what is generally recognized to be good policy nowadays. However, I have some hesitation about putting such a provision into the bill when, as I say, I do not believe it would have any real effect. Having said that, I leave the matter to Your Honour.

Mr. Baldwin: May I ask the minister one question? Does he not agree this provision is entirely in the same category as that contained in paragraphs (a) and (c), which are simply declarations of honesty. For instance paragraph (c) reads:

> (c) each mode of transport, so far as practicable, receives compensation for the resources, facilities and services that it is required to provide as an imposed public duty;

Is there not just a hope that this will be realized, in the same way as the hon. member's amendment expresses a hope that this will be realized?

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think so. Later in the bill we have given the commission specific directions with respect to preservation of competition. For example, at the instance of the hon. member for Port Arthur we inserted in clause 20 a provision to enable the commission to look at mergers between one mode of transport and another in order to see whether they did not unduly restrict the ability to compete. In various ways we have made an effort to have carriers contribute a fair proportion of the cost of the federal resources that they use.

As far as (c) is concerned, we are very specifically making provision for payments. For example, if a branch line that is losing money must be retained in the public interest, then a payment is made to the railway for doing so. If a passenger service which we consider to be in the public interest is losing money but should be retained, then a contribution is made there. So that all of these provisions in the bill are given some legislative effect as well. However, I suggest that this amendment is something to which nc positive legislative effect could be given anywhere else in the bill, and in that respect it is quite different.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Transport has a perfect right to disagree with the suggestion that this amendment should be inserted into clause 1. He also has a perfect right to disagree with the arguments that have been advanced in support of it. But I do not believe that he has any right to try to prevent members from moving amendments with which he disagrees on the basis that they are out of order.

What we are discussing at the moment is not whether the amendment is a good or a poor amendment or is a declaration of principle. What the minister did last night was to raise a point of order in an attempt to prevent the hon. member for Calgary South moving an amendment, and he did so on the ground that it was out of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I know the hon. gentleman does not want to be unfair. All I did last night was to reserve my right to raise a point of order; and I have raised it in a pretty tentative fashion today.

Mr. Olson: The fact remains, Mr. Chairman, that we are now discussing a point of order. We could develop arguments for or against the advisability of inserting this amendment into clause 1; but this, in my opinion, is not related to the point of order which is now before the committee as to whether or not the hon. member for Calgary South is competent under the rules to move this amendment at this time.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, if you are troubled by the argument advanced by the Minister of Transport that there is some constitutional impediment involved, that you should look at the other two clauses brought in by the hon. member for Peace River and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. If the minister's argument is correct he is also violating the rules of this house by putting in such provisions as:

> (a) regulation of all modes of transport will not be of such a nature as to restrict the ability of any mode of transport to compete freely with any other modes of transport;—

The federal Minister of Transport can transfer no authority to this new Transport Commission with respect to highway transport within a province. Certainly that is one mode of transport that will be competing with other modes. Furthermore he has no constitutional authority, and neither has this house, to confer upon this new Transport Commission the right to interfere with interprovincial highway transportation, as far as bearing a fair proportion of the cost of federal resources is concerned.

I could argue for some time on this point, Mr. Chairman, but all I want to say is that I do not think the minister should try to make the argument that there are constitutional impediments in the way of the hon. member for Calgary South in his attempt to move this kind of amendment, when the very argument that he is using would in fact have prevented him from bringing in provisions already contained in clause 1. I hope the minister will be fair and will withdraw all of his objections, so that the motion can be put, and then we in this committee will decide whether or not it is advisable to make this addition to clause 1.

Mr. Pickersgill: Unless the hon. member for Kamloops particularly wants to say something, I must say that I have been somewhat impressed by the arguments of the hon. member for Peace River; I confess I was less impressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I was also impressed by one of the arguments made by the hon. member for Medicine Hat, though I do not think it would apply. I think it is inferred that only federal resources are involved, but I do see what he means. We could not say anything about how much an interprovincial trucking company should contribute toward roads in, say, the province of Alberta; that would be quite impossible of course.

The words can be construed in various ways, Mr. Chairman. I was pretty tentative when I started my argument, but I do not think I should impose upon Your Honour the need for making any decision in this matter. Quite frankly, from my argument about the point of order I think hon. members will have gathered that I do not very much like the amendment, but I am quite willing to leave it to the committee to decide whether to include it in the bill.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I should just like to express appreciation to the minister for the attitude he is taking, which should save the time of the committee. I think just to complete the record on Hansard this point should be made.

On the question whether the matter is intra vires or ultra vires, there can be no argument that this parliament has absolute jurisdiction over railways of the nature of the C.P.R. and the C.N.R. If this parliament has jurisdiction, then it can legislate with respect to the rights and obligations of those railways in the conduct of their business in Canada. The minister might feel that it is improper for us to require them to pay municipal taxes if, as they argue, there is some contractual exemption. But that, as has been pointed out, is a matter of opinion, this requirement is not beyond our power.

By his attitude the minister has shown that he will not press very hard the point as to whether it is ultra vires. Whether or not anyone feels that this should be done, it is certainly within our power to do it. I thought that this point should be made, Mr. Chairman, because I would hate to be casting my vote for any amendment which I felt might be ultra vires.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the minister for an opinion; I gather that sometimes he does not mind giving one. Even if the amendment carries it is merely a declaration. To give effect to it, it would be necessary to bring in some consequential or ensuing amendment to other statute law. Is that not the case?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, if the house saw fit to adopt the proposed amendment of the hon. member for Calgary South, then while not imposing a legal obligation it would impose, I think, a moral obligation on the government to do what it has announced it intends to do anyway, and that is to require the Canadian National Railways—it may, of course, do this itself through the treasury, which in the end might amount to the same thing as a result of the present state of the books of the railways—to contribute the equivalent taxes paid by the crown railways, which are now immune from taxation.

I think if parliament expressed this view and the government did not tell the Canadian National to do that, we should be acting in contempt of parliament, whether or not it would have any legal effect. I do not think any government therefore would be required to legislate to force trucking companies, pipe lines or other bodies to pay municipal taxes. We might decide to do that, but I think it would be better if this part said "pay the current rate of municipal taxation" rather than "a fair proportion of the costs". I do not know how you would determine a fair proportion without intruding into matters where we have no capacity to intrude into. That is about the best answer I can give, and perhaps I have gone further than it is wise to go.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Briefly I want to ask the minister a question. I am in favour of railways paying taxes to municipalities, or grants in lieu of taxes, in the same way as the federal government reimburses municipalities for its presence in a municipality. From my brief municipal experience I have learned that the railways pay a limited form of municipal tax on buildings in a municipality, and possibly on their switching and yard arrangements. Out on the lines of communication, the track through the rural sections of the country, I do not think the railways pay taxes. I ask the minister to tell us on what the railways do pay taxes.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will get that information for the hon. gentleman. I could not give it to him now.

Mr. Ballard: I shall be brief, having in mind that I moved the amendment. I know the minister considers the clause we are discussing innocuous. That is why he is so even tempered this afternoon. He is not exercised about this clause being in the bill. In my opinion this amendment secures the objectives of clause 1. After all, clause 1 is the statement of objectives in the bill, to rationalize transportation in Canada. Clause 1 says that the railways should receive a fair return for services performed, and paragraph (b) says that each mode of transport will pay for those service it receives. The amendment expands this a little. It says that the railways shall pay for services received at the municipal level.

Arguing that this is not fair is defeated by the minister's saying that he will issue instructions to the Canadian National, the government-owned railway, that it shall pay full municipal taxes with passage of this bill. All we are asking, by including this objective in clause 1, is that the Canadian Pacific shall act as a good corporate citizen and follow the lead, laid down by the Minister of Transport, of the Canadian National.

I can say, speaking as a western Canadian member, that the Canadian Pacific has received for 85 years a bonus or subsidy from municipalities of western Canada. At the present time this subsidy runs between $2.5 to $3 million a year, and it is time it ended. It is all right for the federal government to give a subsidy—it intends to do that—but as the municipalities of western Canada have paid to the Canadian Pacific a subsidy for the last 85 years, it is high time that subsidy were ended.

One can argue that we shall change the agreement made with the Canadian Pacific in 1881, which said that the Canadian Pacific shall not be subject to municipal taxes. But the minister already unilaterally has abrogated the provisions of that agreement—perhaps I should say, he proposes unilaterally to abrogate the provisions of the 1881 agreement. That is the effect of the other amendment being considered by the committee. The minister's words in connection with this amendment were that "no consequences can flow from these words". If the words in this amendment are innocuous, why can they not pass? Why can the amendment not pass? In the minister's words the amendment has no effect on the bill. We could pass it, I suggest, without doing any damage to the bill and without changing the status quo.

One provision and stated intention of the bill, in the minister's words again, is to put the railways on a basis to charge compensatory rates. If this bill passes, the expenses of the Canadian National by way of taxes will be greater than those of the Canadian Pacific, because the Canadian Pacific is exempt. This means we automatically give the Canadian Pacific an unearned profit or subsidy, and no comparable subsidy is paid to the Canadian National.

Taking all this into consideration, I think the committee ought to adopt this amendment without a twinge of conscience.

Mr. Churchill: Listening to the minister's words a few minutes ago I understood him to say—and I do not want to misquote him—that this amendment was innocuous, that there would be no difficulty if it were written into the bill, and so far as he was concerned we might as well get on with it.

Does the minister intend to accept the amendment? Or was he, in his roundabout way, saying, "Let us have a vote, because we have sufficient Liberals in the committee now, as we did not have last week, to settle the matter". The minister talks this way, pretending that everything is all right, that he has no objection, and that we had better deal with it. I think he means that he wants to vote the amendment down. Why does he not say so? Why does he not say he is unalterably opposed to the amendment? He keeps talking until the poor Whip can assemble the Liberal sheep, that they may vote as the dictator states. Instead of admitting that, he told the committee, and I heard him say this, that it is innocuous, and that we might as well get on with the business. All he meant, in the double meaning so frequently found in his remarks, was that he would not pass it, and he was waiting for his members to come in.

I think we should take a good look at this. If the minister thinks it is innocuous and might be accepted, why cannot he say so? He does not mind repeating himself; he has been doing it now for two weeks. I want to know whether he has answered the question which the hon. member for Calgary South asked last night. Consider that phrase in a letter quoted from the president of the C.P.R.—this is on page 12209 of Hansard. The president is talking about the taxes the company is prepared to pay—

> —one third for the year commencing January 1 after legislation is enacted modernizing and rationalizing existing legislation and taking into account, among other things, the effective changed conditions of freight rates otherwise fixed.

A very interesting sentence indeed, and one which is carefully worded so that if the legislation did not pass the house in 1966, payment of taxes would be deferred until 1968.

In the fall of last year it was obvious to everybody in the country that the railway bill would not be through the house before Christmas, although the Minister of Transport talked to us and said: Look, the committee has settled all this; why cannot we pass it in about two days and then the C.P.R. will be obliged to start paying municipal taxes. This was the carrot held out to the house. I recall the minister saying this to us, though he knew, and we knew, that it was impossible to get the bill through before Christmas. No doubt this was because the minister had been superseded in the hierarchy of the cabinet by the minister of health and welfare—

An hon. Member: And by the minister of defence.

Mr. Churchill: —particularly by the minister of health and welfare, who had to get his bill through the house. The Minister of Transport is downgraded and pushed to one side. I am not so sure, now, that it was not all arranged. I do not like to be suspicious and cast innuendos, but was this all arranged so that there would be a postponement of the transport bill to the end that the C.P.R. would not have to pay taxes until 1968?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Churchill: If the minister will sit down, I will do the talking. Nothing will prevent his getting up to speak as soon as I have sat down, and the committee will suffer accordingly. I know that, because he has been on his feet every hour on the hour; he has had something to say about every amendment, every section which has been presented to the committee. He is the man who knows all about transportation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Churchill: He does not need any advisers. Oh, no, this is the big play. He is regaining the position he lost before Christmas to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. He has a claque behind him, now. This is a man with leadership ambitions. Everybody is here to support him. Look at his strength in the cabinet now. The minister of defence will be worried. He is slipping.

Now let us look closely at this question. The hon. member for Calgary South said, and I quote his words

> In no place in his letter does he say what he means by "modernizing and rationalizing existing legislation". If some portion of this legislation should not convey the meaning which the president of the C.P.R. had in mind when he made this offer, I wonder whether his offer would be withdrawn. He mentions also "the effective changed conditions on freight rates otherwise fixed".
> When he mentions fixed freight rates does he include the Crowsnest pass rates, for example?

I ask the minister to give an effective answer to the hon. member for Calgary South with regard to that most pertinent question. There is a condition in that letter. We sometimes wonder who is pushing the minister around. Is there somebody behind the scenes directing him as to his conduct of this bill through the house? What is the answer to that?

Why will not the C.P.R. change its letter and say "in view of the unexpected delay last fall our letter will be modified accordingly, and the date will read January 1, 1967 instead of January 1 after the legislation has been enacted."? That was the intent of the letter of August 29, 1966. Why should not that intent be carried through? Why cannot the minister tell us that the letter will be altered and he had another letter from the C.P.R. which he is prepared to table, or read out, showing a new date of January 1, 1967?

That reference to changed conditions of freight rates otherwise fixed—is this the reason for pursuing an investigation into the Crowsnest pass rates? The word is going across western Canada that the Minister of Transport and the Liberal party are dead set on eroding those rates. By a subterfuge they will permit the railways to make an application to the commission to have these rates reviewed. The railways will bring in their costing conclusions and a subsidy will be granted by the government. Then, in the course of time, an argument will be built up that we cannot continue to subsidize the shipment of grain to our ports and that the rates will therefore have to be looked at very carefully and, perhaps, modified.

This is the word which is going around in western Canada. The people are beginning to awaken to the fact that there is more behind this bill than meets the eye. Although the government is saying that the rates will not be touched and that a subsidy will be provided if the railways succeed in proving their point, nevertheless the revenues will be examined, mileage figures will be given, the volume of grain shipped here and there, and the high cost of transportation to the railways mentioned, in an attempt to prove that the Crowsnest rates are uneconomic and that therefore the railways should be given a subsidy. Then within five or ten years the argument will be advanced that the subsidy should not be continued and that the rates should be altered. The people of western Canada are beginning to see through the activities of the Minister of Transport.

The minister has held himself silent for much longer that I ever anticipated he could, and I would ask him at this point to explain the phrase in the letter of the president of the C.P.R. and answer the questions raised by the hon. member for Calgary South. And if he repeats what he has already said, well we are accustomed to repetition from the minister.

Mr. Byrne: The minister has asked me to announce on his behalf that he is unable to support the amendment. I wish to say personally that I agree with him. I should like to say, also, that I feel the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is not giving much credit to those of his party who sat in the committee for something like 40 sittings and heard 40 witnesses, if he believes they failed to discover something in this bill which he now seems to find so objectionable.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I suggested some time ago, and read from Hansard, that the minister did make an agreement with the railways, and whether or not the question of municipal taxes is written into the bill, as referred to in the letter between the minister and the president of the C.P.R., the minister did say as recorded at page 11601 of Hansard for

January 10 that he did make an agreement with the railroads. If the minister is shaking his head then I had better read from Hansard:

> The company did say that if they were allowed the kind of scope the government had said they were going to propose to parliament to enable the company to increase railway revenues, then the company would be glad to give up this immunity.

The minister was referring to this immunity from municipal taxes, and in that quotation which I have given, was pointing out that an agreement was made. There is no question of doubt in my mind but that the minister directed the president of the C.P.R. to put in "January 1, 1967" in his letter so that he, the minister, could have a club to hold over the heads of parliamentarians.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): There is no question in my mind about that. I don't know what the minister is standing up for.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member has accused me of mis—

Mr. Starr: On a point of order—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I have risen on a question of privilege.

Mr. Starr: Then I rise on a question of privilege. I do not know how the minister—

The Chairman: Order, please. It is very difficult for the Chair to hear more than one member at the same time. The Minister of Transport, on a question of privilege.

Mr. Starr: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: The Minister of Transport is already on a question of privilege.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege because the hon. gentleman was questioning my word. I gave my word to the house, not once but on several occasions, that I had no agreement whatsoever with the Canadian Pacific Railway about this bill, and the words that the hon. gentleman has just quoted—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I will read them again.

Mr. Pickersgill: Read them again when I have finished. The words the hon. gentleman has just read are a paraphrase of the letter written by the president of the C.P.R. The letter was not written by me; it was written by the president of the C.P.R. It was a public document, and surely I am as much entitled to refer to that document as any other member of the house, without being accused of deceiving or misleading the house. The C.P.R. did this of their own volition. I welcomed it, and I hope that if this legislation is passed within a reasonable time—and I said this before—they will start paying those taxes this year.

Mr. Churchill: What is the question of privilege?

Mr. Pickersgill: There was no agreement of any kind.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely, sir, I am entitled to defend my veracity, and when I say to hon. members that there was no agreement of any kind I am sure the hon. gentleman who has been speaking believes me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Chairman, this is a very interesting discussion—

The Chairman: Order please. I consider the acts of the committee now to be an interruption of the present speaker, the hon. member for Acadia.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Chairman, I have never been so flattered that so many members over there, so many trained seals, would think me so devastating that they would drown me out by pounding on their desks. I never thought my words would strike so deadly at their hearts that they would be afraid even to allow me the privilege of speaking. You, Mr. Chairman, and the minister can interpret this particular paragraph any way you like, and we on this side will interpret it in the way it reads best to us. I am going to read it out again.

I am not quoting from the letter written by the president of the C.P.R. which was tabled on September 8. I am quoting from a speech which the minister made in the house on January 10, when he was dealing with the question of municipal taxes. Since the minister said I was paraphrasing I shall start the quotation a little earlier. As recorded at page 11601 of Hansard the minister said:

> The difference between myself and the present government and everyone else is that we did discuss this problem with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

That is very clear. The minister did discuss this problem with the C.P.R. There were two parties involved and they were discussing municipal taxes, which is the subject of the amendment.

> We did make representations to them that this kind of immunity, which had been given in perpetuity, was not really the kind of thing that was very desirable in the twentieth century.

So the minister hopes that in the twentieth century the C.P.R. would not try to maintain its exemption in perpetuity from paying municipal taxes. That is the proposition he was making to the C.P.R. Then he went on to say:

> The company did say that if they were allowed the kind of scope the government had said they were going to propose to parliament to enable the company to increase railway revenues, then the company would be glad to give up this immunity.

This is the agreement to which I was referring. The minister made a proposition to the railways, offering them the right to raise rates any way they liked, and if the railways accepted that they would give up their exemption from municipal taxes. This is why the amendment is so important. In this bill we are giving the railways one part of the bargain, and in an earlier speech I suggested another part of the bargain was a thorough investigation of the Crowsnest pass rates.

That part of the bargain was voted out last Wednesday. Proudly we westerners stood together because we realized that that provision in the bill was the thin edge of the wedge with regard to those rates which have been the Magna Carta of western Canada.

That must have been part of the bargain because since then the minister has desperately tried to have the provision re-entered in the bill. We in western Canada know how far the government is prepared to go in driving the thin edge of the wedge into the Crowsnest pass rates. It is going to push the wedge right in to the hilt.

After an examination of Hansard and the number of times that the minister presented this question to the committee, I have no doubt with respect to the letter written to the minister by the president of the C.P.R., and which he tabled on September 8, that the minister directed the president of the C.P.R.

to include the words "January 1, 1967" in that letter. The minister wanted those words in that letter so that he would have a club over the parliamentary committee, and over this house. But he failed to use that club on his cabinet ministers.

Members of the cabinet are all great at using clubs. The Minister of National Health and Welfare used a resignation club on the Prime Minister, stating he would resign unless his medicare bill was proceeded with, even though it would not become effective until July 1, 1968, a year and a half after the legislation was passed. But the Minister of Transport was too good a Liberal to resort to using such a heavy club on his leader, and so he lost in the argument.

There is no doubt in my mind that there was an agreement and that the minister did agree with the president of the C.P.R. that he should include the date January 1, 1967 in that letter. This does bring up the subject of municipal taxes on C.P.R. land, because this bill is giving the railways permission to set whatever rates they like. There is no question in my mind but that this amendment is in order. The minister well may have to vote against it because of an agreement he made with the railways. He may be bound to do so because of the shady dealings which have gone on. I use the word "shady", because those of us who are westerners know what it means. We have been dealt with, in shady deals, by Liberal governments for years. We now know the meaning of it and we see another one being perpetrated across Canada this very day.

Amendment (Mr. Ballard) negatived on division: Yeas 77; nays 87.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I should like to offer a postscript to my encounter with the Minister of Transport yesterday. Also I should like to make another suggestion before leaving this particular debate. Yesterday I was making the point that Bill C-231 really offered no protection to the ports of this country. In my enthusiasm, and despite a good deal of elbow grease, I failed to note that section 14(2) of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, chapter 39, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, was still in effect. I thought that this current legislation we are dealing with had done away with it. However, it is still there, as the minister pointed out and as the railway lawyers pointed out to me later in the corridor. We shared a few jocular remarks about this. This shows the danger of treading in a swamp full of railway legislation involving dozens of acts which must be dealt with.

My argument really is not altered by the fact that the section exists which I assumed was not going to exist. The section provides that the national system—the C.N.R.—among other things will procure or direct shipments of goods through Canadian seaports if the shipper does not specify otherwise. I recall the word "procure", because I think the meaning of this would be that if there were any interchange between the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canadian National Railways by virtue of this section would have to request the Canadian Pacific Railway to use a Canadian seaport. I do not know whether or not this is done in practice or whether it is impractical. Nevertheless there seems to be a direction to use seaports. It would be very easy for the railway when quoting rates to the shipper to say that by using such and such a port—Portland, Baltimore or the like—that the rate will be one thing and that by using Halifax, Saint John, Quebec or Montreal the rate will be another.

Beyond the matter of choice, there is no requirement for the development of Canadian ports. I think this is an important point and one which should be considered, because the railway will quote the route by which it can carry goods for the maximum return with the least amount of effort. Under the best possible practice I think the railways would be bound to direct its customers to the routes best suited to their purses. I wish I had known that section 14(2) carried on the law, because it would not have hurt my argument one single bit. I would have argued even more strenuously that whatever protection we have under the law is very small protection indeed.

I should like to emphasize this point to the minister. I give him full marks for his knowledge concerning section 14(2) or for the homework on the part of the people in the gallery. This is all part of the good clean fun of debate and it serves me right. I do not wish, however, to leave the point that the study which is now before the minister dealing with maritime transportation needs should deal with the point of development of the ports. If it does not, then those who carried out the study should be sent back to the grindstone, with their noses up against it.

I believe the minister agrees with me. From his nod and smile I gather that they have dealt with this point. This is vital and perhaps even it could be added to the Prime Minister's interminable and endless bottomed sack of wonders that he unveiled for us earlier this afternoon, because this is a matter of life or death to the ports of Saint John and Halifax, and is very vital to the whole maritime economy.

It is specifically set forth in clause 1 that the public interest would have to be considered. The minister has made two alterations by amendment in this regard since this matter came back to the house, in a specific attempt to meet the needs of the maritimes. I think he should be thanked in that regard, because he was dealing with shipments through or maximum use of Canadian seaports.

Perhaps at hearings in respect of public interest these changes to Bill No. C-231 will be considered by the board. I hope the board will take a look at the over-all legislation and find that these matters have not been mentioned in previous enactments, and then come to the conclusion that this does relate to public interest.

I am a little concerned, and I know the minister will be sympathetic in this regard, that at these hearings the commission will give consideration to what took place before the passage of Bill No. C-231, and come to the conclusion that public interest is not really affected because shippers are following traditional methods of moving goods out of this country and into other countries. Perhaps I am wrong in that regard. It may be that the board after reading clause 1 of Bill No. C-231 will be generous in its interpretation of what is in the public interest of Canada in order that more use can be made of all our seaports.

Since this is a short day and the minister and his staff have reached the final stages or are on the last lap of this bill, which I presume will wind up tomorrow—

Mr. Knowles: The minister has reached the final stages of what?

Mr. McCleave: Of this particular bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps "collapse" would be more appropriate.

Mr. McCleave: I know the hon. member for Acadia plans to go west over the week end, so at least our consideration should not go beyond Friday.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the hon. member suggesting that we skip tomorrow and come back to it on Friday?

Mr. McCleave: That might save the minister some anguish, but I am not suggesting anything. These little asides have caused me to lose the thread of my discourse.

In any event, dealing with the point of public interest, since the minister will have the night off it might be worth while for him to discuss with his legal advisers whether or not they feel almost absolutely certain that the changes the minister has put in dealing with the use of our ports are strong enough to assure that the commission will be seized of this aspect of public interest.

Let me refer briefly to one other point. It is hoped that in the aeronautics field Canadian Pacific Airlines will be encouraged by the government, if necessary, or perhaps persuaded by what will appear in Hansard, to give consideration to the extension of its services to make them national. I do not anticipate that they will initially enter Atlantic Canada on the same widespread scale as Air Canada, but I do not find fault with Air Canada for suggesting that C.P.A. should at least service some of our major cities. There is always an element of comfort in competition. Competition between two air lines should help to improve services so long as economic considerations are taken into account. I am sure the board will take this fact into account before licences are awarded.

This is tax finding time in our Canadian municipalities. Twice in the last couple of days I have tried to find out whether the Canadian National Railways will be required to pay full municipal taxes for the full year 1967. So far I have not received an answer. The city of Halifax through its council has presented a similar request to the Prime Minister for information. That is why I directed by question originally to the Prime Minister, rather than the Minister of Transport.

Every city in Canada is in exactly the same position. This month they are going over their budgets and setting their tax rates. It would be helpful to them to have some information in respect of this very important matter.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Chairman, I will be extremely brief in my remarks to the minister. I should like to refer to clause 93, which is the miscellaneous clause. That clause has reference to the Aeronautics Act in respect of "hire or reward", and states that this means:

> —any payment, consideration, gratuity or benefit, directly or indirectly charged, demanded, received or collected by any person for the use of an aircraft;—

I feel the position of a private individual or firm may be in jeopardy as a result of this clause. Perhaps the minister will give a detailed explanation as to what this means.

As the clause now stands no person, group of persons, company or group of companies can get together and rent an aircraft or use an aircraft of an operating company by sharing the cost. Perhaps individuals in Toronto want to attend a joint meeting in Montreal and find they cannot group together and hire an aircraft for that purpose. I hope the minister is prepared to clarify this situation because I think it is unfair to private owners of aircraft.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can give an answer at this time, and I appreciate the hon. gentleman giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. The appropriate clause has been passed, but we are allowing wide latitude in respect of clause 1.

The Air Transport Board has informed me that quite a number of cases were cropping up in which individuals or companies were in effect providing a commercial air service without complying with the licensing requirements of the act, and without therefore having any operating certificate from the department covering safety requirements. It could happen that one company owned an aircraft and employed a crew, and would then lease the aircraft without crew to someone else. By separate arrangement that other person would put that crew on his payroll for as long as the aircraft was rented. At the end of that period the crew would go back on the owner's payroll.

What really was happening was that a commercial service was being provided in this indirect way without the law, which other people had to comply with, being complied with by the individual renting the aircraft. What is perhaps more important is that the regulations in respect of safety were not being enforced.

This clause will not prohibit this practice but it will require these people to follow the ordinary rules in respect of safety, as well as those rules in respect of licensing.

Mr. Winkler: I will accept that explanation. Perhaps I may call it six o'clock, but before doing so I should like to pose another question so the minister can give it consideration. Obviously we are not going to finish our consideration of this bill tonight. Would it not be more democratic or beneficial if the individuals involved in this practice of "dry leasing", as it is called, were subject to the law that other companies or individuals owning aircraft are subject to?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is exactly what is intended, and nothing else. The hon. gentleman has said this a lot better than I did and in fewer words.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the government house leader to indicate what the government proposes for consideration on Thursday and Friday.

• (6:00 p.m.)

Mr. McIlraith: We will continue the consideration of the bill which occupied the attention of the house today. At the conclusion of that discussion we will consider two motions on the order paper, the one to set up a joint committee to deal with the rules and the other creating a special joint committee to deal with the national anthem. The next item will be the bill on the integration of the armed forces. The last three items will not necessarily be taken in the order indicated.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, in order to expedite the business of the house and the work of the committees we on this side of the house are prepared to pass without debate items 124 and 125, the two resolutions setting up the two committees.

Mr. McIlraith: I certainly wish to take advantage of this offer if it is agreeable and would ask that Your Honour call item No. 124.

NATIONAL ANTHEM

MOTION SETTING UP JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (for the Prime Minister) moved:

That a special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons be appointed to consider and from time to time to report upon the subject matter of the following proposed resolution: "That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to provide that 'O Canada' shall be the National Anthem of Canada while 'God Save the Queen' shall be the Royal Anthem in Canada";

That 12 members of the House of Commons, to be designated at a later date, be members of the joint committee; and

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that house to unite with this house for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it advisable, some of its members to act on the proposed joint committee.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER PROCEDURAL CHANGES PREVIOUSLY ADOPTED

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works) moved:

That a special committee of 11 members, to be designated at a later date, be appointed to consider and from time to time to report upon the advisability of making permanent, with or without amendment, any or all the several changes in the procedure of this house adopted for the first session of the Twenty Seventh Parliament on January 21, 1966, and such other changes as the committee may deem suitable to promote the more expeditious dispatch of the business of the house.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank hon. members for their co-operation. Perhaps I should indicate some other bills for consideration tomorrow in the event that we complete the consideration of the previously mentioned items. There is item No. 114, a bill respecting the armed forces of countries visiting Canada. The next one is item No. 84, a bill to revise and consolidate the Interpretation Act. Then there is item No. 62, second reading of the bill on the establishment of a Canadian Films Development Corporation, and lastly item No. 83, the bill providing for immigration appeals. I will consult with the house leaders as to the order in which these items will be called.

Mr. Starr: May I ask a question at this particular time? Can the government house leader tell us whether the Chairman's ruling will be circulated and when it will be in the hands of the members?

Mr. McIlraith: I am afraid I have no idea about that. I regarded this as a matter for the Chair and I did not ask about that point.

Mr. Knowles: It will appear in Hansard tomorrow.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Yes, but we like to work on Wednesday night.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, may I have the consent of the house to revert to motions for the purposes of tabling a committee report?

Mr. Starr: Six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): There does not seem to be unanimous consent to revert to motions.

It being eight minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, January 26, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Seventh report of standing committee on industry, research and energy development—Mr. Cashin.

Fourth report of standing committee on Indian affairs, human rights and citizenship and immigration—Mr. Klein.

[Note: Text of the foregoing reports appears in today's Votes and Proceedings.]

PUBLIC SERVICE

AMENDMENT OF VARIOUS ACTS RESPECTING SALARIES OF OFFICIALS

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (for the President of the Treasury Board) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Canada Grain Act, the Income Tax Act, the International Boundary Waters Treaty Act, the National Energy Board Act, the Railway Act, the Tariff Board Act, the Canada Elections Act, the Financial Administration Act, the Representation Commissioner Act, and the Appropriation Act No. 4, 1964, with respect to the salaries of certain public officials.

Motion agreed to.

JUDGES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SALARIES, TRAVELLING EXPENSES, ETC.

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Judges Act to revise judicial salaries and certain provisions of the said act respecting the payment to judges of travelling allowances and other expenses; and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to.

FUND FOR RURAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT ACT

AMENDMENT INCREASING AMOUNTS AVAILABLE UNDER AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Fund for Rural Economic Development Act to increase the limit on the aggregate of the amounts that may be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund and charged to the fund for rural economic development under agreements with the provinces from fifty million dollars to three hundred million dollars.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN CONFEDERATION

PROPOSED CONFERENCE TO BE CALLED BY ONTARIO GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker has the attention of the Prime Minister been drawn to the initiative of the government of Ontario in proceeding to convene a confederation conference, which we on this side of the house were ready to do four years ago and have asked for since? Under all the circumstances, is the dominion government going to co-operate in this regard, or is it going to take the lead itself and bring about the convening of such a conference in this year?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have read the speech from the throne in the Ontario house in which this suggestion was made by the premier of the province. I understand that this proposed conference is not with respect to the amendment of the constitution or indeed to find ways to amend the constitution, but is a conference that might be devoted to a discussion of confederation and its problems, and that sort of thing. Naturally, Mr. Speaker, this is an interesting and important proposal. I have not received any communication on it from the Prime Minister of Ontario. Perhaps it is the kind of thing that should be put on the agenda at the next federal-provincial conference in Ottawa.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the government of Canada allow the provinces to enter the vacuum created by its inaction in this regard?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The answer obviously is yes.

WOMEN

REQUEST FOR STUDY OF STATUS BY ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I would ask the right hon. Prime Minister a question with respect to the brief submitted to the government by the committee for the equality of women in Canada. This appears to be a well reasoned document dealing with matters of equality for women with respect to remuneration, access to occupations and various professions, and equality of treatment before the law with respect to domicile and property.

On January 10 the Prime Minister said this question had been considered in cabinet but it would be considered again on the return of the Secretary of State. Has the government had an opportunity to discuss this matter? Will the Prime Minister be able to tell the house fairly soon whether a decision has been reached with respect to the recommendation of this committee that a royal commission be established to look into the status of women in Canada?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, a certain decision has been made with regard to this matter. I or the Secretary of State hope to be in a position to announce it within a day or two.

NATIONAL SECURITY

CALVIN MACDONALD—APPEARANCE BEFORE ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): I wish to direct a question to the Solicitor General but in his absence may I direct it to the Prime Minister. This question relates to one asked by the hon. member for Villeneuve in March of 1966, and concerns one Calvin Macdonald and his desire to appear before the commission of inquiry on national security. Has the government given or will the government give him the privilege of appearing before that commission, that he may explain his case?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall discuss this matter with the Solicitor General as soon he comes into the house.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have an important question that I think should be addressed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I may say to him that I have noticed in a recent press report that two United States businessmen, one from Detroit and one from Chicago, have opened a business in Montreal at a cost of $5 million.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, my question is this. Inasmuch as this means $5 million of United States capital in Canada for the opening of a Bunny club, will the Minister of Trade and Commerce refer this matter to the Minister without Portfolio for investigation?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has let the bunny out of the bag, and the question is out of order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NORTH VIET NAM—SUPPLYING OF MISSILES BY SOVIET UNION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is he now in a position to reply to the question I asked yesterday about the supplying of arms by the Soviet union to North Viet Nam?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Oxford, I think it is clear that there have been violations by all sides of the 1954 agreement on Viet Nam. The presence in North Viet Nam of Soviet missiles and other modern anti-aircraft weapons represents as much a departure from the state of affairs envisaged by the agreement as other forms of military activity in Viet Nam to which attention is more frequently drawn.

Taken together, all these violations admittedly have led to the dangerous situation confronting us all today. Through its membership on the commission Canada has consistently attempted to have this point of view recognized, in the hope that the commission's assessment of the responsibilities of both sides for bringing about the present situation might contribute to the reversal of the trend of military events, with one violation by one side leading to a further violation by the other. Our discussions with regard to this problem in all its aspects have taken this situation into account, and these matters were included in the conversations I had in Moscow.

Mr. Nesbitt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would take it from the minister's reply that Canada has made formal objections to the Soviet union concerning the supplying of these arms to North Viet Nam?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I said that in my conversations these questions were discussed.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): In the light of the admission by Secretary McNamara, which I read or heard yesterday, that there has been only a trickle of troops moving from North Viet Nam to South Viet Nam since last June, can the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell us, or is he ready to inquire, why the bombing of North Viet Nam was not only continued but was intensified, despite the fact that there was only this trickle of movement?

TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING CROWSNEST PASS RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): I had a question for the Minister of Agriculture but in his absence I will address it to the hon. gentleman's parliamentary secretary. Does the parliamentary secretary agree with the government's policy to eliminate the Crowsnest pass rates?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. McIntosh: I will rephrase my question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Minister of Agriculture be in the house this afternoon to protest against the elimination of the Crowsnest pass rates?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will have to wait a few minutes to find out.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ROYAL FAMILY

CONSIDERATION OF LEGISLATION RESPECTING MARRIAGES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I do not know whether the Prime Minister is in a position to answer this question. It has to do with the Royal Marriages Act, which has been in existence since the early part of the 18th century and is long out of date. In view of the expected and anticipated application of Lord Harewood to marry again after a divorce has been secured from his wife, and the difficulties inherent in the continuation of the necessity of obtaining the Queen's consent to such marriages, is consideration being given by Canada, in respect to the Queen of Canada, and by other commonwealth countries to the abrogation of this law, now in effect but totally archaic having regard to present conditions?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I am not aware of such consideration being given on a commonwealth basis, though it may have been discussed by certain departments of commonwealth governments. I will be glad to look into this matter to see whether there has been any development and, indeed, whether this particular act still has application in parts of the commonwealth other than the United Kingdom.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Am I not right in saying that imperial acts are in effect unless abrogated or limited, amended or suspended, and that this act, which was in operation at the time of confederation, would affect Canada in that our sovereign in Canada would be subject to the law as it now is?

Mr. Pearson: That might well be the situation, but I should like to look into it further.

[Translation]

TRANSPORTATION

PROTEST BY QUEBEC RESPECTING FEDERAL LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport. As the minister left his seat a few minutes ago, I shall direct it to the Prime Minister.

Has the federal government received a letter from the Quebec government protesting against the encroachment of Bill No. C-231, an act to define and implement a national transportation policy of Canada, on provincial rights, and what is the answer given by the federal government to the Quebec government in that connection?

Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether this question could not instead be put during consideration of the bill referred to by the member.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NORTH VIET NAM—USE OF FUNDS GIVEN FOR AID

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. My question is based on a statement contained in a question asked of the Prime Minister by the hon. member for Bow River on January 24 in which he said, as recorded at page 12159 of Hansard:

> To review my question, it referred to $50,000 of aid to Viet Nam of which 90 per cent was going to North Viet Nam, to the Viet Cong, for purposes other than to assist civilian victims.

Has the Prime Minister received a letter from Dr. A. M. Inglis, chairman of the committee on Canadian Aid for Viet Nam Civilians, which committee, I might mention, is sponsored by a number of Canadians including the leader of our party and the hon. member for Kootenay West, which outlines the facts with respect to the distribution of this aid—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is not asking a question. He is obviously making a statement, and perhaps he should have made it on motions.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, may I just repeat the question. Has the Prime Minister received a letter from Dr. Inglis, chairman of the Committee on Canadian Aid for Viet Nam Civilians, with respect to the—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that it is not sufficient to ask whether a letter has been received. Perhaps he might want to complement the question, although I suppose I am asking for trouble in that suggestion.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the house leader, the Minister of Public Works, if he would mind having a conversation with the hon. member for Kootenay West and explain some of the rules to him.

[Mr. Allard.]

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Has the government protested to the United States against using in Viet Nam war equipment made in Canada and bought by the United States? Was the report correct that a protest was made by the Canadian government in this regard?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I think I have already dealt with that matter, Mr. Speaker. There has been no such protest.

Mr. Woolliams: Then may I ask is the government now going to take any steps with reference to money that is being sent to the Viet Cong from Canada, to be used for war equipment against the western world?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, our information is that the supplies that may be going to Viet Nam are medical supplies, and there is no authorization required under our law to send medical supplies to any part of the world.

Mr. Woolliams: As a further supplementary question, has the Prime Minister examined the report I sent him? I think he has read the report which says the money was not going to war victims. Has he made any investigation to determine to the satisfaction of himself and his government that the money is being used for that purpose?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. We have been making inquiries, and I believe the Secretary of State for External Affairs has been discussing the matter this morning with representatives of some of these organizations.

Mr. Herridge: As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, has the Secretary of State for External Affairs anything to report to the house as a result of his discussions with representatives of some of these organizations?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, the discussions are not concluded.

SPORTS

HOCKEY—PROPOSED TOUR OF EUROPE BY TEAMS FLOWN BY R.C.A.F.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. K. H. More (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, or possibly it should be directed to the associate minister. Has the R.C.A.F. made arrangements to fly two hockey teams to Europe for a tour of that continent, and does the minister approve of these arrangements?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if this is a matter of national urgency. I suggest that the hon. member find some other way to obtain the information he is now seeking.

[Later:]

Mr. More: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister. I would ask whether the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association or the Quebec Amateur Hockey Association have complained to him and protested the rather novel arrangements made by the R.C.A.F. and the minister of defence for the participation of two pee-wee hockey teams in a tour of Europe, in defiance of rulings by these governing bodies against making such a tour.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have received representations on both sides on this issue, and I am trying awfully hard to be neutral.

GRAIN

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO MAILING OF FINAL CHEQUES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Have all the cheques representing the final payment on the 1965-66 crop year been mailed? If not, when would he expect the last of them to be mailed?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, if they have all not already been mailed they will be mailed very shortly, but I shall get a more precise answer and provide the hon. member with the information.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—COMMUTATION OF DEATH SENTENCES OF CONVICTED MURDERERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which I should like to direct to the Solicitor General, but in his absence I shall direct it to the Prime Minister. The cabinet yesterday commuted to life imprisonment the death sentences of two convicted murderers in British Columbia. I should like to ask the Prime Minister what is the effect of this statement which he made on August 31 in this house:

> —when this legislation passes it will be the will of the parliament of Canada and if it is the will of the parliament of Canada I know the law-abiding citizens of Canada, as they always have done in the past, will obey it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt that the hon. member is asking a question. Obviously he is submitting an argument at this time. I am not prepared to accept the question.

Mr. Cowan: Your Honour having ruled in that way, may I raise the matter at ten o'clock.

AIRPORTS

INQUIRY AS TO INSTALLATION OF ENCLOSED RAMPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. R. Sherman (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the current season and the recurrence of a chronic problem associated with winter temperatures, can the Minister of Transport bring warmth to the hearts of thousands of chilled Canadian travellers and tell them when enclosed telescopic ramps will be installed at western Canada's major airports?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think the question is one which should be asked at this time. I suggest that it might be placed on the order paper or discussed at ten o'clock.

Mr. Sherman: I had the impression that the minister was prepared to answer.

Mr. Speaker: The minister probably will welcome the opportunity to answer at ten o'clock.

IMMIGRATION

WARNING TO IMMIGRANTS RESPECTING HOUSING IN LARGER CITIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer a question put to me on January 24 by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

To protect unsponsored immigrants with large families and modest incomes from hardship, our officers abroad advise such families about housing conditions. This means that such immigrants are currently being advised against going to certain cities where housing is difficult, but it does not mean that they are advised to go to any community where housing is available. They are advised on the basis of what suitable employment opportunities are available. When they arrive, the same facilities of the immigration division and the Canada manpower centres are available in such communities, to assist the newcomers in becoming established, as are available to immigrants destined to the larger cities of Canada.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister advise us whether the department has broken down the Canadian cities into these various categories, and if so could this information be made available to us?

Mr. Marchand: I will take notice of this question.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—REMOVAL OF FORCES FROM FRANCE AND ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW BASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the regulation laid down by the government of France with regard to our NATO bases and those of other countries, has a decision of been reached to move our forces from Metz and Marville and, if so, what are the names of our new bases?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, a decision has been made to move in accordance with the requirement of the French government's note. I am afraid I cannot yet give the details to the house because negotiations are continuing in respect of the move and the various facets of it.

NATURAL GAS

ACTION OF U.S. COMMISSION RESPECTING PROPOSED PIPE LINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of a slightly more serious nature for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Would the minister comment on the status of the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines application to the United States federal power commission in respect of their eastern route?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps that question more appropriately should be addressed to my colleague who is responsible for that aspect of the problem.

Mr. Winkler: May I then direct the question to the appropriate minister—I think the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources—and later I would hope that the Minister of Trade and Commerce would comment on my previous question.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Would the hon. member kindly repeat his question.

Mr. Winkler: Could the minister, for the benefit of the house and Canada, comment on the status of the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines application to the United States federal power commission for its eastern route?

Mr. Pepin: The United States federal power commission's presiding examiner has asked that further evidence be presented. In the case of Panhandle he asked that evidence be presented by February 10, in the case of Northern Natural Gas, by March 1.

This evidence will be on two subjects; first, the effects of the undertakings on which Trans-Canada Pipe Lines has agreed with the Canadian government; and second, the proposal presented by the staff of the federal power commission. We are watching closely these developments.

Mr. Winkler: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. There seems to be a negative attitude at the moment with regard to this application, particularly in the United States, and I wonder whether it could possibly be in the area of retaliation.

Mr. Pepin: No, Mr. Speaker. I might add though something else I have already said and which appeared in Hansard of January 19:

I can guarantee the hon. member—

That was the hon. member for Timmins.

—that we are taking these precautions. We have asked the company—

That is Trans-Canada.

—to keep us informed on alternative planning—which it is doing now—in case the federal power commission refuses to accept the Great lakes project in its present form.

So not only are we keeping in touch with events in Washington but we are going as far as possible in planning for an alternative project if the present one is rejected by the federal power commission.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The press quotes the minister as having said outside the house something we were trying yesterday to get him to say inside the house, namely that Trans-Canada is being urged to take its planning as far as possible so that if the federal power commission rejects the application, construction of the Canadian route can begin immediately. I wish to ask the minister who is asking Trans-Canada to carry its planning as far as possible, the minister or the National Energy Board; and have Trans-Canada complied with this request and do they intend to carry their planning to the point where there will be no delay in proceeding with the Canadian section of the line in the event that the F.P.C. rejects the application?

Mr. Pepin: The answer to the second part of the question is both, the minister and the National Energy Board. I do not remember exactly what the third part of the question was; the difficulty with long questions is that they require long answers which I am trying to give at the moment. What I said to the press, and would like to have said in the house but could not, was that we were planning in order to make sure that immediately after the decision is taken by the F.P.C. we will be in a position to act, whatever the decision may be.

I did not mean that we intended to act immediately but that we would act immediately after the decision is taken.

If the hon. member wishes to remind me of the third part of his question I will be delighted to try to answer it.

Mr. Douglas: The third part of my question was whether Trans-Canada had agreed to carry its planning to the point where it would be able to begin construction immediately in the event that the F.P.C. turned down the application.

Mr. Pepin: That is what I said in quoting my own words from Hansard of January 19. The company is keeping us informed of its alternative planning.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): I have a supplementary question. In view of the news we were able to obtain last week, and particularly yesterday and today, according to which we can look forward to a two year postponement before we can get a decision on this, may I ask the minister whether we will wait this long before any action is taken? Can no action be taken before we get a decision?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

BRIDGES

CONDITION OF INTERPROVINCIAL BRIDGE BETWEEN OTTAWA AND HULL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. It is urgent, since its object is to prevent the loss of life in the area.

As several thousands of tourists will be coming to Canada's capital during the centennial year and will certainly wish to visit Hull, namely the French part of our national capital, are they going to see the city of Hull through this dreadful ugliness, this heap of scrap, namely the interprovincial bridge, the guard-rails of which are dilapidated and out of repair?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member could easily put this question on the order paper.

[English]

TRADE

PURPOSE OF FORTHCOMING MEETING IN WEST INDIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce on the subject of the forthcoming conference at Saint Lucia in the West Indies in the hope that he will be less brusque and irascible than the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And more intelligible.

Mr. Churchill: Will the minister outline to the house at an early opportunity the objectives of his department at that conference?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking whether the minister will make a statement. I suggest that the answer to this question can only be yes or no. I do not think the member can ask that a statement be made now. It should be made on motions.

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I said "at an early opportunity" which would be on motions tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: I understood the question fully and it was in order, but I wanted to make sure that the answer would also be in order.

Mr. Churchill: The Secretary of State for External Affairs failed to answer the question yesterday and I thought I would revive it.

Mr. Winters: Generally the objectives will be to implement the terms of the communiqué which were agreed upon last July at the time of the prime ministerial meeting here in Ottawa.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR BILINGUAL PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

Did the minister get in touch personally with the directors of the C.P.R. in order to ask them to provide bilingual staff in the province of Quebec?

[English]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): The only thing I have done on this matter is to have drawn to the attention of the railway the comments that have been made in the house, and I have reason to believe that this has been done by a member of my staff.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO REMUNERATION FOR FIRE DAMAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and pertains to a fire which took place along the right of way of the C.N.R. in Richmond and Tyendinaga townships last July 20. This fire was set by the rolling stock of the railway and the farmers along the line sustained considerable damage to crops, fields and fences for which they have not been reimbursed by the C.N.R. When can these farmers expect to receive satisfaction in this matter?

[Mr. Winters.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Unless the fire is still burning I suggest that the question be put on the order paper.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

FINANCE

SPEECH BY TRADE MINISTER ON FOREIGN INVESTMENT IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to take this opportunity to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce, after his pilgrimage to San Francisco where his enunciation of policy with regard to foreign investment in Canada took place, whether a copy of his speech and the sentiments contained therein was made available to his colleague the senior Minister without Portfolio. Would he also let the house in on the secret as to how his particular views, so different from those held by the chairman of that committee, the Minister without Portfolio, will be presented to the committee?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt that the second part of the question is in order. I think this will have to remain a secret for a while yet.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is parliament to be denied the information that was propagated in San Francisco? We have the right to know it. Why is a different story told in San Francisco than in Canada?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): May I say a word in reply?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister may be allowed to answer the question.

Mr. Winters: I simply wish to report that I had a very good and in many ways I think a successful visit to San Francisco and Los Angeles. I heard from the business community there many expressions of confidence in the policies of the Canadian government. I wish to assure the right hon. gentleman that copies of my speech were made available to my colleagues before I delivered it, and I understand that the distribution of the speech was even wider than that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would ask the minister this. Which is the policy? Is it the policy enunciated by him, or that declared by the one recently returned to the cabinet ranks?

Which is the policy on foreign investment? That is all I want to know.

Mr. Winters: I can only reflect policy as I deem it to be, and the policy I reflected in the speeches I made in San Francisco and Los Angeles are the policies of the government as I deem them to be.

EXPO '67

REPORTED DISMISSAL OF MEMBER OF YOUTH ADVISORY COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Last week in this house the hon. member for Cumberland asked the minister to investigate certain alleged discriminatory hiring practices at Expo in the youth pavilion. This matter was raised in Montreal originally by Mr. Oberfeld, who was a member of the Expo youth advisory council. I understand that because he raised this matter in Montreal Mr. Oberfeld has been fired from the youth advisory council. I would ask the minister if he has heard about this, and will he investigate the same?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I cannot imagine the firing, if such it was, being for that reason; but I will investigate this matter and report.

IMMIGRATION

SECURITY CHECKS ON PROSPECTIVE IMMIGRANTS FROM U.K. AND IRELAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the minister in charge of immigration. I would ask him whether there is a security check on British and Irish immigrants. I would also refer to a recent statement of the minister that in future there will not be a security check on emigrants from France. This statement may have been misinterpreted, but I would like it clarified.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there is always some kind of security check on immigrants, mainly because we want to know of any criminal records of prospective immigrants. There are just as restrictive tests in respect of Great Britain, and the same thing will apply to France in the future.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORTED DISSATISFACTION AMONG STAFF RESPECTING PROMOTIONS, ETC.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Revenue may I direct a question to the house leader with respect to collective bargaining matters for employees in the public service. I would ask the minister whether he would mind looking into the dissatisfaction that exists with respect to changed rules regarding promotions, the feeling that there is discrimination in the selection of people for promotion, and the general collapse of morale amongst the security staff in the house.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think the question is in order on a number of grounds.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

POSSIBLE COUNTERFEITING OF DOLLAR BILLS —PRICE OF GOLD COINS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. Is the minister taking any special precautionary measures to prevent counterfeiting of the centennial bills, which bear no serial number at the moment?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the question should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In the past few weeks the public generally have been advised that in order to obtain a $20 gold centennial piece they must purchase a package of coins at a cost of $40. In a recent edition it was said that Reader's Digest are offering 200 of these $20 gold pieces as contest prizes.

I wonder whether the minister could tell us how Reader's Digest could purchase these $20 gold pieces.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think the question is sufficiently urgent to warrant it being asked or answered at this time.

Mr. Webb: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian public have been advised that they have to pay $40 and can only buy these gold pieces in coin sets, while a publishing firm is buying them for $20. I think the question is urgent.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: If the minister is satisfied that there is a question of urgency I will certainly allow him to answer the question.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, now the question has been asked I think there is some question of urgency. I would like to assure the hon. member and all hon. members of the house that there is a uniform price of $40 a set to all comers, including the readers of Reader's Digest.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I rise now on my own point of order relating to the question I asked the Minister of Finance. I would gladly put my question on the order paper on one condition, namely that it is answered a little sooner than the one I have had there since October, addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the right hon. Prime Minister concerning the question asked by the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac. A week ago I put a question to the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, concerning the price of these gold coins. The Prime Minister, as I recall, undertook to discuss the matter with the Minister of Finance. I was wondering whether this discussion has yet taken place, and if so what was the result.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I have been ready to answer this question for some time. The government of Canada, like other members of the International Monetary Fund, has an obligation to avoid taking any steps which would facilitate the speculative hoarding of gold, both nationally and internationally. The issuance of a special set of coins of the centennial year, including a $20 gold piece, in the form of a presentation set, is not inconsistent with this objective. It is designed for collectors and will be purchased largely by collectors.

On the other hand, interest in single gold coins could extend beyond those who are concerned with the commemoration of our centennial. Their issuance might therefore be inconsistent with our international obligations.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. While we are on the centennial business, could the Minister of Finance inform the house whether the new centennial paper bills are only in the denomination of $1, or are they of different denominations?

[Mr. Webb.]

Mr. Sharp: My understanding is that they are $1 only, sir.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to advise hon. members that the time for questions has now expired.

TRANSPORTATION

STATEMENT ON APPEAL FROM RULING BY CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEE

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps before calling orders of the day I might remind hon. members, if it is necessary for me to do so, that a point of order was raised yesterday by way of appeal from a ruling of the chairman of committee of the whole. I have, of course, had an opportunity since yesterday of studying very closely the ruling of the Chair and arguments submitted by hon. members. Before rendering a ruling I am wondering whether the Minister of Transport has anything to add to the arguments he has already submitted in the course of the discussion.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I would like, sir, in addition to what I have already said to make a point which it seems to me would be relevant to the consideration of whether the amendment was in order. I was, of course, well aware of the various rules and standing orders to which hon. gentleman opposite referred. I do not contest the validity of any of them. As I indicated in my argument the other day, I was quite well aware that if I attempted to introduce the same proposition again it would be out of order. Before submitting an amendment, or perhaps I will have to say a purported amendment since it has been called into question, to the committee I felt it was my duty to apply myself to this problem to the best of my rather limited abilities.

Mr. Pickersgill: I recognize that I do not have the long experience of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre nor the legal training of the hon. member for Bow River, to say nothing of the eloquence of the right hon. gentleman opposite, I think I can say, sir, I was aware that there did not seem to be any kind of amendment I could have offered to clause 50 which would be in order at all because it seemed to me that even to attempt to import into that clause, which dealt with grain rates, a review of rates on grain alone would quite obviously come so close to the line that I might very easily cross the line.

I then looked at clause 74, which is the clause which has reference to the financial relationships generally—I do not often ask for the indulgence of the house, but when we are considering a matter as important as this I wonder if those who prefer to carry on a conversation would consider doing so elsewhere.

An hon. Member: You would lose half your party.

Mr. Pickersgill: I might need them badly later, but one or two of them could be spared. I recognize the extreme gravity of the issue before Your Honour. It is a very unusual thing to have an appeal from one of the officers presiding over us to another, particularly when the officer who made the original decision most obviously found it a difficult matter, and felt that it required profound reflection.

I can certainly agree with anyone who takes the view that this is a nice and very difficult question indeed to answer one way or the other. I was aware that if I were to make an amendment which the Chairman could possibly consider in order, or Your Honour if there were an appeal could consider in order, there must be, according to the standing orders, sufficient variance from subclause 329 of clause 50 which had been stricken out by the committee to make it a different question.

I realized also that there must be a difference in the pith and substance or the core, and that the amendment must not be substantially the same as the clause which was stricken out. It did seem to me that in clause 74, which deals generally with the financial relations between the government and the railways, which relates to many other matters in addition to the question of grain rates and indeed deals with grain rates only obliquely, but deals much more directly with payments in respect of branch lines and passenger services as well as the transitional payments and the relationship between any such payment that might be determined by the commission in the future, it would be possible to frame a motion which had sufficient variance to be in order.

It seemed to me also that there was no more reason for permitting an examination of the rates on grain than for permitting an examination of any other rates set by this parliament and not by the railways themselves, and that it was quite wrong to single out one commodity, even though it might be the most important one, for such consideration. In the interval between the time the committee made its decision in respect of subclause 329 and the time the amendment was moved, we had a debate on the new clause 59 and we had confirmed, so far as the committee could do so, every statutory rate with respect to the Atlantic ports. It seemed to me, sir, that if a review was provided which depended on someone else taking the initiative, a review that applied to all statutory rates, there would be a considerable variance but perhaps not sufficient variance.

It seemed to me also that in the interval we had a discussion in the committee on clause 16, and on the very important variety of cases in which a shipper might succeed under clause 16 in getting a rate substituted for a rate at which the railways themselves would have been willing, of their own volition, to carry the commodity, and that these cases could go on as long as this law was on the statute books. This would be, therefore, a continuing and continuous operation whenever a rate was substituted by the commission for a rate which the railways were voluntarily willing to give the shipper. This was something that was imposed by law, not directly by parliament but by virtue of the bill which we are putting through. This would be a process that ought to be continued.

It seemed to me it was just as right and reasonable for a carrier to be able to appeal against a rate that was non-compensatory as it was for a shipper to be able to appeal a rate that was not in the public interest because it gave undue advantage or caused him undue disadvantage. Indeed, this kind of consideration was very much more apt to be a continuing affair than any one shot affair such as the mandatory determination would have been under the proposal in subclause 329.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Diefenbaker: What does the minister mean by a one-shot affair?

Mr. Pickersgill: Section 329, which was removed by the committee, provided that within three years this determination should be made. If I may dare use a latin word in the presence of the hon. member for Macleod, I think that section would have been functus. In other words, once this determination had been made there was no further mandatory determination. What parliament had said was to be done would have been done, and it would have been over and done with, or so it would seem to me.

Mr. Churchill: It could be reopened by the commission.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sorry, was the hon. gentleman asking me a question?

Mr. Churchill: Would it not be within the competence of the commission to reopen the inquiry two, three or even five years later? It did not restrict the investigation just to the one occasion.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I thank the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre for making a point that perhaps is much stronger than any I have made yet, and for making it very much more clearly than I had been able to. Of course, he too has the advantage of legal training that I lack.

The hon. gentleman asked whether it would not be open to the commission on its own motion to take this step later. Perhaps; I do not know, but certainly parliament would have been saying, if we had passed that clause, that it should be done only the once. This responsibility was to be imposed upon them only once and it would never be imposed again. The possibility might occur a thousand times, but surely that has nothing to do with the case. What that section sought to do was to impose a duty on the commission to make one determination and one determination only, and that would have been the end of the matter.

The amendment that I have offered, Mr. Chairman, so long as it might remain on the statute books, creates a continuing right in a railway to ask the commission anytime after two years that any rate fixed by law has been in effect to fix any rate that the railways set at any time in the future after a lapse of two years, but not ealier. Therefore, it seems to me that really there is a quite fundamental difference between the two objects, that is to say, the object of section 329 and the object of the amendment I have now moved.

If I may put it in this way, Mr. Speaker, the object of section 329 was to make a determination whether the railways asked for it or not. Its object was to make a mandatory determination as to whether certain rates were compensatory once and for all, and which would never recur. If they were not compensatory, the commission was to determine what in its opinion might be a suitable relief or payment.

The amendment before us does not require the commission to do anything about any of these rates unless an application is made in respect thereto. I suggest that that is a quite different situation in essence from the other situation. I do not deny that in one or two cases the same effects might flow, but in essence it is an altogether different situation. I suggest it is as different as appointing a royal commission of inquiry into something and establishing a court before which a party can appear if he wants to have a determination made as to a certain matter. Surely the difference is pretty fundamental. Also, Mr. Speaker, instead of creating a single operation for one occasion only it would create a continuing process that would be available to the railways, if they wished to avail themselves of it, in a great variety of cases which might arise over and above the one specific case alluded to in section 329.

In addition to that, sir, there is another difference which perhaps may not be fundamental but which I suggest creates two very considerable variants. Not only does the amendment that I am offering, if Your Honour finds it to be in order, provide for a hearing or for any number of hearings in the event they were asked for, but it also provides, in a way for which there was no provision made at all in section 329, for representation of ministers of the crown when they wish to respond to any such application. I do not attach the same importance to that point, but it is a variant.

There is another important variant, sir, in the amendment I have moved. A provision which I thought was very desirable but which the committee saw fit to reject, and which consistent with having this variation I could not possibly find any way to put into the bill, was subsection 3 of section 329 which read as follows:

> In making its report under subsection (1), the commission shall have regard to all matters that in its opinion are relevant including any change that has been made by any railway company that is subject to the jurisdiction of parliament in the equipment, methods or procedures used for the loading, carriage and unloading of grain and grain products.

That provision clearly related exclusively to grain and grain products. However desirable it might have been in itself, it would have been out of place in an amendment of the general character and purpose of this amendment.

There is, perhaps, one further point, Mr. Speaker, which was not raised by anyone opposite and was not raised by me in argument before the Chair. The most substantial similarity between section 329 and the amendment which I have sought to move is with respect to the definition of categories of grain and where they should go. I admit that that is just the same as it was in the amendment that was stricken out, but since there seemed to be no exception taken by those on the other side to having that provision in, it does make the two much more similar than they otherwise would have been. I admit that quite readily.

However, Mr. Speaker, rightly or wrongly I interpreted the vote and decision of the committee as having relation only to the part which is directed to a review and not to the part which is directed to these rates. I would remind Your Honour that that part of the clause has been stricken out by the decision of the committee and that if this amendment is ruled out of order it is going to be very difficult for any hon. member to get it back into the bill. I just make that point en passant.

Finally, there is the proposed section 472 which deals with the rates on domestic grain to British Columbia. There is nothing similar to that provision, of course, in the other clause that was stricken. I do not think, therefore, that it would come into the picture at all. Certain technical amendments proposed at the beginning of my amendment have no relation to section 329, and I am not making anything of that because they are quite incidental. I assume that any decision on this matter would not preclude the right of any hon. member to move an amendment with respect to the new section 468A, and with the typographical error, even if Your Honour could not agree with the chairman that the amendment appeared to be in order.

May I briefly, sir, repeat the three points with respect to the matter in dispute. It seems that the amendment is different, or sufficiently at variance, to be in order. The first point is that there is no mandatory duty imposed on the commission to conduct a review, that there will be no review unless it is requested by a party. Second, the scope of the review that may be made is far wider than the scope of the mandatory review envisaged in section 329. My third point is that this proposed amendment, if it was accepted, would have a continuing effect whereas the other clause provided for one single process, and when that process had been completed it would have no further force or effect except in relation to the grain rates.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have given the minister an opportunity to restate the arguments he advanced the other day in support of the legality of the amendment proposed by the Minister of Fisheries.

As I told hon. members a moment ago, since yesterday I have spent a great deal of time, which may be well understood, considering the arguments advanced and reported in Hansard both in support and in opposition to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Bow River on the proposed amendment to clause 74 of Bill C-231.

In the comments he has made the Minister of Transport has confirmed how extremely difficult and complex this matter is, both in substance and from a procedural standpoint. My colleague, the Deputy Speaker and chairman of the committee of the whole, has spent at least as much time as I have, I am sure, in the preparation of the very learned ruling which was delivered yesterday and is now under appeal. The question is whether our respective and separate studies of the arguments have led us to the same conclusion.

I should state once again that the procedure of an appeal from the chairman of the committee of the whole house to the Speaker places the Chair in an awkward position. This, I am sure, is recognized by all hon. members. Yesterday two members of the house—I refer to the hon. member for Oxford and, I think, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—suggested that perhaps the procedure might be changed in some way. In passing I take the liberty to suggest that a review of the chairman's decision might come to the Chair by way of stated case rather than by way of appeal. Be that as it may, the standing order is there and I have no alternative but submit to its requirements.

It seems to me that when there is nothing more at issue than the chairman's interpretation of the facts on which is based the ruling under appeal, the Speaker should not normally attempt to substitute his own judgment for that of the chairman. This is a principle I have enunciated before. When it is simply a question of judgment with respect to the personal opinion of the chairman of the committee there is no justification in my view, for the Speaker to take the chair to substitute his personal interpretation of facts for those of the chairman of the committee. It may be that in this particular case there is more at issue than a limited question of personal judgment.

In his ruling the chairman made the following statement, reported at page 12,240 of yesterday's Hansard:

> The problem which the Chair has to decide is whether or not the amendment moved by the Minister of Fisheries is sufficiently different from subclause 329 of clause 50 as to constitute a substantially different question.

In fact, most of the arguments advanced in opposition to the minister's amendment were founded on this approach. I am wondering, however, if this is entirely correct. The problem which the Chair has to decide is not only whether the amendment is different from subclause 329 of clause 50, which in its entirety has been negatived by the committee, but also if the amendment is inconsistent in whole or in part with the committee's recorded decision. The relevant citation is in 406(c) of Beauchesne's fourth edition, which is a restatement of the rules cited in May's seventeenth edition, page 549. The citation from Beauchesne is the following:

> Amendments are out of order if they are—
> (c) inconsistent with a decision which the committee has given upon a former amendment;

The statement in May's seventeenth edition is the following:

> An amendment must not be inconsistent with, or contrary to, the bill as so far agreed to by the committee..., nor must it be inconsistent with a decision of the committee upon a former amendment.

I am in full agreement with the chairman that there are many substantial differences between this amendment and the section formerly deleted by the decision of the committee. This, however, does not necessarily satisfy the requirement of the citation to which I have just referred.

In his argument the minister has quite rightly pointed to the differences between the two proposals. These differences possibly are substantial; I am sure that any number of other additional substantial changes might have been tacked on the amendment. The cumulation, however, of all these added changes does not obviate the basic requirement that no part of the new proposal should be inconsistent with the committee's previous decision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The committee has voted against a review of certain statutory rates and, contrary to this, the amendment would provide for such a review in certain circumstances. This seems confirmed by the minister's statement of this afternoon. The minister this afternoon showed that in the one case there is a mandatory review, and in the other what he calls a facultative—

Mr. Pickersgill: Facultative.

Mr. Speaker: —review. In the one case there is a one-shot review; in the other a continuing review. These, I admit, are substantial changes and I might even be prepared to admit that the objectives of the original clause and of this amendment may differ. But from my limited understanding it seems that the adoption of the amendment would reinstate in part a clause which has already been rejected in its entirety by the committee.

Hon. members of course are all agreed on the most important rule of procedure, that a question which has once been negatived cannot be proposed again in the same session. I am not suggesting that there is a clear, unimpeachable case one way or the other. I do suggest, however, that the application of citation 406(c) of Beauchesne's fourth edition is enough to raise a serious doubt about the legality of the proposed amendment. I am prepared to interpret the doubt in favour of the most important principle in the citation and to reject the amendment.

POINT OF ORDER RESPECTING TWO ITEMS OF BUSINESS ON SAME SUBJECT

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, before you call the orders of the day may I raise another point of order. I apologize for doing so at this moment without giving notice to Your Honour, although I did raise the matter on an earlier occasion. It has to do with the motion to set up a committee to consider the resolution respecting O Canada and God Save the Queen.

Your Honour will recall that on the earlier occasion I raised a point of order about the propriety of introducing a motion to refer this matter to a committee when there was already on the order paper under government order a motion for consideration of the same matter by the house. Last evening at the hour of adjournment, six o'clock—I was not in the house—the motion to refer the matter to a committee was called and adopted. Neither Your Honour nor I had an opportunity to consider the matter again at that time. I had understood that Your Honour had deferred your ruling on the point of order already raised until the matter would come up for the consideration of the house. The result is that the motion has now been passed.

But the question of the propriety of leaving the resolution on the order paper where it appears on page 5 of today's issue still remains. I feel strongly that it is improper and contrary to the rules that a matter should be at one and the same time referred to a select committee for consideration while still standing for the consideration of the house. I submit on the basis of the precedents cited from Beauchesne and particularly from May that if the government wishes to have the matter considered in a committee, the order standing as item 14 on page 5 should be discharged.

In support of this submission I refer Your Honour to May at page 399 where, under the heading "Motions and the rule of anticipation", it is stated:

> A motion must not anticipate a matter already appointed for consideration by the house whether it be a bill or an adjourned debate upon a motion.

Instances are then given in support of the principle, and the citation continues:

> Stated generally, the rule against anticipation (which applies to other proceedings as well as motions) is that a matter must not be anticipated if it is contained in a more effective form of proceeding than the proceeding by which it is sought to be anticipated, but it may be anticipated if it is contained in an equally or less effective form.

In other words, on the basis of the elaboration of the rule the proposal that a matter be referred to committee for consideration is, in my submission, less effective than a resolution that it should be considered and acted upon by the house. The motion for reference to a committee was therefore within the rule against anticipation and should not have been proceeded with unless the other motion had been withdrawn.

It seems to me that members should not seek to complicate unnecessarily the procedures of the house and put the house in a difficult position. What was done yesterday was done and cannot be undone. I am not seeking to have it undone. But I am suggesting that in order to regularize the position Your Honour should now, in accordance with the rule against anticipation, make an order that item of business No. 14 be discharged, as in my submission it should have been discharged at the outset if the government wished to proceed by another method. All matters of procedure, all points of order, and in particular the regulation of the order paper, are within Your Honour's control and it is, I submit, within Your Honour's power to direct that this item be discharged.

Mr. Speaker: I should like to indicate to the hon. member that I did, of course, take into consideration the point of order he raised the other day. I studied it meticulously and prepared a very learned opinion. Indeed, I was sorry when I learned that the house had unanimously agreed to refer this matter to the committee because it deprived me of the pleasure of reading this learned opinion. I can tell the hon. member, if it will bring him some consolation, that the decision was not in his favour, in support of his point of order. Unfortunately there would have been no appeal from the decision which I would have rendered. Perhaps, however, because the point raised by the hon. member is of interest and importance, I might put on record the fruit of my labours which would confirm the opinion I have that I cannot support the point of order raised by the hon. member.

The proposed ruling—and I am reading it now—was along the following lines:

On January 11 last, as reported at pages 11664-65 of Hansard, the hon. member for Kamloops raised a question of order to the effect that it was irregular to have two notices of motions dealing with the question of a national anthem on the order paper under government orders. The hon. member went on to say that he was unable to find an authority for his contention but he suggested that his question of order be taken under consideration by the Chair.

Admittedly, it is unusual to have a duplication of notices dealing with the same subject matter under government orders., but no specific authority bearing on this aspect of the point of order can be found.

The hon. member for Kamloops also suggested that a minister of the crown should ask the house for leave to withdraw item 14 from the order paper. Here again, the Chair might say that it is not in disagreement with the hon. member's statement that it would be tidier were one of these items removed from under government orders. But it is suggested this action may be taken only by a member of the ministry.

At any rate, due notice was given of both item and in turn each was called and transferred to government orders, pursuant to section 2 of standing order 21, for consideration at a subsequent sitting. Since the transfer of government notices is merely a procedural technique adopted in the 1955 session for the purpose of eliminating extended debates during routine proceedings, it is suggested that the house has not yet entered upon the consideration of either of the proposed motions. In this regard the Chair might refer hon. members to the Journals of the house, 1955, page 901, and point out that a similar technique is employed under standing order 47 in respect of notices of motions for the production of papers.

Accordingly, it would appear that the two notices of motions concerning a national anthem are of equal status and that it would be difficult for the Chair at this time—again, of course, I am referring to the position as it was when the point of order was raised by the hon. member for Kamloops—to state which one may be considered by the house and which one the government should remove from the order paper. At any rate, as stated previously, it has not been possible to find any authority that would support the Chair in ordering the removal of one of these notices from the order paper.

There is, however, little doubt that it would be not only illogical but also irregular to proceed concurrently with these two proposed motions and when one of them is taken up for consideration the other, in effect, will lapse. That is to say, when one of the proposed motions has been considered or adopted, or the debate thereon has been adjourned, an order must be made to rescind or discharge any resolution or order of the house that inevitably follows from the consideration of any item of business.

As stated, in part, in section 3, citation 88, Beauchesne's fourth edition:

> The discharge of an order is the indispensable preliminary to the making of a different order with regard to the same subject.

In other words, when the report comes from the committee there would, I suggest to the hon. member, be a point of order which might be taken up at that time, that the first order ought to be discharged before the second one is adopted. So it may be the hon. member will have another point of order to raise with regard to these two motions, though it would be premature to do so today.

This was the result of the studies I made of the question. I do not suggest that this is necessarily the last word, and I am quite prepared to review the matter in the light of the additional comments the hon. member has made which perhaps throw a different light on the subject. I hope I shall have an opportunity to make a ruling on this before the second order is adopted by the house.

PROVISION FOR DEFINITION AND IMPLEMENTATION OF NATIONAL POLICY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, January 25, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-231, to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other acts in consequence thereof, and to enact other consequential provisions—Mr. Pickersgill—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose last evening clause 1 of the bill as amended was under discussion.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word at this point. In view of my lack of success in moving the amendment that I sought to move on clause 74 I wish to say on this clause, upon which there has been a wide-ranging discussion, that after listening to what I am about to say I hope hon. gentlemen will agree to stand clause 1 and revert to clause 74, if the proposal I am going to make is acceptable to the committee.

The proposal I am going to make is that I should be given unanimous consent to move a motion which, in the light of the opinion given to us by the Speaker on appeal, would be clearly out of order if anyone attempted to move it because it would simply be asking the house to reverse a decision that was made on Wednesday of last week.

I do not think at this stage that I need read all the verbiage preceding the amendment which I will ask unanimous consent to move, but the pertinent part is as follows:

> "470. (1) In this section "grain products" means any commodities to which, under the freight tariffs of the company in effect on the 1st day of January, 1966, the rates known as grain products rates, flaxseed products rates or rapeseed products rates applied on that date.
> (2) It is a condition precedent to the payment to a railway company of any financial assistance provided, in respect of the movement of grain or grain products as in this subsection described, pursuant to a report under paragraph (e) of subsection (1) of section 15 or otherwise provided to the company as compensation for an imposed public duty in respect of such movements, within the intent of paragraph (c) of section 1 of the National Transportation Act, that the company has not increased the level of rates prevailing on the 31st day of December, 1966—

And the rest is an absolute repetition of what was in new section 329 describing grain products other than flour moving from any point west of Fort William to Fort William or to Port Arthur over any lines of railway of the company, and so on and so forth.

The purpose of moving this amendment would be to give protection to all the rates that are not directly protected by statute but which are generally called the Crowsnest Pass related rates.

I would also like to be permitted to include provision for renumbering new section 472 and my previous amendment related to domestic rates with respect to British Columbia as new section 471. There was never any dispute with relation to it and it is obviously not in contradiction to anything done up until now.

The effect of accepting this amendment would be to protect all these related rates that are not directly protected by statute. It involves an absolutely direct reversal of the position taken by the house last week and would therefore, under the Speaker's ruling, be even more out of order than the amendment I moved previously. That is why I am saying that I hope I would have unanimous consent. It was certainly never the intention of the government at any time to endanger in any way the rates on any of these grain products that are related to the Crowsnest pass rates.

I appeal to hon. members to overlook the fact that the house took an opposite view on this matter last Wednesday and unanimously to allow me to move my amendment. I am not asking that it be accepted by the committee but, if I had unanimous consent, when we come to clause 74 I could move it because we would have got over any possible procedural difficulty.

Mr. Rapp: Does the minister's proposed amendment mean that rapeseed will be classified as grain?

Mr. Pickersgill: The amendment would include rapeseed and every other grain or grain product that up until now has been protected because of orders of the board or decisions of the railways related to the Crowsnest pass rates. The Crowsnest pass rates are protected in new section 328 in clause 50. This proposed amendment would provide protection for all these related rates. I do not think any of us wanted to take that protection away. All I am seeking to do is get over the rules of the house, which I do not seek to invoke against anybody else merely because they were invoked against me, in order to make sure that this protection, which is so important to the western farmers, continues to be afforded to them.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend the minister for the rapidity with which he was able to produce another amendment within about 20 minutes of the Speaker's ruling against the previous one. But now that we have it in our hands I would suggest to the minister that rather than asking us at this moment to give unanimous consent, which may subsequently be given, we should have an opportunity to study it because we have to go back to the various sections of the Railway Act. A little later today the minister might repeat his suggestion and perhaps at that stage unanimous consent would be forthcoming.

In saying this I am not doubting that this is an accurate proposition. I am simply asking that we have a little time to study it. The amendment occupies a foolscap page and we want to consult on it. Subject to studying it I think I can say that we will be in agreement with the minister's suggestion because, as I stated previously when I moved to strike out new section 329, I anticipated that something would be substituted somewhere in the bill dealing with the definition of grain products. I thought it might be done in the interpretation clause. The minister has produced a version which we may find to be quite satisfactory, but I ask him to let us study it for a while and renew his request a little later today.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the exact terms of my amendment are not satisfactory, I think that once we get over the problem of unanimous consent and have them properly before us there could be a further amendment then if anyone wishes to move it. I should not wish to be unreasonable and therefore I am quite prepared, if we can go on and make some progress on clause 1 and perhaps even pass it, to move the other amendment which we had at the beginning and which relates to new section 468A. I do not think I need ask for unanimous consent in that regard. It is true that my whole amendment was ruled out of order, but this part of it in which there are technical amendments was not even mentioned. It certainly has not been considered before. All it does is correct an error or a couple of errors, one in printing and one which is very little more than a grammatical error. It is very important, however, that this should be done. I would hope it could be understood at this stage that there would be no objection to this. It is identical to the first part of the other amendment, that is, it starts with certain lines substitutes others, and corrects the typographical error. It does absolutely nothing more.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister a question while we are reflecting on the amendment which the minister has proposed and while the committee is dealing with clause 1? I should like to ask the minister a question which I think goes to the root of the whole issue. Is it the minister's view that in this amendment the government in effect is accepting what I think was suggested by the hon. member for York South, because I see there is reference to financial assistance being provided in respect of the movement of grain and grain products pursuant to report under paragraph (e) of subclause (1) of clause 15? I take it that this is acceptance by the government of the fact that under clause 15 the transport commission in fact has the right to make a certain inquiry and if as a result of that inquiry it makes certain recommendations the government might have to take some action hinging on that.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it is the reverse. My understanding is that it would prohibit any action being taken at all if any of these rates was ever changed. If any of these rates was changed, then a railway would be prohibited, unless a new law was passed by parliament, to receive any compensation whatsoever. It is just the opposite. There may be some implications in it but it is a prohibition in itself.

Mr. Baldwin: I understand that, but it does accept the fact that the transport commission under clause 15 can hold the type of inquiry which was the subject of discussion. I quite agree that if any changes are made which involve the carriage of grain by railway companies under what are called the statutory or related rates which have become attached to them, then of course the railway companies are out of court but this, I think, does accept the principle that there can be an inquiry under clause 15.

Mr. Pickersgill: In relation to those matters which are not covered by the statute.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, would it be possible for the minister to provide us with a copy of his proposed amendment to section 329 so that we may study it? Several of us over here do not have copies.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can assure the hon. member that it is not an amendment to section 329.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Kindt: It is a proposed amendment.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is an amendment to clause 74, which purports to put in two new sections, 470 and 471, of the Railway Act. The section 329 which is now in the bill as amended is the one relating to the At and East rates. This has no relation to it. The old 329 is gone but not forgotten.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, since we are going to allow the minister's proposed amendment to stand while consideration is given to it and while discussion is being carried on in respect of clause 1, may I ask the minister for a brief explanation of the second part of his amendment which has to do with section 471. Section 471 as proposed by the minister was included in the amendment moved by the Minister of Fisheries but I understand it was not in section 329 of clause 50 in the original form.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is an attempt to meet in the only way which seemed to be very feasible at this stage, without much more study of all the implications than I felt it possible for me to give, the very urgent and rather compelling observations of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra which were echoed by the hon. member for Kootenay West whom I described perhaps rather irreverently as a "venerable echo". Both hon. gentlemen seemed to think that an inquiry of this sort would at least satisfy the British Columbia Federation of Agriculture, which had made representations, that the problem about which it is concerned was being taken under urgent consideration and that indeed a statutory examination of this problem was being provided for. I may say that one of the difficulties to which I did not allude the other day in dealing with this problem in this fashion is that we already have made a decision in the house, under a bill brought in by my hon. friend the Minister of Forestry, to deal with the same problem in another way through freight rate assistance for feed grains. That is not the only problem; there are half a dozen others. I do think, however, that this study ought to be made. It was felt that while this is only the statutory requirement of an examination of the matter, in view of its importance it ought to be done in this way.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, I do not like the wording of the clause in the amendment.

I wonder whether the minister would consider a change. The reason I do not like the wording is that it says in part:

—the commission shall undertake a study of the differences between rates on grain moving for export to ports in British Columbia—

Then follows the part I do not like:

—and rates on grain moving otherwise—

Does that mean moving east?

Mr. Pickersgill: No. It relates only to ports in British Columbia. To put it bluntly it means the domestic rates as compared to export rates. That is what the people from British Columbia were asking. It has no relation to any part of the country except British Columbia and grain moving into British Columbia.

Mr. McIntosh: I have no objection if it relates to ports in British Columbia and so on but I am suspicious of the wording here. I should like to have it changed.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Chairman, I might assist the hon. member. If he will read a little further he will find that it says, "on grain moving otherwise to such ports". "Such ports" refers back to the ports of British Columbia. So it refers only to grain moving from the prairies to British Columbia.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Chairman, might I say a word?

The Chairman: I recognize the hon. member for Acadia, but I should like to point out to the committee that when the minister rose he rose to ask for unanimous consent to present an amendment to clause 74.

• (4:20 p.m.)

At the moment I should point out to the committee that we are on clause 1.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Chairman, first of all I should like to say that I was recorded yesterday as saying some words in the heat of the debate which I now wish I had not said. I do not deny having said them but I would like to apologize to you, having had my faith in democracy restored by what might be termed the supreme court's ruling on the case that was before the house. I should like you to know that the remarks I made were in the heat of battle and I would not like you to consider them to be as harsh as they sounded at the time. I should like to make that apology to you, Mr. Chairman.

Having said that I should like to ask the minister a question. There is a small amendment to clause 74, section 469, which I should like to move. Would the minister like to hear the amendment now or are we to discuss clause 1 at this time?

Mr. Pickersgill: There is no reason why the hon. gentleman should not make an amendment as long as it is in order, and I wish him better luck than I had.

May I say, sir, how pleased I am by what the hon. member for Acadia said today. I think he has revealed to me and to a lot of us that in the consideration of this bill about which he felt very strongly and to which he has applied himself with great diligence—and I would say has had some influence on—he has revealed to us a new side and has gained new stature and new respect in the house. We all do things in the heat of battle. Perhaps I do not get as hot as fast as some other hon. members do, although I think perhaps there have been times when I have been provoked. I regretted and deplored the fact that those words were uttered. I am glad the hon. gentleman feels the same way and I hope Your Honour will feel that the amends are complete. I am sure all of us on both sides of the house have absolutely undiminished confidence in Your Honour's impartiality.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Can the chairman tell us what clause we are considering now? Are we on clause 1 or on clause 74?

The Chairman: May I say to the hon. member for Acadia that we are now on clause 1 and it would be the preference of the Chair if the hon. member could hold his amendment in abeyance until we get to clause 74.

Mr. Pickersgill: Since we are proceeding in a highly irregular but somewhat more harmonious fashion and since we have allowed in discussion of clause 1 latitude almost beyond where latitude stretches, perhaps we could let the hon. gentleman read the amendment which he proposes to move at a later stage and send a copy to you, Mr. Chairman, so that it would be handy when we reach clause 74. This would give me a little chance to do some thinking about it.

The Chairman: If it is the intention of the hon. member for Acadia to give notice of the amendment which he proposes to move I would suggest to him that there is nothing irregular in that procedure.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): The amendment I propose to move is to clause 74, section 469. I give notice of it if the minister wishes to study it.

The Chairman: Perhaps the hon. member misunderstood me. I see nothing irregular in receiving from the hon. member notice of an amendment which he proposes to move to clause 74 while we are on clause 1.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I will deal with my suggested amendment first. As has been stated many times before, this bill deals with many aspects of transportation. On reading committee proceedings No. 34, in which appears a brief submitted by Canada Steamship Lines, a small omission in clause 74 was brought to my attention. On page 2301 of the proceedings of that committee this company presents strong arguments in support of its contention that section 469 of clause 74 does not allow it a phasing out period with regard to the subsidy to which it is entitled under the Freight Rates Reduction Act. Section 469 states:

"eligible companies" means the railway companies under the jurisdiction of parliament that are subject to Order No. 93600—

The point is that Canada Steamship Lines has been entitled to part of the subsidy under the Freight Rates Reduction Act, which was a roll-back of the 17 per cent increase. Order No. 93600 refers directly to the order of the Board of Transport Commissioners allowing the transportation companies to increase their freight rates by 17 per cent.

In 1959 the government introduced the Freight Rates Reduction Act which states that "company" means a transportation company. The important point here is that in the Freight Rates Reduction Act reference is made to transportation companies while in section 469 reference is made to railway companies and the phasing out over a three year period of the $20 million subsidy granted to them under the Freight Rates Reduction Act. I do not know just what is the minister's intention in changing the wording from "transportation companies" to "railway companies".

On page 2436 of the same proceedings of the transport committee there is a list of transportation companies which have received the subsidy. I could read it but to save time let me say that there are about 13 companies in all and only one of them is a steamship line; the others are railway companies.

Some of them are United States railway companies. As the bill stands now, on that part of the business done in Canada by United States railway companies they will be allowed a phasing out period under the bill but we are excluding Canada Steamship Lines whose freight rates on class and non-competitive goods were frozen on the introduction of the Freight Rates Reduction Act.

I think it is logical to expect that they should be given an equal chance with regard to the phasing out of this subsidy. If they are not, they are being placed in a difficult position vis-à-vis the railway companies with whom they are in competition. The railway companies will be allowed to keep their rates a little below those the competition shall set, but the steamship company will have to set its rates in relation to its costs and in that case they will be higher than those of the railways. Therefore the steamship company will either lose business to the railway companies, because with this subsidy the railway companies will be able to charge lower rates, or the steamship company will have to keep its rates low and lose money or have a diminishing return in respect of profits. In this connection I have taken into consideration the minister's remarks as reported at page 12130 of Hansard. In dealing with this matter he said:

It was represented to us in the standing committee by the Canada Steamship Lines that their rates had been frozen at the time of the rate freeze put on by the previous government in 1959—

The minister went on to say that he had given this matter a great deal of thought and had come to the conclusion that because the transitional subsidies for the railways are made up of a number of different things, upon some of which Canada Steamship Lines has no claim to any share, this computation should be made very carefully. Surely the minister is there suggesting that by some means Canada Steamship Lines has been receiving part of this subsidy under the Freight Rates Reduction Act which it cannot justify or was not entitled to receive. If it was entitled to part of the $20 million subsidy provided under the Freight Rates Reduction Act, it should be entitled to part of the money which will be allocated to these companies in the phasing out period.

I have a minor amendment which I should like to put forward. I ask the minister to consider it very seriously. I have read the remarks of the minister in this regard. He suggests there are a number of differences. If there are a number of differences, Canada Steamship Lines must have been receiving payments in the past to which it was not entitled or there has been some error somewhere.

When this clause comes before the committee again I will move that the word "transportation" be substituted for the word "railway" in line 28 on page 63 of the bill. I shall do this because the clause pertains to order No. 96300 and that order is specifically concerned with the Freight Rates Reduction Act. It is stated in that act that "company" means a transportation company. There is a difference between a transportation company and a railway company. Having said that, and I shall probably say more when the amendment is before us, I shall send a copy of the amendment to you, Mr. Chairman, and to the minister. I should now like to deal briefly with the bill in general.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether before the hon. gentleman does that he would permit me to make a very brief observation about his proposed amendment. I would have some difficulty in accepting it in the form it is. But in view of the statement I made to which the hon. gentleman referred —I forget which clause we were dealing with at the time but it does not matter; it was some time ago—about putting an item in the estimates, I will see whether between now and the time we reach clause 74 again I can find some form of words that would perhaps indicate that an appropriate sum, because I think the rules would have to be slightly different in this cause on account of certain other payments that were made to the railways for other reasons, should be made available to Canada Steamship Lines and any other transportation company covered in the order. Then this provision would be in the bill. I can see the great advantage of having it in the bill. It is a problem only of seeing whether we can find a form of words that will express the intent we both have and not do something that was unintended. The reason I rose to make this speech was not for the members of the committee so much as for certain persons who are not present but who in fact we all know are in the gallery.

Mr. MacEwan: The heavenly host.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I appreciate the minister's remarks. I would like to say a word or two about the purpose of the bill. I know that perhaps most hon. members think I have said enough about it already but there are one or two other things I should like to say. My remarks concern the over-all purpose of the bill and its effects. I shall not deal with the public utilities aspect other than to say that the bill denotes that competition shall be the keynote in transportation in the years ahead. Competition shall be the guide line which will in effect set rates, provide services and, we hope, put the railways in a better financial position. In a sense this is one of the big reasons for the bill. It arose from the report of the MacPherson commission which felt we had to do something to allow the railways to obtain more revenue.

However, I would point out that the bill puts no ceiling whatsoever on the railways. They can charge as much as the traffic will bear. This is where we will get into trouble. We see farm machinery companies all across Canada charging whatever the traffic will bear. The Minister of Agriculture made some brave statements some time ago. He said he would watch this situation and the farm machinery companies would have to account for any price increase. We have seen price increases on farm machinery but we have not seen any action by the minister.

It is perhaps a true interpretation of the minister to say that he says a lot and does very little. This takes me back to his tour of western Canada shortly after he became Minister of Agriculture. He went there to test western reaction with regard to an eastern lawyer being made Minister of Agriculture. I remember the brave statements with regard to transportation that he made in Winnipeg. I wish we had had his help in the last couple of weeks on the subject we have been debating. He has been noticeable by his absence. He was reported as having said:

> The C.P.R. is chafing more and more under statutory freight rates that it maintains are unrealistically low in modern days. Mr. Greene displayed a good grasp of Canadian history and economics in publicly stating that the C.P.R. was given rich rewards in return for the guaranteed freight rates.

It is too bad he could not have said that in the house where it would really count. He also said at about the same time on the same tour, as reported in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of January 13, 1966:

> There was one slight departure from the latter when he—

The Minister of Agriculture.

—told newsmen that the C.P.R. should abandon oil rights "and other amenities" if it wanted to claim a right to rail line abandonments on strictly economic principles.

It is too bad the Minister of Agriculture could not put some emphasis on this matter when we were debating the question of branch line abandonment. It is lucky for us that after this bill passes branch line abandonments will be considered by the transport commission which is to be set up. I should like to see the Minister of Agriculture representing some of the people in rural areas in which lines are to be abandoned and hear him state publicly then that the Canadian Pacific should abandon its oil rights and other amenities if it wanted to claim the right to rail line abandonment on strictly economic principles. These are very sound words. It is too bad the minister did not pronounce them more often during the last two weeks.

I could go on quoting from the remarks made by the Minister of Agriculture during his western swing. He said:

Some very drastic action should be taken...to ensure that grain can be moved as quickly as possible.

Is this bill going to answer that problem? The Minister of Agriculture never told us what the drastic action would be under this bill during the two weeks we have been discussing it. I hope he will take part in the debate on clause 1 and tell us just how this bill can be improved before third reading and what drastic action he is considering.

In the same newspaper, he is also reported as follows:

"The first thing that made me see red," he said—

I suppose he is another one who loses his temper.

—was a situation that arose when Canada sought to send grain to help relieve famine in India.

"Even though the country had the commodities and shipping available," he said, "it was not able to move the grain because of railway limitations."

We hear all this talk about rail line abandonment and we have a minister of the Crown who went out west so he realizes there are many limitations on the railways and our grain is not able to move. This is an interesting point that was not made earlier in this debate.

I should like to quote from the Star-Phoenix of January 14, 1966 some further sentiments attributed to the minister. He has not been very forthright in the last two weeks during this debate but apparently he was forthright during that western swing to test the climate. This editorial reads in part:

But Mr. Greene did echo the sentiments of many prairie citizens that as far as the current grain movement situation is concerned, "We might as well be back in the stone age."

This statement verifies the point I was making earlier that there has to be a good deal of modernization of the railway plant and grain handling equipment. However, the minister has not made any suggestions in this regard.

The Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of January 21, 1966 deals with what the Minister of Agriculture had to say about the Canadian Pacific. Then the minister went on to deal with the farmers. We have not heard him speak for the farmers lately. He was going to do something with regard to farm machinery prices. I tie in all these remarks because in this bill we are taking the wraps off the railways. They can earn as much as they like. They can charge as much as the traffic will bear.

The minister was going to do great things with regard to farm machinery but he has not done anything. He has not even produced a set of guide lines. Some of the other ministers have relied heavily on guidelines but he has not produced any. He made a bold statement about the railway situation in western Canada. We have had a long, difficult debate on this bill, but not once did he give us the benefit of his wisdom. Not once did he stand up in the house and say, "I have a duty to speak when the farmers are prejudiced as they are." Not once did the minister take part in this debate to outline the modernization that he felt should take place in grain handling.

I should like to say one more thing about the movement of grain while we are on this aspect of the problems of western Canada and our whole transport system. Many members will wonder why we debated the question of the Crowsnest pass rates review so hotly. Here is a very good example. I should like to quote from an editorial in the Montreal Gazette for January 20. The heading is "Botched Bill'. The editorial makes reference to last Wednesday when we defeated clause 50. One sentence in the editorial reads:

What is certainly an issue is how much the railways should be paid for carrying such products at uneconomic rates.

We have heard judges criticize newspapers for passing judgment before a case has been heard. Here is a newspaper which boldly says that these are uneconomic rates. It reminds me of the attitude of the press throughout this debate. We in this House of Commons have been told time and time again by the news media that we should get down to work, that it is a terrible thing the way members project their petty conditions, their petty jealousies, and fight for personal gain. The news media, radio and television are continually telling members to get down to work, to set aside petty things and produce some honest-to-goodness legislation for the good of Canada.

The bill before us was described by the Minister of Transport as the most important piece of legislation that this house will be dealing with this year. We have spent two weeks debating it here and we spent six weeks studying it in the transport committee. We moved seventy amendments in the committee and we have moved something like seven or eight amendments here during the last two weeks. Do you know what I heard on C.T.V. news last Sunday evening? In a report on what was happening in Ottawa it was stated that Ottawa has been rather dull during the last two weeks, that not much has been happening but that the weeks ahead look good because there is a fight developing in the Conservative party over whether there should be an early or late leadership convention. Who is it who projects across the country the image of members not working? It is the vultures who sit up there. They are the ones who project this image across the country. No wonder we have a man coming to Ottawa and attempting to throw a bomb into this chamber.

There was an editorial in the Star Weekly some time ago to the effect that members had brought this on themselves because they had driven the man into a state of frustration. He had written letters and the newspaper reached this decision because of the letters he had written. The newspaper said the members of this house drove the man to frustration by continually fighting, displaying petty jealousies and trying to pick a fight over nothing. This is what we are supposed to be doing. We have been working hard for two weeks on this bill and we worked for six weeks in the committee. We have examined a bill which has some 94 clauses and will affect the Canadian economy. The minister described it as the most important piece of legislation the house will deal with this year.

The vultures sit up there waiting to see whether or not a member is going to be in a dangerous position. Then they flock in and feast upon the bones. If we are all healthy and working there is nothing sensational about which they can write so they circle high and stay away. They know nothing and care nothing about a parliament which is working. They want sensationalism to sell their newspapers and capture the imagination of the television and radio audiences. They have agitated the public and discredited the House of Commons all across Canada. They alone are responsible for the disrespect in which this house is held. It is high time that they educated themselves. When I first came to Ottawa I used to forgive the press.

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope the hon. gentleman will not mind too much, but a little while ago he asked what we were doing about speeding up the movement of grain. I should like to speed up movement of this bill a little, if we could leave the vultures aside and get on with the debate.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I am going to deal with another aspect of the press and also with seaway tolls. The minister has thrown me completely off stride but I will come back to it.

When I first came to Ottawa to represent an agricultural area I used to forgive the press because not too many of them were farm boys or knew much about agriculture. Therefore I could not expect them to write intelligently on the subject. I had hoped that after nine years some members of the press gallery above us would become educated and would write intelligently about agriculture, but I found that as soon as they began to write intelligently their editors took them out of the House of Commons.

What the press wants is sensationalism. They do not try to create a good impression of what members of parliament are doing in the House of Commons. We have worked hard over the last two weeks and have brought in some beneficial amendments to this bill. We improved clause 16. We deleted the provision for a review in regard to a major commodity in western Canada. We improved clause 1 and amended a number of clauses in committee of the whole.

I should now like to turn to another subject dealing with transportation, and that is seaway tolls.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to seem to restrict any hon. member, but there is absolutely nothing in the bill having to do with seaway tolls, sir. I commend the hon. gentleman for his zeal, but an encyclopaedic debate at this late stage of the bill surely is not warranted.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): We all realize, Mr. Chairman, that this bill embraces all modes of transportation. The minister should not have been quite so quick. An earlier clause in the bill deals with the Transport Act which in turn deals with navigable waters in Canada. I should like to deal with navigable waters in Canada for a minute or two and also with the very foundation of the bill.

The bill provides that competition shall be the ruling force in setting rates. How can we move our goods to export markets by using a transportation system which has no regard for the movement of such goods to export markets?

I should like to quote an article in the Manitoba Co-operator for January 19 which says among other things:

> Washington has advised Canada it cannot reach an agreement on Canadian proposals to increase St. Lawrence Seaway tolls by roughly 10 per cent—

According to this article Canada wants to increase seaway tolls. The farmers want to move their grain economically to the lakehead by rail and then through the St. Lawrence seaway which was built by taxpayers' dollars and is part of a modern transportation system in Canada. Yet the Canadian government wants to increase tolls by 10 per cent. This is a problem that we are facing. Under this legislation railway companies can charge what the traffic will bear. We now see the Canadian government placing domestic producers in Canada in a worse position by advocating that seaway tolls go up another 10 per cent.

I urge the minister and the new transportation commission set up under this bill to keep a close and careful watch over the railway companies and the seaway authority. The onus will be on them to assure producers, whether it be of wheat, iron ore or manufactured goods, the right to move their goods to domestic or export markets. Even a manufacturer who wants to move his goods to a market in Canada must do so as economically as possible or he will be faced with severe competition from abroad. The same thing applies to the movement of iron ore or of wheat from western Canada by rail to the lakehead and then through the St. Lawrence seaway system to their final market. Control of transportation will rest with the 17-man commission that this bill will set up and the onus will be on that commission to assure the producers of Canada the right to market their products.

May I make one more point about competition. Up to this time the rate setter in the major centres of Canada has been the railways. Trucking companies have followed along at correspondingly lower rates in order to assure for themselves a portion of the business. As we look ahead this bill provides no ceiling on rate setting by the railways, so how is competition going to affect the rate setting of the railways?

Competition will have to come from the air lines. More and more air lines are moving into the field of bulk haulage of freight. The bill is very deficient, to say the least, in bringing about more competition among the various modes of transportation. It does nothing to amend the Aeronautics Act to allow for greater competition between the air lines and railways in the haulage of freight from many centres in Canada producing goods for domestic markets. During the past year businessmen in cities like Calgary, Winnipeg, Edmonton and Vancouver have been complaining that sufficient landing rights had not been established between their cities and other countries.

This bill does nothing, Mr. Chairman, to remedy the deficiencies in the Aeronautics Act and it does nothing to promote real competition between the modes of transportation which will set the rates in the years ahead, namely the air lines and railway companies. There is no doubt that the trucking companies will be in favour of the railway companies increasing their freight rates, because that in turn will allow the trucking companies to increase their rates on a scale in most cases somewhat below that of the railways.

In many respects this bill is deficient. While we have worked hard in the committee during the past two weeks and improved the bill a great deal, it could be further improved and broadened a good deal to provide greater safety for domestic producers and increased competition among the various modes of transportation.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Chairman, after 12 or 13 days of debate I think I may be allowed to speak and although I was assured two days ago that I would be the first to speak on clause 1, other members once again got in ahead of me. But I realize, as the discussion goes on, that the first mistake of the minister was to show excessive tolerance to the other members who break the rules of the house. We have here, I feel, the natural result that ensues when the rules are not observed. I am completely opposed to this idea of standing consideration of clause 1 to the end of the debate. We see now what happens in such a case. We stand clause 1 and go on to clause 20, 50, 60 or 75 and then revert to clause 1 and to the point where we have to listen to members speak four or five times on clause 1. We can even see amendments to clause 4 or 75 brought forth on clause 1.

I think we are making the worst imaginable mess of this thing and that we cannot entirely blame one group or another for it, although one newspaperman took it upon himself to blame the whole opposition saying that the opposition was carrying out a filibuster.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to point out at this time that I am the first of my party to rise to speak on this transport bill. I have only general remarks to make but this I should like to say to the newspaperman I have mentioned and for whom I have much esteem: I am very surprised at his statement because he usually is very careful about what he writes. He seems to have taken leave of his good habits this time. It may be that certain parties gave the newspaperman the impression that a filibuster was being carried out but there again, I am not ready to cast the first stone at anyone because in view of the significance of this bill, it is quite normal I think that such a discussion be foreseen, particularly on the part of the Conservatives, but I should not like to put all the blame on them because if more Conservatives seem to take part in this discussion, it may be because we have been discussing the problems of the west for the last 12 days.

In this regard, I was saying a few minutes ago that I am most anxious to get out, to fly out, once and for all from this Crowsnest pass.

We have been in the Crowsnest pass for about ten days and I wonder when it will hatch. Here again, I am not blaming the members from western Canada, because they are pleading their case, and I only hope that from now on we shall adhere to the rules. I object especially to any violation of the rules, because if we had fully complied with the standing orders, we would not be experiencing our present difficulties today.

I do not wish to speak too long on the subject, because I tried to take a few notes so as to keep my remarks to a minimum and avoid incurring the accusations often made by journalists against the opposition.

Mr. Chairman, allow me first of all to congratulate the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill). We have few opportunities to do so, but I must commend him for his continual attendance in the house during the discussion of his bill. He is also to be commended for his repeated interventions, because it seems, at first sight, that he has taken up alone half the time devoted to this study. It was worthwhile, since we shall probably pass within a few days one of the most important bills for the country. The minister was therefore right when, in his statement at the committee stage, as reported on page 11372 of Hansard for December 20, 1966, he gave the following warning:

> I think we all realize that transportation, as I have said too many times already, is the bony structure of our country and that it is very important to keep the skeleton healthy if the body politic is to be at all healthy. We had a big responsibility, when we came to do something about its basic structure, to make sure that we did it well.

In fact, Bill No. C-231 indicates the course of action for the future Canadian Transport Commission. I must say also that I was greatly surprised when, after that introduction, the minister told the house that this bill should be passed before December 31, 1966, in order to avoid the legal and administrative effects of a delay.

Those are very surprising words coming from a minister whom I always considered very sincere.

The minister knew very well, when he said this, that he was asking the house to do the impossible. He knew very well that the budget contained no provision for further payments to the railways after December 31, 1966. The minister also knew that the order in council dealing with the freeze on present rates for grain moved to Atlantic and eastern ports was due to lapse on December 31, 1966.

He was perfectly aware of the conditions set forth by the railways with respect to abandonment of branch lines on so-called protected lines. Knowing all this, why was the bill not introduced two months earlier? Why was it not brought down ahead of the medicare bill, for example, which will only be put into operation in 1968? Why did he take such a risk with the economy of our country? Was it to protest loudly and publicly that the opposition is holding up the business of the house? Or did he wish to shock the house so that it would hastily pass a piece of legislation deserving the most thorough scrutiny?

That is the procedure to which we have always taken exception, ever since we came here, and we entreat the government to stop playing this game, for although I have drawn the attention of the house to the present bill, I could say as much for other measures, for the government has taken wicked pleasure in using this weapon.

Canada is a vast country and it seems even bigger as in the course of the present debate one hears the different opinions of various parts of the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific and particularly as one becomes aware of the different worries and many needs of the various economic regions. In fact, I think it might be preferable to have a definite law for each region in the country.

Therefore, I hope the hon. minister, who is certainly full of good will, as may be seen from his patience in listening to all our opinions and his determination in answering all our questions as clearly as possible, may give this direction to the business of the house.

Often, it is not his explanations which seem obscure, but the economic complexity and diversity of various regions which make it difficult to implement legislation.

In some parts of Canada, all modes of transport are operating simultaneously and seem to be in competition with one another while in some others, there is neither the number nor the competition, yet, all citizens are entitled to the same justice.

For instance, in my riding of Roberval, the activities are far less numerous than in large cities, since we make shift with the C.N.R. and private trucking. We hope that with the new act, the Roberval-Lake St. John valley will be looked upon as deserving more attention than it has received in the past.

As far as the Canadian National is concerned, I should not like this bill to permit the Canadian Transport Commission to simply eliminate the Chambord-Dolbeau branch line. I am notifying the hon. minister because the C.N.R. authorities have already tried to greatly reduce the freight service by suggesting the closing of certain stations in rural areas.

Of course, I am not afraid of the branch line being eliminated, for the C.N.R. knows very well, in view of freight level and logging companies and so on, that this branch line is the most economical in eastern Canada in relation to its run.

But, it is on passenger service that I wish to call the attention of the minister. Certain young Montreal technocrats, who came to the area, will try to satisfy the commission that the operation of that passenger train is uneconomical. But I can assure you that it is so because the most important point of all was overlooked: service. Indeed, if users in Montreal, Ottawa or Toronto were to receive the same treatment as those of the Lake St. John-Roberval area the "intermetropolitan" trains would be empty.

Once it has been decided that a line is uneconomical, it is not so stated overnight. They do precisely as the Canadian National authorities are now doing, in my area. They start by removing the postal service, thus taking a capital daily revenue from the express service. They gradually abandon the express service to individuals, to such a point that we now have left but one express car, and they even talk about removing it. And because not a single dollar was spent on improving passenger service in the last 30 years, because there is a preference for building skyscraper hotels in large centres, the future commission will be directed to take away the last passenger train, while the former users will still be obliged to foot the bill for the follies committed in large centres. Such is the sorry lot of our remote areas.

In order to remedy this situation, I suggest that commissioners should be chosen in remote areas rather than in large cities; for instance, they should be chosen among the chairmen of great farm co-operatives in the province or in all other provinces, the labour leaders, county council associations, etc., since the law will, after all, be administered by the commissioners. Therefore, we must act at that level in order to assure equal justice.

After freezing the arbitrary decisions of the Canadian National authorities until this bill is passed, we now ask the government to make a sensible choice of commissioners.

In our area, the track itself should be completely rebuilt. That is what is most urgently needed. Then, there are the passenger coaches. The minister must convince the C.N.R. management, since we failed to do it, that the coaches for the Chambord-Dolbeau line will be used by human beings. I wish the minister had come to my riding, particularly around the Christmas and New Year holidays. I would say that the coaches we had were the first ever used in Canada. As a matter of fact, for a moment I was sure that they were being shipped to the Saguenay historical society museum when a station master brought me back to earth.

I know that the minister likes a good laugh but there is a limit to ridicule. I am confident that this time my representations will be heard favourably and that I will not have to raise the matter a tenth time.

I also want to call to the attention of the minister the situation of our private trucking companies which are up against the C.N.R. with its own fleet of trucks. In fact, when we subsidize the C.N.R. and, indirectly, its trucks or trailers with the taxpayers' money, we must remember that we are also taxing the trucking companies which employ more people in my area than the C.N.R. Thus we are forcing our private companies to pay the cost of an unfair and illegal competition. The new legislation must therefore prevent such injustice.

I also pointed out to the minister on other occasions some hypocritical methods used by the C.N.R. on passenger trains running between Montreal and Dolbeau, particularly with regard to sleeping cars. A few years ago, accommodations cost $5, then $7 and today $9. That is more than the price of the ticket. You will be told that the $9 includes $2 for the meal, but what if the passenger does not eat—indeed what if he cannot eat—in fact, the train leaves Montreal at 9.30 p.m., long after supper time, and in the morning, when you wake up, in Roberval or in Saint-Félicien, there is neither kitchen nor cook. For the return trip, it is even worse, since we arrive in Montreal at 7.10, and coffee is served at eight o'clock. I say "coffee" because I had the experience once: when I came in to the dining-car at seven o'clock, I was told that there was no more coffee.

If this is not deluding the public hypocritically, I wonder what all that means. Where are those truly responsible in the Canadian National?

Furthermore, what effect will this bill have on interprovincial transportation? Mr. Chairman, on this point, I would simply like to quote an article which appeared in La Presse today, the 26th of January, pointing out that Quebec had protested to Ottawa about that. I trust that the minister received this protest, since we can read this.

> The federal bill to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada prompted strong protest from Quebec to the federal government.
> That is what Quebec premier Daniel Johnson said yesterday in the legislature in reply to the leader of the opposition, Mr. Jean Lesage.

Mr. Jean Lesage had asked the premier to table the correspondence he had exchanged with the federal Minister of Transport, and Mr. Johnson replied that he could not, unless he received permission to do so from the minister himself. That is as it should be, it is legal, because that is what we are told here when a question is asked about a third party; I believe the Quebec premier was right in giving such an answer. On the other hand, the attack by the Leader of the Opposition was nothing but boastfulness and hypocrisy.

I hope the present minister saw to it that an answer was forwarded to the Quebec premier as soon as he received this protest, because I sincerely feel that the Quebec government is very worried at present, and has good reason to be, in view of what has been happening these last few years.

Repeating that he had sent a letter of violent protest to Ottawa, Mr. Johnson said, and I quote from the newspaper:

> —the bill, to which Mr. Lesage had given his approval while in Ottawa, represented a "mouse-trap" which the Union Nationale government had continuously rejected before 1960.
> He went on to say that clause 5 of the bill contained a provision enabling the federal authorities to take over provincial jurisdiction in the transportation field.

Now then, we would not want to pass a bill providing more mouse-traps, thus placing Quebec in an even more difficult position.

I want to put one last point on the record —since words come to pass and writings remain—with respect to newspaper reports on increased Canadian Pacific Railway profits. No doubt all hon. members have read this report. For the month of November, Canadian Pacific Railway revenues amounted to $48,103,659, with expenditures totalling $43,880,358, leaving $4,223,301 in net profits for one month. The report goes on to state the profits, revenues and expenses covering an 11-month period. From January to November, 1966, railway revenues amounted to $505,-392,223, with expenses totalling $461,859,497 giving a net profit, for 11 months, of $43,-532,726.

The figures are then compared with those of Canadian National Railways, a crown corporation. For the same 11-month period, Canadian National Railway revenues amounted to $812,309,000 with operating expenses totalling $802,305,000 leaving a difference of $10,004,000, which represents the net deficit on railway operations.

Mr. Chairman, I must say that I am very surprised to note according to those figures, that the Canadian Pacific Railway, with net profits exceeding $43 million, enjoys the same subsidies as the Canadian National Railways, operating at a $10 million deficit.

What is being protected through all that? What influence does the Canadian Pacific have with the authorities of the commission that it can get the best lines while benefiting from the same assistance as the Canadian National? Might some of the powers that be in the Canadian National have interests in the Canadian Pacific? Why are some shareholders of the Canadian Pacific going up in the management of the Canadian National?

There, sir, are some of the questions the people of Canada are asking themselves today. The time I am allotted does not allow me to take the wraps off that extremely favoured company, the Canadian Pacific. We had another example yesterday, when a member proposed an amendment to allow municipalities to tax the Canadian Pacific where it operates within their limits. The amendment was negatived.

The Canadian Pacific has nearly always been exempt from paying certain taxes. Even the minister, at times, seemed to invite the Canadian Pacific to pay certain taxes in certain places. I would submit, Mr. Chairman, that the point is not to "invite" that company, because the Canadian Pacific is just an ordinary company like all the other companies in Canada which pay taxes for their presence, but to require the payment of taxes by the Canadian Pacific as a private company. If this bill stipulated that the Canadian Pacific must pay taxes, in view of all the privileges it enjoys, this would not only benefit the Canadian people but it would be fair toward the other companies.

It is incumbent on the government to bring our transportation companies into line and to remind them that they must serve the people not take advantage of the people.

[English]

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a brief word about one subject which the hon. gentleman mentioned. He made reference to certain proceedings that took place in the Quebec legislature yesterday. Strictly speaking, under the rules of our house we are not supposed to import strangers into our debates here, but I am not going to make any point of that. I have the impression that if we in this house talked about the exercise by a provincial legislative assembly of its functions we would be criticized pretty strongly in that assembly.

What I want to make very clear is that although there was very little if any debate in committee on Part III of the bill, that part of the bill respecting extra-provincial motor vehicle transport is completely and exclusively within the jurisdiction of this parliament.

There is absolutely nothing in it which invades in any way anything about which a provincial legislature can legislate. If we are to have any law at all in this country with regard to trucking companies which operate from one province to another or which travel out of a province into another country, that law can be made by this parliament and by this parliament alone. No one else can make such a law because that is the way the constitution reads. We cannot regulate trucking operations which are entirely within a province because that is entirely within provincial jurisdiction. We have never attempted to touch that and are not doing so in this bill. We have no intention in this regard.

With regard to the Motor Vehicle Transport Act passed by this parliament in 1954, the purpose of that act was to fill a vacuum in the law. For many years it had been believed that jurisdiction over all trucking operations, even those crossing from one province to another or even going outside the country, was within the province. This parliament never attempted to make any law regarding that subject matter until the matter was taken to the courts and carried to the Privy Council. The Privy Council decided that parliament and parliament alone could make laws in respect of that matter.

The result was that there was no law at all, because parliament had never made one. At that time I was a very junior member of the government but, as I believe every hon. member here knows, I was a very close personal friend and a former aide, if you like, of the then prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent. I remember very well the discussion which took place at that time about this decision. I remember very well the time when the Motor Vehicle Transport Act was introduced to fill this gap in the law. This act has been the law of Canada since 1954 and to the best of my knowledge its constitutionality has never been challenged in the only place where a challenge could be made effective, in the courts, by any provincial government or by any agent of a provincial government. That is the situation. All we are doing here is continuing to exercise that jurisdiction which parliament and parliament alone possesses. That is the factual situation.

This is a free country and I take no exception at all to what anyone wishes to say concerning what we are doing in this house. We, after all, are the people who must decide what is to be done in matters which are exclusively under the jurisdiction of parliament. I suggest that if we are to have a country at all it is just as important to protect the autonomy of Canada as it is to protect the autonomy of any province. I do not believe there is any member in this house who has been more anxious than I to respect in letter and in spirit the full rights of the provincial legislatures which are given to them by the constitution. I believe that the powers that were given to the provincial legislatures were given to them and to them only and that we should neither attempt to invade them nor take them away. I also believe, however, that provincial legislatures and other people should not try to take away from parliament or appear to suggest that parliament cannot exercise the jurisdiction which belongs to us and to us alone, in this parliament as representatives of the people of Canada.

It is possible that we might desire to change the constitution or change some of its provisions. This has been done before. It was done quite recently. It was done in 1952 in respect of old age pensions and there was another amendment made a year or two ago. These amendments can be made. But so long as jurisdiction belongs to this parliament and to this parliament alone we are the only ones who have any say concerning how that power shall be exercised. Each person must act according to his best idea of what is the proper thing for us to do.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question? I thank the hon. minister for his answer and I would like to ask him whether it would be possible to tell us if he received any protests from the province of Quebec and whether he answered them.

[English]

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Sherbrooke attempted to ask the same question on orders of the day. At that time I happened to be out of the chamber for a moment or two preparing for later events. I therefore was not able to answer his question. I indicated to him that if he would ask it at this time I would have an answer for him. I think it is only fair to the hon. member for Sherbrooke that I should mention this because he was very alert to ask the question, as the hon. member for Roberval has been. The answer is that I received no protest from the premier of Quebec. I would not have expected to. The premier of Quebec did write about this matter to the Prime Minister. He is the person to whom I would expect the premier to write. The Prime Minister replied. I believe there was a second letter and a second reply. I consulted my right hon. friend in anticipation of the question from the hon. member for Sherbrooke.

I am authorized by the Prime Minister to say that so far as we are concerned there would be no objection whatever to the production of this correspondence but we feel, nonetheless, we should make sure by means other than reading about it in a newspaper that the premier of Quebec has no objection. Steps will be taken to do that today, I hope, so that if there is no objection we can comply tomorrow or at the latest on Monday with the request for the correspondence which I should be very glad to have made public.

[Translation]

The Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member for Sherbrooke wish to direct a question or to take part in the debate?

Mr. Allard: Mr. Chairman, I should have liked to participate in the debate. But it seems to me the Chair is a little short-sighted and that we do not often get the opportunity, in this corner of the house of being recognized, especially during this debate on transportation.

So, if you do not recognize me, I will resume my seat once again.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member said that the Chair seems to be affected with a visual defect of some kind or that it is a little short-sighted. I must point out to the hon. member, who gave notice to the Chair of his desire to ask a question, that it is for that reason I am asking him whether he wishes to ask a question or take part in the debate.

Mr. Allard: Mr. Chairman, the question was asked previously by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier). I should like to participate in the debate for five or six minutes, not very long, as you deem it proper.

[English]

Mr. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Mr. Chairman, I must say that I have followed this bill with a great deal of interest. When I spoke on another clause I mentioned that my constituency had many problems. At that time the minister mentioned that he hoped I would read the bill. I have done so; I have studied it from cover to cover. I must say I am very pleased with the debate which has taken place. The debate has been thorough as I believe it should be on a subject as important as transportation in this great nation of ours.

I was very pleased to note that the minister was aware of the concern in my area with regard to rail line abandonment. I was also very pleased to hear the announcement made by the minister the other night that no applications for rail line abandonments will be granted before 1975. I think this is very good but I hope that in the meantime consideration will be given to closing the gaps to which I referred so as to provide the service which rightfully belongs to the people in that area.

I did some further research to find out more about the contract that was signed for the construction of a branch line on Spruce Lake the subdivision of the old Canadian Northern Railway and to discover what was holding it up. I have in my hands the Order in Council with regard to this matter and I should like to put on record, that it is dated May 27, 1927, 40 years ago. This 38-mile gap has been left there for 40 years. If one looks at the map of rail line abandonments one can see a natural barrier in the area north of the North Saskatchewan river. Not a single railway line crosses the provincial boundary in that area. I think this is a shame and I believe that discrimination has been exercised. One can see there a gap extending 38 miles. The result is that all freight on the west side of the provincial boundary has had to be transported through Edmonton to reach the head of the lakes or the port of Churchill.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. Donald Gordon, speaking in Winnipeg in 1962, referred to the cost of moving grain over some of the branch lines. He estimated that the cost in some cases was as high as 15 cents per ton mile. When one realizes the amount of grain that has had to be transported hundreds of additional miles owing to the gap existing there one realizes that if a rail line had been built to close the gap it would have paid for itself in one year.

Hon. members may wonder why more people in that area have not spoken and asked that this important gap be closed. The reason is that people become discouraged when they wait for something for 40 years. We realize that there is no shortage of material for building railway lines. What I wish to bring out tonight is not the fact that we know that this line will not be abandoned for a few years but our hope that the railway company will decide to fill in this gap to give the people the service that is required.

In the same speech in Winnipeg Mr. Gordon pointed out that in many cases grain was being trucked for 4 to 8 cents per ton mile. I do not think Mr. Gordon has ever done much trucking or he would not have quoted such a figure. I am familiar with trucking and I know that any truck driver who attempted to haul grain for 4 cents per ton mile would not be in business very long. I hope that the railway will decide to close this gap at the earliest possible date. Then we can consider the situation and decide whether the line is a paying proposition.

I did some further research to find out what has been done about the expansion of the line from St. Walburg in Saskatchewan to Bonnyville in Alberta. I have here a copy of the Order in Council dated July 2, 1929. The first paragraph reads as follows:

> The committee of the privy council have had before them a report, dated June 27, 1929, from the Acting Minister of Railways and Canals, representing that the management of the Canadian National Railway Company have furnished a plan showing the proposed location of a proposed branch line of railway of the Canadian National Railway Company, one hundred and twenty-six miles in length, extending from St. Walburg in the province of Saskatchewan, to Bonnyville in the province of Alberta. The expenditure for this line, estimated at $4,212,000, has been authorized by chapter 32 of the Statutes of Canada, 1929.

I think this is disgraceful because although the grade was constructed the steel was only laid from Bonnyville to Grand Centre, approximately 29 miles, and left there. It appears, from looking at the map that the railway was afraid to cross the provincial boundary. One cannot help but reach the conclusion that pressure was applied by an effective group of people in one of the cities to stop this line from being constructed. If one looks at the map closely one can see that not one railway line crosses that vast area North of the North Saskatchewan river. I hope that in the period of time when no rail line abandonments are to take place the railway companies concerned will take a close look at the situation. There will be no shortage of material available, as I said before.

In speaking about the St. Walburg line I should like to say a few words about the number of settlers who have become established in that area. Both Orders in Council to which I have referred have stated reasons for this settlement, namely, to improve the area and to develop the country. Nothing was done about this but I should like to mention some of the injustices that have taken place. In the dry 30's many people moved up from the south to what was called the Saskatoon settlement in the Loon Lake area and also the Moose Jaw settlement. Many people from other countries settled in this area and built up fine farms. If justice were done the railway lines would be completed for these people even at this late date.

I shall now refer to the three lines that are up for abandonment in the constituency of Meadow Lake. I should like to say something about the Heatherly subdivision line from North Battleford to Medstead. It would be very unjust to abandon the line in this area. The C.P.R. has applied for abandonent to a point near Leoville. It has been operating as far as Medstead and using running rights on the C.N.R. line. This provided a connection between North Battleford and Meadow Lake. Both these lines are up for abandonment.

Should not the Canadian National get this part of the C.P.R. line so it can run trains in to link up with the C.P.R. and by means of running rights go into the vast area of Meadow Lake? Certainly it would not hurt anybody if the two railways went into Meadow Lake. Approximately 100 miles to the south is the city of North Battleford. I do think these people should not be cut off completely from Meadow Lake so far as rail transportation is concerned. I think it would be only just if the C.N.R. were given running rights from Medstead to join the C.P.R. line near Leoville and then go on into Meadow Lake. I believe one railway should also make an extension beyond Meadow Lake to the west and into the north country.

The resources are there. There are many people in the area hauling grain from west of Goodsoil clear to Meadow Lake. I do not think this is fair. The C.P.R. has had running rights all these years from Prince Albert to Debden, and I think the C.N.R. should be given running rights over the C.P.R. from Medstead to Meadow Lake; either that or the branch line of the C.P.R. from Leoville to Medstead should be turned over to the C.N.R. It is not just that a city the size of North Battleford should not have a railway link with Meadow Lake.

Before there is any talk of rail line abandonment these matters should be very seriously considered and the railway companies should be compelled to accept their responsibility in this regard. The situation that prevails at the moment is very unjust. I have referred to the order in council. The C.P.R. was given almost blanket permission to run wherever it wanted and build a line. This is how it got running rights from Prince Albert to Debden.

These are some of the big beefs of people in the constituency of Meadow Lake. I hope these complaints will be seriously considered and we will not have to wait another 40 years before something is done about them. There are many other problems in this area. We all have a beef about freight rates. I believe there is a lot of injustice in this field. I do not think the country is getting the service it should get. We cannot be getting the service we should when a constituent can write to me saying, "Mr. Cadieu: Is it impossible for me to buy a railway ticket to a city like North Battleford? The railway tells me that I cannot buy a ticket." This is a city of 25,000 or 30,000 people only 100 miles from Saskatoon, and there is no passenger service. I do not think there is any justice in that and the matter should be looked into.

We have a line to cities like Prince Albert and North Battleford, with no rail service whatsoever between them. In recent months I have received complaints from livestock buyers who say they cannot use the railroad line because the trains only leave at the end of the week, and they will not ship stock and let them lay over at the stockyards all week end. The railway could make money in moving these cattle but they have done themselves out of the business by not providing service to the people.

Therefore I hope this new commission will get down to business and work out a policy whereby this country will be given the opportunity to develop in the way it should. I read from Mr. Gordon's speech made in Winnipeg. He said that since the last great war $200 million had been spent on opening up railway lines to mining areas but not one single penny has been spent that would benefit agriculture.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, it is almost six o'clock. I understand there is a desire to have the private members' hour this evening. I was wondering whether before the committee rose there would be a disposition now, since hon. members have had a chance to look at the proposed amendment, to give unanimous consent to its introduction. That does not mean it will pass.

The Deputy Chairman: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the committee revert to clause 74 and let clause 1 stand?

Mr. Pickersgill: That would be very agreeable to me, sir. If we could revert to clause 74 I should like to move the amendment.

The Deputy Chairman: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On clause 74—Cessation of "bridge subsidy".

The Chairman: Order. Before I put the motion from the chair I should like to remind hon. members of standing order 50 which states as follows:

> Whenever Mr. Speaker is of opinion that a motion offered to the house is contrary to the rules and privileges of parliament, he shall apprise the house thereof immediately, before putting the question thereon, and quote the standing order or authority applicable to the case.

I am not now going to rule on whether this amendment is in order; there is no question before me. But I say to the committee that the procedure being adopted is highly irregular. However, the committee is in charge of its own rules, and if it prefers to accept this amendment unanimously that is entirely up to the members of the committee. Having made this statement, I feel that the position of the Chair is clear. Is it now unanimously agreed that I put the motion to the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hellyer: I so move, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: It is moved by the Minister of National Defence:

That Bill C-231, an act to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential provisions, be amended by adding immediately at the end of page 64 of the bill, as reprinted, the following:

"Grain products" defined.

"470. (1) In this section "grain products" means any commodities to which, under the freight tariffs of the company in effect on the 1st day of January, 1966, the rates known as grain products rates, flaxseed products rates or rapeseed products rates applied on that date.

Condition precedent.

(2) It is a condition precedent to the payment to a railway company of any financial assistance provided, in respect of the movement of grain or grain products as in this subsection described, pursuant to a report under paragraph (e) of subsection (1) of section 15 or otherwise provided to the company as compensation for an imposed public duty in respect of such movements, within the intent of paragraph (c) of section 1 of the National Transportation Act, that the company has not increased the level of rates prevailing on the 31st day of December, 1966,

(a) on grain products other than flour moving from any point west of Fort William to Fort William or to Port Arthur over any lines of railway of the company;

(b) on grain products other than flour moving for export from any point west of Fort William or Armstrong to Churchill over any line of railway of the company;

(c) on grain or grain products moving for export from any point west of Fort William to a Canadian port on the Pacific coast, other than Vancouver or Prince Rupert, over any line of railway of the company;

(d) on grain products other than flour moving for export from any point west of Fort William to Vancouver or Prince Rupert over any line of railway of the company; and

(e) on grain or grain products moving from any point west of Armstrong to Armstrong over any line of railway of the company.

Rapeseed.

(3) For the purpose of this section and section 328 and the act and agreements therein referred to, the expression 'grain' includes rapeseed and the rates applicable to the movement of rapeseed from any point referred to in subsection (2) of section 328 after the coming into force of this section shall not exceed the rates applicable to flaxseed.

Rate differential study.

471. Not later than six months after the coming into force of Part I of the National Transportation Act, or this section, whichever last occurs, the commission shall undertake a study of the differences between rates on grain moving for export to ports in British Columbia and rates on grain moving otherwise to such ports, and shall report to the governor in council for such action as he deems desirable or expedient in the public interest."

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should say this when the Speaker takes the chair, but I believe it was the understanding that the private members' hour was to go on today and notwithstanding that fact we would take the hour off from seven o'clock to eight o'clock. I would certainly appreciate that because there are one or two points upon which I should like to get a little advice.

Mr. Knowles: May we also have it understood now which clause we will be discussing at eight o'clock?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think there is no doubt about that. Clause 1 was stood. Clause 74 was called and an amendment was moved by the Minister of National Defence. The amendment is now before the committee, so I think it is clause 74 and the proposed amendment thereto which will be discussed.

The Chairman: When the committee resumes after eight o'clock clause 74 will be considered. It being six o'clock, pursuant to the provisions of standing order 15(3), in order that the house may proceed to the consideration of private members' business I do now leave the chair.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard), Transportation—Montreal—Use of French language in railway transportation services; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), Unemployment Insurance—Request for increase in maximum benefits; the hon. member for Kent (N.B.) (Mr. Crossman), Transport —Improvement of ferry service, Digby-Saint John.

I think there is some agreement amongst members of the house that when private members hour expires at seven o'clock the house will suspend its sitting.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is so ordered. The order of business for today as listed is notices of motions for papers, private bills and then public bills. Is it the intention of the house to proceed with private bills?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE BILLS

SEABOARD FINANCE COMPANY OF CANADA

Mr. A. J. P. Cameron (High Park) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-21, to incorporate Seaboard Finance Company of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to incorporate a small loans company within the meaning of the Small Loans Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, Chapter 251. Section 2(f) of the Small Loans Act defines a small loans company as being "a company incorporated by special Act of Parliament and authorized to lend money on promissory notes or other personal security and on chattel mortgages." The proposed small loans company would be known as Seaboard Finance Company of Canada. There is already in existence an Ontario Company known as Seaboard Finance Company of Canada, Limited. Should parliament grant a charter under the provisions of the Small Loans Act, the existing Ontario company would immediately proceed to sell all of its commercial paper to the new federal company.

The Ontario company would also proceed immediately to effect a change in its corporate name to one completely dissimilar to that of the federal company and change its corporate objects from those of a finance company to those of a holding company.

The existing Ontario company, Seaboard Finance Company of Canada, Limited, was incorporated by Ontario letters patent on August 17th, 1955. There are two basic ways for a company to become authorized to make small loans. The most obvious is to apply to parliament for a charter under the provisions of the Small Loans Act. The second and relatively more simple way is to incorporate a provincial letters patent company and to obtain a money-lenders licence for that company from the federal Department of Insurance.

when Seaboard commenced its operations it did so in Ontario initially on a small scale.

That being the case it did not wish to take the time or trouble to apply to parliament for a charter under the Small Loans Act. However, now Seaboard is a large organization operating on a nation-wide scale in every province except Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. Seaboard therefore feels that it should more properly be operating under a federal rather than a provincial charter. It wishes to take this step notwithstanding the fact that by so doing the operation of Section 13 of the Small Loans Act would result in most of the regulatory provisions of the Loan Companies Act R.S.C. 1952, Chapter 170, being made applicable to the federal company. For example, Section 19 of the Loan Companies Act requires that a majority of the board of directors of a company incorporated under the provisions of the Small Loans Act must be residents of Canada and British subjects. Nevertheless Seaboard, operating as it now does on a nation-wide scale, would prefer to do so under a federal charter and has therefore petitioned parliament accordingly.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): In recent years, Mr. Speaker, the house has given greater and greater attention to this type of bill. In passing and by way of comparison, may I say that when North American General Insurance Company was incorporated not many years ago there was no discussion. I looked up the record and ascertained that the bill was sponsored by the then member for Mount Royal, I believe, former Speaker McNaughton when he was a private member. There was not one word said during the progress of that bill as recorded in Hansard. There was just a motion to give it second reading without any comment by anyone. Likewise, on the motion for third reading there was not a word expressed about the purpose of the incorporation or anything of that sort. The bill was referred to a committee, but what transpired there we do not know, because no verbatim record of the proceedings of the committee was kept.

As a result of the recent traumatic experiences of the shareholders and investors of Prudential and Atlantic there has been growing concern in the minds of Canadians about whether or not they are dealing with sound, efficiently operated companies. Consequently, though this responsibility rested on our shoulders to a great extent before there is an even greater responsibility resting on the shoulders of members now with regard to such bills. This responsibility is to do our level best to see that we are being asked to incorporate companies which are likely to operate their business in such a way that the operation is not sound or ethical. Quite frankly, as I have said on other occasions in this house we do not have the machinery or the adequate facilities to enable us to do this. The best we can do is to make extensive inquiries during debate and to follow up in committee, drawing only on our relative ignorance and the advice given to the committee by the Department of Insurance with regard to a particular company.

On December 8 last, Mr. Speaker, I made some comments in connection with another company seeking incorporation. That company engages in the same field of business and in seeking a federal charter it also desired to replace provincially-chartered companies. Earlier I telephoned the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Wahn) to advise him that I had something to say which would be directed to him but unfortunately the hon. member cannot be here today and I do regret making these comments about this conversation in his absence. However, I am sure he will have the opportunity to follow this up.

On December 8 last I expressed concern about the manner in which a company called Aetna Investment Corporation Limited had conducted itself in so far as the purchase and sale of shares in Cowichan Copper Company was concerned. At that stage the hon. member for St. Paul's rose and indignantly asked whether I would be prepared to repeat what he classified as "slanderous remarks" outside this house and I said that I would. Subsequently the hon. member for St. Paul's and I had a conversation outside the chamber in which he repeated his request that I make my statement outside the house, to which I replied I would be pleased to do so. Following this the hon. member said he would send a newspaperman to my office the next morning so I could speak to him about it. I waited all next morning hoping some newspaperman would call upon me at the request of the hon. member for St. Paul's, but no one came.

However, Mr. Speaker, all this is aside from the other matter I want to deal with in connection with the operation of this company. Shortly after the events of December 8 I came to understand the intense concern of the hon. member for St. Paul's about the activities of Aetna Investment Corporation Limited, because I subsequently discovered that one George E. Creber, who at the time was vice-president and a director of Aetna Investment Corporation Limited, is also the same George E. Creber, or so I am informed, who is a partner in the law firm of the hon. member for St. Paul's. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it seemed to me that there was not that detached approach to that bill that one might have expected, that there was more of a personal or individual involvement in the matter on the part of the hon. member for St. Paul's his law partner being vice president and a director of Aetna Investment Corporation Limited.

The president of Aetna Investment Corporation is a Mr. Mark Tanz. Mr. Tanz was quite concerned about what I said on that day in the house in connection with the operation of his company and so he came to see me. We had a long conversation about the activities of Aetna Investment and other companies with which Mr. Tanz is connected. Mr. Tanz advised me that he had no personal dealings whatever in the sale or purchase of Cowichan Copper shares. Upon hearing that I tendered to him my apology for involving him individually in the transaction which took place, and I now publicly tender my apology once more to Mr. Tanz for having intimated, if not having said directly, that he had participated in the sale or purchase of Cowichan Copper shares.

Subsequently, Mr. Speaker, another matter came to my attention which I think places us in an even more awkward position when dealing with bills of this sort in the house. I am quite sure that the hon. member for High Park, as sponsor of this bill, is taking the information which has been given to him at its face value. He is accepting the word of whoever is promoting this bill. He presents to the house what he is told is the case, and what else can he do? I do not think that he should be expected to be a private investigator inquiring into all the nooks and crannies of the structure of the company whose bill he is sponsoring.

Consequently, if anything untoward happens the sponsor of such a bill is left in an extremely untenable position. Not only that but if there is, as is the case in some instances, a connection, however tenuous, between members of the house and those interested in the company either through a law firm or because they are directors of associated companies, then these members are placed in an awkward position. I submit we must look extremely carefully at this sort of thing.

On April 15, 1965, Sheep Creek Mines Limited, which subsequently became Aetna Investment Corporation Limited, filed a document called a filing statement with the Toronto stock exchange. This document is extremely important in talking about the involvement at Aetna Investment Corporation with Cowichan Copper Company, and at this juncture I do not want to go beyond that point and to talk about other connected companies.

This filing statement dated May 5, 1965, was a specific undertaking, and I should like to quote from it:

> The undersigned Sheep Creek Mines Limited hereby undertakes and agrees with the Toronto Stock Exchange that all shares of Cowichan Copper Co. Ltd., (Non-Personal Liability) acquired by it pursuant to the agreement between the undersigned and said Cowichan Copper Co. Ltd., (N.P.L.-et al) dated 12 April 1965, as referred to in Item 9 of the filing statement of the undersigned dated 12 April, 1965, will be held for investment purposes only and will not be sold or distributed for a period of six months after the date or dates of acquisition thereof and thereafter will not be sold or distributed without prior notice of such sale or distribution being filed and accepted by the Toronto Stock Exchange.

This filing statement is really in the form of an undertaking for the specific purpose, I submit, of protecting the rights of other shareholders in Cowichan Copper. Reading the statement of Aetna Investment Corporation Limited filed on October 17, 1966, wherein is set out the purchase of Cowichan Copper Company Limited's shares, with the price paid and the amount received shown by months, one sees that it shows conclusively that Aetna Investment Corporation Limited sold its block of shares in Cowichan Copper Company Limited contrary to and with full knowledge of the undertaking made to the Toronto stock exchange on May 5, 1965. It is argued that this was an oversight, that one Robert A. C. Douglas, at one time secretary of the company—I do not know if he is still secretary—and also a barrister in Vancouver, forgot to notify the Toronto stock exchange of the sale of the Cowichan Copper Company Limited's shares.

This is the sort of thing, Mr. Speaker, which, added to the promotional activities of companies like Windfall Mines and others, puts the investing public in Canada at a great disadvantage, and I submit places a great responsibility on the shoulders of members of this house to inquire as closely as possible into the affairs and activities of companies which come here to be incorporated. We should inquire as carefully as we can in order to protect the rights and welfare of individual Canadians who at times place their life savings in such companies.

At this stage I can do nothing more than repeat in essence what I said on December 8 about the activities of this company. I might add that, unfortunately for those who want to pay attention to the structure or activities of companies which are incorporated here, a bill went through this house not long ago to incorporate the Canada Health and Accident Assurance Company. When that bill went before the committee regrettably the committee did not have disclosed to it information that would have connected the ownership of that company with Aetna Investment Corporation Limited subsequent to my having raised the activities of Aetna Investment Corporation Limited in this house.

There is therefore, I think, a responsibility on the sponsor of the bill to incorporate Canada Health and Accident Assurance Company to state in the house that this company is owned by the people who own Aetna Investment Corporation Limited. It may be that the sponsor of the Canada Health and Accident Assurance Company bill did not know of this connection. If so, that underlines the point I made earlier that members of this house are placed in a very awkward position, because I am sure that in most instances all the member sponsoring the bill knows is the information placed before him by counsel for the company seeking incorporation. If there is any other connection and the hon. member is not cognizant of it, then he proceeds in good faith, as was done in the case of Canada Health and Accident Assurance Company.

But if it is discovered subsequently that there is a connection between the company to be incorporated and another, such as Aetna Investment Corporation which I have just mentioned where it turns out that we should have had another look at Canada Health and Accident Insurance Company, that makes a mockery of the activities of parliament and puts the sponsors of bills in an awkward position. Who knows what may be the awkward developments falling on the shareholders of any one of those companies so incorporated? If there are connected companies and if the directors happen to be members of the house, and especially if they happen to be former cabinet ministers as in one instance, they are placed in an awkward position, particularly where there is a connection between a finance company, an insurance company, a borrowing agency and a savings and loan company. Where these companies are owned by the same principals I submit that at best parliament is put into an extremely bad position. Because there is an intimate relationship between borrowing money and lending it to one of the other companies controlled by the same group owning the company that borrows the money, the shareholders of any one of these companies do not have their rights properly served.

I put these comments on the record, though my remarks deal with one particular company. I repeat that the activities of Aetna Investment Corporation with respect to the purchase and sale of Cowichan Copper Company shares were contrary to and in disregard of a specific undertaking made to the Toronto stock exchange, an undertaking that was there to protect the rights of shareholders of Cowichan Copper Company Limited. I submit that this is not within the ambit of the good business ethics, as anybody will appreciate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Though the hon. member has not yet discussed the principle of this bill, I must advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Howard: I had just got to that point, Mr. Speaker, but I shall sit down.

Mr. Herridge: On a point of order, I wish the hon. gentleman would live up to the rules of this house with the determination he showed earlier this afternoon and would practice what he preaches.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, when we talk about companies, I am always interested in who owns what. I was interested to hear the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Cameron) say that the Seaboard Finance Company was an old and respected company operating in eight out of the ten provinces. In checking the survey of industrials for 1966, the only reference to Seaboard that I see is to Seaboard Utilities which has housing developments in Tampa, Florida. There is no reference in the Financial Post survey of industrials to this company, though it does mention all the other finance companies I can think of, including some that the hon. member who preceded me referred to. There may be a reason why this particular company does not appear in the survey of industrials. There is no information in the survey about the principals of this company, and the survey covers a very wide range of companies.

Every member of parliament is aware of his responsibility in creating new companies. As the former speaker said, we have created some companies in the past that we have not been proud of. Also, many companies are now looking to federal incorporation for the protection that previously has been afforded by the inspector general in the Department of Insurance.

Many finance companies in Ontario have apparently operated very loosely under the aegis of the Toronto stock exchange and have engaged in activities not in keeping with the principles of high finance and banking. We have heard much about those principles recently before the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs. It therefore behoves each hon. member to look with a jaundiced eye on companies which come to the federal government for incorporation. It might be well to exercise caution with regard to Seaboard Finance, because I am unable to find any statement in the surveys in which companies are usually content to present their financial picture. Thus I am unable to ascertain whether the Seaboard Finance Corporation in Ontario is connected in any way with other companies whose conduct might be questioned. In my opinion, the unpleasant situation which developed a few months ago is sufficient to make us wary of passing bills of this kind which immediately give these companies an immense amount of prestige, and in some cases set them up as going concerns. Before we grant incorporation we should make a point of knowing a great deal about the background of these companies.

The hon. member for High Park (Mr. Cameron) is sponsoring the bill before us. Frankly, I wonder why supporters of the government are so free in sponsoring the applications made by these companies. A member of parliament might well leave himself wide open for criticism by doing so, because there are bound to be some bad eggs. If I were sponsoring such an application I would need to possess a great deal more information than has been made available in some of these cases. I assume that the hon. member is in no better position than we are to ascertain the background of this company. We are being asked to set up a potential threat to the operations of the Department of Insurance, and other departments with similar responsibilities, without knowing what the company has done in the past.

I have seen the signs of the Seaboard Finance Company in a number of communities. I gather that the operations of this company are fairly recent in most of the communities outside Toronto. In some of the smaller communities I have noticed signs of recent date indicating that the Seaboard Finance Company is operating.

I have been looking up the records of the Senate to see what examination was given to this bill in the other place, and, I find that the banking and commerce committee reported that the committee had considered Bill S-21 and directed that it be reported without amendment. The discussion which took place in the Senate was confined to formalities, indicating that the bill would be placed on the order paper for third reading at the next sitting. The Senate committee hearing was not covered, so a report of what took place there is not available.

Recently I have received letters from my constituency raising grave doubts about the financial responsibility of one of the largest finance companies in this country. I have checked with the Inspector of Insurance who tells me there is nothing wrong with this particular company. But constituents of mine who take contracts with this company are being told there is no money available for those contracts, and that the finance company is not buying the contracts. I am also told that a proportion of their money—in the case of a small businessman it runs as high as $13,000—is being held by that company as collateral against bad debts which may be incurred in the purchase of paper from the dealer.

I know an accountant who is familiar with the operations of Bay Street, a man who is closely connected with many of the transactions there, and had him make inquiries in Toronto as to the financial situation of this particular company. He tells me there is no danger of this company going bankrupt, for the simple reason that if it did, two banks would go with it.

It is good to know that this organization is guaranteed because two large financial institutions, banks of Canada, are also involved up to their ears in the relationship. But what protection is given to those who over the years have brought their business to a particular finance company against apparent willingness to pay hold-backs to cover the extra charge for the purchase of the paper they may buy? As I understand it, when a company buys paper, the finance company is really not taking any risk at all with regard to the product being supplied by the businessman. I have found in the past that when a finance company buys a piece of paper, then whether the product is of any value or not the promissory note is a liability of the person who signed it, and no liability rests on the finance company. The finance company, however, has the right to repossess and claim the collateral which is given up by the person who has sold or transferred the note.

Four or five of the people in my riding included their statements with the statement which came to my attention, which became known on the occasion of a trade fair in Toronto, where rumour went around that this very large financial institution was closing its offices that day—and it has, to the extent of not supplying any money in certain areas.

I think it would be unfair to agree to the passage of this bill without knowing a good deal more about Seaboard Finance or without being able to reach the conclusion that its operations in the provincial field had been satisfactory. I am not talking of ten months from now, when the company will have been able to raise $500,000, or even of the time when it can raise $250,000 to call a meeting of the board of directors and begin operations. If we pass this bill they will be able to go into business immediately, because they have the money and, I presume, they have the capital equipment, the offices, and the staff who would be transferred to the new company. If we are asked that a reserve fund be set up to cover the liabilities of these companies we surely have a responsibility to ensure that the government is not saddled with a company which may become a liability.

This must be part of our responsibility. It is not good enough for us to treat these people as though they were boy scouts, and tell them that we think it is a worth-while effort they are making. We are prepared to say that the directors of this national organization will have the interests of the organization at heart, but when we incorporate a finance company such as the Seaboard Finance Company we must remember that we are creating an institution which, in conjunction with all other financial institutions, will play a vital role in deciding the economy of our nation.

This company will decide what businessmen can sell their promissory notes to it, and so finance their businesses. It will also decide which business people can finance their stocks. Incidentally, the case I referred to previously occurred at the furniture show in Toronto. Businessmen there had to finance their purchases on a short-term basis in order to put stock into their respective showrooms. On the basis of the information that has been provided to us, it is unfair that we should be asked to make up our minds on the incorporation of this company. Just recently we had a case of a company being incorporated which changed hands while its application was before parliament, but the sponsor of the bill in question did not inform the house of that change. I do not say that is the case here, but the information that has been given us is not sufficient for us to make an intelligent decision on this application.

It may be that this is a bona fide company which does business in a legitimate manner, but I have yet to meet one of these finance companies that I think does business in a bona fide manner. I say that because of the interest rates they charge and the hosing they give to the general public who borrow money from them.

When we are asked to pass this kind of bill it should state what the company intends to do, what type of business it intends to conduct, whether it will engage in the small loans field, how much interest it will charge, what methods it has of gouging the public, and whether it intends to use the hold-back procedure when making loans. At present some companies have a procedure whereby when a person borrows $1,500 he has to deposit $200 or $300 of it in a bank to be retained as a guarantee that repayments will be made, even though he has to pay interest on the full amount and cannot use the full amount.

Companies such as this should also be willing to provide parliament with financial statements showing how they have operated in the past and stating who will compose their provisional boards of directors. That information should be provided prior to the inspector of insurance deciding whether they should be incorporated federally.

We are almost giving this company the right to print money. We are giving it the right to allow its board of directors to steal money out of the treasury and take it away. We are giving it the right to do all those things which we have seen done in finance companies during the last few weeks, and are putting no new restrictions on it. We are not even asking for the normal type of protection which we would seek from other such companies. Changes must be made in the rules before we agree to pass such legislation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I must advise him that the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, although I have a high regard for the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Cameron), that does not mean I have a similar regard for finance companies. It is the hon. member's job to pilot the bill through the house, and he is doing his best under the circumstances.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): Mr. Speaker, I must inform the hon. member that it is not a job; it is a voluntary task which I assumed.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): I apologize for the error; I took the word job to mean task. I know the hon. member has a kind heart and is doing his best, but despite that I am under no obligation to change my opinions about finance companies.

This bill leaves me somewhat perplexed. I agree with the opinions expressed by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), and in view of recent experiences with finance companies I consider that we must keep our eyes peeled. At present there are a number of items on our order paper dealing with the incorporation of finance companies and insurance companies. We must examine these items closely.

There have been a number of collapses of finance companies in recent weeks. We do not know whether this company will follow that pattern. The sponsor of the bill says that the company is a very solid one, and is spread across the United States. In reply I say that if it is going to be a subsidiary of a United States company, then I do not want it, in the first place. I think this is an incorporation which should stand on its own two feet. We do not know much about this incorporation. Practically all we have here is a series of names connected with the incorporation. We do not see any guarantees here concerning the shareholders. There is nothing about the company's policy. We do not know what its lending policies will be or what its requirements will be. I have seen the operations of the existing Seaboard Finance Company, and I might ask why it is they have so much difficulty in keeping their managers. I think it is because their internal policy is somewhat difficult to cope with. It is not because the managers do not like finance companies, because most of them have switched over to other finance companies.

When we are faced with the responsibility of permitting a bill such as this to go through this house, we should have many more details than are included in the four or five clauses we see here. They tell us there will be capital stock of half a million dollars. There is no guarantee to that effect, nor is there a guarantee that the shareholders will be able to provide security in the event that anything should happen such as has happened in the past few weeks.

There is no statement of policy concerning how the people dealing with this company will be dealt with. I would hope that this bill is not for the purpose of sidetracking the law and setting up some sort of a swindling business. Someone might be shocked and say that a company such as Seaboard Finance would not be involved in any swindling but, Mr. Speaker, some time back I ceased to be an ostrich. I have seen some very big people in business, and I know that just because they are big does not mean that they do not swindle. That does not give them absolution from everything. Sometimes there are things which we should look into. I am not saying that is the situation here, but it could be.

The hon. member for Timiskaming mentioned that some finance companies request deposits in respect of a loan to guarantee that the payments will be kept up to date. In the long run this becomes pretty expensive. We do not know what type of loans this company will be dealing with. We do not know what the interest rate will be or on what basis it will be calculated. Will it be at the rate of 2 per cent per month, 24 per cent per year? It may be more than 24 per cent per year. Some companies work it out on the basis of 2 per cent per month. On this basis the person borrowing the money starts to repay it and then at the time of the last payment there is an amount of $40 or $50 remaining. On that last $40 or $50 he pays the same amount of interest he was paying at the first. This works out in the end to a good deal more than 24 per cent.

All these things might be considered as part of business costs. I do not care what you call them; the other person is paying for them. Sometimes they present a wonderful picture. We hear these finance companies say "If you cannot make your payments, come and see us and we will make them for you", or "If you cannot make payments of $150 a month, come and see us and we will help you make them at the rate of $175 a month". What help is that? Sometimes this is a help, but I have seen finance companies which actually swindle and still have the right to operate. They can operate because there are loopholes. If these loopholes could be blocked, then perhaps some of these legalized bandits could be kept out of circulation.

We have had to cope with the problem of the collapse of finance companies. This is something which has an effect on the economy of Canada as a whole. Possibly this happens because when these bills go through the house they do not provide at that time sufficient information. I believe there should be more information contained in this bill. The title tells us it is an act to incorporate Seaboard Finance Company of Canada. I could go out and bring in a bill which stated that I wished to establish a new religious group. Then without any details having been given, the bill could be passed through the house and we would be able to go around the country collecting money for this new religious group.

When a bill such as this comes before the house, we should ask for more information. We should know how the shares are to be issued and the type of guarantees to the shareholders. We might ask where the head office is going to be. I would hope that this is not some kind of a sidetracking effort, but I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, that we have had the example of the Prudential Company, which some people mixed up with Prudential of America. Their office was on the eleventh floor of a building on the same street—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must advise the house that the hour for the consideration of private members business has expired.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, may I have permission to revert to motions in order to make a short statement?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the minister have the unanimous consent of the house to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FINANCE

SOLVENCY OF CANADIAN BANKS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am given to understand that due to a faulty translation in a foreign language newspaper in Montreal the Montreal City and District Savings Bank has had an unprecedented withdrawal of deposits during the day. I should like to say that all Canadian banks, including the Montreal City and District Savings Bank, are in a sound financial condition and that there is no doubt regarding their ability to meet all their liabilities.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The house will now resume the business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

TRANSPORTATION

PROVISION FOR DEFINITION AND IMPLEMENTATION OF NATIONAL POLICY

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-231, to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other acts in consequence thereof, and to enact other consequential provisions—Mr. Pickersgill—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: Pursuant to an order made earlier this day, I do now leave the chair.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: It is the understanding of the Chair that when the committee rose it was agreed that clause 1 would stand and that we would consider an amendment to clause 74 moved by Mr. Hellyer.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, in considering the amendment that was moved by the Minister of National Defence with the unanimous consent of the committee, I think there are one or two comments which should be made, because in addition to the contentious point with respect to a review that would be made upon application to the railways there is also one other very important part which was also left out of the amendment moved by the Minister of National Defence, and on which there was no contention.

While I certainly do not wish to take a lot of time discussing this bill any further, because we have been through it a number of times, I wonder whether the minister would be willing to accept an amendment to his amendment and include a subclause dealing with a crown representative before the Transport Commission whenever the commission was considering a matter related to the revenues and costs of a railway company under the jurisdiction of parliament. This particular subclause reads:

> Where in any proceedings before the commission under this act the matter of the revenues or costs of a railway company under the jurisdiction or parliament is under investigation, any minister of the crown in right of Canada may cause representations to be made thereon to the commission by persons having knowledge or costing principles or matters that appear to such minister to be relevant to the determination or railway revenues and costs.

It seems to me that it would be appropriate to include this wording as subsection 4 of section 470 in clause 74. At present section 470 contains three subsections and I do not think that the fourth subsection as proposed would be in contradiction of them. In fact it would replace the provision in which the Minister of Transport, and I presume the Minister of Finance or even the Minister of Agriculture may have a keen interest, to ensure that the cost formula used could be adequately investigated. There have been far too many cases in the past when the only really competent cost accountants and analysts who appeared before the Board of Transport Commissioners were from the railways. There have been only one or two important exceptions when experts in this field have been brought in to challenge the costing formula and other factors advanced by the railway. The Crowsnest pass rates, and revenues from those rates, are examples that come to my mind. The minister knows that these rates were challenged before the MacPherson Royal Commission and that the provinces of Manitoba and Alberta went to a great deal of effort and expense to challenge the shortfall claimed by the railways out of the Crowsnest pass rate agreement. I do not know exactly how much it cost these two provinces, but I know that it cost them many thousands of dollars because it involved a study which went on for well over a year.

In this study in depth, the word of the railway cost accountants was not taken but in many cases a survey was undertaken on the spot to determine the various factors which were included in the cost of grain. I am sure that the minister will recall that the $17 million shortfall claimed by the railways was changed, even in the opinion of the commission, to something around $2 million. When such a claim is made, not only with regard to the Crowsnest pass rates but with any other statutory or fixed rates, that is rates fixed by the commission, who will challenge the railways? The other day I said in the house that to challenge the railways can be a formidable undertaking, and sometimes a very expensive one which involves hiring counsel and cost analysts and, as it is said in the clause—> —persons having knowledge of costing principles or matters that appear to such minister to be relevant to the determination of railway revenues and costs.

It is far too great an undertaking for a municipality, even for a large one.

It was a little too expensive even for the provinces, considering that it is the responsibility of the federal government to defend the public interest in the examination of such costs. And yet, if the provinces of Manitoba and Alberta had not taken on this responsibility on behalf of their farm sector I suppose that it is fair to suggest that the $17 million shortfall claimed by the railways would have been partially if not totally accepted. I suggest that if the figures of the C.P.R. and of the other railways had not been challenged, and a study which had been conducted with a great deal of effort and at a great expense had not been carried out, the railways' contention would have been far stronger.

That is all I want to say at this time, Mr. Chairman. There are one or two other things I want to talk about under clause 1 of the bill, but I do not think it would be appropriate to raise them now. I have the amendment ready in both English and French, and if the minister would accept it perhaps I could move it, or perhaps I should move it first.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I am going to ask the indulgence of the hon. gentleman not to move it at all, but to let me have a copy of it. I have no objection at all to including this provision. Quite the contrary; I would like to have it in clause 74. But I do not think it could very well be related to the amendment moved by the Minister of National Defence. I think it should be in clause 74 generally. The hon. gentleman said he wanted it related, not just to the subject matter of new sections 470 and 471 but to all hearings. This is the way I would like to have it, so we would have a provision that in any hearing of this character this could be done. Certainly, as far as I am concerned I would be very glad to include it. I think it would be an additional safeguard to the treasury and an additional protection to everyone.

As far as I am concerned, I would be very happy to include it in this section. I put it in,

in the first place, because I thought it was a good idea. If the hon. gentleman would let me have it, I would like a little time to consider it and make a technical assessment of it. I undertake that we will not pass clause 74 before there is an opportunity to deal with it.

Mr. Olson: I agree, Mr. Chairman, and I should like to advise the minister and the members of the committee that there may be a technicality as to where it would best fit into the bill. It does not have to be subsection 4 of new section 470. But I would draw the minister's attention, now that he has the amendment before him, to the fact that the wording is "where in any proceedings before the commission under this act", and so on. It does not say "under this clause" or "under this subclause."

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it might become a new section 472. I do not want it to be related to this specific subject; I want to see the general application of the principle that if at any time there is any reason for this to be done, the representatives of the minister may be there to act on the other side. I think everybody agreed that this was a good idea. But I do not think we want to tie it to this particular amendment.

Mr. Olson: That is fine. So that the other members of the committee will know, the wording is exactly the same as that which was contained in subsection (6) of section 470 of the proposed amendment to clause 74. When the minister has had an opportunity to consider the amendment, if he would advise me I would be glad to move it.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to move another amendment to this clause.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words on clause 74 and new section 471 before indicating whether in my opinion it should pass. There are some parts of new section 471 that I do not like. I am asking for clarification in this regard. For instance, this section states:

—the commission shall undertake a study—

The word "study" is back in there.

—of the differences between rates on grain moving for export to ports in British Columbia and rates on grain moving otherwise to such ports, and shall report to the governor in council for such action as he deems desirable or expedient in the public interest.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Almost all the grain that moves into British Columbia comes from Alberta.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right.

Mr. Kindt: I have 6,000 farmers down there who will be watching this clause very closely. It appears to me that this provision is asking the commission to make a study of the Crowsnest pass rates to Vancouver and compare them with the private rates on feed grain for chickens and other things to points in British Columbia that are on the way to Vancouver.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, Mr. Chairman. If the hon. gentleman would look at it again he would see it says:

—rates on grain moving for export to ports in British Columbia and rates on grain moving otherwise to such ports—

So it is only to the ports. I am sure the hon. gentleman knows that the British Columbia Federation of Agriculture made representations to the committee that the rate on grain for domestic purposes should be the same as the export rate. Unfortunately and regrettably I did not feel I could accept that recommendation out of hand, but I felt they made a quite strong case. All I want the commission to do is study those two things and make any recommendations that seem to be appropriate. That is all. It has nothing whatever to do with anything else.

Mr. Kindt: One thing it will do is cause the commission to call for figures in connection with the Crowsnest pass rates and make a study of them.

Mr. Pickersgill: We know the figures on both.

Mr. Kindt: You know them now?

Mr. Pickersgill: The rates are known. What we are concerned with is the difference between the rates, that is all.

Mr. Kindt: Does the minister know the costs and all the other matters that enter into the Crowsnest pass rates?

Mr. Pickersgill: It has nothing whatever to do with costs.

Mr. Kindt: The minister does not say that in this section.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. gentleman will look again at the language he will see that it says:

—shall undertake a study of the differences between rates on grain moving for export to ports in British Columbia and rates on grain moving otherwise to such ports—

It does not say anything about costs. All the commission are supposed to look at is how much is charged, which we know, for export grain and how much is charged for domestic grain, and see whether something should be done to bring about some kind of adjustment between the two.

Mr. Kindt: You could get over the telephone what you are asking for in this section. If you turn the commission loose in this connection they will make a great study and come up with cost figures and a great many other things in order to substantiate what they find in the way of freight charges for moving grain through the Crowsnest pass, and for moving grain for domestic use. These figures are what we have been talking about for a week. I would not believe the commission with respect to any figures they put forward from a study of a whole bundle of statistics received from the railway companies. These figures would be absolutely null and void so far as the farmers of western Canada are concerned. They would have no confidence in them. If this study is to be confined 100 per cent to the rates, in the one case for shipping feed grains and in the other in respect of the Crowsnest pass rates, we know it is 23 cents or thereabouts under the Crowsnest pass rates.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think we are all anxious to make progress this evening. Perhaps I could direct the hon. gentleman's attention to the second part of this section, which says:

—shall report to the governor in council for such action as he deems desirable or expedient in the public interest.

The hon. gentleman is perfectly right; everybody knows what the rate is on domestic grain and on export grain. But the farmers of British Columbia have said they want them to be the same.

This parliament took steps at this session to provide a subsidy on feed grain. However, even with the subsidy the rates are not exactly the same. This amendment provides for a study, at the request of the B.C. Federation of Agriculture and other farmers, of whether it would be appropriate to meet the demands of these farmers. It has nothing to do with the costs of the railways. I do not believe the railways would even need to be asked a question about this. Anything the railways could tell us is already known. What we want the commission to advise upon is the question of public policy, whether there should be a different rate established for domestic grain or whether we should continue to use the feed grain subsidy. It is just that very limited question, as was put admirably by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra and the hon. member for Kootenay West. There could not possibly be any effect on the people shipping grain to British Columbia, but might be some effect on the farmers of British Columbia.

Mr. Herridge: I just want to tell the hon. member for Macleod that he is under a complete misappprehension. This suggestion was made before the committee by the representatives of the B.C. Federation of Agriculture, in an effort to provide grain to feeders in British Columbia, dairymen and poultrymen, at a price similar to the export rate. Grain costs a considerable amount in the interior of British Columbia. The request was decided upon after consultation with the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and other agricultural groups, who made no obejction to this suggestion. It is not doing anything to the Crowsnest pass rates or other rates. The request is that the relatively small quantity of grain that is used by grain consumers in British Columbia, in relation to grain consumers in British Columbia, in relation to grain exported, be carried at the export rate instead of at the rates presently charged. The commission is requested to study the matter and report.

Mr. Kindt: I am quite familiar with the facts which the hon. member for Kootenay West has given. I am aware also of the representations of the B.C. Federation of Agriculture. Let me say that federation, in turn, represents some small fruit farmers and the others in British Columbia. I represent 6,000 wheat farmers and I am protecting the interests of the wheat farmers of Alberta. I do not want anything used as an excuse for studying these rates. We have heard the minister's suggestion that a study be made which would expose certain rates, make them the subject of newspaper comment and a hundred and one other things. We have not any fear from that. What we do not want is to have this matter presented in the press and elsewhere as though someone is paying a subsidy to the grain farmer of Alberta.

Mr. Olson: Before clause 74 carries I wonder if the minister would indicate where he wants the amendment I suggested. Should it be included as subsection 4 after subsection 3 in section 470 or should I move it as an amendment to the proposed section 472?

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the hon. gentleman would mind having it moved as a separate amendment and allowing me to deal with this technical amendment and another amendment which I should like to move. This would give me a little time to get advice as to the best place to put his amendment in the clause.

Mr. Olson: I would certainly be willing to do that, except if clause 74 carries—

Mr. Pickersgill: No; perhaps I did not make myself clear. The amendment would be to clause 74. There is no intention to allow clause 74 to carry until the hon. gentleman has a chance to move his amendment. Both my amendments are to clause 74, and later I hope to have advice as to the most appropriate way of dealing with the hon. gentleman's amendment. The amendment presents some technical difficulty, but I am sure we will have it solved in a few moments.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment (Mr. Hellyer) agreed to.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like the Minister without Portfolio to move an amendment to clause 74 which would read as follows:

That Bill C-231 be amended

(a) by striking out lines 35 to 38, inclusive, on page 62 of the bill, as reprinted, and by substituting therefor the following:

"468A. (1) The reductions in rates that, immediately before the coming into force of Part V of the National Transportation Act, were in force by virtue of section 468 continue in force subject to subsections (2) to (4)."; and

(b) by striking out line 30 on page 63 of the bill, as reprinted, and by substituting therefor the following:

"that are subject to Order No. 96300 of the"

This does two things. It makes a very slight change in the language which was technically wrong in proposed section 468A, and the number 96300 is a printers' error. The amendment does absolutely nothing else.

Mr. Kindt: It sounds as though whoever drafted that amendment should decode it before we vote upon it. I realize the minister has said there is nothing contentious in it, that it just corrects these errors which slipped by him. This is quite normal, but at the same time I think we ought to have a look at that.

Mr. Turner: I move the amendment.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I am not objecting to the amendment but, before dealing with the matter, the minister provided an English copy of the amendment stating that lines 35 and 38, on page 62, will be amended. Now, in the French version of the bill, this does not correspond to the same lines and page and, consequently, we find it hard to see what is going on.

I would, therefore, ask the minister to provide us with a French copy of his amendment so that we may know the corresponding lines and page in the French version of the bill.

[English]

Mr. Pickersgill: Unfortunately, I did not catch the first few words the hon. gentleman said. Has the hon. gentleman the French version of the amendment, because I have one here?

Mr. Grégoire: No, I have not.

Amendment (Mr. Turner) agreed to.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment which I would ask the Minister without Portfolio to move.

Mr. Starr: Which one?

Mr. Pickersgill: The one from Toronto. There being such great affinity between them I know the hon. member for Acadia would want the Minister without Portfolio from Toronto to move it. Substantially it is the same amendment which was suggested by the hon. member this afternoon with respect to Canada Steamships, and is as follows:

That Bill C-231, an act to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential provisions, be amended by adding at the end of section 469 in clause 74 of the bill, as amended, the following subsection:

Deduction from normal payment.

"(6) The commission may, in calculating a normal payment under this section in respect of any year, deduct from such payment appropriate amounts for payment to any transportation company that was subject to > Order No. 96300 of the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada dated November 17th, 1958, and that is not a railway company, and may recommend payment to any such transportation company in respect of such year of an amount based on the position of such transportation company in relation to railway companies under that order."

I think this amendment does exactly what the hon. gentleman wanted to do. If we can do it in this way we will not require further debate on another occasion.

Mr. Gordon: I so move.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, may I ask the proposer of the amendment whether he has told the Mercantile Bank of the implications of this amendment?

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I repeat that we did not get a French copy of the amendment and I think the minister should make one available to us. Before the amendment carries, I should like to read it.

[English]

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I am not sure whether the translators have had sufficient time yet to prepare a French version. This amendment was concocted this afternoon, and "concocted" is perhaps the right word. I know the Law Clerk is working on it, and if the hon. member would like to have the amendment stood until we can get a translation prepared, I would be quite agreeable.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, could that section stand until we have received a French copy.

I should now like to ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) some explanation on the following point: unless I am mistaken, we are dealing here with subsidies for transportation by companies other than railway, but which are directly related to the railway companies.

I have here a table giving the comparative rates in Toronto and in Montreal. These do not include the cost of railway transportation. They are the rates applied for delivery by the railway company trucks in Montreal and Toronto, anywhere within the city of Montreal and likewise in Toronto. We are therefore dealing with the comparative cost of delivering goods from the station in Montreal to any point within the city, and delivery of goods taken at the station in Toronto for delivery anywhere in that city.

Here are the figures. Perhaps the minister can enlighten us in this connection. I am told that in Montreal the minimum charge is $1.39 while in Toronto it is only 89 cents regardless of the parcel involved; that it costs 49 cents per 100 lbs. up to 2,600 lbs., or $12.74 for $2,600 lbs., while in Toronto the rate is 22 cents per 100 lbs., or $5.72 for 2,600 lbs. Therefore, a difference exists between Montreal and Toronto, though the same work is involved. In Toronto, it costs $5.72; in Montreal, $12.74, and this merely to truck goods from a freight car to a point within the city limits, as is the case in Toronto. When 16,000 lbs. or more are involved, we note that the rate is 27 cents in Montreal and 22 cents in Toronto.

Therefore, different rates are charged for exactly the same work. Why is this? I should like to know. Do the subsidies granted Toronto allow customers there to be charged 22 cents while those granted Montreal make it necessary to ask for 49 cents for 100 lbs.? If so, changes should be made in the present amendment. True, I naturally do not know all the relevant details, but at first glance and according to the figures we have been given, the handling costs of goods between the freight or express unloading yards and the consignees within the limits of these cities is higher in Montreal than in Toronto, although in both cases the rate is charged by the C.N.R. There must surely be a reason for this, and I would ask the hon. minister to inform us why handling costs are higher in Montreal than in Toronto when labour costs are the same.

[English]

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take any exception to the fact that the question that the hon. gentleman asked has not very much relation to this very narrow amendment moved by the Minister without Portfolio from Toronto. However, if it is at all possible to get the information to answer his question, I undertake to get it before we complete clause 1. If that is not possible I would be glad to give it on third reading. I know the question has been listened to most carefully and I hope to be able to get the information.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: On the contrary, Mr. Chairman, I thought this could be directly related and I was waiting to make my remarks on clause 1 of the bill. But I did feel that under the amendment I have here, in English at least, this was consistent with the remarks I just made, and that is why I raised the problem at this time, since it deals precisely with the payments made by the Transportation Commission for the shipping by transportation companies which are not railway companies proper but are connected with them. This is necessarily the case in cities such as Toronto and Montreal with regard to the unloading of freight for delivery to the consignees.

Under the circumstances, I thought therefore that the matter was fully consistent with the amendment moved by the Minister of Transport.

• (8:40 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Pickersgill: The amendment before the committee to subclause 469 of clause 74 has the effect only of making a provision to pay to a transportation company which is not a railway company—this applies to one company only, the Canada Steamship Lines—a certain proportion of the transitional payments made in respect of the freight rate freeze to the railway companies. This has nothing to do with any other company. What the hon. gentleman talks about would be more appropriate on clause 1 than on clause 74.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I am very happy with the explanation of the Minister of Transport on the point I have raised. I would now ask the minister to enlighten me, as he suggested, on clause 1.

The minister mentions that this is done for one company only, that is the Canada Steamship Lines, which makes deliveries along the St. Lawrence river ports. I am now asking him whether regular payments are provided for this company operating coastal shipping along the St. Lawrence river ports as far as the north and the south shores of the St. Lawrence and if other companies, transport companies or private coastal shippers doing the same kind of work below Quebec toward the north or the south shores, may also benefit from the same payments and be informed, in some way or other, of the grants that are being given.

I am informed that such shipping companies, in most cases owned by the captains or by people who operate their own sail boats, or their ship, are also in need of such subsidies and I wonder if the minister could tell us how such people can find out about this in order to benefit from such grants as the Canada Steamship Lines has been receiving?

[English]

Mr. Pickersgill: I think I can explain that easily, sir. The Canada Steamship Lines had its rates frozen by the order referred to in this clause at the same time as the freight rate freeze was applied to the railways in 1958. The other companies the hon. gentleman referred to were not affected by the freeze. Practically all those companies in the lower St. Lawrence received greater or lesser subsidies from the treasury for maintaining their services. The basis is entirely different. Moreover, these payments to be made to the Canada Steamship Lines are like the payments to the railway companies: they are to be phased out. They will be reduced over a period which will not be as long as the one applied to the railway companies. It is done this way because the company needs a certain amount of time, just as the railway companies do, to adapt itself to the new law. That is the sole purpose for doing this.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I would ask the minister whether he does not think that the wording of the amendment toward the end is vague—perhaps because it was concocted in a hurry. What exactly does it mean when you say that the payment to any such transportation company shall be——in respect of such year of an amount based on the position of such transportation company in relation to railway companies under that order.

What kind of position is that?

Mr. Pickersgill: I would have said, if I may use an adjective which the hon. gentleman will realize is very specific indeed, the relative position.

Mr. Lewis: The relative position of what or to what? Do you not have to say?

Mr. Pickersgill: Some of the subsidy being paid to the railway companies is in respect of the freeze applied in 1958. The last one was in respect of a specific wage adjustment in 1964. What is meant by this language is that the other transportation company, which is not a railway company, can only participate in those subsidies which have relationship to its service, and not in those that do not have that relationship.

Mr. Lewis: I will not argue with the minister. His advisers do better than I can, perhaps, in knowing what is meant. When you have language saying "based on the position of such transportation company in relation to railway companies," that might be based on its financial position, on the amount of cargo it carries or on a dozen different kinds of positions. Would not the minister and his advisers be wiser to say exactly what it is they want to have relativity about?

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman must realize that that was precisely why I took the cowardly course of saying that we should make provision for that later in the supplementary estimates. The hon. member for Acadia seemed to think it would be unfair and prejudicial to the company, which has always been treated in respect of certain of these things in the same way the railway companies are treated, to leave them in doubt about this matter. A certain mathematical determination is required to be made in another clause by the Minister of Finance. The word "position" is not perfect, perhaps. Perhaps if we could find a better word it might be suggested to hon. gentlemen in another place, and they might make a substantial amendment that we might be able to concur in later.

Mr. Lewis: I am not in a concocting mood. I thought I would bring this to the minister's attention.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thank the hon. gentleman. It is not the first time he has been of help in this debate.

An hon. Member: Watch out.

Amendment (Mr. Gordon) agreed to.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Medicine Hat has an amendment, which I should be quite happy to have him move and which is quite satisfactory to me.

Mr. Olson: The amendment is as follows. Clause 471 is to be amended by adding the following section immediately after it. The amendment would then be section 472, and it reads:

Crown Representative. Where in any proceedings before the Commission under this Act the matter of the revenues or costs of a railway company under the jurisdiction of Parliament is under investigation, any Minister of the Crown in right of Canada may cause representations to be made thereon to the Commission by persons having knowledge of costing principles or matters that appear to such Minister to be relevant to the determination of railway revenues and costs.

Mr. Chairman, I sent you a copy of this, but there are technical changes in the numbering. May I therefore send you another copy. I have copies also with the French translation included under the English wording. I shall have something to say after you read the amendment.

I move therefore:

That Clause 74 be amended by adding the following thereto as Clause 472:

Crown Representative. Where in any proceedings before the Commission under this Act the matter of the revenues or costs of a railway company under the jurisdiction of Parliament is under investigation, any Minister of the Crown in right of Canada may cause representations to be made thereon to the Commission by persons having knowledge of costing principles or matters that appear to such Minister to be relevant to the determination of railway revenues and costs."

Mr. Chairman, the numbers may have to be changed. That can be done on another copy I shall send you.

I do not wish to say much more about this amendment now that the minister has accepted it. But I believe it to be an important inclusion in the bill, insasmuch as the public interest will now be looked after by the federal government when matters of this kind are under investigation, particularly in hearings before the Transport Commission. I would therefore commend it to all members of the committee.

Amendment (Mr. Olson) agreed to.

Mr. Pascoe: I have not been present during the whole of the discussion, so this subject may already have been dealt with. But clause 74 refers to the cessation of the bridge subsidy. Has this been dealt with, or is it in order to speak on it for a while?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think it is fair to say it has been dealt with. The committee did accept an amendment of a purely technical nature, but that does not preclude the hon. member from speaking on the matter.

Mr. Pascoe: I thank the minister. I believe the bridge subsidy at present amounts to about $7 millions a year to offset the cost of the long haul across northern Ontario around the lakes. This $7 millions a year—and I wish to take two or three minutes to put this on record—has been of particular benefit to the prairies. I recall that it was brought out at hearings of the committee that this bridge subsidy had a considerable effect on reducing the cost of farm machinery. As the minister knows, it gives the manufacturer on the prairies an opportunity to compete with manufacturers in the east. This subsidy, as I have said, has been of great value to the prairies and I should like the minister to explain just what is happening with regard to its cancellation. The whole of this $7 million is being removed. Does this mean that the railways will have to raise their rates, or get more business in order to offset this loss?

Mr. Pickersgill: The best way for me to explain what is happening would be to read from the bill itself. If the hon. gentleman would look at 468A (2) he would see that it says:

> The commission shall, one year after the coming into force of Part V of the National Transportation Act, authorize such increases in the rates to which subsection (1) applies as in the opinion of the commission would, if put wholly into effect, yield the Canadian National Railway Company, combined, three million dollars, approximately, of additional annual revenues.

Then subsection 3 says the same thing for the following year, only it is two million dollars instead of three million dollars, and for the following year it is another two million dollars. Then, at the end of the three years, it expires. This conforms precisely to the request made by the government of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Pascoe: Thank you. I just thought I should like to have this put on record, because this bridge subsidy means a great deal to the prairies.

Clause 74 as amended agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: We are now on clause 1.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

On clause 1—National Transportation Policy

Mr. Rynard: We have been talking for the most part about transportation over long distances and the abandonment of rail lines. I think we should take a look at the growth of Canada, the increase in its population, and realise that in the year 2,000 it will have a population of between 40 million and 50 million people.

I wish to speak about an area which I know, though the circumstances there are duplicated in many places across the country. I will take the province of Ontario, a province with a population of six millions which in the year 2,000 will have grown to approximately 12 million people. About one third of the people who live in Canada live today in the province of Ontario. Incidentally, it is interesting to note that about half the people included in that one third live within approximately 100 miles of the city of Toronto. This is a congested area at the present time. In rough figures, a million people go to work, and return, morning and night in Toronto, and in the 100 mile area. The highways which they travel are already overcrowded and the point has been reached at which it is almost impossible technically, and certainly unwise economically, to take more land for throughways and super highways.

It must also be borne in mind that this is a popular tourist area. This part of Ontario projects so far south in the direction of the United States that the southern part of the province lies south of the northernmost point of the state of California. This means we probably have more American tourists than does any other part of Canada. We cannot cut these people off. Most of them come by car, and we need their dollars to help our balance of payments. So this is the position we are in: We find people going to work, one or two in a car, over highways which are already congested. Thousands of individual cars are travelling into a crowded area when their occupants could be carried more efficiently by train, or other rapid transit. Roughly a million people travel to and from work in this area. One railway line would carry a lot of them into the heart of the city or industrial area, and would eliminate parking problems.

We are facing a serious problem in air pollution. It takes a motorist in Toronto about an hour to get from downtown to the city limits in the rush hour. He could travel 60 miles in the country in the same length of time, burning approximately the same amount of gas. This is an indication of the amount of pollution and congestion in that area and indicates the need for a rapid transit system.

No railway line in Ontario should be abandoned, and I feel this also applies to many other industrial areas of Canada. In the near future we shall have to rebuild some of the abandoned lines in order to move people to and from work. It is penny wise and pound foolish to abandon railways in a province like Ontario. If certain lines that have been abandoned were in existence today we would be using them to capacity. One line which ran north from Toronto up to Lake Simcoe was abandoned, and had it not been it would remove today a lot of the traffic congestion on the highways.

Slum areas are costing a lot of public money in industrial areas. These sprawling suburban areas are getting completely out of control due to the population explosion. If the trend continues throughout the country, 5 per cent of our population will be living in the rural areas and the other 95 per cent in cities and manufacturing centres. Yet in the great society which we talk about it is estimated that 15 per cent to 20 per cent of the population should live outside the cities.

We shall have to build new towns miles away from cities. I envisage towns like the city of Canberra in Australia, a beautiful city. Those who have visited it know it has no industry. It is the site of the parliament buildings and is a clean, wholesome area in which to live.

I do not believe we have enough railway lines at present in Ontario. We need all that we have, not only to carry freight but to carry people. Commuter trains will be a major factor in transportation, very shortly. Our new towns must be built in locations where land is cheaper, water sources plentiful and air pollution at a minimum. We must start planning for them now, and they must include proper recreational facilities because workers are going to be enjoying more and more leisure time.

The congested areas of the industrial complex of Toronto, which holds roughly 3 million people, needs a rapid transit system. Its problems are duplicated in a minor way in other cities across Canada. Good transportation is necessary so that people can live outside cities in clean, pleasant surroundings in which they can bring up their children. We should be planning now.

Mr. MacEwan: Mr. Chairman, I would draw the attention of the committee to the study which is being made on certain transport rates in the Atlantic area. In reply to one of my questions a few days ago, the Minister of Transport said that this study would be completed in March, and it is my hope that in 1968 legislation will be presented to this house which will be important and advantageous to the Atlantic area.

As hon. members know, transportation is the lifeline of the Atlantic area. It is most important to my province of Nova Scotia, and particularly to my county of Pictou in their efforts to attract secondary industries, and in fact several secondary industries have been established in Pictou during the last few years. During this debate at least two members asked me whether this bill was important. They told me it was not important to their part of the country, and I believe they represent a certain area in Ontario. I replied that it was most important to my province and to the whole Atlantic area.

The question of port parity for Halifax, Saint John and throughout the maritimes has been adequately dealt with by my two colleagues from Halifax and the hon. member for Saint John-Albert. As a result, the minister awakened from a deep sleep and early this week submitted an amendment to this legislation which meets part of our wishes, but does not go all the way. As a result, we shall be watching this legislation to see its effects on the maritime area.

At the moment I am concerned about two applications made by the C.N.R. during the last few weeks for the closing of two stations in my constituency, and the removal of the agents from those stations. This is the first move by the C.N.R. to push the thin edge of the wedge into the economy of that area. The two stations are River John and Merigomish. It occurs to me that the C.N.R. might have waited until the present legislation had been completed. Instead of that, these applications were made. This is particularly important to the River John area. The reason for this is that about three years ago an application was made to cut out a part of what is known as the short line in my constituency which runs from Oxford Junction to the town of Stellarton by omitting the trackage from Tatamagouche in the area of my hon. friend from Colchester-Hants to Scotsburn in the county of Pictou. This, in other words as we might say down east, would have taken the guts out of the short line. Undoubtedly this move to close the River John station and to take the agent from there is a first move to reinforce the application which will be forthcoming by the Canadian National Railways.

It is my belief that no hearing on these applications should be heard until the present legislation is passed and the new act comes into effect. Suggestions have been made that the new act has nothing to do with the closing of stations or the removal of agents. There is one section in this new legislation, to which my friend, the hon. member for Wellington-Huron referred the other day, section 314C, which reads in part as follows:

> In determining whether an uneconomic branch line or any segment thereof should be abandoned—

And then it continues on from there. I believe the new criteria set out in this new bill, C-231, should be the basis for any hearings in respect of the proposed closing of these two stations in my constituency. So far as the River John area is concerned, I have pointed out why the Canadian National Railways has made this move. May I say that I can see no reason for federal agencies such as the Atlantic Development Board and the area development agency of the Department of Industry attempting to assist areas like mine—which they are doing—when with these applications the railways will be allowed to move out of the area. The railways must remain in areas like these. The station in the village of Merigomish is on the main line through Cape Breton. I do not intend to go into the detail of what the Canadian National Railways has included in its application. That will be dealt with when the Board of Transport Commissioners sends its inspector to the area.

I hope to be present at the hearings so that I may be able to help the county council of Pictou, which is fighting to keep these stations, put forward the case. These stations are very important to small villages such as these. Again may I say that I am disappointed that the Canadian National Railways made this move instead of waiting until the present legislation has been passed. Undoubtedly the people from the various other areas as well as from Merigomish and River John, the inhabitants of that area, the county council and myself will be fighting against any closings.

As I already have pointed out, the railway is important to these areas. It is their lifeblood. These stations should not be closed. May I repeat to the minister that we will be looking forward to the report in respect of the study concerning the Atlantic area. We hope it will come in in March or at least early in this year. We hope also that legislation will be forthcoming which will prove that the maritimes are not forgotten. We also trust that any legislation which is brought forward will justify this action which is being taken now.

We do not wish to be discriminated against. We should like to have those rights which are truly ours. We will be watching for the new legislation to amend the Maritime Freight Rates Act, or whatever changes are to come before parliament. When this is brought forward we will examine it most closely.

[Mr. MacEwan.]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I have a few remarks to make on this transportation bill. This is the first time since the debate started three weeks ago that I have taken the floor. I did not do so when the various clauses were studied in order to keep my remarks when clause 1 would come up, at which time we could then discuss the bill as a whole.

Mr. Chairman, a while ago I gave figures on the differences in the rates used in the Toronto area and in the city of Montreal. I should like to add a few more, which rates will illustrate somewhat the point I wish to discuss.

For instance, I have here the rates which apply to the transport of wheat, oats, grain and grain products shipped from various parts of the country to Montreal, Halifax, Saint John and Newfoundland. From Fort William and Port Arthur in Ontario to Halifax, a distance of 1694 miles, the rate is 54 cents per hundredweight, from the same points to Saint John, 1463 miles, 54 cents and to other points in Newfoundland; by ship from Halifax or Saint John, 54 cents per hundredweight. In other words, the rate is the same as that which applies to shipments being sent to Halifax.

On the other hand, when shipments are made from Fort William or Port Arthur, to Montreal, a distance of 995 miles, the rate increases to 66 cents per hundredweight. So there is a difference in the rates.

When it starts, for instance, from Sarnia, Toronto, Midland, Walkerville for shipment to Halifax, a distance of 1150 miles, the rate is 26 cents per hundredweight. From the same points to Saint John, New Brunswick, a distance of 1274 miles, the rate is 25 cents per hundredweight, the same as for Newfoundland.

However, if you ship something from Sarnia, Toronto, Walkerville to Montreal, a distance of only 530 miles, then the cost is almost twice as much, namely 48 cents per hundredweight.

Mr. Chairman, we do not object to that. I see no objection to there being such gaps or to subsidies being made to allow those products to reach the maritimes for one must not forget that the maritime provinces are poorer and that they need assistance. We are prepared to accept that, but I quoted these cases in order to give another example of discrimination which we are not prepared to accept.

When the government uses the taxes of all the citizens of the country to enable residents of Halifax, of Newfoundland, of New Brunswick or of any maritime province, to pay only half of what the citizens of Montreal or Quebec pay for transport, we are ready to accept that state of affairs, because we consider that the maritimes need help.

It is clear from the figures just quoted by me that the cost is lower in the maritimes for any delivery from points in western Canada or Ontario than what it costs us in Montreal or Quebec.

But it is wrong, inconsistent, irrational and unfair discrimination when after December 12 of every year, ship captains are told, as happened this year in the case of Russian ships reaching the port of Montreal: You have no right to load grain in Montreal. This was reported to me by Canadian and foreign ship captains whom I met in the past week. They are told: You have no right to load grain or wheat in Montreal. If you wish to return to Europe with grain or wheat, get to the port of Halifax in ballast where you can load grain before returning to Europe.

While the Canadian government is paying for the transportation of wheat by railroad from Montreal to Halifax, the ships reach Halifax empty to take in freight there.

But that is not all: the same ship captains will tell you: What stupid things happen in Canada. While the grain elevators are full in Montreal, we are told to reach Halifax in ballast and take in freight there. At present, the average waiting period for ships is six days. The ships reach Halifax empty, while there is still wheat and grain in Montreal. They are empty when they leave Montreal for Halifax. Then they stay there idle for six days, waiting for the grain to reach Halifax from Montreal. And since the shipments are slow in getting to Halifax, the ships have to wait.

Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Transport will agree that it is irrational, illogical. If ships are ready for loading in Halifax, the grain should get there in time. If others are without freight in Montreal, they should be allowed to load there instead of wasting time and money to get to Halifax and wait there before crossing over to Europe. This is a ridiculous system.

Mr. Chairman, I would also like to hear what the hon. Minister of Transport has to say on some more figures I am going to quote.

Subsidies are granted for all sorts of commodities. For instance, commercial lumber, timber, boards, studs, plywood, etc., are moved in full carloads from British Columbia to Montreal—an average of 2900 miles—at $1.43 per hundredweight whereas full carloads of our Quebec lumber make the Abitibi-Montreal trip—an average of 500 miles—at 43 cents per hundredweight which is twice the cost of bringing western lumber in to Montreal.

Why does it cost twice as much to move lumber from Abitibi to Montreal as it does from British Columbia?

Here sitting next to me is the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) who is aware of the fact that in the eastern townships, Princeville, Beauce, Plessisville, etc., where maple sugar is one of the main resources, this product is shipped at a cost of $1.10 per hundredweight every 340 miles. Why this double standard? Why these special rates?

Mr. Chairman, these rates and subsidies are presently determined by certain individuals who are in a position to make arbitrary decisions in favour of certain parts of the country at the expense of other areas.

These regulations, these rates are published only in English, as the minister knows. The special rates and the subsidies are not published in French but only in English. I have copies of them here, identified by codes known to those who want to use them: CR 200, CF67, CG 130, CG 180, CG 223, E 140 and CRA 6, those are codes to recognize the special rates benefiting all other areas of Canada but not Quebec. In Quebec, we pay full price.

Well, Mr. Chairman, due to such rate differential, the transport of merchandise from British Columbia to Montreal weighing the same as merchandise from Abitibi for delivery in Montreal would cost less. Our maple sugar, a source of wealth for the Eastern townships, does not benefit from any subsidies. Elsewhere, though, subsidies are granted.

Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) should answer this: Why are ships forbidden to load a cargo of wheat or grain in the port of Montreal? Why must they go to Halifax empty and wait there five or six days before loading wheat because none is available?

Can the Minister of Transport reply to this? The ship captains themselves gave me the information.

And to speak of bilingualism to the Minister of Transport: When ships sail into the gulf they are forced to communicate by radio with the first station on the way into the country, the one situated at Cap-aux-Meules, in the Magdalen Islands. Well, not a word of French is to be had on this radio station. And the same goes for most other radio stations along the St. Lawrence seaway.

The minister should also inquire about that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is another point. I know my friend, the hon. member for Sherbrooke also wishes to mention it. The hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) has referred to it today. Someone is trying to have us pass this bill in haste. In Quebec, the premier objects to that. He is ready to table the letters, but he is waiting for the federal government's permission.

Well, we know implicitly that the premier of Quebec is ready to table the letters. The premier replied as follows to a question from the leader of the opposition in the Quebec legislature: We are ready to table the documents but we are waiting for an answer from the Prime Minister in Ottawa.

Therefore, we want that correspondence. I think the minister is ready to table the correspondence, but I believe he should do so before the passing of this bill, so that we may all be able to know about these objections—and to see whether they are vaild or not.

That problem must be settled before we come to the third reading stage, even before the passing of clause 1 of the bill. I hope the minister will rush the necessary information. I hope he will have relevant remarks to make and that he will give us his opinion in this regard.

The members from Montreal and other areas in the province of Quebec are saying that we imagine we are the only ones to speak on their behalf. In this connection, I will say this: The leader of the opposition in Quebec, who is a member of the Liberal party, and the premier of the province, are of one mind in protesting against the intrusion on the part of the federal government upon a field of provincial jurisdiction. Mr. Chairman, I will not labour the point, merely in order to give them an opportunity to express their view. I am going to give them an opportunity to be the first ones to speak about it, so that they will not be able to accuse me of taking their place. If I have done so on some other occasions, it was because they were not doing it. But now, I am going to let them express their opinion. They will not be able to make the same accusation in this connection.

Mr. Chairman, I meant to call the attention of the Minister of Transport on one point and I want to give my colleagues in the Liberal party an opportunity to point out something else to him. Once they have dealt with that, I will express my opinion concerning the intrusion of the federal government upon a field of provincial jurisdiction.

[English]

Mr. Macaluso: Mr. Chairman, I would be quite remiss if before the passing of the bill I did not express, as chairman of the standing committee on transport and communications, my appreciation to members of the committee. As was stated in the report which was filed by the committee, this committee, in hearing the briefs of all the witnesses and considering all the amendments which were presented, held some 33 meetings, heard evidence from some 73 witnesses and received and considered 36 briefs from corporations and individuals who are interested in Bill C-231. In total, since the commencement of this session the committee has held some 72 meetings on all aspects of transportation and communications. I believe that perhaps this is the greatest number of meetings held by any committee in the history of any parliament of Canada.

I as chairman of that committee wish to express my appreciation to all the members of the committee for their diligence in attending the meetings, many of which the press apparently did not consider interesting or newsworthy, although in fact this committee dealt with what is perhaps the most important piece of legislation with which this country will have to deal for a good many years.

The committee has given an example of what can be done by members of parliament serving on standing committees of the house.

I do not wish to single out any particular members, but again I feel I would be remiss in my duty if I did not express particular appreciation to three members of that committee who attended its meetings every day and who were very diligent in their work. I am referring to the hon. members for Moose Mountain, Moose Jaw-Lake Centre and Kindersley. I think that these three members should be singled out for their efforts. I am not trying to take away from the work of the other members from all parties in the house, but I do feel that all members of the committee will understand why I have singled out these three members of the committee.

I think all members of the committee were deeply appreciative of the attendance of the Minister of Transport at our meetings. It helped us expedite consideration of the briefs and the passage of the bill through committee. When the minister was not able to attend a committee meeting, the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, was there. This was of great assistance to the standing committee and perhaps should be an example followed by other ministers.

I would be remiss if I did not convey the thanks of the committee to the deputy minister of transport and the officials who were present at our meetings. The deputy minister and his officials were of great help to the minister. They were available at every meeting to assist hon. members with regard to questions that they asked, and in preparing amendments and summaries of briefs for the assistance of members of the committee. They helped in preparing in a very informative and summary manner amendments that were considered in relation to Bill C-231, which was of great assistance to the members of the committee in their work. On behalf of all members of the committee I want to thank the deputy minister and the officials of the Department of Transport for the work they did in assisting us in our consideration of this bill.

Members from all sides of the house were co-operative in considering a bill of vital importance to the national interest, a bill that had been talked about for many years and which was the subject of at least two royal commissions, the Turgeon commission and the MacPherson commission. Our meetings showed that the members were knowledgeable in this subject, had done their homework and had read and considered all the briefs presented to the committee. They also showed they were knowledgeable in the questioning of the witnesses who appeared before the committee. They showed that they knew what they were talking about. I would suggest that on many occasions the witnesses were somewhat surprised at the questions asked by the members of the committee, and were at times taken aback in answering some of them, because I believe the committee members showed that sometimes they knew more than the witness about the subject in question.

All the briefs were carefully considered. I want to thank the Minister of Transport and the government in this respect, because it showed that the department and the minister were not inflexible in receiving suggestions from those who presented briefs. I think all members will agree with me that a great many amendments put forward in committee were made as a result of briefs presented by individuals, provincial governments and companies that appeared before the committee. I believe this helped many of us in our consideration of the bill and showed us the importance of inflexibility in regard to a bill that was in the national interest, and would mean that once and for all Canada would have a national transportation policy.

I also believe our experience in the committee showed up some of the weaknesses of the standing committee structure. Our committee retained an eminent economist, Dr. Armstrong, who had worked on the MacPherson royal commission. Perhaps other committees, and especially those dealing with important legislation, should be allowed to obtain the expertise of counsel and economists in order to deal more effectively with these matters. Committees should have available expert counsel and economists who are knowledgeable in the subject with which they are dealing. This would help our committees a great deal.

I would also like to thank the vice-chairman of the committee who, when the chairman was not able to attend on a few occasions, took his place at the meetings. I think all members of the committee deserve a vote of thanks from the house as a whole for the diligent work they performed in consideration of this bill and the briefs presented to us. I think we now have a very good base from which to move forward as far as a transportation policy is concerned. I will not take up the time of the committee to deal with the different aspects of transportation. Many hon. members of this house have done so already. I just want again to express my deep appreciation to all members of the committee for the courtesy they showed me and for the very kind words many of them had for me.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, could I ask the hon. member a question? I realize that we are pressed for time. I also realize that the hon. member could not deal with everybody, but does he not think he should mention those great speeches made out west by the hon. member for Mercier on behalf of Expo?

Mr. Macaluso: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Mercier has been making a great many speeches out west about transportation, but since they have nothing to do with the national transportation bill which is before us at the moment, I will leave that matter to a later date.

Mr. Southam: Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the members of the committee for this opportunity to avail myself of a few moments of the committee's time in the discussion on clause 1 of Bill No. C-231, an act to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada. The hon. member for Hamilton West has put the committee in a very good mood and has named so many of the hard working members of the standing committee. I wish to thank him personally for his kind reference to myself, the hon. member for Moose Jaw, the hon. member for Kindersley and other hon. members whom he mentioned. But in making this passing reference we should not overlook the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Hamilton West himself.

As the hon. member pointed out, this bill was one of the most important, most contentious and contained some of the biggest problems, I think, of any bill ever presented to a committee of the house. His guidance and perseverance, together with the assistance of the vice-chairman, I believe went a long way in facilitating the progress we had already made in passing the bill.

The hon. member overlooked other very capable members besides members of his own party, who also made contributions to the work of the committee. I think I should single out for particular mention the hon. member for Acadia. I feel that he is a man who has spent more time on and done more research into the problems of transportation, and has made, I believe, a greater contribution toward the passage of this bill, than any other individual in the house.

In saying that, we should not forget the chairman of our group, the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, the hon. member for Pictou, the hon. member for Wellington-Huron and, of course, the minister himself. It was appreciated by the members of the committee that, although he had problems in dealing with much of the testimony presented to the committee, the minister was on the job day after day doing everything he could to assist us in carrying out a proper study toward the development of this bill. It was because of the co-operation of the minister that many contentious points were made capable of solution, and it was helpful when he agreed to accept amendments made by the members. In this way we were able to make the progress we did.

Having said that, Mr. Chairman, there is the usual "but". Personally I feel, as a member from western Canada, that this is not yet a good bill. After all, we have been working on a piecemeal basis on transportation legislation since back in 1898. We have been bringing forward and developing certain modes of transportation and have developed, as I say, a sort of piecemeal type of program in Canada. Naturally, it is very difficult to take one encompassing piece of legislation such as Bill No. C-231 and expect it to bring us up to date completely, and be a perfect product in the end result. I think evidence of this fact is what transpired during the course of our committee study. In the committee something like 50 or 60 amendments were put forward by witnesses. We had to contend with those. The fact that there were so many amendments is evidence that it was not a good bill to start with.

I have not been able to keep track of the number of amendments placed before this committee of the whole. They have all been important; they have all been well debated. There is an indication that many more amendments may be introduced before this bill comes finally to the point of what I think is necessary in order to achieve a modern system of transportation in Canada.

I am disturbed about the complete transfer of principle or concept from the old transport board to the new commission, so far as rate setting is concerned. It would appear as though the minister was rather cosy with the railroads in drafting this legislation. I have heard remarks to this effect. In fact, I am just wondering whether the minister, instead of aspiring to the Senate some time in the future, may be thinking of becoming president of the Canadian National.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe all modes of transport have received adequate debate or consideration in this bill. I am thinking of transport by air. Here is a developing mode of transport that has grown up, almost like Topsy, in recent years. I believe the competitive principle should be applied to this mode of transport rather than to rail rates.

There is also the St. Lawrence seaway in connection with which problems are developing. Yesterday the hon. member for Acadia mentioned the problem of seaway tolls. The people of western Canada, as captive shippers, are very dependent upon the seaway and shippers through the great lakes, I do not believe this aspect has been fully covered in our discussion.

The section of the bill dealing with pipe lines is another important aspect. This important mode of transport, although covered in the bill, is still subject to many limitations. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare brought to the attention of hon. members the inadequacies in this legislation in so far as pipe lines are concerned. As members of the committee know, this man has spent a lifetime in the oil industry and knows something about the transportation of this particular commodity. In fact I believe he mentioned he had a chance to look at something like 15 or 16 bills related to pipe line transport in other countries.

One of my colleagues says that this man helped to build 15 or 16 pipe lines. If we had had the time, here was an opportunity to explore the knowledge he had, and possibly have developed a better bill thereby. When we did criticize various aspects of the bill, I do not believe it was necessary for the minister to hide behind the fact the Conservative party had set up the MacPherson royal commission in the first place. I know on various occasions this hint was thrown out by the minister, that after all the Conservatives set up a commission which made certain recommendations, and therefore they must be good. This does not necessarily follow, Mr. Chairman. The government does not have to adopt any of the recommendations if they do not desire to do so. Many of these recommendations were worthy of consideration and we did consider them. When I say I am not satisfied with the bill, I think it is a wrong concept to take the lid off and allow the railways to set rates as high as the traffic will bear. This is what we have done in this piece of legislation.

I was naturally happy to see section 329 of clause 50 voted down by the committee. This directly preserved the farmer's Magna Carta of 1897 on rates affecting the movement of grain or the Crowsnest pass rates as they are called. Had the minister's amendment to clause 94 been allowed it would have been, as the hon. Leader of the Opposition said yesterday, like putting a weasel in a chicken coop, or the first chink in the armour, or hole in the dike. The supposition now that the Crowsnest pass rates cost the railways $2 million is inaccurate in this day and age. This estimate is based on cost accounting practices that were questionable in the first place, and in the second place, the figures were based on traffic back in 1950 to 1960.

Members of the committee and people at large in this country, particularly those in western Canada, realize the vast changes in economic growth since 1960. These changes have been reflected in the movement of grain. This year we have produced something like 800 million bushels of grain in the three prairie provinces. If we include flax, oats, barley and corn, the total volume would reach something like 1,200 million bushels. Then, the discovery of vast deposits of potash in Saskatchewan since the time of the MacPherson royal commission has greatly enhanced the economy of the railways. I believe therefore we have been basing some of this legislation on figures which were outdated.

I do not believe the change in concept to allow rates in Canada to be set by competition will work well in a country of such vast geographic proportions. If we compare Canada to the United States, we find we have a somewhat greater geographic area. The United States has a population of something like 200 million people. So as a result you would feel that this concept of setting rates by competition would work much better there. As the members of the committee and the minister know, from the testimony we heard, the United States set rates in all fields of transportation by regulation. This principle applies also to other countries of the commonwealth. Here we have a young country with one of the greatest geographic areas in the world, sparsely populated, trying to use a concept which I do not believe will work too effectively.

We should have listened to the evidence given by Professors Borts and Williams, to which reference has been made by other members of the committee. I feel these were the two top expert witnesses who were brought in on behalf of the Government of Manitoba to testify from their knowledge and experience in transportation as to what they would suggest could be done to improve this bill. Of course their suggestion was that we completely reverse the concept and regulate rates.

Now, having said that, Mr. Chairman, I should like to conclude my remarks by making one or two short references to rail line abandonment. I have often spoken in the house on this subject. As I pointed out on several occasions, I had a sad experience in representing an area which had a rail line abandonment of the greatest magnitude of any place in western Canada, some 122 miles. When this application was before the Board of Transport Commissioners, I did a lot of research into the problem and know something about the sociological and economic disruptions created by rail line abandonment.

I do not want to pursue the subject any further than to say I am a little concerned about the principle that has been adopted temporarily by the government under the guidance of the Minister of Transport. I refer to the freeze on rail line abandonments until 1975. It seems to me that 1975 is now too far away. I am afraid we are going to be opening another kettle of fish at that time. I believe there should have been more effort to bring the rationalization principle into effect, so there would be no necessity for opening this subject again. In the meantime we are going to be faced with a series of applications for the abandonment of short lines which will come before the new commission which is set up.

I am disappointed that the minister did not see fit to include in this legislation a principle which I have advocated on numerous occasions. I refer to the fact that if a line is to be abandoned after proper study, there should be a freeze on the abandonment order for five years. This would give businesses, farmers and municipalities adjacent to that line a chance to liquidate their businesses, provide roads to replace the railroads, give the farmers a chance to remove their permit books to other areas and so make the necessary readjustments when the line has been taken out. However, we may still have a chance to see that principle incorporated at a later date.

We have done our best to produce a good bill. I am not trying to discredit anybody in saying this because I think we have done our best. However, I still feel that the bill falls far short of what is necessary to provide a good transportation policy. For example we should have incorporated in the bill a clause to the effect that the government in five or six years time should review the legislation and iron out any anomalies or bugs which might have become apparent by then. Had this been done, Mr. Chairman, even though criticism has been directed toward the bill we would have left ourselves in the position where the people of Canada would be able to say that the government had co-operated with the opposition to come up with the best possible bill, and I think the people would be well satisfied. We have a right to be a little critical of the bill, and in concluding my remarks I express the hope that the legislation works out better than I think it will at the present time.

[Mr. Southam.]

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I ask the committee to rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again later this day.

The Chairman: Is that agreed.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, pursuant to standing order 6(2) I move:

That the house continue to sit after ten o'clock p.m. this day.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

(Translation)

Mr. Grégoire: Until what time are we going to sit?

[English]

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, this motion is not debatable.

Mr. Grégoire: May I ask the house leader, until what time?

Mr. McIlraith: Until we complete this bill, except for third reading.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It appears to the Chair that there is some objection taken, Therefore, may I read the first part of standing order 6(2):

A motion that the house continue to sit after the hour specified in section (1) may be made at any time without notice. If any member objects to the motion, Mr. Speaker shall request those members who object to rise in their places, and if ten or more members then rise, the question shall not be put on the motion.

Are there objections to the motion?

And fewer than ten members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I read further from standing order 6 (2):

If no member objects or if fewer than ten members rise in their places, the motion shall be deemed to be carried.

The Chair rules the motion be carried.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION

PROVISION FOR DEFINITION AND IMPLEMENTATION OF NATIONAL POLICY

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-231, to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other acts in consequence thereof, and to enact other consequential provisions—Mr. Pickersgill—Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 1—National transportation policy.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few concluding remards on clause 1 before we pass committee stage of this large and complex bill. I should like to endorse the remarks made by the chairman of the committee on transportation and communications, the hon. member for Hamilton West, with regard to the expressions of appreciation of the minister and deputy minister, the officials of the department and a number of members of the committee. The meetings were far longer, and the committee dealt with a far more complex matter than any standing committee of this house has had for a long time. This does not take anything away from the excellent work other committees are doing at this time, but I am convinced that this bill of more complex nature than any other being considered at this time.

Having said that, Mr. Chairman, and without any reservations as to those expressions of appreciation, I would also raise a word of caution regarding the application of this bill and its effects. I know the minister is aware that when this bill is in full force and effect there will be a very significant increase in freight rates. There will also be a very significant increase in the amount of revenue obtained by the railways from those freight rates. I say that because in many areas there will have to be a substitution of higher revenue from freight rates for the subsidies which have been paid by the federal government, which in the current fiscal year amount to about $110 million.

I agree that this will be done gradually, but in addition to subsituting for these subsidies revenue from freight rates equivalent to those now being paid, there is also a rather significant increase in cost to the railways which will have to be met out of the same revenue derived from freight rates.

For example, we all know that in August and September, 1966 this parliament ordered the railway workers back to work, and at the same time guaranteed to them not less than an 18 per cent increase in wages spread over three years. We also know that mediation has been going on as a result of this order of parliament and one recommendation has been that the increase which is to be spread over this three-year period should be as much as 24 per cent.

I am not suggesting that any of these railway workers are receiving too much compared with wages paid for comparable jobs in other industries, but I do say we have to face the fact that an enormous increase in revenue will be required to be raised from freight rates not only to compensate for the loss of subsidies but also to meet increasing costs.

I hope that the commission will be ever diligent as it applies these new provisions, to make sure that each rate and each category of freight will bear a fair share of increases. In the past it appears to have been too easy for the railways to apply the increases to those categories and shippers captive to the railways. There has not been a comparable increase in rates in areas where there has been effective competition from motor transport, air freight carriers or shipment by water.

Though we introduce a new concept, that railways shall be competitive and find almost all their revenues from competing in the marketplace, as a substitute for subsidies, we must remember that the captive shipper still needs the protection of political action by the parliament of Canada.

Throughout the debate on the bill members from various areas of this country have said they were not quite satisfied with the terminology, with the wording in various clauses. They have asked the minister from time to time what certain things mean; if there appeared to be ambiguity or misunderstanding in language, they asked how that could be applied to transportation. The minister has given assurances of what is intended. Time after time we accepted from the minister his assurances of what parts of the bill are intended to do, and we accepted those assurances despite the interpretation which may be given to some clauses by others. I admonish the minister again, if I may, to live up to these assurances, that this act may be an improvement in the transportation of Canada rather than a detriment to certain areas, regions, industries or economic sectors.

In conclusion I wish to say to the minister, to the chairman of the committee, and to all members of that committee that we hope the fruits of our labours, if I may call it that —because this labour has been going on for a long time—will in fact mean an improvement and benefit for Canada. We hope we shall gain knowledge from our experience of applying this bill in the first few months, so that when we come back in the next session, or the session after that based on the experience we have gained we may make the amendments necessary to make transportation a real asset to Canada from one end to the other.

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, I realize that in the circumstances the minister is most anxious to conclude the study of his bill after all he has had to go through in this house in the last three weeks but, to make him feel better, I can assure him that my remarks will be brief.

I noticed a little earlier that the time had come for congratulations; on both sides words of appreciation were said about this one and that one. I think that something would be missing if someone did not rise at a given moment to stress, to underline the infinite patience shown by the minister during the debate. Sometimes we had the impression—we who followed the debate as objectively as possible—that he was drowning the opposition under a wave of politeness, so eager was he to listen to suggestions and even to ask for them.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I will be happy with a few short remarks to say that, in my opinion, the debate was quite instructive, from my own standpoint. Personally, I learned a lot about the economic activities of that area called the Crowsnest pass and the Pacific coast. I heard more about the Crowsnest pass in the last three weeks that in my whole life before; that name which to me was only a rather abstract geographic point takes on today a meaning full of possibilities for the future of our country. I wish therefore to thank my colleagues for what they taught me.

In my few remaining remarks, perhaps I might reply to some statements made by my colleague the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire). Of course, I am not expected to agree with him always. I would not like hon. members to think that I hate him; on the contrary, I am among those who do not wish the sinner to die, but to repent and be saved.

Therefore, knowing that the hon. member for Lapointe is intelligent and that he has an impressive gift of speech and unusually quick reactions, I believe we should charitably seize every opportunity to try to keep him in the right path because, talented as he is, he could be of service to the country instead of trying to harm it as he has been doing for some time. It is in this spirit, Mr. Chairman, that I would like to draw attention to some of the things he said.

Tonight he said things which impressed me and which would have, normally, done so. Besides, when I listen to the hon. member for Lapointe, I must say that I am very attentive because, occasionally, he says sensible things. He enjoys periods of lucidity, but not necessarily when he chooses to describe the members who represent Montreal, as he did recently. Then, he reminds me of the man who went to see an optician and asked him: "Can you make me a pair of glasses so that I can read"? The optician took pains and made him something a little special but the man came back a week later and said: "But I cannot read with your glasses". After a rather long study of the situation, the optician found out that the man could not read.

There are things that the hon. member for Lapointe cannot read, because he looks at them in a light which is different from everybody else's. However, as we wish him no harm, instead of following the advice of the evil spirits who suggested to ignore him, I think that, charitably, we should apply ourselves to bringing him back on the right track.

Mr. Chairman, some members who are listening to me are anxious to see how I will conclude. I was surprised a moment ago to see the member for Lapointe shaking the minister violently, hoping that tomorrow's newspapers will mention the fact that the member for Lapointe reminded the Minister of Transport that he was committing a heresy by encroaching upon a field where constitutionally the federal government should not interfere. He evidently missed the definite answer given by the minister around 5.45 this afternoon. I was impressed to see how categorical the minister was. He was expressing the viewpoint of the Prime Minister (Mr.

Pearson); he said so himself. But on that matter, my opinion is not very unlike that of the member for Lapointe. I simply blame him once again for not being often enough in the house.

However, I will say to the minister that there is obviously confusion in the minds, since we see that even lawyers, who should be experts in legal and constitutional matters, are not agreeing on that; in fact, lawyers of all political affiliations are upholding divergent opinions concerning the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of an act. For instance, the leader of the opposition and the head of the government in Quebec are two lawyers who maintain that this is not constitutional while in the federal government, lawyers are advising the minister to say that it is constitutional. But we have to come to a conclusion for the guidance of the public in search of the truth.

I would like to suggest to the minister to develop the comments he made in the house and the answer he gave and prepare in his usual masterful fashion which we admire, a press release where he could line up all the arguments proving that he is right, and let them be known throughout Canada. This would put an end to ambiguity and misunderstanding, and prevent certain circles from brandishing scarecrows, to frighten the people who eventually imagine that Ottawa is a bogyman who tries continually, year after year, to infringe provincial rights.

When this is true, it should be blamed; when not, persons who are solicitous of the truth should not do so.

Therefore, I repeat that the minister should clarify the situation in an unqualified statement spread across the country, so that people may know whether or not it is constitutional.

Like those who are constructively trying to find more practical solutions, it seemed to me that the minister was right when he said that we were legislating on interprovincial and international transport; that field comes under federal jurisdiction. That strikes me as being true, because I went through the bill once more to find if it were in any way dealing with provincial transport and I could not find anything of the sort, except, of course, that provincial transport companies wishing to go from one province to another or to the United States will have to comply with this legislation. I think this matter warrants the federal government's intervention, because the existing mess had to be tidied up, what with different legislation and procedures from one province to another.

Personally, I was impressed by the minister's answer, but some Canadians may not have read it or may not have had the opportunity to consider it; he should make his opinion widely known, complete it, support it with arguments, and even send a French copy to the hon. member for Lapointe as well as to the leader of the opposition and the Quebec premier who seem to be people of good will.

The hon. member for Lapointe—no, I am not judging anybody, I leave that up to Providence—mentioned things which nevertheless seemed justified. He said, for instance, that the first short-wave station with which ships entering the St. Lawrence can communicate answers in English only; well, it is inconceivable that this should happen in the province of Quebec.

And that reminds me; we have this problem in our control towers at Montreal. Not at Quebec city, however, where both English and French are spoken. I am speaking of incoming planes. Unfortunately, most of the answers are given in English at Montreal. I speak from personal experience. I travel by plane once in a while. However, I feel bilingual personnel is essential. I agree with the hon. member for Lapointe here, because there you have pilots of all nationalities, speaking various languages.

I was also impressed when he quoted figures emphasizing rate differentials from one city to another. This should prove to the hon. member for Lapointe that I am no fanatic; I am giving him the credit he deserves.

I will not deny what I cannot prove, but I did check on one of his statements. A few days ago, the hon. member for Lapointe had told me: "Russian ships come into Montreal, unload their cargo and are not allowed to take on a load of grain for the return trip. They are told to head for Halifax, where they have to wait a few days". I told him at the time: "This does not seem logical. If it is true, then something must be done."

I went to see those who know what they are talking about. We have grain elevators too, you know. We also have people in the grain business. There are some in Montreal too. Well, I got my information from these people. I was given what I feel is a plausible explanation, which I am giving to the house. Hon. members may check on it if they so desire.

I was told that the grain coming from western Canada and from the great lakes area, comes to Montreal, Trois-Rivières and Quebec city mostly by ship during the navigation season. A very small percentage of the grain production is shipped by rail, it seems.

Early in winter, before the season closes, elevators are filled in Montreal, Trois-Rivières and Quebec city in order to serve consumers in those three areas.

Therefore, from the economic point of view, it would not be wise to let Russian or other foreign ships take aboard our winter supplies which would force us to bring in our own supplies by rail, which would cost more. Another possibility would be to have our livestock tighten their belts. Therefore, this regulation was made, so that foreign ships would not come and get our winter supplies. We need them for ourselves and our silos; our elevators are not large enough to provide for local consumption as well as for exports. Therefore they are being told: Go get some in Halifax. In Halifax, shipping goes on the year round. It seems the elevators there are larger, local consumption is not as heavy and that it is less expensive to send the Lakers over there to get unloaded directly rather than to send them to Montreal and Trois-Rivières and have them take freight there and be sent to the Atlantic coast.

That was the explanation I got and I think it plausible. Another reason I have to find it plausible is that in checking and double-checking I got the same answer.

And this proves that we can easily hear about things, in this house, that seem to us fantastic and astounding and that may create a scandal the following day in the newspapers. I am wondering whether in the long run, by dint of crying wolf, we are not thus creating a feeling of mistrust among the people. We could normally influence the public if we were careful to cry wolf only when the wolf is really at the door and to cry fire when the fire is really burning.

Again, I am not in a position to question the other assertions made by the hon. member for Lapointe. If the figures he mentioned are correct, well, I am saying to the minister it is about time to take care of that situation and to remedy that injustice, should it exist.

But once again, I would like us to have an opportunity to check the statements of the hon. member for Lapointe before blaming anybody. If he is right, the situation should be coped with.

On the other hand, if an irresponsible accusation comes out of the blue, as in the case of the ship captains who are being required to go to Halifax with empty ships, I say that the bad impression created among the people should be corrected.

Mr. Chairman, I believe this house does not ever bring forth perfect bills. The one which we have considered was a difficult one and the debate was protracted.

I feel this discussion has been constructive on the whole and I believe it is valuable piece of legislation, though imperfect. There will certainly be some people who will complain about it, after some experience. But, I presume that parliament will have the privilege of reviewing this legislation every year in order to improve it and amend it so that it will meet the needs of all Canadians.

There are two other things I would like to point out, Mr. Chairman. They have already been mentioned, but I believe they will never be emphasized enough. First, there is the matter of railway and steamship companies that do not pay taxes to municipalities, as everyone does, and of the grants which the federal government must pay in lieu of the taxes those companies should pay. But it is alleged that the Queen must not normally be taxed; that is going a bit too far because I cannot see what the C.N.R. has to do with the Queen, but let us say it is acceptable. Nonetheless, I would say that the subsidies paid by the federal government to the municipalities are, in most cases, inadequate and determined unilaterally.

I suggest that consultations should be held with bodies representing municipalities, such as the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities which has a very active and very capable committee, since the chairman of its harbours committee has recently been appointed member of the National Harbours Board. I refer to the former mayor of Halifax and a former member of this house, Mr. John Lloyd. The federation has a harbours committee which is actively engaged in all matters concerning towns where there is a port and I think the government should get in touch with this committee to determine the fair and reasonable amounts that municipalities should receive in subsidies. I say that in most cases, they are insufficient and do not cover the services rendered by the municipalities to the national harbours.

Another thing I mentioned briefly in my last remarks and which I should like to emphasize because it is probably more important than it would seem on first sight—and I know that all members of this house who have sat on city councils will support what I am suggesting. I claim that it is unfair to require municipalities to pay a share of the cost of tunnels or overpasses that are required to eliminate level crossings. I think the cost of those things should be paid for by the federal government and by the company concerned.

I say the municipalities cannot afford to meet those costs, those capital expenditures and that it is unfair to force them to do it. I mention this to the minister so that instructions may be given to the transport commission whose responsibilities, I assume, will include making such recommendations.

No one will deny that Canadian municipalities are in an alarming financial situation; they lack the resources of the provincal and federal governments to fulfil their responsibilities to their residents. Tax sharing arrangements are being delayed for all sorts of reasons, good or bad, while the municipalities are faced with most difficult problems. Those should not be increased by requiring them to pay sums in excess of their means because, in their own jurisdiction, city councillors are often blamed by the voters, the citizens, for failing to eliminate fast enough level crossings within their territory.

Mr. Chairman, I conclude by repeating another thing, and through repetition, its importance perhaps will finally sink in. Several of my colleagues have said that in this day and age, transportation is extremely important for the country's economy and that in the years to come, we shall have to provide especially for an extensive development of air transport. I say to the minister that a special effort should be made in order to fully anticipate the needs of private aviation if it is to develop normally.

When I speak of private aviation, I do not mean mere amateurs who fly for an hour or two around the town where they live on Sunday morning, but of a sector which is developing very rapidly, that is, private airlines which operate their own planes and American companies which come to Canada with their own planes. I think an overall plan should be designed, particularly with regard to the construction of a greater number of primary, secondary and tertiary landing strips to encourage development in this sector of the industry.

There are other sectors which I shall not deal with so as not to prolong the debate. I should like the minister to remember the essential part of my recommendation, which is that a subcommittee of this Canadian Transport Commission, perhaps, could be instructed to make a complete study of the needs of private aviation in Canada, in view of the developments which we may expect within the next 10 or 15 years.

Mr. Chairman, to show that I am objective and do not suffer from a chronic allergy, I invite the hon. Minister of Transport to inquire into the accusations made by the hon. member for Lapointe who said that there are tariff differences. I suggest that the minister take steps to remedy the situation, because these differences will produce cases of injustice which can easily be exploited by those who want to make capital out of national disunity.

[English]

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, when some of the clauses dealing with air transportation were being discussed it was suggested that anyone wishing to speak on that topic should wait until clause 1 was called again for discussion. Before proceeding further, on behalf of our party I would like to express our appreciation to the hon. member for Medicine Hat for his contribution to the deliberation of the standing committee, and in this debate. He was our main spokesman throughout the debate and we appreciate the effort he made.

The first few words of clause 1 read:

> It is hereby declared that an economic and efficient transportation system making the best use of all available modes of transportation at the lowest total cost is essential.

I am sure I am not the only Canadian who is a bit concerned about the possibility of this ever being more than a pious hope and wishful thinking. I read a week or two ago that Air Canada had committed itself to the purchase of supersonic aircraft. It has plans to purchase four of the Anglo French Concorde and six of the American supersonic aircraft that are now in the planning stage. I expect there are a variety of reasons why Air Canada is going ahead with these plans, but I would like to draw the attention of the committee and of the new Transport Commission to an article which appeared in Harper's Magazine in July, 1966, entitled "The Case against the Supersonic Transport" by John E. Gibson.

In it Mr. Gibson refers to the problems that have arisen in North American transport as a result of over-enthusiasm for the railroad when it was a new method of transport, and when it was revolutionary. I am sure that many of the hours of debate we have had in this session on transport resulted because of mistakes that were made when the railway was a new, experimental, untried form of transportation, and that we are paying now for over-optimism at that time. Yet we seem about to repeat the cycle when it comes to supersonic aircraft.

The article that I have mentioned lists some of the technical difficulties that are involved in this new form of aircraft. They are truly formidable. In speaking of the Concorde the writer says that in essence it will be obsolete before it leaves the drafting table. He also writes of the possible dangers to passengers. These planes will fly at much greater heights than we are accustomed to, and Mr. Gibson gives this startling warning:

> At 70,000 feet, the proposed cruising altitude of the SST, there will be no need of oxygen masks if cabin pressure is lost. The reason is that the human body undergoes explosive decompression, the blood boils, and death occurs within several seconds. This happens whether or not one wears an oxygen mask. The only safeguard is an astronaut type pressure suit.

Designers feel that the safest sort of supersonic aircraft would have no windows, yet the aircraft which Air Canada proposes to purchase will have windows. The article goes on to mention a great many other things, such as the eroding effect of rain at supersonic speeds and so on.

The real problems, however, are not in that area. Having discussed this, he goes on to say that the real problem of supersonic transport is that it cannot make money. Yet Air Canada, which is a crown corporation, is going into a field in which money cannot be made. This means that we will have to pay for it through taxation on higher prices, but it will be paid for and paid for many times. With the announcement of the proposed purchases we have also had the beginning of a program to condition the public of Canada to the acceptance of this. Already we have been told that a premium rate will be paid for this type of transport. Already we have been told that the operating costs will be 50 per cent higher than they are in respect of the conventional subsonic transport with which we are now familiar.

We might wonder why a crown corporation has gone so far as to commit itself in this way. To those people who are wondering why, I would recommend to them a series of lectures which have been given in the last two months by the economist John Kenneth Galbraith which have been published in the Listener. These lectures were given over the B.B.C. He talks about modern technology having destroyed the market, and because the market has been destroyed it becomes essential for government or the great corporations to replace the market and in effect, to guarantee a market. This can be done by the advertising industry using its persuasive means to create a market, or it can be done by a government subsidy.

In the case of the supersonic transport it would seem that the government of Canada, through its crown corporation Air Canada, is guaranteeing a market for one of the most expensive experiments ever undertaken. In its development the Concorde already has cost $1,500 million, and it is not yet in the air. I am sure the cost of the American plane will be even higher than that. Although we in Canada no longer have the kind of aircraft industry which could venture into this sort of an experiment, none the less we will be subsidizing these two experiments, one from Europe and the other outside our border in North America.

I would question whether the Canadian public is prepared to subsidize this type of transport to the extent necessary, because not only will the cost of each airplane be involved, which will be in the vicinity of $40 million, and the operating costs, but also of course there is the cost of the drastic alterations, which have to be made in the runways, in the flight patterns, in the safety precautions and in a host of other areas, if this type of transport is to be used at all.

One might wonder about the reason for this. I expect Air Canada and perhaps the government of Canada have realized there no longer is any free market in the aircraft industry; otherwise what would be the reason for agreeing in advance, when neither of them has been flown, to purchase four Concordes and six American planes? Why not wait to see whether they are feasible at all? Here we have a very fine example of a market being guaranteed. No opportunity is being given for anything like a competitive trial between the two planes, nor even a competitive trial between the supersonic and the subsonic.

One would expect that there would be no advantage in gaining an hour or two in a flight across the Atlantic if more and more time is involved in getting to the airport. It seems to me that it is unwise for a nation with a population such as ours and a country as small as ours to become involved in an experiment such as this. When there is a need for development in other areas in our own country, such as education and research, I do not think we should commit so much of our economic effort to bringing our air line into the supersonic category. I know that these days this is one of the methods employed to buy international prestige; but I doubt really whether Canadians are prepared or should be prepared to pay that price for international prestige. I expect, however, that we will do this, because it will be treated as an inevitability. I expect that Air Canada is above and beyond the reach of any transport board which would be set up as a result of this legislation, because aircraft corporations, not only in Canada but in all countries, seem to be able to put themselves well out of the reach of democratic government.

If there is a need to subsidize technology I believe we should see that it is subsidized in areas which would be more truly productive for the benefit of mankind. Perhaps we should use whatever influence we have left in the United Nations in an effort to get together with the nations in a discussion as to the advisability of continuing this race for higher speeds at increasingly diminishing returns forever and ever.

This is all I have to say in respect of transport, Mr. Chairman, but I do feel that unless there is a close and careful examination made of the future of air transport, and the costs and problems involved in the course on which this nation has embarked, clause 1 of Bill C-231 will be wishful thinking indeed.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, it seems that this long debate on Bill C-231 is finally coming to an end. We now are on clause 1, and since this is the clause for which I have been waiting, I have a few remarks I should like to make. First of all, I think this debate has proven the value of the committees system. I do not think any bill has ever had a more careful scrutiny. At least this would seem to be the case now, when we are at the end of a long and arduous debate and see the gentlemanly way in which hon. members treat each other. I must say, however, that this whole proposition of putting all of Canada's transport under one omnibus committee leaves some doubt in my mind as to whether any committee could handle this onerous task. I would go further and say that any minister charged with the responsibility of overseeing the work of such a committee would have his hands full. Therefore I should like to suggest to the minister, and through him to the government, that they give very careful consideration to dividing the responsibility of the Minister of Transport, if not into two complete ministries at least to the point of establishing the position of an associate minister for air.

As the last speaker has pointed out today, air is taking a more prominent place than ever before in the economic affairs of Canada and of the whole world.

It seems to me that if we are to keep in pace with the jet age we need the full time of a minister who would answer all those questions with regard to air transport and, in the very near future, space control, as well as questions on the research and development which is required if we are not to have chaos in the air industry. Certainly the minister who is responsible for co-ordinating our railroad, pipe line and water transport will have more than his hands full. It may be that in the future we may not have as capable a minister as we have at present who, when all is said, has given a great deal of energy and thought to these matters. I cannot say that I have always agreed with his conclusions but his energy is certainly beyond argument.

To be specific on two matters, let me remind the house that we have been told by the ministry over and over again that our Crowsnest freight rates will be protected and honoured and that indeed this commission, when it is in full operation, will attack Canada's transportation problems with vision. We must have the courage and vision to see the greater Canada which must emerge, and this will mean connecting the railway lines which have not been linked in the past. We must have the courage to build and anticipate the tonnage which will travel over the new railway lines.

I join other members of the house in saying that, whether or not it is wishful thinking, we hope that the new experiment in co-ordinating Canada's transportation system will bear the fruit that all of us sincerely anticipate.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Chairman, I shall be brief. I merely wish to deal with some views expressed by the minister this afternoon with regard to a question I put at the start of the sitting.

First of all, I shall remind the minister that on September 6, in this house, while he was making some remarks on the proposed resolution, I concluded my remarks as follows:

> How will the provincial government react to this resumption, by the federal government, of some authority in the field of interprovincial highway traffic?

I put that question to the minister, and I suggested to him, on that and other occasions, that he should consult or get in touch with the Quebec provincial government, which is rightly concerned about certain initiatives of the central government.

I notice that since September 6—I know that the minister is very busy—he probably did not have the opportunity or did not want to take the initiative to contact the Quebec government. And what I was expecting finally burst out.

Today's newspapers report, as pointed out by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier), that the Quebec legislature, Premier Daniel Johnson and the leader of the opposition, Mr. Jean Lesage, agreed on that matter. The hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) looked surprised a little earlier that two lawyers could agree on an important point.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, yesterday in the Quebec legislative assembly, the premier and the leader of the official opposition agreed to protest to the central government about Bill No. C-231 on transportation.

The Minister of Transport answered, towards the end of the afternoon, that he had discussed the matter with the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and that he intended to table tomorrow the correspondence exchanged between the federal government, the central government, and the Quebec government about the matter. The Quebec premier and the Quebec leader of the opposition were not the only ones who protested. In fact, a few weeks ago we read reports in the press according to which the provincial minister of highways, Mr. Lizotte, protested vehemently against certain tendencies revealed in Bill C-231.

This evening, we are asked to sit until the bill reaches third reading. This is absolutely illogical. In conscience, Mr. Chairman, we should be able to read the correspondence to find out on what criteria the Quebec government based its protests and, also, to study the replies given by the federal authorities to the Quebec government with regard to the controversy about Bill C-231.

That is why I would rather we did not vote this evening, we did not agree to third reading, prior to having had the opportunity to—

[English]

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I may interrupt the hon. gentleman. There is no intention whatever to ask the house to accept third reading of the bill tonight. All we are doing is trying to complete the committee stage. In fact I do not think that under the rules we could pass the bill tonight even if we wanted to because, as I hardly need to say, there have been a number of amendments and when that is the case it is against the rules to have third reading unless there is unanimous consent to it. So the hon. gentleman does not need to worry; this bill cannot possibly be passed tonight. All we are asking is to conclude the committee stage of the bill.

With regard to the other point raised by the hon. gentleman, what I said was that I did not think we should rely upon what we read in the newspapers, but that I would do my best to see that an approach is made to the premier of Quebec to find out whether he would be agreeable to our tabling this correspondence. Of course I have not had much time this evening to do it myself and I do not know whether anyone in the Prime Minister's office has had a chance to do it either, because it was rather late in the day.

If the premier is agreeable, it will be made available. If he is not, I do not think it would be very courteous to do so. However I can assure the hon. gentleman that if that request has not already been made, it will be made the first thing in the morning. If the story which I read in Le Devoir this morning is correct, I see no reason why we should expect any reluctance on the part of the premier to agree. However I think we owe him the courtesy to ask him and not just to take for granted what we read in the newspapers.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Chairman, thank the minister for the two assurances he has just given us. And that is why I shall conclude my remarks this evening, even if I have to come back to them tomorrow on the motion for third reading. First, there is the assurance that we will not be asked for unanimous consent to proceed with third reading this evening, and, second, that the minister will do everything in his power to get in touch tomorrow morning with the responsible people in the Quebec government. I sincerely hope that tomorrow afternoon, at the beginning of the sitting, we will have a statement in that connection.

[English]

Mr. Sherman: Mr. Chairman, I should like to add a few words to what I have already said on this particular legislation. First of all I would like to commend the minister for the manner in which he has piloted the bill through the house, the manner in which he has suffered the comments, protestations and interrogation of new members of the house like myself, and for the patience he has displayed and the generosity that he has brought to the deliberations, to the edification of those of us on this side of the house who have been concerned with this far-reaching legislation. I would also commend his over-all motives and intentions in the legislation, and his department for the additional aid they have provided me and my colleagues in this debate.

• (10:50 p.m.)

Having said that, Mr. Chairman, I would just like to end with one appeal which I feel derives from what I consider to be one omission, one oversight in the legislation. I refer to the lack of a concerted reference to our air transportation policy and our air needs in this country. I feel that at this particular juncture of our history, at the very nub, the very height as it were of the air age, it is almost inconceivable that a bill as far reaching and with as many ramifications as this one on the Canadian society should virtually ignore the field of the air and the subject of air transportation, particularly in cities in western Canada such as my own, and other prairie centres.

We believe there are a number of areas connected with air transportation, and a number of aspects of air transportation that require the urgent attention of this house and this government. As a consequence, we hope that this apparent oversight in what is already a mammoth piece of legislation will be corrected shortly by legislation which the minister will be bringing before us.

I should like to make one or two brief references, with an eye on the clock, to a point that the province of Manitoba made in its submission to the standing committee on transportation. I have made many references to this brief. I refer once again to a submission my province made on page 4 of its voluminous brief to the standing committee. They said:

> The principal requirements for an effective national transportation system may be stated as follows:
> (a) It should permit access to markets by the most direct routes and by the most efficient means which the potential traffic will sustain.
> (b) It should provide that combination of transportation facilities which yield maximum economies to producers and consumers and reasonable returns on invested capital.

With reference to the report of the MacPherson royal commission the Manitoba brief said:

> The commission left no doubt that ... "The primary objective of national policy in Canada has always been to preserve and enhance the political and economic welfare of the Canadian people".

That is to be found at page 96 of the 1966 edition of the commission's report. The bill itself is designed to provide, develop and promote an economic, adequate and efficient transportation system in this country. This is a high and laudable motive indeed. I simply suggest at this juncture, as I make my concluding contribution to the debate, that with this lofty aim in view there is a great deal that must be studied and to which the minister and the government must apply himself and itself with respect to air transportation in Canada.

The most urgent need in this particular area under this specific heading is the need for a healthy and constructive policy for the integration of our regional air carriers and the services they provide in our national air system. There is a pressing need also for an intensified and expanded use of our international airports, particularly the international airports in western Canada, many of which are international only in name. There is an equally important requirement in the area of landing rights that should be made available when negotiations can be consummated for major world air lines at some of our western Canadian airports.

There is a highly urgent and acute need for a continued review of the bilateral air agreement between Canada and the United States, with a view to making available more routes into the United States, airports, airport facilities and air lines operating out of the Canadian west and midwest, and indeed out of centres all across this country that would come withing the category of intermediate and minor communities from the point of view of population.

I refer not only to my own city of Winnipeg, and those of the size of Winnipeg. but those ranging all the way down to cities with a much smaller population status, which are denied some of the access routes to the United States which would be of tremendous benefit to their economic future. These are some of the things that I suggest need the attention of the minister and government, even though a great many aspects of our transportation life in this country, our transportation milieu, are covered in the mammoth bill we have been considering. Research and expertise in transportation in general must be developed and made available to our government, minister and future ministers of transport. But the most pressing requirement of all is the one I mentioned first, namely the need for the development and encouragement of our regional air carriers to the extent that they can be elevated into a healthy economic position in this country, to the extent that they can begin to play a healthy, contributory role in our over-all transportation picture and to the extent that they can feed and stimulate the national air lines operating across this country.

I make that final plea to the minister in closing my remarks on this particular phase of the debate. It is to be hoped that these particular oversights and omissions from what otherwise is a far reaching and most exhaustive piece of legislation will be rectified by legislation in these areas that the minister will be planning to introduce shortly in the house.

• (11:00 p.m.)

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I only wish to say a few words so as not to delay the discussion unduly. I know that many members of the house staff have to stay late and I do not want to keep them too long.

Mr. Chairman, I quoted earlier figures and statistics which the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) seemed to question, if not to reject entirely. I have nothing to take up in his remarks and I leave it to those who will read them to judge.

The Minister of Transport, with his usual courtesy, told me that the proper officials were not available this evening to provide answers and information. I am not asking for them this evening, because I know and admit that the minister cannot, of course, memorize all the railway and transportation rates. I am also aware that the minister cannot require all his departmental officials to stay in the galleries in case a member asked for some information of interest or known by such or such official. I also know that the minister is entirely justified in asking us to wait until tomorrow for his answers. That is why I am not pressing for an answer this evening. I am not asking for a reply tonight, but I want an answer tomorrow, if possible, or before the bill is finally passed.

I think that if the hon. member for Trois-Rivières had listened to my speech, not to criticize or question it, but if he had only listened as I gave it, with the figures I quoted, he would not have said: It might seem striking, but if true, we dare not rise against it, otherwise it would be like the figures of the member for Lapointe.

I will say to the member for Trois-Rivières that in the five years I have been sitting in the house, I have often quoted figures. I have also quoted statistics, not only in the house but elsewhere and no one has ever claimed that I had quoted false figures.

Never. And I challenge the hon. member for Trois-Rivières to prove the contrary. To set the record straight, I can give the hon. Minister of Transport the figures I quoted, so as to substantiate the fact that I said 74 cents and not 71 cents, as given in Hansard. I have here the exact figures I quoted, and I am willing to submit them to the minister.

As to the constitutional aspect of the bill and the discussions which could arise, I would like to point out to the hon. minister that I said earlier I did not wish to make any comments tonight, nor any other time until we have seen the correspondence between the Quebec and Ottawa authorities. I mentioned this a while ago and I can repeat that I am not going to make any comments whatsoever before I see those letters.

The hon. minister says that they will be tabled; I would also like to have his assurance that the bill will not pass third reading before we find out whether or not this correspondence will be tabled. Obviously, if the Quebec government refuses to have them tabled, we cannot insist any longer. But if Quebec does accept, I hope the minister will not come and tell us: "We will have third reading tomorrow and the correspondence will be tabled in three or four days". In my opinion, this would not be honest. Moreover, I feel that—

[English]

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. member would permit me to interrupt him to say that since the hon. member for Sherbrooke spoke I have received a note informing me that a request went out late this afternoon to the premier of Quebec for permission. I was not satisfied with that, because the request may have been by telegram or something of that sort. I said I hoped it would be followed by a telephone call first thing in the morning. I am doing everything I possibly can. There is nothing we want to hide and I do not think there is anything the premier of Quebec wants to hide. It is just getting the matter understood between us.

Mr. Winkler: He was not here to hear that.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: I was here, and the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler) knows it, when the minister said it a moment ago.

[English]

Mr. Winkler: If you were, you would not have asked that question.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: But the minister never gave the assurance to the house that we would not go on to third reading until the letters were tabled, if they are to be tabled. The only assurance the minister gave—

[English]

Mr. Winkler: I rise on a question of privilege now, Mr. Chairman. Seldom do I rise in support of the minister, but I think the hon. member will agree with me that the minister has gone as far as he can.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: That does not mean anything, in fact, because the only assurance—

[English]

Mr. Winkler: I rise again on a question of privilege. I believe we have all agreed to this. In addition, I believe the hon. member has, in essence, agreed with me. All I can say about him is either he was not here or he is quite as irresponsible as his colleagues from Quebec stated earlier this week.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: I am asking the minister to go as far as this: if the letters are to be tabled in the house, providing Quebec agrees, let us wait until they are tabled before the bill is read the third time. If the Quebec government refuses, then of course the bill can be given third reading. But if the Quebec government gives its answer Monday instead of tomorrow and agrees to the tabling of the letters, then let us wait until Monday for the third reading. That is my plea to the minister.

At this time, the only assurance that we have from the minister is that there would be no third reading tonight, that is the only assurance—

[English]

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member—

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I will ignore the remarks of the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler). I will tell him only that his insults do not make a dent in the indifference I feel toward him. In fact, my indifference is complete.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, we are asking the Minister of Transport to give us that assurance because it might be several days before we get an answer from the Quebec government. But if we are to get the letters, they should be tabled before consideration of the bill on third reading.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that the minister—I know he will do his utmost to secure the letters—could give us the assurance that before proceeding to third reading we will know at least whether or not the Quebec government is willing to table those letters. It seems to me that such assurance could be readily given because, according to the newspapers at least, the premier of Quebec is alleged to have said that he was willing to table the letters but was waiting for permission from the government in Ottawa. If both are waiting for each other's permission, something might be done to speed things up.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, as regards the constitutionality of the bill and the violations of the constitution, we think it preferable to wait for third reading to discuss that. The minister tells us that it is a question of procedure. He says: I cannot give you an answer tonight, since my officials are not here. As for the letters, we cannot table them tonight as we have not yet received Quebec's consent. And he is asking us to pass clause 1 and to wait for third reading to discuss this problem.

I am asking the minister if he is willing to give us, on third reading, as much latitude to discuss that problem as we would have if we were dealing with it on clause 1. Is the minister ready to grant us the same latitude to discuss it on third reading that we would be allowed through parliamentary procedure if we dealt with it while examining clause 1 of the bill? That is what I am asking the minister. I wonder whether he could give us an answer immediately, a favourable answer.

[English]

Mr. Winkler: As I leave the house, all I can say is the hon. member is the only tail I know that can wag two dogs.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, could the minister answer my question?

The Chairman: Is clause 1 agreed to?

Mr. Grégoire: I am sorry, sir, I see that the minister does not wish to answer my question. He cannot be forced to answer, but it is clear that we would have more latitude to discuss such problems in committee, on clause 1, than on third reading because on the motion for third reading our possibilities are very limited, under parliamentary procedure. In fact according to the rules, we have more chance, upon consideration of clause 1 of a bill, to get information and to obtain answers to our questions, which is not the case on the motion for third reading.

Therefore, I believe the minister is in fact, now using the motion moved a while ago to try and preclude us from debating those problems with all due latitude. I believe the minister is using the rules to limit our possibility of debate on that matter by forcing us to debate it on third reading instead of on clause 1 in committee of the whole house.

Bill reported

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time.

Mr. Macaluso: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I inform the house that there is a problem of mechanics which arises here. As hon. members know, when the house gives permission for the third reading of a bill which has been amended, that does not carry with it authority to reprint the bill as it comes out of committee of the whole. This is a particularly complex bill. There have been many amendments and it would, I am sure, be of some assistance to the members if they had a reprint of the bill as it came out of committee of the whole. It will be necessary for the house to give this authority, and on behalf of Mr. Speaker I ask for it now.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask what the business is for tomorrow.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, when my hon. friend from Hamilton West called out "next sitting of the house" with respect to third reading he was correctly interpreting the mind of the house leader. It is proposed to move the third reading of this bill tomorrow as the first item of government business. I hope at that time to be able to satisfy the exigence of the hon. gentleman, but that will depend on persons other than myself. However, I will do my best both as to statistics and as to the correspondence. Meanwhile perhaps the hon. gentleman might read the Privy Council decision of 1954 for the rest of the night, when I think he will have the answers to all his questions.

When the third reading is completed—and I intend to spend most of the night in prayer that it will be completed—it is proposed to take item No. 84 on today's order paper, which is second reading of an act to revise and consolidate the Interpretation Act and amendments thereto. I would think that this would be an emotional exercise for the house.

The next item would be item 62, a bill having to do with the Canadian Film Development Corporation; then item No. 83, an act respecting an immigration appeal board. Then there is a little bill having to do with armed forces visiting Canada from other countries. I am told that—

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): —it is an innocuous bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member is being helpful. Then there is a resolution, item No. 116 on today's order paper, respecting the Small Businesses Loans Act which has to be extended. Finally we will take item 120 having to do with postal services. If all of these items are completed, the government reserves the right to take practically any other item on the order paper; but I think there is an understanding that there are one or two items that will not be proceeded with after five o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I should point out to hon. members that when the motion to extend the sittings was made this evening no time of termination was mentioned. Standing order 6(2) under which that motion was made states:

An extended sitting under the provisions of this section, unless a closing time has been specified, shall not be terminated except by the adoption of a motion to adjourn and Mr. Speaker shall not deem that a motion to adjourn the house has been made by virtue of the operation of any other Standing Order.

At this time I would accept a motion to adjourn.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I move that this house do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 11.16 p.m.

TRANSPORTATION

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND QUEBEC PREMIER

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, last night in committee I said that if permission was received from the premier of Quebec, the correspondence between the Prime Minister and the premier would be made available to the house. I learned, just as I came into the house, that the consent has been received but it is limited in this way. The last letter the Prime Minister wrote to the premier deals with several subjects still under discussion. It is proposed, therefore, to table only the extract dealing with Bill C-231. The correspondence will be ready for tabling in a few moments. I wonder if I could have the agreement of the house to table that part of the correspondence as soon as it becomes available.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether, in accordance with the consent given by the house, I may now table the copies of the correspondence between the Prime Minister and the premier of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table the documents in question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MARITIME UNIONS TRUSTEES—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, last week the hon. member for Skeena asked the Minister of Labour to table some correspondence between members of the maritime trustees and the Minister of Labour, and the interim report of that board of trustees. I should like to do so now in English and French.

Mr. Speaker: Has the parliamentary secretary leave to table these documents?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, before you call orders of the day I wonder whether I may direct a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Labour relating to correspondence he tabled today. The correspondence which was tabled is not that to which I referred when I asked the minister for it. I asked whether he would table correspondence between the government and the trustees with respect to their reappointment. All we received is a document relating to the one year extension of the term of office of the trustees but nothing about the other matter. Will the parliamentary secretary look into this question?

Mr. Mackasey: I will discuss the matter with the hon. member for Skeena after orders of the day.

FINANCE

PROPOSED LEGISLATION BY ONTARIO IN FIELD OF BANKING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I do not wish to interrupt the advice which is now being given by the former minister of finance to the present minister, but I wish to direct a question to the present Minister of Finance and ask him this. In view of the statement made in the Ontario legislature yesterday by the minister responsible for financial and commercial affairs regarding Ontario's intention to legislate in the banking field, does the hon. gentleman intend to review the position taken by the federal government with regard to amendments to the Bank Act in particular?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): I do not think it will be necessary to consult with my former colleague on this—

Mr. Starr: Former?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: The truth is out.

Mr. Sharp: This is a case in which he was a former colleague and now, I am happy to say, is a present colleague.

Mr. Knowles: What was he in the meantime?

Mr. Sharp: He was a very highly respected member of parliament.

To be specific in answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Ontario, the government does not intend at this stage to amend the Bank Act along the lines suggested by the hon. gentleman. It is, however, our intention to proceed with some dispatch in connection with the deposit insurance legislation, which I think will help greatly to improve the standards of financial management of the trust and loan companies and other deposit taking institutions. I do hope that the province of Ontario, like the province of British Columbia, will make it mandatory for all deposit taking institutions to be insured by the federal agency.

Mr. Starr: Does the minister not feel this would be an appropriate time for the federal government to act in accordance with the recommendations of the Porter commission and bring other lending institutions under federal regulation, and not push forward with this band aid type of approach with respect to deposit insurance?

Mr. Sharp: As I said previously in the house when similar questions were directed to me, I do not rule out the possibility of action along those lines. However, I think it is important that we should proceed with legislation which can be helpful now. I do not want to found our legislation upon any interpretation of the ambit of banking jurisdiction which might be found by the courts to be invalid.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): In the light of the minister's statement that the government will proceed with dispatch with the deposit insurance legislation, would the hon. gentleman use his good offices with the leader of the house to have that legislation brought forward immediately so it may go to the finance, trade and economic affairs committee where we can proceed to examine its many facets? This is very important.

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I hope we will also have the co-operation of all parties in the house for some agreed apportionment of time so we can do that very thing.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Finance tell us whether he has had any response from other provincial governments such as that which he has received from the premier of British Columbia with regard to deposit insurance?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. I am having the views of the provincial governments canvassed at the present time. I can say, however, that we have had an excellent response from the trust and loan companies.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question while we are on the subject of banking. It is one that either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance may wish to answer. Has the government made any protests to the United States in reference to the proposed legislation dealing with Canadian chartered banks doing business in the United States, which legislation has now been announced officially?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. It would be improper for us to make a protest in respect of legislation that has not even been introduced.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I was going to suggest that this was more a related question than a supplementary.

Mr. Woolliams: It is a very important banking question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he and his colleagues have given consideration to amending the bill regarding the Bank Act in such a way as to be able to refer the clause defining banks more widely than now and including the banking operations of institutions other than banks, to the Supreme Court of Canada for a constitutional decision.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the government had considered this question when the revisions to the Bank Act were introduced, but for the reasons I have given decided to proceed now with the Bank Act in its present form. I might point out to the hon. gentleman, who of course is much more learned in the law than I can pretend to be, that it is impossible to define a term of the British North America Act, and all we could refer to the supreme court would be some legislation, or some action that we propose to take under the ambit of the banking clauses.

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, apparently I failed to make myself clear. That is precisely what I thought my question was intended to convey, to have a section or a part of the act applied to institutions other than banks. Then I asked the minister whether he would consider doing that and refer it to the Supreme Court of Canada under the Supreme Court of Canada Act.

Mr. Sharp: I do not think it would be appropriate to apply the Bank Act to these so-called near banks. I do not believe that would be a proper procedure, and that is why the government decided not to put a section into the Bank Act which would apply the Bank Act itself to all of these deposit taking institutions.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): As a supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will recognize that we have had at least six or seven supplementary questions, and I suggest to hon. members that we move on to another subject.

SUGAR

INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce may I direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister with reference to the proposed Caribbean conference which is to be held at Saint Lucia shortly. Are any discussions to take place at that conference with respect to an international agreement on the price of sugar?

The Prime Minister will remember that a year or two ago when I suggested we should follow the example of the United States and Great Britain in getting a guaranteed price range for sugar which would provide some price stability to the Canadian consumer, the former minister of trade and commerce suggested that the world price was too high. It is now the lowest it has been for several decades. Is the government pursuing the question of an international agreement for sugar, and will such a policy be discussed at this forthcoming conference?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are actively pursuing the idea of an international sugar agreement, which I think is the best way of dealing with the problem and helping our friends in the Caribbean at the same time. But in the absence of a program along those lines we will be discussing with the governments at the conference, which is to be held on the official level, other ways in which we might possibly be able to assist the sugar producers of that part of the world pending the working out of an international trade agreement.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether any discussions have been held with the government of Jamaica, and what progress has been made if such discussions have been held.

Mr. Pearson: This subject has been discussed with all the governments in the West Indies and will be discussed at the conference which opens either today or on Monday. When the deliberations at the conference have been completed, perhaps we will be able to make a report to the house which will throw some light on the progress which has been made.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I should like to go back to the question raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam concerning the negotiations with Jamaica. Did the Prime Minister inquire of the Minister of Trade and Commerce why Canada dropped negotiations with Jamaica last fall when the world sugar price dropped?

Mr. Pearson: It was because we were trying to proceed on the international front, and also because certain proposals we had made to Jamaica and other West Indies governments in order to assist them in this matter had been found to be impossible to work out in terms of our GATT agreements.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL SECURITY

CALVIN MACDONALD—APPEARANCE BEFORE ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in the absence of the Solicitor General. Has Calvin Macdonald requested permission to appear before the national security commission, and has the government granted him this privilege?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): This would be a question for the commission to decide. I have been informed that on January 20 and January 25 of this year the commission advertised in all the major newspapers to the effect that anyone who wished to appear before the commission to present a brief could do so. That, of course, would include the gentleman in question.

DRUGS

AMENDMENT OF LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE GREATER CONTROL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Although the list of proposed legislation was lengthy, there was an important omission. Does the government intend to introduce amendments to the Food and Drugs Act which would establish more effective control over the use of new drugs? LSD would be an example.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I will have to discuss this matter with the minister. I doubt whether there would be an opportunity in the early part of the year to deal with this matter, but there may be an opportunity later in the autumn.

FINANCE

MERCANTILE BANK—CORRESPONDENCE WITH OFFICIALS OF NATIONAL CITY BANK BEFORE PURCHASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. I regret that his colleague the former minister left the chair beside him, because he may need his advice. I should like to ask the minister if he can inform the house whether any official of the government—a cabinet minister or a cabinet minister's predecessor—did in any way communicate with the officials of the First National City Bank of New York with regard to the purchase of the Mercantile Bank prior to the purchase?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would have to study that question very carefully. It is rather like the debate which has been going on in the committee of this house. I think these matters should be clarified in that committee and that the Minister of Finance should not on the spur of the moment be asked to answer a question which is phrased so carefully.

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF AUTOMOBILE AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry. In view of the proposed march on Ottawa by union leaders representing some 20,000 unemployed automobile workers in Oshawa, St. Catharines and Windsor, would the minister reconsider the suggestion proposed by the hon. member for Ontario on January 24 that the auto pact be referred to a committee of this house so that all aspects of this pact could be discussed?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, like other members of the house I have great sympathy for those who I hope are only temporarily dislocated as a consequence of an adjustment of automobile production to current market conditions. I am looking forward to seeing the delegation when it comes here.

Perhaps after hearing what they have to say and after discussing the question with them would be the best time to determine what should be done.

CANADIAN CONFEDERATION

REQUEST FOR ACCELERATED STUDY BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether, in view of the initiative taken by the premier of Ontario in connection with an over-all study of confederation and the constitution and his invitation to other governments to meet with him, and in view of the initiative previously taken by at least one other province in this regard, he will urgently consider accelerating the federal government's study of this matter? The objective would be of course to enable a parliamentary committee to be established at an early date so that parliament could give consideration to this matter so as to insure in turn that the federal government is not caught short when the provinces have completed their studies.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we expect to have our studies completed in time for any constitutional conference which could usefully be called after all the preparatory work has been done at the federal and provincial levels. As soon as the federal study has been completed by the government this matter will be submitted to a parliamentary committee.

I should point out that the statement of the premier of Ontario on this question did not visualize a constitutional conference, but rather a meeting the nature of which is not clear in my mind, but at which the constitution as it is at present would be discussed. I hope shortly to be in touch with the premier of Ontario by correspondence to find out what he had in mind when he made his announcement.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister indicate to the house in general terms his projected timetable in respect of this study? When might we expect a committee of this parliament to be established to study this question under the proposed timetable?

Mr. Pearson: I do not think it would be possible to do that until the autumn at the earliest.

Mr. Fulton: Would the Prime Minister reconsider that timetable in order that we will not be in the position of not having completed our study when the provinces come forward with a formal position? Surely it would not be desirable for the federal government to be left without any position at that time.

Mr. Pearson: I do not think the provinces will have completed their study before the federal government and this parliament have considered the matter. However, that will be a matter for them to decide. I can think of nothing more unproductive than the impression that a constitutional conference will be held shortly to revise our constitution before all the preparatory work has been carefully worked out.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Will the Prime Minister say whether in respect of this important matter the government is withholding any action until it receives the report of the B and B commission, after which it will chart a course?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker, that is not holding up our work at all and is not a factor involved in our desire to complete this work as quickly as possible; and that includes consideration of all aspects of this vital matter and its reference to a parliamentary committee.

Mr. Starr: In view of the answer given by the right hon. gentleman, will he indicate what the government intends to do with the report of the B and B commission when it is received?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS

LOUISBOURG FORTRESS—DISMISSAL OF SENIOR EMPLOYEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of his absence perhaps his parliamentary assistant or the acting minister will answer it.

My question is based on charges that one Jeremy Akerman was discharged from a senior position on the fortress of Louisbourg restoration project as a result of political activities on behalf of the New Democratic Party. Will the minister institute an investigation into this very serious charge and make a report to the house?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take the question as notice on behalf of the minister. I am sure he will look into this matter.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DEMAND BY U.S. UNION TO PARTICIPATE IN PRODUCTION OF FILM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Let me preface my question by saying it relates to a production crew making a film called

"The Fox" at the Kleinburg studios near Toronto. Will the minister make inquiries into the demands of the I.A.T.S.E.—the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees —who are insisting that the New York local provide part of the production crew for this film? There are competent Canadians who could do this job.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I will inquire into this matter, Mr. Speaker.

IMMIGRATION

WARNING TO IMMIGRANTS RESPECTING HOUSING IN LARGER CITIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer a question put to me yesterday by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Forrestall). His question concerned housing conditions for immigrants. The cities to which I referred as experiencing housing difficulties are Toronto, Hamilton, Windsor, Kitchener and Vancouver.

[Translation]

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

FAILURE TO PRODUCE FILM ON CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laniel (Beauharnois-Salaberry): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Secretary of State.

Is the minister aware that in this very centennial year of confederation, the National Film Board does not have documentary films on confederation, more particularly on the Confederation Act?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question of the hon. member constitutes a form of representation and I wonder whether he considers it of such urgency. If he wishes, he could possibly bring it up at ten o'clock.

Mr. Laniel: At ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

DIVORCE

EFFECT ON FEDERAL LEGISLATION OF ONTARIO INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice based upon the announcement in the speech from the throne in Ontario that that legislature will conduct a public inquiry into divorce. In view of the fact that the committee of this house is well along in its study, will the inquiry in Ontario in any way slow down the introduction of possible legislation in this house?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not think it will. The work that is being done by the committee will be very useful to the government in bringing down legislation.

[Later:]

Mr. Prittie: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to put a question to the hon. member for High Park in his capacity as joint chairman of the committee on divorce. I see he is absent at the moment so I will put the question on record.

I would like to know if the province of Ontario has made any application to appear before the joint committee on divorce.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

TRANSPORT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAUSEWAY— POSSIBLE DELAY THROUGH DESIGN CHANGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works, but possibly the acting minister might take it as notice. It is prompted by a reported statement by the premier of Prince Edward Island to the effect that a pending report by a leading consulting engineer is expected to question the department's design for the Northumberland strait causeway as not taking into account the ice hazard. Since this project is a dominion responsibility, will the minister advise the house whether significant design changes are in contemplation and whether any delay in the completion of the crossing will result therefrom?

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I will take this question as notice and bring it to the attention of the minister.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ARRANGEMENTS FOR TAKING PHOTOGRAPH OF HOUSE IN SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lee Grills (Hastings South): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, it was indicated in a note I received from Your Honour today that you were going to take a picture of the house on February 8. I want to inform you that the agriculture committee will be away from the house during that week. I am sure you will agree that without those handsome farmers there would be a great vacancy in this house.

Mr. Speaker: I assure the hon. member that I have no intention of taking a picture. But his representations have been noted, and I am sure an appropriate change can be made to the proposed arrangements.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROTESTS AGAINST QUALITY OF INTERVIEW WITH MR. VON THADDEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State. I would like to ask the hon. lady whether she is aware that a few days ago a member of the West German Bundestag was in Ottawa and reported at that time that he had wired the C.B.C. to ask if they would arrange an interview for him on television because he was appalled by the incompetence and biased interview of this man von Thadden and felt that the whole picture had been distorted by this incompetence. Would the hon. lady inquire why, if the C.B.C. received this communication, they have not replied to it?

Hon. Judy LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I heard such a rumour in Toronto. As a member of the House of Commons, the hon. member must be aware that many people would like to be on C.B.C., but the C.B.C. does not put them on just because they request it. An individual must have some newsworthy value in order to be put on television. I have no idea whether in fact this man did communicate with them and they decided not to use him on a program. I will check this. As I say, I have only heard a rumour.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the hon. lady at the same time convey to the C.B.C. the very grave misgivings and apprehensions of many Canadian citizens about what I termed earlier the grossly incompetent and biased interview on T.V.? It was a disgrace to Canada and the C.B.C.

Inquiries of the Ministry

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST THAT ECONOMIC COUNCIL CONDUCT RESEARCH

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. I would have asked it yesterday but there was not enough time for backbenchers. Has the attention of the minister been drawn to the suggestion of Professor Neufeld, of the department of political economy of Toronto university, that the Economic Council of Canada should be given the responsibility for engaging in research in the specific area of profit-wage-price developments and in short term economic developments in general? I am aware of what has been done, and no doubt Professor Neufeld is, but I wonder whether the minister is considering further research.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is of a very general nature and should be placed on the order paper.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE IN HOME CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): I should like to put a question to the Minister of Labour but, in his absence, I shall put it to the Minister of Finance and Receiver General.

Does the minister intend to provide direct assistance to home building?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will agree with me, I am sure, that this question, being of a very general nature, should be put on the order paper.

INDUSTRY

BETHLEHEM STEEL—EXTENSION OF OPERATIONS INTO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address this question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Did the minister while in San Francisco confer with officials of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation in respect of having their company extend its operations into Canada?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The answer is no, sir, I did not.

Inquiries of the Ministry

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SERVICE PROVIDED BY HUDSON'S BAY COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, a couple of weeks ago the Postmaster General indicated that he would be making a statement in the house about the Hudson's Bay Company and its relationship with people in outlying communities served by their stores. I wonder whether the Postmaster General could tell us what has taken place in this respect.

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I have asked my department to make an investigation into this matter and I have also asked the Department of Justice to report on it. As soon as I have received this information I will be able to make a statement.

TRADE

CANADIAN FOOTWEAR FACTORIES PUT OUT OF BUSINESS BY IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Has the minister received recently a brief from the Footwear Bureau of Canada alleging that in the last two years 26 footwear factories in this country have been put out of business by imports? If so, has a policy decision been taken on the matter?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): I shall have to inquire, Mr. Speaker. I do not recollect whether I have received such representations.

TRANSPORT

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—OPPORTUNITY TO PROTEST INCREASE IN TOLLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, last week I asked the right hon. Prime Minister whether he had received a telegram from the council of the city of Sept Îles, Quebec, with respect to their protest regarding any increase in the St. Lawrence seaway tolls and asking that some opportunity be given them to make representations. The Prime Minister indicated at that time that he had received such a telegram and would acquaint the house later with the terms of his reply. I wonder whether he is able to do so now.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I did receive the telegram, Mr. Speaker, and an acknowledgment was sent. I have discussed the matter with the Minister of Transport, who will be replying in greater detail shortly.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Minister of Transport be able to acquaint the house with the nature of his reply when that statement is made?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I would be very happy to do that, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State. In view of the fact that some members of parliament have undertaken to grow beards for the centennial year, I would ask whether this is an official centennial project.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): No, Mr. Speaker, but I think it is a very good idea. I am only sorry that I cannot do it myself.

FINANCE

STATEMENT ON RUN ON MONTREAL CITY AND DISTRICT BANK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance following the short statement he made in the house last night at seven o'clock concerning the Montreal City and District Savings Bank. Has there been any change in the situation since last night, and has normal business been resumed?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, just before I entered the house I made inquiries of my officials and it is their understanding that the situation is somewhat improved. It is most regrettable that there should have been this run on a bank which is so conservatively run and which I know will be able to meet all its liabilities.

PROVISION FOR DEFINITION AND IMPLEMENTATION OF NATIONAL POLICY

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-231, to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other acts in consequence thereof, and to enact other consequential provisions.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I regret inflicting myself once more upon the house and I will be very brief, but I did promise last night that the Prime Minister would table, if the consent was available, the correspondence with the government of Quebec regarding part III of the bill, and I have done so. I have some extra copies in English and in French if any hon. member wishes to peruse it.

I also promised the hon. member for Lapointe that I would attempt, if I could, to provide certain statistical information for which he had asked. I am sorry to have to say that the information was of such a detailed character that although my staff has been working on it—and perhaps I am not at my brightest this morning anyway and might not have been able to absorb it even if I had received it—it has not been possible to put it in a form in which it could be presented to the house. It is not strictly relevant to the bill, but I intend to give the hon. gentleman a detailed reply in another way.

I want to say one or two words about the bill itself. It seems to me that this bill, which I think we can safely say has not been railroaded through parliament, has had a passage that has been attended by some unexpected events. However, I think I can say that, notwithstanding the considerable number of amendments that have been made to it, it is my opinion that the amendments have been improvements, and I would not have been willing to accept them if I had not thought so. In some cases they were very substantial improvements. I believe that members in all parties and on all sides of the house have contributed to the improvement of the bill, and I say this with the greatest sincerity.

Some hon. members, while speaking on clause 1 in committee last night, indicated a few misgivings about the bill, some them rather serious. I do not pretend for one minute that this bill is perfect. I do not pretend that we may not want to make some amendments to it quite soon. But I think it is about as good a measure as we could have agreed upon collectively at this particular time. I do confess that with respect to the patchwork—if I may put it that way—that we had to do on clause 74 yesterday I am not quite as happy as I am about the rest of the bill. Perhaps I am not quite as happy about the circumstances that brought it about and I may even be a little scarred still, but I try to bear my scars cheerfully.

There is one matter about which I do feel a little concerned, and I think it would be only fair for me to express it to the house. I am referring to my concern about the wide open implications of clause 15 (1) (e) which is now really unqualified by anything else in the bill. Since this clause is mandatory and imposes a duty upon the commission, it does seem to me it is just possible that it would give carriers a little more freedom to bring matters before the commission than we really intend to give them.

I think if that is the case the situation was helped very considerably by the reintroduction into the bill by an amendment moved by the hon. member for Medicine Hat of the provision I had suggested earlier, giving ministers of the crown the right to be represented at any such hearings. However, I would really wish to see a little more restriction upon this freedom in the bill. I would prefer to see an express provision that there should be public hearings when the commission is acting under clause 15 (1) (e) and perhaps under one or two other subclauses of clause 15.

I know that in construing a statute one can pay little attention to what goes on in the legislature where it was enacted. But I would still hope that notwithstanding the fact that there may be that imperfection, the commission would never make any determination under that clause and under one or two others without having public hearings. I feel that is very important, and that all interested parties should be permitted to attend.

In making this point I do not really seriously anticipate much difficulty, and I will not ask one of my colleagues to move that the bill be sent back to the committee to try to make another improvement to it. I think we have about reached the limit of human endurance, and I will not do that at all. I made the point because I thought I should express my misgivings in case, before too long, it might be felt that these imperfections—if I am right in regarding them as slight imperfections—might have to be corrected.

• (11:50 a.m.)

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Leave something for the Senate.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Carleton, whose aspirations, if I read the press correctly, may be somewhat similar to mine, has suggested that we leave something for the Senate. Perhaps he, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and I might all go there together. It would certainly be a livelier place.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the hon. member a question. Has he proposed my name to the Prime Minister? Let us have not just words; let us have some action.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggested to the Prime Minister that if the hon. gentleman was given the tools he might finish the job. However, all joking aside, I think in a bill of this magnitude it is possible that there may be the necessity for a sober second thought about some of the verbiage used here and there, and although I hope the other place will not scrutinize very much the substance of the bill, I do hope they will scrutinize its form in order to make sure that it is couched in good English and good French and that it means what we intend it to mean.

I think it would have been most ungracious of me, sir, in light of what I sometimes think were the many quite undeserved and charitable things that have been said about me at various stages during the course of this long debate if I did not acknowledge in turn the very genuine appreciation, occasionally perhaps slightly mixed with irritation, that I have felt throughout the passage of this bill, both in the standing committee and in the committee of the whole in this house. I do think, the whole record taken together, we can all feel that we have, perhaps not in speed but pretty well in every other respect, given a fair example of how parliament ought to work in producing good legislation.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, my first words will be to join with the Minister of Transport in emphasizing as well as I can that when parliament does do a good job, as it has done with this transportation bill, the country should know about it. I think during this session in the handling of the medicare discussion, in the handling of the guaranteed income supplement proposal, and particularly in the handling of this transportation bill, we on both sides of the house have demonstrated to the whole country that when parliament puts its mind to it it can do a good job.

I have had something to do with railway legislation such as that which is now before us for a good many years, Mr. Speaker. When the royal commission report was submitted to the previous government in 1962 it was our task to make the first drafts of a transportation bill. At that time the bill dealt primarily with railways. It was our concern then how we could manage the railways more efficiently and yet allow for the maximum of freedom.

So far as the rationalization concept was concerned, we felt at that time that this should be kept within the power of the elected representatives of the people in the central government of Canada and that we should deal directly and co-operatively with those provinces that do have rationalization problems. To that end, Mr. Speaker, an informal agreement was reached with the provincial premiers of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba as to the course we would follow in the procedure of rationalization.

It is on this question, Mr. Speaker, that I still have some lingering doubts about this bill, but I have said enough already in this house to indicate what those doubts are. Therefore, in summarizing the first part of my remarks I should like to say that this parliament has demonstrated that it can take a very involved bill, affecting a large section of the economy of this country, and draft legislation which admittedly is venturing into an unknown field in turning over vast delegated powers to a board on a problem we know very little about. In this respect we have made a good effort to produce a bill that will give some guide lines to this new board.

Using round figures, Mr. Speaker, over 40 amendments were proposed to the draft of the bill as submitted to the standing committee in 1966. In the committee in this chamber approximately a further score were added, and some were turned down. I think this is reason for complimenting the government for being flexible, on the one hand, and above all for pointing out that for the most part the opposition has been constructive and has tried to be helpful to the government in producing a better bill.

There is one matter, Mr. Speaker, about which I still wish to place a caveat on the record. As I mentioned a few moments ago, the government to which I belonged intended to carry out the rationalization provisions of the proposed operation of the railways in Canada through the co-operative efforts of the provincial governments and the federal government.

In the bill as it is now a new principle has been brought in which turns the powers of the elected representatives over to a delegated board which is to carry out these rationalization provisions. On behalf of our party I stated on second reading and in committee that we reluctantly accepted this principle in an effort to try to achieve the efficiency in the management of our transportation system that a modern economy required.

In our amendments we tried to do two things under the general principles about which I am talking. On the one hand we tried to strengthen the hand of the board in order that it could better do its job. Simultaneously we tried to keep in the hands of the elected representatives—in other words in parliament, the House of Commons and the Senate—a little more control over this board to which we delegated such vast powers.

The caveat I want to register, Mr. Speaker, is that I still feel it would not have done any harm and would have strengthened the bill considerably had we given that board the power to direct as well as to recommend. In view of the pressure of the subsidies, we could have given to that board considerable authority to express to railway management that where there were ways to run the railways better and save money and thereby keep tariffs down, and perhaps the board could have got its way more effectively with the railways had it been given power to direct. We lost that amendment, Mr. Speaker, but we make no apologies for having made the try.

Simultaneously with trying to strengthen the power of the board to do its job properly the hon. member for Peace River also moved an amendment to set up a more sophisticated means by which parliament could control one of its agencies, whether it be a crown corporation or a board. This proposal too was voted down in committee. I think that was a mistake, and I hope it does not turn out to be fatal. I know that in theory the standing committee on transportation has the right to examine the workings of this board. I also know that because of the lack of skilled professional help at the command of the standing committee there is not a great deal that laymen can do.

For two or three years after passage of this bill, because of the interest aroused in its preparation over the last few years, a number of members will take an active interest in this matter and maintain their knowledge. Ultimately, from apathy, from human nature, the interest will drop, and I am afraid the board will have tremendous powers without full and proper control by parliament. Nobody will be interested enough to look at it, to exercise the control that is needed.

If a government wants to play games it is possible, under the rules of the house, to delay the setting up of a committee until far into the session. At that time other things occupy hon. members and little may be done. We should prefer that a standing committee be set up in such a way that the government could not interfere with the way the board is brought under review. We should like to have that committee under the chairmanship of an opposition member. We started that principle in the public accounts committee some eight years ago and it has worked very well. I think it would work just as well here.

Third, we should like to see that committee buttressed by at least three highly qualified individuals able to deal with technical matters that the ordinary layman member of the house cannot deal with, in order that the chairman of the committee and the committee may be aware of what is happening on the board. It is in this area that trouble will arise. The interest of the House of Commons will not be maintained, and as a result I can see the board becoming a power unto itself. There will be no machinery or capacity to check and control it, unless there is a serious uproar here, in the house.

All this was dealt with in committee. I do not have to rehash it. I have made my point. This party is concerned about our handing over tremendous powers to this board without there being more sophisticated means to strengthen our committee to control that body.

Another point I want to raise in summary has to do with the Crowsnest pass rates. This matter is always dealt with emotionally because for over half a century thousands of Canadians have depended on this rate structure to operate their industries and make a living. It has not been repeated often enough in this debate that at the beginning a contract was made. That contract has been modified over the years, but its essence was that if a group of men built a railway, certain things would be done. The railway, the Canadian Pacific, received tremendous land acreages, valuable oil and mineral rights, forest lands, huge sums of money and monopolies in certain areas. In return it was to carry our grain seaward at a fixed rate.

With advances in automation and engineering, instead of an engineer and crew operating a train of 25 box cars they now can operate a train with 100 box cars. The sooner the railways realize there is modern equipment, the better. Modern, enlarged cars are available, with improved techniques of grain handling in the prairie areas and terminals the cost will be kept constant. Change will keep it constant. The railways cannot argue they are losing money on the Crowsnest pass rates. They have used this argument as a constant propaganda pressure on the people of western Canada. They have tried to maintain the myth that they lose money on these rates, but the truth is that they do not lose money.

The 1964 bill introduced by the government said that if there were losses under the Crowsnest Pass rates there would be a charge on the treasury. In this bill, the 1966 bill, that section has been taken out. When I raised this matter on second reading the minister said the section was taken out because there are no losses on the Crowsnest Pass rates; yet the section having to do with the review was included. My colleague for Winnipeg South Centre moved an amendment to that, and the majority of this parliament spoke with him. Owing to the tradition that Mr. Speaker always maintains the rules, the parliamentary wish prevailed, and I hope that matter is dead, dead, dead.

The pact was made. The railways got their part of the contract; they shall honour their obligation under the contract. The other day, looking at evidence showing the peripheral advantages the railways got as part of the agreement, I saw that one of them was rights to minerals. One peripheral operation alone has assets today of approximately $400 million. I will not mention the value of oil and gas rights which will increase as the years go by and as discoveries continue. I do not mention the value of the tremendous forest tracts the railways have and still enjoy. I could list all the things the railway got, and I have little use for those who say that because the railways got all the cream and they are down to the skimmed milk, we should make a new contract.

The Crowsnest pass rates are a part of our national structure, and I hope discussion of them is over. Parliament has spoken. The bill will get through. I hope nobody raises this issue again. The people of western Canada thank opposition members of parliament for the amendment which was carried.

On the question of maximum rate control and costing we are moving into the unknown. I can only say that the best chance all Canadians will have is if we give the board the power to obtain competent personnel to deal with costing and work out a system of accounting, that we may know what things cost, and that we need not accept the figures of the railways. If this could be done, if competent staff could be selected by the board, many of us would feel relief. We know we are not competent to deal with these questions. Few people in Canada are competent to deal with costing and maximum rate control matters. It is in the field of freight rates that the battle can be lost. I hope the board gets people competent to deal with these matters, that we may feel protected.

I will not talk about the public interest, the general public vis-à-vis the shipper. That has been adequately covered in previous discussions. This matter concerns quite a few people. We shall see what will happen.

Finally, the government will be responsible for the selection of the personnel of this board. I need not warn the minister—rightly or wrongly, I hate to lay the blame on an individual—but the attitude of the Canadian public toward the Board of Transport Commissioners is not good. We feel, whether by its rules and regulations, the precedents it follows and so on, it has always accepted the railway position. In selecting this new board dealing with railways, air, water, buses, trucks, and pipe lines the government will be on the spot to produce the type of commissioner, at the top, in whom the people of Canada can have confidence. We hope that in the next few years a staff will be collected around this individual capable of coping as an equal with the giants of the transportation industry. This is an old, old sore on the social hide of the Canadian people.

Here is an opportunity for the minister and his colleagues to realize that they have had a good run for their money in the house with regard to this bill. We have fought the hon. gentleman where we thought we should fight; we have been constructive where we thought we should be constructive. We have tried to help the minister. Now will he help us and the Canadian people by giving us a board which will address itself effectively and with sincerity to the task before it, and act as a reliable referee between the general public and the transportation companies?

We can only hope that if we get such a board the railways will be able to function efficiently, the air lines will be able to give full service to the public, and all the other forms of transportation will be able to operate in an effective way for the betterment of this country. Certainly the principle of integrating all transport service is a new one for us in Canada. It seems logical, and in the light of the arguments which have been advanced we have agreed to delegate this power to a commission. Now we have done so it is up to the government to produce the type of board having the competence needed to make this bill a lasting success.

Mr. Norman Fawcett (Nickel Belt): During the time this bill was before the committee of the whole house I personally did not become too involved in it. I think hon. members will agree that I did not take up the time of the committee for very long. However, at this point I should like to make a few comments on the measure.

I should like to say at the outset, as far as the general concept of the bill is concerned, that the members of my party, together, I think, with hon. members in other parties, are agreed that the time for setting up a commission which would have jurisdiction over all modes of transport was long overdue. In my opinion this is the most important factor in a good gransport policy for a country such as ours. But the minister will have to watch these matters very carefully in order to make sure the commission is applying itself properly to its primary purpose, the co-ordination of all the different modes of transport in such a manner that they will work in conjunction with one another rather than against one another as happens now, in so many cases, to the disadvantage of the general public.

I was a member of the standing committee on transport and communications, and I will say at once that I commend the chairman of that committee for the excellent work he did. I do not think it would be right if I neglected to say, too, that the minister himself has been very helpful all along. At times he seemed to bend over backward in order to get along not only with the standing committee but the committee of the whole house. I might also say a word of commendation to my hon. friend from Springfield who carried the ball for our party on this issue, for the contribution he made to our discussions. All hon. members will agree, I believe, that he is to be commended on the way he carried out this task, and that while doing so he offered a number of very worth-while suggestions.

It is not my intention to discuss the bill at great length. During the committee stage I indicated that in my view there was a deficiency in the legislation. I still believe this deficiency exists. It has to do with the consequences of the abandonment of branch lines. The amendment I moved in committee would have provided some relief for employees adversely affected by rail line abandonment to the extent that they were required to relocate or, in extreme cases, lost their jobs altogether. It was a matter of great regret to me that this amendment failed to secure acceptance.

I have an amendment here—I do not think I need go into it too deeply—which expresses what I have said previously on this subject, and I intend to move it now, seconded by my hon. friend from York South. I have a limited number of copies in English and in French for distribution. It reads as follows:

> That Bill C-231 be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole house for reconsideration of clause 42 in relation to the matter of compensation to employees adversely affected by railway abandonment or rationalization.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether before the motion is put to the house it would be too hazardous for me to raise a point of order. I do not wish to take any unnecessary time in arguing the point of order, because it would appear to me that this amendment is in substance the same as an amendment which was moved in committee of the whole, at which time it was ruled out of order by the chairman on the ground that it was beyond the scope of the bill, inasmuch as the bill does not deal with labour relations or industrial relations.

My position, substantially, is that the judgment made in the committee on this matter was sound. The bill in no way deals with any aspect of the relationship between the employees of any carriers and the carriers themselves. It seeks to lay down broad policies with respect to the relationship between the government and transport companies, between shippers and transport companies, but it does not in any way enter into the field of labour relations. I submit it would be wrong to attempt to direct the committee to do something which the chairman of that committee ruled as being outside the competence of that committee. To do so would, I suggest —unless Your Honour does not agree with the decision already taken—clearly be asking the committee to do something which was considered beyond the scope of the bill.

• (12:20 p.m.)

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, like the Minister of Transport I shall be brief because we have spent quite some time on procedural matters this week, but it does seem to me that this amendment is within the four corners of the kind of amendments that are in order on third reading. Citation 415 on page 287 of Beauchesne's fourth edition states:

> When a bill comes up for third reading a member may move that it be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of amending it in any particular.

There are a number of other citations which spell out that point. The minister does not quarrel with that, but he contends that the amendment is beyond the scope of the bill because it deals with something which the bill does not include.

I remind Your Honour of the earlier discussion we had in committee of the whole on this matter. I think the situation was different, but some of the points that were made then apply now. I also remind Your Honour that clause 42 of the bill has a subheading which reads "Abandonment and Rationalization of Lines or Operations." In other words, the subject of abandonment and rationalization is in the bill. I also remind Your Honour that the resolution preceding the bill, as recorded at page 7743 of Hansard for August 29, 1966, listed many things that the bill would do and concluded with this phrase:

> —and to provide further for other matters consequential upon or related or incidental to any of the foregoing.

I submit that if abandonment and rationalization of railway lines is one of the subjects of the bill, and if one of the purposes of the bill is to provide for matters consequential upon or related or incidental to any of the matters in the bill, then surely it is appropriate to ask for consideration of the consequences to employees of abandonment or rationalization of railway lines.

When we were in committee of the whole one of the arguments advanced was that the kind of amendment which my colleague moved at that stage might involve the expenditure of money out of the treasury, and thus it was not open to a private member to move it. We are not now at that stage. We are at third reading, where it is possible to move that the bill be referred back for consideration of a matter, it being recognized that such a motion, even if it passes, is not compulsory and therefore does not run up against the problem of finance so far as a private member is concerned.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, there are many precedents for this and there is much that could be said, but I do not think we want to go into it at length today. My notes, which I have looked at quickly in order to refresh my memory, tell me that on the Canada Pension Plan legislation we were allowed to refer it back on such matters as the amount of the old age pension and the age at which it would be paid. Likewise we were allowed to refer the medicare bill back to the committee of the whole for reconsideration of the effective date and one or two other matters.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the kind of amendment now proposed by my colleague is similar to those amendments and that Your Honour should, and I trust will, find it to be in order.

Hon. John N. Turner (Member of the Administration): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address myself briefly to the point of order. I would point out that in citation 415 in Beauchesne's fourth edition there is also subparagraph (4) which reads as follows:

> On the third reading of a bill, an amendment to refer back to the committee of the whole must not tend to change the principle approved on the second reading.

When one relates this citation and its principle to the argument adduced by the Minister of Transport, it is our submission that the amendment goes beyond the principle of the bill which has to do with rates, tariffs, and regulation. The amendment deals with a subject which is foreign to the substance of the bill in that it refers to the relationship between the railways as employers and the employees, a matter involving negotiation, conciliation and other matters falling within the ambit of a labour bill.

I do not argue for a moment that the substance of what the amendment proposes is not important and will some day, and some day soon, have to be brought before this house, but what I do adduce by way of submission to Your Honour is that it is foreign to the principle of this bill and therefore inadmissible under citation 415(4) of Beauchesne, and is irrelevant because it does not deal with the main purport of the bill.

I might also recall to Your Honour's attention that a similar attempt to make such an amendment in committee, to which the Minister of Transport referred, was ruled out of order by the chairman of the committee and, if my memory serves me right, that decision was upheld by the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I might be allowed at this point to read the motion of the hon. member. Would the hon. member indicate who is the seconder of the motion?

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis).

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Fawcett), seconded by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) moves:

That Bill C-231 be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole house for reconsideration of clause 42 in relation to the matter of compensation to employees adversely affected by railway abandonment or rationalization.

The Minister of Transport has taken exception to this amendment on a point of order which has been supported by the Minister without Portfolio. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre bases his argument in support of the validity of the motion on citation 415 (1) of Beauchesne's fourth edition, which states:

When a bill comes up for third reading a member may move that it be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of amending it in any particular.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre claims that the use of these words "in any particular" supports his contention that this amendment should be accepted. I cannot agree with him in spite of the fact that Beauchesne reads as has been indicated by the hon. member. Obviously there must be limitations on the type of amendments that can be moved on third reading. For example, the proposed amendment must be relevant to the bill which it seeks to amend; it should not seek to give a mandatory instruction to the committee, and it should not contradict the principle of the bill adopted on second reading. I point out these last two as examples of what these amendments should not do.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has restated the argument which had been made in committee to the effect that the subject matter which the hon. member for Nickel Belt would want the committee to reconsider is within the scope of the bill. I remind him that there has already been a judgment of the Chair in committee to the effect that this proposal is outside the scope of the bill. The hon. member is now trying to do indirectly what could not be done in committee in view of the decision of the Chair.

A decision was reached that this proposition is outside the scope of the bill, and for this reason I cannot see how the house can direct the committee to consider an aspect of the matter which has already been ruled out of order by way of decision of the chairman of committees. For this reason I regret very much that I must rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a very brief comment on third reading of the bill which is before us. I appreciate, of course, that the amendment is not before the house, but I do wish to indicate that there are in this bill some very serious omissions.

As I understand the bill it is the hope of the government, and certainly the hope of the railways, that when it becomes law the railways will have more revenue. The question is, where is that addition to their revenue to come from? A great deal has been made of the suggestion during this debate, particularly by the minister—and I also have seen statements by officers of the railways to the same effect—that the railways will obtain more revenue as a result of increased competition between various modes of transport. I have very grave doubt as to whether that will result in any very large increase in railway income. I have very grave doubt whether there are sufficient areas where there will be genuine competition between the modes of transport and where the railways really will be able to benefit from the alleged increase in competition.

Time, of course, will prove whether one is right, but as I see the bill as a whole its real object is to provide the railways with added revenues by virtue of (a) abandonment of lines, (b) rationalization of lines and operations and, (c) payments from the treasury, some on a temporary basis and some on a permanent basis to recompense the railways for any losses they may have as a result of rationalization or as a result of other things which the bill covers. I submit that a realistic view of this bill will show not that the railways will receive more money as a result of the alleged increase in competition, but that they no doubt will make a killing out of the three areas I have suggested—abandonment, rationalization and the federal treasury.

I do not at all agree that it is a good thing for Canada to have a transportation policy which reduces the extent of regulation of the rates, tariffs and operations of the carriers. I do not at all agree that it is possible in a modern economy and in a modern society to permit transportation operations to be carried on more by the laws of the jungle rather than less. This, however, is what the minister wants to do, and in doing it he takes the greatest possible care, in every part of the bill, to make certain that as a result of his law the carriers will not suffer. In situations where they suffer losses as a result of carrying grain or other products because public policy demands it, or in situations where they refrain from abandonment because the commission might think it is not in the public interest, the federal treasury may be dipped into. I do not say it will be in all cases. This is a matter of argument. It will be a matter of judgment and discretion; but in every case where the result of the bill may be a loss to the railways, the minister has provided compensation for them.

The bill, however, contains not a word about compensation for the workers who may be adversely affected by rationalization or abandonment. It contains not a word about compensation to the communities which may be literally obliterated by the railways as a result of rationalization or abandonment of lines. It provides not a word about compensation for the shippers, and particularly the farmers who undoubtedly will suffer a very considerable loss in many cases as a result either of abandonment or rationalization. It seems to me that this is as one sided a piece of legislation as could be conceived in the ambit of transportation. It is almost deserving of the term class legislation. At every stage of the bill and on two separate occasions the minister sought to make sure that the companies will not only be compensated in some areas which possibly could be understood, but also, if it could be shown that they have suffered losses through the statutory rates as a result of the application of public policy, inquiries will be held.

While the amendment which the minister finally did get accepted by the Chair and by the committee of the whole house did not give the minister precise permission to establish an inquiry and did not give the railways the precise opportunity to request such an inquiry, nevertheless it did adopt, as the minister said, a suggestion of mine that the commission already had that power under clause 15. Obviously it is the intention of the minister to have an inquiry into the Crowsnest pass rates to find out whether the railways are suffering losses as a result of them and to have a recommendation from the commission which would cause the governor in council to consider compensation. That is what the amendment which is now in the bill clearly implies, even though it implies it in a roundabout way by saying that the compensation will not be paid if the railways have increased certain rates. This exception underlines the intent that where the exception does not exist they will be paid compensation. So at every stage in the bill they have made provision for this.

The minister was accused by some hon. members of having made an agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway that these things would be in the bill. The minister denied this and, of course, I accept his word without hesitation or reservation. But, none the less, I have no doubt that the minister has bought lock, stock and barrel the argument of the Canadian Pacific Railway with regard to the right policies. I accept his word that he has not made any agreement with them, but he has accepted their philosophy; he has accepted their theory of the right kind of transportation policy.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. gentleman would allow me to say that I did accept the views of a most distinguished Canadian who recently died—one of the most respected residents of western Canada—and his fellow commissioners. I refer to Mr. M. A. MacPherson. I do not think Mr. M. A. MacPherson had his ideas injected into him by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company any more than I have had.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, the late Mr. M. A. MacPherson was not a member of parliament and obviously is unable to say whether he should take responsibility for the minister's bill. I respectfully suggest to the minister that he cannot escape his responsibility by what he has just said. I repeat that by the terms of his bill it is obvious that the minister has accepted the philosophy of the C.P.R. concerning what the transportation policy should be.

Over the years when I have served on conciliation boards and in arbitration proceedings I have heard spokesmen for the C.P.R. state all the philosophies embodied in this bill. They have said "We have always been under strict regulation to which the bus, ship and air line companies are not subject. Give us more competition with them and we will do something for you." They always say "We lose hundreds of millions of dollars over the years because of the uneconomic passenger service we must provide under public policy. Do something about that; let us rationalize and abandon branch lines and we will then be healthy."

This has been what officials of the poor, poverty stricken, penniless C.P.R. have told us. They have always claimed that the C.P.R. loses hundreds of millions of dollars as a result of the Crowsnest pass rates, and have always said to us serving on various boards that this is why they cannot pay their workers decent wages. They have said they would be glad to do so because they are as interested in their welfare as we are. They say "We weep for the fact that the railway workers have lost their position in the labour force in Canada", and they say they are as deeply concerned and weep as copiously about this as anyone else.

Having said all that, the officials then ask us to give them back the hundreds of millions of dollars they have lost because of the Crowsnest pass rates and because of the uneconomical passenger service and they will do justice to their employees. I have heard these officials say this since 1952 when I first had something to do with these conciliation boards.

The minister has embodied provisions in this bill in respect of every one of their claims, without exception. He has made certain that when this poverty stricken C.P.R. suffers a loss as a result of public policy, or can show such a loss by using the kind of cost accounting it indulges in, the people of Canada will compensate it from the federal treasury. I have never been able to accept that position, and I have said in reports to which I have been a party, and in some which I wrote and signed in person, that I could not accept the proposition that the C.P.R. is separate as to its rail operations from the rest of its activities.

As a citizen of Canada and as a member of this parliament I cannot accept the idea that there is something sacred in respect of the total empire of the C.P.R. with which rail operations must not be associated. As has been said time and time again, the C.P.R. came into existence historically as a result of tremendous financial and land grants from the people of Canada. Those grants enabled the C.P.R. to become established, and it was the revenues from rail operations and those grants that enabled the C.P.R. to acquire an air line, a huge mining and smelting company, oil operations and a tremendous amount of industrial and financial activity which now makes the C.P.R. one of the largest and richest corporations in this country.

An hon. Member: What a shame.

Mr. Lewis: I think it is a shame to exploit the Canadian people for that purpose. I am only concerned at this point, however, with the false proposition that it is fair, reasonable and just to compensate the C.P.R. for its losses in rail operations without taking into account any of its profits from the rest of its operations because that is taboo. When one deals with labour relations and employees of the C.P.R. he is limited to a consideration of the revenues and costs relating only to its rail operations. One must not look at the economy of the company as a whole but must only look at its rail operations.

Mr. Douglas: That also applies to the setting of rates.

Mr. Lewis: Yes; as my leader says, when the C.P.R. asks the Board of Transport Commissioners to increase its rates that board is limited to a consideration of their cost accounting and their figures in relation to rail operations, and must not consider or take into account other revenue. I don't agree with this.

At one point during the debate in committee of the whole house—and he will correct me if I am wrong or misrepresenting him—the minister said the government had made a definite decision not to include in this bill anything in respect of the labour relations of the railway companies. I am sure I remember that correctly. The minister admits that he made a definite decision to compensate the railway companies for their losses but to do nothing about the losses which the employees of the railways companies will suffer as a result of the implementation of this bill, and nothing about the losses to the communities and farmers which will result from its implementation.

I hope for the sake of Canada that the minister will be proved right in his feeling that there will be added competition which will benefit the society and economy of Canada, and that I am wrong in my conviction, on the basis of my understanding of Canada's transportation system, that this attempt to reintroduce the law of the jungle in the transportation world, to reduce the amount of regulation and to encourage the railways to dip further into the treasury, will not serve the transportation economy of this country well.

It is my feeling that all this will present us in years to come with precisely the same claims, complaints, difficulties and injustices that this parliament has heard about transportation policy for many decades. It is my view that there have been serious oversights in the minister's consideration of this problem. Perhaps when I say "oversights" I am being too kind. The minister has drafted a bill on principles which are outdated. He has been far too lenient and soft so far as the railway companies in Canada are concerned, particularly the C.P.R. On the other hand, the minister has been far too cavalier about the real problems facing the communities, the workers of the railway companies, and the farmers in Canada who will be adversely affected by the provisions of this bill.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to speak at any length, but I do want to say a few words at this stage. We have been considering this bill of great magnitude, and we all know about the years of work and effort of royal commissions, committee members, various ministers and government officials which was undertaken to produce this bill. It is one of the most important and copious bills ever to be dealt with or considered by this house, but I do not believe for one moment that it will cure all the ills of the transportation systems in Canada.

Problems in relation to transportation are going to stay with us for the next hundred years, just as they have been with us for the past hundred years. People will continue to refer to one place in this house as the railway committee room, or perhaps that name will be changed to the transportation committee room. That is a clear indication of the tremendous interest of the parliament and people of Canada in this subject.

This is an attempt to solve some of the problems, but I expect that year after year problems of transportation will be raised in this chamber. I expect there will be amendments to this bill year after year, that there will be further committee study and that people will be wrestling with this problem, no matter how young they may be or how many new ideas they may have with regard to how things should be run in Canada. This is a problem that has confronted us for a hundred years, and it will continue. Whether the minister and the government have made an advance on the present situation only time will tell. I am not convinced that the solution presented to us in the bill is necessarily the best one. It will now have to be given a trial, because the house has reached the point where it is approving the bill.

I do not like the idea of the large commission and the czar who will preside over it. I do not know who that will be, but I just do not like the general idea. I think ministerial responsibility has been decreased by this creation; parliamentary control has been diminished. It has been bad enough in the past asking questions of the Minister of Transport, who says "Well, I will convey your question to the management of the C.N.R. and see what sort of answer I get." We will now be even further removed from control over transportation. So I am not very impressed and am not too hopeful that anything spectacular has been achieved. I recognize that freight rates will rise. I think it is safe to predict that the people in the Atlantic provinces and the western provinces of Canada will be paying more for transportation services. I think there is an element of inflation involved here.

As a resident of western Canada I cannot really rejoice in what has been done. I think there will be a continuation in the future of subsidization by the government. That is the history of transportation in this country. I doubt very much that the subsidization factor has been removed. It is faint praise that I have for the bill. It is faint praise that I have for the government for the way it organized the business of the house in regard to this bill. The minister was eager and anxious to get it completed last fall. He introduced it at the time of the special session when we were called back here to discuss an entirely different matter. He urged us repeatedy in the day and a half just before Christmas to pass the bill and get it out of the way. Of course all that was just nonsense.

The only sympathy I have for the Minister of Transport is in respect of the excessive ill usage to which he was subjected by his colleagues in the government in compelling him to wait all last fall before bringing this important measure before us. He had to give way to the Minister of National Health and Welfare who had a bill that will not become effective until 1968. That is the only sympathy I have for the minister. I thought it was ridiculous of him just before Christmas—I have referred to Hansard to see what he said at that time—to suggest to us that by sitting all night or another day before Chrismas we might pass the bill and then we might get certain advantages. He is gradually learning by experience. I think he has learned the lesson that a bill of this magnitude requires careful study by the house. That careful study has been given.

One thing in which the opposition may take some pride is the fact that we prevented the minister and the government from instituting an investigation of the Crowsnest pass rates and leaving the impression abroad that there is something wrong with those rates. The two methods which the minister devised were rejected by this house, one the mandatory instruction to the commission to investigate the rates and the other the indirect permission to the railways to make application to the commission, when it would become mandatory for the commission to investigate them. That was thrown out by the combined efforts of the opposition in this chamber.

I do not doubt for one minute that the government may institute an inquiry into those rates if they are foolish enough to do it. But it has to be by way of governmental responsibility, and that is just where I want the responsibility placed. Let the Liberal government institute that inquiry, and the people of western Canada will know what answer to give them. The opposition performed a valuable service to western Canada by the action it took.

No bill in my experience has pursued a more tortuous route than this one. It was introduced and then withdrawn. It was reintroduced in September and referred to a committee. It was amended 60 or 70 times in that committee. I have the greatest sympathy for the legal draftsmen who prepare bills for this house. I understand something of the nature of that difficult work. They must have been driven frantic by the instructions received from this minister. A bill that has to be amended to that extent at the committee stage must have been very badly conceived in the beginning.

Not content with that amendment in the committee, we had amendment after amendment in committee of the whole house. No bill has suffered more amendment in the course of its progress through the house than this one. No bill has had more words expressed about it by the minister piloting it through the house than this one. If there is a page in Hansard dealing with this bill on which the minister did not make himself heard, it is an exception. This will stand as a record for all time, and I hope as a guide to other ministers to take a different course of action. But this minister is verbose, has to be very active and likes to wear himself out in the process. Of course we assisted him in so doing.

He may now rest on his laurels, but I do not want him to be carried away and think he has accomplished something that is simply wonderful, because I think it is a very bad example of how to put legislation through the House of Commons and I hope nobody else will imitate it.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Churchill: Yes.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Does the hon. member not think we will be lonely for the minister when he goes to the other place?

Mr. Churchill: Some people will be lonely for him; but he rather accepted my idea this morning to make a point of taking me with him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman is making that proposition more seductive every second.

Mr. Churchill: I should like to be with the minister if he continues in parliamentary life. This bill will be referred to the other chamber, and I expect they will suggest amendments that will have to be introduced. So the bill will be coming back here in order that we may incorporate the amendments that will be proposed by the other chamber. This is the nature of the bill. In any case, I think the minister has a number of left-over amendments that he did not have time to propose in committee of the whole house. He will now transfer them to his colleagues in the other chamber and they will come back by that indirect route. Yesterday afternoon the minister was searching for a particular amendment that he was going to put forward. He seemed to have a whole sheaf of amendments that had not been dealt with. So I think we will see the bill back in this chamber.

I should like to make one correction. When I spoke earlier on the bill and was talking about the Crowsnest pass rates I stated that I thought after the period 1919 to 1922, when those rates were suspended for a time, they were reintroduced by action of the Senate. This may have been an erroneous recollection of an article which I read in the Winnipeg Free Press. I cannot imagine the Winnipeg Free Press being wrong, so it must be my faulty recollection of the occurrence. If somebody in the other chamber when dealing with this bill will give the history of the Crowsnest rates, then if I have made a mistake it will be corrected and 20 years from now when these rates are discussed again everybody will be on the right track.

I simply want to conclude by saying that the activities of the House of Commons in this chamber and in the committee which considered this bill are a clear indication of the way in which this house operates, and I do not think that any fault can be found with parliament with respect to this bill. There are those who argue that everything should be done in two or three days, but when we are dealing with a bill of this nature and size, one which will affect virtually everyone in Canada and deals with the transportation system, which is vital to our existence, we are fully justified in taking the time that we have on this bill, with the sole exception of some of the repetitious remarks made by the minister.

Yesterday the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Horner) had some strong words to say with regard to the news media of this country. I think those remarks were justified and I say this for the following reason. About two and a half years ago the members of the press gallery conducted an informal poll and asked their members to answer the following question: "Which member of the House of Commons could be most easily spared?" I was the winner of that poll although I thought it would have been won by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire). However, I won it easily. Last fall it appeared to me that the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Nugent) was creeping up to take over my position, and yesterday when I heard the hon. member for Acadia I was a little alarmed because I thought that here was another member trying to squeeze me out of my position. In this period when the leadership in many fields is in question I want to make sure that my leadership in that particular poll is sustained. Therefore I agree with what the hon. member for Acadia said for the benefit of my friends in the press gallery and I think they might very well read his words.

I would not use some of the expressions that he used but he was trying to draw to their attention and that of other people in this country that parliament as an institution performs a function which is essential to Canada, and although it may seem to the outside observer that the work we do is rather slow and ponderous the fact is that it is essential and that it is carried out with the freedom of speech which is so desirable. I am prepared to grant that now and again some time is wasted. But the essential work of the country is being done here through the means of the freedom of speech which prevails in this chamber. Nothing can be concealed that we can stir up and discover. Statements that are distorted can be corrected. Unfortunately this is not the situation with regard to some other things in our society. We have been performing here faithful, honest and hard work, and although this session has lasted now for 195 days I challenge anyone to say and be believed that we have been spending our time wrangling and indulging in ineffective debate. The minister and I can exchange a few humorous remarks without becoming bad friends. He has my respect.

I do not like all the things that the minister does, but we have been doing honest and hard work which should be recognized in this country. As the hon. member for Acadia said yesterday, the news media failed to give their attention to what has been going on in this chamber during the last two weeks with regard to a major change in the method of dealing with transportation, a change which will vitally affect everyone in this country. So far as the news media are concerned, we have seen and heard nothing but skimpy reports of this debate.

With those remarks I uphold parliament as an institution and I strive to maintain my position in the informal Gallup poll that may be taken in the future in the press gallery.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) for having complied so graciously with the request we made yesterday and for having tabled today the correspondence exchanged between the Quebec government and the federal government on transport problems, and more specifically the implications of Bill No. C-231.

On consulting the various letters exchanged, we note that certain passages are most revealing. For instance, in the first letter sent to all the premiers, dated August 4, 1966, the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Pearson) said, as shown on page 2 of his letter:

—it would be desirable for discussions to be held between officials of the federal and provincial governments in an exploratory fashion.

In the previous paragraphs of his letter, the Prime Minister referred to highway safety problems, and to the possibility of standardizing highway and interprovincial regulations.

• (1.10 p.m.)

May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that the date on this letter which the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) drafted and sent to the provincial premiers was August 4, 1966. In his letter, he of course expresses the hope that federal and provincial government officials hold discussions with respect to these problems. Now, when we look at the time the federal government chose to introduce its resolution in this regard, we find that it was during the month of August, and the bill itself was introduced on August 29. What immediately comes to mind is the fact that, while the right hon. Prime Minister proposes that discussions be held with respect to the problems arising from any piece of legislation, at the same time, without waiting for these discussions to be held, he puts a resolution before the house, and introduces the bill itself on August 29.

An answer from the Quebec premier, Hon. Daniel Johnson, dated October 13, raises important considerations and I quote:

I shall not try to hide from you that, whatever may be the promises of future consultation, the government of Quebec looks most unfavourably upon the fact that the federal government wishes to acquire the right to exempt an undertaking from the jurisdiction of the provincial boards so as to place it under the authority of the future Canadian Transport Commission. Already, in 1954, Quebec had objected to the discretionary powers the federal government reserved itself under section 5 of the Motor Vehicle Transport Act; in our opinion, this was holding back with one hand what one was giving with the other. It seems now that our opinion was well founded. Indeed, the whole arrangement of 1954 is presently being questioned again.

And, Hon. Daniel Johnson, in his letter of October 13, continues with these words:

In fact, I was very surprised by the haste in which this measure concerning motor vehicle transport was submitted to parliament. Your letter dated August 4th, 1966 emphasizes the necessity of holding federal-provincial discussions so as to determine how we can best settle the problems that face us in this field. I wonder how such discussions could possibly be useful now that the federal government has already decided beforehand what would be their conclusions. If your government sincerely favours provincial consultation, it should necessarily proceed to such consultation before making its decisions, not after. The presentation of such a measure as the one provided for in Part III of Bill C-231 might eventually be the result of our discussions but it could certainly never be the preliminaries to them. For this is putting the cart before the horse.

Therefore, the government of Quebec asks you, as a token of good faith, to strike out of Bill C-231 Part III dealing with extra-provincial motor vehicle transport so that the discussions you proposed in your letter of August 4th, 1966, may take place in normal conditions. For, in such a critical field as this, it is only by holding discussions in the best of circumstances that one may hope to reach solutions satisfactory to the legitimate interests of every government and the common good of all citizens.

Mr. Speaker, from the letter of October 13, we see that the Quebec premier rightly accuses the government of the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada of putting the cart before the horse, by inviting on August 4 the provincial representatives to meet the federal officials in order to discuss and set up jointly standards for the field of transport. Then, before the provinces had had time to answer, the federal government, putting the cart before the horse, moved the resolution in the house and the bill, nicely cooked up, completely ready, was introduced on August 29.

We note, in his letter of October 13, the Quebec premier's well-advised comments on this way of going about it. On October 20, 1966, the right hon. Prime Minister replied to the October 13 letter of Hon. Daniel Johnson.

Among other things, he said this:

It was in accordance with this exclusive federal jurisdiction that the federal parliament took action to confer upon provincial agencies the authority to act as agents of the federal government in regard to movements of this sort—

In this paragraph, as well as in the previous paragraphs, Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Prime Minister refers to the federal legislation which had been introducted and passed in 1954 and which left with the provincial agencies, the authority to legislate and to regulate in the field of motor vehicle transport.

And, in another letter that the Quebec premier wrote to the right hon. Prime Minister, on November 15, 1966, the following considerations are removed, and to do that, Hon. Daniel Johnson says this:

—expressed very serious doubts regarding the use of such meetings, if the latter take place, after the federal government's decisions have all been made irreversibly. It would seem, judging by your answer, that such is the case.

Indeed, after reading your letter of October 20 concerning Part III of Bill C-231 regarding the national transport policy, I understand that your government does not intend to comply with the request I made in my letter dated October 13, 1966, asking you to delete, as a token of good faith, this part of the bill.

Under the circumstances, I do not see to what purpose officials of our two governments could meet to discuss cooperation. Your government seems determined to follow the policy it has established in this field as in others, regardless of the provinces' views. What good could there be in holding repeated meetings that would lead nowhere?

Those, Mr. Speaker, were the views exchanged between the Quebec government and the federal government. I had a hunch, even before I could read that correspondence, that things had been handled here, in Ottawa, in the usual way.

A few years ago the federal government was wont to refer to the friendly and open relations that should exist between the federal and provincial governments, and that procedure was called co-operative federalism.

Well, with regard to several pieces of legislation, the central government took unilateral action so often that the spokesmen of the Liberal government in Ottawa no longer dare use the expression co-operative federalism, either in this house or at official dinners, because they have never put it into practice. No matter how well that expression sounds, its application proved awkward and inefficient, precisely because of the dishonesty of the federal Liberal government.

It is being asked not to deal unilaterally with many administrative problems in Canada, either on the fiscal, political and administrative levels, or with regard to social security.

Neither the central government nor the ten provincial governments should live as bees, each in its own hive. There should be co-operation between intelligent human beings, between men of good faith. It is apparent once again in the case of this bill that the federal government had made all the decisions, that everything was cooked up—the resolution and the bill—at the very moment the letter was being sent, pro forma, to the provinces, seeking their co-operation, consultations with them and close understanding. Everything had been prepared and cooked up and the bills introduced almost at the same time as the prime minister's letter to the provinces was being written.

Well such is the process that increases tensions in Canada, first between Canadians and between the provincial governments and the central government.

• (1.20 p.m.)

It is the wrong way to do it. I call it autocratic federalism. The central government decides by itself unilaterally puts the provinces before a decision it has taken alone and, after it has got its bearings and is firmly in control, only then does it ask for their co-operation. It is ridiculous, it is even insulting for the provinces, because when dealing with them the central government does not consider the provincial governments as sovereign and independent governments in their field, in a spirit of true federalism, but rather acts like a father who looks condescendingly at his little girls, alone, immature, under age, and takes all the decisions alone, just like parents who decide for their children who are still under age or too young to have judgment and intelligence. The father does not consult children of seven or eight, or four or five; he decides everything and then tells the children what he has decided.

That is what the federal government does and unfortunately that attitude has become widespread in the last few years here in Ottawa. It emphasizes tension and misunderstanding between the provinces and the central government, and particularly between the Quebec government and the central government's relations with the rest of Canada.

When I talk about the Quebec government, I am not referring to any political party, I mean the successive Quebec governments. It was the same thing when a Liberal government was in power in Quebec and right now it is the same with the Union Nationale government.

I submit, sir, that there must be an end to these hypocritical, insulting and injurious practices in the relations between the central government and the provincial authorities.

I do not intend to take up the constitutional aspects of the issue again today; these were dealt with at length on September 6, 1966, as may be seen on pages 8074 and following of Hansard.

This correspondence does not bring out the constitutional aspect so much as it reveals the attitude of the central government in the matter. We understand, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian constitution, supported by certain Privy Council rulings, has granted jurisdiction to the central government in the field of interprovincial, extraprovincial and international transport. The constitution itself and rulings such as the one handed down by the Privy Council in the Winert case in 1954, acknowledge this jurisdiction. It is not so much the costitutional aspects as the way of dealing with the matter, in practice, that comes out in the correspondence between the right hon. Prime Minister and the premier of Quebec.

Now, we know that, in fact, for a hundred years now, the central government has left to the provinces legislation and regulation in the field of motor vehicle transport. Indeed, a federal act passed in 1954 even recognized the practice. This act entitled Motor Vehicle Transport Act confirmed this; sections 3 and 4 sanctioned the agreements whereby the central government left to the provinces legislation and regulation in that field.

Today, through Bill No. C-231, the central government wishes to recover its constitutional authority. That is clear to me. But what a way to go about it, Mr. Speaker. The province of Quebec has legislated, has instituted a system of rules and regulations, and now the federal government wishes to retrieve, with a view of placing them under the Canadian Transport Commission, the modes of transport by air, water, truck and pipeline as well as by motor vehicle.

The central government has a right to have such a philosophy, but its approach to the problem is to be rejected. After letting the provinces, including Quebec, legislate and regulate on the matter for so many years, the federal government, before bringing in such legislation, should have had discussions, and consultations, in the precise spirit of the letter that the right hon. Prime Minister wrote on August 4. Instead of making such meetings possible, of discussing for the very purpose of making this return, this recovery, possible and instead of negotiating certain areas on which the provinces have a right to continue to legislate, such as the issue of licenses, traffic control, in a word, several areas of the trucking field, the central government, by the way it proceeded, had its legislation all concocted at the time they wrote a letter, as a matter of form, to the premiers of the provinces.

Such a procedure is insulting, harmful, and does not contribute anything toward solving the problem uniformly or restoring proper balance in the trucking industry across Canada. Furthermore, the procedure is wrong and protests recently lodged by the Quebec government and the Quebec leader of the opposition are warranted; as a matter of fact, I think they should be repeated here in this house to show the government and the minister that it is not good procedure to put the cart before the horse.

[English]

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Has the hon. gentleman taken into account that the Prime Minister in his correspondence and I in the house have said quite clearly, that the government had no intention whatsoever of transferring the application of this jurisdiction from the provincial agencies acting as agents of the federal government until after the fullest consultation with the provincial governments, that all we are doing here is providing stand-by powers in case certain actions of the courts leave us without any law whatsoever, as we were left without any law whatsoever in 1954? All this was carefully explained.

I wonder whether the hon. gentleman has taken those explanations into account? If he has, does he see any reason for this parliament not exercising its clear and undoubted jurisdiction, which he admitted it had?

• (1:30 p.m.)

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, the minister has just made a point that cannot in any way be reconciled with the argument I was developing. Of course, the minister is repeating the same assurances that were given in the correspondence with the premier of the province of Quebec. Well, all the assurances given by this government are such that they are likely to cause concern to the Quebec government.

And how funny it was yesterday, in this house, to hear the Minister of Transport state, with the zest for which he is famous, that no member in this house was more mindful than he of the respect of the letter and spirit of the Canadian constitution. I found that statement extremely amusing, Mr. Speaker. And it is certainly not the kind of statement which the minister made yesterday and seems willing to repeat today which will dissolve all our fears about the letter and the spirit of the Canadian constitution which the minister and the present government are claiming to respect. As a matter of fact, that commitment is not borne out by the facts in this session or particularly during the last two years the present Liberal government has been in office. Mr. Speaker, the minister has assured us during this session that no other hon. member has more respect than he has for the spirit and the letter of the Canadian constitution, but he is a member of a government which has presented to us bills which are absolutely contrary to the spirit and the letter of the Canadian constitution.

I am referring for instance to medicare, to the increase in old age pensions and the rest. In the field of mining, for instance, on the continental shelf, all sorts of tricks and means are being used, though natural resources clearly and explicitly belong to the provinces to take them away from provincial jurisdiction. In fact, the provinces are being hamstrung by dragging the question before a court which is not empowered to rule on constitutional matters in Canada.

They also have, in the course of the present session, through the establishment of a cultural centre, infringed upon the field of culture and education which is under the jurisdiction of the provinces according to the letter and the spirit of the Canadian constitution.

Here is a government and an hon. minister who have co-operated during this very session in scuttling and despoiling the spirit and the letter of the Canadian constitution. When the hon. minister rises, as he did yesterday and today and, with talent and charm I must say—because he is very charming—gives the hon. members in this house and specially the province of Quebec, the assurance that there are no grounds for anxiety, well then, I say that if we consider some legislation which this government has introduced during this and other sessions, for instance on school allowances, on student loans and also that political program of handing out scholarships to students, this is spoliation of the Canadian constitution, both in letter and in spirit. The assurance given by this government cannot dispel our anxiety in the province of Quebec as far as observance of the constitution.

And as to the provisions of the Canadian constitution that must be observed, in the field of transport, it is not so much the constitutional aspect as the method of the present government in putting the cart before the horses that we are discussing. It is the method that needs to be pointed out and criticized, for it is to be blamed for trying to face the provinces with the fait accompli while, for diplomatic reasons, they had been invited at the same time to meet the provinces to discuss and arrive at decisions knowing full well that all decisions had been arrived at and that the resolution and the bill had already been drafted and cooked up. This way of doing things, I feel, is unacceptable in the field of a well balanced relationship, in good faith and equality, each in his own area, between the central government and the provincial governments.

I understand quite well the stand taken by the Minister of Transport who says that the federal government has jurisdiction under the constitution and judgments of the Privy Council. This is all very well, but before preparing his bill, he should have discussed the withdrawal and extension of the right to legislate of the provinces in certain fields of highway transport. It is just like in civil law, Mr. Speaker. Let us imagine that the minister, probably to play a trick on me, steals my car and puts it in his yard. I have no right then to go on his property with my friends to retrieve my car, because this would be a trespass under criminal law. In short, the car actually belongs to me, since I have the ownership and registration papers, but I cannot go on his property to retrieve it. What I must do, Mr. Speaker, as you know very well, is to send a summons preceding a seizure under a prior claim. The provisions of civil law are based on the honesty and intelligence of man, of the human being, from his adolescence. The basis of the law is the common sense and the sense of justice of human beings. That is how the federal government should proceed.

If it wants to take over the jurisdiction allotted to it by the constitution with regard to interprovincial, extraprovincial and international transport, I am not against it. I respect the constitutional powers of the central government as much as those of the provinces, but I object to this off-hand and insulting procedure. If it had only met with provincial representatives, especially those of the province of Quebec, in order to discuss and prepare this legislation, we would not be faced today with the situation whereby the Quebec government is asking for the removal of Part III of a bill prepared without consultation and discussion. The Quebec government is asking the minister to defer, to remove Part III from this bill, that is, from clause 28 to clause 36, precisely because in certain fields, the Quebec government has enacted regulations and passed pieces of legislation on which persons of good faith ought to agree.

Before taking over, in what I call an offhand manner, that constitutional authority, the minister should have given a formal notice. The funny part of it is that the Prime Minister gave such a notice in his first letter of August 4 to the provinces, asking them to meet in order to discuss all those problems.

But before sending that notice, he had already prepared his resolution and his bill without giving the provinces an opportunity to discuss the matter.

Thus, this is absolutely superficial and did nothing but emphasize the tensions between the Quebec government and the central government, when it would be so easy during this centennial year to show less arrogance, less inclination to act unilaterally to get the Canadians, the governments closer together and to give Canadian federalism a real sense of balance, understanding and respect for one another, in short to act with more tact and intelligence.

I am not sure of it, because the letters do not mention it, but I think that the members of the Quebec legislature, even some Canadians, are worried also about that administrative monster which is being created through this Canadian Transport Commission which will in fact regulate the whole field of transportation in Canada.

Whether in the fields of air, sea and road transportation, it is giving much power to a transportation commission set up by the federal government because it will regulate means of transport including the trucking industry in Canada and in Quebec whereas the C.N.R. which operates a trucking service comes under the same creating body, the central government. The members of that commission will also be appointed by the central government.

This, Mr. Speaker, leads us to wonder if that national commission, that administrative monster, will be able directly or indirectly to administer with true objectivity the field of transportation in Canada.

It would have been important among other things, for the federal government to discuss those matters before presenting a bill already drafted.

Those are the various points I wanted to submit once again to the minister. I do not know whether I have convinced him. He shakes his head negatively. Obviously, he does not understand easily.

Mr. Speaker, I felt I had to report on these provisions contained in the correspondence between the Quebec government and the federal government, and even if the hon. minister cannot understand, even if he refuses to change his attitude, I think the time will come very soon when circumstances will force him and some of his colleagues to treat the provinces differently, and particularly the province of Quebec.

Of course, I do not know whether the minister often has the opportunity to go to the province of Quebec and to stay there longer than five or six hours, which is the length of time a banquet lasts. However, if we have a summer recess—although we are beginning to despair—I advise him to spend a week in several places in the province of Quebec and to talk with people of different ages belonging to different classes of society. He would then find it much easier—and this goes for several members here—to understand the Quebec point of view and the respect of the spirit and letter of the Canadian constitution, because in fact the constitution is the tie that binds us to the rest of Canada. Past infringements upon the constitution and the constant spoliations which took place during the present session were not calculated to bind Quebec to the rest of the country.

On the contrary, such spoliations can only widen the gap between the province of Quebec and the rest of Canada. That is why I would very much appreciate it if the minister would change his attitude toward my remarks. I understand that we could get together and discuss the main issues; however, there were no such discussions between the federal government and the province of Quebec on matters covered by this bill. I would want him to realize that, in this as in many other fields, the province of Quebec is not trying to put grit in the bearings, on the contrary, it wants to create a new climate and work in a spirit of good will, understanding, comprehension, on a equal footing, each in its own sphere of jurisdiction.

Mr. Speaker, that is why, in closing, I would ask the minister to voluntarily remove Part III of this bill, discard or postpone it until he has met with the Quebec representative.

After such a discussion or dialogue, the whole of Part III could probably be approved, with some minor changes being made through amendments which he would perhaps gladly introduce himself.

If the minister would agree to do so, that is accede to the request of the Quebec government to postpone Part III of the bill, it could perhaps afford the unique occasion, in this Canadian Centennial year, to see finally each side abandon its rigid attitude and, in good faith, in a friendly and brotherly way, enter into an open, honest and fraternal dialogue, precisely to create a climate of good will and good faith in a field as important as transportation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): The hon. member for Matapédia-Matane.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, perhaps it would be agreeable to the house that we break now until 2.30 and resume the debate at that time.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): We agree, but I hope that the minister's colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen), who has become quite an expert on parliamentary procedure outside the house, will not misunderstand this luncheon adjournment and say we are weakening and not doing our job, as he said in Halifax about our recess.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am weakening anyway.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Is it agreed that we suspend our sitting until 2.30?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Consequently I do now leave the chair.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order, please. The hon. Solicitor General.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, I understand there has been the usual discussion about dispensing with the private members' hour today. In order that hon. members may govern themselves accordingly, I wonder whether it would meet the wish of the house that I ask for unanimous consent to dispense with the private members' hour?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. René Tremblay (Matapédia-Matane): Mr. Speaker, it will indeed be an easy task for me to join my congratulations to those which have already been offered to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) regarding the mastery with which he conducted this debate for the passage of Bill No. C-231, which represents one of the most complex and most useful pieces of legislation which parliament has had to study over a long period of time.

These compliments paid to the minister were not accompanied in certain quarters by the praise which he deserved in his case—having conducted the debate in a masterly fashion—especially as he introduced a bill which represents a worthwhile endeavour for the solution of a problem which Canada has been facing for a very long time, that of competition between the various means of transportation.

In this bill, the minister has to take into account certain definite objectives: First of all, to ensure to the Canadian people, as efficiently as possible, the best transport services.

Second, he had to consider financial problems involved specially in the field of railway transportation and, lastly, he had to take into consideration the legitimate interests of each part of the country.

How to reconcile, in the same piece of legislation, objectives that seemed to be clashing between the efficient services to be given to the people and the financial problems that were very real for the Canadian tax payers and, how to maintain the balance between the advantages that would result from the different methods of transportation available in each part of the country.

In order to reach this three-fold objective, the bill that was before us has set up three basic principles: the first is related to co-ordination. In order to reach this aim we had to agree that it was essential that each method of transportation in the country should not be considered in an isolated manner, but, compared with the others that can possibly be used. Hence, creation of a commission whose duty will be to coordinate the various sectors of transportation in the country, based on the three principles I just mentioned

The second method, established in this legislation, concerns competition. To provide for a greater efficiency of services and dispense the public sector from the great financial expenses it always assumed for the means of transportation, it was essential, within certain statutory frameworks to maintain competition between the various methods of transportation.

Third, a method of financial stability had to be established for each means of transportation.

Hence, three general goals, and this gave us Bill No. C-231 which, as has been said, is not a perfect bill, for it does not meet perfectly any of the three objectives I mentioned, but which as in many other fields in the country, constitutes the most realistic compromise which could be established in the circumstances, taking into consideration the three objectives I mentioned, the best public service for the taxpayers who do not pay indefinitely unlimited expenses, and finally for the areas which, economically differ from one another, but could maintain themselves in a certain balance by compensatory transport rates.

We then have before us a bill which, in my opinion, will provide a great improvement in the means of transportation compared to what we have had until now. I think that the hon. minister is to be commended for the ability he has shown in piloting this bill. We should also congratulate him for the type of legislation he introduced in this house and, especially, for the new methods that will now be used in the field of transport.

But, Mr. Speaker, if I rise up now to take part in the debate on third reading, it is not to come back to the substance of this bill since many speeches have been made in committee and in this house; the members and public opinion are well informed about this transportation bill.

I would like especially to deal with a very important point raised several times during the debate and which was again brought to light by the publication this morning of the correspondence between the federal government and the Quebec government, concerning the responsibilities of each government concerning motor vehicle transportation. The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) took part personally in the debate expressing his views on this problem of "federal and provincial jurisdictions".

My remarks will bear on two main points. The first, namely, the constitutionality of the government action in introducing this bill, and Part III which deals with interprovincial motor vehicle transportation. The second, the procedure followed by the government with regard to this bill.

Both the Quebec premier and the member for Sherbrooke have expressed doubts about the constitutionality of Bill C-231 in respect of interprovincial transport, and about the procedure followed by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and the hon. Minister of Transport in presenting the bill to the house and about the discussions proposed to the Quebec government.

First, the problem of the constitutionality of Bill No. C-231. The right hon. Prime Minister, in his second letter to the premier of the province of Quebec, namely that of October 20, 1966, which was tabled today in this house, reminds the latter of the position taken by the government as regards the constitutional problem. In the second paragraph he says:

> The provisions which are contained in Part III of the bill and which would make it possible for a federal government agency to engage in regulatory activity in the field of interprovincial commercial road transport, are fully in accordance with the exclusive constitutional jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada. This has been established by court decision beyond all doubt, when it was ruled that a commercial motor carrier movement between provinces constituted an undertaking "connecting the province—

These words are quoted since they are taken from the 1954 judgment of the Privy Council.

> —"connecting the province with another and extending beyond the limits of the province and therefore comes within the provisions of section 92(10)(a) and is solely within the jurisdiction of the Dominion".

Further on the Prime Minister pointed out that if agreements had been signed between the federal government and the provinces, so that they could establish regulations within their own territory as to motor vehicles coming under their "jurisdiction", those provinces had done so only under powers delegated by the central government to the provinces, but this could never have meant relinquishing under the constitution itself the rights belonging to the federal government as regards the control of highway transport between provinces or between this country and other countries.

What was pointed out in the first letter addressed by the Prime Minister of Canada to the premiers of the provinces, on August 4, 1966, was the advisability of discussions, not in order to establish the federal government's constitutional rights to legislate in the matter, since those rights were already very clearly established in the constitution and had been reaffirmed by a judgment of the Privy Council, but so as to allow, at the official level, a discussion on the application of federal regulations that might arise out of the legislation contemplated at that time.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the federal government did not want to discuss with the provincial premiers its constitutional right to introduce a bill before the house to regulate motor vehicles crossing provincial boundaries, but to establish a working agreement at the departmental level, for the efficient enforcement of federal and provincial regulations in the respective field of jurisdiction of each authority, as referred to by the Prime Minister in his letter, dated August 4. The object of the letter was to provide harmonious application of regulations which would be determined by the federal government on the one hand, and by provincial authorities on the other.

It therefore was not a question of holding discussions with provincial authorities, as the premier of the province of Quebec seemed to imply. Provincial authorities were not going to be asked to grant the federal government permission to insert Part III in its bill, which clearly establishes or reasserts rather, the constitutional rights of the federal government with respect to interprovincial highway transportation. It is unfortunate that the letter dated November 15, 1966, sent by the premier of Quebec to the Prime Minister of Canada reveals the Quebec government leader's complete ignorance of the problem referred to in the Canadian government leader's previous two letters. On November 15, 1966, the premier of the province of Quebec wrote the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada, and I quote:

Under the circumstances, I do not see to what purpose officials of our two governments could meet to discuss co-operation. Your government seems determined to follow the policy it has established in this field as in others, regardless of the provinces' views. What good could there be in holding repeated meetings that would lead nowhere?

This letter dated November 15, 1966, written by the Quebec premier, lays down conditions which, in my opinion, no decent Canadian government can possibly accept; neither are they acceptable to the House of Commons, which is made up of representatives from all parts of the country, appointed to legislate in fields which under the constitution come within federal jurisdiction.

At no time, Mr. Speaker, did we in the Liberal party show any reluctance, and I was happy, then, to be associated with that party as a member of the government. At no time would we have refused any province whatsoever the right to exercise its rights in the fields which the constitution placed under its jurisdiction.

The same is true with regard to joint programs, where we made our biggest effort towards decentralization. Why? We did that because we recognized that the province had a very clear jurisdiction over those matters. We had initiated legislation, we had administered those fields for several years. If a province made known its desire to exercise its own jurisdiction over that field from then on, we were quite pleased to agree to withdraw from such field and to grant fiscal compensation in exchange.

But to those who could understand, at the time, that the recognition in fact of the Canadian constitution, in fields under provincial jurisdiction, of that basic position, did that mean that, in all fields where we had until then exercised our jurisdiction, under our constitutional rights, if a premier of a province—be it the province of Quebec —wrote to tell us to withdraw, that we would do just that?

Mr. Speaker, the Liberal party, which has been for co-operation in the federal field, is the same Liberal party that will not agree to relinquish the rights conferred upon it by the constitution, at a time where a provincial premier, in a letter, expresses doubts about the constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tremblay: The Privy Council performed the function of a constitutional court for a long time; handing over its responsibility to the Supreme Court provoked a great deal of comments. I know that many people have suggested the creation of a constitutional board so that an independent body, at the level of the provincial and federal governments, would rule on the constitutionality of bills. It is an open question and anybody is entitled to his own opinion.

But, Mr. Speaker, until this new constitutional board is created, it is essential that, at both federal and provincial levels, the authority of the highest constitutional court in the land, that is the Supreme Court, be respected. If any doubts arise in the minds of provincial officials concerning the constitutional right of the federal government to legislate in any field, the only acceptable procedure to follow is to refer the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada.

But until a judgment is rendered, any provincial government can introduce any bill which in its opinion, relates to its constitutional rights, just as, on the other hand, the federal parliament, on the government's initiative, can draw up or prepare any bill which, in its opinion, comes within its rights under the constitution. And the only impartial judge is the present or future board; but it cannot be any political authority, either federal or provincial.

Mr. Speaker undoubtedly the federal government, in this instance, both under the constitution and by virtue of a judgment by the Privy Council, had the authority to legislate on part III of Bill No. C-231. Undoubtedly, problems will be raised following the enforcement of that part and the right hon. Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport recognized that fact by stating positively that that part would not be enforced as long as discussions had not been held with the provinces.

But, it would not have been proper for this government at any time to have discussions with one province in particular to see whether it could go ahead and introduce in this house a bill whose subject matter, undoubtedly in my opinion, comes within its jurisdiction.

Mr. Chairman, it is because this position is quite clear constitutionally, and because of very serious problems of administration and implementation of that policy, that the right hon. Prime Minister on August 4, wrote to the provincial premiers. I come now to the second part, which was questioned by the hon. member for Sherbrooke namely the procedure followed.

The Quebec premier, as the hon. member for Sherbrooke, seemed to indicate in their statements that the right hon. Prime Minister had acted improperly or with a lack of consideration for the Quebec premier in that respect.

In the light of the statement I have just made, it seems quite obvious, now, that the procedure followed was the normal procedure.

In a letter dated October 4, addressed to all the Canadian provincial premiers, the right hon. Prime Minister said that it would be desirable for discussions to be held at the official level with regard to the implementation of certain parts of a transport bill dealing with problems of interprovincial highway traffic. Therefore, it is not the beginning of a constitutional discussion but simply preliminary negotiations which seem essential to the implementation of Bill No. C-231.

We do not know the answers from the other provincial premiers, but the position of the Quebec premier is, from the start, a stand on principle. After reading those letters it seems that the Quebec premier questioned again the constitutional problem itself, or even the propriety for the federal government to legislate and enforce regulations in the field of road transport moving between the provinces, especially with regard to traffic safety.

The sentence I read in the letter dated November 15, 1966, addressed to the Prime Minister of Canada by the premier of Quebec seems very clear in that regard. It seems that the Quebec premier, not having prevented the government from introducing its legislation, including part III, on interprovincial transportation, says: Now that no co-operation is possible, that a meeting of our officials would be useless and that you will proceed unilaterally.

Well, I think this stand taken by the Quebec premier is, in my opinion, unsound on the constitutional level and deplorable from the standpoint of federal-provincial relations. In fact, the present government, after having worked for many years on decentralization in fields where the provinces had an explicit jurisdiction, exerts in a unilateral way, as it is normal—the provinces do the same in their field—its jurisdiction in the field of transportation, and calls upon the co-operation of the provinces for its application.

And now one of those premiers is denying his co-operation, because he has not been asked his advice and because he considers the bill as being an encroachment upon provincial rights.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that the procedure followed by this government was the only one consistant with the responsibility which it must assume on behalf of the Canadian people and all the provinces in a field within its jurisdiction, in order to emphasize the fact that if some co-operation must exist between the provincial and federal governments, that co-operation should never reach the point where it would be understood as being a surrender of the responsibilities entrusted with this parliament and this government under the constitution.

Therefore this procedure was normal and constitutional; second, it was wise, for all the provinces were asked to co-operate before the implementation of this part of Bill C-231.

The attitude taken by the premier of the province of Quebec was most unfortunate. The last letter from the Prime Minister of Canada in this correspondence was dated December 7, 1966. It left another door open, for in it the Prime Minister said that it was unfortunate that the government of the province of Quebec had not agreed to choose officials to whom it would explain the implementation of Part III of Bill C-231, but he hoped nevertheless that the premier of Quebec would change his mind and agree to co-operate.

If I had to make a wish, Mr. Speaker, I would wish that the premier of Quebec, who has just assumed a heavy responsibility and who must govern Quebec alone and during a very difficult period, would see future discussions between his government and the federal government in the light of mutual respect of fields of jurisdiction. This goes for us as much as for him. I would also wish he would remember that what the Canadian people in Quebec and in all the other provinces want is efficiency from every level of government in its own sector. They want constant co-operation between these levels of government because no modern policy can be implemented efficiently in isolated cases and without co-operation between all levels of government. If the premier of the province of Quebec would change his mind on this subject, I think he would serve the interests the population of all the other provinces which I am sure supported the efforts of the present government to promote decentralization in fields under provincial jurisdiction. This includes all the joint plans. In any case, the Canadian people will not allow the present or any other government to abandon its responsibilities in sectors which are vital to a prosperous country.

I hope the premier of Quebec will understand that if he is concerned with the interests of the people he governs, we as representatives of the people of Quebec on the federal level, do not intend to betray the interests of these people nor those of all the other Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the previous speaker, the former postmaster general, on a well informed address. I hope I will not be misunderstood when I say that I detect some similarity between his speech and activities and the methods which brought about the return to the cabinet of the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gordon). In other words, it might be said that he is also preaching for a recall.

I seldom intervene during third reading and I will try not to take advantage of the fact that the minister cannot reply to anything that I say at this stage of the debate.

My remarks are somewhat similar to those of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill). They will not be quite as laudatory as some that have been made. Last night we seemed to form quite a happy mutual admiration society and the minister continued that trend today. It almost sounded to me like a swan song.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will leave that to the hon. gentleman's leader.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I am one of those who predicted in the first instance that the minister might be leaving transport. But I am confused; I cannot figure out where he will be going if he is leaving. The other night when we were talking about the review of transportation in the maritimes the minister forgot himself in the heat of the debate and said that this will be up to another minister of transport. This is on the record.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was looking to the decades ahead.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): If that is so then the minister fell into the trap. In other words, the review of transportation in the maritimes will take place some decades in the future, and that is just the point that I was trying to make. The minister cannot have it both ways. The review was supposed to take place in a year or two whether or not the minister leaves before that time.

Mr. Knowles: He might become chairman of the commission.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): My other comment, which is in a similar vein, is that if there is anything which helped the bill to pass it is the fervent prayer to which the minister kept referring, particularly last night. This may be a lesson which he should pass on to some of his colleagues, for instance, to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp). His prayers seem to have worked.

Mr. Pugh: He is a wolf in sheep's clothing.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I do not know whether the minister is a wolf in sheep's clothing, as has been said by an hon. member over here, but some credit is due in regard to this legislation and I do not think that we as members of parliament should try to take too much credit for carrying out our duties. I believe that we should pay tribute to the civil servants and officials for their perseverance and, as the hon. member for Winnipeg South

Centre said, our parliamentary process can also be praised. Perhaps the minister could take aside his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen), when the latter returns from his wanderings and preaching outside the house about activities here, to tell him that there are some things in the parliamentary process which are working.

With reference to the amendments to the bill which have been mentioned by other speakers let me say that I was amazed at their number. I do not know how many there were but there must have been well over a hundred. It seemed to me that the minister had an amendment for everybody who made a speech and the tougher the speech the bigger the amendment was. Nevertheless, not all of this is bad.

Reference has been made to the reporting of this debate by the news media. I agree with what has been said. I think that the newspapers in the maritimes and western Canada rose to the occasion after their interest was provoked and did their job well but the national newspapers in central Canada, which are now being sold in the extremities of the country and are bragging about their great influence and position in Canadian affairs, should smarten up. They have not devoted much time or space to this important subject and the reason for this can only be that either they are too lazy or too busy to write about this legislation which is so beneficial to central Canada or they are embarrassed even to mention it. I am not enthusiastic about the manner in which they have reported this subject which is of national importance. If mention is made of "bunny girls" in parliament, word is flashed across the country and headlines are made, but if a speech is made about a serious matter, something with which we will have to live for the next 50 years, our friends in the press gallery say that there is no news value in it.

Having said that I will now make quick reference to four points. So far as the 17-man transport commission is concerned, we are in favour of it. As many of our members have said, it is a big board. We are worried about its bureaucratic nature but we hope it will simplify the methods of dealing with our transportation problems.

The minister made a great case of the amendment moved last night by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson), with reference to the minister employing experts to attend commission hearings on his behalf. I do not think this is a very important matter; to me it is of minor significance. I believe that the minister would have done so anyway whether or not it was provided for in the bill. I also think he is trying to imply that the government and the cabinet are removed from the commission. But, Mr. Speaker, there will still be politics involved in the transportation commission. We cannot divorce it from politics and I am not sure that we should. I was one who favoured this watchdog amendment that was brought forward, but one of the worries I had was that it attempted to take politics out of transportation, and you cannot do that. I am not talking only of party politics but also of regional politics. The minister has made speeches about this question and I think he knows what I mean.

We are in favour of this commission, Mr. Speaker, and hope that it will do a good job. We have confidence in the members of the commission. We do not think that they needed all the directions that we gave them, but some of the words we inserted in different clauses will be of help to them and will give them an idea of the way we were thinking.

Second, may I say that I feel that not enough attention was given to the brief which was submitted by the representatives of the province of Manitoba. It was an excellent brief and I hope it will be remembered by those interested in transportation for years to come. It was a massive brief; it was thorough and in my opinion all-Canadian. It dealt with the position of the maritimes, the west, the early days of our history and the obligations which were incurred when promises were made under confederation.

One of the things which impressed me about it and which I looked up again this morning was that the brief pointed out that the old seaway canal system which was constructed early in our history was valued in those days at a sum in the vicinity of $250 million. When the $300 million-odd spent on the St. Lawrence seaway is added this means that over $500 million has been invested in the waterways system of central Canada. This indicates, of course, that transportation is not all one-sided; it does not have to be paid for in that instance too.

The Crow rates have been mentioned and I cannot improve upon what has been said about them. Hon. members have chided the minister in his humiliation and have said they hope he has learned his lesson. I can only say that I have always been aware of the importance of the Crow rates to western Canada.

However, I did not realize their significance until one day an hon. member was speaking in this chamber and referred, I believe, to the religious significance of the Crowsnest pass rates, at which he drew probably the biggest hand of any of the members who took part in the debate. So in view of this spiritual comparison in regard to the Crowsnest pass rates I do not believe that the minister or anybody else had better start thinking about changing them.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suppose what the hon. member is trying to say is that the minister had to eat crow.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I am glad the minister is in a good humour; I think this is because he sees an end to the legislation.

I also think we should recognize that in its brief the Canadian Pacific Railway pointed out very forcibly that there was, if I may use its words, a shortfall of revenue from the Crow rates, and it demanded reimbursement from the government. This was probably the main contention of the brief. It is quite right that we did have a battle on this issue, which has now been resolved.

We tend to make the railways, particularly the C.P.R., whipping boys in legislation of this nature, and I for one do not want to be misunderstood in this regard. I am very proud of the C.P.R. as a private enterprise Canadian institution. I do not agree with the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) who has attacked the C.P.R. and its policies many times. I am not saying that everything it does is right, but when I do say something that appears to be critical of the company in instances such as those we have discussed it is because of the relationship of the C.P.R. to the government and because of my responsibility as a member of parliament in regard to this relationship as it affects certain of their activities, though not all of them.

The big issue put forward by the province of Manitoba—I mentioned it half a dozen times to the minister but never really got any satisfaction—concerned the proposed section 336 and the lack of any limit on the rates, particularly those applicable to bulk commodities. The representatives of the government of Manitoba pointed out that in their opinion there would not be any economies from heavier loading of bulk commodities. They further pointed out that the relationship of the contribution of such loads to the total variable cost was out of line with the surveys they had taken, with waybill analysis, and the like.

I mentioned that in its many briefs to the committee, particularly with respect to passenger service, the C.P.R. referred a great deal to its responsibility as a private enterprise development company in Canada and to how it must not misuse our resources. The brief pointed out that it should not be compelled to continue to provide passenger service when it was uneconomical and unreasonable to do so. I say that this is right and I agree with the C.P.R. on this as a general proposition. At the same time, Mr. Speaker, I throw back to them the point that, in the case of large bulk commodity shipments there might be such misallocation or misuse of resources. I would also point out that in the province of Saskatchewan rates on potash and the like might go sky high. The industry might be able to survive for a while, but there would not be any declaration as a captive shipper and the money required to meet other competition later would have to be derived from the economy of the west, from labour reassessment, and the like. I think that is an important point and it was one of the main contentions put forward by the province of Manitoba.

My third point, as you may have guessed, Mr. Speaker, concerns the maritimes and what we have been able to accomplish for that region of Canada. Let me tell the minister I am not happy with the treatment given to the maritimes by this legislation. I think there has been a whittling away of our position, such as it is. We are anxiously waiting for the completion of the transportation survey, to which I alluded at the beginning of my remarks, and we hope and pray that something good will come out of it. In the meantime we have been forced to fight a tough rearguard action to hold on to what little protection we do have in this legislation.

It will only take me a moment or two to try to summarize the other matters which were dealt with. The minister, and I give him credit, after three amendments had been moved followed through on the matter of flour and I think we do at least have the same protection on flour shipments from eastern Canadian ports that we formerly had. In clause 59, which was amended during the latter stages of consideration of the bill, there is the phrase "to route traffic through Canadian seaports". This could be of some benefit to us.

Clauses 1 and 16 were also amended and contain the phrase "undue obstacle to the movement of commodities through Canadian ports". These were the two substantial amendments that we feel, if interpreted generously and wisely, will give the ports the protection they already have but no more. Let us be clear about that. We are not getting anything more; we are simply holding our own. The compensatory rule in section 334 still causes apprehension. The minister, in a statement which I will not repeat, excluded the compensatory rule from the changes within the present law. That sort of thing may be all right.

Referring again to clause 1, I brought up the original proposal by the Maritimes Transportation Commission which has the effect of preserving any sort of statutory protection or rate now in existence. Unless I have misunderstood, it means that any future minister or government seeking to change the legislation cannot do away with the Maritime Freight Rates Act unless parliament agrees. In other words, there is a binding precedent that the change ought not to be made unless everybody agrees to it. In this respect the situation is not too bad. I have misplaced a quotation and will not subject the house to it. It is to the effect that the maritime provinces do not think this bill good or bad but that we are apprehensive about it.

The fourth point has to do with the position that we take as a party. I have said that we approve of the super board, though we fear it. The watchdog committee was turned down. It may be that the right men in the right places will make the board work. Perhaps our transportation problems can be considered in their entirety by this board. However, the whole legislation is an invitation to raise freight rates in the east and west. Like it or not, we are at the mercy of the railway companies. I refer to the year-end report of Mr. Donald Gordon, now engaged in another type of activity, in which he said:

> While the legislation is not likely to provide any immediate financial benefits to the railways, it will when enacted remove outmoded restrictions and regulations which have hampered them in the past and place upon them the responsibility of paying their way in a highly competitive situation.

The situation is wide open, unless I interpret that statement wrongly. Yet I remember Mr. Gordon saying in Moncton and Saint John, "Do not worry about freight rates." As surely as I stand here, within a few months freight rates will go up. This will create further pressure on our financial system and will be highly inflationary. The $100 million will have to come from somewhere. I am pleased to see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) sitting in the house. Perhaps he can discuss the matter with the Minister without Portfolio from Toronto. As I say, these increases will impose extra burdens on our highly inflated economy.

No matter what anybody says, we have tight money in the maritimes. Higher freight rates will hit us hard. What will happen to us I do not know. I suppose the only thing to do is what the minister did last night, pray and hope that the new legislation, this pig in a poke, sight unseen—

Mr. Pickersgill: On a question of privilege, for the hon. member to suggest after all these days that this legislation is sight unseen is to misrepresent all that has happened, including the participation of the hon. gentleman himself and the good work we have done here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, the sight unseen reference has to do with the report relating to the maritime provinces which we are awaiting. In closing my remarks let me say that we have been asked to pass legislation that actually does not affect us except that there will be a deterioration of the maritimes' position because of this bill. But we are asked to go along with it as good Canadians, as we were asked to go along with the seaway and many other things. The inference is that, if we are good boys, in two or three years the government will get around to acting on the new transportation report and we may get something then.

As one maritimer to another—I should say, as one maritimer to a pseudo-maritimer—I can tell the minister that this bill is not going over very well in the maritimes. That is why I cannot support the legislation. The government has to live with it but I for one will be able to say, "I told you so."

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a few brief remarks at the conclusion of this constructive and cooperative debate. I rise particularly to correct the remarks of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Kindt) last evening affecting the application of the principle of the bill. I am pleased that the hon. gentleman is in the house; I was astounded by what he said because he is a doctor of economics.

Other members of other parties have expressed misgivings about certain aspects of the bill. I think there is no question that as the result of experience over a period of time there will be considerable amendments to the policy enunciated in this bill. I am sure also that all shippers, whether producers or not, will watch with great interest the administration of the policy embodied in the bill and the administrative changes related to the bill. We shall be referring to this matter when a report is made to the house from year to year.

As I said before, I rise particularly to deal with my good friend from Macleod.

Mr. Kindt: Good.

Mr. Herridge: As found on page 12299 of Hansard the hon. member is recorded as saying:

I am quite familiar with the facts which the hon. member for Kootenay West has given. I am aware also of the representations of the B.C. Federation of Agriculture. Let me say that federation, in turn, represents some small fruit farmers and the others in British Columbia. I represent 6,000 wheat farmers and I am protecting the interests of the wheat farmers of Alberta.

I now bring to the hon. gentleman's attention something contained in the minutes and proceedings of the standing committee on transport and communications of October 17, 1966. The representative of the B.C. Federation of Agriculture made representations. As found on page 1874 of the committee report Mr. L. A. Currie, chairman of the feed and grain committee, said:

Gentlemen:

We appear before you today to suggest ways in which legislation regarding railfreight rates and freight assistance on feed grains can be improved to the benefit of both the farmers of British Columbia and the government of Canada.

We represent the B.C. Federation of Agriculture, which organization's over 14,000 members contains practically 100 per cent of the farmers and farm organizations purchasing and growing feed grains in the province of B.C.

Mr. Patterson: Hear, hear.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Herridge: I am very glad to have the endorsement of the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson). He knows that, as is usual in my observations in this house, what I am saying is strictly the truth. In this connection I have some agricultural statistics published by the Social Credit government of British Columbia, which will prove the point I am making. I want to say that never once have I found anything wrong with their regular statistics published in connection with production in the province. The only time I have had reason to doubt their statistics was when they concerned the cost of the Columbia treaty projects. This is what it says, here, under the heading "Agricultural Statistics, 1965":

Estimated Cash Receipts from the Sale of Farm Products, 1964-1965:
Wheat, oats, barley, flaxseed, potatoes, fruit, vegetables, other crops	$ 48,751,000
Cattle and calves, hogs, sheep and lambs, dairy products, poultry, eggs, other livestock and products	$109,433,000

So the total estimated receipt for farm products in 1965—the last year for which I have the figures—is $158,184,000.

In the light of these figures which I have given at the request of people connected with the British Columbia Federation of Agriculture, I am sure the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Kindt), with his usual courtesy, will willingly retract the statement he made last night, a statement which was widely misunderstood in British Columbia.

The British Columbia Federation of Agriculture is pleased that the minister has seen fit to include in this bill provision for a study of freight rates paid for the carriage of grain used by producers in British Columbia. They welcome it and look forward to having the opportunity to present their views to the commission when it considers this question. This is all I have to say now. I am looking forward to hearing a few remarks by the hon. member for Macleod.

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): I am most happy to have an opportunity to say a few words in response to the statements which have been made by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). I would not for one moment wish to take away any political advantage from him. He felt at liberty to bring in the views of the Federation of Agriculture and point out that the federation had 14,000 members, compared with the 6,000 big farmers in my riding who are raising wheat. I have no quarrel with the comparison. I do not even complain that the hon. member for Kootenay West felt unwilling to confine the comparison to his own riding in which, I happen to know, there are a large number of small chicken farmers—people who raise chickens and who buy Alberta wheat in order to feed those chickens. I have nothing against that.

I would not mind what he said in any way, had he confined his remarks to his own riding. I have every sympathy for his chicken farmers and fruit farmers who raise a few chickens and want wheat from the prairies. I have no objection to that. I have no objection to their wanting our wheat. In fact I am very pleased they are buying Alberta wheat in order to feed their chickens.

The point I was making was an entirely different one. Let me put it on the proper basis so that the hon. member's chicken farmers will not feel offended. I was saying that under this bill a study is being made of Crowsnest pass rates to British Columbia for the purpose of comparing those rates with other freight rates, so that interested people can point a finger at the level of the Crowsnest rates. My remarks centred on the fact that this device is a springboard for a study to be made, in the course of which it will be shown that the Crowsnest pass rates are extremely low. It will also be pointed out, through publicity, that somebody is subsidizing the farmers in my riding and elsewhere who ship their grain at the Crowsnest rates. This is what we do not want to happen. This is why we do not want a study made. This is what we say may take place following such a study. I was cautioning the minister against having such a study made. If only a comparison of rates is involved, what would be the need for an elaborate study? The rate under the Crowsnest pass agreement is in the neighbourhood of 22 cents, and anyone can get on the telephone and find out what the rates are on grain to feed those chickens about which the hon. member for Kootenay West is talking.

The matter goes much deeper than that. Hon. members opposite intend to use this study as a device for bringing back the baby which was thrown out with the bathwater, when their amendment on this subject was defeated. The minister has told us that no costs will be shown. I hope he adheres to that undertaking, because if he does not I will be the first to call his attention to the fact that he has dragged in all these other matters which we feel should not have been brought in.

It was with these things in mind that I felt it necessary to rise the other day and make the observations I did. I still feel I was justified in doing so. I do not want to offend the hon. member for Kootenay West, because he is a good friend of mine, but I just wanted to set the record straight.

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): I want to say in as few words as possible that it is still difficult to decide how to receive this legislation and, in the end, how to vote in regard to it. There are as many facets to this bill as there are clauses; in fact, there are more. I want to say to the minister and his supporters that some of the features of this legislation are commendable and can be accepted and praised; but there are others which, to put it mildly, are very difficult to accept. In fact I would say, as I have said on repeated occasions, that some of the assumptions upon which this legislation is based are ill-conceived. Clause 1, which sets the tone for the rest of the bill, is based on assumptions that in Canada today there exists sufficient transportation competition that we can rely on competition as a natural regulator or protector of the public interest, and protector of the users of transportation services. Insufficient evidence has been given to warrant that kind of assumption.

It may well be that in some parts of the country, where population density and industrial activity are high, there is sufficient competition in transport to warrant greater reliance on that factor than we have been able to place upon it in the past; but this is not the case with regard to vast areas and regions.

In speaking to this bill the minister has expressed an excessive degree of solicitude for the railways, especially in view of the fact that their revenue and earnings position is improving, and is likely to improve in the foreseeable future. As the population of our country grows and productivity increases, the railways will be in a much better revenue and earnings position. Therefore it is unnecessary to express the kind of solicitude for them that we have done in this legislation, which gives them ample opportunity to apply to the public treasury for support, when they perform a particular service as a matter of public policy and do not earn enough money performing it to satisfy them.

The minister is to be commended for agreeing to amendments to several clauses, amendments which have improved the bill. The legislation contains certain features that are an improvement over existing statutes which deal with transportation, but there are still objectionable features in it. This underlines the problem which many hon. members face in deciding how to vote on a bill which contains many commendable clauses as well as some that are objectionable.

This bill's provisions with respect to maximum rate control were objectionable from the start. The minister refused to agree to some amendments that were offered and, as a result, the bill still contains a kind of maximum rate control provision which is meaningless and a denial of common sense. This provision allows the railways a huge mark-up to the extent of 300 per cent or 400 per cent on the haulage of bulk goods, something which has been pointed out not only by hon. members but by hired transportation experts. I, and many other hon. members, simply cannot support such a provision.

The difficulty we have in this regard is compounded by the fact that we were denied access to information which, in our opinion, could have helped us to make an evaluation in depth. As a result our evaluation has really been superficial. We did not have all the necessary statistical material.

Whether it is intended or not, one of the most damning aspects of this legislation will be its effect on the economy of natural resources generating regions which are areas that produce primary products. Western Canada, northwestern Ontario and the maritimes, all areas which produce natural resources in the raw state, commodities and goods which, to use the jargon of the industry, are heavy loading, will be penalized or adversely affected by this legislation. Of course the legislation will take effect on a transitional basis, but once it is fully in force it will have a deleterious effect on the economies of the regions I have mentioned.

With respect to the debate which lasted for a few days on what the minister intended by the proposed new section 329, I wish to say that I voted for the amendment to delete that new section because I felt its net effect over a period of years would be a subversion of the Crowsnest pass rates. But I do no want to associate myself with anyone who may have ventured the opinion that the minister, by design, was attempting to subvert those rates. All his assurances were certainly to the contrary, and as originally worded the provision could not possibly be interpreted to have that design.

However, an incidental effect of it might have been that over a period of years, if a study showed that these rates caused a loss to the railways which had to be made up by public subsidy, there would have been growing public pressure on the government to do away with them. There was some logic in the arguments on both sides of the question, but in fairness I should say I could not find any specific intention on the part of the minister to tamper with the rates to the end of eliminating them.

[Mr. Schreyer.]

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, a lot will depend on the calibre of the persons appointed to the new Transport Commission. We take it for granted that they will be selected on the basis of competence and experience in the transportation field, but much will depend upon them because of the considerable amount of discretionary power granted to them by this bill.

With regard to the clause of the bill which deals with branch line abandonments and railway rationalization I feel rather strongly that the commission is in a position to save and protect the economic and social interests of the residents of western Canada if the commission chooses—and I assume it would —to exercise the authority it has with full regard for the social and economic aspects of a community when a main artery of transportation is abandoned. I persuaded the minister, his colleagues, and other members of the house, to accept an amendment which will give the commission specific terms of reference so that when applications for abandonment are being considered it also will have authority to make recommendations to local governments, provincial governments and the governor in council if there should be increased costs in respect of road building. In this case the commission would have authority to recommend to the federal authority or any authority concerning the way in which this extra cost can best be shared when provision is being made for new and alternative transportation services by way of highways, and so on.

By this amendment the commission also has authority to take into consideration the extra cost of production to farmers, and the losses in respect of investment. It has authority to make appropriate recommendations to the governor in council or any appropriate authority concerning how best to deal with these problems of increased cost of production, and other problems. So in my opinion, in many clauses in this bill the commission is given the necessary authority and scope. I hope, as I believe all hon. members do, that over the years it will exercise this authority in prudence and with the best judgment.

Mr. Raymond Rock (Jacques Cartier-Lasalle): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on third reading of Bill C-231, particularly in respect of clause 78 concerning the grade crossing fund, I should like to say that on December 20 and January 9 I asked the minister certain questions. I asked him to study an amendment which I had brought forward concerning clause 78. I should like the minister to tell me whether this type of clause would have been accepted. Also, does the government intend to vote any supplementary amount to the grade crossing fund in the event that it should be depleted during the fiscal year? I wonder whether it would be possible to give the new commission sufficient power to initiate a plan to eliminate grade crossings, so that we would not be faced with the necessity of waiting for the roads department of a province or a municipality to take action.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Lawless, director general of the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities, has asked the minister that a meeting be held in the future concerning changes which might be made to the grade crossing fund, which I believe has been inadequate since 1958. I should like to ask whether the minister could explain what protection there is in respect of the commuter service under this new legislation vis-à-vis abandoned railroad tracks.

I wonder whether the minister in his concluding remarks would be able to answer some of these questions?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, which perhaps is not a genuine question of privilege, you might allow me to say how glad all of us are to have the hon. member for Jacques Cartier-Lasalle back after his lengthy illness, which prevented his taking the same part in the work of the committee of the whole that he did during the hearings of the committee on transport and communications, when he was most helpful. Unfortunately under the rules I am not allowed to speak, but I will personally give the hon. member an answer to his questions.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I shall detain the house only a few minutes. I rise to speak not on any matter of substance in respect of this bill but rather with regard to a matter of form. Were I to speak to a matter of substance, the minister probably would guess that it would have to do with the pensions of retired employees of the Canadian National Railways and the pension arrangements of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Frankly I do not see how I could relate these subjects to this legislation. I plan, however, to raise these matters again on another occasion.

The point of form to which I should like to draw attention has to do with the set-up of the bill on page 2. In the middle of that page in capital letters there is a heading and then a subheading in small capital letters which reads:

PART I.

CANADIAN TRANSPORT COMMISSION.

I should like to suggest that that heading and subheading are in the wrong place. The way it is now it would appear that clause 2, namely the title, and then the clauses relating to interpretation and application, relate only to Part I of the bill. The fact is that the title and the interpretation and application clauses refer to the entire bill, not just to Part I. I contend therefore that the heading, "Part I, Canadian Transport Commission" ought to appear after clause 5. In other words I suggest it should appear just above the subheading in italics, "Constitution of Commission". Even if we were in committee of the whole I am not sure whether this would be a proper amendment. I suspect it is simply a matter of adjusting the lay-out of the pages. It may be that this is a situation in respect of which the parliamentary counsel could make the necessary adjustment when he prepares this bill, after it is finally passed, for its final printing by the Queen's Printer. I simply bring this to the attention of the house in the hope that this matter of a change in the form might be made so that if the bill does pass it will appear in a sensible form so far as this part of it is concerned.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Pickersgill) which was agreed to on the following division:

• (4:10 p.m.)

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson).

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene). Had I voted I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. MacRae: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. McIlraith).

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, I was paired. Had I voted, I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. Munro: I was paired, Mr. Speaker. Had I voted, I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. McLean (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Fairweather). Had I voted, I would have voted for the motion.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. McCutcheon: I was paired, Mr. Speaker. Had I voted, I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Speaker, I wish at this time to protest at the shortness of the time allowed for hon. members to come to the chamber from their offices. When the bell began to ring I was engaged in a long distance telephone call from Europe. By the time I had finished that call the bell had ceased to ring. I do not think a proper opportunity was given at this time for hon. members to respond to the bell.

Mr. Scott (Victoria (Ont.)): Mr. Speaker, I was paired. Had I voted, I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. Southam: Mr. Speaker, in regard to what the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. Alkenbrack) said, I also found it impossible to make it over here with such a short bell.

INTERPRETATION ACT

PROVISION FOR REVISION AND CONSOLIDATION

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Justice): moved the second reading of Bill No. S-9, to revise and consolidate the Interpretation Act and amendments thereto, and to effect certain consequential amendments to the Canada Evidence Act and the Bills of Exchange Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Batten in the chair.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Cardin: Because of the largely technical nature of the bill it was my intention and that of my department to send it to the committee on justice and legal affairs. This was the procedure that was followed in the other place. Since this is a very technical bill I think that the time of the house would be saved if we could send the bill to that committee and I would ask the consent of the committee to do just that.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, the course suggested by the minister is one which would certainly meet with approval on this side, particularly in the light of the very strong article which appeared in the December issue of the Canadian Bar Review written by a very distinguished counsel, Gordon F. Maclaren, Q.C. an article which I think requires study. Such a study can only be given by a standing committee of the house. We would certainly be agreeable to this committee rising and reporting progress and we would suggest that a motion be presented then to commit the bill to the standing committee on justice and legal affairs.

The Chairman: Is that course agreeable to the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the subject matter of Bill S-9 be referred to the standing committee on justice and legal affairs.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN FILM DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

PROVISION FOR DEVELOPMENT OF FEATURE FILM INDUSTRY

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-204, for the establishment of a Canadian Film Development Corporation.

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, if the minister would like to make a few remarks I would be quite willing to defer to her, but it is my understanding that she would rather wait and perhaps make her remarks later on. It is an unusual situation to find the Secretary of State speechless. However I will take advantage of that situation and make a few remarks on what I believe to be a very important bill.

I have been very disappointed by the fact that the government has seen fit to let this particular item languish on the order paper for such a long period of time. Indeed it could be said that not only has it languished on the order paper for a long period of time but it has languished in the area of political promise for a long time. We have now reached the stage at which we were three years ago when the minister's predecessor promised in somewhat specific terms that a new corporation would be set up, the responsibilities of which would be to encourage a feature film industry in this country and to which, I think, an initial sum of $10 million would be granted. That was in 1964, and here we are in 1967 finally coming to grips with this matter.

It may seem perhaps to many hon. members in the house and to many people across the country that whether or not a feature film industry is established in Canada is not a matter of terribly pressing concern. After all, we can leave the chamber at this very moment and go down into the heart of the city where we can find half a dozen places where feature films are shown. I could even tell you the names of three or four of the films that are showing at present, being myself a feature film fan. We might think that there is no pressing need for the establishment of a feature film industry and in particular for the government to take an interest in this question. However, I think that if we compared ourselves in this regard to many other countries in the world we would be shocked to discover how much we have neglected this area, considering Canada's position in so many other cultural endeavours, and considering also the overall strength of our economy and our privileged position in terms of affluence and education. There has been a shocking neglect in this field. I remember that when a few years ago, upon visiting South Korea, I went for a walk in a park one Saturday afternoon, I suddenly discovered there a full fledged film crew in action. I watched them for a few moments and turned to my host, a Korean gentleman, to ask him what was going on. He told me that one of the South Korean film companies was making another feature film. I looked at him incredulously and asked: "Do you mean to tell me that you make feature films in South Korea?" to which he replied "Certainly; doesn't everybody?" I had to admit that as far as I knew in 1961 the thought of establishing a film industry in this country was by and large ignored and thought superfluous.

From the beginning we have relied basically on two areas for our feature film entertainment, the United States and Great Britain.

Mr. Prittie: And France.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): The hon. member reminds me that we have also relied on France. What has this meant to those of us who have grown up in Canada over the last 30 or 40 years? It has meant that throughout a whole generation we have identified ourselves with certain alien cultural values and certain entertainment personalities, and subconsciously adopted standards that are not basically our own but which exist in other countries. We have never had the privilege, which a great many countries have had in the last 30 years, of identifying ourselves with fellow Canadians through that extremely important cultural instrument, the film. I think it is true to say that basically most people regard feature films as a source of entertainment. However, my belief is that feature films are one of the most powerful and subtle influences on the development of the values of a society, a continuing influence in the setting of certain standards and goals. If one does not believe this, he should visit some countries overseas which have been exposed for the past few years to American feature films and learn from them what is their understanding of North America. The response would be alarming.

We in Canada who have continued to view the feature film productions of other countries have identified ourselves with their values and established goals for ourselves which are not necessarily concurrent with what life is like in this country. There has been a continuous impediment to our development of a national image and a national identity. I am not saying this in a narrow, restrictive, or partisan sense, but I think it has been a great failure on our part to have overlooked year after year the necessity for establishing a feature film industry.

For many years we have considered as very important our Canadian broadcasting system. It is well known to hon. members of this house that hundreds of millions of dollars have been spent in establishing this communications link, this heart throb, if you like, for the Canadian nation. We have also taken a considerable amount of trouble to do similar kinds of things under the National Film Board in other kinds of less direct but still, on the whole, cultural fields. But when it comes to the feature film industry we have been greatly negligent.

I suppose the blame does not fall on the head of any one person or any particular government, because as far as I know no government has ever taken this question seriously. I was investigating and looking into this particular matter some months ago, Mr. Speaker, and I chanced upon what I consider to be one of the real ironies of our development as a nation. Apparently shortly after the second world war, during the period 1945-47, there was some interest in Canada in the development of a feature film industry. There was a real desire on the part of some to see a feature film industry get off the ground. Actually this would have been a good time to think about starting a feature film industry, because after the war there had been neglect of this proposal and there was a kind of vacuum into which a new industry could have moved.

It is my understanding, Mr. Speaker, that five of the major film producers in Hollywood got wind of this possibility of a loss of market in this country. They were disturbed that some of the extra revenue they received from runs in Canada would be lost to them, and so they approached the then minister of trade and commerce, I think it was, with a proposal. The proposal was that instead of actually going to the trouble of giving some special protection to, and assisting the development of, a Canadian feature film industry, these five major Hollywood producers would fill the vacuum, so to speak, and would make two concessions which would prevent any difficulties from developing, and would also ensure that some kind of Canadian image was carried on in film making in North America.

As I understand it, their two concessions were as follows: First of all they agreed that every year one of the five producers would come to Canada and would make a 15-minute travelogue on some aspect of Canadian life, and this would be a major concession; there would be some kind of Canadian identity at the movies.

That was good enough, Mr. Speaker; but they decided to go a little further and to establish something called, I think, a Commonwealth office in Hollywood, where they would have a couple of resident script writers. These resident script writers were to review all of the scripts of the shows to be produced. They would read the scripts, and if they found a line or two that ran something like: "I was talking to my mother in Seattle by phone the other night", a chap would sit down and would rewrite it in this way: "I was talking to my mother in Vancouver by phone the other night", to make sure that occasionally there would be some geographic references to places not only in the United States but also in Canada. This was the kind of concession that I understand was agreed to by the government of that day in order that the five major producers of films could carry on their distribution in this country without impediment.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, after many years, we are now in 1967 on the verge of paying some real attention to the development of a feature film industry in this country. As other speakers have said when dealing with the resolution preceding the bill, I think in the first instance we must give the minister a very real vote of praise in taking the initiative in this matter. We sympathize with her in part for the way in which other members of her government have found other things so much more pressing that the resolution had to languish on the order paper month after month. Only at the end of the day, on a Friday afternoon, when those who have been able to do so have taken off by plane or train, are a few of us left to deal with this matter. This is not something to be left to the last, let me assure you, Mr. Speaker. This is an attitude that will only ensure the eventual dismissal of those things which we should like to think are uniquely Canadian.

Having voiced those words of gratitude to the minister for bringing this bill before this house, I think I must also say that the bill leaves a great deal to be desired, because at this point it has really recognized only the fact that Canada needs to have its own feature film industry. It does not go very far beyond that recognition, I am afraid.

It is all too easy, and it has been all too easy in the past, for governments—not only this one but other governments—to say that the answer is simply to create a foundation, to give that foundation money, and everything will be off to the races. It just does not happen that way in most cases, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure it will not happen in that way with one of the most competitive, and I think one of the most complex, industries that functions in the world today. As I say, I do not believe this is true, but I think that if it were true the minister would see that merely setting up a foundation which occasionally would hand out money and awards through some kind of subsidy to a production company to ensure the development of a self-sufficient and worthwhile feature film industry would only be the height of naivety.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that in what this bill spells out we are taking the first step in creating an agency which becomes concerned about the problem. But this is not the first bit of legislation which I think will be necessary, if we really believe that a feature film industry should be encouraged to develop in this country.

I have some fear about this because the government has shown, by its willingness to let this matter languish for a period of time, that it considers this is not really an issue of priority. I am afraid that we do not have a cabinet at present which can be called a cabinet of "swingers". Perhaps the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) is the only swinger of the group, but it does take more than one or even two swingers to make a thing like this go; and I think she will have to have some converts if we are to put muscle behind this ambitious proposal.

For instance, Mr. Speaker, I think that if we are to be serious about the establishment of a feature film industry in this country something must be said about distribution, certainly something more than simply saying that the film will have a certain amount of content and that certain agreements will be entered into. Many countries have found distribution to be the overriding problem facing film producers. You see, Mr. Speaker, in many cases the problem is not getting together enough money to make a film; the problem is what is going to happen to the film after finally it has been produced.

We know that in Canada the whole question of distribution comes amazingly close to what may be termed a monopoly. I think unless we have some answer to this problem, and unless we have some knowledge of how these films are going to get from the producer to the distributor to the exhibitor, then we will only do a very small part of the job and in a very short time we will frustrate the very people we are trying to encourage in this embryonic industry.

I think too that it would be pointless, particularly in this country or in this house, to think we can do everything to ensure the development of this industry. Because this is a federal state some of the questions that will face us in the encouragement of this industry will of necessity have to be resolved by provincial legislatures and provincial governments. I think this is an area in which the minister and her colleagues must take some lead. If she is serious about seeing not just half a dozen films made for centennial year, or for next year, or until the money runs out, but seeing an industry develop in this country, then the provinces must be encouraged to take the necessary steps to ensure that the final product is shown.

If the minister does not do this, I think the situation will be very similar to the situation which occurred last year and which was featured in a report in the Toronto Star. I do not have the date of the clipping I have from the Star, but let me read some of the problems encountered by one person who apparently was able to get the money to put together a film worth looking at, a film called "Nobody Waved Goodbye". This film was made by a man called Don Owen, and this is what Robert Fulford had to say about it:

> But now consider "Nobody Waved Goodbye", by Don Owen, perhaps the best feature made so far in English speaking Canada. It was a Toronto film, by a Toronto director, about life in Toronto; and it was treated shamefully by the movie exhibitors of Toronto.

● (4:40 p.m.)

A leading exhibitor, who saw it privately, declared that it was "a piece of junk from Hicksville". It was booked into the New Yorker theatre, in the dead week before Christmas. It had practically no advertising. It came and went.

But when it went to New York the critics liked it so well it created a sensation. Their reviews astounded even the film's admirers in Canada. Finally it was brought back to Toronto and received a proper booking.

The point is this: If we are to depend on the good faith and the warm-hearted nationalistic interests of the exhibitors, we are far from realistic. I am convinced that unless we encourage—and I use the word encourage advisedly—exhibitors to display these films, we are involved this afternoon in an exercise in futility.

We know too well that in dealing with exhibitors the major control cannot be exercised by this house; that must be a provincial responsibility. It seems therefore not only sensible but ultimately necessary that if the machinery for this industry is to go forward the minister at the earliest possible date—and I always hate to suggest this—must call a federal-provincial conference.

An hon. Member: Not another one.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): I will rue the day I suggested this. On this point I see no way around the roadblock, unless the provinces can be made responsible for grappling with this problem. Unless the provinces are willing, as the minister seems to be, to take positive steps we shall gain little from passage of this legislation.

I think, also, that if this is to be realistic endeavour, the corporation to be established by this legislation must of necessity have liaison and links with the provinces. I might say, as an aside, that since some of the provinces have become seriously interested themselves in producing motion pictures, there may be important reasons for having closer links between the provinces and the corporation.

It would be irresponsible to create an agency like this unless we are able to envision its relationship to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. At the present time the C.B.C. is the biggest producer of motion pictures in this country—not necessarily feature films, but of motion pictures. It produces three or four times the film footage the National Film Board produces. One of the tragedies is that a great deal of C.B.C. film produced is only a one-shot affair. Most films produced are shown once, then discarded, and not too tidily in most instances, in some attic or cellar where they are mislaid.

Yet I think the motion picture industry in future in this country will have to think seriously of its relations with the television industry. How many hon. members were impressed, as I was, by the September 28 report of the Ottawa Citizen of last year which said that the United States television companies signed a $92 million deal with the film companies to show $92 million worth of American-produced feature films on television? There is no mistaking that more and more television companies—and in this country the major television producer is the C.B.C.—will be anxious to produce feature length motion pictures to show in first instance on television, and then to continue showing them across the country in theatres. This will involve a serious consideration.

It seems strange to me that the corporation to be established by the proposed legislation bears a greater relationship to the National Film Board, by provision of a commissioner, than to the C.B.C. which actually produces three times the film the National Film Board produces. We must look into this question seriously.

I want to refer to something the minister said in her closing remarks some months ago, when speaking on the resolution. She said that if the exhibitors do not seem anxious to display or distribute these films, certain questions about a quota would have to be taken up. Presumably that quota would apply to the number of foreign films to be imported into the country. That is the kind of negative approach that will be harmful to the development and encouragement of a feature film industry in this country. I suggest, rather, that we think of the ways we can encourage the expansion of Canadian produced feature films. We should think, in this instance, not of ways to force people to exhibit Canadian films, but of the other side of the picture: What positive steps can be taken to encourage exhibitors to become interested in showing Canadian films?

I think that the "Eady" fund is at least one very potent way to adapt what Great Britain has done, that revenues gained from the exhibition of United States motion pictures can be turned to the advantage of those who produce Canadian feature films. It seems extremely sensible that revenues gained from showing foreign made products should in some way subsidize or stimulate the development of our own feature film industry.

For 30 or 40 years we have willingly exported, year after year, millions of dollars of wealth, to be entertained by motion pictures not produced in this country. It seems eminently sensible for us to take steps to ensure that some revenue gained from showing foreign films is put toward developing and encouraging a Canadian feature film industry.

In closing, I say that we are making this grand venture into the feature film industry at an auspicious time. Great interest was sparked by the announcement of the former secretary of state. We now have producers, writers and technicians, and we can develop this industry in this country. The time is ripe for us to take this step, and from our discussions here we should formulate the strongest legislation possible that will enable us to do this job.

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, earlier today, speaking on another bill, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) made remarks about the way parliament works and how long it takes to achieve something. I agree with much of what he said. The public does not fully understand that, under the legislative process, consideration cannot be rushed. I confess, nevertheless, that I am amazed at the time this legislative item has taken to come this far. The hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacDonald) referred to the fact that the former secretary of state, the hon. member for Outremont-Saint-Jean (Mr. Lamontagne) made a public pronouncement as long ago as 1964. I believe an interdepartmental committee had been at work for some time before he made that pronouncement. We last had the bill before us on June 20, 1966, and here we are, on January 27, 1967, getting second reading. It is an extraordinary operation and I think we could somehow organize our business a little better.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Miss LaMarsh: Hear, hear.

Mr. Prittie: I noticed last year that a report on films for Canada's centennial year was presented to the Centennial Commission on April 1, 1966 by Robert Anderson Associates Limited. On page 5 of this report the following appears under the heading "Feature Films":

> A noticeable gap in 1967's film spectrum is the lack of films of epic proportions—theatrical feature films. If such films are to be made, they will occur only as a result of early government implementation of its announced plans for a Canadian Film Development Corporation to assist in financing and distributing Canadian feature film. Producers are poised and waiting. If the government were to advance this legislation on its order paper, there would still be time for feature films for 1967.

I would be rather late in 1967, following this legislation though I am pleased to see that, as the previous speaker mentioned, some independent film producers are at work in Canada. Seven or eight months having elapsed since we last discussed this measure, there is bound to be some repetition. During the debate on the resolution a number of hon. members raised the question why Canada has not had a feature film industry in the past. The hon. member for Prince gave the answer to some extent. The principal reason is, of course, the relationship between English speaking Canada and the United States. During the discussion at that time I mentioned that those countries which had been obliged to produce their own films developed their own film industries. Sweden is a good example. That country has a film industry which has turned out very many fine films. Indeed two weeks ago, there was a week of Swedish films shown at an Ottawa cinema. The industry in that country came into being because nowhere else was Swedish spoken.

To give another illustration: When the C.B.C. began its television network in the French language there was no material available. France had not begun production at that time, so it was necessary to produce the material locally. This was done, and today Montreal is, I am told, the leading centre for the production of television programs in the French language.

There have been other reasons for Canada's failure to develop a feature film industry. One of them is the fact that distribution facilities in Canada are not under our control. In addition to distribution facilities, personnel and money are needed. Personnel are not lacking. There are in Canada people with sufficient technical ability to produce films—they have been doing so in other parts of the industry for many years. Many of our people possess the requisite acting capability; they are acting on television, now. There are still enough capable people here, though unfortunately some were attracted by prospects in the United States or in France.

Then again, producers find it difficult to raise money for their projects. I wish to quote briefly from an article which illustrates this point. This was taken from the Ottawa Citizen of November 11, 1965, entitled "Canada cool to foreign film makers".

Montreal (CP)—Claude Giroux, Montreal-born president of Allied Artists, the U.S. film distributors, says Canada offers no inducement to film makers to make movies here.

Mr. Giroux, a leading figure in the United States, movie industry, is attending the 98th technical conference of the Society of Motion Picture and Television Engineers.

He said in an interview Monday that Canadian banks are conservative and lack knowledge of the film industry. They know nothing, he said, about production guarantees which are given by foreign distributors.

"When you go to the banks and say 'here is a guarantee from an Indian distributor and an Italian distributor and a French distributor to pay $100,000 each when the picture is finished—now lend me $300,000 and I'll make a film here' they get a glassy-eyed look.

"They don't understand that making a film is like building a house. You get a construction loan and a completion bond and after that you convert it into a mortgage."

What is needed, he said, is a film agency similar to the industries. Such an agency would be knowledgeable about films and would therefore be in a position to endorse guarantees, he said.

This bill will, to some extent, solve the question of raising money, one of the factors which was hitherto been lacking.

In the course of the debate last June, the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. Southam), I believe it was, said he had some knowledge of the film industry and suggested the figure of $10 million mentioned here did not amount to very much. I do not know whether it is sufficient or not, but I do know that some of the smaller European countries such as Sweden, Czechoslovakia and Denmark have turned out very good motion pictures on small budgets, pictures which have made a good deal of money for their producers. One such production has been running in Ottawa for a number of weeks. It is called "Dear John" and it is, apparently, a small budget picture. They just used a bedroom most of the time, but it seems they have the necessary ingredients for success.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Prittie: The question of distribution and the desire of the industry of some kind of guarantee being given for the distribution of films produced in this country by Canadian film makers has already been mentioned. This is most important. Speaking last June, the minister said that co-operation by the exhibitors and the established companies would be expected. I notice that in writing up the debate the Globe and Mail of June 21 made this comment in a headline: "Import quota hint if Canadian movies are not shown more often".

I think this was implied in the minister's speech last year and I would certainly agree that if this co-operation is not forthcoming all possible steps should be taken by the government to make sure that Canadian films, assuming they are good ones, do get the exhibition facilities which they deserve, not only here but in other countries of the world, and that if necessary we should use import quotas for this purpose. After all, many other countries do this.

There is one other matter to which I should like to refer. It concerns the relationship of the National Film Board to the established private film producing industry in Canada, however expanded that may become. A week ago today I addressed a question to the minister. The representative of one of the international unions, in this case the International Union of Film Photographers, had protested the fact that the National Film Board and the C.B.C. were co-operating to make a film—the particular film he had in mind was entitled "Waiting for Caroline". It is being filmed in Quebec City and in Vancouver. He was protesting on the grounds that by making this film the National Film Board was exceeding the mandate given to it by parliament.

I understand the C.B.C. and the National Film Board have made arrangements to produce three feature length films. In reply to my question the minister said this, as reported in Hansard of January 20, page 12037:

I have seen Mr. Cole of I.A.T.S.E. and listened to his complaints. He did complain that the present activities of the National Film Board were not within the provisions of the act. As the hon. member knows, as a minister of the crown I am not in a position to give a legal opinion, but anyone may look at sections 9 and 10 of the National Film Board Act and see that this sort of endeavour falls within them.

Mr. Cole has demanded that a collective agreement be signed with his local in Toronto, a demand which the film board has rejected on the grounds that the board will not instruct its employees to join any particular union. In fact, I am informed that the employees of the film board have joined other unions, particularly Le Syndicat Général du Cinéma.

Mr. Cole has also threatened to prevent distribution of a film now being prepared, and has even threatened to disrupt further an infant industry which all hon. members have indicated they would wish to see flourish in this country. It seems to me that it would be a most short-sighted approach on the part of cameramen and other individuals associated with film making, to cause a disruption which would sabotage the efforts of government and prospects for the industry to grow in Canada.

I am not too concerned at the moment as to who organizes the film crews, but I must confess I was surprised, when the committee on broadcasting and films made a visit fairly recently to the National Film Board, to find out that the employees of that board had not been organized. But whether they are organized by the international or the C.S.N. is not our business.

I have not tried to get a legal opinion, since the minister replied to the question, to see whether or not the National Film Board is operating within its mandate. Philosophically I have no objection to the National Film Board co-operating with the C.B.C. to make films. The public has put money into both corporations and probably should get a good return on it, but I pose this question: If indeed the act is not clear, can we not make it clear? If the interpretation of the act is that the National Film Board cannot make feature films, then we know where we stand. Further, if it is the wish of the government and the C.B.C. that their facilities could be used for that purpose to assist the C.B.C., then perhaps the act should be changed.

However, I suggest that when the feature film industry in Canada gets off the ground we are apt to receive more complaints of this type. In fact the same complaint appeared in a publication which I received the other day, "Canadian Film and T.V. Industry," published in Toronto, which incorporates "The Canadian Moving Picture Digest." Whom it represents I do not know, but it made this same complaint about the mandate of the National Film Board. I shall have more to say when we discuss the various clauses in the bill, but that will conclude my remarks for now

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I am of the opinion that this is a direction in which we should be moving and, even though it has been somewhat delayed, I congratulate the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) upon bringing forward this piece of legislation. The film industry is the kind of industry in which, as a nation small in population, we should be involved, because it demands high quality, high degrees of technical skill and artistic talent, and does not involve great use of natural resources. In addition, if we can manage to sell our film production abroad it would alleviate greatly our balance of payments problem. As it is, since this industry began we have made our contributions both in money and in talent to almost every other part of the world except Canada.

I am pleased with some of the clauses in this bill, particularly the one which suggests that certain qualifications will have to be met, namely > —that the completed film will, in the judgment of the corporation, have a significant Canadian creative, artistic and technical content.

I am sure this will lead to problems for both the minister and the corporation. I am sure that not long after films are completed someone will rise in this house and demand why Canadian tax money has been used for a particular film. I wonder how the determination on the adjective "Canadian" will be made in conjunction with the words "creative, artistic and technical content".

I also wonder about the quality of films produced. I am sure applications will be received from people who have always had a burning desire to create the ultimate in what is known as avante garde, or underground, or modern films. I am sure these people will also apply for funds. Somewhere along the line the corporation will have to develop sufficient nerve to say no to some of the applications it receives. In fact it may be called upon to say no to a completed film.

I would remind the minister, without making any comparisons, of the embarrassment General Franco had in Spain when, a few years ago, he invited back to his country all of the creative talent which had earlier been driven out of it. One of the people who went back was the very famous and talented director Bunuel who then proceeded, without the knowledge of Franco or his government, to produce a film that was one of the most fiercely anti-clerical films ever made anywhere. General Franco and his agents learned too late about this film which was produced under their very noses. The film was smuggled out of the country and presented at one of the great European film festivals. There it won all of the awards, which is not at all surprising considering the nature of the film.

We shall have to watch the content of films as specified in this bill. There is no reason why "Doctor Zhivago" could not have been made in Canada, but I suppose it would not have had Canadian content within the meaning of this bill. I only hope our film industry will not be so restricted.

I would also urge, although this may be in contradiction of some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacDonald), that not too much insistence be laid on total provincial involvement. Let us not fragment this industry before it is born. I suggest much of it will be centred in my own province, British Columbia, because of the tremendous natural advantages which it has for this type of industry. I believe the government of Canada should be quite prepared to go ahead with a subsidized industry which is centred mainly in one province, should that be the case. I know there are a variety of other industries which are highly encouraged by the government and which happen to be centred in provinces such as Ontario and Quebec. It is not beyond imagination that this industry could play a very important part in British Columbia. For the benefit of the hon. member for Prince I might suggest, for instance, that even "Anne of Green Gables" could be successfully filmed amid the beauties of British Columbia.

One other advantage which I think the development of a privately encouraged or subsidized film industry could have would be the gradual phasing out of the C.B.C. from some of its film making activities. A while ago we heard about established film companies making films for television. We have heard the suggestion that in Canada it should be the other way around; that is, that our television industry should make the films for our motion picture industry. I think the reverse should be the situation.

If the film industry as such is to develop, then I think the C.B.C. should be one of its customers and not one of its main suppliers. We will have more to say in respect of this bill when we study it clause by clause. I believe the idea is worth while. There will be serious problems for this industry and for the department which shepherds it along, but I hope that they will be successful.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks on this bill and to point out first what is probably a misprint in the French version of the bill. On page 3, paragraph (b) of subclause 2 of clause 10 is shown as paragraph "(d)" instead of "(b)" and I am wondering whether it is a misprint or a new way of drafting a bill, unless the hon. minister is considering the inclusion between paragraphs (a) and (d) of unforeseen provisions. Anyway I wonder if it could not merely be a misprint.

[Mr. Johnston.]

In any case, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that the intention shown by the government to give assistance to the Canadian feature film industry—and the word "Canadian" is stressed in the bill—should precisely be that, namely to promote more interest in the production of Canadian feature films on the part of our film-makers and artists.

Some time ago, perhaps a year and a half ago, the C.B.C. had a film produced by Seaway Films Limited, of Toronto, which apparently had entered into an agreement with the Associated Television Limited, of London, England, a private television station there, to produce a Canadian film on the St. Lawrence Seaway. They were to produce 30 one hour films, a venture which had cost the Canadian people $3 million. As the estimates provide $10 million apparently earmarked to promote the Canadian film industry, I wonder whether that amount will really be enough to develop and encourage that industry.

Those who are in the film industry will be in a position to judge whether this initiative can really promote this kind of industry in Canada or whether this is not merely a superficial attempt on the part of the minister to show to the artistic world that the government is interested in this field of Canadian artistic activities.

I note, however, that the hon. minister left out certain details which I feel are very important. For instance, the clause dealing with the objects and the powers of the corporation does not say anything about dubbing a film. And yet, film dubbing appears to be one of the most important considerations here in Canada, for it will enable Canadian films produced in the English language to be translated for distribution to theatres catering to French speaking viewers. The bill should provide that this dubbing will be done by French or English Canadian actors and actresses, or Canadian artists, at least.

If the hon. minister does not insert this provision in the bill, we will have to watch imported films, translated and dubbed by foreign artists, like those being shown every day on our television sets.

Here I wish to refer once again to this movie shown over the Canadian television network in which a well-known Quebec comedian, Mr. Rolland Bédard, performed. A French actor had dubbed his voice in Paris. Thus, we were presented with the peculiar situation where the voice of a French Canadian actor, performing in a film shown to a Canadian audience, is dubbed by a Parisian actor.

I am wondering if this anomaly could not be corrected through a minor amendment that the minister could move on his own. Nevertheless, I do not move it myself as an amendment, but rather as a suggestion. In my opinion, the minister should add, after paragraph (a) a provision to the effect that the dubbing of feature films produced in Canada, be done by Canadian artists, both English and French speaking. In doing so, I think we would be spared this unpleasant and deplorable practice of seeing Canadian films subsidized by our country, by our government, and by our taxpayers, being dubbed by foreign actors.

I also think that the minister should have stated in the bill that all films being financed by this Crown corporation must answer to certain public moral standards.

A few minutes ago the hon. member who spoke before me referred to some European, Swedish or Norwegian films that have been translated for Canadian viewers. But, I believe, the example mentioned by the hon. member does not represent exactly the type of film we would want as far as the morals described are concerned.

Mr. Prittie: Never.

Mr. Valade: There are certainly good films that come to us from those countries. We hope that the Canadian film industry will produce good films; because when we look at films on television and in the movie houses, too often do we find that we are being snowed under by war films of low moral standards.

These films encourage violence among youth, crime, free love and even prostitution.

All those films that clutter up our cinemas are surely not of a kind to help our young people to orient themselves toward the future imbued with the moral standards we expect of them.

Therefore, I hope that the minister will see to it that this assistance we want to extend to the film industry will not be merely confined to helping producers whose sole concern is making profits. The Corporation should rather provide guidance in the production of moral, artistic and cultural films. That, to my mind, should be the motivation of a crown corporation such as this.

Much more could be said about this bill, Mr. Speaker. It may not be elaborate, still it provides certain guiding principles. For my part, I think we are doubling, perhaps tripling, our help to the Canadian film industry.

The C.B.C. is financing the production of films. The National Film Board also produces a number of films, and I wonder why an amendment has not already been brought to the Canadian Arts Council Act, so that the funds would be paid by the National Film Board, since such is the name of that organization. The words film and cinematography are synonyms and, from a practical point of view, if the word "cinematography" was substituted for the word "film", I do not see that it would make a difference. I wonder why the government has not already considered altering the present structure of the National Film Board, so that a branch of that organization would specifically look after the development of a Canadian film industry.

Mr. Speaker, we realize that we are still dealing with another corporation. We are increasing the number of crown corporations, we are involving state intervention in a field where I feel we could encourage in a very unobstrusive and discreet way those who would like to launch out in the film industry.

If, whenever there is a dearth in an area of economic activity, the government were to establish a corporation to take the initiatives which the people themselves should take but are reluctant to take because they fear to take the risks, the government should take the risks instead.

I wonder if there again, we are not complicating things or even competing with existing industry. There are movie concerns in existence, some of which have been successful and others which have not succeeded, probably because their management or their production was of poor quality.

A government organization could step in and finance the film itself, without regard for the management, because the film may be very good and the management very bad. Then the government would be financing a production and not a poor administration. Therefore, it seems to me that it can, through indirect means, through already existing agencies, give assistance to those who proved that they were really able to produce quality films. In my opinion, this would serve at best the Canadian movie industry.

Therefore, if she is agreeable—and I shall not insist on some amendments I have mentioned a while ago, since the members of the house seem to have properly put the helm over as regards the previous legislation—the minister could at least give me her assurance that the dubbing of films produced in this country shall be done by Canadian actors and players and that the moral standards shall be respected in all the works to be financed by this crown corporation.

[English]

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have a few remarks to make in respect of this bill. Let me first say that I am very much in favour of the principles embodied in the bill. We have observed the very excellent example in Canada over the past years of the development of Canadian talent by the Canada Council. As a result of its efforts a great deal of talent from many communities has come to light.

The Canada Council has accomplished three things. It has found a great deal of Canadian talent in many communities where many people probably thought talent did not exist. It has devoted its efforts over a wide area, and has looked for talent in areas beyond the reach of other government agencies associated with the arts. It has also given opportunities to many small groups which, without this assistance, certainly would not have had the opportunity to accomplish the very fine goals they have reached. If the proposed corporation handles itself in the same manner as the Canada Council, I think the feature film industry in Canada will progress in the same way as many other areas of artistic endeavour have progressed, through the assistance of the Canada Council.

It seems to me that the C.B.C. in recent years has followed the opposite trend, by bringing increasingly questionable material to the attention of its viewers. The C.B.C. has recently become no more than, to use Mr. Ouimet's words, sleazy and slipshod. I am thinking particularly of the production "Harvest of the Sea", which has been a source of embarrassment to the fishing industry in Canada, and has also embarrassed the Department of Fisheries. I have in my hand a letter written by the deputy minister of fisheries to Mr. Alphonse Ouimet. The deputy minister says in this letter, among other things, the following:

> Representations have been made to my minister by the fishing industry of Canada protesting that considerable damage may have been done to the country by the poorly researched script which in some instances presented the industry in a very poor light. There is also the fact that the program made almost no reference to the work carried out by the Department of Fisheries of Canada and the Fisheries Research Board of Canada;—

[Mr. Valade.]

He then states:

> The commentary leaves much to be desired. It more than implies that Canada has done nothing about conserving and managing its fishery resources.

Later he states:

> This department was not consulted by anyone connected with the program to verify facts;—

Later he said this:

> It would seem to be obvious, also, that the C.B.C.'s farm and fisheries department would have been in a position to provide constructive advice to the producer.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Finally the deputy minister wrote:

> It is regrettable that what could have been an informative program should be so marred by lack of research and inadequate preparation, and that the orderly development of Canada's fisheries, which is achieving a great measure of success, should be ignored.

One result of this bill will be the creation and development of a trend in the opposite direction. Perhaps this will improve Canadian film productions and assist in the development of Canadian talent in respect of feature films and documentaries. Surely this is a move away from what is becoming an ingrained difficulty in respect of this crown corporation.

In conclusion let me compliment the minister for bringing this bill to the house. I support it wholeheartedly, but I should like to ask one question about it which I think the hon. lady will answer to my satisfaction when she speaks on this subject. Why cannot the objectives of this bill be carried out by the Canada Council? Why do we need another crown agency to accomplish what could be very well accomplished by one more competent committee of the Canada Council, which has already shown its competence to deal with many fields of the arts to the satisfaction of Canadians from coast to coast?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Shall the motion carry?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, is the minister not going to say anything at all in this debate? I have been waiting for the minister to rise and speak on this matter. I realize that if she spoke she would close the debate, but I had hoped she would have something to say in this regard.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. The Chair did not rush to put the motion. However, if the minister wishes to rise at this time I would point out that if she speaks now she will close the debate.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether it is the intention of the house to debate this bill now, or is it to be referred to one of our standing committees?

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, at one time it was the intention to refer this bill to the broadcasting committee, but it was decided not to deal with it in the standing committee but in committee of the whole house.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the minister? I should like to ask whether it is not true that she has received representations from the people most interested in this industry, the producers and others who have been interested for some time in this regard, and who wish to put forward some improvements in the legislation. There was some difficulty last year in contacting the minister. I think it would be most welcome if the committee could meet with the people specifically involved in this industry. I think many hon. members of the house do not understand the full intent of this measure. In order that we may fully understand the situation in this regard I think the minister should be willing to see these people.

Mr. Prittie: Mr. Speaker, if this matter had been raised in September or October last I would most readily have agreed; but if it is referred to the broadcasting committee, I do not know what will happen. I suggest that this matter will not be resolved by 1969 if it is referred to the committee. Some of the people who represent film making associations came to Ottawa last June and made representations in this respect. I made some notes at that time and I shall be dealing with these matters when we reach the clauses of the bill. I believe we could have dealt with this matter in October or November last, but I think we should now go ahead with it.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal of interest on the part of producers and others involved in this question and I think we should not deal with the question at this time. It would only involve a few weeks to call a couple of meetings of the committee to deal with this subject. If the committee were to study this question, I believe they could direct us as to the best way in which this legislation could be presented. If we do not do this, I believe we may seriously weaken the legislation that is before us today.

Development of Film Industry

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have received absolutely no representations from any source asking for such a matter to be referred to committee. I have not received any such representations from anyone interested. Over the past six or eight months I have not seen anyone connected with the industry who has made representations in this regard; this includes people within and without the country. I know at the present time of no request by anybody to appear before the committee. This piece of legislation has been exposed since June 20 and has been subject to any publicity which might have appeared in the film magazines and film press in this connection. The representations I have received have been connected with such things as distribution and the necessity for producing something which meets certain criteria of Canadians. These have not been matters, I suggest, in which the federal or provincial governments will be affected.

This is not supposed to be a subsidy, as some hon. members have seemed to suggest. We are concerned here with a budget of $2 million or $10 million, but this does not mean that the Canadian government will be involved in the film business. This money is supposed to meet the needs that exist in regard to the producers producing films for world wide distribution. Some films have been produced by Canadian producers. They may apply to this corporation for "front" money or "end" money which is necessary to meet their budgets. Some others may be coming to us for interim money, or guaranteed money in the form of a bonding, as it were. This matter has been dealt with by Mr. Giroux. In other words, it is not a phraseology of the legislation at all. However, I have not any knowledge that there has been any attack on it; it is advice as to how the corporation might function.

The hon. member has suggested that the provinces might be involved in setting up the distribution in this regard. It is no use producing a film and keeping it in a can on some dusty shelf; the corporation should have a package deal in connection with the finished product. It should be placed on the basis of the distributor being able to make the most worth-while use of it under a budget that is realistic. After all, one of the aspects of this fund is a banking fund. I suggest to my colleague from Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) that it is quite different from the ordinary function of the Canada Council, which makes grants. This is more of a banking function; it is to assist people in the Canadian film industry who find it is necessary to receive assistance. This is not a large fund to be used for investment and in which we will become a partner. This money may not last beyond 1967 in our centennial fields, because it takes a long time to get the scenario ready and the arrangements set up with regard to budget arrangements.

I have been told by Canadian film makers, not I might say the one which produced "Nobody Waved Goodbye", which was a National Film Board production, but who have produced others, and particularly the producer of "The Luck of Ginger Coffey", that having once dealt with the distributor they are aware of the pitfalls and know how much more they should receive. Distributing companies are prepared to go along with the distribution of meritorious films, but a number of things must be shown.

Promotion is a big part of distribution as was demonstrated by the film "Nobody Waved Goodbye". Certain things have to be included in the distribution guarantee, but neither the government nor the commission arranges it. An individual cannot come to the Film Development Corporation and say: "Here is the package I want". He must make his arrangements about distribution. We have been concerned about this all along, from the time when the interdepartmental committee first met and began to produce reports to my predecessor, the hon. member for Outremont-Saint-Jean (Mr. Lamontagne) and into the early days when I represented this agency. The officials wished to ensure that the whole spectrum of the industry would be considered and that this should not be a place where people can walk in from the street with a hot idea and receive $2 million to create a film. We know this is something which will have to be handled carefully. This is public money which should be used to promote an industry and not just one film.

One hon. gentleman mentioned the question of dubbing. We consider that this is covered under section 10 (2) (a) which requires a significant Canadian creative artistic content. However, it is not intended that this bill provide the subsidization of Canadian dubbing of foreign films either in English or in French as a major part of the enterprise. The problem raised by the hon. gentleman concerns many individuals in the province of Quebec who would like to see all films dubbed in this country, and not in France. Nevertheless, where French or English dubbing of Canadian films is done, it can be part of the assistance granted under this legislation.

I should like to say one last word in reply to the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke, who suggested that a film such as Dr. Zhivago could not be produced in this country. I would suggest that there is no reason why it could not be produced here, provided there were Canadian stars and Canadian people both in front of and behind the cameras, and that the script was written by a Canadian so that in fact it had a largely Canadian content. There should be no restriction on the origin of the ideas which are produced into a screen play.

This leads me to one last point, namely the question of whether I or the members of the board will be the ones to judge as to the morality in the plays. I suggest that if any of the vital elements of the passions of human beings are excised completely from any films in which the Canadian Development Corporation might invest, there really would not be much left in which to invest. We have to remember that films which are most popular are those which are a reflection of life. I do not think we should produce licentious films, but we want to produce films which are of good commercial quality and of value. Our purpose is to promote and develop an industry and not to produce one or two art films for which Canada has already become famous.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Churchill: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Richard in the chair.

Mr. Prittie: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. You said that the motion was agreed to on division. I want to know for the record whether in fact there was a division or whether it was agreed to unanimously.

The Deputy Chairman: Yes, there was a division.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a general remark on clause 2. I regret that the house is faced with having to make a decision on this bill today. I do not think for one moment that we can complete debate on this bill in the committee of the whole house today. I say this for the following reason. On checking over the debate that took place on June 20 and after listening to the debate today I find that there is a division of opinion in the house. Some hon. members are absent today as they did not expect this bill to come up for discussion.

When the bill was first discussed on June 20 one or two hon. members on both sides of the house expressed opposition to it. To protect their position I think we should make sure that they are given a chance to speak on this bill at some stage or another. The very fact that, as the minister said, the bill has been exposed since June 20 does not mean that it has been considered. I made a calculation that by six o'clock tonight the house will not have spent more than three hours in discussing a bill which is considered to be of considerable importance, and in considering a proposed expenditure of $10 million.

I do not think that three hours is adequate time to spend on a bill of this nature, and to consider a proposed expenditure of that magnitude. I suggest that the house should be a little more cautious and should not proceed so rapidly on this particular measure. The minister does not seem to be overly enthusiastic about the bill or she would have made a statement on the opening of the debate on second reading, which she did not do. It was only under some pressure that she consented to make a statement at the conclusion of second reading. So that all we have had from the minister is what she said to us on the resolution stage way back on June 20. Several very important comments were made this afternoon and there are some hon. members here who are very interested in this measure. I think their case should be heard and so should the point of view of other hon. members who, at the resolution stage, expressed serious opposition to it. That being the case this committee should adopt a responsible attitude and take its time in dealing with this measure.

I hope that hon. members will believe me when I tell them that I am speaking in good faith and that I do not just want to delay the bill. I want responsible consideration of it. I have an open mind and I am prepared to be convinced that this is an essential feature in Canadian public life.

Development of Film Industry

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak on this point of order. The hon. gentleman has ignored the fact that this legislation has been called every day of the week. Surely all hon. members are expected to be in the house during the week, and would have had the opportunity to find out when this legislation would come up. The hon. gentleman said that there is some disagreement. I suppose there is some disagreement on everything, including the colour of one's eyes. But generally hon. members have shown pretty general agreement with respect to this matter.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Hon. members on all sides of the house have had some very interesting contributions to make. When the hon. member suggests I have refused to say anything I would point out to him that I have given up my right to speak first so that other hon. members may have an opportunity to make more lengthy remarks. Following that, I will answer them to the best of my ability. I would be very happy, if hon. members gave proper consideration to each of the clauses as they came up, to let the matter be dealt with at once.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Chairman, with regard to my request for information, one of the questions that bothers me is the production of films. Sometimes we in Canada have a perverted sense of nationalism. For instance, we note the feeling in the C.B.C. that to produce a Canadian show all of the personnel involved, from the director down, through the technicians to the actors and actresses, should be Canadians.

It has become obvious that this attitude has slowed down the development of Canadian talent. In the fields of basketball, American football and Canadian hockey we have found that if a country does not know anything about these sports they import the best they can get in these particular fields of endeavour into their own countries, so their local boys can learn the necessary techniques.

We have seen this occur very dramatically in Canadian hockey, where just a generation ago there was hardly a nation in the world could stand up even to the most average of Canadian teams. So successful have these countries been in importing a few Canadian coaches and players that today Canada is very hard put to match these other countries in our own native sport.

In the matter of film making we have in Canada today a number of directors who I think would match directors of almost any other country in the particular line in which they are skilled. However, these directors in Canada are forced, under our unique sense of nationalism, to hire actors and actresses from the Canadian pool who may not be the type of actors or actresses required to fit into a particular role.

I am not going to develop this theme, because I am talking about a field of which I know very little, other than what I learned from my own investigations some years ago. Therefore I simply suggest that one of the criteria which should be applied in the choosing of people to receive awards under this particular bill should be that of making sure that the wrong type of nationalism, will not be a limiting factor.

I am a nationalist, Mr. Chairman, and I want to see a Canadian film industry developed. I know that individuals and companies in Canada have made tremendous efforts and sometimes lost a great deal of money trying to develop a commercial type of film. Over and over again they have been trapped by the fact that the Canadian market is insufficient to carry their product. But the minute they try to come into the field and produce a film for the C.B.C., for example, they are caught by the type of attitude which dictates that you can only hire people who are Canadian citizens.

Ultimately we want to see more and more people reaching technical excellence as directors, as lighting and stage technicians and in all phases of good film making, as well as in the field of acting. We know we have these people because they have been a success in other countries. But if the chief criterion in setting up a Canadian film industry is that the Canadian Film Development Corporation can hire only Simon-pure Canadians, then we would be limiting ourselves and would not be able to produce the best scenario, the best actors and actresses or the best technical standards.

I do not think we should try to put restrictions of this sort on our film producers. If these people need a certain type of director or require technical people with certain qualifications for a certain job, then they should be allowed to hire the people they want. We know that the production of Disney films in Canada has involved the use of Canadian technical personnel by the Disney Corporation almost exclusively, and we have had tremendously fine results. This industry could be a two-way street, but what we are after is something which we can sell.

The final point I wish to make is in the form of a question. The minister indicated the difficulty involved in distribution, what I would call the marketing. The fundamental weakness is that today's market for films requires to be composed of a good many more millions of people than we have in Canada. The market must be sufficiently broad to carry the cost of production of a film.

Marketing films would involve a lot of tie-ups with international distribution agencies, but the minister has said that this is a costly arrangement. One reason above all others that I support this legislation is that I have seen Canadian enterprises in this field fail before. I hope that the money supplied, even though it comes from the state, as it does in other countries, will help these people break through the barriers that now exist against ordinary Canadian companies becoming big enough financially to cope with the tremendous production costs and distributive costs in other countries. What we need is a market for Canadian films which will be sufficient to ensure that it is a pay-off operation, which in time will enable it to accumulate enough capital of its own.

With those few remarks and with the warning I issued earlier, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister whether there is any intention of making this corporation subject to the sort of restrictive and narrow nationalism about which I warned her at the beginning of my remarks.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, the very fact that films must be commercially viable is an indication that individually talented people either before or behind the camera would be part of any package. It may be that the film will be 100 per cent Canadian in content, but we have not put a percentage into the bill, as will be seen by a reference to clause 10(2). I understand that in the United Kingdom they use a percentage in the neighbourhood of 80 to 85 per cent, but we have made this bill more flexible. However, looking at the whole thing, the film must have Canadian content.

Mr. Hamilton: Do I understand that even though we have a lower percentage there must be a large Canadian content to warrant support?

Miss LaMarsh: One of the matters mentioned in the resolution, Mr. Chairman, was that we did not want pirate companies to come in and just use Canadian tax moneys to make a profit. That is why the films are generally to be of a Canadian nature or of Canadian content, somewhere in line with the averages described in the B.B.G. lists.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. It being six o'clock it is my duty to rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask about the business for next week.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, before we reach that might I speak to my hon. friend who has asked about adequate consideration by hon. members opposite. In view of such extremely inclement weather outside and the fact that it would be difficult to go anywhere, might I suggest that in order to consider the matter further we might not see the clock for some time? In this way we could give further consideration to this bill, for which we want so much time made available.

Mr. Churchill: This is very interesting, and I should like to respond favourably, but we sat until after eleven o'clock last night on another bill. In any event, today we expected to take up Bill No. S-9, having to do with the Interpretation Act. One member of our party, who had an excellent speech prepared, did not make it because the government changed its policy or program. All I ask this government to do is to be consistent, to make up its mind on the program it wishes to follow. I would prefer to recognize the clock and to call it six o'clock.

Mr. Turner: To answer a question of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, the Interpretation Act was sent to the committee on justice and legal affairs earlier this day.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, but the hon. member will recognize that we had to bail out the minister, who wanted it to go to committee.

Mr. Turner: I do not think there was any bailing out.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) bailed him out.

Mr. Turner: In any event the order of business for Monday is as follows: item No. 107, second reading of Bill C-243, an act to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

Mr. Churchill: That is enough.

Mr. Turner: Then, when that item has been successfully concluded we hope to take item No. 62, continuing the committee stage on Bill C-204, to establish a Canadian Film Development Corporation. If that is proceeded with successfully, we hope to take item No. 83, second reading of Bill C-220 relating to the Immigration Appeal Board. Should there be time available to the house we would then take item No. 116, the resolution relating to a measure to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act. Should the house still be in the mood, we would consider item No. 120, second reading of Bill S-55, to provide for relief in certain cases against loss of hardship suffered as the result of interruptions of normal postal services.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the minister whether that order of business will hold for the entire week.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Speaker, that may be reviewed on Monday.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): May I ask the minister a question? As we shall not come back to the Film Development Corporation bill on Monday, would it not be possible to refer that bill to a committee, as the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre suggested, rather than letting it languish for another six months on the order paper?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. A decision has already been taken about that.

It being five minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, January 30, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

• (2:40 p.m.)

HOUSING

ANNOUNCEMENT OF POLICY OF DIRECT LOANS TO BUILDERS

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a brief statement concerning housing policy.

Additions to the housing stock in Canada reached a record level in 1966, with the completion of 162,192 new dwellings. Constructions starts, however, at 134,474 units were down 19.3 per cent, and this decline is reflected in the number of units under construction at the end of the year.

The reasons for the decline in starts and dwellings under construction are well known, I think, to most hon. members in this house. On more than one occasion I have indicated that demands on private capital resources were exerting undue restraint on residential construction in most parts of Canada. For this reason assurances were given that direct lending by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation would provide for at least as many starts and new dwellings in 1966 as in 1965.

I should like to draw to the attention of members that in actual fact direct federal loans in 1966 increased by more than 10 per cent in terms of units and 18 per cent in terms of dollar volume. With some moderation in prospect this year in other demands on the economy and with an additional source of mortgage funds provided, I hope, by the proposed amendments to the Bank Act, we can, I believe, be somewhat more optimistic concerning housebuilding in 1967. Other incentives should arise from the November amendments to the National Housing Act and from the formula introduced to automatically adjust the interest rate on loans under the act.

However, Mr. Speaker, it will take time for these forces to exert maximum impact in the residential construction field, and the government has authorized Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to institute a spring program of direct loans to builders. This program will be similar to recent annual fall direct lending activity that was so successful in encouraging winter construction and stabilizing employment during winter months for workers generally.

Effective March 1, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will accept applications from merchant builders for loans to be made in the period April 1 to May 31 inclusive, without a presale requirement. Federal funds will be available for up to 20,000 new dwelling units during that two month period. I would estimate that some 16,000 of these units will take the form of single family dwellings for home ownership and about 4,000 will be rental units in smaller communities and in new resource areas.

While we hope it will be possible to introduce this special program without a quota arrangement, loans to any builder will not exceed his physical and financial capacities nor will lending in major centres be permitted to drain off excess amounts at the expense of resource or growth areas and smaller centres where the need for both home owner and rental housing is acute.

Of necessity, the program will be kept under close review. Its purpose, simply stated, is to ensure immediate stimulation of housebuilding activity.

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister started off by stating that he was going to make an announcement on housing policy. Well, Mr. Speaker, if the housing policy of this government consists of merely providing 20,000 direct loans, then in my opinion it is no policy whatever.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, when the government raised the National Housing Act interest rate by a full 1 percentage point last year they increased the cost of housebuilding to the point where today a person with an average income cannot afford to buy a house under the National Housing Act. This cost was aggravated by the 11 per cent sales tax. Because of the shortage of housing there was a tremendous competition for the available housing, and that competition again raised the cost of houses. For many months we have been urging that the government should have made available more direct loans. When the minister raised the interest rate to 7¼ per cent he certainly implied that this should make available from private lenders all the money that would be necessary. Now he admits that this is not the case, and makes provision for another 20,000 houses by way of direct loans.

The minister has not made any proposal to solve the problem of those Canadians who earn in the neighbourhood of $5,000 annually. It is impossible for these people to build under the National Housing Act. I believe also that the provision for loans up to an amount of 10,000 in respect of existing houses, as we warned the minister, also has proven to be insufficient. It is my understanding that very few applications have been received. I submit that before long the minister will be forced to increase that amount in order to achieve the objective the government has in mind.

The government has not made any mention of further measures to assist low income families. Last year not many more than 2,000 rental units were provided for low income families in Canada. The Senate report on aging showed there are something in the order of 300,000 Canadians who are in immediate urgent need of low cost low rental housing.

Mr. Speaker, I think there will be nothing but disappointment in all parts of Canada with this minor change in the policy of the government in respect of housing.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, whether the government is aware of it or not this country is facing a housing crisis. The proposal the minister has announced today is about as adequate to meet the housing crisis as it would be to feed a peanut to an elephant in the hope of assuaging its hunger. The proposal the minister has outlined to make direct loans to the builders to enable them to construct some 20,000 housing units certainly will be of help to the builders, but it will be of little assistance to the people who really need houses and who are in the moderate income brackets.

As the minister himself has admitted, one would need an income of $8,000 or more per annum in order to buy a house today. The latest figures show that a house which cost $25,000 in 1966 could have been purchased in 1965 for $20,000. The cost of property is going up, and the housing program the minister has announced will benefit mainly those persons whose incomes are such that they can afford to pay the very large price that is involved here.

My colleagues the hon. member for Danforth and the hon. member for Broadview have been urging the minister over the past two or three years to announce a housing policy of direct loans to persons desirous of becoming home owners and not just to builders; that is, to the people in the middle income groups. The government is in a position to borrow money at much lower rates than the average individual can borrow money even under the National Housing Act. Unless the government is prepared to make very large sums of money available to prospective home owners by means of direct loans, the people in the middle income groups are not going to be in a position to buy or build homes.

We hope the government will take some cognizance of the request that homes be made available, by means of direct lending, without a down payment and at low interest rates. We hope some such action will be taken to reduce the cost to those people who want to buy lots.

The last report carried in the Toronto Daily Star indicated that people in the metropolitan Toronto area were paying as much as $10,000 per lot. That price makes it prohibitive for individuals with incomes of $4,000, $5,000 or $6,000 per year to purchase homes.

We have been urging the government, and urge them again, to embark upon a large scale public housing program which will make homes available to a great number of Canadians who today have no hope of owning homes under the present provisions of the N.H.A. It is not enough for the minister to compare housing starts and housing completions with those of 1965. Under present circumstances there has to be a greatly accelerated program. It is estimated that something over a million new homes are needed in Canada. The present tepid and inadequate approach will not give very much encouragement to those Canadian people who are looking for homes in which to live. There is little value in having an affluent society when at the same time thousands of young couples have no means to build houses in which to live and raise families.

We hope the government will make some announcement very soon in respect of a housing policy rather than give us bits and pieces which, added together, indicate that it really has no policy and no imaginative approach to this very serious housing crisis.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I wish on this occasion I could congratulate the Minister of Labour, but I am afraid I cannot. Following the mini skirt budget brought in by the Minister of Finance, we have observed the Minister of Labour attempt to apply a band aid policy to a serious situation. That is a "band aid" policy rather than a "bandit" policy, but perhaps the second meaning is not far off the mark.

I think the announcement is somewhat ambiguous and falsifies the facts. Some 20,000 new starts are to be made, but it is clearly understood that they will not necessarily have to be sold prior to the commencement of construction. I understand why the minister has made that provision. The new houses will not be sold to that category of individuals we desire to help. They cannot afford them.

Perhaps it would be of value for the Minister of Labour to consult with the Minister of Finance, because this whole problem is of a financial nature. This government appears to be operating much like a finance company. The cost of money and of construction in respect of houses is so high they are beyond the means of the ordinary wage earner in this country. I suggest that we are not helping to solve the housing crisis which exists at the present time in Canada.

The difficulty now faced in the housing industry in Canada is not the result of people not wanting to buy houses, but results from the fact they cannot afford them at the present time. We have serious credit restrictions in effect, and we are faced with an 11 per cent tax on building materials. This increases the cost of construction and is an influencing factor in respect of weakening our economy. The minister has suggested that this might be counteracted or resolved when amendments to the Bank Act are passed. I do not believe that will be the case, because banks do not necessarily have sufficient funds to make available mortgage money in respect of the number of houses we need to solve this shortage in the country. We saw them a year ago asking permission to lower their reserves to permit them to operate, because they were working with a tight-belt system. They are not in any better position at the moment, and the situation will not get any better in future. The cost of living is too high to allow the situation to improve.

This policy does not contribute to lowering the cost of living. The fact that we can build 20,000 houses does not mean they can be sold. The contractors will be asked to support this cost, and it will not help the situation one way or the other. It is just a band aid solution or a band aid applied to a major problem for which we need a major cure. The minister certainly has not given us that major cure today.

Housing Policy of Direct Loans

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have been told on many occasions that we ought to be thankful for small mercies. Even though I agree with many of the criticisms that have been voiced today I want to express appreciation for the small step that has been taken by the government in further attempting to meet the housing problem that exists in Canada today.

I remember the Liberal party proclaiming the fact that they were interested in assisting Canadians to own their own homes. That was a very commendable objective, but we have found during the past months, and indeed the past two or three years, that many of the policies that have been followed by the government have really worked against this objective. Instead of helping our people to own and live in their own homes, these policies have practically placed homes beyond the reach of many thousands of individuals.

In his statement the minister referred to the demands on private capital resources which were exerting undue restraint on residential construction. We in the Social Credit party have maintained for years that the government ought to make use of the Bank of Canada for its social capital requirements. We believe that if the government would use the Bank of Canada to meet its social capital requirements it would take the pressure off the private capital supply, so there would be substantial amounts of money available to carry on the business of this nation and also to enable our people to acquire housing and the other facilities that are required.

I agree that the price of housing today is far beyond the reach of many thousands of would-be home owners. One reason among many is the fact that interest rates have climbed to such an extent as to pretty well take housing out of the reach of those in the middle or low income brackets.

The suggestion that this measure will provide for 20,000 new dwellings is, I think, entirely inadequate. The minister of manpower, I believe, has announced that additional endeavours will be made to encourage immigration to this country. If with this consideration you couple the need of housing for new family formations in Canada, I suggest that 20,000 units is far, far too few to in any way meet the demand in this field. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, while expressing appreciation for small mercies, we are looking for bigger mercies in the days that lie ahead.

House of Commons

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION TO AMEND PROVISIONAL STANDING ORDER RESPECTING ADJOURNMENT FOR MEALS

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like at this stage to move a motion based on rule 41 affecting the times of meeting of this house. The motion is expressed in the following terms. Moved by myself, seconded by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr):

That provisional standing order No. 6 be amended by adding after subsection (1) the following:

(2) At 6:00 o'clock p.m. on Mondays and Tuesdays and at 7:00 o'clock p.m. on Thursdays, Mr. Speaker shall leave the chair until 8:00 o'clock p.m.

(3) At 1:00 o'clock p.m. on any day upon which a morning sitting of the house is held Mr. Speaker shall leave the chair until 2:30 o'clock p.m. and that the present subsections (2) (3) and (4) be renumbered (4) (5) and (6).

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order. As some members will suspect, there is some doubt as to whether this motion is acceptable at this time, and I would certainly like to hear the hon. member on the point of order. I suggest to him that this is a type of motion which can hardly be moved without notice, even at this time. If the hon. member wants to submit an argument refuting my suggestion I would be pleased to hear him. If not, I am prepared to enter a ruling on the point.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say something on that point of order. The reason for not giving notice of my motion is based on standing order 41 and on the precedent in 1951 when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) presented a motion to extend the sitting hours, which was followed by a debate on the point order which I am now raising. Mr. Speaker Beaudoin found that it was within the right of a member to make such a motion without giving prior notice because it dealt with the hours of sitting of the house and not with days of sittings or with the adjournment.

My motion is based on the standing orders, with the sole exception of that section of my motion which deals with the retention of the private member's hour on Thurdays from 6 to 7 p.m. I admit that this could have been expressed in another way, namely by saying that the hours of sitting of the house shall be on Mondays and Tuesdays from 2.30 p.m. to 6 p.m. and from 8 p.m. to 10 p.m. and on Thursdays from 2.30 p.m. to 7 p.m. and from 8 p.m. to 10 p.m., and on Fridays from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. and 2.30 p.m. to 6 p.m. However, the wording of the two parts of my motion which indirectly determine the hours of sitting of the house by informing the house that the Speaker may vacate the chair at certain specified periods is based on the standing order.

I suggest that since my motion deals solely with the times of sittings of the house it is covered under standing order 41 and therefore is in order. Standing order 41 reads as follows:

Forty eight hours' notice shall be given of a motion for leave to present a bill, resolution or address, for the appointment of any committee, or for placing a question on the order paper; but this rule shall not apply to bills after their introduction, or to private bills, or to the times of meeting or adjournment of the house.

It was under that standing order that I felt I was within my right in making my motion without giving prior notice.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Kamloops wish to support that argument?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I was going to say that one further consideration might be taken into account by Your Honour, namely that the standing order says——this rule shall not apply to bills after their introduction, or to private bills or to the times of meeting or adjournment of the house.

I doubt very much whether Your Honour would reject the motion on these narrow grounds; however, if Your Honour were to say that this standing order does not apply to the motion by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre one could say equally well that a motion having to do with a dinner recess has nothing to do with the actual hours of meeting or adjournment of the house. This is the only ground on which it could possibly be held that the motion is not covered by standing order 41. I am sure Your Honour will not rule on that narrow ground, because surely the words "times of meeting or adjournment of the house" include the hours of sitting and the arrangements for the sittings of the house.

There is one other point I should like to ask Your Honour to consider in making your ruling. If Your Honour were to say, for instance, that this motion has nothing to do with the hours of meeting or adjournment of the house but is a motion to suspend the standing order, and Your Honour were inclined to rule against the motion on that basis, would you then give us a moment to change the wording of the motion so it would read "for the balance of this session the hours of sitting shall be"? This might bring the motion into line with what may be Your Honour's feeling as a result of its present wording. We would appreciate the opportunity to reword the motion if Your Honour feels that it is not in order under standing order 41.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Although I would like to hear the government house leader, and so would hon. members, I am sure, I really do not think we should do so at this time. I have given serious thought to the motion proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, and I think I owe it to him to mention that he was thoughtful enough to give me advance notice of it at 2.30, which gave me an opportunity to consult the authorities and satisfy myself that the motion cannot be accepted on a number of grounds.

It is admitted that this is a type of motion that cannot be made at this time by virtue of the standing orders unless prior notice is given. I refer hon. members to citation 10 of Beauchesne, which reads as follows:

> A motion for such temporary suspension requires notice under standing order 41, but in urgent cases the notice can be waived under standing order 42.

Of course standing order 42 requires unanimous consent, and certainly if unanimous consent could be obtained it would not even be necessary to make a ruling on this point of order. However, the citation refers to standing order 41 on which the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre based his case.

The hon. member referred to a precedent in 1951, which I have also consulted and which, I might say, causes a slight problem. That is based on standing order 41, to the effect that the motions allowed on routine proceedings are motions relating to the business of the house. Of course the motion relates to the business of the house, but there is no indication that notice of such motions is dispensed with. This type of motion can be considered, but they require notice. It is obvious to me that the exception dealing with the hours of sitting on one particular day was very limited in application. I am assured there is not a single precedent for it other than the one that was referred to, and it seems to me that since then our procedure has evolved. It has even been suggested sometimes that our procedure has become stagnant, but perhaps it is not that stagnant since it appears to change to the extent where Beauchesne's citation 88(2) states:

> All motions referring to the business of the house should be introduced by the leader of the house.

However, such a motion introduced by the government leader would require notice.

For these reasons I regret very much that it is not possible for me to accept the motion as presently proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I know I am not in order in speaking on this point after you have given your ruling, but I think this is a very important matter, which will save a great deal of time in the days ahead if these particular hours of sitting are agreed to. There is considerable discussion about whether we should or should not have a dinner adjournment. I should like to ask whether there is unanimous consent to the adoption of this motion. I think we would be able to proceed in a more orderly fashion in the days ahead.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am completely amazed at the method of proceeding today. There has been no request made on this subject, and no intimation on the part of the hon. gentleman opposite that any such proposal would be made. Under these circumstances I do think it would not be appropriate to adopt this motion. Since we are to consider the second reading of a bill, I do not believe any hardship will be imposed on any hon. members if we refuse consent at this time.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. Churchill: I rise on a question of privilege to refute the statement made by the house leader. This matter was discussed before Christmas, and the house leader informed me that when the house opened in January he would get the consent of the house so we would not be faced with the situation of repeatedly asking for a luncheon or supper break. Nothing has been done since to obtain that consent, so we are still going through this silly procedure. On some occasions a minister will grant the request and on other occasions a minister will petulantly refuse it. This is the situation in which the house finds itself. Members generally do not want to sit through the luncheon or supper period. It was for this reason I tried to have the situation corrected.

Concurrence in Committee Report

INDIAN AFFAIRS, HUMAN RIGHTS AND CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

CONCURRENCE IN FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Milton L. Klein (Cartier) moved:

That the fourth report of the standing committee on Indian affairs, human rights and citizenship and immigration, presented to the house on Thursday, January 26, 1967, be concurred in.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): This motion, Mr. Speaker, gives us an opportunity to draw to the attention of the house something which I think is not good both in so far as this particular committee and committees in general are concerned. In order to give effect to a decision of the house made in July of last year, this report asks that certain actions be taken with respect to the operations of the committee. I want to point out some of the proceedings that have taken place with respect to this committee in relation to its desire to visit Indian communities. I am not the least bit happy about most of the things that have taken place.

It may well be that the house will want to make a different kind of decision with regard to the motion before us, and accordingly, I think we should look at the record of the committee. On May 19 last the committee met and heard an opening presentation by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. At that meeting I suggested, and I quote from the committee proceedings, page 11:

—by establishing a subcommittee and requesting permission of the house to visit these native people in their homes and villages to find out, at first hand their various problems.

The minister was quite amenable to that suggestion, except in a larger context, and he made reference to it on page 13 of the committee report as follows:

—I want to comment on Mr. Howard's suggestion. I do not think that I would be wrong in telling you that a suggestion has already been made to us along a parallel line of something in the nature of a continuing committee to do just this thing.

Farther down the page he is reported as saying:

But a continuing committee to make a check here and a check there, Mr. Chairman, I think has tremendous merit.

The committee proceeded along until June 16 of last year when it made a report to the house. I think this report is worth quoting because it indicates the desire and intention of the committee last summer:

Your committee recommends:

(1) That it be granted leave to resolve itself into three subcommittees composed of seven members each, to be named by the chairman in consultation with the subcommittee on agenda and procedure, for the purpose of obtaining further information relating to matters affecting Indians and living conditions of Indian communities, and so report from time to time to the house through the main committee.

(2) That these subcommittee be granted leave to sit while the house is sitting when meeting outside the precincts of parliament and to sit notwithstanding any adjournment of the house—

I do not know what happened to that report, but the first thing we knew the government came along with a substitute motion. Somehow or other this substitute motion was imposed upon the legitimate desire of the committee to break into subcommittees and another order of reference was passed on July 13. This order of reference, conceived somewhere in the back room, I submit, made no mention whatever of subcommittees. Instead it authorized the committee itself to adjourn from place to place for the purpose of obtaining information.

We went from July 13 until November 18 before there was a possibility of the committee even meeting to decide to what extent it was going to visit the Indian communities. This meeting did not come about even then until a question was asked in the house as to when the committee was going to meet to consider these matters. The committee met on November 18 but there was not even a quorum, not even enough interest amongst members of the committee to try to work out something practical.

Subsequently there was a meeting on November 22. At that meeting, as members who were present will recall, an itinerary was presented. This itinerary was either developed by someone who did not know the first thing about Indian affairs or did not want the committee to make an in depth examination of the problems of the Indians. The itinerary, to which I objected as did other members of the committee, was a brush-fire operation. It involved the spending of an hour here and an hour there in Indian communities except for one visit to the Indian community of Caughnawaga. In any event, the committee went ahead and endorsed the idea of that particular visit, even though most of the time would be spent in travelling and little time in meeting the people. However, there was not a sufficient number of members of that committee who expressed a desire to go on the trip, so it had to be cancelled.

Now, near the end of January, many months after the matter was raised in the committee and a desire was expressed to have meetings of this sort, the committee once again is making a report and a recommendation which in substance repeats the report that was made in June of last year and was pushed to one side by the government. It was superseded by another motion which the government said would better serve the interests of the committee. The report before us now reads in part as follows:

In order to facilitate the implementation of this order—

That is the government order of last July.

—your committee recommends that it be empowered to appoint subcommittees of not less than five members, which will report to the main committee but will enjoy all the other powers which have been granted to the committee.

I submit that there has been an inordinately long delay in the operations of the committee, a committee which has within its grasp the full range of social and economic problems confronting the Indian people. This committee is concerned intimately with the welfare of human beings in this nation, not with something apart from the rights of people.

I think it is a sad commentary on the interest of members of the house, of the committee members and of parliament in general that the legitimate desires of those who wanted to do something worth while, constructive and instructive in the field of Indian affairs could not be met. The Prime Minister made a pronouncement the other day about the business between now and the end of the session. I think his deadline was March 10. If the session is to conclude by March 10 I submit it serves no great purpose to pass this motion because there has been procrastination and the government has been permitted to interfere in the operations of the committee ever since last June, whereas the committee might have been doing something worth while and constructive in looking into these matters during that time.

It is up to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to bring to us something which will put into effect the suggestion he made on May 19. The minister suggested a form of continuing committee, as he put it. I submit this is what we must now do by legislation or otherwise. We must give authority to the Indian affairs committee to establish itself in such a way that it will be in continuous existence and operation. It should be a committee whose roving commission extends beyond the end of a session because we know that, under the present rules, once the session prorogues that is the end of committees for the time being and we have to start again.

I want to say also that last June the committee members, having passed the motion recommending the necessity of establishing subcommittees, desirous of and anticipating the opportunity to travel to Indian communities for the first time in the history of Canada, acting in good faith and thinking that this would be one way to make an incisive inquiry into Indian affairs, to become acquainted with the Indian people and their problems in different parts of the nation, gave only a passing scrutiny to the estimates of the Indian affairs branch with the understanding that they would have the opportunity to visit Indian communities and meet the Indians there. The committee gave a scanty examination to the estimates. In common with other committee members I also scantily examined the estimates. We felt that the motion that committee had passed in mid-June asking for authority to set up subcommittees would be agreed to. In fact, information was given to us that the government had supported that concept.

Then on July 13 we found that was not so but that there was another motion involving the full committee. The consequence was that the desires the committee had expressed last June were stifled. Now, many months later, an attempt is finally being made to try to undo the damage the government did to that committee and get back to the situation in which we were last June.

I submit that mere passage of the motion, with the time available to us between now and the end of the session, will give the committee members and those interested in the matter not much time to make any sort of examination in depth or to search out some of the crucial difficulties existing in Indian affairs. Believe me, Mr. Speaker, they are many. I do not want to go into the concern of Indian people with respect to the activities of the Indian affairs branch, but there is a growing insistence by the native people that they run their own affairs. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) has just shown me a newspaper clipping indicating that the Indian band at Alert Bay, not having had an Indian agent for some time because the gentleman resigned or was transferred, has passed a motion to the effect that they will go ahead themselves and appoint their own agent, and to heck with the federal government.

I fully support that attitude. In many cases it would be just as well to have the Indian agents chosen by the Indians because this was the original concept. I only point to that as an example of the great dissatisfaction developing among Indian people. Their dissatisfaction is noticeable across the land. There was the massive march of the Wabasca people a while ago and the march of the people of the Cowichan reserve on Vancouver island who, trying to obtain redress for their housing problems, tried to march to the Indian affairs branch headquarters in Vancouver. It is shown by the situation on the St. Regis reserve, and by the complete collapse and blow-up of community development.

All these things show that there is a festering discontent. The time has long passed when parliament and the government can ignore the demand of the Indian people to do things for themselves. To look at the interests of the Indian people was the concept the committee members had last year. If the committee had had an opportunity to visit the Indians, to see some of these communities, undoubtedly it would have been able to speed alterations and changes in our Indian legislation. May I say in passing that when we heard the Prime Minister declare the business for this and the subsequent session a few days ago it was a matter of extreme regret to me and many others that he made no reference whatever to Indian affairs. This is another indication of the lack of interest of the government in this matter.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I also have been disturbed by what has happened in this committee. I intend to support the motion because it may do something to remedy the damage that has been done. The difficulty that has arisen in this committee and in the committee system generally arises from the fact that the whole system has broken down. Too many committees have sat at the same time. There have been too many meetings and too many members trying to be in two places at once and not managing to do so. Too many committees have travelled at a time when other committees have been trying to sit.

This committee, as has been said several times, made an effort to organize itself to make trips to Indian reserves. Departmental officials tried to organize the trips in some instances but the results were not satisfactory. The timetable was too short. Frankly, the members did not co-operate to make these trips a success.

I support the motion only because, by reducing the number of members who will go to Indian reserves, something may now be done. It was well that the hon. member for Skeena raised this point because he has shown not only what has happened in this committee but what has happened to many committees of the house during the session. The whole affair has been badly managed. Too many committees have sat at the same time and too few members have been able to attend each committee. I believe that all of us have to reconsider our position in connection with committees. If the members on the government side in charge of the organization of committees cannot arrange to cut down their number, then we shall have to insist on more members making a tremendous effort to get to these meetings.

I believe I am a member of five or six committees and sub-committees, but I find that the situation in this particular committee is the worst of all. I understand that through no fault of the chairman or of any individual it has been jammed in with other committees. This has led to a bad experience for those who serve on it, and for the Indians, too. On at least one occasion, and perhaps on two, the Indian representatives were prepared to appear before the committee and the meeting had to be cancelled.

I support the motion, and I certainly hope that in the new session a great deal more thought will be given to the amount of committee work members of this house can handle. The number of these committees will have to be reduced, and members will have to attend the meetings better if they are to be successful.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I wish to support the proposition advanced by the hon. member for Skeena and referred to by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka, and I want to do so in a non-partisan fashion. Behind the bland façade of this motion lies one of the most shameful chapters in Canadian history.

The intent of this committee, approved by the minister, constituted a genuine effort on the part of members of this house to direct attention in a really positive way to some constructive suggestions. The trouble is there has been a mere trickle of facts and help concealed in a veritable waterfall, a Niagara of words. There is need for more than that. This was to have been an attempt by members of this house to take justice out to the areas where justice was needed, an attempt by members of this committee, divided into subcommittees, to go to areas where there were genuine problems, really serious and difficult problems.

I know that when I went back to my constituency in the summer I spoke to band councillors five or six hundred miles north of Edmonton saying that this was what the parliament of Canada intended to do, and that in due course there would be official visitors in the shape of members of parliament going to those areas, as subcommittee members, to talk to the people. The very fact that a microcosm of parliament was ready to appear on an Indian reserve and was willing to entertain objections and complaints, the legitimate complaints of the people in that area was a wonderful thing.

I know the minister's views. I think he felt the same way. I think this illustrates the almost complete breakdown of our committee structure. We hear a lot of talk about parliament reforming itself. I do not think parliament wants to reform itself. I do not think it knows how. I will not refer to matters which have been decided by the house. I did attempt to inject a method by which members of the house could take some authority into their own hands and deal, in committees or subcommittees, with urgent problems as they rose without having to wait for government action. This suggestion was rejected.

I hope the committee on procedure which is being set up will take due note of what has been said here today, and direct its attention to this serious problem. If the committees are to work properly a great deal more attention will have to be paid to their organization. If they do not work, then I do not think parliament will work.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I will support this motion in the spirit in which the hon. member for Fraser Valley supported the minister earlier when he dealt with the statement on housing. I will support this motion because there is really nothing else one can do at this stage. It should be obvious to every member of this house that there is not much a committee can do during the short period of time which remains before this session of parliament comes to an end.

As happens toward the conclusion of every session, we are confronted with a heavy backlog of work. Members find it difficult to agree upon a time at which they can be away from the house. It seems to me the house should approve the motion proposed by the chairman of the committee, but that the government should give consideration to setting up the new committee very early in the new session so that in 1967 the committee can do the work it was unable to do in 1966.

I wish to join with the hon. member for Skeena in deploring the kind of itinerary which was proposed for the committee. The major reason I said I would not make the trip when I was asked to do so was that it is completely useless for a member of a committee to spend an hour or two on a reserve. Those of us who know anything about Indians—most of us are not very knowledgeable, and this includes all members of the house on all sides, including most of the people we have had as ministers; this is not a criticism—know that if a committee goes into a reserve for two or three hours the only things members have an opportunity to learn are the things which the department wants them to learn, the things which the deputy minister, the commissioner and the agent want them to learn. The agenda is lined up. The speakers are lined up. What members of the committee hear is the official line. Surely every member of the house recognizes that often there is nothing so misleading as the official line.

I was one who attended the meeting at which members of the Ontario Union of Indians made representations regarding their hunting rights. I can tell the minister that the Indians who were present were most dissatisfied with the response they received. I can tell the minister, in case he does not know, that there is a great feeling among the Indians across this country that the community development program announced with such great fanfare a couple of years ago is now in a state of complete disorganization, and that among Indians and people interested in Indian problems there is a feeling that the whole program might as well be washed out altogether because it is nothing, really, but a paper plan.

One merely needs to look for the people who came into the department to plan this program to see that hardly any of them are left. They have gone. One went to the Prime Minister's anti-poverty secretariat, another to a teaching post at a university; a third, who was on contract, did not have his contract renewed. Why did all these people leave? This is something the committee should look into. I hope the committee will look into this matter in depth after we have had the opportunity to visit some of the reserves.

I will support this motion. I hope the committee will get on and do its work not only in the next month or two but very early in the 1967 session.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): On this issue, my hon. friends and I agree entirely with what the hon. member for Skeena has stated. I do this even at the risk of being called an N.D.P.'er. I do not mind that. I have been called worse than that; I have been called a Liberal.

The minister himself might well do something about this matter. Possibly he would agree to the establishment of a permanent commission to look into these problems and follow them up day after day so that parliament may have a correct understanding of whatever measures may be called for. It occurs to me that such a commission might not only be set up immediately, but that it might be carried on in the session which lies ahead so as to avoid any interruption to its work.

The committee was in favour, as pointed out by the hon. member for Skeena, of making contact with these people, who at the moment are under the impression that they are completely forgotten by the federal government and their fellow Canadians. After all, Mr. Speaker, they were the first citizens of this country, and I think they should receive justice and that the demands they have the right to make should receive attention.

I think the minister should take under due consideration at this time the representations made by hon. members, including his own colleagues in the committee, to the effect that the committee could very well be set up now. I am only sorry that it has not been set up before this date because it could have been making very useful reports. We have lost many months, and it would be a shame to lose more time as a result of procedural difficulties or because someone is holding the cart from behind. I say, get that guy away from the cart, get the wagon rolling and let this committee do its work.

Whether this should be a standing committee, a special committee or whether a royal commission should be appointed does not matter so long as it is able to do its job. I do not see why the minister cannot agree to its establishment today and to its carrying on its work in the new session. For my part I wish to state that I entirely agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Skeena and I also think that this is the opinion of my colleagues.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I am a member of this committee and I can endorse everything that has been said by those who have spoken up to this moment.

There is one observation I should like to make which I think has some significance. One of the reasons for the difficulties into which this committee has fallen arises from the fact that the members who are interested in Indian affairs are to a large extent also interested in the activities of another committee which covers the functions of the new Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I serve on both the northern affairs committee and the Indian affairs committee. During the past year the northern affairs committee has been most active in travelling through the north and visiting some of the national parks. It is for this reason that many of us who found ourselves on both committees were unable to divide our interest and participate in the planned itinerary of the Indian affairs committee. I have raised this point before, and it is the responsibility of the government to resolve the dilemma.

Many of our committees are still functioning on the basis of the old organizational set-up of the various government departments. I believe we can partially resolve the dilemma of the Indian affairs committee if we organize a single committee to cover all the activities of the new Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Hon. members have mentioned the point that the announcement that subcommittees of the main Indian affairs committee would be making personal visits to reservations was received with great enthusiasm by the first Canadians across the country. Nothing has happened and a sense of disillusionment has inevitably resulted.

This has been the case with other announcements which have been made during recent months with respect to Indian affairs. Elaborate programs for housing and other amenities on reservations have been announced, but up to the present time it has not been possible for the people on the reservations to get details from Indian affairs officials in the field about these programs and how they are being implemented.

Because of these difficulties, and because of this growing disenchantment, over the week end I organized a meeting in my own constituency which brought together the representatives of all the neighbouring reservations, some five in number, in a face to face confrontation with officials of the department. As a result of this meeting I can agree with the hon. member for Skeena that our Indian citizens are disappointed, disenchanted and extremely vocal in expressing their opinion of the recent announcements, all of which have tended to support their belief that the white man speaks with a forked tongue. Last Saturday, Mr. Speaker, I listened to complaints which have been re-echoed in this chamber this afternoon. We had Senator Gladstone, the Indian senator, with us. He was able to speak to his people in that part of Canada and try to open channels of communication. I can assure the minister responsible as well as hon. members that more than words are needed in dealing with the problems of our first citizens. We need action. We can no longer proceed on the basis of propaganda which is announced with a great fanfare and publicity and which creates a vacuum of expectations resulting in the sense of disillusionment that now prevails. The sooner we can get this resolution approved and can visit some of these reservations and have face to face contacts with the Indians, the sooner will the problem be resolved. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I heartily endorse the motion.

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to participate in this brief debate but there is one point I should like to make. There is no doubt that the government is responsible for some of the difficulties in which we find ourselves. With regard to the particular instance with which we are dealing here, the question of the Indian affairs committee visiting the reserves, I should like to submit that there is only one group at fault and that is the members of the committee themselves.

As a member of the committee, Mr. Speaker, I recall when we tried to organize these trips. We were not very successful. The first attempt we made was a meeting with the elected Ontario Indian chiefs in Toronto. The government went so far at that time as to provide an aircraft for our transportation. Six or seven members went, not more. It was only a one day effort.

It is very nice to know that hon. members are now taking renewed interest in the affairs of the department of Indian affairs since it has run into a certain amount of political hot water, but I would suggest that instead of listening to a lot of the nonsense that has been said here this afternoon hon. members of the committee should take a look at themselves to see what they have done in trying to organize visits by the committee.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, I support this movement. I should like a much more active interest to be taken in Indian affairs, and it seems to me that the people who should take this more active interest are the members of the committee themselves.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention in becoming involved in this discussion until I heard the last speaker. He is a young member, but I think he should be ashamed of the representations he has made in the last few minutes on behalf of his riding. I say that for the simple reason that he comes from an area where there is a very great problem, as there is in all northern Ontario, in relation to Indian affairs.

I think most members of this house were of the opinion that the new minister was going to do something which had not been done before. We were willing to allow the committee members to make the decision concerning how this problem should be solved. I do not think there is anyone in this house who is not aware of the fact that the agents on the Indian reserves have failed to relate the problems of the Indian to modern society. In some areas the problems of the Indian are handled in such a way that one might think we were still living in the days when the treaties with the Indians were signed.

The young member who just spoke referred to the fact that members of the committee should be criticized because they did not participate in the trips which were outlined. I think it is his responsibility and that of his colleagues on that side of the house to violently protest the operations of the Indian affairs branch and the direction they give. It will be no more apparent to anyone than it is to him that the problems will not be solved for some time, and must be solved by individuals.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question? Is the hon. member aware that the committee was not bound by the proposed itinerary which was set out by the Indian affairs branch.

Mr. Peters: Yes. I am also aware of the fact that the committee made the decision that they would have subcommittees of seven or eight members which would attend these Indian reserves on an itinerary on which they decided some time early last summer with the co-operation of the minister.

I should like to refer to the itinerary which most of the members of the committee were not interested in following. On Friday they would leave for the Caughnawaga reserve. They would leave here at seven o'clock in the morning and spend eight or ten hours on the Caughnawaga reserve where they would have a tour and meet with the chief and the council. I have been to the Caughnawaga reserve many times and I am sure I speak with some knowledge when I say it would be impossible in that time for an organized group to meet with the chief and the band council and complete an investigation of the many things that would be brought up in respect of that reserve.

The next day they would be at the Caradoc agency from 12.45 p.m. until 1.45 p.m. when they would meet with the Oneida council in the council hall. Between 2.30 and 3 p.m. they would meet with the Chippewa and Muncey councils at Mount Elgin school. Then between 4 p.m. and 5 p.m. they would meet with the Moravian council at the band hall.

On the second day they would have three hours during which they would meet with the Indians at a formal meeting and, in my opinion, would have no opportunity to speak to the people there in order to discuss their problems. On Saturday they would have from one to one and a half hours to meet with the chief and council of the Sarnia reserve. They would have a maximum of three hours in which to meet with the chief and the council and tour the reservation on Walpole island. At 3.30 p.m. they would have an hour or an hour and a half after arriving at Kettle Point to meet with the chief and council and tour the reservation. On Sunday they would have approximately five and a half hours in which to meet with a large number of band councils and would have very little time in which to observe and investigate the problems which are facing the Indians. On Monday they would be on Christian island and would have a maximum of four and a half hours in which to tour the island and discuss problems with the band council.

Mr. Chairman, if the young member is wondering why some of the members were not impressed by this kind of a tour, then he fails to understand the real problem. As the hon. member for Skeena said, this is what the Indian agents submitted as to how members of parliament should investigate the problems which affect Ontario Indians. This is the kind of inspection the mine inspectors made of the mines which I worked in. They would phone to the mine and say that they would be there to make an inspection. They would arrive and make the inspection the following day. In the meantime the part of the mine which would be on the inspection tour would be all cleaned up. The safety conditions would be no better than they were before the inspector arrived except along the route that had been planned.

In the case of this itinerary it is no wonder that some hon. members objected. I have not given the complete itinerary but merely the time in which members would have an opportunity to hear the objections and representations made by the Indians. Considering the time involved in arriving and leaving, they would have ten hours to hear the representations by the councils.

I think every member of parliament is concerned about the problems which face the Indian today. I am certain there is not a member of this house who has not read with interest and certainly a great deal of shame the reports concerning the Indian community in Kenora over the last year. I am sure there is no one who is not of the opinion that the House of Commons must give direction to the Indian affairs branch through the minister. With the advice he received from the committee the minister must modernize the treatment which is provided for the Indian population.

Yet we see members of the committee being critized. I am not a member of this committee, so this criticism is not directed to me. However, the members of the committee are criticized because they will not participate in the Cook's tour engineered by the Indian affairs branch which obviously will not accomplish anything. Such a tour would show the members of the committee that we have Indian reserves at five or six places. They would receive a first class view of those places and would have an opportunity to hear some of the leaders outline the problems which the members of the committee have heard over the years when Indian delegations have appeared before them.

I think it behooves us to exert more influence on the chairman of the committee and on the government so that instead of having motions such as this we will see some action in respect of the things which I believe the minister has in mind. On a number of occasions in this house the minister has outlined some proposals which I thought were very useful. I was pleased about the support he gave members of the committee when they wished to break up into groups so they could go out and spend two or three days mingling with the Indian people on the reservations in order to find out from the Indians who are not necessarily members of the council what problems they have. The hope was that in this way they would have an opportunity to get to know these people and hear about their problems at first hand. I approve of the support the minister gave to this suggestion.

I now am surprised to find that this has not been brought to fruition, and rather that the committee now is asking for permission to do something which they had permission to do back in June. It is time we faced up to our responsibilities and insisted that the Indian affairs branch must not dictate to the committee, but that the committee should have a free hand to draw up its own agenda and decide what steps should be taken to make conditions more palatable for our Indian population across Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on the motion now before us.

Judging the remarks we have just heard, it is quite clear that the whole committee system does not seem to work. In fact, after 12 and even 13 months of this session, we have not yet succeeded in organizing this committee. I have also noted that on all sides, the main complaint is that too many committees are sitting and that members are sitting on too many committees.

I just heard the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) say a while ago that he is sitting on five or six committees.

Not so long ago the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) also admitted that he was a member of five or six committees, so that he was unable to attend them all which of course keeps them from having a quorum. I admit that the members who were chosen to sit on various committees have the required experience and competence to do so.

Mr. Speaker, I should also like to point out that two members do not sit on any committee. Complaints are made that too many committees sit simultaneously and that it is difficult to have a quorum. Well, I remind the house that the member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) and myself do not sit on any committee, that we are systematically deprived, voluntarily and deliberately, of membership on any committee of the house whatsoever. The house is faced with some problems but let it not complain about it for it has only itself to blame for that because it refuses to accept two members who want to do some committee work, as they have shown and proved in the past.

Mr. Speaker, we attend committee sittings and we question and seek information. For my part, while I am not a member, and while I cannot help make a quorum, which is not even reached at the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs, nevertheless I attend the sittings and ask questions. This is surely evidence of a member's eagerness to do his job and the same is true for the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard). While the other members are all complaining that there are too many committees sitting simultaneously, the hon. member for Sherbrooke and I are denied any participation in committee work; in my opinion, we are victims of systematic discrimination.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the main problem with regard to committees—if their work poses a problem—is that they are badly organized and that no effort is made to appoint those who can serve and are interested in doing so. People are named simply so as to make up the total number of members, and therefore I think the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) was right when he said over the week end that almost half the members of this house are no more than rubber stamps.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to call your attention to another point. I feel that committees do not serve their purpose, precisely because the ministers concerned have no interest in them. A while ago members of the New Democratic Party made very appropriate interventions, showing their concern for problems relating to Indians and Eskimos. One would wonder if the minister himself is as much concerned as the other hon. members.

Here is a typical example to illustrate what I am saying. Ever since the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs began consideration of Bill No. C-222, the hon.

member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has been trying to find out either from officials or all the other witnesses, the exact meaning of the word "bank", and what the minister means by "banking". Surely, the repeated inquiries of the hon. members for Edmonton West and Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) and those of others, with respect to the meaning of the words "bank" and "banking", have been brought to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp); but the hon. minister has yet to attend a sitting of the committee, even though this is probably one of the most important bills to be presented this year, if not the most important since he was appointed Minister of Finance. Are they going to tell me that the minister is interested in the committee?

The committee is trying to study, to analyse and to vote on the legislation proposed by the minister who does not even attend the sittings. If the minister does not come to the committee sittings, how can you ask the hon. members to be interested, when the one mostly concerned, that is the Minister of Finance, does not even attend? The minister has not yet attended one sitting of the finance, trade and economic affairs committee when we are studying his bill to amend the Bank Act, which, in my opinion, is probably the most important that the Minister of Finance will ever present during his career.

Mr. Speaker, obviously one does not have to look very far to realize the stagnation in which the committees are floundering. Why have the committees floundered into stagnation? It is first, because the ministers are not concerned about the committees, are not concerned about the legislation they send to the committees, and also because there is a whole group of members who try and protect the bills in the absence of the minister rather than work out measures acceptable to everyone and accepted by all.

Furthermore, there is another committee problem. At the present time, the government—and I am not afraid to accuse the government, the house leader, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and the whip of the Liberal party—practises a discrimination and an intolerable injustice, in a so-called democratic country, against the hon. member for Sherbrooke and myself.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member for Cartier speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Klein: Mr. Speaker, I think at the outset we must agree that the number of our committees is too large, as a consequence of which it is difficult at times to obtain a quorum. In respect of the situation now under discussion, it was impossible to obtain a quorum to make these trips. As just pointed out by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, one reason for these trips not being made is that many members of the Indian affairs committee are also members of the northern affairs committee, and at the time these trips were to be made the northern affairs committee was slated to make a trip to the northern part of Canada.

The fact that these trips did not take place is a reflection on the members of all parties in this house. Perhaps the reason they did not take place can be related to the fact that they were not glamour trips. Had they been trips to Paris, France. I am sure we would have had no difficulty in getting a quorum. Members on all sides of the house were not interested in making these trips, and that is the fact of the matter.

I am amazed that the hon. member for Skeena should raise this issue in the forceful manner he did today. He is the hon. member I have found it most difficult to get to attend steering committee meetings. When he attended those meetings he always apologized for being late. It is just as much the duty of a member of a steering committee to see that a committee functions as it is of any other member. The hon. member never raised this matter at a steering committee meeting or at a full committee meeting. He waited until there was a full press gallery before raising this in the manner he did.

Let me inform the hon. member for Skeena that I have bent over backward to please him on every single occasion we met. The fact that these trips did not take place can be directly related to the fact that he could not attend. If some of the trips did not occur, it was because he could not come. We wanted everybody on that committee to come. It is shocking that the hon. member should stand up here and make the kind of spectacle that he made of himself this afternoon.

• (4:10 p.m.)

An hon. Member: He was looking for headlines.

Mr. Klein: But we have come to expect that from that section of the house, which must now be recognized as the angry old men.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Klein: The committee met in Toronto with the Indian chiefs of Ontario, and the hon. member for Skeena was not there. We suggested a trip to Caughnawaga, and the hon. member for Skeena said he could not make it on a certain day last week, so we did not proceed with the trip until the hon. member for Skeena was able to make it. We did this because we wanted to rely on the experience the hon. member for Skeena has in matters of this nature. But to use this occasion to play that kind of politics is something that the country ought to know about.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Klein: We ask that this motion pass. It is the intention of the committee to divide itself into small committees and visit as many communities as possible throughout Canada. While we are laying blame I must mention the co-operation I have received on this committee from the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), for which I compliment him. He has been present at every single meeting. I am not asking him to do so, but I think he will bear me out when I say that at numerous steering committee meetings the hon. member for Skeena never presented himself, never came to the meetings, and when he did come he apologized for being late.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the only way I can do this is by way of a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Skeena now rises on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howard: I do that, Mr. Speaker, because it is the only way I can get the floor to refute what are a number of untruths.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The only way the hon member can rise now is on a legitimate question of privilege. He cannot tell the Chair that he is using this as a subterfuge to carry on a debate. If he has a question of privilege I will hear him out.

Mr. Howard: I would not presume to do things by way of subterfuge, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howard: The chairman of the committee indicated that I never attended steering committee meetings. The one I missed was on December 7. I have a note of it here. I missed that because notice of the meeting came to my office late in the morning and the meeting was to be held at three thirty o'clock that day. I did not have the opportunity and time to attend that particular meeting.

The hon. member accused me of not wanting to go to Toronto in order to meet with some people there. I was unable to go, and got in touch with my colleague the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, who went in my stead, to make sure that someone would fully represent us at that particular meeting. With respect to the meeting to be held at Caughnawaga, the hon. member said it was not held because I could not go on a particular day. I would point out that the committee went to pains to ask whether I would be available to go at a particular time and I told the committee, in full view of the chairman, who was there and heard it, that the committee should not make its plans to make visits rotate around my ability to go, that if they wanted to go they should make the plans and I would try to fit in with them.

The hon. member also made reference to the fact that I had not objected to the committee calling a vote with regard to the itinerary which the hon. member for Timiskaming placed on the record. I point out that I was the only member in the committee who objected to that, and when the vote was taken I said I wanted to record my vote against the particular trip because they were one hour visits. I was followed by the vice chairman agreeing with me and the hon. member for Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie (Mr. Watson) who when asked the same thing agreed that it was the wrong type of thing to do.

When the chairman of the committee points out that one of the reasons the committee has not been able to function properly is because of its conflict with the northern affairs committee.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is the government house leader rising on a point of order?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I respectfully suggest that what the hon. member is now doing is taking a second opportunity to debate the subject matter of this motion, and he is not dealing with a question of privilege. He has not mentioned any question of privilege so far in his remarks.

Mr. Peters: The Speaker will decide that.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I realize the desire of the house leader to protect his members who are in error—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Concurrence in Committee Report

Mr. Howard: —but the fact of the matter is, and I say it to the chairman of the committee, that he has told in this house a number of falsehoods in respect of my activities on that committee, and I am refuting those by reciting what occurred.

May I say that one of the major reasons there is not now a conflict between the membership of the northern affairs committee and the membership of the Indian affairs committee is that as of last Wednesday there were only six members of the northern affairs committee who were also on the Indian affairs committee. The conflict come about because the chairman of the committee is also the chairman of the immigration committee and is far more concerned with people coming from other countries than he is with our Indian people here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is not at the moment, in my estimation, dealing with a question of privilege. He is obviously refuting the allegations, alleged to be wrong, made against him, and I am wondering whether this is proper debate. Allegations were made by the hon. member for Timiskaming against the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, and allegations were made about the hon. member for Skeena which he is trying to answer now. This might lead to a rather protracted debate.

Mr. Howard: I would just wind up my question of privilege by pointing out, Mr. Speaker, that it is obviously partisanship, because everybody who spoke on this side of the house agreed with the points I was making.

Mr. Roxburgh: I rise on a point of privilege, please, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will first rule that there was no obvious or apparent question of privilege in what was raised by the hon. member for Skeena. I will now hear a second question of privilege raised by the hon. member.

Mr. Roxburgh: Mr. Speaker, as deputy chairman of the committee I have listened to what has been said, and had absolutely no intention whatsoever of taking part in the debate, because this is exactly what it has turned out to be. But the last statement made by the hon. member for Skeena is, I think, absolutely incorrect, because he knows that the hon. members on this side of the house, and he has also already mentioned—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member—

Mr. Roxburgh: Mr. Speaker, I will now talk about myself personally. The hon. member for Skeena has also mentioned my name, and that is the reason I have risen. I, along with other hon. members on this side of the house, have been and am as keenly interested in the Indian people as any hon. member on the other side of the house. There has been possibly a certain amount of misunderstanding on a number of occasions. But as far as the over-all picture is concerned, I just wanted to say that when he makes the statement about hon. members on this side of the house, he is absolutely wrong. I just wanted to clarify that matter. I am sure if he is the gentleman I expect he is, he will acknowledge that fact.

Mr. Howard: I wonder, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope the contribution of the hon. member for Norfolk has closed the debate and that we can now go on to another matter. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

REFUNDS OF OVERPAYMENTS UNDER PENSION PLAN

Question No. 1,781—Mr. Stanbury:

1. Has the government assessed the proposals made to it on June 22, 1966, by major Canadian trade associations regarding overpaid employer contributions under the Canada Pension Plan?

2. Have all these proposals or any of them been found to be feasible, and, if not, for what reasons?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): 1 and 2. The proposals made at the meeting of June 22, 1966, by Canadian trade associations did not relate to the interpretation of the provisions of the Canada Pension Plan but rather to the effect of their application as presently enacted. The implementation of any of these proposals would require amendments to the Canada Pension Plan as passed by parliament and, therefore, if considered in the public interest, will be introduced in the usual manner at the appropriate time.

STATISTICS RESPECTING DEATH SENTENCES

Question No. 2,025—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

1. Since the publication of the supplementary table, capital case statistics for Canada at page 65 of the white paper on capital punishment, how many persons, by years, (a) have been sentenced to death (b) have been executed (c) have had sentences of death commuted (d) have been sentenced to death but whose cases are (i) before the courts (ii) awaiting decision of His Excellency the governor general in council?

2. What disposition has been made of the cases of the persons shown on the said supplementary table as still being before the appeal courts, showing by years, how many (a) had their appeals granted (b) were executed (c) had sentences commuted?

3. In respect of all cases subsequent to May 6, 1965, what were the leading characteristics of the case, the information being classified on the same basis as table D at pages 100 to 103 inclusive of the white paper?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): 1. (a) May 25, 1965 to December 31, 1965, 10; 1966, 12. January 1, 1967 to January 27, 1967, 1. (b) May 25, 1965 to December 31, 1965, 0; 1966, 0, January 1, 1967 to January 27, 1967, 0. (c) May 25, 1965 to December 31, 1965, 3; 1966, 2. January 1, 1967 to January 27, 1967, 0. (d) (i) May 25, 1965 to December 31, 1965, 3; 1966, 9. January 1, 1967 to January 27, 1967, 1. (d) (ii) As of January 27, 1967, 0.

Note: In accordance with the practice in recording such statistics, each case is carried through to its conclusion under the year in which the sentence was imposed. Thus the two cases shown under 1 (c) for 1966 were actually commuted on January 24, 1967. The cases shown under (d) (i) are presently before the appeal courts. It should also be noted that in the period May 25, 1965 to January 27, 1967 there were five capital cases in which new trials were ordered which did not result in subsequent convictions for capital murder.

2. (a) 1962, 0. 1963, 0. 1964, 1*. January 1, 1965 to May 25, 1965, 0. (b) 1962, 0. 1963, 0. 1964, 0. January 1, 1965 to May 25, 1965, 0. (c) 1962, 1. 1963, 1. 1964, 0. January 1, 1965 to May 25, 1965, 4.

* In this case the accused was again convicted of capital murder on his second trial.

Note: Two of the cases shown as sentenced to death in the period January 1, 1965 to May 25, 1965 are still before the appeal courts.

3. The cases subsequent to May 6, 1965 up to and including January 27, 1967 are shown on the following table.

ANNEX TO TABLE D OF APPENDIX I ENTITLED "CAPITAL PUNISHMENT: MATTERS RELATING TO ITS OBJECT AND ITS VALUE", SO AS TO INCLUDE THE RELATED DATA UP TO JANUARY 27, 1967

Case	Age	Date of decision by Governor in Council	Motive	Recommendation of mercy		Murdered	Murder Weapon	Whether murder premeditated	Mental condition	Commuted or Executed

FRENCH EDITIONS OF BUREAU OF STATISTICS PUBLICATIONS

Question No. 2,449—Mr. Grégoire:

1. Are publications of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics numbered 61-203 and 61-204 published in French?

2. If not, for what reason?

3. Is it the intention to publish French versions or bilingual versions and, if not, for what reason?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): 1. No.

2 and 3. It is the policy of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics to produce as many reports as possible in both languages, bearing in mind the amount of translation resources available. In increasing the number of bilingual reports, an effort is made to give priority to the translation of those with the greatest known demand.

CONVENTIONS OF COMPANY OF YOUNG CANADIANS

Question No. 2,451—Mr. Hales:

1. How many general meetings or conventions has the Company of Young Canadians held since incorporation?

2. Where were they held?

3. How many people attended each convention?

4. What were the hotel or accommodation charges for each convention, including telephone, room service, etc.?

5. What were the transportation charges for each convention?

6. Is there a report available for each convention and, if so, from whom?

7. Who are the auditors for the Company of Young Canadians and what yearly audit fees have been paid?

Mr. John R. Matheson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): I am informed by the Company of Young Canadians as follows: 1. Apart from staff meetings, of the provisional council and the two training programs, the company has held one general meeting since incorporation.

2. This meeting was a regrouping of volunteers already in the field, and was held at Orillia, Ontario, from October 29 to November 5. The purpose of the meeting was to provide new training and orientation information to the company's volunteers, to provide those volunteers with an opportunity to discuss common field problems, and to assist the company develop plans for its third training program based on actual field experiences. Other volunteer regroupings are planned on a regional basis. No further centralized regroupings are planned.

6. No report is being published but a record of the sessions of the Orillia meeting was kept by the staff. The executive director reported on the regrouping to the provisional council.

7. The Auditor General. No fees are charged.

EXPANSION OF TRADE REPRESENTATION IN AFRICA

Question No. 2,460—Mr. Tolmie:

Has the Department of Trade and Commerce any plans to expand its trade representation in Africa so as to stimulate a greater flow of exports to this developing area?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The department will be opening a trade office in Nairobi, Kenya, early in the new year to service Kenya and the surrounding countries of Uganda, Malawi, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zambia. It will become the commercial division of the new Canadian high commission there.

LOANS BY INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK

Question No. 2,471—Mr. Godin:

During the financial year ended September 30, 1966, how many loans were granted by the Industrial Development Bank in each of the provinces and in the county of Portneuf in amounts of (a) over $50,000 (b) under $50,000 to (i) manufacturers (ii) wholesale and retail establishments (iii) tourist establishments?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): The annual report of the Industrial Development Bank for the year ended September 30, 1966, contains information regarding the number and amount of loans by size, by province and by type of business. A further breakdown of the information is not a matter of public record.

Questions

CANADIAN FORCES TRAINING BASE, RIVERS, MAN.

Question No. 2,477—Mr. Mandziuk:

1. What are the future plans for the Canadian forces training base at Rivers, Manitoba?

2. If it is the intention to close this base, on what date will it be closed?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): 1 and 2. As was stated in the white paper 1964, the aim of the reorganization of the Canadian forces is the achievement of increased efficiency and economy based upon the overall national interest. The proper positioning and grouping of activities and forces, and their amalgamation where practical, is now under study, and it is anticipated that this study will extend over a considerable time. In any event no major bases, including Rivers, will be closed out during 1967. Of course this does not preclude the possibility of moving units or activities from one base to another. If, and when, a decision is taken to close out a specific base the maximum possible advance information will be will be provided to those who are directly affected.

GASPE CONSTITUENCY—REMOVAL FROM OFFICE OF F. R. SAMS

Question No. 2,495—Mr. Keays:

1. With reference to the answer to question No. 2,204, was Mr. Frederick R. Sams, Gaspé, P.Q. removed from office for any of the following reasons (a) has attained the age of sixty-five years (b) ceases to reside in his electoral district (c) is incapable, by reason of illness, physical or mental infirmity or otherwise, of satisfactorily performing his duties under the Canada Elections Act (d) has failed to discharge competently his duties, or any thereof, under this Act, or (e) has, at any time after his appointment, been guilty of political partisan conduct, whether or not in the course of performance of his duties under this Act?

2. If not, why was he removed?

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): 1. Mr. Frederick R. Sams is still the returning officer for the present electoral district of Gaspé. Hence, he has not been relieved of his duties; (a) not applicable; (b) not applicable; (c) not applicable; (d) not applicable; (e) not applicable.

2. The Elections Act requires that a returning officer be named by the governor general in council for each electoral district. However, as the limits of the present electoral district of Gaspé have been modified, under the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (13 Elizabeth II, chapter 31), a returning officer was required for this new electoral district and Mr. Ludger Gagné was duly appointed.

MISSIONS ORGANIZED BY TRADE DEPARTMENT

Question No. 2,523—Mr. Walker:

How many trade missions have been organized by the Department of Trade and Commerce during the past year, and how many are planned during the current year?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): The department's trade missions program for fiscal year 1966/67 (April 1-March 31) now includes 28 missions, of which 13 were outgoing and 15 incoming. Thirty-three missions, including 14 outgoing and 19 incoming, are presently planned for the 1967/68 program.

TRADE

FRUIT—REQUEST FOR TARIFF ON IMPORTS FROM U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the statement made by the secretary manager of the Ontario Fruit Growers' Association, has it been brought to the attention of the Department of National Revenue that Ontario fruit growers are being adversely affected by large scale imports of processed fruit and is the government considering the imposition of a tariff on fruit imported from the United States?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like to check but it is my impression that I received a communication about this matter within the last few days. I will be glad to look into it. May I also say that this matter has been brought to my attention by one or two hon. members on this side of the house.

Mr. Starr: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of what the Prime Minister said last fall in Hamilton, namely that the situation was being considered, is any action being planned to provide relief to Ontario fruit growers?

Mr. Pearson: I will be glad to look into the matter and answer the hon. member's question as soon as I can.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PAYMENT FOR BOMB DAMAGE TO YUGOSLAV PROPERTIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs may I direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister regarding the unfortunate bombing of the Yugoslav embassy in Ottawa and the Yugoslav consulate in Toronto. In view of the fact that the United States authorities have announced that they propose to pay for any damage done to these properties, will Canada be paying for the damage done in this country and will payment extend to the buildings in the immediate vicinity which have also been damaged more or less severely?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in view of the nature of the question perhaps I will be permitted to give a longer answer dealing with one or two other aspects of the unfortunate incident mentioned by the hon. member.

The explosions in Ottawa and Toronto are being investigated by the Ottawa and Toronto police in co-operation with the R.C.M.P., and I have already seen a preliminary report. There is every reason to believe that in both cities this was a terrorist act. It is our hope and determination to do everything we can to ensure that those responsible will be apprehended. There has been obvious international co-ordination and Interpol has therefore been consulted.

We shall do our utmost to ensure that these atrocious incidents do not affect adversely the relations between Canada and Yugoslavia, and we have assured the chargé d'affaires of Yugoslavia of this. Our deep regret that such senseless acts could have occurred has been conveyed to the Yugoslav government both in Ottawa and by our ambassador in Belgrade.

As host country Canada is under an international obligation to protect foreign embassies and other official premises in Canada. Yugoslavia of course recognizes a similar obligation with regard to Canadian premises there. It goes without saying that Canada accepts and honours its obligations under international law and practice with regard to the protection of foreign representatives and compensation for damages to official premises.

The hon. gentleman has raised another question, namely the obligation if any which attaches to the government in respect of damages to adjoining property. Before replying I should like to look into that aspect of the question.

NATIONAL SECURITY

CALVIN MACDONALD—APPEARANCE BEFORE ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Justice I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. Calvin Macdonald has been told he can testify before the commission on national security in order to clarify his case. However, he has stated that he was asked to keep a file on Hon. M. J. Coldwell, who is at present a member of that commission, and this charge has never been refuted either by the government or the R.C.M.P. Does the government plan to replace Commissioner Coldwell, since he might be involved in the case, or does it intend to give Mr. Macdonald a private hearing as was done in the Spencer case?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I said the other day, Mr. Macdonald has made representations to the commission either verbally or in writing, followed by an appearance. These hearings, if they dealt with security matters, would have been held in camera. Mr. Coldwell is an important member of the commission and there is no intention to interfere with his membership on the commission.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does this not come into conflict with the principles which were laid down long ago in the Magna Carta, and does it not put the two parties in a very peculiar situation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope we will not have to settle this question this afternoon.

PRESENCE IN CANADA OF PERSON EXPELLED AS SECURITY RISK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister or to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is it a fact that approximately five years ago one E. Ritzig was asked to leave Canada because he was a security risk? Is the government aware that at the present time this same E. Ritzig is back in Canada with one of the embassies or legations? If so, does the government intend to do anything about it?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I shall take the question as notice.

SOCIAL SECURITY

INQUIRY AS TO STUDY OF GUARANTEED MINIMUM INCOME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Having regard to various statements made by cabinet ministers and more particularly the announcement made by President Johnson last week, of the appointment of a commission to study proposals for the establishment of a guaranteed minimum income, and in view of the problems which could arise if that nation proceeded with such a program before Canada, is the Prime Minister considering the formation of a similar commission in Canada?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this government along with other governments has been giving consideration to the very important matter of a guaranteed annual income for all. My hon. friend will recall that we have made what I think is a very important and useful first step in that direction in the legislation which was passed a few weeks ago. The broader aspects of the matter are still under consideration and will require a great deal of study before a guaranteed income can be implemented in this country.

OIL

STEPS TO INCREASE EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of his temporary absence it might be taken as notice and he could give an answer when he returns to the house a little later or tomorrow. In view of the Levy report entitled "The Outlook for Canadian Crude Production and Markets", have the minister or officials of his department had any consultations recently with representatives of the oil industry on steps to be taken to increase markets for Canadian oil in the United States?

[Mr. Langlois (Mégantic).]

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that this is a question of a very general nature. I do not think that this type of question can be asked on orders of the day.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, this is an urgent matter of importance and I hope that the minister will be able to answer the question tomorrow.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the question raised by the hon. member for Calgary North I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would look into the situation and determine first whether the targets laid down for the export of crude petroleum will be reduced at the rate of 100,000 barrels of crude per day and, second, whether a method is being considered in conjunction with trade groups in the United States to increase the export of crude which is of such importance in the trade between our two countries?

Mr. Speaker: May I point out to the hon. member that the second question is of the same nature as the first one and the minister may wish to answer both by way of a statement on motions. However, I doubt that the question can be asked in the way it has been.

GRAIN

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR DELAY IN SALE OF ELEVATORS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Transport. The first part is simple. Has the minister received a telegram today from the minister of agriculture of Quebec asking that the sale of grain elevators in that province be held up until there can be some sort of meeting with the minister?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I gather that the hon. gentleman has also received such a communication. I have received one. I have not had time to reply to it, since it reached me just as I came into the house.

Mr. Hamilton: May I ask a supplementary question. Will the minister consider replying to the effect that he will consider holding a meeting not only with the minister of agriculture for Quebec but also the Board of Grain Commissioners and the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development who has charge of the feed grain program, so that the problem can be looked at as a whole rather than on a piecemeal basis?

Mr. Pickersgill: There is no question, sir, but that before any such sale, if there is a possibility of such a sale taking place, it would be considered by all agencies of this government which would be concerned and that would include the Board of Grain Commissioners and the Canadian Wheat Board.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REPORTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER RESPECTING EXPANDED MANPOWER PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I assume the Prime Minister is familiar with the speech given by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to the York-Scarborough Liberal Association in Toronto on Saturday since it was reported with headlines at the top of the third page of the Globe and Mail this morning. Was the minister expressing government policy when he said that the government should first offer more generous grants to those who move to another locality to find work, second, expand the designated area program and, third, increase its spending on industrial research? If this is government policy, can the Prime Minister advise the house when he expects to introduce legislation to implement this important change in government policy?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows it would be improper for me to comment on press reports, especially headlines, devoted to my colleague's statement. I will be glad to examine the text of my colleague's statement on this matter. I would remind my hon. friend that he is aware of the imaginative and important steps that have been taken by the government in this field, and we are I think making these steps more effective.

Mr. Hees: May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Was the minister misquoted by the Globe and Mail in its report which appeared on the third page today?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Inquiries of the Ministry

SEAFARERS UNION—CHARGES LAID IN U.S. COURT AGAINST CANADIAN OFFICIAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Labour, based on information I have received from Chicago, in the United States. Has the minister been informed that Donald Swait, secretary treasurer of the Seafarers' International Union of Canada, has been named a co-conspirator in a United States court in Chicago where five persons are charged at present with the bombing of a Canadian ship, with the bombing of port tracks and the interstate transportation of dynamite for this purpose? Has he any information to give the house with respect to this very serious case?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the only information I have on the subject matter of the question is contained in the notice of the question which was sent to me by the hon. member for Kootenay West. The facts put forward in the question will be investigated and I shall be glad to confirm them or otherwise when I have more accurate information.

I also wish to say that if the statements are true they bear out the statement made by my predecessor, the present Minister of National Health and Welfare, that the Canadian authorities were receiving co-operation from their opposite numbers on the other side of the line, that these bombings were being investigated by the proper authorities and when they were in a position to make charges same would be laid.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): May I ask a supplementary question. Are arrangements being made for the appearance of the maritime unions trustees before a standing committee of the house?

Mr. Nicholson: I thought I had answered that question. I said the trustees were engaged on their annual report for 1966 and that when it was available I had no reason to anticipate that arrangements could not be made for the trustees to appear and be examined on the contents of that report.

HOUSING

REPORTED UNAVAILABILITY OF LOANS IN RESOURCE AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact it is virtually impossible for residents in many of Canada's mining communities to receive loans from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, would the minister elaborate on his statement that loans will now be available to new resource areas?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, because it gives me the opportunity to deny completely the premise upon which the question is based. The residents of new resource areas in Canada, according to my information, have had no serious difficulty in getting the necessary loans either for home construction or even for some rental housing.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Make inquiries in Thetford Mines to see if that statement is true.

Mr. Simpson: Would the minister take the time to look into the situation at Thompson, Manitoba, where the International Nickel Company has had to guarantee all loans?

Mr. Nicholson: That fact does not alter the statement that I have made that in the mining or resource towns there has been no difficulty in getting loans from C.M.H.C. I have been assured that responsible mining companies give the necessary guarantees that are called for by the regulations.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF ADULT TRAINING PROGRAM TO INDIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ian Watson (Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Last week he announced a pilot training project for adult training in areas of slow economic growth in Canada. Inasmuch as almost 50 per cent of the adult male Indian population in Canada is unemployed, will the minister consider, in co-operation with the department of Indian affairs, establishing a division in each provincial project which will deal specifically with training and employment opportunities for adult Indians?

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to suggest to the hon. member that the question appears to be of a very general nature. Unless there is some urgency which I fail to see, I do not think the question should be allowed.

[Mr. Simpson.]

Mr. Watson (Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): I submit there is some urgency in that last week the program for these pilot projects was announced. I think it is important that as these projects are brought into being there be an Indian division in each of them from the start. Surely 50 per cent unemployment represents an urgent matter.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am ready to study this suggestion.

[Later:]

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration concerning the manpower services of his department. Can the minister tell the house what steps he has taken or intends to take to ensure that in the staffing of offices throughout the country wherever there is a significant Indian population, there will be officers particularly qualified to help Indians requiring employment? Has he in mind recruiting staff from amongst the Indian people themselves for this purpose?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we have worked hard in the department to upgrade our own personnel. I cannot answer for this particular aspect of the subject. Perhaps I could take the question as notice and inform the hon. member later of what is happening.

WOMEN

REQUEST FOR ROYAL COMMISSION ON STATUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. During the presentation of their brief this morning did the National Council of Women ask for the establishment of a royal commission into the status of women in Canada?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, they did not bring that up. It was not the subject of one of their resolutions at the last meeting of the council. I did have the pleasure of telling them at the end of the meeting on Friday last that the government would be making a statement on this matter in a day or two.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED PREVENTION OF CIRCULATION OF CERTAIN PUBLICATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I have a question as a warm-up pitch for the Minister of National Defence. Is the department now adopting a policy of preventing the distribution of publications unfriendly to unification while allowing distribution of others, and who acts as censor? I refer specifically to the case of maritime command bulletins.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has indicated himself that he has in mind the debate which will be continued later today. Perhaps at that time the problem could be considered.

Mr. McCleave: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether circulation within the service of publications that are uncomplimentary to the minister are prohibited by him.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Certainly not, Mr. Speaker. I can assure you that if they were there would be a lot fewer publications. We have tried not to interfere with freedom of speech with respect to publications.

Mr. Churchill: A supplementary question. It is true then that the minister and his program are quite unpopular with the services?

Mr. Hellyer: With my hon. friend, Mr. Speaker, that is correct.

[Translation]

EDUCATION

MANITOBA—LACK OF FINANCIAL SUPPORT FOR SEPARATE SCHOOLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Since the Manitoba government, again this year as for many decades, has refused to include Manitoba separate schools in its school budget, contrary to the procedure followed in the province of Quebec, does the Prime Minister intend to resort to section 93 of the B.N.A. Act in order to meet the situation and allow Manitoba separate schools to cope with their present difficult financial situation?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question is very interesting, of course, but I wonder whether it is appropriate on the orders of the day.

Mr. Grégoire: After the orders of the day, then, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to re-phrase my question to the Prime Minister once again, so that it will, I think, be acceptable.

Is the Prime Minister aware of the fact that Manitoba has decided to leave out the separate schools from the school budget of that province for another year? Is it the Prime Minister's intention to invoke section 93 of the B.N.A. Act to make a decision on this matter?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me, that the second question of the hon. member is strangely similar to the first and my conclusion will be the same, that is to say: it is not acceptable at this time.

Mr. Grégoire: I shall bring it up at ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker, because I feel it is an important matter that must not be concealed.

WINTER WORKS

REPORTED SPEECH BY MINISTER RESPECTING PROPOSED CHANGES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It is based on the remarks he made to a Liberal meeting in Toronto over the week end. He is reported to be advocating changes in the municipal winter works incentive program. Will the minister make a statement to parliament as soon as possible outlining the proposed changes? Will he say whether he is anticipating a new policy or new legislation?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have already announced in the house that we are revising this program. It can be seen in Hansard that somebody asked me a similar question a couple of weeks ago and I said we were revising this program.

Mr. Starr: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When will the minister advise parliament what the revisions are to be?

Mr. Marchand: I did not say in York-Scarborough what the revisions were or were intended to be. As soon as I know, the house will be the first to hear of it.

Mr. Starr: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, based on the same speech. Inasmuch as the minister referred to some municipalities which are participating in the municipal winter works incentive program but are doing unnecessary work—he said the scheme was being misused by them—can he say whether the projects he referred to that are unnecessary or where there is misuse of the scheme were approved by his department?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, projects are approved by the department but the administration is under provincial jurisdiction. As soon as the matter is approved by provincial authorities we simply pay. The provincial governments, as I say, are responsible for administration.

Mr. Starr: Is it not a fact that of necessity—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Starr: —the approval of the federal government has to be obtained before payment is made?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that is not in keeping with the spirit of this period.

Mr. Starr: The minister is just passing the buck. That is the trouble.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should not comment about speeches made outside the house.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration a related question, apropos the speech he made in Toronto over the week end, with reference to the expansion of the designated area program? As this matter comes under the aegis of the Minister of Industry, is it his intention or the intention of the Minister of Industry to make an announcement fairly soon about the expansion of the designated area program? If so, how soon can we expect that statement?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, the only thing I said in York-Scarborough was, I think, that this program should be expanded but in collaboration with the provinces and the municipalities.

[Mr. Starr.]

Mr. Starr: I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that the last few minutes have not been productive. To my mind this is not the type of question which should be belaboured. The hon. member for Ontario has asked three questions on this subject, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has asked a question, and now the hon. member for Ontario wants to ask a further question.

Mr. Starr: I want to ask another supplementary question having to do with the subject brought up by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. Will the expansion of the designated areas include areas where there have been lay-offs and stoppages of work owing to the auto pact?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I did not give any detail. I just said that the program can be expanded but with the co-operation of the provinces and municipalities. If we go farther than that we would have to discuss the matter with the provinces and municipalities to know exactly to what extent they are ready to co-operate with us.

Mr. Starr: Are these speeches checked with the Prime Minister before they are delivered?

TRANSPORT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAUSEWAY—POSSIBLE DELAY THROUGH DESIGN CHANGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. It really follows a question of last Friday put by the hon. member for Queens when the minister was not in the house. The Minister of Fisheries said he would bring it to the attention of the Minister of Public Works. It relates to possible design changes in the New Brunswick-Prince Edward Island causeway and is of great importance to all residents of Prince Edward Island. A report appeared last week in Prince Edward Island that an engineer had said that the proposed causeway designs are inadequate. Are design changes to be made?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, none are contemplated.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister also assure us that the completion date is still 1970? Is that correct?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member might put that question on the order paper.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

INQUIRY AS TO IMPLEMENTATION BY PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. While the minister was absent last week I placed a question on the record asking whether any provinces have signed agreements yet to implement the Canada Assistance Plan, and I referred particularly to British Columbia.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

ASSISTANCE TO FORT SMITH FOLLOWING NAMING OF YELLOWKNIFE AS CAPITAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. J. Orange (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. With the naming of Yellowknife as the capital of Northwest Territories I ask the minister whether he will be able to announce the level and type of assistance to be available from the federal government to the community of Fort Smith to ensure that no disastrous economic effects will be felt by the latter community when many families are moved from Fort Smith to Yellowknife.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am not pessimistic about any area in the Northwest Territories and I hope the hon. member is not either. With all the things that are going on there and the evidence of the resources that we have, the outlook is very bright indeed.

We have said that in the interim we shall be thinking in terms of putting some of the institutional buildings in Fort Smith that we might have planned for other places to take up the slack. I expect to make an announcement in about a couple of weeks in this regard.

Mr. Orange: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister approach his colleague, the Minister of Industry, to see if the Area Development Incentives Act might be applied to the community in question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. gentleman is making a representation and not asking a question.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED RENEGOTIATION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS CONVENTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Has the right hon. gentleman had an opportunity to look into the question I asked on January 18? I inquired whether consideration was being given to the advisability of asking the United States to renegotiate the migratory birds convention?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the advisability of approaching the United States government with a view to the re-examination and renegotiation of the convention is now under consideration.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF NAVY, ARMY AND AIR FORCE

The house resumed from Wednesday, December 7, 1966, consideration of the motion of Mr. Hellyer for the second reading of Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, this debate was interrupted by the six o'clock adjournment on Wednesday, December 7, seven weeks ago, and one might feel it is almost anticlimactic to come back to the question. However, perhaps the house would permit me to recapitulate briefly the remarks I made on that occasion after having heard the minister deliver a carefully prepared speech lasting an hour and 50 minutes, a speech which was, I understand, distributed at public expense in great numbers—40,000 I am told, or have read—to the various service personnel. I was wondering whether the minister would do us the courtesy of distributing an equal number of the critiques of his speech so that the servicemen might have an opportunity to form an objective conclusion rather than be forced to rely on a wave of propaganda from the minister's office.

The points I am making are, briefly, these: first, that since the government and the minister are making the proposal for the change and since, we hope, change must be for better and not merely for the sake of change, it is strictly up to the minister to prove his case. It is not, as suggested by some of those who no doubt are influenced by the minister, up to the opposition, to prove the hon. gentleman's case wrong. After all, the Department of National Defence and the armed services existed and operated efficiently long before the present minister reached the scene. On the basis of the speeches made in this house, as well as on the basis of speeches made elsewhere, I say that evidence to justify the need for change has not been produced. It is true there have been grandiloquent statements from the minister in that white-paper type of language which lends itself so conveniently to varying forms of interpretation as the need arises.

This leads to the second point I made. There was a great deal of confusion about the concept held by the minister when he spoke of a single unified defence force. There may have been some obscuring of the facts. I do not know. But certainly at the committee hearings which will follow this debate his use of the term "single unified defence force" will be questioned.

Speaking at various meetings, addressing either the general public or members of the armed forces, the minister has said in effect: do not worry too much about the question which is worrying a lot of people, whether this means a single service. But now we are presented with a bill whose basic principle is the establishment of a single service—not a single unified defence force because a single defence force does not necessarily mean a single service. One could have unification at command level. Our forces could be unified in their operations but it does not need to be composed of people in the self-same service wearing the self-same uniform and operating within the self-same rank structure.

Third, I contend there has been a not so subtle change in the objectives of Canadian defence policy. Peace keeping has been upgraded at the expense of the defence of Canada and our commitments under international treaties. The whole concept of the mobile force and the reasons given by the minister for the acquisition of certain equipment and for many of the things which have been done have always been based on peace keeping. However, we know that at the present time peace keeping has a low priority in the organization which alone has authority to despatch a peace-keeping force. After all, Canada is not planning to become a world policeman with an armed force ready to go about on its own initiative to knock heads together. And we know that the concept of peace keeping is having a very difficult time at the United Nations and that unless there is almost a reversal of attitude by some of the principal nations belonging to the United Nations peace keeping will have an increasingly difficult time over the next few years.

This is not the occasion on which to raise some of the problems which go with peace keeping. But they are there. The first, of course, concerns the extent to which Canadian forces would be at the disposal of the United Nations untrammelled by any limitation as to their use. In other words, just how much authority over Canadian forces would Canada give to the United Nations without the right of veto with regard to their use? Unless it were guaranteed that the commander in chief of a peace-keeping force would be one of our own officers, the force might easily pass under the control of someone else.

Fourth, I spoke about the adverse effects on the navy. I will leave it at that. My remarks are on the record and many of my hon. friends will wish to speak about that subject.

Fifth, I inquired why so many senior military officers had retired prematurely or been relieved of their duties—13, as a matter of fact in three months. In the first of a series of articles written by General Foulkes last summer the writer asks: why is it that the whole of the command structure was completely changed in less than two years, something which has never happened before in Canada's military history? Many of these men were exceptionally young. They had been promoted by the minister. They had a brilliant future ahead of them, and certainly they did not fit into the category of officers who were the darlings of some rather ill-informed editorial writers or cartoonists—senior officers well past the age of retirement who had somehow or other become semi-senile. This, of course, is an altogether improper representation of these men.

Then I spoke of the uncertainty, the frustration and the demoralization in the armed services as a result of the minister's action or inaction. There was the frustration caused by delayed decisions. There was the inconsiderate action with regard to the release of the 500 pilots. It could have been done in another way if there was an excess of air crew. There was the minister's statement that there would be a compulsory reduction of some 10,000 in all ranks of the armed services. We know what a demoralizing effect the "golden bowler" program had. Certainly it did not require the retirement of 10,000 service personnel, and we remember the jockeying that took place. Some of those who were in a position to benefit from it did so, and this was the case in a number of unfortunate instances.

Before proceeding further I want to go into what General Foulkes said in the second of his articles. This is a question that the minister must answer. Why is it that Lieutenant-General Fleury said in the the committee that it would be three to five years before the logistic framework of Canada's armed services could be completed? Here we are rushing headlong into the amalgamation of field forces. Not only did General Fleury speak about this but so did General Simonds and Air Marshal Annis. We would like an answer to that question.

The minister has on many occasions both inside and outside the house alleged that other nations are also moving toward the same end, that they are moving toward a single unified defence force composed of a single service. We even have the highly laudatory phrases—self-adulation, I call them—at the conclusion of the minister's speech in which he stated that this is the goal of the armed services of the rest of the world.

What countries have shown any interest, Mr. Speaker? There has been a remarkably strange silence. I believe at one point the minister said that two countries were taking a look at the proposition. We know that New Zealand did take a look at the proposal but rejected it as not being appropriate. With regard to Great Britain the minister will have to explain some of the passages in the book written by the former naval minister, Christopher Mayhew, about the minister's concept of a single service and some of his other reorganizations of the defence forces of Canada, which Mr. Mayhew says will not work in the United Kingdom. Therefore the United Kingdom may be ruled out as being one of the countries that would emulate Canada.

Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but the supremo principle has been thoroughly rejected by the British. In their white paper in 1963 they did not go along with the idea of unification or integration at all. I know that the problems of each country are not the same, but somehow or other the minister has given the impression that we are the shining light, the northern beacon that other nations will rush to for guidance. The only northern beacon there is is just the gleam in the minister's eye, and it has blinded his own vision.

Let us see what Mr. Christopher Mayhew is reported to have said as found in a review of his book published by the Canadian Press. Mr. Mayhew said:

> It seemed clear to me, and Mr. Hellyer readily agreed, that the degree of dislocation which he had cheerfully and deliberately created in Canada—

I could use other terms, Mr. Speaker.

> —would be too much for a country like Britain, with a larger and more complex defence organization, and with immediate, widespread operational responsibilities—
> He says Hellyer has dismantled and rebuilt the defence forces on functional lines.
> "He has built an effective machine for allocating scarce resources on rational principles, and for steamrollering inter-service differences."
> In the short run, Mayhew writes, the reforms meant increased demand on money and manpower instead of economies, with the centralized departments supplementing rather than replacing the three service departments.
> "A member of the department commented sardonically that he doubted whether Canada could find the money needed to finance Mr. Hellyer's economies."

This, Mr. Speaker, is certainly a question to be considered. Admiral Landymore referred to the cost involved and also to the number of persons required in maritime command.

Mr. Hellyer: That was his quote.

Mr. Lambert: That is not his quote.

Mr. Hellyer: It is.

Mr. Lambert: Well, the minister can say it is if he wants to, but the former commander of maritime command would know far more about what is going on in his command than would the minister, who after all never paid it a visit to find out what was going on.

To explain all these difficulties with generals and admirals, Mr. Speaker, the minister maintained there was a breakdown in the lines of communication with the various commanders. If there was a breakdown in the lines of communication, how could he find out what was going on at these commands?

Let me now turn to what the United States has to say with regard to unification. I think the minister is well aware of an article published in the April 1966 issue of "Foreign Affairs" written by Mr. Zuckert, former air force secretary of the United States. I should like to make some rather extensive quotations from this article because I think it helps to place certain things in perspective. It must be remembered that Mr. Zuckert was at one time a great exponent of unification. He signed the Symington committee report in this regard but since has changed his mind, he says. I should like to quote Mr. Zuckert's article:

The Air Force Secretary's specific job, as it evolved between 1961 and 1965, embraced the formidable management task of phasing no less than six major strategic weapon systems in or out of operational status—the B-47, B-52, B-58, Titan II, Minute-man I and II, as well as their trained manpower and all their supporting logistic facilities. He had to be mindful at all times of retaining a proper balance of skilled personnel and resources, without slackening total operational effectiveness.

These considerations shaped my decision to stay on the job. They helped to change my views. For a decade or more, I had been an ardent advocate of more unification. But I came to acknowledge, as did Deputy Secretary of Defence Roswell Gilpatric in his farewell press conference in January, 1964, that further unification of the Department of Defence is neither practical nor advisable.

It must be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that the United States proposals did not go half as far as the minister's present proposals. There was no question at all of a single service. To them unification meant the combining of the forces under one chief of staff' one chief of defence, one minister. That is what they were aiming at, and they have not even gone that far. The minister is proposing not only to follow up the organizational changes he has made but he also wants a single service.

I continue with Mr. Zuckert's article:

In any circumstance that I can foresee, unification of the U.S. military establishment has gone about as far as it ought to go. This statement recognizes that some residual areas of service separatism have so far defied reform.

Then he goes on to outline some of these areas which on the face of it suggest that there could be room for improvement. In this regard those of us on this side agree with the government that certain changes could have been made in the administrative and supply echelons of the armed services in 1964. I continue:

Looking at the big picture of service roles and missions, no reason for separate services seems more important than the freedom to apply many years of thinking and experience to operational concepts and weapon requirements.

• (5:10 p.m.)

In the army, navy and air force, and in the marines, too, a sense of professionalism has been distilled to: develop each requirement; design and produce the suitable weapon; devise the doctrine to govern its proper use in battle; then train and supply the troops to operate that weapon effectively in a familiar medium. This collective effort by each service is then funneled to the unified commander in the field for use in his co-ordinated military machine as approved by the joint chiefs.

[Mr. Lambert.]

Then, the last quotation:

From a purely management view, retention of service identity is wholly consistent with the most sophisticated corporate organizations in the United States.

He gives the example of General Motors. This is precisely contrary to the argument which the minister made in his speech the other day that for the setting up of weapons programs, structures, computer analyses and so forth one requires a single service. Mr. Zuckert says quite the contrary. I would think perhaps he has had as much if not more experience than the minister in handling a very great machine. The quotation continues:

General Motors, for example, maintains separate divisions for the production of Chevrolet, Buick, Oldsmobile, etc. They operate within the policy framework of the parent organization, which even encourages healthy competition within reasonable limits to keep everybody on his toes.

A structure embracing a centralized authority at the top and decentralized management responsibility at the service level is very close to being the most responsive to our need.

He continues:

The military services, essentially organized around the medium in which each one operates, offer through the service secretaries precisely that middle level of management which cannot be discharged as well anywhere else in the department of defence.

This article deals with the objections to unification at the ministerial and management level, which is a long way from what the minister proposes. Therefore it shows even greater strength in its logic than what has been advanced by the minister. Then we come to the other NATO countries. What are they doing about following Canada's plan? Nothing.

How does the minister envisage Canada's force operating with allied units which are organized into three environmental services, navy, army and air force, when Canada proposes not to have a navy, an army and an air force? He says he is going to have sailors called privates, airmen called privates and soldiers called privates, all in the same uniform indistinguishable one from the other, all arising from the same amorphous mass.

The minister has attempted to make a case for his reorganization but even the speech which he made last December contains very little in the way of a concrete plan for the complete reorganization of the forces. This is the same problem which arose during the month of October in the debate on interim supply. Although we knew the minister had something in the back of his mind nothing was forthcoming except his insistence that the whole principle of—I do not know what one might wish to call it—integration and unification must be accepted before one can examine the plan. If the plan has in it one iota of anything which is worth while, it will stand on its own feet and does not require acceptance in principle before examination. One might think the minister is afraid that the plan might not be acceptable or workable and therefore that the legislation must be enacted before the adverse effects of the plan become more and more apparent. In his speech the minister spent a great deal of time talking about the advantages of a single service. It was blocked out paragraph after paragraph. This showed again the confusion which exists in respect of the concept of a unified force and the concept of a single service.

If we go back to pages 10828 and following in Hansard we will see some of the advantages which the minister outlined in respect of the single service. These are: 1. Identity; 2, careers; 3, adaptability of change; and 4, demands of modern warfare. In his argument in respect of identify he claims that while sailors, soldiers and airmen will have a common identity and loyalty to their ships, regiments and squadrons, they will have an overriding loyalty to the whole force and its total objectives on behalf of Canada. What unadulterated piffle! Does the minister suggest there is going to be an improvement in loyalty and that there will be a higher loyalty, for instance, to one's country because there will be a single service? I am afraid that the minister shows how woefully short on experience he was in his country's service.

Mr. Churchill: It is insulting to the men who are in the service now.

Mr. Lambert: Is he suggesting that because the men were organized into regiments or because they were in the air force or the navy and attached to a particular service, their loyalty either to the service or to the country was one whit less? Remember, the minister must show that there is going to be a greater loyalty because they will be under a single identity. This is the first argument. His second argument is:

> For able and highly motivated individuals, both officers and other ranks, wider, more challenging and rewarding career opportunities will be available.

Again I say, what unadulterated piffle, because in expansion of that statement the minister said:

> When people are able to move in a broad stream, which does not confine employment opportunities to narrow specialties or to the individual naval, army or air force entities, both the individual and the force as a whole will clearly benefit.

More Rand corporation language. I should like to give a comment on that, and I believe the minister will agree with this assessment of the degree of specialization in the forces:

> Specialization is essential to maintain competence in today's technical and complex world and this principle applies as fully to defence as it does to industry. Therefore, the special training, equipment and experience to fight in each of the three environments, land, sea and air will remain segregated in our defence forces.

The minister has said that we will still have sailors, soldiers and airmen. Then, to continue:

• (5:20 p.m.)

> There is nothing new in having common training or common support facilities provided by one service for the other by the service best equipped so to do or in placing elements of one service under the operational control of another for the specific exercise of commitment. It is obvious too that the spectrum of common training and operations is much narrower than the present service policies would imply. The cost of the multiple specialist training courses required to produce a universally employable service man in terms of dollars and time is prohibitive.

By this it is not meant that the minister proposes to turn out jacks of all trades. Even a four year old would recognize that that would not be feasible.

Let me continue:

> It follows that unification of the field forces into a single service is inconsistent with the complexities of today's military facts.

That is a definitive answer to the minister's arguments in this regard.

We then swing away from the idea of a single force back to the idea of a single unified defence force. When the minister talks about adaptability of change he talks about a unified force permitting a much more objective analysis to be made as to the employment of this force. He suggested that because an individual belongs to a single unified force with a common uniform, with no tradition, and because he is one of a great mass, indistinguishable from any other, our defence policy, our weapons systems and all those other matters related to an over-all policy will be more flexible and easier to change. I fail to find any connection in this regard or any relationship between these two theses. The proposition advanced by the minister in regard to adaptability to change must surely be a non sequitur. He says it is true because when a man has a common uniform his mind is open to change.

If the minister is talking about a defence force being more adaptable to change because of a common command structure, then I am prepared to concede that there may be some merit to his suggestion, but it does not necessarily follow as a matter of course that because a man has a common uniform and a common rank structure he will have any loyalty to the mass structure and will be more easily changed. I fail to see any merit in that argument put forward by the minister.

Let us now refer to the demands of modern warfare. How on earth could those demands be met more satisfactorily by a man in a common uniform operating under a common rank structure? The minister is not asking for a common command structure or common field commands by this legislation. We are talking about joint or combined service headquarters. The demands of modern warfare are continually changing and there is continuing change in the operations of our land, sea and air components. There is no basis in reason for the suggestion that because all servicemen wear one uniform there will be greater cooperation.

Another strange argument put forward by the minister is that because a man in the air force, army or navy has a loyalty to that particular service he will allow that loyalty to override his objective analysis of the greater requirements of weapons, strategy and so forth. What is suggested is that there may be some ingrained selfishness, preference or prejudice toward one service. Let me suggest to the minister that he has entirely overlooked the feeling, philosophy and the attitude of the fighting man. The minister has been surrounded by people at the command level and has failed to understand that morale, tradition and loyalty to one's regiment have some meaning, although he may have paid lip service to this fact in his statement. He has suggested that this can all be wiped out and that some sort of higher loyalty to the Canadian Armed Forces can be developed.

The word "Royal" is being dropped, but a strange situation will develop if and when we again use it in the new name because again we will have "R.C.A.F.". Perhaps as a former member of Her Majesty's armed forces I might as an ex-soldier feel that there is some plot here, although I am sure that members of the R.C.A.F. would insist that they would not participate in such a scheme and that there would be nothing equivocable about such a move.

A great number of my colleagues wish to speak on this bill and there are only one or two other points I should like to raise. The minister did say something in an effort to assuage certain fears about the continuing use of ranks. He stated that under certain conditions warrant officers and other ranks could continue to use those ranks. That will apply only until these men are promoted because the rank structure of the navy and air force will be wiped out. An individual will never be able to move from lieutenant commander to commander because the rank of commander will no longer exist. He will only be able to maintain that rank until he is promoted. Unless the minister suggests that the regulations will provide otherwise, that rank appellation will continue for perhaps a generation.

The minister has undertaken that no member of the forces today will be called upon to serve in some other branch or role than that in which he is presently engaged except in an emergency. In other words, one cannot convert a seaman into a soldier except in the case of an emergency. I ask this question: When would they be called upon except in an emergency? I admit that on a parade square you would not expect to suddenly convert an airman or a sailor into a soldier but where the difficulty comes—and this is what the services are concerned about—is that you will take soldiers and put them on a ship, when there is a solemn undertaking not to do this, because the bill says "except in an emergency". Every time out it would be deemed to be an emergency if there was such a requirement.

There is a further point. I refer to the integration of the service bases. I contend that it is quite illegal for the minister to have carried this out. He has presented it to this house, the armed services and the country as a fait accompli, in the same way as I found the phrase "Canadian forces" in a bill that came here from the Senate after being passed there.

Mr. Hellyer: It is in the present act.

Mr. Lambert: It is in Bill S-50 which deals with the rights, obligations and what have you of the armed forces of friendly countries while they are visiting Canada.

Mr. Hellyer: The term is also in the present defence act.

Mr. Lambert: But not in the same way, not "Canadian forces." Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it boils down to this. The minister is asking us to accept this measure, not a bill to create a single, unified defence force but to create a single service with a single rank structure. He has not demonstrated the advantages such a step will achieve. I am opposed to the bill on many grounds but principally on this one. I have no hesitation in opposing the bill and that is how I intend to vote in regard to Bill C-243. I refuse to accept what the minister is trying to do to us at the present time by means of this bill.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the introduction of Bill C-243 gives members of the House of Commons an opportunity of discussing all phases of defence organization and defence policy. This was made very clear by the minister because in his tour de force, which covers some 65 typewritten pages and in which I cannot think of one aspect of defence policy and organization that was not mentioned, he covered the active services and the reserve services, he covered organization, he spoke of NATO, of NORAD and the United Nations and, as I say, just about everything one can conceive in this connection.

In introducing my own small contribution to this debate I would commence by going back four years to when this issue was first raised and then I will bring it forward step by step as closely as I can to the present day. We all remember, or we should remember, that a white paper was tabled on March 27, 1964. This was the first indication to this house and the country of an anticipated policy of integration and unification.

On August 1, 1964, integration was approved and went into effect. We have had an accelerated rate of integration since that time. It is obvious that the minister in his thinking has now arrived at the conclusion, through the introduction of this bill and setting forth the major policies in the legislation, to move headlong into unification. It is quite obvious that he thinks the integration process has continued to a point where it is now appropriate to proceed to the ultimate goal, the final goal of a unified defence force. That is why we now have Bill C-243 before us.

There can be no question that as a result of the statements and actions of the minister, particularly in the past 18 months or two years, a furore of opposition has developed amongst many both in the forces and in the general public across this country. As a matter of fact, the opposition has given rise to a great many stories. Undoubtedly the minister knows the one that spread from Halifax to Esquimalt, namely, that history would show three main troublemakers, one was Corporal Napoleon, one was Corporal Hitler and now it is Corporal Hellyer. That is an indication of the thinking of some people in this respect.

The minister quite honestly made clear what he had in mind, not only at the time of the white paper but also at the time integration came into effect. It must be remembered that on several occasions the minister, while maintaining that the "end objective of a single service is firm", made it clear and emphasized in various statements that the changes in Canadian defence organization and policy would take place step by step.

He also made it clear, at least in my estimation, that from his viewpoint unification is the end objective of what he termed a "logical and evolutionary progression." But he also made it clear—I want to make this clear to others just to make sure I have exactly what was stated over the years by the minister—that "although integration and unification are sometimes regarded as alternatives and inherently different, they are, in fact, merely to be stages in the same process."

There are many who do not think that they are, in fact, merely different stages in the same process. That was made abundantly evident by the remarks of my friend the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). In my estimation the opposition which has developed has not developed as far as the policy of integration is concerned; I think it is mostly opposition to the policy of unification. I believe this was made obvious by one who has certainly been making a lot of speeches and doing a lot of writing in opposition to government policy. I refer to Admiral W. M. Landymore. Therefore if he has basically no objection to integration, there is not too much opposition in this respect. Just to make it understood why I take that position I should like to quote from one of the documents he sent me not too long ago. In this document he said:

Both headquarters are now fully integrated but this is no new experience for the navy or for our maritime air forces. Realizing the advantages to be gained by the closest co-operation between sea and air components and discharging a common task, the operations of maritime air and the navy were fully integrated some ten years ago. In both Halifax and Esquimalt for nearly a decade our operations staffs, our planners, intelligence staffs, our meteorologists, oceanographers, operational researchers and communications have worked in an integrated organization—

I want to emphasize this, Mr. Speaker.

—so that the move toward total integration was neither strange nor unreal and was really only felt in the logistics and administration branches of my headquarters.

I think we can take it for granted, Mr. Speaker, that the policy of integration is inevitable. It is certainly my belief, from reading all the documents, books and records on which I could lay my hands, that integration appears to be the only way to remove duplication, triplication, and unnecessary expense, thereby bringing about a saving to the taxpayer and, I believe, a far greater efficiency in the operation and organization of our armed forces.

However, the matter of unification is far more complicated to consider than is integration. I wish to express my firm belief that in advancing the policy of unification the minister, on behalf of the government, appears to have made three major mistakes, and I outline them as follows. First, he did a poor public relations job, leaving nothing but confusion in the minds of the forces of the elected representatives and of the people, thereby unnecessarily antagonizing them. Second, he has been too dogmatic and dictatorial in introducing changes and new policies which could far better have been left to develop of themselves in the natural course of events. Third—and this is the final and most important point—he has not outlined in any way whatsoever the basic and fundamental decision as to the future role of the Canadian Armed Forces.

We maintain that it is absolutely unreasonable to expect us to arrive at an understanding of what the government has in mind. How can we have a knowledge of the meaning of unification if the government does not outline the basic future role of the Canadian Armed Forces in world affairs? This was completely lacking in the 65-page presentation made by the minister.

I should like to elaborate on the three points I have just enumerated, the three main mistakes made by the minister. There can be no question whatsoever about the poor public relations on the part of the minister and his department with regard to members of the House of Commons on a bill as important as this one is and which has such far-reaching affects. The refusal to refer the bill to the standing committee on defence prior to its passage on second reading was a very poor decision. I endorse completely all that was said by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) when he pointed out that the bill should have been sent to the committee. It is absolutely unfair and unreasonable to ask the house to pass this bill on second reading, thereby adopting it in principle, before it is referred to the committee on defence. This is poor public relations for which we can only blame the minister.

He is just about the most unco-operative minister I have ever met. He insists on everything being a fait accompli. This has certainly been our experience in the defence committee of which I have been a member ever since it was first established. We have never been given the opportunity to offer advice, to go over the plans or to give consideration to what the minister or the government had in mind. Oh no, it has always had to be a fait accompli. It comes to the standing committee when the minister has made up his mind and it is almost impossible to try to get him to change it. Not only has there been poor public relations vis-à-vis the committee on defence but the same has been true with regard to members in the house. The minister has said that we jolly well have to vote for the bill and support its principle—therefore we have to support the principle of unification—before he will permit the bill to be considered by the committee on defence. He has been here long enough to know that when a bill has been endorsed in principle it makes it much more difficult to make any changes in it in committee.

The minister seems to have an aptitude for antagonizing members in the house and members in the committee. There certainly have been poor public relations as evidenced by the fact that for three years people have not known what was in the mind of the minister. In all the years before the bill was introduced there has been confusion as to ranks, as to pay and as to whether members of the armed forces could be moved from the navy to the air force, to the army. Unnecessary confusion has reigned, all of which could have been avoided if the minister had received proper advice from those who are supposed to be expert in the field of public relations.

I will not say any more on that subject because I wish to deal with the two other points I have mentioned. I have already dealt in part with the excessively dogmatic and dictatorial manner of the minister. However, it can be further evidenced by his attitude toward the reserve forces. He certainly built up opposition where it was completely unnecessary to do so. He cracked the whip at the reserve forces of Canada who over the years have done a wonderful job. He is cracking the whip on uniforms. He did not need to do so because the matter of uniforms could have been left to develop in the natural course of events.

These and many other matters could be mentioned but suffice it to say that the minister has brought a lot of these problems on his own head because of his dogmatic and dictatorial attitude. How much better it would have been if he had learned to be a little more co-operative and realized that he is not the only one interested in our defence forces or the only one who knows something about them. This is all I will say on the second point because, as I said, the most important aspect of unification is the future role of the Canadian Armed Forces. This, of necessity, ties in with foreign policy and with many of our international relations. I honestly believe that a great deal of the confusion about the government's intention with regard to unification would not have developed if the committee had had an opportunity of studying the bill after it was introduced but before it was given second reading, and also if this house and the general public had been given some understanding of what was in the government's mind concerning the role of our Canadian forces in the future.

I believe, sir, that the entire situation is not only confused but that it will continue to be confused until the government indicates just what the purpose of the forces is. I put the question this way: Are Canadian forces to perform only a peace-keeping and intervention role and have combat capacity limited to non-nuclear operations or are Canadian forces intended to have full combat capability not only for the direct defence of Canada but in particular within the present strategy of the NATO and NORAD alliances?

It appears to this group at least, Mr. Speaker, that the nature of the armed forces required and the equipment for each of these roles are vastly different. It seems self-evident to us, therefore, that a clear definition of the future role of the Canadian forces is required before any sensible examination and decision can be made on the best organizational structure. The minister himself pointed out certain matters that affect structure and equipment. It is difficult to tie in the structure and equipment which he emphasized with regard to mobility with the role of the Canadian Armed Forces in the future within the NATO and NORAD alliances.

If I may refresh the memories of hon. members, I will refer to what the minister said in his presentation. He indicated that at the present time there are six air squadrons in Germany having a nuclear strike role and also having a conventional bombing capability. He indicated also that there are two air squadrons located in Fance having a reconnaissance role. As the minister pointed out the two reconnaissance squadrons will have to be moved out of France during the present year. He stated further that it was the intention of his department to reduce the number of squadrons from eight to six, four of which would be strike squadrons and two reconnaissance.

In addition to our air squadrons in Europe, we also have the fourth Canadian infantry brigade group in Germany. This outline would appear to indicate that, all these years after the end of the second world war, we are going to maintain at least six air squadrons in Germany and an infantry brigade group. We would like to ask on what ground is this necessary, especially when we remember the further remarks of the Minister of National Defence? Mobile command headquarters were established at St. Hubert, Quebec, in October, 1965. The minister stated in this connection:

> —a mobile command's mission is to maintain combat readiness and a land tactical air force. The mobile command is responsible for the provision of a rotational brigade for the land forces assigned to NATO in Europe and for the training of two additional air portable brigades designed for rapid deployment. Also the command is forming a Canadian airborne regiment whose personnel and equipment can be rapidly sent to danger zones. A vital component of mobile command is its tactical air element and current planning of the defence department calls for the formation of four squadrons of CF-5 tactical ground support aircraft. In addition to the formation of the CF-5 squadron plans are in hand for units of Buffalo transport aircraft and light and heavy helicopters to meet the need for air mobility in any combat zone.

When you put together these two statements you find that basically one refers to maintaining thousands of servicemen and their dependants in Europe, while the other refers to mobile command and the equipment necessary to operate it. We say that there is a conflict here. We say the statement does not give any clear indication of the future role of the Canadian forces or the forces that the minister and the government want to have. The government indicates that, after two world wars, a small populated country like Canada is going to have an over-all air force, an over-all army and an over-all navy. Obviously Canada cannot do that because we have neither the money nor the manpower. Obviously the government has to decide the future role of the forces on the basis of the best contribution Canada can make toward world peace. Having reached that decision, then we can understand at least to some extent what is meant by unification.

In view of the minister's own outline and the stress he places on mobility, what it means in men, equipment and training, we feel there is a strong argument for a definite statement of policy from the government so that by the time the new NATO agreement comes up in 1969 Canada will have removed its forces from Europe. We believe it is time to give real consideration to that, particularly in view of the fact it takes a while to accomplish this after the decision is made, and because the new agreement comes up for discussion and signature in 1969. Surely after so many years and all the redevelopment after the devastation of the second world war, those countries are basically able to look after themselves, especially with the Canadian mobile force at hand as outlined by the minister.

We in this group are not the only ones talking about withdrawing troops in two or three years. This has been discussed in the United Kingdom. If you want to bring it closer to home I would refer to an article in the New York Times of January 20 with a Washington dateline. It reads:

• (6:00 p.m.)

Senate majority leader Mike Mansfield, criticizing the administration for "marking time" on European policy, has reopened his campaign to bring about a substantial reduction of U.S. forces in Europe.

With the support of most of the Senate Democratic leadership, the Montana Democrat reintroduced a resolution saying a substantial reduction could be made in the present six U.S. divisions in Europe without "adversely affecting" North Atlantic Treaty commitments.

It was identical to a resolution last year that the Senate leadership decided not to press after the administration gave assurances that it was studying future U.S. troop levels with the NATO allies.

The resolution is to be referred to the armed services and foreign relations committees, and Mansfield said he expected the two committees to hold joint hearings and act on his proposal some time this year.

Should the resolution reach the Senate floor, the appraisal of Senate leaders is that it would receive approval by a large majority.

Canada should think not just of renegotiating its position in NATO but of getting out of NATO. The only phase of activity I can see where we might continue is in that having to do with the anti-submarine specialty of the Canadian navy on the Atlantic coast.

The future role of our forces is not made clear, is not outlined in any way by the Minister of National Defence. Having mentioned NATO I ought to mention NORAD. It is understandable that there should be a close relationship between the United States and Canada on defence matters. No reasonable explanation can be given why, in regard to defence co-operation and our relations with the United States under NORAD, we should have nuclear weapons in the hands of Canadians and on Canadian soil.

An hon. Member: It is a matter of policy.

Mr. Winch: When the Liberals came to power, following our friends on the right who had agreed to the introduction of nuclear weapons in the hands of Canadians and the storage of nuclear bombs on Canadian soil, the Prime Minister made it clear that Canada would move immediately to negotiate out of that commitment. We have not heard a word about it since. We accept our Prime Minister's word. We tell him to negotiate out of that commitment and to remove atomic weapons from Canadian soil and from the hands of our troops overseas. I do not know how the Minister of National Defence can maintain the present position of having these weapons in face of the absolute contradiction contained in those beautiful, constructive yet sanctimonious speeches prepared by the Department of External Affairs and delivered at the United Nations. One was made at a NATO conference in Paris not too long ago. The speech warned against the proliferation of nuclear weapons of any kind. As a matter of fact, the whole thing becomes ridiculous.

Having said what we urge, let me now refer to something that appeared in a newspaper. This article deserves to be printed in every newspaper in North America and possibly throughout the world. It is datelined Washington and reads:

The United States, Britain and Russia signed a treaty Friday which bans nuclear weapons in space—

Oh.

—and reserves the moon and other celestial bodies for peaceful purposes.

Is that not beautiful? They have reserved the moon and other celestial bodies for peaceful purposes. When will they get together and reserve this earth for peaceful purposes? Can nations not get together, can some country not take some action at least that will mean peace on earth, that will stop the proliferation of nuclear weapons? We do not want those weapons in space, nor do we want them in Canada and we do not want them in the hands of Canadian forces.

Mr. Herridge: That is our policy.

Mr. Winch: We want a different government policy from what we have had. Canada should lead the nations along the lines we suggest.

We must know the future role of the army, the navy and the air force. We must know how our forces are to stand in regard to NORAD and NATO, nuclear weapons and mobility. The role of our forces we must know before, as responsible members, we can say whether unification is or is not good for the forces, or for Canada. Other speakers from this group will go into this matter in greater detail. I have spoken for almost 40 minutes but I have not covered the entire field because that is impossible. Other speakers will talk of defence policy and other organizational matters.

In concluding I repeat that Bill C-243 should have been sent to the defence committee after first reading. That was not done. I hope the minister will rid himself of some of his dogmatism, dictatorship and arrogance and will recognize that it is unfair to ask us to vote on second reading on such an important principle without the matter having been discussed by the committee and without the minister and his officials having placed every last bit of factual information before that committee. We must have the complete plan of unification and integration.

I hope I see the spirit of co-operation in the minister's eye, and I urge him even now to adjourn second reading and refer the subject matter of this bill to the defence committee. The policy of integration seems logical and reasonable to us, but the House of Commons should not be asked to endorse the principle of unification until the government has clearly outlined its attitude toward existing military alliances and its reasons for same; and the anticipated role for Canada's armed forces.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this debate I do not intend to go into details I want to deal with defence policy and with the proposal to unify the armed forces.

It has been brought to our attention that the objectives of Canada's defence policy are, first, to preserve peace by supporting collective defence measures to deter military aggression; second, to support Canadian foreign policy including that arising out of our participation in international organizations and, third, to provide for the protection and surveillance of our territory, our air space and our coastal waters. When we turn to the white paper which was tabled in 1964 we read the following statement on page 6:

• (6:10 p.m.)

In these circumstances, there have developed four parallel methods by which the objectives of Canadian defence policy have been pursued. They are:

(a) Collective measures for maintenance of peace and security as embodied in the charter of the United Nations, including the search for balanced and controlled disarmament;

(b) Collective defence as embodied in the North Atlantic Treaty;

(c) Partnership with the United States in the defence of North America;

I believe there is general agreement across the country with respect to the first objective outlined. I do not think anyone will disagree that we must seek to preserve peace by supporting collective defence measures to deter military aggression. Nations have reached the point in the word's history where they realize the futility of trying to guarantee the integrity of their own borders and maintain their national sovereignty completely on their own. In seeking to accomplish this objective they have realized the importance of banding together with others who are interested in the same goal, pledging mutual support in case of an attack by an aggressor state.

Nor do I think anyone will disagree with the proposition that we ought to support Canadian foreign policy, including that arising out of our participation in international organizations. Reference has been made to one of these organizations, the United Nations. I believe that Canada has played an important and vital role in this assembly. The United Nations is not a perfect organization, nor has it achieved all its objectives all the time, but I think we must agree that in the final analysis it has served a very useful purpose in endeavouring to substitute the conference table for the battlefield. It has not always succeeded but I believe it has succeeded in a number of instances.

When we think of one of the most important operations of the United Nations organization—I refer to peace-keeping operations—we can all be proud of the contributions our men have made in various areas of the world. Moving in without any massive organization and without any large amount of military force, they have established a presence which has contributed greatly to the maintenance of at least a semblance of peace in troubled regions. All members of the house recognize this and agree that we must support Canadian policy with regard to at least some of these areas of activity.

Furthermore, I believe there is general agreement that we should provide for the protection and surveillance of our territory, our air space and our coastal waters. It is this aspect which is causing the greatest concern to those who have been speaking and writing about the proposed unification program. Doubt has been raised as to the effectiveness of such a force in fulfilling these important obligations—the protection and surveillance of our territory, our air space and our coastal waters.

While I do not agree completely with the submissions of Rear Admiral Landymore, I believe one of his main fears is that the proposed unified force would be unable to carry out effectively the protection and surveillance of our coastal waters in particular. There will be fairly general agreement that the three objectives of policy to which I have referred are to be commended. But though general agreement may be reached as to objectives there are wide discrepancies of opinion as to how these objects can best be achieved. One of the reasons for this lack of agreement may be differences of opinion as to the type of military challenge which may confront us in the future.

Will we be faced by a nuclear threat? There are many people who have come to the conclusion that as far as Canada is concerned this is not a very serious prospect at the present time. A few years ago there was a great deal of discussion about the degree of probability of a nuclear attack in which Canada would be involved, and we have gone to considerable expense in order to meet that challenge. Whether or not that expense was justified is open to question.

In the course of the hearings before the defence committee shortly after it had been set up, a former military officer, now a military analyst, appeared before the committee. This gentleman, Mr. John Gellner, wrote an article which appeared in the magazine Executive, of February, 1966. Referring to the cut-off date of 1964, he said:

> Until then, Canada had followed the American lead and concentrated almost entirely on means of deterring the big, i.e. the nuclear, war, and if it came to the worst, possibly fighting a limited kind of such a war.

Later in the article he states: "It all resulted in a fantastic waste of effort and money". I think there are a great many people who would agree with Mr. Gellner's observation.

So there are those who envisage a nuclear war in which we must participate and there are others, in my estimation by far the larger group, who suggest that Canada is more likely to find itself engaged in wars of a conventional or local type.

The question raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) is most important. What is Canada's role to be in any future conflict? If the minister could outline for us in some detail the role Canada is likely to play in the event of such a conflict, I believe it would help the members of this house as well as the public in general and those serving in the forces to understand his policy better.

In order to meet the challenge, whatever it may be, there are those who would like to hold to the status quo. They contend that what we have at the present time has served us admirably in the past and will continue to serve us effectively in the future.

Without question, Mr. Speaker, Canada's armed forces have proven themselves in the last two world conflicts adequate for any and every situation. Those of us who had the opportunity of going overseas with the veterans affairs committee some months ago to visit various countries and meet the people there who came to participate in the memorial services which were held can testify to the fact that these people stated very clearly and definitely their appreciation of the role that Canada played in those two major conflicts. One man asked members of the committee on one occasion to convey to Canada the thanks and appreciation of his countrymen for the contribution that the Canadian forces had made in securing and providing for the maintenance of liberty and freedom so that they were able to bring up their families to enjoy the benefits of a democratic system of government. I am sure that every member of this house whether he has served in the armed forces or not, as well as every other Canadian, would agree that Canadian forces have made a tremendous and effective contribution to the defence of freedom and liberty in days gone by. Therefore it is logical that there are those who say that what has been good enough for Canada in the past is good enough today. They contend that what has served us so effectively in the past will continue to serve us effectively in the future and that our forces should remain as they are.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker—and this is the position that the Minister of National Defence and the associate minister are taking—there are those who contend there must be a radical change or reorganization of Canada's armed forces if they are to meet the demands and challenges of the future. As a result we now have before us the proposals which are incorporated in the particular bill now under discussion.

I should like to refer to the defence committee which was established some time ago. I suppose this present proposal was a new concept, and I remember in the 1950's, before my enforced holiday following the 1958 election campaign, making the suggestion that Canada should have a non-partisan defence policy just as it had been following, generally speaking, a non-partisan foreign policy. I suggested that a committee should be set up to study the whole matter and to give advice and counsel to the minister and the government in arriving at defence policy. That suggestion was not accepted. Later, Mr. Speaker, it was suggested that a committee ought to be set up and the government was urged to do so. We then found during an election campaign that the Liberal party picked up the proposal—I am not sure whether they took it solely from us or from us and somebody else as well—and established a defence committee.

It was my privilege to serve on that committee for a time and I appreciate the experience that was gained. However, I must say I was sadly disillusioned in a very short time over the role that the defence committee was to play in the formulation of policy or in a study of defence matters. The minister stated before the special committee on defence on June 27, 1963, that the committee would give hon. members an excellent opportunity to inform themselves on defence matters and to contribute to the determination of defence policy for the years ahead.

Perhaps the first part of his statement has proved to be true. At least, it has as far as I am concerned because I must admit that my understanding of defence matters was very limited and in fact is still very limited even today. Therefore it did give us an opportunity to study defence matters and to inform ourselves. However, as far as contributing to the determination of a defence policy for the years ahead is concerned, I can see no such contribution anywhere.

I can remember the minister coming to the defence committee or into this house on occasion and making statements setting out policy even on matters under discussion at the time by the defence committee. Whether he was anticipating the views of the committee or not is open to question, but I think some members of the committee and some members of the house took it that the minister was just going ahead on his own without reference to the committee, laying down policy and then saying: "Well, you can inform yourselves on the policy and here it is but you are not going to have any part in the determination of the policy".

I suppose I was rather naïve in expecting such a thing would happen, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps other hon. members were naïve too. But I insist that as far as the committee's work is concerned I cannot see that it has had any effect whatever on the determination of a defence policy for Canada.

Having said that, as a general principle we support the course that is being followed in the reorganization of the defence forces of Canada. I would make the reservation that we do not necessarily agree with everything contained in the bill, but we have taken the position on other bills before the house that debate on second reading involves the policy or principle and is not a debate on all the details and provisions of the bill. In discussing this question with my colleagues we have agreed that this course if desirable and advisable.

Many distinguished officers have voiced opposition to the program. We have read constantly in the newspapers of this or that officer making such and such a statement in criticism of the unification program. We have had a mass of material sent to our desks outlining their objections in great detail and why they are objecting. This matter has been raised in the house on many occasions. In fact, the question was asked today: Why is it that so many eminent military leaders have found it necessary to resign or be ousted because of the position they have taken in respect of the unification proposals. Even though many distinguished officers have voiced opposition to the program, there must surely be equally distinguished officers who support the course that is being followed.

In this regard, Mr. Speaker, I have come up against a problem. On November 1, 1966 the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) quoted an article written by General Foulkes in support of the concept of unification. Yet I have heard this same gentleman referred to as one who opposes the concept of unification. I do not know which to believe. Perhaps I might refer to the statement to which the associate minister referred, as it appears at page 9395 of Hansard. He stated that General Foulkes was reported to have said the following in the Star Weekly magazine of November 14, 1961:

We need one single armed service under one supreme chief of staff in one uniform. We need to organize our armed forces in the form of task forces designed for their particular jobs, at home or off our coasts or in Europe or with the United Nations. They should each be given the strength they need for their particular job at a given time. They would have no fixed establishment with rigid ladders of promotion, as the three services have now. They would all come under one system of administration, and by this means—and only by this means—I believe, the taxpayers' legitimate complaints of extravagance, duplication and waste can be removed and Canada can start to get real value for its defence budget.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I say, I am having some difficulty in reconciling this statement with some of the statements which have been attributed to this same eminent officer by some of those persons who argue against unification. I have several articles here. One which appears in the Ottawa Citizen November 12, 1966, is entitled "Top officer gives support to Hellyer's defence plan". The article is referring to Air Marshal F. R. Sharp, vice chief of the defence staff. There also is an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of November 15, 1966, which quotes the chief of the defence staff, General J. V. Allard as supporting the policy of the minister. Perhaps I might read just the first two paragraphs:

The chief of the defence staff, General J. V. Allard, yesterday defended the integration and proposed unification of Canada's armed forces and said it is not the intention to make the forces a melting pot of individuals without identity or pride in their environmental and functional affiliation.

[Mr. Patterson.]

He insisted that each of the three present services will continue to operate in an environment of their own "keeping the traditions associated with their operating environments at the unit level".

Are we to assume, Mr. Speaker, that those who are serving officers at the present time support the principle of unification, but when they get out of the service they state something completely different. It almost would seem that way. Therefore if that be true, then it would seem that we cannot believe the officers who are presently serving. It would seem that they are being required to state government policy and say that they agree with it, and believe it is the only thing. I think possibly the minister might refer to some of these contradictory statements and perhaps clarify them for us.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I do not think my hon. friend wishes to make that suggestion. It would be grossly unfair to the officers who presently are serving. It also would be grossly unfair to the minister and associate minister, because we have not required anyone serving to make statements in favour of the policy, nor would we expect them to make such statements if they did not believe in them. I believe that is only a fundamental courtesy which we might extend to them and others who have retired, and who have different views.

Mr. Patterson: I certainly would like to agree with the minister, but as I say, I am in a quandary because here we have an example where in 1961 General Foulkes apparently stated his full support for a single armed service with one chief of staff, one uniform and so on, and yet he is being quoted as being in opposition to the unification program, now that he is retired. The minister shakes his head. Perhaps I have misunderstood some of the statements made by members of the official opposition. However, may I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I am not in any way trying to decrease the stature of those who have served or who are serving; I am not attempting to do that. I am just trying to state my position in an attempt to understand just why these seemingly contradictory statements are being made by the same individuals.

I have stated that generally we support the policy as outlined in the bill, but I believe the minister is to be blamed for being so close-mouthed in the past, if he in fact was clear headed enough to know where he was going and what he intended to do. I should like to go back to November, 1966, and read two or three brief sections from an editorial which appeared in The Legionary regarding this particular matter. I do not intend to read this consecutively, but will pick out portions here and there. In doing so, however, I am sure I will not be doing a disservice to the entire article:

The Legion's request was contained in a letter to Prime Minister Pearson, dated August 26, from Donald M. Thompson, the Dominion Secretary and read as follows:

"The members of the Royal Canadian Legion have always taken a keen interest in developments affecting Canada's defence forces. One of the purposes and objects included in our Act of Incorporation states: ..'.to strive for peace, good will and friendship among all nations, at the same time advocating the maintenance by Canada of adequate and sufficient forces on land, sea and in the air for the defence of our country.' "

I shall now skip two paragraphs:

"We have been deeply concerned at some of the public statements which have been made lately, both by those opposing and those proposing complete unification of the Canadian forces. In spite of our best efforts to understand the situation we are compelled to say that, because of the lack of authoritative, clearcut information and explanation we find ourselves unable at this moment to form a sound judgment on the whole question.

The Royal Canadian Legion is not interested in the partisan politics which appear to be developing in connection with this question."

At this point I shall move down to the next paragraph:

"The Royal Canadian Legion urges your government to make clear, without further delay, the detailed plans connected with the integration, and particularly the proposed unification, of the forces so that the judgments made by Canadian organizations and citizens will be based on frank and comprehensive official information and fact, not on rumour and supposition, as seems to be largely the case at the present time."

So it is evident from this editorial that the Canadian Legion was very perturbed over the fact that although there had been a great deal of discussion and debate, and many statements made for and against, they had not been given the necessary information upon which to base their own conclusion and decide whether the program was or was not worth while. I shall not take the time to read the statements made by Admiral Landymore, but I should like to refer to pages 6 and 9 of the brief he prepared for the committee on national defence. Here he states his concern that sufficient information has not been given to enable them to arrive at intelligent decisions and recommendations. There was a lot of talk about unification and integration, but as far as unification is concerned there was nothing to indicate just what the minister had in mind. This was one of the things which really disturbed Rear Admiral Landymore. He stated that this disturbed his officers and his men. While I do not agree with his attitudes, his words, his actions or his influence, I realize there was some excuse for his position. Perhaps this could all have been avoided by some clear-cut statement of policy on the part of the minister.

The minister must be blamed therefore for allowing this state of uncertainty to exist for so long. The natural consequence of that was the building up of resentment and antagonism. This would not have occurred if accurate information had been given to those vitally concerned. In this way the rumours, reports, misinformation and misstatements would have been eliminated.

The minister must also be blamed for proceeding so far in the implementation of this policy, which has not as yet been approved by this parliament. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) stressed this point to a considerable degree, so I will not refer to it further. I do believe the minister must be blamed in this regard, and that he should not have proceeded so far before obtaining the approval of this parliament.

We are in support of the principles of the bill and unification. Let me refer to a statement of Social Credit objectives, principles and policies which was published I believe in 1958. This is Social Credit policy, so I should like to put it on record here. Let me quote from page ten of this booklet which states that the Social Credit party in respect of national defence would adopt—

(a) A realistic defence policy based on the following premises:

(2) Canada's geographical factors and small population make sustained effective defence against a major aggressor impossible without the aid of other nations.

(b) Having regard to these facts, a Social Credit government would:

(1) Re-design Canada's defence strategy and military forces to eliminate useless expenditures on forms of defence obsolete in the light of modern circumstances.

(2) Concentrate on establishing powerful well-equipped, highly mobile forces strategically deployed and capable of immediate airborne transport to any area of Canada.

Having supported a statement of policy such as this it would be difficult for us to turn around, even if we had any desire to do so, and oppose the measures proposed by the minister. We still believe that in the light of modern conditions this is a commendable, satisfactory and logical position to take in the re-organization of our forces.

One reason suggested for unification was economy of operation. Some members of the house during this debate went to great lengths in an endeavour to prove that economies would not result. I have not gone into this particular matter, but the minister has said that economies have and will be effected. I suppose the only thing we can do is wait and see, and then make a judgment.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Patterson: Yes.

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. gentleman compare the estimates from year to year, which show there has been no decline in expenditures, or savings as a result of this policy.

Mr. Patterson: Perhaps that is the case, but we must recognize the fact that the minister has already stated that we would save money so far as administration was concerned, but that money would be used to update our equipment. When that has been achieved it is hoped there will be a saving. Even if we just update our equipment in this way, I think this is a worth-while step so far as the operations of our defence forces are concerned.

Perhaps many members of this house, if not all, will agree that this policy is desirable and worth while from the standpoint of administration. In the final analysis this is a proposal which is somewhat commensurate with Canada's resources. We must admit that we have a relatively small population and do not have the tremendous resources which would enable us to move into the big league, as it were. We must therefore fulfil the vital and important role to which we can adapt our forces.

Mr. Winch: Specialized, though.

Mr. Patterson: Yes, that would be right.

I believe that this bill embodies a move in the right direction, and in conclusion I should like to ask the minister to clarify for us, for the people of Canada and for the armed forces what the role of the Canadian Armed Forces will be in the future. If we can obtain the answer to that question perhaps we can more intelligently discuss this whole matter of national defence.

[Mr. Patterson.]

The special committee has its work cut out. Reference has been made to the attempt to put this bill before the committee before second reading. At that time, commencing on that suggestion, I stated that would be contrary to the usual procedure of this house, but I also said perhaps this is one instance when we should depart from usual procedure. Perhaps by doing so we might have allayed the fears of those who are apprehensive about this whole program of unification. We trust that as a result of the studies to be conducted by the committee when this bill is referred to it, the information gleaned and the recommendations made, an effective program will be developed which will safeguard and promote the freedom and integrity of not only Canada but the entire free world.

Mr. John R. Matheson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to speak after the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson). I was pleased that he referred in the course of his remarks to the visit by the veterans affairs committee to many of the battlefields in Europe. It was certainly my conclusion, after the briefings we received in places such as the Somme, Dieppe, Arnhem, the Normandy beachhead, Mount Cassino and Ortona, that military science is constantly in the process of change. If we are to progress and accomplish those high aims for which our armed forces were established, namely the maintenance of peace, we must constantly re-examine basic issues and have the courage to deal with them.

There was the suggestion in the remarks of my hon. friend that the Minister of National Defence has not been frank. To me this is, with respect, a ludicrous assertion. I wonder when in the history of Canada, even during the period of the two wars, Canadians have ever received as much information with respect to defence as was given to this house on December 7, 1966, in the lengthy, detailed, almost exhaustive statement of the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Winch: It is what was left out that bothers us.

Mr. Matheson: I wonder when in the period prior to 1963 we ever heard between 100 and 200 extraordinarily able people of this country, and elsewhere, giving evidence on defence matters. Where else has any group of parliamentarians been able to hear defence policy discussed from every aspect—tactical, strategic, logistic—and intelligence of the quality that we received in the defence committee?

I am reminded of John Walker's comments on C.B.C. in the program "Preview Commentary" of September 20, 1966, when he said:

> When the session adjourned recently, the Conservative member for Halifax, J. M. Forrestall, was accusing Mr. Hellyer of "illegal" actions in unifying the services before the bill is presented this fall and charging him with putting things over on the members.
> His argument, like that of the military men who claim they never knew unification was planned to begin in 1967, is a hollow but desperate one. It was reasonably clear from the white paper of March 15, 1964, that unification was supposed to begin some time between March, 1967, and March, 1968, the details and extent to be worked out by the new single defence staff, as Hellyer repeatedly told the defence committee.

Incidentally, if I may interpolate for a moment, because I wish to continue with Mr. Walker's comment, if we examine the address of the Minister of National Defence of December 7 last, it seems perfectly clear that a period of years will still intervene before there can be anything like complete unification. This is a process that will tend to continue and improve as each year goes on.

Mr. Churchill: Not with the same minister, I hope.

Mr. Matheson: Perhaps not with the same minister. He may be prime minister by that time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Speaker, may I continue with what I think is very fair comment by John Walker on the C.B.C.:

> This was confirmed in a long directive sent out to all the forces April 2, 1964, repeated by Vice Admiral H. S. Rayner the next day in a personal notice in every naval wardroom and barrack. "The end objective of a single service is firm", he said, although Admiral Landymore apparently didn't get the message for another two years.
> And on April 9, 1964, Mr. Hellyer told the Commons that it was correct that for planning purposes the defence department "considers July 1, 1967, as an acceptable target date for the unification of the three forces".

I believe that in military matters, as in other matters, if you are to move you have to decide to move, you have to get the engine into gear and have the courage to move. This is precisely what has happened. John Gellner gives us an idea of the administrative background of this whole situation. The only satisfaction we as Canadians can take from a review of our situation is that similar conditions have prevailed in most other western states. John Gellner says:

> To understand the revolution in national defence management, one must first look at what the practice used to be.

I am pleased that my hon. friend the former minister of national defence, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness), is in the chamber. I think we can describe the situation that prevailed for a long while between wars. John Gellner continues:

> In the past, in peacetime, the defence minister of a western democracy was only the spokesman of the services in the cabinet and in parliament, and the interpreter to the services of the government's policies. He did not usually take a hand in planning strategy. He was not even the co-ordinator of planning. Co-ordination was done by a chiefs of staff committee, and by other joint committees of the services (in Canada, there used to be about 200 such committees).

This is the sad way in which defence policy developed during the peacetime years. John Gellner continues:

> These, split by service rivalries, were not the best instruments for common action.
> Each service drew up its own budgetary requirements, usually on the basis of its own conception of what its mission was.
> Invariably, the requirements submitted totalled much more than the government was willing to spend. After much haggling they were pared down so that each service got its piece of the pie.

This may have been 40 per cent for one service, 40 per cent for another and 30 per cent for the third, with not much more logic to it than that. Gellner continues:

> The size of it, however, was as often as not determined on the basis of arbitrary ratios rather than on rational division.
> The tendency to look at a military problem in isolation was also prevalent when it came to judging individual equipment programs.

I like what Ron Collister has said by way of summary in his excellent series entitled "The Unification Issue," when he sums it up in this way:

> Unification is on its way because it makes sense to the new generation, in or out of uniform, on the grounds of economy and efficiency in 1966 and the age of science.

My hon. friend from Fraser Valley was challenged by a member of the official opposition a few minutes ago on the question of whether the Minister of National Defence was in fact effecting economies for Canada in this program of unification. I am reminded of a visit I had to our brigade in NATO and talking to a number of friends, some of whom had been servicemen in world war II and old comrades. It was a very sad picture that we received attesting to the depletion of materiel. We did not have adequate guns, we did not have adequate gun tractors or recce equipment. It was entirely inadequate. One could refer to every branch of the services and find that we had failed to keep up with our materiel requirements. I am speaking off the top of my head, but I believe for a while we were spending only about 17 per cent of the defence budget for equipment. While our total defence costs remained constant we were in fact disarming.

During this period administration costs tended to climb, costs for personnel were very much larger; so there was the piling one on top of another of administration staffs. Finally we were so overloaded with overhead costs that we were becoming an army that could scarcely have fought any decisive action anywhere. Perhaps we were fulfilling a useful role as a diplomatic force, and I do not minimize the importance of this. Our attempts to meet our NATO commitment must always be regarded partially in this light. But if our presence in Europe is important or is to be regarded seriously anywhere, we must equip a force in such a way that it can in actual fact perform its task effectively.

I should like to refer, if I may, to the conclusions of people who are not in the public service at this time, either here or elsewhere, but who stand out as giants I think in the field of military science. I feel that many of these people have in their own way and as a result of their experience, some of them in world war I, world war II and Korea, come to the certain conclusion that for optimum military efficiency unification is necessary.

May I call it seven o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, it was suggested that we rise from seven o'clock to eight o'clock to permit hon. members to have dinner. If this is unanimously agreed, it might be so ordered.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Matheson.]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty pursuant to standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock this day are as follows: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), unemployment insurance—request for increase in maximum benefits; the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Simard), bankruptcies—consequences of bankruptcy of Prudential Finance Corporation and subsidiaries; the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. Alkenbrack), Canadian National Railways—inquiry as to remuneration for fire damage.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF NAVY, ARMY AND AIR FORCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Hellyer for the second reading of Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Speaker, just before the dinner recess I presumed to suggest that what the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) has done for Canada's defence policy is to implement the recommendations of some of the most prophetic and knowledgeable people in the military field known to our times. May I refer to an article which appeared in the Canadian Army Staff College Journal, period 1959 to 1961, written by J. G. Forth of the Royal Canadian Engineers under the title, "Unification, when, how, why?". The author of that article concluded that the existence of three or more separate services in modern national defence forces is an illogical relic of the past perpetuated by inflexible thinking, vested interests and individual service fear of extinction. He said that a clear distinction of roles for each service is no longer possible; that as time passes this overlapping of function continues to increase with resulting waste in research and development programs, in manpower and time. He said that the ever expanding area of overlapping of functions and the continual development of new weapons and concepts of war point clearly in the direction of service unification.

He concluded that the development of a single, unified service would lead to an increased efficiency both in logistics and operations; that unification would eliminate the need for combined staffs; would eliminate interservice jealousy and rivalry, and it would make possible the more efficient use of resources available at every level. What was required here or anywhere else where this problem was under consideration was a person with a very sharp mind and an appetite for action, and that is what Philip Smith of Weekend magazine concluded was our happy fortune in the Minister of National Defence, a person possessed of the courage to act on the conclusions of past experience.

Hon. members might be interested in some of the quotations that are available from different authorities. General of the army Douglas MacArthur said:

> The great lesson for the future is that success in the art of war depends upon a complete integration of the services. In unity will lie military strength.

Mr. Churchill: That is integration.

Mr. Matheson: I am not interested in semantics; I am interested in the development of an idea. I should like to quote what Dwight D. Eisenhower, General of the army, said:

> Unity of command in the field so vital to our success was not easily achieved. When war came at Pearl Harbour we had joint command. It was not until we surprised the enemy in North Africa that the first large scale example of unified command emerged. But it was a new device and there were many difficulties which yet remained to be overcome. All of these had to be met and surmounted during actual operations when lives were at stake—
> The navy, the air force and army must work as a unit. If I had my way they would all be in the same uniform.

This is General of the army Dwight D. Eisenhower speaking, and many of us in this chamber had the satisfaction of serving under this outstanding military leader of this century.

President Truman said:

> We should establish the most advantageous framework for a unified system of training for combined operations of land, sea and air.

All of us can remember what Lord Lovat did with a united task force and what Mountbatten did in difficult days and what Wingate did in the east. General of the army, Henry H. Arnold said:

> Not only unity of command is required, but unity in the preparation of programs, preparation of supplies, preparation of ships and allocation of ships, and movement of supplies.

There was a reference a little earlier by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson) to our visit to Europe during the summertime. I remember studying for some hours the landing beach at Dieppe. The tragedy which developed from that fateful operation—I say this with humility and respect —would not have happened had there been the unity we are seeking to provide for our forces by this piece of legislation.

Then, Marshal of the Royal Air Force, Sir Arthur Harris, known as "Bomber" Harris, said:

> There is only one answer to this otherwise inevitable tendency in each of the services to get tied to a particular and invariably obsolete weapon, and all weapons are obsolete as soon as they are in use. There must be only one service; the survival of three of them at this stage in the development of armaments is wholly idiotic, and there never was any reason or need for them at any time.

• (8:10 p.m.)

Some years ago when talking to some friends from the Royal Canadian Horse Artillery in Europe I was told precisely the same thing. I was given to understand that some weaponry used in the army was used also in the air force and in the navy.

Lord Louis Mountbatten said:

> I do not believe that a committee composed of the respective commanders-in-chief, even if it had been under the chairmanship of a minister of state, could have functioned with the advantages which the Supreme Allied Commander enjoyed.

Field Marshal Montgomery said:

> It is a grave question whether any large military organization which is not closely integrated and gripped tightly at the top can adapt itself successfully to the required speed of modern life.

The Duke of Edinburgh, respected all over the scientific world, tells us this:

> Any idiot can go on doing what has been done before, but it takes real courage, intelligence and character to assess the needs of the future, to devise a sound program and carry it into effect. This is particularly true of the armed services, which become merely an expensive luxury unless the process of improvement, modernization, forward thinking, and planning goes on continuously.

He was speaking at the Royal Society of Military Engineers. Some of my friends might be interested in reading the book "Three Continents" by Field Marshal Montgomery of Alamein, published in 1962 by Collins of London. In the chapter "The defence organization of Britain" he writes under the heading "One fighting service: not three". Montgomery concludes:

> Progress and development in the modern world have outmoded the old conceptions of the organization of armed forces; but we cannot see this, so strong are our habits and traditions. The separate existence of the three services, sea, air, and land, automatically results in waste of money, waste of manpower, waste of time.

Mr. Lambert: Nonsense.

Mr. Matheson: Nonsense, is it? Perhaps my hon. friend sat too long reflecting about war and the tragic circumstances of Dieppe, because if unification had been implemented earlier, if he had more assistance on the beaches of Dieppe he might not have been a prisoner of war for so long.

Mr. Lambert: It would have taken more than that.

Mr. Matheson: I suggest that listening to Montgomery, who had some experience in war is worth our while. He said:

> The separate existence of the three services, sea, air, and land, automatically results in waste of money, waste of manpower, waste of time...
> But the greatest fact of modern times is that change is inevitable;...
> Progress depends on courage to make decisions to meet the needs of the times.

He says that this confusion in military thinking is the result basically of the old feudal system of three services. He said:

> The old feudal system, first of two services and now three, has existed for too long—

He says this, and I quote:

> It seems to me to be ridiculous to go on in this way. Obviously we cannot today go over to one service—

He is speaking about the United Kingdom. He suggests that the final step must be to abolish the three services and organize them into one fighting service under a single war department.

I notice in another statement he concludes:

> If the United Kingdom were today a recently created state organizing the fighting forces it is inconceivable that they would be separated into three services.

This step of course invites all kinds of opposition. I can understand people who love tradition being upset. I do not believe there is any person involved in the implementation of this operation who does not care about tradition. I should like to touch on some of this in a minute. Nevertheless, we are compelled to come to certain conclusions. I was interested to read the observation of a prominent Canadian who, when speaking of the Minister of National Defence, said:

> He has perhaps more integrity than any man I've ever met in public life,—

These words were spoken before the Christmas recess. I think we are exceptionally fortunate in Canada to have this minister at this time willing to undertake this difficult and in some respects unpopular task which must be done.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Disastrous.

Mr. Matheson: Disastrous, the hon. member for Carleton said. Well, General Charles Foulkes, former chairman, chief of staff committee in the Star Weekly magazine of October 14, 1961, said something about this—and my hon. friend from Carleton was sitting over here in those days where he might have done something about it. The Star Weekly article I refer to states unequivocally:

> We need one singled armed service, under one supreme chief of staff, in one uniform.

The author General Foulkes, says that only then can Canada start to get real value for its defence budget.

Mr. Harkness: You had better read what he wrote in 1960.

Mr. Matheson: Perhaps my hon. friend who formerly had responsibility in this regard would listen. Perhaps it was not his fault that his defence policy was so utterly paralysed, going in opposite directions. Perhaps he would not mind listening to our Minister of National Defence who has put his reputation on the line. Our minister is prepared to carry this through. Believe me, many Canadians feel this makes good sense.

One of the things that appeals to me in this program is that it will undo the confusion in trades. John Gellner tells us that there are 346 separate trades in the services. A careful, study, conducted since October, 1964, has shown that there need be only 98. Of these, 28 are unique to one service and will exist only in one. The remaining 70 trades will be common to two or all services. He says:

> To integrate these trades was the only sensible thing to do. It should have been done long ago.

Some of us have had an opportunity to discover how, for a period of years there was an oversupply in some trades, and a great shortage in others. Continuing quoting from John Gellner:

> The purpose of consolidating the service trade structure is the same as that of the whole unification drive; to achieve economies in manpower and money, which then can be plowed into the acquisition of more military muscle. There is no doubt that the integration of the 70 common trades will make the whole force more flexible; will allow the keeping of a simple manpower inventory, and will reduce costs of training and administration.

I like the way the minister dealt with this matter at page 10829 of Hansard on December 7, 1966, when he spoke about careers. He says:

> For able and highly motivated individuals both officers and other ranks, wider, more challenging and rewarding career opportunities will be available.

Mr. Speaker, I hope we never need to have a large service force in Canada, but it is imperative that men who are gifted militarily ought to be able to serve in some challenging capacity. They should be trained so that they might make their best contribution to the development of the force. This was spelled out by the minister, in my view, in a very satisfactory fashion. Blair Fraser, writing in Maclean's magazine of August 20, 1966, says that nobody has yet made a case against unification. He says:

> The subject has been debated for 20 years, but the argument has always been between reform on the one hand and inertia on the other. Nobody has ever risen to explain, in terms a civilian could understand, why the services should not be united.

In a few minutes we shall hear from the former minister of national defence. His own defence policy was a tragedy—perhaps not through his fault, but because of divisions inside his own government. Perhaps for the first time during this debate he will present the case against the principle of unification. I shall be interested to hear him because on the unification side we have some men for whom I entertain the greatest respect. One of these is Lieutenant-General W. A. B. Anderson. He was born in 1915 and graduated from R.M.C., which he attended from 1932 to 1936. He was commissioned as a lieutenant in the Royal Canadian Horse Artillery, was promoted to lieutenant-colonel in April, 1942, and from there on he held first grade appointments until appointed to command the 15 Field Regiment, R.C.A.

My hon. friend will be interested in this, because I am sure that he recognizes that Anderson is now one of the outstanding military men of this continent. He served as a general staff officer, Grade 1 (operations) headquarters, Canadian army in northwest Europe from May, 1944, until his return to Canada. He was promoted to colonel in February, 1946, and he was appointed director of military intelligence, and later director to the Canadian Army Staff College. In 1962 he was promoted to major general. In 1964 he was appointed chairman of a senior officers study group. In 1966 he became a lieutenant general and commander of Mobile Command.

Or consider a man like Michael E. Pollard, a man with a fantastic record as a medium bomber pilot, decorated on several occasions for gallantry during the war. In 1952 he was posted overseas to command the R.C.A.F.'s fighter wing at Grostenquin, France and in the following year he assumed the duties of senior air staff officer at 1 Air Division headquarters, Metz. We remember our visits there and the reputation Pollard enjoyed, within the European theatre.

In the summer of 1966 the headquarters of Canadian Forces Air Defence Command was moved to North Bay to be re-located with the headquarters of the Northern NORAD region. At that time Air Vice Marshal Pollard was appointed commander of both Air Defence Command and Northern NORAD region.

All of us know Major-General Robert P. Rothschild, known all over Canada, as the "Baron". He was born in Cochrane, Ontario in 1914, and educated at the Royal Military College and at McGill University. Commissioned in the Royal Canadian Horse Artillery in 1938, he went overseas with the 1st Canadian Infantry Division. He returned to Canada in 1916 when he was appointed commandant of the Canadian Army Staff College in Kingston, Ontario. In 1951 he was appointed a commandant of the National Defence College and two years later was named deputy co-ordinator, joint staff, at National Defence Headquarters in Ottawa. On March 15, 1960, General Rothschild was appointed commander, Canadian Army Liaison Establishment and army member of the Canadian joint staff, London, England. He was appointed quartermaster general of the Canadian Army in August, 1962 and promoted to the rank of major general. In August, 1965 he was appointed Commander, Materiel Command. We are so fortunate to have Rothschild where he is now as one of our top planners.

And what about the brilliant Canadian who is in command of our defences, General Jean Victor Allard, the holder of the CBE, the Distinguished Service Order and numerous other decorations conferred by governments here and abroad. He is a young man; he was born on June 12, 1913, in Ste. Monique de Nicolet, Quebec and commissioned in the non-permanent active militia in 1933. It is a matter of great pride to those who served, or still serve, with the militia that General Allard has got where he is today. I remember him as second in command of the Royal 22nd in 1943 while the regiment was serving in Italy. In December, 1943 he won the D.S.O. for gallantry, initiative and military skill in the battle of the Arielli River, near Ortona. In January, 1944, he has appointed commanding officer of the regiment and in September of that year was awarded the first bar to his D.S.O. for outstanding service during the breakthrough of the Gothic Line. In 1945 he was given command of the 6th Canadian Infantry Brigade in Holland where he won a second bar to his D.S.O. After a year at the Imperial Defence College in England, where he is still well remembered, he became vice quartermaster general for the Canadian army.

Jean Allard returned to the field of action in April, 1953 as commander of the 25th Canadian Infantry Brigade Group in Korea. He represented Canada at the truce signing ceremonies at Panmunjom on July 27, 1953. In 1965 he became the first commander of the newly created Mobile Command and in 1966 he was promoted to general and appointed Chief of the Defence Staff.

Or we could consider navy people such as Vice Admiral Ralph Lucien Hennessy, D.S.O. Born in 1918, Admiral Hennessy is still a young man. He entered the navy as a cadet in 1936 and joined the Canadian destroyer Assiniboine in 1939, serving in her for the next three and a half years. As executive officer he was awarded the Distinguished Service Cross in August, 1942, for his part in the sinking of the German submarine U-210. In 1944, while in command of the Assiniboine he served on North Atlantic convoy duty until the end of the war. When H.M.C.S. Micmac, the first Canadian built Tribal class destroyer, was commissioned in September, 1945, he took command. In 1956 he was appointed in command of H.M.C.S. Niobe, R.C.N. headquarters in Britain, and additionally as chief staff officer to the naval member, Canadian joint staff (London).

Admiral Hennessy served as director of naval training in headquarters from September, 1958, until he became deputy chief of naval personnel in June, 1960 with the rank of commodore. In August, 1963, he became commodore, personnel, Atlantic coast. In July, 1966 he was appointed comptroller-general having been promoted to vice admiral. Let us bear in mind the influence, at least, that the party now in the official opposition used in the making of some of these important appointments.

I could go on. I could deal with the records of Commodore Fraser-Harris, or of Air Marshal Edwin M. Reyno, or of Air Commodore Gerald Gordon Diamond, or of Rear Admiral John Charles O'Brien, a man with a particularly brilliant list of achievements. O'Brien entered the Royal Canadian Navy as a cadet from the Royal Military College in 1937, he trained and served with the Royal Navy in monitors, battleships and cruisers. In October, 1940, he joined the Canadian destroyer Saguenay for North Atlantic escort duties. In 1942 he specialized in communications and served as flotilla signals officer in the R.N.'s fourth destroyer flotilla. After a period in command of the destroyer Cresent, which vessel I have visited at sea, and a year spent on the staff of the Supreme Allied Commander, Atlantic, he became executive officer of H.M.C.S. Stadacona, R.C.N. barracks at Halifax in 1953 and was later executive officer of the aircraft carrier Magnificent.

Admiral O'Brien took command of the aircraft carrier Bonaventure in September, 1959. Two years later he became naval member Canadian joint staff (Washington) and commanding officer H.M.C.S. Niagara, R.C.N. establishment in Washington. He was appointed senior Canadian officer afloat, Atlantic, on August 24, 1964. In July 1966 he was promoted to rear admiral and appointed commander, Maritime Command.

So we have a pretty strong team.

An hon. Member: It was a lot stronger four years ago.

Mr. Matheson: I did not hear that interruption.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Would the hon. member tell us just what the purpose of all this irrelevant name dropping might be?

Mr. Matheson: I do not think it is irrelevant. Sometimes the admiral who makes the loudest criticism can be heard from coast to coast, in broadcasts and newscasts everywhere, while those able leaders who build day in and day out, year in and year out, are not heard from at all.

Having examined this matter from my vantage point in parliament, I am firmly of the opinion that today we have as fine a team as we have ever had in Canada's proud history.

Anyone who knows anything about General Allard's background would I think, be bound to agree. It was my privilege to serve with the Royal 22nd as a gunner officer while he was in Italy. This man is legendary. I do not think it is wrong for Canada to take a great pride in those who are now in charge of our defences. But perhaps I have said sufficient.

We must decide whether or not we shall venture upon this new ground and set the example which, some people believe, will be followed by a number of our western allies, and possibly by countries which are behind the iron curtain. This is something dramatically new. Indeed, we believe that even outer space is militarily no longer remote from the air, the land, the sea, and the waters beneath the surface of the sea. We believe that unification is a means of rendering more efficient, and giving greater clarity of purpose to, a force which we wish it were not necessary to maintain at all. But since this force is engaging the services of many of the finest elements in our nation, prepared to live their lives and give their lives for their country, then let us try to give them, as far as possible, the advantages which come to any who are engaged in civilian occupations.

We want nothing but the best for them. I believe with all my heart that in this unified program Canada is ushering in a new era in defence policy, venturing upon a policy which is fresh, creative, constructive, and designed to lead, ultimately, to world peace.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): In introducing the bill to create a single Canadian defence force the minister made a brief reference to the aims or objectives of Canadian defence policy. But he did not go deeply into those matters or indicate how the proposed reorganization of the defence force would enable these objectives to be pursued. Surely, Mr. Speaker, the purpose of defence forces is to carry out defence policy. Unless we start from that basic proposition as to what is Canadian defence policy and what are the objectives of Canadian defence policy, to a large extent we are really thrashing around in the dark.

I was very disappointed, Mr. Speaker, that the minister spoke for an hour and three quarters and devoted about half a minute of his speech to what are Canadian defence objectives. I was glad that the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) and the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson) both had something to say about Canadian defence roles and objectives. I did not agree with what they had to say in many respects, but in any event I thought that they were on the right line in discussing what I think must be the essential starting point for any discussion of this bill and its implications, namely the unification of the defence forces and the forming of one single defence force, rather than the organization we have had.

At this point I should like to make some references to what has been said by the speakers immediately preceding me. The hon. member for Fraser Valley said that he did not know what were the objectives. He complained about that, and he complained about a number of other things that the minister had been doing. He then went on to say that he and his group were going to support the government as far as this bill is concerned. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that is a completely illogical position to take. If the hon. member did not know and does not know what are the objectives of Canadian defence policy, and therefore has no conception of what will be the effect of the proposed changes on the avowed aims of Canadian defence policy, how can he possibly support the bill?

The hon. member also spoke of some difficulty that he had over various statements made by General Foulkes. That again, I think, is due to the fact that there has been a great deal of confusion over what is meant by "integration", what is meant by "unification of command", what is meant simply by "unification" and what is meant by what the minister now calls "a single unified force".

I can well understand the confusion of the hon. member for Fraser Valley, because the minister, his representatives and spokesmen during the past three years have, I believe, deliberately confused the meaning of these terms. We have never had any precise or definitive definition of what is meant by integration, unification and so on. These terms have been used either alternately or as synonyms for each other quite regularly. This is a matter to which I will refer a little later in connection with some of the statements made by the minister in his speech.

The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) quoted a large number of unrelated excerpts from speeches or writings of various distinguished gentlemen, but I do not think much can be gained by taking something out of context and just quoting it; and essentially that is what the hon. member did. I should like to say at this point that I disagree completely and absolutely with the statement he attributed to Mr. John Gellner to the effect that ministers of defence of the past were, in effect, captives of their military advisers, and that defence problems during those periods were looked at in isolation in each service, with no co-ordination of effort.

This is, Mr. Speaker, without doubt completely false. It is certainly false as far as I was concerned. I know it is incorrect as far as General Pearkes was concerned. I am also absolutely certain, knowing the gentlemen and something of what they did from my experience in the department, that this is completely untrue as far as Mr. Campney and Mr. Claxton were concerned. Certainly Colonel Ralston and Senator Power showed their independence sufficiently, by their resignations from the cabinet to which they belonged at that period, to make it quite clear that they were making up their own minds and were not the captives of their military advisers.

In this respect I think that all the gentlemen I have mentioned, as well as myself, during the periods we were ministers of defence of this country did listen to the advice of the senior military officers, and on the basis of that advice, and taking into consideration political facts, financial demands and matters of that sort, we came to a decision as to the course of action to be followed.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the present minister has not followed that very wise course but has disregarded the advice of his senior officers, as demonstrated by the fact that practically all of them have now resigned or been fired, as the case might be.

I think there is no question that any reasonable method of carrying on defence activities and defence policy in any country must be based on the general course that has been followed up to the present time, such as for example weighing the advice of senior military officers, and other factors concerned, and then coming to a conclusion on that basis, rather than disregarding these officers and, if they disagreed with you, firing them or otherwise getting rid of them.

The hon. member for Leeds tried to demonstrate that a considerable number of distinguished military leaders of the United States were all for a single unification system. But the actual fact is that the United States has not gone for a single unified force. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) put on the record this afternoon a considerable amount of evidence from Mr. Zuckert, who for several years was secretary of the air force in the United States, as to why, although he himself had been convinced for years that complete unification was the answer after several years of experience he found it was not the answer, and that it was unwise to proceed with it. This again is another matter to which I shall refer in dealing with some of the points made by the minister in his speech.

I had started out to say, Mr. Speaker, that in my view a consideration of this whole matter must start with the roles or objectives of the defence force you want to create, or which you have in existence, and how they can be fulfilled. In actual fact, during recent months there have been very grave doubts about what are the minister's and the government's end objectives in defence. There is a widespread belief that while the minister pays lip service to the defence objectives followed for many years past, and which are set out in the 1964 defence white paper, his real objective is to run down our defence forces so that in the end they will consist of nothing much more than a type of police force which would be able to carry out certain United Nations peace keeping activities but very little more than that. Certainly it would be unable to meet the other stated objectives of our defence policy.

This suspected position of the government, if I may call it that, was stated in fairly bald terms in an editorial in the Ottawa Citizen for November 5, which as everyone knows is one of the papers which very strongly supports the government. Its editor, Mr. Young, is known to have close ties both with the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and other members of the government, so therefore I think it is reasonable for us to suspect that to a very considerable extent his utterances and editorials reflect the thinking of the government, or some of the most important people in the government.

• (8:40 p.m.)

The editorial reads as follows:

The evident strategic doctrine contemplated by the government is to set up a mobile force of land, sea and air services that could be moved quickly to any part of the world to undertake either a UN peacekeeping obligation, or to help fight a brush fire war on NATO's behalf.

This is what he calls the strategic position of the government at the present time. He goes on to say:

> This would require the country's air and naval units to play largely a support role for the army, rather than the semi-independent part they once took.

I do not know whether that represents the thinking of the government, but in many quarters there is a very strong suspicion that it does. From what has been going on I am afraid that it is a reasonably close approximation to what the minister and the government have been thinking and where they are heading, whilst at the same time trying to lull the Canadian people into a belief that our defence is perfectly well looked after, that the force has never been in better shape, and things along that line. This is a strategic document, as Mr. Young calls it, and the fact is that the government contends it will meet the necessities of Canadian defence or the stated objectives of our defence policy as laid down by the minister in the white paper of 1964. It would be totally inadequate to meet those objectives. The first of these aims is the direct defence of Canada, the surveillance and control of our land, water and air, and the ability to deal with any infringement of or attack on these. This of course requires naval, army and air units, each so far as its effective use is concerned acting in its own sphere.

Surely the best way in which to meet this need of Canadian defence is by maintaining the present three services. To substitute a mobile force which is mainly army, in which naval and air elements would take only a supporting role, would not enable us fully to maintain Canadian sovereignty even over our own water, land and air space. As a matter of fact if we came to a situation of that kind we in effect would have to depend on the United States for the direct defence of this country, even in the event of minor incursions. In my view this is a concept which is utterly at variance with the sovereignty and independence of this country.

Further, the objectives of our defence policy are to maintain peace by deterring and preventing the outbreak of a third global war and to maintain the security and independence of Canada itself. Clearly these objectives are, in the past 15 or 20 years have been, and in the future will be attained only by alliance with other free democratic nations and by making the United Nations an effective force. I believe that Canada's defence policy primarily must be based on strong support for NATO and a willingness on our part to make a proportionate contribution to its strength, according to our population and economic position.

The western alliance of NATO has prevented any general war breaking out during the past 18 years, and at the same time has stopped the Soviet take-over of any further countries in Europe. The deterrent power of the alliance depends on its military strength, both nuclear and conventional, and on its evident will to use this strength if necessary. It is on this point that I disagree completely and thoroughly with the ideas put forward by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) on behalf of the New Democratic Party. There has, of course, been this deterrent so far as Soviet-western relations are concerned during the past two years. I think this has lulled a large number of people into the belief that there no longer is a serious threat so far as the Soviet Union is concerned. I believe this is a completely false and incorrect assumption which, if it were followed by the other powers, eventually would result in disaster. The Soviet aim of imposing communism on the world has not changed. There are likely to be continued probing actions on their part to made what gains they can and to test the will of the west to resist. The Russian adventure in Cuba was an outstanding example of this. It demonstrated very clearly, when the United States, backed by other members of NATO, showed that they were willing to employ all their military strength if necessary, that the Russians were not ready to carry the matter to an all-out war.

In order to prevent an all-out war I think the western alliance must be maintained and the members of that alliance must be prepared to continue to play a fair and reasonable part in the alliance. The military contributions of each country to NATO are based on the ability of each to contribute to the common defence. They are arrived at by negotiation and agreement, and must of necessity change with changing circumstances. I have no quarrel with the contention that the military commitment to NATO should be renegotiated, because as conditions change this becomes a necessity. However, while contributions may be increased or decreased, or one contribution replaced by another, the main thing is that when it has been agreed that certain forces will be provided, and other members of the alliance depend on these being available, they should be produced. Otherwise the whole force is weakened, or other countries must assume the burden, with the consequent loss of a spirit of unity and co-operation within the alliance.

The alliance has been struck a severe blow because of the action taken by France. I do not think the alliance can stand a situation in which another country would take the type of action France has taken. So far as Canada is concerned we have agreed to make certain naval, army and air forces available to NATO. In my view we must meet these commitments until such time as we secure agreement to a change in them. We must not unilaterally decrease them, simply by failing to replace equipment as it becomes worn out or obsolete. This, I am sorry to say, is what is happening at the present time with regard to our naval and air contribution to NATO. From the naval point of view, the ships which we have had available are wearing out and no replacements are being built. The naval program which had been arranged when I was minister of national defence has been scrapped by the minister. About a year ago he said that another naval program would go ahead which would include four ships instead of eight; but still none of these ships has been down. Nothing has been done. So there will be a lapse of many years before there is any replacement for the obsolete or worn out naval ships.

A considerable number of the ships which we did have, have been scrapped during the past three years and, while some technical improvements have been made to the remaining ships, the total number available to carry out the anti-submarine role which we have accepted under NATO is now less than half the number we had in operation in 1963. So far as the contention of the minister is concerned to the effect that our anti-submarine capability is greater than it ever was, from the point of view of any naval man of stature this is nothing but a laugh. He would say that it is ridiculous to make a statement of that kind.

In addition to that, of course, the manpower of our navy has declined seriously. There has been a very serious loss of highly trained technical personnel necessary to man our ships at sea, with the result that a considerable number of ships still in commission are tied up at ports. The total result is that our naval strength is not sufficient to adequately meet the naval commitments which we have assumed as far as NATO is concerned and as far as our own local protection is concerned.

This situation has been caused by policies pursued by the minister. These policies have also resulted in the destruction of morale in the navy with the consequent refusal of trained men to re-engage. The projected disappearance of the navy as a separate service, if this bill is passed, will accentuate this situation and greatly decrease our ability to meet our commitments to NATO from a naval point of view.

Our air commitment to NATO was an air division of strike reconnaissance aircraft—F-104's armed with nuclear weapons. This division did consist of 12 squadrons but has now been reduced to eight. In December the minister announced, when introducing this bill, that it would be further reduced to six squadrons composed of four in the strike role and two in the reconnaissance role. This in effect means a two thirds reduction in the strike capability we are committed to supply NATO.

This reduction in our air contribution may have been agreed to by other members of NATO, but if so that has never been announced and we are not aware of that fact. Had it been agreed to, I am sure the minister or the government would have said so.

In so far as our army is concerned, we are committed to maintain a fully equipped brigade in Europe. In the event of hostilities we are committed to bring that up to a full division. With the reorganization of our defence forces now going on, the demoralization which now exists, coupled with the shortage of manpower, I doubt very much whether these two additional brigades could be supplied if they were needed.

In the event of a large-scale war it is essential for us to have the ability to mobilize our manpower. The reorganization of our defence set-up which has been taking place has undoubtedly cut down our ability to do that rapidly. This is particularly true because a number of training bases have been closed, and because the number of our reserve forces or militia has been greatly reduced. This inability to mobilize has been one thing which has been of partcular concern to a number of highly experienced and capable senior officers who have expressed their opposition to the unification plans of this government.

Another matter which is of concern to those with military experience during war is how the proposed unified Canadian force will work in co-operation with the forces of our allies, all organized on a navy, army and air force basis. Many people believe that even if the proposed Canadian Armed Forces organization was a better one for Canada than the organization we have had, on a theoretical basis—and none of these experienced people have conceded that to be the case—we could not work effectively with the forces of our allies. This is another very serious disadvantage, so far as this proposed move is concerned.

Our support in United Nations peace keeping activities is a very important feature of our defence policy. It must be realized that the United Nations, because of its composition, cannot intervene between the two great powers, the Soviet union on the one side and the NATO Alliance on the other; but it can, with the co-operation of these powers, arbitrate the disputes of smaller countries to prevent them from spreading.

Many people in Canada, and members of the N.D.P. are good examples, believe that United Nations peace keeping activities should be our only or main military contribution. I am sorry to say, as I indicated earlier, that the government seems to be moving toward that point of view. That position disregards the fact that the general peace is really kept by NATO and that the United Nations can deal only with small countries. This is unrealistic, I submit, because no one can foresee what kind of forces may be required by the United Nations from time to time. The needs of the United Nations for peace keeping forces can really only be met by a well balanced navy, army and air force with good transport capability.

From the point of view of each of these three main objectives in respect of Canada's defence policy, which I outlined, the proposed unification will place them in a worse position to meet our responsibilities. In fact it will place them in a position in which we will not be able to meet our responsibilities adequately.

These are all reasons for the dropping of this bill by the government, or for defeating it here in the house. I should like to make one or two comments about the minister's speech of December 7. Although he spoke at great length, he did not provide one good reason during an hour and forty five minutes in support of unification as an essential or necessary program. He did not give one good reason to show that it was either militarily or financially better than the system under which we have been operating. In my submission he did not provide one single reason to support this policy.

Let me first of all deal with the defence council which was referred to by the minister and recorded in Hansard at page 10822 of Hansard. The minister sought to give the impression that although integration had gone into effect, until he had been in control of the situation for some time the defence council was a completely ineffective body. He said as reported on page 10823:

> The role of the defence council forecast in 1964 has been fulfilled during the whole period of detailed planning on the unification process and this body has in fact become an active and decisive forum for the formulation of policy.
> In the 29 months since defence council was reactivated in July, 1964, it has had 90 meetings dealing with matters covering the whole range of defence policy. For the 29 months preceding July, 1964, it met on four occassions.

Apparently the aim of that statement was to persuade the members of this house and the general public that under his predecessor the defence council was completely inactive, hardly ever met, and that there was no co-ordination in the department. Nothing could be further from the truth. The minister is very fond of using half truths in order to create a completely false impression. The minister was referring to formal meetings of the secretary, the assistant secretary and various other individuals, to take minutes and things of that sort. It is true that in this sense meetings were held very seldom to deal with formal matters. But the effective defence council, in other words the Minister of National Defence, the Associate Minister of National Defence, the chairman of the chiefs of staff, the chiefs of staff of the navy, army and air force, the deputy minister and the chairman of the National Research Board, during all the time I was minister of national defence met regularly every Monday morning in my office. We went over all the matters which were of concern to the Department of National Defence as a whole and obtained the views of the heads of the three services, the deputy minister, and so forth, in regard to these matters. We very frequently held other meetings during the week. This was a fully effective means of co-ordinating the activities of the Department of National Defence. The attempt made here to convey the impression that there was no co-ordination of the Department of National Defence and that the defence council in effect never met, is completely wrong.

There has been no advantage whatsoever, from that point of view, as far as the members of the present defence council are concerned. In fact, it is not nearly as effective a body because it has now really only one military adviser, whereas formerly it had four, the chairman of the chiefs of staff and the chiefs of staff of the navy, army and air force. As was put very forcibly to the defence committee by Brigadier Malone, and has been dealt with by a considerable number of other people of experience, a defence council which has the advantage of the detailed and expert knowledge of the heads of the three different services which operate in three different environments serves to give the Minister of National Defence a very much better and more adequate picture of what the situation is, and puts him in a much better position to come to a proper conclusion than the present set-up, where you really have only one source of military information, as far as the minister is concerned, on the defence council. So much for that point, Mr. Speaker.

On the same page of Hansard there is a statement about the 4th Canadian infantry brigade group which reads:

> For its currently assigned role in the central European front the brigade group has today far greater fire power, mobility and protection than at any time since its formation. Man for man it is unsurpassed by any other unit in NATO.

That has been the case from the inception of the brigade group in Europe. I think it has been admitted by all the successive supreme commanders of NATO that this brigade group, for its size, was perhaps the most effective army unit they had. The minister tries to assign to himself and to his integration policy, presumably, and so forth, the fact that this is an exceptionally fine fighting unit.

Mr. Hellyer: There is no armoured protection at all for the infantry, and you know it.

Mr. Harkness: The minister talks about armoured protection. He knows full well that all the plans for the provision of armoured personnel carriers, for improved anti-tank weapons, for improved fire power in the brigade generally were made long before he became Minister of National Defence. This is part of the deception he tries to practise on the Canadian people. He tries to take all the credit for the fact that this group is now better equipped than it was five, 10 or 15 years ago, and if it was not better equipped the then minister of national defence should be very, very seriously condemned. Naturally it is better equipped and has more fire power today, because there has been constant technological improvement. But all the plans and original arrangements in that respect were made long before the minister became Minister of National Defence. I notice that at one time he made the statement that this brigade group now has more fire power than had the whole Canadian army during the last war. That is true. But he did not mention the fact that practically all that fire power was due to the Honest John battery which was bought and delivered to the division while I was minister of national defence, and not afterwards. I say, Mr. Speaker, this is part of the picture which the minister attempts to present and which—

Mr. Churchill: The Hellyer myth.

Mr. Harkness: —is really disgusting. I would think the minister would attempt, as I did and as I think all previous ministers of national defence did, to present a reasonable and fair picture as far as our defence forces and our defence effort were concerned. But unfortunately that time seems to have passed.

The next matter upon which I should like to comment is materiel command. This passage is to be found on page 10826 of Hansard for December 7, 1966:

> Because of the complexity and magnitude of the project, however, it will take from three to five years to implement fully the single automated system. In the meantime, the three existing systems are being operated by materiel command and the logistic support to the forces has not in any way been diminished.

The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) referred to this matter this afternoon. What does this mean? It means that the supply of goods of all kinds to the services is being carried on by the navy, army and air force supply systems which existed and have existed for many years. As General Fleury stated before the committee, it will take at least three to five years to weld this into one system. So the minister is doing something completely illogical; he is going to form immediately one unified service, and that unified service will have to be supplied by the supply components of three separate services. You will have as a result the most horrible type of confusion; there is no question about that at all.

An hon. Member: We have it now.

Mr. Harkness: We have it now, as an hon. member has said. I think there is no doubt that we have it now, but it will be worse when you have the three services completely disappearing and one service taking their place. This is another very good reason, if you examine what the minister stated in his own words, why unification should not take place at the present time, even if you admit that unification as a final goal is desirable, which I do not and which not many other people who have studied the matter admit, except for supporters of the present government; and a large number of them do not admit it either. Even if you admit that it is desirable in three to five years, it is certainly not desirable at the present time when you do not have the supply service equipped or able to do anything to supply the three separate services.

My next point, Mr. Speaker, is concerned with page 10827 of Hansard and what was said in regard to the aim of the reorganization. The minister stated:

> The aim of the reorganization of the Canadian forces was clearly stated in the white paper—

Then he goes on to state that aim. If we turn to the white paper we find that the only reference in its entire 30 pages is the one statement to be found on page 19:

> Following the most careful and thoughtful consideration, the government has decided that there is only one adequate solution. It is the integration of the armed forces of Canada under a single chief of defence staff. This will be the first step toward a single unified defence force for Canada.

That is the only statement there is in regard to a single unified defence force. The minister has tried to maintain in the last year, and in recent months in particular, that this policy was completely clear. But in the same paragraph, just below those few lines you have this statement, which is a complete contradiction:

> Similarly, there will be no lack of competition. The sailors will press for more ships, the soldiers for more tanks and the airmen for more planes. This is as natural as breathing. Competition will not be lost but it will be contained at the service level.

This was a definite indication to me, and I think to nearly all the senior officers in the services, that the use of the words "service level" meant that the services will be retained. When I read this statement in the white paper and heard the statement which I quoted previously, namely the single line about a unified defence staff for Canada, I did not think for a moment that these two statements meant that the three services would disappear. It did not cross my mind that this was the minister's intention.

The Deputy Speaker: I regret to have to inform the hon. member that the time allotted to him is expired.

An hon. Member: Let him speak.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I have a considerable amount of material and I wonder if I have the unanimous consent of the house to continue.

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I will just finish the particular point which I was making and I will then resume my seat. As I said, a few lines further on there is a complete contradiction of what appears above, if those lines meant what I did not think they were intended to mean at the time. As a result of what was said here, there was complete confusion in everyone's mind with regard to the minister's intention, and I do not know whether or not he did have that intention. If the minister intended a unification of the forces, why did he state in the white paper that competition will not be lost but will be contained at the service level? If there are no services there can be no service level at which to contain them. He also said that there will be sailors, soldiers and airmen.

Therefore it has been absolutely clear ever since the white paper came out that the minister's contention that there will be a single unified force will not stand up to examination. In fact the reverse is true, as can be proved by some of the statements in the minister's own speech. However, this is a different point into which I will not go at this time because I think I will have other opportunities to deal with it further.

The other point which I should like to make at this time, and to which I briefly referred earlier, is that I think that these contradictions were part of a continued attempt to confuse people as to what is meant by integration and unification. I am sorry to say that to a large extent it has succeeded in that purpose. The result of the contradictory statements made by the minister and his spokesmen from time to time is that there are very few people in Canada at the present time who understand the difference between integration and unification. The minister has never given us a specific definition of the terms, and he continually makes statements which confuse the issue even more. One thing which I think the minister should do before the conclusion of this debate is to give us a definition of these terms and an explanation of his concept of them. This would clear up the confusion which has existed for the past three years and which has served to make any reasonable debate on these questions much more difficult than it should be.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): In following the debate on second reading of the defence bill I have listened with some interest to the remarks that have been made up to date. As the minister probably knows, when we debate defence I usually go to sea. Those are his words; but may I say that in many respects it is better to be at sea than to be adrift, as he is. I will be quite parochial and provincial, in that my remarks will be confined primarily to an area in which I have some knowledge and understanding, being neither professional nor expert in this field. Nevertheless I will base my remarks on communications which I have received and on discussions which I have had with many hundreds of serving officers and men in the Royal Canadian Navy.

Before I do that I want to put on the record again what it is that we are speaking about in Halifax when we refer to the defence structure, and what is the real impact of defence spending in the Atlantic provinces in what was revealed in the original research conducted by the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council last fall, and produced last October.

In the 1963-64 fiscal year the military pay and allowances in Nova Scotia amounted to some $70,595,000; the civilian pay was some $25.7 million; another $3 million went into travel; another $45.7 million went into supplies, and there was a miscellaneous item of $2.8 million, making a total of $147.8 million. It can be readily understood why we in Nova Scotia become concerned about the loss of the navy when we realize that it constitutes the largest part of these expenditures. Nova Scotia cannot withstand the economic impact of the loss of even 10 per cent of its current defence structure.

According to this bill the minister has active plans for the consolidation of bases. These plans are not yet out in the open. We have had some indication of what is about to happen at Cornwallis. Rumours have been rampant about what is to happen at Shearwarter and at Greenwood, and very serious doubts have been entertained about what might happen to the main base at Stadacona and to the supporting services at Dockyard. We wonder why the minister is so concerned about the separate identity of the forces to which he has referred.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Our fears and our concern are based primarily on four criteria, which have been essentially used in defence planning in the United States. One is the rejection of the principle that the execution of defence planning requires today a growing awareness of the role of the professional, much more so than it did even during the days of the second world war. I believe that competition is an essential factor in our way of life today and to remove it from the services will result in decreased initiative which is essential to the solution of most problems. We believe that a defence force should have an efficient management. The best example of this can be seen in General Motors. They have set up competition within this massive industry not only for competition's sake but also for the sake of management efficiency. They have learned, as have most industries, the benefits that can be enjoyed from this type of approach to a massive organization.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Finally, there is the intangible aspect of the spirit, the esprit de corps. The absolute necessity of this in any efficient military organization that is going to be called upon to prosecute your country's natonal aims and objectives in terms of national defence is self-evident. What about these four points? The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) has quoted what many prominent military people in the United States, indeed all over the world, have said on the subject of integration and unification. There is no need for me to spell out to the house the system that has remained in effect in the United States. Indeed, this system has been in effect for some 17 years and it has been building toward the high degree of efficiency that has been achieved. We all know about that.

We all know the United States system has a defence secretary, joint chiefs of staff and a secretariat for each of the land, sea and air environments. Earlier this year, the deputy secretary of defence, Mr. Vance, gave his views on the subject of integration and what he termed the creaking fuzziness or misunderstanding on the part of many people in the United States about what was happening to the defence structure. He said this:

> I believe very deeply in the importance of and the need for military departments. We cannot run the defence department properly without them . . . It is essential, however, to have unity of effort;—

This, I do not deny.

—but we can have this unification in military departments.

The United States has unification, integration and all the things the Minister of National Defence is trying to tell us are absolutely necessary. Indeed, perhaps in many ways they are. However, the United States has not lost sight of the essential necessity of retaining the separate identities for at least the reasons I have just mentioned. I will not go into those in detail.

Let us look for a moment or two at the white paper which is supposed to contain the criteria for what we are doing. In part, the white paper says this, at the very outset:

Following the most careful and thoughtful consideration, the government has decided that there is only one adequate solution. It is the integration of the armed forces under a single chief of defence staff and a single defence staff. This will be the first step toward a single, unified defence force for Canada.

The minister says it is going to take a long time before we get there. I hope he is absolutely right. I hope it is many, many years.

The principle and concept embodied in this statement gives very wide scope for members to participate in this debate, Mr. Speaker. In my opinion, there are at least three aspects that must be carefully studied. The first is the effect of having a single chief of defence staff; second, the effect on professionalism of having a single defence staff composed as it is at present; third, the very apparent absence of rational thought at this particular stage on unification. It seems that a step is taken, and if the ice does not break, then you put your next foot forward.

Let us look at the single chief of staff first. Under such a system there will invariably be a minister who is untrained or, if he has military experience, by the time he rises to the position of responsibility of minister he will be somewhat behind the times in overall military matters. However, he will be responsible for the management of the armed services. He will face a chief of defence staff who, under this concept, will likely be fully and completely trained in one of the services.

As I understand it, in no small way the chief of defence staff performs much the same task as the minister. Under the present set-up, he will be an extension of the minister at the military level. As long as both the chief of defence staff and the minister see eye to eye, there will not be any serious problem. However, let there be a major difference of opinion, particularly professional opinion, and the resulting clash must inevitably lead to the destruction of one of them. I am sure the minister is aware of the report of the Esher committee of 1904, which is going back some 63 years. This committee advised against the commander in chief concept in other than a purely operational theatre.

There is another problem, Mr. Speaker, and that is having at the top only those who will agree with the minister. I think this situation is quite obvious and there is no need for me to illustrate the problems that could develop. The Esher committee itself, in that very excellent report, dealt with all the ramifications that develop when this type of clash takes place. This is a weakness which has occurred in our defence structure before, but never with the alarming rate of incidence that it has in the last 18 months.

We know, and it remains a fact no matter what the reason is, that all of those of senior military rank who have opposed the minister on obviously rational and respected grounds have left the armed services. These were professional men who felt that a matter of principle was at stake. Brigadier Malone had this to say on this aspect:

The single chief with the one minister will never be satisfactory. The dominant personality will always destroy the other. We can hardly expect any man to become chief of defence staff who is not a man of very aggressive, strongly opinionated nature. Equally, we cannot expect any government to select a minister who will control about a quarter of the budget who isn't a strong man.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in spite of the difficulties which can arise from the old committee or defence council concept, there can be no doubt it is essential that a committee or council be appointed to deal with all aspects of management and policy aspects. Indeed, the minister recognizes this need in his move to bring about stability to his present top echelon. I suggest the committee will function correctly only if the officers representing the three professional environments, land, sea and air, work with equal status to the chief in advising the minister or the associate minister of the problems presently confronting them.

There is one important aspect to having the three environments properly represented at the top. The point may be minor, but personnel serving in any branch of the armed services are much more competent, and more prepared to accept decisions handed down if they know they are represented at the decision-making level by one of their own kind.

It is often argued that equality of representation as a weakness of the former organization. This I suggest is a wrong assessment. It is necessary to have equality of representation if for no other reason than to assure that there is balanced argument in all matters of capital expenditure.

The effect of professionalism on a defence staff composed in the present form is quite obvious. If one looks at the first and second staffs under integration, he sees that they have been composed somewhat along these lines: the first one, the C.D.S., had an R.C.A.F. background. There was an army vice chief, the personnel had two vice chiefs, or two members on it, one from the navy and one from the air force; the controller's staff was navy and army oriented and engineering was air force and navy oriented. This is absurd. They made changes in the second staff, and the C.D.S. presently has an army background, the vice chief has an air force background, the personnel come from the air force and the army, the controller, back to the single service, this time is from the navy, and the engineering is represented by army and navy backgrounds. The balance there is poor. It was poor at the outset and remains poor.

For example, in operational matters there is no naval or air force representation in either composition. I do not know how you can come to this state of affairs unless the inference of the present chief of defence staff is correct, that it is no longer the intention of the present administration to continue in any of this long-range planning the concept of a naval defence force.

Mr. Hellyer: Nonsense.

Mr. Forrestall: The circumstances can occur when important matters of policy come under consideration without experienced, professional opinion essential to the matters under discussion being necessarily represented. It is necessary to have two deputies for operation, personnel, and engineering to ensure that professional advice is always present at defence staff deliberations.

It is necessary, Mr. Speaker, for other reasons. In each major department the staff officers working in specific professional fields should have a head, or voice, who fully understands the professional task being performed. In this way staff will be properly represented, and with some faith will accept, even though there might be a conflict of opinion, the decisions coming down from the top level. If there is any reason for the minister doing what he is doing, it must be that he wanted to engender support for his proposal.

Nobody objects to looking forward, and forward thinking—at least, I know of nobody who does. We shall examine this matter in depth when we come to the committee stage, but I suggest that the composition of high command at the level adjacent to the minister should come somewhere on these lines. We should have a chief of defence staff, and a deputy chief for air, a deputy chief for sea and a deputy chief for land. Specifically, where operational matters are concerned I believe such an arrangement to be necessary. If the chief of personnel happens to be air, you could have a deputy chief for sea and a deputy chief for land. The same holds true for engineering. If he happens to be from the army, then the deputy chief could be from the naval or air element. I am not certain that the controller is absolutely necessary; I do not believe you need three or four deputy controllers. One good accountant is enough for a job like that.

In other words, under this concept—and this is my personal point of view—if you accept the validity of the usefulness of this type of approach to our defence organization, and defence control at the professional level, you cannot help getting back to the essential concepts of three basic services: air, land, and sea.

If there is to be any sensitivity of awareness of constant technical change, and if this is to be transmitted properly to the political arm, which must at all times remain dominant, then, under the present system, you fail the test. Only in a system such as I have suggested, not necessarily exactly as the one I have suggested—but along those lines —you do not lose balance and perspective, and the contribution that the true professional may make.

This argument can be extended to cast a doubt on the full effects of integration. This is not carrying the argument to its extreme limit and saying there is no room for integration of services. There is room for integration of services, and particularly is there room for integration at the operational and field level. Eventually something like that will have to come about. I do not think we doubt that. The minister has said that his white paper is not immutable; it is flexible. He will see, I am sure, as time goes on, if he is not prime minister by then, as has been suggested—

An hon. Member: He might not be.

Mr. Forrestall: It has been suggested that he might be in a few years. As I say, the minister will see the truth of my words. Eventually something like this would have to come. Our allies to the south have been integrating and unifying, with definite objectives, for 17 years. They have long since concluded, and this conclusion has not been shaken in the last 10 or 15 years, that the way we are approaching the problem is not the proper way.

Let us look at unification as it now is. It is claimed in the white paper that integration came, as I said earlier, as the result of the most careful and thoughtful consideration. Generally, a careful and thoughtful consideration of such important matters, or matters of major importance, requires the production of guide lines, of papers arguing the pros and cons of courses of action, with definite conclusions and recommendations. There is no such study, and no information has been made available to members of the house about integration or unification. It can be claimed that the white paper, in saying "careful and thoughtful consideration," has misled the house, or has misled the people.

It has misled us into believing that the minister did, indeed, give this matter extensive and thoughtful consideration. I hope that as part of this debate the minister can find time to explain to us in much greater depth than he did in his 65 pages of repetitive prose, precisely what he has in mind. Perhaps I did not read his speech properly. I give the minister that much credit, anyway. If I misread it, I apologize. But it did not seem to me to deal with this issue in the depth necessary to provide an explanation for this concept of unification. The minister talks about what may happen, physically. He tells us what he thinks is desirable. Frankly, however, that speech contained a lot more platitudes than hard common sense—and this is not my opinion alone.

If no paper can be produced, if the minister has not gone through this type of exercise, I think it is clear to Canadians and clear to members of the house that the hon. gentleman has embarked upon a program which has been evolving step by step. In other words, it has been a pragmatic program; if it works, it is to be accepted, and if it fails it is to be rejected.

In any event there is so little information available to us, now, either from the white paper or from the minister's lengthy statement of December 7, that few people, not more than half a dozen I would think, within the minister's personal staff, can possibly understand what is intended. The parts in this puzzle which were missing and which in my opinion are still missing are, first of all, a definition of unification, second, a valid argument in favour of unification and, third, an explanation of the need to carry unification to the ultimate step without room for variation. The white paper says there will be no thought of eliminating worth-while traditions. The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) repeated this promise and we are very pleased to hear it. However, there are probably a great many things involving traditional matters which have already been discarded out of hand because it was found suitable to do so for the sake of public relations.

It would not be difficult to name half a dozen. First, traditional naval dress will disappear. R.C.A.F. uniform is to be changed In the past it has been traditional to name naval shore bases as R.C.N. ships. This practice has been abandoned in favour of the designation Canadian Force Base. The white ensign has been removed from our naval ships, ostensibly on the ground that when the new flag was accepted all the old flags went out of use. I am still not sure of the statutory authority for this decision.

The traditional rank structure will disappear, though it is true the R.C.A.F. may not be so much concerned about this, because I think they would like to have their rank designations brought more closely into line with those of their counterparts in the United States. Nevertheless they will be changed. It has always been traditional for recruits to the three services to be trained by the service directly concerned. This practice, followed for very real reasons, will be discontinued.

Toward the conclusion of the white paper it was clearly stated that the policy outlined therein was not immutable. No good reason has as yet been put forward to show that unification will provide a better defence force. If the policy can be changed as necessary, it is time that this unification plan came under the surgeon's scalpel.

Let us consider for a moment or two the difficulties which make unification uneconomic, if not impossible. Operational service in the three environments is vastly different. At sea, almost everyone involved serves in an operational environment and comes in contact with the enemy. In the land service about half the whole force comes into contact with the enemy. In the air environment, except for naval air personnel, only a very small percentage will be exposed to enemy action.

Because of this factor the vast majority of naval personnel must be young. The maximum age would not exceed 45 years, except in exceptional cases. About half the army must be young, with the maximum age of those who fight not greater than 45 and, preferably, if practical under 40. The other half of the army—support personnel—could serve effectively until 55, if physically fit. In the R.C.A.F. the upper limit on operational personnel should be about 45 for air crew, and in some cases, fighter pilots for example, the upper limit should be much lower. The rest of air force personnel could well serve to age 55 without affecting operations adversely.

Under unification there will be strong arguments to have a similar upper limit across the board. This means that for more than half the armed forces personnel the upper age will be either too high or too low, depending on the point of compromise. Unification under these circumstances is uneconomic and may lead to operational difficulties.

Rank structure and promotion are also affected by environmental differences. The navy requires a higher percentage of higher ranks for men than the air force or army. The reason for this is that a ship will normally, under emergency conditions, operate in three watches. Each part of the ship, because of compartmentation, requires chief or petty officers in charge. Under unification the obvious course, though not the correct one, will be to have all ranks at all levels pooled between environments. This will inevitably lead to the air force and army having more N.C.O.'s than they need, and the navy fewer than it needs.

Again this affects pay structure, privileges for rank, and so on. The navy needs a pay structure which makes the pay scale heavily weighted for rank, and less for professional qualifications. The R.C.A.F. needs a pay structure which leans heavily toward higher pay for trade and less for rank. The operational units of the army—infantry, armour, etc.—should have pay scales based more on rank than trade, while their support services should be paid more for trade than for rank.

Under unification this flexibility, I suggest, is bound to disappear. While putting everyone on a single pay structure might be from an administrative point of view advantageous and make sense in terms of theoretical economy and efficiency, in practice it will fail. The best condition for the navy is for men of equal rank and trade to be paid the same. This is not necessarily so in many of the other environments.

Time is beginning to run out, and I do not want necessarily to be the last speaker on his feet this evening. May I simply point out to the minister that in its present form this bill will mean hardship to those in the environment with which I am most familiar, the navy, and will be resented. In fact it is resented now. It is not understood. No sincere effort has been made fully to acquaint them with its ramifications. The minister knows how they rebelled during his trip last fall. He is aware of the difficulties being faced.

At some point in the very near future, Mr. Speaker, and hopefully before this debate comes to an end—and he need not occupy 65 pages in doing this—the minister must stand up and point out to these men what the government intends to do. Are we about to give up our national sovereignty? Are we about to disband the navy? Does the minister no longer see any role for it?

Are we about to shut down and let the United States move in. I have heard a lot of rumour, much of it confirmed to me by one source or another, about certain logistic capabilities of the United States defence structure to move into this country and to take over our bases and defence forces. I do not like this. I do not think we have to spend 10 or 12 per cent of our gross national product on our defence structure, but I do not see anything wrong with spending 5 or 6 per cent. We spend somewhere in the order of 5.2 per cent now. I do not think we have to walk away from our country and simply turn it over to somebody else to defend for us.

I hope the minister will at some point find the occasion to reassure everybody in the Atlantic provinces about the government's intentions, basically because of the economic impact of the bill. There will always be a navy, albeit maritime command or whatever it is he chooses to call it. But we hope it will not be something less than its present structure.

In closing, I repeat that we in the Atlantic provinces cannot afford to lose the economic benefit of the military pay and allowances of those in this area who spend their funds on local supplies and provisions.

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, before the supper hour

the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) was advising the house that we should read the minister's speech given on December 7 on second reading of Bill No. C-243. He said we should examine it because the minister had given to the house in his one and three quarter hour speech more information on this matter than had even been given the house before.

I have examined the minister's speech, Mr. Speaker, and I would agree with one of the press reporters who said it leaves much to be desired. In fact, I would go further than that and would say that the whole speech is a balloon. It has a cover, but nothing of substance in it—all air.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat put his finger on the crux of this debate when he said that there has been no definition given of the term "unification". The minister has filled page after page—some 65 of them, I believe—about this subject, and for the information of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Forrestall) I have found the minister's definition of unification. It appears at page 10827 of Hansard and is as follows:

> Unification is the end objective of a logical and evolutionary progression.

If you can make anything out of that, Mr. Speaker, then you are a better student than I am.

I searched further to see whether there was any other breakdown of this definition, but in my opinion what the minister means by unification is taking the "Royal" out of the Royal Canadian Air Force and the "Royal" out of the Royal Canadian Navy, and it also means putting our services into one uniform.

The minister in his remarks prior to the introduction of this bill and throughout the debate has perpetrated upon the Canadian people the most gigantic hoax ever. There is absolutely no meaning ascribed to the word "unification" as far as the minister's explanations are concerned.

I should like to refer further to his speech to see whether hon. members can help me to determine what this paragraph which is reported at page 10828 of Hansard means. If this is the writing of some of his staff officers who have been trained in the services, then I would say there are other dismissals due. I read this from the minister's text:

> The force structure is comprised of force units which may be used individually or in combination depending on the military tasks to be undertaken. These force units are the infantry companies, the armoured squadrons, the artillery batteries, the engineering squadrons, field ambulances, the air squadrons, warships and the support ships—to mention a few. None of these will be changed in moving to a single service from three separate services. They will continue to be trained and equipped for their particular roles. Moreover, a single service will involve no change in the organization of these force units into formations such as brigades, air wings, or squadrons of ships.

In other words, the minister says these three services are going to be identical but they are also going to be different. What is meant by that? We are still going to retain the three services, the army, the navy and the air force, but they are going to be one service.

Mr. Hellyer: Read it again.

Mr. McIntosh: I have read it time and time again. I would go further and suggest that the minister had no intention at any time of changing these services, except to bring in this mysterious word "unification", which only confuses people and makes those serving in the forces very concerned about their future. He has succeeded in doing this to the detriment of the security of our nation. I think something should be done about this, perhaps not by parliament but by those on the other side in the government.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the order of business for tomorrow?

Mr. McIlraith: We will continue the same subject matter tomorrow, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN MAXIMUM BENEFITS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, January 20, as recorded at page 12036 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) whether we could look forward to an increase in the maximum benefit rates under unemployment insurance being proposed this year by the government. In his reply the Minister of Labour indicated, as he has on other occasions, that an interdepartmental committee which had been established some time ago by the Prime Minister had studied unemployment insurance matters and had made a number of recommendations. The minister said that he could not give details but he hoped that within a reasonable period of time it would be possible to implement some of these recommendations by order in council or by regulations under the act. In a supplementary question I asked the minister whether it was not true that benefits could be raised only by amending the act, and not by regulation, to which the minister replied that that was a question of law which he was not in a position to anwer. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I posted this question for an adjournment debate.

I should like to say just a few brief words on the two points I raised on January 20. First it seems to me that the case for an increase in the maximum benefit rates under the Unemployment Insurance Act is so clear that it need only be stated. The present maximum rate is $36 a week in the case of an unemployed person with a dependant and $27 a week in the case of a single unemployed person. Those rates were set in 1959, eight years ago. If one applies to those rates any index he likes, whether the cost of living index, the wage index, the gross national product, or what have you, he will come up with a figure for today which ought to be considerably higher. In fact it gets into the $50 bracket for an unemployed person with a dependant.

Not only is it a fact that there have been no changes in the maximum rates during the eight years since 1959, but also five years have gone by since the Gill committee made its report. In 1962 that committee recommended that the rates I already have quoted—$27 and $36—should be increased to $36 and $48. I should like to point out that if you start, as of 1962, with these rates of $36 for an unattached unemployed person and $48 for an unemployed person with a dependant and apply to them the increases in the wage rates or in the cost of living which have taken place since then, you come up with figures which are even higher than those I suggested a moment ago.

In addition to these changes which have taken place in the last eight years, there is the fact that the government at last brought before parliament a labour code which includes a minimum wage rate of $1.25 an hour. That same piece of legislation speaks of a 40-hour week. This would seem to suggest that in the government's mind $50 a week is a minimum upon which working persons should be expected to live. These days the government even speaks about a guaranteed annual income. I am not sure that it understands what that phrase means, but at least members of the government like to talk about it. I suggest this is an area where this idea might be applied. In other words, it seems to me quite clear that we are being unfair to persons who are unemployed, to persons who have contributed to unemployment insurance over the years, by leaving them with maximum rates of $27 or $36 per week, in view of the fact that these rates were set eight years ago.

The other point referred to during our question and answer exchange on Friday, January 20, was as to whether this change could be made by regulation. The minister said this was a question of law and that he was not in a position to answer it. While I recognize that he is a lawyer and that I am not, it seems to me it does not take much legal training to read the Unemployment Insurance Act and find that the maximum rates are set by the act, and that there is no provision in the act for those maximum rates to be increased by regulation or by order in council. Surely it is crystal clear that the only way maximum rates can be changed is by an amendment brought before parliament itself.

I should like to protest most strongly over the way in which the years are being allowed to slip by without any amendment being made to the Unemployment Insurance Act. There are other improvements that need to be made as well, but to let these years slip by with nothing being done to increase these maximum benefit rates is quite uncalled for, and it is most unfair to those people who have paid into this fund and have a right to expect the protection the Unemployment Insurance Act was designed to provide.

It is my hope, therefore, that the government will not continue to delay action on this matter on the grounds that it is not clear whether the act needs to be amended. I hope an amendment will be brought in soon, and that it will increase these rates to something of the order of $50 or more per week.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is very little that can be added to what the minister said on January 20 in reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, except perhaps that a study is being made of the recommendations of the committee which was set up to study this matter.

The minister has been otherwise engaged and regrets that he has been unable to give this matter the thorough study it deserves. It is encouraging to note that unemployment insurance and unemployment itself is not the burning question it was at the time the Gill committee made its report. I recall as a member of the opposition, sitting on the other side of the house, on a number of occasions asking when that committee was going to report and when something was to be done about its recommendations.

Since that time we have dealt with a number of social welfare measures which have taken precedence, perhaps because unemployment has not been a burning question.

Mr. Knowles: It is still a burning question to the unemployed.

Mr. Byrne: The fund has now reached something in the neighbourhood of a quarter of a billion dollars.

The Gill committee did recommend that the maximum rate be increased to $48 per week and that new categories be brought into the operation of the fund, so that the maximum would be available to those who had received higher incomes. None of these things has been done and the government regrets that they have not been done, but I can assure the hon. member that steps are being taken at this time to see what can be accomplished in this regard.

BANKRUPTCY—PRUDENTIAL FINANCE CORPORATION—EFFECT ON SUBSIDIARY INSURANCE COMPANIES

Mr. Alcide Simard (Lac-Saint-Jean): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, and for the benefit of hon. members, I shall re-read the question I put to the Minister of Finance and Receiver General (Mr. Sharp) on January 17.

In view of the financial disaster of the Prudential Finance Corporation and its subsidiaries, are Canadian citizens who have insured their properties through that institution entitled to full compensation in case of fire?

The reasons which prompted that question I have just read are the following: In the last few days, certain citizens have been writing me letters actuated and dictated by the concern they feel about certain companies which agreed to carry risks with their material goods, clothing, properties, etc. Who will dare say that such fears are groundless? To prove my case, there is the recent financial disaster of the Prudential Finance Corporation and its subsidiaries.

A Montreal citizen called me last Sunday night to inform me that he had lost all his furniture, clothing and personal belongings when the building where he lived with his family had been destroyed by a fire. To make matters worse, everything was insured with a subsidiary of the above mentioned institution which is in deep financial difficulties and going bankrupt. The man who evaluated the damage from the fire recommended that the insurance company should pay the insured an indemnity of over $2,000; he will be lucky to get a cheque for half the amount of the indemnity suggested by the adjuster.

Another financial institution which will be unable to meet its obligations towards the Canadian public. Every day, newspaper articles denounce the mishandling of industrial funds. Certain well-paid and abjectly fawned upon bureaucrats shamelessly fatten on the sweat and savings of the low-salaried and dispossessed unfortunates. Why must such felonies always be perpetrated upon the taxpayers, upon those whose honesty is frustrated by the greed of shameless and bare-faced profiteers?

The Mercier report, in 1965, unveiled part of the scandals between 1960 to 1964 alone which cost the state of Quebec the sum of $52 million in lost income tax. The same report indicates serious shortcomings in the operation and application of bankruptcy legislation in Montreal courts.

Commissioner McClellan of the R.C.M.P. in Ottawa did not mince his words when he said:

The underworld is taking over every area of the Canadian economy and unless strong and immediate measures are taken by all concerned, tomorrow will be too late to root out organized crime.

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure how to reply to the remarks of the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Simard). He began by making some reference to the failure of the Prudential Finance Corporation, which is an Ontario company over which the federal government has no supervision. He also referred to some of the subsidiaries of Prudential Finance Corporation. I would imagine that he had in mind particularly the North American General Insurance Company, which was a subsidiary of Prudential Finance Corporation and sold, among other things, fire insurance. I have answered quite a number of questions in the house about these developments and events and I made several statements, one at some length, dealing with the federal government's responsibility in these matters. I do not think I can add very much to what I have said on those occasions. Like the hon. gentleman, I am concerned about the failure of some of these financial institutions because I believe that even if these failures are not in a sphere over which the federal parliament has control, nevertheless it reflects upon the reputations of all Canadian financial institutions. I have urged the provinces to do what they can to improve their laws and I have promised that as far as the federal government is concerned in its laws relating to federal institutions, we intend to do likewise.

In conclusion I would like to say again that the North American General Insurance Company, which capsized when the Prudential Finance Corporation went into bankruptcy, was the first failure of a federal insurance company in 40 years. I do hope we will have no more, but I think that the record of our federally incorporated and federally supervised insurance companies has been most remarkable.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—INQUIRY AS TO REMUNERATION FOR FIRE DAMAGE

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to rise this evening to intercede on behalf of some 18 farmers and others in my riding in the township of Richmond and in the township of Tyendinaga. Last Thursday I put a question to the Minister of Transport and it appears at page 12264 of Hansard. I asked him a question pertaining to a fire which took place along the right of way of the C.N.R. in Richmond and Tyendinaga townships last July 20. This fire was set by the rolling stock of the railway, and the farmers along the line sustained considerable damage to crops, fields and fences for which they have not been reimbursed by the C.N.R. I asked the minister when these farmers might expect to receive satisfaction in this matter.

• (10:20 p.m.)

This unfortunate fire happened more than six months ago. The C.N.R. has sent in inspectors and investigators. They promised the farmers satisfaction in this matter, but nothing has been done toward reimbursing them for the damage done to their fences, pasture lands and crops. The fire was set from a train. One of the C.N.R. claims agents saw it, for it so happens that he was in the area in process of settling a previous claim for damages caused by an earlier fire in April or May.

Officials of the C.N.R. have suggested that the fire may have been caused by a passenger on the train throwing out burning material, such as cigarette butts or matches. This does not make the railway any less liable. The railway is liable for the actions of its passengers. It is also liable for damages caused by mechanical equipment. This fire was set by a hot-box, which is mechanical equipment. The fire took place during a very dry time last summer, in drought conditions.

It was the east bound flyer which set the fire. The train crossed the boundary road between Hastings and Lennox and Addington counties at about 11.45 A.M. standard time. In a few minutes the whole south side of the railway was on fire. The Napanee fire department records show that they were called at 12.06 p.m. standard time. The first sign of fire and the emergency and alarm calls sent in are all in timing with the passage of the aforementioned train across the area. Damage was heavy and serious. The following is a list of the names of owners who have sustained damages:

John Sexsmith, R.R. 2, Shannonville; V. Ryan, R.R. 2, Shannonville, $90; Holy Name of Mary Church, Marysville, $200; Mrs. Bernard O'Sullivan, R.R. 1, Deseronto, $45; Eldridge Rosenblath, R.R. 5, Napanee, $150; Mr. Ross Oliver, R.R. 6, Napanee, $208; Walter Hudson, R.R. 6, Napanee, $500; Mrs. Ola Dillenbeck, R.R. 6, Napanee, $300; Mr. Ralph Hawley, R.R. 6, Napanee, $100; Mr. Fred Mowbray, R.R. 1, Deseronto, $125; Mr. Claude Nugent, R.R. 1, Deseronto, $100; Mr. Cecil Root, R.R. 5, Napanee, $200; Mr. Reginald Badgley, R.R. 1, Deseronto, $640; Mr. E.L. Hinchey, Shannonville, $200; Mr. Harold Moon, R.R. 1, Deseronto, $190; William Stewart, R.R. 1, Deseronto, $125; Eric Root R.R. 5, Napanee, $50.

The total of these figures amounts to $3,223 and we hold the railway liable for these damages for more than one reason. The railway did not burn the grass along the right of way in the spring of 1966 as they should, and usually do. The result was a heavy growth of hay on the railway property which, under the drought conditions, conducted the fire set by the train to the farmers' fences, fields and crops.

Another obvious factor which indicates the fire was set by the train is that the fire was only present and damages sustained on one side of the right of way, namely the south side, without exception and right across the parched, dry countryside. The fire resulted in chaos and disorder in this rural area because of the destruction of fences. As a result, farmers could not pasture their fields and those that were burned produced no grass for the rest of the season. One farmer, Ralph Hawley, had 40 head of cattle other than his own pasturing on his land at one time. Some of these fences have not yet been totally rebuilt.

Much of the seeded land was seeded to Birds Foot Trefoil, which was burned over. I remind the house that it costs at least $8 per acre just for the seed. One man lost 800 bales of hay. I have checked today with many of the people and no settlement has been received by any of them for the damages incurred in this fire.

Here is an example of the lack of action and procrastination of the Canadian National bureaucracy. The Canadian National is most inconsistent in this matter. The bills rendered by the various fire departments for fighting this fire, and the attitude of the Canadian National toward paying them are as follows: The Deseronto fire department rendered a bill for $50 to Tyendinaga township, and the township billed the Canadian National, the latter refused to pay, saying they were taxpayers and entitled to fire protection. The same thing happened with regard to a bill from the city of Belleville fire department which amounted to about $350. Tyendinaga township paid this bill but could not collect the money from the railway.

On the other hand, the Napanee fire department was called to the same fire in the Richmond township area. They rendered a bill for $170 to the Richmond township council. Richmond, in turn, billed the Canadian National and received payment in full in the month of September, less than two months after the incident. How ridiculous and inconsistent can this railway bureaucracy be? They assume responsibility in one instance and ignore their obligations in another, and especially for the damage done to the farmers and agricultural industry in the area.

I protest most strongly, Mr. Speaker, the failure of the railway company to right this wrong and their failure to satisfy the reasonable and deserving requests of the farmers in the area who have suffered certain damage. I remind the house that we are all glad to learn the Canadian National had a good year last year. However, I submit that they should not enjoy this financial improvement at the expense of the farmers along the right of way in Richmond and Tyendinaga townships. I ask that these just claims now be paid.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, obviously the conflagration was not sufficient to set a fire under the claims department of the Canadian National Railways.

The minister sincerely regrets the inconvenience and difficulties that have been caused to farmers and others in those communities as outlined by the hon. member. Certainly he will urge, in so far as his responsibility will permit, that the Canadian National do everything in its power, and undertake everything for which it is legally responsible.

It appears a coincidence that we have been informed that only today officials of the Canadian National claims department have journeyed to the community to finalize these agreements. I want to assure the hon. member that his representations have not gone unnoticed. I hope everything will be satisfactorily arranged during the visit of the officials to that area.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

GRAIN

ANNOUNCEMENT OF FINAL PAYMENTS ON WHEAT, OATS AND BARLEY

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the mailing of the wheat payment cheques will be completed tomorrow. The distribution of the cheques for the final payments for oats and barley will commence on February 2 and will be completed within the next two weeks.

In 1965-66 producers delivered 49,626,630 bushels of oats and 88,920,104 bushels of barley. The amounts of the final payments to be distributed are $12,313,571 for oats, and a record $29,230,543 for barley. As I informed the house on January 13, the amount of the final payment on wheat was $270,028,575. Thus the total of the final payment on wheat, oats and barley is $311,572,689, which is the largest final payment on grains in the history of the Canadian Wheat Board.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winters: These sums are not a final payment by the government of Canada but represent the net returns of the Canadian Wheat Board in the marketing of western Canadian wheat, oats and barley for the 1965-66 crop year. The average final payment for oats is a record 24.8 cents a bushel, and the average final barley payment of 32.8 cents a bushel has been exceeded only once.

I beg leave, Mr. Speaker, to table the statement being issued today in Winnipeg by the Canadian Wheat Board regarding the final payments on oats and barley.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table the document to which he has referred?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, the farmers in western Canada will, of course, be pleased with this announcement of the final payments on the oats and barley pools. As the minister has indicated, this is a payment of money due to them on the sale of their grain. I was interested in the minister's statement that these, with minor exceptions, are the highest payments on record. Western farmers are presently facing the highest costs in their entire history, and this is one of the facts that must be borne in mind when examining these figures.

If my memory serves me correctly there is no appreciable increase in the volume of barley as compared with previous years, and the improvement in the payment on oats is a reflection of the policy begun eight, nine or almost ten years ago, when the oats pool was in a deficit position. Over the years it has gradually been brought to its present situation.

Of course this also brings to mind the other problems which face those who are engaged in agriculture generally and particularly those in the dairy industry. They have a peculiar problem. All in all I would say that the people in western Canada will be pleased with the final payment, but still it does not reflect the improvement which we should like to see in the position of those who are producing grain in western Canada, when one considers the high cost of production which prevails at the present time.

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, the minister's announcement to the house and the country will be welcome news to the grain producers of western Canada particularly those who have middle sized and smaller farming operations, because to these people the production of oats and barley is relatively a more important factor in their operations. I should like to say also that the fact that the final payments on oats and barley are at either record or near record rates on a per bushel basis seems to be a pretty definite indication that perhaps it is time to think in terms of increasing the amount of the initial payment.

One could make the very logical argument, since the farmers must wait a certain number of months to receive the money that is coming to them in any case, that it really is not fair, that they be required to carry the interest charges on the money they must borrow in order to carry on their operations with their fixed costs and so on.

In view of the fact that the final payments are at a record level on a per unit basis I would urge the minister to give serious thought to increasing the initial payment to a significant extent.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I join with other hon. members who have spoken in welcoming this announcement. At the moment, according to Canadian Wheat Board selling prices even since the end of the selling year 1965-66, there are indications which would lead us to believe that the final payments for 1966-67 will be even higher than the payments indicated in this report. The minister has pointed out this is the largest payment ever made. I think it is the largest final payment ever made on wheat. It is almost certain that a year from now we will have another report which will indicate that the total price for this year's crop will be higher than in respect of last year's crop.

This indeed is welcome news, although we do recognize the point brought up by the hon. member for Rosthern that the costs involved in producing this grain have increased at least as rapidly as the price itself. One other point I am very gratified to see in this statement is that the minister included the fact that this is not a final payment by the government of Canada. This $311 million does not constitute a charge on the public treasury. No part of it constitutes a charge on the federal treasury. I believe this is one of the first occasions on which this kind of emphasis has been placed on this fact. I should like to commend the minister for doing this, and I recommend that he include it in all statements which are made in respect of these final payments on wheat, oats and barley.

CONSUMER CREDIT AND COST OF LIVING

CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Ron Basford (Vancouver-Burrard) moved:

That the third report of the special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on consumer credit and cost of living, presented to the house on Tuesday, December 20, 1966, be concurred in.

[Mr. Schreyer.]

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I only wish to comment briefly on this motion. The special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons on consumer credit and cost of living is submitting to us today a quite detailed report and is asking us to concur therein. But something happened within that committee that should not go unnoticed, and since there is no mention of it in the report, I feel the house should look into the matter.

When the Consumers' Association appeared before the committee, its president, I believe, brought a rather serious accusation against the government with regard to its inaction, stating that if—

[English]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder whether the hon. member for Lapointe realizes that the motion before the house relates to the third report and not to the fourth report of this committee. The details to which he is referring are contained not in the third report but in the fourh report.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, this concerns the report presented on December 20, which contains a large number of recommendations.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member is still speaking about the fourth report, even though the third and fourth reports were both presented on December 20.

• (2:50 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I want to take advantage of this opportunity and I think I have the right to do so. Whether the third or fourth report is involved, we are refused, possibly under—

Mr. Boulanger: That is incompetence.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is well taken. The hon. member may not, during a discussion on the tabling of a report in the house or on a motion for concurrence in a report by the house, give consideration to the proceedings of the report in which concurrence is being sought. The point he wishes to bring up bears on a report other than the one now before the house and I suggest that he may not continue the remarks he has started to make.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, my remarks deal with the third report as much as, if not more than, they do with the fourth, both of which were presented at the same time. Although concurrence is sought in only one of them today, my remarks deal as much, indeed more, with the third report, because it recommends that the committee be authorized to adjourn from place to place. If it is to be authorized to do so, its hearings should at least be useful. Now, that is precisely the point I want to make. The chairman of the Canadian Consumers Association charged that nothing was being done, that no valid recommendation was being made by the committee or that the government was not considering any action to help housewives, because its election funds are provided by large food processing corporations, and that its decisions are thus influenced by those companies which preclude the government from taking the necessary action to ease up the housewives' budget.

Mr. Speaker, if that accusation is justified, then whatever recommendations the committee makes, the present government will still be bound to the big companies which contribute to its election fund. At a committee hearing, the companies were accused of being mainly responsible for price increases to the consumers, especially on food. If those companies rather than the committee influence the government, what good will it do to hold hearings here and there?

Mr. Speaker, I feel that after such a serious accusation the government should investigate that matter, should reveal what those food companies subscribed to its election fund, so that we can decide whether or not that might constitute an obstacle to logical and normal decisions, in short if that might prevent the government and the committee from making suggestions and offering solutions which will really help Canadian consumers to solve their budget problems.

Mr. Speaker, you will admit with me that the committee received the accusation full in the face, that it did not refute it and that through its silence it admitted the accusation implicitly. I feel some light should be thrown on the subject.

It is all very well to accept election funds from the big companies but if, as a result, the government feels committed, consumers can see why nothing is being done for the consumers and why food companies take such a heavy toll of their budgets.

That is why I say, when the committee is asked to sit in various localities, that we must make sure that it operates efficiently, and draws valid conclusions capable of helping Canadian housewives. I want to see positive results and to achieve this, the government cannot be committed to those companies which contribute to election funds.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask for an inquiry in that respect. I think the committee should set out clearly its position and state that whatever these contributions might be, it will not be influenced by large corporations that take unfair advantage of Canadian consumers as a whole.

CANADIAN CONFEDERATION

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING CONFERENCE PROPOSED BY ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the reports appearing in the press in relation to a letter from the Prime Minister to the premier of Ontario dealing with the question of a constitutional conference summoned by Premier Robarts, will the Prime Minister table in parliament the letter along with the reply when it is received?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would have no objection whatever to doing this, to set at rest any rumours as to what I might have said and the tone in which I said it. I have not yet received the reply, but as soon as it is received I will ask Premier Robarts whether he would be agreeable to my tabling both letters.

REQUEST FOR ACCELERATED STUDY BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. With reference to the Prime Minister's statement as recorded in Hansard at page 12331, on the subject of confederation and the constitution, can the Prime Minister advise how long this study has been carried on, under which minister's authority is it taking place, and when will it be completed?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it has been going on now—I am subject to correction here—for about a year in various committees under the supervision of the President of the Privy Council. Since he unfortunately took ill I have been supervising the study myself. I think it will take a good many months before we complete this work. I suggested the other day that it would be the autumn.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RETURN OF PRESIDENT OF PRIVY COUNCIL AFTER ILLNESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, before I proceed with my question may I be permitted to say how delighted we all are to see the President of the Privy Council back in his place. We hope he is fully restored to health and strength and that he will be sufficiently well to be with us for a long time.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, at this point I wonder whether the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam will allow me on behalf of our party to also welcome back the President of the Privy Council. It is good to see him back, and we hope he enjoys good health.

[Translation]

Hon. Guy Favreau (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted on this occasion to say a few words without taking too much of the time of the house?

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. members who have just spoken for having been the interpreters of their own sentiments and those of their colleagues.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, during the rather frustrating period I have gone through and which kept me away from the house, I must say I was constantly sustained, and I want the house to know this, by the tokens of friendship, the encouragement and the sympathy which I received from all sides of the house.

It may have become a cliché to say that friendships transcending ideologies or political convictions are made in the House of Commons, but I think it should be repeated, at least in my case, because the manifestation of these friendships is one of the main reasons why I am back in the house perhaps several months before I expected it.

I wish to thank the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) for his constant support and encouragement.

May I, at this stage, add a personal word or two? It is that, during my absence, specially in the last few weeks, I have had to make a difficult decision, that is to leave the Quebec leadership. I must say, on the other hand —with the utmost sincerity—how happy and proud I was to observe the unanimous appointment of my successor. It is often a source of anxiety for someone forced to leave a post, to wonder over his successor. In the present case I must say that the personality, the sincerity and the talent of my successor will always give me a feeling of fulfilment. I wish him all success in the heavy task he will have to carry on. I also wish him—and I know he will receive it—the same support, the same backing and the same solidarity which I have received from all my colleagues.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO POLICE REPORTS ON BOMBING OF YUGOSLAV BUILDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I was about to ask the Prime Minister whether he has received any reports from police authorities regarding the persons or organizations responsible for the recent bombings of the Yugoslav embassies and consulates. I notice that the leader of one organization in the United States has said that they were out to make life miserable for Marshal Tito. What seems to have been overlooked is that it is also endangering the lives and properties of Canadian citizens. I wonder whether the Prime Minister has received any report on who are the persons responsible, and whether anyone has been apprehended as yet.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No report has yet been received from the police who are carrying on their investigation into this unhappy and senseless incident. The observation as to responsibility to which my hon. friend referred was made, I believe, by a United States citizen in San Francisco. I should add that the Secretary of State for External Affairs saw the Yugoslav chargé d'affaires again yesterday, and I believe he is seeing him later today.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether any decision has been reached with respect to compensation for persons living in adjoining residences whose property was damaged as a result of these violent actions? I ask this because of the suggestion in some areas that people are asking for these consulates to be moved in view of the threat to their property.

Mr. Pearson: As I say, the government naturally accepts its international obligations in matters of this kind. In so far as obligations toward the property of Canadian citizens is concerned, that is a matter that is being examined now and, as I indicated yesterday, it involves certain legal considerations which will be looked into very carefully.

NATIONAL SECURITY

PRESENCE IN CANADA OF PERSON EXPELLED AS SECURITY RISK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I avail myself of this opportunity to welcome back in the house the President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Registrar General of Canada and to wish him a good health for the years to come.

I now wish to refer to the question I put yesterday to the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning a Mr. Ritzig. Has the minister anything new to tell the house in this connection or does he need more time to look into this problem?

I put my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but I wonder whether he caught it.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member whether he means the question he asked me yesterday?

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I studied the records this morning and took up the matter with my officials. We found no justification for the question put yesterday.

It may be, though, that the hon. member received more information. I can assure him that we looked up the name he mentioned and failed to obtain the required information. I should be pleased to discuss the matter with the hon. member. I believe some of my officials got in touch with him this morning.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I will be very pleased to take up the matter with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but in the meantime perhaps his officials could discuss it with the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General, in order to look at that side of the picture.

FINANCE

CANADIAN REACTION TO POSSIBLE INVESTMENT BY FRANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): First, Mr. Speaker, may I on behalf of this group express our pleasure at the return to the house of the President of the Privy Council and wish him good health in the future.

My question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the announcement that the French government has moved to make Paris a more important international money market, what will be the official Canadian reaction to possible foreign investment in Canada from this new source?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): The Canadian government would welcome investment from France. I hope there will be an increasing interchange both in trade and in investment between our two countries.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): May I ask a supplementary question. When the Minister of Finance says he would welcome investment from France, does he mean investment in bonds or equity capital?

Mr. Sharp: In either form, Mr. Speaker.

OIL

STEPS TO INCREASE EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): I wonder if the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is now in a position to answer the question I asked yesterday with regard to improved markets for Canadian crude oil.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I presume the hon. member is referring to the Levy report. This report was read and analysed by my officials a number of weeks ago. Mr. Levy is one of the world's prominent oil experts who deserves to be read with great attention. Generally speaking I can say that my experts are more optimistic than Mr. Levy. On the subject of exports to the United States, I can only say that they have been growing substantially. They were averaging 317,000 barrels per day in 1965 and 379,000 barrels per day in 1966. This indicates quite a growth. However, the hon. member can be sure that the government, in co-operation with the industry, is at the moment still trying to expand these markets.

Mr. Harkness: I did ask particularly whether the minister and his officials had any consultations with representatives of the oil industry with regard to steps that could be taken, and particularly if anything had been done leading toward the constructoin of a pipe line into the Chicago market?

Mr. Pepin: Extensive consultations have taken place with regard to the matter the hon. member mentioned.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Within the last few hours reports have been circulated, consistent with the questions that have been asked, to the effect that the crude oil industry is working at less than one third of capacity. Is there a complete program in the United States for the sale of this product?

Mr. Pepin: A complete program?

Mr. Winkler: By the Canadian government?

Mr. Pepin: The policy was originated six years ago by the previous government, and it has been progressing ever since. The Canadian government, with the full agreement of the Canadian industry, has developed the program consistently in the past years. Last year the Canadian oil industry broke the one million barrels a day production barrier, and the rate of increase of exports has been 18 per cent in 1966 over 1965. I do not believe it is proper to talk about this industry other than with enthusiasm.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): My supplementary question will be directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the important answers given by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and in view of the discussion which I had with the Prime Minister before the house opened, will the Prime Minister be prepared now to have one of the ministers, either the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, make a statement on this important matter outlining the situation and the policy of the government?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I will be glad to discuss the matter with the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who are the two ministers most concerned, to ascertain if a time can be arranged for such a statement.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has his department made any feasibility study of extending the oil line into the Montreal market area, and will such a study be made available? Has the government any policy to announce as a result of such study, if it has been made?

Mr. Pepin: A continuing study is made by the National Energy Board and that subject is also covered, as the hon. member knows, by the Levy report. The industry is also studying this possibility, but at this moment there seems to be a consensus that increased exports to the United States are more desirable than building a pipe line to the Montreal area. Our efforts, therefore, are concentrated now in this field of further exports to the United States.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether, in the light of the great new discoveries of oil in Canada, as well as the proven oil reserves, the government of Canada has initiated discussions with the government of the United States with a view to obtaining an upward revision of the quota of the North American oil market allocated to proven Canadian reserves.

Mr. Pepin: Canada benefits in the United States from what are referred to as the overland exemptions. These exemptions are set from year to year, and this is presently being discussed by Canada and the United States.

Mr. Fulton: Am I to understand from the minister that discussions are under way between the two countries now?

Mr. Pepin: Indeed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

OFFSHORE EXPLORATION RIGHTS IN AREA BETWEEN NEWFOUNDLAND AND FRENCH ISLANDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the recent discussions between Canadian and French officials on the issue of offshore exploration rights, has the minister any report to make on the conflicting national claims to the area between St. Pierre and Miquelon and the Canadian coast of Newfoundland?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think this question is of a very general nature. I am not sure the subject is of immediate urgency. If it is the hon. member may so indicate; otherwise it seems to me this matter could be dealt with by way of a statement on motions.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, in answer to your suggestion may I say that I believe a delegation was sent from Canada to Paris, and that it returned only this week end. Therefore I would welcome any announcement the minister has to make because of the importance of this question not only to Canada nationally but to all our provincial premiers.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions between the French and Canadian governments in France within the past few days. Our delegation has returned to Canada and is making a report some time tomorrow, when we will have an opportunity of seeing what progress the negotiations have made. My impression is that the progress has not been what we had hoped it would be; however, the discussions are continuing.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR COPIES OF ECONOMIC COUNCIL STUDY ON MANPOWER ADJUSTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would undertake to request the Economic Council to supply members of this house with copies of its latest study on manpower adjustment to technological and other change, because as far as I know we have not yet received a copy.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to do that. I think the report just came out yesterday, but I shall be glad to ask the chairman whether that can be done.

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question. I should also like to ask the right hon. gentleman whether the study suggests any legislative action in reference to the kind of arrangements that should be made between labour and management in the case of technological change; and in that case may I ask whether the government is contemplating such legislative action on the subject.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I have not yet had an opportunity to do more than read the report casually. I am not sure whether there is any recommendation for legislation. My impression is that there is not. In so far as the general nature of the question is concerned, we will be awaiting a report from the task force on labour legislation which I believe will have certain recommendations on this as on other subjects. However, we should like to have that before we decide on what legislation should be introduced.

DOMINION COAL BOARD

REQUEST FOR APPOINTMENTS TO FILL EXISTING VACANCIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that regretfully another member of the Dominion Coal Board has now passed away, which leaves two vacancies on the board, and in view of the critical situation of the coal industry and its future, can the minister advise when new appointments will be made to fill these vacancies on the board, especially in regard to a representative from the ranks of labour?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for being reminded of this situation and I will do my very best to correct it. If the hon. member would kindly become a candidate I might act even more rapidly.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): A supplementary question. May I ask the minister whether he is desirous of removing me from the house? I always thought he rather liked me, like the Minister of Transport.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRANSPORT

IMPOSITION OF SURCHARGE ON CARGOES BETWEEN EUROPE AND VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ron Basford (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Would the minister refer to the restrictive trade practices commission the action of the European-Pacific coast freight conference in imposing a 10 per cent surcharge on ship cargoes between Vancouver and European ports, so they can investigate this price fixing conspiracy?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether this would be a very efficacious way of dealing with the problem, but I do regret very much that this conference has seen fit to penalize the harbour of Vancouver in this way without any prior consultation whatsoever with the National Harbours Board. We have asked for an explanation of this and protested as strongly as we can.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

POSSIBLE EXTENSION OF JURISDICTION TO RYE AND FLAXSEED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce which arises out of the statement he made today regarding the final payments for oats and barley. In light of the progress that has been made in this regard, is the government now considering moving rye and flaxseed within the operations of the Canadian Wheat Board?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter that has been under continuing consideration for some time, and the government will continue to consider it.

EXPO '67

STATEMENT ON DISMISSAL OF MEMBER OF YOUTH ADVISORY COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet may I answer a question asked the other day by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce about the dismissal of Mr. Harvey Oberfeld from his position on the youth advisory council. The hon. member asked whether this was due to criticism of the hiring policies at Expo in connection with the youth pavilion.

On looking into this matter, Mr. Speaker, I have been informed that Mr. Oberfeld was dismissed by the youth advisory committee, which committee is completely independent of the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition. The reasons for the dismissal have not been communicated to Expo but I understand they related to certain comments he made to the press without the authorization of his employers.

COAL

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NEGOTIATIONS WITH JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I apologize for doing so because he has been very much overworked today.

Negotiations are supposed to be taking place between the coal operators in the Crowsnest pass area and Japanese officials with respect to new contracts and larger shipments of coal exports from Canada to Japan. Has the minister anything to report on these new negotiations?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, may I make one point first; the minister of energy can never be overworked. In answer to the question may I say that negotiations are taking place at this time regarding the export of coal to Japan, but the government is not in command; these negotiations are being carried on by industry. I think it is well understood by everyone concerned, particularly by the Japanese, that these exports must be made without federal subsidies.

SHIPPING

BOILER ROOM EXPLOSION ON "NIXON BERRY"; CAPSIZING OF "MANSEAU 101"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has he appointed or does he intend to appoint a commission of inquiry into an explosion in the boiler room of the ship Nixon Berry which resulted in one person dying in hospital subsequent to the explosion?

I wonder whether I could take a leaf out of the cabinet's book and while I am on my feet direct another question to the minister. Has he yet received the report of the commission inquiring into the capsizing of the Manseau 101?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, to answer the last question first, the answer is yes. In answer to the first question, may I say the matter is under consideration.

Mr. Howard: A supplementary question with respect to the report of the commission of inquiry into the capsizing of the Manseau 101. May I ask the minister when he will make this report public?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I can give a precise answer to that question at the moment, but I am considering the matter.

TRANSPORT

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—OPPORTUNITY TO PROTEST INCREASE IN TOLLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gustave Blouin (Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport which is further to a question asked in the house last Friday in connection with a telegram addressed to the Prime Minister from the city council of Sept Îles protesting the proposed increase in St. Lawrence seaway tolls. I should like to know whether the minister has any comment to make on this matter today.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I was sent copies of this telegram both by the city and by the Prime Minister. I sent word to the city clerk that I would reply to the matter as soon as I can find a few minutes to do so.

That happened after my bill got to this house. I replied yesterday to the city of Sept Îles telling them that the question of tolls was still under discussion between our government and the government of the United States, but assuring them that we would not agree to any change in tolls which would have the effect of discouraging traffic and, above all, of interfering with the iron ore industry of Quebec and Labrador.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): What reply did the minister make with respect to the request of the city of Sept Îles that they be allowed to make representations to the government before any final decision is made?

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not think it was necessary to reply to that question because under the law made by parliament the opportunity to make representations was advertised widely throughout this country, and a great many representations were made. I need hardly add that any citizen who wishes to write a letter or send a brief to me can be assured that within the limits of human capacity it will be given full attention.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Does that reply not mean that the minister will still not consider the advisability of bringing this matter before the transport committee before a decision is made?

Mr. Pickersgill: There were so many negatives in the hon. member's question that I do not know whether to answer yes or no, but I will be glad to look at it.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I will make it positive and simple. Does the minister envisage that this question of tolls will go before the committee for consideration?

Mr. Pickersgill: I would not be surprised if it did go before the committee. However, there has to be something definite to go.

Mr. Starr: So I guess it will never go.

SPORTS

HOCKEY—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO CONTROL OF PLAYERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. S. Smallwood (Battle River-Camrose): I have a question for the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister consider setting up a parliamentary committee to formulate federal legislation to protect our young Canadian hockey players from being signed by the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association and sold like slaves to the professional National Hockey League?

[Later:]

Mr. Smallwood: I am serious about the question I asked the Prime Minister a few minutes ago. This is a matter of great concern to the people of Canada, regardless of whether the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Roxburgh) wants to laugh.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): A report on this matter is to be made by the fitness council. It has not yet been received by the government but it will be available very shortly, I understand. At that time we can determine whether it is the kind of report which should go to a parliamentary committee for consideration, to see how these wage slaves—some of whom receive a much larger income than does the hon. member—are treated.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST THAT EXTERNAL AFFAIRS MINISTER PARTICIPATE IN UNIFICATION DEBATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of external affairs, who appears to be in a better mood this week than last week. Will the minister contribute to the discussion of unification of the armed forces this week by indicating to the house the importance to his department of destroying the identity of the three services, the navy, the army and the air force, as intended by the Minister of National Defence?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think there is a possibility that the minister might want to contribute to the debate later this afternoon along the lines suggested by the hon. member, but I do not think that question can be asked now.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that I was in the west last week and noticed in my hon. friend's constituency a great deal of disunification.

Mr. Churchill: I will be out there this week to correct the bad impression left by the minister.

[Later:]

Mr. Churchill: My question is for the Minister of National Defence and it concerns the propaganda task force which he has posted just behind the press gallery. Would the minister instruct his propaganda agents to draw to the attention of the press my speech of November 4 in which I accused the minister of knowingly and deliberately misleading the House of Commons?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): I asked these people to attend during the present debate because indications are that the hon. gentleman and some of his colleagues have such a primitive knowledge of the subject under discussion that we are happy and willing to make available to them all sorts of material which will assist them in the preparation of their speeches.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: Will the minister make available to us in the opposition the slick, 47 page booklet complete with photographs of military hardware which he has distributed to servicemen, veterans groups, writers and other interested persons and organizations? This contains his speech of December 7, which was most uninteresting. With the addition of the photographs and pictures we might be enlightened and amused.

Mr. Hellyer: I would be pleased to do that.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I would ask the minister to review his last answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. Does he recognize that his answer contains an admission that this propaganda force is actually in being?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is hardly a proper question.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

DECISION NOT TO TELEVISE UNIVERSITY DEBATE ON VIET NAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. R. Sherman (Winnipeg South): My question is addressed to the Secretary of State. It arises out of the fact that ten Canadian university teams will debate the Viet Nam war on March 17 at York University, and that two United States networks are apparently planning to televise the event. Since the C.B.C. has said it does not plan to carry this program, would the hon. lady consider using her influence to try to obtain a reversal of that decision?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): No.

CRIMINAL CODE

POSSIBLE AMENDMENT RESPECTING ELECTRONIC LISTENING DEVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the statement made yesterday in the Ontario legislature by the attorney general of that province that the Ontario Provincial Police use electronic listening devices in criminal cases, and his statement outside the legislature that he had asked the federal government to amend the Criminal Code to permit this, would the minister tell us whether the government is considering the introduction of such legislation?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Justice): The question of wire tapping was discussed quite fully at the meeting of attorneys general held about a year ago, and the matter has been under study by the department for some time.

Mr. Orlikow: Would the minister consider referring the whole question of wire tapping and the use of electronic listening devices to the standing committee on justice and legal affairs?

Mr. Cardin: I do not think it would be wise to refer the matter to that particular committee at this time.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

SUGGESTED COMPLIMENTARY TRIPS TO EXPO FOR OLDER CANADIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State. If she decides to give me a one word answer, as she did to the hon. member for Winnipeg South, I hope it will be "yes" rather than "no".

Mr. McCleave: Is this a proposal?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: I am afraid that would be invading a jurisdiction which has already been established.

An hon. Member: By whom?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the general desire to honour older Canadians during this centennial year, would the Secretary of State suggest to the centennial commission the possibility of arranging for complimentary trips to Expo for Canadians 80 years of age and over?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I have to confess to the house that I have been waiting 40 years for the chance to say "yes" to a question, but this is not it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Where?

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

INQUIRY AS TO IMPLEMENTATION BY PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare supplementary to the one I asked him yesterday concerning the Canada Assistance Plan. The minister said no agreements had been concluded with the provinces. Can he say whether the necessary agreements will be completed within the very near future so the benefits of the plan can come into operation?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, I hope it will be possible to sign these agreements in the near future.

• (3:30 p.m.)

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF NAVY, ARMY AND AIR FORCE

The house resumed from Monday, January 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Hellyer for the second reading of Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I have about four speeches which I wish to make on this bill and until a few moments ago I was undecided as to which I would make at this time. However, I have been prompted to make up my mind by the answer given by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) to the question put to him by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) during the question period. I was not quite clear whether he meant by his answer that he had limited knowledge or that the opposition had limited knowledge. However, I think I can prove which is correct.

Before the house adjourned last night I had referred to the minister's speech of December 7 last and said it left much to be desired. I said it reminded me of a balloon; it had a cover but inside there was nothing of substance, just air. We in the official opposition were particularly anxious to examine that great speech in order to determine what he meant by unification. The word "unification" as used by the minister mystified the members of all the armed forces, the general public and members of this house, and again I say that the definition of this word is the crux of the debate in which we are engaged.

National Defence Act Amendment

Last evening I stated that the minister's use of the word "unification" was the most gigantic hoax ever perpetrated on the Canadian public by a minister of the crown, and I repeat that statement today. The basis of my charge is documented by the minister's own words in his speech in moving second reading of Bill No. C-243. As recorded at page 10828 of Hansard for December 7 last, under the heading "Advantages of the Single Service" the minister said:

> The principle of the bill to create a single service is very simple.

Under the heading "Aim of the Reorganization" the minister stated:

> However, the end objective of a single service is firm.

Under the heading "The Single Service Concept" the minister said:

> —the three services would no longer retain their status as individual entities with the Canadian forces.

He also said:

> The concept of three separate service entities was thereby abandoned in favour of one. Comprehension of the concept of a single service will be assisted by an understanding of the structure of the force.

In that speech the minister attempted to tell us what the force structure is. In brief, he told us that it is the army, the navy and the air force as we know them at the present time. In the same paragraph he also said:

> None of these will be changed in moving to a single service from three separate services. They will continue to be trained and equipped for their particular roles. Moreover, a single service will involve no change in the organization of these force units into formations such as brigades, air wings, or squadrons of ships.

Last night the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) seemed to be under the impression that the Minister of National Defence has a very sharp mind and is rational enough to become prime minister of Canada some day. Well, Mr. Speaker, we in the official opposition want these questions answered by the minister:

1. How can the services be different and still be identical?

2. How can the three separate service entities be abandoned in favour of one and there still be no change in the three services?

3. What does the minister mean by his statement, "None of these will be changed in moving to a single service from three separate services"?

[Mr. McIntosh.]

These are ambiguous statements. I do not mind revealing to the house that having read the minister's speech that far I was very confused as to his intentions with regard to the present services. I had hoped that I had found a declaration by him that he was going to retain the three services as we know them—the army, the navy and the air force. However, I was not too sure so I read on and discovered another paragraph in his speech under the heading "Careers" as recorded at page 10829 of Hansard, in which he said:

> One general principle should be underligned again. The combat units will retain their identity, and their specialized functions and training. It is important to state that it is not and never has been any part of the plan associated with unification to convert our servicemen to "jacks-of-all-trades".

I repeat that quotation:

> It is important to state that it is not and never has been any part of the plan associated with unification to convert our servicemen to "jacks-of-all-trades".
> An infantry soldier will not be asked to do the job of a sailor in a fighting ship; a sailor will not be asked to fight in an infantry platoon; and a fighter pilot will not be required to drive a tank.

Under the heading "Continuation of Units and Elements" the minister said:

> At the time the new force comes into being, its units and elements shall be those which then exist in the navy, army and air force.
> Units and elements of the force are the command entities—for example, in the navy, ships and squadrons; in the army, battalions of infantry, regiments of artillery, armoured regiment, brigades; in the air force, squadrons, wings and groups. All of these will remain unchanged.

I read that last sentence three times and I reflected on the minister's previous words, "None of these will be changed in moving to a single service," and "no change in the organization of these force units." I began to wonder why we had been so concerned about the minister's coined word, "unification". I began to wonder why a large number of senior officers had resigned or taken early retirement.

The minister had stated that there would be no change in the three separate services. I was beginning to understand him. What he meant was integrate at the top, in administration, in supply, and possibly in training. We would support such a move. I was further elated when I read in the same paragraph of the minister's speech:

> This system will not be changed by reason of unification. Certainly, we will continue to have infantry regiments as well as the Royal Canadian Armoured Corps and the Royal Regiment of Canadian Artillery.

At the time I wondered why the minister had dropped the word "royal" from the names of the navy and the air force. However, that is incidental. I read further in his speech and discovered that he said, as recorded at page 10834 of Hansard:

> Although a unified personnel management system will be introduced, the separate units and elements of naval, field and air forces will continue to exist ... personnel in the combat forces will continue to be identified as sailors, soldiers and airmen—

And then, Mr. Speaker, the roof fell in on me because the minister ended his sentence with these words:

> —until the force structure within the unified force is developed.

Just what do you mean by that, Mr. Minister? Do you mean that there is a limitation to everything you have said throughout your speech about there being no change, or do you mean that you as minister have no idea what the word "unification" actually means? These are the questions we want answered. In fact, Mr. Minister, you are saying yes and no at the same time. No doubt at some future date, no matter how the tide turns or the wind blows, you will be able to say that you clearly indicated in your speech introducing Bill No. C-243 that you had said yes there and no here—take your choice.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Churchill: That is right. It is completely misleading.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows he should address the Chair and that he should not address the minister or another member directly.

Mr. McIntosh: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I direct my remarks through you to the minister. I should like the house to remember the only definition of the word "unification" which appears in the whole of the minister's speech. I repeat, as I said last night, that the definition which appears in his speech is that unification is the end object of a logical and evolutionary progression. I admit that that is a very lofty statement, but it does not convince me that the minister knows what he is doing; in fact, it actually has the opposite effect. I now agree that the senior officers who have been referred to so many times during this debate were right in the action they took even if it accomplished nothing more than to focus public attention on what is happening in the Department of National Defence. I would say that they have served their country well by retiring and refusing to accept such an explanation as the minister is attempting to give the house at the present time.

How many staff officers who are now serving in the forces can say that they understand what the minister has in mind for the future of the services? It is beyond me. Perhaps I should enlarge the term "staff officer" and say that I cannot understand how any officer serving in the armed forces today knows what the minister means unless he is gifted, as the minister seems to be, with inner sight. I defy any one of these officers to give a coherent and rational explanation of unification as outlined by the minister. The onus is now on members of parliament, particularly those on that side of the house, not this, to stop this farce of unification, as the minister has attempted to explain it, before he destroys not only our defence forces but Canadian pride and sovereignty as well.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that when the minister refers so often to a single service he really means a funeral service for the armed forces of Canada if he is allowed to remain in his present office. I should like to read the last paragraph of the minister's speech under the heading "Bill No. C-243" as found on page 10832 of Hansard:

> The three services under the provisions of the bill become one service to be called the Canadian Armed Forces. It is understandable that proud and gallant men may read this with heavy hearts. Those who do, I hope, will on reflection see that the single service is born with the great heritages of the three services that give it its life blood. These are not lost but brought together into one service, the strength of three to meet the challenges of the future and to add to the glories of the past.

Such hypocrisy for one who holds the axe. I could continue to read other ambiguous statements contained in the minister's speech. Under the heading, "The Influence of Rising Costs", he had this to say, dealing with finance:

> The conclusion is somtimes reached because the figures are approximately the same that there have been no reductions in costs in the defence department.

Let me repeat that:

> The conclusion is sometimes reached because the figures are approximately the same that there have been no reductions in costs in the defence department.

Although I am not an auditor, it would seem to me that if the figures are the same the cost is the same and there is no reduction. How ambiguous can the minister be?

There are other problems which appear from the minister's speech. In fact he has outlined quite well the problems not only here in Canada but in practically every country in the world in respect of national defence. I could go through the minister's speech and point out where he has listed certain problems in respect of manpower, certain problems in respect of command and certain problems in respect of finance. But he offers no solution so far as the Canadian government is concerned. We might take, for example, the United Kingdom solution to these problems. Last night the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) put on Hansard the remarks of Mr. Christopher Mayhew. I should like to direct the attention of members of the house to the first and last paragraphs of those remarks. They appear at page 12411 of Hansard. Mr. Mayhew said:

> It seemed clear to me, and Mr. Hellyer readily agreed, that the degree of dislocation which he had cheerfully and deliberately created in Canada would be too much for a country like Britain—

Then in the last paragraph he said:

> A member of the department commented sardonically that he doubted whether Canada could find the money needed to finance Mr. Hellyer's economies.

After saying that there is no reduction in the expenditure for national defence the minister should have come up with some suggestion concerning how it could be reduced. As I said before, I should like to have taken the example of the United Kingdom. However, I will deal with the problems France had. I believe France probably had a great many more problems than Canada in this regard. Canada has no concrete plan to overcome the military problems today.

The French government has decided to keep military expenditures at a fixed percentage of the gross national product in order not to affect the country's living standards or production growth. This is a very sound basis on which to work. The gross national product of France is increasing by about 5 per cent annually, which means a parallel increase in absolute value in the military budget. These additional funds will make it possible to meet the growing cost of modernizing the armed forces of France. The structure of military budgets in all countries has undergone radical changes since world war II. In the case of France the sums allocated for capital expenditures have risen from 16 per cent of the military appropriation in 1945 to 50 per cent in 1966, with an appropriate drop in operating expenditures. In other words, they are balancing their budget and intend to do so.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

Military capital expenditures for defence must inevitably increase due to technological advances. New weapons and equipment become more complex and costly each year for all countries. In spite of the increase in capital expenditures for weapons, France balanced her defence budget by a sizeable reduction in military personnel which resulted in a decrease in operating expenses. The minister should make a note of this. The reduction in personnel is compensated for by the increased fire power of the new weapons that country acquired. In France the operating expenses for defence have remained fairly constant for the past five years, but fire power has increased over this period in spite of a reduction of over 50 per cent in personnel during the period 1961 to 1966.

Why did the minister not propose some sound plan for the Canadian people, like other countries have done, instead of giving us the drivel which he gave us in his speech of December 7, 1966? For a few moments I should like to refer to an article which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of November 14, 1966. The title of the article is, "Hellyer sees anti-unity conspiracy". The article states:

> Defence Minister Paul Hellyer charged Saturday that a conspiracy of forces inside and outside parliament is determined to kill unification of the armed forces.
> In a speech to the Toronto District Liberal Association, he said the real cause of the filibuster in parliament was from influences outside the House of Commons.

• (3:50 p.m.)

I do not consider that we are carrying on a filibuster. We are carrying out our duty as members of the official opposition to the people we represent and to the people of Canada. We are trying to bring to light the mess the minister is trying to make of Canada's defence, the mess he is trying to make of our sovereignty and the mess he is trying to make of our national pride. Having read the speech delivered by the minister abroad I am afraid that we are now being ridiculed by every country in the world. The article to which I have refered then states:

> He blames a small group of "desk officers" who have combined forces with the Conservatives and who he said are determined to prevent unification regardless of its effects on national defence.

What does he mean by "desk officers"? Is this another rank that he has created within our forces? The article continues:

> He said also that part of the blame lies in Opposition Leader John Diefenbaker's "tenuous hold on his party" and the desperation of his supporters to keep him as Conservative leader after next week's national P.C. convention.

Let me point out to the minister that our leader has not taken part in this debate. If he had I suggest that perhaps he might have conveyed to the Canadian people much better results which will result from the attempt of the minister to impose on the Canadian people something of which he knows nothing.

There is no doubt that many Canadians have been seriously disturbed by the implications of the ministers' unification program. We do not understand the ultimate intent of unification because the minister has never explained the meaning of that term in a manner that relates to the services, except by what he has been reported to have said in various newspapers. I have a long list of reported statements but let me read only a few. At one point he said:

> Unification is a single military force containing lists of sailors, airmen, artillerymen, infantrymen, dentists, etc.

In another paper he is reported to have said:

> In the unified force management will not be imposed from the top, but will work up through the crafts and trades—

This certainly is unorthodox so far as the policy of any other service is concerned.

In another newspaper he is reported as follows:

> Unification is probably the boldest plan of military reorganization ever tried by a modern nation—

In another newspaper he is reported to have stated:

> Regardless of the words the important thing is to understand the concept which is a force of military specialists and their support all working for a common purpose.

What a conglomeration of words. He is also reported to have said:

> We are now becoming leaders in defence organization and thinkers not just followers.

We really must be the laughing-stock of other countries.

Mr. Churchill: Just the minister, not us.

Mr. McIntosh: We are also a part of the parliament of Canada and if this bill passes it will be partly our responsibility. Let me appeal to all hon. members of the opposition to get up and oppose this bill.

The minister is also reported to have said:

> Canada will have indelibly etched he name as the world leader in military organization—

How is that possible with a population of only 20 million?

In another article he is reported to have said:

> The aim of our program first and foremost is to build a more responsive force—a force which is more united strategically. To do this there is a necessity for a cohesive plan at the top.

Perhaps some of his staff officers can explain to me how a force can be united strategically. The only conclusion to be reached as a result of such statements is that the minister has some revolutionary ideas to advance that will change the whole concept of defence. Does he intend to keep these ideas secret as a new weapon for Canada?

We have asked the minister to reveal the facts about unification. As you know, Mr. Speaker, we did not want to agree to this fundamental change in principle without knowing the implications of such a change. We are not attempting to carry on a filibuster; we are truly attempting to obtain answers to our questions and to find out what the minister means by unification. Certainly his speech in respect of Bill No. 243 gave no indication of what he meant. In that speech he said yes at one time to one question and no at another time. As I said before, his speech was very ambiguous.

We are not alone in our search for answers. Members of the press have asked various questions such as: Tell us what unification means, Mr. Hellyer? What is required is an official comprehensive public statement on unification. The services and the people must be told why integration is not enough and why unification is necessary. We must be told what we have to give up and what we stand to gain. The services and the people have a right to an explanation of the necessity of this dangerous political experiment, and I am inclined to believe that is all it is, a political experiment. The press has also stated that the minister has not handled this matter well. He must reveal more facts. Unification is untried, untested and undefined.

The minister must have been aware he was causing unnecessary fears and confusion in the minds of the Canadian public by his silence and his refusal to define the term "unification of the armed forces". The minister knew he was not proposing any fundamental change in the services, but he let that idea circulate because of the press coverage he was receiving at that time. Possibly he had dreams similar to those that the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) had for him. Perhaps he wanted to attain the top position—prime minister.

In any event the minister was getting a lot of free publicity. If that was the reason he allowed that idea to circulate then he obviously had no concern for the armed forces and was using his position only as a stepping stone or for political expediency. If that is the position—prime minister.

The minister knew that his statements were just a play on words designed to deliberately create confusion and in many cases unnecessary fears. What did he do to those officers who had served for a lifetime in the armed forces when he forced them to retire because they would not agree to something they could not understand? The minister could not make them understand because he did not know what he meant. I am sure he does not know what he means by unification. This was a word which obtained a lot of publicity for him. He continued to utter it time and time again.

As a result of this obvious play on the word "unification" the minister has perpetrated a gigantic hoax on the people of Canada, the armed forces and the parliament of Canada. This is the greatest hoax ever played by any minister in this or any other parliament. What is perhaps even more dangerous is that he has endangered the security of this nation. He has endangered this nation by dismissing or forcing the early retirement of a number of senior officers.

The minister in my opinion deliberately misled the Canadian public when he said some time ago in Edmonton that this issue involved civil control over the military.

Mr. Hellyer: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIntosh: I ask the minister to get up at this time and deny that he made that statement.

Mr. Churchill: No, he now confirms it.

Mr. Hellyer: I said it, Mr. Speaker, and I meant it.

Mr. McIntosh: The Canadian people are entitled to know if at any time during the minister's term of office there was a deliberately planned coup by the senior officers of any of our services. He owes this house and the Canadian people an explanation in respect of the statement he has now confirmed. What military control did the officers want to take over civilians? I think this is something that has to be explained in the house before discussion on this bill is completed.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Churchill: Make him answer it now.

Mr. McIntosh: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) says, "Make him answer it now."

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question? Has not the minister, by the answer he gave just a minute ago, cast a very serious reflection upon the officers and men in our services, namely, that they were trying to gain control over the civilian authority in this land? That is the reflection he cast upon our serving officers and men.

An hon. Member: Is that a question?

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, up to this time I was not sure whether the minister had made that statement in Edmonton although it had been reported in the press. Today all hon. members present heard the minister when he rose and repeated that statement. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre that it is a serious statement. It does cast a reflection upon all officers now serving in the armed forces and in particular upon those who left under a cloud, as it were.

Mr. Hellyer: It was directed to one.

Mr. McIntosh: Tell us who that one is.

Mr. Hellyer: You know who it is.

Mr. McIntosh: We do not know who it is. You told us you knew.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If we are to have orderly debate it means that the hon. member will make his speech and the minister will eventually reply to speeches made, closing the debate.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested that the minister has not produced any proof for his statement, and I believe this house is entitled to some proof. I have only a few moments left so I will let one of my colleagues deal with this phase of the matter when I have finished. The minister is primarily responsible for the present uncertainties, insecurity and lack of confidence he has caused to develop because of the issue of unification.

As I said before, the minister will be responsible for the ridicule that will be directed at us when other nations realize that unification is a myth that existed only in the minister's mind. I doubt that it does exist in the minister's mind because I do not think he knows what he is talking about. One writer, after reading the minister's speech, said:

> Many of Mr. Hellyer's arguments in support of unification have an improvised air about them, as though he had dreamed up unification first and then devised the evidence in support of it afterward.

I would say there is no evidence that he has devised the evidence in support of unification. At least, it is not on record and he has not told us what the evidence is. He certainly did not tell us in that ambiguous speech in which he said yes and no at the same time. Again I say that perhaps that speech was made so that when he attains a higher office or aspires to a higher office he can say to one audience, "I said no there and I will read it to you," and to another audience in another part of the country he can say, "I said yes here in the same speech." If that is not political expediency, I do not know what is.

Mr. Churchill: It is worse than that.

Mr. McIntosh: I submit that there is no evidence to support the minister's dream. Regardless of any explanation now put forward by the minister, the fact still remains that the term "unification" as used by the minister in his press releases could only mean extreme integration. I do not want to be unfair to the minister. I am sure all hon. members in this party will agree to a certain amount of integration. Those of us who have served in the forces of our country know that this has been taking effect ever since world war II, perhaps too slowly. If we were in the minister's position we would be able to realize that and speed it up if possible. We would have no quarrel with a program such as that; in fact, we would give the minister kudos for such an attempt.

An hon. Member: I would not go that far.

Mr. McIntosh: I should now like to say a few words in relation to what the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Forrestall) said last night about a single chief of staff, a single committee, and so on. I do not want to repeat what I said on two previous occasions in this house. The first time I mentioned this matter was in May of 1963, and I dealt with it again just a couple of months ago. At that time I referred to the danger of having a single chief of staff. I agree wholeheartedly with the hon. member for Halifax that there is a danger here. All the minister has to do to realize this is refer to history and find out what happened in the United Kingdom forces when the government attempted to instal a single chief of staff over their forces. They did not continue that policy. We know what happened in Germany as a result of a similar experiment. I think the minister should be very careful because of his nature, and he should know this, that he does not gather around him "yes" men or people who will agree with him. That is not what the minister needs. I do not know whether the people sitting in the gallery are there because they are "yes" men or not, but I would suggest that if they want to serve their country well they should tell the minister the truth.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order. My understanding of the practice of the House of Commons is that visitors are allowed in the gallery and are welcome there but they are not permitted to bring in with them various articles such as papers, books or things of that nature. If undesirable people are in the gallery an hon. member may rise and declare to the Speaker, "I spy strangers." I do not want to do that on this occasion because there are some people here who are earnestly endeavouring to gain some knowledge of this debate. But I would ask Your Honour to discover whether the group of people sitting behind the press gallery are authorized members of the press gallery and therefore entitled to have books and papers with them or whether they are visitors to the press gallery who are not entitled to be here laden with books, papers and goodness knows what.

I realize that in recent years we have had to take very much more stringent security precautions in the house. Is it now permissible for people behind the press gallery apparently to have rather voluminous documents in their possession? Are they just visitors to the gallery? Are they members of the press gallery and therefore authorized to be present and have papers with them, or what is their purpose? I would ask you, sir, to investigate.

Mr. Speaker: I, of course, cannot see who is behind me in the press gallery. However, I think I should point out to the hon. member that for some time now the row of seats immediately behind the press gallery has also been occupied by persons who would normally sit in the official gallery. In other words, the proliferation of officials attached to ministers' offices over the years has meant that the departmental officials occupy not only the official gallery but also the row of seats behind the press gallery.

I might mention to the hon. member that there is a dispute, if I may use the word, between the press gallery and others about whether that part of the public gallery has been assigned to the press gallery and whether they have authority over it. So far as the Speaker is concerned, the authority of the press gallery over that particular row of seats has never been confirmed. Therefore in the circumstances departmental officials have used these particular seats. I assume that is what is being done now, but this is only theorizing on my part because, as I mentioned at the outset, I have no way of knowing who is now occupying those seats. I presume that is the explanation of the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. In any event, I will look into the matter.

Mr. Churchill: I would just say, Mr. Speaker, that at this distance they do not look to me to be departmental officials and therefore I think they should be expelled from their position.

Mr. Speaker: I will look at them and see whether they look like departmental officials.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. D. W. Groos (Victoria (B.C.)): Mr. Speaker, the activities which have been generated by the bill now before the house were referred to in an article which I read the other day as being a collision between the minister and the admirals. I do not know about that but I recall reading recently an authoritative book about accidents at sea and I was amused to see on the front page a single anonymous quotation which might interest the house in connection with this debate. It read: "Collisions at sea should be avoided. They can spoil your whole day". Some aspects of the matter now being debated have spoiled not only my whole day but also my whole summer and my whole winter, and I hope we do not intend to let them spoil our whole spring.

I had planned to make my contribution to this debate in the usual form and I had prepared a number of quotations from famous men showing how right the government is in introducing its unification legislation. However, on reading what has already been said in the newspapers and magazines and in the lengthy debate on interim supply, and having listened to the debate yesterday and today, I have come to the conclusion that this would be pointless now because it is evident to me that little that is new can be added to what has already been said somewhere.

[Mr. Speaker.]

The battle lines in this debate have been drawn, and like Wellington before Waterloo we are going through the motions of a sort of parliamentary gavotte before we get down to the real business before us, which is of course the vote on second reading. It is the form of this political dance which bothers me, and it disturbs me to the point where I feel that I must unburden myself to the house for a few moments on this subject.

As every backbencher knows, a backbencher has plenty of scope for contemplation. In contemplating parliamentary work generally and this debate in particular I am struck by the way our excesses in the house come back to haunt and plague us all. Debates on matters as close to the heart as this one generate in many of us a heat which gives rise to exchanges across the floor and in the press that amount to nothing less than slander and are a form of character assassination which leaves grievous and lingering wounds. It seems to me that all of this serves but little the cause of parliament and the people's business.

The general excuse, and how often we have heard it, is to say, he did this or he said that when we were over there, meaning the other side of the house from wherever the speaker happens to be. I know I am not the first to say this but I hope I will be the last to have to say that this is ancient history and it matters not one bit to the great majority of us. It should be forgotten, dead and buried. In my view it is inexorably poisoning the atmosphere and killing our work in this house, work which somehow has to be done. I point the finger at no one because I could not do so if I tried. I suppose we are all guilty of at least encouraging or in any event condoning this kind of debate.

I feel that we are too inclined, in the security and isolation of this chamber and elsewhere, to try to impute motives, however subtly we do it in order to get past Your Honour's watchful eye, and too inclined to place in question the integrity of the opponents of our own point of view. We do this when surely the real point at issue in every case, as it is in this case, is one of judgment. Is the government right in its judgment in introducing this legislation on a unified force? Some say this and some say that, some say yes and some say no, but it is all a matter of judgment, and the questioning of motives and integrity has no place no matter how subtly it is done.

What possible excuse is there for harking back to the day—and I mean no pun here —when, for example, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) was minister of national defence, as has been done more than once in this house and elsewhere? Is it intended to prove that he was not a good minister? What is the point of that? Having used his name as an example, and it is only one example, I owe it to him to acknowledge to the house that from my personal knowledge, regardless of whatever has been said or implied in this house, the hon. member for Calgary North when he was minister in fact enjoyed the general respect of the officers and men of the armed forces for the job he was doing, and nothing can take that away from him. I venture to say again that, whatever is said or implied here, the same respect is generally shared today by the present minister.

If I can continue in somewhat the same vein for a moment, let me ask who would presume amongst us to question subtly the motives of that other westerner, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert)? Of course there is no need for me to labour on his behalf since he has earned his place in this house and in this debate many times over by his unique experience in the service of Canada both in peace and in war. Therefore it pains me to hear us resorting to excesses in debate both here and elsewhere, and I implore hon. members both inside and outside the house to use the restraint which a matter of this importance deserves. I know this is not going to be easy, and little wonder, because a matter such as the unification of the forces which deals with long established and honourable institutions and is surrounded with such indefinite but nevertheless very real factors such as tradition, esprit de corps, morale and so forth, tends to make ordinary human emotions explode. When one adds to this the undoubted fact that into this emotionally charged field one is thrusting servicemen and ex-servicemen who, God bless them, are not used to losing and who do not intend to start now, then one has the makings of a real knock-down and drag-out battle.

Is this really what will serve our nation best? I suggest that there comes a time, and that time is now close at hand, when we must decide whether in the excitement of the immediate battle and in the excesses of the moment we are not endangering the very thing which in the long run we all wish to preserve. I am sure hon. members will agree that this is now a very real dilemma. I venture to say that every hon. member here and every person who has taken sides outside the house wishes to see the armed forces of Canada continue strong, useful and, most important, in good heart. What each one of us has to decide for himself is whether by prolonging this debate we are helping to achieve these things, and I for one do not think we are. It does not take much imagination to see what the inevitable results of delay and uncertainty could be, and I say it is a tribute to the qualities of Canadian servicemen that, after all that has happened, morale, enlistments and re-enlistments are as high as they are, and from what I have been able to find out from my own sources they are not at all bad. As I see it, this debate is in danger of becoming a "yes it is, no it isn't" type of debate, if indeed it has not done so already.

Are we now engaged in a time-consuming exercise in futility which could drag on for weeks and weeks, and if so will not the innocent victims of parliament be the armed services? The uncertainty under which they labour has been with us, one way or another, for long enough. Thousands upon thousands of pages of written words are a matter of record, and hundreds of thousands of spoken words have been devoted to the subject.

• (4:20 p.m.)

To be realistic, there may still be some legitimate questions to be answered and this is to be expected when there is almost no precedent for what we are undertaking. Firm answers, in my opinion, too often represent immovable positions, and in stepping into almost the unknown as we are doing this would be dangerous indeed. However, to be realistic also, it can hardly be argued there is much hope now of changing anyone's point of view on this matter. We obviously differ amongst ourselves on the wisdom of the government's action in bringing this matter before parliament, but it can hardly be denied with any justice that it is their right to do so and to do so in the manner in which it has been done. The government has the responsibility and they have followed the procedure entrenched in 400 years of parliamentary practice, which is a pretty good tradition in itself if I may say so.

The government has put its life on the line to back up its judgment and its responsibility. This is not a threat, it is a fact of parliamentary life. This fact sometimes needs explaining, if not inside the house then outside it. I certainly have no quarrel, and I emphasize the word "quarrel", with those who oppose this bill. Let no one misunderstand the motives which have prompted the opposition. We have two genuine points of view and for the moment they appear to be irreconcilable. This situation is not new to parliament. Sooner or later we have to make a decision on this bill and then get on with the job at hand.

I have purposely refrained, Mr. Speaker, from entering into the subject of the debate because, as chairman of the defence committee, I feel it is my most important duty, if this bill ever does come before us, to help resolve the differences during the clause by clause study in committee. I have a duty to see to it, within that framework, that when the unification bill is returned to the house it contains all the essential safeguards necessary from the point of view of both the serviceman and the national interest. I have the duty to see that it reflects to the greatest degree possible a balance of the opinions and experience of the members of the committee.

I happen, of course, to support the government strongly on the principle of the bill, which is all that is before us now. This is a matter, as I have said, of personal judgment. For the reasons I have outlined, and in particular in the interests of the services, I urge the house to rise and shine, to use a service expression, and take a vote on this matter as quickly as possible. We should either get this bill approved in principle or get a new government. If the bill is approved, then our task is to get our heads together and, using all our intelligence, skill and experience but in particular all our good will, to do what is expected to us in committee by making this the best possible bill to meet our nation's needs.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): First of all, Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to congratulate the hon. member who has just resumed his seat upon the manner in which he made his speech, although I cannot agree with the content of it. I hope the minister was listening closely and will take the attitude of the hon. member as an example. I am sure if he did so he would expedite the passage of this bill through this house.

In so far as the major principle of the bill is concerned, I can do no better than to endorse heartily the excellent speech delivered by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) yesterday. Rather than repeat the remarks made by that hon. member, I think my time might be better spent in trying to give some advice to the minister, for whom I used to have a great deal of admiration. I had a great deal of sympathy with the alleged objectives of his integration bill as it was introduced in the house and publicized across the country.

I think back, Mr. Speaker, to the first time I saw the minister and that goes back some years now, long before I was a member of this house. I recall that at that time the minister was a very youthful, newly appointed associate minister of national defence. He was being heralded as the young, white hope of the Liberal party. He was particularly heralded because he was the first minister the Liberals had appointed from the city of Toronto in many years. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, there was no lack of qualified members from that particular region. I recall a very distinguished member of the other place who was a Liberal member in this house for a number of years. Almost everyone in Ontario wondered why he was not chosen to fill a cabinet post. Possibly the major reason was the fact he was a little hard to handle. I recall that when he was a cabinet minister in the Ontario government they tried to push him around so he promptly resigned his cabinet post. The federal Liberals did not want the same thing to occur again. Finally they decided that the best thing to do was to try to bury him in the other place. This move was not really successful because today he is one of the most vociferous and hardest working members of that chamber.

I recall having breakfast on many occasions with the present minister back in the days when he was a member of the opposition. I remember the many discussions we had at that time. I must say that the first impression I had of the minister continued for some time. I recall the night he was called in as a last minute replacement for a guest speaker and created a tremendous impression. After all, he was young, he had stature and good looks and he did make a very good impression.

I believe this impression started to fade at the time we attended the NATO conference. I thought at that time that the minister, then a member of the opposition, made use of his position for purely partisan purposes and did not really play the game the way one might expect. Of course, the reason is easily understood. The minister was ambitious. Now his ambition has been partially fulfilled at least by his appointment as Minister of National Defence. I might say that at the time he embarked on the program of integration, which has somehow become unification, he had almost universal support. He had the support of the armed forces, the general public and the members of this house. I think everyone realized, certainly anyone who had been a member of the armed forces or who was interested in the minister's proposals, that waste and duplication were rampant in the armed forces. Everyone supported the idea of trying to achieve a little more efficiency in the services in order that the Canadian people could receive a little more value for their defence dollars.

The minister, Mr. Speaker, having had this great and wonderful opportunity, has muffed it. Somehow he has lost the good will that he had when he first made these proposals. He has lost the good will of the forces, he has lost the good will of the public and certainly he has lost the good will of the members of this house.

I think the reasons for his loss of good will in this house are quite obvious. We saw another example today during the question period. The minister seems to be completely unable to resist any opportunity to display arrogance and rudeness. The minister has been a member of the house long enough to know that this is not the way to get the co-operation of other hon. members. That is not the way for a minister to get his legislation through. Regardless of how great the temptation or how much his ire may be aroused, the minister's attitude is not the way to accomplish things. The minister's whole attitude in the debate on this issue reminds me of nothing more than a frustrated corporal who, because of the death of some grandparent, has inherited the office of commander in chief and ever since has behaved like a bull in a china shop, seeming to love the sound of breaking glass.

There are some people who say—I do not know whether this is true—that the prime motivation for this attitude is to try to show the Canadian people that, contrary to the present leader of the Liberal party, the minister is a man of strength and determination. Anybody who has started out on a project of this kind with the complete support of everyone but winds up without the support of anyone would make a very good leader of the Liberal party.

The reason the minister is losing the support of the armed forces is again, I think, quite easy to understand. I have with me an example, a letter received from a member of the armed forces serving in the Gaza Strip. I should like to read two paragraphs. He says:

> I do not see why the single man must pay for rations that are supplied from world powers. We do not receive any Canadian rations here and Canada only subsidizes an 8-cent grant per man. I'm willing to pay $2.40 per month but not $35 per month.
> If you can answer this question it would be appreciated and if Canada wants us to pay $35 a month let them send us good Canadian rations for a change. The food here is not worth $35 a month.

That is one of the reasons that the armed forces are becoming so fed up with the present minister. Another major reason for the minister's loss of the support of the forces is the confusion which is being caused throughout the armed forces as well as throughout the country. This confusion is rampant. For example, I have before me a few newspaper clippings dealing with the recent well-publicized pay raise given to the members of the armed forces, and they are quite interesting. On September 24 there was a story by Neville Hamilton of the Journal headlined "Armed Forces Pay Bonanza May Reach 30 Per Cent". Three days later, in the Ottawa Journal for September 27, there was a headline reading: "Forces' Boost 14 Per Cent". On the same day the headline of a story by John Walker in another newspaper was: "Forces' Boost Cut —Now 10 Per Cent". Two days later the following headlines appeared in two newspapers both printed in the same city. First, a story by Norman Campbell was headlined: "14 Per Cent Average. Forces Pay Increase Puts Stress On Skill". Second, a story by Dick Jackson was headlined: "Increases Average 10 Per Cent. New Pay Deal For Forces".

I do not believe that there is a conspiracy afoot among newspapermen to try to confuse the Canadian public. I think that these newspaper reporters were trying very hard to do an adequate job. I believe that they, like the house, the armed forces, the minister and all his officials, are completely confused about this whole situation. No one seems to know where he is going, what he is doing, what he can look forward to, what to expect, or anything else.

I have talked to ex-servicemen recently returned from Germany who told me that six months prior to their return they had every intention of signing on for another five years but that because of the confusion brought about in the forces over the past six months they cannot wait to get out of uniform. This they did as promptly as they could and returned to civvy street. If it were possible for all members of the armed forces to get out of the services today, we would find the services completely depleted almost overnight. However, there is a beautiful little scheme to prevent this. I am told by servicemen—I have letters in my office to back this up—that if a member of the armed forces wants to get out of the services he must first of all have a job to go to and, second, he must give six months' notice. In other words, proof must be provided to the authorities that somebody will hold open a job for him for six months. In my opinion that is the only reason that the armed forces today are not so depleted that there would not be enough men to defend Parliament Hill against an invasion from Hull.

I suggest to the minister that the best thing he can do is to take a good lesson from the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Groos) and as long as this debate continues govern himself as did the hon. member. I think the hon. member for Victoria has rendered a very good service and I am very pleased that he is chairman of the standing committee. I hope he can maintain the calm and restraint that he showed today, and most of all I hope he can pass on some of his calm and restraint to the minister.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the most important issue in this debate is whether or not the present legislation, which we are told is designed to unify our armed forces, really indicates an important shift in our foreign and defence policies and, if it does, whether this shift in our foreign and defence policies is desirable. To date the government and, indeed, various organizations have dragged in a number of red herrings, so to speak, which have thoroughly confused the real issues involved. There are many, many questions concerning this legislation which have been left unanswered by the government, and how the government can have the effrontery to ask parliament to approve this legislation in principle before those questions are answered, or the details have been clarified, is hard to understand.

In my opinion the subject matter of this bill should go before a joint meeting of the defence committee and the external affairs committee so that the details of the bill and the government's long-range defence plan can be clarified. Only then could approval in principle be given or withheld by this house. The government and the minister have been vague and ambiguous with regard to many aspects of this bill but it does appear, despite all the confusion, that the following are to be essential elements of the measure.

First, it is the intention of the government to set up a single service which will be outfitted in one kind of uniform the design of which has apparently not yet been chosen and that all designations of rank will be an agglomeration of those now used in the existing services. It also appears that the government intends to do this over a number of years, perhaps over three or four years.

Second, it would appear that the new service will be extremely mobile and well armed. To this extent it will probably be very efficient. It will resemble a kind of marine corps or possibly, as somebody put it, a modified police force. I suppose it will rather resemble a marine corps.

Third, it appears that the air force and the navy will eventually be relegated largely to transport and support roles. These three considerations seem to emerge from the morass of information which has been handed out. As has already been pointed out this afternoon, the minister's public relations men are already organized upstairs, passing out information on this program to the press gallery. It is difficult for members of this house to compete with such a formidable tribe because they probably have easier access to the press than do most of us. However, I rely on the judgment of the members of the press gallery to pay some attention eventually to the arguments put forward in this house as well as to those handed out to them by the minister's public relations staff. Incidentally, I would say that the members of this staff have been very efficient. I compliment them because they have been able to "sell" the public on the proposition that this new, unified force will be economic, efficient, and somehow up to date in this modern world.

So far as economy is concerned, that is a matter of evidence, a matter of fact. There has been plenty of evidence so far to raise doubt whether this new force will be economical. I think these facts could be brought out very well when the bill goes to committee. For that purpose, and for that purpose alone, I see no objection to the bill going to committee after second reading. But approval of such a procedure ends there.

The second aspect which the minister and his cohorts have "sold" to the public is the claim of greater efficiency. Perhaps this new force will indeed be efficient. But efficient for what purpose? That is the big question, the really important question. One naturally asks: can a hybrid force of this kind effectively integrate with the forces of our allies under our collective defence agreements such as NATO and NORAD? Our allies have no unified forces of the kind proposed for Canada at the present time; they have the conventional three services.

It is difficult for any of the military men with whom I have discussed this subject to understand how a hybrid force such as is contemplated by this legislation could successfully be integrated into the more specialized forces of our allies. As someone put it, it would be like trying to mix oil and water. Close co-operation in future with our NATO and NORAD allies would certainly be very difficult, if not impossible.

Another question which arises is this: what about the role of the navy with respect to NATO? As I understand from the information which has been given to me, our naval forces have certain responsibilities to carry out in respect of NATO, namely, anti-submarine work. It is also my understanding, though the minister has denied this from time to time, that our naval forces are at present not fulfilling the commitments which have been undertaken.

Mr. Hellyer: That is not so.

Mr. Nesbitt: The minister says no. He has said it on other occasions. But it is difficult to understand how this can be so when some of our ships are apparently not sufficiently manned to go to sea. The minister himself told us a year or so ago that there were plans to build additional ships to fulfil our anti-submarine role, but these vessels have not as yet been laid down.

It would seem to me, from information which is public knowledge, that one of the main dangers to NATO and to this continent is the increase in the number of nuclear-powered rocket firing submarines operated by the Soviet Union. While at the moment there is a detente between the Soviet countries and the NATO powers, there is no assurance that such a state of affairs will continue indefinitely and one must always take into account the weapons which any hostile power or powers might have. If the numbers of nuclear-powered submarines are increasing, it would appear to me that our navy should be given an increasing role rather than a decreasing one in this regard.

As both the minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) have stated on other occasions, defence policy really depends on foreign policy or, to put it another way, defence policy is really a part of foreign policy. What is our present defence policy? As I understand it, for a good many years our defence policy has been in this priority: first, to preserve the security and sovereignty of Canada; second, to play an active part in collective defence agreements such as NATO and NORAD. These two items are closely related, especially in regard to our link with the United States known as NORAD. The third objective is to participate in United Nations peace-keeping activities. These seem to be the three bases of our defence policy, and that is the priority given to them.

But there would now appear to be patent evidence that the proposed new force cannot fulfil adequately, if indeed at all, the first two priorities I have mentioned, namely, the immediate protection of Canada and active participation in collective agreements such as NATO and NORAD. There is, as I have mentioned, the difficulty of integrating a hybrid force such as is proposed by this legislation with the three specialized services of our allies, and there is the factor of the steadily declining role which seems to be laid out for the navy. It would now seem that the purpose is to place the third priority, United Nations peace-keeping operations, in first place, and there appears to be plenty of evidence to corroborate this very natural conclusion.

The Ottawa Citizen, a newspaper that normally speaks on behalf of the government, carried a lead editorial on Canada's defence program in its issue of November 5, 1966, which has already been referred to by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness). I quote from that editorial:

> The evident strategic doctrine contemplated by the government is to set up a mobile force of land, sea and air services that could be moved quickly to any part of the world to undertake either a U.N. peace-keeping obligation, or to help fight a brush-fire war on NATO's behalf. This would require the country's air and naval units to play largely a support role for the army, rather than the semi-independent part they once took. The air force appears to have come to terms with this doctrine. The navy has not.

From what I have seen over the years the Ottawa Citizen, and certainly its editor, seem to be very close to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and the government, and when it comes out with this allegation I think most reasonable people would be inclined to pay pretty close attention to it.

Another piece of corroborative evidence is that at the United Nations last fall, Canada's largest and principal project was a peacekeeping resolution which it introduced in the General Assembly. I have a copy of that resolution here. It is rather long, Mr. Speaker, and I would request that it be placed in the record of today's proceedings as an appendix to Hansard. As I say, it is a resolution which was presented by the government of Canada to the United Nations General Assembly last fall.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Does the house give unanimous consent to have this resolution printed as an appendix to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of resolution referred to above see appendix.]

Mr. Nesbitt: The Secretary of State for External Affairs had the responsibility for this resolution, which was a very good one. In general terms it laid down guidelines as to how the United Nations could provide funds and troops at the request of the Secretary General. The Secretary of State for External Affairs and his departmental officials should be commended for it. However, at the United Nations we found that for a good many reasons peacekeeping is not in vogue any more, and this commendable resolution put forward by Canada was badly defeated.

Although we expected the Soviet Union and her allies to oppose it, much to the surpise of some of us we found that the following countries, many of them members of the Commonwealth, did not support the resolution: France, Australia, Brazil, Burma, Ceylon, Ghana, Iceland, India, Ireland, Jamaica, Kenya, Malaysia, Mexico, the Netherlands, the Philippines, Singapore, Trinidad and Tobago, Tanzania and Zambia. When our close friends, plus a great many other countries, did not support our resolution the conclusion is that peacekeeping is not at all popular at present in the United Nations.

If it is the intention to provide an integrated force mainly for peace-keeping operations we should be very careful of what the United Nations is thinking because, as suggested by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) during the question period some time ago, we might have the force "all dressed up and no place to go". I am sorry that peacekeeping operations are by no means popular at the United Nations at present but the facts of life, unpleasant as they may be, are the facts of life.

As further corroborative evidence I would point out that from time to time many of us receive information from what the gentlemen of the press refer to as "reliable sources". People tell things to those of us who have been around here for a while, and the information which I have received from various sources and in various places is that the government's plan for a single service is to make it available for United Nations peace-keeping operations and perhaps occasionally for specific NATO purposes. I might add that two members of the goverment party have quite frankly said that this is the government's intention.

This suggestion was put forward by myself during the debate on December 7, and also by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), the spokesman for this party on defence and vice chairman of the parliamentary defence committee. We have posed these questions to the minister on other occasions and there has been no reply to our suggestions.

Mr. Hellyer: That is not true. They were categorically denied.

Mr. Nesbitt: I would like to know just when they were denied?

Mr. Hellyer: The last time you raised them.

Mr. Nesbitt: The minister, as usual, makes a vague remark. Perhaps when he is answering he will deny these things. He has not denied them to date. They were brought up the other day right after the minister spoke. The hon. member for Edmonton West again raised these points. I do not know when they were denied. They certainly have not been denied in this house nor have I seen any reports that they have been denied outside the house.

I do not wish to create the impression that members of this party are opposed to peacekeeping operations by the United Nations. Far from it. We are certainly most in favour of this sort of operation but we are not in favour of putting all our eggs in one basket, having all our armed forces designed for one purpose, to serve the United Nations and possibly help NATO fight brush-fire wars. I think the United Nations should be the third priority. The defence of this country and this continent should be the first two priorities.

If the government's intention is as I have outlined, I would like to hear the minister speak on that point when he replies because there is some logic and merit in the apparent position taken by the government. It is argued that Canada cannot defend her huge area and enormous coast line all by herself, that we must rely on the United States to help us and, therefore, that it is better and more efficient for the United States to do this by herself. Then Canada could carry its share of the burden of keeping peace in the world by providing forces for United Nations peace-keeping emergency operations and also take a part in fighting "brush-fire" type wars on behalf of NATO.

As I have indicated already, I have no doubt that this new force could perform this function very efficiently. There is some logic in the position of the government in this regard. There are, however, certain arguments against such a proposal. Perhaps I might enumerate these. First of all, if the defence of the continent of North America is almost completely turned over to the United States, then the United States for her own protection and for the protection of the continent eventually must take over and use the military installations in Canada. In addition, the United States would probably find it was necessary to set up new installations in Canada. In view of the present increasing Canadian nationalism I would doubt very much that such a proposition would be acceptable to the Canadian people. As was suggested to me the other day, I hardly think it would be very acceptable if United States troops were quartered in the citadel at Quebec. That is just one example.

There is no one in this house who is any more a friend of the United States than I am. I believe it is all very well to have close alliances with friends, but once one starts turning over his household to them there can be only one result. In this case it would only encourage anti-American feeling in Canada even more than the C.B.C. is doing at the present time. I do not think this is at all desirable. If a situation were to develop in which United States troops of different types were quartered in Canada, then foreign countries could only assume under these conditions that Canada was little more than a military province of the United States. Should Canada be regarded as merely a military province of the United States, would our troops then be acceptable by the United Nations? I think they would not.

In the United Nations peace-keeping operations it recently has been the practice that the major powers such as the United States and the Soviet Union do not provide forces nor do their immediate close allies. Were Canada to be placed in such a position, I do not think our troops would be accepted by the United Nations. They could not be used. Then what function would they perform?

The third objection, to which I have alluded already, is that at the present time the United Nations is not disposed to undertake peace-keeping operations. This may change in the future, and I hope it does, but at the present time the United Nations is not disposed to undertake peace-keeping operations because of the many internal difficulties it has had in this regard. I shall not take the time of the house to enumerate these. Those members who are interested in this matter already know the reasons.

It is alleged that we have a faint voice in Washington, but if we should leave the defence of the continent entirely to the United States then under such conditions we would have no voice at all. At the present time we have a very good position internationally. However, there are a number of serious questions concerning matters which ultimately could seriously affect our sovereignty and position internationally. The government has not yet answered any of these questions. A few moments ago the minister stated that it has. I do not know where these answers are. I hope the minister will clarify this situation so that there will be no misunderstanding.

Is it the intention of the government to provide a single unified service, sort of a hybrid force, just for the purpose of U. N. peace-keeping operations or to take part in certain brush-fire wars on behalf of NATO? It seems to me that this is the case. There is a good deal of evidence to back this up, including private observations made by members on the government side of the house. If this is a fact, then the minister should tell us. If it is not a fact, he should deny it specifically right down the line, because I think this is the most important issue in this debate.

Matters such as economies, uniforms, what happens in respect of the various units and so on, of course are important, but the really important thing is how our foreign policy may be changed as a result of this program. The minister, in a sense, is in a awkward position in a debate of this kind because he cannot answer until the debate is wound up. However, I suggest to the minister, and I hope he will seriously consider the suggestion, that the subject matter of this legislation be sent to a joint meeting of the committees on national defence and external affairs so that we will have an opportunity to ask some questions of the Secretary of State for External Affairs as well as the Minister of National Defence, because these matters affect our whole foreign policy in the future and our relations with the United States, the United Nations and other countries. I believe these are matters which must be clarified before we are expected to vote on the principle of this bill. If the minister will not allow the subject matter of this question to be sent to either of these committees, then I would hope that he would give very complete and, for once, unequivocable answers to all these questions which have been brought up from time to time. He has not done so to date but I hope he will before we are asked to vote on this bill.

Mr. Jim McNulty (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, in considering the question of unification of the Canadian armed forces, I think it would be interesting to hear the words of a distinguished Canadian soldier, General Charles Foulkes, C.B., C.B.E., D.S.O. As hon. members are aware, General Foulkes gave distinguished service to his country for more than 34 years. He held senior military posts in the Canadian armed forces. He served as chairman of the chiefs of staff committee for over nine years. I should like to read the following article by General Foulkes entitled "Our Defence Dollar Is Being Wasted" which appeared in the Toronto Star Weekly magazine of October 14, 1961. The article reads as follows:

Drastic changes are needed in the organization of the Canadian defence forces. This year's regular defence budget—without the additions promised in the present session of parliament—came to $1.6 billion for a total strength of 120,000 men. About three-quarters of it is needed for pay, maintenance and operation, leaving only $400 million for new equipment, although effective defence depends more and more on highly complex and expensive weapons. We are well on the way, as one commentator remarked, to having "the best dressed, best paid and poorest equipped forces in the world". Unless we can devise a new approach we shall find ourselves spending more and more money on less and less effective forces.

I am not one of those people who think we can find an easy and painless way out by trying to be neutral or putting all our forces under the United Nations or even by refusing all atomic weapons. Nor do I agree that our forces don't provide any protection. They help to provide the only protection there can be—which is to prevent nuclear war by making it far too dangerous for an aggressor to start one. I think Canada must go on contributing what it can to the "nuclear deterrent" of the free western world. I think we must also go on supporting United Nations efforts—however haphazard—to police the world's trouble spots. The question is whether we can reshape our defence forces so that they can perform these tasks more efficiently.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Can we eliminate the waste and duplication and futility which taxpayers properly complain of? Can we reorganize the navy, army and air force so that they will give the Canadian people value for money and make a better contribution toward preserving peace?

I think we can. With the money we are now spending, I think the forces could be reorganized so as to meet all the major aims of Canadian policy. The first thing to do is to abolish the Canadian navy, army and air force and unite them all into one single Canadian Armed Service, and that is the name I'd use. Their functions already overlap. The army and navy want to fly; the air force already dreads being relegated to underground burrows dusting off automatic missiles.

Instead of keeping a separate air division and army brigade group as part of NATO's European shield, we should have a single Canadian task force. Instead of our scratch collection of ships and aircraft patrolling the oceans—some under the R.C.N. and some under the R.C.A.F. with joint committees trying to control them—we need a single maritime task force. Instead of having the R.C.A.F. clinging to its aircraft as the cavalry used to cling to its horses, while the army conducts survival operations, we need a single task force for continental defence.

After my nine years as chairman of the chiefs of staff, trying to co-ordinate the rival services, I am convinced that we can't achieve much more by the present road. Attempts to integrate the three services by persuasion have been going on ever since 1945. They have woven a huge spider's web of committees, which are rather like foreign ministers' meetings where rival powers try to reach a compromise. Some of the branches, like medical services and chaplains, have actually been amalgamated. But there was no economy in these amalgamations. When former defence minister George Pearkes pushed through a merger of chaplain services, he ended up with two more chaplains on brigadier's salary.

The problem can only be solved by complete unification of the three services, with one chief of staff, one chain of command, one ladder of promotion and one uniform.

I'm thinking, among other things, of the young men who are now in the services or may contemplate joining them. We must realize that these are professionals. Both officers and other ranks look to the services as providing a career. They can't be hired and fired at will as defence requirements may change. But so long as we insist on keeping them in three separate channels, which never meet except to argue on committees, we are crippling their chances for promotion and greatly reducing the career prospects we should be able to offer them.

In 1958 we had to disband the anti-aircraft artillery regiment. Its role was finished. The regiment included many technicians with tradesmen's skills in radar and electronics who had several years' service ahead of them before they went on pension. The air force was busy at the same time recruiting people to man its new radar stations: It took them in green and trained them. Air Marshal Hugh Campbell, chief of the air staff, fully agreed with Lieutenant General Finn Clark, chief of the general staff, that the surplus army men, who had been trained in the same skills, should be taken into the air force jobs. The "brass" pushed the idea, but it still foundered on the basic rivalries and vested interests of the different services.

I can see the same thing happening in the near future to hundreds of skilled men in the R.C.A.F., unless the services are unified in time. The Canadian air division in Europe has 12 squadrons flying F86's and CF100's, which are now becoming obsolescent. They were designed to intercept enemy bombers. Eight of these R.C.A.F. squadrons in NATO are to be re-equipped during the next two years with the Lockhead Starfighter, known as the F104G, which is now being built by Canadair Ltd. and numerous Canadian subcontractors. The new plane is called a "strike fighter" and it is designed to help ground troops by carrying a small atomic bomb to drop on enemy concentrations. It looks as though the R.C.A.F.'s switch to this new role in NATO will leave at least one-third of the pilots and ground crews of the present air division without a job.

At the same time both the navy and the army need men of just these skills. They are now advertising for new recruits whom they will have to train. Will they save the expense of training and absorb the R.C.A.F. men who already have the necessary skills? Not on the present basis, because it would upset their ladder of seniority.

The set-up of navy, army and air force is really a hangover from the two world wars. It was spiced up to meet the demands of NATO and Korea, but it's still basically a miniature model of the old British forces. This always meant keeping enough "brass" and pen-pushing "office wallahs" to look after four or five times as many active troops as Canada had. They were supposed to be ready with paper plans to mobilize the reserves and auxiliaries after war started. But today's strategy leaves no place for reserves and wartime mobilization. We are no longer trying to win the last battle. Our only object is to prevent war starting by making aggression too dangerous. The only troops which can contribute to this deterrent are those already trained, equipped and in position.

As it is now, navy, army and air force each has a separate establishment and each has different methods of administering it. Their manpower ceilings, laid down by the government, stand at 20,000 for the navy and 50,000 each for the army and air force. Naturally each tries to get as many men as it can into the higher ranks. When I was chairman of the chiefs of staff, we tried to rationalize the ranks through a three-man committee consisting of myself, the Deputy Minister of National Defence (C. M. Drury first, then Frank Miller, who succeeded me as C.C.O.S.), and the Secretary of the Treasury Board (originally R. B. Bryce, who has now gone on to be Secretary of the Cabinet). The one thing we learned was that the three services were organized so differently that we couldn't impose a single standard of rank requirements.

I consider that this is very unfair to the men in the services. There should be a single list for all promotions, appointments and retirements. Men should be posted to the various task forces according to their training, experience and seniority regardless of the colour of their uniform.

Although we can't turn over our whole forces to the United Nations—which doesn't want them, anyway—we ought to be able to go on providing contingents suitable for police duties as we did in Egypt and the Congo. But it shouldn't be as difficult to pick out the appropriate tradesmen as it was when the Congo force was being assembled last year.

You may ask why no one has tried to cut down the "brass" and unify the three services long ago. The answer is that we did. The late Brooke Claxton was made Minister of National Defence in 1946 with precisely this object. Until then there had been separate ministers and departments for each service. Brooke Claxton made a good start. The civilian side of the administration was unified under one Deputy Minister. "Bud" Drury, a former Brigadier, and later Frank Miller, an Air Marshal who went back into civies for the job, did all they could. The chiefs of staff were lumped together in one building around the one minister. Innumerable inter-service committees were set up. It seemed that one single Canadian armed service was about to be born at any time.

Then suddenly it was all dropped. I can't be sure why the idea of a single service vanished so suddenly, but the story at the time was that Mackenzie King had persuaded Claxton to become Minister of National Defence by promising him that he could move to another department as soon as he had "banged the heads" of the three services together and unified our defence effort. This promise gave him a chance to be quite ruthless in overruling inter-service jealousies and cutting out duplication. He got as far as amalgamating the civilian administration. Then, the story goes, Mackenzie King was so pleased with this success that he told Claxton to stay in national defence and continue the good work. Whether that's the reason or not, the attempt to unify the three services came to a grinding halt and we were left with innumerable, ineffective inter-service committees on every conceivable subject.

Let me quote one example of the way overzealous service loyalty at an earlier stage resisted common sense attempts at uniformity and economy. When the war ended, Dr. C. J. Mackenzie, president of the National Research Council, wanted to give up the military research which N.R.C. had been doing during the war, and asked the chiefs of staff to take it over. The army staff had prepared a plan, at my direction, to centralize all military resaerch for the three services in one research organization. It was bitterly opposed by the air force, which insisted on keeping sole control of all military air research. The chief of the air staff, Air Marshal Leckie, happened to be chairman of the chiefs of staff committee at that time and we made no progress. Finally I put the problem to my minister, then Douglas Abbott; and he put it to C. D. Howe. The air force, which still had a separate minister, Colin Gibson, got his support, and it took a cabinet level decision to overrule the air force and establish the Defence Research Board.

Brooke Claxton's new organization—more or less integrated on the civilian side with committee government on the service side—barely survived the challenges of 1950 and 1951, when we had to raise the special force for Korea and make our contribution to NATO in Europe and the North Atlantic. I was still C.G.S., with responsibility for raising and training the new army brigades. I had also become chariman of the chiefs of staff, which meant frequent visits to Washington, London and Paris for discussions with our allies. There was so much work involved in this first effort to establish a collective defence alliance in peacetime that the government decided to appoint a permanent chairman, chiefs of staff. This relieved me of responsibility for the army and Lieutenant General Guy Simonds became C.G.S. But it didn't give me any direct authority over the chiefs of staff. They remained directly responsible to the minister, Mr. Claxton. I was expected to rely on my powers of persuasion to "co-ordinate" the services.

This led almost immediately to a critical dispute about the stationing of our army brigade group in Germany. We easily reached agreement that our air division in Europe should be stationed in the U.S. zone and supplied by the U.S. supply system. But General Simonds insisted that the army brigade group should be stationed with the British forces and get its supplies through them. All the rest of us in the chiefs of staff committee believed that the brigade should be near the R.C.A.F. contingents and that they should both be supplied through U.S. channels. This would have been more reliable and certainly more economical. But General Simonds took his stand on tradition and sentiment, and his plan was adopted.

General Simonds insisted on going to negotiate himself with the war office in London. He got an assurance of British support, but there was no written agreement of it and no details were spelled out. Within a few years the U.K.'s financial troubles and shortage of manpower landed us all in difficulties. Its supply system fell below NATO standards; the brigade group was affected; NATO authorities asked Canada to augment the inadequate British supply system. In short, the arrangement never was satisfactory: It still leads to friction and uncertainty. But it just shows what can happen when one service is allowed to follow its own desires instead of doing what is best for the overall defence effort.

We need one single armed service, under one supreme chief of staff, in one uniform. We need to organize our armed forces in the form of task forces designed for their particular jobs—at home or off the coasts or in Europe or with the United Nations. They should each be given the strength they need for their particular job at a given time. They would have no fixed establishment with rigid ladders of promotion, as the three services have now. They would all come under one system of administration. By this means—and only by this means. I believe—the taxpayers' legitimate complaints of extravagance, duplication and waste can be removed and Canada can start to get real value for its defence budget.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McNulty: Certainly.

Mr. Dinsdale: I wonder whether the hon. member has read the most recent statement of General Foulkes on the question of unification, which appeared last year in the Ottawa Journal under the heading, "General Foulkes asks where integration went wrong." He seems to have changed his mind considerably since that 1961 article.

[Mr. McNulty.]

Mr. McNulty: I did read that article, and I think the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) and myself would be very pleased to have General Foulkes as the first witness before the defence committee as soon as we can get this bill through the house and into the committee.

An hon. Member: No, we want the minister first.

Mr. McNulty: Members of the house have discussed at some length this particular issue in regard to our national defence policy. During the interim supply debate from October 31 to November 15, 1966, there were 204,641 words spoken and recorded on 241 pages of Hansard. Certainly this is not a surprise measure. The government announcement to reorganize the Canadian armed forces was made on March 20, 1964. I quote from page 19 of the white paper on defence:

Following the most careful and thoughtful consideration, the government has decided that there is only one adequate solution. It is the integration of the armed forces of Canada under a single chief of defence staff and a single defence staff. This will be the first step toward a single unified defence force for Canada.

That passage in the white paper has been quoted before. Members of parliament have thoroughly discussed this subject and the special and standing committees on defence have had 81 meetings, where in 2,300 pages of committee evidence were recorded the thoughts, advice, reports and criticism of 103 witnesses, retired and serving officers, civilians, and so on. The Minister of National Defence has been accused of not giving sufficient information to the house regarding unification. The facts refute this accusation. The minister of National Defence or the associate minister appeared before the committee on 63 occasions. The minister himself answered 857 questions.

Mr. Churchill: How many dealt with unification?

Mr. McNulty: More information on defence has been provided to parliament through committees in the past three years than at any other time in the history of Canada. I appeal to all members of the house to give this bill second reading and move it into the defence committee where we can hear expert witnesses, some against and some for unification of the armed forces, where we may question, probe and seek the advice of top military and civilian personnel.

If hon. members will give Bill C-243 second reading and allow the defence committee to study it in depth, clause by clause, and come to conclusions in a democratic manner, parliament and Canada will benefit greatly. Let us hear these specialists in military matters who have been quoted from both sides of the house where their words will have meaning, before the standing committee on national defence.

Mr. Terence Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to be following the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. McNulty) in this debate and I hope the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) (Mr. Groos) is still in the house because I would like to make a comment or two about his contribution to the debate. I thought the question asked of the hon. member for Lincoln put most of his speech into focus. He quoted at great length from General Foulkes' opinion of several years ago, but his answer indicated that he realizes that the general has now changed his opinion. But this did not stop the typical Liberal approach of putting on the record what they hope they may find useful and quoting someone whether or not the quotation is reliable.

I thought the suggestion the hon. member put forward was so much like the attitude of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer): Let us get this bill out of the house and into committee so we can get at the facts and allay everybody's fears. It was very nicely put by the hon. member. But, of course, he did not bother to mention that since the question to be decided is the principle of unification, once the vote is taken the house has decided on the question and therefore there is no right for the committee to call evidence as to the principle of unification. It would then be useless to go to the committee to get answers to all these questions.

Of course, all this has been said before in the house. The same objections have been taken and we have received the same bland assurances. The frustrating part of it is that the minister can sit there very contented that he has been successful in the snow job he has been doing on the Canadian people as to what is at issue in this defence debate. Frankly, the situation is that this house is demanding information and the minister says: Ha, ha; I do not have to give you any and I am getting away with it.

There was an article in the Globe and Mail this morning on the same subject as the objection raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) with regard to the activities behind the press gallery. The minister has his high-priced and very successful hucksters up there riding herd on every word said. They are making sure that if anything embarrassing to the minister is said in the house they can descend on the press gallery and divert the attention of its members should they show any signs of thinking seriously about something which may be objectionable to the minister. His minions disseminate with the greatest vigour what the minister would like said about him and what will enhance his image.

Our principal objection to unification, our principal complaint, is that for the first time in Canada's history there is only one important element in the mind of the defence minister, namely, to sell his own image and to gain the political benefits which can be obtained from building himself up. I suggest that the minister is playing fast and loose with the security of Canada and with millions and millions of the taxpayers' dollars. His prime purpose is to ensure his own greatness.

I was amazed to hear the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) (Mr. Groos), who is chairman of the defence committee, compliment the minister on the way in which he has presented the bill to the house. As a matter of fact I was shocked. The chairman of the defence committee was aware before anyone else in the house of the minister's methods to ensure that parliament would grant the funds for his program. The chairman of the defence committee was aware, before I was or anyone else on this side of the house, of the fact that the minister had tampered with the evidence before that committee. The hon. member for Victoria, B.C., said that the minister had acted in the same democratic manner which has been followed for 400 years. What nonsense. This is the first time that parliament has ever been so affronted by any minister of the crown. It is the first time that a member belonging to the same party as a minister who has so insulted this house has suggested that he will slavishly follow and support him in continuing to insult the house. The minister is guilty of tampering with evidence and he has done so for the purpose of ensuring that parliament does not get the information which is essential before it can decide on those questions on which it is its duty to decide before granting supply. The suggestion that this is a method which has been followed for 400 years is sheer hypocrisy and I am amazed at the hon. member's effrontery in making such a suggestion to the house.

I think that the approach of the minister has been very consistent, as evidenced by the statements made by various individuals and organizations who have taken exception to the minister's actions. Their statements have been founded on a sincere and firm belief that the defence of this country is too important to be trifled with and that when drastic changes are to be made which have such a far-reaching effect on morale, on the status of the forces and on our security, not to mention the financial implications, the fullest information should be supplied so that all those who are concerned can see for themselves that the matter has been fully studied, that all necessary information has been made available and that the best minds have discussed it thoroughly. All the information has not been divulged to us. All we have is a barrage of propaganda and the bland assurance of the minister that all is well.

I was not surprised to hear the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson), who has come to the minister's defence so often, assure the house that any suggestion that full information has not been forthcoming is nonsense. As he said, the amount of information which the minister has provided to the house is stupendous. In other words, how can we say we do not have information when the Minister of National Defence has been willing to give it to us and in fact has given us more information than anyone else? The hon. member for Leeds told us to look at the great number of appearances which the minister made before the committee and at the great number of questions he has answered. Let me say in reply that I do not think anyone in the house is prepared to accept the minister's testimony on anything as being of any value or accuracy. In fact, after having witnessed his tampering with evidence we must even suspect his motives. I for one have to say about the minister what I have never said about any other minister of the crown, that I cannot in all conscience accept any information pertaining to defence which he gives to the house as being helpful to us. I am suspicious of it and in fact will reject it until such time as he should decide to submit to trial on the charges which he now faces and attempts to clear his name as any hon. member should.

[Mr. Nugent.]

I do not wish to return to the debate we had on this subject. The important point is for everyone in the country to realize that the minister's critics are concerned and feel they do not have enough information. For example, the Tri-Service Identities Organization, in a letter written to members of parliament stated in the last paragraph:

> We hope that you will support us in our objective of a commission type of inquiry but, as a preliminary step, the Minister of National Defence should be persuaded to follow the rational and democratic process of reconvening the defence committee before the unification bill is presented. We hope you will agree that an issue as vital as national defence deserves a thorough and open nonpartisan approach.

The minister labels these critics as a bunch of admirals trying to take over. His answer in the house indicated that the cause of the whole difficulty is that the top service personnel find themselves unable to grant to the government ultimate authority over the armed services, and he would have us believe that there is some sort of plot whereby the top service personnel are attempting to dictate to the government. I think such an approach is a reprehensible one and a studied insult to those people who have devoted their lives to defence. Certainly this is not the only insult which he has thrown at most of the top personnel who have found that they had to resign rather than go along with the minister's reckless plans.

The Air Force Officers' Association, which is composed of people who deserve the confidence of this nation as well as our gratitude for the services they rendered in the last two world wars, has written asking for certain information. They have asked for an explanation of what is meant by unification and integration. I think that this type of approach to the question of defence demonstrates the spirit in which the House of Commons has always acted until the advent of this minister, namely, an inquiring mind, a search for information and a real concern for the welfare of the country rather than solely the personal glorification of the Minister of National Defence.

In its brief the Navy League of Canada demonstrates exactly the same sort of attitude. Although we can understand that they have every reason to consider that the minister should be condemned out of hand for his character and conduct, for the way in which he had treated the armed forces and for the confusion which he has brought to this country, their brief indicates a simple search for information. This is obvious in the concluding paragraph of the brief on page 36. They wish to be satisfied that the question has been properly considered. This paragraph reads:

It is of paramount importance to determine if there has been any change in the underlying principles on which our forces are established. Is it the intention to abandon the concept of forces organized to protect the sovereignty of Canadian waters, fields and skies, and replace them with a new kind of police force designed for dispatch overseas, and leaving Canada to be protected by others?

Certainly, Mr. Speaker, those are legitimate questions to which we have had no answers. I thought that the speech of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) beautifully illustrated that point. The minister has not explained to the house what is meant by unification. He has not told us what his aims and objectives are. I submit that unless we know what his aims and objectives are, unless we know at least his definition of unification, it is going to be difficult for hon. members to vote in favour of this bill.

As for having confidence that this plan is the result of careful thought and detailed study by the best minds available, I find it incredible that all the evidence I can gather points to the fact that right up until last summer not one of the heads of staff, not one of the top brass in any of the armed services knew what the minister meant by unification. Not one of these people who have spent their lives in these important jobs knew what the minister intended to do. Not only had the minister not taken their advice but apparently he had not taken them into his confidence and had not even discussed the matter with them. In fact, when historians are looking at this particular period of Canadian history I think the most amazing thing to them will be that so many of the top brass were fired for disagreeing with the minister when nobody, including the top brass and the minister, knew what the minister intended to do. This is still the situation today. Nobody can tell us what he means to do with these forces. No one, I am sure, knows what this special force is.

Anyone who has seen the lengths to which the minister will go to keep information from the members of this house, the lengths to which he will go in disseminating propaganda rather than facts, would be a little afraid to accept the minister's definition of the special force. We do not know what it is to be used for. We know that no one in the armed forces is going to ask the minister because it has been demonstrated that if you ask a question you are on your way out.

I hope some members of the house have read the brief prepared by Rear Admiral Landymore which includes testimony he would have given to the committee if he had been recalled. The committee will recall that when he gave testimony before, not only was his brief altered and his evidence tampered with by the minister but the minister sat right there and pre-empted any questions that might be embarrassing. The minister gave his own replies. We have to take it for granted that this is exactly what he did with all the rest. In other words, the evidence that was given before the committee by the minister was given to prevent the committee getting the facts and not to give the facts as my hon. friends opposite suggest when they brag about the number of visits the minister made to the committee and the number of questions he answered.

It is obvious or should be obvious to hon. members that the purpose of the minister in answering those questions was to prevent the witness from giving the committee the facts which the witness had available and wanted to give. One has only to look at the proceedings of the defence committee to see how often the minister stepped in. One has only to look at those areas in which are armed forces are in such disarray today compared with the time before the minister took office, to see how skilfully he rode herd on officers who were responsible to him and to see how his interventions prevented them from giving evidence.

Rear Admiral Landymore had something to say in his brief about the subject of the planning for unification and whether it was the result of consultation with the best brains and most responsible people in our armed forces. I quote from the top of page 6 of the brief:

At this time the word unification was assumed to mean a single service, with a single identity, that is, a common identity for personnel serving in the force. This definition had to be assumed for there wasn't any official definition then, nor as far as I can determine is there one now. Indeed, in the military forces of other nations "unification" means something altogether different. For example, in Britain it is used to denote that in a theatre of operations there will be only one commander in chief who, with proper senior advisers from other services, will command the theatre. There was no study of unification to show how it had been arrived at as a concept. Although it has been claimed integration was studied, as far as I can determine there hadn't been a study of the implications of it either.

Whether people are opposed to the navy, whether they dislike admirals or generals, the fact is that the armed services constitute a tremendously important business in this country. There are many millions of dollars being spent. If we are going to have armed forces, then they must be properly run. When Admiral Landymore left the service he was chief of the maritime command and so would be in a position to know whether any studies had been made of integration. He would be in a position to know what unification meant.

Hon. members should consider the destruction of morale, the feeling of uneasiness, the wholesale firings of the top brass and the amount of consternation in the forces generally caused by this word "unification". One would have thought that someone would certainly know what it meant. If there was any plan for unification, if there had been any study of the effect of integration, certainly the top brass would have heard about it. But we have Admiral Landymore's evidence, and I will take his word any day over that of the minister, that he never saw any study. In other words, apparently we have been wandering along without any plan and with some idea in the minister's mind that he could change from time to time. I suppose this is what he means by "flexible".

I thought the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson) did a fine job of explaining to the house the position of the Conservative party and those of us who are opposed to the minister's bill. I realize that the hon. member said it was his intention to support the minister. We are used to the Social Credit philosophy of criticizing something because they do not know what it is about but saying that they will go along with it. On this occasion I believe the hon. member was making a valiant effort to find out what the bill was all about. He did confess that the bill left him confused but said he was going to go along with the minister.

I suppose I should congratulate the minister because it is a fact that the feeling of the hon. member represents, I am sure, the predominant feeling of most citizens in Canada today. The minister has done a beautiful snow job by way of publicity not only on some members of this house but on the people of this country. No one yet knows what unification means but people have swallowed the minister's line that he is giving them more defence for less money, that Canada is leading the way in a sparkling, new concept which shows original thought and which other countries are going to be glad to follow as soon as they realize how brilliant our minister is.

I also realize why so many people in this country pay little attention to the armed services and to defence spending. It is very hard to arouse the interest of people in why we are fighting so bitterly over this issue. Because the people at home are not paying enough attention I believe we should perhaps redouble our efforts in this regard. I resent the minister doing a snow job. I resent the minister, who should be interested in the defence of this country, selling himself, and I doubly resent it when he is successful. I have always said that the Liberals—the minister is a shining example of this—can sell a lie faster than we can sell the truth, but when the effects of a lie are so far reaching and dangerous to the country as well as so expensive to our treasury, then our duty becomes much clearer and much more rigid.

Admiral Landymore related an incident or two to prove the kind of mystification which exists throughout the top echelons of our armed services. He stated in his brief:

> The minister himself gave us a clue at the meeting held in Ottawa in June 1965. At an assembly of a very large number of senior officers who had been invited to Ottawa to learn something of the organization plans for integration, the minister in his opening remarks announced there would be a single walking-out dress and a single rank structure by July 1967. I immediately asked the chief of personnel for more details of this and he, normally, is responsible for dress and rank structure. He told me he had no pre-knowledge of the announcement or any knowledge of any such plan.

I think the chief of personnel should certainly have had some knowledge of this if there was a plan. I would not be surprised if the Minister of National Defence had suddenly made it up on the spur of the moment and announced it in his speech. Since the minister had not been known beforehand to be an expert on defence matters and we in this house have no reason to suspect that since he has become minister he has learned very much about defence, it would be very comforting to hon. members to think that at least there are some people who know something about defence who have been guiding him. But according to this statement it has been a one-man show. The chief of personnel had no knowledge of something that it is his personal responsibility to know. He had no knowledge there was any such plan, which makes it obvious there was no such plan and that there was no planning.

There is a line or two on page 7 of Admiral Landymore's brief which illustrate what many members in this house feel. He says:

> But it is impossible for anyone to support something, or to be against something, if he doesn't know what it's all about. For my part, from the beginning I have made it clear that if unification is to be carried to the rumoured extreme so that the navy would lose its identity, there would have to be clear improvements to efficiency and economy or I'd oppose it.

From the time the minister first put forward his concept of integration and unification of the services this was the position of this admiral who stayed in the service and stuck it out after Admiral Brock had gone and others had been fired. His position was that there would have to be clear improvements in efficiency and economy or he would oppose this plan.

I ask the minister, though I know it is futile, what is the objection to a senior officer who has this viewpoint? Does it not reflect the real concern of this officer for the efficiency and economy of the services? Is not the viewpoint of this officer one which we on this side would like to think prevails? Is he not taking his duties seriously in wanting to examine any radical changes to make sure that in all conscience he can go along with them, in wanting to examine the reasoning behind them in order to make sure that improvements will ensue, in wanting to voice his disapproval of them if he cannot find any improvements? That is what this officer was doing, and we all know the manner in which he was treated.

I should like to know, Mr. Speaker, how I can get the minister before the committee on privileges and elections or before the defence committee where those senior personnel could be called who have been forcibly retired or have taken early retirement from the services over the last few years, particularly those who resigned because they could not stomach any further the lack of planning and lack of policy on the part of this minister. Before such a committee, the minister would not be able to interrupt. He would be told to shut up if he tried to interrupt when we were asking questions of somebody else in our search for the facts. In this way we would get the facts, not the minister's propaganda.

I can well understand the minister being scared to death at being put in this position. I can well understand those who feel that the Liberal party would be given a black eye if the minister were shown up for the phony he is. I know why they so anxiously and slavishly support him and why they deny to this house the information that we should have before voting on such an important issue.

I must confess that I cannot go along with what was said by the hon. member for Fraser Valley. I believe it is a complete abdication of the duty of a member of this house to say, "I don't understand this bill but I am going to support it". Surely, Mr. Speaker, if the minister cannot make it plain to this house, if he cannot reveal the facts to the members of the house so that they can with confidence support the government, then the government has no right to proceed. Certainly no member has any right to give his confidence and a blank cheque to the minister under such circumstances.

I have said before and I say again that there is one fundamental point in argument that most have accepted as common sense from the time they were old enough to think. Whenever one becomes involved in a discussion one should not do what the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. McNulty) suggests and regard something as a case of "It is or it isn't". If the facts support your side of the argument you should present the facts and try to convince the other side of the truth of your proposition.

Is there any member of this house, Mr. Speaker, who would take serious exception to this manner of approaching a question and trying to persuade others that you are right? Is the hon. member for Lincoln, who so glibly quoted the outdated speech of General Foulkes, going to suggest that the minister is afraid of revealing the facts unless the minister knows that the facts will support him? Surely it should have entered the minds of hon. gentlemen on the other side, as well as the mind of the hon. member for Fraser Valley, that if the facts are there the minister should be ready, willing and proud to present them so as to give conclusive proof of his statements and to overwhelm his detractors.

The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) in his speech praised the minister for giving the house so much information. I am wondering whether the hon. member has had any courtroom experience. I can just imagine him calling a witness, saying to the judge that he could rely on that witness, the judge saying "Yes, but what about this recent conviction for perjury, do you still want me to take his word", and the hon. member saying, "He is a very fine fellow; take his word anyway". This seems to me to be the parallel of what the hon. member for Leeds said in his speech about the information given by the minister, who still sits in this house though charged with tampering with the evidence of a witness. The purpose of the tampering was to make sure that we did not get certain information. The minister still has not disclosed this information. Yet the hon. member for Leeds has stated that more information on defence has been given to the house by this minister than by any other. For that kind of information we do not give much thanks.

I hope hon. members will read the speech made by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness). To my mind it was a perfect, a classic example of a difference of approach. I have not always agreed with the hon. member for Calgary North, but he is honest and straightforward and he said what he had to say like a man. The minister of National Defence has hidden the evidence, has resorted to half truth, has kept the facts from the committee and has given us nothing but propaganda when all we seek are the facts.

It is my hope that some hon. members who so far have supported the minister will search their consciences at least to the extent to which the hon. member for Fraser Valley has searched his and reach the conclusion that they do not really know anything about this plan. They might continue to search their consciences before reaching the conclusion that we as members of parliament have at least ten times as much opportunity as our constituents to find out the facts. They might admit that it is our responsibility to ascertain these facts before disposing of the taxpayers' money in such large amounts.

I wonder whether we can succeed in spurring the minister into rising and telling us what he means by unification and what role Canada's armed forces are to play. Perhaps he might even say something about nuclear weapons. When in opposition he was skilful at selling the idea of our commitment. The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has promised to reconsider that particular role. Perhaps the minister, little as we can rely on his word, will tell us what part nuclear arms will play from now on in the armed services. Just what kind of defence force are we to have?

I would suggest, if I thought the minister was the type of man who would take advice in the house—he has not taken it from his military advisers—that the hon. gentleman should put aside the arrogance referred to by the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) and try to see himself as others see him for a few minutes. I suggest too that he should look at the speech made by the hon. member for Calgary North, compare that speech with the pamphlet he himself put out, and try to follow the example of that member. He could still disagree with the hon. member for Calgary North, but he might gain a tenth of the respect in which the hon. member for Calgary North is held in this house.

[Mr. Nugent.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): This might be an appropriate point at which to announce the proceedings on the adjournment motion tonight.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard), Transportation—Montreal—Use of the French language in railway transportation services; the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams), National Parks —Use of expropriation to halt court cases; the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan), Administration of Justice—British Columbia—Commutation of death sentences of convicted murderers.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF NAVY, ARMY AND AIR FORCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Hellyer for the second reading of Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

Mr. Heber E. Smith (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, the objects of national defence ought to be clear to everyone. They are to defend our territorial integrity and the political institutions of our country, or at least those political institutions which we value. Our defence policy should be the means by which we seek to accomplish this.

The 1964 white paper on defence ought to be a blueprint to guide us in this purpose. It is anything but that. It is both confusing and confused. It is impossible to get clear meanings from it. It reminds me of the story of the blind men who went to look at an elephant. One felt a leg and said "It is like a tree trunk." The other felt an ear and said "It is like a leaf". The third felt the tail and thought it was a vine. On this evidence the blind men concluded that the elephant was a tree. Consider the white paper of 1964. One can get any meaning from it one wishes. Nothing is clear. It is far from being a blueprint.

There are two essential truths about our national defence. They relate to our physical position and to the size of our country. The first is that the defence of our territory will always depend on others, primarily upon the United States. The second is that the defence of our principles must also depend on others. This will depend to a greater extent though on our political alliances with the Commonwealth, NATO and the United Nations. Of these three organizations only NATO has effective military strength.

To follow this through, our military role will always be to contribute to our own defence to the best of our ability, subject to the reality of our ultimate reliance on others. The degree of political integrity which we would be likely to retain after another world war would depend on the effectiveness of our contribution to our own defence relative to that of other countries. When, therefore, we are discussing integration and unification we must always do so with the knowledge of our dependence on others, realizing that our forces would be only part of a larger defence system.

It is hard to find any real objection to the principle of integration and unification of the supply services, the communications services and training facilities. Indeed, it might be fair to complain that the integration of these services might have gone ahead a great deal faster since the end of the second world war. If the services I have mentioned, along with similar services, were properly integrated, the result ought to be a real saving in both manpower and money. However, I am not sure that this phase of integration has in fact been carried out properly. My impression is that there has been far too little planning. There was and is still far too much haste—why, we do not know. This haste, together with the absence of planning, has, I feel, destroyed some of the advantages of integration at the level I have mentioned to the detriment of the morale of our military forces, their military efficiency and, incidentally, the combat efficiency of our troops.

I think this phase of the integration of the services is of such importance that no further steps should be taken until this has been accomplished in reality, not just on paper or in theory. We should have the reality of integration before we go further. Unified command was provided for in large measure by the amendments in 1964 when a single chief of staff was appointed. Unified command has been the subject of long controversy. Nearly every biography and history of world war II cites examples of disastrous mistakes in judgment and often attributes them to lack of unity in command. Many of the people who have written these books are experts but I have got the feeling they are being wise after the event in citing lack of unity as the excuse for other shortcomings such as bad judgment, bad advice or mistakes in execution.

I am not sure that all the damnation of lack of unified command is just. One recent book, for example, talks about the now generally accepted wastefulness of much of our bombing of Germany, but I doubt very much that the course we took in that respect would have changed if there had been unified command.

The 1964 amendments provided for a single chief of staff. The pitfalls in that course of action were set out in great detail both by hon. members and by experts inside and outside this house. The chief objection to a single chief of staff was, and still remains, that it cut off too many high ranking military officers from direct contact with the Minister of National Defence. The minister now gets only the consensus which the chief of staff brings to him. This perhaps cuts out bickering but there is a difficulty because the military machine is much more complicated and technical than ever before. The minister is usually a layman in military matters. Therefore I think he needs more advice rather than less advice.

One cannot help but wonder if many of the early retirements among senior officers are related to the fact that they have lacked direct contact with the minister or direct means of expression of their views within the services. I am not talking about their right to go outside the services and speak, but I think some of the retirements have been due to frustration. Officers have had no way in which to express their dissent and still stay within the services.

We have been given certain figures with respect to the integration of national defence headquarters but they leave me with great doubt because I feel they result in large measure from juggling of personnel and the transfer of personnel from one department to another. The figures look good but the savings are not very real. It is not the least bit reassuring to find that the plans for the new defence headquarters provide accommodation for a staff much larger than is proposed for its administration. Everyone knows what is likely to happen to empty office space if it is available anywhere in a government building.

All of the arguments for and against unity of command and integration of the services come down to one thing: the effectiveness of your military organization is measured by the combat unit it provides. This is the real test, the effectiveness of your forces, how effectively will they fight on land, sea and in the air. Few, if any, responsible military authorities have recommended a unified force below the level of an army brigade and its naval and air equivalents.

The minister has never told us clearly at what level combat unification is going to stop or start. We have talked about regimental identities. There has been confusion over the use of the word "regiment" because regiment to us means something quite different from what it means in the United States.

The minister's reassurances, such as they are, leave a lot to be desired, particularly when one reads Hansard for December 7, 1966, page 10831, when the minister was talking about the demands of modern warfare. The demands of modern warfare should be the whole criteria, the whole standard of judgment with respect to organization of our forces. On that occasion the minister made a couple of amazing claims. He said:

> The pattern of warfare in which armies fought armies, navies fought navies, and air forces fought air forces is not likely to be repeated. Under the traditional three service concept, the individual service recruited, administered, trained, equipped and supported the combat force units within that service.

Then he went on to say:

> Each component depends on its parent service for support in a host of ways which require special channels of communication and complex methods of co-ordination throughout.

In that speech the minister oversimplified what he called the old-fashioned pattern of war, armies fighting armies, navies fighting navies and air forces fighting air forces. He was entirely wrong because we have only to look at the kind of war still being fought today. We have a full-scale war in Viet Nam, short only of nuclear conflict. It is being fought exactly the same way as world war II and by very much the same type of army, navy and air combat units that fought the second world war. The only very new thing is the method of transportation, helicopters, although they are not very new in themselves. In 1967, we are seeing war fought in exactly the same way as it was in 1945. The war being fought in Viet Nam is very much the type of war that Canadian forces could be involved in if we were so unfortunate as to get into another conflict.

The minister talks disparagingly of the traditional three services concept where individuals were recruited, administered, trained and supported separately. I admit that they can be recruited and administered by a single authority, but a soldier who fights on land, either on foot or in a vehicle, will have to be trained, equipped and supported as a soldier who fights on land. He will require a special set of equipment and special supply for everything except food. The same applies to a man who fights in the air or a man who fights on the sea. There is no sense to what the minister says about the demands of modern warfare because in my view the advantages of unification at that level are not foreseeable at present. If those are the minister's views, then I think we should now refer this bill to the committee before we have accepted the principle involved, because after hearing witnesses it is possible that the minister might change his mind concerning the demands of modern warfare.

It is not enough to oppose unification or integration on the ground that it would destroy the morale of the services, but morale does play a most important part in the maintenance of our armed forces. We have been unable to obtain any meaningful or accurate figures concerning the manpower of our combat units in the three services. Over-all figures are very often misleading. I was in Italy during the reinforcement crisis of 1944 and 1945 when Mr. Ralston visited the troops. While the over-all figures continued to be reassuring, there was no question concerning the lack of men in the combat units. Indeed, it was so bad that Mr. Ralston came back and resigned his position as minister of national defence.

We do not have any good figures concerning our combat effectiveness. All we have is a sort of innuendo. We know that one battalion of the infantry had to be stripped down in order to reinforce another battalion in Cyprus. We know that ships are being laid up. We have the right to be disturbed about the lack of manpower in the combat forces of the army. I think we also have the right to be disturbed about the state of training in these services.

How are we to continue to supply the soldiers, sailors and airmen we are going to need? This is where morale enters the picture. Money never has been an overriding factor. One can never hope to pay members of the services an amount sufficient to represent a purely monetary incentive. Pride of service has played a very substantial part in getting people into the services and keeping them there. If we have a faceless unified service, will we be able to attract people to it or will we be able to maintain effective combat units?

The minister is a great admirer of Mr. McNamara. Mr. McNamara has initiated studies in the United States concerning ways to get rid of the draft. His officials, when speaking of getting people into the services, have an expression they use—"professional incentives". What this really means is the pay rate that would be required in order to have a completely professional service. The studies they have made indicate that the cost would be astronomic to maintain the United States services on a voluntary basis. Do we have any idea concerning what professional incentives we will have to offer in order to get people to remain in our services? Do we have any estimate of the dollar value involved in this or are we to continue along on this course, have our services depleted and then in two or three years find that in order to maintain our forces it will be necessary to have conscription or some other form of compulsory service? Will this be the result?

There are the important questions in respect of recruitment and retainment of personnel in the service. The minister skirts around them; yet I think these are the vital questions in respect of the matters we are considering today. We should not accept the minister's proposals and should not adopt the bill in principle until we have a full explanation.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, the bill of the Minister of National Defence is of great importance to areas such as the Atlantic region and particularly the maritime provinces. I should like to put on the record a few thoughts on this matter. I do not intend to deal in detail with various matters such as the new set-up concerning the chief of staff and so on which have been dealt with adequately by other members. I should like to reiterate, however, what was said by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) and other members to the effect that our Canadian defence policy should be threefold. First, it should provide defence for our country, second, honour our international commitments so far as NATO and NORAD are concerned and, third, participate in the peace keeping operations of the United Nations.

In his excellent speech yesterday I believe the hon. member for Calgary North pointed out that with the mobile command now taking the priority position in our new national defence scheme our navy and our air force will only be support components and will not have an important part in our defence set-up. It is my submission that this should not be the case. If we are to carry out our commitments in this regard and provide an adequate defence of Canada, we require the three services which we have today.

I believe that integration at the various levels certainly is a necessary thing. It has been agreed by many officers in our armed forces that integration in respect of supply, pay and many other things—the components which make up the administrative part of our defence forces—is something which should be carried out, but not unification as proposed by the minister.

Perhaps I might place on the record a most interesting article which I do not believe has been referred to in this debate. It appeared in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald and was written by Dave McIntosh of the Canadian Press who had quite a wide experience in Korea writing on defence matters. The article is dated September 14, 1966, and reads as follows:

A manpower crisis, a financial crisis and planned unification of the armed forces have arrived simultaneously at the defence department.

He points out that the three problems are intertwined.

Since Mr. Hellyer took over the defence portfolio in April, 1963, the strength of the armed forces has dropped by some 17,000 to 106,000—45,000 air force, 44,000 army and 17,000 navy—of whom 12,000 are serving with NATO in Europe and 2,000 are on United Nations service in world trouble spots.

The drop may have been more since there may be a slight difference in the figures.

> The drop of 17,000 represents a financial saving of some 85,000,000. But the savings are being eaten up by the necessity of paying servicemen more to keep them from returning to civvy street for better paying jobs.

Then the article goes on to say:

> In the meantime, the cost of weapons and equipment keeps going up.

Of course the minister in his utterances in the house and as reported in the press has repeatedly talked about the impact of inflation on his department.

> The manpower and financial crises pose a stern problem—whether to reduce some armed forces commitments and tasks or increase the defence budget. The 1966-67 defence budget is $1,572,000,000, an increase of $22,000,000 over 1965-66.

As I pointed out, the real problem is that of unification. It is pointed out fairly in this article, as I have said, that a number of the leaders in the various services certainly have agreed with the proposition of integration but not unification. This very senior officer pointed out:

• (6:30 p.m.)

> We want to grow into unification in, say, five years.
> We don't want to be pushed before we can get properly ready for it.

That is what the minister is doing by this bill, which he expects to have passed in a hurry. Many hon. members have spoken about the bill and undoubtedly many of our military personnel do not agree with it. Some may agree with the proposition of unification, but do not feel it should be put into effect in a short period of time.

The article then states:

> Sources close to the minister say he is inclined to regard as disloyal any officer who opposes unification on technical ground and that is where the main opposition lies.

We all know that certain senior officers who would not agree with the minister's proposition for unification lost their jobs.

Another problem regarding unification was referred to by the Chief of Materiel Command who said——he could not provide them with adequate support...weapons, equipment, spare parts and the like...in an emergency.

He was referring to the operational commands. That is one reason unification should not go ahead so quickly, and a further reason it should not go ahead quickly is the upsetting situations young men find themselves in so far as careers are concerned. I talked to a number of excellent young Canadians who had joined the navy after attending R.M.C. and other schools, and they now do not know where they are headed.

In this regard our commitment to NATO is an important one, and as we all know our NATO forces report to the commander of SACLANT at Norfolk, Virginia. Under that command our role has been one in respect of anti-submarine operations. In the last few years our naval research people devised one of the best types of sonar systems, called the variable depth sonar. It was developed by E.M.I. Cossor, Limited, at Dartmouth, in the province of Nova Scotia. In my constituency the Trenton works company constructed what was known as a "fish" housing for this equipment. This proved to be excellent and assisted to a tremendous degree in our anti-submarine role. As has been pointed out by other hon. members, we have insufficient ships to carry out our role in NATO.

I have been aboard ships in Halifax during the last two months, and on one particularly I spoke to a number of junior officers. Reference has been made to the fact that we in the opposition have been talking about admirals and generals, and what they have said. These junior officers said they had wanted to make the navy their career but that they now do not know where they are going. They suggested that unification was not the answer to all our problems, and that it looked as though they would be stricken off strength.

These men pointed out that there were insufficient ships, particularly in view of the number being declared surplus, to train junior officers. In this regard let me quote from an article which appeared in the Toronto Star on September 24, 1966. It was written by Tom Hazlitt, who journeyed down to Halifax to see what the situation was, and who he wrote the following:

> At a jetty around the corner and out of sight of this old navy town there lie six ships which may consider a dismal symbol of the future.
> The six ships tied up at Shearwater, the nearby naval air base, are the modern destroyer escorts Athabaskan, Algonquin and Crescent plus the World War II vintage frigates Swansea, New Waterford and Victoriaville.

He pointed out that these ships were kept in what is known as "hot reserve". He suggests that is a way of saying there is nothing wrong with them except they do not have crews.

The article continues:

The ships cost the taxpayers several million dollars each and as they now stand are utterly useless for offensive and defensive purposes. They are in fact a deficit, because every day men go to work on them in an attempt to keep complex electronic and mechanical gear in shape.

He pointed out that theroretically these ships could get up steam and sail perhaps within a week or, by raiding training establishments and cancelling leave, the navy could probably muster crews within a month.

He also pointed out that——this "hot reserve" concept is largely window dressing because every sailor knows it takes at least two months of solid work to whip a new crew into anything approaching fighting efficiency.

He also stated:

H.M.C.S. Skeena, a magnificent ultra-modern destroyer escort with helicopter facilities, lies alongside at H.M.C. Dockyard preparing for a major refit. When she comes out in three or four months she will take on a skeleton crew and join the hidden fleet at Shearwater.

This may also be the fate of her sister ship Annapolis, which is undergoing refit.

Finally he states, and he was referring to the new uniform of the unified forces:

Take the case of the Jolly Green Jumper, as navy types designate the proposed common uniform proposed by Hellyer.

He then quotes a navy type to whom he was speaking at that time as follows:

The navy can still mount a flashy guard of honour, the officers still have that starched, stiff-upper-lip look, but the ratings observed in the bars and on the streets can only be described as scruffy.

This is so because their uniforms have been allowed to deteriorate because new uniforms are to be issued. He quotes a leading hand with seven years service who looked balefully at the patches and worn spots on his uniform and said:

A couple of years ago I wouldn't have thought of wearing this on the street. But now, what with the Jolly Green Jumper and all, it doesn't seem to matter.

Mr. Hazlitt's article then continues:

A saltier colleague put his feelings in more colourful language: I'll be flipped," he said, "if I'm going to wear the Jolly Green Flipping Jumper regardless of what Paul Flipping Hellyer flipping well says."

A bright young officer summed up the majority thinking. He said he agreed that the days of swords, ceremonies and iron clad discipline are over. But he added: "I've spent my entire adult life preparing to take command of a ship. Now it appears there aren't going to be many ships. So I'm shopping for another career."

The morale of the navy is very low.

National Defence Act Amendment

On December 19 of last year the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) answered a question I placed on the order paper. I asked what units of the Royal Canadian Navy are now being declared surplus or will be declared surplus at an early date, and this is the list as set out in that answer:

H.M.C.S. Granby
H.M.C.S. Antigonish
H.M.C.S. Beacon Hill
H.M.C.S. Jonquière
H.M.C.S. New Waterford
H.M.C.S. Sussexvale
H.M.C.S. New Glasgow
H.M.C.S. Swansea
H.M.C.S. Stettler
H.M.C.S. Ste. Thérèse

Surely some of these ships could have been retained in order to provide necessary instruction for our junior officers. If this is not provided the navy will be a thing of the past. An old saying of the navy is "The gravy's in the navy". I think those days are gone forever. Perhaps the "wavy navy" will never wave again.

In his answer the associate minister also said that tenders would be called for helicopter destroyers in March of this year. I hope that will be the case, but I fear it will not. It was my understanding that four of these ships were to be built. It will be many years before they are completed. Once a keel is laid, as hon. members are aware, it takes a great deal of time to construct one of these modern destroyer escorts. Unfortunately our navy will not have ships available for its operations, and when they do they will not have sufficient crew.

• (6:40 p.m.)

Let me turn to another matter. I was pleased on Robbie Burns Day to hear the associate minister announce that the minister agreed that pipers should be accredited as musicians. I think that is a proper decision. I have in my possession—I do not intend to read it all—an excellent letter from a constituent of mine which contains a letter from a pipe major who came from Scotland and had a distinguished career. Among other things he was appointed Queen's Piper of Holyrood Palace, Edinburgh. In 1948 he was appointed private piper to the Royal Company of Archers, private piper to the Queen's Bodyguard in Scotland, and so on. I intended making this speech before the change was made in the Department of National Defence but I will still put a few of these matters on the record because they are quite pertinent. The letter says in part:

> The decision regarding piping—

That is the decision not to accredit pipers as musicians.

> —and music is just another step in the discarding of old military traditions, and I'll bet my last cent that there's a bigoted English "scrap metal" band type aiding and abetting the whole issue.

The letter continues:

> To say that a person who plays an instrument and music which must be committed entirely to memory, literally hundreds of different tunes, some such as the piobaireachd (piob-roc) involving times of 20 to 30 minutes playing, is not the equal of the man who plays a proportion of a musical score propped under his nose, especially on a trombone, bass horn, glockenspeil and the like is beyond the bounds of reason, and must indeed be the thoughts of a professional snob, not a musician.

I concur in what my constituent says. He goes on to ask a very pertinent question. I was at the United Nations with the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Langlois). As we walked up Broadway we saw the proud pipes of the Black Watch as the pipers marched along and made a great hit. My constituent wants to know this:

> I wonder if the D.N.D. must still comply with the musicians union regulations whenever pipers and pipe bands perform, such as was the case in New York and on the Ed Sullivan show recently. They can't have it both ways, surely.

That would probably be a nice question for the order paper, namely whether pipers are musicians. The hon. member for Chicoutimi might say that French Canadians do not like the pipes, and so on. This letter from Pipe Major Ramsay says:

> It has been suggested that the French speaking people don't like bagpipe music. To me this is utter nonsense. I have adjudicated in Brittany, France, where no fewer than 40 French pipe bands took part in what can only be described as "tremendous", the sight of thousands of Frenchmen flocking to hear "The Bagpipes".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEwan: I bring this matter forward just to point out that I have in black and white a commitment by the minister that the kilt will remain a part of the tradition of our forces. But I am wondering how often the forces will be allowed to wear it. Perhaps the minister when replying at a later date will answer this question. It is an interesting matter. It might be something like our second flag in this country: Only when the Queen comes here will they be allowed to wear it. I hope this will not be the case.

[Mr. MacEwan.]

We go back—and this ties in with the militia—to the days of the first world war when battalions such as the 78th and 85th were proud to wear the kilt, and the North Novas in the second world war, of which the hon. member for Colchester-Hants (Mr. Kennedy) was a company commander. We must remember that the militia is a very important part of the reorganization which the minister has put forward.

I have read that the militia will play an active role in the reorganization, and I hope this is true. I belonged to the local unit. Upon being elected to the House of Commons I had to leave it, of course, but I still maintain an interest at the local level. The reports I have received from some of the officers are not good. I hope there will be an active participation by the militia in the new reorganization, because they are most important for the defence of this country. I fear, however, that with a unified force this will not be the case.

May I refer specifically to the matter of defence establishments in the maritimes, and particularly in the province of Nova Scotia. I refer to those which are most important —Greenwood, Cornwallis, Shearwater, and so on. These bases pour millions of dollars into our economy, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Forrestall). Not only that, but in my submission they are needed in order that we may provide for the adequate defence of our country and meet our commitments to NATO.

I recall that on coming into this house I and other hon. members called for the decentralization of industry in this country. These defence bases are among the most important industries we have. Our shipyards of course are assisted, although since the present government came into office the shipyard in my area has had hardly any naval refits because the ships just are not there. It is my hope that the minister will take a very close look at these defence establishments and will realize, if he means what was pointed out by the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Groos), namely that the good of this country must come first, that these defence establishments are most necessary for the first two parts of our national defence policy, that is, the defence of Canada and our commitments to NATO and other organizations.

Many very pertinent questions have been asked by hon. members: Is Canada going to rely for its defence in the future on alliances such as NATO and NORAD? If so, what type of military contribution is Canada going to make to these alliances? What are the specific advantages in a single military service that are not attainable in an integrated three-service system?

Many questions put to the minister have not been adequately answered. In my opinion the bill before us is something written in black and white, but there are many more things that should be found out. There are many witnesses who should be heard, so we will be able then, and only then, to judge whether this plan that the minister proposes is a proper one. I say integration, yes; unification, no.

This policy has been hurried by the minister, and such should not be the case in a matter so vital to our country. The effective defence of Canada is our first duty. We have heard many very good speeches in this debate, and many important points have been raised. Hon. members have asked that this bill be sent immediately to the defence committee before second reading. I think the minister would be wise to do this, so that we would then be able to judge what are the merits of the bill.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am responding to the general desire of the other side of the house to hear me. I was waiting to see whether hon. members opposite wanted to hear me, and I think they are suggesting that I speak now.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: I rise under a bit of a handicap in entering this defence debate. This afternoon during the question period the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer)—I copied his words down—said that I have only a primitive knowledge of the subject under discussion, and he then went on to say that he would be happy to send me more information. This is the handicap under which I labour, namely that my knowledge of defence matters and this bill is, in the opinion of the minister, primitive. Despite that handicap I thought I would be bold enough to enter this debate.

I have this similarity with the minister: I was once a corporal. When the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) was speaking yesterday he said there was a story going around about corporals. I quote the words of the hon. member as reported at page 12415 of Hansard, when he said that—> —history would show three main troublemakers, one was Corporal Napoleon, one was Corporal Hitler and now it is Corporal Hellyer.

They certainly have been trouble makers; but I would not want any reflection to be cast either on present or past corporals, with the sole exception of those three. I stand here to defend corporals, because the corporal is the mainstay of the army. The officer has the advice of the sergeant major and the sergeants, who have the privilege of talking things over with their superiors; but the corporal is the one to whom orders are given and the one who does the work. His companions, the privates, treat him as one of themselves. In my day the corporal was not a superior person. The sergeant majors, sergeants, and the officers supervise and make the plans on paper, in an armored car, in a cellar or in a dug-out, but the corporal and his section have to go out in front and carry out the orders which they have been given. I am speaking in favour of the corporal and I hope that just because we have had some offenders like Napoleon, Hitler and Hellyer, the rank of corporal will not be downgraded.

On December 7 the minister introduced the bill in a rather lengthy speech, of which he was so proud that he had it reprinted specially, with the addition of photographs, for the edification of the general public and of the people in the services. I have not yet received my copy of that expensive brochure or document, but I notice that his speech filled 19 pages of Hansard, 15½ of which were devoted to matters which we have already heard debated before. This constituted the historical summary. It showed us largely what had been done by better ministers of defence before the present minister. These 15½ pages were a repetition of what we had heard in the defence committee and here in the house. The minister was so unenthusiastic about the bill that he devoted only 3½ pages to a discussion of it. He should have concentrated his attention on the bill, which is to be the crowning glory of his career.

We are witnessing a strange series of events in the house. Before Christmas the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) presented us with two or three bills which had to be completed. He had to have the claque of the Liberal party behind him to give him encouragement, and when the bills were passed he rose in the estimation of his party. One of those bills does not even take effect until 1968. Lately we passed a bill in the name of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill). That bill on transportation was his crowning achievement, and he had to get it through the house one way or another before ending his career. In one of the statements which he made during consideration of that he devoted only 3½ pages to a discussion Minister of Transport is approaching its completion.

If I could be sure that the passage of the bill before us will bring to an end the career of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer), I might take a different view. Perhaps one of the assistants of the minister sitting behind the press gallery could send down a note and tell me what is the future of the minister, and if the passage of this bill will promote a change in his occupation. I think that the opposition should have such information at its disposal. It might change our attitude with regard to the minister. As a matter of fact the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister indicated last night that the minister will not continue forever in his present position but might become the prime minister. These words are recorded in Hansard. I wonder whether the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has been advised of this sinister plot that is going on behind his back conducted by his own parliamentary secretary. This is what shook me last night.

Although we do not have any information regarding the future of the minister, we have his bill before us, the crown of his career, which may wind up what he has been doing in national defence. Perhaps that is why he is pressing on with it at present. He does not wish to subject the principle of that bill to an investigation by the committees on national defence or external affairs, to see whether we are following the right course. This is one of the most important bills that has ever been placed before us. I intend to oppose it, just as I opposed the bill which brought changes to the administration of the Department of National Defence and set up a supremo in the person of the chief of staff. I do not like the idea and I hope it can be changed in the future.

Similarly I am now opposing this bill and I join my colleagues in pointing out its errors. Although we have heard hon. members saying that this subject has been debated and that now is the time to complete the debate, I say that this is the first opportunity we have had for a debate on the subject of unification. We have talked about integration and we have exposed the fact that the minister has misled the house by providing incorrect information or by not providing it at all. However we have not had the opportunity to debate the subject of unification. This is the first opportunity we have had to study it at length, because until the bill was presented to us and until we heard the minister's speech on it we did not know with any exactitude what the minister meant by unification. On earlier occasions we tried to get that information from him, but we failed. Time and time again I asked him whether he would give us a definition of unification but he would not do it. It is only now that this subject is placed before us, and we intend to examine it with the greatest of care.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it seven o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): The house will now suspend its sitting until eight o'clock.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, just before the supper hour, which was of no advantage to me, I was making some introductory remarks. I should like to continue them now. However, I should like the assurance of the minister that he has his brain trust in the gallery behind the press gallery, equipped with their suitcases, documents and writing pads, in order that they can keep an account of what is going on here and pass to the minister or to the members of the press contradictory items of information. If they are present, perhaps we can continue.

I was talking about the minister's presentation on December 7, and I made one slip. I said that in the 19 pages his speech covered he devoted 15½ pages to telling us things that had already been placed before us. My slip was that, during the course of those remarks, he dealt with a single unified force, something which had not been drawn to our attention on any previous occasion. I was going to criticize him for that omission in days gone by when we had the defence committee operating. Incidentally, the minister has been afraid to summon the committee during the last seven months, in view of the disclosures that would be made at that defence committee.

The minister did not tell the committee or the house about his ideas with regard to a single, unified force. This idea has now been disclosed in the bill before us and in the speech the minister made on December 7. I cannot deal with all the matters that are subject to criticism in the speech the minister made, or as to the principle of the bill, but I hope to have another opportunity to do so. I am restricted to 40 minutes while the minister had about an hour and forty-five minutes. However, I will mention some items.

Before I conclude I intend to give the minister an idea, and I hope he will think about it. I hope he will put his brain trusters to work and set up a study group if he sees merit in the idea. I believe even this minister will see some merit in the proposal I intend to put before him before I sit down. Before doing that, however, I want to draw attention, with some regret, to the continuing misleading statements to which the minister subjects this house and the people of Canada. In his speech on December 7, as recorded at page 10820 of Hansard, the minister referred to rising costs. He was attempting to get across to us and to the public the fact he had made some substantial savings, and he used these words:

> The facts are clear and incontrovertible. Either the defence budget had to be substantially increased or substantial cost reductions had to be made. Otherwise funds would simply not be available for the capital expenditures that are essential to effective military forces. These pressures will continue. The integration through unification process will generate important new cost reductions for some years to come.

• (8:10 p.m.)

The minister went on in that vein until I interrupted him to ask:

> Will he relate the reduction of personnel to the cost factor?

The minister dodged that and simply replied:

> Let me continue my statement.

However, Mr. Speaker, I had had it from him earlier by way of question and answer on another occasion that by reducing the personnel in the services and on the civilian side of National Defence headquarters to the number of 23,000 all told, the minister had saved on the cost of personnel and was able to divert that saving to other purposes. That is how he effected what he likes to proclaim to the public as substantial savings in national defence.

The budget of the minister for national defence is the same; he has a ceiling of $1,500 million, or it goes a little above that now and again. The minister has made no saving to the taxpayer at all, yet this is the type of propaganda that he has spread across this country. Here and there I hear from various people, and from some who should know better, that this minister has saved the taxpayers money. He has dismissed from the services 23,000 people, and this saving by way of salaries and upkeep has eliminated any increase in the defence budget; but in point of fact there has been no corresponding savings to the taxpayers. I regret that the minister continues to give misleading information such as that.

I want to say a word or two about the minister's statement concerning the single service concept, as he calls it. The minister wants us to believe that when he issued the white paper in 1964 this was implicit in that white paper. I am not going into all the details. The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) pointed out that this was not evident at the time. It is not evident even now from reading the white paper. There are ever so many senior officers, retired, dismissed or fired by the minister, who will be prepared to state, I expect, that this was not evident to them when they first read the white paper or when they had conversations with the minister.

Be that as it may, Mr. Speaker, the minister said that this concept was introduced at that time and that we are now going to have just one single service. The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh) pointed out this afternoon, with several examples, how the minister on one page says we are going to have a single service and on the next page says that there will be a navy, an army and an air force, or that there will be sailors, soldiers, and airmen. There must be half a dozen examples in this speech of his where, on the one hand, he is saying that we are going to have one single unified service, and yet things will be unchanged.

What are people to judge from that, Mr. Speaker? The only judgment you can make is that the minister is misleading the House of Commons and the people of this country, and I do not think that this should be done.

Remarks were made the other day about the statement of the minister in his speech in connection with higher loyalty; the minister gave us some peculiar statements with regard to that matter. He said that the men in the three services, despite their respective loyalty to each individual service, will have to develop a loyalty to a single unified service, and consequently a higher loyalty to their country.

I think this is quite wrong, Mr. Speaker. I stated yesterday, or stated by way of interruption in the course of discussion going on, that this was insulting to the people now in the services. Anyone who has served knows perfectly well that his loyalty was to his unit, to his corps, or to whatever branch of the services he was in, whether navy, army or air force; but there was an overriding loyalty which did not have to be further developed, that loyalty to his country, to Canada. It was the same in the first war and in the second; there was this overriding loyalty to Canada. Every serviceman that I ever saw or met had that loyalty and was proud of the fact that he was serving his country.

The minister tries to tell us that because the services are split between navy, army and air force the people in these separate services must develop a higher loyalty to a single service, and hence to their country. That, sir, I think is an insult—an insult to Canadians who have served and to Canadians who are now serving, and I reject it entirely.

I was interested and amused by the reference by the minister to adaptability to change, which appears at page 10831 of Hansard. Then the minister went on to tell us about the various weapons and their influence on the services. Let me quote some of his words, as reported at that page:

> Many of these developments cut across the traditional lines of distinction between the different services. One example of this is the anti-submarine warfare equipment which can be carried in land-based aircraft or carrier-based aircraft, or in ships on or under the sea. Another example is the use in all three services of fixed-wing aircraft and missiles. Still another is the use of helicopters in all three armed forces as reconnaissance vehicles, weapons platforms and instruments of mobility. The recent creation by the United States of mobile divisions with their reliance on helicopters may mark a departure from tradition which will have a profound influence on the nature of military activities.

Then the minister goes on to say this:

> Such changes must affect the organization of the forces. It is clear that the influence works in the direction of a single service for reasons of military effectiveness, cost and career considerations.

I do not know where the minister gets these illogical statements. Just because an artillery weapon is used on a ship as well as on land the minister seems to think that you must therefore unify the services. Just because a machine gun is used in aircraft, on ships and by the army on land he says you must therefore unify the services. It is just sheer and utter nonsense.

The minister thinks that the use of the helicopter with a mobile division is going to change the whole nature of organization within the United States forces. On the contrary, the use of the helicopter is just another method of obtaining mobility, which has been the search of armed forces ever since the beginning of warfare. If we had more helicopters in the Canadian army we could form a helicopter brigade, fashioned upon the experience of the United States division which is now in South Viet Nam. As the years go by there will be other means of getting infantry from one position to another, whether by a track vehicle by helicopter, by some other method such as propelling an individual over ditches or walls; or even the age old method of simply walking on your flat feet.

I do not see why the minister suggests that because these changes are taking place we have to have a single unified force. The whole history of warfare is that changes have been adopted from time to time, some of them slowly, some of them more rapidly. But it is not necessary to unify the navy, army and air force just because they happen to use similar weapons.

Then the minister had some profound words to utter about the demands of modern warfare. The hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Smith) talked about that a little while ago. As reported at page 10832 of Hansard the minister said:

> The need for fast decision-making and quick reaction is synonymous with modern warfare.

• (8:20 p.m.)

I have heard all that before. Everything is to be done much more rapidly than in the past. Decision making is to be done in a split second instead of being carried out over a period of time. But it is too bad this cannot be applied to civilians such as those who compose the present cabinet. Their decisions are not reached in a split second. There is procrastination, delay and postponement. But the minister is attempting to tell us that everything is changed—that there must be a new attitude and a single, unified force in order that we can have these quick decisions. I have heard all that before—in 1939, in 1940 and in 1941. The second world war was to be so different from the first. Everything was to be done much more rapidly and men who could make quick decisions were required. My actual experience of the second world war showed that in many respects it was like the first. I regret the need to mention these things, because the minister said earlier, as Your Honour will recall, that my knowledge of such matters is primitive, which means, archaic, antiquated and ancient.

If I may be pardoned, let me state categorically that decision making in the second world war was in many instances no quicker than in the first, not a bit. Again, in the second world war, speed of movement in the areas in which I was operating and which I had the opportunity to observe was no faster than had been the case in the first. It depends on the nature of the situation and on the nature of the ground. We talked in 1939, 1940 and 1941 about tanks going at 20 miles an hour. Well, I saw tanks going at one mile an hour in the month of January, 1945, and they were lucky to make that speed. So when the minister tries to tell us that everything is changed, that we must reach decisions more quickly because we have a single unified force and because we have new equipment, it shows he does not know very much about the actual operations of war.

In that famous speech of his, the minister uses a heading which reads "To Sum Up". That is a bright paragraph heading. This is what he says with regard to the bill:

> The object of this bill is not to destroy and erase at one stroke the traditions of the past but to build, on the solid foundation we have forged, a strong and viable force to meet Canada's needs of tomorrow.

Well, we know he has, in fact, destroyed at one stroke the traditions of the past. He has virtually wiped out the navy and its tradition. He has already effectively wiped out the traditions of the air force and the army. He talks about Canada's needs for tomorrow which, in the minister's mind, will be so different from Canada's needs today and are so different from Canada's needs ten years ago. Apparently he had a special perception of the future. Then he goes on to say:

> I believe that the present division into three separate service components imposes restrictions and that these barriers should be removed both in the interests of the most effective military forces for the future and in the interest of the men and women who belong to the force.

What are these barriers? He does not tell us, but he goes on to say this:

> That is the essence of this bill. It has nothing to do with the question of naval forces, land forces, air forces or even space forces. Rather, it has to do with the management, the strategic and operational planning, the training and support, the capacity of the force to adjust to changing requirements, and the ability of the force to provide meaningful, challenging and rewarding careers for service personnel. All of these needs are enhanced by unification rather than the traditional separation of the men and women who comprise the force into three components.

Well, in that paragraph the minister's brain trust produced quite a bit of gobbledegook—I think that is how it should be categorized. We are told that the essence of this bill has nothing to do with naval forces, land forces or air forces. I am uncertain as to the minister's real objective. He talks of a single unified force, yet on the other hand he says there will always be sailors, soldiers and airmen.

We have not objected to certain aspects of integration—integration of the supply and administrative services. We have not objected to the training of the high command in the knowledge of operations by land, sea and air. Indeed I think that is essential in order that in combined operations, which are as old as history, our commanders in this modern age may be able to adapt themselves to the use of forces in the three elements. We have not objected to that. But we have objected to the single chief of defence staff, and we are objecting to the single unified force.

Sir, the single unified force seems to us and to people who have been writing about this subject to be designed to promote one aspect only of Canada's defence. I intend to quote from an article written by the former chief of staff, Air Chief Marshal F. R. Miller. He has since retired; I do not know what his attitude is, or was, with regard to unification. At any rate he wrote this article which appeared in the Canadian Forces Sentinel of June, 1966. The article is called "The Decisive Years" and it was directed primarily to university undergraduates and senior high school students in order to encourage them to enter the services—an object of which I approve. He says this:

> Operationally, Canadian servicemen are being employed more and more in peacekeeping, or "fire brigade", roles.

Later on, he says:

> Today the Canadian serviceman is, first and foremost, a man of peace. He is still trained to use his weapons, and use them well, but there has been a subtle change in his prime purpose. Once it was to fight and win. Now he must add the role of preventing or halting bloodshed.
> His duty, in essence, is the assertion of the rule of law as well.

Our Canadian servicemen have, very commendably, been undertaking United Nations peace keeping operations in various parts of the world and the policy of this government as expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) seems to be directed toward enlarging Canada's contribution to peace keeping forces for the United Nations.

National Defence Act Amendment

The change that is taking place in the forces appears to be directed along that line, with the navy dropping its anti-submarine role and the air force dropping its attack force role, bomber fleet and strike reconnaissance role in order to give transport assistance and close support to a land force, with the navy also providing transport assistance. With the sanction of the government this is what the minister appears to be aiming at, but at the same time he says, "Oh no, we are going to maintain our contribution to NATO although it may be reduced in size from time to time. We are going to maintain our military alliance with the United States in NORAD, and maintain our connection with the Commonwealth for military purposes, if required." But recently the minister has come around to putting United Nations peace keeping operations in the forefront, and this is where I think he has gone wrong.

I do not think there is any objection in this house or throughout Canada to activity by Canadians in peace keeping operations, but I believe these peace keeping operations should be separated from our military forces, navy, army and air force. Most of this work has been done by army personnel, and in this connection I mention the Gaza strip, the Congo, Cyprus, and the International Control Commission, the brightest organization in the eyes of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin). We also have people stationed in various other parts of the world, but most of the work has been and is being done by the army. I believe we should separate our peace keeping role from the armed services. Our peace keeping forces have not been obliged to intervene to put down insurrections. So far as I know they have not engaged in fighting. They have defensive weapons in case they are attacked or unexpected trouble occurs, but they have not been used to suppress military activities in any country. We had signal personnel in the Congo. I presume if we had had infantry there the United Nations might have used them in a combatant role, but that has not been our history over quite a number of years, and so I say we should make a division of our objects, and for our peace keeping operations we should have a force separate and apart from our armed forces.

If a Canadian peace keeping force under United Nations auspices is assigned to some country where there is trouble, I think that force should not be a regiment or a battalion of the army, or ships from the navy, or aircraft from our air force, except transport craft. Here is where the minister could really achieve something worth while by setting up a special force which would have to be disciplined, trained, and administered for supply purposes from defence headquarters, with a special uniform, equipped only with protective weapons such as rifle, revolver, armoured scout cars if in terrain where irregulars might attack them, and let that type of force operate for peace keeping purposes. Make it an elite force of specially selected and specially trained men.

I think the effect on the country in which that force would be operating would be better than if we assigned an organized military force to undertake that role. I do not think there would be objection from the country or countries concerned, if this type of force were available. It would convey no idea of aggression because it would not be armed for that purpose. It would contain no idea of aggression because it would not represent the navy, army and air force of this country, or would not represent a single unified force of this country.

I put this idea in front of the minister and say to him, "Consider setting up a force of that nature with a strength of, say, 3,000"—at present we have 1,800 people engaged in these foreign operations under the United Nations—"and maintain the navy, the army and the air force for the defence of Canada, for our operations with NATO and for our military alliance with the United States." If the United Nations gets involved in a struggle in which forces have to take an active part, only then would I dispatch Canadian forces from our armed forces.

The minister and Canada as a whole can have both forces. We can continue our peace keeping operations under the United Nations, because I think that is essential, and we can have the army, navy and air force to fulfil their important role with regard to the defence of Canada and to meet Canada's obligations under her military commitments with other countries, We can have it both ways and everybody will be satisfied. We do not need to have a single unified force in order to carry out United Nations operations. We could have a separate force for that.

I was unable, Mr. Speaker, to think of a suitably spectacular name for such a force, but some of the bright people in the Department of National Defence or in the Department of External Affairs, which considers itself somewhat superior, might come up with a suitable name for that special force. If such a force were set aside then you would not have to draw on Canadian battalions and reduce their strength for other purposes; you would not have to draw on fighter aircraft and fighter pilots from the air force. You would have people whose definite role for a period of time would be a United Nations peace keeping role, something like a constabulary. I do not like that term because I think it is a little out-dated. Neither would I like to call it a police force —I don't like the word police. But we could call it something else. We could call it the Canadian Peace Keeping Force, which gives four initials. I present this suggestion to the minister with my compliments and I think he should do something about it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I must advise him that the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. J. Chester MacRae (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I wish to enter this debate on the unification bill, first because of a life-long interest in the military, and more especially the army, an interest which goes back many years to a high school cadet corps, and second, because in my constituency there is situated what is considered to be one of the finest military establishments not only in this country but in the entire world. I refer of course to Camp Gagetown, which is now part of the new mobile command.

The third reason I enter this debate is, the same for me as for all other Canadians, that we believe our way of life is the right way, and we are prepared if necessary to fight in its defence should the need again arise, even to the extent of engaging in a full scale war. But, Mr. Speaker, if I may interject a personal note, having served in world war II as a front-line soldier I pray that never again will we have another world war, because man now possesses the nuclear capability of destroying our civilization as we know it.

Before criticizing this legislation and asking the minister some questions, I would like to thank both him and the associate minister for the many courtesies they have extended to me on the problems that I have taken to them over the past months, as a matter of fact, over the past three years. Since the bulk of the matters that I have raised have dealt with personnel, with the problems of serving soldiers and their dependants, my correspondence for the most part has been with the associate minister and I would like to take this opportunity to thank him especially for his assistance. My letters have always been answered promptly and, where possible, the answer that I sought for my constituent was a favourable one. I realize that you cannot win them all, but I feel that the minister has been very helpful. I am very grateful for that assistance.

I should like to comment on a decision made this past week wherein the minister announced that henceforth pipers are to be classed as musicians. The minister may recall that some few months or so ago I wrote to him on two or three occasions in this connection. I love the pipes, as I think most persons of Scottish ancestry do. The pipes and drums of the Royal Highlanders of Canada, the Black Watch regiment which is now stationed in Camp Gagetown, have become known all over North America and even beyond. Only recently they were on one of the great national television shows of the United States. To classify these pipers as musicians is the only right and fair thing to do. I am surprised that this was not always the case.

There are many matters which I should like to raise dealing with specific cases of men in the services, but I decided I would wait until the minister's estimates are before us. They concern such matters as elected representation in the town of Oromocto. I have some suggestions for the minister in this regard which I think he would welcome. I also have some constructive suggestions, I believe, about the soldier vote, about pension service of veterans serving in the regular forces and other matters of that nature. Even though on second reading the debate can be rather free-wheeling, these matters I believe can wait until another time.

There is, however, one matter which I think is within the purview of this debate. I should like to commend the government about this too; that is, the re-engagement bonus which was instituted some time ago. This was a very important issue in my area where we have a very large concentration of troops. In the election campaign which was held in the fall of 1965 I stressed that I was very much in favour of this. I raised the matter with the ministry and I am very pleased to see that this was done. I am sure it is a measure which made those troops who were able to benefit from it very happy indeed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having said those more pleasant things, I should like to discuss unification and integration. There are a few criticisms I should like to make and I hope that they will be considered as constructive. I feel that is the only type of criticism which is of any value. Otherwise we would be wasting our time. I should like to raise the matter of the militia of this country. The militia has been affected greatly by this matter of unification. Unfortunately it seems to have been very much downgraded. A few years ago the role of the militia was changed, and it was given a more active role in the whole vital field of civil defence. I have had considerable correspondence from serving officers in militia units, especially in eastern Canada. Those letters indicate that the officers and senior N.C.O.'s especially are very unhappy. Now, what is the trouble? I suppose most of the troubles are those which the Minister of National Defence has heard many times before. There is the lack of proper equipment to do a job, and specifically the lack of vehicles.

When you have a militia unit which is spread over a distance of several hundred miles with four, five or six companies—infantry regiments normally have six companies—the only way in which stores and personnel can be moved is with road transport. With many units, the vehicles are old and not functioning properly. When a vehicle breaks down, that is the end of it; they do not get a replacement. I believe the militia still has a very definite role to play in this nation. Some of us, from our experience, know that in 1939 and 1940 the Canadian army had a firm springboard from which to launch itself. Thousands of excellent officers and N.C.O.'s —many now in this house—went right from the non-permanent active militia to the Canadian army, navy and air force.

Another complaint is that adequate training time is not allotted to these units. I have been led to believe there is some discrimination against the maritime units in the matter of training time as opposed to units in other parts of Canada. It disturbs me to think that this might be so. I would appreciate it if the minister would look into this matter. Recently a very distinguished former minister of national defence, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness), wrote about this matter. I should like to quote him because I think what he has to say is sound. He speaks from broad experience as a militia officer and as commander of an artillery regiment in world war II, and he also speaks from his experience as a former minister of national defence:

> The direct defence of Canada also requires strong militia or reserve forces and it is only by the maintenance of such forces that numbers of trained men in organized units can be provided. A strong militia is also essential to carry on the survival operations, which would be the most important immediate task of our armed forces in the event of a nuclear attack. In addition, reserves are necessary to provide some of the personnel likely to be required for United Nations operations. The Korean war was an example, and to provide the numbers required for rapid expansion of our regular forces in any emergency.

I do not agree with what the government is doing in respect of unification of our Canadian armed forces. I am deeply disturbed to see so many senior officers leaving the service prematurely—not only senior officers, but others not so senior who I believe should have been retained until the end of their service. As I understand it, in many cases what they were suggesting was that we should proceed more slowly with what was being attempted. In other cases, of course, there was outright opposition to this whole program of unification. Like all members of parliament I have received the material which has been prepared by the Tri-Services Identities Organization—TRIO—as it is usually called. Recently, among the material which we received, there was a copy of an open letter to the Prime Minister of Canada. In this letter the gentlemen who formed this group—which is non-political—have outlined their position. They say, and I agree with them, that they are left with grave doubts concerning what is going on. They say there are a number of questions which are fundamental but which are unanswered. The TRIO group sets these out very well. I should like to place these on the record.

First, what is to be the future role of Canada's defence forces in terms of specific military tasks? Second, is Canada to rely for its defence in the future on alliances such as NATO and NORAD, and if it is, what type of military contribution is Canada expected to make to these alliances? Third, how is a requirement for mobilization to meet an emergency and up to a tenfold expansion in the numerical strength of Canada's forces provided for in this unified force which is envisaged? Fourth, what are the specific advantages in a single military service that are not attainable under an integrated three service system? This brings up the point, that many of us see considerable value in having some integration, but we cannot see the value of unification. Fifth, what are the criteria for militarily effective forces? Could these be met to the same degreee in a single force as in a three service system. Finally, would a single military force be capable of operating effectively with the military forces of our allies, remembering always that none of our allies at this time have a single military force?

I believe that the Minister of National Defence owes it not only to TRIO, who have pointed out so well the questions that are troubling them, but also to the people of Canada to tell them much more explicitly than heretofore just exactly what are the advantages and disadvantages, what are the pros and cons of this whole matter of the unification of our forces.

It has been suggested, especially by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) that a United Nations police force would be one of the most effective ways of maintaining peace in this world. I recently read a very interesting article by Major General Carl Von Horn, who indicated in the article that he was deeply critical of the United Nations peace keeping missions. General Von Horn, who is a Swedish officer, took over from Canada's General Burns as chief of the staff of the UN truce supervisory organization in Palestine in 1958. He went on to command the United Nations forces in the Congo and later in Yemen. He writes that the troops he commanded were excellent, that their morale was high, despite humiliations, but that the United Nations civilian administrators "were so petty they made the soldiers feel like second class citizens".

This is a very damning indictment against the United Nations. I read his remarks with a great deal of interest because I spent some time at the United Nations a few years ago at a very interesting session. I had the opportunity there to watch the direction that the United Nations was taking, and how rapidly it was changing with the advent of the many small African nations. Not only does General Von Horn say that United Nations peace keeping efforts have been a complete mess, but he makes the charge in his memoirs that corruption is rife among United Nations officials on peace keeping missions. These are very serious charges. I believe that in this world, with two great power blocs, the U.S.S.R. and the United States, the really serious arguments will have to be settled by direct negotiation between the United States and the U.S.S.R.

I should like to put on record the opinion of two of Canada's most distinguished generals, which I do not think have been put on record in this debate before. I refer to General G. G. Simonds and General Vokes.

They had this to say:

> The aim of military policy in peace time must be to prepare for the worst eventuality, which would be the outbreak of a major war in which we would become involved. No matter how remote this eventuality may seem, employment of our standing military forces on peace enforcement tasks is a contingency which is secondary to the above aim. To prepare for war is not militarism. It merely faces up to the cold, hard facts which will govern our future existence as a sovereign power.

Generals Simonds and Vokes say that our military structure in peacetime must be so organized that it can pass rapidly and efficiently to a war footing. Therefore it must be measured by this: Is it capable of assuming the burden which will be placed on it in the event of the requirement to mobilize our military force to maximum national capacity? If it does not measure up to this, then it is of doubtful value. This preparation for war does not demand a large standing military force in peacetime, but it does require the maintenance of professional and military know-how by maintaining the trained nucleus to provide the framework for a planned and tidy mobilization.

Fortunately since world war II and because of our military commitments through membership in NATO and the UN, Canada maintained standing military forces today that are many times greater than at any other peacetime period in our history. Because of this the military expertise which began to flower in the Canadian Armed Forces in world war II has remained in bloom. Thus the regular Canadian sailors, soldiers and airmen are highly skilled, professional military men. Those who have risen to senior rank by education and experience are military experts of a high order, and their advice on matters pertaining to the military service should never be disregarded. It would appear that in far too many cases this has been so.

It is very easy for the government to impose its will on senior service officers by retiring them out of hand if they disagree with the policy which, because of their training and experience, they know to be dangerous to the future military welfare of their country.

I am disturbed, and I am sure many Canadians have been deeply disturbed, by the premature retirement of so many of Canada's ablest soldiers, sailors and airmen. I am disturbed by what is happening to our armed forces. I am disturbed by what is happening to the great traditions of the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army, and the Royal Canadian Air Force. I can see that some integration might be a good thing. Certainly, there is some integration in the forces now, and we accept it, and think it should be given a fair show. However, unification of all our forces is another matter.

In the past we have had in Canada, in peace and in war, some of the finest sailors, soldiers, and airmen in the world. I can see no value in putting our armed forces in uniforms of one single colour. There is no question of course that we want efficiency and economy in the administration of our armed forces. We realize only too well that defence costs a great deal.

I would urge the Minister of National Defence, with all the power at my command, to stop and take another look at what he is doing. Because, if this great experiment on which he is embarked should prove to be the wrong one, irreparable damage will be done to our armed forces and to our whole defence system, which could require decades to correct.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, when I took part in this debate at the resolution stage I appealed to the minister to refer this important matter of national defence to the standing committee. He did not pay heed to that appeal, and I thought that, having advanced to the second reading stage, the appeal had been lost. I had not intended to take part in this debate during second reading, but wish to do so now because of two things which occurred today. First, the minister in reply to a question posed by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) indicated that the present discussion was taking place on what he called a primitive level of knowledge.

He did not specify the names of those who were participating on that level of military intelligence, but I think it is a significant commentary on the lack of clearcut and specific information that has been forthcoming from the minister and his advisers during the course of the discussion which now has spread over more than a two-year period.

Debate is supposed to broaden knowledge; it is supposed to clarify issues and assist in determining policy. If at this stage of the discussion, having advanced to the second reading of the bill now before us, which will be discussed in detail in due course, the minister still refers to the contributions of members of the opposition and others taking part in the debate as being on a primitive level, I am sure he is partly, if not entirely, responsible.

I have read very carefully the statement made on December 7 last with a view to broadening my knowledge of the fundamental purposes and policies of the minister. I wanted to avoid being classified among those hon. members who possess a primitive knowledge of these matters. But for the life of me I cannot discover in that speech a specific policy, particularly a policy which might lead to the conclusion that unification, as the minister keeps insisting over and over again, will establish greater economies in Canada's armed forces and produce an organizational set-up which might be described as more efficient than that which would exist under a program of integration. I say right at the outset that I am all for integration and have always been in favour if integration, as is everyone who has concerned himself with military matters, in the wake of the tremendous technological changes that have taken place in the past two decades. But it is this word unification that is confounding even the pundits.

Just to demonstrate that point, the minister's speech on December 7, listed under very nice headings, is a lovely essay in the organization of prose. It is full of words and phrases, a few of which I should like to quote as illustrations to indicate the dilemma that faces an ordinary member of parliament in trying to interpret the mysteries of this wonderful program of unification. Here is what Mr. George Bain said when commenting on the problem that he faced in interpreting the gobbledegook prose in which the speech was phrased:

> Everybody who knows anything about defence knows that an ample supply of logistical hardware is one of the prime needs of the day. Obviously, if logistical hardware is to be of any use at all, it must be systematized.
> So there you are: "It seems to me, if I may say so, that the defense department in its current posture is not giving enough attention to systematized logistical hardware." After that, you can say anything; you are a certified expert.
> Functional management capability. Is anyone against functional management capability in our defence department—communists excepted, of course? Balanced digital options. It may not mean much, but, by George, it has a ring to it, hasn't it?

If I may digress for a moment to the minister's speech, it had a fine oratorical ring to it. It contains that wonderful phraseology that is today peculiar to the pursuits of the men in grey flannel suits. Returning to the article by George Bain, he said:

> Now, get in there and blind them with footwork. It's astonishing all the information you get in this newspaper for a lousy dime.

I would paraphrase and say it is wonderful, all the information you get in Hansard, and I think it costs only a nickel. There is even more information in Hansard, and it costs only five cents. This applies particularly to Hansard for last December 7.

An hon. Member: It is $3 a year.

Mr. Dinsdale: I do not intend to make this a commercial on behalf of Hansard but it is, as the hon. member suggests, $3 a year. I am sure that is a good investment.

Mr. Knowles: It is $3 a session, which may be two years.

Mr. Hellyer: Buy now, read later.

Mr. Dinsdale: It is because of the aura of confusion that has surrounded the subject of service reorganization, as a result of statements, phraseology and public relations gobbledygook, that I am entering the debate at this stage. I think only by a close and detailed analysis of the problem, and this can only be carried out in a parliamentary committee, will we sort out fact from fiction. Certainly it is only by that face to face confrontation that becomes possible between members of parliament and the experts in the Department of National Defence, particularly those experts who have been fired because they disagreed with the so-called policy enunciated in the minister's speech, that we can sort out fact from fiction.

Sooner or later we will have to come to grips with the matter in the defence committee. The tragedy is that we are proceeding, to quote the minister again, on the primitive level of knowledge at this important second reading stage. We could have had the opportunity to listen to well qualified critics, such as General Foulkes, to enlighten us as to why he now disagrees with the trend that the government's integration policy has taken.

The contribution of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. McNulty) is another reason for my wanting to take a few minutes of the time of the house this evening to try to clarify some of the confusion. A good deal of the hon. member's speech this afternoon was taken up in reading a quotation of General Foulkes, the former Chief of Defence Staff, from an article written in 1961 which was highly in favour of integration. I am sure that most members of the Department of National Defence were in favour of integration, because it had been proceeding at a steady and logical pace for a number of years under several ministers. As the Minister of National Defence pointed out in the preamble to his speech of last December, integration is not a new concept and has been proceeding at a reasonable and logical pace over a number of years.

I asked the hon. member for Lincoln whether he had read the sentiments of General Foulkes as expressed in three articles which appeared last year in the Ottawa Journal and in other newspapers across the country. This was five years after 1961. I will take this opportunity to read a short excerpt from General Foulkes' statement, which indicates why he is now disturbed by the current trend of government policy. This was the first in a series of articles and I will start by reading the opening paragraph. It reads as follows:

> I know all the senior officers who have been involved in this controversy with defence minister Hellyer over integration. Most of them have served with me in peace and war and I have had an opportunity to evaluate their ability, knowledge and character. I have a high regard for their professional skill, loyalty and esprit de corps and their devotion to the Canadian defence effort is above reproach.
> I am sure that if these senior officers had not believed fully in the concept of integration, they would have not have accepted their appointments on the armed forces headquarters staff, knowing full well that their task was to implement the integration scheme.
> The only logical conclusion that can be reached on the recent mass retirements is that there is a profound disagreement on the method and pace of implementing this novel and complicated military reorganization.

I think this points up the problem which confronts parliament. Suddenly integration has turned into unification. Anyone who disagrees with the sudden transformation is fired. The minister, in his white paper of 1964 indicated that unification was the ultimate objective. The statement was in the final phrase of that paragraph and was almost an afterthought. This is the impression which I got from the minister's speech, that he suddenly dreamed up the concept of unification, and unification, whatever it means, had a good ring to it. It seems to me that now he is improvising a policy to fit that vague word. This is a trial-and-error proposition. This is what disturbed General Foulkes, and what has disturbed most of the senior officers who were heartily in favour of integration but who have retired prematurely or were fired by the minister because they did not agree with this vague, and ill-defined concept of unification. Judging from their comments it would seem to me that the fact which concerned them most was the thought that we were proceeding at such a hectic pace to achieve the propaganda goal of unification without policy guide lines that we were placing our present defence structure in jeopardy, so far as the maintenance of the basic responsibilities of a defence force of any country is concerned, and that is the security of our nation.

Unfortunately the senior officers who are now advising the minister are ardent exponents of unification, and have been active promoting it in defence establishments across the country and in making public statements in support of this vague concept. I suggest that ultimately those who have the good fortune to be serving on the defence committee will have a chance to come face to face with the experts on both sides of the question. It is tragic that we have arrived at a stage of the debate at which the rapid process of unification is irreversible. The very propaganda activities of the upper echelons of the officer corps have so saturated the thinking of some of the members of the armed forces that the process has become irreversible, and the pace has been so fast that confusion, uncertainty and misunderstanding amounting to demoralization have become rampant in the armed forces.

As General Foulkes intimated in the introduction to his series of articles, the proposed unification has brought about the exodus of highly responsible and most experienced members of Canada's armed forces, as well as the premature exodus of a large number of service personnel.

I must say that I have tried to understand what the minister means by unification. As I have intimated, I can understand integration. Integration was designed to streamline the Canadian armed forces, to gear it to the demands of defence in the technological and military situation of today. However, unification is a change for the sake of change. This afternoon the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. McIntosh) dealt with this in some detail. In carefully analysing the minister's speech he pointed out the contradictions it contains. At one point the minister said that there will be a single service and at another he said that the services in their respective environments will preserve their individual identities. No wonder we are confused on these matters and, no wonder many members of the armed forces have retired in confusion.

I question the minister's claim that unification will produce greater economies and greater efficiency in the armed forces. No less a defence critic than Mr. John Gellner, writing in the Globe and Mail last November, expressed the same anxieties as we have expressed in the course of the debate.

The following is a quotation from his article:

> The defence debate over the past months has been conducted on a distressingly low level—lower, if anything, than the last one, in early 1963, which brought down the Diefenbaker government. Then, it was nuclear weapons; now it is service unification. But the point at issue is the same in both cases: What is the purpose, the mission, of the Canadian armed forces?
> Unfortunately, this fundamental question was not posed then, let alone answered. It is not being posed now. Four years ago, Canada had largely irrelevant discussions about such matters as the value, if any, of Bomarc missiles, with or without nuclear warheads.
>
> At present, Canada is having an equally irrelevant debate about the virtue of maintaining service traditions. Yet it should be clear that unless it is first determined what the Canadian armed forces are for, the problem of unification and whether it will help or hinder Canada's military effort, it cannot be tackled intelligently.

• (9:20 p.m.)

I have tried to determine what policy decisions might be behind the minister's breakneck pace toward the mystical goal of unification. The only conclusion to which I have come, and others have come to the same conclusion, is that there is a fundamental policy change to convert the Canadian armed forces to an international police force. This, as I read the white paper, was the lowest priority back in 1964. Unification, it seems to me, is reversing the priorities and placing this peace keeping role into a position of priority ahead of the basic function of defence forces, that is the security of the nation, and ahead of the other priorities of commitments to the alliances and the military responsibilities that are ours.

I know the Prime Minister has long had in mind the goal of the peace keeping role. This goes back I believe to about 1956, at the time of the Suez crisis when the United Nations first put a peace keeping force on the Gaza strip to separate Israel and Egypt. Of course, prior to that we had the Korean war, but that was hardly a peace keeping effort. It was a full blown war. If Canada's armed forces are converted exclusively to a police force function, it means that we lose our influence as contributors to peace keeping forces; we lose our influence as a middle power. This influence has been built up over a number of years during the course of Canada's history, largely because of the nature of the contributions Canada's armed forces have made in world conflicts in this generation. We had no political objectives; we had no desire for military aggrandisement or political aggrandisement. Our sole objective in participating in the world wars of this century has been the preservation of our free way of life.

Our contributions have been made at tremendous cost of Canadian lives, Canadian manpower and Canadian resources. This contribution was made without any ulterior motive whatever. It was on this basis that we have been able to serve in the United Nations councils as a middle power, accepted by both sides in the power struggle that has gone on in the world since the end of world war II. In addition, we are going to lose our moral influence. While this is intangible, I would submit that it has been the source of Canada's strength in the United Nations and in other military and international organizations. The moral factor of Canada's willingness to serve without any nationalistic desires or objectives of her own has been important.

Once we convert our armed force to a glorified police force, we have to depend on somebody for our security. It is not good enough, Mr. Speaker, to say we cannot defend ourselves in any case in the face of the threat of nuclear weapons and a global conflict. This gainsays the main issue, the issue that is the number one priority, and that is the security and defence of our own shores. This is the fundamental function of our armed forces. If we reduce our armed force to a police force, then we automatically surrender a substantial part of our sovereignty and we come under the military aegis of our powerful neighbour to the south.

If we are under the aegis of the United States in any shape or form, if we surrender our military sovereignty, it would be just as disastrous as surrendering our economic sovereignty, a subject which is racking the government at the present time. It seems to me there is an inconsistency in policy in this respect. This denotes a general confusion at the level of government policy which has produced so much uncertainty across the nation.

In so far as our major obligations to NATO are concerned, and no doubt the minister will be discussing this in the defence committee, I fail to see how a unified force, particularly a single service force as it is conceived by the minister, will fit into the structure of our obligations under the NATO organization. Perhaps the minister can see it, but the rest of us cannot see it. We are proceeding at this reckless, breakneck speed even before NATO has determined the force requirements that will be necessary in the future. As I understand it, the minister, in reports following NATO meetings, has not yet been informed that there have been any decisions concerning what the NATO forces requirements will be. In spite of this, we are proceeding with this radical, structural reorganization, in the direction of the single force which obviously will make it impossible for us to continue to meet our obligations under the NATO treaty.

I should like to move on to another subject with which the minister has concerned himself recently, other than service unification. He has been making statements on urban policy, and his philosophy in meeting the problems of urbanization is the reverse of his philosophy in meeting the problems of defence organization in the face of a rapidly changing society, technological revolution and so forth. The minister favours decentralization and dispersal. He is afraid that centralization, the trend toward bigness, the trend toward monolithic unity, which is the natural trend in the sort of world in which we live, is contrary to the best interests of a rationally organized urban community and will foster problems of social confusion and social disorganization.

I agree with the minister in his concept of meeting the obvious problems of urbanization in the urban communities across Canada, and I would ask him to apply the same philosophy to the concept of armed forces organization, where he insists you must have solidarity always. Certainly firing anyone who disagrees with unification, or monolithic unity, is not the way to get a rational and intelligent defence force.

With regard to the three services in the armed forces, I am not so much concerned about the uniform problem or the rank problem. Regardless of how loudly the minister declaims that this concept will become the model for armed forces around the world and will produce astronomical economies and fantastic efficiency, and regardless of how this concept is put in the language of public relations, I contend that if we remove the elements of criticism, of healthy discussion and differentiation within the armed forces, our armed forces are going to lose a great deal of their effectiveness.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I think that anyone who looks at the matter conscientiously and sincerely today will agree that as a result of the overwhelming desire of the minister to proceed to this mystical goal our defence forces are placed in serious jeopardy at this moment. I have talked to many military people; I receive communications from military people; I visit defence installations across the country, and I find that there is a serious lowering of morale. There is a loss of esprit de corps. The pace of change has proceeded so rapidly there is confusion in the military centres across Canada.

I give one illustration of this. There is a joint air training centre at Rivers, Manitoba. Actually this is the only unified or integrated base of the armed forces at the moment, I would think and has been for a number of years. At Rivers there is co-operation among the three services who are living happily under the same roof. They have been proceeding toward the common goal of greater integration. Yet at this station there is grave uncertainty. There is the feeling that it is one station which will be seriously disorganized if not eliminated as we proceed toward the goal which is away beyond what was ever conceived by integration, that of unification. It seems to be a strange paradox, an illogical situation, Mr. Speaker, that the one station dedicated to the concept of integration and which has actually carried forward its training program on this basis should find itself in this demoralized condition. I am sure similar situations could be found in other military installations across the country.

I close with this, Mr. Speaker. The fundamental purpose and responsibility of the armed forces of Canada, or the Canadian defence forces, or whatever you wish to call them—a rose by any other name would smell as sweet; the language or terminology is not of any great importance—is the defence of the security of this nation at the present time. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if we were at this time faced with a serious threat, because of the obvious confusion rampant in the armed forces we would not be able to meet our obligations. We depend on volunteers to man the Canadian armed forces, we are largely a citizens army.

Unification, Mr. Speaker, this streamlining which is contemplated by the program the minister has in mind, would turn our armed forces into a body of highly trained mercenaries, devoid of the esprit de corps that comes from traditions, loyalty to the nation, loyalty to the cause of freedom, objectives that have made it possible for the Canadian serviceman in the great wars of this century to establish such an enviable reputation.

I do not think I am exaggerating in this respect. It seems to me that the wholesale exodus of our Canadian military officer élite, their public criticisms of the minister's proposal, and the reversal of General Foulkes' opinion from his statement in 1961 to his statement last fall, bears out this fact.

I am also sure, Mr. Speaker, that as the defence committee comes to grips with the details of the proposals outlined in the bill now before us, this is the conclusion that will be reached. The tragedy is that it might be too late for the safety of the nation. It is for this reason that I decided to speak at this stage of the debate and to appeal once again for a face to face confrontation with the men who have placed their careers and their reputations on the line by opposing this program of unification.

The bill will eventually arrive in the committee; the sooner the better. I trust that as the debate proceeds the minister might even now be persuaded to give the members of the house the opportunity of taking this close look in committee, which is the only way we will ever sort out fact from fiction.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, members in the house have been indicating different reasons for their participation in this second reading debate today. I could enumerate several reasons for my participation but mainly I take part in the debate because I disagree entirely with the idea that unification will bring about the desired objective of the minister. I could also state that I disapprove of his dishonest approach in this whole matter.

Mr. Prud'homme: Come on.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I disapproved of his attitude last fall, with regard to the charges laid in this house, charges which were substantiated by the sworn testimony of Admiral Landymore. The minister referred to the member who brought these charges as lacking the guts to make the proper charge. Everyone in the house realizes that the proper charge was made, and if there was any lack of guts we know where it was.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I cannot identify the hon. member sitting across the way, but if I could I would put him in his place.

Mr. Prud'homme: I am not sitting in my place.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): You are sitting in a seat and yak-yak-yaking. You do not participate in the debate as you should.

Mr. Prud'homme: I shall soon.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Then I look forward to listening to you and I will surrender the floor the minute you have the guts to get up.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would ask the hon. member to continue his speech.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I have trouble making up my mind whether to follow your instruction or listen to the yacking over on the other side of the house. I would think it was the duty of the Chair to put him in his place, should he seek to continue as he is doing.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for his guidance, which I will try to take into account. However, the hon. member has spoken for a minute or two, and if he will read Hansard he will find that nothing he has said up to now has much to do with the debate upon which the house is engaged, and I would invite him to limit his comments to the bill now before us.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): All I can say to that is that I accept Your Honour's ruling.

With respect to the approach taken by the minister in this matter, I would refer to his attitude last fall and the charges which were then made in this house, as well as to the fact that there is an affidavit to the effect that evidence before the committee was altered. I have yet to see any sign of an affidavit from the minister that this was not the case. He will shake his head, but I should like to see it put down in the form of a note as was done when it was claimed an alteration had been made.

Turning again to the events of last fall, the minister had this to say as reported at page 9647 of Hansard for November 7:

> A number of points have been raised during the debate and I should like to take this opportunity to deal with some of them. The first major point that seems to keep recurring in many of the speeches which have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite is in respect of lack of information regarding the unification and progress of integration of the armed forces.

He went on to refer to an example brought up by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) and then he continued:

> In reply to the hon. member for Calgary North and other members of the opposition who have raised this point, I must reiterate that never before in Canadian history have this house, its committees and the public been given so much information on our force structure, our present and future policies and the capabilities of our forces.

That was quite a mouthful for the minister to utter when one considers that it is precisely this lack of information about which the public is continually complaining. If the minister does not care to believe me, I suggest he go to the files of the Prime Minister and read some of the letters which have been received in that office, copies of which have been sent to other hon. members. He will find there letters from the Air Force Officers Association, the Tri-Service Identity Organization, the Naval Officers Association—all groups which are interested and active in the affairs of the Canadian Armed Forces.

It is obvious that the minister's approach to this question is altogether wrong. We are developing in Canada something which belongs under a dictatorship. What is democratic about the idea of having among us a propaganda team or a propaganda force as was indicated this morning in the house by the minister's acceptance of that charge? He can look at Hansard tomorrow and read his answer about the propaganda team. They are still operating up there. I will say to them: Don't let me catch you passing a note or you will not be there too long. The minister indicated this afternoon in answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) that he does, indeed, have a propaganda team at work, and that he accepts the statement made to that effect.

What is propaganda? It is the spreading of lies for the minister's own advantage or, I was about to say, for the advantage of the government. But that would hardly be fair. The government is not in attendance. I have yet to hear any member of the government get up and defend the minister's position with regard to unification. Look around. Who is here in support of the minister? Nobody. The minister is trying to put this legislation through the house without the support of a single colleague. Of course it is not hard to understand why they cannot get together. The minister has had some support from the Liberal side of the house. Again I refer to last fall when a speech was made by the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) who sought to quote various authorities in support of the minister's position. His approach to this theme was dishonest because he did not quote what those authorities had actually been saying. The hon. member shakes his head. I suggest he read over that speech and compare it with the following statement by General Foulkes, who has often been mentioned this evening. I quote this statement by General Foulkes:

> The only other record of wholesale changes in the military occurred in the Hitler regime. He dismissed every general who dared to tell him what he should know and not what he liked to hear.

Check that statement against what the hon. member for Verdun said last fall. It will soon be found that the hon. member was misquoting the general in his efforts to defend the minister's policy.

I should probably refer to the minister's attitude once again because I believe it should be emphasized over and over again. In any other country he would be in jail.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): You laugh? Last fall the same minister denied what I put on record here, indicating that in any other country in the free world he would be in jail. He shook his head at that time and made a denial; but I produced for him his own words which told him what parliamentary language does not permit me to call him.

He knows he put that on record. He knows what he did. He knows that in any other country in this world he would either be in jail or something a lot more drastic would have happened to him. Yet this is the man who is today trying to push unification down the throats of the Canadian people. This is the man who has brought about the retirement of so many people from the services—people who were of great value to this country. Those who remain in the services for their own reasons cannot, or will not make their views known on the question of unification. Those who have spoken out have made their statements after voluntarily retiring from the services, and there are many of these, very capable men, who have taken exception to the course the minister is pursuing.

Where does the minister get his advice? Evidence has come to me very recently that he has rejected the advice of officers on his staff, his own boys. What about his propaganda team? What are they doing to the Canadian people? To whom are they directing their propaganda? They continue to harp the same tune—that the old soaks and the veterans do not matter, anyway. But I can tell the minister that if a national emergency arose he would find himself obliged to call on a lot of people who are today in disagreement with him. Today he says their opinions do not matter. They are primitive, to use an expression the minister used this morning. The fact remains that when some of the senior officers were retired they were younger than the minister himself. Does he believe their views are primitive?

Where does the minister get his experience? I am sure he did not gain much experience riding that motorcycle around during the war. Yet this is about all he has behind him to call upon. Where does he get his advice, and when does he decide not to take that advice, as I have indicated was the case very recently when Canadian staff officers put forward their views?

The minister has said that certain information is not available. All he needs do is go to his files or to the Prime Minister's files. Many letters and briefs were addressed to the Prime Minister, so possibly he should look in the Prime Minister's files.

I would like to see the Prime Minister come into this house and tell us where he stands on unification. Is the Prime Minister, as in so many other matters, letting the ministers run wild and make their own decisions? I recall a statement made recently by the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) referring to the return to the cabinet of the new Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gordon), the former minister of finance. She referred to him as the glue that kept them together. Someone else said that that was another way of saying they were stuck with Gordon.

But returning to the minister's propaganda team, they are aiming their propaganda at the large segment of the population under 30 years of age. They do not care about the opinions of former servicemen and present serving officers and men. I never heard of a propaganda team in a democracy previously, but thanks to this minister and his dictatorial attitude we now have certain things that were brought about by dictators in the past. Again I refer to the recent statement made by General Foulkes who said of one dictator that he dismissed every general who told him what he should know, and not what he would have liked to hear.

I suggest that the minister should look at what his propaganda team is doing. Its members are probably very expert. They are probably feeding him propaganda, but the Canadian public are not swallowing the unification idea, certainly not those people most concerned with it.

As recommended reading for the minister I would refer him to editorials printed in the Winnipeg Free Press in August last year, and in particular to one headed "Two Serious Errors," which reads in part as follows:

> The two serious errors in defence minister Hellyer's otherwise constructive program for integration of the three armed services concern the two extremities of the military establishment, namely the command structure at the very top, and the lower levels of the regimental family, the ship's company and equivalent units. The grave weakness in these two areas has already been illustrated through the recent retirements of a number of senior generals, admirals and air marshals. If not soon corrected, these two faults could destroy the effectiveness of our defence establishments.
> The initial fault in Canada's command structure commenced with the army back in 1950 when, despite all the clear lessons of history, we created a virtual commander-in-chief. In the more recent re-organization of a unified defence council and a chief of the defence staff, Mr. Hellyer has not only perpetuated this faulty principle, he has enlarged the error by making it applicable to the combined services.
> We now have in fact, if not in name, a captain-general of the forces, a post which became obsolete in Queen Anne's reign.
> In essence, the chief of Canada's defence staff is now the adviser to the government on all defence matters. Mr. Hellyer argues that we do have a defence council. But members of this council do not vote or speak with a voice equal to that of the chief of the defence staff nor do they have the right of direct access to the government.
> History has demonstrated times without number the fallacy of this arrangement. It is much like the relationship between a patient and his doctor—the professional. When the patient refuses to accept the doctor's professional advice the doctor must either abandon the case or be fired. In history, where the commander-in-chief principle has been attempted, either the minister representing the government or the commander-in-chief has dominated. One or the other, or sometimes both, must be destroyed or become mere ciphers.
> Invariably a commander-in-chief tends to gather around him his friends and like-thinking "yes" men, who have no authority to question his decisions, their future appointments and promotions being dependent on his favour.

That is as far as I wish to quote that editorial, but once again I would direct the minister's attention to the last paragraph which I read. I know the minister is not required to listen in the house but I hope he will take into consideration the arguments that are put forward. I see now that the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Stewart) is leaving the house. I would ask him to get up and express his opinions with respect to this unification bill. As in other matters he has spoken outside the house but he never seems to be able to get up and put his ideas across in the house.

The propaganda team which has been referred to, and which has been acknowledged by the Minister of National Defence, is possibly a follow-up to the truth squad, something that was originated by the Secretary of State, but very soon dropped. I trust the propaganda team will come to the same fate as the truth squad, for no other reason than that the personal pride of its members should lead them to leave the staff of a minister who acknowledges that they are nothing more or less than a propaganda team. If this is the type of work they are performing, then I repeat that their personal pride will call upon them to quit, once the minister indicates that they are nothing more or less than a propaganda squad. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether this is getting across or not, but I trust it will be brought to their attention when they arrive in the house tomorrow.

The minister has often stated that unification will result in economic savings. He has often mentioned the 1964 white paper. I defy him and anybody else on that side of the house to point out where the 1964 white paper indicates anything in the way of savings for the Canadian taxpayer. There is absolutely nothing in it to indicate a saving to the taxpayer in respect of defence matters.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

TRANSPORT—MONTREAL—USE OF FRENCH IN RAILWAY SERVICE

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, on January 17 last, I put the following question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill):

> Since the Canadian National Railways are not governed by any specific regulation with respect to bilingualism, and in view of the fact that several regrettable incidents have occurred lately on Canadian Pacific Railways in the Montreal area, would the hon. minister advise the railway companies—including the C.P.R.—to finally recognize the bilingual character of Canada in our centennial year, and to set down effective regulations in this regard for the benefit of passengers?

Mr. Speaker, it is a long acknowledged fact that the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. do not promote bilingualism within their organization and in the relations between their employees and the public throughout Canada, as well as in the province of Quebec.

Only recently some unfortunate incidents happened on C.P.R. trains. On the train between Rigaud and Montreal, the conductor refused to speak French to one Marc Brière and called upon a company constable to put that French Canadian off the train. On another train, the one from Pointe-Claire, a Mr. Gilles Gaboury was treated the same way for the same reason. A company agent also called him "dirty Frenchman".

Those are bitter insults after a hundred years of federative life in a country recognized, even abroad, as bilingual and bicultural.

When those two incidents were brought to the attention of responsible C.P.R. authorities, Mr. J. L. Harris said that the union threatens to hold study sessions if ticket collectors are not spared the humiliation of having to speak French.

As far as the president, Mr. Crump, is concerned, he is blissfully satisfied to state that no C.P.R. law requires an employee to speak French.

That is conscious, wilful and blameworthy indifference. I want to protest with the greatest energy against such bad faith, such a backward attitude by the railway companies. These companies, in many fields, come under the jurisdiction of the federal Board of Transport Commissioners and the federal Department of Transport.

[Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South).]

Millions of French Canadians pay taxes to support these companies directly or indirectly. That is why the federal Minister of Transport is in a position to recommend to the railway companies that they observe bilingualism and that they promote the study of the two official languages of Canada by granting a special bonus.

The minister could also suggest to the said companies that they adopt a regulation recognizing the two official languages and providing that their knowledge will represent a factor of qualification for the employees.

It is no use lighting bonfires, Mr. Speaker, to celebrate the Centennial if seven million French Canadians are still in danger of being roughed up and threatened for speaking their mother tongue, that is, one of the two official languages of the country.

I hope the minister will take action at the earliest possible moment.

Hon. John N. Turner (Member of the Administration): I am speaking tonight for the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill). I have listened with great interest to the plea of the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard).

I note that, two days ago, the Canadian Pacific Railways addressed a letter to Mr. Yvon Groulx, Montreal president of the Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste, outlining their policy with respect to bilingualism, and I am sure the hon. member has read this letter and that his interpretation is similar to mine. C.P.R. officials also released a statement alleging that they insisted on all their employees requesting tickets in both official languages, in the Montreal area as well as everywhere else in the province of Quebec.

The hon. member knows very well that we do not have the same direct jurisdiction over the C.P.R. that we have over the C.N.R., but I personally feel—and I believe I speak for hon. members on this side of the house—that if a company wishes to operate in an area of the country where there are English and French-speaking citizens, the company must deal in both official languages of the country.

There has already been extraordinary improvement at Air Canada, over the last few years, and I predict unhesitatingly that a similar situation will develop within the railway services.

NATIONAL PARKS—USE OF EXPROPRIATION TO HALT COURT CASES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, my remarks tonight relate to a question I asked with reference to civil rights, which elicited a reply from the Prime Minister, who waxed very eloquently in respect of civil rights not only of Canadian people but on an international scale.

My question arises from a problem we have had for many years in respect of the Banff National Park. A man by the name of Hugh L. Gourlay, who is only representative of perhaps hundreds of people in the parks, was operating a tourist business and had a 42 year lease with the right to renew it. He operates perhaps the only motel with tourist facilities in the lower Lake Louise area, outside of the Post Hotel. On April 12, 1965, in accordance with the terms and conditions of his lease he received a letter from the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Laing) which said in part:

Dear Mr. Gourlay:

Thank you for your letter—

This was followed by the normal opening. The letter then stated:

I understand the director of the National Parks Branch has acknowledged your letter—

And this is the meat of the letter:

After a careful examination of your proposals, I would be prepared to permit expansion of your existing development as far as a new motel and a restaurant of sufficient size to serve registered guests are concerned. I would also be prepared to authorize year-round operation if the existing lease is surrendered and a new one for a term of 42 years with no provision for renewal is accepted.

Let me pause there to say that a new lease will be granted, but this gentleman must give up a 21 year period of renewal.

The minister goes on to say that a new lease would not permit a store and outlines the provisions for rent. That letter was written on April 12, 1965. When Mr. Gourlay submitted his plans to the department they were ignored. Last year he commenced an action in the Exchequer Court dated March 25, 1966, for damages resulting from the fact that the terms and the conditions of the lease were not carried out, and asking for other remedies which I have not time to outline.

What happened after he commenced that action? Without disrespect for the parliamentary secretary (Mr. Haidasz), because I am sure he is not aware of the situation and has no responsibility in this regard, as soon as the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development had notice of this action, it expropriated the whole property in order to avoid this right of action, in accordance with the terms and conditions of the lease and the law of Canada.

Having regard to civil rights, let me say that these people are so flagrantly bureaucratic nothing we can do will stop them. When we met in Banff we were presented with a brief such as we in the rural districts of the prairies would liken to an Eaton's catalogue. This was an obvious attempt to brainwash us. Instead of going out that night to attend a social engagement I read part of that brief. What I found was shocking to the deputy minister, because he had not been informed about it. In that brief it is stated, as the views of the Department of Justice, that:

On normal renewals of perpetual renewal leases, the department can probably be forced (legally) to issue renewal leases also containing the perpetual renewal clause—

It goes on to suggest that the term of the renewal lease cannot be reduced. That was based on the department's legal advice.

Let me draw an analogy. When they wanted four acres for the trans-Canada highway, which involved fee simple land, and when they could not make a deal they expropriated the whole 60 acres. I have a sworn copy of evidence taken on examination for discovery in the Exchequer Court action. This is the answer given by the witness. I said:

So that it was really, then, the result that as you were not able to negotiate for the highway that you did actually expropriate the other land?

That referred to the other 56 acres as well as the four involved. His answer was: "Yes".

We are talking about civil rights in this country. This man started an action. This is not one individual case, as Your Honour may have thought when I put the question. This question concerns hundreds of people in western Canada doing business for 1,700,000 tourists. As soon as they demand their rights through the courts, this minister and his department—with no disrespect to the parliamentary secretary—exercise bureaucracy by expropriation. If these are the civil rights in Canada which the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) talks about in such glowing terms, and which we hope to gain internationally, I think the time has come to ask this government—and I can be brief tonight—when they are going to stop usurping the civil rights of those doing business for visitors to the parks.

I was told four years ago—this situation has not developed only under this government; that is one thing I want to make clear—by an R.C.M.P. officer who is no longer near the parks, that in two nights in July and August they turned out 100 families, which had to drive 100 miles to Calgary because there were not any hotel or motel facilities. Yet this government, with the legal right of a lease, use what they call the right of expropriation when a man starts an action. I do not know what the outcome of the legal matter will be, but I feel that when rights are being usurped like this I, as a member of parliament for that area, have a strong duty to ask the minister for an explanation.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, in the short time available to me I would like to state that, according to the information available to me, it would not appear that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is using the law of expropriation to halt cases brought to test my minister's policy on leases in the national parks.

The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) should realize that action brought by Mr. Gourlay is proceeding in the normal manner through legal channels. The fact that Mr. Gourlay's property has been expropriated does not, in itself, I believe, preclude Mr. Gourlay from carrying through his court action against the department. To be more succinct, expropriation does not prohibit Mr. Gourlay from continuing his case against the department. The department therefore is not interfering with this man's rights to press for court action to test leasehold policy.

To give a little background on this whole situation, I would like to say that according to my information the problem is basically that Mr. Gourlay several years ago applied to expand his present facilities to an extent that would have been in serious conflict with the huge visitors centre planned for Lake Louise. The department vetoed his plan on the practical basis of a serious conflict and on the legal basis of the national parks building regulations, as amended, which state:

> The superintendent may refuse to issue a permit where he is of the opinion that the proposed use of the building or structure is not in the interests of the park.

By early 1966 when the department had more clearly defined its land requirements for the visitors' service centre at Lake Louise, it became apparent that the lands immediately adjacent to the proposed complex, and these included not only the land Mr. Gourlay occupied but other lands as well, were in fact necessary for the successful completion and operation of the large visitors centre.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Therefore the department entered into negotiations with Mr. Gourlay to purchase his land. Mr. Gourlay demanded a price considered to be exorbitant by the officials of the department. The department then requested that an appraisal be carried out by the normal appraisal methods used by federal departments. Mr. Gourlay rejected this and stated that an appraisal would be carried out only under his terms. It was at this point the department deemed it necessary to expropriate in order to proceed with the Lake Louise visitors service centre, which will eventually represent an investment of approximately $10 million. At about the same time Mr. Gourlay decided to proceed with court action against the department on the basis that he was not allowed to develop his lands in the manner in which he is entitled.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but he had only three minutes in which to reply. That period, I am afraid, has expired.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—BRITISH COLUMBIA—COMMUTATION OF DEATH SENTENCES OF CONVICTED MURDERERS

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday I rose to ask a question which appears in Hansard and which reads as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I have a question which I should like to direct to the Solicitor General, but in his absence I shall direct it to the Prime Minister. The cabinet yesterday commuted to life imprisonment the death sentences of two convicted murderers in British Columbia. I should like to ask the Prime Minister what is the effect of this statement which he made on August 31 in this house:
> "—when this legislation passes it will be the will of the parliament of Canada and if it is the will of the parliament of Canada I know the law-abiding citizens of Canada, as they always have done in the past, will obey it."

Mr. Speaker, now I wish to direct the same question to the Solicitor General and ask him whether the cabinet is above the law of the land, that they do not have to observe the law of the land referred to by the Prime Minister on August 31 when he said that when it is the express will of parliament the law-abiding citizens of Canada will obey it, as they have always done in the past.

Two death sentences were imposed on convicted murderers in British Columbia which were then commuted to life imprisonment by the cabinet. This was done despite the fact that approximately a year ago parliament ruled in a vote 143 to 112 that they wished to see the law of the land continued. This calls for the death penalty in capital murder convictions. I have not yet received an answer to my question on that score. I wish to develop further the question which I asked last Thursday, by asking whether the cabinet has discarded the principle of a responsible government in this country.

There was a vote of 143 members to 112 to continue the law as it is on the statute books, and yet the cabinet continues to commute death sentences despite that law. The cabinet has stated that it is commuting sentences in cases where there were recommendations for mercy from the jury. Does this mean that 12 selected jurymen have more power than 265 elected members of parliament? If so, I would suggest to the Governor General that he should dismiss the House of Commons and call in 12 jurymen to conduct the law and rule this nation. The cabinet seems to think that a jury is better able to handle convictions for murder than the Supreme Court of Canada, the supreme court of the province that may be involved, or even the trial divisions in the provinces.

I have in my hands pages 12397 and 12398. of Hansard of January 30, 1967 in which the Solicitor General, in answer to a question from the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) gave some statistics with regard to the action taken by the cabinet on murder convictions. Four sentences without any recommendation for mercy whatsoever have been commuted. As stated in Hansard, in case No. 88 there was no recommendation for mercy from the judge or from the jury. In case 90 there was no recommendation for mercy from the judge or from the jury. The same applied in cases No. 91 and 93, and yet every one of these sentences was commuted. We are told that this was only done in cases where there was a recommendation for mercy from the jury.

Mr. Speaker, I will make the flat statement that I could get a petition signed by a minimum of 100 names, and possibly running into thousands, asking for mercy for the victims of these criminals. We have never had time to get a recommendation for mercy for the victims. The two men from British Columbia whose sentences have been commuted and who have received recommendations for mercy from 12 jurymen, murdered two women. I am sure we could have gathered thousands of names asking for mercy for these two women before they were murdered by the criminals to whom the cabinet has extended clemency.

I have no hesitation in referring to the case in Hull. It has not yet been appealed so one can comment, since a conviction has been handed down. This is another case of a woman being shot by a man for whom a recommendation for mercy was made. I am sure we could have gathered hundreds of names on a petition asking for mercy for the woman before she was shot dead by the man who has been convicted of her murder. But no, we have the criminal with a recommendation for mercy gracing his shoulders and no recommendation for mercy gracing the shoulders of the victim.

When I said the cabinet is flying in the face of parliament when it commutes a death sentence, I refer to the fact that a free vote was held. Evidently a free vote means that parliament votes, then the cabinet feels free to do what it likes. When the cabinet flies in the face of a free vote of 143 to 112, responsible government appears to have gone out the window in this country. There was a vote not long ago of 59 to 58 against the cabinet. Within 24 hours they endeavoured to bring in another amendment which would counteract the vote of 59 to 58, and this is a cabinet which is supposed to be responsible to the parliament of Canada. Is it no longer responsible to the party that keeps it in power? They fly in the face of a vote of 59 to 58, or endeavoured to do so until they were derailed because they were flying in the face of responsible government. We believe that the cabinet should be responsible, and must be responsible to the parliament of which they are only the executive branch.

Now, I ask the Solicitor General (Mr. Pennell), has responsible government left this country, in view of the definite cases we have in which the cabinet has been flying in the face of votes that were against them in two matters, but more particularly this question of capital punishment when the vote was 143 to 112.

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, there is no need for me to say that I respect the feelings of the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) on this important subject of capital punishment. However I should like to point out to him, with respect, that section 656 of the Criminal Code was enacted by parliament and that section provides that the governor in council may commute a sentence of death to imprisonment in a penitentiary for life or for any term of years not less than two years, or to imprisonment in a prison other than a penitentiary for a period of less than two years.

I should like to point out also that section 642A was enacted by parliament, and it should be noted that section of the Criminal Code provides that when the jury finds an accused guilty of capital murder the judge shall ask the jury whether they wish to make any recommendation in regard to clemency. In both the cases referred to by the hon. member, the cases of Frederick Myron Turner and Michael Gregory Kuzyk, there were unanimous recommendations from the jury concurred in by the trial judge.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

APPENDIX

RESOLUTION ON PEACE KEEPING PRESENTED BY CANADA TO UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY

DRAFT RESOLUTION

November 19, 1966

The General Assembly,

Recalling that the first purpose of the United Nations as set out in Article 1(1) of the Charter is to maintain international peace and security,

Convinced that all States Members of the United Nations should co-operate to ensure that the Organization is able to achieve this purpose,

Recognizing that the Charter has conferred

(a) on the Security Council the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security; and

(b) on the General Assembly the right to discuss any question relating to the maintenance of international peace and security and the right to make recommendations on any such question,

Recognizing further that if the Security Council is unable to adopt decisions the General Assembly, which bears its share of responsibility in maintaining international peace and security, may consider the matter in accordance with the Charter and make appropriate recommendations,

Believing that the Organization, pursuant to the Charter, should be in a position to respond promptly and effectively to the need for duly authorized action to maintain international peace and security,

1. Notes that various methods of financing peacekeeping operations may be considered when the need for any such operation arises, and that these include:

(i) apportionment among the Members of the Organization;

(ii) special arrangements agreed among the parties involved;

(iii) voluntary contributions;

(iv) any combination of these various methods.

2. Considers that if the costs of a particular peacekeeping operation involving heavy expenditures are to be apportioned among the Members of the Organization this should be done in a manner which would provide for the equitable sharing of the above-mentioned costs, due account being taken of:

(i) the special responsibilities of the Permanent Members of the Security Council;

(ii) the relatively limited capacity of economically less developed countries to contribute towards the costs of such an operation;

(iii) where circumstances warrant, the need to give special consideration to the situation of any Member States which are victims of, and those which are otherwise involved in, the events or actions leading to a peacekeeping operation.

3. Considers further that, taking due account of the considerations outlined in operative paragraph 2 above, the equitable sharing of the costs of a particular peacekeeping operation involving heavy expenditures might be achieved by means of a special scale which would establish that the economically less developed countries would contribute 5 per cent of the total costs with the balance of the costs to be borne by other Member States.

4. Invites Member States to communicate to the United Nations information concerning the kinds of military or civil forces or services which they might be in a position to provide, if they so decided, in response to a request to participate in a duly authorized United Nations peacekeeping operation.

5. Recommends to the Security Council:

(a) that it authorize a study of the means of improving preparations for peacekeeping;

(b) that, as a matter of general practice, it should obtain from the Secretary-General an estimate of the expenditure involved when recommending or deciding measures to maintain or restore international peace and security;

(c) that it explore the prospects for agreements to be negotiated with Member States for provision of armed forces, assistance and facilities, to be made available to the Security Council, on its call, pursuant to Article 43 and taking into account Article 47(2) of the Charter.

6. Decides to place an item entitled "A Review of Peacekeeping in All Its Aspects" on the agenda of the XXIInd regular session of the General Assembly.

23033—792

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, February 1, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

USE BY DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS OF PORTION OF GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre yesterday questioned the propriety of certain departmental officials using the first row behind the press gallery for the performance of their responsibilities as departmental or ministerial officials. I indicated to the hon. member that I would look into the situation, and I have now had the opportunity of doing so.

• (2:40 p.m.)

There is a degree of uncertainty, as I indicated yesterday, in respect of the first row behind the press gallery; that is, whether it is an extension of the press gallery, an extension of the official gallery, or part of the general gallery.

In view of the uncertainty of the situation I took the opportunity to suggest that when space is available in the recognized official gallery the departmental officials should use it rather than other galleries for the exercise of their official responsibilities.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HALES—ANSWER TO QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. In view of the fact that all of us in this house expect full, complete and correct answers to our questions, be they oral or written, I should like to bring to the attention of the house, the Prime Minister and his parliamentary secretary that I asked a written question to which I received an answer on Monday. Part of the question was:

> Who are the auditors for the Company of Young Canadians and what yearly audit fees have been paid?

The answer to that part of my question was

> The Auditor General. No fees are charged.

That is completely wrong because, as I recall, the act did not stipulate that the Auditor General would be the auditor, but that the Governor in Council would appoint an auditor for this organization. To the best of my knowledge no auditor has yet been appointed. I have brought this situation to the attention of the house because I feel we should receive full and correct answers.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in order to clarify this matter—and I am very sorry if my hon. friend thinks he has been misled in any way—let me say that during the current year payments on behalf of the Company of Young Canadians have been made through the comptroller of the treasury. As a result all these expenditures come under the scrutiny of the Auditor General. In succeeding years it will be necessary for the cabinet to appoint an auditor as provided in the legislation. In respect of the current year the answer given is quite correct.

ROYAL VISIT

DATES OF VISIT BY HER MAJESTY AND DUKE OF EDINBURGH

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it will be recalled that on September 13 last it was announced from Government House that Her Majesty the Queen and His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh had accepted an invitation of the government of Canada to attend ceremonies in our national capital, celebrating the 100th anniversary of confederation.

I am happy to be able to state now that the dates of the visit of Her Majesty and His Royal Highness have been confirmed. They will arrive at Uplands airport in the late afternoon of Thursday, June 29, and will remain in Canada until late in the evening of Wednesday, July 5. Her Majesty and His Royal Highness, on this occasion, will visit the national capital and will have one day, July 3, at Expo '67.

Her Majesty will address members of both houses of parliament assembled on the anniversary of confederation, Saturday, July 1

1967 at which time the Speakers of the Senate and the House of Commons will each present a loyal address to Her Majesty.

Following these addresses Her Majesty will deliver a special centennial address. Later on July 1 a reception will be held for members of both houses of parliament and their wives at which Her Majesty will attend.

Other details of the program for the royal visit are now being worked out and will be announced in due course from the office of the commissioner general for visits of state. I felt that I should make an announcement of plans for this meeting in the national capital at this time, so that members of parliament and senators may make their plans accordingly.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, this is indeed a very welcome announcement the Prime Minister has made, that Her Majesty the Queen and His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh will come to Canada for the celebration of our centennial. I am sure all Canadians will be happy with this announcement that the Queen of Canada will be with them on this occasion. I am also sure the Prime Minister has conveyed to Her Majesty the Queen and His Royal Highness that they will be received in Canada with courtesy and a warm welcome.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members and the people of Canada will be very happy at the announcement the Prime Minister has just made. It will give great emphasis to our centennial celebrations to have Her Majesty the Queen and His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh in this country. I am also sure that their visit will help to cement further those ties of loyalty which the Canadian people have to the crown, to the commonwealth and to the principles of democracy and justice which they represent.

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, members of our group were glad to hear the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) inform hon. members that Her Majesty the Queen is planning a visit to Canada next June 29 and will, on that occasion, visit Expo '67 and address members of both houses.

Mr. Speaker, a visit by Her Majesty during our centennial year means that Canada is worthy of such a visit by Her Majesty, and we should be proud of this fact. Hon. members and, indeed, all Canadian citizens must endeavour to give the Queen a fitting reception. As far as I know, Mr. Speaker, the Queen was never the cause of any trouble in our province, except for a disturbance by a few on one occasion. As French Canadians and plain Canadians, we bid her welcome.

I hope her stay will be a pleasant one and that her return to England will be filled with happy memories of Canada. I should like her to be sure that Canada will make as much progress over the next one hundred years and that, just as any other head of state, she will always be welcome in Canada.

[English]

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Social Credit party I join with the other party representatives in the house in welcoming the announcement the Prime Minister has just made. Certainly we are more than pleased that the Queen of Canada will be able to visit this country during the 100th anniversary of Canada's confederation. It is, I think, a very excellent thing that Her Majesty the Queen will be able to be with us on July 1. I could not help but think, as we listened to the announcement, that it would have been a wonderful birthday present for Canada if the provincial premiers and the federal government could have agreed on an amending formula for our constitution, so the Queen could have carried it back with her after her visit with us on July 1. We join in the expression of loyalty and gratitude to Her Majesty that she will be able to be with us.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADA BONDS HELD BY CANADIANS

Question No. 2,246—Mr. Godin:

1. What is the amount of Canada bonds held by Canadian individuals?

2. What amount of interest is received by these individuals?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Government of Canada bond issues other than Canada savings bonds are in both bearer and registered form and it is not possible to establish the amount held by Canadian individuals. Canada savings bonds may only be purchased by Canadian individuals and for the purpose of answering the question it has been interpreted as referring only to Canada savings bonds. On such an interpretation the answers are as follows:

1. The approximate amount of Canada savings bonds outstanding as at December 31, 1666, was $6,089 million.

2. The amount of interest payable in 1967 on the Canada savings bonds referred to in part 1 would be $299 million.

TELEVISION ADVERTISING FOR R.C.M.P. RECRUITS

Question No. 2,309—Mr. Prittie:

1. Have the Royal Canadian Mounted Police placed any advertising intended to attract recruits with television station KVOS?

2. If so, what has been the cost of such advertising?

3. Have the Royal Canadian Mounted Police placed any advertising intended to attract recruits with television station CHAN, Vancouver, B.C.?

4. If so, what has been the cost of such advertising?

5. Have the Royal Canadian Mounted Police placed any advertising intended to attract recruits with television station CBUT, Vancouver, B.C.?

6. If so, what has been the cost of such advertising?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General):
1. Yes.
2. Nil.
3. Yes.
4. Nil.
5. Yes.
6. Nil.

REGULATIONS RESPECTING TELEVISION COMMERCIALS

Question No. 2,324—Mr. Orlikow:

Has the Board of Broadcast Governors formulated regulations (a) limiting the number of television commercials which can be shown in any program (b) limiting the time that television commercials can be shown in any program and, if so, what are these regulations?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Board of Broadcast Governors as follows: 1. (a) No; (b) Yes. Section 8 of the radio (T.V.) broadcasting regulations states:

8 (1) Subject to subsection (2), no station or network operator shall, during any clock hour, broadcast commercial messages the aggregate duration of which exceeds twelve minutes.

(2) A station or network operator may, during any clock hour, broadcast commercial messages the aggregate duration of which exceeds twelve minutes but does not exceed thirteen minutes if, during either the immediate preceding or succeeding clock hour, the aggregate duration of commercial messages is reduced by an amount equal to the excess time over twelve minutes which was broadcast.

REPORTS ON TELEVISION COMMERCIALS

Question No. 2,325—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Does the Board of Broadcast Governors require television stations to report on the number of television commercials and the time taken by these commercials which are televised for each program?

2. Does the Board of Broadcast Governors monitor programs either regularly or on an ad hoc basis to compare the reports, if any, which it receives from television stations, with the actual production of these stations?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Board of Broadcast Governors as follows: 1. Stations are required to keep weekly program logs which include the duration of each commercial message except in the case of a sponsored program where the aggregate time of all commercial messages is entered in the log.

2. Yes, on an ad hoc basis.

COMPLAINTS RESPECTING TELEVISION COMMERCIALS

Question No. 2,326—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Has the Board of Broadcast Governors received complaints from the public about excessive televising of commercials?

2. Have these complaints been investigated and, if so, what were the results of such investigation?

3. Has the Board of Broadcast Governors, as a result of its investigations, or as a result of complaints, discovered violations of its regulations with regard to television commercial usage by television stations and, if so, in how many cases?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Board of Broadcast Governors as follows: 1. Yes.

2. All complaints are investigated. In most cases the stations have been operating in accordance with the regulations.

3. The log examination section reports on all instances in which the station logs appear to indicate excess commercial time. Each case has to be investigated before it can be established to the satisfaction of the board that a violation of the regulation has occurred.

PROSECUTIONS FOR VIOLATION OF BROADCAST REGULATIONS

Question No. 2,327—Mr. Orlikow:

1. What action has the Board of Broadcast Governors taken when it has discovered that its regulations are being violated?

Questions

2. If prosecutions have been ordered or recommended, what was the number of cases, and what was the result of such prosecutions?

3. If discussions have been held with television sations or television networks, how often have these discussions been held, when were they held, what agreements if any were reached with the stations or networks, and have these agreements been lived up to by the television stations or networks?

4. Has the Board of Broadcast Governors drafted any new regulations to control television commercials being used and, if so, what are these new regulations?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Board of Broadcast Governors as follows: 1. Each case in which the logs disclose an apparent violation is brought to the attention of the licensee and is investigated by the board to determine the circumstances and to satisfy the board that there is a case with which the board could proceed successfully under section 18 of the Broadcasting Act.

2. During the three month period September, October and November, one case has been taken to court and a plea of guilty was entered. Another case is before the court. Other cases are still under study.

3. See 1 above. The board expects each station to comply with the regulations and therefore there is no need for an agreement in this respect.

4. No.

USE OF METRIC SYSTEM IN CANADA

Question No. 2,353—Mr. Stanbury:

1. Is there under way in the government any program for promotion of wider use of the metric system in Canada?

2. If so (a) what is the nature of the program (b) what results has it had to date?

Hon. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): 1. No. There is no comprehensive program at present to promote the wider use of the metric system in Canada. Encouragement is being given to the study of the subject in various sectors of Canadian industry, particularly with respect to the impact on export trade. Any consideration of the adoption of the metric system of measurement must take into account the requirements in Canada's main export markets and practices in the countries which are the principal sources of Canadian imports of technology.

2. See (1) above.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

SOUTH WEST MARGAREE R. R. No. 1

Question No. 2,364—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

1. Was authority given for the establishment of South West Margaree rural route No. 1 to provide the patrons concerned with direct R.M.D. service?

2. On what date was this service scheduled to begin operating and what was the detail of travel for South West Margaree rural route No. 1?

3. Were the patrons concerned instructed by officials of the Post Office Department to either purchase rural mail boxes or, alternatively, to provide their own mail boxes?

4. Were the patrons concerned advised by postal authorities to complete the application for rural mail delivery service which is found at the back of booklet 9 R.M.D.?

5. Were the patrons concerned advised in a further circular letter of October 4, concerning the establishment of South West Margaree rural route No. 1, that the new service would begin on November 16, 1966?

6. In the circular letter of October 4, were the patrons concerned again advised to purchase and erect rural mail boxes?

7. Were the patrons concerned later informed on November 18, 1966, that the establishment of South West Margaree rural route No. 1, was to be held in abeyance for the time being and, if so, for what reason has the establishment of this rural route been held in abeyance?

8. What representations were made and by whom to the effect that this proposed rural route not be established and for how long is the establishment of this rural route to be held in abeyance?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): 1. Yes.

2. (a) 16th November 1966; (b) The detail of travel for South West Margaree rural route No. 1 is as follows: To leave South West Margaree post office daily except Sunday as soon as possible after receipt of mail from highway service trip 29 and proceed: West on highway No. 19 to south west Margaree road, 0.2 mile; South on south west Margaree road to Kiltarlity road, 4.8 miles; West on Kiltarlity road to Vincent MacKinnon's lane, 0.6 mile; Retrace and go south east to east side river road, 0.9 mile; North on east side River road to highway No. 19, 5.3 miles; West on highway No. 19 to south west Margaree post, 0.2 mile; office, Total distance, 12.0 miles.

3. Yes.

4. Yes.

5. Yes.

6. Yes.

7. (a) Yes; (b) It was not found advisable to inaugurate service on the 16th November.

8. (a) The postmaster of the Gillisdale post office, which will be closed upon the establishment of south west Margaree R. R. No. 1, requested that the office remain open until the end of the 1966-67 winter season. (b) The proposed south west Margaree R. R. No. 1 will be inaugurated on the 1st April 1967.

TARIFF ON CLOTHING AND TEXTILES

Question No. 2,371—Mr. Madill:

1. What is the tariff level on clothing?
2. What is the tariff level on textiles?
3. How long has the present level been in effect?
4. What is the net effect of this tariff policy on the Canadian consumer?
5. What is the net effect of this tariff policy on the Canadian textile and clothing industry?
6. How many people are employed in the manufacture of clothing and household linens?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Departments of National Revenue, Finance and Trade and Commerce as follows: 1. Under the British preferential tariff the rates of duty vary from free to 25 per cent, under most favoured nation tariff, from 10 per cent to 35 per cent, and under the general tariff, from 25 per cent to 55 per cent. There are, in addition, several tariff items which bear a specific rate of duty and an ad valorem rate, and under these tariff items the value of the goods governs the level of the tariff. In the absence of value information these are, therefore, not included in the above.

2. On textile goods other than clothing, the British preferential tariff rates vary from free to 27 per cent, the most favoured nation tariff rates, from free to 37½ per cent, and the general tariff rates from free to 55 per cent. There are, in addition, several tariff items which bear a specific rate of duty or a combination of specific and ad valorem rates, and under these tariff items the value of the goods governs the level of the tariff. In the absence of value information, these are, therefore, not included in the above.

3. While many of the tariff items in the clothing and textiles schedules have remained unchanged since the general agreement on tariffs and trade became effective on January 1, 1948, there have been a fairly substantial number of changes since that time, particularly those effective April 1, 1960, which resulted from the tariff board's recommendation to the Minister of Finance following textile reference No. 125.

4 and 5. It is not possible to measure the net effect of the tariff on the Canadian consumer or on the Canadian textile and clothing industry.

6. Estimated number of employees in the clothing industries in 1966 is 126,000.

The number of employees in the manufacture of household linens is not available. These products are not classified as a separate industry but are included in miscellaneous textiles, cotton yarn and cloth mills industries.

ADVERTISING BUDGET FOR EXPO '67

Question No. 2,396—Mr. Coates:

What is the present advertising budget for Expo '67, how much of this budget has been earmarked for the United States, and what proportion of the moneys earmarked for advertising in the United States will be used in that section of the United States within a 600-mile radius of the city of Montreal where there is a total population of seventy million people?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): The total Expo advertising budget for 1967 is approximately $6,000,000 and of this amount approximately $4,500,000 will be spent in the United States. Approximately 75 per cent of the United States advertising moneys are spent to cover 600 mile radius of the city of Montreal.

CANADAIR—ESTABLISHMENT OF BRANCH OFFICE IN ENGLAND

Question No. 2,402—Mr. Allard:

1. Is the government aware that Canadair is about to open an office for draughtsmen and instrument technicians in England?
2. Is the government aware that Canadair has already begun to publish advertisements for employment in British newspapers?
3. Is the government aware that Canadair will set up this branch office at Potters Bar in Middlesex on the outskirts of London?
4. For the years 1963, 1964, 1965 and 1966, what is the number, nature, and value of the contracts awarded to Canadair by the government of Canada?
5. With respect to future contracts between the government of Canada and Canadair, will the government demand that these contracts and the work involved be carried out entirely in Canada by Canadian workers?

[Translation]

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): 1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. Yes.

4. The following figures represent the number and nature of DDP contracts and related contract values awarded in the calendar years indicated. The value excludes government financed equipment such as power plants, avionics, accessories awarded to other contractors. A portion of the values shown would however be subcontracted to Canadair's airframe subcontractors.

*Product Support includes spares, repair and overhaul, technical support, field service representative, mobile repair parts, modification kits, engineering studies, technical publications.

Includes CF-5 aircraft contract.

5. With respect to any future production contracts between the Department of Defence Production and Canadair, the department will employ its normal practice of seeking to obtain the maximum Canadian content of labour and materials, consistent with technical and economic feasability.

The prime purpose of the London office is to bridge the gap existing temporarily in Canadair's design engineering capacity for their United States military C-5A jet transport aircraft subcontract program, which was executed directly between Canadair and Lockheed Corporation.

NEW POSTAL GUIDE AND INFORMATION BOOKLET

Question No. 2,403—Mr. Allard:

1. When will the Post Office Department publish a new postal guide and postal information booklet in the two official languages?

2. When did the Post Office Department publish the last postal guide and information booklet?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): 1. The Post Office Department has no plans at this time to issue a new postal guide. It is expected the department will publish a new postal information booklet in both languages in April of 1967.

[Mr. Drury.]

2. The Canada Postal Guide, Part 1, "Postal Law and General Information" was issued in both languages on the 30th June 1965. Six revisions have been issued to date. Part 2, "International Mails Rates and Conditions" was issued in both languages on the 1st October 1963. Nine revisions have been issued to date. The last postal information booklet was published by the department in 1963.

EMPLOYMENT ON PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAUSEWAY

Question No. 2,433—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. Has any department of the government made any estimate of the number of persons likely to be employed in the construction of the Northumberland Strait Crossing?

2. If so, what is the estimated number per year of projected construction?

3. Is it the intention to give priority in employment to workers from Prince Edward Island?

4. Has the government of Canada given any assistance in the training of potential workers on this project and, if so, what is the nature and extent of such training?

5. To date, how many men have obtained employment on this project?

6. Of these, how many are residents of Prince Edward Island?

7. When is it intended to commence construction of the highway approach from the Prince Edward Island side of the crossing?

8. What portion of the approach to the highway on the New Brunswick side has been completed?

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): 1. Yes, but the estimates are confined to the work on site directly involved in the construction of the crossing. No attempt has been made to estimate the numbers of men who will be employed indirectly or in related work because of the construction of the crossing. Estimates relating to an undertaking of this kind become increasingly tentative for each future year.

2. The estimate of the numbers of men to be employed on the site in 1967 and the next three years are respectively as follows: (a) 621, (b) 1549, (c) 1833, and (d) 2004. Figures beyond 1970 are very highly tentative.

3. The standard government contract clause will apply. Clause 27(2) of the general conditions of the standard government construction contract states: "Subject to subsection (1) the contractor will employ labour from the locality where the work is being executed to the extent to which it is available and shall use the offices of the National Employment Service in the recruitment of workers wherever practicable."

4. The government of Canada, under the technical and vocational training agreement, is assisting the provincial government of Prince Edward Island in training men for this project. Thirty men are now enrolled in a course on basic heavy duty maintenance. This course will be repeated three times. Six men are in a course on welding. This course will be repeated. Nine are in the tugboat masters course. Fifty-two are in a boat crew course; and 60 already have completed this course. Twelve are enrolled in an upgrading course for carpenters. Additional training courses will be started when the requirements are anticipated.

5. A total of 284 men have obtained direct employment on this project.

6. 149.

7. A contract has been awarded; and the work entailed is now about 35 per cent complete.

8. The work entailed by the contract awarded on November 3, 1965, has been completed. The approach road has now been brought to the standard required for the construction of the crossing.

NATIONAL EMPLOYMENT SERVICE OFFICE, RIMOUSKI, QUE.

Question No. 2,435—Mr. LeBlanc (Rimouski):

1. How many job vacancies were brought to the attention of the National Employment Service office in Rimouski during 1965-66?

2. How many persons obtained work through the National Employment Service office in Rimouski during that same year?

3. Which ridings are included in the area covered by this office?

[Translation]

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. There were 3,734 job vacancies brought to the attention of the National Employment Service office in Rimouski in the year 1965. A comparative figure for 1966 was 3,241.

2. The number of persons placed by the same office in the year 1965 was 3,301; for the year 1966 a comparative figure amounted to 2,845.

3. The area covered by the Manpower Centre in Rimouski includes:

(1) Electoral district of Rimouski, excluding that area which is a part of the county of Rivière du Loup.

(2) Eight municipalities which form a part of Matapédia-Matane electoral district:

Price
Grand-Métis
St-Octave-de-Métis
St. Antoine-de-Padoue
St. Noël
St. Moïse
Ste. Jeanne d'Arc

PAYMENT OF SCHOOL TAXES, POLYMER CORPORATION

Question No. 2,445—Mr. Grégoire:

1. Does Polymer Corporation Limited pay school taxes?

2. If so (a) what were the amounts paid in the last three years (b) for each of those three years, what amounts were paid (i) to the public schools (ii) to the separate schools?

[Translation]

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Insofar as Polymer Corporation Limited is concerned:

"As a crown company, Polymer Corporation is not legally obligated to pay municipal or school taxes. However, it does make an annual grant to the city of Sarnia in the same amount as its total municipal tax would be (including the amount for schools) if it was subject to tax."

CANADIAN PRODUCTION OF U.S. MATERIAL FOR USE IN VIET NAM

Question No. 2,454—Mr. Mather:

Of the United States defence orders placed in Canada in 1965 and 1966, what was the amount, in dollars, of material destined for use in Viet Nam?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Under the Canada-United States production sharing program, the United States in 1965 purchased $259.5 million and in 1966 approximately $300 million in defence supplies from Canadian sources, including both prime and subcontracts.

All Canadian produced defence supplies sold to the United States government under this program are delivered to the Department of Defence inventories in the continental United States. The Canadian government has no information as to logistic arrangements for further distribution beyond these points.

ROAD CONSTRUCTION, BELLETERRE-LE DOMAINE, QUE.

Question No. 2,457—Mr. Lefebvre:

Is a road being built from Belleterre, Temiskaming county, to Le Domaine and, if so (a) is this road being built under a federal-provincial plan (b) what have federal expenditures amounted to thus far, annually, for this project since the beginning of construction of this road?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): (a) Yes, federal-provincial forestry agreement; (b) federal share of expenditures to date, $119,308.82. Federal share of expenditures, annually: 1964-65, $43,177.11; 1965-66, $49,849.11; 1966-67, $26,282.60.

U.S. CONTRACTS LET IN CANADA BY DEFENCE PRODUCTION DEPARTMENT

Question No. 2,476—Mr. Allard:

What is the increase in the net value of contracts of a general nature awarded on behalf of the United States by the Department of Defence Production in 1966 as compared with 1965?

[Translation]

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Contracts on behalf of the United States government are awarded to the Canadian Commercial Corporation. The corporation subsequently places a contract with Canadian companies for the supplies required and these contracts are administered by the Department of Defence Production.

In 1965 the net value of prime contracts and amendments awarded by the United States government to the Canadian Commercial Corporation totalled $162.94 M and in 1966 the value of these awards was $143.71 M, resulting in a net decrease of $19.23 M.

WHOLESALE VALUE OF MOTOR VEHICLE PRODUCTION

Question No. 2,492—Mr. Hales:

1. What was the wholesale value of the 901,230 motor vehicle units produced in Canada in 1966, and the wholesale value of the 855,476 units produced in 1965?

2. What was the wholesale value of the 696,088 passenger cars produced in Canada in 1966 and the wholesale value of the 710,811 cars made in Canada in 1965?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): 1 and 2. These figures were taken from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics' monthly report for December 1966 entitled "Preliminary Report on the Production of Motor Vehicles", catalogue number 42-001. These preliminary, production figures are compiled monthly but corresponding values are not collected.

Values of motor vehicles are collected annually in the form of shipments from plants. Final figures for 1966 will, therefore, not be available for some time since the motor vehicle manufacturers are only beginning to submit their reports for 1966.

1965 final figures are:

	Number	Value
Total motor vehicles shipped	843,845	$1,919,969,000
Total passenger cars shipped	705,620	$1,561,154,000

VISITS TO PROVINCES BY TRADE COMMISSIONERS

Question No. 2,507—Mr. Deachman:

Will trade commissioners making the centennial export promotion tour of Canada as announced recently by the Minister of Trade and Commerce visit all of the provinces?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): The senior Canadian government trade commissioners participating in the program known as "Operation Export 1967" will visit the following eight major business centres over a period of seven weeks on the dates indicated: Montreal, April 17-21; Vancouver, April 25-28; Edmonton, May 1-2; Saskatoon, May 4-5; Winnipeg, May 8-10; Toronto, May 11-24; Halifax, May 29-30; Saint John, June 1-2.

Exporters in Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island will be approached directly and invited to meet trade commissioners of their choice in either Halifax, Nova Scotia or Saint John, New Brunswick.

INCOME FROM TOURISM

Question No. 2,508—Mr. Isabelle:

What was Canada's income from tourism in 1966?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): Information on travel expenditures in Canada by non-residents is not available for the last quarter of 1966. However, during the four quarters ended September 30, 1966 these totalled $813 million.

TRADE FAIR EXHIBITS BY TRADE DEPARTMENT

Question No. 2,518—Mr. Walker:

How many trade fair exhibits will be organized by the Department of Trade and Commerce during the 1967-68 fiscal year and in what markets will Canadian products be displayed?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): The Department of Trade and Commerce will sponsor exhibits in 48 trade fairs during the 1967-68 fiscal year. Canadian products will be displayed in the following markets: Britain, Czechoslovakia, France, Germany, Ireland, Italy, Peru, Spain, South Africa, The Netherlands, United States and Yugoslavia.

CLAIMS BY CANADIANS AGAINST POLISH GOVERNMENT

Question No. 2,519—Mr. Langlois (Mégantic):

1. What is the nature of claims made by Canadians against the Polish government, as a result of nationalizations?

2. Since when have negotiations on this matter been carried on with the Polish government?

3. What are the names of the Canadians involved in these claims?

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. The claims of Canadians against the Polish government which are registered with the Department of External Affairs are, generally speaking, in respect of property in Poland which was expropriated or otherwise taken without compensation by the Polish authorities after World War II. The claims arose out of the nationalization of urban residential property, farmland, industries, and other property. According to a well-established principle of international law, the Canadian government advances those claims which belonged to Canadian citizens at the time of loss and continuously thereafter until the presentation of the claim to the Polish authorities.

2. Within three years after the end of World War II, the Canadian government approached the Polish government with a view to reaching a settlement of nationalization claims of Canadian citizens. However, although this question was reviewed periodically, no basis for progress was found until 1965 when an understanding was reached whereby the Polish authorities agreed to enter into negotiations toward a lump-sum settlement of Canadian claims on the basis of principles similar to those applied in settlements which Poland has concluded with other countries. The Department of External Affairs issued a public announcement on September 1, 1965, inviting Canadians to submit their claims against Poland to this department before January 1, 1966. This deadline was subsequently extended to May 1, 1966. These claims are now being examined in the Department of External Affairs in preparation for negotiations with the Polish authorities. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, upon his return from an official visit to Poland among other countries, stated in the House on November 17, 1966, that "the Polish government is desirous of settling the long-standing matter of the claims of certain Canadians arising out of post-war nationalizations, and in the very near future we expect to enter into detailed negotiations to that end".

3. The Department of External Affairs had on record, as of January 26, 1967, 562 claims against Poland. Some of these claims are not eligible for espousal by the Canadian government because the requirements of the rule of continuous nationality (see part 1) have not been met. In other cases, the claim may not be espousable because there is no evidence of loss or because the Polish government is not responsible in international law for the loss as, for example, where the loss occurred as a result of a general devaluation of the currency.

It is not usual practice to reveal the names of registered claimants prior to inter-governmental claims negotiations.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

C.B.C. PAYMENTS TO MESSRS SAYWELL AND RICKER

Motion No. 200—Mr. Cowan:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all correspondence, telegrams or other documents, dated since January 1, 1961, exchanged between the Secretary of State or any agency or department of the government of Canada relating to payments made to John T. Saywell and/or John C. Ricker by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and a list setting out in detail each such payment to each such person.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I understand there is no correspondence between the Department of the Secretary of State or any other agency or department of the government with respect to the matter in question, and I would therefore ask my hon. friend whether he would be prepared to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, I ask that the matter be transferred for debate. I asked not only for the production of correspondence and telegrams but also for other documents.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

C.N.R. LEVEL CROSSING, METROPOLITAN TORONTO

Motion No. 202—Mr. Stanbury:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all correspondence, telegrams or other documents exchanged between the Board of Transport Commissioners and any other organization, group or person, with reference to the level crossing of the Canadian National Railways line at Cummer avenue and Leslie street in the borough of North York in the municipality of metropolitan Toronto.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF POLICY RESPECTING U.S. DRAFT DODGERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister and ask him what is the government's policy in the face of action sponsored by the Students Council for Peace Action to assist the entry of United States draft dodgers into Canada. Is the government making immigration facilities available, are working permits to be granted, and is there any policy with regard to such people of military age seeking entry into Canada?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the rules regarding the admission to Canada of United States citizens would apply in the normal way to men in this category. The fact that these people were draft dodgers would probably be unknown to the immigration officers in any case, and I am sure my hon. friend would not wish to do anything which would interfere with the maximum freedom of movement across the border.

It is very difficult to take action in individual cases but we would certainly not do anything to encourage admission to Canada of this category of United States citizens.

Mr. Starr: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Prime Minister say whether the government has been approached for any further assistance for the Student Council for Peace Action in addition to the grant that body was awarded last year from the Company of Young Canadians. What is the government's policy with regard to the activities of an organization which cannot but damage relations with the United States at this time?

Mr. Pearson: I do not know of any assistance the government is giving to this particular organization. Certainly it is not an organization that should be assisted in this kind of activity.

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Is the Prime Minister ready to make any statement concerning the request made by the Canadian Quakers for financial assistance in aiding the victims of war in both North and South Viet Nam? He said the other day a request had been received.

Mr. Pearson: I think I received a communication on this matter this morning. I would prefer to take notice of the question and look into it.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

REQUEST FOR NATIONAL CODE WITH FEDERAL INSPECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the information placed before the committee on justice concerning the thousands of defects in Canadian manufactured cars, some of which were of a serious nature, does the Prime Minister not think the time is long overdue for a national car safety code with adequate federal inspection? Is the government prepared to introduce such a measure in the near future?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): I hope to be making a statement to the house judicial committee on this particular topic tomorrow.

Mr. Douglas: Having in mind the gap which sometimes exists between reports of committees and legislative action, may I ask the Minister of Industry if the government has undertaken the preparation of such a car safety code, and if it intends to bring such legislation before the house?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Drury: Perhaps after I have made my statement to the committee, Mr. Speaker, I could have some conversation with the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam to ascertain if he is adequately informed. It would take some time to explain the whole thing on orders of the day.

TRADE

CEREALS—DISCUSSION AS TO ENTRY INTO EUROPEAN MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce related to the negotiations that will begin next week in Geneva respecting cereals and the Kennedy round of trade negotiations. I should like to ask him if Canada intends to ask for a discussion with respect to the price of cereals entering the European common market, and also if Canada is being made aware of the terms and conditions under which cereals will enter the common market.

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): In general I could cover the whole question by saying the answer is in the affirmative. This and other aspects are being discussed. Particularly, as I said before, we are advocating a higher price for cereals for Canada.

Mr. Olson: I wonder if the minister would be prepared to tell the house how much of an increase Canada is advocating in the maximum under the international wheat agreement.

Mr. Winters: I really do not believe it would be in the public interest to disclose that at this stage of the negotiations.

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Provencher): I wonder if the minister could advise us if the United States position in these negotiations has been known to the government, and if so what that position is.

Mr. Winters: I am not at liberty to say what the position is. The position of the United States is known to the negotiators. It developed after long weeks of discussion.

Mr. Olson: Can the minister advise the house whether it is true that Canada will be seeking a new maximum of $2.50 per bushel for wheat?

Mr. Winters: I do not think I can add to what I have said on the matter of price.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

INQUIRY AS TO INVITATION TO HIS HOLINESS THE POPE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister.

I would like to know whether the Canadian government has officially invited His Holiness Pope Paul VI to visit our country and the World Exhibition on the occasion of our centennial?

[English]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there have been questions previously of the government on this matter, and I can only repeat what has been said most recently by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that the Papal Delegate has indicated to the government that His Holiness will not be in a position to make a visit to Canada or to North America during this year. This is the latest information we have on the subject.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO ONTARIO PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government has been approached by the government of Ontario with regard to assisting in its crash housing program which was announced in the legislature yesterday.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know the minister responsible for housing has been in touch with the Ontario representatives in connection with this matter, but I would prefer to have a word with him to see whether he can answer the question at greater length tomorrow.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Could the minister inform the house whether for the first time the federal government is going to take part in a plan to provide capital grants for the construction of senior citizens homes and homes for the aged?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to discuss this matter with my colleague the Minister of Labour.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE RESPECTING TAX PAYMENTS TO PRAIRIE MUNICIPALITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Transport. I would ask the minister whether, if he has not already done so, he will give this house an undertaking that he will make a definitive determination whether the C.P.R. intend to give effect in 1967 to its pledge to commence payment of municipal taxes in certain areas of western Canada.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I did give an undertaking during the debate that I would take up this matter with the Canadian Pacific Railway as soon as the bill had been dealt with by parliament, and I intend to keep my word.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): A supplementary question. Can the minister say whether the same answer would be applicable to the requests of the municipalities in the maritime provinces that C.N.R. properties in those provinces pay full municipal taxes?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, that is a matter for determination by the government.

WATER RESOURCES

OTTAWA RIVER—POLLUTION REPORTED COMING FROM QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack Roxburgh (Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to whom I have given notice. My question arises from a column in yesterday's Citizen on the subject of pollution. Mr. Dworkin, the Citizen's financial editor, points out that unlike Ontario, because of lack of—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt—

Mr. Roxburgh: This is leading up to the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Roxburgh: If you would let me ask it—

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member kindly resume his seat. I would ask him to give me an opportunity of making my speech. I would point out to the hon. member, and indeed to all members, that according to the rules hon. members should not refer to articles, newspaper reports or telegrams in prefacing their questions. A question should be asked directly.

Mr. Roxburgh: I will do that, Your Honour. I should like to ask the minister whether his department has done anything or is doing anything to correct pollution of the water of the Ottawa river, which is an interprovincial river, which pollution originates from the province of Quebec.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, an investigation in connection with the Ottawa river was conducted in recent years, but if my memory is good the investigation was not concerned with the problem of pollution in particular. However, I will put forward the hon. member's concern in future negotiations with Quebec regarding the matter of water.

I might add that we are now negotiating with Quebec on another water matter, and I will add this to the subject being discussed in the present conversations.

OIL

STEPS TO INCREASE EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the questions and answers yesterday with reference to the petroleum industry, is the Prime Minister now in a position to assure the house that the minister of trade or his officials are having serious discussions with the Department of the Interior in the United States of America in connection with increasing export targets for petroleum products, instead of having them cut back?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, discussions have been going on, and are continuing, between representatives of the Canadian government and officials of the United States government in connection with this matter.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NORTH VIET NAM—ACCESS BY MEMBERS OF CONTROL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Does the scene which was shown on last night's C.B.C. television news of members of the international control commission being rebuffed in their attempts to gain access to North Viet Nam via a bridge represent the "channel to the north" that the minister talks of when discussing Canada's role on the commission?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my only reply to that question is that whenever the Canadian member on the commission wishes to go to Hanoi this access is extended to him at once. Mr. Moore was indeed there on January 6 for 11 days, and there will be another visit to Hanoi shortly.

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In light of this most recent information that has been made available I wonder whether the minister would reconsider allowing Victor Moore when he returns to Canada to appear before the external affairs committee so the members of this committee can be informed of the viability of the I.C.C. at the present time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I have given consideration to this suggestion which the hon. member made in a question the other day. I do not think, in view of the nature of Mr. Moore's recent assignment, or that of his successor, that this would be a helpful way to reach the objective the Canadian government and the Canadian people have in mind.

Mr. Douglas: Why not?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): For the simple reason that there is too much public discussion about this matter. If we want to bring the war to an end I think it is time we showed more prudence.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: We thought it was Hellyer who was the dictator.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and arises out of his answer to the question put by the hon. member for Prince. Does the minister feel that the appearance of Mr. Moore before the external affairs committee, either in camera or otherwise, would be of no benefit to the members of the committee, and that their knowledge of external affairs and Canada's foreign relationships would be so primitive, as suggested by the Minister of National Defence, that the experience would not add to this knowledge of foreign policy?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the question is in order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I answer the question?

Mr. Speaker: If the house allows the minister to reply to the question. However, I suggest it is not a question but argument.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I can very well understand—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Obviously the minister has not unanimous agreement to reply to the alleged question.

Mr. Churchill: I have a question—

Mr. Speaker: The question was disallowed. There can not be a supplementary question.

PROPOSED TRIP BY PRIME MINISTER'S PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs that I am sure he will like to answer. I ask about the proposed world junket that his department is arranging for the Prime Minister's parliamentary secretary. Is the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) being sent on a public expense tour because he prefers the Minister of National Defence to the Secretary of State for External Affairs as a future prime minister?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is not accepted. It is not necessary for me to say that it is at least hypothetical.

[Later:]

Mr. Churchill: I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I understand that the hon. member for Leeds will go on a world wide fact finding tour, visiting Britain and France to investigate trade problems. We realize that the minister needs assistance. Is this the type he desires?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister, and I hope it will be allowed. Considering the great interest shown by the house in the Far East, could the Prime Minister give some indication what topics will be discussed during that part of his parliamentary secretary's tour?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the scope and nature of the visit of my parliamentary secretary to the Far East has been greatly exaggerated in the press statement which I saw this morning. He was invited some time ago to visit Taiwan by the government of Taiwan and accepted that invitation with my approval because it was considered useful to have a Canadian government representative visit there. While in the Far East he will take advantage of the opportunity to visit two or three other countries in Asia and then he will return to Canada.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NOVA SCOTIA—TRANSFER OF COAL OPERATIONS TO CROWN CORPORATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of press reports of certain discussions held in Nova Scotia. I should like to ask the right hon. gentleman whether the government is now prepared to consider extending the area of operations of the proposed crown corporation in Nova Scotia to take over all possible operations, including steel plants in Nova Scotia?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to add anything to what I said on this matter a week or so ago, when I replied to a similar question that it is not our intention at the present time to extend the field of operations of this corporation.

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question. May I ask the Prime Minister whether it is not the view of the government of Nova Scotia that this extension of the authority of the corporation should be made; and is it not advisable to do it now while negotiations with the province and DOSCO are under way?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question is argumentative.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the answer the Prime Minister has just given to the hon. member for York South, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he would look at the previous answer given to this question to see if there is not a clear indication in that answer that the government was considering taking over steel plants? All the Prime Minister needs to do is to check his own answer.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that can be read into my previous answer, which I will be glad to look into again.

[Later:]

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, my question is actually one of privilege arising from the Prime Minister's answer to the hon. member for York South, his answer to my supplementary question, and the implication that something was being read into his answers that was not there. To substantiate my question of privilege with respect to the fact—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder if the hon. member might raise his question of privilege when the question period has expired. I am afraid we might use up the time that is required by hon. members who want to ask questions.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton South on a question of privilege.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, the question I wish to bring to your attention arose from the answer given by the Prime Minister to the hon. member for York South, his answer to my supplementary question, and the implication that hon. members were reading something into his answers which was not there.

For the benefit of the house, and particularly for the benefit of the Prime Minister, I would direct attention to Hansard for January 12, 1967, at page 11692, second column, where my question to the Prime Minister was recorded as follows:

> Would the right hon. gentleman consider the purchase of DOSCO as a unit in order to maintain the steel operation where it now is, rather than provide a springboard for the transfer to Quebec?

The Prime Minister's answer to me was:

> This is a far reaching question involving government intervention in industry, and one which I certainly do not wish to answer on the orders of the day. It is too important to deal with in this way. There will be an opportunity to discuss this whole matter before long in connection with legislation, or even earlier. This will be one of the aspects of the question that will be considered.

The Prime Minister has referred to the fact that I have taken certain inferences from answers given to me with respect to industrial problems in Cape Breton. I would respectfully ask him to review his own answer and to realize that this is a promise which he has already made.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hardly expect the house would want me to rule on the question of privilege. I suggest to the hon. member that he is simply arguing the point. He disagrees with an interpretation made by another member of the house, and that is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, on this same question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If hon. members want to undertake a full fledged debate on this question of privilege I will hear them, but I suggest with respect, to the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria, that I have ruled there is no question of privilege. I suggest to him that we should not pursue this debate.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, there is no one I would rather listen to than yourself, because you grace your position with great honour and I should take your advice, but on this occasion I would like to assert my privileges in the house. Further to what the hon. member for Cape Breton South has said, on that same day I posed questions to the Prime Minister following questions asked by the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Cape Breton South. In the right hon. gentleman's reply already referred to by the hon. member for Cape Breton South he said:

> This is a far reaching question involving government intervention in—

And I would ask you to notice, Mr. Speaker, that he said at that time "in private industry."

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, I did not say at that time "in private industry". I said "in industry".

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I heard what the right hon. gentleman said. Next day when it appeared in Hansard I mentioned it specifically to the house leader of our party and referred to the fact that "private" had been eliminated or deleted from the proceedings of Hansard. To verify this further may I draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that in my supplementary question to the Prime Minister I said:

> I assume that when he previously mentioned taking over private industry, that pertained to the coal industry.

The reason I mentioned "private industry" was that I was reiterating what the right hon. gentleman had already said when he referred to private industry.

I might also add that when I mentioned this to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) he said "Keep your eye on it. Put a note in Hansard. It will certainly come up again, because it has been deleted." I would like to make that point because there appears to be a change. When we were referring to private industry I naturally assumed we were referring to the DOSCO steel industry in Sydney. Not only that, but the writer for the Halifax Chronicle-Herald assumed the same, and I am sure the right hon. gentleman and his colleague from Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacEachen) interpreted it in the same way—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I respect the hon. member as much as he respects me, but in spite of this I have to rule against his question of privilege.

Mr. Pearson: In view of what has been said, Mr. Speaker, I assume you will give me an opportunity to reply. It should be made quite clear that in my reply to this question I said:

> This is a far reaching question—

That is the question of DOSCO steel industry.

> —involving government intervention in industry—

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): "Private".

Mr. Pearson: The word "private" does not appear.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): That is right; it does not appear now.

Mr. Pearson:

> —in industry, and one which I certainly do not wish to answer on the orders of the day .... There will be an opportunity to discuss this whole matter before long in connection with legislation—

Surely my hon. friend does not wish me to say to the house that there will be no opportunity to discuss this matter when something comes before the house in terms of legislation. That is what I had in mind, and the words make that quite clear.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Further on the question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has already spoken. He cannot speak twice on the same question.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The question of privilege in any event has been ruled out, but I will hear the hon. member's point of order.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): My point of order involves the reference just made by the Prime Minister to a question which was put to him in respect to the matter of DOSCO as a unit and the steel operation in particular, and the Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is not a point of order. From the beginning it was my impression that there was no actual, justifiable question of privilege. Hon. members know what a question of privilege is. I am sure I do not need to quote the various precedents, chapter and verse. A question of privilege arises in respect of a very extreme matter such as a breach of the privileges and rights of hon. members in a very serious manner. To my mind there is no relationship whatsoever between a question of privilege and an argument in respect of the interpretation of a statement made in the house. I have ruled against both hon. members, and I do not think the subject matter should be pursued further. I suggest this, with great respect, to the hon. member.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order I should like to call the attention of the Chair and the house to the fact that when the Prime Minister mentioned this problem he definitely eliminated the last sentence which provided the answer in respect of which I raised my point of order in the first place.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

WATER RESOURCES

GRAND CANAL—DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN ONTARIO AND QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Has the minister recently met with the Quebec and Ontario authorities with regard to the Grand Canal project?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries, but in his absence I direct it to the acting minister. Would the acting minister please advise the house whether he would consider making a grant to the provincial government of Newfoundland-Labrador to purchase food for "Moby Joe", an 80-ton finback whale now stranded off the coast of Newfoundland?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to give that question all the consideration its obvious importance merits.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

HALIFAX—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE FOR MEDICAL BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my fishing expedition is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister received a request from the provincial government of Nova Scotia for more assistance under the Health Resources Fund Act, passed during this session, for the Sir Charles Tupper medical building in Halifax. If so, what action will be taken to meet this reasonable request?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that this question should be on the order paper.

NATURAL RESOURCES

OFFSHORE MINERAL RESOURCES—REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the announcement by Hon. Donald Brothers, minister of mines for British Columbia, that the provincial cabinet had approved an order reserving the continental shelf rights for the crown, and considering that the constitutional question of the ownership of the continental shelf has been referred to the Supreme Court of Canada for a decision, has the Prime Minister any comment to make with respect to this unusual announcement?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be appropriate for me to comment on a matter now before the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Herridge: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Am I correctly informed that Hon. Donald Brothers agreed with some of the Prime Minister's colleagues, when he was in Ottawa conferring about this question, that the proper way to deal with it was to refer it to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, as this question involves the attitude of a member of a provincial government, I had better check the record.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice know when the decision of the Supreme Court in this matter may be expected?

Mr. Pearson: We have no information, Mr. Speaker. We hope that the decision will be produced with the least possible delay as it is important to clear the legal aspect of the matter.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): My question is supplementary to the matter of offshore mineral rights. Has the government received communications from the premier of New Brunswick on this matter. Would the Prime Minister check into this, and if communications have been received will he table the letters?

Mr. Pearson: I shall be glad to look into that, Mr. Speaker. I am not aware of any communication of that kind from the premier, but one may have come and I shall look into it.

AGRICULTURE

ALLEGED FAILURE TO SEND STATEMENTS WITH PAYMENTS TO DAIRY PRODUCERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): In the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister aware of the failure of the Minister of Agriculture to send statements with payments to dairy producers?

[Mr. Herridge.]

What action will the Prime Minister take to correct this situation?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I know of no failure on the part of the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Nasserden: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the Prime Minister will take the trouble to inquire he will not have difficulty discovering that statements have not been sent with these payments.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS

ABBEY HOUSE, LONDON—PLAQUE MARKING ROOM WHERE B.N.A. ACT DRAWN UP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jim McNulty (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I believe there is considerable urgency, as I understand that Abbey House, a building adjacent to the Houses of Parliament in London, is about to be demolished. It was in a conference room in Abbey House that the terms of the British North America Act were drawn up. The room is marked by a plaque to commemorate this event. I am sure the house would like to know what the government intends to do to preserve this plaque.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the house may be apprised of what the government wants to do by way of the order paper.

CANADIAN CONFEDERATION

QUEBEC—SUPPORT FOR PROPOSED NATIONAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

The premier of Quebec, Mr. Daniel Johnson, following the premier of Ontario, said yesterday at a press conference in Quebec city how pleased he would be to take part this year in a conference on the constitution. Would the Prime Minister agree to change his attitude and take right now the initiative in calling such a national conference?

[English]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think I should wait for the prime minister of Ontario to reply to my communication before making further statements on this.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO HOLDING OF BY-ELECTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R.-E. Régimbal (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Since it would be advisable that all ridings be represented in the House of Commons during centennial year, could the Prime Minister tell us if a date has been set for by-elections in the ridings of Hull and Sudbury and, if so, when it will be announced?

[English]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I share my hon. friend's interest in this date. It will be announced before long.

PAYMENT TO EMPLOYEES FOR OVERTIME AND LOST HOLIDAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): My question is directed to the government house leader. Can he tell this house why the loyal and efficient employees of parliament did not receive payment in January for lost holiday time and overtime, some of which goes back to 1964? The employees were under the impression that such payment had been agreed to by those responsible.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question cannot be asked now. It is the type of question which should be directed to the Chair in writing.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I understood—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There can be no discussion on the point.

FINANCE

MERCANTILE BANK—SPECIAL PROVISION RESPECTING FOREIGN SHAREHOLDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and it is based on a news report in today's Ottawa Citizen.

An hon. Member: You cannot. Order.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I can base it on a report; I will not quote it. The report appears to show that the minister is negotiating with the Mercantile Bank of Canada to arrange a special provision for that bank not applicable to other Canadian banks. I ask the minister if the government is considering giving a special privilege to the Mercantile Bank, or the National City Bank of New York, with regard to permitted foreign shareholdings in a Canadian bank.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the short answer is no. Perhaps I should add that, as the newspapers reported, I did meet with representatives of the Mercantile Bank yesterday, but they made no proposals to me and I made none to them. The situation was not advanced at all by the meeting we held.

WATER RESOURCES

PEMBINA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO COMMISSION REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which I wish to direct to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I apologize for not giving him prior notice. Perhaps he will take this as notice and give an answer within the next day or two. Would the minister bring the house up to date on the Pembina river development project that affects important agricultural areas of North Dakota and Manitoba and is presently being considered by the International Joint Commission?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As the hon. gentleman has suggested, Mr. Speaker, I shall take the question as notice.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

NOVA SCOTIA—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF CHIEF JUSTICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect to Hon. James Ilsley, who passed away just a short while ago, will the Prime Minister advise the house on his current thinking with respect to the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia and the filling of the office of chief justice of that province?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it would take far too long to express my current thinking on this matter on orders of the day, but we hope to make a statement soon on this important post.

DIVORCE

APPEARANCE OF PROVINCE OF ONTARIO BEFORE JOINT COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. member for High Park who is the chairman of the joint committee on divorce. Has the province of Ontario made any application to appear before the joint committee on divorce which is now hearing the views of different groups.

Mr. A. J. P. Cameron (High Park): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF NAVY, ARMY AND AIR FORCE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, January 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. Hellyer for the second reading of Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, in my closing remarks last night I had begun to refer to the economy which is supposed to be effected by the unification of the armed forces. The minister and his propaganda team have attempted to leave the impression that there will be a saving in respect of defence. In this regard they have made many references to the white paper of 1964. I challenge any member on the government side of the house to show me where in the white paper of 1964, there is any reference to savings for the Canadian taxpayer in respect of defence spending. This is only a further indication of what the minister's propaganda team is doing.

I should like to quote in part from an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press under the heading "False Economy":

> This pattern of local unit identification, developed by the early settlers all across Canada to guard their homes, has been a mainstay of Canadian defence services all through the years. Due to our vast geography, local regimental identification has been a more important factor in Canada than perhaps any other country.
> In the past week a series of three articles on this page outlined two major errors in the government's current plan to integrate the three defence services completely. It is considered by many qualified observers that by sacrificing regimental spirit and identification Canada will lose far more than she can gain in dollar economies or efficiency by forcing integration down to the level of combat units, either army, navy or air force.
> As indicated in the earlier articles, England, although adopting a degree of integration, after a serious study of the factors has stated that regimental identification of combat units will be preserved as an absolute essential to morale.

Yesterday I referred to the fact that we now have a propaganda team working under the minister. This is a most shameful occurrence in a country such as Canada. Is it any wonder that the C.B.C. disregarded the representations made in parliament by the representatives of the Canadian people and televised an interview with von Thadden of Germany, when here Canada under this Minister of National Defence a propaganda team, has been established, something which belongs only under a dictatorship? As I indicated, these gentlemen who have appeared in the gallery recently and have passed notes back and forth feeding to the press propaganda which the minister himself cannot get across should be ashamed of the fact that they are on such a team. If they have any pride they should retire or resign immediately. They are as guilty as the minister. They are participating in something originated by this minister which we should not have to put up with. Again I say, is it any wonder that the C.B.C. would defy authority and do business with a neo-Nazi?

On the matter of unification the minister and his propaganda team are directing their propaganda to one segment of the economy. The minister says that the veterans and serving officers and men of the Canadian armed forces do not mean a thing. They are directing their propaganda to an age group which has never had any personal involvement or experience with the armed forces of this country. They say this is where the voters are and that these are the people whom they have to convince.

I ask the minister, where is the support for unification in his own party? I have yet to hear one member of the government defend the policy of unification. In fact during all the time I have been present in the house I do not recall an occasion when even a member of the Liberal defence committee has risen to defend it. Why are they not taking part in this debate? Why are they not supporting the minister? It must be because they do not believe in unification. If they did, that would be all the more reason for them to stand up and say so. By their silence it is very obvious that they cannot find in themselves any desire to get up to speak out on behalf of the minister and his policy in respect of unification. Not one member of the defence committee from the Liberal side of the house has taken the opportunity during this defence debate to stand up and support the minister's approach. I said "the minister's approach". I must apologize; that is all wrong. The propaganda team has sold the minister on this policy. In fact I think they did a snow job on the minister. They have convinced him that they are doing the right thing and he has swallowed it. So far as I can see he is the Charlie McCarthy end of the Bergen-McCarthy team.

There is no doubt that Mr. Lee has been brought in as the team manager. He has taken over; he is the puppeteer and the minister and his colleagues are dancing to his tune. He is pulling every string. When members of the defence staff have something they want to direct to the minister's attention they have to know how they stand with Lee before they do anything because he is the man who is directing Canadian defence. Mr. Lee and his cohorts are a great bunch of note passers. I will not go into that further but will leave it there. Mr. Lee is the man who is directing everything that goes on. Perhaps there may be some competition from those involved in private industry who may be looking to him as a public relations man. What he has done to the defence minister is absolutely astounding. When we examine what we have as a defence minister we will realize just how far Mr. Lee has taken him.

Among the ideas they have sold the Canadian people is the one that Canada is leading the way in unification and that this defence policy will be copied by every other nation in the world. That is a downright lie. We have had indications from the British people that unification is impossible and they want no part of it. They have maintained that regimental identification of combat units must be preserved as an essential of morale. That is the approach of the British. The United States has also turned thumbs down on this idea and wants no part of it. New Zealand examined it and wants no part of it.

One British expert, in commenting on unification of the services in Canada, summed up the situation very nicely when he said that Canada cannot afford Hellyer's economies. That statement was made by a leading British authority who suggested, in spite of the minister's claims that it would effect a saving for the country, that Canada could not afford that kind of economy.

Let me again direct the minister's attention to the propaganda squad that has been brought to the House of Commons. I should like to quote from an editorial which appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail today, and again this is recommended reading for the minister. Under the heading "A contempt for Parliament" it is stated:

> For a government that considers unification of the armed forces so important as to rate second-to-top priority on this session's legislative list, and for an opposition that considers the unification legislation so terrible as to gird for a last-ditch fight to defeat it, both sides of the house were acting blasé this week. When the debate was at its height on Monday, there were only 25 MPs in the commons, five Tories, 13 Liberals, five New Democrats, one Socred and one Creditiste.
> The fact that nobody else seemed much interested did not, however, justify Defence Minister Paul Hellyer in his behaviour, or in the tactics he permitted to be introduced into the house.
> The minister sat for the most part silent and inattentive, giving the impression that he was not even listening, only rarely rising to meet a point. But up in an official's gallery of the house the minister's executive assistant, William Lee, and a small army of other defence department supernumeraries met every attack of the opposition with a rain of pamphlets, copies of speeches, information sheets and whispered points directed at members of the press gallery.

This is an indication of the contempt that the minister has shown for parliament. The approach he has taken in this regard can be likened to a springboard from which he has launched a propaganda machine. The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and other members of the cabinet should take a good look at this approach and put a stop to it immediately. The minister has gone too far in his contempt of parliament.

An hon. Member: It is like the truth squad.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Yes, this seems to be a followup of the truth squad. The minister should remember what happened to the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) as a result of her association with that group.

The minister may sit in his place in silence if he wishes, but I suggest that is a contemptible approach to his responsibility to this country. It is a contempt of parliament on the part of this so-called Christian gentleman. If that is the attitude adopted by members of the government it is no wonder that representations made to the C.B.C. were ignored and that the interview with a neo-nazi was carried on television.

Let me make further reference to this editorial in respect of the minister's contempt of parliament:

> What Mr. Hellyer disdained to answer on the floor of the house his faithful assistants, that army of the non-elected, made certain reached, in its most favourable form, the ears of the press.
> It was a performance that showed contempt for the practices and principles of parliament, and one that would not have been permitted to continue five minutes in Westminster. The Mother of Parliaments belongs to the elected representatives of the people, and oppositions attack and ministers answer on the floor of the house. All others are present on suffrance, and the minister cannot catch 40 winks while his flunkies by-pass the other half of parliament to take the word direct to the news media.
> Mr. Hellyer may be an exceedingly efficient administrator—

I disagree completely with that opinion. The editorial continues:

> —but the more one sees of his attitude toward parliament, of what can only be described as his arrogance toward parliament, the more one must question his aspirations to lead his party.

To that I would add, amen. The minister has continually disregarded questions posed to him in respect of defence matters and he refers to anyone who does not go along with the information passed on to him by Mr. Lee, which he uses as his own, as archaic. What else can one expect from a McCarthy-Bergen team? The minister should take a leaf from the page of his colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters), who stands up in this house and presents prepared answers to questions he has been asked. All the questions we have directed to the Minister of National Defence have been ignored, and I am quite sure that unless they were brought directly to the attention of Mr. Lee he would not understand them.

Not too long ago I directed a question to the minister, and I was not being facetious, but in spite of the fact he has had weeks to look into the matter he has yet to provide me with any answer. We have already had an example today of an answer that was incomplete but at least the department concerned gave some answer. The answer to the question I asked might well have been of some advantage to the Liberal party. It was my understanding that experiments were being carried out in respect of providing packaged dinners to service personnel.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am wondering whether the subject matter of the hon. member's comments at this time have any reference to the second reading of the bill before the house.

[Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South).]

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, with all due respect I think any matter concerning defence is relevant. The subject of rations is a vital consideration in the matter of unification because without proper rations we will not have any forces to unify. I remember an old saying to the effect that an army travels on its stomach. That is as applicable today as it was 200 years ago and it is applicable not only to armed forces but to all of us. I venture to suggest that members of parliament would not care to go upstairs and be served packaged dinners. Our armed forces personnel do not deserve that kind of treatment.

• (3:50 p.m.)

The Department of National Defence apparently has been experimenting with packaged dinners, T.V. dinners as they are commonly called, as a method of feeding our armed forces. If that is so and that type of ration is to be adopted, I am sure some packager will receive a lucrative contract. No doubt that kind of patronage will be handed out by the Liberals in the usual way. This would no doubt have a great bearing on whether the experiment would be carried out. I have yet to receive a denial from the minister or an answer of any kind to that question. I received this information from a source I have no reason to question. As far as I am concerned, until I receive a definite no on this matter I believe the Minister of National Defence is again taking a very precarious step and one that will lead to nothing but augmenting the coffers of the Liberal party by way of lucrative contracts.

I have also asked the minister a question in respect of another matter. I have asked him to provide me with a proper answer and again he has failed to do so. I interpret his silence as meaning that if both these questions were looked into the allegations I have made would be borne out. The second one involves an incident that took place at Camp Gagetown where a number of army servicemen were paraded, if you please, before a senior R.C.A.F. officer to be told about promotions. It is my understanding that when these young men were paraded it was indicated to them that promotion would be available to them if—and here was the condition—they would leave their families behind when their units went overseas. I will allow a little time to the minister for that matter to sink in.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member should not give the minister too much time because his time is just about up.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Fair enough, Mr. Speaker. It has registered now, and I am quite sure that somebody in the gallery has taken note of it. I ask the minister to consider this army procedure of giving promotions only if members of the armed forces will leave their families behind when their units go to Germany. This is an approach one would expect from nobody else but the Minister of National Defence, because anybody with any experience or knowledge of the services realizes that it is a most detrimental and degrading step. But, then again, it was introduced by the Minister of National Defence.

[Translation]

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I shall start with a stock phrase: another day, another speech.

At the outset of my remarks, I thought of pointing out that since the beginning of this debate on the unification of the armed forces most speakers have noticeably dealt with the subject with much restraint and objectivity and that everyone has put forward ideas that I find, constructive even though I do not approve them all. I am taking the liberty just the same, in spite of fairly recent events, of passing this remark and congratulating the members of the opposition on their participation in this debate.

On the other hand, I must attempt, in a general way, to restate the theory they have set forth. It seems to me that most Conservative members feel they are in favour of a status quo, that is, they accept and even endorse integration, but they wish to stop its progress at this point. I think my friends opposite will find that I am explaining their thinking correctly in saying that.

They are in favour of the status quo. Consequently, the status quo means that they are for integration, but against unification.

On this side of the house, we claim that integration and unification are simply different stages of the same operation. We advance from integration to unification, which is a logical consequence of integration. This attitude could naturally be expressed by a joke which has been made on the subject and, with all due respect for my hon. friends opposite, I should like to recall it. On the basis of comparison, it was said that they are in favour of conception, but against motherhood. Yet, one follows the other. It seems to me, in any case, that some things are being overlooked in all this question of integration and unification of the forces, when the status quo or even, in some cases, backtracking in being urged. My esteemed friend for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) waxed nostalgic, the other night, over the three former services. I cannot blame him, but I noted that he was nostalgic over the services at a time when all of them were divided and operated separately, except on occasion, when they might come together, and I said to myself: We are no longer involved in integration, we are backtracking.

There is nevertheless a fact that must be taken into account, Mr. Speaker. It is that the government has some responsibilities. Everything is changing these days, and it certainly is not the time, in an area as significant and important as national defence, to ask the government to advance in every area except in the area of defence. And among the various responsibilities of government, one of them is to ensure that Canada continues along the road to peace and prosperity. Any nation, large or small, cannot negate the vital task of keeping abreast of the progression of new ideas.

Indeed, the government would be shirking its responsibilities to the nation and to the people if it did not incorporate new ideas and new ventures which generally can provide our citizens with a better life and better opportunities.

In the field of defence, this government seemingly is providing a force structure which will enable Canada to maintain its sovereignty, which is of course the first objective, and at the same time to make its contribution toward the maintenance of international peace and the deterrence of war. In so doing, we in government would be neglecting our responsibilities to the nation if we did not ensure that the very large portion of money allotted to defence will be spent in a manner which will give our forces the proper equipment they require to support our national and international objectives.

I am convinced we can do this and at the same time generate savings. I feel that the government is more than living up to its responsibilities, to its mandate, in this regard.

As we look at the world we live in, we find ourselves in an era of advanced technology where the armed forces of countries both large and small, possess greater fire power than ever before. We find ourselves in a world whereby fire power has increased so much that we in turn must increase the protection for our troops in the field. We find ourselves in a mechanized world of armoured personnel carriers, ships that can wash themselves of nuclear fall-out, and self-propelled howitzers which carry their own armoured protection.

We live also in a world of instant communication, of orbiting satellites, tactical communications and radio facilities which can reach any part of the world almost instantly. Thus we live in a world of mobility where long-range heavy transports can fly troops and equipment to the most remote parts of the world at a moment's notice; where helicopters can carry troops to the front lines of battle; where very short take-off tactical fighters and transports have all become part of the armed forces inventory.

Realizing this, it is obvious that no country can be insular. No country can stand alone in the world and say—we are not a part of the international community or we are not affected by the events of the world. And because of all these things, it is clear that each brush fire war which now occurs, has the inherent, potential danger of escalating to an international conflagation. Every armed dispute between any nations must be viewed as one which has a potential danger of disrupting international stability, thereby endangering national security.

We are all aware of these dangers and we are also aware that even the large stable alliances such as NATO must be designed, not only toward stopping a major assault, but also toward stopping minor conflagrations which may break out on any flank. Recognizing this, Canada undertook to provide to the Supreme Commander of NATO, a 1000 man force to the ACE Mobile Force in Europe. It is in this sort of contribution that Canada recognizes her international responsibilities and fulfils her desire and her intention toward maintaining international stability and the deterrence of war.

With these responsibilities in mind, there are a number of options that were available to Canada in the early '60s. We could, for example, contribute all our forces toward the maintenance of peace by placing our forces under the United Nations. As someone has said—"We could put all our eggs in the peacekeeping basket."

The second option open to us was to commit all our forces to the deterrence of war by making additional contributions to NATO and to NORAD and by building up our nuclear capability beyond all reasonable and even logical requirements.

[Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne).]

The third option was to keep only enough forces that we would require to maintain our national sovereignty.

Let us examine these three options. If we committed all our forces to the United Nations, then it seems to me we would have to depend upon the United Nations to maintain our national sovereignty, but since the United Nations has neither the military structure nor the forces currently available to undertake such a task, we would be neglecting our responsibilities to the nation and our role which is precisely to maintain national sovereignty.

If we committed all our forces to the deterrence of war in such organizations as NATO and NORAD, we would be neglecting our international responsibilities to the United Nations by not having the forces available for United Nations peacekeeping and peace-restoring actions.

If we undertook the third option of only keeping forces to maintain our national sovereignty, we would place ourselves in an impossible insular position and we would not be living up to our international responsibilities. To put it in very frank terms, we would be saying—"I'm alright Jack, and the rest of the world be damned". That would not be living up to our international responsibilities in the family of nations.

Thus we come to a fourth option. This is the option we have taken. This is the option which permits us to create a proper mix of forces which can be used to contribute to international peacekeeping, which can be used to contribute to the deterrence of war and which can be used to maintain our national sovereignty. This, to me, is the only logical option available to a country of our size, with our population and with our resources. With due respect to those who would suggest that we should take one of the other options, I would simply say that I do not think that the greatest number of Canadians would agree with you.

The Canadian choice of the option that I have just described has been taken because we possess the advanced technology required by our forces to engage in the deterrence of war. The Canadian choice has been taken because we have the resources and the manpower which permit us to accept this proper mix of forces. The Canadian choice for this option has been taken because we are able to produce or procure the necessary equipment for our forces to participate in these various types of conflict.

Above all, however, the Canadian choice of these options has been taken because as good neighbours to all nations, we wish to make our contribution to international stability. For all these reasons, we firmly believe that our choice of these options is not only the right choice but the only choice. I think that Canadians have a sense of pride in the members of our armed forces who are doing their job in NATO, NORAD, in the United Nations and in every part of the world where Canadians are making a contribution to international peace and to the deterrence of war.

Mr. Speaker, there has been a great deal of discussion by members of the opposition regarding our force structure. From what I can gather, and they expressed opinions which in some cases are contradictory, I understand they would have us create a separate force for UN duties; another force for NATO; yet another force to maintain national sovereignty and possibly another force to keep at home for riots, insurrections or what have you. This would be simple, but, I submit, very, very expensive. In fact, Mr. Speaker, it would be a waste of manpower and money.

What we have done and, what I suggest the members of the opposition conveniently ignored, is to create a functional command structure which permits us the flexibility to assign portions of one force to these commitments as the conditions and occasions require. This, in my opinion, is making the maximum effective use of our manpower, equipment and financial resources.

Look at it this way. We have made our choice of options. This choice includes contribution to the deterrence of war; the maintenance of peace, the continuance of national sovereignty and aid to the civil government for internal stability. In all the range of possibilities, there is only one case which comes to mind in which our force structure could not possibly operate. That case would have to include an outbreak of major war in Europe plus many UN peacekeeping operations in separate parts of the world, plus a direct enemy land/sea and air attack on Canada and finally insurrections in all the major Canadian centres. This is what the opposition wants us to prepare for, but I submit in such a case, Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much if any force structure we created would withstand the test. In fact what I am describing is total world anarchy—something which none of us realistically expect to happen.

On the other hand, it would be incomprehensible to have forces which are only trained and equipped to fight a nuclear war committed to UN peace restoring action or to restore civil order elsewhere. Now, I admit that there are the two extremes, but between these extremes we are committed to provide a force, or portions of a force, depending on the requirements.

This is the crux of the problem. From a single force containing land, sea and air elements, we must be in a position where we can detach the required portions necessary to fulfil a particular commitment. If the particular commitment requires a combination of land and sea elements, or land and tactical air elements, or just a land element we can provide this portion by detaching from the single force the strength and type of force required.

We can apply various combinations of this force at home and abroad as the case may warrant. It may be to stop an enemy lodgement on our shores; it may be to assist in UN peace restoring action; it may be to further assist NATO or it may be a combination of these tasks. The point remains, however, that with this type of structure we know what our force is, what it can do, how it can be supported and most important of all, we can give it the required flexibility to meet these changing commitments.

Now, some people have advanced the argument that all this can be done while retaining the three separate services. I suggest to them, however, that it is both dangerous and expensive to retain the separate services. It is dangerous because we have already experienced some of the bitterness of inter-service rivalries. We have seen previous cases where one service will press for particular equipment it feels it must have to carry out a specific function without relating that specific function to over-all defence objectives. We have seen previous cases where a particular service refuses to alter its equipment so that it can carry dual instead of a single function. We have seen previous cases where the purchase of military equipment by the services was made before government policy had been decided on the use of such equipment. In other words—and to this I think we can all agree—there have been times in past years where the three services have procured some types of equipment for themselves without any reference to the needs and requirements of the other services.

In so far as expenditures are concerned, I think that the expense required to maintain the three separate services is both unnecessary and unwarranted. I do not intend to list all the areas of duplication and triplication necessary to maintain three separate services. They are well known to all members of this house, but here are some examples:

1. Separate and distinct uniforms.

2. Separate personnel policies and the duplication of manpower required to support these policies.

3. Duplication in areas of common training.

4. Duplication of the communications systems.

5. Different logistics systems.

I realize that the retention of the separate service identity is an emotional concern but in this emotionalism there are a number of illogical suggestions. To be perfectly frank, I am not concerned whether the Chief of Defence Staff is navy, army or air force. What I am concerned about is that we have the best Chief of Defence Staff available no matter what his previous service may have been.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): In a similar view, I want the Canadian Armed Forces to be able to pick the best man for every position despite the confines of his previous service. Only by removing the limits imposed by the three separate service concept can we make the maximum effective use of our manpower resources.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, having examined what the new force structure is capable of doing I want to draw the attention of hon. members to the equipment that these forces will be provided with in the early '70s. It has been suggested that we will have nothing but a peace-keeping force. Look at the $1.5 billion five-year program for re-equipping our forces:

Two more operational support ships which materially increase the effectiveness of our surface fleet; seven Restigouche class destroyers to be fitted with new submarine detection equipment and the ASROC anti-submarine weapon system; approximately 1000 armoured personnel carriers, command post vehicles, cargo vehicles and anti-personnel machine guns; self propelled 155 mm. howitzers for the brigade in Europe; anti-tank guided missile equipment; medium anti-tank weapons to replace present weapons in the field forces; a quadrapartite 81mm mortar having greater accuracy and lethality for infantry battalions. These are just some of the equipment purchases we are making.

[Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne).]

Mr. Speaker, the equipment we are procuring combined with the force structure we have created gives us a capability to undertake a variety of tasks anywhere in the world. In cases where we can use our forces for different circumstances, we have insured that our troops will have the proper equipment and fire power to carry out their commitment.

Where we can employ our equipment for different purposes we have built in a dual capability. Thus, for example, our new operational support ships can not only provision the fleet at sea but carry heavy equipment and stores required to support our land forces wherever they may be assigned.

Our CF-104s, previously limited to a nuclear strike role, now have the dual capability of nuclear and conventional strikes. These are but two examples. There are more, for example, our CF-5 aircraft can be used for ground support but also have the ability to intercept and engage in air-to-air combat.

I am therefore convinced, Mr. Speaker, that our forces have been correctly structured to meet the needs and requirements posed by the events we face today and those we foresee in the early '70s.

In a similar vein, I am convinced that our forces are receiving the right equipment to carry out the defence policies of this nation.

Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago I mentioned unification and I heard again and again in this debate the question "What is meant by unification?" Here is what the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) said about unification, and I quote:

"Integration-to-unification is a series of interlocking steps designed to provide Canada the best military course possible to meet our international obligations for a reasonable expenditure. It is quite difficult to determine any clean break between them because there was never intended to be one. Integration is actually the first phase of the total process of unification. Whatever special meaning the word may carry in any given context, in practical terms the process of integration can be but a means to an end and not an end in itself."

Or here is what Lt. General Moncel said about integration and unification:

"I must stress, however, that we must not allow integration to become our whipping boy. Far from being the cause of our troubles it is their best cure. In the final analysis, perhaps integration is the wrong word altogether and it is unification of which we should speak—one force with many facets operating at the will of our commands in the fulfilment of our nations defence policy.

I think there can be no mistake that integration and unification are well known and that those who are particularly charged with operating a unified force know full well the terms and meaning of unification.

Coupled with the question about unification is the charge that we are creating a hybrid force. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I do not see how it can be made more clear than the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) made it when he stated on second reading:

> One general principle should be underlined again —the combat units will retain their identity and their specialized functions and training. It is important to state that it is not and never has been any part of the planning associated with unification to convert our servicemen to "jacks of all trades". An infantry soldier will not be asked to do the job of a sailor in a fighting ship; a sailor will not be asked to fight in an infantry platoon; and a fighter pilot will not be required to drive a tank.

And Gen. Moncel stated:

> There is however, one last point which I would like to make. It is that we shall retain sea, land and air units and formations, each with its own environmental expertise and professionalism, for exactly as long as our defence policy requires. In my estimation, this is likely to be for as long as human beings are inclined to quarrel with each other on the sea, on the land and in the air.

It is clear to me that the creation of one unified force, with land, sea and air elements is not the same as three separate forces, the Navy, the Army and the Air Force each with their own training, logistics, equipment and specialized tasks trying to co-operate on the same tactical problem. Three armed services trying to co-operate does not fulfil the criteria outlined by Gen. Moncel, and I repeat:

> One force with many facets operating at the will of our command in the fulfilment of our nation's defence policy.

Now another charge levelled by members opposite is that in this process of integration and unification there have been no savings. I would refer hon. members to an answer tabled in the house on October 19, 1966 in reply to this varied question. First, let me read in some detail some parts of the reply to that question:

> • (4:30 p.m.)
> It is not possible to relate specific details in terms of dollars to a particular fiscal year due to the time lapse involved for the necessary reorganization subsequent to actual decisions being taken. Savings already achieved through the integration of headquarters and services since July 1964:
> Headquarters—a reduction of 26% in staff; Training—a reduction of 13% in staff; Recruiting—a reduction of 33% in staff; Information Services—a reduction of 60% in staff; Construction Engineering —a reduction of 45% in staff; Cataloguing Section Materiel Command—a reduction of 26% in staff; Canadian Staff London—a reduction of 44% in staff; Canadian Staff Washington—a reduction of 34% in staff.
> Despite increased costs of materials, supplies and services generally actually expenditures for 1965-66 compared to 1964-65 show a net saving of $12 million.

To be perfectly fair, Mr. Speaker, I would be remiss if I did not also bring to the attention of the house an additional part of the answer where it is stated.

> It is forecast that additional savings due to integration in 1966-67 will not be sufficient to compensate entirely for continuing increased costs including the general military pay increase effective 1 October 1966.

But in all fairness, Mr. Speaker, I think all members will realize that the armed forces like the civilian economy, is suffering from the increase of costs found in any booming economy.

Next, I want to deal with the rumours that we are closing out bases. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Forrestall) raised this point on Monday night and I know that there is great concern in this area and other areas of the country. We have replied to this question, but I would like to bring our reply to the notice of hon. members and to the citizens of the country who are directly affected. We answered as follows:

> As was stated in the White Paper 1964, the aim of the reorganization of the Canadian Forces is the achievement of increased efficiency and economy based upon the overall national interest. The proper positioning and grouping of activities and forces, and their amalgamation where practical, is now under study, and it is anticipated that this study will extend over a considerable time. In any event no major bases, including Rivers, will be closed out during 1967. Of course, this does not preclude the possibility of moving units or activities from one base to another. If, and when a decision is taken to close out a specific base the maximum possible advance information will be provided to those who are directly affected.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I am firmly convinced that we are upholding our governmental responsibility to our armed forces and to the citizens of our country, when dealing with unification.

The force structure that has been created, the projected operational course of deployment planned for the early '70s plus the equipment we are purchasing through our five year $1.5 billion procurement program will enable our armed forces to carry out their duties and responsibilities in support of our national policy.

I am not convinced that we have in any way been secretive about our plans and projections. Canadians have never been more aware of our plans concerning our defence policy than they are today. Some people charged that Canadians do not care about defence any more—that it is a dead issue—I do not believe that at all. I believe that Canadians have real knowledge of our defence policy and are secure in the knowledge that what we are doing in the field of defence is good for them and in the best interests of the nation.

Mr. Speaker, we are engaged in a discussions of the principle of unification. I believe the Canadian Armed Forces are anxious to carry out the task of unification.

We are not engaged in the process of destroying the old organization. We are on the threshold of developing a unified force which is the best type of force to carry out our defence policy. It may not be the best way for all countries. I do not know about that. But I am confident that it is the best type of force for Canada and fully in keeping with our desire to deter war and maintain international peace and stability.

[English]

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I agree wholeheartedly with quite a bit of what the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) has said. I have a high regard for the associate minister and for the capable way he has carried out his duties.

Mr. Hellyer: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I regret that the time has long passed, if it ever existed, when I could say the same about the minister.

I agree with the associate minister that this question is important, and I hope he is correct when he expresses the opinion that Canadians generally have a vital interest in it. I should like to see some evidence of that. If it is so, I am delighted. It is important from many points of view, not only because of cost. In this fiscal year we are spending something like $1,575 million on defence. For a country such as Canada with its small population this means an expenditure of something like $75 to $80 for every man, woman and child.

But unification is vitally important from other points of view. It is important not only because of the cost of our defence effort and what we get for our defence dollars but also vitally important because in our course of action we are taking a virtually irreversible step in doing away with the defence set-up that has served us well over the years and substituting another one for it. No matter how unsuitable it may prove to be for Canada it will be almost impossible effectively to unscramble the situation and get us back to the position we are now in or something like it, regardless of how desirable returning to this situation may be.

I do not want to refer at great length to the associate minister's speech. He talked about things which are true and valid, the desirability of equipping our forces with modern equipment that is versatile, and that sort of thing. That does not necessarily imply that unification, as this bill before us would have it, is necessary to achieve these other desirable ends. In a number of instances the associate minister's reasoning was perfectly correct and valid but in some instances he started with false premises. Naturally, though his reasoning process was correct, he ended with wrong conclusions. He said that this is a time of change, that we have to be adaptable. Nothing could be truer. It does not follow that because you change you make progress. Progress is not automatic. Though you have to change to progress, it does not always follow that by changing you always progress.

When the debate began on this stage of the bill in December the minister spoke for an hour and three quarters. I read his speech carefully. It contains scarcely a statement which cannot be validly challenged. Last evening I saw some remarks reportedly made by the retiring president of the Canadian National, Mr. Donald Gordon. They describe Canada's difficulty at the present time. Mr. Gordon said, "It aint the things you don't know that gets you into trouble, it's the things you know for sure what aint so." In my judgment that is the difficulty with the minister. No matter what authority is quoted, no matter what facts are put forward he simply dismisses them by saying they aint so.

We could benefit by examining the experience of other countries in this important matter. Having one armed force instead of three is not a new idea. There is nothing new under the sun. Probably dozens of countries have thought of it but in every case have discarded it. In July, 1963, Great Britain produced a white paper entitled "Central Organization for Defence" which in part said:

> The object is to improve the central control of defence policy without impairing the efficiency and morale of the fighting services. Their separate identities will be preserved.
> The services must preserve their separate identities. In action they are increasingly interdependent. This interdependence must be expected to increase. Nevertheless all experience shows that the fighting spirit of the individual man in battle derives largely from his loyalty to his ship, his unit, or his squadron. The traditions and battle honours of the individual services are a vital factor in morale and fighting efficiency. This must be preserved.

What has been the experience in the United States? Up to quite recent times, until the end of world war II, the United States had only two departments, a department of the army and a department of the navy. There was also the United States army air corps which in world war II was a very powerful and decisive force but it was not a separate armed service in the sense that we are speaking of now. After world war II the United States examined the whole problem of the administration of its armed forces. The joint chiefs of staff appointed a committee of outstanding army and navy officers in May, 1944, to examine thoroughly three basic systems of defence organization: (1) two departments—war and navy; (2) three departments—war, navy and air; (3) one department—defence. In this connection I quote from a history of the United States air force by Alfred Goldberg, and I should like to emphasize that he is talking about departments, not services.

After ten months of study and travel in every theatre of war, interviews with 52 key military and naval leaders, and one hundred separate meetings in Washington, D.C., the JCS Special Committee, in March 1945, recommended a plan for one department of armed forces consisting of three co-ordinate branches. It advised prompt action to prevent reversion of the air arm to its prewar status and the loss of the gains in efficiency and co-operation made since 1942. The JCS plan included a military commander of the armed forces who would also be chief of staff to the president.

Again quoting from Mr. Goldberg's history:

In response to the president's message, a subcommittee of the Senate committee on military affairs, under Senator Elbert D. Thomas, began working on a unification bill with the representatives of the army and navy—Major General Lauris Norstad and Vice Admiral Arthur W. Radford.

I should mention that what was involved was unification of the departments, not of the services.

Numerous conferences with top leaders of the services followed, and nine separate drafts were prepared. The last draft was introduced as a bill in April 1946 and accepted by the whole committee in May.

This bill became known as the proposed Common Defence Act of 1946, because it provided for a Department of Common Defence comprising three co-ordinate arms. There would be a civilian secretary of common defence, a secretary and a commander for each of the arms, a chief of staff of common defence to rank above all other officers of the armed forces, a council of common defence, a national security resources board, and a central intelligence agency. This bill offered no assurance that the army and navy could retain their special air units.

That bill was not passed. It was withdrawn and another bill known as the National Security Act of 1947 was passed in its place.

The National Security Act of 1947 became law on July 26, 1947. The lawmakers stated their intentions at the beginning of the act in a declaration of policy: to provide a comprehensive program for the future security of the United States; to provide three military departments—the army, the navy (including naval aviation and the marine corps), and the air force—

I shall not quote further, but the interesting point is that in the United States approach the people concerned sought the best advice from the senior officers of their services as to what would be the most efficient and most desirable form for their armed forces to take. They also took the advice of their senior officers with regard to administration of the civilian department. That was in complete contrast to what we see here in Canada. Of course it can be said that Canada's problems are not on all fours with those of the United States or any other country. I would be the first to agree, but nevertheless I think we can learn from the experience of other countries.

It is said that defence policy is an extension of external affairs policy. The white paper published in March, 1964 contains the following at page 6:

In these circumstances, there have developed four parallel methods by which the objectives of Canadian defence policy have been pursued. They are:

(a) Collective measures for maintenance of peace and security as embodied in the Charter of the United Nations, including the search for balanced and controlled disarmament;

(b) Collective defence as embodied in the North Atlantic Treaty;

(c) Partnership with the United States in the defence of North America;

(d) National measures to discharge responsibility for the security and protection of Canada.

I would like to know if this statement of our objectives is still valid or has there been some undisclosed, subterranean shift in our external affairs policy and therefore a shift in our defence policy which requires a different shape for our armed forces? If this is the case, and if it is the only reason for the proposed re-organization, then the Canadian people have a right to know.

Our forces have been reduced in strength. Many of them are not up to establishment at the present time. In that regard I should like to quote from an editorial in the Charlottetown Guardian of last Monday which in part refers to articles that appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press with which I am not familiar. The editorial reads in part as follows:

• (4:50 p.m.)

Morale in all three services, according to first-hand reports, is at an all time low and new recruiting is far below actual requirements as a result of Mr. Hellyer's policy.

Under the present faulty command structure, however, it is virtually impossible for the public, parliament, or even the cabinet now to ascertain the true state of affairs. As it now stands, individual members of any army council or defence council no longer have any official right of direct access to the cabinet, nor are they free to give their honest opinions. The present chief of the defence staff (in fact a commander in chief) and the minister are now able to control, dominate, and overrule all other members of the council or senior staff.

Through firings and early retirements of any seniors who had the courage to speak out, the minister has tended to gather about himself a clique of "yes men". No officer can now freely offer his advice to the cabinet. In short, the cabinet and parliament are now entirely dependent on such information as Mr. Hellyer and his "commander in chief" do or do not wish to report. For other officers to carry their case to the cabinet would be to place their appointments and future promotions in jeopardy, if not to risk being fired outright.

This is a formidable indictment by a leading Liberal newspaper, and it is not something that can be brushed off lightly. It is time, the Free Press maintains, to re-establish the post of inspector general—

I would agree with this suggestion if we are to retain the type of organization where there is only one channel of communication to the minister. Time and again it has been said that a unified force will provide flexibility. I maintain that the very reverse is true, that when you have a unified force it is only the opinion which results from one set of judgments which will ever come to public notice. If that opinion should prove not to be the best, then the error will be concealed for as long as possible, not through any malicious intent or inefficiency on the part of the commander in chief, the generalissimo, or whatever he might be called, but because human nature is what it is. When there are three separate services with three separate chiefs of staff and suggestions in respect of requirements and demands for equipment and so on are made on behalf of one of the three defence forces, these must stand up to the criticism, the judgments and suggestions which are presented in competition to them.

Mr. Hellyer: That was the trouble with the system; they did not.

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

Mr. MacLean (Queens): That is exactly what I am saying. When you have three chiefs of staff you have the best of at least three choices. Under the present situation there is only one type of thinking which will become government policy. I know for a fact that other countries such as Britain have toyed with the monolithic type of structure and have discarded it for that very reason. Where it is used, only one point of view prevails whether or not it is a completely valid point of view. In respect of this defence structure we have what one might refer to as the bed of Procrustes policy of the minister. If a senior officer, no matter how valid his position may be with regard to a policy matter, is a big enough man to stand up and proclaim his position through proper channels to his superiors, he will lose his head if his policy does not fit in with the accepted single policy. This is the practice which has been followed for the past two years.

I have mentioned the fact that on the east coast particularly our navy is under strength. The number of ships at sea and in commission has been seriously reduced. In answer to questions on this point which have been asked over a period of months the minister has replied that this is absolute nonsense. He says that the units which we now have at sea are so much more technically advanced—they have helicopters, variable depth sonar and so on—that eight of them are equal to twice as many of the type in commission four or five years ago. This is true in that limited sense. We must not forget, however, that technical advance among our potential enemies is not stagnating; it is not at a standstill. If one were to project the minister's reasoning beyond a period of a couple of years, perhaps over a few centuries, one would immediately realize that perhaps one world war II frigate would have disposed easily of the Spanish Armada. But that is not the problem we have today. We must keep abreast of developments and have counter-measures for every potential threat that is developed.

In connection with anti-submarine warfare I think it is not fully realized among the general public or the press that there is a new, tremendously important and extremely dangerous dimension to submarine warfare which did not exist in world war II. Up until some time after world war II virtually the only use to which submarines could be put was to attack merchant shipping or naval units. The defence against them was relatively simple. All one had to do was defend the sea lanes. The enemy could not produce any damage without exposing himself to danger. The submarine had to come in close in order to attack. Virtually its only targets were merchant shipping and the naval units protecting that merchant shipping. So it really was a case of keeping the sea lanes open. That type of submarine warfare is still in existence, but it is of only relatively minor importance compared to the tremendous threat which has developed as a result of nuclear-powered submarines armed with nuclear missiles which carry for a very considerable range. They can park anywhere in a huge area of the ocean.

The potential threat to our cities and our communications from these nuclear submarines extends over a wide area. You do not wait for them to come to you. You must search them out. The problem is similar to looking for a needle in a haystack. In my judgment this is of tremendous importance and should not be downgraded. I believe it is the main reason that our naval strength must be kept up to date if we are to be in a position to meet our NATO obligations so far as our naval contribution is concerned.

In this regard there is an apparent conflict in the policy of the government. For the last two years the government has been pretending to have a policy of extending our territorial seas and declaring vast areas, such as the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the bay of Fundy, Hecate strait, Dixon Entrance, and other vast waters, as national waters of Canada. That policy also seems to be in a state of suspended animation or limbo at the present time. If the government pursues that course and the objective is achieved it will then have the additional responsibility of assuring our allies that we are capable of enforcing our sovereignty over those vast areas of water.

Our allies cannot afford to take the chance that the Gulf of St. Lawrence, for example, might become a sanctuary for potential enemies. Even during world war II it was not possible for us to keep the Gulf of St. Lawrence clear of enemy undersea craft. It will be even more difficult in peacetime to assure our friends and allies that there are not enemy submarines, capable of lobbing atomic missiles into some of the largest population centres of North America, lurking in that area. The minister should assure us that the capability of our navy is such as to be consistent with the implications of the other policy. Let me be perfectly clear by saying that I agree wholeheartedly with the policy of extending our territorial waters, but we must face up to the accompanying responsibilities.

Is it the government's intention to pass on some of our responsibilities for establishing and protecting some of our territory to a friendly neighbour? Are we going to default, cut down or bargain out of some of our obligations to NATO? I am not passing judgment on such a possible course, but we should be clear in this regard. Is it possible that the government intends to employ our armed forces for peace-keeping duties under the United Nations? That has been denied time and time again.

Mr. Hellyer: The hon. member surely listened to the associate minister's speech. I am surprised that he raises this subject again.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I raise it again because the fact is we are contributing at the present time to peace keeping forces under the United Nations. If that is going to be a permanent role it should be carried out by a special organization within our armed forces. The effectiveness of our armed forces should not be reduced by gathering up ad hoc peacekeeping units to be shipped off to Cyprus or somewhere else when a special crisis arises.

The training of our armed forces is not particularly suitable for the duties required of peace keeping forces under the United Nations. Consideration should be given in conjunction with other nations to the creation of a special peace keeping force which would be specially trained for the specialized tasks involved. It would have to be a force trained in the diplomatic handling of tense situations. Its members would have to be long suffering and patient in order to be effective under most difficult conditions.

I am very much saddened and sincerely disappointed by the course the minister insists on pursuing. Not long ago we in parliament heard a great long list of legislation that had to be completed, according to the Prime Minister, before the next recess. That list should be culled and legislation of little or no merit should be deleted. Legislative items which the majority of Canadians believe are downright harmful and disadvantageous to the future interests of this country should also be deleted. At the top of the items for deletion I suggest should be the bill presently under discussion.

The policy embodied in the measure before us has all the earmarks of an idea conceived before arguments were gathered to prop it up. It is a tragedy that we should now find ourselves as a nation in the position of embarking upon this policy. I will not be surprised if the bill passes in the course of time and the minister has his way, but if that turns out to be the case it will be little short of a tragedy for Canada.

One may ask how this could come about. I suppose it came about first because the minister got his way in the cabinet. Apparently for the sake of solidarity his colleagues, some of whom must have great reservations about this matter, went along with the idea. Perhaps the minister might have resigned had they not agreed and a weak government of this kind probably could not afford to have that happen. If I were in their places I should think it better to have the minister as an enemy than as a friend.

The government must have support in the house. No party at the present time particularly wants an election because we have had so many within a few years. It may also be argued that the whole matter of unification is something that is of interest to only those people who are directly concerned and that many many Canadians pretty well ignore it. As a result we are being subjected to the tyranny of the artificial majority which the government maintains in the house with the assistance of one or two splinter parties.

An hon. Member: Splinter parties?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): With the support of the third, fourth and fifth parties, if you like. I do not care what you call them. The fact is that the government at this time represents only a relatively small segment of the Canadian people. Its support is far less than 50 per cent. Under those circumstances the government does not have a mandate to proceed in a bull-headed fashion with highly contentious legislation without first examining that legislation very carefully and without first obtaining the best possible advice available.

For that reason I feel strongly that the subject matter of this bill should have gone to a committee for further study before the house was asked to approve it in principle. The government has no mandate to force its will upon the Canadian people. It is true that it is the largest group in the house and under our system is charged with administration, but it should seek a consensus in respect of highly contentious matters.

In this regard I have often been disturbed by the interpretation placed on the performance of parliament by our press and other mass media of communication, an interpretation which has found its way into the minds of the Canadian people. I believe that the workings of parliament are of fundamental importance to our democratic system and that they should be understood. On reading the press of Canada I get the feeling one gets when walking through a hall of mirrors at an exhibition midway. In one place one's image is distorted in one way and in another place in another way. Even if an individual does by chance come across an accurate reflection of what goes on in parliament, there is no way for him to know whether it is distorted or whether it is the actual fact.

I believe that a press which holds the right of freedom of the press in such high esteem, and rightly so, should recognize the very grave responsibilities that go in this day and age with moulding public opinion. The moulding of public opinion should be based on objective observation rather than prejudiced or distorted, pre-conceived views of any situation. All the opposition ask in connection with this very important matter of unification is that it be thoroughly examined, that we have the evidence of witnesses, without prejudice, without trying to force the outcome one way or the other. If unification has the merits the government claims for it, it will stand up under that examination. If it has not, it should not be perpetrated upon the Canadian people.

With regard to what we in the official opposition are trying to do here in parliament I would like to read one quotation and then I shall have concluded my remarks. For convenience I quote from Beauchesne's fourth edition. The passage I shall quote contains quotations from other authorities on the subject of democracy:

> In every country attempts have been made to ensure that there shall be some check on the powers of the majority. Lord Bryce said in "Modern Democracies": "That a majority is always right, i.e. that every decision it arrives at by voting is wise not even the most fervent democrat has ever maintained seeing that popular government consists in the constant effort of a minority to turn itself by methods of persuasion into a majority which will then reserve the action or modify the decisions of the former majority."

There is a special onus on a minority government when it proceeds on courses that are not reversible. The passage continues:

> Decision by majority is not an absolute and unquestionable principle. "Our constitution, to use Burke's phrase, is something more than a problem in arithmetic." There is no divine right of a mere numerical majority any more than or kings. Majority decision is a measure of convenience essential to the dispatch of business, the result, "of a very particular and special convention, confirmed by long habits of obedience." The idea that a majority, just because it is a majority, is entitled to pass, without full discussion, what legislation it pleases, regardless of the extent of the changes involved or of the intensity of the opposition to them, the idea in fact that majority edicts are the same things as laws, is wholly alien to the spirit of the constitution.

A minority party may question ministers, may criticize but cannot control in the ordinary case a government with a reasonably large majority. There can be no control of the executive where the supporters in parliament are prepared without question to obey the leaders of their party—through the whips. All that the minority party—the opposition—can do without support from members of the majority party is to question, inquire and criticize, but whilst this does not amount to control it is an important method of checking abuses of power. With the support of a majority——of members it would be possible for a cabinet to suspend the sitting of parliament, have the minority members arrested, withdraw the safeguards of liberty such as habeas corpus and freedom of speech, and to establish virtually a dictatorship. All this, too, could be done within the law. It is surprising how few members of the general public appreciate how uncontrolled the cabinet is where it has the support of a loyal majority in parliament and that "the supremacy of parliament" in this sense is absolute and subject to no real safeguards of any kind.

I contend that the government is abusing its imagined power in this situation.

We may add that the majority of the House of Commons does not always represent the majority of the electors in the country. It often happens that, owing to the redistribution of electoral districts, a party may come out of the general elections with a majority of elected members without having received the majority of the votes given by the electors who went to the polls or whose names are on the electoral lists. That party may form a cabinet, but the official opposition together with other anti-ministerial groups, though sitting to the Speaker's left, are the real representatives of the people; and their right to challenge by legitimate means every measure or proceeding sponsored by ministers cannot be disputed. In such cases, when the house divides, members who oppose the administration may act on behalf of the majority while government supporters represent the minority of the people of Canada.

In respect of this legislation I believe that the government represents a minority, and a small minority, of the people of Canada. Therefore it is my intention to vote against second reading.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, implicit in the decision that this house is called on to make on second reading of this bill is much more than simply questions of organization, machinery, uniforms or ranks, important though these may be. The basic question posed by approval in principle of this bill is the whole question of the future role of Canada's armed forces, the purpose and function which they are to serve and the contribution in the sphere of defence that Canada can best make to the security of the people of this country and of the world. Viewed in this light, I have come to the conclusion, somewhat reluctantly I must say, that I must support this bill on second reading. I say reluctantly because I resent, with others, the obstinacy with which the minister and the government have refused to do what it seems to me common sense and courtesy both require, that is, send the bill before second reading to the defence committee.

Many distinguished officers and others who have served this country have expressed serious apprehensions about unification. Why could they not have been allowed to present their views before the committee and the public in that way before we are asked to approve in principle this legislation? Another reason I am supporting the bill with reluctance is that it might seem to be support of the defence policy of this government as enunciated in the white paper and reiterated by the minister in his speech in this debate on December 7 last. I have very serious differences with the policy of the government. I find the defence policy of this government evasive, inadequate, ambiguous and unresponsive to the challenging opportunities that Canada's special position makes possible.

I am reluctant because I have found, in one edition at any rate, that in the 65 pages of the minister's speech the reasons for unification given by the minister were uninspiring and non-persuasive. As the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) pointed out, there was no explanation whatsoever of the future role of the Canadian forces which would justify the inevitable dislocations involved in unification. The minister has put the cart before the horse. He has told us that he will change completely the structure of the Canadian armed services before telling us what the function and role of those services are to be. In the 65 pages of his speech I find only two paragraphs referring to Canada's policy, and they are a reiteration of the policy in the white paper on defence. I remind the house that this policy consisted of a standpat acceptance of the obligations, regardless of whether they are dated or outdated, that had been assumed in the NATO alliance, and a complete failure to judge whether they were appropriate or obsolete at that particular time. This is still the policy that is put before us. However, if the appropriate question is asked and the right answer given, then I think this answer justifies unification as the most appropriate and suitable way of performing the role which we consider to be the effectve and proper role for Canada.

What are the present roles of our armed services? Roughly speaking there are five or six. As is well known we provide, integrated with the forces of our NATO alliance, an army brigade in Germany and an air division which is either wholly in Germany or shortly to be moved there. We have our share of the North Atlantic anti-submarine defences. In NORAD we participate in the air defence of North America. We contribute peace keeping forces in a number of theatres under the aegis of the United Nations. We have a mobile command at St. Hubert.

It is our view that we should now abandon some of these roles. We should withdraw our brigade and air division from Europe. We should close down the totally obsolete and useless Bomarc SAGE air defences against a non-existent bomber threat. We should review our anti-submarine role. We should concentrate on a tri-service or unified, lightly armed, highly mobile force available for peace keeping and other intervention roles. We should provide the fire extinguisher which would help put out fires which might spread into major conflagrations. To use the modern jargon, we should be ready to put out the fires which might escalate into a nuclear holocaust.

If, as the present government asserts and reasserts continually, we are to continue our present roles in which different services perform isolated and different activities, then I think unification makes no sense at all, or at least it is not worth, the trouble that is involved. But if we contemplate joint operations in which the services combine in the operations, then unification becomes desirable if not imperative.

My criticism of the government is that it has failed to make a clearcut decision and therefore has failed to present what would be a compelling argument for unification. I say we should withdraw our brigade and air division from Europe. Why do I say so? I do not think it is good enough merely to make such a proposal without supplying the reasons for it. There are at least four reasons for withdrawing our brigade. Our brigade is armed with Honest John rockets or tactical weapons. It is stationed in the forward zone in Germany. It forms a small, although highly efficient, part of or contribution to NATO strategy, the strategy of confronting a possible U.S.S.R. all-out attack on western Europe with tactical nuclear weapons.

This proposal was orginally made in 1954 and adopted in 1958. In our view it has become obsolete now and indeed provocative. I cannot go into all the reasons for this but I just want to say that one of the reasons is that both sides now have these tactical weapons the use of which would be so destructive as to be insane, and I do not think this word is too strong. General Ailleret, the French chief of staff, had this to say in the November-December issue of Survival, a publication of the Institute of Strategic Studies in Great Britain:

> It is clear that even a purely tactical nuclear exchange would wipe out Europe over a depth of 1,800 miles from the Atlantic to the Soviet frontier.

I ask the following question: What have we Canadians to do with potential involvement in this suicidal madness if it were ever to come about?

Defence Secretary McNamara has given additional information on this question. He said:

> Thousands of U.S. warheads deployed on the continent for the immediate defence of Europe have a combined explosive strength of more than 10,000 times the force of the atomic bombs exploded at Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

He left no doubt whatever—and I remind the minister of this because at one time he was not too clear about it—that this tactical nuclear force represented a substantial preponderance over similar Russian weapons but not a monopoly.

The threat of a deliberate all-out invasion or the use of this massive concentration of power in Europe is at the very lowest end of the spectrum of possibilities, if I may use an expression which is used in this sort of discussion. Indeed, no sane person would launch intentionally such a cataclysm. But as long as this confrontation exists the escalation of threats and bluffs might precipitate a disaster. What is needed is that this massive confrontation be thinned out and eventually dissolved. It makes no sense at all.

Even if I am wrong about this, the need for a Canadian contribution is non-existent. General Foulkes informed the defence committee a year or so ago that as long ago as 1960 the military leaders of NATO approved of Canadian withdrawal from the front line into the position of a mobile reserve. He told us in the committee that this difficult situation, namely, the problem of supplies for the Canadian brigade, was appreciated by the NATO authorities in 1960 and in view of the build-up of the German army to 12 divisions, the supreme allied commander, General Norstad, agreed to place the brigade group in mobile reserve and allow the German forces to take over this forward task on the east German border. This proposal was agreed to on the military level in the early 1960's but, perhaps for political reasons, it has not been implemented.

Then General Foulkes, after going on to point out that it cost about three times as much to maintain a Canadian brigade—indeed, for the price we pay a corps of two divisions could be maintained—asked whether this makes NATO sense? He replied in this way:

> It was originally intended that as the European partners increased in economic and military strength, the North American forces would be brought home and provide a strategic reserve. This trend toward the Europeans taking over their own territorial defence is both militarily and economically sound and providing there are no serious political difficulties the change-over should be accomplished before the end of the decade.

I rely on the words of General Foulkes because I think they make common sense. There is no military reason whatever for maintaining our forces there. It has been suggested that there may be a continuing political reason and indeed in the white paper the so-called political reasons are the only ones that are advanced for the maintenance of this excessive commitment. The only political reason that I have ever heard is that the Canadian withdrawal would rock the NATO boat—a phrase used to justify from time to time a certain immobility by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin). It is also said that it would persuade the United States, whose forces in Europe may perhaps constitute a stabilizing factor, to withdraw its troops.

I suggest this is nonsense. The United States is quite capable of deciding its own role without undue influence resulting from the fact that Canada, for its own good reasons, has decided to withdraw its brigade and air division from Europe. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, all the political arguments point exactly the opposite way. The cold war and the massive military confrontation in Europe have become an anachronism of which Europeans themselves, as anyone who has been to Europe knows, are heartily sick. The danger that the red army will engulf western Europe and, by the parity of reasoning on the other side, the danger that the armies of NATO will seek to roll back the frontiers of the Warsaw Pact, are equally unreal. If both NATO and the Warsaw Pact are incapable of being used to liquidate the cold war and improve east-west relations they will have to be scrapped. They no longer correspond to political realities. The centre of gravity of the threats to world peace will be in Asia and Africa, not in central Europe. Our government's continued adherence to obsolete NATO strategy is a symbol of its lack of independence and initiative.

What I have said about our brigade applies with even greater force to our vulnerable air division which, because of its vulnerability to Russian rockets, would in moments of tension constitute a positive danger of provocation to hasty first strike action on one side or the other. Here again, my authority for this statement is General Foulkes. Perhaps I have not the time and should not get into an elaboration of that statement, but the fact remains that if you have a highly vulnerable, highly dangerous strike force, in a moment of danger the desire to hit first is so powerful that the weapons themselves constitute a provocation and a source of danger.

This role was described a long time ago by a military commentator, Mr. John Gellner, who I think supports and sometimes I believe advises this government, as a costly $500 million mistake. I think the only thing wrong with calling it a $500 million mistake is that is much too low a figure. A great deal more than that is involved at this time.

I ask this question: Why is it, after four years in office, this government has failed to liquidate or discontinue these expensive mistakes, these dangerous commitments or, apparently, to do a single thing about them? The minister himself spoke in criticism of these roles before he assumed the position he has today. Is the failure to act the result of timidity or fear of upsetting some of our allies? What is it that compels us to maintain at considerable expense, and quite inconsistently with the policy of unification now advanced by the minister, these particular roles?

These are negative arguments, Mr. Speaker. The principal argument for Canada's concentration on a highly mobile reserve is that it could make a positive contribution to future peace. With our limited resources we cannot do everything. Indeed we should not, as now, try to do a little of everything. The hon.

member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) suggested that peace keeping through the United Nations is not exactly popular at the United Nations these days. It is well known that there are difficulties about financing and indeed difficulties in the operations themselves.

But I suggest that those operations in which Canada has taken part, in the Middle East, Cyprus and in the Congo, have played a vital role in preventing the spread of wars which could have been dangerous. In terms of effort, time and money they have been infinitely worth while. There were difficulties when these operations were launched and they were launched and improvised, if you will, because circumstances demanded that they be launched.

I see the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I know he worked hard to secure United Nations approval of our idea about how the peace keeping forces should be organized, but so far this has not been possible. I suggest that when emergencies arise again those emergencies will create solutions. It is vitally important to peace that we have available throughout the world, and Canada is in a very good position to contribute, forces that will be able to step in when emergencies arise.

If, Mr. Speaker, the rule of law is ever to prevail in an unstable world, and I think it will, then peace keeping forces will and must have increasing importance in the future. We are now discussing Viet Nam and the crisis in Rhodesia. If there is a settlement in Viet Nam, and let us hope to God there will be a settlement fairly soon, there will be need for a police force to see that the settlement is effectively carried out. The same situation might arise if sanctions are effective in Rhodesia. I am quite certain that during the course of history there will be a call again and again for the fire extinguisher, a call for the type of lightly armed force that this country is in a position to provide.

Of course the mobile force we propose, and upon which we think we should concentrate, would not be confined to operations under the aegis of the United Nations. I recall that when we were at NATO the military authorities told us about possible danger to NATO's flanks, so it may be vitally important to have a mobile reserve that could get there in good time. This sort of contribution might turn out to be far more important than the massive, tactical nuclear confrontation in central Europe.

In this connection I recall to the house the words of Wayland Young. I believe that like many other British people he has become a peer with a new name, but that was his name. He issued a pamphlet entitled, "The Bomb and Politics", and this is what he said:

> It was lightly armed common sense which saved the day in those places (East Africa, Malaysia, Cyprus); cheap, tough, portable weapons and above all mobility. The first rule in this sort of operation is, if you get there first, you do not have to shoot.

It is my submission, Mr. Speaker, that this concept of Canada's role fits in with Canada's special position and aptitudes. It happens to be a fact that we do not have to be absorbed, as some other nations are, with fears of direct attack on the soil of Canada. This is a traditional approach, but it happens that Canada does not have to be preoccupied with that. The facts of life are, whether or not necessarily by choice, that our neighbours are the most powerful military nation in the world. It is unthinkable that the United States would permit any hostile forces to establish themselves on Canadian territory without massive resistance. It is, therefore, unthinkable that any hostile nation, if such there be, would risk retaliation.

I hasten to add that this does not mean, of course, that the mobile force which would be created would be of no value in the defence of Canada or that we do not have to carry out the surveillance of Canadian territory. Of course we do. It does not mean either that we should do as some people say we can do since we are protected by the United States, namely, that we can be either neutral or passive or do nothing about our responsibility for defence. What it does mean, I suggest, is that we are freer than some other nations by reason of this fact to contribute to what in today's nuclear world should be the supreme objective, the prevention of wars and the limitation of wars if they break out.

No one wins a war in this world today. What we must direct our efforts to is to finding the most efficient instruments (a) to prevent and (b) to limit wars, if they occur. I suggest that a unified force of the type we have discussed would be a useful instrument in that regard.

It sometimes seems to me that we are deluded today by the efficacy of massive, unusable power. Our task is to see that usable power is available where it is needed to create stability in an unstable world. In this field Canada can for the first time, if we have the imagination to do so, escape from a role in defence which is purely subsidiary either to the imperial strategy of Britain, though at a certain stage in history this was quite naturally what we depended upon, or to the great power strategy of the United States of America. In this proposal of a unified Canadian force lies the possibility of making for the first time a distinctively Canadian contribution.

I suggest that in our centennial year it would be quite fitting, Mr. Speaker, to see the emergence of a distinctively Canadian contribution to world security, one most fitted to the circumstances. This would be more valuable to our allies than what we are doing at the present time in the matter of defence, though that we do it efficiently I have no doubt at all. It is because we in this party—and I think I speak for the other members in this party—see in the unification of the armed services a contributing factor to this goal that we propose to support the bill.

I believe that if the minister and the government of the day would only put the problem in this light they would secure the loyalty, even the enthusiasm, of many men and women in Canada. I cannot say, as did the last speaker, that they would have the support of the majority of them, but I certainly think they would secure the support and enthusiasm of our armed services. Changes cannot be made without creating opposition. But when making changes, Mr. Speaker, we should quite frankly and openly declare why they are needed, that in this case what is being proposed is in accordance with a new concept fitted to the nuclear world of the sixties.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, this is a particular contribution Canada can make to the world today. But so far the minister and the government have failed to make this declaration and in not doing so I think have damaged the cause of unification rather than helped it. Because this is what we believe, and subject to what we may be advised in the defence committee and during the future deliberations on this matter, I feel reluctantly obliged to say, for the reasons I have already given, that we will support this bill on second reading.

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I approach this subject from a somewhat different angle than most members who have taken part so far, mainly because of the interest I have had for some time in international affairs. It has always been a belief of mine that defence policy is nothing more nor less than a function of foreign affairs and is part of the foreign policy of the country involved.

It has been somewhat distressing in listening to and reading the debate to see the line which has been taken by Her Majesty's loyal opposition. In this instance the action of the Conservative party reminds me of King Canute, who called for his chair, sat it down at the tide line, put up his hand and ordered the tide to go back. Well, Mr. Speaker, the tide did not and neither will this bill. The Conservatives have still not changed from the time of the middle period of last century when in Great Britain the Conservative party there attempted to stop the Liberal government of Mr. Gladstone from preventing the purchase of commissions in the Queen's army. They failed at that time too.

Many arguments have been raised against unification, Mr. Speaker, and one of the silliest and least logical, it seems to me, is that which insists that people will fight only for the sake of a regiment. I should like to quote from Douglas MacArthur's "Reminiscences", the paperback edition. At page 470 he is describing why a man fights for his country and why he risks his life. He says:

> These men will suffer hunger and thirst, broiling suns and frozen reaches, but they must go on and on and on when everything within them seems to stop and die. They will grow old in youth burned out in searing minutes, even though life owes them many tranquil years. In these troublesome times of confused and bewildered international sophistication, let no man misunderstand why they do that which they must do. These men will fight, and, perchance die, for one reason only—for their country—

They will fight for their country, Mr. Speaker, not for their regiment. I think it is incumbent upon us as parliamentarians to give our men, who may be called upon to risk their lives, the necessary tools to do the job. We cannot have armed forces in the twentieth century, fighting on the basis of what was suitable for war during the late nineteenth century, using weapons which were almost obsolete at the end of the first world war.

Other arguments have been raised against this bill, Mr. Speaker, and one of them is that a great many officers have left the services. And I am not surprised. Whenever a new defence policy is introduced and someone does not agree with it I believe he should leave the services and if he wishes to oppose the policy he should do so from outside the service. I think that those members of the armed forces who have taken that tack are to be congratulated on their honesty. At the same time I do not regard their departure as that much of a loss. A great many younger men have been kept back because of these people who have served long and honourably but whose concepts of what the world is like are perhaps outmoded and it is time for them to be replaced. It is much better both for the government and for the minister that these people depart.

I recall the time when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) was prime minister and used to complain bitterly that his government was ineffective not because his ministers were ineffective but because there were too many Liberal senior civil servants. If the leader of the government at that time really thought that was so he should have fired them because they were old government employees and some of them were Privy Council appointees. I have no objection to seeing these senior officers depart for greener fields, as they see it; similarly, I have no objection to their fighting for what they believe.

Having read all the speeches and listened to a great many of them, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the basis and justification for unification in our particular circumstances lie in what we are able to do in foreign affairs. As I said, defence policy is a function of foreign policy and our armed forces can only be considered in relationship to it. It is not a matter of isolating the services and looking upon them as something to play around with, putting men in pretty uniforms and marching them up and down the House of Commons lawns. I have always regarded the navy, the army and the air force as a waste, a drain, an expenditure of money we could use in other areas much more profitably.

Therefore, it seems to me that there are certain legitimate conclusions that flow from that attitude. Our foreign policy has been oriented toward joint action with other countries, and for obvious reasons. We have concentrated on the United Nations, with NATO becoming less and less an effective force in the world, its usefulness declining steadily. One of the reasons for this is that the tensions between the United States and Russia have declined. That is also why the present Prime Minister insists in implementing article II of the NATO treaty.

[Mr. Reid.]

Since our attention is directed to the United Nations, it is necessary to define what role we can play in its operations. To date we have participated in several exercises with the United Nations which have served a useful purpose. In operations of this sort the United Nations has been able to exercise influence, sometimes decisive, in preventing brush fires from growing into greater fires. This is a very useful and very necessary service in our world. In addition, as the United Nations moves away from dominance by the two great powers, the United States and Russia, and begins to acquire a life of its own, effective opportunities for United Nations intervention in brush-fire areas will become more important. If Canada is to play a useful role we must provide ourselves with the tools to be effective in these activities.

I have always believed that we shall have many of these brush-fire wars because the world is not politically sophisticated. Politicians have not worked out effective means of avoiding direct confrontations. They search desperately for face-saving measures to dig themselves out of the holes in which they inadvertently find themselves. We are always trying to save face. A peace keeping force in this area can also be very effective. As we become more sophisticated, as the developing countries become more sophisticated, I hope it will become less and less necessary for the United Nations to intervene. In the meantime Canada can make a most useful contribution in this area, especially if we are prepared to lead. Under the present government I believe we have given notable leadership.

Other implications must be drawn from the fact that no matter how much we want to we shall never be able to defend ourselves from our neighbouring nations, Russia and the United States. We border these countries and sometimes it is difficult to say which is the more dangerous, the United States with its economic invasion or Russia with the threat of physical invasion. At present we are at peace with both these nations and we hope that this continues. If either one decided to attack us we could not defend ourselves. We have too much land and too few defence resources.

The former government entered into an agreement with the United States whereby we gave up responsibility for defending ourselves to the United States in return for a small participation in the defence structure. The impact of this has been to extend the United States border to our northern border.

We are allowed to play a small role. We were allowed to buy certain weapons which had to have nuclear warheads. Unfortunately the government of the day bought the bombs but neglected to buy the warheads and we were saddled with much expense without any effective way of making these weapons efficient. I am not sure of this but I understand that the weapons had no explosive power and that in some instances sand was used as ballast. Had we been attacked we would have fired these bombs hoping the invaders would be smothered in sand.

As Canada is a peace-loving country, and I hope it is, we do not need an army for aggression. As we have common borders with the two super powers we are very likely to be the battleground in any conflict between them. We need a defensive army to look after ourselves, if we need anything. As I understand it, we are on the way to giving up our nuclear capacity. As our weapons would not be much of a deterrent to these two super powers, there will be small loss.

It seems that this leads us back to unification or integration of our forces as a reasonable method of ensuring that we have the power to play the role we want to play in external affairs. Unification or integration —call it what you will—is a reasonable, logical concept if one accepts the assumptions on which it is based.

I would not wish to repeat the opinions of former generals read into the record the other day by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson). All these generals wrote memoirs after the second world war and they unanimously agreed that the old method of carrying on war with divided commands was inefficient, ineffective, and cost a great many of their soldiers' lives. One of my hobbies happens to be reading the memoirs of generals, not necessarily for edification but for enjoyment. I enjoy the way war is depicted in books, the way Eisenhower criticizes Montgomery, Montgomery criticizes Bradley and on and on. All these comments of the generals show one thing, that the old system has to go, that it is no longer efficient and something needs to be evolved. May I call it six o'clock.

PUBLIC SERVICE

AGREEMENT OF SENATE TO CONSIDERATION OF PENSIONS OF RETIRED CIVIL SERVANTS BY JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that a message has been received from the Senate informing this house that the Senate do agree that the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Public Service of Canada be empowered to inquire into and report upon the matter of the pensions paid to retired civil servants or their dependants under the provisions of the Public Service Superannuation Act.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow I hope we will conclude the current debate and proceed to item No. 121, second reading of Bill C-216, to establish the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 2, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

MR. JUSTICE LANDREVILLE

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Ovide Laflamme (Québec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table the first report of the special joint committee on Mr. Justice Landreville, in English and French.

SHIPPING

TABLING OF REPORT INTO CAPSIZING OF DREDGE "MANSEAU 101"

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table the report of the court of inquiry into the capsizing of the Manseau 101 dredge on the river St. Lawrence, near the Quebec bridge, on September 30, 1966.

[English]

I regret, sir, that the English translation is not ready, but I hope it will be ready soon.

Mr. Speaker: Does the minister have leave to table the report?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FINANCE

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER RESPECTING OWNERSHIP OF CANADIAN INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the government's growing apprehension over foreign ownership of Canadian companies, as revealed by the return to the cabinet of the hon. member for Davenport, the setting up of still another committee and the promise of the Prime Minister on television last night in respect of yet another white paper, is it the intention of the government to reject any future guide lines issued from Washington to firms operating in Canada?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, firms operating in Canada operate under Canadian law and consistent with any Canadian guide lines which might exist.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister in very ringing terms suggested last night that foreign enterprise must be subject to Canadian law only and responsive to Canadian policy. I wonder whether the Prime Minister could not be a little firmer in his reply to the effect that they will not be subject to any future guide lines from Washington.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, how could you be firmer than say "under Canadian law only and consistent with Canadian policy"?

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I also wish to ask the Prime Minister a question with respect to the telecast he made to the Canadian people last night in which it appeared that the Prime Minister was trying to ride two horses moving in opposite directions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Douglas: I want to ask the Prime Minister about the statement to the effect that the objective of the government is to have Canadians own and control much more of our industry, and that for this purpose the government is going to pursue a policy of marshalling a greater measure of Canadian investment in Canadian industry. I would ask the Prime Minister whether this statement is a pious hope, or whether the government intends this year to introduce a legislative program to give effect to this pronouncement.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I know my hon. friend will not misunderstand me when I say that no one in this house knows more than he about riding two horses going in no direction.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: The additional policies and proposals of the government with a view to increasing Canadian ownership of Canadian resources will be made known to the house in due course, and I hope there will be further progress made in this regard before the end of this year.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Prime Minister whether the legislative program which the government has in mind will have to await the report of the cabinet committee and the task force which has been set up, or has the government now a legislative program which it intends to present to the house this year?

Mr. Pearson: There are items in the program that have already been announced to the house that concern the subject raised by my hon. friend. I would hope that the task force in question will be able to produce a report and the government will be able to make that a government report in the form of a white paper in time to assist the government and the house in working out further steps in that direction.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether he would object to including in the various private bills regarding insurance companies and the like which are currently before the house a provision for Canadian ownership similar to that contained in the Bank Act.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, this matter is already covered in the Insurance Act in so far as federally incorporated companies are concerned.

[Later:]

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister arising from answers he gave earlier about foreign ownership, particularly of insurance companies, under federal charter. I ask the question because I was bewildered by the previous answer. Is the right hon. gentleman saying to the house that there is now legislation limiting the foreign ownership of insurance companies under federal charter?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, that is the information the insurance department gave me.

NATIONAL SECURITY

PRESENCE IN CANADA OF PERSON EXPELLED AS SECURITY RISK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and is in reference to Euzrem Rietzik. I will spell that name for the benefit of Hansard, because I have seen it spelled in different ways. Has the minister any further information to give the house as to the whereabouts of this man, or is he still working on the case?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for giving us this additional version of the spelling of the name of the person in question. I can only say that this matter, as he knows, is now being investigated.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister care to ask his officials whether they can ascertain if that is the name he took when he flew in from Montreal airport to Ottawa on August 3 last?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

GRAIN

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO TENDERS FOR SALE OF ELEVATOR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the hon. Minister of Transport. Can he tell us if tenders have been called for the sale or rental of grain elevators in the port of Quebec city?

[English]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I understand there has been some publicity with a view to getting possible submissions under certain terms and conditions. I do not have any document at hand, but I think I could get it quite easily.

[Translation]

Mr. Ricard: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the hon. minister inform the house whether he has received a telegram from the Catholic Farmers Union and other representatives of the farmers to the effect that this decision would be against their interests?

[English]

Mr. Pickersgill: There has been no decision, so whether or not it conforms with their interests would be hard to determine. This is only a possibility, and I can assure the hon. gentleman, as I have assured the minister of agriculture of Quebec who sent me a telegram to which I replied this morning, that the interests of the consumers of domestic grain in the Quebec region will be fully safeguarded if and when there is a lease or sale of this elevator, and it is by no means sure that this will ever take place.

INCOME TAX

JOHN DOYLE—INQUIRY AS TO DECISION OF APPEAL BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. It is reported that Mr. John Doyle, now in debt to the Canadian government to the tune of almost $4 million, had an appeal board hearing last June, and that the department had not made a ruling on the case. I wonder whether the minister could tell the house if and when this ruling will be issued.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, an assessment was made by the Department of National Revenue in the case of Mr. Doyle. It was appealed to the income tax appeal board, which is independent of the Department of National Revenue, and it is up to this semi-judicial body to make its decision and then to report. We have no influence on the decisions of this body.

Mr. Winkler: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell us whether they have reached a decision as yet?

Mr. Benson: So far as I know the decision has not yet been rendered.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

OSHAWA, ONT.—LAY-OFFS RESULTING FROM AUTOMOBILE AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry and ask whether he has received a letter, a copy of which was sent to the Prime Minister, from the mayor, the board of control and council of the city of Oshawa, expressing a direct and urgent appeal for action to be taken immediately by the setting up of a committee of the house to deal with the increasing number of lay-offs which are taking place as a result of arrangements made under the automobile pact. If so, what does the minister intend to reply to this letter?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I have received such a letter and acknowledged its receipt. I promised the mayor a rather more reasoned reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Starr: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the growing uneasiness in Oshawa and St. Catharines, and in the automobile industry generally, will the government move immediately to re-examine the whole situation with regard to the automobile pact rather than wait for a review by governments some time in the future, so the cloud of uncertainty may be removed from the employment of automobile workers and those in associated industries?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I did indicate that there was to be a meeting, proposed by the union concerned, with government representatives to discuss this situation. I think it may be a little premature to anticipate this meeting and, if I may put it this way, to try and overlap affairs in the house.

GERALDTON, ONT.—LAY-OFFS RESULTING FROM CLOSING OF GOLD MINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. K. Andras (Port Arthur): My question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. What steps is the minister taking to assist the 348 miners and other employees who have been laid off as a result of the closing of the MacLeod-Cockshutt gold mine at Geraldton, Ontario?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, workers laid off by the closing of this mine will have virtually no prospect of obtaining suitable employment in the Geraldton area. I have therefore designated the area under the manpower mobility regulations for a period of 12 months. This will permit unemployed workers to receive mobility grants in order to move to places of suitable employment.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Would the hon. minister inform the house whether a decision has been taken or will soon be taken concerning subsidies to gold mines?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, this decision concerns the Minister of Finance, but I may say that it is under consideration at the present time.

[English]

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the situation referred to by the hon. member for Port Arthur, and in view of the remarks the minister made a few nights ago in Toronto when he stated the government was of the opinion the four months waiting period should be abolished, is the minister prepared to announce when this will be done?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I said this mobility program could be improved. The officials of the department are studying how we should improve it When a policy has been outlined and approved by the cabinet, I will be happy to inform the house.

CANADIAN CONFEDERATION

PUBLIC PARTICIPATION IN DISCUSSION OF POSSIBLE CHANGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister which I am putting to him in an attempt to clarify the confusion which appears to exist at the present time as a result of correspondence between himself and the prime minister of Ontario on the question of confederation. Does the Prime Minister not agree that the people of Canada have a vested interest in any changes in confederation and in the constitution, and that these matters should be canvassed, debated and discussed with the greatest possible extent of public participation, and not left to be produced in secrecy by experts like an immaculate conception.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is not in order, as it is argumentative.

RESEARCH

REQUEST FOR INCREASED GRANTS FOR MEDICAL RESEARCH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the report that three medical schools in Canada are about to lose their accreditation through lack of research facilities, will the minister take immediate steps to correct this situation and provide more funds for medical research for all medical schools in Canada, and particularly those three?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): There are very large sums appropriated by parliament for this purpose, and there will be other large sums in the estimates. I think this is a matter that should be discussed when the government's estimates are being considered.

Mr. Howe (Hamilton South): Will this be in sufficient time to save the accreditation of these universities?

[Later:]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and is supplementary to the question of the hon. member for Hamilton South. Considering the serious situation obtaining in three medical schools likely to lose their accreditation, will not the minister undertake to get in touch with the schools in question to see if emergency action may be taken to save their accreditation? As the minister knows, once accreditation is lost it is hard to recover.

Mr. Sharp: I do not know whether this falls within my purview, but I understand that these medical schools are constantly in touch with the federal government through the Medical Research Council. We understand fully their position. My colleagues or I will follow the matter up to make sure it is not the fault of this parliament that the things the hon. member speaks about may happen.

Mr. Howe (Hamilton South): In a sense, Mr. Speaker, this is a correction to the question just asked. Four medical schools, not named, are involved. Perhaps this matter could be looked into by the minister.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

THE VATICAN—ESTABLISHMENT OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): My question is for the Prime Minister. Now that it has been announced the Vatican and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics are exchanging ambassadors, will the government take whatever action is necessary to overcome whatever has prohibited such an exchange with this country?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I have really nothing to add on this matter since my answer to that question on May 19, 1964, as recorded at page 3341 of Hansard.

Mr. Brewin: Could the Prime Minister just tell us in a sentence what the answer was on that date?

FINANCE

REPORTED BANK CHARGE FOR RENEWAL OF PERPETUAL BONDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Is the minister aware that the banks are making a charge for renewing the 3 per cent perpetual bonds, and if so has such a charge been authorized by his department?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman had the courtesy to send me a copy of this question in advance. I made a few inquiries just before coming into the house and ascertained that neither the government nor its fiscal agent, the Bank of Canada, has heard of a charge being made for issuing new coupons on the 3 per cent bonds. I will inquire to to see if that is true.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): Will the minister inquire into such charges being made by one bank in the town of Strathroy?

Mr. Sharp: I certainly will.

[Later:]

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, I have a further question for the Minister of Finance arising out of my previous question. Will he consider arranging to have the chartered banks compensated by the government for expenses incurred in renewing the 3 per cent perpetual bonds, so the banks may not take a dislike to me.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I said in reply to the original question that neither my officials nor the Bank of Canada are aware of any charge being made. I promised I would investigate, and I will take the suggestion under consideration.

NATURAL RESOURCES

OFFSHORE MINERAL RESOURCES—REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Justice. I apologize for not sending him notice, but I spent a long time on a long distance phone call to Vancouver. Can the minister inform the house what progress is being made by the supreme court with respect to consideration of the constitutional issue related to the continental shelf?

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if this question should be asked at this time. It is a matter of very general import. I think the question should not be asked in this form, and it would be more appropriate for the minister to make a statement on motions.

[Translation]

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Transport.

On February 2, 1966, the house, at my request, passed a notice of motion for the tabling of correspondence between the federal government, the Quebec government and the corporation of the Trois-Rivières bridge.

Since that time I put three or four questions to the minister and he gave me interesting and encouraging answers.

So as to celebrate the first anniversary of this request, could the minister present me with a definite answer this afternoon?

[English]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I hope that on this occasion the bear will be able to see his shadow and that something can be done about it.

TRANSPORT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAUSEWAY—POSSIBLE DELAY THROUGH DESIGN CHANGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the very general concern now being registered in Prince Edward Island I wonder if the minister could tell the house whether he has been in contact with the premier or government of Prince Edward Island in connection with the news which is being spread about the design of the Prince Edward Island causeway. Has the minister been in touch with the government?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): No, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): A supplementary question. In light of this uncertainty, is the minister making plans to contact the government of Prince Edward Island about this matter?

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Speaker. I am not clear as to the uncertainty about which the hon. member is speaking.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS

RESTORATION OF HOME OF SIR ALEXANDER GALT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Patrick T. Asselin (Richmond-Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In his absence might I direct it to his parliamentary secretary, who might take it as notice or answer it.

Has the minister received a request from the Eastern Townships Historical Society that the balance or remaining portion of the house that his department did not order to be demolished—originally the home of Sir Alexander Galt, one of the Fathers of Confederation—be kept and restored as an historical site and monument? What are his intentions regarding the request, and will the minister accept the invitation of this society to visit the site before any decision is made?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This would be a very good subject to discuss at ten o'clock.

Mr. Asselin (Richmond-Wolfe): Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR INCREASED AID TO DEVELOPING COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the very important speech made in Ottawa two nights ago by Mr. Escott Reid, a retired outstanding Canadian diplomat, in which he urged a tripling of Canada's contribution to developing countries, would the Prime Minister indicate whether the government might bring appropriate legislation respecting this matter before parliament during this centennial year?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, our intentions for the current year in this regard have already been made known and represent a considerable increase in external aid. A program has been worked out which I hope will make it possible, if parliament approves, for our foreign aid within a short period of time, two or three years, to reach 1 per cent of our national income.

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the Prime Minister aware that Escott Reid's suggestion is that we aim at 3 per cent?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I did have the pleasure of reading Mr. Reid's speech.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): A supplementary question to the Prime Minister in relation to the subject of external aid. Is it the intention of the government to revise their present policies in connection with the admittance to Canada of students from foreign countries in order to see whether there is some better arrangement that can be made to help out these countries, or to find some method of returning these students once they have graduated?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I think the arrangements are working out very well at present and are an important part of external aid; but if there are any improvements that can be made I know those responsible will be very glad to consider any suggestions.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Has the government under consideration the allotment of further moneys to finance students from other countries who come to Canada to obtain their education?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend may not realize that at the present time, if my figures are accurate, there are about 2,800 foreign students in Canada under our external aid program. This is a pretty important part of our general allocation. I believe in addition to the 2,800 students there are 600 Canadian teachers in less developed countries.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the Prime Minister that I was aware of that, but I was wondering whether the government was going to extend its assistance beyond this.

Mr. Pearson: I have just announced that funds will be increased this year, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister answered the first part of my question when he mentioned there were 2,800 students in Canada, but I was wondering whether he could answer the latter part of my question.

GRANT TO STUDENT ORGANIZATION ASSISTING U.S. DRAFT DODGERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister based on the reply yesterday to my question regarding the activity of the Student Union for Peace Action. The Prime Minister replied that he did not know of any assistance the government was giving to this organization. He went on to say that certainly this is not an organization that should be assisted in this kind of activity. I ask, then, what was the purpose of a grant of $4,000 given to the Student Union for Peace Action through the Privy Council office last year, which appears on page 34-4 of the public accounts for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1966.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that assistance was not given for the purpose indicated by my friend's question yesterday and referred to by him today.

Mr. Starr: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As it has been announced that the Student Union for Peace Action will place advertisements in United States magazines outlining assistance available to United States draft dodgers here in Canada, will the Prime Minister assure the house that no part of the funds already granted to this organization by a government agency will be used to this end, and that no further public money will be granted to this body by the government or any crown agency?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will; and I agree that public funds should not be used for that purpose.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PRESENTATION OF WORLD WAR I DECORATIONS—COMMEMORATION OF BATTLE OF VIMY RIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I have two questions for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I wish to ask both now for obvious reasons. The first one arises from the statement made yesterday by the Prime Minister about the royal visit. I am informed that a number of world war I veterans alive today, who won medals for bravery, have never been properly decorated. The method of delivery of the decorations in some cases was through issue by the orderly room only if the unit was still in France. Would the minister take advantage of the royal visit and arrange for appropriate ceremonies so that Her Majesty or His Royal Highness might make presentations to the veterans concerned?

My second question concerns the fiftieth anniversary, next month, of the battle of Vimy Ridge. Will the minister as a gesture of gratitude to surviving Canadian veterans of that battle arrange a second visit to the battlefield for them in this anniversary year at government expense, as was done 50 years ago?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will look into the matter raised in the first question. I have no knowledge of it at the moment, but I shall see if anything can be arranged. I could not give any kind of reply to the question at the moment, but I shall look into it.

In reply to the second question, while plans are not yet complete they are in the process of being completed. The intention is to have representatives of those who took part in the battle of Vimy Ridge 50 years ago attend. I doubt very much if it is possible to transport all survivors to this commemorative service at this time. Certainly there will be a representative group of Canadians and surviving veterans of Vimy Ridge in the official Canadian delegation to that ceremony.

Mr. McIntosh: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Considering the small number of survivors, after 50 years, would the minister not reconsider the word "representative" and give all veterans a chance to attend?

Mr. Teillet: Certainly I shall reconsider, but I doubt if it can be changed. However, I shall have another look at the matter.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

SASKATCHEWAN—REPORTED REQUIREMENT FOR QUALIFICATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I wish to direct a meaningful question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the minister aware that in the province of Saskatchewan some applicants have had to dispose of their homes and be out on the street before qualifying for assistance? Is this the intent of the Canada Assistance Plan or, for that matter, of any joint assistance plan in effect?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

SHIPPING

INQUIRY INTO BOILER ROOM EXPLOSION ON "NIXON BERRY"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport and preface it by a faltering exercise: "Merci pour le rapport à propos Manseau 101." I ask the minister if he has come to a conclusion about the appointment of a commission regarding the accident and subsequent fatality on the Nixon Berry, about which I asked him the other day.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I have not reached a conclusion about that.

TRADE

REPORTED PROTEST RESPECTING IMPORTS FROM JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance. According to recent reports from the office of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Pepin), the Minister of Finance has written to the government of Japan to protest against some foreign imports.

Is the Minister of Finance in a position to advise the house today about the nature of those protests and to say whether he has received an answer from the Japanese government?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not written to the Japanese government recently on this or any other subject.

[Mr. Korchinski.]

IMMIGRATION

ASSISTANCE TO IMMIGRANTS FROM FRANCE AND UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address my question to the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

I should like to know if difficulties encountered by immigrants from France and England triggered the government's decision to send an emissary to those two countries, reporting directly to the Prime Minister on his findings.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, French immigration is an intricate problem and we want to have all the facts before a specific policy is established. While we want to be aware of objections and the situation prevailing in France, we also wish to be informed about them in Canada.

Investigations will be carried out in both places.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

YUKON—REQUEST FOR TRANSFER OF EXECUTIVE RESPONSIBILITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I have a question for the Prime Minister prompted by the action of the British government in the last few days in granting independence to six British West Indies islands. Will the government not produce and implement a program for the progressive transfer of executive responsibility to the Yukon legislative council, leading ultimately to provincial status?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, steps are being taken to that end.

Mr. Nielsen: Could the Prime Minister indicate the nature of the steps which are being taken?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. Nielsen: I have a question to ask which is supplementary to the two questions I directed earlier to the Prime Minister. It arises out of his reply that steps are being taken for the transfer of executive responsibility to the Yukon legislative council. Since this would involve amendments to the Yukon Act, can the Prime Minister indicate when we will be likely to see amendments to that act before this parliament in that connection?

Mr. Pearson: I will have to take notice of that question and discuss it with the minister, who is not here today.

PUBLIC SERVICE

RECLASSIFICATION OF EMPLOYEES OF NATIONAL EMPLOYMENT SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration a question which I consider urgent and important, because it affects about 100 employees of the National Employment Service.

As the minister decided a year ago to reorganize and reclassify the employees of his department, and as nothing has been done yet to that effect and several employees consider themselves in an insecure position, can the minister tell us when he will undertake the final phase of reclassification in this department?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration has not decided to undertake the reclassification; that was decided several months before he was sworn in as minister. The classification has been done, analyses have been carried out and that has been applied nearly everywhere. We are now discussing grievances of individual employees.

Mr. Valade: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Has the minister received representations from many employees of the National Employment Service through an association, protesting against the delays of the reclassification procedures?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, we have received a number of complaints. In view of the number of employees concerned, those complaints are rather few. Now, discussions are taking place at all levels with those people to settle the problems which have arisen.

COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF PENSIONS OF RETIRED CIVIL SERVANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the hon. member for Ottawa East in his capacity as co-chairman of the joint committee on the public service of Canada. Is the hon. member now in a position to announce when the special joint committee will meet to consider the question of the pensions of retired civil servants?

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East): I am always happy to give advance notice of meetings to the hon. member here on the floor of the house. The public service committee, ever mindful of its obligations and duties to civil servants, will meet on Thursday next to consider the case of superannuated civil servants.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—REQUESTS FOR AID TO WAR VICTIMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Is the Prime Minister in a position to make a statement today concerning the request of the Quakers in connection with assistance for civilian victims of the war in Viet Nam?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I do not have the information before me, but I will try to answer the hon. member at question time tomorrow.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST FOR EXERCISE OF CLEMENCY DURING ROYAL VISIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General of Canada.

On the occasion of the visit of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II, would the government consider recommending to Her Majesty, as a gesture of royal magnanimity, to grant amnesty or parole to some prisoners, in particular certain students who are in jail at present as a result of separatist activities arising from the passionate feelings of youth rather than from criminal instincts?

[English]

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): The question is in two parts. As far as parole is concerned, that is a matter entirely within the discretion of the National Parole Board. As to that part of the question which concerns the granting of amnesty, I will take it as notice.

PILOTAGE

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): I have a question I should like to direct to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister say whether the report of the pilotage commission has been received and, if not, when he expects it?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I am afraid I shall have to give the same answer as I gave the last time this question was asked. I do not know when the report will be received, but I am very eager to get it.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF NAVY, ARMY AND AIR FORCE

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Hellyer for the second reading of Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Before the house rose last evening I had been outlining some of the reasons for my support of the policy for the unification of the armed forces advanced by the Minister of National Defence. I suggested, too, that since defence policy is only a continuation of foreign policy, one of the reasons for so much confusion in this debate was the fact that the two committees at work in this area, the committee on foreign affairs and the committee on defence, have been separated whereas in reality they should have been one.

When I broke off at six o'clock, we were discussing the testimony of the generals who had taken part in the second world war, as evidenced by the voluminous memoirs they have written. There is a whole series of books on this subject: "Struggle for Europe" by Chester Wilmot; the memories of Douglas MacArthur, the diaries of Lord Allenbrook, the memoirs of Eisenhower, Bradley, Wavell, Lord Tedder and many others who have felt the need to put their deepest thoughts on paper. One theme runs through all these books; the need for unification of command to end inter-force conflict.

The question which always faced these people was how best to get the army, the navy and the air force to work together effectively.

It has always seemed to me, having read most of these memoirs, that General Eisenhower was a good general, not so much by reason of any military ability he may have possessed but because he could get other generals to work together in a concerted way. Under the terms of this bill the armed forces of Canada are to be unified. The conception of a unified command is a logical one. Indeed, as appears from the article which was read into the record the other night by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. McNulty), there is evidence of the beginning of this process in Canada under a former minister of defence, Mr. Brooke Claxton.

If we take this concept and apply it logically there is no reason to stop with the unification of command. It is sensible, logical and realistic to extend the process right down to the bottom as far as it can be applied effectively. There are a variety of tasks which are common to all the services. There is no need for three services to employ three people to carry out, separately, work which could be done better and more economically on the basis of unification. If a man is an administrator in one area it seems reasonable to assume that he can administer in another. There are great savings to be gained in personnel, in time and in money by embarking on such a program as is now proposed.

Then again, since all those who make up the armed forces are serving their country, there seems no real reason for retaining separate uniforms, a separate rank structure separate forces and all the rest of the conventional paraphernalia. This bill completely reorganizes the structure of the armed forces. It is designed to bring the armed forces into line with the conditions and needs of society today. It is unthinkable to me that we should organize our armed forces today in accordance with concepts which possibly were relevant in the days of the first world war.

The armed forces must represent to a large extent the organization of the society which brings them into being, which depends upon them for its safety and which uses them as its instrument in the conduct of foreign affairs.

This is a revolutionary measure. The bill before us brings the armed forces into the second half of the twentieth century, taking account of the weapon technology of 1967 and the 1970's. I believe it to be as revolutionary as some of the social service measures which have been brought down by this government during the past year. I think, for example, of the concept of the guaranteed annual income which will give us a new approach to social security. So too I think this measure will revolutionize the organization of the armed forces.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Some criticism has been advanced to the effect that we are the only ones engaged in this type of program. I ask the question, why should we follow? Why should we not lead? It is probably true that we are the only ones doing this, but on the other hand our needs are quite different to the needs of other countries. It behooves us to be responsible enough to provide ourselves with the tools to do the job we want to do. It is not necessary for us to follow the military structure of the super powers. It is necessary for us to create a force which will do what we want it to do.

In this debate a variety of surprising things have taken place. One is the charge that unification has been suddenly thrust upon an unsuspecting and unprepared parliament. I cannot understand this argument. If we go back to the time this government first was elected, we will recall that a special defence committee was set up. That committee looked into this matter. Then there was a white paper. Goodness knows the defence committee sat often enough. It had 81 meetings, 2,300 pages of evidence were recorded, and a total of 103 witnesses appeared. The associate minister was in attendance at 63 meetings, and the minister answered some 857 questions. This does not take into account the amount of time we have dealt with defence matters in the House of Commons.

It seems to me that those who make such a charge are doing themselves a disservice, because it indicates that they did not do their homework, that they did not read the documents and were not prepared to debate the issue with regard to integration and unification.

Had these members done their homework and had they known what they were talking about, then during the committee meetings they would have taken the opportunity to probe the minister and his officials in order to get to the bottom of it. Instead, this only came out after a series of admirals had resigned from the service; that is, after there had been a so-called admirals' revolt. When this was going on I received a letter from one of my constituents who had served in the navy. He told me that if this was the most effective way the admirals could fight, he was very thankful they had left the service.

Mr. Winkler: Shame.

Mr. Churchill: Those men risked their lives for you.

Mr. Reid: If hon. members wish to get to the meat of this bill, then I think we should complete this debate as quickly as possible and send the bill to the committee where witnessses could be summoned and all the facts could be gone into. The longer this bill languishes in this House of Commons, the longer we will have to wait before the investigation which hon. members opposite want can begin.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Reid: Certainly.

Mr. Churchill: Will the hon. member take this opportunity to withdraw the slanderous statement he made with regard to the admirals, all of whom risked their lives in the service of their country. The hon. member has put a stain on their record which I do not think should remain. I think perhaps the hon. member would like to make a statement of clarification with regard to what he said a few moments ago.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I was quoting from a letter I received from a constituent.

Mr. Winkler: And accepting responsibility for it.

Mr. Reid: I will be quite happy to withdraw those remarks. Perhaps it was unwise for me to make them.

Mr. Winkler: You are learning.

Mr. Reid: But in many cases their effectiveness in this area has not been what I would have liked it to be. However, I do withdraw the remarks. In any case, I hope we will soon have a vote on second reading so this bill can go to the committee to be properly investigated.

There has been a certain amount of energy directed toward the constitutional question which has amused me. It has been stated that the government should send the bill to the committee without having a vote on second reading on the principle of the matter. This seems to be completely at odds with the concept of responsible government. If the government is willing to accept the responsibility for bringing forth new legislation, and if the supporters of the government party are satisfied with it, then it seems to me the government is fulfilling its responsibility in bringing a clear-cut program to the Canadian people. It appears to me that the only time the action of sending a matter to a committee for investigation would be warranted would be when the government had not made up its mind, when there was a great deal of dissention about the effectiveness of the matter, and when they were looking for additional information.

In the present circumstances, however, I think those who suggest that the measure should not be voted on before going to a committee are taking an irresponsible approach.

Mr. Douglas: Is the hon. member suggesting that the Minister of Transport was irresponsible in sending the transportation bill to a committee of this house before the bill was given second reading?

Mr. Reid: As I understand it, the Minister of Transport referred Bill C-120 in 1964 to the committee for direction. As I said in my remarks, this should be done only when the government feels there is a great deal of dissention and where there is no firm opinion on the government side of the house concerning the effectiveness of the bill.

The other matter on which I should like to comment is the personal attack on the minister. It seems to me that this has displaced a good deal of good, honest debate which might have taken place. The minister may or may not have a propaganda machine backing him up, but this has nothing to do with the subject matter of the bill. One could be in favour of the bill without having to like the minister, and one could like the minister without having to like his bill. It seems to me, however, that we should be devoting our attention to the subject matter and the principle of this bill instead of using the bill as a cloak for a personal attack.

An hon. Member: Or for attacking admirals.

Mr. Reid: It seems to me that some of the behaviour we have seen in this house and some of the attacks which have been made by hon. members opposite tend to prove the old adage that people become more aroused over trivialities than they do over serious fundamentals, and that the amount of response often is in inverse ratio to the profundity of the issue.

I should like to close by quoting an anecdote about Albert Einstein. Mr. Einstein was once asked why it was that mankind, having been clever enough to achieve the grand scale release of nuclear energy, was apparently unable to avert its use in the destruction of mankind. "That's very simple," Einstein replied. "It's because politics is far more complicated than physics." We certainly have seen an illustration of that in the debate on this bill.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to take part in a debate which is a bread and butter issue for my constituency as well as having the major ramifications of life and death.

First I must state my regret concerning the way in which the early part of this debate has progressed in this chamber. I think the minister brought no credit and probably demeaned himself by endorsing what really was a goon squad approach in allowing young and enthusiastic members of the Department of National Defence to engage in the debate while in the gallery of this house; not speaking out in the manner of rowdyism but exhibiting rowdyism none the less. If this is indicative of the mentality of the minister and those people, then I say they should all go; because past ministers of national defence and past military people in the Department of National Defence always were very careful to assert the civilian predominance over the military. This sort of approach, I presume derived from the truth squad of bygone days does not add to the minister's charm or reputation.

• (3:30 p.m.)

I also regret that a publication entitled "An Address On Canadian Forces Reorganization", which purports to be a speech of the minister in the House of Commons, has been tampered with somewhat in its publication. It does not reflect the proceedings that took place in the House of Commons on that particular day. For example, all references to Mr. Speaker have been removed and there are other forms of editing such as cutting out the interjections of other members. In this sense I say there has been some tampering with the record and an attempt to present a picture to service people which is not really accurate. When page five is compared with Hansard it is apparent that some seven changes have been made. I do not think the minister or whoever was responsible for this has done himself any credit by such an abuse of the use of the record of parliament.

One point has been made over and over again and I merely mention it briefly. I refer to the failure of the minister and the government to develop policy on an all-party basis. In other words, there has been no effort to develop a policy which would reflect the contributions of all members of parliament rather than the views of the minister. This is regrettable but the point has been made on several occasions and I do not intend to belabour it.

Our main concern relates to the objectives of military policy. The last speaker, drawing on the inexhaustible information he acquired in his political science course at university, pointed out that military policy is really an extension of the diplomatic policy of any country. That is true. Military policy may be either of an aggressive nature or a defensive nature. It can be fairly said of Canada that our policies have always been of a defensive nature and in line with our diplomatic objectives as a middle power trying to bring about an easing of tensions in the world.

The Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) in his thoughtful address yesterday, which I very much appreciated listening to and reading today, pointed out that military policy is an attempt to create a mix of peace-keeping functions in living up to our international obligations and our obligations in regard to the defence of Canada. These are worthy aims but the question arises whether the minister, the associate minister and the government are carrying on a course of action which will be the most effective in achieving these aims or are perhaps giving more attention to one part of the mix and not enough to another. My own view is that as a result of the bill now before us we are not going to achieve the utmost in value for our defence dollar and that what is being done will not be in the best interests of this country.

The question we must ask ourselves is whether unification will satisfy Canada's needs. Unity at the top seems to be acceptable, and unity in respect of supply and support services is probably acceptable. During an earlier debate I said that I had seen supply and support groups, engineers, ordnance men and the like working in a common service battalion at Camp Gagetown a couple of years ago. I was impressed by the operation and by the fact they seemed to be happy working together. Perhaps there can be no quarrel about the concept of unification in respect of supply and support services, though the minister and his department will find that because of the great degree of specialization required in the different services this may be rather difficult to achieve.

The most resistance in respect of unification occurs at the combat level. Surely it is the combat level, which of all levels, must have efficiency, with which we must concern ourselves. We cannot blind ourselves to the opinions which have been expressed by those who might be termed traditionalists. A great friend of the minister—I assume they are still friends—has been quoted from time to time. I refer to R. S. Malone, publisher of the Winnipeg Free Press. Let me read something that has not yet been placed on the record so far as I am aware. Mr. Malone is quoted in the Bulletin of the maritime command, December 1966 issue, as follows:

> In my view two cardinal errors have been made in our integration program. Before examining these in detail, however, let me say something on the subject of esprit de corps. For those who have ever been on active service no explanation is necessary. Every commander in history, however, is on record as to the all important value of regimental pride and spirit—from Caesar's legions to Napoleon's old guard—or in England—The Rifle Brigade, the "Buffs", the Grenadier Guards, the Scots Guards, the "Fore and Afts" and all the other units of fame and tradition...in Canada in the past hundred years we have built similar reputations for such regiments as the Black Watch, the Queen's Own, The Van Doos, the Patricias, the 48th, The Little Black Devils, The Seaforths, and so on, right across the country. All of these units, as well as our famous naval and air units, have come to mean something very real in our national structure. Thousands of men have given their lives in building these deserved reputations.
> Comparing the respective values of esprit de corps to actual numbers in battle Napoleon placed the comparison in the ratio of 4 to 1.

That is the opinion of a person who certainly should not be classified as a "Colonel Blimp". If the minister thinks he is of that type he certainly has not publicly said so in respect of his dear old friend, Brigadier Malone.

The Naval Officers Associations of Canada, in dealing with the same subject in a letter of October 3 to the chairman of the standing committee on national defence, made this point at page five of their presentation:

> —we have been conducting a survey since the spring of this year with the following results:
> Only 25.3 per cent have been "combat" types, but 95.1 per cent of these men wanted to be quickly recognized as "air crew" or "sea going" or "land fighters". A distinctive cap and arm insignia did not appear to be considered as a distinctive uniform by naval and air force men. About all that can be said for the results of the survey, and our other similar inquiries to date is that in view of the lack of availability of reliable data elsewhere, the results are interesting, and suggest that a properly complete survey might well be usefully informative to all concerned.

• (3:40 p.m.)

It is also interesting in examining the traditional point of view to go to the Canadian Army Journal, volume 1, issue No. 12, of March, 1948, in which is contained a speech made by the minister of national defence of the day, the Hon. Brooke Claxton, in Kingston. In that speech he dealt with the point of a single service. Because the remarks are relatively short I will quote all his observations at that time. They are to be found at page 3 of that issue:

> A single service? At this point it will become obvious that I have been proceeding on the assumption that we shall continue to have three services in Canada. But a very considerable body of people put forward the case for a single service as one way of solving many difficulties. There is a good deal in this, and perhaps one day we shall come to it.
> At present, however, the advantages of having a single service are not nearly as great as would at first appear. Tradition is important: pride in the service, pride in the uniform, are very real things. The functions of the three services differ from each other and produce consequent differences in training and operations. Since specialized training is required to run a ship, a wing or an armoured brigade, it is obvious that even if we had a single service we would have to call parts of it "the naval arm," "the air arm," "the army arm," or "branch" or something else, and in the result we would be just about where we are today.

The minister and his party enjoy a certain advantage in this debate in that public reaction to the issue so far has been relatively one of indifference. This does not, of course, excuse us from our obligation to express as forcefully as we can our feelings on the matter. What we are doing today will reflect either the wisdom or lack of wisdom of the government and this parliament when times of trouble come upon us. The point about the public reaction though is perhaps one that is favourable to the minister in that not much of a desire to examine the topic has been manifested. Therefore the minister's plan does not come in for the critical type of analysis which I think it should be subjected to and which it certainly will receive here.

Scott Young in a delightful essay in the Toronto Globe and Mail of Tuesday, November 15 last, put it this way:

> The lack of curiosity shown by most Liberals in what the defence department will get for its money leads one to suspect that if a Liberal cabinet minister shot his grandmother at centre ice in Maple Leaf Gardens, the Conservatives and New Democrats would still have to filibuster in interim supply to get an inquiry started.

One of the members of the press gallery, Mr. Paul Akehurst, made a point a few days ago. I was listening to his remarks over CJCH in Halifax. He was on an open-line program. In this instance he was in Ottawa but the broadcast was going to Halifax. Paul Akehurst said that the minister was enjoying a certain success with the public and with his own backbenchers because he was making decisions. Mr. Akehurst left aside any consideration whether the decisions being made were useful or sensible. He said the minister was filling a vacuum that existed in the Pearson government, that he at least was going out and doing something, and that this brought him a certain amount of public acclaim. Again I say there was no question raised whether or not these decisions were sensible, but the minister may want to take whatever comfort he can from Mr. Akehurst's remarks.

There are very proper questions that will have to be answered in the committee when the bill goes to it shortly. There are questions that raise serious doubts about the good effects of a unification policy and the competency of the Minister of National Defence to provide an effective defence policy for Canada. The proportion of naval officers and men serving at sea has been shrinking. At one time I believe that over 50 per cent of those in the navy were serving at sea but I understand that the figure is now under 50 per cent. Can this be said to be a successful defence policy?

There was the case of the short-term pilots who were let out, later creating a crisis in the Royal Canadian Air Force. Can this be said to be a successful defence policy? A dozen or more senior officers have either left with the golden handshake or have been booted out. These are men who have given distinguished service to Canada, whose views surely must have had a hand in the past in shaping defence policy and whose views, one would think, should be welcomed now. But they are gone. Can this be said to be a successful defence policy?

Admiral Landymore has made the point that even with the few steps in the direction of unification in his own maritime command the administrative costs have trebled. As one of our objectives in Canada we try to achieve as much for the defence dollar as possible. Yet there appears to be, from Admiral Landymore's statement, a wastage of dollars in administration. Can this be said to be a successful defence policy? In addition, though the minister trumpets the virtues of unification to the world the world does not listen and nobody else is following Canada's lead. Can this be said then to be a successful defence policy? Is Canada to be the only nation in the world in step, with everybody else out of step?

So far as the military opinion is concerned, it seems to me that most of the anti-unification feeling is precisely at the level where the most important part of our national defence effort should lie, that is, at the combat level. The voices of experience there are saying that unification simply will not work. We have the views of Lieutenant General Guy Simonds and Major General C. Vokes in a letter dated August 31 of last year which has been given some circulation. I will read the summary rather than going through the major part of their brief:

> To summarize, it is our opinion—
> (a) That the aim of governmental military policy has become wrongly oriented, by ignoring the possibility of having to mobilize for a major war.
> (c) That the reorganization of the command and administrative function of each service, below national defence headquarters, into one set of integrated functional commands; and the projected scheme to "unify" all three services, is the direct result of the wrongly oriented aim of Canadian government military policy.
> We believe that (a) and (c) should be corrected before it is too late, and that this should be a matter of foremost concern for all Canadians. This is our only motivation.

• (3:50 p.m.)

I turn again to the minister's great friend, Mr. Malone, who has made the following point:

> Techniques and skills are not all interchangeable nor are all vehicles, weapons and communication services. For example, there are vast differences between operating a tank and a submarine. As in civilian life you could expect service on your car from a mechanic at almost any service station. Yet, you could hardly expect that same mechanic to be an expert on marine engines or airplane motors. To make this possible would be a very costly and wasteful exercise.

My concern about the unification upon which the minister would have us embark is that it may create a monolithic rigid and therefore immobile structure rather than a flexible one. Some of these issues are important, particularly to the province of Nova Scotia. We are concerned about the study that has been carried out by the Department of National Defence regarding the closure of bases. Although we do have the assurance of the Associate Minister of National Defence that no bases will be closed in 1967 I wish we had an assurance that none will be closed in 1968, 1969, 1970 and onward.

Here is what will happen in some of the municipalities when the bases are closed. The taxpayers who have chipped in together with the Department of National Defence, to provide first rate educational services will be left with a staggering tax load. The schools are paid for over a period of say 20 years, and if bases are arbitrarily closed then the tax burden alone assumes the proportions of a Frankenstein monster. I think that in considering the closure of bases the department should deal with this very fundamental point.

Then there is the economic effect on different areas. For example, in western Nova Scotia it would be a disaster if Cornwallis base were to be closed. The detrimental effect on that area would undo all the good that other departments of the federal and provincial governments have done to bring about more economic viability in western Nova Scotia. I think it should be noted that Nova Scotia stands united in its opposition to the minister's policy. We do not have political differences in this regard.

The leader of the Liberal opposition in the province of Nova Scotia and former member of parliament, Gerald Regan, made the following statement in talking about what he was going to do at the annual meeting of the Liberal Association of Canada held last fall:

> I am not sure what is meant by unification of the armed forces. Everyone seems to have a different version, but I am concerned that the existence of the three separate identifiable branches of our armed forces, the navy, army and air force, should be retained. Therefore, I have given notice of a resolution praising integration but calling for the continued existence of the navy, army and air force as separate identifiable branches of an integrated armed force, and for the retention of distinctive dress uniforms for each of these three branches.

The views of the New Democratic Party in Nova Scotia are also of interest in this regard. They are certainly different from the views that were expressed in the house yesterday by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin).

Mr. Pugh: There are no members of that party in the house right now.

Mr. McCleave: Yes, that is so, but I understood the position of the hon. member for Greenwood yesterday to be that he was tearing a paper tiger to pieces and then sanctifying the mincemeat which was left over. In other words, he criticized the policies of the minister and the Department of National Defence and then said that in any event his party would vote for the bill. However, the leader of the New Democratic Party in Nova Scotia takes a more forthright view of this issue. On September 21 Professor J. H. Aitchison had this to say in part:

> Governments have been known to change course before now, and ministers have been changed. Mr. Hellyer is in trouble and the cabinet and the Liberal party will be in deep trouble if they allow him to continue on his present course. The best thing that could happen is for the cabinet and the Liberal caucus to require Mr. Hellyer or a successor to him to change course. If that happy result ensues, it will be due chiefly to Admiral Landymore and officers like him who have served their country well.

As I said, Nova Scotia is united in opposition to the policy of the Minister of National Defence.

I should like to deal with two small side issues before concluding my remarks. Last year I suggested that the minesweepers, although they are older ships, should be reactivated for two reasons. First, they would provide an economic method of training younger officers instead of putting them willy-nilly on the bridge of large and expensive ships and, second, mine warfare skills are not easily acquired and have to be studied and practised. I believe that the minesweepers are now back on the water and I compliment the minister for accepting that suggestion.

The other point, which I raised in the house the other day, deals with a bulletin published by a private company in Dartmouth. It is called "The Bulletin of Maritime Command" but actually it is an unofficial publication, and the maritime command has now set up a new publication which officially represents its views. The Bulletin of Maritime Command is dead set against the policy of unification and it makes no bones about it. It publishes articles criticizing the concept of unification, although admittedly they are not signed by people in the services.

Distribution of this bulletin is not permitted on ships of the maritime command. In short, there is a form of censorship at work and a definite discrimination against this publication. I hope the minister will be open-minded enough not to attempt to keep away from the services those aspects of this issue which may be unfavourable to him. I think that as citizens in a democracy they should have the right of access to all forms of information just as we outside the Department of National Defence have. I hope that this policy, which does not reflect credit on the minister or his department, will be changed and that this bulletin will be distributed in the same way as other publications.

Finally, I want to say that I reject the concept of unification which, by the way, was last tried in the reign of Queen Anne. At that time there was a captain general of all the forces. You see, we are not going ahead into the twenty-first century, we are going back to the eighteenth. I reject unification because it fails to take into account service conditions; it fails to take into account specialization because nobody who knows the subject can be satisfied the economies will accrue that it is hoped will be achieved. I think it is flimflam and a piece of razzle-dazzle which the minister in particular wants as an expensive memorial to himself. However, I do not believe it is in the best interests of Canada and I propose to vote against it.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, the electors I represent here are concerned about this matter of unification and integration for various reasons. The first one is that we have at home a regiment which did our country proud during the last war and which, as a reserve regiment, is still very active. This matter is discussed on the principle that we believe in effectiveness, economy and competence in the organization of defence and all other government services.

I feel justified in saying to the house that all the people I represent approve of the unification and integration program for another reason, namely because General Allard, who is chief of staff of the armed forces, is one of our native sons. As a matter of fact, according to his biography, he was born in Sainte-Monique, in the riding of Nicolet, but he left when still quite young for Trois-Rivières where he got his early schooling and experience. That is where he joined the army and his studies, hard work and competence earned him promotion after promotion. He enjoys the full confidence of our men.

When we heard that the government's unification and integration program had General Allard's full support, our people said: That's all right, we support it. And they asked me to express their views in the house.

What is it all about, Mr. Speaker? I said a word about it a while ago. The object is to make our defence system more efficient; it is to increase competence, to concentrate our technical skills, instead of leaving them divided among three services; it is also to avoid disastrous delays which occur because of that multiplicity of commands and services; it is to avoid conflicts of authority which we so often witness in some countries, conflicts of prestige precisely because there is a great desire to uphold ancient traditions which very often result in ranks, dazzling uniforms or certain small prerogatives acquired through the centuries but do not meet modern army needs for efficiency.

Mr. Speaker, in order to define exactly what the object is, I have some literature which gives explanations that I should like to comment on, in order to circumscribe the debate. For instance, in reprinted articles in the Toronto Telegram, I find things that seem to be quite concise and quite to the point and which read as follows:

[English]

This requires unity of planning at all levels, especially in projects and priorities.

The other objective was most fire power, most flexibility and the fastest response possible for the taxpayers' dollar. The unified force would reduce duplication which has increased sharply over the years.

"Admirals and Air Marshals no longer have to write to each other when combined reserves are required," says Hellyer. "One unified command can work out a plan and issue orders, as combined operations did during the war.

This gives us instant decision making, which is more important than ever before."

In the process, there is more control over the military, as recommended by the Glassco commission's investigation of government operations.

[Translation]

And it goes on:

[English]

"Similarly, there is no lack of competition. The sailors will press for more ships, the soldiers for more tanks and the airmen for more planes.

This is as natural as breathing. Competition will not be lost, but it will be contained at the service level."

[Translation]

And a bit further, other advantages are listed:

[English]

A new single pay system is being developed in three stages over three years. By that time, when the system is fully automated, pay services will be provided with 650 fewer men.

Recruiting organization has been integrated. This has been discussed for 15 years, but there is no agreement among the services, which sometimes had their recruiting offices in the same building.

The new Canadian forces recruiting centres enlist officers and men for the army, navy and air force. Recruiting is higher than last year so far, but the job is being done with 30 per cent fewer people.

Before integration, there were five separate intelligence organizations at headquarters. Now, there is one.

[Translation]

And further on, we read:

[English]

Savings and an increase in efficiency are also expected from the new Canadian forces communications system.

[Translation]

So, that explains fully, for those of course who do not doubt the minister's word, what the aim is. It is crystal clear and should win over all those who really believe in the old proverb that unity is strength. Consequently, concentration of technical skills, especially in defence, more than anywhere else, will ensure the best results under the best circumstances.

Objections have been made, some of which are constructive and deserve to be brought forward in this house if we want to know the opinions held in all sectors of the Canadian people before passing the bill. On the other hand, some of them are whimisical and smack of some kind of personal aversion for the minister, and they result in criticism that, to my mind, should not be allowed in this house if I am to go by the rules founded on the century-old precepts of the gentlity which were explained to me upon my arrival here.

Other purely sentimental objections have been put forward; some people would like to maintain traditions charming in themselves, but certainly not fundamental qualifications for an adequate national defence system.

Concern over the possible disappearance of the pipers, or whether the kilts will be retained, lengthened or shortened, whether dress uniforms in each of the services will still be sine qua non, etc., in my opinion, this type of concern is unwarranted.

• (4:10 p.m.)

I think that if this were the hon. minister's only worry, he would readily tell everyone: "Keep your kilts and we will keep our pipers; if the French Canadians want their arrow sash, they can have it; but please, let us get on with unification and integration so that this first-rate defence force can be set up as quickly as possible, and in the best conditions."

Sentimental considerations do not agree very well with North American tradition; we were taught that two and two makes four and that we should not let ourselves be influenced by traditions which are very nice in themselves, but surely not based on efficient administrative principles.

Mr. Speaker, some complain that the matter has not been adequately explained. I shall come back to this later. It seems to me that more than enough explanations have been given and that ample discussion has taken place. But at any rate, let us consider those criticisms as well-founded and suggest that the minister continue providing factual and specific explanations, so that no Canadian may complain of being kept in the dark concerning unification.

I say no Canadian of good will, because I notice some who refuse to understand, and there are none so blind as those who do not want to see, who do not really aim to provide an efficient and modern defence, but who pursue instead partisan concerns or personal grievances against the minister.

Some complain that we are proceeding too hastily. It might be, Mr. Speaker, that we are proceeding too quickly for some people. But in our day and age, if you are not quicker than your neighbour you may be too late very often. It is probably more so in the field of defence than anywhere else: The first one there will win the battle, not the last one. In the re-organization of our defence system, such a principle is surely useful and valuable.

I am somewhat surprised at the feud being carried out by the opposition—that is to say, I am surprised, yet I am not, because they obviously have a political opposition role to play and they intend to play it, except that expensive delays will occur as a result, for all concerned, But at least, they are fulfilling their role.

I cannot say as much for the admirals' revolt, Mr. Speaker, for I have always thought and many people share my views, that a reasonable defence system is required in this country. I believe in the military career and I have always felt that in their career, the military should have a basic principle that discipline is something fundamental and that the higher ranking the officer, the more he should set an example of discipline. Many of those admirals were more interested in playing politics than in setting an example for their subordinates. This may be one of the reasons for the weakening morale of our troops, if it has indeed weakened.

In my opinion, those who complain that these admirals had to resign their commission or were dismissed do not help the morale of the armed forces nor that of the Canadian people, because it is true that the higher the rank of a soldier, the more he must set an example with regard to discipline, and it is not the admirals but the government in power which determines a national defence policy. Let the officers be consulted in time, I agree, but when consultations are over, it is time to submit. This has always been an unquestionable principle in any country which has tried to establish an efficient defence system. Therefore, I find the revolt of the admirals most objectionable.

Besides, there is an old American saying which is quite plain: Get in or get out. I think it applies to admirals and generals as far as government policies are concerned. Now, we have been talking about a unification policy for fifteen years, and I think it is time for action.

Some nostalgia will have to be overcome, of course. In all modern progress, old customs are discarded and many people sigh for the good old days. Every modern economic revolution is made in spite and at the expense of some of the keen feelings one might have had heretofore.

I have seen, for example, in a western paper I believe, an editorial entitled: "Are we losing our pride?" Then, to show that there should be national pride, the article spoke about flags, kilts, pipers, and that sort of things.

Mr. Speaker, if our national pride must be based on such artificial things, I believe that Canada's future is in danger. Our national pride should be based on a concern for efficiency at the lowest possible cost, on the belief that we have a defence system which is entirely adequate and which was able to derive maximum benefit from all the skills we attracted into it.

I have said, sir, that in my opinion, improper criticisms had been made in this debate. For the guidance of the house, I should like to note a number of them.

For instance, I did like the approach taken by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness)—perhaps I am mistaken as to the name of his riding—as well as that taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Sherman), whose views I do not always share and who sometimes seems to be fanatic. But he gives facts, advances arguments, explains them his own way, although it may be in an intransigent way. But when I see certain other hon. members trying to tie the minister to the stake, trying to attack his personality, I am of the opinion that nothing is being settled. I should like to quote some cases in order to arrive at a conclusion which I believe the vast majority of my colleagues will approve.

The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Nugent), referring to the minister, said, as reported on page 12477 of Hansard for January 31:

> His prime purpose is to ensure his own greatness.

Mr. Speaker, if one started from that principle, one could say of the opposition members that their first objective is to further the political interests of the Conservative party. It would be just as unfair, Mr. Speaker; in fact, it would be mean. The hon. member went on:

> This is the first time that parliament has ever been so affronted by any minister of the crown.

Parliament is affronted. I have heard many hon. members raise questions of privilege to protest against that affront to parliament.

> The minister is guilty of tampering with evidence and he has done so for the purpose of ensuring that parliament does not get the information which is essential before it can decide—

Those are serious charges, Mr. Speaker, and I think that the hon. member who made them is serious. He added:

> —it is sheer hypocrisy and I am amazed at the hon. member's effrontery in making such a suggestion to the house.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that the hon. member who made those serious charges should ask the house to have the minister called before the committee on privileges and elections if he really meant what he said. Then, after blaming the minister for not giving enough explanations, he said:

> —I do not think anyone—is prepared to accept the minister's testimony—

Then why ask him for explanations if, at the outset, one will not believe what he says.

> —we must even suspect his motives.

It is always the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Nugent) speaking and he added:

> —I cannot in all conscience accept any information pertaining to defence which he gives to the house as being helpful to us.

The minister who has the support of about a score of ministers and some 130 members would then be guilty of imposture.

Mr. Speaker, to my mind those are unconsidered accusations. He continues by saying:

> Certainly this is not the only insult which he has thrown at most of the top personnel—

And he continues in that vein, but I shall spare you the rest. I apologize for seemingly lecturing my colleagues who are more experienced that I am. But I feel, Mr. Speaker, that in this year of the centennial of confederation, our first concern should be to reinstate Canadian patriotism in the minds of all Canadians, reinstate the confidence Canadians have in their parliament. If, like the member for Edmonton-Strathcona and others, including the member for Cape Breton, whose riding I have forgotten, we take pleasure in discrediting one another, if like the members for Lapointe and Villeneuve (Messrs. Grégoire and Caouette) did not long ago, we take pleasure in clamouring outside the house that the majority of members are incompetent, we are destroying in the public mind the prestige our parliament should have, and we are undermining the patriotism we want to create.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me we could discuss the pros and cons of unification and integration without attacking individuals and discrediting ourselves before public opinion. I cannot help but recall the old saying that those they would destroy, the gods make mad.

That may explain why, in too many spheres of Canadian life today, there is a lack of respect for parliament, but people are beginning to really think that parliament is made up of incompetents, individuals who are dishonest intellectually, if not morally, and who are pursuing greatly disquieting aims for the future of our country. I find such criticisms unseemly and improper in the House of Commons. I must point out, however, that a few of them were timely.

• (4:20 p.m.)

For those of our colleagues who make such unseemly criticisms, who object to new methods in the defence reorganization, who attack any new policy proposed by a government which is keeping up with the times, I should like to recall that Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth, who will honour us with her visit this year, is much more broad-minded and noble-minded about the source of inspiration of government policies, about those responsible for them since they are in power and about those partly responsible, because they form the opposition.

I shall simply quote two paragraphs from the speech made by Her Majesty on her last visit to Quebec city. She was then speaking about the future of Canada and the human race.

> We must prepare for that future today among our fellow citizens, we must give explanations and express our views dispassionately while respecting the opinion of others—

Rather than disparaging each other, we should set the example of constructive discussion. This comment is mine. Now I quote:

> The problems will founder in confusion if we do not learn to enlighten them with fraternity and humanity. Let the dialogue remain open and it will tend to unite men of good will. True patriotism does not preclude the understanding of the patriotism of others.

And she added:

> The democratic system rests upon the conscious adhesion of the citizens. The role of the constitutional monarchy is to personify the democratic state, to sanction legitimate authority, to ensure the lawfulness of the methods, to guarantee the execution of the popular will.
> In order that the inhabitants of a country may live happily, they must live in an atmosphere of confidence and affection. But a dynamic state must not fear to reconsider its political philosophy.

I repeat, and the Queen said it:

> But a dynamic state must not fear to reconsider its political philosophy.

And to reconsider it in relation to present needs and modern progress.

So I say, Mr. Speaker, that the only practical discussion called for, in these circumstances, is the one carried on by some of our colleagues when, for instance, they tell the minister: We are not getting enough information. Some Canadian citizens are not getting sufficient information. Yet, information has been given, since the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. McNulty) said the other day as reported in Hansard on page 12476: Between October 31 and November 15, over 200,000 words covering nearly 250 pages were uttered during debate on the defence estimates, in committees. There were two committees on defence and they held 81 meetings, the proceedings of which cover 2,300 pages. Some 103 witnesses were called; the Minister of National Defence or the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) testified 63 times. There was opportunity to ask questions, since 857 have been recorded. Now then, if 857 questions were not enough to get an idea of what the minister had in mind in this regard, we should give up. I personally feel that these criticisms are uncalled for. At that time, there were almost 250 pages of text containing 200,000 words. At that rate, one million words will probably be on the record. It might be a good idea to print some 20,000 copies of Hansard, or condense the debate, so that all Canadians may have the opportunity to see how extravagant some criticisms can be when they are not made in an objective manner, when one forgets the purpose of a bill. In this case, it is to ensure greater efficiency and modernization in the field of national defence, as in all other fields.

Mr. Speaker, it has also been argued that some servicemen objected to the plan. Of course, they have the right to do so. They have the right to object up to a certain point. But they no longer had this right, when it became a government order. Only one thing remained for them to do: to leave voluntarily or to be dismissed, as it happened.

The men and the soldiers who endorsed the principle of unification and integration have been listed. They are not just anybody or fools. I shall spare the house another such enumeration. Anyway, a rather complete list of names has been given by many hon. members who spoke before me. I shall mention only the case of General Allard, a French Canadian like me, for whom we have a great deal of respect. He did not usurp his post, but literally conquered it by his own strength. He is entirely in favour of unification and doing everything he can to implement the program, together with his many associates who have also endorsed the program.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the views of these professional soldiers who acquired experience by visiting the defence arrangements of all the countries in the world and who rose to their rank through their knowledge and ability, should suffice to assure us that the minister is on the right track in speaking of integration and unification. Therefore, I should like to conclude by saying that there are 20 million Canadians who do not care whether we will have kilts or pipers tomorrow, or whether admirals will continue to parade in one uniform and generals in another, but who are interested in knowing whether the country can have the best equipment in the world, operated by the best technicians in the world and at the lowest possible price, so as to put as small a strain as possible on the taxpayers. That is what they are interested in.

The opposition has suggested that if most Canadians favoured unification, it was because the minister had made them believe that the moon was made of green cheese, had blinded them to the facts. I for one, Mr. Speaker, believe in the common sense of Canadians. I think, on the contrary, and the opposition has admitted it, that the great majority of the Canadian people supports the government on the question of unification and integration, and that should be sufficient reason for members of parliament not to go against public opinion so eloquently expressed.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I will support as much as I can, the policy of the government regarding unification and integration.

[English]

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my remarks on the unification bill will be brief. I have listened to and read the speeches, particularly those by members on the other side of the house. I want to refer to one speech from the other side, that made by the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Groos) on Tuesday, January 31. I and many others on this side have asked many questions and have sought answers from the minister. In my opinion the minister has not given satisfactory information. We looked forward with anticipation, therefore, to the speech to be made by the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) as he is chairman of the defence committee. What a disappointment it was. His speech covers more than two pages of Hansard but he uttered not one word about the merits or demerits of the unification bill. I did not expect the hon. member to emphasize the disadvantages of the government proposal, but surely it is not too much to expect the chairman of the defence committee to give his views on the subject matter under debate. The hon. member uses this excuse, to be found at page 12468 of Hansard:

> I have purposely refrained, Mr. Speaker, from entering into the subject of the debate because, as chairman of the defence committee, I feel it is my most important duty, if this bill ever does come before us, to help resolve the differences during the clause by clause study in committee.

I will come back to that later. Just before that statement the hon. member said, as found on the same page:

> Let no one misunderstand the motives which have prompted the opposition. We have two genuine points of view and for the moment they appear to be irreconcilable.

First the hon. member says that the points of view of the two sides are irreconcilable and then he says he will do his best to bring them together. The main point I wish to make clear is that the position of the hon. member in the House of Commons is entirely different from his position as chairman of the defence committee. It is his duty as a member of the house to let his views be known on the subject matter under discussion. It is his duty to the people of Canada, because of his position as chairman of the defence committee, to state his views. It is his duty to his constituents to let them know what his arguments are before voting for this measure. When the hon. member acts as chairman of the defence committee he does not deal with the subject matter of the presentations. He deals merely with matters of decision. Any statements, therefore, that he might make in the house would not in any way prejudice his position as chairman of the defence committee.

Having checked with many eminent parliamentarians in the house I find it is quite customary for the chairman of a committee to participate actively in the house when the subject matter for which his committee is responsible comes before the house. I suspect that the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. was playing it safe. He was afraid to put forward arguments in favour of the bill because his constituents in Victoria would be in a position to question them.

The very least the hon. member could have done was to answer the question put to him by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) during the previous debate in the house. The question is on page 9551 and it refers to the knowledge the chairman of the defence committee had with regard to the changing of the evidence which Admiral Landymore was to give before the defence committee.

The hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) seemed to imply that speeches made in this debate are made for the purpose of prolonging the debate and nothing more. His attitude seems to be that since the government is now proposing this legislation there is no point in seeking to oppose it because it will go through in any case. Let me tell the hon. member and all hon. members over there that those who have taken part in this debate, on this side of the house at least, did so because they were anxious to make their views known on a matter which affects the security and sovereignty of Canada. I for one consider it my duty to express the views I have put forward not only for the benefit of the government and for the benefit of other hon. members but for the benefit of the people who sent me to parliament. The hon. member for Victoria, B.C. said that the chairman of the committee does not normally express his views on a subject matter to be discussed by the committee, but I hope that when this bill comes back to the house from the standing committee or on third reading he will tell the people of Canada and in particular his own constituents his reasons for supporting this measure.

I wish to refer briefly to the statements and speeches made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer). I have read carefully the speech he made on December 7. I for one believe that either the minister is unwilling or he is unable to advance cogent arguments in favour of a single defence force. Indeed, he seems unable or unwilling to give a clear explanation of what he means by a single defence force. Of all the speeches made on this subject by members of the other side I consider that made by the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) to be the one which most genuinely sought to advance concrete arguments in favour of the government's proposal. The hon. gentleman made a genuine effort, I believe, to explain what unification meant. I hope my remarks will be listened to in the same spirit as were the minister's.

When this same subject was before the house during the debate on interim supply, members on this side were attacked for consulting with experts who had been kicked out of the forces by the minister. The Associate Minister of National Defence said we had done the right thing, that we should consult anyone who was knowledgeable in these matters, as he himself had done. He admitted that he was not sure of all the facts so he had consulted a person whom he considered to be an expert. The person whom he consulted was General Foulkes. He says of General Foulkes as found in Hansard on page 9395:

> General Foulkes is a reliable source upon which the members of the opposition called, and I am not blaming them for that, since I have a great respect for General Foulkes.

He goes on to say of him:

> —when I saw a man with such experience, holding an absolutely necessary position, realize the urgent need of the Canadian forces—

And so on. Incidentally, on November 1 last the associate minister was quoting the opinions of General Foulkes as reported in the Star Weekly magazine of October 14, 1961. On November 4 I referred to the speech which the associate minister had delivered and suggested he should bring himself up to date by reading a more recent statement which General Foulkes had made. I quoted excerpts from an article written by the general in the Ottawa Journal of Thursday, October 13, 1966, in which he was critical of the government and of the proposed unification plan. They can be found on page 9555 of Hansard. I would now refer the associate minister to the Ottawa Journal of October 11, 1966. The headline is: "Foulkes Asks Hellyer What On Earth He Is Doing".

> The only other record of wholesale changes in the military occurred in the Hitler regime. He dismissed every general who dared to tell him what he should know and not what he liked to hear.

I hope, therefore, that the associate minister, whom I have always found to be a fair-minded man, will tell us when we are in committee what his reaction was when he read this later statement by General Foulkes.

As reported at page 12536 of Hansard, the associate minister outlined the various alternatives which the government might have considered, and I think he did it very well. He indicated there were three options open to the government. The first was to contribute all-out forces toward the maintenance of peace keeping by placing them under the United Nations. Later he asserted, rightly in my opinion, that this should not be the main purpose or the only purpose of our defence forces.

The second option available to us was to commit all our forces to the deterrence of war by making additional contributions to NATO and NORAD. The third was to maintain only such forces as would be required to uphold our national sovereignty. The associate minister told us that a fourth option had finally been chosen. I quote from page 12536:

> This is the option we have taken. This is the option which permits us to create a proper mix of forces which can be used to contribute to international peace keeping, which can be used to maintain our national sovereignty.

I maintain, in reply to the minister's argument, that the type of force we now have is most suited for these purposes and that it has proven to be so. In the first place, it has proven itself to be satisfactory. We have played an important part in NATO and NORAD, and since the present set-up of our armed forces corresponds with that of our various allies I believe we are more likely to continue to make an effective contribution to those alliances by maintaining the structure we have at present.

In my opinion it has also been shown that Canada has played a leading part in peace keeping. There has been no indication that the role which our forces have played in various parts of the world has been in any way unsatisfactory as a result of their conventional structure. Again, I think it has been amply demonstrated that the type of force now in being has proven to be adequate and satisfactory for our defence and for the protection of the security of Canada.

I submit that the priorities, objects and functions of the Canadian defence force should be in the following order. The first consideration should be the security and sovereignty of Canada. That is the number one priority by far. Number two priority should be participation in defence alliances and the third should be participation in United Nations peace-keeping tasks.

Although the government has not admitted this, it seems to me that according to their view of the matter the primary role of the unified defence service, if not immediately then in the future, is that of peace keeping for the United Nations. I am one who believes that if it is at all possible we should encourage the United Nations to set up a peacekeeping force on a regular basis. I think it would be contrary to the interest of Canada if we unilaterally set up such a force for that purpose. When the time comes for such an international United Nations peace keeping force to be established, the type of force which should be established must be determined by the United Nations, not by Canada. If we proceed now to set up a type of force with a peacekeeping function, in the future we might find that it would conflict with the decision made by the United Nations when such a police force is set up.

To me the attitude that we should create a single force with the major objective of performing a United Nations peace keeping function is part of the kind of continentalism which seems to be common to the Liberal party. Republicanism or continentalism seems to be in line with such an idea.

The security and sovereignty of Canada are too important to be tampered with by an experiment such as the minister now is undertaking. In support of my contention that this attitude prevails in the government I quote from an editorial in the Ottawa Citizen of November 5, 1966:

> The evident strategic doctrine contemplated by the government is to set up a mobile force of land, sea and air services that could be moved quickly to any part of the world to undertake either a UN peace keeping obligation, or to help fight a brush-fire war on NATO's behalf.
> This would require the country's air and naval units to play largely a support role for the army, rather than the semi-independent part they once took.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote from an editorial in the Victoria Colonist of Saturday, December 24, 1966. It is headed "The Defence Role" and reads:

> It is persistently argued that the proposed integration of Canada's defence forces is justified in large measure by this country's responsibility in peacekeeping roles on behalf of the United Nations.

I shall skip part of the editorial and then quote again:

> They exist primarily to defend the interests and the integrity of the people who pay for them.

Then I go to the last paragraph:

> It is doubtful if the people of Canada would accept a military budget of more than a billion and a half dollars a year to provide a United Nations' police force even in the highly improbable event of our being invited to assume this function.

If I am correct in my assumption that this seems to be in the mind of the government, then I think the government is premature. As I said, I hope the time will come when the United Nations will set up an effective police or peace keeping force. When that is done eventually, I would assume first of all that it would be the smallest countries which are members of the United Nations that would provide the actual personnel. Surely, however, all members of the United Nations would contribute toward the cost. If the United Nations should decide that a certain type of force is required, since all the countries which participate in the United Nations would have to pay for it it would be logical, if a certain type of force is required, that Canada should play its part by then establishing the type of force which would meet the special requirements of the United Nations.

I should like to quote again from the speech of the Associate Minister of National Defence. The reason I quote him is that he is the only one who has presented arguments which call for us to reply. He has tried hard, I think, to put forward valid arguments. The next question with which the associate minister dealt was the question of what is meant by unification. Here I think the associate minister felt it would be wise to rely on the definition given by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer). As found on page 12538 of Hansard the Associate Minister of National Defence, in answering the question "What is meant by unification", quotes the Minister of National Defence as follows:

> Integration-to-unification is a series of interlocking steps designed to provide Canada the best military course possible to meet our international obligations for a reasonable expenditure.

I think what the associate minister did not realize was that the minister finally let the cat out of the bag when he said:

> —the best military course possible to meet our international obligations for a reasonable expenditure.

Apparently that is the only explanation that could be given of what is meant by unification. However, in a further effort to explain what is meant by unification the associate minister again quotes the Minister of National Defence as follows, as recorded on page 12539 of Hansard:

> One general principle should be underlined again —the combat units will retain their identity and their specialized functions and training.

That confuses me more than ever, Mr. Speaker. If this is what the minister has in mind by way of a single defence force, namely, "the combat units will retain their identity and their specialized functions and training", then surely that is what the situation is under the present set-up. Then the associate minister in a very genuine and sincere manner attempts to indicate some of the advantages of a single force. At page 12538 of Hansard he cites some of the advantages of unification:

> Separate and distinct uniforms.

Well, surely if 100,000 new uniforms have to be bought it is going to be more expensive. There will be 100,000 new uniforms of a different colour and type. Surely there can be no appreciable saving there. The second advantage is:

> Separate personnel policies and the duplication of manpower required to support these policies.

Third:

> Duplication in areas of common training.

Then, fourth:

> Duplication of the communications systems.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? He is quoting me the wrong way around. This is the argument I was advancing against the former system. I said that we wished to obviate these duplications.

[Mr. Chatterton.]

Mr. Chatterton: I accept the minister's correction. From the statements the minister made on various occasions I had understood that these were the things we would be avoiding by integration. The associate minister then dealt with the question of costs. He stated that a considerable amount of savings has been effected in various parts of the defence service. Then at page 12539 of Hansard he quoted from an answer already tabled in the house:

> Savings already achieved through the integration of headquarters and services since July 1964:—

I repeat, "Savings already achieved through the integration of headquarters and services since July 1964". The minister repeatedly has said that integration has effected savings. I do not concede that at all. If there are 23,000 fewer personnel in the armed forces now than there were a year ago, naturally a lot of money would be saved thereby. I think that is the way to save money. If I did concede that integration has saved money, and I do not, that does not mean that the next step, unification, will also save money. Surely it is up to the minister and the government to present us with evidence of some kind of a plan which will indicate that unification will effect savings. It is not enough just to make a general statement in the house that it will do so. We must have some evidence of some plan, and it is my opinion the minister has completely failed to present us with such evidence.

• (4:50 p.m.)

In support of that statement let me quote Admiral Rayner, the former chief of naval staff. I do not know the date of this article but it appeared in the Ottawa Citizen. Admiral Rayner was referring first to unification and he said:

> The fact that we were to proceed with a firm plan was considered acceptable by the government—

He was suggesting that there was no clear plan developed for integration. He also said.

> I was concerned that there was no detailed plan to implement the new organization. Hence people could not be told in good time how it would affect them. Also, without a plan, I found it impossible to estimate the savings that might be made.

In referring to unification he is also reported as having said:

> Once again no plan has been produced, just the announced intention to proceed. Is this to be 1964 over again? Unification poses much greater problems than integration.

In the absence of any evidence presented by the government or the minister that integration will in fact provide savings I can only assume that no detailed plan has been prepared as to what effect unification will have in cutting down the cost of providing this service.

I shall not be much longer, Mr. Speaker. Earlier I mentioned that this whole plan is in line with the government's attitude toward continentalism and republicanism. We have seen examples of this. Let me quote from the Victoria Colonist. The quotation I wish to put on record appeared in an editorial on Saturday, November 5. It begins:

> For a start, no longer will any branch or unit of the services be "royal" according to the minister's pronouncement.

I have just been informed that the minister may not know where the Colonist is published. It is published in the Victoria riding.

The editorial then continues:

> This will please few except the republican element in the country and conceivably those who resent the fact that Britain's Queen is also Queen of Canada. What useful purpose such a controversial change can serve the minister will explain, no doubt, when the opportunity for debate is given the commons. But if this is a part of Prime Minister Pearson's "Canadianization of Canada" plan, ostensibly aimed at a closer national harmony, it is likely to fail dismally.
>
> In fact, such tampering with tradition and honoured symbols is likely to be dangerously divisive.
> There will be those who mourn for the passing of the Royal Canadian Navy and the Royal Canadian Air Force. These will become the sea and air arms of the Canadian Armed Forces, to be built in future on the rank structure of the army.

The last part of the editorial states:

> It also remains to be seen how Canada's voluntary enlistment system stands up under the strain.
> Mr. Hellyer may be prepared to take these risks but the nation should not. Unless he can be prevailed upon to modify this new military design, either by the already vociferous opposition in the commons, by respected and experienced military men, or by the sober elements of his own Liberal party, he is leading this country very close to the edge of disaster.
> What he risks is a wholesale demoralization in the armed forces, if not their disintegration.
> This is too solemn a matter for experiments of the drastic nature this minister proposes.

We have been urging all along that the government refer this bill to the defence committee before approval in principle on second reading. That fact of the matter is that once the principle of unification is approved by the house it will be a fait accompli. This is such an important matter that I feel sincerely it would be risky to proceed with the government proposal. In my view it would be the better part of wisdom for the government to withhold its request that parliament give this important matter approval in principle until we have heard all the evidence of experts and other people who wish to appear before the defence committee.

If the principle of this bill is as good as the minister has maintained and if a single defence force has all the qualities ascribed to it by the minister, surely it will stand up to the test of critical analysis and examination by the committee before approval in principle. The fact that the minister seems to be convinced that it will stand up is all the more reason he should send it to the defence committee. Surely if this were the case he would say: We are absolutely sure our contentions will be borne out by the evidence. Even at this late date I hope the minister will give serious consideration to this suggestion.

It is also my hope that when the bill goes to the defence committee there will be no attempt on the part of the minister or the government to prevent any person, whether he be a member of a military force or not, from appearing before the committee. I recognize that a member of the armed forces appearing before a committee cannot disclose matters concerning security or policy. I am satisfied that the chairman of the committee will handle that situation adequately. I sincerely hope there will be no attempt to prevent the appearance of individuals the committee may wish to call.

• (5:00 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Beauharnois-Salaberry): Mr. Speaker, Bill No. C-243, which will provide a unified defence force for Canada, is a legislation which, in my opinion, has the approval of the majority of Canadians.

Earlier this afternoon the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) talked about the indifference of the people. I do not agree with him on that point, and I wonder whether the Canadian people are not rather indifferent to some passionate and emotional arguments put forward by the opposition.

For some, the people are unable to assess the results of such government action. But I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if actually the arguments put forward by those who object to the unification of our forces are really valid.

I agree with the hon. member who spoke before me, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Chatterton) who said that those who are interested must voice their opinion during this debate; but I believe that some speeches should have followed a different course. The same member also referred to an editorial published in Victoria. I even blame editorials which inject matters of tradition, of royalty and republic into a debate such as this one which only seeks to improve our armed forces.

Mr. Speaker, all kinds of motives are ascribed to the hon. Minister of National Defence; he is accused of stubbornness, he is blamed for his determination and even his sense of responsibility is questioned. It is a pity, in my opinion, that in this house, in public, the sincerity and honesty of our public men can be questioned. Earlier, the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) gave us a few examples of arguments which, in fact, were unwarranted and which do not improve the debate.

The present Minister of National Defence is just as sincere as his predecessors. He tries to assume his responsibilities in the best interest of everyone; he places before us a bill which is indeed right with our time, 1967, and consistent with our world commitments. I am even led to believe that the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) and the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) would probably have made the same decision if they were still minister of national defence.

Is it wrong to submit that ministerial decisions are always preceded by studies at the department level, by consultations with officials and the people responsible for their implementation? Of course, in the end, somebody has to make the decision. And I am sure that, even in this case, it was not made lightly and that everything was carefully thought out with a sole object in view: improving the efficiency of our armed forces and establishing a defence policy more suitable to our country and to our modern times.

It is nevertheless ridiculous to see the reaction of certain members in this house. They always blamed the present government for its lack of policy, for its rehashed policies, for following constantly the influence of our southern neighbours, for waiting too long before meeting problems, for its inability to take decisions. Now that we have before us a legislation innovating in the field of defence, a first, a plan which many countries are considering, what happens? Everyone cries shame, is afraid of the venture, anticipates the worst, instead of encouraging and helping the minister to implement a legislative measure which will be to the credit of our country and will give a new dimension to our armed forces.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, all those changes will not be made smoothly or without difficulties, since any change naturally brings about a little disruption, especially when men are concerned. This is quite normal. Are we afraid to meet the challenge?

Were the few retired officials who engaged in a pitched battle against unification also afraid to meet the challenge? I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that practically all members of the Canadian forces are able to meet such a challenge and to carry out this unification project, a "made in Canada" project.

Yet, in this debate an effort is made to have the minister contradict himself or others; an attempt is made to show that he has hidden the truth. We hear an exercise in semantics, quotations, so-called contradictions, and above all, efforts are being made so that the people will look upon the Minister of National Defence as a monster who wants to crush our poor little servicemen and get rid of those who will not submit to his requirements. How ridiculous. Those who are talking of arrogance should rather say of the minister: determination and conviction. Those accusing him of stubbornness should talk about decision and action. Those blaming him for his obstinacy should rather see a sense of responsibility.

Mr. Speaker, I too have been a member of the committee on national defence since 1963, as well as the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), the critic in military matters of the official opposition, and I do not contend that somebody tried to hide anything from me. I am convinced that we were given all the necessary opportunities during the 81 meetings to examine the defence policy of Canada, to hear statements from servicemen, former servicemen and civilians, to question them and also to read the special studies prepared for the committee.

The minister, or the associate minister (Mr. Cadieux), attended 63 meetings of the committee. They answered a considerable number of questions, namely over 800. If certain senior military officers who gave evidence before the committee on the Canadian defence policy feel frustrated because their evidence was reviewed before they could present it, I am surprised at their attitude, all the more so because they were able, while answering questions from members of the committee, to go far beyond the information embodied in their brief or in their statement.

The hon. members opposite did not lose a single opportunity, I think, to question or cross-examine, either in the presence or in the absence of the minister. On the other hand, there is nothing abnormal, in my opinion, in considering certain pieces of information as classified in defence matters.

I have compared the brief submitted to the committee by Admiral Landymore with his draft brief, and I do not see why such a storm was raised on this matter.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we should see if the minister has indicated very clearly, bluntly and strongly in his statements and in his answers the meaning of integration and unification.

• (5:10 p.m.)

To my mind, integration meant integration and I think all members understood it and accepted it. As far as unification is concerned, I have not seen anything more in it than unification of the three services of the Canadian forces into one unified defence force. How can it be otherwise? Moreover, the minister has mentioned that the whole process would evolve progressively, beginning with the integration of command and, through stages, leading to one single force. One can scrutinize all the evidence given by the minister and wonder what he really meant in one sentence or another, whether he has been explicit or could have been more explicit. In my opinion, this is a childish attitude and we have more constructive things to do.

Of course, the process of integration represents a big job with a lot of things involved; the minister himself has admitted it, and that is why it will be done in stages. Unification will probably be even more complex, but the first step was integration and, according to statements already put on record, it was obvious that the objectives could not be precisely defined in every detail before at least some progress had been made toward integration.

Mr. Speaker, in any case, I challenge anyone who can read either English or French to deny that the white paper on defence has not made clear the objectives set by the government, and everybody knows that this white paper has been available to the general public since March 1964.

I believe I can understand French; on page 19 of the white paper, I read:

> Following the most careful and thoughtful consideration, the government has decided that there is only one adequate solution. It is the INTEGRATION of the armed forces of Canada under a single Chief of Defence Staff and a single Defence Staff. This will be the FIRST step toward a single UNIFIED defence force for Canada. The integrated control of all aspects of planning and operations should not only produce a more effective and co-ordinated defence posture for Canada, but should also result in considerable savings.

Surely, there is nothing underhanded here. What more can one ask for? Every hon. member received a copy of this white paper, the admirals surely read it, and the matter was publicized in newspapers across the country; even those unappreciated persons had an opportunity to find out about it. The concluding sentence of that same paragraph reads as follows:

> Sufficient savings should accrue from unification to permit a goal of 25 per cent of the budget to be devoted to capital equipment being realized in the years ahead.

Who in the world would have the nerve to declare that integration only would result in that much savings? After all, 25 per cent of one and a half billion dollars is 400 million dollars per year, the greater part of which would come from unification and integration, precisely. Everything is expressed in clear terms, and the paragraph I referred to should help convince hon. members that there was nothing ambiguous about the white paper.

In this connection, I cannot understand those who, like the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Chatterton) a while ago, wanted the bill referred to a defence committee before second reading, alleging that the committee has not had the opportunity to study the whole matter and hear the full testimony with respect to the desirability of such legislation. Of course, the committee never took a definite position on unification, but it could have done so. The government cannot, if it is in earnest about the discharge of its responsibilities, wait many more months to introduce a bill it considers both necessary and pressing, and all the more so after having given a standing or special committee of the house the opportunity to study the matter for months on end and even years.

Let no one tell me that it is normal for the dissatisfaction of a few retired soldiers to have so much weight in the balance, when we know that the majority of our military establishment, from the chief of staff down, is aware of the problem and supports, wholly or partially, the proposed unification.

Present procedure does not prevent in any way the committee on defence from perusing the bill after second reading and calling witnesses if it so wishes as well as making the required changes.

Some say that it is too late after second reading because the principle of the bill is then accepted. I do not agree at all, and in this I have the support of Bill No. C-231, an act to define and implement a national transportation policy. Everyone saw the work put in by the members of this house during committee consideration of that bill, and the amendments made to it. Moreover, there is no doubt that the nature of the evidence before the committee, if the proposition was to be as ill-fated as some claimed, would surely have influenced the decision of the government. However, I doubt that the evidence of some people who may be speaking for their own small vainglory, has much influence. Not on me anyway.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as for the merits of integration or unification—two things that I do not want to separate, for in my opinion one is completed by the other—I believe that there is no problem for integration, as I said earlier. But as for unification, some people made reservations as to its effects.

This legislation will surely bring about important changes in our military structure, but if the aims sought after when the decision was first made are really kept in mind, a general improvement is necessarily to be expected.

This bill has been prepared in close consultation with our military leaders and the heads of our armed forces, as I mentioned at the outset of my remarks, and they are the ones who will also be responsible for its implementation. I think that point is very important.

During the debate on Bill No. C-90 in 1964, this whole question of unification was discussed, even though only integration was being mentioned then. And now, most of the arguments put forward at that time seem to crop up again. It is feared that our armed forces will be weakened, that they will be unable to carry out their duties; it is thought that this change will cause concern and reduce our strength and, finally, it is much feared that the morale of our troops will greatly suffer.

Mr. Speaker, during consideration of this bill, the present and the future must be taken into account much more than the past. Efficiency must take precedence over sentiment; nor should the returns we can obtain from our national defence dollar be overlooked.

Sentimental and fond of custom and tradition though we may be, we also must be progressive and face our problems. Everyone knows that in this house, no one dares change too rapidly the procedures and precedents going back a number of years, precisely to spare the feelings of some of us.

In the meantime, however, the population of Canada is paying the cost of long discussions.

Mr. Speaker, I have personally served in the Canadian air force during the war, I was proud of my squadron and of the Royal Canadian Air Force, or the Corps d'aviation royal canadien as it was then called in French, but I was particularly proud of being a Canadian and equally proud of the exploits of each of our three services, at sea as in the air or on the ground. I was even sorry that our navy was not identified by a more distinctive insignia to separate it more clearly from the royal navy.

After the war, I was active in reserve troops in an anti-aircraft regiment for about eight years. There, too, I am happy to say, I was proud of my regiment and I showed as much eagerness in my work as artillery officer as when I was officer in the air force. Today, I have a certain attachment to both, and I remain proud to be Canadian.

However, in the present case, there is no question of transferring sailors to the army, soldiers to the air force or airmen to the navy. The minister said it, General Allard said it and it was the talk of the town but some are still afraid. The point is simply to set up a single force composed of several elements, a unified force so that its efforts will be better co-ordinated under a single leadership, with much more flexibility in action.

I think that the emotional problem has to be put aside, at least for the time being. Besides, the emotion is felt a little more among former and present military people who have lived through the last war, than among our young people who now join our services, either for a few years or to make a career out of it. However, the latter group is still the larger, it is where the fighting force is.

Therefore, let us give those young people the opportunity to extend their affection to the whole Canadian forces, rather than to a single service and very soon, they will develop a feeling of pride and generosity even greater toward their country, all the more because they will know that many countries of the world are watching Canada and this unification project.

As for the uniform, it is again a passionate matter. The minister said that the military heads will be responsible for it. Well, I am prepared to place my confidence in them and I am convinced that they will choose a style which will meet all the requirements and which will even be attractive.

As for efficiency, integration certainly brought about improvements, for instance, the setting up of a single command—I think that everyone agrees with me on that—and the creation of the Canadian Forces Council, followed by the reorganization of headquarters and the structure of commands such as the mobile force command, the maritime command, the air defence command, the military command, and the air transport and materiel command. Already, it is possible to show that great savings have been made with an increased efficiency and a reduced staff.

With unification, we shall complete the process so that our three present services may benefit from a better co-ordination of effort in the field of administration, personnel training and the discharge of military jobs. Those who during the last war served in the army and in the air force, know full well that, at certain times, such lack of co-operation and co-ordination between our two services, was responsible for the loss of lives of some of our airmen and soldiers.

Yesterday afternoon the Associate Minister of Defence pointed out some weaknesses in our present system, from the rivalry between the three services to the duplication of our military establishments, of different logistic systems, to various communications networks, from the duplication of materiel purchases to the duplication in the training of the forces in each of the services, let alone the uniforms, various regulations and so on. For a country such as ours, to define clearly our aims in matters of defence is a must. Moreover, our defence program should contain some priorities in order that the best possible use may be made of our establishments, our equipment and our financial resources.

Through unification we shall be able, with up-to-date armament and equipment, to protect our territorial sovereignty. We shall also be in a position to help prevent major conflicts through our contribution to deterrence forces, as, for instance, NATO forces, and maintain world peace while participating in operations under the United Nations, and all this with minimum strength and maximum effectiveness, which, in itself, will result in financial savings.

While setting up a single force, we shall assist in the establishment of better co-ordination and greater flexibility and mobility within each component of our armed forces.

Since that personnel must be replaced periodically, since some rotation is even advisable, each of those elements will thus be better prepared to play various roles according to immediate needs.

Our soldiers will be more versatile, our sailors, our airmen, our soldiers will be better prepared to work together and perform tasks as different as those called for by NATO mobile force, the defence of Canada and the protection of our territory, world peacekeeping operations, NATO deterrent force, help to the civil government in an emergency. All that through a more diversified training and equipment chosen precisely for more diversified use. For that very reason, the Canadian armed forces will be in a better position to face all kinds of emergencies, they will be better suited to periodic rotation and the government will be able, if need be, to change its international commitments without having to change drastically our military structures.

No doubt you noticed, Mr. Speaker, that I have purposely avoided so far to quote the views of any expert or soldier, because I wanted to express my own views without, for all that, feeling the need to repeat the various quotations which in general have already been heard in this debate or the previous ones on defence.

My personal views are based nonetheless on a thorough study of the matter and were arrived at following the work I did when I took part in the business and meetings of the special committee and the standing committee on national defence.

Mr. Speaker, the western world is watching Canada, it is taking considerable interest in our unification program. Let us join hands and make this undertaking a complete success. And, if we really want to help the minister and our military leaders, let us make constructive and practical suggestions, as he recently asked us to do, and I am sure that request still stands today.

At the same time, we will be achieving this result through common effort, and I am sure that we will be proud of our accomplishment in the not too distant future.

[English]

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in participating in the debate on such an important bill which affects a good number of my constituents physically and materially and affects the traditional and historic role and interest of the Atlantic provinces in the defence and defence forces of Canada. I must say I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the preceding speaker, the hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry (Mr. Laniel). He managed to keep the debate on a logical and unemotional basis but, with respect, I think he glossed over some of the cracks in the cake with the frosting of a few words.

It has surprised me during the four days we have been considering this bill, and it has only been four days, to hear speakers opposite, perhaps hoping to be constructive, continually refer to a committee that has been meeting for two or three years and a white paper that was published in 1964. This bill, once passed, is going to change forever and a day the form and substance of our armed forces. The minister is maintaining his usual silence, which is certainly most constructive fos debate, but I would ask him to tell me where, other than on page 19 of the white paper, there is mention of the word "unification" or the expression "a unified force".

I will follow the precept of the hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry and will not become unnecessarily emotional in this debate. I have had no military experience to bring to this house in trying to define the minister's concepts or in pointing out constructively some of the pitfalls. However, one thing that does concern me, which has been mentioned by others in the house with military experience, is what the experts outside the house think of this measure.

The hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry in frosting the cake, and perhaps gilding the lily, will have to admit that there is a very real and sincere division about this issue among people most knowledgeable outside the house. For all the talk both in the press and in the house—and the government cannot have it both ways—the most constructive step that the Minister of National Defence could take would be to refer this question to a committee. The minister knows that this is the reason we are objecting so strongly and fundamentally to his bill.

During the debate on this subject last November many hon. members did not come out flatly against integration or unification but wanted the bill referred to a committee. With regard to the debate on interim supply last November we in this house know, and certainly the public know, that it was almost exclusively directed to the question of Admiral Landymore's evidence before the defence committee and whether or not it was changed either before or after he gave his evidence. That was the primary theme of the supply debate.

The testimony of the minister and his officers before the committee has been somewhat muddied by what we have heard from Admiral Landymore, and some attempt was made to introduce that evidence in the house. No less a person than General Foulkes, who occupied the highest military position in this land, suggested, with respect, that the minister was not as direct and purposeful in his evidence before the committee as he should have been. For instance, in 1964 the minister suggested in evidence that only the command structure of the forces should be integrated.

No doubt the minister or his advisers can provide me with exact information but, having read the 30 pages which comprise the white paper of 1964, as far as I can see the only time among all the thousands of words contained therein that the word "unification" is referred to is the one occasion mentioned by the hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry with reference to a single unified defence force. Only once is a unified structure mentioned.

There has been constant reference to the 1964 white paper and to the committee hearings based in part upon the white paper, but all of this as well as the supply debate in November was before the present bill came before the house. Surely, Mr. Speaker, if members of parliament are to earn their keep at all they must, when a bill as fundamental as this comes before them, define and dissect it if they are not granted their one acknowledged wish which would resolve all matters for the time being anyway, the referring of the bill to the committee.

This is a constructive step that the minister could take but unfortunately he has not taken too many constructive steps thus far in response to the wishes and recommendations of those of this side of the house. That, of course, is his privilege. But in a way he should be complimented for putting the issue before us because for the first time in Canada, certainly since the conscription crisis debate during the last war, through the minister's action we are now at last concentrating our efforts upon the subject of defence and trying to ascertain what is our defence policy. As I say, Mr. Speaker, for that the minister is to be complimented.

Having complimented the minister for focusing attention on what the defence policy of this small nation of 20 million people should be in relation to the Goliath to the south of us consisting of 200 million people, the question must be given real scrutiny. In a way, perhaps this whole debate is academic. We all know that the shield and umbrella of the United States protect us in a meaningful way, and we on this side have tried to elicit from the minister whether it is the ultimate intention of the government to let the shield and umbrella to the south protect our shores and air space. Hon. members opposite may scoff at this, but I will not repeat all the arguments about sovereignty. Suffice it to say that references to the white paper, to the committee proceedings, to the revised evidence which was given and to the debate on supply are merely a red herring.

This bill was given first reading on November 7, 1966. It may be prophetic that December 7 was a day of infamy some years ago, and I hope that this date is not going to be symbolic as far as the effects of this bill on the defence forces of this country are concerned.

I realize it is the minister's belief that the bill will place Canada in a better state of preparation for defence than we were before. But many people more knowledgeable than the minister, let alone this member, have said that the bill will not fulfil this purpose. Therefore, what more constructive step can the minister take than to refer the matter to the committee?

The minister has had a very favourable press on this bill, and I do not begrudge him that; it is understandable. As I say, I compliment the minister for focusing attention on this issue. But the minister has disappointed me. He has come from the booming area of Toronto with new ideas and new concepts to revolutionize parliament. To a certain degree he has a keen mind in many areas.

Having said that I suggest, with respect, that he has not followed his own principles in the one area he knows best, the area of construction. This is my reason for injecting the word "construction" into this debate. When you are mixing concrete and erecting a building it is not quite the same as radically changing an established structure and hoping you come up with a better one.

Let us suppose, Mr. Speaker, that in the course of his duties outside the house in the construction field the minister was planning a large building. Let us say that some of the architects, design engineers, even foremen and electricians employed by the consulting firm to prepare plans and specifications for the new building resigned. Would any reliable or successful contractor say; in the words of one famous admiral "Damn the torpedoes; full speed ahead"? I suppose we still have some torpedoes left, but I use that expression in the allegorical sense. I suggest that the construction industry would ride that particular contractor out of town if under those circumstances he decided to build.

Let us say there have been resignations and protests and that, as any reliable, responsible and reasonable contractor would do, a meeting is held to air the views of different men. In any reasonable consulting or construction firm views are thoroughly thrashed out. If somebody then resigns because he objects to the way the plans are being laid out, because he does not believe they are logical or sound, you know where you stand. This is quite apart from an aroused public with regard to a development planned in the area, or from any change in the basic rules. A good contractor looks at things carefully, and I make no apologies for using the analogy of a contractor in this debate.

Mr. Hellyer: I am glad.

Mr. Nowlan: I hear the minister commenting. There is an analogy to be drawn between what a contracting firm would do and what is happening to our defence structure under this bill. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, my analogy is not restricted to mixing concrete for a big building. It does not deal with the ingredients which are needed to build any structure. Let us look at the example of scrambled eggs. You take a little milk, a little butter and eggs and mix them together and you are left with eggs no matter what the ingredients were, no matter who stirs the mess in the frying pan.

An hon. Member: That is what you have in your speech.

Mr. Nowlan: The scrambled egg analogy is apt. Once the forces are reconstituted you cannot unscramble them. After all, a four day debate on something which will change a structure which has existed for 100 years is not too long.

I believe every hon. member should stand up and say whether he supports unification. I did not stand up and speak before because I do not know the facts and figures of logistics. I do not know much about supply or the theory of integrated command. Those things are for the experts. I am sensible enough to know that others know more about these things than I do. But to come back to the construction analogy, would not a contractor who acted as the minister is acting be run out of business? Would not a contractor who was starting some revolutionary housing development, apartment block or supermarket, want to look into things carefully and make sure he was doing the right thing before he went ahead? After all it is not the minister's money that he is spending. If he were a contractor in the outside world and there was a great division of opinion about the design of anything he tried to build, he would be more cautious about the way he spent his clients' money. Here he spends the taxpayers' money.

Theoretically, in an improved parliament we ought to have no repetitious speeches, the debate should go along smoothly, and we should contribute nothing outside the scope of the debate. But here let me say that I am most disappointed with the minister. The minister has heard the Prime Minister of this country say that no cabinet minister should stand in hardening cement. In the words of the Prime Minister, if you want to give leadership you do not stand in a bucket of cement. That way you get stuck and when you are stuck you cannot give leadership. I need not repeat that for some time it has been difficult for members on this side to determine the course the government is charting on this issue. It was at the rejuvenation meeting preceding the recent reincarnation of a minister that the Prime Minister, as reported in a Toronto Telegram article of October 13, 1966, said:

> Remaining firm and immovable in a bucket of hardening cement is nothing to boast about. Political leadership is being steady, not stuck.

I had hoped that the minister would heed the admonition of the Prime Minister. The minister may be sincere, though it is perhaps not apt to use that term in this house. Disraeli said that the only person who does not change his mind is the person who has no mind.

Mr. Pickersgill: Nobody ever accused Disraeli of sincerity.

Mr. Nowlan: I did not hear what the Minister of Transport said. Undoubtedly it was a logical intervention.

Mr. Pickersgill: I said, nobody ever accused Disraeli of sincerity.

Mr. Nowlan: I do not know if Disraeli was sincere or insincere. I know he was a master psychologist who applied his talents with notable success to politics. I know equally well that the Minister of Transport has been in this place for a fairly long time and that he knows a thing or two about psychology, at least.

An hon. Member: Too long.

Mr. Nowlan: An hon. member says he has been here too long.

Let me say that there have been noticeable changes in the Prime Minister's course. I cite medicare, Mr. Spencer, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Gordon), nuclear arms, and so on. In all these things there has been change, noticeable change. Why can the minister not change? Even at this stage there could be a change overnight if this matter were only referred to a committee. We need to know more about the proposal. We need to know if the plans are correct, if they will stand scrutiny and criticism. If this matter went to a committee and then came back to the house we should not have the repetitious contributions from this side that members on the other side do not like. We have a precedent. The transport bill previous to the one recently passed was referred to a committee before being approved in principle. The precedent is there. Let the Minister of National Defence follow it. I have been disappointed as have others in my party by the minister's behaviour. We were disappointed that he did not follow the advice of some of his advisers. They too could come before that committee.

I shall not review in detail the arguments repeated here for the last four days. The hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) last night tried to show the history and chronology of the concept of unification as propounded by other governments. One cannot stress the points he raised enough. The subject matter of this debate is unification, not integration. Unification concerns us, as do defence policy and the sovereignty of this country.

Do efficiency and economy mean anything in the context of this bill when one considers what has happened in the forces in the last year? These questions concern us. What do we find? There has been a sort of stop and go, pause, retreat, change, reverse and forward action on the part of the Department of National Defence which has disproved the validity of what the minister has tried to maintain. In the forces we see a patchwork quilt of reaction and reflex actions. In these instant decisions that we have heard of the prime ingredients in the kitchen have not necessarily turned out to be for the good of decision making. Certainly the incident of the 500 pilots who were prematurely retired—one leading authority said that this decision cost the Canadian taxpayer over $125 million—was not a positive contribution or a peg on which the minister can hang his hat. There was the bowler hat incident, and that does not make members on this side of the house or the people of Canada feel particularly relaxed.

Then there was the "instant mix" decision on pilot pay increases which for the first time involved discrimination between air crew. This has now been resolved in part as a result of the general increase and the recent study of the salary structure. So there was a positive contribution in the end but for many months the situation caused dissatisfaction and erosion of men and morale. Again, the re-engagement bonus, though perhaps fine in theory, was not working out until the pay increases were announced last October. These decisions, I suggest, were nothing more than desperate reflex actions by the department at a time when they did not really know where their plan was taking them.

Much has been said about the efficiency and economy which will result from unification. Let us consider the question of economy. The minister can boast about results in certain areas but the over-all price tag, according to my information, is higher than it ever was.

I do not intend to review the command structure proposals, because the hon. member for Queens showed us that no other country has followed the proposal contained in the bill before us, certainly not Britain and the United States, two large countries with a long military history. There has never been any complaint about the integration of command at the top level or about integration at many levels. Our criticism is directed toward unification at the lower levels, especially at the combat level. There is no objection to transport, dental, medical services and so on, being supplied by a single corps. But there should never be unification at the lower levels where combat is involved.

These are my views after reading the reports and the evidence presented before the defence committee. I suggest that the level at which unification might be applied should never be below the regimental level in the army, on the ships and in the squadrons. No less a person than Mr. R. S. Malone, in the course of a series of articles which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press, has pointed out the danger of unification at combat level. I do not know whether he has yet been quoted on this aspect, but he writes that the minister is trying to swim against the current which is flowing in other countries of the world, especially the United States. Mr. Malone is speaking about the decision not to impose unification at combat level. He says:

> The same situation exists in the United States where an increasing effort is now being made to create and expand on regimental identification. To quote the U.S. Secretary for the Air Force, "men have functioned most effectively as members of an identifiable group. The spirit of unity . . . of brotherhood . . . is enhanced by tradition, pride in one's organization and by a distinctive uniform which is a mark of membership.
> The value of esprit de corps cannot be measured with precision.

This is very different from something like concrete which can be measured with precision. That is why progress toward a unified command is so different, in one sense, from the construction of a supermarket, for example. The writer continues:

> No price tag can be placed on it, yet we all recognize its intrinsic contribution in the quality of our armed forces. It is the heart of the true fighting force.
> We should not tamper with that precious esprit de corps, that sense of identification, by immersing it in a vast agglomeration of a single service."

I ask the hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry to consider carefully this expression of opinion by Mr. Malone, a man who, if he ran for political office, would certainly not sit on this side of the house. He is fairly well identified, I think, with one party, or at least he was until the question of unification arose. It is such reasoning by men like Mr. Malone and men still more knowledgeable than he which disturbs so many of us in this house to the point at which we speak perhaps ad nauseam, in the opinion of some sensitive members of the press, in order to discharge the duties which we feel are placed upon us. It is because of this concern that we find ourselves so firmly opposed to this unification bill.

Loss of identification at combat level will leave Canada by itself.

I see it is six o'clock and I would like to call it so.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock the house will now proceed to consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper. Perhaps I could read the proceedings on the adjournment motion at this point.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock this day are as follows: The hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Simard), Administration of Justice—absolute pardon for first offence; the hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry (Mr. Laniel), National Film Board—lack of documentary films on confederation; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), Canadian Centennial—suggested complimentary trips to EXPO for older Canadians.

PRIVATE BILLS

EXCELSIOR LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. Robert Stanbury (York-Scarborough) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-26, respecting the Excelsior Life Insurance Company.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to continue as a federal company a company which is an existing Ontario company, in fact, one of the leading insurance companies in Canada.

• (6:00 p.m.)

The Excelsior Life Insurance Company was incorporated under the laws of the province of Ontario by letters patent dated August 7, 1889. It has been licensed with the federal Department of Insurance since June 23, 1897.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

I understand that, in terms of assets and over $1 billion of insurance in force, it is one of the largest insurance companies in Canada. As a provincial company the Excelsior Life Insurance Company is subject to most of the provisions of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act to which it would be subject as a federal company, but at the same time it is subject to the jurisdiction of the Ontario Corporations Act, certain provisions of which overlap and conflict with the provisions of the federal act. This dual jurisdiction does result in some hardship and inconvenience. The company, for instance, must prepare its annual statement in the form prescribed by the federal Department of Insurance, but its annual report is prepared on a different basis to comply with the provisions of the Ontario Corporations Act. The Ontario act, of course, is designed to apply to all Ontario corporations and not particularly to companies engaged in the insurance business.

The investment powers under the Corporations Act in Ontario do not conform to those provided for under the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. The provisions of the federal act, however, are the standards referred to in the investment community.

The company is engaged in direct competition with federally incorporated companies and with British and foreign companies operating in Canada, and it feels prejudiced by the narrow investment powers which it has under the Corporations Act of Ontario.

In some respects the Ontario legislation is silent in respect of certain administrative procedures, and the company has been following, and must comply with, the more detailed federal requirements. There are certain areas of difference in the field of administration between the federal and provincial requirements. These could be resolved if the company became a federal company.

I understand that the Ontario Department of Insurance has been quite understanding in dealing with this company in its operations under these circumstances. The company, in fact, has been treated much as if it were a federal company. The Excelsior Life Insurance Company is licensed to operate in each province and to transact the business of life insurance, accident insurance and sickness insurance. The company carries on business in all the provinces of Canda.

Reincorporation as a federal company and subsequent sale and transfer of the company's assets to the new corporation is not in itself feasible in view of the size of the Excelsior Life Insurance Company. First of all, there are close to 200,000 policyholders. There is more than $1 billion of insurance in force. It would be quite impracticable to transfer these policies to a federal company. Second, there are mortgage loans on real estate which are held by the company totalling approximately $68 million. It would not be feasible to register assignments of such a large number of mortgages to a new corporation. Third, the company has marketable securities to a value in excess of $83 million. The task of transferring these securities would be quite onerous.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to achieve the effect of reincorporation as a federal company without the apparent difficulties posed by that course of action. This bill, by a special act, would make The Excelsior Life Insurance Company, a company of long standing and high reputation throughout Canada, a federal company subject to all the controls and federal laws to which it is now subject and make it if anything more competitive with other companies in the field and enable it to serve the public interest better.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member concludes his remarks, would he permit a question? If so, could he tell the house, if he has knowledge of this, the extent to which the company is owned in Canada by Canadians and to what extent it is owned by nationals of other countries? In other words, could he tell us to what extent the company currently is owned by Canadians and to what extent it has foreign ownership?

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, I do not have that specific information. My information is that it is an independent company, not controlled by any foreign company, but I am not familiar with the exact shareholding. I would be glad to inquire about that and have this information available when the bill reaches the committee stage.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Stanbury) for undertaking to provide this information when the bill reaches the committee stage, which I suppose is as appropriate a time as any to deal with it. I think it is perhaps all the more appropriate that we study the structure not only of this company but of other companies in the light of the extremely important double-barrelled statement which the Prime Minister made last evening. I did not see the whole speech but I read newspaper extracts from it. I think we might touch on that a little later.

At the moment, however, I should like to quote a few words from the explanatory note in the bill, which to me are extremely revealing. I should think they would be revealing as well to the government and would give the government, if it needs it and I hope it does not, an additional reason to spur on its consideration of the degree to which Canadian law should apply to companies of this sort or companies generally operating in the field of handling other people's money, which includes life insurance companies, other insurance companies, trust companies, loan companies, investment companies and the like. The explanatory note reads as follows:

> Non-conformity of the Ontario legislation with the federal legislation respecting the operation of a life insurance company and the inconvenience and hardship resulting from the dual jurisdiction of the laws governing the affairs of the company make it desirable for the company to achieve the status of a company incorporated by special act of parliament.

Perhaps I am reading more into this than I should, not having the knowledge lawyers possess in respect of the intricacies of law, but as I see it there is a conflict in this field between the law of Ontario and the law of Canada which results in inconvenience and hardship to such companies. Our first consideration should be in respect of private individuals, and if this conflict results in inconvenience and hardship to the companies it must result in greater inconvenience to the policyholders, shareholders and investors.

In passing let me cite as an example the awkward position in which the investors, shareholders and policyholders of the Prudential Company found themselves, and that company was incorporated under Ontario law. I might also cite the situation in respect of the North American General Insurance Company which was incorporated federally by private bill. In that case the provincial government said it had nothing to do with the situation because it was the federal government's responsibility to legislate in respect of bankruptcy. The federal government said it had no responsibility because North American General Insurance Company, although incorporated by the federal government, was a company belonging to Prudential. As a result of the buck-passing between the federal and provincial governments the investors, shareholders and policyholders of those companies found themselves in the middle of a squeeze.

I am not arguing about the merits of the relationship which investors, speculators, shareholders or policyholders might have with these companies, but the fact is that because one was incorporated provincially and the other federally, with both governments passing the buck and refusing to accept responsibility, these people were left out in the cold.

The Excelsior Life Insurance Company has attempted to explain this away by suggesting that the non-conformity of the provincial legislation with federal legislation results in hardship and inconvenience because of different laws and dual jurisdiction. We should be looking for some way to do everything possible to ensure that individual Canadians who have a financial relationship with these companies are fully protected. This is particularly true because we have required these companies to be incorporated by statute.

We in parliament should pave the way for the federal and provincial governments to do away with the luxury of political combat in regard to the fixing of responsibility. These governments should be honest enough to admit their errors. There is obviously something of greater importance than political gain on the part of governments. The rights of individuals in respect of their relationship to the companies are of more importance.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Has he not heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) say on several occasions in the house that the North American General Insurance Company was involved because its investments were stolen?

Mr. Howard: I realize that it is impossible to legislate against theft. The best we have ever been able to do in this field is to legislate penalties.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): Is it not true that—

Mr. Howard: Just one moment. Surely my hon. friend, who is a very learned lawyer with many years of experience in this house, will give me the opportunity of answering his first question before he asks another. I know what the minister has said. I am simply suggesting that there was buck-passing involved between the federal and provincial governments, neither one of which wanted to set up a commission to inquire into this situation. I only referred to Prudential and North American General because they are companies which fell by the wayside. I am referring to Excelsior Life, North American General and Wentworth in relation to the necessity for governments to do something to protect the rights of individuals. That is the point I am making. If my hon. friend wishes to ask his other question now I will attempt to deal with it.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): The federal government's responsibility is to check on the financial stability of the insurance companies incorporated by the federal government through private bills. The North American General Insurance Company, which was incorporated in this way, as the result of stock control became the owner of a finance company. The real onus in respect of what happened to the finance company should be placed on the insurance company for allowing the finance company's assets to disappear in this way. Let me also say to my hon. friend that I agree the government should assume some responsibility in this matter.

Mr. Howard: I did not think for a moment that the hon. member for High Park and I were at odds in respect of that principle. We must be concerned about the welfare and rights of individuals. The government of Canada has for some time had knowledge of this matter. Certain officials of the government of Canada, charged with the responsibility of overseeing activities in this field, viewed with alarm the growth of inter-corporate relationships which permit one individual or a group to control a borrowing company, an insurance company, a lending company and a finance company. So the government should have become alarmed about this situation.

This situation has permitted a savings and loan company involved in this inter-corporate group to borrow money from the hon. member for High Park, using him as an example only, to lend to one of its other companies. This relationship in the field of finance which allows companies to borrow money and act as insurance companies and lenders, all of which is done in an intimate way rather than at arm's length, does not lend itself to the protection of investors. The government of Canada has known about this situation for many months, if not years, but has done nothing except to say that the matter is under study and consideration. In my opinion that is not good enough.

The parliament of Canada is here being asked to deal with a matter of great magnitude and we should be concerned about protecting as much as possible the rights of the people who will have a financial relationship with the Excelsior Life Insurance Company. If the government of Canada has abdicated its responsibility in this field, parliament must step into the gap. We hope this is what parliament will do; we hope this is what the committee will do when the bill proceeds beyond second reading and is sent to committee. I understand there is an arrangement that the bill will be sent to a committee that is not now heavily burdened with work and can tackle this job with some ease and speed.

We should insist that when the bill gets to that committee not only the company officials but government officials will give the committee detailed knowledge about the extent of the relationship of this company with other companies, the extent to which it is owned by people who are not Canadians, and the extent to which it is able to protect the interests of the individuals who have financial relationships with it. I do not think it is good enough to say that the company is financially sound at the moment and is thus able to meet its liabilities. That may be all well and good now, as was the case with the North American General Insurance Company when it was incorporated by parliament, but there is nothing to stop some other element in the financial field gaining control of this company and operating it in such a way that the interests of the shareholders, investors and policy holders are not protected.

It falls upon our shoulders, in the absence of any government indication of responsibility or concern as to this matter, to try to do something about it. I hope that before the appropriate committee we will be able to amend the bill in such a way that the degree of protection we feel is necessary will be written into the bill. I believe this is necessary. We are concerned about the extent of foreign ownership of Canadian industry. We in this party have been concerned about this for many years. Many of us noted with appreciation the comments of the Prime Minister—as I said earlier, I only read them later—about his government's concern over the question of foreign ownership.

We, of course, do not bring the approach of Janus to this problem. Ours is a one-faced approach. We are looking in only one direction, that of protecting the interests of Canadians. My reading of the Prime Minister's comments reminded me of Janus, an ancient Roman deity after whom the month of January was named. The first month of the year was named after him because he had two faces and as a consequence was able to look both fore and aft.

We take the Prime Minister at his word when he says he is concerned that there be greater Canadian ownership of our industries. This concern has been expressed in the bank bill, No. C-222, which is being examined by a committee at the moment. The bank bill contains a declaration of government policy in the field of banking, namely, that not more than one individual or corporate group can own more than 10 per cent of the shares of a bank, not more than 25 per cent of the shares of a bank can be owned by foreigners, three-quarters of the directors must be Canadian citizens ordinarily resident in Canada, and nobody who is a director of a bank should at the same time be a director of another bank, trust or loan company.

This exemplifies what we are getting at. It shows that the government was cognizant of the problem of the close ties between banks and other financial companies when it wrote those provisions into the bank bill. In our opinion insurance companies have just as great an effect upon the money situation of a nation as a bank because insurance companies have within their grasp, I venture to suggest, billions upon billions of dollars of policyholders' money. This money is invested by insurance companies at varying interest rates in various projects and is thereby pumped back into the economy of the nation.

We submit that if the government deems it to be the correct policy to place certain restrictions upon the degree of ownership and the interdirectorship of banks, it is equally valid to take the same position with respect to insurance, trust, loan and investment companies or any company that comes before parliament, asks to be incorporated and is involved in the financial field in some way. We want to assist the Prime Minister in attaining his goal. We think it behooves the Excelsior Life Insurance Company and other companies in this field to conform to the policy of the government, enunciated by the Prime Minister, with regard to restrictions on the degree to which they are owned in other countries and restrictions upon the relationship which their directors have with other companies in the financial field. The policy enunciated in the bank bill should apply to them.

When this bill is before the standing committee we want from the owners of the Excelsior Life Insurance Company an indication whether they agree to the incorporation in this bill of the principles set out in the bank bill. If they do, to a degree this would be an acceptable course for parliament to follow. In addition,—and this is much more vital—we shall have to consider the steps necessary to preserve the rights of Canadians who have relationships with this company whether as investors, shareholders or policyholders, because while the Excelsior Life Insurance Company may today be as sound as can be, there is no guarantee that this will continue to be the case. We have only to refer again to the North American General Insurance Company which parliament incorporated some years ago without a word of debate or examination. Presumably at that time everything was fair and above board in so far as the operation of the company was concerned, but it subsequently fell into difficulties. We have to look at—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must advise the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members listened with interest to the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) this afternoon when he indicated, in reply to a question, that already the insurance companies operating under the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act were fulfilling the requirements that the government has now seen fit to introduce in the amendments before the committee in respect of banks owned in Canada.

• (6:30 p.m.)

I was very interested in discovering what was the authorization for this statement and therefore I looked at incorporation under the original Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, and particularly the sections with regard to Canadian ownership. I find in the second volume of the statutes, chapter 31, Part II, section 6 (3), the closing part of which reads as follows:

> —and a majority of the ordinary directors or of the shareholders' directors, as the case may be, of a company shall at all times be Canadian citizens resident in Canada.

Certainly this section was drafted many years ago. In fact this statute was originally drafted in 1911 and revised in 1952. At that time a section was written into it which affects the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act which demands among other things that they shall deposit in a chartered bank in Canada all moneys received by them on account of stocks subscribed or otherwise received on account of the company, and may withdraw the same for the purposes of the company only, and may do generally what is necessary to organize the company.

I am raising this matter in speaking about the bill because I think that there is a growing need in Canada to review our policy with regard to the creation of these new insurance companies and to consider whether we are accomplishing what we wish to provide for in incorporation of financial institutions. It is interesting to note that this particular company is a very large one; it has $83 million in assets. I was particularly interested in discovering how these assets have grown. This information is contained in the report of the superintendent of insurance. Under section 63(4) of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act it is indicated that in 1948 only .30 per cent of the total assets were invested in specified fields. This amount has now grown to 1.5 per cent of the total assets. If we check the amounts we will see that they are divided between bonds, stocks and real estate. The investment of the insurance companies registered under the federal government in 1948 was $8,900,000. In 1965 it was $94 million in stocks. In 1948 their investment in real estate was $1,183,000 and now it is $41 million. This proves the impact that these companies had on the Canadian economy and emphasizes the need for greater study and consideration which should be given to these bills.

A certain philosophy is apparent in our attitude to various companies. If the company is Canadian owned it is considered to be a good company, but if it is foreign owned it is a bad company. I think this is not necessarily true, and it is certainly not always true. However, I think it is of advantage to Canada if the company is owned and controlled by shareholders in our country because of our greater ability in directing the assets and savings of that company. Much of it is in the real estate field, and it is easier to direct the operations of such a company so that Canadian needs can best be served.

I have not had much opportunity to study the insurance companies act in any depth but I find that in the past there was a great interest on the part of the legislators to make sure that insurance companies under federal control take into consideration at all times the best interests of Canada both as far as investments are concerned and in the choice of directors. Since 1910 there has been no change. The government, in its recent instructions to financial institutions as contained in the Bank Act and in the pronouncements of some ministers of the crown has placed greater emphasis on the majority control than was originally required in the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. There is a requirement now for a 100 per cent directorship in Canadian hands. In fact it goes further than that and states that the directors must represent not less than 75 per cent of the ownership, and that of the 25 per cent which remains only 10 per cent can be under the control of one company or corporation.

I was pleased to hear the explanation given by the hon. member sponsoring the bill and to note that he was willing to ascertain the disposition of the control of the original capital of the company.

I am surprised to see that the explanatory note does not indicate whether or not the company wishes to be incorporated. A reference is made to Part IX of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. I find that in chapter 31, Part IX, section 150 there is an indication of the role to be played by provincial companies. As I read the other sections in that part, I find that these companies are not placed under the same restrictions under which they will now find themselves under federal control. It is quite true that under section 152, and to some extent under section 153, the superintendent is the federal superintendent. At the same time, they do not have to provide information as to the control of their stocks, the disposition of their holdings or file certificates that the proper transactions have taken place, as they would if they were a federal company.

• (6:40 p.m.)

I presume part of the difficulty of this company arises from the fact that they have been issuing life insurance for a great length of time in the province of Ontario, as well as in other provinces, in conformity with Ontario insurance laws. I assume the company is rather reluctant to release the paper that they have, including the assets which they hold in trust for their policyholders. I assume they are reluctant to make any major change in the transactions in which they have hitherto engaged in the province of Ontario, but are going to set up a new federal company that will assume responsibility for the provincial company but will not take over the assets or liabilities of that company. It is extremely difficult to tell what the company wishes to do or what it is asking in this instance.

Mr. Stanbury: If the hon. member will permit, I will try to explain briefly. As I understand it, one of the means of dealing with the situation—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stanbury: I understand the hon. member is posing a question, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to answer it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member can only reply to the question on the understanding he is not closing the debate.

Mr. Stanbury: Perhaps the hon. gentleman has made his point and is satisfied that the debate may be closed?

Mr. Peters: No, I understood, Mr. Speaker to say, on the understanding that the debate would not be closed, that the question could be answered.

Mr. Stanbury: Perhaps I could answer the questions at the end of the hon. member's remarks.

Mr. Peters: We are confused as to what this particular incorporation may mean in terms of this specific company. There have been a number of other companies that have wanted federal charters and were prepared to operate under federal legislation. However, this company appears to be operating now under part IX of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. The explanatory note reads in part:

> Non-conformity of the Ontario legislation with the federal legislation respecting the operation of a life insurance company and the inconvenience and hardship resulting from the dual jurisdiction of the laws governing the affairs of the company make it desirable for the company to achieve the status of a company incorporated by special act of parliament. Due to the size of the company, continuation as a federal company and not a federal re-incorporation has been applied for.

Perhaps this explanatory note is easily understood by insurance people, but it completely confuses me. I have looked at part IX of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act under which I understand the company is operating now. As I understand it, the company operates under this act because of the inspection that is given by the superintendent of insurance. Now it is asking for continuation as a federal company, but not federal re-incorporation of the same company. I feel this situation raises a problem as to exactly what the company wants. It certainly is not clear.

In any case, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the operation of The Excelsior Life Insurance Company has been good. I have checked and it rates quite highly, I believe about seventeenth amongst insurance companies in Canada issuing ordinary insurance. It rates fairly high in group and collective insurance. I presume the company is going to continue to operate in the same manner. I assume therefore that the only reason for applying for federal incorporation, and not re-incorporation, is something which I do not understand. I wonder therefore why this should be granted.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that members of parliament will have to give very serious consideration before they pass insurance bills, particularly those bills which will give to insurance companies the protection they are obviously going to be granted by federal incorporation. The hon. member who preceded me mentioned that the North American General Insurance Company that is federally incorporated and operating in Ontario is the exception. I feel that things have been done in that company that were close to the border, and that the superintendent of insurance probably did take special precautions against what eventually happened. I understand that rather than the annual inspection, the superintendent made inspections of this insurance company every two months, and that he was trying to track down some of the transactions that have taken place. An accountant was placed in the office to ascertain the total operations of this insurance company. The fact that one of the senior officials of an insurance company steals from the company, not by manipulating company assets but by actually removing the assets from the company office, cannot be prevented.

If we are going to give federal incorporation, then we should be assured as nearly as possible that the incorporation is going to be in the interests of the Canadian public, that the shareholders are going to be protected to the greatest extent possible and, in particular, that the policyholders are going to be protected by the superintendent of insurance to the extent that this money may be the same as money in the bank. For these reasons, I believe it will be necessary for the Canadian government to make amendments to the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act to ensure that the majority of the directors of the company are Canadians and normally resident in Canada, and that the capital, which in many cases is more important than the people that we have in these offices, be Canadian. This capital should be directed toward Canadian ends and Canadian needs. I think the indication of large investments by insurance companies, particularly in the field of real estate, is something that is worth while and should be encouraged not only by individual companies but by the government as well. I think that this can only be done when these companies become Canadian companies, the finances of which are under the control of Canadian citizens.

[Mr. Peters.]

• (6:50 p.m.)

In reading the insurance act I find there is no limitation upon insurance companies conducting bona fide transactions in a business-like manner. Section 9 of the act which refers to provincial companies asks only for very limited control over such companies. I see the provision as no infringement upon their rights as provincial corporations, and I see no particular limitation upon this company if it did wish to remain in the provincial field and conduct its affairs over a large number of Canadian provinces. That this company should ask for federal incorporation I think is a very good proposition; but I suggest that the company representatives should be very carefully questioned when they do appear before the committee about why they want this protection of federal incorporation and are not satisfied—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member as his time has expired.

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member speaks now he closes the debate.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I wonder whether it could be understood that when the hon. member has finished speaking we will call it seven o'clock. In that event I would certainly have no objection to listening to the hon. member conclude the debate.

Mr. Speaker: It is difficult to rule on that question because the hon. member is raising a point in anticipation. It is rather difficult for the Chair to say in advance what will happen at seven o'clock. The only thing I can say now is that if the hon. member speaks he closes the debate.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I raised this point of order because earlier when somebody else was occupying the chair there was a little mix-up about who was asking whom a question. It was suggested that the hon. member who is sponsoring the bill would be prepared to deal with certain questions which were raised by the hon. member for Timiskaming, and there was a question of order involved at that point.

In view of the closeness of the hour of seven o'clock I do not think that it would be fair to the sponsor of any other bill if we were to proceed with the discussion of another bill at this time. That was the reason for raising the point of order, in the hope that there would be consent.

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, certainly I have no objection to the hon. member's suggestion and I hear no objection from the house.

Hon. members have made some constructive comments, and I thank them for their appreciation of the status of this company which is applying for this unusual and special act. This company does not fall into the usual category of incorporations because it is an existing and long established company, as I explained. The difficulty is that it is incorporated as a provincial company, and because it operates in every province in Canada this makes for some awkwardness, in addition to there being certain conflicts between the requirements of the various jurisdictions.

The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) is correct in that this company would have to submit itself to stricter requirements than it is now subject to if this bill were passed. It is quite prepared to do that. I think this bill is clearly in the public interest, as well as in the interest of the company, which feels that it will have less red tape to deal with in coping with the requirements of federal jurisdiction, which it is quite prepared to abide by. Frankly I think it will have perhaps some additional prestige in being a federal company, rather than a company incorporated in one of the provinces of Canada.

The bill is somewhat unusual, as I say, in that it is not seeking an incorporation of this company but will simply perpetuate the same rights and obligations the company now has as a provincial company. The only difference will be that as a result of the passage of the bill it will become a federal company and will acquire certain additional obligations as a consequence.

I understand members feel that this bill should be considered in committee, and therefore by consent I intend to move, seconded by the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Cameron):

That notwithstanding the provisions of standing order 105 the said bill be referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. Stanbury: I move, seconded by the hon. member for High Park:

That notwithstanding the provisions of standing order 105 the said bill be referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Mr. Speaker: The hour appointed for the consideration of private members business has now expired.

Is it understood that this sitting is now suspended until eight o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AMENDMENT

AMALGAMATION OF NAVY, ARMY AND AIR FORCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Hellyer for the second reading of Bill No. C-243, to amend the National Defence Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, before the supper recess—I almost said summer recess, we may not have a summer recess—but before the supper recess I think I had reached the point of saying that Canada, with this policy, is going against the current. The minister is trying to swim against the current, against the rocks. I said other countries had not followed his policy of unification. I cannot stress too strongly that what has taken place elsewhere is integration, not unification. When we look at our commitments under NATO or NORAD, what unified forces are there? What unified forces are there in the Gaza strip, in Cyprus; what unified forces of this country contributed to Korea? In the present confrontation in which North Viet Nam faces the free world, and involves the whole world, does a unified force exist there? There you have the classic case of an integrated force working under a commander with integrated commands. Does the soldier slogging through the mud in Viet Nam worry about unification? He is under an integrated command.

Government members invariably say that the unification concept is bold and new, and is examined by the world. Ministers of defence come here to look at what we have done. Well, Mr. Speaker, it seems that most countries, seeing what we have done, reject similar moves in their own countries. We might be the microscope for other countries to look through, but they reject the concept of this when they see what is beneath the lens.

Listening to hon. members opposite trying to be constructive and trying to take pride in what they think other countries admire reminded me of a legendary story. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) told the legendary story of Canute but he twisted it. I hope I do not twist mine. I am reminded of Lady Godiva and her journey through Coventry.

Mr. Knowles: Careful.

Mr. Nowlan: At least that lady had the direction of her horse. She knew why she was on the horse. Had the townspeople disobeyed their orders and looked at the lady they would have seen that she was good to look at.

So it is with this integration plan. Some features of it are constructive and positive. But Lady Godiva had the direction of her horse, and because of the demand of her husband there was some purpose in what she was doing. Besides, it was difficult to see her; she had long hair. Unfortunately the present minister, with his policy, is exposing the armed forces of Canada to a scrutiny which cannot be covered by long hair or propaganda. What he is doing to the forces is fundamental to the country.

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister a peeping Tom?

Mr. Nowlan: He is no peeping Tom. My analogy to Lady Godiva, who was good to look at, is to show that she had a purpose; everybody knew why she was on the horse. We, on the other hand, are not sure of our direction and there are many political cross currents which may affect the purpose of the unification program.

To continue this laboratory experiment, affecting people and positions, involving long traditions, is to ignore fundamental world problems. In the free world there is international integration. Canadians in Gaza, Cyprus, Korea—I will not mention Viet Nam—have served as parts of integrated forces under an integrated command.

One country which looked at Canada's experiment and rejected it was a small country, smaller than we are, New Zealand. Canada has never had a military hierarchy and we have no real world military history. We are a small country and we have a good history, but we shall never be a dominant military power—at least in my lifetime, and that is good. Two major powers exist in the world and it is foolish not to recognize that. Other countries recognize it, New Zealand being one of them. Here I should like to quote from an article by Canadian Press, appearing in the Chronicle-Herald of Saturday, June 11, 1966. The article is headed: Integration of Defence Forces Unfavorable for New Zealand. I wish to read some brief paragraphs from this report, because the situation is fairly analogous to Canada. I quote:

> New Zealand has decided against establishing a unified defence force combining all three services on the Canadian model. The Canadian system has been studied by senior New Zealand defence officials in recent years and at one time it was thought that aspects of it would be adopted here.
> For several years, New Zealand has moved toward integration of some functions of the forces, especially for civilian staff and supply.
> However, a white paper just issued—

This article, dated June 11, 1966, is topical.

—covering defence policy up to 1970—

At least they have defined their problem.

—explains why complete integration is not favored.

I now quote from the report:

> Examination has led the government to conclude that such a combined force would not make sense in terms of our principal aim, to gain maximum effect from the level of contribution which New Zealand can make.
> The force of this type which New Zealand could afford to maintain in peacetime would never be large enough to give a truly independent role in limited war.

• (8:10 p.m.)

They go on to say they feel they can supply soldiers, transport for the air and anti-submarine ships for anti-submarine warfare. This is a situation somewhat akin to Canada's. International integration by the free countries in supplying different forces has been necessary in the past, and it will be necessary in the future. Only a country such as the Goliath to the south has the men, the physical strength and the means to operate an independent unified force, and even they do not have such a unified force to contribute.

These have been a few remarks by a layman looking at the picture and reflecting the concern of men who admittedly know much more about the subject than he does. But when there is real division among people at the top, and when the minister is proposing policy which runs contrary to that of any other country, there is good reason to feel perturbed. In various parts of the world, Cyprus and the Gaza strip, for instance, one finds integration, not unification, and it is surely time for us to pause and for the minister to make a real study of what unification will mean.

Before concluding I should like to refer briefly to the situation in my own province of Nova Scotia. Other speakers have covered the situation as far as the navy is concerned. I think of the contribution made by my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Forrestall) and his colleague, also from Halifax (Mr. McCleave). I want to make one or two remarks about the so-called base consolidation program. If we are not to have forces, then obviously we do not need bases, but the minister has told us that the base consolidation program is to be reviewed and that certain bases will not be closed until 1967 or 1968. I would express the hope that while this government is trying to develop a nation from sea to sea, the government, in this base consolidation program, will keep in mind the historic and traditional contribution made by the east, from which I come, toward the provision of services for the forces.

We are not blessed with the tremendous natural resources which are available in other parts of the country. Halifax was founded as a service town. We realize that if the minister continues to cut back the forces, bases in certain parts of Canada will have to be closed. But I am speaking of an area which, above all, has traditionally played its part in defence policy by the maintenance of bases.

There is one base in my riding, Cornwallis, which at one time contained 12,000 people. Already there are rumours about the future of this base. Statements are being made that it will not be closed until a certain date. If there are to be training bases in the future, we find it difficult to understand the closure of bases which were, from the very beginning, intended solely for training purposes, especially if bases for training unified personnel are to be developed in other parts of Canada.

We do not begrudge to other parts of Canada their geographical assets and their natural resources. But to offset our limited resources and our limited capacity we have always, as a matter of tradition, shared the defence burden of maintaining and servicing bases. There is a great deal of concern in Nova Scotia lest bases should be closed there and bases with similar functions established in more central parts of Canada Cornwallis was commissioned in 1951, and since then its sole purpose has been the training of personnel.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order. I regret to inform the hon. member the time allotted to his speech has expired.

Is it agreed that the hon. member may continue his speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: He never even asked.

Mr. Nowlan: I want to thank the house for allowing me to continue my remarks. As I was saying, from the beginning the function of Cornwallis has been training. Several members of this house were trained there during the second world war. All the facilities are available. It is a completely integrated town. To close that base and establish training bases in the more central parts of Canada to perform the same function seems a poor way of economizing. In many areas of the east, and indeed throughout Canada, there is real concern lest Hellyer's hallucination might be Canada's lament.

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew North): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to say that, as another layman in this debate, like the hon.

member who has just spoken, I will try to keep my eyes on the horse because I imagine he had a better sense of direction than Lady Godiva.

Major changes in the economic and social characteristics of a country or of several countries have a great effect upon the old ideas of nations concerned. Similarly, international pressures such as those created by the conflicting ideologies of the western democracies and the communist bloc have been the guiding force of changes which have taken place in the defence strategy, defence equipment, and defence planning of the western world.

Naturally, the larger and wealthier nations of the world can participate in every phase of defence operations and defence research. Middle powers such as Canada must decide what they can do best and try to specialize in fewer fields of military endeavour. Canada is also among those nations which have to decide how best they can perform those tasks in such a way that both efficiency and economy will receive the fullest consideration.

The real basis of this bill can be found in the substantial technological change which has taken place during the last 20 years, as reflected in the report of the royal commission on government organization, which had the following to say in regard to the Department of National Defence:

> Not only is the relative size of the 'administrative tail' growing steadily in all military forces—for budgeting, accounting, supply, construction and general administration; in addition, among the operational elements themselves there is a rapid increase in the technical content of the work, a large element being common to all three services. Consequently, there is a growing range of activities of common concern to the services, for which the traditional basis of organization is unsuited. It is increasingly recognized that to maintain three separate organizations for such functions is uneconomic. Moreover, the chronic scarcity of many of the skills involved cannot be ignored.
> The traditional pattern also aggravates the rigidities in the defence establishment resulting from collective arrangements. It has meant, for example, that in finding signallers for the Congo at short notice, the Canadian Army could look only to its own resources in the Royal Canadian Corps of Signals, having no access to the large reservoir of communications personnel in the other two services.

The commissioners went on to say:

> It is the opinion of your commissioners that effective consolidation cannot be based on joint control by the three services with the object of preserving the traditional responsibility of the three chiefs of staff for the control and administration of all the armed forces.

[Mr. Hopkins.]

• (8:20 p.m.)

The commissioners recommended that the gradual transfer of executive control of common requirements to the chairman, chiefs of staffs, take place. The government, however, felt that this recommendation did not adequately solve the problems of the basic issues. It was recognized that if a single command structure was not established, co-ordination by the committee system could remain and would retain all of its inevitable delays and frustrations. The Minister of National Defence has been criticized in this house for not informing the house and the Canadian people about his plans to carry out his program to its obvious conclusion—a unified defence force for Canada. On page 19 of the white paper on defence I wish to quote the following:

> Following the most careful and thoughtful consideration, the government has decided that there is only one adequate solution. It is the integration of the armed forces of Canada under a single chief of defence staff and a single defence staff.
> This will be the first step toward a single unified defence force for Canada. The integrated control of all aspects of planning and operations should not only produce a more effective and co-ordinated defence posture for Canada, but should also result in considerable savings.

The white paper on defence has received wide distribution and in particular has been made available to all members of this house.

A special committee in 1963 met on 30 different occasions and heard from 28 different witnesses, some on two or three different occasions. After the publication of the white paper in 1964, the special committee met on 36 additional occasions, made five reports to the house and heard 41 different witnesses. In 1966 the standing committee on national defence met on 15 different occasions and heard from 34 different witnesses on the whole range of subjects dealing with reorganization, the progress of integration, the force capabilities, the roles and mission of each command, and the equipment that the commands operated to carry out their missions.

Since 1963 there have been 2,355 pages of committee evidence. Since 1963 the committees have met 81 times and have heard 103 witnesses. The minister and/or the associate minister have met with the committee on 63 different occasions.

The Canadian forces produce 4,500 copies in English and 4,500 copies in French monthly of an integrated magazine known as the Sentinel. The Canadian forces bulletin is another monthly publication containing unclassified information of general interest. It is issued under the authority of the chief of defence staff. There are 30 base and station newspapers operated by the servicemen, containing news of local interest and of the forces at large. The comprehensive coverage and review of the principles involved in reorganization, the force structure and the important provisions necessary for unification were given by the Minister of National Defence on moving second reading of Bill C-243 on December 7, 1966. There have been numerous visits and talks by senior defence officials to civilian organizations and military units in Canada and abroad. Surely all these facts destroy any charge that has been made by anyone about lack of information.

The whole business of integration and unification of the armed forces of Canada is not just a political scheme, as some would have the people of Canada believe. It is a major readjustment of the administration and the operations of our armed forces, which forces have served our country in a responsible and dedicated manner in our past history during times when conditions were such that they could perform their duty without having to face many of the technical and complex international problems that or some time have been presenting themselves as a challenge to our country, and which are going to continue to present themselves in an even more complex way as a challenge in the future. Page 7 of the white paper on defence states as follows:

> In the post-war reorganization, which took place during the years 1945-47, it was recognized that Canada could not return to its pre-war attitude to defence. Canada was then relatively strong and prosperous at a time of Soviet expansion and western European weakness. In addition, Canada had undertaken new responsibilities through its membership in the United Nations.
> Another major lesson of the war was the inadequacy of the pre-war mobilization base. After September, 1939, considerable time elapsed before Canada was in a position to take a significant share in military operations. It was recognized that in any future war, such time, in all probability, would not be available.

Any industry that is running a large-scale operation must review those operations from time to time and make the necessary adjustments in its operations so that it will always be operating in the most efficient way, in the most economical way and in a way that can best serve its purpose. Similarly, the Department of National Defence is a large operation but is even more important to the Canadian people than is a particular industry. It is important to the defence of Canada; it is important to the peace keeping operations of the United Nations; it is important in the field of international relations; it is important to the image of Canada, at home and abroad; it is important to the economy of many areas of Canada, and it is important to every man and woman who serves in the defence forces of Canada.

At this point I should like to quote in part from a speech delivered by K. R. Patrick, O.B.E., C.D., president of Canadian Marigot Limited of Montreal. This speech was delivered to the Business Papers Editors Association:

> Defence is a big business and a big piece of the taxpayer's dollar, yet for the first time the application of modern management techniques is being applied to the management of this "business". It offers an unparallelled opportunity for the military to conduct their business in a businesslike manner.
> We know that the era is significant in terms of rapid changes and that these factors are changing the traditional way of doing things. Political, economical and social changes throughout the world are having a profound effect on the nature and the location of confrontations that might lead to war. It is just not radar and guided missiles or atom bombs that are new. There are, for example, satellite observations and computer manipulations that enable the armed forces to keep track of all surface vessels throughout the world at any instant and it is possible to instantly attack this shipping through use of this data.
>
> Who would have thought that our main concern, in a period of tension between the two great powers, would be centred in the events of Cyprus or central Africa, or that this would be a sufficient threat to world peace to call for United Nations troops.
> We sometimes forget that for 16 years now, the Canadian armed forces have not been involved in any war (since Korea). This suggests a whole new concept of training based on the kind of service that troops are now doing overseas, which is clearly an extension of the Canadian foreign policy. This exemplifies the military life and rules for Canadians as opposed to Americans.

This important bill cannot be considered in the light of the present alone. Its values and purposes are far reaching in that it deals with preparedness for the future. There have been several occasions in military history when countries have been caught unprepared.

• (8:30 p.m.)

The big reason for the unfortunate incidents that occurred during the Crimean war were largely due to the outdated military tactics displayed by the British. That lesson taught them to review their military strategy and techniques from time to time, and this is one of the major reasons Britain was in a position to face up to the first world war. The Americans had for a long time throughout their history felt they could remain aloof from world affairs, but the disaster at Pearl Harbour proved to them they had to embark unequivocably into international affairs and maintain a higher calibre of preparedness.

In 1909 and in 1910 a naval defence bill was debated in this house. That debate took up approximately 2,400 pages in Hansard. The bill passed in 1910, but before a Canadian navy could be established a change of government took place and the Conservatives under the leadership of the right hon. Sir Robert Borden decided not to build a Canadian navy. As a result Canada entered the first world war without a navy.

Many things can be done in defence and other areas when a nation is under the pressure of international conflict, but it is to the credit of the Minister of National Defence, (Mr. Hellyer) that he is attempting to prepare the armed forces of Canada for their future role during a period of relative world peace.

We have heard a great deal from some of the senior officers who left the services because they disagreed with the policy of integration and unification of the armed forces of Canada, but what about that large number of senior officers who have chosen to remain in Canada's armed forces because they solidly support integration and unification and want to be identified with it? These are the people who really count for the future; these are the people along with the rank and file of Canada's armed forces, who are playing and who will continue to play a constructive and a useful role in Canada's future military history.

At this time I should like to read an article that appeared in the Ottawa Journal dated February 1, 1967. It is under the heading "Corporal" Hellyer Needled, and states:

> Defence Minister Hellyer got another needling in the commons Tuesday about the fact he was a lowly corporal during the second world war.
> On Monday Harold Winch (NDP-Vancouver East) said there was a story among the armed forces that the three main troublemakers in history all were corporals—Cpl. Napoleon, Cpl. Hitler and now Cpl. Hellyer.
> Gordon Churchill (PC-Winnipeg South Centre) spoke Tuesday supporting Mr. Winch. But as a first world war corporal himself, he maintained that those three were exceptions to the rule, that "corporals are the mainstay of the army".
> "I hope that because we have had some offenders like Napoleon, Hitler and Hellyer the rank of corporal will not be downgraded," he said.

Let me just add that I know a great number of corporals, and they are fine individuals.

[Mr. Hopkins.]

I will ignore the comparison with Hitler because such personal slams do not add anything to the decorum of this house. However while there are many characteristics about Napoleon that cannot be compared with similar characteristics of the minister, there are a couple that bear watching. History records the fact that Napoleon was the greatest military leader and organizer of his time. The morale of all his forces was high and every man performed his duties in a spirit of cooperation, never lacking the courage to accept challenge.

An hon. Member: Do not forget the battle of Waterloo.

Mr. Hopkins: I never thought I would see the day when the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) would pay such a high tribute to the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Churchill: If I paid him a tribute I retract it.

Mr. Hopkins: Furthermore it is interesting to note that personal admiration for Napoleon lives on even today, in the national spirit of France.

At this point I should like to quote once more from K. R. Patrick, O.B.E., C.D., president of Canadian Marigot Ltd. who said, as reported in his speech delivered to the Business Papers Editors Association, on January 25, 1967:

> I have listened to the chief of the defence staff, General Allard, and other senior officers in similar discussions with all ranks. The "face to face" contact with all ranks has produced a new kind of "esprit de corps", based on logic and an understandable purpose. During the last few months I have been invited to address a large number of officers and men to outline my views on the reorganization of the armed forces, and have submitted to hundreds of questions. I think it is fair to say my contact with the subject is fairly broad, current and first hand.
> From this experience I am convinced that the men and women of the armed forces accept the changes and regard them as progress. There are opponents to be sure, but I have yet to see any opposition based on anything other than emotional factors.
> This is the danger. To stop, or even slow down the process of this essential reorganization for "emotional reasons" would be tragic and expensive, a dreadful disservice to Canada, to the personnel in the armed forces and may even further postpone our hopes for international peace.

I am one of those members of this house who is proud to have a large military establishment in his constituency. I have heard many comments from personnel about the omnibus bill brought to this house by the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) which allowed certain world war veterans to claim their years of war service in respect of over-all pension. This means that if they had joined up in 1942 they received credit for the three years between then and the end of the war. Many members of the armed forces have expressed their gratitude for the recent increase in pay and for the good pension retirement plans which have been introduced. One individual said to me just the other day that he now no longer feels like a second class citizen.

I have known many of Canada's armed forces personnel during the past few years and appreciate the opportunity to work for and represent them. Many of these people have served our country with dignity and honour in many areas of the world. We can all be proud of the great contribution our military personnel across Canada and abroad have made toward the building of an outstanding image for Canada at the international level.

At this time I should like to say to those members of this house who are veterans of the first and second world wars that I regard it as a privilege and an honour that younger Canadians like myself can be members of this house. Along with them and on behalf of the younger members of this house I want to express my appreciation for their efforts in the second world war which have guaranteed our right to serve, if we so desire and our fortunes are right, in the parliament of Canada.

As a result of this bill before us the same people are faced with change. No matter what type of change takes place in any society there is always some reaction. These men and women will meet this change in the same way they have met problems in the past—by getting on with the job.

• (8:40 p.m.)

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of these remarks I must express my appreciation to the minister for his prompt attention to any inquiries I have directed to him. I have directed inquiries to him on occasion and have been very pleased with his attention to them. I also wish to express my appreciation to the associate minister. I have directed to him a number of complaints on behalf of personnel of the armed forces. I particularly wish to thank him for the trouble he has taken on occasion, and quite recently, with respect to inquiries that concerned the health of the armed forces and the peace of mind of all ex-servicemen. I appreciate the trouble he has taken.

I have listened with interest to this debate, particularly the views of those members of the Progressive Conservative party who have served with distinction in the armed forces. I have heard them called primitives on occasion, but I think it is only right to recognize these people. In this instance I am going to place on the record some of the achievements of my opponents to the right. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) was awarded the D.F.C.; the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. MacRae), the M.C.; the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) was in the Canadian army in the second world war; the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) won the D.S.O. overseas and served in both the first and second world wars.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: I see the hon. member is blushing.

Mr. Churchill: It is a primitive blush.

Mr. Herridge: The hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) served in the R.C.A.F. and was awarded the D.F.C.; the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Fane) won the M.C.; the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) won the George Cross and was a lieutenant colonel in the second world war. I wish to refer to the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) who went through the second world war and was a sergeant. He was one of those Canadian socialists who recognized the need to come to the support of Great Britain and France when those countries were fighting the greatest organized tyranny in world history.

On the whole, regardless of our differences of opinion, members of the opposition have presented their views forcibly but with respect for parliamentary procedure and the decorum of this house. However, as a member with 21 years service in this house and, as a matter of fact, the senior member of my party in terms of service in the house—this is the only opportunity I get to blow my own horn—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: —I wish to give the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Nugent) and the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacInnis) a few kindly words of advice which I trust they will accept in the spirit in which they are given. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona spoke with conviction, but I thought he was rather carried away on occasion by his own oratory when he pointedly indicated that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) was not telling the truth. I suggest he would have been just as effective, without transgressing the decorum of this house, if he had simply said, "The minister has just uttered a Hellyerological inexactitude."

With respect to the hon. member for Cape Breton South, I must say that the other evening I was not impressed with some of the language he used when he suggested the minister lacked so-and-so, and so on, and so on. I thought—and afterwards I found out that a number of people in the galleries had the same impression on that occasion—he could have made his point quite clearly, while observing the courtesies of this house, if he had simply said, "The area below the minister's thoracic cavity is a void."

This afternoon a Liberal backbencher spoke. I enjoyed listening to this young man who made his contribution to the debate. He quoted from a book written about General MacArthur which quoted General MacArthur as having said, "Men fight for their country." That is quite correct; but from my experience I have found that tradition, service, unit and regimental loyalties make it easier to fight for one's country on certain occasions. I happen to have served in the infantry; I did not have any of the glorified positions of some hon. members to my right. However, I found on a number of occasions this loyalty to the service, loyalty to the regiment, unit or platoon was a very great morale builder in times of stress and made it easier for men to fight for their country on such occasions. I trust the minister will understand that when he comes to the final application of the terms of this legislation.

I listened to the minister's speech delivered on December 7 last and have read many of his statements since. But I must say, in fairness, like many other hon. members on the opposition side of the house, that I am slightly confused as to the details of the policy the minister intends to pursue, as are a good many other Canadians at this time. A number of senior service personnel have taken objection to the policy outlined by the minister in his speech of December 7. Among them are General C. Vokes, who possibly had some change of heart and realized there were dangers in going too far with this question of unification. I have not found anybody opposed to integration, anything that will give us a more efficient fighting force and reduce expenses, and so on. But I have found, and I have talked to a good many members of the services, a great deal of concern as to what the minister means by unification. The terms "integration" and "unification" have to date not been properly defined in the opinion of those persons who are somewhat confused about this question.

General Simonds, General Lowen, Rear Admiral W. M. Landymore, and many other senior officers now retired have expressed their support for the integration of our forces but opposition to what they understand the minister intends to do with respect to unification. The Naval Officers Association of Canada, the Air Force Officers Association, the Tri-Service Identities Organization, and some of the cadets have expressed concern about the minister's proposals. I received a letter from a cadet just a few days ago who was writing on behalf of his cadet corps. He said, "On no account, Mr. Herridge, mention our names, because we daren't bite the hand that feeds us." I suppose they receive a grant to carry on the corps, and I can understand their feelings in this respect.

The Royal Canadian Legion took a most responsible stand when the Dominion secretary, Mr. Donald M. Thompson, wrote the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) on August 26 last. I will simply quote one paragraph from that letter, because I think they took a very fair point of view when they said:

> The Royal Canadian Legion is not interested in the partisan politics which appear to be developing in connection with this question. We are, however, deeply concerned about the question of the state and condition of our defence forces at any given time.

> It appears to us that sufficient thought and planning have not been given to the important questions of tradition, morale and esprit de corps or, if so, the members of Canada's forces and the public have certainly been kept in ignorance.
> The Royal Canadian Legion urges your government to make clear, without further delay, the detailed plans connected with the integration, and particularly the proposed unification, of the forces so that the judgments made by Canadian organizations and citizens will be based on frank and comprehensive official information and fact, not on rumour and supposition, as seems to be largely the case at the present time.

I thought that that was a very responsible approach to take to this very important question, not only to the members of this house but to the armed forces and to many persons in this country.

I support those who have asked the minister to refer this bill to the defence committee, in view of the fact that hon. members are required to vote on the principle of the bill. In my opinion this would provide an opportunity for all, whether they are for the principles of the bill or against them, to be heard and to give evidence. It will also provide an opportunity for a thorough analysis of what the minister intends to do. However, I may say that if by any chance the issue comes before the house, the members of this group will support it.

I do not intend to speak at great length, but I must say that I have always looked upon the defence policy as simply an extension of foreign policy. This house is entitled to a clear and unequivocal explanation of the relationship between the two.

Unfortunately in the last two or three years we have only been given the opportunity for quite short debates on external affairs, during which in some cases only the leaders and one or two other hon. members of the house from each party expressed their views. In view of the fact that this legislation has been brought in I hope we shall have, in the near future, a thorough going debate on the subject of external affairs when the opportunity is provided us, so that we shall be informed of the relationship which exists between external affairs and the role of our armed forces as envisaged in this bill.

Hon. members are entitled to be informed clearly of the future role that is to govern the organization and operation of Canada's armed forces. The situation will remain confused until the government indicates what is to be the purpose of the armed forces of Canada. We should be told whether Canadian forces are to perform in the peace keeping role or are intended to have a full combat capability, not only for the direct defence of Canada but in particular within the present strategy of the NATO and NORAD alliances. I think we should be given much more information on those questions than we have at the present time.

I support the representations of other members of this party who have spoken in this debate. I wish to emphasize that our party has taken a strong position with respect to the use of armed forces, and so that there will be no doubt as to where we stand I place on record the resolutions adopted by our national conventions. Our policy in this respect has been clear cut. In this as in many other fields, we are pioneers in policy. We shed the light along the paths which the government should follow, and we are only too pleased to do it. I have always been a humble person; that is the trouble with me. I have been inclined to hide my light under a bushel, but I cannot help it.

I wish to refer to the program which was adopted at our convention in Regina in August of 1963, and of course carried on at our last convention. This is what our program says with respect to NATO.

Mr. Pepin: Will the hon. member read it all?

Mr. Herridge: The minister suggests that I should read the whole Regina manifesto. I shall be only too pleased to send him a copy for bed time reading.

The following is part of the manifesto which I wish to quote:

> NATO has played its part in the maintenance of West European security. However, it has concentrated on a military role and has failed to adapt its policies to the growing importance of the economic and social front in the present world struggle. The New Democratic party believes that we should seek a reappraisal and change of NATO's policies and objectives.
> The New Democratic Party believes that the extension of nuclear weapons to any further states and alliances threatens disaster to the world. It therefore opposes Canada's troops being supplied with such weapons at home or abroad.
> At present, except for those nations which have independently developed atomic capacity, neither NATO itself nor its members individually possess or control nuclear warheads. Should they do so, Canada must make it clear that it cannot remain in the alliance. To relieve tensions, Canada should press for a demilitarized zone in central Europe and for the simultaneous disbandment of the Warsaw and NATO pacts.

I think that this policy has even been advocated by some members of the United States congress. This is the position of our party and our continued attitude with respect to this problem.

I will go on now to the question of NORAD. In this regard I wish to quote from page 51 of the N.D.P. program which reads as follows:

> It is questionable whether NORAD ever made any significant contribution to the defence of Canada and in any case it has outlived its usefulness.

I remember the time when the Minister of National Defence agreed with this wholeheartedly and made ringing speeches on the matter in the house. I am sure that some hon. members remember that. The program goes on to read:

Furthermore, there is every danger that the Bomarcs will be equipped with nuclear warheads. The NORAD agreements should therefore be terminated.

That is the attitude of the New Democratic Party with respect to NORAD.

I put these two resolutions on the record so that there be no confusion whatever. As the years have gone by we have found that, having been pioneers in policy in all fields, both domestic and international, we have gathered support.

In this connection I want to quote briefly from the Vancouver Province of December 14, page 26.

Mr. McIntosh: Tell us what you believe.

Mr. Herridge: That would take a very long time indeed. As I was saying, I wish to quote from the Vancouver Province in which an article concerning this matter reads as follows:

Canada should consider dropping out of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization when the present treaty expires in 1969, says Howard Green, former external affairs minister.

NATO was formed by 13 nations to create a defensive alliance to prevent communist aggression, he said. But one of the few bright spots in the world situation today is a reduction of tensions in Europe and between the U.S. and Russia.

This has downgraded the position of many of the middle-power nations, including Canada, he said.

But there is still a very real threat of nuclear war, particularly if production of nuclear weapons spreads to a large number of smaller nations. "And once the first bomb falls, the whole world goes up."

Green recalled that during his term of office as external affairs minister from 1959 to 1963, there was a "terrible tension" between the U.S. and Russia.

"On one bleak Saturday night during the Cuban crisis, I was sure nuclear bombs would be falling by morning."

I am very pleased to be quoting Mr. Green because we served together in the same company in the first world war. However, recently we have discovered another ally following along the pioneering impulse of this group. In this connection I wish to quote the Nelson Daily News of December 18, 1966. It is entitled "Diefenbaker urges cut in Canada's force in Europe", and it reads:

Opposition Leader Diefenbaker has added his voice to the growing chorus seeking a Canadian troop reduction in Europe.

For the last year or more, a group within the Conservative parliamentary party led by Heber Smith, M.P. for Simcoe North, has been suggesting Canadian troop reductions in Europe, if not a complete withdrawal. Some Liberals are known to support this view privately.

I know some of them but I will not give their names away at the present time. It would not be fair. The article goes on to say:

Mr. Diefenbaker had not supported Mr. Smith's group, at least publicly, until he said in the commons December 19 that "Canada should give consideration to reducing the numbers of her forces on the continent of Europe" because of the easing of East-West tension and the preponderance of nuclear power in the U.S.

That shows that the Leader of the official Opposition is commencing to march in our direction, and we are very pleased to see that.

The question of remaining in the NORAD alliance is related closely with the type of force that we will build up in the future. I want to quote something in that connection because I agree with it. I will quote a statement made by the minister as reported in the Ottawa Journal of March 2, 1966:

• (9:00 p.m.)

NATO top heavy—Hellyer

Change is inevitable in NATO, Defence Minister Hellyer said Tuesday.

He told the Canadian Club it was time to take a hard look at the alliance and the form it should take in the next decade or two.

Mr. Hellyer said NATO is becoming "top heavy with headquarters and bureaucratic machinery." He cited what he called the "plethora" of military headquarters.

Mr. Hellyer suggested NATO could make savings of some $7,000 million annually on its present annual gross defence expenditures of $74,000 million.

He said such savings could be used for better weapons and equipment and for more aid to underdeveloped countries.

We are all for more aid to the underdeveloped countries. I am sure the minister was speaking from personal experience. We have to remember that some of this money that is being wasted is Canadian money, and even on those grounds alone we should give very serious consideration to this situation.

I have a list here of the costs of NATO, but I am not going to repeat them because I dealt with them before. A question which I asked was answered on July 6 last year, and I found out the cost of maintaining our forces in Europe. It is very heavy indeed. I think a good many people agree, under the circumstances that prevail at the present time, this cost is not justified and we would be well advised to use the money for other purposes. I feel we are on sound moral grounds and we are on sound financial grounds in urging the withdrawal from NATO and from the NORAD alliance. Anyone who goes into these figures carefully must realize the immense amount of money that is going into this top-heavy bureaucratic organization which the minister says is wasting some $7,000 million annually on defence.

We support the policy of integration which, to us, appears sound and sensible. I have not heard anyone who has any interest in or knowledge of defence matters oppose integration. We believe it will remove duplication of services and unnecessary expenditures, and as a result provide greater efficiency in the operation of the armed forces. This would mean savings for the people of Canada.

However, Mr. Speaker, unification is a more complicated matter to resolve. Unfortunately, to date the minister has not defined this term. We have had no definition of what the minister means when he uses the terms "integration" and "unification". In my opinion, there is need for a basic and fundamental decision on the role of the Canadian armed forces in the future. Before we are going to understand this question properly, we have to have these terms defined. This has not been done so far to the satisfaction of members of this house, senior officers of the armed forces and a good many people interested in the subject. It is for that reason we urge that the bill be sent to the defence committee before second reading.

We believe the minister has been too dogmatic in introducing certain changes and new policies which could far better have been left to develop by themselves under the direction of competent officers and advisers in the natural course of events, to meet the circumstances that prevail in the world. Unification has produced nothing but confusion in the minds of the members of the armed forces and a great number of the civilian population in Canada.

In my opinion, the minister has created a great deal of misunderstanding himself, because he has failed to be frank with parliament, frank with the members of the armed forces or frank with the people of Canada with respect to what he actually proposes in this change in policy, what unification actually means. The members of this party believe that, under present world circumstances, the role of the armed forces in Canada should be in the first instance to protect Canada and her shores and, in the second instance, to provide a well trained, mobile force for peace keeping operations under the United Nations wherever and whenever required. We believe in that role we can, as a middle power, shall we say, or one of he lesser powers, make a contribution to peace in the future.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, there are many reasons for my participation in this debate on unification. One is, and I hope I will not be considered presumptuous in stating, that I represent the riding of Wellington South, and the new name of the riding will be Wellington. It is named after that great general, the Duke of Wellington, who defeated Napoleon at the Battle of Waterloo. I must remind the minister that the man who won that battle did not know about unification, nor has the country for which he fought ever brought about unification. Although they have considered it, they have never brought it about. Wellington won that battle with an army and a navy, but I think we can say that the man he defeated had unified forces because he fought a one-man battle.

There are, as I say, many reasons, of which the above is only one, for my speaking on this subject. That portion of Ontario from which I come has a great military history and a great tradition in the military field. As far back as 1837 we had a volunteer unit called the Wellington Rifles. In 1866 we had the 11th Field Regiment which celebrated its 100th anniversary just last year, and of which Hon. George Drew is honorary colonel. We have the 34th Battalion which was mobilized in 1915. As I say, this area has a great tradition and these units along with many others have brought honour and glory not only to themselves and to our county, but to the world in general.

When I think of unification I am reminded that all of this tradition will disappear. I am one of those who realize that we cannot live on tradition; we must have change. However, here is tradition that has been tried and tested down through the years by all the great military nations; yet here we are, a young nation, wanting to throw overboard this tried and tested tradition. I want to state at the outset that I believe in integration. I believe integration is very necessary in order to bring about efficiency of operations and curtailment of expenditures. We have proven the success of this approach in the medical field. As a matter of fact, it was the Conservative party that integrated the defence medical services. The padre services were integrated, and there has been integration in the purchasing and other branches of the Department of National Defence.

However, the fact that we have made a success of integration does not mean we should go one step further and go into unification by bringing all the forces into one unit. I am sure there are many who agree with me that there is only one answer, and that is an emphatic no. In my opinion there are many valid reasons for continuing to maintain separate units of the army, air force and navy. There have been many excellent reasons given, and wonderful speeches have been made on this very point.

Four reasons come to my mind, why we should keep the tri-services and I do not think they have been dwelt upon, at least not to any great extent in this debate. I would list them, Mr. Speaker. First, the constantly increasing need for military professionalism; second, the value of competition and a system of checks and balances; third, efficiency of management and, fourth, the intangible but real value of esprit de corps.

Let us look at them one by one. First, the question of professionalism. There was a time not too long ago when a soldier could move from infantry to artillery to calvary, and even to aviation, with a minimum of training. An airman could transfer quite readily from pursuit to observation to bombardment duty. Machines of war were relatively simple. Peacetime forces were small, and wide oceans provided time for mobilization in the event of an emergency.

All this has now changed, Mr. Speaker. We need professionals today. We have to maintain large and instantly readied combat forces which can be moved swiftly to any trouble spot on the globe, or meet an attack against this country with no more than a few minutes warning.

May I cite a little practical example where I think professionalism has proven its worth. In the medical field years ago there was the family practitioner, the general practitioner, who was able to handle all phases of sickness and disorder. As medicine and science progressed and drugs became more varied and more difficult to administer, there developed the professional, the specialist. Since the arrival of the specialist in the field of medicine we have been able to give better service to mankind.

So I think it is with the Department of National Defence. They need specialists, those who can look after this section or that section. I am sure that by unification we will not promote professionalism.

[Mr. Hales.]

Mr. Hellyer: You integrated the doctors, you have just said so.

Mr. Hales: The professional produced by the services is just as essential at the level of the joint staff, and department of defence staff, as they are in the field, in my humble opinion. Their expert advice is indispensable in planning strategy, deployment of forces and weapons requirements. So to sum up this point very briefly, Mr. Speaker, military professionals, military equipment, military doctrine and their ultimate expression, effective military forces, must be developed for each of these media of warfare—air, land and sea.

As to the second point, competition, I am one of those who believe that the existence of three services, the army, the air force and the navy, serves to create a feeling of competition among them. This has been the lifeblood of the Canadian forces. I think it has been proven that wherever competition is stifled it generally follows that the rate of progress declines. It does not matter whether it is the army or business: When you stifle competition, progress declines. Unification will be bound to stifle competition.

In the militia, competition engenders new ideas and forces everybody to examine critically the old and accepted ways of doing things. We would not suggest for a minute, Mr. Speaker—I do not think anyone here would suggest this—that Ford, Chrysler and General Motors should be merged into one to form a non-competitive giant in order to produce a better and cheaper automobile. Yet this is what we are suggesting for our forces. Such a thing is not done in business; it has been tested there.

I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that it is just as unlikely that a merger of our three military services into a single service would produce better military thought and performance. However there is one qualification here. Competition must be controlled so that it creates a positive contribution to the nation's defence. I believe there are adequate controls on inter-service competition which should be exercised by the Department of National Defence.

The Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) in his speech indicated that competition was dangerous because we have already experienced some of the bitterness of inter-service rivalries. I do not think there is anything wrong with inter-service rivalry, inter-service bickering, or whatever you call it. We should remind ourselves that in this house where we are working for the good of the country we are often involved in bickering with each other when discussing various subjects. On the college campus such debate would be called discussion, or in the Supreme Court it would be called deliberation. So what is wrong if the members of the three armed services deliberate, discuss or even bicker between one service and another? I think that is all to the good and should be so, and I would hate to see this principle done away with.

My third reason for retaining the three services is efficiency of management. I expect someone right off the bat will immediately ask: How could you have that in three services as opposed to one service? I should like to give one or two illustrations of this. The personnel strength of the armed services is something like 105,000 in uniform, with more than 40,000 civilian personnel. This constitutes one of the largest organizations of people in the country, exceeding that of General Motors by as much as six times. Yet General Motors, like every large corporation, has found it desirable to organize semi-autonomous, even competitive divisions for effective management and greater profit.

For example, General Motors built a separate plant within its own business to manufacture the differentials for its cars. It has set up other companies under the direction of the main company to build other parts for its cars. Why do they do this, Mr. Speaker? It is because they have found they have greater control, more effectiveness, and better financial results are produced by dividing their organization into component parts under the ownership of the main company. Yet what do we want to do with our defence forces? We want to put them all together and create one great conglomeration over which we will not have the control that we exercise today.

Let me cite another example, that of the Thomson-owned daily press in this country. I do not know how many papers Lord Thomson owns in Canada—perhaps 30 or 40 of them. But has he brought them all together and said that they must do this or that? Has he unified the press? No. He has integrated parts of it, such as the finances, head office costs and other items; but as far as the individual papers are concerned, whether in my area or anybody else's area in which Thomson daily papers circulate, the editor of the paper is allowed to run things in the way he sees best for the community. Business organizations do not believe in unification; why have it in our three armed services?

Finally there is the question of esprit de corps, the value of which all of us recognize. We know there must be a great spirit within each organization. If you do not have that, Mr. Speaker, you are lacking one of the greatest binding factors. Throughout history the majority of men have always functioned most effectively as members of an identifiable group; that is beyond dispute. Men fight better when they are identified as a particular group.

This is particularly true of the military profession in which certain values are held superior to life itself. The spirit of unity, of brotherhood, is enhanced by tradition, by pride in one's organization and by a distinctive uniform which is a mark of membership. Now we want to throw that away.

The value of esprit cannot be measured with precision. I realize that no price tag can be placed on it; yet we all recognize its intrinsic contribution in the quality of armed forces. It is the heart of the true fighting force.

Mr. Churchill: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hales: Our minister wants to throw all these things aside, to disregard them. He wants to move in the opposite direction to which the oldest military countries in the world have decided to go. The United States Congress repeatedly has opposed unification. In 1945 they considered unification for the first time in the United States; in 1948 Congress opposed it. In 1949 the Hoover commission recommended it, yet Congress opposed it. President Eisenhower suggested unification; when the matter went to Congress the answer was no; they opposed it, because congressmen represented the viewpoints of all American states. They debated-discussed it, and in line with the thinking of the people of the United States they said: No, we will have no part of unification. Yet our minister, in Canada, knows better than the congressmen of the United States. He wants to bring unification to Canadian armed services.

Let us look at Great Britain. What has Great Britain done about unification? She has studied it, given it careful thought, but here again they have opposed it. I have here a quotation from the Central Organization for Defence Paper of July, 1963, page A3, paragraph 10. This was published just three years ago, and this is what they say over there, in summary, about whether they should adopt unification:

> The services must preserve their separate identities. In action they are increasingly interdependent. This interdependence must be expected to increase. Nevertheless all experience shows that the fighting spirit of the individual man in battle derives largely from his loyalty to his ship, his unit or his squadron. Services are an important vital factor in morale and fighting efficiency. This must be preserved.

That is what Great Britain says about unification. Yet our minister ignores the viewpoints of two tried and tested military powers of the world which have looked into the subject very carefully.

In a pre-election speech the minister said: "Sailors will always be sailors; soldiers will always be soldiers; airmen will always be airmen." I should like him to explain this. Let us take it to a committee where it could be explained. Maybe he could give us information there. How will sailors always be sailors? Let us consider these remarks of the associate minister as they appear at page 12537 of Hansard:

> This is the crux of the problem. From a single force containing land, sea and air elements—

I do not know whether he means sailors, soldiers or airmen. He refers to "elements". Continuing:

> —we must be in a position where we can detach the required portions necessary to fulfil a particular commitment. If the particular commitment requires a combination of land and sea elements,—

Again I think he means soldiers.

> —or land and tactical air elements, or just a land element we can provide this portion by detaching from the single force the strength and type of force required.

How in the name of goodness will you do this if you have unification? The minister said sailors will always be sailors, soldiers will be soldiers and airmen will be airmen. For the life of me I cannot understand this, and I am sure that thousands of Canadians do not understand it, either. They want to know more about unification, as we do. We want to move this to a committee where it can be studied in greater detail.

I say to the minister and his associate, "slow down and look". This matter is important for Canada. I, for one, can simply not see why we, as a young country would want to over-ride, to ignore what great military countries of the world have decided to do. The minister wants to rush into unification and do the opposite to the great military powers of the world.

[Mr. Hales.]

This concludes my remarks on unification along with the hope that the minister will send the bill to committee. I now move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Forrestall):

> That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "The further consideration of Bill C-243 be deferred until the principle thereof has been examined by the standing committees on national defence and external affairs meeting together."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Perhaps at this time I could ask for an expression of opinion from members of the house on the validity of this amendment.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the question of relevancy comes into the argument. If you will look at Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, page 396, under form No. 93, you will see the heading "On Second Reading". There are three methods of determining amendments on second reading, and you will notice that the first one reads as follows:

> The question being proposed "That Bill No. ..... intituled An Act ..... be now read a second time";
> Mr. ..... moves in amendment thereto, seconded by Mr. ....., that all the words after "That" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

This is the meat of the matter. I quote:

> The further consideration of this Bill be deferred until the principle thereof has,—

And this is the only portion where the present motion differs from the motion approved by Beauchesne. I read on:

> —by means of a Referendum, been submitted to and approved of by the electors of Canada.

That is the end of the quotation. That is a recognized form for moving an amendment on second reading. We are here suggesting the deferment of second reading until the bill has been examined by two committees sitting together.

The means by which it is done are immaterial. It is the deferment of the bill until that study has been made. The amendment is based directly upon the form approved by Beauchesne.

• (9:40 p.m.)

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Hales) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on national defence.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson). Had I voted, I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Speaker, I was paired on both votes. On the first vote I would have voted against the amendment and on the second vote I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, I was paired. Had I voted I would have voted yea and nay in that order.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). Had I voted, I would have voted the same as the hon. member for Prince.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, would someone on the government side tell us what business we will be taking up tomorrow.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, the first business will be item 121, second reading of Bill C-261, an Act to establish the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation; then, item No. 62, house again in committee of the whole on Bill C-204, an Act to provide for the establishment of a Canadian Film Development Corporation; then item No. 116, house in committee of the whole on the resolution to introduce a measure to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act. Again, continuing in the same optimistic vein, we would consider item No. 120, second reading of Bill S-55, an act to provide relief in certain cases against loss or hardship suffered as a result of interruptions of normal postal services.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—ABSOLUTE PARDON FOR FIRST OFFENCE

Mr. Alcide Simard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I want to re-read the question I put to the Minister of Justice and Attorney General (Mr. Cardin) last January 18:

Could the hon. minister tell us whether his department intends to exercise its prerogative of absolute pardon in the case of a person who has committed only one offence during his life?

In the few minutes at my disposal, I wish to put forward the main reasons which motivated my question.

At a conference on criminality, under the sponsorship of a Quebec welfare council, some outstanding experts on criminology agreed unanimously that, in some cases, a criminal record may stand in the way of rehabilitation.

The members of that panel were Messrs. Julien Chouinard, Yvan Migneault, Quebec's deputy minister of justice, as well as Messrs. Thomas Tremblay and Noël Dorion. Along side those distinguished lawyers were seen doctors, social workers, psychologists, probation officers, welfare officials, even police officers.

Last November 26 in Le Soleil one could read this:

> The chief justice of the Court of Sessions of the Peace, Mr. Thomas Tremblay, and a well-known criminal lawyer, Mr. Noël Dorion, deplored last night that the federal cabinet is no longer called upon to exercise its privilege of absolute pardon which makes it possible to erase completely the criminal record of a citizen who, for instance, has committed only one offence in his life.

At that conference, Mr. Dorion pointed out that as a Conservative member in Ottawa he had submitted a bill to destroy the record of an offender who had not committed any offence over a period of five years.

Since the hon. members of the time had boycotted his bill, his deduction was that only public opinion could conquer the inertia of certain members of parliament, when confronted with such important matters.

Mr. Yvan Migneault, Associate Deputy Minister of Justice, quoted a provision in our Criminal Code which, according to him, discourages rehabilitation completely; it is the section dealing with persons convicted of impaired driving. A $50 fine is the penalty for a first offence, but if there is a recurrence, the law provides for 14 days compulsory imprisonment; I submit that, instead of spending 14 days in jail, the man's driving licence should be suspended for two years.

Another section of the Criminal Code provides for imprisonment when a convicted person is unable to pay the fine; this measure was also labelled discriminatory by two members of the panel.

Mr. Dorion explained that a convicted person who could afford to pay a $50 fine, for example, did not have to go to jail, whereas a poor person could not get out of it.

In view of the opinion expressed by such distinguished lawyers and criminologists, I feel we can reasonably say that some of the laws in our present judicial system are archaic and outdated, and that it is high time for parliament to draft legislation which will eliminate all types of discrimination and place the emphasis on rehabilitation of the citizen who makes an unfortunate mistake, perhaps only once in his lifetime.

What are the views of the hon. minister in this respect?

[English]

• (10:40 p.m.)

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Solicitor General (Mr. Pennell) I would like to say that pardons, as the hon. gentleman is aware, may be granted pursuant to the letters patent constituting the office of the Governor General, and under section 655 (2) of the Criminal Code.

By well established practice the advice tendered to the Governor General in regard to pardons is regarded as confidential and is not disclosed except in very exceptional circumstances. Every application for pardon is considered on its individual merits. Among other things, the age of the applicant at the time of the offence or offences, the nature of the offence or offences, the amount of time that has elapsed since the offence or offences were committed, and the subsequent conduct of the offender are taken into consideration. It may be of interest to the hon. member to know that the policy in respect of pardons generally is under consideration in the department at the present time.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—FAILURE TO PRODUCE FILM ON CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Beauharnois-Salaberry): Mr. Speaker, when I put a question to the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) last Friday, with regard to the National Film Board and the availability of recent films on the Canadian confederation, I knew beforehand that my question was not urgent as required under the standing orders of the house. However, since I find this lack inexcusable, I wanted to raise the matter right in the house in order to give more weight to my representations, in the hope that remedial action would be taken without delay.

Mr. Speaker, it is unthinkable, in my opinion, that in this very centennial year of confederation, the National Film Board authorities have failed to provide for one or several films on confederation and the Confederation Act.

That is why I suggest immediate measures should be taken to remedy the situation right away and to start production on some films of the Confederation pact, of Confederation, of preceding events of the development of our political system toward the federal system as well as of the British North America Act, its adoption and finally, of the various stages of the Confederation pact from 1867 to 1967.

Throughout the year, Mr. Speaker, it is hoped that the public will take part in civic, artistic and sports events to mark Canada's centennial. Should not, at the very basis of such activities, a fair programme of information have been initiated to make Canadians cognizant of their political system of the ties that bind them together and of the efforts made by our leaders to ensure the development of this association of citizens?

Of course, the National Film Board has some more or less recent documentaries on the Fathers of Confederation and on certain Canadian politicians. Furthermore, the Film Board has a number of film strips on our constitutional evolution and on our system of government at the federal, provincial and municipal level, but these are caricature films without handbooks or commentaries.

I think it would have been easy for the Film Board to prepare a program of film productions before centennial year, so as to make 16 mm. synchronized sound films available to the public, to schools, and even to members of parliament. Within the framework of an educational centennial year program, the Film Board could perhaps have prepared 30-minute films on the events which led to the signing of the British North America Act, covering perhaps the period from 1860 to 1867, as well as other films explaining the Canadian constitution, the political evolution which took place during the last hundred years, our parliamentary system in the country and perhaps particularly in Ottawa, the proceedings themselves, the responsibilities of the different levels of government, and, finally, the main events which occurred in Canada during these years.

Mr. Speaker, I do not mean to disparage the work of the National Film Board. I know it has prepared films which will be distributed across the country for centennial year. I wish to congratulate the Board particularly for its last production, called "Helicopter Canada", which allows us to travel clear across the country and to see our cities, our panoramas and our scenery.

I congratulate them in general for most of their contributions, and it is precisely because they deserve to be congratulated for the fine work they have accomplished that they should undertake today, or as soon as possible, the program I suggest.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the member for Bonaventure (Mr. Béchard), in his capacity as parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State, will make the necessary representations to the proper authorities, and I thank him warmly.

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, after hearing on January 17 last the member for Beauharnois-Salaberry (Mr. Laniel) express his concern with regard to films which the National Film Board should have or should not have produced with regard to the centennial of Confederation and especially a certain reproduction of the ceremonies surrounding the signature of the confederative pact. After hearing the stirring words of my good friend of Beauharnois-Salaberry tonight, I must say that the government may be rightly proud of the enthusiasm of a member for one of the Quebec ridings most concerned with the celebrations, throughout the country, of the centennial of our Confederation, the success of which we are happy to celebrate this year.

However, Mr. Speaker, in order to do justice to the National Film Board and to the government of Canada, but more particularly to the National Film Board, it would be proper to point out to the worthy representative of Beauharnois-Salaberry, that to think of making a film about Confederation, about the signing of the confederative pact, was in itself a rather far-fetched and ambiguous idea since in 1867 the cinema industry was in its infancy.

It would also be proper to remind the hon. member that there is a series of five historical films on Canada, of 28 minutes each, intended for television, in French and in English, bearing the general title "Our History Makers". The five films are entitled as follows: Sir John A. Macdonald, The Fantastic

Intuition; Alexander Galt, The Unrepentant Idealist; George-Étienne Cartier, The Quebec Lion; Charles Tupper, the Magnanimous; and Louis-Hippolyte LaFontaine.

Moreover, it might be well to add that—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry I have to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, allow me to add—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The time allotted the hon. member is over.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL—SUGGESTED COMPLIMENTARY TRIPS TO EXPO FOR OLDER CANADIANS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, two days ago, as recorded at page 12459 of Hansard for January 31, I asked the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) a question in which I made the suggestion that the centennial commission might be asked to arrange for complimentary trips to Expo for Canadians 80 years of age and over. As hon. members will recall, the asking of my question seemed to attract a bit of banter. I did not mind this because it at least had the effect of drawing attention to my question. I am sorry that the Secretary of State cannot be here tonight, after the arrangements that were made in public, but she has extended her apology to me and has indicated that she is well represented by her parliamentary secretary.

I should like for just a moment or two, Mr. Speaker, to press the point I made by way of a suggestion two days ago. In this centennial year we are trying to honour our older people in a number of ways, but to a large extent the honours that we pay to them are quite formal. I think, for example, of the framed certificates that are being presented to those who are 100 years of age or over, and there are other ways in which tributes are being paid to our older Canadians.

It seems to me it would be a good idea to do something concrete for some of these people who have seen most of the century of our history, and have helped to build Canada into what it is today. It was for this reason I suggested that Canadians who are 80 years of age or over might be given a complimentary trip to Expo. Someone may say this would cost a lot of money. I suggest that a lot of money is being spent on travel in this centennial year. I think it is a good idea that young people and others are being facilitated in their travels about our country. But if we are finding it possible to help our younger people to travel, why not make it possible for older Canadians as well?

I realize that many people 80 years of age or over would not be able to make the trip because of their health or for other reasons. But surely some arrangements could be made for those who could make the trip to get to Expo to see what is going on there. I know that Expo is largely a case of emphasizing what is happening now, and what is going to happen in the future. There is therefore an emphasis on getting young people there to see it. However, do not our older people who have helped to bring this country to where it is today also have the right to see what may be ahead in Canada's second century? I recognize that the confederation train is being taken around the country so that people can see it in various parts of this land. In the main, when they see the train they see the history of the past. I think our older people are not only interested in the past, in the last 100 years, but they are interested in the next century as well.

In so far as Expo has been billed as a glimpse into the future, I think it would be a very fitting tribute for the country to make provision for as many as possible of our older people to see what is being put together in the St. Lawrence river at the city of Montreal. I hardly expect the parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State to give the final answer to this suggestion tonight, but I trust he will at least indicate that his minister will be prepared to pass this suggestion on to the centennial commission, in the hope that the commission might give it favourable consideration.

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I first want to express the regret and apology of the Secretary of State for not having been able to keep her date tonight with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. In his question to the Secretary of State on January 31, as reported at page 12459 of Hansard, the hon. member asked:

> Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State. If she decides to give me a one word answer, as she did to the hon. member for Winnipeg South, I hope it will be "yes" rather than "no".

The minister answered:

> I have to confess to the house that I have been waiting 40 years for the chance to say "yes" to a question, but this is not it.

Fortunately, Mr. Speaker, I too am not in a position tonight to answer "yes" in the sense used by the Secretary of State in her answer the other day.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in short, the hon. Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) is quite sympathetic to the hon. member's suggestion so that our older people, 80 and over, may visit Expo '67.

However, I must say to the hon. member that no funds have been appropriated for that purpose in the budget of the trade and commerce department or the centennial commission, to organize such free trips for our old people, although the government would like to give to all the Canadian people the financial means to see that memorable and unique event for us, Canadians.

However, I shall be glad to pass on to the hon. Secretary of State the views of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, which, I am convinced, meet the approval of every member, so that she may make the necessary representation to the centennial commission, even if it is a little late, in order to find out its views on the matter.

Before concluding my remarks, I should like to add that the old people who will be 68 and over during Expo '67, thanks to the policy of this government, will have more financial means to visit Expo '67 since this thoughtful government has granted them a $30 a month increase.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 11 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, February 3, 1967

The house met at 11 a.m.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Sixth, seventh and eighth reports of special joint committee on the public service of Canada—Mr. Richard.

[Note: Text of the foregoing reports appears in today's Votes and Proceedings.]

WOMEN

ANNOUNCEMENT OF ESTABLISHMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION TO STUDY STATUS

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the house that the government has decided to establish a royal commission on the status of women. The chairman of the commission will be Mrs. John Bird. Other members of the commission will be announced when their appointments have been completed, which I hope will be over the week end.

The royal commission will be asked to inquire into and report on the status of women in Canada and to recommend what steps might be taken by the federal government to ensure their equality with men in all aspects of Canadian society. Its findings will, of course, have to take into account the division of legislative powers between the federal and provincial governments under the constitution.

The commissioners will be free to look into such matters as they feel are relevant, and in particular the following areas: Laws and practices under federal jurisdiction concerning the political rights of women; the present and potential role of women in the Canadian labour force, including the special problems of married women in employment and measures that might be taken under federal jurisdiction to help in meeting them; measures that might be taken under federal jurisdiction to permit the better use of the skills and education of women, including the special retraining requirements of married women who wish to re-enter professional or skilled employment; federal labour laws and regulations in their application to women; laws, practices and policies concerning the employment and promotion of women in the federal civil service, by federal crown corporations and by federal agencies; federal taxation pertaining to women; marriage and divorce; the position of women under the criminal law; and immigration and citizenship laws, policies and practices with respect to women.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the right hon. Prime Minister on this announcement. I am extremely sorry that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) is unavoidably absent today; I am sure she would have liked to offer her congratulations, because this is a subject which she has been pursuing for some time.

I think the government's decision to appoint this commission is most commendable. I am very glad to see that the influence of the Secretary of State has prevailed upon her male colleagues to take this very progressive step. We have not had an opportunity to examine the commission's terms of reference, but judging from the remarks the Prime Minister made they seemed to be fairly comprehensive.

I hope the terms of reference will spell out in particular the problems of working women and working mothers; the whole problem of nursery schools; the problem of women who have to hire baby sitters and housekeepers, and the enactment of laws enabling them to charge this as an income tax deduction. There are a great many problems in our modern society which women have to face today which were not common 10 or 20 years ago. I hope the terms of reference will be wide enough to allow a full investigation into the problems which confront modern working women in order that they may have fair treatment, equal to that of men in our society.

May I say to the Prime Minister that the selection of the personnel of this commission is extremely important, and I hope the government will keep in mind not only the professional women and the business executives but also membership on that commission of women who understand the point of view of women in the labour force and the particular problems which confront them at this time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

I am sure nothing but good can come from the investigation the Prime Minister has announced. I hope it will result in some legislation being presented to the house which will help to give women a status equal to that of men in our society.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I find it a very pleasant task indeed to comment on the announcement the Prime Minister just made. I want to make my remarks very brief, but I do not wish to let the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam have the credit for being the only member on this side of the house interested in the rights of women.

I believe the announcement made by the Prime Minister will be welcomed not only by the women of Canada but by all Canadians, because I think it covers an area which has been neglected so far, namely the task of ensuring that the rights of mothers and of working women in this country are equitable in every respect.

I wish to say to the Prime Minister that I believe it is particularly necessary that this commission investigate both the federal and provincial laws to make sure they are applicable equally to men and women; and this applies also to the taxation laws which the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has already mentioned. I will just add that I think it is a good thing this action has been taken, and I believe nothing but good can come out of it. I commend the Prime Minister for making this decision.

NORTH VIET NAM—COMPLAINT RESPECTING CANADIAN SALE OF ARMS TO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs but in his absence I will direct it to the Prime Minister. Has the government of Canada as yet made any reply to the accusations of North Viet Nam concerning the sale of arms to the United States by this country?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the North Vietnamese government has not sent any protest to the international commission because the matter referred to, the alleged export of arms, is not a matter that comes within the ambit of the Geneva agreement. What was received by our commissioner was a communication addressed by the chief of the North Vietnamese liaison mission in charge of relations with the international commission, commenting upon and requesting clarification of Canadian policy as enunciated by me in this house on January 18 with respect to our relations with the United States on this matter. We are considering that communication, which was forwarded to us by the commissioner, and we hope to reply to it as soon as possible.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

AUTOMOBILE AGREEMENT—MEETING WITH UNION RESULTING FROM LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I direct a question to the Minister of Industry. Yesterday he made reference to the fact that a meeting had been proposed by the United Auto Workers with the government regarding the Canada-United States auto agreement. In the absence of the Minister of Labour I want to ask him if there has been a protest from the United Automobile Workers because the meeting which is to take place among representatives of the union, the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Industry and the Minister of Manpower has been set for February 8 from 12.30 to 1 p.m. I believe the union is somewhat concerned about the short space of time which is being allotted for the discussion of this matter. I want to ask the minister if he does not consider that a matter of such great significance, affecting thousands of auto workers, ought to be given a greater length of time for discussion?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, representations were made by the United Automobile Workers to the Minister of Labour suggesting that perhaps rather than having the meeting from 12.30 to 1 p.m., it might start earlier following the presentation of the Congress brief to cabinet. I have not been able to communicate with the Minister of Labour in this regard, but I have every expectation the matter will be satisfactorily resolved.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the minister if he can assure the house that some attempt will be made either to have a much longer meeting or to set aside another day next week when this matter can be gone into thoroughly because of the effect it has on the workers concerned?

Mr. Drury: I think the government is as interested as anyone in making sure that adequate time is provided for an appropriate hearing of representations.

Mr. Douglas: Does the minister consider that to be half an hour?

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): In view of the headline in yesterday's Toronto Daily Star which reads "More Lay-offs Face General Motors Workers in Oshawa", will the minister not take this matter seriously and refer the auto pact to a standing committee of the house for consideration?

Mr. Speaker: I think the question is argumentative. When the hon. member asks if the matter will be considered seriously and referred to a committee, I suggest the question becomes argumentative.

Mr. Starr: He does not take it seriously; he will not even reply.

RESEARCH

REQUEST FOR INCREASED GRANTS FOR MEDICAL RESEARCH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if his department has been advised by the Association of Canadian Medical Colleges that four or any other number of these colleges may lose their accreditation as the result of a lack of research facilities.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker, we have received no such information. The report upon which I believe this question is based is, in general terms, an inaccurate report.

[Later:]

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): I have a question for the Prime Minister. I should like to ask the right hon. gentleman whether as part of the arrangements for centennial year a program will be announced or instituted for the support of medical research, particularly in the areas of heart disease and cancer research. I ask this question bearing in mind that the government came under fire from some of those attending the meeting which was held in the Chateau Laurier a couple of weeks ago.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I think when the hon. gentleman is in a position to look at the expenditures of the government which will be announced for the forthcoming year he will find that there is a considerable increase in the fund to be devoted to research generally, including medical research.

FARM MACHINERY

REPLIES FROM COMPANIES RESPECTING INCREASED PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent (Ont.)): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. A short while ago, in answer to a question concerning a rise in the prices of farm machinery, the minister indicated quite rightly that he would not be in a position to answer until he had communicated with the major farm machinery companies. Is the minister in a position this morning to indicate to the house the average amount of the rise in machinery prices and the reasons given for this increase?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have seen all the main companies involved in the business and I hope very shortly to have a report to give to the house in this regard, which will include an answer to the question asked by the hon. member.

Mr. Lawrence Watson (Assiniboia): A supplementary question. Could the minister table the replies he received to his inquiry about this increase from some of the machinery companies, and would he tell the house what he intends to do to hold down these price increases?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I hope to embody an answer to the hon. member's question and to deal with the advisability of tabling the reports, if such is deemed to be the case, in my reply to the house.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION TO MAINTENANCE OF STRANDED WHALE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the efforts of the government of Newfoundland to save an 80-ton fin whale from starvation by paying up to $1,000 for herring to feed it, is it the intention of the federal Minister of Fisheries or his department to make any financial contribution toward feeding the whale and author Farley Mowat while he is looking after it?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would not think this was a question of national urgency.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FINANCE

CANADIAN OWNERSHIP OF INDUSTRY—STATEMENT BY STUART KEATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and arises out of the subject discussed here yesterday, namely the Prime Minister's speech concerning Canadian ownership of Canadian industry.

I was wondering whether the right hon. gentleman would care to comment on the statement made by or attributed to his good friend Mr. Stuart Keate, who has acted as adviser to the government, to the effect that Canada provides the best proof of United States integrity in international affairs and, in so saying, asserted that "it is true we have some economic nationalists but any country that can survive three wars, floods, rock slides and other natural disasters can survive Walter Gordon."

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Keate is well known for his sense of humour, Mr. Speaker.

DIVORCE

APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSION ON WOMEN—EFFECT ON POSSIBLE LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister following his announcement about the royal commission on the status of women, and that the commission will study the question of marriage and divorce. Does this mean that any legislation concerning divorce will be put off until that commission reports?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. I think it would be quite undesirable to have terms of reference for a commission of this kind which did not include these matters. However, this does not mean that action cannot be taken before the commission completes its work.

NATURAL RESOURCES

OFFSHORE MINERAL RESOURCES—REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. I should like to ask the minister whether he can inform the house when the supreme court will commence hearing argument on the reference of the constitutional jurisdiction over the resources of the continental shelf.

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have been informed that the supreme court will hear argument on that question around March 6.

AGRICULTURE

MILK—INQUIRY AS TO NATIONAL SCHOOL POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture and arises out of the recent meeting of the dairy farmers of Canada and a recommendation they made. I wonder whether the minister could tell the house when some action might be taken toward the implementation of a national school milk policy for this country.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, any question with respect to a national school milk policy would be a constitutional one. Schools and their operation are matters which come under provincial jurisdiction; hence the development of a national school milk policy would require provincial co-operation.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I do realize that but I am wondering whether the minister, his department or his officials have given consideration to the possibility of having some federal-provincial consultations to effect a badly needed program of this type.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy to consider the hon. member's suggestion in this regard.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Minister of Agriculture how many provinces he will discuss this matter with?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder whether this question is urgent. I do not think a question asking how many provinces the Minister of Agriculture will discuss a certain problem with is urgent.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, I think it is a fair question to ask, as the minister has said that consultation is necessary before anything can be done because of the constitutional question involved, and the pledges made to the Canadian people during election campaigns regarding this matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nasserden: I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has he discussed with the provincial ministers of health a national school milk policy?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

SUGGESTED CENTENNIAL STAMP HONOURING SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Enns (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. On January 11, Sir John A. Macdonald's birthday, the department issued a commemorative postage stamp which did not refer to the first prime minister. In response to my question the Postmaster General said the suggestion to issue a commemorative stamp for Canada's first prime minister would be taken under consideration. We now notice that a new series of centennial regular issue postage stamps will go on sale on February 8. On them I find no reference to Sir John A. Macdonald, and I am rather surprised that Canada should advertise the Alaska highway in this way. I still would have some satisfaction in advertising Sir John A. Macdonald.

Mr. Speaker: I am still waiting for the question.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST FOR EXERCISE OF CLEMENCY DURING ROYAL VISIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General and relates to the coming visit of Her Majesty and Prince Philip. I ask the Solicitor General whether the government intends to grant amnesty, to remit time of inmates of federal penitentiaries, as has been done in past years.

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Trois-Rivières raised the same question and I advised the house I would take notice of it. I must reply in the same way to the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Howard: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister not recall that long before the Christmas recess he gave us the same answer?

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): My question is for the Prime Minister. During centennial year, when we shall appropriately emphasize Canada's history and traditions, including heroism and sacrifice in wartime, has the Prime Minister arranged for a suitable ceremony to commemorate his approval of the plan to destroy the identity of the Royal Canadian Navy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—REQUESTS FOR AID TO WAR VICTIMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Prime Minister has a reply today to my question of yesterday about the Quakers and their request for financial assistance.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I looked into the question after I left the house yesterday. I believe the reply will be completed over the week end and I hope to make it available on Monday, or at the latest on Tuesday.

TRADE

FRUIT—REQUEST FOR TARIFF ON IMPORTS FROM U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): At the beginning of the week I asked the Prime Minister about the position the fruit growers find themselves in. I asked whether action was being taken, based on the Prime Minister's promise last fall in Hamilton, whether higher tariffs were being considered to protect the fruit industry in Canada. Has the Prime Minister an answer?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I referred that matter to the minister concerned but not in the context of anything I said last autumn. I will check with him about the reply.

Inquiries of the Ministry

AIR POLLUTION

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Considering that President Johnson has asked the United States congress to pass an "Air Quality Act of 1967", and considering that the atmosphere of our two countries is indivisible, is the government considering bringing in legislation this year, in order that Canada might participate in the campaign to eliminate air pollution?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I will be very glad to look into that question, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR BEETS—INQUIRY AS TO SUPPORT PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. A short time ago the minister said he hoped to announce by February, the support price for sugar beets for the 1967 year. May I ask the minister whether he has an announcement to make in this regard and, if not, when he will be in a position to make this announcement?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): We hope to make this announcement soon.

RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING PERMANENT MORTGAGE PLAN FOR DAIRY FARMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. At a recent meeting of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture held in Winnipeg it was brought to the attention of the minister that Canada might soon face a serious shortage of dairy products. Has the minister given consideration to the suggestion by the dairy farmers that a permanent mortgage plan be established to perpetuate the dairy farm operation by enabling it to be handed down from father to son?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): All recommendations from the Dairy Farmers of Canada will certainly be given serious consideration by the government in formulating dairy policy for the ensuing year.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Is it not true that the government's present dairy policy represents a permanent mortgage plan as far as dairy farmers are concerned?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

REPORT OF YOUTH COUNCIL ON PROPOSED YOUTH SEMINAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State with reference to the youth parliament project for centennial year. Since an ad hoc committee of the house strongly recommended such a project, and since time is getting along, may I ask whether the hon. lady has received the expected report from the youth council and whether, if there is to be a long delay, the government intends to proceed with a youth project this year?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I promised members of the house that I would call the ad hoc committee together. My parliamentary secretary has been engaged in the broadcasting committee somewhat intensively, but I expect a meeting will take place some time next week.

Mr. Douglas: Has the minister a report from the youth council to put before the ad hoc committee or some further recommendation with reference to a youth parliament or some other youth project?

Miss LaMarsh: No. We have had an application from a youth group and this will be considered by the ad hoc committee; it has not yet been considered by the government.

PILOTAGE

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Apropos of today's announcement that there is to be a royal commission on the rights and status of women, I wonder if I may ask the Minister of Transport what has happened to the long lost report of the royal commission on pilotage.

Hon J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): One of the hon. member's colleagues, the hon. member for New Westminster, asked that question yesterday and the answer is the same today as it was yesterday. The hon. member may not have noticed.

EXPO '67

REQUEST FOR MORTGAGE ASSISTANCE FOR MOTEL CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R.-E. Régimbal (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): In the absence of the Minister of Labour who is responsible for C.M.H.C., and of the Minister of Trade and Commerce who is responsible for Expo, I should like to address my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that several projects for the building of motels on the south shore of the St. Lawrence opposite Montreal cannot be completed because of lack of mortgage funds, thereby depriving visitors to Expo of millions of bed nights of accommodation, does the government intend to take any action to relieve the situation?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think this would be a very interesting topic for discussion at ten o'clock.

FINANCE

MERCANTILE BANK—POSSIBLE CHANGE IN BANK ACT PROVISIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance and ask him whether the government is contemplating any change in the restrictive legislation relating to the Mercantile Bank as a result of the changed attitude referred to by the minister in evidence before the committee yesterday. May I also ask in what circumstances the government would consider changing the present restrictive clauses in the Bank Act.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): I have been engaged in an interesting discussion—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure the hon. gentleman will recognize that this matter is now before the committee. I do not think this question should be accepted.

Mr. Starr: Then I will ask another question. Would the minister recommend the purchase of Mercantile shares to prospective speculators?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

POWER

PROPOSED TEST CONNECTING U.S. AND CANADIAN SYSTEMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): My question is also addressed to the Minister of Finance. In the event that the test to be held on February 7, interconnecting the major power systems in the eastern and western United States and in Canada, is successful, does the government intend to make this massive grid permanent?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is obviously hypothetical.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

MAINTENANCE OF CIVILIAN CONTROL OVER ARMED FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): My question is for the Minister of National Defence. During his term of office has there been a deliberately planned coup by the senior officers of the armed services or by any one of those officers to supersede civilian control?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Even if the minister is anxious to reply to the question I doubt whether it is acceptable. It is certainly not an urgent question, if the hon. gentleman is referring to things which have happened; and for that reason at least I do not see that it can be accepted.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): On a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: The question has been ruled out of order but if the minister wishes to rise on a question of privilege he has the right to do so.

Mr. Hellyer: The only coup I know of is the one which was so well planned and executed by the hon. gentleman last night.

Mr. Speaker: Obviously the answer given by the minister by way of the question of privilege indicates that I was right in the first instance.

Mr. Churchill: I should like to raise a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You ruled my question out of order as not being urgent, or not being serious. I cannot think of anything more serious. I was referring to a statement which was made by the minister on January 31; and if there is any question in this country of any attempted coup by the military, in the past or in the present, to supersede civilian control, it would warrant not only investigation by this house but perhaps investigation by a royal commission. I wonder whether on reflection Your Honour would not permit my question to be considered.

Mr. Speaker: I certainly could not prevent the hon. gentleman from asking the question, but I can still say it is out of order.

WOMEN

INQUIRY AS TO PERSONNEL OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): A brief question to the Prime Minister arising from my continuing interest in the fair sex. I should like to ask whether there will be any male appointments to the royal commission he mentioned earlier.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we would like this to be a mixed commission and if the hon. gentleman would like to give up his seat and participate he would be an admirable commissioner.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

GERALDTON, ONT.—WAIVING OF WAITING PERIOD FOR MOBILITY GRANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. K. Andras (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. So there may be no doubt arising from the exchange between him and another hon. member as recorded at page 12556 of yesterday's Hansard, will the minister confirm that the four month waiting period for mobility grants will be waived for employees laid off as a result of the gold mine closing in Geraldton, Ontario?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the general policy remains the same. That means that normally workers have to wait for a four month period before obtaining these grants, but in the case of the mine at Geraldton it was decided that this period would be waived.

[Mr. Churchill.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF ESTIMATES FOR 1967-68

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the number of times we have been told that certain questions will be answered when we learn about next year's expenditures, could the Minister of Finance or the President of the Treasury Board tell us when the estimates for 1967-68 will be tabled?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): If the present session is completed by March 10, as is hoped, I will table the estimates immediately the new session opens. If not, I am aiming for a date around March 13.

COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF ARMED FORCES UNIFICATION BILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence and ask him whether he can tell the house when he intends bringing before the standing committee on defence the measure which received second reading last evening?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): This is a matter which is entirely within the purview of the chairman of the committee and the committee itself. It was referred to the committee last night immediately after second reading, as the hon. member knows, and I hope the committee can begin meeting early next week.

PROVISION FOR CONSIDERATION OF PRIVATE MEMBERS' BILLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question to all intents and purposes is a point of order and can be addressed to the Prime Minister. In view of the large number of public bills sponsored by private members now on the order paper, some 164 in all, and in view of the fact that some of them have been on the order paper since the opening of the session last year, may I ask if the government is interested in finding a way to provide time for discussions of these bills, or will it tell members that the procedure of putting private bills on the order paper is no longer of use? I might mention that I have a bill on the order paper which was No. 18 or No. 24 on the list when first introduced, and now stands at No. 13.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the house rules are in existence and cannot be changed except by agreement in parliament. However, I would hope that when the committee to deal with the rules and procedures is set up next week this is one matter that will be high on its agenda.

CANADA DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION

AUTHORIZATION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF CORPORATIONS, MAKING OF LOANS, ETC.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-261, to establish the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned when moving the resolution preceding this bill, events have made it desirable to move more quickly than was originally intended. The government now feels that it is most desirable to proceed with this legislation at once and, after approval, to proclaim the Canada Deposit Insurance Act with the least possible delay.

It would be undesirable for federal institutions to be insured earlier than insurance would be available to provincial institutions. To expedite making insurance available to provincial institutions it is contemplated that the deposit insurance corporation would be prepared to cover all the existing deposit accepting trust and loan companies of a province if the province concerned so requested, even before the corporation has made an examination into the affairs of the individual companies and ascertained if they were eligible for insurance.

The provinces will be expected in return to enter into appropriate financial arrangements to ensure that any losses which occur as a result of the deposit insurance scheme having become effective prior to inspection will not become the obligation of those institutions which are in a sound position and are contributing to the deposit insurance fund. This would simply be a recognition by the provinces of their responsibility for provincially incorporated institutions prior to the applicability of federal deposit insurance.

It is not our intention in any event, Mr. Speaker, to insist on uniform national standards as a prerequisite to entry into the insurance plan, but to work toward higher minimum standards over a reasonable period of time with institutions which have the desire and capacity to improve their financial standing.

I realize that by going ahead at once on this proposal we will not have as full consultation with the provinces before the legislation comes into effect as we had originally hoped to have. It is not intended that passage of the legislation will close the door to further discussion with the provinces, and I will continue to give serious consideration to any suggestions that may be made. However, in the light of the views that have been expressed in the house and in the committee which is considering the bank bills, the government has reached the conclusion that we should not delay the availability of deposit insurance while further discussions with the provinces proceed.

There are three major objectives for the proposed system of deposit insurance. The primary objective, of course, is to ensure the safety of the deposits of small investors who are usually not in a position to judge for themselves the financial soundness of the constitutions to which they entrust their savings.

Second, the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation will also have power to function as a lender of last resort for deposit accepting institutions, providing needed liquidity at times of crisis when such institutions may not have access to their normal sources of liquidity.

Third, member institutions will be subject to inspection. It will be an objective to bring about a gradual improvement in the minimum financial standards of deposit acceptance institutions across the country. There will be a genuinely sympathetic and helpful attitude toward institutions which wish to cooperate in this objective.

Membership in the deposit insurance plan will be obligatory for chartered banks, Quebec savings banks and those federal trust and loan companies which accept deposits from the public. Provincially incorporated trust and loan companies which accept deposits from the public will be eligible to apply for membership if they have the consent of the province concerned.

It is not proposed that deposit insurance be available to credit unions and Caisses Populaires, which are co-operative institutions dealing with their members rather than public deposit accepting institutions. To a considerable extent mutual insurance schemes have already been established for the local credit unions. At the federal level there is the Co-operative Credit Associations Act, which provides for the incorporation by special act of the parliament of Canada of co-operative credit societies.

Amendments to the Co-operative Credit Associations Act are presently under consideration. Among the matters that will be reviewed is whether a lender of last resort facility is needed in connection with the operation of these societies. As I have already mentioned in the house, I have asked my departmental officials to look at the more general questions surrounding the adequacy of the control that now exists in the field of finance companies, and I have indicated that we are willing to confer with the provinces on this matter if they so wish.

Except in the matter of the maximum size of deposit to be insured, namely $20,000, it has been thought best to leave some room for flexibility in the definition of insurable deposits. It is proposed, therefore, to define the kinds of deposits eligible for insurance under the by-laws of the corporation which will require the approval of the governor in council. All the usual kinds of savings and current deposit accounts will be insured. In addition, it is the intention to include special forms of term and notice deposits and deposit-like instruments which are issued by some institutions.

It may be desirable to ensure a clear, public understanding of what is insured and what is not insured by bringing about some clarification in the names used to describe certain deposit instruments. But so far as the existing situation is concerned, the intention is to go as far as possible to make insurance available for all types of deposits and deposit-like instruments provided only that they are not instruments clearly in the category of securities rather than deposits.

It is expected that the greatest need for the lender of last resort function of the deposit insurance corporation is likely to arise in relation to the demand or quite short term deposits of insured institutions. To the extent to which the liabilities of financial institutions are of a long term character, given good management they should be able to protect themselves by holding an appropriate distribution of assets. However, in the case of institutions with very short term liabilities, it is difficult for them both to make any profit on their operations and to keep enough short term assets to protect themselves against all emergencies. Even if they maintain high standards of financial management, events taking place elsewhere in the financial system, perhaps outside Canada, can have repercussions that produce serious liquidity problems for them.

Turning now to specific measures involved in the proposal to establish the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, I shall just mention the major features.

First, it is proposed to establish a new crown corporation to be called the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation. It will be under the management of a board of five directors, including a chairman of proven financial experience from outside the public service to be appointed by governor in council. The other four directors will be the governor of the Bank of Canada, the deputy minister of finance, the superintendent of insurance and the inspector general of banks.

Second, parliament is asked to provide the $10 million share capital of the corporation, and a deposit insurance fund will be built up out of premiums of one thirtieth of one per cent per annum on the insured deposits of member institutions. When the fund has reached adequate proportions it is provided that the rate of premiums may be reduced under certain circumstances.

Third, the corporation will invest its share capital and the deposit insurance fund in securities of the government of Canada. Earnings on these investments will be available to meet operating expenses and, if there is sufficient net income, to pay dividends on its share capital.

Fourth, to enable the corporation to act as lender of last resort to its members in case of need, either by lending on the security of members' assets or purchasing such assets when that is appropriate, the government will be authorized to make advances to the corporation up to a total of $500 million. Any such advances would be expected to be repaid by the corporation from recoveries of the assistance provided to its members or from the deposit insurance fund.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, several days ago we had a relatively short debate at the resolution stage of this legislative measure which concluded with a lot of pushing and prodding of the government by the opposition. The government had not made up its mind, as it indicates it has now, that this bill should be brought on at this stage and referred to a committee. As a matter of fact the original idea was that following the resolution stage the bill would be introduced so the people concerned and the public would have an opportunity to study the matter before it was dealt with at the next session.

Intervening events very often alter circumstances and intentions. As a result of the public outcry in respect of the Prudential Finance situation the government has decided this measure should be pushed through at this time. The government's embarrassment and the haste with which it is approaching this matter now bodes no good for this scheme.

Let me refer the minister to a discussion we had yesterday during a meeting of the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs in respect of the reason the deposit insurance scheme should be brought forward. On reflection I am more amazed at the government's attitude in this regard in relying on the deposit insurance scheme to solve certain financial problems. In fact the minister stated that this scheme was an interim or intermediate step in respect of control of near banks. This step has been advocated by the Porter royal commission and by all interested parties for some considerable time.

The government's action in this regard is very crab-like, and frankly I must confess amazement over the convolutions the government has gone through regarding the Bank Act and this related bill. The government has had plenty of time to determine what should be the nature of a new bank act. It brought forward Bill C-102, which was completely unacceptable, and the occurrence of an election ended the possibility of any consideration of that bill in the house. We now have Bill C-222 and Bill C-261 which represent what the government deems should be done in respect of the recommendations of the Porter commission.

I cannot agree with the minister's refusal to define banking when he will not agree to put banks and those engaged in banking practices under the legitimate umbrella of federal government control where they belong, according to the constitution, which refers to banking, currency and interest. I do not agree that it would be impossible to draft a new act to cover chartered banks in one part, near banks in another, and set standards, examinations and controls with respect to each of them.

The result of deposit insurance insofar as federally incorporated institutions are concerned is to doubly put them under the control of the inspector general of bank or the superintendent of insurance. This will just put more icing on the cake. These institutions do not require deposit insurance, and they are already subject to a degree of federal inspection and control which is satisfactory to the public.

The problem we are trying to solve does not involve insuring of the deposits of banks, near banks and financial institutions, particularly those under provincial charter, but rather the inspection and control of those engaged in banking practices. It must first of all be recognized that no system of insurance by itself can provide a guarantee or safeguard in respect of public deposits in financial institutions. The most effective safeguard is sound management backed up by government supervison and inspection. In addition there is the safeguard which results from control exercised by national and international authorities. These authorities can take certain measures to prevent catastrophic economic declines.

We in Canada have had a great deal of experience in respect of sound management and supervision in our banking system. The supervision goes back to the 1920's following the Home Bank debacle. Since then there has been no question about the safety of bank deposits. However, the events of the past three or four years have raised an increasing number of questions with respect to the position of public deposits in institutions that come under a system of supervision and inspection that has yet to prove its worth. These institutions are not subject to proper supervision and inspection.

• (12 noon)

What is the answer on the part of the government? It is deposit insurance. The government has gone to the United States to borrow an idea which came about as a result of entirely different conditions. Frankly, there is no real parallel in the situation which led to the establishment of a deposit insurance system in the United States and that which may exist in Canada in the future.

Briefly recapitulating history, we know that in 1933 there were nearly 17,800 commercial banks in operation in the United States, with an almost equal number of non-bank savings institutions. Those of us who have reached a certain age remember the banking holiday in March, 1933, in that country. We know that all their commercial banks were closed, and after the banking holiday only some 12,000 were licensed to reopen for business. Of the remaining 5,000 I gather that some 3,000 were eventually reopened, but over 2,000 were liquidated or consolidated with other banks. In short, the United States system of deposit insurance was established in conditions of extreme crisis in the banking and financial system as a whole. There can be no doubt that in this situation the system helped restore a public confidence that had been buffeted and was confused. That system was also designed to provide a longer run answer to the problems of successive bank failures and of the destructive runs on banks that had afflicted the decentralized unit-banking system of the United States for most of its previous history.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that there is a difference between the United States and its decentralized unit system of banking and Canada's more centralized and concentrated branch banking system. The Americans had to bring some degree of uniformity to different classes of banks, some of them members of the federal reserve system but most of them non-member banks. An examination of the United States experience will reveal that the crucial element in the operation of the insurance system over the past three decades has been the effective enforcement of standard supervision and inspection over the thousands of deposit taking institutions of all types and sizes that operate in that country.

In Canada no one can assert with any justification that the federally supervised institutions are under a deficient system of supervision. Rather it is those institutions which have been provincially incorporated and operate in a vacuum. I can say nothing better for them than that they operate in a vacuum, because the standards of supervision vary so much.

Under those circumstances, in the government's desire to provide for insurance I find it somewhat strange, as I did at the resolution stage, that there should be an insistence that it be mandatory that the federally supervised institutions shall have deposit insurance. There is no question about it in the bill. But in respect of those who require the insurance, those whose supervision it is essential be upgraded, their participation will be voluntary; and worst of all—and this is where this bill is absolutely incomprehensible—it shall be with the consent of the province that incorporated the institution. This to me is a negation of the constitutional obligation of the government of Canada to have exclusive jurisdiction over banking, currency and interest.

All I can say is that the government is endeavouring to buy some political peace at the expense of enshrining in a statute in the most permanent form some theory of the right of a province to have a say with regard to banking. This provision is in the bill —"with the consent of the province". In the matter of banking, currency and interest it is clear in the constitution that the exclusive jurisdiction lies with the government of Canada. It is up to those who assert the contrary to show that this jurisdiction is not exclusive. They must assert their own jurisdiction, because jurisdiction in banking cannot exist in a vacuum. Therefore I cannot see why this feature has been introduced into the bill.

Yesterday during discussion in the committee the minister expressed the opinion that it was difficult to define the business of banking. But in this particular bill we have bumped up against much the same sort of thing. We will have the problem of deciding which are deposit taking institutions. There are many ways of defining banking without inhibiting the growth and evolution of that system, and I hope on the appropriate occasion to put forward such a definition.

We will have the problem of defining a deposit taking institution. Why it could not have been assumed in the Bank Act is something about which one must speculate. The bill proposes that this insurance shall be at a flat rate, and therefore denies one of the fundamental principles of insurance; there is no question of risk being a determinant of the rate of insurance.

Therefore I can flatly state that I think our chartered banks and the major near banks will be made to serve as the milk cows for this scheme. For some of the banks this may mean an expenditure of about $4.5 to $5 million a year. Who will pay for that? It can be said that they have customers and that this charge will be passed on. I do not think one can legitimately insist that the banks should assume this charge. The service is being provided to the customers; therefore it is they who should assume the charge.

In so far as the small institutions are concerned, the requirement that a minimum of $500 or one thirtieth of one per cent of a deposit within a limit of $20,000 per account be assessed each member institution—and it is not per depositor but per account—means that this institution will have to have minimum deposits of $1.5 million or the rate of one thirtieth of one per cent will not be applicable.

During the resolution stage I made representations to the effect that those institutions wishing to become insured members of the corporation should be given the privilege of working up to the required standing. In other words, if they met the minimum standards now they should be allowed to apply and be granted interim certificates, which are of course renewable each year, until they reached the required standing. From the remarks made by the minister I am not too sure whether the Trust Companies Act or the Loan Companies Act will apply to the standard of investment which will be required of these institutions, and what degree of liquidity will be sought.

When the minister makes his statement at the completion of the debate I hope he will give us a much fuller explanation with regard to his statement that all the institutions would be accepted into the scheme if the provincial governments asked for it. There is some confusion in my mind regarding this matter, but let me say that it may be in my mind only and not in the minister's statement. In any event I hope to be given a clearer picture of the interim steps, because I think they are very important. It will be interesting, when this bill is considered in the committee, to get some idea of the regulations which are envisaged; because the bill only marks out the four corners of this scheme, and as a matter of fact a good deal of the law will be embodied in the regulations.

I should like to reiterate the plea I have made on many occasions, that these regulations should be subject to review by this house and by a standing committee of the house, because this corporation is a classic example of delegated powers. It will have very extensive powers, and they must be subject to review by parliament. It is not good enough to say that the regulations are made by order in council and tabled and that hon. members can go and find them. No means is given whereby these regulations may be examined. I urge the minister to assist the house to amend our rules to provide for a standing committee on delegated legislation, so that hon. members may be given a chance to see what is being done and examine it themselves.

The last point I should like to make, and which I should like clarified by the minister either now or in the committee when the bill is sent there, concerns the powers of the deposit corporation. I should like to know whether the corporation will have the right of sale or merger of an institution which has not been able to meet its obligations.

The power of sale or merger is not specifically dealt with in clauses 11 or 3(1) of the bill. It is said in clause 3(1):

> There is hereby established a corporation, to be known as the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, having power to acquire, hold and alienate real and personal property.

I doubt that the wording of this clause is sufficiently wide. I apologize for making specific reference to a clause in the bill; however, I did want to state that this bill should provide for power to be given to the corporation to dispose of the assets of a defaulting institution. It is said in clause 11(c) that the corporation may act as a liquidator. Nevertheless I think it should have the power of sale and of merger.

There are a number of other remarks which could be made with regard to this government proposal, but in view of the remarks which have already been made both by myself and by my colleagues, our main concern now is to see this bill goes to the committee as soon as possible. I will say at this time that we in this party are prepared, with some reluctance, to support this bill on second reading. At this time and under the circumstances the principle of deposit insurance is only second best.

We think the provision with regard to the lender of last resort is good. We have some very serious reservations about the provincial rights which are being established in this regard. As a matter of fact if it were not for some other good features of the bill I would be opposed to it because of that provision. However, in the light of all the circumstances we are prepared to support the bill on second reading.

[Translation]

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member for Edmonton West allow me a question?

Mr. Lambert: Certainly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Clermont: Did I misunderstand the hon. member or did he really say that the expenditures of some banks could amount to $4 or $5 million for each bank for the deposit insurance premium?

Mr. Lambert: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Speaker, I have here the replies given us by the president of the Canadian Bankers Association, Mr. Patton, to the effect that for the eight banks now in operation the total expenditures could amount to $4.5 million for the first six years and that the premium would then drop to $2.5 million.

Mr. Lambert: I have information to the contrary, Mr. Speaker.

• (12:20 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): The members of the New Democratic Party support the principle of deposit insurance and are prepared to facilitate the speedy passage of this bill. The hon. member for Greenwood set forth our support during the debate on the resolution. We look upon our large financial institutions as forming part of the whole of our financial system, and deem it necessary that they be under federal direction, supervision and control. These financial institutions include banks, trust and loan companies, finance companies, credit unions and caisses populaires.

The recent display of waffling in determining jurisdiction, authority and responsibility by the federal government and the government of Ontario with regard to Prudential Finance indicates the necessity for the direct assertion of authority over the financial institutions of our country. We appreciate the jurisdictional problems involved, but we place the security and safety of Canadian depositors and investors in priority to petty jurisdictional problems.

The principle of deposit insurance is twofold; first, to assure the safety of deposits and, second, the supervision and control of our financial institutions. I would prefer to place the second purpose first because the safety of deposits is almost entirely dependent on supervision, inspection and control. I noted an article in the Globe and Mail of Monday, January 30 in which Fraser Robertson reports a statement to the shareholders of Guaranty Trust Company at a recent annual meeting. The president, J. Wilson Berry, pointed with pride to the record of Canadian trust companies, noting that the record of no casualties in the industry has been maintained during a severe time of testing in the past year. He also said that the essential purpose of deposit insurance is the protection of depositors. Mr. Berry then indicated that he did not believe deposit insurance would be of any value to customers of some large, well established trust and loan companies or even the chartered banks.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, the objective of deposit insurance is to prevent losses, not protect against them. What may be safe today in a bank, trust or loan company may be insecure tomorrow. Prevention comes before, and as a necessary and vital step to protection. Mr. Robertson pointed out in his article:

> There is no guarantee that I know of that the management of any company will not deteriorate, that control will not change hands, that the nature of the business will not alter. Governments may force such changes, for instance, by requiring banks to divest themselves of substantial interests in trust companies or by limiting the availability of directors. Again, governments may themselves bring about a change in the nature of a business, as by permitting banks to enter substantially into the mortgage business and to issue debentures, while trust companies are asking for permission to make consumer and personal loans.
> The activities of financial institutions in Canada have changed remarkably in recent years in response to the requirements of a vastly changed economy. Thus much of the experience of an old established company will be no greater than that of a relatively young one, and the temptation to believe it cannot err may be a very real danger to the institution and to the public.

There are a few criticisms, Mr. Speaker, which I hope are constructive and which we would like to present to the minister. First, the legislation indicates an almost tacit approval of provincial jurisdiction in the monetary and financial affairs of our country. The provision in the bill which requires consent both by the applicant company and the province with regard to provincial trust and loan companies should not prevail. The voluntary aspect is lost by requiring the consent of the province. The province should require companies to participate in deposit insurance, and should make it a requirement of their licence to do business in the province.

We were very much encouraged by the statement of the premier of British Columbia to the effect that he would compel such companies to take out this insurance as a requirement of doing business in the province. Other provinces should follow this lead. When one knows that most of the large trust and loan companies are provincially incorporated, it indicates the necessity of full participation by all these financial institutions in deposit insurance.

The second criticism we have is that the term "deposit" is not defined in the bill but is left to the governor general in council to determine. We appreciate the difficulties in defining the term "deposit", as to whether it is a deposit or an investment with the institution involved. I note that in the United States the Federal Savings and Loans Insurance Corporation insures the accounts of all forms of savings in insured savings and loan associations, including share and investment certificates, while the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation insures demand savings and time deposits in commercial and mutual savings institutions. This would be a good starting point, Mr. Speaker, toward defining the word "deposit".

I would ask also that all financial institutions be required to notify depositors as to whether the "deposits" were deposits covered by the deposit insurance scheme or were just investments in the shares of the company. This problem was underlined by the recent Prudential fiasco, when people rightly thought deposits in the form of guaranteed investment certificates were the same as cash deposits in our chartered banks. We in the New Democratic Party feel that in those circumstances some form of compensation should be given to those people who invested their money in Prudential. When you have people who are not aware of the difference between a deposit and an investment, the onus is on the financial institution not only to make them aware of it but to compensate them if losses occur.

The third point, Mr. Speaker, is with regard to coverage. We of the New Democratic Party would like to see coverage not only of chartered banks, federal loan and trust companies, but also of provincial trust and loan companies and finance companies. We appreciate the insurance protection that people have with regard to credit unions and the Caisses Populaires. The attraction of the lender of last resort provision in the bill would act as an encouragement and attraction to companies which would otherwise be reluctant to enter into a scheme of deposit insurance. In so permitting these companies to enter the field, we feel some standard should be adopted. Again, I point out information received with regard to deposit insurance in the United States. Before insuring any bank the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation considers the following factors: (1) the financial history and condition of the bank; (2) the adequacy of its capital structure; (3) its future earnings prospects; (4) the general character of its management; (5) the convenience and needs of the community to be served by the bank; (6) the consistency of its corporate powers with the purposes of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act. These factors should be given full consideration when companies are making application for deposit insurance.

• (12:30 p.m.)

May I say again that we agree in principle with deposit insurance, Mr. Speaker. We should like to see its coverage extended, and will co-operate fully in the passage of this bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall the motion carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): No, Mr. Speaker. I had understood that another member of the official opposition was going to speak, but apparently that is not so.

I have a few things I should like to add to the remarks of my colleagues from Broadview (Mr. Gilbert). In the first place, I think we should have it clearly in our minds that the measure now before us should not be considered solely in the light of its aspect as a deposit insurance scheme. It is in effect the government's attempt to cope with a situation that has been causing more and more concern throughout the country; that is, the development of a conglomeration of various financial institutions which are beyond the scope of federal legislation and control. That is to say, Mr. Speaker, they are unless the federal government is prepared to face a head-on confrontation with the provinces and to exert its authority over all institutions that could by any reasonable definition be called banking institutions. In fact I think this is a rather typical example of this government's efforts to do things by the back door method.

I regret that the minister did not heed the suggestion I made to him some while ago before this measure was introduced, at a time when there was a rather notorious collapse of a financial institution and we had in Ottawa representatives of the provincial governments. It seemed to me that was a golden opportunity for the federal government to speak bluntly and plainly to the provincial governments and suggest to them that it would be the part of wisdom on their part if they were to refuse to licence any other financial institutions unless they were prepared to come under federal inspection; in fact, to go further than that and cancel any existing licenses unless those institutions were prepared to submit themselves to federal inspection and control.

As I remarked to the minister at the time, Mr. Speaker, I could not really conceive of any provincial premier in his right mind not seizing the opportunity to dump this problem on the lap of the federal Minister of Finance. The fact that two of our largest provinces have decided to make compulsory the acceptance of this particular scheme indicates that I was on the right track, that they do know the problems they may face, and that to bring these concerns under federal control is one way of avoiding serious difficulties in the future.

However, Mr. Speaker, I should like to reinforce what the hon. member for Edmonton West had to say about the danger of one of the features of this bill, that which calls for the consent of provincial governments before a provincially chartered institution may apply for deposit insurance under this scheme.

This seems to me, Mr. Speaker, to be a very dangerous enshrining in federal legislation of an admission, shall I say, that the provinces have some right in this field of the control of finance and banking operations, or what would normally be called banking operations. I am not a lawyer, but I cannot imagine any more useful club for provincial governments to wield in the future when asserting their right to a position that they have achieved merely by means of squatter's rights at the present time. As I say, Mr. Speaker, I think the minister would have been much better advised to have gone openly to the provinces and offered them a way out of their present difficulties in the future, and by that means to firmly establish federal government control and inspection of all financial institutions.

I am also interested in the definition of a deposit, or rather in the lack of a definition of a deposit. A deposit is merely referred to as something that is going to be defined by the by-laws of this corporation.

This raises a rather interesting point, and I hope the minister will think of this. It occurred to me yesterday before the committee when we were discussing the question of the relevant deposit taking institutions, and I asked the inspector general of banking by means of a note I had passed to him whether he would consider the province of British Columbia as a deposit taking institution since Mr. Bennett has issued parity bonds which are cashable at any time at par. It appears to me that these are deposits which are in no way different from the deposits that I make when I go to a bank. I wonder whether Mr. Bennett will come to the minister and suggest that he has to insure all the operations of the government of British Columbia.

[Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Mr. Sharp: In that case I would have to insure the federal government, too, because we have issued the same kind of bonds.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): You will be in the same spot.

Mr. Knowles: What about Canadian government perpetuals?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): They are not redeemable at any time.

Mr. Sharp: The Canada savings bonds are.

Mr. Knowles: What about the perpetual bonds?

Mr. Sharp: No, the Canada savings bonds.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The Canada savings bonds are, but not the perpetual bonds.

However, to come back more seriously to this question of what this measure is all about, it is really a measure to start the process of bringing near banks under federal control. We had before the committee a number of witnesses, some of them leading professional authorities on the monetary and banking system, who dealt quite fully with the problem of this conglomeration of financial institutions to which I have referred.

One witness presented a paper which outlined the history of deposit insurance in the United States. One of the interesting things about his brief is that it points out that deposit insurance in the United States was introduced precisely because there is no constitutional federal authority in that country over banking and finance. They had to have some means of controlling and supervising the operations of an enormous conglomeration of institutions under a multiplicity of legislative authorities. It seems to me that this outline of the history of deposit insurance in the States actually points out that we are in a better position to undertake some really far reaching controls over all financial institutions than are our United States friends.

Another witness before the committee, Dr. Richard Neufeld, had another idea with regard to near banks. His idea was that they should be granted some type of interim charter under the Bank Act, under, as he said, very stringent regulations, and with the aim in mind that after the lapse of ten years, when the Bank Act will come before the committee again, by that time the development of the financial system of this country would be such that the banks and the trust and loan companies would be carrying on functions which would be virtually indistinguishable from each other, and they might all be tidied up under the Bank Act.

I am not sure whether this is practicable, Mr. Speaker, but it seems to me to be the direction in which we should be moving rather than, as I say, trying to do something by the back door method and risking the danger of having some chickens in our dominion-provincial relations coming home to roost at a later date.

• (12:40 p.m.)

I believe now is the time for the federal government to act boldly with the provinces in this regard. Not even the province toward which the federal government looks nervously over its shoulder all the time would dare to hold out from the scheme or from the proposition I made, that they cancel their provincial licences and refuse to issue any more except to those institutions coming under federal authority and inspection. Any provincial government that refused to do this would find itself in an extremely difficult position, even without another bank failure, because it would be exposed to its electorate as being careless of the welfare of its own citizens.

There are tremendously powerful levers in the hands of the federal government. One might say that the regrettable financial collapses we have had are an ill wind that has blown good, if the federal government is prepared to set its sails to that wind and exert its authority over financial institutions in the country.

I presume the scope of the inspection and regulation will be fairly severe, fairly critical, and that the club to be used to make institutions conform to what the inspector general and his staff deem to be reliable business operations will be threat of expulsion from the scheme. We should examine that. It is inevitable that there must be some sort of club, and that is the club I can see. This may raise problems in two provinces, my own province of British Columbia and Ontario, which have already announced they will make membership in the scheme compulsory.

This may raise some problem if the federal authority decides to expel an institution in one of the provinces from the scheme. Then, by virtue of the provincial legislation making it compulsory to belong to the scheme, it will put that institution out of business. I am not sure that that will not be good, but let us see exactly what the results of this can be. We should examine that closely.

In conclusion, I repeat, I am disappointed that the minister has not done by more direct means what he seeks to do by indirect means, but that he has enshrined in legislation an admission which he as federal Minister of Finance should never be prepared to make, that there is split authority in Canada over banks, finance and money affairs. His successors, whoever they may be, may regret his excessive caution here, and his not doing by the front door what he has tried to do by the back door.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton West on behalf of Her Majesty's loyal opposition has expressed our feelings about this bill, that we intend to support it with some reluctance. Speaking for myself, I intend to support it with a great deal of reluctance because I think it incorporates one or two thoroughly objectionable principles. For my part, while it has a desirable objective, to bring about a system of deposit insurance, with the additional attraction that thereby there will be some extension of the umbrella of federal regulation and inspection—those two aspects are desirable—it incorporates features to my mind so undesirable that my reluctance to support it is extreme indeed. It is only, I can assure you, because I appreciate the necessity of something being done in this field now, that I bring myself to support the bill on second reading.

I have already summarized my view about what I think should be the approach of the government with respect to this matter of banks, banking and banking legislation. I have stated that in my view there is no question about the sole jurisdiction of the federal parliament and government in this field. I have also stated my view about the absolute necessity of maintaining that control, undivided, whole, in all its integrity, and the necessity of using legislative and administrative control to maintain the monetary system, the system of financial institutions built around the banking system in all its integrity as being the inescapable responsibility and indispensable strong right arm of government in its control over fiscal and monetary policy.

I regret exceedingly that in the Bank Act amendments before us, and in this deposit insurance legislation, the minister has shied away from that approach. Not only has he shied away from it, but in my submission he has opened crevasses in it which he and future federal authorities will regret exceedingly.

Referring to the matter of maintaining the integrity of federal control over the entire financial and monetary system of Canada, it is unfortunately true that at the moment we do not have that effective federal inspection and regulation over the entire monetary and credit system that its stability and integrity requires. There is adequate control over banks and federally incorporated trust companies. No one would question their stability and integrity. But large segments of the system, many trust companies, finance and loan companies, operate completely outside the sphere of that federal inspection and control, many such companies not being federally incorporated. Yet these institutions carry on many of the aspects of banking business. They accept deposits and create demand and term liabilities; they accept cash and exchange cheques, and their activities in the field of credit buying have an important bearing on the effective level of consumer demand in this country. The Porter commission recommended a wide extension of federal legislation to cover all of the types of institutions I refer to.

The failure to accept the Porter commission recommendation is the first serious omission in the legislative program the government has presented to us in this field. The program almost completely rejects the Porter commission recommendations.

It is obvious that the government is unprepared to extend its jurisdiction in any direct way. Its amendments to the Bank Act contain no new definition of banking, which would be one way of accomplishing that result.

It is interesting to note, Mr. Speaker, that traditionally our Bank Act contains no definition of banking at all. Though this may be traditional, I think it is incredible, indeed inconceivable, that it should be allowed to continue. With the multiplicity of institutions entering the field in one or another of its aspects, the situation is new and serious and requires new and serious measures to meet it. If adequate measures are not taken there will be a serious erosion of federal authority in this whole field, and serious dangers to the stability and credibility of the entire system.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, while not being a panic-monger, one can ask very seriously how many more impacts like those of Atlantic Acceptance and Prudential Finance the system can withstand. It is not only the amount of loss involved at the moment, terribly serious though that be, especially to the unfortunate creditors of the companies involved, it is the loss of confidence in the entire system and the ramifications of the calling and tightening of obligations throughout that cause ever-widening and extremely serious consequences throughout the entire financial system. So, although no system can ever guarantee complete protection against deliberate fraud or dishonesty, an adequate and uniform system of federal inspection and regulation could certainly reduce the dangers, not only in individual instances but throughout the system as a whole. And in my view such a possible system lies almost entirely within the scope of the authority of the federal parliament.

[Mr. Fulton.]

I regret exceedingly, therefore, that notwithstanding the urgency the government has refused to follow the course of direct legislative authority. The minister tells us that he doubts his jurisdiction and fears it would be challenged. So he has resorted to a device, a sort of carrot, to entice the near banks in on a voluntary basis, because he is concerned with the difficulty if he is challenged. I do not know why he does not follow the simple course suggested in this house not long ago by the hon. member for York South by bringing in even now, in this legislation or in the banking bills before us, a definition of banks and banking so as to cover the field we think should be covered. If the minister really has serious doubts about jurisdiction he could do this and refer that particular section to the Supreme Court of Canada for a ruling.

I do not have these doubts. I think it extremely unlikely that the minister would be challenged provided a workmanlike definition was produced. Why does he not follow the course I have outlined so that financial institutions across this country will know the intention is to protect the public by means of a legislative umbrella under which regulation, control and inspection would be carried out throughout the entire system.

But the minister will not do this. Instead, he has adopted a device. His theory is that by establishing a federal deposit insurance scheme the provincially incorporated trust companies and the near banks to which it is available will be enticed or compelled to join in the scheme because their customers will demand the security of the federal insurance coverage, and would go elsewhere if they do not join. Once in, they will be compelled to submit to federal inspection as a condition of coverage. Even in this connection I have reservations to make in the light of what the minister said while moving second reading. I will return to this a little later on.

With regard to the scheme as a whole, based on the bill the minister has introduced, I submit that it makes clear the weaknesses inherent in the hon. gentleman's whole approach. In the first place, while it is only voluntary to the provincially incorporated institutions, membership in the scheme will be compulsory to the chartered banks. Yet these latter are the very institutions about which there is no concern as to the safety of their deposits. So you compel those who do not need it and whom you already control, to come in and contribute substantially to the cost of the scheme, while having only a vague hope that those whom you do want in, and whom the public interest requires in, will come in on their own. This seems both unsafe and unfair.

In the second place, the bill goes beyond a merely voluntary association in the scheme on the part of the provincially incorporated companies, and provides that even if they decide to join they must obtain the consent of their provincial governments. This surely is saying to parliament that not only do we doubt our own primary jurisdiction in this field, but we recognize a primary jurisdiction on the part of the provinces; because we give them in effect a veto over the extent and operation of a federal initiative in a field which is certainly part of banking; that is, the taking of deposits.

This is the view of the bill which I take and, as I said before, it is with extreme reluctance that I will vote for this measure on second reading. Were it not for the feeling of urgency which attaches to it I would never vote for a bill which contained so little confidence in federal jurisdiction.

In brief, on this aspect of the subject I do not question the right of provinces to incorporate companies and require that they conform to provincial laws and regulations; but I certainly assert and defend the right of the federal government to regulate all those companies wherever incorporated which engage in the business of banking in Canada. I think the minister will have reason to regret he has taken his present position and written legislation which will carry it into effect.

This is my main objection to the bill. I have some other, more detailed objections to which I should like to make reference, not for the purpose of protracting the debate but because I wish to lay a basis upon which I shall later ask the minister to give consideration to these matters and accept some modifications when the legislation is considered in detail in committee.

I was much disturbed by the minister's words this morning to the effect, if I interpreted them correctly, that he did not intend to insist on uniform national standards. Those were the words I took down; I may have misunderstood what was meant.

Mr. Sharp: Perhaps I might say a word on that point. I said we were not going to insist upon uniform federal standards as a condition for bringing the companies into the scheme, and that we would gradually improve the standards as we went along.

Mr. Fulton: With that modification I am satisfied and greatly assured. I take it the minister is saying we want to bring this scheme into operation quickly in the immediate future; it is obviously impossible to insist on uniform standards, but that will be the objective. I am glad to have this assurance.

There are other features which cause me concern. The bill as I read it does not provide for the compulsory inspection of provincially incorporated institutions which may come within its jurisdiction. One of the sections provides for the compulsory inspection of federally incorporated institutions, but section 22 states:

> Where the corporation enters into a contract of deposit insurance with a provincial institution, the policy shall provide that a person designated by the corporation shall be permitted to examine the affairs of the company at least once in each year and at such other times as the corporation may require.

The provision is only that an inspection shall be permitted. I think the bill should be much more direct and provide that as a condition of entry or continued participation there shall be regular inspection of all member institutions. As to the requirement in section 16 that provincial consent is necessary, I have referred to that already. I think it is a provision which this parliament should resist and which should be deleted from the bill in committee.

Finally, I regret that although in the event that an irregularity is discovered in the operations of a federal institution it must be reported at once to the chairman and board of directors of the company, there appears to be no such requirement in the case of provincially incorporated member institutions. I am certain that it would be done as a matter of administration; however, I think precisely the same regulations and terms, in this aspect of inspection and control, should be applied to provincially incorporated loan institutions as are applied to federally incorporated institutions. These and other reservations which I have about the bill will be taken up in the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs.

In the meantime I hope the minister will seriously consider the fundamental weakness that he is opening up by the position he is taking, not only by expressing doubts as to the extent and efficacy of federal jurisdiction but also by explicitly recognizing a primary provincial jurisdiction which nowhere exists under the constitution and can only arise if this bill is passed in its present form.

There is one other matter which I would like to touch on briefly. The minister has said he is going to give consideration to it, and I hope his consideration will lead him to introduce what may be a substantial amendment or addition to the bill, one which I think is urgently necessary. I think he should extend the field of federal inspection and regulation to finance and loan companies which are not federally incorporated. These are precisely the types concerning which very extensive and disturbing difficulties have arisen in recent history. Yet as I see it, unless one goes through a rather tortured process of definition to say that they are deposit taking institutions—and I have doubts about the efficacy of such an interpretation—they will not be covered by this bill.

The minister again indicates that he is in agreement with my reservation on this point; therefore one could assume that as things stand these companies likely are not covered.

In this case where you have provincially incorporated institutions and they are not directly deposit taking institutions, then the right of federal jurisdiction is certainly much less than it is with respect to deposit taking institutions. In the case of these institutions, finance and loan companies, I would be prepared to say we can only use a carrot because we do not have any other device. Therefore I urge the minister to use this bill as a carrot to bring these companies under it, probably by making the corporation a lender of last resort available to finance and loan companies as well as to deposit taking institutions.

I am satisfied that this type of company would take advantage of the lender of last resort facility, and would therefore be prepared to submit to the umbrella of federal inspection, regulation and control. In that way there would be achieved that complete extension of federal control which the integrity of the financial system of this country requires. It is true that we have not had it before, but then neither have we had the kind of development which has been taking place so rapidly within the last five or six years.

I submit in all seriousness, and with a sense of urgency, that unless we take these developments into account, the rapid entry into the monetary and financial business by this type of company, and extend our legislation to bring those companies under control, we are inviting a serious undermining of that which has hitherto been unquestioned, namely federal jurisdiction and responsibility for this entire field.

I know there is urgency about this bill now, Mr. Speaker; nevertheless, I urge upon the minister that he should improve his bill along these lines because I think a very unhappy situation would be created if, after we put this legislation through, we find there is that type of gap and omission which I am satisfied exists at the present time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I understand there is a disposition on the part of hon. members to suspend our sitting for approximately one hour. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Then this sitting stands suspended from now until 2 o'clock, and at that time I shall recognize the hon. member for Compton-Frontenac.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at 2 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, with regard to this deposit insurance legislation which the minister has brought before the house, I wonder why insurance is sought for capital. If there is one thing which is insured, one thing which is positive, big and strong, it is indeed capital. Insurance is sought for capital. All the means available are used to protect the financial capital.

I am one of those who want solid banks. At this time, there is nothing stronger than our financial institutions and we did not see many of them go into bankruptcy; in fact, we have seen virtually none. Our major financial institutions have assets totalling $26 billion, while the government has liabilities of $26 billion. And here, we have the federal government wanting to guarantee with its liabilities the assets of banks or finance companies.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I wonder where we are going. I wonder whether the minister is claiming that financial capital is more important than human capital. Nobody cares about human capital; it is taxed and overtaxed; in a word, it is crushed by all means, direct and indirect. As far as financial capital is concerned, it is protected by all direct means and by all the drastic measures available, at the expense of human capital. Mr. Speaker, I think the minister should give a little more thought to human capital than to financial capital, for without the former, the latter would be inexistent. If there is financial capital, it is thanks to the human capital, which puts the mechanism of our economy into motion. Unless human capital is protected, in a word, if protection is given only to financial capital, the mechanism of our economy will stop. And then we will see disruption, bankruptcies, revolutions and a chaotic situation resulting from the over-protection given to financial capital.

The bill in this connection was not available when this text was drafted. However, the objective pursued seems to provide for compulsory insurance covering all deposits in federal incorporated companies, including chartered banks, and for voluntary insurance for provincially incorporated companies, subject to the consent of the provincial governments.

Mr. Speaker, without the approval of the provincial governments, the federal government can barely, if at all, assume the responsibilities it wants to assume or take the measures it wants to implement at this time.

In other words, insurance would be forced on the companies which need it least. The protection offered by the chartered banks is undeniable. The main result of setting up compulsory insurance for the chartered banks will not be to give depositors increased protection but to force the banks to subsidize their competitors, namely the near banks holding federal and provincial charters. The whole thing could also influence world opinion. Mr. Speaker, are we going to trumpet abroad that the position of Canadian banks is so shaky that deposit insurance has become necessary?

After all, the problem does not concern insurance, but rather the existing deficiencies in the control and inspection of near banks. As I said earlier, banks already have excellent regulatory and inspection systems: theirs and that of the Inspector General of Banks. They do not need deposit insurance. As for near banks which really need deposit insurance, they will gain nothing, unless this insurance provides for adequate control and inspection methods.

Without such control and inspection, deposit insurance, even though generally implemented, could actually result in an increased number of bankruptcies.

The banks will probably keep on doing their best to ensure the stability of the financial system, but should it not be asked whether they will not finally have enough of covering the expenses of all institutions, having first to subsidize their competitors following the establishement of deposit insurance, and to come afterwards to the rescue of near banks which find themselves in a precarious financial situation?

I would be in favour of a purely optional federal system applicable to all institutions that accept deposits and are subject to a strict control and inspection. In other words, insurance should be provided to institutions that need it. This insurance should not be made compulsory for chartered banks which offer fool-proof security, as witnessed at the worst times of the crash of 1929-30.

If bank managers or presidents say this insurance is senseless, that it is unthinkable to implement such insurance, because their financial situation is sound and strong, being backed by the strength of the country, nevertheless the financial provisions will prevail.

Then, if there is no risk on that side, why make it compulsory for those who do not need it?

To me, Mr. Speaker, the best insurance that should be required, would be to ensure the bread of those who need it for the next day. That would be a citizens insurance, an insurance on human capital, an insurance on labour. We could call that an insurance in a field where the government could really do something; the government could direct its activities on that side to ensure stability in every field of our economy and later go down to the level of the family, in order to ensure the houses and the assets of the citizens and prevent their bankruptcy. We want to provide an insurance to prevent the bankruptcy of high finance while it murders our Canadian citizens. Large companies which produce goods useful to the nation are going bankrupt because they do not enjoy the protection of the state, because financial interests take an unfair advantage of them. Nothing is being done for the people and I say to the Minister of Finance that the people have to be protected first. If we are unable to protect them, there is nothing else to protect, because everything else is of secondary importance.

Mr. Speaker, if these regulations and this deposit insurance is established to protect high finance and if the caisses populaires are excluded, I want the minister to tell us why. Is it because the caisses populaires are more solvent than others? Is it because Caisses Populaires are required to keep 50 per cent of their reserves on deposit to provide for bad debts and for the refund of deposits or is it because the financial institutions which create credit only maintain $3 in reserve for $21 on the books?

Are we establishing insurance on the book figures? The book entries in the large financial companies are the best protected in the world, because they are not only kept in fireproof safes but in fire-proof buildings. It is the best protected capital to be found in the country while the human capital cannot find a place to live in. In fact, some citizens live in hovels and too often, five, six or seven members of a single family are lost in a fire. That is all we are doing: There is no insurance on human beings, no insurance on the house, no insurance to protect man from capital transfers and what have you.

Everything is to be given to high finance, to high society, to those who enjoy the wealth belonging to others. The privileged who rule the country and control its assets are to be protected, so that they may also take over the assets of the individuals and turn private assets into liabilities. Mr. Speaker, they have the advantage of controlling everything, they control all sectors of the economy of the nation and, without their permission, a man cannot breathe.

Again that insurance will protect high finance or those financial institutions which fully control the economy. The government did not want and is not even able to keep a degree of control over those institutions. The government gives up its sovereignty and hands it over to those high institutions which exploit the people in all kinds of ways. They exploit them legally, because the government gives them its sovereignty, its rights, in short gives up its privileges.

That is what the government is doing and that is the reason why no one protests against increases in the interest rate, reduction in the bank reserves, secret reserves, hidden reserves. That is what the Minister of Finance said and he added that for the first time banks will have to reveal their undisclosed reserves or their secondary reserves and will also have to pay income tax on them. I studied all the clauses in the bill and I did not find a single one that says what the minister said or sets out the minister's suggestions. That means that the minister's statements will not have any value, that they are not included in the bill.

I would therefore ask the minister, if he is sincere, to amend the bill and to include therein the improvements he mentioned when he said that the hidden reserves would be brought to light and the citizens would pay income tax on those reserves. Otherwise, there is no reason to have deposit insurance, since the purpose of deposit insurance is to protect against the insolvency of those banks. They have hidden reserves, indiscreet reserves, comprising millions of dollars that are not declared; in fact, the minister does not even know how much there may be in those reserves. They are not declared and the minister is forbidden from looking into them.

Therefore, the hon. minister should take the necessary steps not only to prevent those large institutions from going bankrupt but also to permit them to live. There are many ways to enable them to live, but we must also enable the people to live, to develop normally, to develop their natural or individual resources, in short, to be masters of their own homes. That is what I call a country, that is what I call the administration of a country, that is what I consider the responsibility of the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance holds the highest responsibility in this parliament, for he is the one who has control over all the highest institutions, and if he does nothing, if he merely passes regulations and laws to protect those institutions, he is not carrying out his duties. In so doing, he is not responsible to the people, but he is responsible to finance.

[English]

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my remarks in regard to Bill No. C-261 will be brief. In principle we give our support to the bill because we believe it is necessary to have some form of deposit insurance available to protect depositors who place their savings in the hands of various deposit receiving institutions in the country which are not specifically chartered banks.

• (2:20 p.m.)

One point in this bill about which we are particularly concerned relates to those deposit receiving institutions classified as near banks which do not come under federal jurisdiction. According to my understanding of clause 16 and subclause 1 of clause 17 it would seem that adequate provision has been made to permit these provincially incorporated institutions to come under the cover of deposit insurance, provided the provincial governments concerned adjust their legislation either to require or permit this to be done. It seems to me that, when this legislation comes into effect, the near banks that do not hold federal charters will be forced into taking action along one of two lines. Either they will have to seek federal charters in order to receive this coverage or they will have to prevail upon their provincial governments to pass legislation enabling them as provincially chartered companies to come under the coverage of deposit insurance. The reason for the present concern is the failure of the Prudential Finance Company and the great deal of public talk that this event has caused. The failure of the Atlantic Finance Corporation also caused a great deal of concern, and perhaps justly so, among the Canadian people about whether or not they are adequately protected by these smaller institutions.

I think that the real work on this bill will have to be done in committee and I hope that the debate on second reading will be kept to a minimum so that we can proceed to consideration of the technical aspects of the bill in committee. I am not sure whether the various clauses of the bill contain the provisions which are necessary, and therefore it is all the more important that we hear the opinions and advice of experts and that we deal with this bill in more detail than we can in general debate.

It seems to me that the comparison of our deposit insurance policy with that of the United States is legitimate because the real purpose of this bill is to achieve something that has been in practice for many years in the United States and has proved very useful and beneficial in that country. It has been mentioned in this debate that the United States government does not have control and jurisdiction over the banking policy and the function of the banks in the same way as we have in Canada. Nevertheless, as long as there are provincially incorporated institutions able to accept deposits and carry on the generally accepted services of banking, the Canadian federal government does not have the proper control that will provide the protection to the people of Canada which I believe it is the responsibility of the government to provide. I believe that even though the comparison of the two countries in this field may not be exact, there is certainly much common ground as far as the need for such legislation is concerned. I believe we can learn a lesson from the manner in which deposit insurance now operates in the United States.

I trust that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp), in considering the various ramifications of the bill as the debate continues, will make sure that the legislation does leave an adequate door open to make the benefits of deposit insurance available to the provincial governments and the provincially incorporated near banks. I do not accept the argument that giving recognition to the provincial governments with relation to near banks is a general admission of weakness and an abrogation of responsibility so far as the federal government is concerned because in respect of the operations of the near banks the responsibility of the provincial governments has been a legitimate one. However, whether or not this should continue is another matter.

In the committee where we have been considering revisions to the Bank Act, we have heard the governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Rasminsky, and the minister state very clearly that they do not feel it is necessary to bring the near banks under the coverage of the banking legislation at the present time because the total volume of banking and financial business carried on by these institutions only amounts to about 1 per cent of the total banking services provided in the country. Therefore it is the apparent policy of the government, in the revisions to the Bank Act which are being proposed at the present time, not to bring these near banks, many of which are operating under provincial charters, under the umbrella of federal legislation. I believe that part of the urgency for this bill —perhaps this is the reason for the minister's motivation in moving so quickly on this particular piece of legislation—would have been avoided if the federal government, in drafting its proposed banking legislation which we are considering at the present time had expanded it to include all of the near banks operating in the country, not only to protect Canadian depositors but also to keep financial and banking policies in the hands of the federal government and the central bank, in order to guarantee effective operation of the economy.

Without making any further comments we would hope that Bill C-261 will be sent to the committee as soon as possible. There we will consider the various points that have been raised in the debate and hear testimony by those who are technically qualified and responsible for the operations of the banking system, whether it be the operations of the banks or of the near banks.

I wish to say in closing that, as the previous speaker has mentioned, whether or not the chartered banks themselves should be included in this legislation is questionable because, as has been stated, the deposits held by chartered banks are in no real danger, and if the banks are required to come under the proposed deposit insurance arrangements they will in effect be subsidizing their very competitors.

This argument may be valid from the point of view of the record of stability of the chartered banks but it seems to me that a basic principle is involved, namely, the responsibility of the government to provide the insurance and the protection that such insurance will give to the people of Canada who entrust their savings and their day to day financial operations to those who are authorized to receive deposits and by receiving deposits are able to lend money to those at the other end of the banking operation who need it. It has been stated in the committee that not only are the banks operating on the basis of reserve expansion. In other words, it is not only those who are legally required to operate under a specific reserve requirement according to the Bank Act who are able to expand the money that they use in making loans. It applies also to the near banks which do not have these restrictions nor the inspection of the federal banking service performed by the inspector of banks.

For this reason it is all the more urgent that this legislation or similar legislation be passed as quickly as possible. I therefore state again that we give our support to the principle of the bill and look forward to the consideration of its various clauses when it comes before the committee.

[Mr. Thompson.]

• (2:30 p.m.)

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, this bill, I believe, is a vivid illustration of the unique propensity of the government for doing everything backwards, of its affinity for half measures and compromise and of its incredible aptitude for vacillation and irresolution. The bill is compulsory for those who need it least. It is voluntary as well as dependent upon the provinces and least effective for those who need it most. It will protect the public where the least protection is needed. It may well leave the public exposed and imperilled where protection is imperative.

Sir, the basic weakness of the government's approach was stated precisely in another context in the report of the Porter royal commission at page 363:

> An alternative, therefore, would be to make the federal regulation voluntary while offering inducements to institutions to submit themselves. Unfortunately, however, those few institutions which are now clearly unregulated are precisely the ones which are likely to remain outside the regulatory framework.

This, sir, is what is likely to happen as a result of this legislation. Those provinces which may need it most are the ones which will not make it imperative upon the institutions within their jurisdiction. But what I find most objectionable in the bill is its admission, both by explicit provision and by inference, that the provinces have a role in the field of banking. This I dispute vigorously and it will be the theme of what I want to say this afternoon, for I object to the abdication and surrender of jurisdiction of this parliament.

I do not believe that the provinces want to intrude in the field of banking. The failure of this parliament in the past to occupy fully the field of banking has enabled the provinces to purport to confer on provincially incorporated institutions of the type now colloquially known as near banks, powers in the field of banking. Do the provinces really want to retain that usurpation of authority achieved by default? I think not.

As an example, sir, I point to an exchange which occurred in the legislature of Ontario as recently as January 26 of this year. At page 25 of the Ontario Hansard the following appears during a speech by Hon. H. Leslie

Rowntree, Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs of Ontario, dealing with the question of deposit insurance:

—it is the intention of this government to introduce legislation to cover the entire field and to occupy that position in the jurisdictional aspect or nature of the British North America Act which has been abdicated by the federal government.

Our intention is to see that legislation is made available by this government, to see that the people of this province are covered in this field and in this area, regardless of any technical detail of where jurisdiction lies.

Mr. Sopha: We should get out of the near banks field—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Who is going to get in it?

Mr. Sopha: —and give it to the federal government.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Will they take it?

Mr. Sopha: Certainly, they will.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: They could do it now if they wanted to.

I underline and emphasize that comment by the Premier of Ontario:

Hon. Mr. Robarts: They could do it now if they wanted to.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: This is the point. Are they going to exercise their jurisdiction under the British North America Act or are they not? That is the question.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, that is the question. Is this parliament going to exercise its jurisdiction under the British North America Act or is it not? In my submission the future health and development of our banking and commercial institutions is directly dependent upon this parliament occupying fully and occupying now its constitutional jurisdiction.

Where the government has gone wrong in this matter has been, in my view, in its virtual pigeonholing of the whole report of the Porter royal commission. In my view that report is one of the most distinguished state papers ever produced in Canada. It is original and provocative; it blazes new trails while upholding tried concepts. It is a cohesive, packaged document, each part of which is dependent upon the other for its purposeful rationale.

If the government had adopted the recommendations of the Porter commission, had acted boldly and wisely to bring the so-called near banks under the jurisdiction of this parliament, we would not have had this half-hearted, faltering bill before us today. We would have had the package deal which was contemplated by the Porter royal commission, a realistic, cohesive and workable charter for Canada's financial institutions in the ensuing ten years. Instead, in the Bank Act and in this allegedly complementary legislation which is to create the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, we have a hodgepodge of political compromise, a medley of economic expediency and political contrivance.

Even at this late date I want to plead this afternoon with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) to change his course and to ask parliament to occupy to the limit the federal jurisdiction in banking, financial and commercial matters. It is because I feel so keenly and so deeply that such a course is imperative at this stage of our development in Canada's centennial year that I propose to discuss with some precision, based upon judicial and other authorities, the constitutional problems involved.

In the second edition of his authoritative and scholarly work "Canadian Constitutional Law", Mr. Justice Laskin has this to say at page 590 about the jurisdiction of this parliament:

The B.N.A. Act contains overwhelming internal evidence of the conviction that money, banking and credit (in its public aspect) should be exclusively of federal concern. Among the enumerated classes of subjects in section 91 are (1), currency and coinage (head 14); (2) banking, incorporation of banks and issue of paper money (head 15); (3) savings banks (head 16); (4) bills of exchange and promissory notes (head 18); (5) interest (head 19); and (6) legal tender (head 20): these are in addition to federal power in relation to bankruptcy and insolvency (head 21). From the outset the courts took a broad view of the federal banking power. In Tennant v. Union Bank of Canada (1894) A.C. 31, the Privy Council declared that "banking" was "wide enough to embrace every transaction coming within the legitimate business of a banker"; and see also Merchants Bank v. Smith (1884) 8 S.C.R. 512. Its opinion did not vary over the years as is indicated in Reference re Alberta Bill of Rights Act, A.G. Alta v. A.G. Canada (1947) A.C. 503, where it reaffirmed a consistent course of decision that what is fairly included within the conception of "banking" is a matter reserved exclusively for parliament and this without any limitation to the extent and kind of business that was carried on by banks in Canada in 1867.

The basic issue is, what is "banking"? I have reviewed all the authorities in the courts, in the texts and in so far as I could find them in state papers and I propose to make reference to a number of these authorities. Without hesitation I submit, indeed I assert, that all authorities, with the exception of one court of first instance in British Columbia and one basically irrelevant decision in the Manitoba Court of Appeal, have given to the word "banking" the widest connotation, certainly wide enough to bring in the near banks and wide enough to make the legislation which is before us compulsory and imperative. I put it to the minister, does he think for a moment the learned and distinguished Chief Justice of Ontario, a man with such experience both in the political and legal fields as well as the constitutional field, made his recommendation that near banks should be brought under federal jurisdiction without thought of the constitutional problem?

Sir, the most recent and authoritative discussion on the word "banking" was in the English Court of Appeal before a very strong court consisting of the Master of the Rolls, Lord Denning, and Lords Justices Harman and Diplock, in the case of United Dominion Trust v. Kirkwood, reported in 1966—you see this is up to date, Mr. Speaker—All England Reports at page 968. The issue there was whether United Dominion Trust was a money lender or a banker, and at page 974 Lord Denning pointed out that the parliament of Westminster—indeed like this parliament—had never defined the word "bank". He said:

> So one sees that parliament has conferred many privileges on "banks" and "bankers", but it has never defined what is a "bank" and who is a "banker". It has said many times that a banker is a person who carries on "the business of banking", but it has never told us what is the business of banking. It has imposed penalties on persons who describe themselves as a "bank" or "bankers" when they are not, but it has never told us how to decide whether or not they are bankers.

Lord Denning himself undertook to try to do that and at page 975, after considering all the earlier authorities, which incidentally are collected immediately after the headnote of the case and are very helpful to any student in this field, Lord Denning went on to say:

> There are, therefore, two characteristics usually found in bankers today: (i) they accept money from, and collect cheques for, their customers and place them to their credit; (ii) they honour cheques or orders drawn on them by their customers when presented for payment and debit their customers accordingly. These two characteristics carry with them also a third, namely, (iii) they keep current accounts, or something of that nature, in their books in which the credits and debits are entered.

These characteristics, I submit, Mr. Speaker, are exactly the characteristics of the deposit-taking business conducted by all the so-called near banks in Canada, however, these near banks may in fact be incorporated.

Lord Justice Diplock added these remarks which are to be found at page 986 of the report, and while I apologize for quoting at such length, I believe these statements are of sufficient significance to be put on the record:

> What I think is common to all modern definitions and essential to the carrying on of the business of banking is that the banker should accept from his customers loans of money on "deposit", that is to say, loans for an indefinite period on running account, repayable as to the whole or any part thereof on demand by the customer either without notice or on an agreed period of notice. Some verbal confusion and perhaps some misunderstanding of the less recent judgments may arise from the fact that an account kept by a banker of his customer's loans made without interest and repayable on demand, is nowadays generally called a "current account", while the account kept of his customer's loans made at interest and repayable only on notice is generally known as a "deposit account". Accounts of both these types, however, possess the essential characteristics of running accounts of "deposits" of money by the customer.
> Accordingly it is, in my view, essential to the business of banking that a banker should accept money from his customers on a running account into which sums of money are from time to time paid by the customer and from time to time withdrawn by him by cheque, draft or order. I am inclined to agree with Lord Denning, M.R., and the author of the current edition of Paget on Banking (6th Edn.) that to constitute the business of banking today the banker must also undertake to pay cheques drawn on himself (the banker) by his customers in favour of third parties up to the amount standing to their credit in their "current accounts" and to collect cheques for his customers and credit the proceeds to their current accounts. This view of the essential characteristics of the business of banking today is supported by the evidence of the witnesses who were unquestionably bankers who gave expert evidence in the present case.

That long definition of banking is one which I believe our Supreme Court, which pays the very highest respect to the English Court of Appeal, on this basis could not fail to hold that near banks in their deposit business are carrying on the business of banking, the regulation of which under section 91 belongs exclusively to this parliament.

I point out to the minister that Canadian governments in the past have not been so fearful and reluctant as the minister now is to assert federal authority. In 1906 the then minister of justice, Sir Allan Aylesworth, took specific exception to a Quebec act amending the charter of Imperial Trust Company authorizing that company to receive money on deposit and allow interest, and to purchase bills of exchange. In his report to cabinet Sir Allan said:

> The undersigned does not admit that these powers may be conferred by the legislature.

Similar objections were raised by Sir Allan Aylesworth in 1910 to a Quebec act incorporating The General Trust, and in a report of January 12, 1911 he expressed the opinion that the powers "infringed upon the subject of banking under any fair interpretation of the word". I emphasize Sir Allan's statement "under any fair interpretation of the word".

Since the provincial government of that day in Quebec refused to amend the act, Sir Allan in a further report dated May 23, 1911 recommended disallowance. At that time he said this, and I think this is a statement of some significance:

> The nature of the business of banking is part of the law merchant, and is judicially noticed. If from this business, as so recognized, be excluded the authority to receive money on deposit, to lend money to individuals, except upon the security of bills of exchange, and generally to do an exchange business, the undersigned—

That is Sir Allan.

> —apprehends that the peculiar business of banking would not only be affected, but very considerably diminished. The expression "banking" as used in section 91 of the British North America Act, 1867, is, in the opinion of the undersigned, intended to describe not only such powers as are inherently banking powers, but, also, those which were, under the laws of the provinces at the time of the Union, exercised by the banks in the carrying on of their business, and it includes everything within legitimate banking business as it is practised, or has been developed. It may be seen by reference to pre-Union legislation that the deposit of money at interest, and dealing in exchange were expressly authorized banking transactions in the province. Leading decisions in the United States, also, show that such powers are attributed to the banks in that country. In fact it seems impossible to suppose that these powers are not necessarily common to all well-ordered banking systems.

This opinion of an earlier minister of justice is, I think, of real significance and I wish that the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Cardin) would take as strong a position in advising the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. gentleman permit a question? I am very interested in his learned and well prepared discourse but I am a little curious how it was that these trust companies provincially incorporated came to exercise these powers to accept deposits.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think the answer to that is very clear. It was solely by default of this parliament, a default which I think ought to be rectified. I am going to submit that if this parliament is prepared to move in—the minister will hear my argument as I develop it—then in the future under this legislation there will be no problem. I would point out to the minister, if I may—

Mr. Sharp: I should like to get the point clear, if I may. I gather that the act passed by the Quebec legislature was disallowed at that time. At what point was legislation introduced that was not disallowed?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The minister has greater access to research facilities in that respect than I have and I would commend that particular research to him. I think the position is simply this, that it was due to default on the part of this parliament and on the part of the government. In this argument I care not which party may have been in office. I am talking about the fault of this parliament in not exercising what I believe are rights which properly and legitimately belong to it.

I point out to the minister that the question of whether Montreal Trust Company was a banking institution within the meaning of that term in an agreement to subscribe for shares that "this underwriting may be pledged or hypothecated with any banking institution" was discussed in Montreal Trust Company v. Richardson, (1921) 62 S.C.R. 617. The trial judge, Mr. Justice Rose, who subsequently became a great and distinguished chief justice of the Supreme Court of Ontario, and on appeal the Chief Justice of Canada, Sir Louis H. Davies, a former minister of justice, held that the trust company was a "banking institution" within the meaning of that agreement.

Further, sir, I think that the 1938 and 1947 decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the references regarding the various Alberta statutes indicate how wide is the federal jurisdiction under banking. In 1947 the Judicial Committee declared a statute of Quebec ultra vires which would have forfeited to the Crown in the right of the province as bona vacantia, deposits in "credit institutions and all other establishments which receive funds or securities on deposits," upon which no claim had been made for 30 years. The case is Attorney General for Canada v. Attorney General for Quebec, (1947) A.C. 33.

The reasons given by Lord Porter make it clear that the deposit contract is the heart of banking. The argument of counsel for the Attorney General of Canada, Mr. H. E. O'Donnell, K.C., a distinguished counsel and son in law of Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, and W. R. Jackett, now the distinguished President of the Exchequer Court is, I think, most interesting. On page 35 I note this sentence from their argument:

> The Quebec statute strikes at the very heart and core of banking as used in section 91—the deposit contract and the rights and obligations flowing therefrom being a most essential part of banking.

There, in one sentence, is the pith and substance of my argument. The heart and core of banking is the deposit contract. That is why I assert that these deposit-taking institutions are under federal jurisdiction, and we in this parliament should assert our authority without equivocating.

Earlier in my remarks I said that there are two troublesome Canadian cases—troublesome to my argument. I believe in mentioning anything that is troublesome. The first case is in re Dominion Trust Company and United States Fidelity Claim, (1918) 3 W.W.R. 1023. The headnote reads:

> A provincial legislature has power to incorporate a company with the object of carrying on that branch of banking which consists of accepting money on deposits, paying interest thereon and allowing the customer to issue cheques against such deposit.

Personally I deny that and I submit that the parliament of Canada can intervene to stop this practice. This was a case before a single judge, Mr. Justice Murphy at trial, and the issue was never presented as to what would happen if parliament fully occupied the field. It is clear that grave injustice would have resulted in this case if Mr. Justice Murphy had held otherwise. The old maxim "hard cases make bad law" is especially applicable. In any event it is clear that Murphy J. had grave doubts about his decision because he said:

> In the absence of authority, I decline as a judge of first instance, to place a construction on that statute which would have disastrous results on the business of numerous provincial companies.

The other case is in the Manitoba Court of Appeal, re Bergethaler Waiseman—a corporation apparently from the constituency of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jorgenson). The case is reported in (1948) 1 D.L.R. 761.

The company was incorporated by special act of the Manitoba legislature, with the usual powers of a trust company. For some 23 years it carried on business in the Mennonite community (1) as an administrator of estates and (2) as a deposit business, that is, receiving money on deposit, repayable on demand, and dealing with the money as its own. It went into liquidation and it was claimed that the actions of the company were ultra vires its powers under provincial legislation.

I point out that in this case, there are clear distinctions, of which two are most important. First, in this institution in Manitoba, no cheques could be drawn by customers on their own account; second, withdrawals were not in cash but by cheques issued by the company to its customers drawn upon a chartered bank. It was held that this company was not in the banking business, and I personally believe it was not. It is clear that it was not carrying on a true deposit business. This case has been referred to me on different occasions as the authority for the reluctance of the minister. I submit that it is no authority at all. I submit that neither of these cases is in any way an authority for weakening the exclusive legislative authority of this parliament over the business of banking coming within the normal and natural meaning of that word. I submit that meaning is clear and unequivocal and includes the deposit business of the near banks.

Sir, it may probably be said that I am making a lawyer's case this afternoon; perhaps I am, and I do not apologize for that. Perhaps that is needed from time to time in this chamber. In other days men trained at the bar were prepared to argue legal and constitutional issues in this chamber, and personally I believe we slough off such problems much too readily upon the vague and undetermined group yclept "the law officers of the crown".

I return to my original submission, and I advance it in all earnestness to the Minister of Finance, that the business of the near banks is banking within the meaning of section 91 of the British North America Act and as a result all such deposit business should be brought under the control of parliament.

I have shown that the Premier and the Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs of Ontario apparently agree with my argument this afternoon. I say that this legislation should be made universal and compulsory for all institutions accepting deposits from the public. Unless it is, I submit this bill is defective and indeed may be mischievous. The legislation may result in a hodgepodge of deposit-taking institutions, with fantastic, dangerous variations across the country. There may be insured institutions in Ottawa and non-insured institutions in Hull, insured institutions in Sackville and non-insured institutions in Amherst. The provincial boundaries, I hope, are invisible in this country. In my opinion such a hodgepodge inevitably would lead to confusion. It might be mischievous and dangerous.

I say to the Minister of Finance this afternoon that there is still time for boldness and for wisdom on his part. Let him move in and occupy the full jurisdiction of this parliament. If he fails to do so he will cause irreparable harm to our financial institutions which have been, traditionally, among the soundest and most progressive in the world. Their integrity, their future development, are imperative to our national development. Let not the hon. member for Eglinton fail them today.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the minister one or two questions before he closes the debate. I note that the corporation may declare a dividend from time to time at an annual rate. Is this to be paid only on the amount of authorized capital, the ten shares, and will the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) receive all the dividends declared by this corporation from time to time or can an interpretation be placed on this section that would allow the corporation to pay dividends to some of the companies, banks and so on which pay funds into it by way of insurance premiums?

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on Bill No. C-261, particularly about the definition of the word "deposit". The bill says that the board of directors of the corporation will be able to set up regulations about the definition of the word "deposit". Are we going to be guided by the experience of other countries and say that there is a demand deposit, a time deposit or a savings deposit.

I know that the role of the opposition is to criticize all bills introduced by the government, but I feel that in introducing Bill No. C-261 the government has taken a step in the right direction. In fact, clause 14 stipulates that when this legislation is implemented all federally chartered business institutions must take part in that program and that all the provincial institutions will be able to take part in it if they so desire. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the public will be able to force the provinces to participate when a federal organisation has announced that deposits up to $20,000 are insured. I do not agree with the hon. member for Compton-Frontenac (Mr. Latulippe) when he tells the house that deposit insurance will be adopted to protect financial institutions. To my mind, that theory is far remote from this bill, because if the Canadian parliament passes deposit insurance, it will do so to protect the savings of the public.

Clause 13 of the bill stipulates that when the corporation is called upon to reimburse deposits, it will do so to the depositor and not the financial institution. I feel that the maximum of $20,000 is adequate when compared with the $10,000 maximum provided for by deposit insurance in the United States. The plan of the Federal Insurance Deposit Corporation in the U.S.A. covers 97.2 per cent of the accounts of the finance companies belonging to that corporation, and provides a maximum coverage of $10,000.

With regard to the premium mentioned in Bill No. C-261, namely $500, that is 1/30 per cent, it proves most reasonable when compared with the one provided for by deposit insurance in the United States, their premium being 1/12 per cent, and because of the discount, it really amounts to 1/27.

In Canada, as I have already said, we would start with a minimum premium of $500 or 1/30 per cent, and the bill states that, after a few years, it could be reduced. The minister will recall that in my opening remarks, I mentioned the definition of "deposit". When he comes before the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs, I trust he can give more information to the members of the committee and, at the same time, to the Canadian parliament. I shall ask certain questions and request certain details, as some members have already said they would do, when the bill is referred to the committee for study.

[English]

Mr. Fulton: Before the minister closes the debate perhaps I may be allowed to put a question to him. I regret having omitted it from my remarks this morning. I pointed out earlier that institutions already under federal control, about whose integrity and ability to meet the demands of depositors there was never any question, namely, the chartered banks, were among those institutions whose membership under this system is to be compulsory. On the other hand, the membership of companies with whose affairs the legislation might be thought to be most directly concerned is left as a matter of voluntary association on the part of those institutions.

Admitting the minister's view that the membership of the chartered banks is necessary in order to make this scheme workable—I understand this is one of the premises of his position—would he not consider the possibility of a differential in the amount of the premium required? On the one hand the scheme includes institutions which are sound and which from the standpoint of security need not be members of this institution, and on the other it includes institutions about whose position there may be some question.

Membership on their part is voluntary. Would not the minister consider that a lesser percentage should be extracted from the chartered banks than from these other institutions? Chartered banks have larger deposits and a smaller percentage would still produce substantial revenues to the fund. It seems to me that to take this course would be an equitable way of relieving the burden of support placed on companies which are not those for whom this scheme was designed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): If the Minister of Finance speaks at this time he will close the debate.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, may I first thank the house for the way in which it has proceeded to debate this bill and to give it careful but not too prolonged attention. I am grateful for this because I believe it is important to proceed with this legislation as soon as possible.

First, may I comment on the remarks made by my learned friend the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) who gave us a most interesting and erudite discourse on the meaning of banking within the British North America Act. I hope his view of the ambit of the banking clause is justified. As he admitted, however, there are some doubts. There are some learned people who even disagree with my learned friend from Carleton. Perhaps if he had spoken first they would not have had the temerity to do so. At any rate he does agree there are some who do not share his views or the views of the other authorities he quoted.

• (3:10 p.m.)

I am inclined to agree with him that the powers of parliament over banking are very extensive. Why then have I hesitated so far to proceed with legislation? I have felt that even though it might have been possible to go further in extending our legislative jurisdiction over banking it was important, first of all, to deal with urgent problems, and one of the urgent problems is the insurance of deposits, something upon which there has been widespread agreement in the house. I believe it is important, at this stage of the development of our financial institutions, that the ordinary citizen, who is not in much of a position to tell the difference between the financial worth of the institutions that are competing for his deposits, should have some assurance that his savings are not going to be destroyed by depositing them with an institution that founders either because of lack of liquidity or because of bad management.

If we had proceeded otherwise, if we had proceeded on the assumption that our legislation extending jurisdiction in the field of banking would be valid, we would nevertheless risk the possibility that, notwithstanding the confidence which we might have in all the authorities, including the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), about the scope of federal jurisdiction, someone would have the temerity to challenge it, in which case there would have been long delays while our legislation was being tested in the courts before it could become effective. Therefore I felt it was important that we should proceed along lines that I believed would not arouse such a challenge.

Moreover this is the reason why, in the legislation that is before us, we are requiring that the provinces should agree before any provincial institution accepts deposit insurance. We do not want to risk the possibility of a challenge which would interfere with the extension of deposit insurance as quickly as possible to as many depositors and as many institutions as possible.

From the discussions I have had personally with provincial ministers and that my officials have had with provincial officials, I know that in practically all of the provinces of this country there is a desire that this legislation come into effect immediately. The Attorney General of the province of British Columbia has said that he will recommend that institutions which accept deposits in that province should be compelled to take out federal insurance. I am hopeful that other provinces will do likewise because nothing will serve better to make this system universal throughout the country than declarations like that by various provincial governments.

I say that because a provincial deposit-taking institution may be able to get some insurance for its deposits within the province of its incorporation, but I do not think that any province would have the power to insure deposits taken by its institution in another province. Therefore if the province of British Columbia, for example, were to compel all deposit-taking institutions, whether British Columbian, federal or provincial, to be federally insured, then a trust company incorporated, say, in the province of Quebec would be unable to accept deposits in the province of British Columbia unless it were federally insured. This is the argument for federal jurisdiction in this field.

It is important that we should have uniform financial regulations, uniform banking regulations and uniform laws in relation to banking generally. I do not dispute this point at all. However, Mr. Speaker, I do suggest to the house that this is the practical thing to do under existing circumstances in order to extend the kind of protection and inspection that is so much needed across the country.

There are one or two other points upon which I should comment. First, I should add a word or two to what I said in my opening speech with respect to the interim arrangements. I have made two proposals, one of which is in the bill and the other in my speech. In the bill it is provided that provincial institutions may be insured with the approval of the provincial authorities, the provincial governments.

I also said in my opening speech today that in order to expedite the extension of insurance to provincial institutions it was contemplated that the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation would be prepared to cover all the deposit-accepting trust and loan companies of a province if the province concerned so requests even before the corporation has made an examination into the affairs of the individual companies and ascertained if they are eligible to pay for insurance.

I went on say that the provinces will be expected to accept some share of financial responsibility during the period while these institutions have not been examined to see whether they comply with the requirements of the corporation itself. I think this is a proper step to take because I feel it is most important the scheme should come into effect as soon as possible and that it should come into effect uniformly.

I do not believe it would be adequate to bring institutions in as we find the time and the men to do the inspections. I believe we will have to take some chances and bring in the provincial institutions even before there has been adequate time for this work. If a province agrees to this and makes some arrangements about sharing the financial costs or losses, then we can accomplish our major objective.

Some question was raised about the definition of deposits. It is a very technical question. I hope we can defer it until we get the bill before the committee on finance, to which I intend to refer it after second reading.

The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) asked me who will receive the dividends of the corporation. The answer is that I will as Minister of Finance. These accrue only to the federal government; there are no other shareholders of the corporation.

The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) asked if I would consider the possibility of a differential in premiums because of the difference in risks. We gave some consideration to that possibility but we discarded it because, even though we are confident our federal institutions are sound and are adequately supervised, there may be other provincial institutions that are equally sound, and the problem of trying to differentiate between the financial integrity of institutions would be beyond the capacity of the corporation. Therefore we have decided that it would be better to have a uniform premium.

I thought that in the course of his remarks the hon. member for Kamloops suggested that the only pressures were coming from the, shall I say, less viable institutions, from those institutions whose standards are not as high as the banks and federal trust and loan companies. This is not altogether true. Perhaps the best example is what happened the other day with the Montreal City and District Bank, which is probably one of the soundest and most conservatively managed banks in the country, and yet there was a run on it. That run was based on ignorance but these things can happen in the best regulated institutions. The existence of deposit insurance would have prevented that run. The depositors would have known that their money was safe. This is an argument altogether apart from the question of improving the financial standards of institutions for deposit insurance on a universal basis.

I think that is enough for me to say at this time, Mr. Speaker. When the bill is before the standing committee on finance I shall have a few minor amendments to propose to it.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs.

CANADIAN FILM DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

PROVISION FOR DEVELOPMENT OF FEATURE FILM INDUSTRY

The house resumed, from Friday, January 27, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-204, to provide for the establishment of a Canadian Film Development Corporation—Miss LaMarsh—Mr. Richard in the chair.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): When the committee rose on Friday, January 27, clause 2 of the bill was under consideration.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Chairman, before we pass clause 2 I should like to make one or two comments. On Friday last we were discussing this matter, and I should not like to accuse the minister of misleading the house but when hon. members on this side requested that an opportunity be provided for individuals interested directly in this legislation and its specifics to comment and make their representations to the appropriate committee of the house the minister said, as reported at page 12375 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I have received absolutely no representations from any source asking for such a matter to be referred to committee.

Obviously if one takes the literal meaning of that sentence, as I am sure the minister does, that would be correct. What is misleading is that in the past few months a number of requests for interviews with the minister have been made, particularly by the Directors' Guild, in order that they could discuss the specifics of this measure. For some reason or another the minister was not able to meet with representatives of that guild. This is not only an unfortunate situation but one that is rather odd.

The bill now under discussion will establish a feature film industry in this country. Surely no one is unaware of the difficulties involved in establishing a feature film industry in a country such as ours with such a small population. There are not that many people here who have any concern in this matter and, what is perhaps more important, there are few who have the ability to make a feature film industry a reality.

The majority of people interested in this measure are directly involved or connected with associations such as the Directors' Guild, and it seems very strange and disappointing that the minister should adopt what I can only term as a cavalier attitude toward these people who are trying to work within the framework of this particular legislative measure. To my knowledge there has been no real attempt on the part of the minister in the last six months to meet with these people and hear their representations in respect of the bill. It is my hope that what I can only refer to as bad faith on the part of the minister will become good faith as we move toward the implementation of this program. On behalf of the members of this house I sincerely request the minister to adopt a more sensible and purposeful attitude in respect of representations which have and will be made. I hope she will show some positive reaction in this regard.

Subclauses (d) and (f) refer to a film-maker and film technician as individuals creatively engaged in film production or engaged in the technical or administrative aspects of film production. I should like to know whether or not this definition would include what might be classified as film writers, those people who actually write the script upon which a film is based. This is important inasmuch as script writers create the starting point of any feature film. For that reason I hope this definition does include these people, and I seek some clarification of this matter.

Miss LaMarsh: I am informed it does, yes.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister for some clarification about eligibility for assistance. A few years ago a group of Canadians of Ukrainian origin in the city of Oshawa and district organized a Ukrainian film club. They undertook to produce a film of feature length on a voluntary basis. They used their own technicians, directors and photographers. This group produced a feature film entitled "The Cruel Dawn", which depicted the Ukraine immediately after communist domination and the activities of the partisans, nationalists by nature, who resented this occupation. The film was made in and around Oshawa. I had the pleasure of viewing it. Its running time is about three hours and ten minutes and it is in colour.

This group worked on a purely voluntary basis and substantial expenditures were made out of their own pockets. It was a very wonderful and worth-while achievement and it highlights the efforts of Canadian groups who have an interest in projects of this kind.

My particular concern is whether or not such groups may receive assistance under the provisions of clause 10. This particular group is so enthusiastic about its first success it is considering another feature length film project. Perhaps the minister can indicate whether a group of this type will be eligible for financial assistance under the terms of this measure.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. member will see in looking at clause 10 that the terms are wide enough to include that type of project. However, as other hon.

members have mentioned at earlier stages of this bill, the real crux of getting any kind of film business going in this country is the question of distribution.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Whoever is the person appointed to act on behalf of the board to be appointed and hand out public moneys by way of loan, grant or purchase of a share will have to be certain that the product will be seen somewhere. I do not know what the Canadians mentioned by my hon. friend may have done in the way of distribution, whether it was done through libraries, Ukrainian societies or something of that kind, but I do not think it has been considered that that kind of distribution would be sufficient. I suppose that distribution would have to be related to the amount of money being sought. Where the amount of money was small and perhaps 200 film societies were involved, it might be something the board would accept, but if a large amount of money were involved and perhaps only half a dozen people were involved that might be another matter. Each package would have to be looked at by the board.

I would hope, as I said before, that they will look at these matters with a pretty cold eye without being completely bankers, because if we wanted ordinary bankers we would not be setting up this board. The board will have to take a chance on something; otherwise films like "Tom Jones" would not be produced. In other words, it is not a matter of just getting rid of $10 million of tax money.

If I might answer the first speaker, I have not seen the Directors' Guild. I have not had very much time of late to see people, particularly since the beginning of centennial year. But yesterday or the day before I sent a telegram to the president of the Directors' Guild inviting him to see me at the beginning of next week. In any event, I undertake to see him before I appoint the officers who will deal with this program and before the regulations are set up. After telling the house last week that no one had asked to have this matter taken before a committee I checked again with every member of my staff who is concerned and ascertained that this is correct. No one has asked to appear before a committee. The burden of the representations we have received has amounted to: Get on with it, pass the bill, set up the board, and let us get into business.

Mr. Brand: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks on clause 2 of the bill. In doing so, at the outset I would say that I thoroughly agree with the motives of the minister and of this legislation in attempting to set up a truly Canadian feature film industry. As I look at clause 2 I can see its many advantages to film-makers in this country. It will give an opportunity to our creative artists, writers, producers, technicians, and what have you, to produce feature films.

Over the past few months on the few occasions this matter has been before the house in resolution and bill form many eloquent speeches have been made. I have no desire to be repetitious in this regard, but would point out that while Canada would rate only a footnote, I suppose, in any book on the world's best motion pictures, films have been made in this country since before 1900. That is a long time ago. So we already have a good basis in this country on which to build a feature film industry.

It may be of interest to hon. members to know that from 1917 to 1930 feature motion films were made in Canada. They were filmed in Ottawa, Montreal, Trenton, Cobourg, Toronto, Calgary, Fort William, Saint John, Banff, Vancouver and Victoria—in fact, all across the country. These were not shorts and productions of that nature, they were feature films. Admittedly, many of them were failures and did not make much money but some of them did make money. It is an interesting sidelight to note that the most expensive and ambitious of these was a film called "Carry on Sergeant", filmed in Trenton, Ontario. It cost $500,000, which was at that time, and is still, a considerable amount of money. At that time it was a very large sum indeed. Unfortunately in the United States, at exactly the time this silent film was to be distributed, a film called "The Jazz Singer", starring Al Jolson, appeared and opened the era of talking pictures. That was, of course, the first talking motion picture. As a result the Canadian production "Carry on Sergeant" was not able to carry on at all and fell flat on its financial face.

We are all aware of the success of the National Film Board, Crawley Films and other private companies. I will not go into that matter further. So we do have an honoured tradition in film making in this country. It is possible, and I emphasize the word "possible", to make Canadian films with Canadian people involved. It will probably come as a surprise to the minister to realize that in my home constituency of Saskatoon, the garden city of the prairies, if I may speak with pardonable pride, even there in the vast expanses of western Canada we have a budding film industry. We have there, under the very capable direction of Mr. Richard Savage, a theatrical company known as the Circle in the Centre. Incidentally, it is a professional theatrical company and is in better financial condition than any other such company in Canada, including the Neptune in Halifax and certainly the Crest in Toronto. Our professional theatrical company is in the black and has already produced one talking picture. Admittedly it is only half an hour in length, but nevertheless it is of excellent quality. This is a beginning of what can be achieved in this part of the world. This illustrates the fact that we have a very useful motion picture industry in western Canada.

I should now like to return to my earlier statement that it is possible to make Canadian films with Canadian personnel involved. I say it is possible, but is it probable? If we pass this bill, as I am sure we shall, will we be providing loans or backing for Canadian film-makers, producers, technicians and what have you? Frankly, Mr. Chairman, in the present situation I do not believe this is probable. What we will be doing is providing money to film-makers and technicians in Canada, but the choice of who is to be involved in these productions will be strictly under the control of a union in the United States of America.

Clause 2 of the bill defines film activity, film-maker, film production and film technician. When one considers this matter one finds that these people are controlled from New York. Are we going to give money collected through taxes on our people to a Canadian film industry and then have no say or have our say interfered with by an international union with regard to who shall be involved in production? This is a problem about which I am sure the minister is more than aware. I have grave doubts about voting for a bill that will provide money for a Canadian film industry which, as I have said, will actually be controlled from New York, Chicago or Hollywood.

Until that matter is settled this bill will be just another example of subsidizing the United States by tax dollars from Canadian citizens, and I think this is deplorable. Anything which militates against Canadian sovereignty I must in all conscience oppose. I see the minister is nodding her head. I know she knows the union to which I am referring, the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees and Moving Picture Machine Operators of the United States and Canada, known shortly as IATSE. When you listen to the word IATSE you realize it has a certain connotation which will be obvious in a moment.

As I have mentioned, its headquarters are in New York, Chicago and Hollywood. Admittedly the union of electricians and stage hands based in Toronto does have some Canadian autonomy and is able to make some decisions based on Canadian problems. However, I would defy anyone to produce a film without cameramen. It is very difficult indeed. Local 644 in Toronto is merely a branch. The headquarters of this union are in New York and all the executive officers reside there. Its interests are United States interests, not Canadian. For example, the contract which the producers of a film in this country sign must be dictated by New York. This is certainly true in the eastern part of Canada. I believe it is true that one of the sections of the contract states that there shall be no use of British cameramen or other technical personnel in the production of a film unless specifically agreed to by the New York headquarters. Of course in most instances they will not agree. In other words they say: Do as we say or we will throw a picket line around you and put you out of business. This is what has happened.

I have before me a brief presented by the Canadian film cameramen's local to IATSE. I should like to read into the record part of what the Canadian film cameramen say about this problem. It appears on page 3 of the brief which was presented in 1964. May I say to the house once again that the problems I am delineating today will be brought before the executive officers of IATSE this evening in Toronto. The brief reads in part as follows:

> Canadian cameramen are getting no professional recognition because when a producer wishes to use a union crew in Canada he must contact the New York or Hollywood local and these locals would give preference to their own American members. In fact, they have done little for the film cameramen employed in Canada, and as far as that goes, in the Canadian film industry generally. It is understandably so if you consider that their own organizers and business agents are concerned mainly with the affairs in the United States which are vastly greater than the problems in Canada.

Then the brief goes on to describe the problem which they had in Toronto with a local business agent from New York who came to Canada and created such a terrible impression that they got together and threw him out.

At the top of page 4 the brief goes on to say:

> Moreover, the interest of the United States locals 644 and 659 are diametrically opposed to the interest of their Canadian members. To the American cameramen's locals, films for T.V. and features made anywhere outside of New York or Hollywood are second rate, and an encroachment of their security and they would be quite happy to see Canada without any film industry whatever.

What a formidable obstacle to place before the best intentioned bill of the minister which we are discussing now. With such an obstacle it will be very difficult to establish a truly Canadian feature film industry. Unfortunately, as the minister knows only too well, the problem is still before us even as we discuss this bill. This group has asked, and is asking again tonight, that local 644 allow the Canadian cameramen to form an autonomous Canadian union so that Canadian problems can be decided here and not in New York. The brief continues:

> Moreover, we feel that if the charter was granted to those in Canada that the International would, in fact, make a real contribution to the development of the Canadian film industry.

It can be asked: why do they not join another union or form their own? As the minister knows, it has been tried. They have not been able to get local autonomy. They went to Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labour Congress but he refused to interfere. He said it was a local problem. After all, we must recognize that the C.L.C. is also affiliated with some United States unions. Perhaps this is understandable. Some employees of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and of the National Film Board have formed a local union with the C.N.T.U. However, I will not go into details on that. The whole matter is in a state of flux right now. In looking at this bill one might say that it is a wonderful idea to have film-makers, film technicians and film producers creating Canadian films. Yet this will not actually happen until something is done to overcome the problem of United States domination of the Canadian film industry. Our Canadian sovereignty is a matter of paramount importance which must be settled before this bill goes into effect. I would certainly like to hear the minister's view on how she intends to do this before money is allotted to Canadian film-makers.

In Saturday Night of September, 1966 there was an excellent article describing the situation. The headline reads: "Thanks, Yanks, For All That You've Done, or Why There Isn't A Canadian Feature Film Industry". The article is written by Harold Arthur. The subheading reads: "Unless A big American Union Called IATSE Is Forced To Re-assess Its Role, The Industry Is Doomed". I have spoken to film cameramen in this country, as I know the minister has, and they agree with this assessment.

Of course the matter of distribution is very important. The minister knows only too well that every feature film that is produced must be 99.441 per cent IATSE—like the soap—and must have a IATSE seal before the distributors will touch it. What can this union do if we do not go along with them? As is stated on page 1 of this article:

> In effect, what IATSE demands is that Canadians should play by American rules, but with none of the Americans' advantages...In other words, as far as IATSE is concerned, we are not supposed to make features at all.

Farther down it reads:

> Whether they admit it or not, IATSE in Canada owe first allegiance to headquarters in the U.S.A.

There is one pungent comment here regarding what some of the members of the local would not do without first getting permission from the United States, but in the interests of parliamentary usage I will refrain from quoting that portion of the article. However, I would like to read an example of what a big United States union can do to a Canadian production. The article reads as follows:

> As an example of what the cameramen can do when they have the help of the 873 members—

That is local 873, composed of electricians, etc.

> —there was the incident last summer when a crew from Labrinthe (the National Film Board's contribution to Expo) arrived in Toronto to film a circus sequence at Maple Leaf Gardens. Telling the story, Cole, the Toronto business agent—

I understand the minister knows him very well.

> —comes on as the unhyphenated Canadian. "This was supposed to be a Canadian project for all the world to see," he says, "and we thought they should have a Canadian cameraman". What happened was that IATSE objected to the presence of Walter Lassaly, internationally renowned British cameraman (Tom Jones, Zorba the Greek), who had been hired by the Film Board specially for the project. "We have Canadians right here who could have done the job as well," said Cole, "so we threw them (the National Film Board) out of the Gardens. I'd do it again if I had to."

• (3:50 p.m.)

Since Cole had the support of IATSE electricians at the Gardens there was nothing the Labrinthe people could do. Had they tried to start filming, IATSE could have pulled the switch and put Gardens, circus, and spectators in darkness. The Film Board retreated.

The author of the article goes on to wonder if they would have objected as strongly if Lassaly had been from the United States. I continue the quotation:

> To Canadian film workers, that's a wonderful straight line. What puts a final, baffling seal to it all is that the circus sequence was eventually filmed successfully in Milwaukee, in the good old U.S. of A.

This is a classic example of what can be done. You may perhaps wonder, Mr. Chairman, why with the tremendous power this union exerts on Canadian cameramen they would want to join that union or have a local here. Why would they not be happier with their own organization in this country, because the distributors undoubtedly would distribute film as long as there was a union label on it? I think the answer is an honest one, and it comes from these cameramen. They need the help and the experience of the cameramen and others in the IATSE organization in the United States. They need their help. If they get an autonomous local here, they need to be able to go back and forth and ask for help. They need to have this type of experienced help in order to build up a reasonable film industry.

In addition they need the right, and it is in the bill, if they want to make a contract with British film-makers to be able to do so without IATSE excluding the British film-makers. I think this is a serious problem of Canadian autonomy and it relates to what we are going to do with the $10 million and whether it is going to be controlled from the good old United States.

I am sorry the Minister of Manpower and Immigration is not in the house because with his vast experience with unions he could perhaps shed some light on what could be done about urging the union, with its headquarters in New York, to allow an autonomous union here. Perhaps something could be done through the Department of External Affairs with the Secretary of State of the United States to urge upon the union the necessity for allowing a totally autonomous Canadian branch. I feel this is a very difficult question with which to deal. I should like to hear what the minister has to say on this important question. I, of course, support the principle of the bill the minister has introduced because I believe in the idea. I believe it is a marvellous idea. However, I feel we must be able to make these films without any United States strings attached.

Mr. Prittie: Will the hon. member permit a question? Without deprecating any of the points he has brought out in his speech, I may say it sounded very much like a speech the new Minister without Portfolio might make. Would the hon. member suggest to the federal government and to the ten provincial governments that they pass laws declaring that all unions and businesses within Canada must immediately become autonomous? Is this what he wants?

Mr. Brand: I do not think that has anything to do with the problem here. I believe the fact of the matter is, that we are providing public money to set up a business. If we are going to attempt to have a completely Canadian film industry, how can we have it if the decisions as to how that film industry is going to be run come from New York, Chicago or Hollywood? I think that is the key. I am not attacking the unions or anything else. What I am attacking is the concept of one union in another country having complete control of the actions of an industry which will be supported by public funds. I think that is a very important concept. As you know, local 873 is autonomous but local 644 is merely a branch of the New York union. When the executive is referring to this union they go so far as to delineate the area of the branch as extending to the northern boundaries of Canada. This is the way it is put now. This may sound like a choice for Canada but I think it sounds more like a choice for the House of Commons at the moment.

Mr. Prittie: I do not dispute the points the hon. member makes. They are valid. However, there are many aspects of Canadian life such as unions, businesses and so on, so how is the hon. member going to solve the problem? Is it going to be solved for this industry only or does he suggest this action for all industries?

Mr. Brand: Quite frankly, being a Canadian I should like to see all unions in this country have autonomy over their own affairs in cooperation with unions in other countries. However, I do not agree and I would never agree that any group in this country can or should be controlled from another country. I think it should be totally Canadian. We have sovereign rights over the whole of the country.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Corporation established.

Mr. Prittie: Clause 3, Mr. Chairman, deals with the establishment of the corporation. If I may, I should like to refer to clause 4, the appointment of the members and chairman of the board. Is it the intention that the chairman shall be the government film commissioner?

Miss LaMarsh: No.

Mr. Prittie: Is it the intention that the chairman of the board shall receive any payment other than ordinary expenses?

Miss LaMarsh: No.

Mr. Prittie: In that case, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that this might be changed. It seems to me that the person who will be chairman will be quite active in consultation from time to time with the executive director of the organization. I thought of this yesterday when we were questioning the director general of the British Broadcasting Corporation. They too have a chairman, a layman, in addition to the executive. Their chairman is required to do a great deal of work for the corporation in dealing with the executive staff. He does receive an indemnity in addition to his expenses. I wondered about this because if a person is coming to Ottawa, or wherever the headquarters will be, and spending a great deal of time away from his ordinary occupation, then some type of indemnity ought to be considered.

Miss LaMarsh: I can only draw an analogy with the current situation in the film board. There is no film commissioner at the moment but the two acting commissioners and the chairman of the board, designated by the board in the absence of the film commissioner, do not receive any additional fees. It is expected that the film development board will, of course, have to meet fairly frequently at the beginning to set out its regulations and procedures, but thereafter it is expected the chairman will be like the chairman of many other boards such as the Canada Council, and will be someone who is sufficiently interested in it that he will serve with energy and enthusiasm but without a stipend.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): I was glad to hear the minister say that the government film commissioner would not be chairman of the Canadian Film Development Corporation. However, I think it is somewhat strange that the film commissioner is a member of the board. Clause 5 states quite clearly that no person is eligible to hold office as a member of the corporation who has, directly or indirectly or as a shareholder, partner or otherwise, any pecuniary interest in commercial film activity. What we will have on the board will be people with some experience in the arts generally or in some aspect of business other than one directly related to the production of films. Yet one member of this board will not only be knowledgeable in this field but will be responsible for one of the largest film companies in this country, the National Film Board.

I would say that this makes for a very difficult situation at best. I remember when some years ago the government of another day set up two positions, one being the chairman of the National Film Board and the other the government film commissioner. It was clearly defined that these were two separate positions, each with its own responsibilities; but through the years there came to be a kind of melding and finally the person who was chairman of the film board was also the government film commissioner. I think this has created some little difficulty from time to time.

I am very much afraid that on a board of this type, where one person would have experience and I would say an advantage in certain aspects, there might be very great pressure on the government film commissioner to take over as chairman. If he did not take over as the legal chairman he might become a kind of de facto chairman.

There is also the increased danger—and I think it is a danger—that it would then open up the way for the National Film Board to become a producer of feature length films, and there is nothing in the present films act passed some four or five years ago to prevent this. It has been doing this in the past and there is no reason to believe that it might not want to do feature films in the future, as it does seem one of the major sources of exposition.

Frankly, Mr. Chairman, I find it difficult to justify in my own mind, when we are establishing a feature Film Development Corporation—which is basically a business enterprise and I think must be regarded as such—the proposition that it should be tied to a crown corporation which is in the business of making movies for various government departments and various cultural agencies of the government, and is committed to a certain task, yet is in a very restricted field of activity. To give the National Film Board a privileged relationship I am afraid will impede, in fact inter, the development of what must become a businesslike proposition.

Frankly, Mr. Chairman, the minister has not yet justified to my mind this afternoon the necessity for having a government film commissioner at all as a member of this board and giving him this particular advantage over the others who, as it is stated very clearly in the bill, have no direct interest in or relationship to the motion picture industry.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I have not discussed this particular point with the officials who were advising us in the drafting of this legislation, but I think that the purpose of the presence of the film commissioner is a fairly clear-cut one.

As the hon. member probably knows, countries may sign cultural agreements. Canada has already signed a cultural agreement with the Republic of France. Such an agreement has been under negotiation for some time with the United Kingdom and with Italy; and I discussed this with the appropriate minister and officials while I was in Italy in the fall.

The signing of such agreements will also permit the signing of co-production agreements between countries. Once those agreements are in force the individual agreements between individual companies may be made. The co-production agreements are, we feel, particularly important because again they are the key to distribution abroad, particularly in countries like Italy where the actual movie houses themselves are owned or influenced by the state. Such agreements can guarantee that Canadian movies at once have entrée to all of the hundreds and hundreds of movie houses throughout Italy.

So the film commissioner, Mr. Chairman, as the managing head of the film board is the person responsible for advising my office and the government generally on co-production agreements and cultural agreements which may involve film work. He is the adviser to the government apropos of films, and it was thought most appropriate that he be there.

However, there is no suggestion—though I think from time to time this may have been raised—that the film board would attempt to strangle this industry to preserve itself. Indeed we think that what may very well happen is that some of the film makers on the film board themselves may, in a sort of moonlighting or part time way, go out and make their own films and apply for a grant or a loan of one kind or another.

We hope that the two corporations will provide two different slices of the needed pie to produce films for various purposes within and without the country. I really cannot suggest any reason for thinking that there will be any kind of conflict or that the commissioner would have a weighted position on the board. He will simply be there to liaise—and liaison is very important—in the matter of information and expertise between the film board and this new board with respect to eventual agreement.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): If I may, Mr. Chairman, this is the very thing I was afraid of, and the minister has spelled it out very clearly. The government film commissioner, who will be a member of the board, will in fact be involved in very serious negotiations. The minister mentioned co-production rights, which will become more and more important to a country which seeks to enhance and develop its own feature film industry; but in saying this she indicated the very source of what I think will be a major problem.

I think it would be acceptable—at least, at first glance it is acceptable—if the government film commissioner were put into an independent position. But, in effect, the government film commissioner is the managing operator of the National Film Board and thus is, at one, both going to carry on very consequential negotiations for this feature film corporation and also run a motion picture company of his own.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, may I just correct that. He is not going to be carrying on negotiations for this new board. These negotiations are conducted between this country and another country, and he is the adviser to the government when it is dealing with other governments in executing these agreements. The agreements are over-all agreements. As far as the individual agreements are concerned, a person may come along who wants to produce a film, and he will have to make his own agreement with somebody else in another country in the over-all framework. These co-production agreements are pretty general; but the commissioner will have nothing to do with the specific agreements which will have to be engaged in.

Mr. Prittie: Mr. Chairman, I am not worried about the point that the government film commissioner will be on the board of the corporation; I think he should be, though I do not think he should be chairman. I did ask the minister about this and she gave me the assurance that this was not the intention.

One of the points the hon. member for Prince made was that the government film commissioner is the representative of an agency which will be a competitor in the feature film industry. I brought this point up two weeks ago in a question to the minister. I stated that there had been some complaint about a current production of the National Film Board, which is co-operating with the C.B.C. in the making of a film in Quebec and in Vancouver called "Waiting for Caroline". This is a feature and entertainment film and there had been some complaint about it.

I have not asked for a legal opinion whether or not this is within the mandate of the National Film Board, but I suggest that the problem will probably be self-correcting. As a feature film industry develops in this country those in the private film industry will probably ask the government to restrict the feature film industry to the private companies and the National Film Board to the documentary, educational, information type of film.

As I said last week, the thought of the National Film Board making feature films in co-operation with the C.B.C. does not bother me; but I am sure that, once we do have a private feature film industry, that industry will insist that that particular field be reserved to them.

Mr. Brand: I wish to ask the minister a question, as she mentioned co-production and the film commissioner. Will he be the one to advise on union problems which will arise? I ask this question because I did not hear her comments on this very serious problem I outlined a few minutes ago.

Miss LaMarsh: I would not expect that any one member of the board would be advising on this. Problems such as this which may occur may not be problems to be dealt with on a production by production basis. Some of the threats made are that there might be no distribution if union members are not used, because of agreements between the union in New York and a major distribution company. My response to such a threat was that I felt the public was getting a bit fed up with this kind of highway robbery, that Canadian cameramen were quite able to stand on their own feet, capable of being hired on merit, and they did not need somebody trying to beat potential employers into hiring them because they happened to live in a particular area.

I answered a question of my hon. friend in the house, that the members of the film board were the persons against whom the threats were made in the first place. In making this feature film in the Toronto area without IATSE performers, it would not be distributed but it might be shown on C.B.C. The implication was that either IATSE members outside the film board be used, or members of the film board be required to become IATSE members. The acting commissioner, independently, shared my view and took my position, that is, that I do not think it is the government's responsibility to tell people what union to join. We do not intend to tell them. In fact, members of the film board, anticipating the passage of bills referring to agencies of government, as well as to the public service, are joining a rival union. They have not much interest in this IATSE union. I do not know if Mr. Cole, since the interview I had with him, is attempting to pursue his threat. One group from which we might expect an approach is distributors of Canadian made films. We did not find much alarm in these cases, and we have the assurance that we have nothing to worry about.

It seems to me that we should put this problem squarely before the public, to let public opinion clear it up before it becomes a bruise on an infant industry. I am happy to know that any member I have on my staff shares my view that the new industry will not be strangled by any kinds of irresponsible action.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—Appointment of members.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Chairman, returning to the matter raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond, I feel that throughout this bill there is a tendency to show what is contemplated as a very lighthearted occasional occupation. Surely the minister's remark that no consideration has been given to providing some form of subsidization for the person to be the chairman of the board means that this will be a very casual endeavour indeed. Even the appointment of an executive director, if there is one, is not suggested specifically. The bill says "may on recommendation of the committee appoint an executive director".

If the executive may be appointed, if all the board members will be occasional people receiving a travel allowance and some form of daily indemnity, and if the only full time person will be the government film commissioner who has a full time job and who will be there because of his particular responsibility, who will be spending time on this matter —because it will take time?

I appreciate the willingness of the minister to enter into this responsibility; I do not know whether that means she is resigning and planning to take up the appointment of chairman or executive director—

An hon. Member: She wants a C.B.C. job.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): There is no provision for sending anybody from the C.B.C.

Mr. Pepin: She will be the star of the films.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): I have a picture of the minister, and she looks a possible star in some future epic.

Miss LaMarsh: Yukon Eric.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): I am concerned that the chairman is not more specifically dealt with in this bill. For the minister's consideration I suggest adding this phrase—what I suggest might allow somebody with some stature, with some willingness to be approached, for him to give his time. This will take time. Over the next four or five years it will demand a great amount of energy from the people specifically charged with this responsibility. Returning to the point, I suggest therefore in clause 4(2) after the words "during pleasure" adding, "who shall receive a yearly honorarium to be determined by the Governor in Council". This would give us a start, and we could ask for a chairman who could bear responsibility. This matter will take from 50 to 75 per cent of his time, and I think in the first critical years the chairman will have to spend from 50 to 75 per cent of his working time in developing the full aims of this board. This leaves the government free, in consultation with this board, to determine what support will be necessary. Would the minister be willing to accept that phrase, to allow for greater flexibility?

Miss LaMarsh: I see no harm in accepting such a phrase, but it depends on what the chairman says. I do not know, constitutionally, whether my hon. friend can move the amendment.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): I am not moving; I am suggesting.

Miss LaMarsh: If it meets with the approval of the committee I do not object. If the remuneration is as little as $1 a year—and I would certainly undertake that we would try to get this service free—it would still be a charge on the treasury. It may be that we shall have to pay something to get the right person. I think there is no objection to the phrase. Is it written?

[Mr. MacDonald (Prince).]

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): I will write it.

Miss LaMarsh: While the chairman is considering the matter, I suggest, even if the payment is $1 a year it could become a charge on the treasury, and it might not be appropriate to receive this amendment without a resolution. We are long past the resolution stage and I hope we do not hold this measure up. If the chairman is prepared to accept the amendment without a resolution, I have no objection. Perhaps it might be better to say "may" instead of "shall".

• (4:20 p.m.)

The Chairman: The question before the Chair at the moment is whether or not the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Prince is in order. It is necessary to determine whether there is a charge imposed on the treasury, which is not provided for in the resolution. The resolution says, in part—> —to make grants to film makers and film technicians, to otherwise advise and assist the producers of Canadian feature films; to provide for the administration of the said corporation—

In view of the fact that the resolution provides for the administration of the corporation, I would rule the amendment to be in order.

Miss LaMarsh: Did Your Honour say you ruled it to be in order?

The Chairman: Yes. In order.

Miss LaMarsh: Are you suggesting that the hon. member may move it himself?

The Chairman: I understood that the hon. member had moved the amendment.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): That was not my understanding. I do know that it is possible for the minister to make this motion if she is willing to accept this suggestion.

An hon. Member: No, she cannot.

Mr. Hellyer: If it would help regularize the proceedings I would be glad to move the amendment on behalf of the hon. lady.

The Chairman: I do not know whether that is necessary, but if it is satisfactory to the hon. member for Prince I will accept his suggested wording to be treated as an amendment, and it will be presented as having been moved by the Minister of National Defence.

Amendment (Mr. Hellyer) agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clauses 5 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 10—Objects.

Mr. Prittie: One question occurs to me on clause 10. Would films of an entertainment type on short subjects be regarded as films in which investments could be made? Or would it be feature films exclusively?

Miss LaMarsh: It is my understanding that this is intended to cover feature films. Subclause (1) of clause 10 says the objects of the corporation are to "foster and promote the development of a feature film industry in Canada." I think the purpose of this is to help create commercial feature films.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I should like to say a word on this clause. I was hoping the minister would go into more detail as to what is envisaged by the government by the policy put forward in the bill before us, and particularly in this clause. Paragraph (a) of 10(1) says the corporation may—> —invest in individual Canadian feature film productions in return for a share in the proceeds from any such production; . . .

What is the position of the taxpayers in cases where there are little or no proceeds from productions—in cases where a picture is a complete flop, as can happen on occasions? What happens in a case of this sort? Could the loan be recovered from the company out of the proceeds of some other feature film which might turn out to be successful? Or is the minister suggesting that the possibility of recovery is limited to the proceeds of any particular feature film in which an investment is made?

Miss LaMarsh: It is not my understanding that there is any intention to mortgage any asset owned by a film maker, apart from the film whose production is assisted. This is why we need a board which is careful and businesslike in its approach, investing in films which it believes to have a commercial chance. Without question there will be some mistakes. I have talked to dozens of film makers since we began to draft this bill. No one can tell which Broadway show will be a hit when it opens, and no one can tell what film will be accepted. For example, the film "Tom Jones" which was so well received in most parts of the world had a very shaky beginning. I am told that many experienced film makers would have absolutely nothing to do with the idea of a film on the subject, and investors were hard to find. They did not think the public would accept such a film.

Without question we shall lose some of this money but it is our hope that we shall pick up more on the swings than we lose on the roundabouts, though that remains to be seen.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): That is the question in my mind. It seems that when films are successful the government is only in a position to recover the investment it has made, if you can call it that, together with additional profits. But is it not the case that when a feature film is likely to be successful the company concerned would probably proceed with it in the absence of any assistance from the corporation, whereas in circumstances where doubt arises it would go to the government for support. There may be long shots which would pay off, but unless the minister can say something to reassure me, I believe there is a danger of the government being made the fall guy, to use a slang expression, in the interest of projects which may have doubtful prospects of financial success.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Miss LaMarsh: To go back to the case of "Tom Jones", this was a production which the British agency was afraid to touch. They considered it for a while, but all of a sudden other funds were found. Philip Terry, who is the executive director of the British corporation, just wishes they had invested in that film because of the returns it would have brought to the corporation. I have read of another film, "Never on Sunday", produced at a cost of $100,000 and which has grossed millions of dollars. I hope we will be lucky to get an investment in something like that. Far from being a fall guy, this is the purpose of the legislation,—to provide that extra boost to our Canadian industry which it has not had up until now. Bankers have feared the risk and there are just not enough angels in this country. This legislation will provide 20 million new angels and we hope that as good angels they will get a pat on the head from time to time.

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Chairman, with regard to the remarks just made, I only want to observe that the Canadian government is not setting any precedents in this connection. The European film industry has long set the example of state assistance, and several European countries have subsidized their film industry, because they felt that, in our day and age, that industry is extremely important for the prestige of any country. As a matter of fact, those countries thought it worth while to take risks, not only the risk of profit, but the opposite, the risk of loss.

But I am rising especially to make a few brief remarks and put a question to the minister concerning clause 10 (1) (e) which reads as follows:

> advise and assist the producers of Canadian feature films in the distribution of such films and in the administrative functions of feature film production.

At the resolution stage, discussion largely centred on the distribution problem and anyone even slightly acquainted with the question must recognize that it is basic, because no film industry—except possibly the Canadian film industry to date—produces films to let them lie on the shelves. Assuredly, the Canadian government intervention in the film industry is justified inasmuch as it is likely to ensure the development of this industry.

I do not have the slightest intention of advocating for instance the restriction, of foreign films circulation or distribution in Canada for even if we were to take the ridiculous decision of excluding foreign films from our theatres and of admitting only Canadian films, assuming that Canadian filmgoers would attend the showings in these conditions, we would not be able to pay for the production of such films from the Canadian box office returns.

Obviously, the only way we can have a Canadian feature film industry is by securing foreign distribution for them, at a profit.

Recently, an American, or rather international, film periodical stated that only American films could pay their way on the domestic market and that countries with a film industry much more important than that of Canada such as Italy, for instance, had to depend upon foreign distribution to pay much of the cost of their films, not to mention profits, of course. Therefore, I am inclined to be a little sceptical of the benefits of the legislation in this regard, because the question of distribution is not dealt with.

I also realize that several steps have to be taken, the first of these being the establishment of the corporation. In my opinion, this is the bill we needed to establish the corporation, but I would like the hon. minister to explain, if she can, what is meant in the paragraph dealing with assistance in the field of film distribution.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Section 10(1)(d) provides for the making of grants to film makers and film technicians. Does this include film writers?

Miss LaMarsh: I am informed that it does.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Section 10(1)(e) provides for the corporation to—> —advise and assist the producers of Canadian feature films in the distribution of such films and in the administrative functions of feature film production.

The minister has talked about the board arranging for films to be distributed on what seems to be an ad hoc basis. This is one area in which we are going to have the most difficulty when the board is established. We have a movie exhibition industry in this country which has relied almost completely on films from other countries, and for the exhibitors suddenly to dislocate their consumption of foreign films so that they can start showing Canadian films will demand considerable expertise, not only at the federal level but at the provincial level as well. Has any consideration been given to holding some kind of federal-provincial consultation on distribution? Has the minister any idea what reception will be given to feature films produced in this country? The experience to date is a pretty unhappy one.

Miss LaMarsh: The interdepartmental committee has had some dealings with the owners of movie houses, particularly in Canada, and other agencies have had some dealings with distribution houses outside the country. I had a talk some ten days ago with the Canadian producer, Mr. Crawley, and asked how he got a distribution contract for "The Luck of Ginger Coffey". He replied that one experience can be pretty harrowing, but having once received it one knows what to look for after that.

With respect to clause 10(1)(e) I expect that the corporation will employ a specialist on distribution, a man who knows all the outlets. The government is not going to attempt to make distribution deals. The applicant will have a package effort to present to the board. He will have a story line, with his actors ready, his production agreement ready, and probably the completion bond ready. So far we have heard nothing which would indicate that we are going to have resistance.

But if we try to pass off a lot of second rate films, or art films, and wave a nationalist flag and say, "You fellows who show films in this country are going to have to show ours," we may find resistance. We have not taken that attitude. We have said. "Look at Canada's past record",—because we have produced some first rate films, but there is not much value in them because they have not been the subject of an effective distribution agreement. Through this measure individuals with a good story will not only get good distribution, but probably will be able to make deals with various markets—British, Swedish, Italian and others—who may be paying part of the cost. The agreements may be made with the governments of those countries or others who own movie houses. In those agreements there would be a provision for financial assistance and a guarantee as to distribution. There will also be included in respect of distribution some guarantee as to publicity. There is no point in putting on a good show and letting it die like a dog without any kind of publicity. We have all seen what happened to "Festival Canada". Money was spent in promoting it, and people came out to see it instead of just saying that because it is Canadian it could not be good.

Every individual project will have to be considered on the basis of its artistic and commercial quality, and if we think it is satisfactory and we should invest, there will be no problem. But there will have to be some kind of distribution agreement. There are not enough good movies made in this world at this time.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Perhaps this is a matter we should pursue, but it would serve no useful purpose during this debate to deal with the subject at length. We have now indicated that there is a critical problem which will have to be faced after we have had some experience, and when similar legislation is placed before us.

The third point I should like to refer to here relates to clause 10(2)(a).

Mr. Prittie: We are considering clause one, are we not?

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): I think we are considering clause 10 (2) (a), or perhaps the whole clause 10. That clause states in part:

(a) that the completed film will, in the judgment of the corporation, have a significant Canadian creative, artistic and technical content—

This is fundamentally important to this infant film industry. The paragraph then states:

—arrangements have been made to ensure that the copyright in the completed film will be benefically owned by an individual resident in Canada, by a corporation incorporated under the laws of Canada or a province or by any combination of such persons.

I am wondering whether or not this means that the individual who owns the corporation must be a resident of Canada or whether there are two separate categories, either an individual resident in Canada or a corporation incorporated in Canada.

Miss LaMarsh: It means either.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): In that event we run into the same situation referred to by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond. We may well be establishing an industry here which will benefit the interests of some other country, perhaps that country to the south. I can envisage a situation in which a film is made in this country and is Canadian in terms of its creative, artistic and technical aspects, but made by a corporation not necessarily resident but incorporated here. We might find companies such as M.G.M., Paramount or Twentieth Century Fox incorporating under provincial or federal statutes for the purpose of making a picture here. They would then take the profits back to the United States. In this way we would not improve the situation, although perhaps additional employment would be provided for local talent.

It is strange that the government did not spell out the provisions of this bill in the same way provisions are spelled out in respect of broadcasting. In that respect 75 per cent of the facilities must be Canadian owned. We made provisions in regard to broadcasting which seemingly we are not making in respect of the film industry. Some safeguard should be provided to protect the Canadian film industry.

Mr. Prittie: Before the minister answers the hon. member, perhaps I could pose another related question which she could deal with at the same time. I am concerned with the point raised by the hon. member for Prince regarding incorporation in Canada and substantial Canadian ownership.

In clause 10 (2) (a) appear the words:

—have a significant Canadian creative, artistic and technical content—

At this time a film entitled "The Trap" is being shown in theatres across Canada and elsewhere. This is a British production, most of which was filmed in British Columbia. Several Canadian actors were employed during its production, as well as certain Canadian technicians. The stars were British, and some British technical crew were brought over and employed. The processing of the film was done in the United Kingdom. Although some Canadian artists and technicians were employed in the production of this film, it would seem to me that it would not meet the requirements of clause 10 (2) (a).

Perhaps the minister could give some explanation as to what is meant by "significant Canadian creative, artistic and technical content". Percentages are laid down in the United Kingdom in respect of technical and artistic staff which must be used, as well as in respect of processing. Will there be any guide lines at all in Canada to make sure that there must be a percentage of Canadian content before a company can qualify for the benefits available under this measure?

Miss LaMarsh: We did not think we could stipulate by legislation that one must have so much ownership in a Canadian company before being eligible. Canadian tax laws will apply to those companies incorporated in Canada under provincial or federal statutes, but any company that is so incorporated is a Canadian corporation.

Each corporation will be considered by the board as to whether or not it is able to guarantee completion, and we do not expect such a guarantee will be provided in respect of a feature film by a fly-by-night company set up as a shell company for certain purposes. These companies will have to provide a completion guarantee and prove or show an ability before they will be eligible.

We feel we have gone as far as we can to make sure that not only does Canadian talent get an opportunity but that these films will in fact be Canadian productions. I agree with my hon. friend that the film "The Trap", while most enjoyable, using Canadian talent, scenery and facilities, is not the kind of film which would qualify under this act. In order to qualify it would have to be put together under a co-production agreement. There are no co-production agreements between the United States and Canada. One reason there are no agreements of that kind between the United States, Italy, the United Kingdom or other countries and Canada is that they are awaiting with interest the results of this proposed legislation. They now feel there is no point in signing a co-production agreement until we provide some kind of assistance. An astonishing number of people in this country and other countries of the world are waiting for the adoption of this measure.

Mr. Enns: I have the distinct impression that the National Film Board would be an agency, as a film producer, which might qualify under the provisions of this measure. Am I correct in that impression?

Miss LaMarsh: No, it could never qualify.

Mr. Brand: Is the minister aware of any arrangements to set up a 35 millimetre colour processing establishment in Canada? My understanding is that there is no such service available at this time and that this type of film is sent to the United States for processing. Have there been any discussions at all in this regard? Such a service would provide an inducement to the production or processing of such films in this country.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Miss LaMarsh: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I do not happen to know the answer to that question. I will be happy to get it. I notice that my officials sitting in the gallery are nodding their heads, indicating yes.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Chairman, I should like to return to this matter of ownership. I am indeed surprised that the minister says, very easily, that we felt we went about as far as we could go in this respect. I wonder whether she has in mind the cabinet of which she is a member, and a number of her associates who seemingly have no reserve about how things should be spelled out clearly in terms of Canadian ownership. I wonder whether the minister remembers her good friend to her left, whom she welcomed back to the cabinet a few weeks ago. Certainly what she has said seems to refute that warm welcome, in a sense at least.

The other thing that concerns me about ownership is this. The minister said that the possibility of fly-by-night companies getting involved in and being accepted by the feature film industry was very remote. I am not worried about fly-by-night companies; I am worried about the large companies, the million dollar, and I suppose approaching the billion dollar enterprises south of the border who would like to find some kind of loophole whereby they could establish themselves here. I think there is a loophole in this legislation big enough to push a whole movie studio through, and to permit not only ownership and maintaining a considerable amount of profit, which is one thing, but it will even adversely affect our whole balance of payments problem. We are dealing here with a million or billion dollar industry. There is even the more fearsome ogre, if you like, of control; for if control is not with Canadians, what will happen with respect to what in the end result we will be watching as so-called significant Canadian films?

I have no desire of arresting the development of a feature film industry which will present Canadian movies which will in fact be Canadian owned in terms of some kind of significant content spelled out in this bill. However, I am concerned that these movies will obviously not be Canadian when we ultimately see them. I believe it is imperative that we include in the bill at this point a phrase that will make it very clear to the officers of the corporation, and those who seek to produce feature films in this country, that we are interested in developing a genuine Canadian industry. I would suggest again, for the minister's consideration, that after the word "province" a phrase something like this be inserted: "and the shares of which shall be at least 51 per cent owned by Canadian residents." I think this would ensure the very real desire that lies behind this clause, namely that the ownership of our film industry should not be in the hands of those outside our country.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I think we must have a sense of proportion here. My hon. friend talks about these great big million or billion dollar corporations that will come into this country. Remember that this fund is a miserable $10 million. These billion dollar corporations will not be coming into Canada and trying to invade this country for the purpose of taking advantage of the fund. I went to see the studios of Di Laurentis in Cinecitta outside Rome. He had just finished making "The Bible", which cost well over $10 million. He had just sold the distribution rights for $10 million. He will not try to take over Canadian film-making, because if he wanted to produce a film in Canada he would do it right now. He does not need to make application to this corporation. We will not set up some sort of electronic boundary at the border to prevent any of these large sized moguls coming in and making their films. The purpose of this legislation is to help those people who need help to make films, not the very large corporations.

If it were not for the co-production agreements I would hope everybody employed in the industry would be Canadian and all the materials used would be Canadian. This is obviously the group to which this fund will appeal more than anyone else. I can tell hon. members that they are practically standing in line outside the House of Commons to get their stories and packages dealt with. When the legislation is passed, the board is set up and the regulations are established, there will be a real rush to take advantage of this measure.

I do not think we need concern ourselves that $10 million will fatten people in Hollywood, Nice, the Ealing studios, or anything of that kind. I suggest to my hon. friend that we should leave the matter as it is and give the program a while to operate. Let us gain a little experience in this field. As hon. members will see, the last clause of the bill deals with the matter of an annual report. One of the matters particularly to be dealt with will be the amount of assistance provided by the corporation and the kind of distribution involved. After the program has been operating a while parliament will be in a position to make amendments as we feel our way in this infant industry.

I would say to the hon. member for Saskatoon that the nodding wizards in the gallery inform me that there are three laboratories in Toronto which will be processing 35 millimetre colour films within the next three months.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the minister would suggest to her colleague the Minister without Portfolio that his task force keep a close and paternal eye on this particular clause.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister would like to change the expression she used "a miserable $10 million". It seems to me there was at one time another outspoken minister who got into trouble for using the expression, "What's a million?"

Development of Film Industry

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, as soon as I used the expression I could see the significant glances of some hon. members on the other side of the chamber. I would point out that everything is relative. Ten million dollars is the biggest sum in the world to me and so is a million. We must remember that hundreds of millions of dollars are involved in the production of some films. Therefore I hope that when hon. members opposite quote me as saying "a miserable $10 million" they will keep it relative to the very large sums which are concerned in this industry.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Is the minister saying that when this $10 million is exhausted, that is the end of the road as far as feature film development in this country is concerned?

Miss LaMarsh: It is a question whether it will be exhausted first, or whether I will be. That is all this bill provides, $10 million. If we are very fortunate, this will be a rotating fund and we will have more money coming in than we will have spent. The committee will notice that administrative costs and things of that nature are taken out of the $10 million and are not renewable as such. When this money is spent, if it ever is, or is reduced to a very small sum, as is the case at the present time in England, the house will have to assess the situation on the experience that has been gained. This is exactly what is happening in England now. Their program lasted for quite a long period, so they could see what would happen when the industry was assisted. They are now in the process of deciding whether to renew the fund or take the corporation out of existence.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the minister a question or two along this line. Could she give us some information about the experience of similar corporations in other countries? I suspect, as has been proven by the experience in the United Kingdom, according to the minister, that in the long run this program will be a losing proposition. With regard to the $10 million fund to which the minister has referred, will this amount, for the present at least, be a fairly firm ceiling? Will this money be invested, or is this to be just an interim measure to gain $10 million worth of experience, and not much more; or is the idea to come back to the house later to amend the bill and increase the fund?

Miss LaMarsh: There is no question about what has happened in England. This program has sparked a major industry in that country.

[Mr. Bell (Carleton).]

Everyone knows the number of films being produced in England and how very successful the whole industry has been. The English fund was one of the prime reasons for the success of the industry. We all know how many films are made in the United Kingdom by American, German and other film studios. It is true that the funds set aside have now been spun down to a point where they are really too small to be of much effect.

I am not suggesting that the $10 million will be all. I hope that by the time $10 million has been used and repaid 100 times over our feature film industry will be in full blast and will not need any further assistance. However I am not in the position now to guarantee that.

• (5:00 p.m.)

I wonder whether hon. members opposite would be disposed to not seeing the clock and perhaps continuing, in the hope that we may conclude the committee stage of the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.
