Mr. MacDonald (Prince): I must admit that the whole discussion sounds a bit like the saying about the chicken and the egg: Which comes first? Are we setting aside $10 million and then dreaming up a board which will decide how to spend this money, or are we setting up a board and saying to it that we will make $10 million available to assist it in getting a feature film industry off the ground? I would like to think that what the minister has just said will become a reality, but I have great doubts about it. She said that $10 million, in terms of the loans that will be repaid, will in the course of time produce a full-blown feature film industry in this country.

If such were to be the case we should be able to find the same situation existing in Great Britain today. But that is just not the case. We know that it is not enough to have an institution like the B.F.C. available to provide funds or loans for the production of worth-while feature films. The British have had to instal a very complex system known as the Eady plan to subsidize the distribution of their own feature films. Great Britain is a much more heavily populated country than Canada and obviously they have a much larger audience, and yet they are threatened by the same kind of foreign exposure as we are, being so close to the United States, an influence which plays such a large role in our cultural milieu.

I think that what will happen is that once we have launched this particular board we will find that additional steps will have to be taken. We will either have to introduce tariffs or establish a levy of some kind whereby the revenue collected from the production of foreign films can be used to subsidize Canadian production. This may prove to be a very acceptable system.

In this case my question about the ownership and the control of feature films becomes of paramount importance—and no pun is intended—because if it is possible to subsidize and produce films of "significant Canadian content", then it will be very profitable for any large film producers in the United States to come here and incorporate federally or provincially so as to benefit from our subsidization.

The minister knows from her own study of the British industry that attempts have been made by foreign film producers to benefit to a large extent from the Eady levy. I think this is something we must guard against in the establishment of this corporation.

This is why the good will expressed by the minister does not convince me at all, nor her assurances that it is not necessary to ensure that these corporations will not benefit from the production of Canadian films by including in the bill a stipulation that the majority ownership should be Canadian.

This is why I should like to ask again whether the minister would be willing to include the words: "and the shares of which shall be at least 51 per cent owned by Canadian residents". I think this is fundamental to guarantee a Canadian feature film industry.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I would prefer to leave the wording as it is. As my hon. friend knows I have tried to be co-operative, and I agreed to the last amendment. I must point out, however, that we are trying to get an industry started. We are not speaking about an industry that is well established and flourishing. I welcome, as do all my colleagues in the cabinet, the right kind of investment in this country. My hon. friend is very young and I am sure he has almost 100 years left as a member of parliament. Unlike myself he will be here in a few years to make an assessment of the situation, at which time we will be in a much stronger position to say whether or not this sort of thing is needed. I would ask him to consider the situation and to let it remain as it is. Let us get some more experience.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): I do not know why my age always comes up—

The Chairman: Order, please. It being five o'clock and in order that the house may proceed to consideration of private members business shall I rise, report progress and ask leave to sit at the next sitting of the house?

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I did ask hon. members whether they were disposed not to see the clock and to continue so as to complete the business. I thought there was unanimous agreement to my suggestion.

The Chairman: Is it agreed to continue with the discussion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): I do not know why my age seems to come up from time to time. I find that it seems to come up when I am on the winning side of the argument. Perhaps it is also strange that I should be arguing for what I think happens to be the policy of the government of which the minister is a member. She should be sitting over here and perhaps I should be sitting in her place, and then we would each be arguing for the proper side of the case. I think this is a critical issue. It is absolutely unbelievable that the minister should be willing to admit that under the terms of this bill it should be permissible and acceptable that the ownership of feature films produced in this country should not be in the hands of Canadians, but of foreign film producers. I find it impossible to believe that the minister is willing to allow this to happen.

This seems to contradict and contravene the spirit of the bill. It makes very little sense to me that we should go through the exercise of establishing a feature film industry in this country, something which has been neglected for far too long, and then at the very point when we could specify clearly that this is to be a Canadian industry, to be operated by Canadians and to serve Canadians, we would leave this tremendous loophole which would allow people outside this country who wish to invest in it and gain profits from our feature film industry, to do so without any fear of reprisal or any difficulty. This certainly seems like a strange exercise.

I suppose all I can do is to express my sentiments very strongly with regard to the faulty apparatus which is implanted in the bill in a clause which does not provide in very clear cut terms for at least 51 per cent

Canadian ownership and Canadian control of the feature film industry.

Miss LaMarsh: I am afraid my hon. friend is assuming something which I suggest he should not assume, namely that all sorts of minions will be running across the border forming corporations and taking great shovelfuls of money out of our coffers. The board which we are proposing to set up will deal with each film proposal. It can consider each individual proposal and will not need to accept any proposal it does not wish to accept. As I suggested earlier, I believe that initially at least there will be so many Canadians coming up with proposals that they will clog the halls, and anyone who has to come from a greater distance will not be able to get anywhere near this board for a considerable length of time.

We have done everything we can. The copyright has to be held here either by individuals or by corporations. Under the subsection concerned there has to be a significant Canadian creative, artistic and technical content, and we were careful not to tie that down to a percentage at the suggestion of those in England who said that it is better to leave it flexible. We have done everything we can to make sure that we will be fostering a Canadian industry. It may well be that a corporation which is formed in Canada and gets its script and everything else here will then go and sell it to a U.S. or a British firm. It can sell the distribution rights and then obtain financial support, which would mean that it would turn over more than 51 per cent of its ownership. If he does not get that kind of financial support, that kind of distribution, then he is not going to make it.

I am informed by Mr. Crawley and others who have been successful that the most important thing is to get a track record, to be able to produce a first rate film, and if that is done, thereafter the doors are open, agreements are assured and the film industry is on the way. I suggest to the house we should not throw this roadblock up now because if we do not insert a provision concerning this 51 per cent that may be the very thing which will permit young people to start out and make films in this country in co-operation with others who have been in the business, and who can give distribution rights as well.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Chairman, I feel the minister—

[Mr. MacDonald (Prince).]

The Chairman: Order. The Chair feels that standing order 15 must be invoked at this time. If there is any disposition on the part of the committee to proceed with the bill, I think that decision should be made with the Speaker in the chair. Shall I rise now, report progress and request leave to sit later this day or next sitting as the case may be?

Progress reported.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I think we are dealing with a very interesting bill, and perhaps we will be able to complete consideration of this bill if we continue with it. I am sure other members would agree. I think, looking over at the minister, this suggestion is quite acceptable to her.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that the private members hour be suspended and the committee proceed with its work on the bill it was considering?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, if I may say so, I do not believe you should suspend private members hour because there was a certain understanding reached which has now been circumvented by the proposal just made. I think the best we could do, if it were agreeable, would be to carry on with this bill, and if it is completed before six o'clock see if we could not make progress with the particular item of private members business on which there was an agreement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we return to the committee and proceed with this bill, then if the bill has been completed before six o'clock we make progress on private members business?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN FILM DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

PROVISION FOR DEVELOPMENT OF FEATURE FILM INDUSTRY

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-204, for the establishment of a Canadian Film Development Corporation—Miss LaMarsh—Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 10—Objects.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Chairman, while I appreciate the minister's good faith and her willingness to ensure that as many aspects as possible of this feature film industry will be Canadian, I think in being adamant about ownership and control she is sowing the seeds of her own destruction on this matter. I was just thinking a few minutes ago of the implications of what she said before we resumed in committee. It seems to me she is saying that in order to establish a feature film industry in this country we are going to have to rely on those from other countries who have both the experience and the contacts. I agree with what she says to a degree. She is saying also that in order for us to assure the exhibition of these films we will have to be in touch with these people because they will be able to arrange for the distribution.

What strikes me as so devilish about this whole arrangement is that if we are to follow the suppositions the minister has enunciated, then we are going to encourage outside film producers to come to this country. They will come here, and I assume they would employ enough people in the various aspects of film making to establish themselves as credible in terms of Canadian content. What will they be doing? They will be, foremost, producing motion pictures that will fall in line with the kind of films that are currently acceptable for distribution in the United States, the United Kingdom or some other market.

It would be folly of course for any film producer, particularly in the English speaking world today, to produce films purely and simply for the domestic market. However, it is quite another matter to invite in film producers who will not be, first and foremost, producing films for the country in which the film is produced. This is the thing that scares me. We would not be establishing a film industry in Canada which could be called Canadian; we would be setting up certain facilities and encouraging those facilities to be used in terms of motion picture production, and the resultant films would be directed to other countries. A film of this kind may say much more about the culture and life of someone who lives in Great Britain or the United States than someone who lives in Canada. It has been true from time immemorial that he who pays the piper calls the tune. It is my conviction that he who puts money into this film is going to determine the kind of script, and what the script says about the cultural and political aspects of life. While the film may be made here, it is not going to be a Canadian film.

Mr. Pepin: Would you say that about the National Film Board?

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): No, there is no comparison with the National Film Board. Why does the minister introduce that element?

Miss LaMarsh: The film "The Luck of Ginger Coffey" was made in exactly that way by a Canadian film producer who got the story and put it together. However, he did not have the money to put the whole thing together. He went to a United States film producing company which had distribution facilities, and made a deal with them for distribution and for money. They put up money, and that was the only reason this film came into being. This company in the United States had no control over the production of the film; they bought a package. This is the only way it can happen.

All he has to sell, of course, is a share in the corporation which produced the film. He may have to give the stars 10 per cent interest in it. He may have to give away a 20 per cent interest that way. He may have to give the distribution people another 10 per cent or 15 per cent. He may have to give the person who has written the book or the script another 10 per cent. This is the way these people are in it, without getting dollars except out of the final result of the show. We do not know what will happen because in each case it will be different. I could suggest to the hon. member that he is only seeing ghosts. If he gives this bill a chance to work, I am sure he will find this is not going to happen.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): I have some friends on the front-benches who are seeing ghosts, too. Who owned the film "The Luck of Ginger Coffey"?

Miss LaMarsh: The distribution company and Crawley Films, as well as some other people.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Who owned control?

Miss LaMarsh: A whole bunch of people.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Surely the whole point of this discussion is whether or not we intend to develop a Canadian feature film industry. You start off with somebody who writes a script and who wants 10 per cent. Surely we would expect that person to be a Canadian, otherwise—

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Not in every case, perhaps, but surely in some cases we would.

You say he is going to be given 10 per cent or 15 per cent, and surely in some cases he should be a Canadian.

Miss LaMarsh: Sure.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): The minister seems to be inferring that a good many of these people connected with the film will not be Canadians. If they are not Canadians, then what is the sense of trying to establish a feature film industry in Canada?

Miss LaMarsh: Because my hon. friend has agreed that the real bugbear is distribution, and this is where the big piece of ownership can go. This does not mean there is any kind of control over the film. The film may be virtually in the can by that time. If Mr. Crawley or any other person produces a film. no matter how good it is, it is not going to be a success unless it can be distributed. He is not going to sink a lot of money into it unless he knows it can be shown. He may not even have enough money to finance it. Most people like Budge Crawley insist on control of the product. They produce it and that is what they sell.

All that the distributing firm cares about is that the film will make money at the box office. They are not going to put Zazu Pitts in the film, or Mr. MacDonald from Prince or Miss LaMarsh from Niagara Falls. All they care about is they get something in the can so they can make money. In exchange for that they may be helping with the financing and may take shares. This is why I am afraid of trying to make any restrictions at this time until we see what happens.

Mr. Prittie: May I ask a question, Mr. Chairman. In general I share the sentiments of the hon. member for Prince. I am surprised that the 25 per cent figure talked about in the past by the hon. member for Davenport in relation to Canadian corporations is not mentioned in the bill. I wonder whether there is some ignorance here about the film industry on my part, and perhaps on the part of the hon. member for Prince and others.

The minister has mentioned Mr. Crawley's film "The Luck of Ginger Coffey". When he made that picture did he form a separate corporation both for making and for marketing the film? Does the minister know the answer to that question?

Miss LaMarsh: I think he did in that particular case but I am not absolutely certain.

[Mr. MacDonald (Prince).]

We did discuss that but I have forgotten what he said.

Mr. Prittie: If that is the case, I can see variations coming up, but I would suspect that what happens is that a corporation will be set up to produce and market a particular production. In the case referred to by the minister the foreign distributors may ask, in return for distribution rights, for a larger percentage of the corporation. However, I wish we knew more about the techniques of the film industry.

Miss LaMarsh: There are not many people in the country who do know. I should really publicly apologize to Mr. Crawley, because when he came to give me some advice I am sure he did not expect me to peddle his personal views to this house at large.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Chairman, the minister has continually referred in the course of debate to something very significant. She said that the prime concern on the part of the film producer is to arrange for international distribution. It will be difficult for anyone to disagree with that; but it strikes me that she has become so concerned about international distribution that perhaps she is indicating her willingness to accept the fact that the most difficult distribution will be domestically.

In the first instance, it seems to me that if a feature film industry is to be established in this country we must be assured that there will be Canadian distribution of films. It will be almost pointless—not quite but almost—if feature films are produced in Canada in great numbers and are shown for the most part in the United States and parts of Africa, Europe and Great Britain, but only occasionally in Canada. It strikes me that this is one of the reasons the minister is so concerned to put in any limitation in this bill. She appears to think that as long as we can guarantee some kind of international distribution we will have assured the survival of a feature film industry in this country.

Surely this will not serve the end we envision for this measure in terms of providing feature films made by Canadians for Canadians. This does concern me greatly. If we cannot achieve this end, we have bought only a very small piece of this business.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, it goes without saying that we hope distribution in Canada will be one of the first considerations. As a matter of fact, our movie houses are owned by United States movie companies and by British movie companies. When you distribute your films you enter into distribution agreements with respect to Canadian rights, United States rights, European rights and sometimes world rights. This is not a matter for the government but for the person who is selling the package.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I want to deal with subclause (4) of this clause, which reads:

> The corporation shall, to the greatest possible extent consistent with the performance of its duties under this act, consult and co-operate with departments, branches and agencies of the government of Canada and of the government of the provinces having duties related to, or having aims or objects related to those of the corporation.

I think this is a most interesting clause. Could the minister explain to the house how this clause will function? How will the corporation collaborate with these various departments and branches? Can she give us some idea how this clause will be implemented?

Miss LaMarsh: I am informed that both the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec have expressed interest in feature film production, the former through the Ontario Development Agency and the latter through the minister of cultural affairs. In the latter case the minister of cultural affairs for Quebec has already made one direct grant to a feature film maker. We expect to be working quite closely with them. They may be one of the people who apply. I do not think that an agency which will itself produce a film will apply, except for assistance in distribution and matters of that kind.

Mr. Peters: I ask the minister whether there have been any requests by the Ontario department of lands and forests to assist in their film production as well?

Miss LaMarsh: Not that I am aware of, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Chairman, may I once more refer to the film "The Luck of Ginger Coffey", since it has been mentioned. I do not think the minister would want it to go on record that this was in any way, shape or form a typical Canadian movie. I have been reminded that the stars were not Canadians. The director was not a Canadian, the director of photography was not a Canadian and the editor was not a Canadian. If I remember my conversation with Mr. Crawley, he told me that he would not have regarded this film as falling within the criteria envisaged by this legislation.

Before we dispose of this particular clause may I once more raise the objection I made and put forward a suggestion to the minister by way of compromise. Since the minister seems to be unwilling to accept the proposal I made, then by way of compromise, and as a very tangible reminder to the corporation, would she accept such words as "owned by an individual resident in Canada, by a corporation incorporated under the laws of Canada or a province, with significant Canadian ownership"? Would the words "with significant Canadian ownership" be acceptable? It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that if we do not include some words like that we have left the door as wide open as it could possibly be.

Miss LaMarsh: I do not think it is necessary to include those words, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Then I, as one economic and cultural nationalist, will let it go on record at this point that I think the minister has in this legislation opted for allowing a very sizable chunk of what might have been a Canadian feature film industry to drift away from us. I hope that I do not have the opportunity at some future date of standing in this place and saying very loudly and clearly "I told you so".

Clause agreed to.

Clause 11 agreed to.

On clause 12—Executive Director and Secretary.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Chairman, it is suggested in this particular clause that on the recommendation of the corporation an executive director may be appointed. For purposes of clarification I should like to know whether this means that if the corporation did recommend that such an appointment be made the governor in council would in fact make the appointment? The word "may" seems very ineffectual in this context.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, we hope that we will have a small staff to begin with, which will be paid for out of the $10 million, so I do not want to fritter it away in this regard. Without question we have to have legal experts, a treasurer and a comptroller. We have included a secretary in order that there may be the opportunity for language balance. That is the reason we have used permissive language rather than mandatory.

Clause 13 agreed to.

Development of Film Industry

On clause 14—Advisory group.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, clause 14 reads:

The minister may, on the recommendation of the corporation, appoint an advisory group broadly representative of the professional associations, exhibitors, distributors and unions in the Canadian film industry and including other qualified persons, to advise the corporation on matters which the minister or the corporation may refer to it.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Would the minister explain how this section will work, what is actually intended, and what groups are likely to be included?

Miss LaMarsh: I shall be glad to. This again is a permissive section modelled on the type of advisory committee existing in the United Kingdom. The purpose of the committee is to give the film industry an opportunity, on a formal basis, to advise the government. We expect that the various associations will, as in England, nominate three or four people, and we shall select one from each. This may be open to people outside the film industry, and can include film critics or economists specializing in film matters, or other people who specialize in the industry who, from time to time, may be required to give advice.

Mr. Prittie: Is it the intention to pay the expenses of this advisory group when they meet? As the bill now stands you cannot pay their expenses. It seems to me that if the advisory group is called to a central place from time to time to aid the corporation, their expenses at least should be paid.

Miss LaMarsh: I am not certain whether they will come together at one point. Members of the industry have been extraordinarily helpful, as has been the interdepartmental committee, in dealing with the problems over the past two or three years. We find that people in all parts of the industry have offered assistance to that committee, and I do not think it will be necessary at this time, since that again would be a charge on the fund, to give them financial reimbursement. If it proves necessary to give that reimbursement in future, we shall ask parliament for that right.

Mr. Prittie: Does the minister mean, as the bill now stands, that there is no express authority to pay the advisory group's expenses?

Miss LaMarsh: It is not my intention to pay them, no.

[Miss LaMarsh.]

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, following my previous question, the clause says:

—appoint an advisory group broadly representative of the professional associations—

Does this mean professional associations within the film industry, or other professional associations that may want to make some contribution?

Miss LaMarsh: They may be in or out.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Again, I find this clause is not enough to deal with the situation. Earlier this afternoon we said that the only person with any expertise to be directly associated with the board will be the government film commissioner. At a later date it will be the person who will be executive director of this particular board. If the new federal Film Development Corporation is to get the amount of advice it will need, this clause is not sufficient. The clause could not have been written in a more vague fashion. It says:

The minister may, on the recommendation of the corporation, appoint—

And it lists a number of groups:

—to advise the corporation on matters which the minister or the corporation may refer to it.

I find the use of the word "may" wrong, particularly in the first part where it says "may appoint". If the federal film development board determines that it will need this expertise, and I am 100 per cent sure that it will, why could the committee not change this clause to read "will on the recommendation of the corporation"?

I am also disappointed because the minister has said there is to be no remuneration. If we are thinking of using people receiving at times much remuneration, how will it be possible to ask them to give up their time, so that they may give advice, unless there is some definite responsiblity to pay their travelling expenses at least, and some kind of daily indemnity. It seems that where an advisory group is set up, this sort of thing normally is available.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, there is no indication that it has to be mandatory. This is intended to be permissive. I am not sure, at first blush, that we shall set up an advisory committee. It will be hard enough to find the people, the right people who have no connection with the business, to put them on the board—to say nothing of people who from time to time on an ad hoc basis will serve as part of the advisory group. I do not anticipate thay any board of management or advisory group sitting in another part of the country will have any difficulty because of the situation my hon. friend has described. From time to time experts will be required to give assistance, and we shall call on them.

Perhaps I should make myself clear. We do not want two boards. The government would have to appoint them to give advice on the one hand and management on the other.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): I am sorry, but I had difficulty following the minister. I am still not clear. Is the minister saying that there will be a specific group known as an advisory group? I see advisory group in the clause spelled with a capital "A" and capital "G". It seems to me that the clause makes provision to set up a specific entity—

Miss LaMarsh: No, no. There is no capital "A" or capital "G".

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): There is in my copy.

Miss LaMarsh: That is the Queen's Printer.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): I think the Queen's Printer must have had a hand in this.

Miss LaMarsh: There are no capitals in the French version.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): There is discrimination somewhere. We ought not to have capitals in English, either.

Coming back to my point, there are those who will be needed to provide continuing expertise. By and large membership of bodies providing assistance will not be on a full-time basis. Most people will be occasional members, not necessarily from the film production world. The corporation will need to get advice somewhere, and if we are to use the $10 million intelligently in initial stages, that advisory group with a capital "A" and a capital "G" will be necessary.

Miss LaMarsh: It may be that people with experience in labour relations may be called in to advise us on the IATSE question, and the whole idea of labour unions in the film industry. On the other hand a board will be set up, and as I have said it may be composed of lawyers, secretary-treasurers and people like that, who are also experts in the film business. Only from time to time will things have to be addressd to an advisory group.

We are happy in this country to have enthusiastic members of the public offering unpaid assistance to the public, through government, when requested. I do not know why this should not continue. We could pay them expenses, give them an aeroplane ticket and a meal. But any corporation can do that without legislation. We do not expect them to spend their own money; but we do not want to pay them as such. We do not want to make them consultants.

Mr. Herridge: I wholeheartedly support the minister in this respect. I believe the hon. member for Prince is underestimating the willingness of Canadians to do something on a voluntary basis when it comes to making a contribution to their country, their province or the community in which they live. I think we shall be able to find people willing to do this, as long as they are allowed their out-of-pocket expenses as far as travelling is concerned.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 15—Staff and Special Advisers.

Mr. Prittie: Has any projection been made as to what the size of the full-time staff of the corporation will be? Will it be five, ten, or 20 people?

Miss LaMarsh: We think the staff will be small, to begin with. For one thing, there is not a very great pool of suitable people to tap. We have to pay their salaries and everything else out of the $10 millions; we do not wish to dissipate that amount.

Mr. Prittie: So the staff will be small.

Miss LaMarsh: Small in numbers; I am not talking about stature or weight. It will be the minimum we can get along with to enable the corporation to perform its functions.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 16—Application of Public Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. Peters: I should like to know why the benefits of the Public Service Superannuation Act have been withheld from the members of the corporation. This is a Crown agency and some of the other agencies of the Crown, or rather their employees, receive the benefits of this act. I think it would be to our advantage to bring more people within the act than to leave people out. Their inclusion established equality among the employees of the various Crown corporations.

Miss LaMarsh: There are a number of agencies, the National Film Board for instance, whose employees do not come under the act. They stand on their own feet.

Mr. Peters: Is it not the case that if we do not place these people in a class comparable with that of regular civil servants we shall find it necessary to establish conditions of wages and benefits strictly comparable to those outside, so that the corporation will have to be run strictly on a commercial basis. There is an obvious advantage in giving people who work for Crown agencies the benefit of the security which comes from employment in the public service in some fields. In wage negotiations these things are taken into account.

Miss LaMarsh: I am sorry. I have misled the hon. member. The phrase in clause 16 is "members of the corporation as such". If the hon. member turns to clause 4 he will find that the members referred to are members of the board. It does not mean the staff.

Mr. Peters: In other words, the staff would be covered as civil servants. Thank you.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 17—Corporation Agent of Her Majesty.

Mr. Crouse: Subclause (3) of clause 17 talks about the corporation acquiring property in the name of Her Majesty. Is it intended that this board should set up in Ottawa? Where will the physical headquarters be located?

Miss LaMarsh: We have not yet decided. I have had lots of importuning from hon. members in constituencies from the west coast to the east coast.

Mr. Herridge: I am illiterate about legal matters and I should like to ask the minister a question in connection with the same subclause. It says:

> Property acquired by the corporation is the property of Her Majesty and title thereto may be vested in the name of Her Majesty or in the name of the corporation.

Can the hon. lady explain the difference between these two types of ownership?

Miss LaMarsh: The difference is not really significant; it does not mean anything. A piece of property, real or personal, can be owned by the Film Development Corporation or it can be owned by the Queen in right of Canada.

Mr. Herridge: The minister is really telling us that this is superfluous.

Miss LaMarsh: No. A contractual agreement might be drawn up in England or in the United States, or in some other place. This provision ensures that either form will be appropriate.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): As the minister said earlier, I am new at this game and I am not sure whether I am correct, but it would seem to me that legislation of this kind should indicate the location of the head office. I refer to this because I am concerned that it should not be located in one or two places which might be detrimental to the basic purpose of the corporation.

For instance, I think it would be a bad thing to have the office space of this corporation located in Montreal, in the same building as the National Film Board. I have nothing against the National Film Board, but if this new agency is to function as a separate entity it is important that it does not become an appendage of another which is connected with the production of motion pictures. This is why I think we should have a specific statement from the minister as to where the headquarters of the corporation will be.

Miss LaMarsh: I do not know. I doubt whether the acts setting up the C.B.C. or the National Film Board indicated where the head offices would be. In one case the head office was moved from Ottawa to Montreal. In another, the Fowler report wanted the office moved and there was no suggestion the legislation would have to be amended so that this might be done.

If I were asked to make a personal choice, I would say Niagara Falls, but no doubt there would be 264 objections from other parts of this chamber if I were to do that. The same would probably be true if I chose Summerside. So it might very well be located in some larger centre.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): I would like to be assured that it is not to be located where it is likely to become part of a larger entity connected with motion picture films. This could easily extend to the C.B.C., which is the biggest government producer of films in our country today. I think it is important that this new corporation should have a life and purpose of its own.

Mr. Prittie: The motion picture industry in the United States flourishes in that part of the country where the climate is best suited, namely the west coast, and I should like to suggest that this is where the headquarters of the corporation should be.

Mr. Nasserden: When considering all these claims I hope the minister will not forget the city of Yorkton in Saskatchewan, which is host to Canada's most famous film festival.

Bill reported.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a third time? By leave now?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I do not particularly want to raise an objection, but I think we should follow the regular practice that when there are amendments to a bill it should not be read the third time the same day. Under the circumstances, however, I would be agreeable to having third reading now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that the bill be read a third time, by leave, now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Miss LaMarsh moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Earlier this day there was agreement that when the bill which has just been passed had been completed the house would proceed to the consideration of private members business.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, in the light of the request to proceed over this hour with government business I wonder if the house might wish to make an order putting into effect the result of the discussion that some hon. members had, representatives of all parties, namely that item No. 9 under the heading private bills be renumbered as item No. 1, so that it could be dealt with as the first item of business the next time private bills are called.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that item No. 9, namely, second reading of Bill No. C-239, on today's order paper, be renumbered as No. 1 under the heading of private bills?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION TO AMEND PROVISIONAL STANDING ORDER RESPECTING ADJOURNMENTS FOR MEALS

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I take it that in the few moments which are left we shall not proceed to consideration of private members business. Therefore I would like to state that I believe there has been unanimous agreement that during the two week period beginning February 6, 1967, the sittings of the house shall be suspended from 7 o'clock p.m. to 8 o'clock p.m. on Mondays, Tuesdays, and Thursdays, and from 1 o'clock p.m. until 2 o'clock p.m. on Fridays.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I should point out to the thouse that this is the type of motion which requires notice; but if there is unanimous consent of the house for me to put the motion now I shall do so. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McIlraith moved:

That during the two week period beginning February 6, 1967, the sittings of the house shall be suspended from seven o'clock p.m. to eight o'clock p.m. on Mondays, Tuesdays, and Thursdays, and from one o'clock p.m. until two o'clock p.m. on Fridays.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is so ordered.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McIlraith: On Monday the house will be asked to resume the budget debate, and it is our present intention that at the conclusion of the budget debate we would immediately proceed with the budget resolutions and the bills.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, February 6, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

CANADIAN CONFEDERATION

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING CONFERENCE PROPOSED BY ONTARIO

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table an exchange of letters between myself and the premier of Ontario regarding the latter's suggestion for a meeting to discuss confederation.

Mr. Knowles: Are you both in favour of it?

Mr. Speaker: Has the right hon. Prime Minister leave to table the documents?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MR. JUSTICE LANDREVILLE

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Ovide Laflamme (Québec-Montmorency) moved:

That the first report of the special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons respecting Mr. Justice Landreville, presented to the house on Thursday, February 2, 1967, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

FRENCH SPEAKING TEACHERS IN PENITENTIARIES

Question No. 2,146—Mr. Lachance:

1. Is it true that the inmates in the Kingston penitentiary, of whom 30 per cent are French speaking, cannot benefit from the services of any French speaking teacher?

2. If so, does the government intend to correct this situation soon?

3. Does the same situation exist in the other penitentiary institutions in Canada?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): 1. There are three teachers on the staff of the Kingston penitentiary, of whom one can converse reasonably well in French, but not to the extent of being able to teach in French. The services of part time bilingual teachers are available on request; however, no such request has been received from inmates. Correspondence courses are available to all inmates in both French and English. The stated percentage of 30 per cent of French speaking inmates needs clarification, inasmuch as this percentage estimate is based on the inmate's family name and not on the language spoken on a day to day basis. A large number of the inmates thus categorized were raised in Ontario and use the English language as a matter of choice.

2. Yes. The next teacher vacancy, which will occur by virtue of the retirement of any one of the teachers now on staff, will be advertised, stating bilingualism as a requirement.

In any event, it is usually possible to transfer a French speaking inmate from an English speaking institution to a French speaking institution, where he so requests.

3. Yes, a similar situation exists at Dorchester penitentiary where French speaking inmates form 23 per cent of the total inmate population.

FUNDS IN PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACCOUNT

Question No. 2,232—Mr. Knowles:

1. What was the total amount of money in the Public Service Superannuation Account as at (a) March 31, 1964 (b) March 31, 1965 (c) March 31, 1966?

2. What rate of interest does the government pay for the use of this money?

3. What amount of interest was credited to the Public Service Superannuation Account during the fiscal years ending (a) March 31, 1964 (b) March 31, 1965 (c) March 31, 1966?

4. What was the total amount paid out of the Public Service Superannuation Fund during the fiscal years ending (a) March 31, 1964 (b) March 31, 1965 (c) March 31, 1966?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): 1. Balance in superannuation account as of (a) March 31, 1964, $1,856,407,622; (b) March 31, 1965, $2,161,828,358; (c) March 31, 1966, $2,390,383,091.

Questions

2. Interest is credited to the superannuation account on the last day of each quarter in every fiscal year, calculated at the rate of 1 per cent of the balance to the credit of the account on the last day of the preceding quarter.

3. Interest credited to the superannuation account during fiscal years ending (a) March 31, 1964, $71,756,270; (b) March 31, 1965, $78,715,785; (c) March 31, 1966, $89,499,085.

4. Total amounts paid out of the superannuation account during the fiscal years ending (a) March 31, 1964, $56,807,908; (b) March 31, 1965, $64,160,629; (c) March 31, 1966, $69,906,914.

ACCEPTANCE OF SANITARY CODE BY RAILWAYS

Question No. 2,238—Mr. Reid:

With respect to the Department of National Health and Welfare's national sanitary code applicable to Canadian railways, has this code been accepted and implemented fully by all railroads in Canada and, if not, what parts of the code have not been implemented by what railways?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The potable water regulations for common carriers which have been in effect under successive orders in council since 1923 are being implemented without significant difficulties. It is generally recognized that water and ice made available on common carriers for consumption by the public are safe and free from harmful bacteria and chemicals. From time to time, sanitary officers of the Department of National Health and Welfare detect deviations from the practices or equipment specified in the regulations. These are brought to the attention of the railway authorities and corrective action as prescribed by the department is carried out by them.

In 1966 a set of additional standards was developed by the Department of National Health and Welfare after consideration of the views of the Canadian Railway Association and representatives of employee organizations, and recommended for implementation. Implementation is proceeding as older equipment is being replaced by new, or as governed by negotiation between labour and management. It is anticipated that complete implementation will require a considerable time. No detailed inventory of progress is maintained in the Department of National Health and Welfare.

[Mr. Sharp.]

*GREAT LAKES—LEGISLATION RESPECTING DISCHARGE OF WASTE

Question No. 2,368—Mr. Tolmie:

Is the government proposing to introduce legislation to control the increasing pollution problem in the great lakes arising from the discharge of human waste and garbage from commercial vessels now in use in the great lakes and those to be constructed in the future?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is yes. When the legislative timetable permits, the government intends to introduce an amendment to the Canadian Shipping Act to authorize regulations to be made respecting the discharge of sewage and garbage from ships.

KEEPER OF SANDFORD LIGHT, YARMOUTH COUNTY, N.S.

Question No. 2,424—Mr. Bower:

1. Has there been a change in the keeper of the Sandford light, Yarmouth co., Nova Scotia?

2. If so, how long had the incumbent held the post, what were the reasons for his dismissal and how long had the reasons for his dismissal obtained?

3. Has a new keeper been named?

4. If so, will the new incumbent be unimpeded during the day from attending the light because of his customary activities?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Yes.

2. Since November 1, 1964. Report received that the light was left unattended and that the incumbent who was a part time keeper receiving an annual fee of $480 was also employed full time by the provincial government. Investigation confirmed that he had been so employed as sign painter by the province for the past 10 years.

3. Yes.

4. Yes. The new incumbent has agreed personally to attend the operation of the fog horn at the lighthouse during the day.

CONVENTIONS OF COMPANY OF YOUNG CANADIANS

Question No. 2,451 (Correction)—Mr. Hales:

1. How many general meetings or conventions has the Company of Young Canadians held since incorporation?

2. Where were they held?

3. How many people attended each convention?

4. What were the hotel or accommodation charges for each convention, including telephone, room service, etc.?

5. What were the transportation charges for each convention?

6. Is there a report available for each convention and, if so, from whom?

7. Who are the auditors for the Company of Young Canadians and what yearly audit fees have been paid?

Mr. John R. Matheson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): I am informed by the Company of Young Canadians as follows: 1. Apart from staff meetings, meetings of the provisional council and the two training programs, the company has held one general meeting since incorporation.

2. This meeting was a regrouping of volunteers already in the field, and was held at Orillia, Ontario, from October 29 to November 5. The purpose of the meeting was to provide new training and orientation information to the company's volunteers, to provide those volunteers with an opportunity to discuss common field problems, and to assist the company develop plans for its third training program based on actual field experiences. Other volunteer regroupings are planned on a regional basis. No further centralized regroupings are planned.

Questions

FEDERAL EXPENDITURES ON RETRAINING PROGRAMS, MANITOBA

Question No. 2,453—Mr. Schreyer:

1. What is the federal cost share of each of the classes or courses presently operating under program 5 of the T.V.T. agreement wiith the province of Manitoba?

2. Of the above amounts, how much is spent on operational costs and how much on allowances?

3. How many in plant or in service special training programs have been conducted either jointly with the province of Manitoba or with particular industries concerned in that province during 1966?

4. With respect to part 3 above, how much was the federal expenditure in each of these programs for (a) equipment rental (b) space rental (c) instruction (d) living allowances for those enrolled?

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. The federal share of operational costs for program 5 courses is 75 per cent. The federal government also shares in allowances paid to trainees at the following rates: (a) 100 per cent of a basic $35 per week training allow ance; (b) 90 per cent of supplementary allowances up to a maximum of $55 per week per trainee.

2. Federal payments to the province of Manitoba toward the costs of program 5 courses, April 1, 1966 to January 15, 1967 were: (a) Operational expenses, $400,021; (b) Allowances to trainees, $933,368.

3. There were 47 in plant training projects initiated in Manitoba during the current fiscal year.

4. The federal expenditure toward in plant training projects in Manitoba, April 1, 1966 to January 15, 1967 were: (a) Equipment rental, approximately, $30,000. (b) Space rental, approximately, $3,000. (c) Instructional costs, approximately, $85,000. (d) The amount of the federal payments for allowances are not available because claims based upon the total attendance are not submitted until a course is completed.

CENTENNIAL TRAIN

Question No. 2,458—Mr. Allard:

With regard to the centennial train (a) who built it (b) how much did it cost (c) who paid for the building of this train (d) who pays for its maintenance and use (e) what will be the approximate cost of its maintenance and use during the centennial year (f) with regard to the staff, how many Canadians are there whose mother tongue is French and how many whose mother tongue is English (g) among the employees responsible for welcoming visitors (i) how many employees regard French as their mother tongue and how many employees regard English as their mother tongue (ii) what is the number of bilingual employees (h) are employees appointed to be responsible for welcoming visitors required to be bilingual and, if not, for what reason (i) would the government agree to recommend that all employees appointed to be responsible for welcoming visitors should be bilingual (j) where and how were each of the employees for the centennial train selected (k) after the centennial tour has been completed, what will be done with this train?

[Mr. Laing.]

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): (a) The Confederation Train made up of fifteen (15) cars was constructed by the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National Railways and the contents of the six (6) exhibit coaches were built and installed by Design Craft Ltd., Toronto.

(b) The total cost of the train, including purchase and rental of equipment, design and installation of exhibits, equipment modification is $1,438,252.

(c) The Centennial Commission paid for the construction of the Confederation Train.

(d) The Centennial Commission is responsible for paying the cost involved in the maintenance of the train during 1967.

(f) Of twenty-five (25) Commission personnel, excluding members of the R.C.M.P., on the Confederation Train staff, twelve (12) have French while thirteen (13) have English as their mother tongue. The manager of the train is bilingual.

(g) (i) Nineteen (19) members of the train staff deal directly with the public. Eleven (11) have French while eight (8) have English as their mother tongue.

(ii) The number of bilingual members on the train staff is twelve (12).

(h) The Centennial Commission's policy in recruiting the crew of the train was to represent insofar as possible every province and territory of Canada. The emphasis, because of need, was placed on ability in both English and French. However, the employees from Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland, Yukon Territories and British Columbia are unilingual English. The French speaking population in these areas did not produce candidates. Of four (4) recruits from Ontario, two (2) are bilingual.

The proportion of bilingual personnel is sufficiently high, in the view of the Centennial Commission, to ensure adequate service to visitors in both official languages.

(j) The employees for the train were selected from applications received after a nationwide advertising campaign was conducted by the Department of Manpower and Immigration, and through application directly to the Centennial Commission.

The personnel division, using a three-man review board and the merit principle, either set up boards in the nearest centre to the applicant's residence, or in some cases of managerial level, brought the applicant to headquarters to appear before the three-man board.

(k) The eventual disposal of the Confederation Train is under discussion at present but no recommendation has yet been made by the Centennial Commission.

APPLICATION OF EASTERN TIME ZONE TO MARITIME PROVINCES

Question No. 2,464—Mr. Fairweather:

Has any consideration recently been given to the possibility of the maritime provinces of Canada, or some of them, becoming part of the eastern time zone?

Mr. Jack Davis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No consideration has been given by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources to the possibility of the maritime provinces of Canada, or some of them, becoming part of the eastern time zone.

The time service section at the Dominion Observatory, though charged by order in council P.C. 6784 dated August 28, 1941, as the custodian of correct time for official purposes in Canada, has no authority for the definition or regulation of time zone boundaries and there is no federal regulatory body or office in Canada to review and revise time zone boundaries.

Each province has legislation regulating the time being observed within provincial boundaries. From time to time these regulations are modified to accommodate the wish of a community near the zone boundary to adopt the time and the adjacent zone.

Question No. 2,478—Mr. Mandziuk:

1. How often is the householder directory of each federal electoral district brought up to date?

2. Is each postmaster responsible for the correctness of the list of patrons?

3. Is the postmaster's salary based on the number of patrons at his post office?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): 1. Annually.

2. Yes.

3. No.

ADVERTISING OF OLD AGE SECURITY SUPPLEMENT

Question No. 2,497—Mr. Irvine:

1. What was the total cost of advertising or acquainting the public with the terms of the supplement to old age security since the passage of Bill C-251?

2. How many newspapers were used (a) dailies (b) weeklies?

3. What other news media were used and what was the expenditure in each case?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. It is estimated that the cost of the advertising campaign in progress to acquaint the public with the terms of the guaranteed income supplement to old age security will be $380,000. To date, no invoice has been received and no payment made.

2. To date use has been made of 105 dailies and 273 weeklies.

3. None to date. Arrangements are being made to use radio, television, booklets and informational inserts with old age security cheques.

Questions

*COST OF TELEVISION INTERVIEW WITH VON THADDEN

Question No. 2,503—Mr. Diefenbaker:

How much did the C.B.C. expend in securing the interview on the program "Sunday" of the 22nd of January with Adolph von Thadden (a) for payment of crew and interviewers (b) telephone and telegraph messages (c) for a honorarium or payment to von Thadden (d) total other expenditures, not including the foregoing?

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the C.B.C. that approximately $3,000 was the cost of the European assignment for a four man team which included camera fees, travel and equipment expenses. Approximately $300 was spent on telephone and telegraph messages, and $960 for film stock, processing and editing. It has not been the custom of parliament to ask that the C.B.C. disclose honoraria or payments made to individuals.

ROYAL PROCLAMATION RESPECTING NATIONAL FLAG

Question No. 2,510—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. How many copies of the reproduction of the royal proclamation of January 28, 1965, respecting the national flag of Canada were produced by the Queen's Printer?

2. How many requests for copies have been received from (a) individuals (b) organizations in each of the provinces of Canada?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): 1. (a) 35,000, size 24" x 19¼"; (b) 140,000, size 12" x 9⅝".

2. No records are kept of orders received either from individuals or from organizations.

Altogether 30,100 copies have been sold of quantity mentioned in (a) above, 26,000 copies of the smaller reproduction in (b).

PRODUCE OF EXPERIMENTAL FARM, MORDEN, MAN.

Question No. 2,512—Mr. Douglas:

1. What was the total quantity of (a) fruits, and (b) vegetables, produced at the dominion experimental farm, Morden, Manitoba, in each of the years 1965 and 1966?

2. In what way were the (a) fruits, and (b) vegetables, disposed of?

3. If all, or part, of the (a) fruits, and (b) vegetables were destroyed, what was the reason for their destruction?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): 1. No estimates are available because total yields were not measured for the bulk of experimental material. Yields were calculated from harvesting representative samples of crops.

2. Samples were picked, processed, or stored for experimental use. Some material went to the Morden hospital and charitable organizations. The remainder was not harvested.

3. In any hybridization program, many thousands of plants are produced from which the outstanding specimens are selected and it is normal procedure to discard much of the remainder. It is too costly to gather and sort edible or marketable produce from diseased, overripe, and inferior material.

TRADE MISSIONS IN CONJUNCTION WITH EXPO '67

Are there any trade missions planned for 1967 in conjunction with Expo '67?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes. The trade missions program of the Department of Trade and Commerce is highlighting Expo '67 by concentrating on incoming missions whose memberships will all have the opportunity to visit Expo '67 at the conclusion of their Canadian tours. Tentative plans anticipate about 20 incoming trade missions in the fiscal year commencing 1 April, 1967.

FINANCE

BANK OF WESTERN CANADA—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of moving the adjournment of the house in accordance with standing order 26 to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, namely the startling disclosures made by the president of the Bank of Western Canada to the effect that:

(a) the directors of the British International Finance (Canada) Limited and Wellington Financial Corporation Limited, now the York-Lambton Financial Corporation, and/or subsidiary corporations have endeavoured to attempt to get credit from the Bank of Western Canada;

(b) that the said company or its subsidiaries are engaged in a borrowing operation with

United States banks which involves the giving of an option of 10 per cent of the total shares of the Bank of Western Canada and various arrangements designed to tie the management and operations of the bank to the operations of these United States banks, again contrary to statements made when applying for a charter, which disclosures indicate that the applicants for charter for the said bank, in making their presentation to the committee of the House of Commons on finance, trade and economic affairs, misled the committee and the House of Commons, in contempt of parliament.

I move that motion, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith).

Mr. Speaker: Would the Leader of the Opposition address the Chair on the question of urgency of debate at this time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am not going into the detail of the allegations made over the week end by the president of the Bank of Western Canada, except to say that his allegations charged that the intent of the legislation granting a charter to the bank, with the express proviso of the Treasury Board granting exemption from certain clauses of the legislation, has been infringed by the controlling organization, British International Finance, in a way to countermand the wishes and intent of parliament.

When the rights and privileges of parliament have been contravened and a prima facie case has been made out, no other matter can take primacy in this House of Commons. In other words the rights and privileges of parliament cannot be shamelessly treated or contemptuously disregarded. Whenever that takes place the urgency thereof is second to no other field or area of legislative responsibility in parliament.

It might be said that the budget debate will be commencing soon and that therefore this matter can be discussed at that time. It is difficult enough to get answers in parliament at any time during debate; how much more difficult in a matter such as this. I would hope the government would immediately agree to the adjournment of the house, to the end that the basic foundations upon which our financial institutions stand, namely integrity and honesty in the presentation of grounds for incorporation, are in no way undermined.

This is a specific issue, Mr. Speaker, dealing with the conditions under which a charter was granted by parliament and expanded by Treasury Board in its decision to exempt this particular bank from the provisions forbidding concentration of ownership in a proportion greater than 10 per cent. The exemption was granted, one of the conditions being that there would not be financial intercourse between the Bank of Western Canada and the controlling companies with the bank being in the position of a lender. According to the president of the Bank of Western Canada this provision, by a species of financial wizardry, has been swept aside and abrogated.

Indeed, what can be more urgent than the president's statement to the effect that there had been an attempt to breach the conditions set down by Treasury Board, in other words a deliberate, intentional and indeed planned flouting of undertakings given again and again to parliament in the committee—and I have the various quotations here—to the effect that the Bank of Western Canada would not under any circumstances become a kind of milch cow for the Stevens group. Yet that is one of the things the president says is being attempted.

If the facts alleged by the president of the bank are true we have an issue that goes to the heart of parliament's rights. Parliament must go into the financial operations of this group, the Stevens group from Toronto, and British International Finance Corporation. It must look into the power that has been accumulated over six years when less than $300,000 of capital, by reason of interlocking directorates and other manipulations, has given two or three men control over $130 million of capital in various corporations, the Wellington Bank, York-Lambton Financial Corporation, York Trust, Canada First Mortgage, and so on.

These are matters that cannot be dealt with in a budget debate. We cannot get answers. I was away for a few days during the recent debate on unification. On reading the reports I find I missed nothing in the way of information. The minister gave no information at all.

We want to guard against that. We ask for the opportunity of debate, to learn whether the allegations are correct and to put an end to the kind of financial operation exemplified by Mr. Stevens saying that the president of the Bank of Western Canada had only a $7,600 interest in these corporations. What business had Mr. Stevens to say that? That type of arrogance deserves to be looked into. Parliament has the right to investigate this matter. Every hour of delay leaves open the door for further important financial repercussions which affect the lives of Canadians. We do not want another financial mess on our hands such as we have had recently.

There has been too much nonchalance regarding these financial matters. I say they must be dealt with now. They require the fullest inquiry. We want to know from the government whether there was deception.

I have here the record of the evidence given in the committee. I say, on the basis of the evidence given by Mr. Stevens, what has taken place here is a flouting of the pledged word. The whole labyrinthine complex of the Stevens combine must be looked into. It cannot be done by questions. Questions have been asked all the way through. On December 1, 15 and 16 I endeavoured to secure from the minister or Prime Minister some indication of concern by this government regarding what was being done. On January 17 I again raised the matter with regard to the Treasury Board exemption. On January 18 the Minister of Finance tabled Treasury Board Order No. 658,534. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands asked what was the meaning of the series of operations reported in the press, in December, having the effect of concentrating control in the hands of a few individuals. The minister promised to look into it, but a licence to operate was issued regardless.

This is a serious matter, something which cannot be glossed over. This is the first opportunity parliament has had to inquire into it. There is no other way in which we, on behalf of the Canadian people, can ensure that such experiences as Prudential Finance, insurance company bankruptcies and the like shall not become permanent features of the financial landscape. Nothing comes before the right of members of parliament to examine and cross-examine. They received an assurance that these things would not take place. Now the president of the bank resigns because he says that undertakings honestly given, as he says, have been contravened. We cannot shut our eyes to the revelations which have been made.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): As Your Honour is aware, I had prepared a motion to the same effect as that prepared by the Leader of the Opposition, though I must say at the outset that I had hoped a statement from the Minister of Finance would have obviated the necessity for presenting such motions. Indeed, I am somewhat surprised that he did not seize the opportunity when it arose.

As to the matter of urgency of debate, I think really there can be no question about that. Here we have a situation in which, for the first time in many, many years, a chartered bank of Canada—and no matter how slightly the Bank of Western Canada has entered into the banking field it is now one of Canada's chartered banks—comes under the winds of suspicion. I suggest that unless the government is prepared to announce certain action to correct the situtation we may well create a lack of confidence in the whole banking structure, something which we in this country cannot afford.

Another argument in respect of urgency is that at this very moment we are in the process of carrying out the decennial revision of the Bank Act, which is now before the committee on finance and economic affairs. If something is to be done about this specific case something must also be done about the arrangements which were made under the Bank Act and certain provisions in the bill before us. I do not think this is a matter which can be left where it is in the absence of a declaration by the government of Canada clearly indicating that this is an occasion for serious concern, especially when it arises, as it does, after a number of events in the financial world which have badly shaken the confidence of the Canadian people. Also, I might say, the government's reluctance to assert its authority in some areas in which it is suggested there is no doubt about its provenance gives rise to a certain amount of misgiving and apprehension as to whether the government is fully seized of the nature of the events now revealed by the president of the Bank of Western Canada.

Before I close, may I say I think we should commend Mr. Coyne for his frankness in bringing this matter before the people of Canada. He may have been naïve in his choice of business associates, but I suggest no member of this house and no member of the public has ever had any doubts about Mr. Coyne's honesty and integrity. I urge you to accept this motion, Mr. Speaker, so the people of Canada may be reassured with regard to the affairs of one of the chartered banks of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I did not notice that the hon. member for Red Deer had risen. Perhaps the Minister of Finance would allow the hon. member for Red Deer to make his remarks before taking part in the debate.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My remarks will be very brief. With regard to the importance of the topic which has been raised at this time, in my opinion there can be no doubt that a trust has been violated so far as this house is concerned, and to have something like this come up at a time when we are considering the over-all banking picture is certainly very disturbing. I believe it is in the national interest that it be dealt with as quickly as possible.

I join with the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands in saying that one would have thought the Minister of Finance would have taken the lead and made a statement on motions, because it was only to be expected that this important matter would be raised today.

Notwithstanding the fact that the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs is currently meeting and the Minister of Finance is appearing before it as a witness, I believe the importance of this issue is such that it is imperative we debate it. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, as you are making your decision I trust you will have regard to this aspect of the matter, and I hope your decision will be in favour of the motion made by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think it is highly desirable that the charges made by Mr. Coyne should be investigated, but I doubt very much whether they can be successfully investigated on a motion to adjourn the house.

Mr. Coyne has made certain specific charges against his colleagues in the Bank of Western Canada. I believe those should be investigated. This morning I also received a message from Mr. Sinclair Stevens which I should like to read:

> I am sorry I missed speaking with you at the Park Plaza yesterday and I was unable to contact you by telephone this morning but I wish to assure you that my associates and myself are more than willing to meet with you personally or to appear before any committee or other group that you may feel desirable to clarify or contradict statements which are attributed to Mr. Coyne in the press.
> Sinclair Stevens.

I do believe it is highly desirable, Mr. Speaker, that both Mr. Coyne and Mr. Stevens should appear before the committee of this house on finance, trade and economic affairs, before which the original application for the charter of the Bank of Western Canada was heard and where Mr. Coyne, incidentally, would like to make some suggestions about further amendments to the Bank Act.

Personally I have no difficulty in dealing with the government's responsibility in this matter, but before I am asked to make a judgment, which I am required to make under the act, I would like to know what the issues are, and I do believe that we would better advance the business of the house and the business of the nation, in which we are all interested, if these charges and the reply of Mr. Stevens could be heard before the standing committee of the house which is charged at the moment with the amendments to the Bank Act.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, if we just wanted to have a general discussion about this matter, there is ample scope in the budget debate.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I say a word on the matter of urgency. The Minister of Finance has argued that this matter should be investigated but that it can be more properly investigated by the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs, and that he would be quite prepared to make a statement to the house but it is necessary that he know what the charges are.

I want to suggest to Your Honour that the matter of urgency has not to do solely with the question of charges by Mr. Coyne. The matter of urgency has to do with the manner in which the Minister of Finance himself has been discharging his responsibilities. The commitments which were made by the Bank of Western Canada through the banking committee of the House of Commons prior to the bank's incorporation are one thing, but there is an agreement between the Treasury Board and the Bank of Western Canada, which arose out of the extension of the ownership clause to allow them to hold more than 50 per cent of the stock. That agreement was specific in setting out what the bank could not do. It could not make loans to the B.I.F. companies; it could not deposit money with those companies, that it could not guarantee any liability of that financial group or purchase any assets from that financial complex.

It seems to me the house has a right to a statement from the minister as to whether this agreement has been complied with, whether any of the provisions of this agreement have been violated or circumvented. It is not now a matter of the charges of Mr. Coyne versus Mr. Sinclair Stevens. The question at the moment is whether the Minister of Finance, who is the watchdog for parliament and the Canadian people with respect to the operations of this bank, has been doing his duty, and whether he can assure this parliament that the bank has complied fully with the agreement.

If he cannot tell us that, then we are in a bad way. If there has been no investigation, or if there has been no supervision, then certainly we are in a bad way. Surely we do not have to depend on Mr. Coyne and Mr. Stevens to tell the house whether an agreement, entered into between a chartered bank and the Canadian Treasury Board, has been lived up to in every detail. It seems to me this is a matter which makes it most urgent that the subject be discussed.

There is also the matter of the bank itself to be considered, and public confidence in it. This will not be cleared up until the Minister of Finance has given us the kind of assurance that I have suggested he ought to be able to give us at this time.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, not in the interests of prolonging this debate but because of the effect of these statements upon public confidence, may I be permitted to extend the few remarks I made? I was trying to avoid dealing with questions of substance—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to hon. members that if we were to give effect to the suggestion now made by the Minister of Finance we would effectively get into the debate itself. I am sure that to some extent, to some considerable extent, we have gone beyond the very limited question of urgency of debate to which we should normally be restricted by virtue of the standing order itself, as dealt with in citation 100 of Beauchesne. The decision I have to make at the moment is on whether there is urgency of debate.

I refer hon. members to citation 100(3) in Beauchesne's fourth edition:

> "Urgency" within this rule does not apply to the matter itself, but it means "urgency of debate", when the ordinary opportunities provided by the rules of the house do not permit the subject to be brought on early enough and public interest demands that discussion take place immediately.

I am in full agreement with the submissions made by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands and the other hon.

members that this is a matter of urgency, but the house is in a position where, within an hour or so, we will revert to consideration of the budget.

A suggestion was made by the Leader of the Opposition that it might be easier for the opposition to obtain information and the views of the government if the debate on this important matter were held under the terms of standing order 26 rather than in the course of the discussion on the budget, but I cannot agree with this suggestion. It seems to me that the only difference between one debate and the other is that speeches during the budget debate are limited to 30 minutes, and speeches in a debate under standing order 26 could be for 40 minutes. That is the only procedural distinction I can see between the two types of debate.

Hon. members will have an opportunity to make their statements later on this afternoon and in the course of the evening, and for all intents and purposes I would think we would achieve the same objectives during the budget debate as those which are sought at the present time by the mover of the motion, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NORTH VIET NAM—PROVISION OF MEDICAL SUPPLIES AND POSSIBLE PEACE FEELERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I wish to ask him whether he would elaborate, for the benefit of parliament, on the statement he is reported to have made over the week end to a group of students to the effect that Canada, if requested, would send medical supplies to North Viet Nam. I should like to ask him how this statement fits in with the minister's oft repeated declaration that North Viet Nam is in fact the aggressor and must be dealt with as such.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I said in answer to the students, and as I had said in answer to another question a few days ago in the city of Ottawa, there has been no request for medical supplies for North Viet Nam by the government of North Viet Nam. Any assistance given by Canada under its external aid program is in pursuance of a request from a government. If a request came from the government of North Viet Nam it would be examined in the light of the over-all picture. That is what I said on Friday and that is as far as I can go. If such a demand does come it will be examined by the government in the light of all the circumstances.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I can make no observation on that factual statement, but I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether he is in a position to advise us whether anything in the nature of authentic peace feelers have come to Canada from North Viet Nam within the last five days; and has the minister, the Prime Minister or either of them been in touch with Washington suggesting that as a preliminary to hopeful or fruitful negotiations a cessation of the bombing should take place at once?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian representative on the Viet Nam international control commission is now in Ottawa. He has been reporting to the government. He was in Hanoi on January 6 and remained there for a period of eight days. We have been in consultation with the government of the United States as well as other governments, but I am sure my right hon. friend will appreciate that, if efforts in this area are to succeed, what is desirable now is that there should be careful consultation conducted within the context of confidential discussions, until such time as it is possible to take a more public position.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have one other question for the minister. Is he in a position to deny the suggestion which appeared in the press that because Mr. Ronning has dared to speak out, he is going to be required to cease his efforts on behalf of Canada in relation to North Viet Nam?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There is no basis whatsoever for the suggestion that because Mr. Ronning has exercised the rights of a free citizen he should not be used, as he was constructively used for the two visits he made to Hanoi on behalf of the Canadian government.

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It is supplementary to the first question asked by the leader of the official opposition. I wonder whether either the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs is in a position today to report to the house about the request from the Quakers for medical aid; not a request from the government, but a request from the Quakers.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): A reply to that question is going out this afternoon and should be in the hands of those who made the request tomorrow. I would prefer to make known the nature of the reply after they have received the answer. I expect to be able to make a short statement on the matter tomorrow.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is it expected that Mr. Chester Ronning will use the same channels in his contacts with North Viet Nam?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The channel which Mr. Ronning established successfully on the two occasions in March and June of 1966 continues to be open. We have had confirmation of this fact and the government has stated, through me and through the Prime Minister, that we are prepared to use this channel when we are satisfied that there is the slightest reason for it being used again. In the meantime our representative on the commission has been to Hanoi, as I said, on January 6. One of our military officers will be in Hanoi next week. There will be continuous contact with the government of the north. This is known to the government of the north. We are disposed to do anything we possibly can in this situation if the opportunity presents itself.

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. My question is in the form of a suggestion to the Prime Minister. For some days now, or some weeks, there has been considerable discussion and interest both in the house and in the country with regard to the rapid developments in Viet Nam. I wonder whether the Prime Minister would consider giving directions for the calling of the committee on external affairs so it could hear key witnesses on this subject particularly the people we have had in Viet Nam over the past year. I think this is important especially with the discussions presently going on with the United States.

Mr. Pearson: I think this might be useful. I understand from the Secretary of State for External Affairs that some arrangements are being considered in this regard at the present time.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

CANADIAN STANDARDS ON MOTOR CAR SAFETY DEVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the hon. and gallant Minister of Industry. I might say, Mr. Speaker, that I have been waiting for 52 years to ask a question in the hope of putting a brigadier on the spot. In view of a Washington report to the effect that a safety consultant has resigned his government post because he cannot in good conscience accept the government's safety standards, as they will not contribute effectively to safety since they are totally inadequate; and as we have a tendency in Canada to follow United States action in this regard, can the minister assure the house that Canada's auto standards when announced will be totally adequate and contribute effectively to safety?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, in reply to my equally hon. and gallant colleague in the house, I regret that he has not chosen the right opportunity to put a former army colleague on the spot. The resignation which has taken place reflects a difference of opinion between Dr. Haddon and one of his advisers. As the hon. gentleman knows, I think, all these questions of additional safety measures for automobiles represent a compromise between practicability and the desirability of assuring a maximum of safety. These are matters of judgment, and as you know judgments are not always the same. I can assure the hon. gentleman, however, that in this country we will have the safety of the public as our foremost preoccupation.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO FINANCING OF PREFABRICATED HOUSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour.

Can the minister tell us if the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has agreed to finance the purchase of prefab houses which the Aluminum Company of Canada is planning to build in Canada? Can he tell us also if studies were made to establish if those houses meet present housing standards in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will no doubt allow me to tell him that his question is of a very general nature and not so urgent that it cannot be put on the order paper.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO TAXATION COMMISSION REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. I wonder whether the minister would inform the house when he expects the commission report on taxation to be tabled?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to give a date until I am absolutely sure of it. I am not yet absolutely sure.

BANK OF WESTERN CANADA—LOANS TO PREFERRED SHAREHOLDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Joseph Macaluso (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Has the Bank of Western Canada or any of its shareholders asked the minister to permit the bank to make loans to any of its preferred shareholders in accordance with the terms of the order in council of August 3, 1966, which I believe is No. 658-530?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that question is no. The terms of this order prohibit the Bank of Western Canada directly or indirectly making any of its funds available to any of the preferred shareholders without the prior approval of the Minister of Finance.

I want to say two things. First of all, no one has asked me as Minister of Finance to give my approval. Second, I have made it clear to the people concerned that if I was asked for any such approval it would be given only under the most exceptional circumstances, because the terms of that order are intended to separate the financial operations of the Bank of Western Canada and those of its shareholders.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Could I ask the minister whether, in the light of the circumstances referred to by the hon. member for Hamilton West to which the minister just replied, he has been in contact with the chairman of the committee on finance and economic affairs to arrange for the two gentlemen, Mr. Coyne and Mr. Sinclair Stevens, to appear before the committee, which according to their statements they both wish to do?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I have had a brief conversation with the chairman. I would not like to commit him but I think he would welcome this provided that it did not prolong unduly the discussion of the provisions of the Bank Act.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, the minister mentioned a moment ago a communication he had received from Mr. Stevens. Has he had any communication whatsoever with the president of the Bank of Western Canada since late last week?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker, I have not had any communication with Mr. Coyne since the time he made his statement. I did have a telephone conversation with him in which he told me that he was going to make a statement. He did not tell me the nature of the statement, but he gave me advance warning that one was going to be made.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister has said that he informed certain individuals that if such an application was made, namely to have loans from the Bank of Western Canada to this great complex of financial monopoly, it would not be granted excepting under stringent rules, as I understood him. Who were these people with whom he communicated? When did he communicate this view to them? Was it before or after the president of the Bank of Western Canada made his statement to the press?

Mr. Sharp: Until the president of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Coyne, made his statement I was unaware of this issue. The order speaks for itself. The order says this bank shall not have financial dealings of the kinds outlined in the order with its preferred shareholders. This is the law. As far as I am concerned the law is going to be enforced. The only question that arises is the circumstances under which I might give prior approval to something that would otherwise be prohibited. I have said in this house that there would have to be very exceptional circumstances for me to give that approval. I have had no application from anyone asking me to exercise this discretion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That answer does not cover the situation at all. The treasury order says it shall not take place except under the exercise by the minister of a discretion, which he says will be restricted to the limit. In all the circumstances revealed by the president of the bank, is not the minister prepared to say that in this case it is not going to be granted?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the right hon. gentleman would not want me to make any such statement, or expect me to do so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do.

Mr. Sharp: The law says there shall be no such transactions except with the prior approval of the Minister of Finance, and we are not going to change that law. Because I do believe there may be very exceptional circumstances in which it might be in the interests of the public and in the interests of the shareholders for some sort of transaction to take place, I could not say in advance whether this would be so. But I make it quite clear again that this order was drawn and approved precisely for the purpose of preventing the sort of financial relations between the Bank of Western Canada and its shareholders that I believe should be prohibited.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the minister not agree that when evidence was given by the Stevens interests before the committee there was a specific undertaking that this would not be done, and that this vast complex of companies would not be able to get itself into the trough and borrow from the bank controlled to the extent of 51 per cent by the Stevens firms?

Mr. Sharp: I am not completely aware of what went on before the committee, but I do know that as Minister of Finance I would not have approved of an arrangement relating to the Bank of Western Canada unless those terms had been in the order; because I personally, and the government as a whole, believe that these kinds of transactions between the Bank of Western Canada and its preferred shareholders are not desirable.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question. The minister has said that Mr. Coyne phoned him prior to the time Mr. Coyne made his public statement. I would ask the minister whether Mr. Coyne divulged to the minister the nature of the statement he was about to make, and whether as a result of that information the minister took any steps to investigate if there was any danger of the terms of the agreement being violated or circumvented.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I thought I had just answered that question very clearly. I said Mr. Coyne did not divulge the terms of his announcement to me. Indeed, he said "I do not think you should know what I am going to say."

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, so I may be quite clear about it. Am I to understand that Mr. Coyne merely phoned the Minister of Finance and said he was going to make a statement, but he was not going to tell him what it was?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will recognize that I have exercised a considerable degree of leniency with respect to the questions that have been asked on this very important and urgent matter, but I do not think the question period should be allowed to change into a series of questions in examination and cross-examination.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would you allow one more question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: One more question in cross-examination by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I thought all the sharks were in the ocean off Florida, but since I came back and read Mr. Coyne's statement I find that I was wrong. Will the minister answer the question I put to him a while ago, when he stated voluntarily that one or more of these people had communicated with him to ask what was the attitude of the government in regard to granting such a discriminatory right? Will he tell us who are the people who telephoned him in that connection suggesting that they would like to have his consent?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker, no one has asked me for prior approval of anything. I said that I had indicated to one or two people since Mr. Coyne made his statement that the terms of the order speak for themselves, that I was not going to give approval to transactions of the kind outlined here, and that it would require very exceptional circumstances for me to exercise my discretion. I said that in one case to Mr. Sinclair Stevens and in another to another member of the associated group.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister tell us who that other person was?

Mr. Sharp: I would have to refresh my memory, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FROM MANITOBA FOR NATIONAL FARM CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Enns (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. I would like to ask him whether the government has received from either the premier of Manitoba or his minister of agriculture a formal request to call a national conference on agricultural policy centring on one basic theme, namely farm income.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I believe a request was received from the province of Manitoba with respect to a national farm conference. I do not recall that it was to be specifically limited to farm income.

Mr. Enns: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Do I take it from the answer of the minister that such a conference is being called or planned?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I stated that the request had been received. The department officials are now considering the practicability of such a conference and whether it could have any useful results.

SHIPPING

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—MAINTENANCE OF WINTER NAVIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

Since a few ships are now ice-bound on the St. Lawrence river between Sorel and Montreal and others are being delayed precisely because the river is closed to shipping, a situation which threatens to last several more days, can the minister tell us whether his department is making special efforts to open the St. Lawrence river so as to enable those ocean-going vessels to go through?

[English]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not have any later information than what I read in the Gazette this morning to the effect that all the ships have been freed largely as a result of the efforts of the coastguard.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister suggesting—I am afraid I did not understand correctly—that all ice-bound vessels and all those unable to go through, can now proceed on the St. Lawrence as far as Montreal?

[English]

Mr. Pickersgill: I said, sir, that I read that in the Gazette. I did not say I knew it of my own knowledge. I read the item just before I came into the house and I have not had time to make any check on it. However, I would imagine that since it appeared in the Gazette it is likely to be accurate.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Under the rules of this house, anyone seeking to put a question based on a newspaper item is immediately called to order and his question ruled unacceptable.

Now, here we have ministers quoting newspaper items to give information to members.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that this is out of order, that you have given your ruling on this point on several occasions and that the minister is not entitled to give—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Grégoire: —answers based on newspaper reports.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order.

[English]

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister inform the owners of these ships that the ports of Halifax and Saint John are open all the time, and that they will not have any trouble if they go there?

Mr. Pickersgill: If they have any doubt about it I will certainly resolve that doubt.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the hon. minister make sure that it is the same for the port of Montreal?

Mr. Pickersgill: That will depend on circumstances, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR CONDITIONS

AUTOMOBILE AGREEMENT—MEETING WITH UNIONS RESULTING FROM LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry following the question I asked him on Friday with regard to a meeting which the United Automobile Workers were trying to arrange with certain ministers to discuss the employment situation and factors arising out of the Canada-United States auto agreement. The minister said on Friday:

> I have not been able to communicate with the Minister of Labour in this regard, but I have every expectation the matter will be satisfactorily resolved.

The matter to be resolved was to be discussed at a meeting which was to last half an hour, from 12.30 to one o'clock on Wednesday, and those concerned felt quite properly that half an hour would not begin to make it possible to look into this matter adequately. Has the minister been able to resolve this matter with the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, who I believe are meeting the U.A.W. delegation?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I have not been able to speak to the Minister of Labour but I have seen the telegram which was addressed to him. Knowing my colleague the Minister of Labour, I am sure this matter will be resolved satisfactorily.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CONSIDERATION OF COLLECTIVE BARGAINING FOR EMPLOYEES OF PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the government taken note of the recommendation contained in the sixth report of the joint committee on the public service of Canada to the effect that consideration should be given to the introducing of legislation to provide for collective bargaining for the employees of parliament similar to that which is to be provided to public servants generally? Is favourable consideration being given to this recommendation?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could answer this question. I understand that the matter was considered by the committee dealing with the public service legislation, and of course the report of the committee will be given due consideration by the government.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

FAILURE OF ARMED FORCES TATTOO TO APPEAR IN KOOTENAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Defence based on representations from Kootenay West and Kootenay East. Can the minister inform the house why the Canadian armed forces tattoo "Red Train" will not appear in any place in the Kootenays, British Columbia, during centennial year?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think this is the type of question which can be asked at this time.

AIR POLLUTION

EQUIPPING OF AUTOMOBILES WITH PROTECTIVE DEVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, in view of the announcement made in Washington last Saturday relating to United States federal regulations for air pollution standards for cars, has the Minister of Industry carried out the undertaking which he made to the house a number of days ago? Has he got in touch with the automobile industry to make sure that the clean air package will be introduced in Canadian cars as standard equipment?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, when this question was first asked I pointed out that the extent to which the so-called package is needed in Canada is currently under investigation by the Department of National Health and Welfare as this is a feature more related to air pollution than to auto safety. I am advised that the Department of National Health and Welfare have not yet concluded their studies.

Mr. Grafftey: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is there any doubt whatsoever on the part of the government that the air pollution problem is as severe in Canada as it is the United States?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

TRANSPORT

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—PROTESTS FROM FARM ORGANIZATIONS RESPECTING INCREASED TOLLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. I understand that the minister will be making a statement on February 15 regarding operations on the St. Lawrence seaway. Has he received letters from farm organizations expressing opposition to any increase in seaway tolls because of the higher cost which this would entail for grain shipments?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have heard I am going to make a statement on February 15, so the rest of the question would not be relevant.

Mr. Pascoe: Will the minister not be making a statement on February 15?

Mr. Pickersgill: I have no such intention at present, but I might take it into my head to do so later.

THE BUDGET

ADDITIONAL FINANCIAL MEASURES OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Monday, December 19, consideration of the motion of Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Monteith.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, in resuming the budget debate which was adjourned some time ago I want to say that it is very difficult to say anything about the budget because in my opinion and that of my colleagues it was an entirely unnecessary exercise in which the Minister of Finance indulged last December. I think it was shameful of him to have attempted it, and I suggest it was a deliberate attempt on his part to frighten the Canadian people away from seeking increases in social welfare programs from now on with the threat that there would be an immediate and equivalent increase in taxes.

This becomes clear, Mr. Speaker, when we look at some of the statements which he made on December 19 when he introduced this so-called mini-budget. He said that he was introducing these taxes because it was necessary for the people of Canada to realize that every time they want any social expenditures, taxes for them must be found. At page 11332 of Hansard the minister is recorded as saying:

> It is because we are in that position that tonight we are asking the Canadian public to accept increased taxes in order that we may distribute more to our old age pensioners with low incomes.

This was an inaccurate statement, Mr. Speaker. It was a deliberately misleading statement to the Canadian people. The minister had the funds and admitted that he had the funds to distribute more to our old age pensioners on low incomes. He admitted he had the funds until at least this coming spring when he would bring down the regular budget. I suggest his statement was a deliberate misrepresentation of the financial position.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure, knowing the hon. member for York South, he would not want to use words which are obviously unparliamentary. No hon. member can say in the House of Commons of Canada that a statement made by another hon. member is deliberately misleading.

Mr. Lewis: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker; I will put it this way without casting the aspersion which my previous words contained. The effect of the statement was to give a false picture of the financial position of the old age security fund in that the minister's own tables showed there was enough money in it to take care of the old age pensioners under the supplementary payments bill without requiring further taxation. In fact, time and time again in his speech the minister seemed to me to be waving his admonitory forefinger at the people of Canada as if they were school children and telling them that if they ever wanted any more social welfare they must remember they would have to pay for it and pay for it immediately no matter what the circumstances may be.

There was no reason for the budget, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, the Minister of Finance said two things about the Canadian economy during his speech on December 19 which clearly emphasized the fact there was no reason for the budget. After reviewing the situation and the developments in the past three months, the minister is recorded as saying at page 11332 of Hansard:

> Developments in the past three months, however, suggest to me that the undesirable acceleration of the demands upon our economy has moderated. There has been some economic readjustment taking place following the excessive rates of expansion that occurred earlier this year. The effects of a large number of strikes have also been appearing in the statistics. My judgment is that the economic expansion now taking place is more in line with the capability of our economy to grow steadily without inflation.

This was a clear statement that there was nothing in the development of the economy at that time that justified any action by him in withdrawing any part of the purchasing power of the Canadian people. Later in his speech he certainly emphasized two or three times that in December the economic situation could not be foretold, that he had to wait, if I remember correctly, for the situation to become clearer in the United States, that events were still in a state of development and it was impossible for him to make any definitive forecast about the economy in 1967.

What does that add up to, Mr. Speaker, except a statement to the house and to the country that in fact he did not have the information necesssary to take any fiscal measures which would be related to the economic requirements of Canada? This is what he said. So far as he was able to see, the economy had levelled off, economic expansion had slowed down and no action by him was necessary. I suggest to him that he was going around the mulberry bush. At one point he said we needed no action, at another point he said he was not in a position to take action, and at a third point he said he was taking "neutral action".

What does neutral action mean? As I listened to him and as I reread his speech, I wondered what he meant. It reminded me of some people who talk about equality and insist that some people are more equal than others. It seemed to me that his December budget was a little more neutral than others. It was intended to have no effect, but it is having a deleterious effect on the economy and particularly one part of it to which I shall refer in a moment.

I really listened to the minister with amazement and I read his speech with even greater amazement. It is clearly obvious that there were only two reasons for introducing the budget. The first one was that in September, perhaps out of genuine fear of what he called inflationary pressures, he undertook to introduce a mini-budget. When December came he found it really was not necessary, but he felt that he was committed to take an unnecessary and unwise step. The second reason I have already given. It seems to me the minister was deliberately setting out to slow down social progress in Canada, to warn the Canadian people that from now on, so far as he and his colleagues are concerned, the progress of the Canadian people in regard to welfare would have to be slowed down because he said that we can no longer afford these vast payments. I say, Mr. Speaker, that this is a retrograde step, a regressive policy, an unjustified attitude in these modern times. He and I hope, as does everyone in Canada, that the Canadian economy will continue to expand. I say to him that it will be as unnecessary in the future as it has been unnecessary in the past to match welfare increases by precise increases in taxes. This is what his budget did.

I always hate even trying to be technical about these things, but it seems to me the budget was extremely illogical in another way. If the minister had come before parliament last spring and given an indication he intended to come before parliament this spring with the proposition that he must balance his budget in every way, then I could understand him attempting to balance the particular expenditures under the old age supplementary payments bill. I would not agree with him but I could understand it. However, in the same speech in which he insists he must increase taxes to raise precisely the amount it will cost to implement old age supplementary assistance payments, he also tells us the budgetary deficit is going to be greater than the amount he estimated last spring. This action, I suggest, emphasizes and underlines my suspicion that he sought to place the situation before the people of Canada in such a way as to make certain that from now on Canadians will be frightened to ask for improvement in the welfare of the young, the old or the ill because immediately they will be faced with an equal adjustment in their taxes.

I feel that this action is both unreasonable and undesirable. However, if the minister came to the conclusion that he needed a tax increase, we in this party, think that one half of the steps he took was correct. We disagree that there was any need at all for a tax increase, for the reasons I have tried to indicate. But if the minister determined that he was going to increase taxes he was certainly right in increasing the special income tax which is related to the old age security fund. As far as we are concerned the minister should have raised the ceiling even higher than he did if he wanted more money than this increase will provide.

A careful study of the minister's budget speech shows the following situation, which really condemns beyond words his increase in the sales tax. At page 11335 of Hansard appears Table 2 of his budget speech and, basing himself upon the table, the minister said, as reported in the first paragraph on page 11336.

> It will be seen that with this increased maximum tax—
> The increased maximum tax related to the old age security fund.
> —the requirements of the fund, to which the law directs our attention, are met until the end of the 1970-71 fiscal year, the first full year after the age reduction program is complete.

What reason then is there, Mr. Speaker, for any further tax? If, as the table at page 11335 of Hansard shows, the increase in income tax in connection with the old age security fund will place the fund in such a position that it will have the necessary money to meet the progressive reduction in the age of recipients as well as the additional payments under the old age supplementary payments bill for the next five years until 1970-71 what possible reason or justification can there be for an increase in another tax?

According to the minister's argument, which I reject, it was necessary for him to raise the additional funds by way of tax. Enough money was raised for five years by the simple increase of the maximum rate of the old age security tax from $120 to $240 a year. That, Mr. Speaker, gave him all he wanted from now till the first year the full program of age reduction is complete, sufficient. I repeat, not only for the $75 a month old age security pension but also, as the table clearly shows, for the additional payments that will have to be made under the supplementary payments legislation.

Despite the fact he had already raised sufficient money—which I repeat he did not have to do in the first place—to meet his requirements, the minister then imposed a totally injustified additional 1 per cent on the sales tax. I must say he did it with some obvious feeling of shame and regret. He himself admitted that it was a regressive tax and almost apologized for imposing it. Nonetheless he did so while at the same time making more exemptions, exceptions and long apologies.

I have tried to understand why the minister took this step, and again I can only repeat my earlier suggestion, that it is his determination to rap the knuckles of the Canadian people for wanting any advance in the welfare services or of the people in Canada who require welfare assistance of any sort. If I may summarize, there was no reason for any budget at all. But if there was any reason whatever for raising extra revenue this was fully accomplished by the progressive increase in the income tax and there was no justification for any additional increase in the sales tax.

As reported at page 11337 the minister said:

> The increase in sales tax can be expected to increase the prices of those goods subject to it—

I stop in the middle of a sentence. Here is a gentleman who for a year has been crying about what he called inflationary pressures in the economy. This is a government that has been faced with constant increases in the cost of living. We have a situation in Canada where the housewives of this country have been protesting against increases in prices. A joint committee has been dealing with the problem of the rising cost of living. Without any necessity whatever for his action, and after he has met all his requirements, the minister puts on the statute books an increase in the sales tax and blandly says that the increase in sales tax can be expected to increase the prices of those goods that are subject to it.

I am aware, of course, that food and some other things are excluded from sales tax, but this sales tax hits the housewife in many other areas: clothing, fixtures, household appliances, furniture and all the other things a family needs. To impose an additional 1 per cent at a time when it is totally unnecessary and the economy does not require it is an act of sheer thoughtlessness for which the only explanation, as I have said, is the desire of the minister to rap the knuckles of the Canadian people.

The fact of the matter is that despite his action of not putting the additional 1 per cent on certain building materials, this increase has already had an effect on prices. In the same paragraph from which I have already quoted—I am not going to take the time to re-quote it, but if you will permit me to paraphrase it the minister can correct me if I paraphrase it wrongly—the minister said that in his opinion the increase should be very minimal; it should be less than 1 per cent, he said.

The fact is that there have already been price increases announced in the press of 2 per cent, 1½ per cent and more than 2 per cent on many of the goods on which this sales tax falls, as could have been foretold by him and his advisers. There are situations where an increase of 1 per cent on a certain item would be so small a fraction of a cent that the manufacturers or others would take advantage of the 1 per cent increase in sales tax to get to the nearest half cent or full cent increase in prices, with the result that the total increase is, in fact, 2 per cent or more. Once more I ask the Minister of Finance what possible justification he can have for this thoughtless addition to the cost of living in Canada today.

I have in my hands a letter which one of my colleagues received from a building materials firm, and one paragraph reads as follows:

> Prior to the current increase—

That is, prior to the current increase in the sales tax.

> —it was possible to make up a bid using 11 per cent on everything. Now it is necessary to take some items at 11 per cent and the increased items at 12 per cent. This causes no end of work to all the trade and will no doubt result in considerable extra expense for the department, as it will entail a far greater amount of checking into the various accounts.

I have the suspicion, Mr. Speaker, that if a mistake occurs it will likely be on the side of 12 per cent than on the side of 11 per cent.

In my view, the minister ought to have looked in particular at the effect of this tax increase on housing. Instead of increasing the sales tax by 1 per cent, he should have given careful consideration to the housing needs of this country and to the question whether it was not his duty to remove the sales tax on housing materials and building supplies entirely. I suggest to him that that was his duty. It was not his duty to increase the sales tax by 1 per cent.

We are faced in this country, as the minister and every member knows, with a serious housing crisis. Everybody uses the term. In this country, in parliaments and legislatures, we have got into the habit of dealing in percentages and global figures—millions, hundreds of millions and billions of dollars. We talk of houses in terms of large numbers of homes. Sometimes I feel, when we use these figures, particularly when they are large figures, that we forget we are really speaking of the plight of thousands of Canadian families, men, women, and particularly children, who have to live in unsanitary homes, unpleasant surroundings leading to broken homes and juvenile delinquency. That is what we speak of when we talk of housing figures. Those figures represent broken lives in Canada. The Minister of Finance had a moral and social duty to be concerned about the broken lives of people living in unsanitary homes. He ought not to be concerned with the silly promise he made last September which he felt obliged to implement in December despite changing economic circumstances.

The housing facts have been placed on the record time and time again. Until this government acts and until some of the provincial governments join with it to take adequate action. They will have to be repeated. In 1965 housing starts in Toronto, in round figures, totalled 30,000; in 1966 they were about 21,000, a decrease of 30 per cent. According to the authorities we need at least 40,000 new homes in Toronto—I have been dealing with Toronto and my figures were for that city alone. Instead of 40,000 new dwellings started in 1966, 21,000 were started, about 50 per cent of the requirements of that metropolitan area.

In the whole of Canada there are about 50,000 publicly owned low rental housing units, less than 1 per cent of all dwellings in the country. The 1961 census showed that 923,000 households, just short of 1 million, in this country lived in broken down, crowded or unsanitary homes. The likelihood now is that instead of the number being under one million it has risen to about one and a half million. A great many Canadians are living in such homes.

In Vancouver from 400 to 500 families are on the waiting list for public housing, and less than half the required number of units are scheduled for completion within the next two years. They are not even completed now. This sort of thing is true right across the country. In every urban area the housing lack is disastrous for the people of Canada.

I do not refer only to new homes. Slum areas ought to be redeveloped. There is a lack of parks and recreational facilities. Air and water are polluted. All these factors are making life for many hundreds of thousands of Canadians in our larger metropolitan areas really unpleasant, unsanitary and uncomfortable.

This is the situation the minister ought to have dealt with last December and for which he ought to have made provision so that the Minister of Labour responsible for housing might have made in this house a statement that really meant something when dealing with the housing crisis. Instead, we had the picayune policy announcement which my leader justifiably and graphically described as giving a peanut to an elephant to assuage his hunger. Because the minister and the government fail to deal with the basic issues facing the Canadian people we get little bits here and little bits there, slowly, totally inadequately, and totally undesirable in most instances.

Since the minister was determined to make a budget speech in December—I suggest he could have spared himself the trouble and us the pain had he looked at the economy and the situation then—he should also have been concerned, as he says he is, with a matter about which his colleague, the Minister without Portfolio from Toronto, is so terribly concerned. I assume that the question of the lack of adequate control by Canada of its own industry and resources must be of great concern to the present Minister of Finance. Unlike another minister of the government, he agreed to serve on the special committee of ministers going into this question. I suggest to hon. members, and this is without disrespect for the Minister without Portfolio from Toronto for whom I have a great regard, that in parliamentary history there probably is no parallel for a member of parliament being invited to rejoin the cabinet and then being promptly appointed chairman of a royal commission of inquiry. This is what the committee of ministers to look into these matters is really about.

I say to the Minister of Finance and to the government that the New Democratic Party and others have waited for years for the long promised Canadian Development Corporation. At its founding convention in 1961 our party suggested that one of the best ways of regaining greater control over Canada's economy was to establish a publicly organized, publicly directed and managed—I emphasize totally publicly directed and managed—Canadian development fund, as we called it. In it would be gathered the savings of the Canadian people in appropriate ways. In it would be placed such savings as insurance companies and the like hold, voluntarily if possible but by a requirement of the law if necessary. Such a Canadian development fund would then have the necessary savings of Canadians to invest in new industries, in underdeveloped regions of this country and, whenever necessary, in repatriating parts of the economy it may be desirable to repatriate. Two or three years after 1961 we heard from the government that it proposed to establish what it called the Canadian Development Corporation. But we find that it is now on the shelf, as are so many things this government has placed there, resting peacefully and gathering dust.

I suggest to the Minister of Finance and to the house that the concern felt by the people some years ago about Canada's economic self-reliance, Canada's economic independence, ought to be a great deal deeper today than it was even then. The fact is that the control of Canada's economy by foreign corporations continues apace. The reinvestment of undistributed profits by subsidiaries of United States corporations gives them an ever-increasing weight in the economy. Moreover, in the last two or three years there have been examples of interference with the laws and policies of Canada and attempted interference with lines of economic development in this country. All this makes it more important than ever before that we should take steps to give Canada greater economic self-reliance.

I need not recall the famous guide lines which were issued from the United States according to which Canadian subsidiaries of Unites States corporations were required to send their undistributed earnings back home to their parent companies. More recently, if we had any sense of Canadian identity and Canadian pride we all stood aghast at the temerity of the United States authorities in sending sharp notes to the Canadian government with regard to the Mercantile Bank.

Why is not the Canada Development Corporation legislation before us? What is the reason, other than the division in the ranks of the government, the difference of opinion which has been disclosed from time to time between the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gordon) and some of his supporters in the cabinet and other ministers with their supporters? The result of this indecision, of this conflict within the ranks of the government, is that an important piece of legislation, one which alone, in our view, can effectively bring about the control of our economy by Canadians, lies on the shelf.

These are the matters with which the minister ought to have been concerned, in my view, last December. I summarize by saying that in my opinion the supplementary budget was unnecessary and the increase in the sales tax was a shameful, undesirable imposition on the people of Canada.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be more appropriate in debating this supplementary budget to speak about the subjects which it did not involve rather than about those which it actually covered. I say this because there was much more left out than was put in.

From this point of view I want to say something about those aspects of the economy with which the minister failed to deal and which I consider he should have covered. First of all, let me say it is most difficult for anyone who looks at the economy of Canada today to determine with any certainty just where we are going and whether we are going there too fast or too slowly. It is hard to decide what the future holds for us in view of the government's attitude in a number of areas.

I should like to speak first of all about the government's recent action in setting up what the last speaker described as a royal commission of cabinet headed by the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gordon). In this regard I should like to comment on the minister's recent appearance on the C.B.C. program "Sunday". I must say I was impressed by the questioner. He put a number of very cogent questions to the minister without, I am afraid, getting any factual information whatsoever in reply. The minister is alleged to be an economic nationalist, whatever that may mean. During that interview, which I witnessed, the statement was made that the Minister without Portfolio liked to deal in facts rather than in generalities. At the same time the hon. gentleman held forth in nothing but generalities; he is not nearly as sure what the facts are since he became head of this cabinet committee as he was at his literary best when producing books for the consumption of Canadians.

Before we embark on anything which might be interpreted as anti-American policy we should look very deeply into what we are likely to derive in the way of benefits. I come from an area which looks upon American investment with a great deal of interest. A large number of our industries have been developed during the last few years as a result of our connection with the United States. We have witnessed with great concern the change of course decided on by the government—for that is what it must be.

At the annual conference of the Liberal party last year we saw what we considered to be a change of course in favour of a more realistic approach to the financial future of our country. We felt that common sense had prevailed. It appeared that the Minister without Portfolio was certainly the loser. Indeed, many businessmen in this country uttered a sigh of relief, thinking that the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) had dealt a knock-out blow. Since then, apparently there has been soul searching on the part of certain Liberals. The first thing we know is that the hon. member for Davenport re-appears on the scene. One day, we were told, he intended to resign. The next he was a member of the cabinet. And the day after he became the head of a cabinet committee to study the effect of United States investment on the development of Canada.

The Atlantic provinces are concerned about the establishment of this committee. They recall the days when the Minister without Portfolio was the head of a royal commission that recommended that certain things be done in the maritime provinces which were not in keeping with our point of view. Provincial government policies in the Atlantic region have proven in recent years that other approaches are better if we have the right kind of policies emanating from the federal government. However, the right kind of policies are not coming from the federal government today, and they will not as long as this minister has a significant say in economic policy.

Although we may stand up in righteous indignation and talk about the degree of control exercised by United States firms and their subsidiaries in Canada, I think we should look at our investment potential from the Canadian point of view and gauge it on the basis of how far and how fast we want to go. Without United States capital we would not be moving very quickly at present, and I do not see any prospect of our moving quickly in the future unless we can continue to attract United States capital to develop many of our industries or to assist us in developing them. I do not think that a narrow, nationalistic, economic policy will benefit Canada in the foreseeable future. For Canada to become upset and concerned about the amount of United States capital coming into the country is almost like a flea attacking a dog.

The government's various approaches to such subjects are difficult to reconcile. Recently we had a debate on national defence. We are turning over more and more North American defence obligations to the United States, and if we were involved in any kind of war we would be completely dependent on that country to protect our sovereignty. We do not seem to be concerned about that. On the other hand, we are told that United States businessmen who invest their money in our country should not have anything to say about anything that happens in our country.

There is little or no evidence to suggest that American businessmen are interested in anything but the returns they can get upon the capital they have invested. I have been a member of this house for ten years and have never been approached by people associated with United States industries telling me we should do certain things for the United States because they have invested money in certain industries in this country. I am sure hon. members generally can say the same. The United States has never encouraged lobbies to force Canada to follow its line of thinking in any given situation. Indeed, every day it becomes more and more evident that Canadians speak their own minds whenever they desire on any aspect of government policy.

The tight money policy of the federal government has been damaging to the progress we are enjoying in the Atlantic provinces. Time and again we have heard leading spokesmen from the Atlantic provinces tell the government that, no matter what the situation may be in the rest of the country, so far as the Atlantic provinces are concerned tight money is a bad thing. This has been said in reports prepared by men hired by the government itself. Yet the government continues to ignore these constructive criticisms and carries on with the application of a blanket tight money policy that does irrevocable damage to our advancement.

Mr. Stewart: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Coates: I will permit one question.

Mr. Stewart: Would the hon. gentleman tell the house what Mr. Rasminsky said about the feasibility of applying a variegated money policy throughout the country?

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, Mr. Rasminsky is just one individual with one particular point of view on monetary policy. Whatever he may have said, I can quote a dozen other individuals who are just as intelligent and who have a different point of view about monetary policy. Whenever a proposal is placed before the establishment, in the normal course of events the establishment will say no to it. We who come from the Atlantic provinces believe the answer should be, "Yes, this can be done," and then find ways and means of doing it.

In recent months I have seen in my own constituency the all too familiar danger signals of a recession. Major industries have been laying off men in substantial numbers. More and more people have been coming to my office telling me they are looking for work and cannot find it. These are the kind of indicators which in the past have pointed to a recession. They are the kind of indicators that were much in evidence in 1956 and 1957. They are the kind of indicators which businessmen in the Atlantic provinces, certainly in Nova Scotia, are concerned about. In this connection I would like to quote from an article which appeared in the February 3 edition of the Halifax Chronicle-Herald. It deals with a report made by the Truro Area Industrial Commission. The headline is, "22 Outside Firms Show Interest In Truro Park". The subheading is, "Federal Tight-Money Policy Deters Other Companies". The article, based on the report of the chairman of the commission, reads in part as follows:

While the report listed five new industries which have started operations in the area during the year with the assistance of the commission, it explained the commission believed the federal government's "tight-money policy", which has been applied during the year, was a deterrent to some of the other firms interested in establishing plants in the area during the year.

This is exactly the situation which exists in Cumberland county and especially in Amherst where we also have a very large and most modern industrial park. I would hope that in the future it would be one of the best used industrial parks in the Atlantic area.

The same situation is developing elsewhere in the Atlantic provinces where in many instances the people have to depend on the establishment of branch plants to service their areas. The situation is that when a major concern has among its plans the establishment of a branch plant in the Atlantic provinces it also has a number of other schemes afoot. Possibly the branch to be operated in the Atlantic provinces is a marginal proposition. The company endeavours to secure the credit necessary to carry out the expansion and finds that it cannot get all the money it requires because there is a federal tight-money policy in effect. As a result the company has to start cutting corners and unfortunately in too many instances the branch plant it had hoped to establish in the Atlantic provinces falls under the shearing knife. Then we have to wait for a longer period of time until there is a better climate from a credit point of view before we can secure the plant, the employment and the goods and services which are associated with it. This is what happens time and time again. Rather than doing something about this problem the government ignores it and goes on its merry way continuing to apply its tight-money program. Certainly there is an indication that there is a let-up and I hope this be helpful to our area of Canada in the near future.

I have learned through talking to businessmen that inventories are growing, the number of projects being undertaken has lessened materially, the number of firms looking for the orders has increased greatly and competition is very keen to get what available business there is. As a result lay-offs are occurring in plants which have not had to lay off anyone for a period of five to ten years. If something is not done in the very near future we will be in a lot of trouble and most of it will be related to the tight money policy imposed by the government.

In this regard I should like to say something about housing, because even in a small town like the one in which I live, which has a population of only 11,000 or 12,000 people, there is a very great need for housing. With the amount of interest which has to be paid on the loans necessary in order to build houses today, houses are so far out of the reach of the ordinary person who needs a home that it is impossible for him to assume the obligation that the government today requires.

In addition, the tight money policy of the government always strikes the construction industry and housing first, and the first victim generally speaking is the Canadian who is in the $5,000 to $6,000 income bracket or below. These are the people who really need housing more than anyone else. Yet they are the people who are struck first by the tight money policy. They are the people who find that their hope of owning a home of their own goes out the window completely. I believe that housing in particular should be divorced from the construction industry in so far as government policy is concerned and certainly in so far as its tight-money policy is concerned. But that has not been the case in respect of this government. This is indicated quite significantly by the number of housing starts in recent months. The government has tried to take some meek steps to correct the situation. I like the analogy that was drawn by the leader of the New Democratic Party when he said it was like throwing a peanut to an elephant.

[Mr. Coates.]

I believe that the government must wake up to this fact. It must come forward with far more constructive housing policies than has been the case to date. Unless this is done, the government will be doing a great disservice to many hard working Canadians who have a right to expect to be able to look forward to owning their own homes but who today do not have a chance in the world of accomplishing this aim.

I should like also to say something about the amendment moved by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith) in so far as old age security is concerned. Certainly, as was stated by the previous speaker, the funds are available today in the old age security fund. They were there when the increase was approved. They could have been used. Had they been used it would not have been necessary to increase the income tax, but instead the government went forward and in effect gave the taxpayers a spanking for thinking that a $30 increase could be provided even to the needy without someone paying the bill. They said that everybody is going to pay the bill and that this will prove to everybody that they cannot come and ask for money unless they are willing to shell out money.

The funds in the old age security fund were put there by the taxpayers of this nation and they should not be expected to have to pay additional income tax while their own money is sitting in the fund and it is available for the payment of the additional $30 a month to those who can qualify for it. I also think that if the government wishes to talk about a guaranteed annual income and suggest to the Canadian people that the minimum amount which should be available to anyone in this nation is $1,260 per year, then the least it can do is increase the income tax exemption to that amount. In my opinion it is rather ridiculous for the federal government to say we should provide the Canadian people with a guaranteed annual income of $1,260 and then ask these same people to pay income tax on $260 because there is an exemption of only $1,000. Surely to goodness the government cannot talk out of both sides of its mouth at the same time. We should have one thing or the other. We should have a guaranteed annual income, if this is what the government wants, of $1,000 a year—I do not think that would be at all adequate; indeed, I do not think $1,260 is adequate today—or the exemption should be raised so that those people receiving the guaranteed annual income would not have to turn around and give back to the government a portion of the $1,260, the minimum amount on which the government feels they can maintain themselves.

If we in the Atlantic provinces are to go forward I believe more programs will have to be put forward by the government to allow us to advance at a faster rate than is required in the rest of the nation. This is necessary because we have a great deal of ground to make up. I believe that a great many logical arguments have been put before the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) in so far as the designated area program is concerned and in particular as it applies to the Atlantic provinces. During the last election campaign it was a plank in our platform that the whole Atlantic area should be designated. I still contend that this is the logical step. We in that part of Canada have to develop the growth areas that are situated there.

But this government by its program is forcing industries to locate in other areas. This would not be too bad if those other areas were within the Atlantic provinces, but unfortunately in many instances industries that may be thinking about locating in Halifax, Dartmouth, Saint John or Fredericton will locate in a similar area in some other part of the nation if they are prevented from securing the incentives available under this program. We therefore lose out completely. It is my hope that even now it is not too late for the government to reconsider its policy in so far as designated areas are concerned, single out these four growth centres in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and allow them the benefits available under the program. If the government does this it will materially assist our part of Canada to move forward.

Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. gentleman resumes his seat will he allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. Coates: Yes, Mr. Speaker, with the leave of the house.

Mr. Stewart: I assume that the hon. gentleman has time remaining. I should like him to comment on the report from the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs where Mr. Rasminsky said on November 1, 1966, that if in an area there were lower interest rates it would not help that area, but rather would have the effect of expelling money from the area to other parts of the country where the interest rates were higher. Would the hon. gentleman comment on that statement?

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, the governor of the Bank of Canada might put forward all kinds of theories but I do not think I can expound on them in the house at this time in answer to a question.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I was rather surprised at the turn of the debate this afternoon, having anticipated that in the first round we would hear representations from the minor parties in the house. It is because of an obvious miscalculation in schedules that involved Your Honour as well as other hon. members of the house that possibly there has been a slight shuffling around. It may be that the attitude of the minor parties is a reflection of how important they consider this mini-budget. Frankly, I share their implied attitude.

With the greatest respect to the minister, I think he found himself facing the necessity of bringing in a budget, which he postponed and postponed and finally could not postpone any longer than December 19 if the house was to adjourn on December 21. Therefore there was a fulfilment of the undertaking given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) and I think by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) on a number of occasions in the late summer and early fall, that because of pressing problems concerned with rapidly increasing inflation there would be a budget by Christmas. As a matter of fact, the indication was that there would be a budget well before December 1, as though the presentation of a budget in this house would be a cure-all for any and every economic ill that beset the nation.

I remember that in 1962 there was a great cry by editorial writers and other people who were not favourable to the government, that all that was required in the fall of that year following upon the convertibility crisis of May, 1962, was a budget. Our late colleague, the former hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, then minister of finance, repeatedly had the taunt thrown at him by government members, then in the official opposition, and other opposition members that never in his career had he presented a budget. When we came back into office after the election in 1962, the election having followed a full budget presention by the then minister of finance, Hon. Donald Fleming, the whole budget was there for everyone to examine. The proposals of the government were before the house and the country.

It is true that that budget was not debated in the house. But if we understand the nature of a budget debate we know that the proposals of the government are in the main ignored and hon. members discuss subjects which they were not able to discuss during the debate on the speech from the throne. The budget debate settles nothing. It provides a forum for ideas and proposals. That is what this house does. But somehow or other the idea is abroad in the minds of far too many people that the mere fact of presenting a budget, whether it tinkers up or tinkers down, will have salutary effects. In many instances, as is the case with this budget, it matters not a tinker's damn. That is the effect of this budget.

Frankly speaking, this budget did nothing and it was uncalled for in the light of the circumstances. It was only mooted last summer as a sort of ultimate escape hatch for the government when it failed to deal effectively with certain problems of inflation. The dilemma which faced the Minister of Finance in December was whether or not he should tax, whether or not he should apply a damper or whether he should leave the situation pretty well as it is. The dilemma he faced was one which was perplexing economic experts not only in Canada but in the United States. This is an indication of the close affiliation between the two economies, the United States economy being the dominant one and ours not being an exact mirror of theirs but following its movements in so far as United States interest rates are concerned.

We have heard cries about tight money as though this was only a Canadian phenomenon. However, the truth of the matter is that restrictions on credit appeared in the United States before they did here. The United States has experienced additional pressure on credit facilities primarily because of the demands of the war effort in connection with the conflict in Viet Nam and also the demands of the space program. We in Canada have not had such pressures to the same extent. There was inflation in the United States similar to that in Canada. There have been price hikes in basic commodities in the United States, such as we have had, and they have been controlled in some cases by executive action in that country. We in Canada saw the same sort of action taken with regard to a certain increase in the cost of steel which was announced by a number of companies in the late summer.

Many economists in our country have said that because darkening clouds were looming on the economic horizon it was not the time to impose a tax increase and that in effect the government would have to look to certain stimulants. Some have suggested that the housing industry be used as an economic tool. This has happened in the past. I am not too sure of the validity of a policy whereby Canada's housing program should depend on our economic policy. This would certainly make the housing construction industry behave much as one would expect a yo-yo to behave, up one year and down the next. We saw this happen this year. The government was partly responsible for some of these difficulties because of its winter construction bonus. It tried to create an image of superactivity in the housing industry which resulted in an increase in the price of houses by about $500 and a dislocation of the normal pattern of housing construction, after which it discontinued the program because it did not want pressure put on Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for more mortgage funds to fulfil the natural demands for housing in Canada.

I have before me an article written by one Leonard H. Lempert which appeared in the Christian Science Monitor of Wednesday, December 21. It is headed "Tax Hike Now Called 'Mistake' ". It contains a whole series of charts on employment and unemployment, wholesale prices, industrial production, retail sales, personal income and gross national product. The lead paragraph of the article reads as follows:

> The upward acceleration of economic activity in early 1966 has largely disappeared in recent months. This slackening in the rate of growth has caused most business observers to feel that a tax increase at this time would be an economic mistake.

The opinion is that it would be an economic mistake, but we know that in his budget message President Johnson confused and confounded the economic experts by announcing a special 6 per cent hike in income and corporate taxes. Therefore a parallel action was taken by the minister in Canada. Notwithstanding the views that the momentum of the economy was running down or that the rate of increase was levelling off and that before too long the minister might have to look to some stimulants to maintain forward progress, the minister came along with a 1 per cent increase in the sales tax. What is the result of this action? I will not go into the motivation for the tax increase. The amendment put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith), points up precisely what I think in this case. The minister need not have put forward his tax increase to cover the initial increases in old age security. This was not necessary.

This brings me back to my original thesis, namely, that the minister and the government were committed to some kind of budget speech before Christmas. He had postponed it as long as he could and the only legitimate means whereby a budget could be justified was the imposition of an increase of 1 per cent in the sales tax. What is the effect of this action aside from the extra money that will be raised for the old age security fund? It means that an additional portion of the gross national product will be diverted to the public sector. We know now that well over 40 per cent of the gross national product goes directly into the public sector.

Someone asks, have we got the welfare state? Of course we have, Mr. Speaker. This is where I say we must cry, halt. We have suffered—if the minister will let me finish, he will find plenty of opportunity to speak. The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald) and the minister may feel that they can make some political hay out of what I have said, but let them look at what is happening in Canada. Let them look at the brand of economic nationalism into which the minister is being dragged, kicking his heels.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): What has this got to do with the welfare state?

Mr. Lambert: It is tied in with the welfare state in that there is this preoccupation, this hangover or depression complex, that people must not only be given a boost in the event of need but also that everyone shall be compulsorily provided with a cushion of sorts whether he wants it or not.

Mr. Sharp: I thought that was the Conservative party's platform on old age pensions.

Mr. Lambert: When you have embarked upon a government created program of assistance which results in gaps in the program for individuals, then of course there is entitlement to equality in this regard. But we are getting to the point of asking, how is the Canadian economy to provide funds for its own development? Before you can guarantee a welfare program you must make sure you have got the income and the economy to support it. This is something we have not got and which we are rapidly destroying. The government is becoming very much aware of the fact that the Canadian people themselves are not providing the necessary investment funds for the development of our industry and the control of our industry.

Why is this so? It is because they do not have the money left to invest. More and more funds are being channelled into the public sector, not for the development or control of industry and our resources but for public expenditures such as transfer payments. We must come to a decision as to what we are going to do. Are we going to take away the funds that could be in large measure devoted to the purchase of equities for the development and production of Canadian resources which in the end would guarantee the basic economic strength necessary for Canadians to look after themselves?

In my view there must come a point where the individual still has the responsibility, still has the right to make up his mind, but this is being denied to him. Every program that comes along is compulsory and is framed in the so-called language of universality. If the individual is to make up his mind as to how he will provide for his old age, by investment in this or that pension plan, surely this process will provide funds for investment in the private sector. We know that this year $600 million was taken out of the economy compulsorily for the Canada Pension Plan. I am not saying all that would have been destined for investment in the private sector but certainly a great proportion of it would have been. However, it has been withdrawn and turned over to the provincial governments who in turn may hand some of it over to the municipalities for spending on various undertakings, many of which would require a second look as to timing. When it comes to having money available for investment, say in the tar sands, and one requires $250 million one finds that the private sector of the Canadian economy does not have that kind of money.

There are many other areas in which I feel the Canadian public should be encouraged to invest in the Canadian economy. There was a certain approach when the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Gordon) was minister of finance, and there are still regrettable vestiges of this policy prevalent in government thinking, to the effect that you can guarantee a proportion of Canadian ownership and control by negative policies, by using a big stick. I feel there is a great deal more merit in encouraging Canadians to invest rather than in discouraging foreigners from investing in Canada. I feel that a positive program of incentives is not going to cost that much money and in the end there will be an increase in the economic development of Canada by Canadians.

In the over-all picture of government budgeting it matters not whether certain moneys have to be spent in a certain way or whether less money comes in by another means. The result, from a budgeting or balancing point of view, is the same. We have heard that we are going to have presented to us this session that oft-postponed project known as the Canada Development Corporation. This piece of legislation has been delayed and delayed so long that one had hopes it had become stillborn. However, the other day, in outlining the business of the house before the end of this session, the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) indicated that the Canada Development Corporation bill would be brought before us for consideration. If March 10 is the date that the government has in mind for the prorogation of the house, I fear that with the many other things before the house there just cannot be any meaningful discussion at this session in any event of the Canada Development Corporation unless, of course, one subscribes to the idea prevalent in government ranks and among certain newspaper editors that anything the government proposes must ipso facto to be accepted by the house in which event we would make a cursory speech or two and then wrap it up. This is "acting responsibly" according to a number of people.

The parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) may be silently applauding such a philosophy but—

Mr. Sharp: He likes your speeches.

Mr. Lambert: —I would point out to him that he has not had any experience on this side of the house, and neither has the Minister of Finance. However, I seem to recall the attitudes of certain of their colleagues when they were on this side of the house, and I would suggest to the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche that he should consult with the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) or the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) as to the way one views government projects from one side of the house compared with the other. One could go into a great deal of the philosophy behind the cabinet putting forward measures which frustrate their backbenchers. They do not know what measures the government is putting forward but are asked to support them even though they had nothing to do with the preparation thereof. However, we will come to that when we reach the discussion on the rules.

The last point I should like to make, Mr. Speaker, concerns the question of the 12 per cent sales tax. This has become an extraordinarily large bite; it is one eighth added on at a certain price level. In some instances it is applied at the retail level which is in effect the contact between the producer and the public. In other instances it is applied at the manufacturers' level, many times removed from the actual consumer. The net result, of course, for the consumer is about the same because every intermediary between the manufacturer and the consumer adds on his percentage across the board. Therefore we get a profit margin on the tax, then another margin on the tax plus the profit margin, etc. etc., and the snowballing effect is considerable.

I will be very interested to see what the Carter commission on taxation has to say about the sales tax now that it has reached the level of 11 or 12 per cent. Whether it is 11 per cent or 12 per cent, I think it is equally onerous. The big difficulty comes when you are comparing—

Mr. Chrétien: It is not so bad as it was.

Mr. Lambert: Eleven or 12 per cent? I did not think it was necessary. I am talking about the general philosophy of sales tax.

Mr. Chrétien: Do you have any other fields to suggest to us?

Mr. Lambert: I think there is one field into which the government has moved—and if it was really honest it would admit it is going into that field—and that is the imposition of a service tax. I will admit that if the government is asked to spend money, it is not going to manufacture—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order.

Mr. Lambert: I am just finishing, Mr. Speaker. The government must raise the money it is required to spend; this I will admit right from the start. But the government moved into the field of a service tax when it imposed a tax on retreaded tires, for instance. This was an innovation in 1963 that I objected to. It was accepted, but I think on a false premise based on other cases.

Be that as it may, Mr. Speaker, I support the amendment because I think this budget was not necessary. The 1 per cent increase in sales tax was levied for the purpose only of justifying the budget. The money required for the old age security payments between the date of the budget and the end of March is certainly now in the fund. As I say, I support the amendment.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I find it very interesting to note that less than three hours ago we were involved in a debate on the setting aside of the normal business of the house in order to debate the urgent problem that had arisen in regard to the Bank of Western Canada and the resignation of the president of that bank from several financial corporations in Toronto with which he had previously been connected. At that time, Mr. Speaker, your advice in disallowing the plea for urgency was that the matter could be raised in the budget debate which was to follow. We are now embarked upon that debate and have been so engaged for several hours. The afternoon is well advanced but we have yet to hear any mention of the subject which would have set aside the normal business of the house.

It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to dwell on that matter at any length now, though this does not detract from the importance and urgency of dealing with it. I found some of the remarks the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) made in regard to the matter most interesting, particularly the reference to his telephone conversation with Mr. Stevens. As the hon. gentleman will be before the committee tonight I am sure we will hear further remarks from him at that time. I trust that both Mr. Stevens and Mr. Coyne will be brought before the committee on finance and economic affairs at the very earliest opportunity so that we can hear directly from those two gentlemen.

Certainly if the Bank of Western Canada is to be a bank the operations of which are particularly aimed at serving the interests and needs of western Canadians, then the stand that Mr. Coyne is taking is a most commendable one. Whether the bank is controlled from Bay street or whether it is controlled from Wall street, what is most important is that the banking services of this country meet the needs of the country in all their aspects. Therefore it is imperative that this matter be discussed before the committee and that the minister very clearly outline government policy.

In this regard I refer briefly to the proposed banking legislation. I find it very difficult to understand how the government can justify a policy which actually discriminates against the Mercantile Bank, albeit it is United States owned at this time, when what was involved was merely the passing from one foreign ownership to another. It seems to me that rather than coming in the back door, harming our own reputation in international financial circles and impeaching the record of a parliament that has always been known for justice, we would have been far better served had we simply relied on that portion of section 53 which requires that the foreign ownership of shares in the Mercantile Bank or in any bank, including the Bank of Western Canada, be limited to 25 per cent. If such action could yet be taken it would be quite straightforward.

It is the responsibility of the government to draft banking legislation for each period of 10 years. It seems to me that the objective of making sure that the Mercantile Bank is serving the interests of the nation could have been reached by making the degree of foreign ownership very specific. Any discriminatory clauses in the bill should have been deleted, and I cannot see any excuse for them except to achieve the objective of Canadian ownership. However, this matter must be debated in greater detail following the committee hearings when the banking bill comes before the house. My remarks do not detract from the importance and urgency of dealing effectively with the problem that has arisen in connection with the Bank of Western Canada. Government policy must be adhered to; banking operations and institutions in Canada must serve first of all the interests of the Canadian people and their economy.

I now come to the mini-budget. I do not see why it should have been brought in. I know the minister said, either last fall or earlier in the summer, that a mini-budget would be needed because of dangerous inflationary elements developing in the economy. Between the time of that announcement and the mini-budget conditions had changed greatly. The dangers of which he had forewarned us had begun to decline more rapidly than anticipated. He found it advisable to cancel action he had earlier intended taking.

The mini-budget concerns itself, therefore, with raising the money necessary to implement the guaranteed income provision for our senior citizens for the last three months of the fiscal year. The minister, it seems to me could have forgotten the mini-budget. He could have made a statement saying that the inflationary dangers in the economy had abuted to the point where it was not necessary to take special measures. He could have left the implementation of the extra tax for the next budget, which cannot now be far distant. The surplus in the old age security fund was more than enough to takecare of any expenditure necessary for the implementation of the guaranteed annual income for the first three months. In any event, payments to our senior citizens under the guaranteed income plan will not be made until March although they will be retroactive until January 1. It seems to me that this debate is redundant.

The minister decided to increase the income tax and the sales tax. As I said before, I commend the minister for making clear to the Canadian people that there is no secret source of government funds, that the only way money will be obtained, unless it is desired to increase deficit borrowing, is from the taxpayer's pocket. Because the increase in income tax does not really affect those in the low income brackets, that increase was the most logical way to collect the extra money.

I cannot agree with the decision to increase the sales tax by 1 per cent. Already our cost of living has risen so much, and is continuing to rise, that any increase in the cost of the things necessary for every-day living should be avoided. The minister argued that the 1 per cent increase in sales tax on certain items is not much and that the extra tax was a simple method to raise the additional income. The increase in sales tax from 11 per cent to 12 per cent does not mean an increased cost of just 1 per cent with respect to those items on which it is charged. The escalation of cost is more than that.

Before the house reassembled in the new year I took it on myself to investigate what the effect of the 1 per cent increase in sales tax would be in the wholesale grocery business with regard to those things normally sold in food stores. I came away with a sheaf of letters. I will not burden the house by going over them in detail but will mention a few.

I found that the increase in the cost of powdered milk was exactly 5 per cent. Wholesale companies after January 1 were charging 5 per cent more for powdered milk than they had charged before that time. The price increase for condensed milk ranged from 5 per cent to 9 per cent. Certain other standard brand products increased in price at the wholesale level by 8 per cent or more. Cooking oil, for example, rose by a fantastic 35 per cent. To be specific, a case of 12 cans of vegetable oil which sold before January 1 at $5.61 increased to $7.60. This increase cannot be attributed wholly to the 1 per cent sales tax increase; nevertheless the excuse for raising the price was the sales tax increase, and part of the increased price was owing to the sales tax increase. I found that for many items sold in food stores—I will not enumerate them all—the price increases varied almost without exception from 5 to 8 per cent, the excuse for raising prices being the 1 per cent increase in sales tax.

This was at the wholesale level. The retail level had not entered the picture and neither in many instances had the jobber. The effect of the increased taxation has been to increase costs, to escalate costs at the various levels. The greatest single problem facing us now is the escalation in the cost of living.

In 1966 we had more strikes in more vital areas than ever before. Never before had labour demanded the large increases it demanded in 1966. With the cost of living going up, if workers are to maintain the standard of living they had previously had they will have to have more money to spend. So the struggle for increased wages goes on.

Recently I talked to an employer who has probably not more than a dozen employees. He had spoken to his employees during 1966 and told them over and over again that to demand more wages would further spiral the cost of living ever higher. He tried to show them that by demanding more wages they would defeat their own purpose and not until costs could be kept down could they expect to control the cost of living. He said to me, "I cannot again face my employees with that story again; in 1967 their standard of living will be lower than in 1966 unless their earning power is increased."

That is the situation. The problem is so acute that we in the Social Credit party contend it cannot continue. Unless something is done to slow the spiralling cost of living, which month by month, year by year, sends living costs higher, the country will soon be in a more dangerous situation than we now realize. In fact, the net cost of living last year increased by 4 per cent and if present trends are indicative the cost of living will go much higher still in 1967.

At the same time, home construction has lagged behind the demand by more than 22 per cent. With the tremendous number of immigrants who have come to this country requiring homes, and the needs of young people who marry and want to establish their own homes, the yearly demand is estimated to be in excess of 150,000 units. We are not keeping pace with this demand. Bearing in mind the abundant supply of building materials available to us and the readiness of skilled labour, there is no valid excuse for the failure to provide the number of homes required. This year we have to make good the short-comings of last year in addition to providing for the needs of 1967. The whole story is an indication of what is happening in our economy.

We have been concerned for the past year about the increasing number of strikes which have taken place, and it appears we shall see more of them in 1967. At the same time, tight money continues to throttle industrial and commercial growth. We have no chance whatever of increasing productivity at a rate faster than the increase in the deflationary value of our money, or the inflation in the cost of living, unless this particular restraint is sufficiently removed. This is not taking place at the present time.

The Minister of Finance tells those in the private sector of our economy, as well as those engaged in provincial and local government, that we are spending too much money and that we cannot expect to correct the inflationary situation until we moderate our expenditures. At the same time, expenditure by the federal government continues to increase, this year by something like 20 per cent. Unless the federal government can set a pattern for other governments as well as for private industry, how can we expect the objectives of the Minister of Finance to be achieved? When taxes escalate and government expenditure increases faster than the productivity of the nation it is not surprising to find interest rates moving ahead.

I was impressed by reading some statistics from the United States; I do not think the statistics for Canada would differ greatly, if at all. I learned that if one calculates the total level of debt in the United States, including the governmental, private and mortgage sectors, and compares it with the total assets of that conutry, the two figures are almost the same. There is less than $3 billion difference in total figures which run into trillions of dollars. This means, according to any possible business criteria, that the United States is in an extremely serious position so far as debt is concerned. When I interpret this in terms of Canada's smaller economy, with the same general conditions applying, I can only conclude that the economy of this nation is running far closer than we realize to the edge of a precipice, and it is the responsibility of the Minister of Finance to do something about the situation.

I wish to draw attention to a few statistics with regard to the cost of government in Canada. In 1965, the last year for which statistics are available—we do not yet have the statistics for 1966—the total cost of government in this country in relation to the national income was much higher than it should have been, certainly much higher than we realise. In 1965 expenditures by the federal government amounted to approximately $8 billion, or a little less. In that year expenditures by provincial governments amounted to approximately $5½ billion and municipal government expenditures totalled something over 9½ billion. This gives us a total of something like $22 billion in government expenditures. Yet the national income in 1965 amounted to just less than $39 billion. In other words, approximately 55 cents out of every dollar that Canadians earned is being used for government expenditure.

Very often statistics concerning government expenditures in Canada include only federal expenditures. To arrive at the over-all picture one must, of course, include the expenditures at all three levels. After all, governments all get their money out of the same taxpayers' pockets, unless they use the taxpayers' credit in order to borrow money by way of deficit financing. It would be obvious, I think, that such a division of our national income is bound to place us in a precarious position. I have stated before, and it is true according to history, that whenever the expenditures of a government exceed 50 per cent of what its people earn the process of democratic government weakens and something else takes its place.

This is the danger I see in our present policy. Somehow or other we have managed to slow down our productivity while at the same time insisting on developing government budgets to the extent that half of what Canadians now earn is used merely to pay for the cost of government. That is a precarious situation in which to place ourselves.

It is said we have inflation in Canada. There is no inflation of money. We are short of money. In fact, one of the problems today on the whole international scene is that the world is short of money. Yet money is something which man makes and which man has the ability to control. Its purpose, basically, is to enable the distribution of goods and services, though it must also supply a standard of measurement and a means of storing wealth. One of the greatest needs facing this country today, in fact the greatest need which faces the whole free world today, is the introduction of a new system of monetary units which will reaffirm the fundamental purpose for which money was intended in the first place, that is, distribution. It is wrong to say there is inflation of money in Canada. There is not.

A previous speaker talked about the failure of Canadians to invest their savings in the development of Canada. That is true. The total amount held in savings accounts in Canada today is something in excess of $10 billion. If half of that sum were used for the development of our resources, for the expansion of our industry, we would not need the foreign capital we need today. For some reason Canadian people lack the confidence to invest their savings in the development of the resources of their country. Consequently it is necessary to depend on capital from the hands of foreigners who apparently have more confidence in Canada than we do ourselves as Canadians.

But the responsibility there, Mr. Speaker, falls back on government because unless government can set a climate, unless government can provide the incentive, unless our productivity does increase faster than the cost of government, then we shall continue to find ourselves in the position in which we are now. It is called inflation. It is not an inflation of money. It is an inflation of prices. It is an inflation of government expenditures. It is an inflation of the cost of everything we buy to the extent that Canadians, after paying taxes, do not have enough left to spend on those things which are produced for their own needs. This is the real problem with which we are faced. Unless the Minister of Finance and his financial policies can move toward correcting this thing in some way which we are failing to do at the present time, the economy of Canada is in for trouble.

The Minister of Finance must be concerned about the problem of adjusting taxes, and there are several areas he must consider in this respect. Perhaps a little timely advice, whether he gives heed to it or not, is in order. In my opinion it is time we called a halt to the increase of government expenditures and a corresponding halt to tax increases. If we do not call a halt to the present trend of things, if the federal government does not set the pattern for provincial and municipal governments in this regard, then government expenditure is going to spiral faster than the increase in income and the increase of productivity in this country and the inflationary problem, which is one of prices, is going to get worse rather than better.

It seems to me that one of the first steps which must be taken is to call a halt to the increase in government expenditure. We have watched and listened with interest to the proceedings of the special committee on consumer prices. There is no doubt this committee is doing good work. But as I have observed and read some of the presentations made before that committee it seemed to me that the real cause of the increase in the cost of living was being neglected.

I think the number one cause of the increase in the cost of living is the tremendous increase in taxes because taxation compounds itself at its various levels, as we have seen with the 1 per cent sales tax increase. Tax increases are the first villain in the cost of living spiral. The second cause is the tremendous cost of usury and interest. We are living today in a debt economy, on a time payment, pay tomorrow, consumer purchasing basis, and unless we can do something to reduce the cost of usury we are not going to correct the problem. It is not a question of packaging or of somebody making too much profit or too high wages. The first cause is the increase in the cost of government and the second is the run away cost of usury and interest.

The government must give a lead in this matter. I simply cannot understand the government's policy with respect to the proposed banking legislation, which would free the rate of interest. It seems to me that what is required is a ceiling on the cost of interest, particularly as it relates to consumer credit buying. We should lower the cost of interest from the top instead of taking the ceiling off and letting it rise from the bottom. By taking the ceiling off we are not going to reduce the cost of interest so far as the consumers of Canada are concerned.

Second, Mr. Speaker, I think it is imperative that in laying out his plans for his next budget the Minister of Finance should firmly establish priorities in the area of welfare. At the present time on the federal level approximately 35 per cent of everything we pay in taxes to the federal government is spent in the area of welfare. Out of 12 million Canadians who are 20 years of age or more, 5.5 million are actually receiving direct payments from government at this time. This is a situation which is extremely difficult to manage so far as federal budgets are concerned, but unless we are able to establish the priorities we are going to be in trouble, if we are not already in serious trouble.

There is no doubt in my mind that the first priority in the field of welfare is education. Unless we can provide educational facilities that will train the young people of today for the environment in which they will be making a living, and unless we can finance the retraining of older people who are no longer working in the professions or jobs in which they were originally trained, then we shall be failing them in their efforts to earn their own living. Today when the emphasis is on health and welfare it seems to me that we have our priorities reversed.

I realize that my time is just about finished, Mr. Speaker, but I have one or two other points I would like to make if I have permission to do so.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Has the hon. member the consent of the house to continue beyond his time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Thompson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I think it is the responsibility of the Minister of Finance, as the member of the government responsible for financial and tax policies, to take a careful look at our present taxation structure in order to eliminate any inequitable taxes which are restricting the growth of the economy. The province of Alberta has taken a lead in this regard by eliminating an inequitable tax, succession duties. This principle applies to the gift tax as well. Here again the federal government should take a lead in eliminating this type of tax in consultation with the provinces, because certainly it is doing nothing but discouraging the investment of Canadian savings in Canada.

I do not have sufficient time to talk about many other areas where taxes are restrictive instead of expansionist, but as my closing point may I say it is also necessary and imperative that the national income be equalized with the total market values of consumer goods and services. This is a subject with which I will deal on another occasion, but for the moment suffice it to say I have statistics which show the pattern for the last 50 years. It is one in which the amount of income that the Canadian people earn in all of their different activities and have in their own pockets to buy consumer goods is not equal to the market value of that which is produced in consumer goods and services. Until the national income is equalized with the total market value of consumer goods and services we shall continue to have the debtor economy we have now. There is no alternative for it, and here again I think it is the responsibility of the Minister of Finance to do something in this regard in connection with banking legislation and monetary policies for which he is responsible. The debt building policies of government and consumers are not only wrong but they are leading us to national and personal bankruptcy. This has already been evident in 1966.

I would close by saying that tight money and higher taxes are not the answer to our present situation. Until we have fiscal and economic policies that will encourage the development of our national resources by Canadians, so that the productivity of our economy will exceed the actual increase in the growth rate of government expenditures, we shall continue to find ourselves as we are this year, unable to meet the logical needs of the Canadian people. There is no clearer example of this problem than our failure this year to have sufficient money in circulation to permit the construction industry of the country to build the homes that Canadians need. So, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the minister in finalizing his plans for his coming budget will give heed to some of these things, which are not my ideas but are the very facts of the economy, in order to bring about a policy to deal more effectively with these problems.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock this day are as follows: The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), External Affairs—North Viet Nam—use of funds given for aid; the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange), Northern Affairs—assistance to Fort Smith following naming of Yellowknife as capital; the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire), Education—Manitoba—exclusion of separate schools from school budget.

THE BUDGET

ADDITIONAL FINANCIAL MEASURES OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Monteith.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the supplementary budget a couple of months before the annual budget is due, I ask why this budget to announce these two tax increases was brought in when it was. I think that the impact of the old age security supplement would not already be felt before another budget could be brought in. Someone has said that the minister brought in a tax increase contemporaneously with the old age pension supplement to teach us a lesson that welfare costs money. This is indeed a lofty approach and flatters the minister unduly.

I do not generally quote newspapers and will not do so now. I will say, however, that the Vancouver Province in an editorial dated December 21 last year, set forth the proposal that this was the reason the minister brought in his budget when he did. Others said that it was not so much to teach us a lesson but rather that the minister had to face the economic fact that an increase in spending must be met by an immediate increase in taxation. This is a view held by the Toronto Telegram. Another newspaper expressed the opinion that the increase in the sales tax actually will help recover part of the pension increase from the very people who will receive it, that is, from the pensioners as well as everyone else. This is only partly true and is not completely fair to the minister. Undoubtedly, however, that will be part of the effect. None of these approaches is entirely true. I am sure that neither the country, nor the members in the house, nor the minister's colleagues would benefit from or appreciate or require to be taught a lesson about economics in this manner.

The minister's political experience has been sufficient for him to know that the imposition of taxes just for the purpose of teaching people a lesson is not singularly appreciated. So far as facing economic facts is concerned, if we were to have a supplementary budget every time the government increased its spending we would have a continuous budget debate and hardly any legislation. Did we have a supplementary budget when the actual cost of Expo, for example, went up? Did we have a supplementary budget when the Canada Pension Plan bill came in last year which resulted in substantial additional spending?

Mr. Sharp: The money was provided in the bill itself.

Mr. Aiken: Did we have a supplementary budget to meet the extra costs as a result of the skyrocketing inflation and the increase in government spending? Perhaps the minister would answer that. I think not. But herein lies the answer. We all know the story of the straw that broke the camel's back. We know that the cost of government has grown and grown until the limit has been reached.

Just as the government was about to add the last straw the Minister of Finance snatched it away triumphantly protesting that we could not let our elderly break the camel's back and that we should ourselves carry the load of this extra straw. The minister knew that the Canadian people would gladly carry this little extra load on behalf of our senior citizens and that at the same time the camel would not break down. So our economy goes on carrying the load of the government's spending until the next straw comes by. I wonder whether the minister will find such a good excuse under similar circumstances the next time to pick off that next straw? I suppose we shall see what happens by the time the budget rolls around in a couple of months, but regardless of the reason let us not be led to think that the old age supplements were the whole cause of these two tax increases.

With otherwise healthy government, financing these tax increases could have been absorbed in other ways and without an additional budget. I think this is the fundamental matter which we must examine. If government spending had not accumulated to the point that it has, this additional load could have easily been carried. I think it is unfair that we should place on the old age pension supplement the sole cause for the tax increases that we are now considering.

This leads to another matter. Why do we find increasingly anxious attention being paid to our financial institutions at the present time? Canada's long-term financial prospects are excellent. The country at the present time could be described as being nervous. There is a lack of confidence because no firm businesslike action or legislation has been forthcoming from the government to meet the current problems. The cost of living continues to increase rapidly. While there are some increases in long-term credit, short-term credit is in very short supply. This is what we need for our day by day operations.

How many royal commissions, parliamentary committees and other boards of inquiry will the government continue to set up to look into questions on which it should make a decision itself? Just recently I have had cause to raise some question concerning the number of committees which are sitting to look into an immense number of problems, many of which could be placed directly before the government and action taken. While these committees are valuable in a great many cases, I think they are abused in many other cases when they are used to help the government put off making a definite decision in respect of some of these important problems.

I see it is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker. I believe something further is to be announced.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the house recess until eight o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, at the adjournment I was discussing the situation of the financial institutions of this country. I believe we recognize that the government will either have to cut tax expenditures or increase taxes in order to restore confidence in the economy. The last controversy over the Bank of Western Canada, following other difficulties with regard to financial institutions in Canada, will merely add fuel to the fire. Regardless of the reasons for the dispute, it has come at a particularly unfortunate time. The fact that the issue has been raised by Mr. James Coyne, who seems to have a penchant for public controversy, will certainly cause many hon. members some scepticism. However, his allegations should be fully investigated to ensure that the objects of this banking institution are properly carried out.

To come back for a moment to the budget debate, I would say we have been puzzled by the apparent reluctance of government members up to this time to take part in the debate. Here is the opportunity for many of the members of the Liberal party to discuss the important matters of the economy of this country. We read in the press from time to time about the lack of opportunity for private members on the government side of the house to speak out. Having been a member on the government side for some years, I recognize the lack of opportunity in many cases when they have so many experts sitting in front of them to discuss almost all fields. But here is the opportunity, during the budget debate, for some of these monumental expositions to be made.

However, Mr. Speaker, we have had four consecutive opposition members speaking on this budget debate without any government members seeming to clamour for the opportunity to speak great words in favour of the budget. I understand that there are one or two government members now ready, willing and anxious to present their views; but it has been a matter of some bewilderment to us that they have not sought to speak before. Perhaps they are too embarrassed by this unnecessary budget to take part in the debate, and merely want to get it over with and hope the government may come up with something more vital, something more meaningful for them to discuss. Perhaps it is difficult for the government members to explain a general tax increase at a time when the economy needs some encouragement, rather than discouragement.

I shall not reiterate what I said before the dinner hour, but it seems that this budget was an unnecessary exposition so close to the time for a regular budget, when a general tax increase could have been applied. I think it was something the minister felt he had to do for the expedience of the moment, and now wishes he had left undone until a later date. However, I do not want to delay the budget debate for that reason. I believe it was unnecessary; it was ill-timed and left a cloud on the older people of this country; it left the general impression with the public that it was only to provide the old age security supplement that additional taxes had to be raised. As I indicated previously, this was not the sole reason, and if there had been a properly managed economy it could have absorbed this latest burden on the taxpayers of the country.

The budget debate is normally a time to air complaints. While this is a fairly narrow budget, I have one complaint that I want to raise at this time in connection with budget matters. Being a member from a rural riding it bothers me considerably. It relates to the administration of unemployment insurance in rural areas. One of the things that a person living in a rural area is required to do when he applies for unemployment insurance is to prove that he is willing and able to accept employment, and that he is available for work. The Unemployment Insurance Commission has taken this to mean that a person who wishes to draw unemployment insurance must not limit the place of employment, the wages, or the type of job that he is prepared to accept. Time after time people in rural areas receive notices of disqualification because they have said that they find it difficult to work outside the community in which they reside. However, if they do state in their applications that they wish to work only within the immediate area of residence, they are disqualified by their own words.

To make it worse, they are often encouraged by the Unemployment Insurance Commission to state exactly where and when they will accept a job. If they say that they will not accept a job at a certain place 15 miles away, they may be disqualified on the ground that they have refused a job which, really, was never offered to them. This is most difficult for those people who have been raised, have worked and lived in a rural or an isolated community. The Unemployment Insurance Commission says: "You may have lived and worked there but we cannot get you a job there, so you had better go somewhere else." There may be reasons for it under some circumstances, but it is difficult in many cases for men to travel 30, 40 or 50 miles when they do not have transportation, when they are out of a job and when they cannot afford to maintain two homes.

If it is difficult for men, it is all the more difficult for women who either work part time to supplement the family income, or even support a family because of the inability of the husband to do so or because of his absence. And yet such a woman living in a rural area is told that she has to leave the community and go somewhere else to find employment.

Of course this is absolutely impossible. I run across this time after time and I take this opportunity to raise the issue and to ask that the unemployment insurance regulations be applied somewhat more reasonably to people in rural areas. It might be that we have a particularly difficult office in our area but I have heard the same complaint from other hon. members. I hope the government will give some thought to a more reasonable application of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Speaker, my time has just about expired. I hope that before the budget debate is concluded we will hear some hon. members on the government side explain how they can justify the imposition of the tax in question at a time when perhaps it could have been avoided. I hope they will explain why the apparent burden of the increase in taxes was cast upon the older people of this country. We know very well that while the granting of benefits to the older people was a factor in the increase in taxation, it was not the only factor. If the economy of the country had been in proper shape, if we had not been spending money recklessly and going into debt, we would have been able to absorb this increase instead of raising the tax at the time when we decided to give the old people a supplement. In this way we have burdened them with this increase.

I am sure the minister knew that the people of Canada would accept an additional tax, but I do not think we should be under the illusion that a supplement to the older people was the whole reason for a tax increase at this time. We have burdened ourselves to the point where a tax increase would have been necessary anyway. We may have to have another increase in the regular budget. It seems to me that the minister is approaching this matter in a piecemeal way and is trying to cast the burden of his difficulty on as broad a spectrum of the population as possible.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) has pointed out, this is the opportunity for private members to express their opinions on financial matters, and on other matters generally that are of concern to them. I am seeking to use this opportunity for that purpose and I am speaking as a private member representing Kootenay East. I think it is true that despite the fulminations of the members of the opposition, the budget speech as outlined by the minister has met with general approval. It is true that no one relishes a tax increase, but on the other hand those who are benefiting—and some of them have been mentioned by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka—certainly smile with approbation when it means an increase in grants.

I think the hollowness of the invective of the opposition can best be disclosed by turning back a few pages of Hansard to the debate on the act which provided for a supplement to old age security. Of course at that time it was a call for higher grants, while today it is a call for a reduction in taxes. This reminds me of the sage advice that was given to me when I was a rookie member of parliament—admittedly quite a number of years ago—that a successful politician never votes for a tax bill or against a grant.

Generally speaking I think that governments must face up to the horrible facts of life and be ever mindful of the Scottish politician's advice which is as follows:

> They'll dom soon forget what you've already gie 'em, but they'll remember for a long time what you ain't gie 'em yet.

While it is not my purpose to criticize the imposition of higher income taxes on certain groups of taxpayers and an increase in the sales tax, I do offer a suggestion which I believe to be fair and reasonable. To some members of the house it will be very unpopular, but I know that others will recognize that deep down in their hearts they find it acceptable, although they might not be prepared to admit it. I know also that it will be unpopular with a large and what I believe to be a preferred section of our population. It will indeed constitute a severe criticism of the economic philosophy of my friends, but I hope they will take it in the best sense, namely that it is a question of principle and that I believe it to be in the best interest of all Canadians.

I am referring to the removal of the special tax privilege enjoyed by co-operative enterprises and credit unions. Had this special tax incentive, based as it is on no sound economic or fiscal theory, been removed decades ago when co-operatives first emerged from the local self-help status on which they were founded, no new taxes would have been necessary at this time.

The co-operative movement, as it chooses to be called, is nothing more nor less than corporate enterprise enjoying the benefits of $3 billion worth of business each year in Canada. Co-operatives have become a corporate colossus in competitive enterprise, but with a difference. Co-operative profits are almost completely exempt from income tax. Their competitive advantage at the expense of the corporate and personal taxpayer may be simply stated. A corporate enterprise, in order to undertake a $1 million expansion program must have first earned $2 million in excess of a reasonable return on invested capital. One half of the corporate profit, or 52 per cent, must first be handed over to government, its sleeping but avaricious partner in business. The co-operative, on the other hand, need earn only $1 million, declare the full amount in patronage dividends and retain all or nearly all as capital for reinvestment purposes. The co-operative has no sleeping partner who demands 52 per cent of the corporate earnings.

Since the beginning of the industrial revolution, the eggheads have tended to look upon a corporate enterprise as a menace to society. Anyone who dares to defend corporate enterprise is one virtually living in sin. I believe, and sincerely believe, it is the benefits of corporate enterprise, operating under a democratic free enterprise system, that has provided for us on the North American continent the highest standard of living in the world, and in Canada the most comprehensive social welfare program in the world. Certainly, nothing I saw during my recent visit to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics altered, even in the minutest detail, this long held conviction.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Byrne: I will permit a question when my speech has been completed. I know hon. members—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Surely, the hon. member can indicate to us what he believes—

Mr. Byrne: I know the hon. members for York South (Mr. Lewis) and Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas)—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton South on a point of order.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): The hon. member is reading his speech, and he continues to read every word he has spoken in the house. This is not in accordance with the rules.

Mr. Byrne: I submit to this hon. member who has taken exception to what is being done that I do not intervene very often in debate. I have what may be considered to be copious notes because I am dealing with a very serious matter. If the hon. member would be as serious as I am in this house on occasion, he would show up much better.

I know that the socialist group in the house will not agree—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Cape Breton South on a point of order.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I am waiting for a ruling from the Chair. Is it or is it not against the rules to read word for word from a prepared text?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member will recall the explanation given by the hon. member for Kootenay East. He has explained to the house that he has copious notes, but I hope that he will not follow them too closely.

Mr. Nasserden: It appears that the notes are not only copious but difficult to read.

An hon. Member: The fellow who wrote them should read them.

Mr. Byrne: I have sat here for many years watching hon. members read their speeches word for word.

Mr. Nugent: Would the hon. member tell us why he could not find a better example than that to follow?

Mr. Byrne: The socialists have a reactionary outlook which I believe is 25 years behind even contemporary communism. Even communist Russia today struggles with the problem of reviving an enterprise or profit system, while trying to retain its special form of government.

Lest I be misunderstood, and whether or not I am misunderstood I know that I will be misinterpreted, I harbour absolutely no ill will toward co-operatives as such. Co-operatives have indeed a place in our society. They are, or at least should be, just another enterprise operating in a free enterprise environment, assisting in but sustaining a government or governments which are required to pour out billions of tax dollars in welfare and other services. Their special status need come only from the desire of a special group of like minds to provide self-help and co-operation. Co-operatives do, however, enjoy a special competitive position which threatens the very existence of corporate enterprise. It is against this discrimination I appeal to government and members of the house at this time.

Mr. Nasserden: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Byrne: Let us, for example, assess the relative position of two competitors bidding for a going concern in which one bidder is a co-operative and the other a corporate enterprise. Let us assume that the firm on the block enjoys net earnings after taxes of $1 million annually, and that the capitalized value of those earnings on the stock market is $10 million. Let us assume the going rate of earnings for that kind of investment is 10 per cent. Let us assume also that before payment of the corporation's income tax, its earnings were $2 million.

If the co-operative regards a 10 per cent return as satisfactory, it can afford to pay as much as $2 million for the firm. It can receive tax free the full $2 million of annual earnings. The other, ordinary, corporation seeking to buy this firm could wisely pay no more than the after tax capitalization value of $10 million. It will be argued I know that patronage refunds do not fall in the category of dividends; that co-operative earnings are not in any way connected with profit. Surely any economist worthy of the name would not say that excess earnings over disbursements are not profit.

From what I have said, it will be obvious to members of the house that while tax exempt co-operatives are not bearing their fair share of the Canadian tax burden, an even more serious result of this practice is the advantage they hold over corporate competitors. This policy, in an age when corporate profits are taxed at an exceedingly high rate, cannot help but mitigate against corporate expansion and conversely encourage unprecedented and overwhelming expansion of co-operative enterprise.

It is time, in my opinion, that co-operatives, having attained the multi-billion dollar business status, should divest themselves from the sort of semi-religious garb under which they have been clothed these many years. In all their literature and protestations designed to seek patronage of the individual and to retain the sympathies of legislators, there rings a semi-religious strain. It follows of course that any criticism in this area of special privilege is looked upon as sacrilegious utterance against the deity.

Let us take a look for a moment at the annual report of the Federated Co-operative Limited and subsidiary companies for the year ended October 31, 1964. I know that I would have the co-operation of the house if I were to table two pages from that report.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): You had better read it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent to having this material printed in Hansard?

Mr. Nugent: I rise on a point of order. Considering the manner in which the hon. member has been proceeding, I would think it only fair to the house he should tell us the name of the author of this speech, so he would not have to bear the blame alone. On that condition, we will allow the material to be read into the record.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, I have been in this house since 1949. Any utterances I have made have been of my own origin, and I am sure the same cannot be said for the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Nugent).

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Byrne: The annual report—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Cape Breton South on a point of order.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): My point of order is that there is no reason why the hon. member for Kootenay East should reply to a question from this side of the house in the way he did. His reply was inaccurate in any sense of the word.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I ask the house whether it gives unanimous consent to the parliamentary secretary to have this table to which he has referred recorded in Hansard?

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, in view of the unwarranted attack which is being made on co-operatives by the hon. gentleman, we cannot give him that consent.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, in this table—

Mr. Habel: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Byrne: —if hon. members will permit me—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Cochrane on a point of order.

Mr. Habel: Mr. Speaker, I cannot say otherwise than that it is amazing to see members on the opposition side doing what they are doing now, when only a few moments ago one of their members was blaming the Liberals for not speaking in this house.

Mr. Nugent: We are objecting to his reading from notes.

Mr. Byrne: In this statement, Mr. Speaker, we find net sales of $110,988,000, and other income of $182,000, for a total of $111 million odd. Expenditures are $92 million, estimated income tax $207,000, for a net savings available for distribution to members of $5,063,000.

I wonder whether anyone can find in this statement anything that faintly resembles a disbursement to a charitable institution unless, of course, 50 per cent of the western farmers on the western prairies are in need of welfare. Incidentally, none of these dividends have apparently been distributed to the western prairie farmers and others.

You will note from the statement, Mr. Speaker, that in any portion of the operations in which a deficit is incurred, the shortfall is described in such bourgeois terms as a loss. Where there is an excess—

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam on a point of order.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Douglas: —in this savage attack he is making on the co-operatives—

Mr. Nesbitt: And credit unions.

Mr. Douglas: Yes, and credit unions—but he should not be allowed to malign the co-operatives and misrepresent the situation. He just made a statement which certainly impugns the integrity of Federated Co-operatives. The hon. member said they distributed nothing to the farmers. He should know that Federated Co-operatives is owned by the individual co-operative associations, not by individual farmers.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is not a point of order. Sit down.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I do not need any orders from any pipsqueak over on that side of the house.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Make your own speech; don't interrupt others.

Mr. Douglas: I rose, Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Béchard: Obey the rules.

Mr. Douglas: I rose, Mr. Speaker, in protest against this attempt—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is a little difficult for the Chair to decide whether or not the hon. gentleman has a point of order until it has been heard. I would ask hon. members to give me the opportunity of hearing the hon. member's point of order. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I was merely endeavouring to point out, before I was interrupted, that if the hon. member wants to discuss the co-operative movement he should discuss the situation with accuracy, instead of maligning the co-operatives and leaving the impression that they are not distributing dividends to farmers. He knows the farmers are not members; it is the co-operative associations which are the members.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Douglas: The hon. member is leaving a totally erroneous impression, which no one can correct until he has finished his remarks, and by that time this false impression will have gone across the country.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think that the point of order which was raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam is an attempt to refute what is being said. The Chair is not the judge of the accuracy of the statements being made by the hon. member for Kootenay East, but if the argument he is now presenting can be refuted I am sure there will be an opportunity for the hon. member to do so.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, I would prefer to let the co-operative movement speak for itself, if hon. members would allow me to table these figures.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam I also want to record my regret that the hon. member has—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair's responsibility in this matter is to decide on the point of order. If the hon. member wishes, as I have said, to refute the argument being made, he will have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier I would be quite pleased to let the Federated Co-operatives speak for themselves, if hon. members opposite would allow me to table these two pages of their report dated October 31, 1964. Since that has been denied me they will have to accept my statement.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Byrne: Where there is an excess of revenue over expenditure—

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think that to suggest the house has denied the hon. member from doing a certain thing might leave the impression that the house has therefore acceded to an argument of his in which he made a very misleading statement, which I am sure he would not except the house to abide by. Our argument against his putting the statement on the record is based simply on the fact that we—at least as far as I am concerned—want to know the author of his speech. Since we contend that we should not accept the statement that he wishes to proffer because it does not support his argument, our refusal is not an admission of anything, except that we are not buying anything that he is selling in this matter.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the dinner hour must have been a little too long and that purchases have been made during that period. This, if I may say so, is not, as a corporate enterprise would term it, a profit and loss sheet; it merely becomes a pusillanimous recording of undistributed savings.

In this context, Mr. Speaker, what is the real meaning of the word "savings"? Is it intended to show how much the patron saved through dealing with the co-operative, rather than an avaricious corporate enterprise or a corner grocer or a hardware merchant? If so, such an assumption is a subtle distortion of the fact. The saving is in reality the amount by which the federal and provincial treasuries have been deprived. Had the co-operative not been in a position to expand with the assistance of free capital, and had current profits been subject to the 52 per cent corporate income tax, the picture would indeed have been vastly different.

You will note also—and this is significant —that the net savings—not profits, of course —in 1964 amount to $5,063,000, upon which the estimated income tax is $207,000.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, the hon. member who now has the floor has said that the savings that are made by co-operatives have been robbing the federal treasury. That is an insinuation that is unworthy of any member of the House of Commons.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, I expect the hon. member will be making his speech. He usually favours the house on these matters. A corporate enterprise with like earnings—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): You have said that already.

Mr. Byrne: —profits or savings, would have paid the federal and provincial treasuries $2,633,360. The co-operative would have paid about 4 per cent, for a total of $207,000.

I would like hon. members to please note that this is no charitable distribution. If we refer again to page 21 of the report, we see under "Members Equity" the sum of $5,080,000 of undistributed savings. This money will be used, of course, either for capital expansion or direct purchase of going concerns.

The assumption that co-operatives hold down prices, too, is a completely erroneous one. Consumer co-operatives simply do not undercut prices, but offer their patrons a nebulous patronage refund which is paid in cash only if the co-operative does not entertain expansionist ambitions. Producer co-operatives such as Western Co-operative Fertilizers Limited, after they got into production, instructed their retail outlets to meet the going price and to promise a patronage refund. Such refund, made possible by the avoidance of income tax and current taxes, is a legacy of the co-operative privileges. I shall be referring to this matter a little later on.

But what has been the experience in other countries in the matter of the price stabilizing effect of the co-operative movement? In Sweden, where consumer co-operatives have been an important factor in the nation's economy for over a hundred years, they account for almost 20 per cent of the total retail business. Yet an article in the Ottawa Citizen of Thursday, January 12, at page 17, had this to say:

> Swedes staggering under the world's highest cost of living, were faced today with higher taxes and prices in the toughest budget for at least nineteen years. Observers saw the budget as a determined government effort to correct a faltering economy.

But where will it all end here in Canada? Mr. Fowler, President of Interprovincial Co-operatives, 1962, is reported as saying:

> Co-operatives hope to acquire 25 to 35 per cent of the total business of providing goods used by humans.

Mr. Speaker, if this special tax privilege continues, and I feel sure Mr. Fowler's expectations were that it will, his prognostications, in my opinion, were uncharacteristically pessimistic.

Speaking before the standing committee on transportation and communications on October 8, 1966, on behalf of the Canadian Co-operative Wheat Producers, Mr. Gibbins had this to say:

> We have been in the international grain business for more than forty years and our experience is widespread. Taken together we own and operate for our member farmers more than forty per cent of the licensed country elevator space in western Canada and about forty per cent of the terminal elevator space and handle about half of the total grains marketed in the three prairie provinces. Our farmer membership accounts for about eighty per cent of all prairie farmers. In addition either separately or together we operate livestock marketing facilities and a packing plant, flour mill, process vegetable oils, publish farm newspapers, manufacture and distribute fertilizers and other farm supplies, and maintain an insurance company.

This is indeed quite a diversified philanthropic organization. If this phenomenal expansion continues and the special tax privilege is left unrepealed, who, in the name of heaven, but the personal income taxpayer will be left to shoulder the tax burdens being imposed by modern government.

Corporate enterprise in Canada last year paid almost $1.5 billion in income tax. Eighty two per cent of this tax was required for welfare payments. It would be well for members of parliament to consider the tax burden that will fall upon the shoulders of the personal income taxpayer in our country if this special privilege continues to give rise to such monumental vertical integration of co-operative enterprises.

A confirmed anti-socialist, I personally believe such a development to be even more insidious than state ownership and control of our means of production and distribution. Surely, if by some miracle, the state enterprise would show a profit, such profits would at least be calculated for use by the state to the benefit of all the people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, at this stage of my contribution members will begin to wonder just why I have become suddenly involved in a study of this serious matter. I, too, perhaps, would have remained blissfully unaware of this situation had the results not begun to endanger the very jobs and economic well-being of my own constituency. Legislators both provincial and federal have been inclined to ignore the problem.

Indeed, Mr. George Davidovic, research director of the Co-operative Union of Canada, commenting in Antigonish, Nova Scotia, recently, on the subject of Income Tax on Co-operatives is reported to have made this contemptible remark:

> Furthermore they—
> Meaning politicians:
> —realize the co-operatives are made up of people, very large numbers of people, and after all it is people who make votes!

Obviously, spokesmen for big time co-operatives look upon modern day politicians as fair game for blackmail. Let me remind Mr. Davidovic that corporate employees are voters too, but I do not wish to debase my argument to that level. My concern is for the economy of Canada generally and the welfare of a large number of my constituents in particular. I hold the integrity of members of parliament in higher regard than does Mr. Davidovic.

On the avenue of fertilizer production involving Cominco and Western Co-operative Fertilizers Ltd. there appears to me to be a head-on encounter. For a moment let us review the history and development of production and use of fertilizer in western Canada. It began with Cominco, then Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, which was the only producer until 1954, when Northwest Nitro built its plant at Medicine Hat.

Throughout those early years the major marketing task was to demonstrate to the Canadian farmers the economic benefits which could be achieved in improved yields, earlier maturity and better quality of crops by use of fertilizer.

The progress was slow and tedious. Consumption rose in the three prairie provinces from nil in 1930 to 25,000 tons in 1940, thence to 100,000 tons in 1950 and 170,000 tons in 1960. Since that time growth has been accelerated rapidly and in 1966 consumption was about 700,000 tons.

The rapid acceleration of consumer demand that may be seen is directly attributable to the promotional activities conducted by Cominco over the past 36 years. Their marketing policy has been and continues to be strongly based on technology. Their people are not merely salesmen but are university trained agronomists who have been trained to know soils, crop fertilizer requirements and the proper method of application, thus ensuring the most efficient use of fertilizer by the plant. Cominco has conducted a great deal of fundamental research on prairie soils and soil fertility, and has sponsored research at the three western prairie universities.

Mr. Douglas: Has it also written members' speeches, may I ask?

Mr. Byrne: All these efforts have been designed to increase crop productivity. They have placed hundreds and sometimes thousands of demonstration plots.

The first year Western Fertilizer came into production they took over 25 per cent of Cominco's market on the prairies. The sales pitch was to instruct their co-operative controlled retail outlets to quote the going price but offer a patronage refund at the end of the fiscal year.

However, it is natural, and indeed to be expected, that other producers would be attracted to the Canadian prairies. Over the past 12 years competition has grown and at the end of 1966 four additional companies were producing, with a total capacity of 900,000 tons. Cominco's total capacity in Trail, Kimberley, Calgary and Regina was a million tons.

These plants supplied the Canadian prairie market with some 700,000 tons in 1966 and exported 1,200 million tons. In addition, J. R. Simplot is currently putting on stream a fertilizer plant of 350,000 tons annual capacity and Imperial Oil has announced their intention of producing 500,000 tons annually commencing in mid 1969. By this time it is estimated the total prairie consumption of fertilizer may be 950,000 tons. It appears from this forecast that the western Canadian market will face a virtual glut of fertilizer over the next five to ten years.

Mr. C. W. Gibbins, president of the Saskatchewan wheat pool, is reported to have stated that the aim of the co-operative plant in Calgary is to save the western farmers as much as 35 per cent on fertilizer charges. While Cominco can probably maintain a fair share of the western Canadian fertilizer market under all competitive conditions, it is extremely doubtful and, in fact, improbable that it could do so if its main competitor is a co-operative enjoying a special tax privilege. Western Co-operative Fertilizers have already announced a plant expansion ranging up to one million tons.

Fertilizer production is one of the basic elements in the economy of East and West Kootenay. Long and costly freight charges over mountainous territory both to the prairies and the seaboard for the finished product and the high cost of mining and delivery of phosphate rock to the Kimberley and Trail plants constitute a severe disadvantage.

Nevertheless, throughout the years Cominco in response to the demands of a strong and militant industrial union, led the field in wages and working conditions and other social benefits to its employees. Throughout most of those years, Cominco has paid to the federal and provincial treasuries 50 per cent, representing hundreds of millions of dollars income tax on all profits. Yet a glance at the D.B.S. price index listing commodity services and equipment used by farmers and based on 1935-39 prices will reveal that in terms of constant dollars the cost of fertilizer has decreased over the period.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have made allowance for the interruptions which the hon. member encountered during his speech but I must now advise him that the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Would the hon. member permit a question before he continues?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired. The hon. member for Halifax.

Mr. McCleave: We are prepared to give the hon. member more time in which to complete his address. I believe everyone on this side is agreeable to that being done.

Mr. Herridge: It is a most interesting speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) wish me to ask for unanimous consent?

Does the house give unanimous consent for the hon. gentleman to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Did I hear an interjection "no" from the Liberal side?

Mr. Byrne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The price index reveals that the cost of fertilizer has decreased over the period mentioned. The 1965 index shows farm machinery at 284, a rise of 184 points; building material 405, a rise of 305 points; feed 230, a rise of 130 points; seed 212, a rise of 112 points, and fertilizer 180 for a rise of only 80 points. In the light of these figures, was there real justification for co-operatives, short of a genuine profit motive, entering into the fertilizer production field?

On a relatively small scale tailored to growing western demand, Cominco has developed the first iron and steel production industry in western Canada, but it was, and still remains, a by-product of fertilizer processing. The expansion of this embryonic industry, therefore, is contingent upon continuing fertilizer production and expansion at the Kimberley plant. Here iron tailings, of which there are many million tons in storage and other thousands produced daily, are roasted to produce sulphuric acid and iron calcine. But it is a costly process consuming vast quantities of electrical energy. Sulphuric acid is the main re-agent in all phosphate fertilizer manufacture.

While the production of fertilizer by this process may stand alone under normal competitive conditions, production of iron and steel could not. In other words, it appears to me that the continuation and expansion of the steel industry in the Kootenays is directly related to the production and marketability of fertilizer. Fertilizer production at this time is an extremely marginal operation and cost of money is a major determining factor.

Any suggestion of a substantial reduction in price, even far less than the 35 per cent proposed by Mr. Gibbins, and made possible only through tax privileges tantamount to a direct subsidy, would simply eliminate corporate enterprise from the market. Such a prospect seriously jeopardizes the economy of the Kootenays and the welfare of hundreds of my constituents.

I ask hon. members, therefore to consider seriously everything I have said. Would it not be appropriate, in this centennial year, to change our tax laws to make them equally applicable to all—to share the tax burden without special privilege to any group?

Mr. Basford: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Basford: May I have the unanimous consent of the house to ask a question?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): If I had a question to ask, I would ask the stout defender of private enterprise production of fertilizer whether he is really standing up for the bulls of Bay street.

Mr. Byrne: Make up your own mind.

Mr. McCleave: It it always difficult to follow the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne). The target is so wide and inviting that one is apt to become completely diverted by it and fail to get on with the business at hand.

What we have just heard represents one of the most singular attacks upon co-operatives and credit unions in Canada that I have been privileged to hear in the House of Commons. It was not only outspoken; it was atrocious. Surely the spirit of co-operatives and of credit unions is the banding together of people with limited means in order to achieve a strength which they would not otherwise possess. On this side of the house we are inclined to suspect that the speech so diligently read by the hon. member for Kootenay East, with all its copious notes—we all know that the parts he read sounded much better than the parts he "ad libbed"—was put into his hands by somebody. Obviously he was flying a kite—

Mr. Byrne: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member has no right to imply that I was making a speech prepared elsewhere. I have sat on this side of the house for many years and have often heard what appeared to me to be speeches prepared in the back room of the Leader of the Opposition, but I have never suggested they were not speeches made by hon. member who was delivering them. I prepared this speech myself and delivered it with copious notes.

[Mr. Byrne.]

Mr. McCleave: I would not wish to send anybody else on a suicidal mission by saying they had written the speech. I will acknowledge to the hon. member that he himself did write the speech. I am glad to hear him confess that he wrote it.

The arithmetic of the hon. member may also be open to question. He said he has sat here since 1949, but I cannot recall his presence between 1958 and 1962. I understand that the hon. member for the distinguished riding of Kootenay East at that time was a Mr. Murray McFarlane.

There are obviously other hon. members who wish to come to grips with the hon. member for Kootenay East on the subject of taxation, or non-taxation, of co-operative unions and credit unions. I do not intend to deal with the subject further, except to point out that if the hon. member would lean across and speak to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) he will find, perhaps, that the parliamentary secretary would like to excise some of the paragraphs from the speech which has just been read to us.

My own thoughts are more in agreement with the speech delivered earlier today by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). He said this was an unnecessary budget, and I suppose he was dealing with it from that point of view because of its sins of commission, the imposition of taxes to raise moneys for old age security supplements which could be raised in other ways. With that aspect of his argument I do agree. Later on, however, I would like to attack the mini-budget for its sins of omission, that is, the things it could have done but the Minister of Finance did not deign to do.

Before I do so I do not think it is out of place in a budget debate to mention, as a native of New Brunswick, a significant event which took place in that province tonight, the victory of a former member of parliament, who has gained a seat in the provincial legislature. I understand that Mr. Charles Van Horne is going to gain that seat by a margin of about 2,500 votes.

Mr. Keays: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, before announcing the wonderful victory in the province of New Brunswick, I think the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) should first of all clear up the question of the fertilizers mentioned by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne). Could he tell us, are these fertilizers extracted from the surface or how far down must we go to get them?

Mr. McCleave: The only source of this substance that I know of was in the speech of the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne). But returning to the event that happened in New Brunswick this evening, I think it must give the Minister of Finance some pause for reflection, because one of the points that was eloquently pressed over and over again—

Mr. Chrétien: The former hon. member was wise enough to resign from your party.

Mr. McCleave: I am sorry; did somebody have a question?

Mr. Chrétien: He resigned in 1961 from your party.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Van Horne is Conservative party leader in the province of New Brunswick, and perhaps his election victory is more significant, since the matter has been raised from the other side, in that his quarrel was not with a gentleman named Mr. Savoie but a gentleman named Louis J. Robichaud, who happens to be the premier of New Brunswick. And I suggest that before the end of the year the happy event of this evening will be translated into an even happier event, namely the replacement of the present government of New Brunswick with one more attuned to the needs of the people.

As I was saying, some of the issues raised in that by-election are very pertinent to this debate. The government's tight money policy lies particularly hard upon Atlantic Canada, and questions have been raised by the return to the federal government of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Gordon). This afternoon in this house I saw that hon. member, now Minister without Portfolio, communing with the Minister of Finance. Both have since gone forth and not returned, and now the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters) is here to take their place.

I suppose that under the policies of the government those with one point of view hold the fort for a particular time, and those with another point of view hold it at another time, thus trying to beguile the voters. But the return of the hon. member for Davenport to the cabinet was aptly pronounced upon in a recent editorial in the Montreal Gazette, from which I quote in part that it—

> —recalls what old Dr. Samuel Johnson said about a man who had married for the second time. "It was," said Dr. Johnson, "the triumph of hope over experience."

Mr. Byrne: That's an old one.

Mr. McCleave: Old, but none the less true. Why did the hon. member return to the cabinet? We know that in mid November a number of reverse going away, farewell dinners were held for him saying, "After all, don't go, Walter." Then came the announcement by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) that the lost sheep had returned to the fold.

We recall when he left on November 10, 1965, after an electoral event which could only be counted a disaster by his own party. When he met with his fellow colleagues in the cabinet two days after that event and said, "I am going to resign because I gave you bad advice," to his dismay they accepted his offer, right on the spot.

My own inference from what happened recently—I was not there and nobody has blabbed yet—is simply that the Prime Minister decided it would be unprofitable and unwise to open up the Davenport seat for a by-election. Therefore he was faced with two alternatives, neither one very palatable. One was to let the hon. member resign from the house and have a by-election; the other one was to have him back in the cabinet. There was no middle ground, and he chose what was best in the interests of the Liberal party for the time being, whether it was best for the country or not.

Again I quote from the Montreal Gazette editorial:

> In view of the record, there can be little enthusiasm for Mr. Pearson's decision to place Mr. Gordon at the head of a committee to study the implications of foreign ownership and control of Canadian industry. This happens to be the field in which Mr. Gordon, when last holding office, held the most extreme opinions and was well on the way of doing the most damage.
> Such policies as he supported brought protests from the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, and from many other sources concerned with practical business.

To that distinguished list we could add the former president of BRINCO and Rio Tinto, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, (Mr. Winters) who has no aptitude for swallowing the Gordonian philosophy.

What has the Prime Minister done with the shadow minister of finance? I suggest he has done this: He has appointed him in charge of a very important study, a gentleman who has his verdict ready now and is simply going to go around and scout up such facts, and the blessings of such colleagues as he can muster to the cause to support him in that verdict.

It may be said of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that he at least has sense enough to stay away from such a dubious undertaking. It also allows him to go forth with a straight face and let it appear that nothing really has happened by the return of the hon. member for Davenport to the cabinet, clutching his carpetbag of strange and narrow, isolationist, fiscal policies.

I now wish to deal with the budget, Mr. Speaker, and concentrate on its sins of omission. There is one that really stands out. Surely when we study the problems that today baffle Canadians, the most serious problem we have is the failure to come to grips with soaring prices. From the Third Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada, 1966, quoting from page 191, I point to the paragraph where recommendations included:

> To achieve a more satisfactory reconciliation of economic goals, the main policy "levers" must be complemented by policies whose primary focus is the supply rather than the demand side of the economy. Among these are effective manpower and other policies to encourage the flow of available resources into their highest and most remunerative uses, and to help relieve the economic pressure points which are in part responsible for the appearance of excessive price and cost increases before the economy has reached its potential path.

Later on in the recommendations point 9 might be drawn to the attention of the minister. It reads in part as follows:

> It is more than ever important that effective measures be taken to increase productivity at all stages of food production and distribution.

This is all good fodder for the Minister of Finance; and all of this, by the way, was available to that minister some weeks before the budget was presented. The following is a quotation from page 199:

> Among the required measures are an important range of supply-oriented policies, including those designed to improve productivity, to strengthen competition, to facilitate adjustments to technological and other change, and to increase manpower training and mobility.

Giving him a few marks and some Christian generosity for some of those points, I still say that the minister has failed absolutely to come to grips with the most important suggestions made by the Economic Council of Canada in that particular report. Instead, some of the excursions and forays of the government into this field smack more of a public relations technique than one of honest and sound administration.

At page 181 of this Third Annual Review a press release of the President of the Privy Council is quoted fairly extensively. This press release dealt with the fact that the Economic Council had been asked to carry on a major investigation in the general area of reasonable price stability. The point I make is that the Economic Council of Canada did not find very much about the terms of reference from the order in council that was passed, but found them from a press release issued by a member of the cabinet. This is one of the most extraordinary things, I think, which one could see in government, even government by press release such as we have now.

Well, sir, I will very quickly conclude. I would have preferred that the budget had dealt not only with the particular point of price stability, something which is bedevilling Canadians, but also the matter of a higher exemption in the income tax. If we agree with the Senate committee on aging, that $1,260 should be a minimum for our old people, we would probably also say that $1,260 should be a minimum for our younger people and that therefore $1,260 should be the exemption for any one person in Canada. I think to that some people would be inclined to reply Q.E.D.—quod erat demonstrandum.

This is another thing which should have been included in the budget in order to help the young married people of this nation who must go out and make capital expenditures for furniture and accommodation in order to get their marriages and eventually their families under way. I think the budget has fallen down sadly in that regard. For these reasons, and because the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) has proposed to impose taxes at this particular time when taxes do not appear to be necessary, I support the amendment and will reject this budget.

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to intervene in this budget debate to discuss a few matters which I consider most important and which I would hope the government would adopt as policy in this centennial year. Last September the Minister of Finance moved that certain matters with regard to the cost of living be referred to the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons on consumer credit. The committee was asked to look into the causes of the rapid rise in the cost of living with regard to consumer items and report and make recommendations. After many sittings during the months of September, October, November and December the committee issued an interim report in the middle of December in which it made very significant recommendations.

At this time I feel obliged to take strong exception to some of the remarks made by my colleague the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne), because I feel that his opinions do not, according to my understanding, reflect the thinking on this side of the house with regard to credit unions and co-operatives. It always has been my humble feeling that co-operatives were a means whereby small businessmen—the farmer, the fisherman and the consumer—got together, through a co-operative exercise, to make it possible for a man to be the master of his own destiny, to use the words of Dr. M. M. Cody, the great pioneer of co-operatives in Nova Scotia for whom I have always had the greatest respect.

Mr. Winkler: But you have not got the message.

Mr. Allmand: I think I have. I have been a member of a co-operative for several years.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): That is not the message we are talking about.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, during the hearings of the committee on consumer credit several witnesses appeared who recommended, not that the role of the co-operatives be restricted, but that it be increased. Several witnesses who appeared before the committee suggested there should be a federal act to govern co-operatives. This is something which we do not have at present. This would help the co-operatives help people through co-operative action, on a broader scale than they can now. At present they are restricted to the provincial co-operative acts. The co-operative federation for many years has been recommending that there be a federal co-operatives act. It may be, after we have studied this matter more in the committee, that we may recommend to the government that such a bill be introduced.

It is significant that the Stewart Royal Commission in 1959 recommended that there be a federal co-operatives act, but so far that recommendation has not been accepted either by the previous government or by this government. I think it was in 1906 or 1908 that a Liberal government introduced into this house a bill to establish a federal co-operatives act, but the bill was defeated in the Senate after it had been passed by the House of Commons.

There were other important recommendations in the interim report of the committee on consumer credit (prices). One of the most important recommendations was that we establish a department of consumer affairs. Many members have asked why it is necessary that we have a department of consumer affairs. They say it is important that the consumer be protected but they ask why is it necessary that we have a department and a minister to do it. Of course it is important that the public's interest be protected, and I think it also is important that we have a department and a minister whose sole responsibility is to be concerned with consumer problems and to initiate legislation to protect the consumer and help him with regard to the problems of the rising cost of living, inflation and so on.

Right now there are several statutes which are designed to protect the consumer, but these statutes presently are administered under five separate departments. They are under the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Department of Fisheries, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of the Registrar General and the Department of Finance. Although the statutes are fairly well administered under these departments, I think if we are to have co-ordination with regard to consumer affairs and the administration of these statutes they should be brought together under one ministry.

Another point is that most of these departments are concerned more with production, and the producer end of farming and fishing, than with the consumer who eventually buys the products of these industries. I hope that when the government introduces the speech from the throne in this centennial year a department of consumer affairs will be one of the items included in that speech.

There were other recommendations in the interim report on consumer affairs which are also very important. These were recommendations to help and protect consumers. One recommendation was that there should be more and better grading processes of the different products sold on the Canadian market. There was also a recommendation that there should be labelling and packaging of products which would provide more information for consumers as to the contents.

It was found by the committee on consumer prices that one of the groups hardest hit by the inflation which took place between the middle of 1965 and the middle of 1966 were those persons on fixed incomes, and especially the pensioners. That is why we were so ready to welcome around Christmas the legislation of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) increasing the old age pension by $30 a month and introducing the new concept of a guaranteed minimum income. I hope this guaranteed minimum income will be increased in the future, because although it is a worth while measure at the present time I think that as a guaranteed minimum income it is too low. But I appreciate the fact, and congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) for this, that when we adopted this measure of social welfare he let it be known that we do not spend large sums of money on measures such as this without paying for them.

I accept what the minister said in this respect, namely that at this particular time the tax measures necessary to provide for the guaranteed minimum income were about as high as we could go, but I hope this income can be raised in the future. I also hope that this is only the beginning, and sooner or later this policy will be applied to other welfare measures such as family allowances, unemployment insurance and similar programs. I think we should maintain a guaranteed minimum income across the board for people who are unemployed, families, and so on, in addition to providing it to our old age pensioners.

The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) mentioned the tax exemption. I support the suggestion that the exemption for people on pension be at least raised to $1,260, because at the present time the extra $500 exemption, as all hon. members know, applies only to those over 70 years of age. Under the new legislation there will be pensioners receiving $1,260 per year through the guaranteed minimum income program, and they will have to pay tax on $160. I do not think this is fair. I hope that in the budget to be presented later this year the minister will take steps to correct this situation.

[Mr. Allmand.]

There are two other matters I should like to raise very briefly at this time. As one hon. member said this evening, a budget debate is the time when backbenchers can raise grievances. One grievance that I should like to raise as a member from Montreal concerns the question of winter navigation on the St. Lawrence river. I believe that in this centennial year the government should undertake an intensive study to see whether a policy of full winter navigation on the St. Lawrence would be economically feasible. Then I hope they would take steps to put that policy into effect. I congratulate the Department of Transport for—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Allmand: Yes.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Whether or not winter navigation on the St. Lawrence is economically feasible, does the hon. member realize it would be morally wrong?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Allmand: I would think that if it was economically feasible, this would not mean it would be morally wrong and necessarily uneconomical for other parts of Canada. I intended dealing with that matter shortly, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacInnis) will disagree with me and if so I hope he will speak on this matter in the house, because I believe it is one that should be debated. In any event, as a member from Montreal I should like to give my opinions on this subject.

I believe that in this age of advancing technology and science, to deny the implementation of this technology and science merely to satisfy one part of the country or another is just another form of featherbedding, and I do not think that in the long run featherbedding benefits society as a whole, in this case Canada. I hope that if such a report does recommend winter navigation on the St. Lawrence as economically feasible, this policy will be carried out. I do not think it would hurt the ports of Halifax and Saint John because I would hope the government would also assist those ports to become as efficient as possible. I doubt whether those ports will ever become sidetracked by the shippers of today's world because I think there is a continuing—and it will become greater—demand for good port facilities. Halifax and Saint John do have good port facilities, and I would certainly support all reasonable measures to help these maritime ports become more efficient and competitive.

The final matter I wish to raise this evening in the budget debate is that of air pollution. I raise this question also as a Montrealer because we had recently in that city a very difficult problem with air pollution. Again I know the government has taken certain initiatives in this respect, but because of the very great danger to Canadians I think the initiatives must be increased. I have here a quotation of Senator Robert F. Kennedy of New York. Senator Kennedy said that:

> —air pollution in New York city is so acute that every year "old and young, rich and poor, athlete or infirm recluse . . . breathes in 750 pounds of his own wastes".

I have another quotation of the words of Vice President Hubert Humphrey of the United States, who said:

> More people are dying from emphysema—which is a throat disease aggravated by air pollution—

> —than on the field of battle in Viet Nam—

I think that many of us, because we can go outside and breathe do not recognize the seriousness of this problem right now and believe we can put it off until some time in the future. But I think that if we do not do something now, in 1967, on a very large scale to combat air pollution, in a very few years we will be in very serious trouble, and then it may be too late to do very much about it.

So I would like to recommend strongly to the government that during Canada's centennial year it adopt what I think are three worth-while programs: first, that it take a serious look at the recommendations contained in the interim report of the committee on consumer prices; second, that it undertake a large scale and effective program on air pollution; and third, that it adopt a serious and positive policy with respect to winter navigation on the St. Lawrence.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the budget which we are considering tonight is a good indication and reflection of the government's attitudes. I certainly hope that the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) who loosed a diatribe against co-operatives such as has seldom been heard in the house, was not reflecting the government's views. The entire budget suffers from defects which we exemplified in the speech made by the hon. member for Kootenay East. It showed a complete lack of concern for what is going on in the country and for the needs of the people of this country, and an excessive concern for maintaining the corporate power, which is already far too great. When we see a co-operative movement in existence, people banding together to try to find an alternative to this power structure, to try to reduce prices, and to insist on competition, it is disconcerting to find this kind of attitude in response. This is regrettable, especially as it comes from one so close to the government as is the parliamentary secretary.

In introducing his budget the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) referred to it as a neutral budget. I think that the word "neutral" is too kind. Perhaps it should be called a "paralysed" budget, because this is what it reflects. It reflects a paralysis on the part of the government in dealing with the great and pressing problems of this country.

We have the problem of Canadian identity and nationalism, and what is the government doing about it? After having permitted this problem to develop throughout the years, all of a sudden it shows a sort of enthusiasm toward solving it. We see people running around in circles, establishing task forces and looking for answers. Royal commissions on this subject have been set up, many books have been written and I do not know how many investigations have taken place and opinions have been offered. However, now that we are faced with a crisis, a task force is being set up. I do not know what solutions this task force will bring, but I have very little hope that it will find solutions to our problems. If these solutions will consist in putting some kind of curb on United States ownership without examining the deep-rooted problems in the economic structure of Canada, then that task force will have been a complete failure and will have misled the Canadian people. I hope sincerely that it does come up with some answers although, judging from its actions and from its personnel, I do not have the kind of confidence which I wish I could have in this particular case.

The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) has been working very hard and, generally speaking, has been applauded for his efforts in the field of manpower. He has introduced a mobility program which, as we pointed out from the start, was inadequate because it only touched the surface of the problem, because it was too restrictive in outlook, and because it depended on an entirely new set of ancillary conditions in order to prove its effectiveness. These ancillary conditions are not even being recognized by the Minister of Finance. The result is that the mobility program is a complete failure. The figures on this subject given to us by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration indicate this. One of the reasons for its failure is that we have not provided for the kind of housing that will be needed in those areas into which we attempt to move people. People cannot be moved into non-existing houses. They cannot be expected to move from one area of the country into another area in which housing is not available to them.

An effective immigration program cannot be established when the minister warns immigrants not to go to certain centres in Canada which are perhaps the centres which need them most. On the one hand an agency says to them: Come on over, we need you, we would like to have you, and on the other hand they are told to stay away because no houses are available for them. There is complete confusion and paralysis in terms of defining objectives and trying to achieve them.

An inflationary situation has developed in this country. We have seen the cost of living go up higher and faster than it has for a long time, and the first thing that happens under those circumstances is that the government suddenly forgets the grand words which it used in the Speech from the Throne when it said: "There will be a war on poverty. There will be an end to poverty in Canada. The dispossessed will be considered." We do not hear this any more because we have failed to control the inflationary process in this country and because of a lack of imagination in dealing with this problem. The grand design for our society has gone down the drain, and this budget reflects it. There is hardly a word in the budget about the kind of obligation which the government should have toward those who need the assistance of the government.

The government is to blame to a large extent for allowing the interest rates to rise. The Minister of Finance even acknowledged some of his responsibility in this matter. We have started to put on the brakes elsewhere. The minute brakes are applied to the general economy it is the large regions in the country where no brakes are required that suffer most, even in the most overheated circumstances. The disparity in income between prosperous regions in Canada and those who are trying to achieve that prosperity is still great. Where in this budget can the answer be found? Where is there even a recognition that such a problem exists in this country, recognition of the fact that an attitude which is appropriate to an economically viable section of Canada is certainly not appropriate to those areas which need development urgently and which could be developing at this time without adding anything to the problems of inflation or to the difficulties in controlling the cost of living? There is nothing dealing with this in the budget, not even an apparent awareness.

Mr. Chrétien: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Saltsman: Not from that seat.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, may I call your attention to the fact that this has happened for the second time this evening, and unless there is a change in the seating and the hon. member has been made minister of the government, he is out of order.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Saltsman: I am sure the parliamentary secretary will understand that I should like to conclude my remarks, but I will try to leave some time available for questions.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Why don't you accord the same courtesy to us?

Mr. Saltsman: We have seen medicare sacrificed on the flimsiest of excuses. This was not done in this budget, but it was done in the previous budget and the minister could have corrected that in this budget. Medicare was thrown to the dogs, and why was it thrown to the dogs? There is not an economist in this country who will defend the minister when he says that medicare was inflationary, that medicare was really a serious problem with which he had to cope. The impression remains, and it is an impression I do not like to consider, but it is unavoidable, that the minister took this action to satisfy those companies which were so ably defended tonight by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne). Perhaps his actions were a sop to these corporate giants who felt that the postponement of medicare was the kind of restraint this country needed.

This budget will go down as one of the most insensitive documents ever presented to this house. It is almost without justification in what has been done to convey the chastising image of the government. I believe we are rather fortunate in Canada in that scorpions and whips are rather rare, or perhaps the minister might have used them as the medium to impress upon the Canadian people the fact they have to pay for welfare services, that money does not grow on trees. This is a spurious argument. It has been repeatedly shown that these taxation measures were not necessary to pay for this kind of program.

I should like to read an editorial from the Toronto Star which I think puts the situation rather well. It carried the heading "The Budget: Moralism Through a Fog" and states:

> Canada has found its stern public moralist, its Cromwell of the treasury, in Finance Minister Mitchell Sharp.
> If there was any real purpose behind last night's mini-budget except to point the moral lesson that new social security benefits must be paid for immediately, it was not evident in the facts and figures which Mr. Sharp himself gave ...
> It is good of Mr. Sharp to care about our moral redemption. But it's an odd system of priorities for a minister of finance. We must hope the economy and the ill-housed can bear so much virtue, such Cromwellian zeal.

The minister and the government which I presume he represented in the presentation of his budget, had an opportunity to bring in social justice as something which should be brought in with pride and satisfaction, a sense of achievement, instead of representing it as a burden. I was interested in a speech the minister made on October 13 to the National Industrial Conference Board in which he gave his views on welfare services:

> I am one of those who believe that these vital responsibilities are a proper burden to place equitably upon all of us in dividing the fruits of our increasing productivity which arises in a very large measure from joint efforts made by many.

This is the view of the minister and presumably the view of the government. Our sick are a burden; it is too bad they will not go away. Our elderly are a burden; it is too bad they grew old and have to be cared for. The fact that they worked all their lives to build this nation should not mean they are now a burden. The weak are a burden. The just society that we all seek has become a burden. What sort of philosophy is this for the government to have? What sort of budget is this that reflects this kind of attitude toward the whole problem of social justice in Canada? This budget is regressive, and it is being called regressive by many. Except for a small bow the minister made to progressiveness in raising the ceiling on the old age pension tax, the minister did not make any other obeisance.

I should like to quote from a column in the Toronto Star which gives the opinion of F. Gerald Townsend, a tax specialist and partner in the chartered accountancy firm of Thorne, Gunn, Helliwell and Christanson. Mr. Townsend said:

> The increase in the maximum old age pension tax payment from $120 to $240 per year would mean an increase of 2 per cent to a person with a taxable income of $6,000 per year. However, to a person with a taxable income of $30,000, the increase would be only one half of one per cent.
> In a similar way the inerease in the federal sales tax from 11 to 12 per cent would bear more heavily by proportion on those with smaller incomes. This was direct violation of the principle of payment according to ability to pay.

If we were going to be chastised, then should not everyone be chastised equally or are some to be chastised more than others, especially those with lower incomes? Perhaps these people have been chastised more because they have lower incomes and deserve to be chastised more. Perhaps this is the attitude of the government. I should like to hear the minister defend his position before the Canadian people instead of adopting this surreptitious way of bringing in this philosophy through the back door. I feel he will find the Canadian people have ways of examining these proposals and evaluating them.

In the speech to which I referred the minister was talking about what a lucky country Canada is. I should like to quote his statement—

> When before have men ever been able to look forward with confidence to such cumulative improvements? Where in the world, outside of a few lucky countries like our own, can one hope for so much?

It is true that we are a lucky country, and we have every right to hope for a great deal; but that hope does not appear likely to come to fruition as a result of the actions of this government. I should like to quote from the Second Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada. They give some of the reasons this country has a right to expect something more than has been presented to us in this particular budget. I quote from page 61 of the report:

> It is widely recognized that Canada has important natural resources in the form of minerals, petroleum, forests, fresh water and agricultural land. Historically, natural resources and their development and export have played an important role in the development of particular regions of Canada and the timing and industrial composition of growth in the country as a whole.

The above considerations indicate that both the extent of capital facilities and the use of land and natural resources per person tend to operate in the direction of a higher level of productivity in Canada than in the United States. In combination with other factors, a large volume in capital, land and other natural resources may be very important elements in high levels of productivity, but they are not sufficient in themselves to assure the attainment of high productivity and high standards of living. Thus, the main explanation for the lower levels of Canadian incomes per employed person must lie in the differences in the quality of Canada's productive resources, and in the efficiency with which these productive resources are combined in the production process—that is, the scales of output, degrees of specialization, the attitudes and effectiveness of management and labour, and so forth.

Instead of "so forth" we could have said, "because of government policies." In Canada, we have the greatest opportunity to be the most affluent nation in the world. Instead of that, Mr. Speaker, with all these advantages and opportunities, our level is about 25 per cent lower than that of the United States.

It is not that our people do not work as hard. I think we see instances where they work just as hard as it is possible for any group of people to work. But without proper policies and the proper involvement of the government in the affairs of the nation in order to get the maximum use of our resources, our capital and our labour, we cannot achieve these levels that we are entitled to expect.

The most indefensible attitude of this government is when it talks about productivity, congratulates itself on its level of productivity and what it has done to achieve it. As we look at the budget, Mr. Speaker, where do we see a single measure which indicates we are going to do something to improve productivity? There is only a negative measure. Perhaps the inference is that if we do not have a universal old age pension in Canada we will have productivity, which is a fallacy.

On the question of sales tax, Mr. Speaker, is there any indication that the sales tax can be used in a selective manner to ensure productivity? We see that not at all. The very items which are needed to assist productivity are those which the minister is insisting upon taxing.

As to investment policy, Mr. Speaker, is there any direction or guidance given to the country in this budget? Is there any indication of the role which is played by social capital in improving productivity? Are there any measures in relation to the research programs which are so badly needed in this country to improve our productivity? Where are the measures to rationalize Canadian industry, which almost every expert now agrees is one of the central problems facing this nation? There is none of these measures, Mr. Speaker. But there is moralizing.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that what this country needs is a little less moralizing from the minister and his government and a few more ideas about how to run the nation. This budget is a document of omissions of those things which should have been done. It says nothing to the Canadian people. It offers no hope to those looking for a government to provide a sense of direction to the nation. It offers no challenge to the people of Canada to rally around ideas being developed by the government, so as to create the great society we all seek. It does none of these things, and for that reason has to be condemned.

The minister would have been far better off never to have introduced such a budget. He has displayed the nakedness and poverty of the government's program. It is almost an insult to bring in a budget of this type. The prideful minister said he was going to bring in a budget and he brought one in, even though the reasons for a budget no longer existed. The minister should have maintained his pride by bringing in a budget of a positive nature, one which would have encouraged the economy and spurred the nation on to those goals that it seeks.

In view of the lateness of the hour, Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to accept the question the parliamentary secretary seemed so keen on putting. I see he has had his question answered during the course of my speech, and I am very pleased that I have been able to anticipate the problem that was in his mind. I hope he has listened carefully to what has been said and will be able to convey these thoughts to the minister when he sees him.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I did just want to make one comment. The hon. member said that in the budget—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot make a comment. He can ask a question if the hon. member who has the floor allows him to do so.

Mr. Chrétien: Is the hon. member aware that in the budget last March which dealt with the general economy for this year the government made the provision that a lot of the additional measures introduced at that time would not be applicable to the designated areas? Probably the hon. member is not aware of that.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I am very well aware of that item to which the hon. gentleman refers; but if the government considers that that particular item will do anything more than put a false hope into the hearts of people in the designated areas it will have to examine that idea again. Because that is all that measure will do.

May I call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: I am informed that the hon. member has three minutes to go before his time expires. Is it the wish of the house that the hon. member be allowed to terminate his oration?

Mr. Stewart: May I help the hon. member out by asking him a question?

Mr. Saltsman: I thank hon. members for permitting me to conclude.

Mr. Stewart: May I ask the hon. member a question to spin out his speech? Would he tell the house whether in fact he is opposed to the designated area program, not in its details, but as a general program? I would not want him to leave any misunderstanding on that score.

Mr. Saltsman: I am not opposed to the concept of designated areas, Mr. Speaker, but certainly I do not think that the proposals the government has introduced can be considered the least bit satisfactory in meeting the needs of the people in the designated areas. If I recall the occasion on which I spoke on this subject, I called the program a cruel hoax. I said it was a program that looked as if it offered hope and encouragement, but that it would fail miserably and would not develop the kind of opportunities that were needed in those parts of Canada.

Mr. Stewart: Would the hon. member admit that these are pretty vague words he is now tossing around?

Mr. Saltsman: All I know is that the way to judge a program is by its effectiveness. If you look around this country and note the depressed areas which have not achieved the level of prosperity to which they are entitled as part of Canada, you have to say that whatever may have been the government measures or the government's intentions in these particular matters, they are far from being a howling success.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: I gather the hon. member's time has about expired.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): So has the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—NORTH VIET NAM—USE OF FUNDS GIVEN FOR AID

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity to speak for a few minutes about a question which is important to all members of the house who have any feelings for their fellowmen. On January 26 I asked the following question of the right hon. Prime Minister, to be found at page 12260 of Hansard:

> My question is based on a statement contained in a question asked of the Prime Minister by the hon. member for Bow River on January 24 in which he said, as recorded at page 12159 of Hansard:
> "To review my question, it referred to $50,000 of aid to Viet Nam of which ninety per cent was going to North Viet Nam, to the Viet Cong, for purposes other than to assist civilian victims."
> Has the Prime Minister received a letter from Dr. A. M. Inglis, chairman of the committee on Canadian aid for Viet Nam civilians, which committee, I might mention, is sponsored by a number of Canadians including the leader of our party and the hon. member for Kootenay West, which outlines the facts with respect to the distribution of this aid—

There was more questioning and the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) asked supplementary questions. I say that the lusty member for Bow River had been misinformed. I expect the parliamentary secretary this evening will be better informed than the hon. member was when he asked the question.

I have in my hand a letter written by Major General A. E. Wrinch, C.B.E., C.D.,

National Commissioner of the Canadian Red Cross Society, addressed to A. M. Inglis, Esq., M.D., F.R.C.S. (C), Canadian Aid for Viet Nam Civilians, P.O.B. 2543, Vancouver 3, B.C. I wish to quote a couple of paragraphs from the letter:

During my recent visit to Geneva on League of Red Cross Societies business, I took the opportunity of discussing this subject with Mr. Roger Gallopin, Executive Director of the I.C.R.C. Mr. Gallopin stated that the needs among Viet Nam civilians everywhere are great but are almost certainly greatest in N.L.F. territory and next in North Viet Nam. Medical and first aid supplies are the priority item and the I.C.R.C. has been shipping these to Hanoi for care of wounded and sick civilians in both North Viet Nam and N.L.F.-controlled territory—those for North Viet Nam being consigned to the Red Cross Society of that country, those for N.L.F. territory to an N.L.F. representative in Hanoi whose address was provided—

And again, later:

"The I.C.R.C. urgently needs more money for purchase of supplies as funds donated by the Red Cross Societies of various countries have been largely disbursed. Although permission has not yet been granted for an I.C.R.C. delegate to function in North Viet Nam and N.L.F.-controlled territory, the I.C.R.C. seeks our support of their program in these areas. Acknowledgment of previous shipments to North Viet Nam has been received and Mr. Gallopin has no reason to suspect that the goods have not been properly used. He urges us to participate."

As you will realize, the above represents a change of attitude on our part which resulted from the very useful conversations that I had with Mr. Gallopin of the international committee of the Red Cross in Geneva.

This letter is signed by Major-General A. E. Wrinch, National Commissioner of the Canadian Red Cross Society.

Now I should like to quote from a letter I received from Dr. Inglis dated January 9, in which he says:

The needs of all parts of Viet Nam are recognized by the Canadian Red Cross which has sent assistance to all areas.

The concluding paragraph is as follows:

Meantime, your readers can assist all civilians in Viet Nam by sending donations to this committee at P.O. Box 2543, Vancouver 3, B.C. We have already received more than $20,000 and have set an objective of $50,000 for 1967 because of the escalation of the war. These funds are distributed in the approximate proportions of population and need; 45 per cent to the north, 45 per cent to the National Liberation Front areas, and 10 per cent through the international committee of the Red Cross to civilians in strategic hamlets in Saigon-controlled areas.

That letter is signed by Dr. A. M. Inglis, Chairman of Canadian aid for Viet Nam Civilians, Vancouver.

[Mr. Herridge.]

I am sure the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) would not have asked the question he did had he been fully aware of the facts. This miniscule aid which we Canadians are sending to the people in North Viet Nam and South Viet Nam is a drop in the bucket compared with the millions being spent daily there now, but they serve to indicate to those people that we have a heart for suffering people everywhere. I look forward to hearing the parliamentary secretary's reply.

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of External Affairs): I appreciate this opportunity to put on record again the response which was given by the Prime Minister several days ago to the hon. member for Bow River in connection with the question he raised.

As the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) has said, some question was raised at that time as to the validity of transfers of funds for medical assistance in North Viet Nam and as to the use to which such funds were being put. I would draw attention to the response given by the Prime Minister on January 26 last as recorded at page 12260 of Hansard in which the right hon. gentleman said:

Our information is that the supplies that may be going to Viet Nam are medical supplies, and there is no authorization required under our law to send medical supplies to any part of the world.

The Prime Minister as well made it clear that there is in no sense a violation of Canadian law in this particular program of sending medical supplies to North Viet Nam.

With respect to the questions and answers on January 24, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) suggested I might be able to clarify the matter further. However, modesty compels me to admit that the answer given by the right hon. gentleman on January 24 as reported at page 12159 cannot be improved upon. After pointing out that there was no objection to transferring funds, or nothing in the law to prevent the transfer of funds, the Prime Minister went on to say:

As to the second aspect of the question, concerning the use made of supplies or funds sent to North Viet Nam once they have reached their destination, we have no knowledge in that regard and I doubt whether the government of North Viet Nam would regard it as within the responsibilities of our representative on the international commission to seek such information.

I understand that the international committee of the Red Cross has endeavoured to obtain this kind of information with respect to its own consignments to North Viet Nam but without avail. However, I also understand that a representative of the Canadian friends committee was in Hanoi recently and did have an opportunity to talk with representatives of the North Viet Nam Red Cross.

The hon. member has put on record this evening a statement by the international representative of the Red Cross stating that they have no reason to be apprehensive about the misappropriation of funds made available to the North Viet Nam Red Cross. As the Prime Minister has pointed out, there is no effective way the Canadian government could scrutinize how Canadian funds were being used in this regard. The hon. member has also referred to the statement in the letter of Dr. Inglis that no government funds have been made available to North Viet Nam. As was pointed out earlier today by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin), in fact there has been no request for assistance from North Viet Nam.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS—ASSISTANCE TO FORT SMITH FOLLOWING NAMING OF YELLOWKNIFE AS CAPITAL

Mr. R. J. Orange (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I would like to thank the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Laing) for being in the chamber tonight. He is well aware of the subject matter which I wish to raise and his presence shows his concern about it. I am sure that will be appreciated in the community of Fort Smith for which I am now speaking.

I would also like to express my appreciation for the dispatch with which the minister acted in regard to implementing some of the recommendations of the Carrothers commission with respect to the granting of self-government to the Northwest Territories.

Last Monday I asked the minister when he would be able to announce the level and type of assistance from the federal government to be made to the town of Fort Smith, to ensure that no disastrous economic effects could be felt by the Fort Smith community as a result of the movement of many families from Fort Smith to Yellowknife, which has now been declared the capital of the Northwest Territories.

The minister replied to the effect that there was a certain amount of thinking going on in terms of institutional buildings for Fort Smith. I then asked if the minister would consult with his colleague, the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury), to see if the provisions of the Area Development Incentives Act could be applied to the community and you, Mr. Speaker, suggested that my question was not proper at that time.

Tonight I hope to impress upon the minister that he and his department have responsibility to this town not only in terms of his being the minister responsible for northern development, but in terms of a particular and peculiar responsibility in this special instance. The problem of the community of Fort Smith arose as the result of a decision of the federal government to locate the capital of the Northwest Territories in Yellowknife, as recommended by the Carrothers commission and the Council of the Northwest Territories.

Prior to this decision Fort Smith was considered the administrative centre of the Northwest Territories, and for that matter had been recommended as the capital in 1962 by a previous council, with the result that private industries were counting heavily on the growth of the town in the event that the community was declared the capital. Because the federal government was charged with making the final decision I maintain, as do the residents of Fort Smith, that the federal government has a direct responsibility not only to assist the community but to initiate measures which will ensure stable growth and remove the threat of disaster which now hangs over it like Damocles' sword.

It may be argued that the initiative is up to the territorial government and the townspeople themselves, but I come back to the premise I established a moment ago, that a federal government decision has caused the present chaotic situation, and therefore the federal government, through the minister and his department, has a direct responsibility to bring hope and aid to the town.

There is a precedent for this, Mr. Speaker, in terms of the decision made approximately 12 years ago to abandon the town of Aklavik and create the new town of Inuvik. At that time the federal government subsidized all the business townspeople who wished to move from one town to the other, and I suggest that this might be taken into consideration in the present case.

What is the future of Fort Smith? I am not worried about its future, nor are the townspeople, provided we have the encouragement and incentive of the federal government behind us. We must have now, however, some indication from the federal government about the type and level of assistance which will be available to the town. The town is not standing waiting for the federal government to take the initiative. The mayor of Fort Smith, Mr. Paul Kaiser, will be in Ottawa next Monday, together with the representatives from the town to give the minister his views and ideas concerning how the town can grow and develop. In the meantime there are other ideas. Last week I spent a very delightful two and a half hours with 450 people who are residents of the town. Naturally there was some concern. There was some hostility. However, there was no fright; I think this is extremely important.

It was suggested that this great roads program which has been brought in by the government might be re-evaluated in order that the road development could commence in the area of Fort Smith, rather than at the east arm of Great Slave lake. The Department of Agriculture undertook to do a land survey. I should like to know what the results are.

In the time which remains to me I should like to suggest to the minister that there are two important factors which he must consider. The first concerns the establishment of some type of a prefab housing factory in an area where there is lumber—and that is the Fort Smith area. There is a proposal to build approximately 100 homes in Yellowknife this year. I believe the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, in consultation with the territorial government and the Department of Industry could bring into effect some form of incentive so that a factory could be established in this particular area to provide the basic prefab facilities for this great growth in Yellowknife itself.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I should like to impress upon the minister the urgent necessity to establish a university of the north which would include in its curriculum at least the first two years toward a Bachelor of Arts degree. Hopefully the minister will be able to bring together all the interested parties, including members of the territorial government and the federal government, to discuss the matter fully and completely.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to commend the hon. member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange) for his energy and ingenuity in looking after the people in his area. I presume that is his responsibility and I believe he is doing it most admirably. In addition to that he has arranged to have the mayor and councillors of Fort Smith come to Ottawa next Monday. We will discuss matters with them. I should like to commend the mayor and his council for having contracted with an engineering firm in Edmonton to make further suggestions concerning what the city might do in the interim.

First of all, I should like to say to the hon. member—and I know he agrees with me—that none of us are very surprised about any particular area in the Northwest Territories at the present time. The hon. member is more aware than I of the abundant resources—the metals and now gas and oil—which are indicating themselves in so many places. We have a gas field in the Northwest Territories which is only about five weeks old. It has prompted a pipe line company already to announce its intention to build a 20-inch pipe line into the area. The resources of metals, principally gold, copper, lead, zinc, and asbestos are well known and are beginning to show up everywhere.

The main thing that we could do for Fort Smith at the present time would be to come to some agreement with the government of the province of Alberta in respect of diminishing the size of Wood Buffalo Park, which covers an area of 17,000 square miles. There is a herd of buffalo there and we intend to keep them, but they do not need 17,000 square miles. I have spoken to the responsible minister of the province of Alberta and to Premier Manning of Alberta. I told them we would be very happy to negotiate for part of that park to be developed, if we could get compensating land in southern Alberta. I would hope we could carry those negotiations further. There is there an enormous quantity of very high-grade spruce, and the construction of a saw mill, lumber mill and planing mill in Fort Smith is realistic if we could use that timber. This was indicated by my friend the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange).

We are doing other things. The acting commissioner of the territories has been in Fort Smith for three or four days. We have indicated that we intend to move in there a number of institutions that would otherwise be in other parts of the territories. We are thinking in terms of a hospital at Fort Smith, possibly with a residential nursing facility, because many of the native women make very, very excellent nurses indeed. We have in contemplation a great variety of things. I will be glad to see the mayor when he comes here, and I think when he goes away he will feel a little happier than he does at the present time.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.23 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, February 7, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Tenth and eleventh reports of standing committee on public accounts—Mr. Hales.

[Note: Text of the foregoing reports appears in today's Votes and Proceedings.]

IMMIGRATION—CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Jack Roxburgh (for Mr. Klein) moved:

That the second report of the special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons on immigration, presented to the house on Tuesday, January 31, 1967, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

FINANCE

BANK OF WESTERN CANADA—LOANS TO PREFERRED SHAREHOLDERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. It has to do with the statement he made in the house yesterday as recorded at page 12682 of Hansard, and which reads in part as follows:

—I had indicated to one or two people since Mr. Coyne made his statement that the terms of the order speak for themselves, that I was not going to give approval to transactions of the kind outlined here, and that it would require very exceptional circumstances for me to exercise my discretion. I said that in one case to Mr. Sinclair Stevens and in another to another member of the associated group.

I asked if the minister would tell us who that other person was, and the minister replied that he would have to refresh his memory. Arising out of that statement I ask the minister when, where and under what circumstances the minister made this positive and categorical statement to Mr. Sinclair Stevens. Who was the other person in addition to Mr. Stevens to whom the minister referred, and under what circumstances and where did that discussion take place?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, similar questions were directed to me yesterday in the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs, but I am quite happy to clarify my answer of yesterday in the House of Commons.

I made these statements to Mr. Sinclair Stevens yesterday, after Mr. Coyne had made his statement, in a telephone conversation I had with Mr. Stevens when he phoned me to state his position in relation to the statements made by Mr. Coyne. I have refreshed my memory, Mr. Speaker, and it is to the effect that I am not certain whether in the conversation I had with the other person yesterday morning immediately following my discussion with Mr. Sinclair Stevens I did in fact repeat what I had said to Mr. Stevens.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who was the other person?

Mr. Sharp: The other conversation was not in relation to any matters which are before the house. It was a conversation on another subject altogether, and I should not like to say now that I did mention this matter because that might not be accurate and might lead to unnecessary embarrassment on the part of that person.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did the minister have occasion to read Mr. Stevens' statements reported in the Globe and Mail for today, to the effect that:

I advised the directors that at some future date I, in my capacity as president of B.I.F., would seek clarification from the Minister of Finance as to under what circumstances such consent—

That is, borrowing consent.

—would be granted.

I have not approached the Minister of Finance on this matter nor do I intend to.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I bring that to the minister's attention, and I would ask him how this conversation arose yesterday between him and Mr. Stevens.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think it is important that this matter be clarified, and I hope I may have your indulgence to say a few other words. I volunteered this statement to Mr. Sinclair Stevens in case there should be any doubt whatever about my attitude in relation to the certificate that has been granted to the Bank of Western Canada to open business. Mr. Stevens did not ask me about this; I volunteered the statement.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question to the Minister of Finance with reference to the Treasury Board minute which extended the 10 per cent ownership provision prescribed in the legislation, thereby giving the B.I.F. group the right to own over 50 per cent of the shares for a period up until 1977.

May I ask the minister why this 10 per cent limitation was extended by the minister in the case of the B.I.F. group through the Treasury Board minute.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the reason is that this is a new bank and we do consider it most important that we should encourage new Canadian owned banks to establish in business. This is done under the provisions of the Bank Act and, indeed, under the provisions of the special act that was approved by this house establishing the Bank of Western Canada.

Mr. Douglas: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister why in this Treasury Board minute respecting the commitments which the B.I.F. group have given to a parliamentary committee with respect to not associating their business with that of the bank the minister is given authority to exempt them from the commitment they have made to the House of Commons, a commitment which the applicants themselves had voluntarily given to a committee of the house.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, in case very exceptional circumstances should arise I think it is a wise thing not to so restrict these matters that the Minister of Finance could not grant exemption under those very exceptional circumstances. As I said yesterday in the house, I made it quite clear that I consider that the general nature of the relationship between the bank and its preferred shareholders is covered by the order itself, and that the discretion is only to be used in very exceptional circumstances.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The representation or undertaking having been made to parliament, what took place that caused the alteration in the Treasury Board order to relieve this bank from the responsibilities which it led parliament to believe would in fact be carried out? The bank needed no encouragement with respect to any relief.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, there was no alteration in any order of Treasury Board. That is the original order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, no. I talked of the undertaking to the House of Commons.

Mr. Douglas: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the commitment had been made by the B.I.F. corporation to a parliamentary committee, and since under this Treasury Board minute the minister had the power and discretion to allow the company to circumvent that commitment, could not this have been done without parliament being acquainted with the decision the minister had made?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the Treasury Board minute underlined the conditions under which the Bank of Western Canada could operate. Nothing in any legislation is more restrictive. Those conditions carried out the wishes and intent of parliament, in accordance with the undertakings given by the corporation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Parliament was deceived, completely deceived.

INQUIRY AS TO TAXATION COMMISSION REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Yesterday I asked the Minister of Finance when he expected the royal commission on taxation to table its report. Today I ask the minister whether or not W. M. Anderson, chairman of the board of North American Life Assurance Company, had an advance copy of the commission's report, because in his address at the annual meeting yesterday he gave many of the details of the report. It is rather strange that somebody outside should have access to the report before it is tabled in the house.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the statement made by Mr. Anderson. The government does not have the report, and I am quite sure the royal commission would not give it to unauthorized persons.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CALVIN MACDONALD—INQUIRY AS TO ASSOCIATION WITH R.C.M.P.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): My question is directed to the Solicitor General. Can he tell the house whether Calvin Macdonald ever worked for the R.C.M.P. in any way?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked previous questions about the gentleman to whom he has just referred. I cannot determine any urgency about the matter. Because these questions have been repeated over a long period of time, I am led to believe that the subject matter could easily be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I have not asked the question before in this form. Since this man has uttered slanderous remarks about so many people, I think the government should answer my question yes or no.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. You recommended that I place the last question I asked on the order paper. I would gladly do so, but it takes time for it to appear. I submitted some motions and questions a week and a half ago, and they are not yet on the order paper. On Friday I submitted a question and it is on today's order paper. Somebody along the line is stalling, and I should like to know why that is. If I am asked to put questions on the order paper I shall do so, but I expect to see them appearing there. I would ask that questions submitted be placed on the order paper more quickly than they have been placed. I shall submit this question and hope the minister can answer it.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ST. JOHN'S, NFLD.—REPORTED UNAUTHORIZED VISIT BY U.S. NUCLEAR SUBMARINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister any comment to make about the unconfirmed reports that a United States nuclear submarine visited St. John's, Newfoundland, on February 6 without prior permission from Canadian authorities?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think the question is in order. The hon. member asks the minister to comment about something that may have happened. Unless there is urgency, which I fail to see, I do not think the question should be asked at this time.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister to comment. Is the report that a nuclear submarine landed at St. John's, Newfoundland true or false?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question in that form is not acceptable.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether the recent visit of a United States nuclear submarine to a Newfoundland port is part of the program of handing over the surveillance of Canadian waters to the United States navy.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question is argumentative.

Mr. Churchill: I do not see any argument at all, Mr. Speaker. Surely we are entitled to information. If this is what is happening, cannot the minister tell us? The abolition of the Canadian navy must be made up for, then, by the activities of the United States navy.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I still believe that the question is argumentative and I do not think the minister should be allowed to reply.

An hon. Member: He wants to reply.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I will ask the Minister of National Defence this. Has the government of Canada entered into any agreement with the government of the United States for the protection of Canadian waters in the event that the Canadian navy cannot assume its responsibilities?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, might I be allowed to answer the previous question?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister would rather answer the previous question than this one, but I would think that generally speaking the two questions fall into the same category and cannot be asked at this time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

POWER

ESTABLISHMENT OF RESEARCH INSTITUTE BY HYDRO QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have an inquiry for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is the minister aware of or has his attention been directed to the announcement made yesterday by the premier of Quebec with regard to the establishment of a $28 million research institute by Hydro Quebec for the purpose of studying questions of transmission and other generally related matters in the field of electrical energy? If so, can the minister say whether it is the intention of the government of Canada to participate or assist in this project, as was indicated by the premier as his hope?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, may I ask for time to study this matter.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

INQUIRY AS TO REGULATIONS RESPECTING AWARD OF MEDAL

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the Prime Minister is yet in a position to give the house and the country a general concept of the awarding of the centennial medal. It is amazing the number of people who have shown an anticipatory interest in this matter. Have the rules been put together to set out who shall be the subject of this honour and the circumstances under which the award shall be made, so that many who are outside the pale of governmental expectation will know in advance?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, arrangements are being made governing the awarding of this particular centennial medal. I, or the Secretary of State, will be able to make a statement before long. I will do my best to see that the right hon. gentleman's name is on the list.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I take it that the Prime Minister has already appropriated his. I would ask the Prime Minister, has approval as to form, style and content been given by Her Majesty?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, all the necessary steps were taken before this was decided upon.

[Mr. Speaker.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—REQUEST FOR AID TO WAR VICTIMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister will not be surprised if I question him today concerning the request of the Quakers in connection with medical supplies being made available to Viet Nam.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to my hon. friend for his patience in this matter of a request from the Quakers that the government should provide free transportation for medical supplies to all parts of Viet Nam, including of course North Viet Nam.

This matter was given the most careful and thoughtful attention by all those interested in and responsible for the conduct of Canadian aid programs, and I would emphasize that this is the context in which the Quakers' request had to be considered. As a result of this examination we came to the conclusion that we had no alternative but to decline the Quakers' request as inconsistent with the established practices of our official aid programs.

Specifically, the arrangements under which we work with recipient countries provide for the governments of these countries on their own account meeting the shipping charges on all goods or commodities supplied under Canada's official aid programs. Having insisted on this principle in our government to government aid programs, it would be difficult to adopt a different policy with respect to shipments from Canada of items provided by private groups interested in international aid programs. We have not done so in response to previous approaches from such groups, and such approaches have been made in the past.

Although that was the essence of the decision communicated to the Quakers yesterday, I might remind the house that there are no government obstacles in the way of normal shipments of medical supplies abroad. Similarly, if normal banking channels can be found for this purpose, we would place no obstacle in the way of transfer of funds for humanitarian purposes in Viet Nam.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO DISTRIBUTION OF NEW UNIFORMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Have any new armed services uniforms been distributed to national defence staff?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Not yet, Mr. Speaker. We have been preparing a uniform for trials during the coming summer season. The staff have now agreed as to what it should be, and a number of sample uniforms will be ordered which can be worn by headquarters and command personnel this summer in order to determine whether it is acceptable in all respects, including durability. A public announcement on this will be made in the not too distant future.

Mr. Nasserden: As a supplementary question, is it the intention of the minister and the department to issue some of these uniforms to the federal centennial commission?

Mr. Hellyer: Only if they are in the armed forces, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): As a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister if it has been decided that these experimental or trial uniforms will not be green, as has been reported, but will indeed be "Hellyertrope"?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

AIR POLLUTION

EQUIPPING OF AUTOMOBILES WITH PROTECTIVE DEVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It is based on the announcement made in Washington on Saturday relating to the elimination of air pollution by clean air packages in motor vehicles, and on the reply given to me yesterday by the Minister of Industry that this question was under study by the Department of National Health and Welfare. Has the government practically completed its studies so the Canadian people may anticipate that they will receive protection by Canadian standards similar to that which will be enjoyed by United States citizens?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the matter referred to by my hon. friend is still under consideration and when appropriate, further information will be given.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, without any desire at all to be contentious, will the minister please assure us that he will reach the necessary conclusions quickly, before it is too late? If the regulations are to apply to 1968 model vehicles the study will have to be concluded soon.

SUDBURY, ONT.—SULPHUR DIOXIDE LEVEL AT INTERNATIONAL NICKEL PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has the minister's attention been drawn to an allegation that the sulphur dioxide content at the International Nickel plant at Sudbury is 40 times higher than the acceptable level in this connection? Will the minister take the initiative in referring to the Canadian council of resource ministers the question of national acceptable air pollution standards as has been suggested by a member of the Ontario legislature?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, this is not my day with the hon. member for Kamloops. I will investigate and report on this important matter.

SHIPPING

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—MAINTENANCE OF WINTER NAVIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport.

Could he brief the house on the situation with regard to the opening of the St. Lawrence channel, at the present time? Could he also tell us whether he has received any information in this regard from his department rather than from the newspapers?

[English]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I made a request for such information, the very latest information, but it has not reached me since I made the request. I understand that there was a very heavy frost last night, and I am not sure just what the temperature is at the moment.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister tell the house whether or not federal icebreakers are now clearing up the ice jams on the St. Lawrence?

[English]

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand there are at least four icebreakers working on this problem at the moment.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Yesterday in addition to assuring the house that he had sought certain information, the minister in his reply gave the house assurances that he had made certain these shippers knew they could ship to the port of Halifax and the port of Saint John. Would he undertake to see that this is reconfirmed?

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand that this information is being conveyed through the usual channels.

TRADE

FRUIT—REQUEST FOR TARIFF ON IMPORTS FROM U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, January 30 I asked the right hon. Prime Minister the following question:

In view of the statement made by the secretary manager of the Ontario Fruit Growers' Association, has it been brought to the attention of the Department of National Revenue that Ontario fruit growers are being adversely affected by large scale imports of processed fruit and is the government considering the imposition of a tariff on fruit imported from the United States?

I wonder whether the right hon. gentleman has an answer to this question.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I did take up this matter with the department of government concerned. I will try to have a reply by tomorrow.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

FINANCE

REPORTED STATEMENT BY TRADE MINISTER RESPECTING ACCUMULATION OF SAVINGS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce with reference to a speech he made in Toronto during the week end, which is referred to in a report appearing in this morning's Globe and Mail under the heading "Need new look at tax laws, Winters hints". The report is as follows:

Trade Minister Robert Winters told a student audience in Toronto during the week end that government legislation inhibits the accumulation of savings in Canada.

Could the minister advise the house what government legislation inhibits accumulation of savings in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think the question in the way it is phrased is acceptable. The hon. member knows that generally speaking, according to the practice of the house, reference can be made to speeches made outside of the house only to ask the Prime Minister whether this represents government policy. I do not think the question as asked by the hon. member is acceptable.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might ask a supplementary question. In view of the opinions the minister has expressed recently would he advise what legislation inhibits the accumulation of savings in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: I do not wish to appear to be obstructive, but in asking the question in this way it seems that the hon. member is asking for an interpretation of statutes or for a legal interpretation. This is the interpretation I place on his question.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is vitally interested in investment in this country. I should like to ask him, in view of the requirement for investment capital in Canada, would he advise the house which legislation he considers does inhibit savings in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: It might be easier to allow the minister to reply to the question, but in my view it is against the rules to ask such a question. I must seek the co-operation of hon.

members to agree with me that the question as asked both by the hon. member for Northumberland and the hon. member for Edmonton West is not acceptable.

Mr. Lambert: We are seeking information.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he would participate in the debate this afternoon and give the house an idea of his views, which seem to be contrary to those of the Minister of Finance and the Minister without Portfolio from Toronto.

Mr. Speaker: That is a very valid question.

WATER RESOURCES

INQUIRY AS TO STUDY IN CANADA BY NATIONAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that the United States congress yesterday authorized the formation of a national waters commission to make a comprehensive review of national water resources programs and problems, is a similar study being undertaken in Canada by any public body?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I know of many studies on water supply made in Canada in the past and others which are being made now, some of them by the provinces, some of them by the federal government and some of them jointly, but I am not aware of any national study. Most of our investigations are conducted on a regional basis. I have a speech to make in a few days on the inventory of Canadian waters, and I will be glad to send a copy of the speech to my hon. friend.

Mr. Aiken: Does the minister have in mind the setting up of a national body to evolve a comprehensive plan in respect of the use of our water resources?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I know one thing; it is easier at this moment at least to do these things in the United States than it is to do them in Canada.

Inquiries of the Ministry

GRAIN

NORTHERN ALBERTA—BOX CARS TO HANDLE MOIST AND DAMP GRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Trade and Commerce, to give him an opportunity to reply without any real impediment. In view of the urgency of the situation of the farmers in northern Alberta who have large quantities of damp and moist grain which is likely to be spoiled, will the minister consult with the Canadian Wheat Board and the railway officials to see whether box cars can be supplied in the numbers necessary to meet the emergency?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I will be glad to do that. The box car situation was fairly intense toward the end of last year, but it has been alleviated considerably recently. I will be glad to look into the matter to see what the needs are and what can be done.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON MEETING WITH CARIBBEAN COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, could either the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Minister of Trade and Commerce give the house a report on the Caribbean conference which was held at Saint Lucia in an endeavour to work out greater co-operation with those countries?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): This was a conference of officials, and the officials will be reporting to the government. In due course the government will make its report to the house.

Mr. Douglas: I am aware it was a meeting of officials, but have any decisions been arrived at and are there any indications that out of this conference there will come a sugar agreement? This is one of the questions in which there is a good deal of interest both in the Caribbean area and on the part of the sugar consumers in Canada.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This and other questions were discussed. Different proposals have been made and these will be examined by the government. The matters concerned not only economic but also certain other political questions as well.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): May I say something supplementary to the reply by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The undertakings we made last year respecting sugar will be carried out. At the recent conference officials explored further ways and means to do this, but the undertakings will be fulfilled.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the government any plans to increase our aid to the West Indies, either by way of additional money or by diverting certain aid that is now being received by other countries?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As the Prime Minister indicated the other day and as we announced about four months ago when we met with the Caribbean countries, we have decided to approximately double our aid to the West Indies.

Mr. Starr: Is the minister in a position to tell the house what form this aid will take?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would be very happy to do that, but I am sure my hon. friend with his long experience will agree that this cannot properly be done on the orders of the day.

INDUSTRY

REPORTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER RESPECTING POSSIBLE FREE TRADE AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Yesterday when speaking to the national export advisory council it is reported that the minister said there were several areas of free trade similar to the U.S.-Canada car pact arrangement that they were investigating. Is the minister in a position to advise the house as to what areas of free trade he was speaking about?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker; and I do not think we have reached that stage yet. I said there were other potential areas. I think hon. members know that we have been looking beyond the auto parts pact into areas where the same sort of formula may be applied, but it is premature to say precisely what they are.

Mr. Hales: I have a supplementary question. Would furniture be one of these areas of free trade?

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

REPORTED STATEMENT BY ENERGY MINISTER RESPECTING CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. A special report to the Globe and Mail covering an address to the Women's Canadian Club in Montreal stated that the minister, when criticizing requests for a new written constitution, said that a constitutional conference to study revision of the British North America Act would be a terrible idea. I wonder whether the minister was expressing his views or the views of the government on this occasion.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As I suggested to another hon. member today, a question of this nature should be directed to the Prime Minister.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED TRIP BY PRIME MINISTER'S PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and I believe he will be able to answer it on orders of the day. In the minister's "Nobel" pursuit of peace in Viet Nam, will the fact finding world tour of the hon. member for Leeds include any activity on behalf of the minister in Saigon or Hanoi?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say I agree with what the Prime Minister has said. I am sure we will find the purposes which are taking the hon. member for Leeds to certain countries useful. My hon. friend may belittle the efforts of certain people who are trying to promote peace in the world, but I am sure most members of this house and of this country believe the hon. gentleman speaks the language of a seventeenth century statesman.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, as a twentieth century backbencher I should like to ask a supplementary question. Will the minister tell the house whether the invitation to the hon. member for Leeds resulted from his own initiative, or was it extended as a result of the initiative of the government of Chiang Kai-shek?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In the first instant I think the invitation was offered by the government of Formosa, which asked the hon. gentleman to come as its guest. The government felt there were reasons he should undertake this visit, but that under the circumstances it should assume the cost of the trip.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the same circumstances prevail in respect of other members of this house who may have received similar invitations?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member for Leeds happens to be the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister. If the hon. member is looking for an invitation I can only suggest that in certain cases one might be very difficult to obtain.

Mr. Lambert: I could not agree with you more.

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question relates to the original question and the answer by the Prime Minister yesterday afternoon as reported in Hansard. Are the rules of this house such that committees, in this case the external affairs committee, are only called at the behest of a minister? That was the indication given yesterday. I thought this house determined its own committee procedures rather than the specific minister involved.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest the hon. member is advancing an argument rather than an appropriate question.

INQUIRY AS TO POLICE REPORTS ON BOMBING OF YUGOSLAV BUILDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General or the Prime Minister. Has any word been received as yet in respect of the investigation regarding the bombing of the Yugoslav consulate last week?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, we have received no report as yet. We are pressing for one and hope to receive it as quickly as possible.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

OTTAWA—TRAIN TRAVELLING WRONG WAY ON C.P.R. TRACKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and does not concern icebreakers. As one of the passengers on the C.N.R. train which went flying 15 miles past the Ottawa station on the C.P.R. tracks on Sunday, at great danger and inconvenience to the passengers, I should like to ask the minister to confirm the report that a full investigation is being made into this matter, and to assure us that in the meantime C.N.R. employees will be made aware of what the new Ottawa station looks like so they will recognize it.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to advise the hon. gentleman not to associate too much with Mr. Van Horne if he is going to have this effect on trains. The matter is, of course, being investigated. This is a matter of some concern, and I am sure the C.N.R. will do its best to see that it does not happen again.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): A supplementary question. Do I take it from the first part of the minister's remarks that he is repudiating the decision of the voters of New Brunswick yesterday?

Mr. Pickersgill: Unfortunately I have not the capacity to do that.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

DEPARTMENTAL PRESS RELEASE ISSUED BY MEMBER FOR ST. JOHN'S EAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development based on a press release issued from his department on February 1, 1967 by Mr. Joseph O'Keefe, the hon. member for St. John's East. Is Mr. O'Keefe officially connected with the minister's department and, if not, has a new policy been established whereby private members representing specific constituencies make such announcements on behalf of the department?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, let me assure the hon. gentleman that the hon. member for St. John's East took the lead in initiating with the department the project to which he has referred, as have other members in respect of other projects. Therefore I think it most appropriate that the hon. member's name should have been associated with the announcement. That will continue to be our policy.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, I recognize that individual members are often connected with projects, but my question related to the policy which allows private members to make announcements on behalf of the government. Many members initiate projects, but I can think of no other occasion when a similar announcement was made by—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me the hon. member is now making a speech. Does the hon. member have a supplementary question?

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should ask the Prime Minister whether there has been a change in policy regarding announcements by private members on behalf of the government.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman will consult Senator David Walker I am sure he will find there has been no change.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are running out of time, and I am wondering whether the hon. member wants to take up the rest of the time available.

Mr. Aiken: I should like to debate this at ten o'clock.

OLD AGE SECURITY

QUEBEC—DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING TRANSFER OF ADMINISTRATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of National Health and Welfare tell the house whether the government is now engaging in conversations or discussions with officials of the government of the province of Quebec in connection with the take over by that province of old age security administration? What discussions have taken place, what is the present position of those discussions, and what is the government's attitude in this regard?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, officials of my department have not held any discussions with officials from the province of Quebec in respect of such a take over.

[Mr. Laing.]

THE BUDGET

ADDITIONAL FINANCIAL MEASURES OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Monday, February 6, consideration of the motion of Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Monteith.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, at this time I should like to discuss the reform of the procedures of parliament. I want to take this opportunity of doing so because some excellent speeches have been made on this subject in various parts of the country, notably by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) and others. The resolution to set up a special committee to examine the continuation of the changed rules was passed by parliament without debate, and a good many of us had hoped to have an opportunity to discuss this matter at that time.

I have a fairly loud voice, Mr. Speaker, but I do find it very awkward and difficult to speak when about 87 other hon. members are speaking at the same time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will hon. members kindly continue their conversations behind the curtains? The hon. member for Royal has a most interesting speech to make which I am sure all of us would like to hear.

Mr. Fairweather: I am particularly anxious that the government house leader, if he can spare a minute or two to listen to my speech, give me the benefit of his views at a later date because he and some other people share the responsibility for the fact that some ideas put forward by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) and others have not yet been translated into action.

Mr. McIlraith: Will the hon. member permit a question? Why does he single out the government house leader in this kind of personal reference when the government house leader is one of those in the house who try to obey the rules and conduct themselves in a responsible way?

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): That is what the hon. member said.

Mr. Fairweather: I would soon use up my time if we are going to have a dichotomy of views between us on this matter. I think that the minister has a responsibility and I respect the part he plays in the reform of the rules of parliament. However, among those of us who occupy the back benches there is a feeling that the recommendations for parliamentary reform that might have come from the minister have not as yet been indicated.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope the hon. member will want to return now to the consideration of the business at hand. If so, he will not be charged with the last two or three minutes.

Mr. Fairweather: Of course the first reform that is essential is one that was recommended to parliament by the special committee on parliamentary procedure, and that was the establishment of a standing committee on procedures. I think it was a great pity that when certain changes were made to the rules this recommendation of the special committee was not carried out. The advantages of such a committee are, first, that owing to the fact that it would be a standing committee it would be established immediately upon the opening of parliament. It would also be able to keep under constant review many of the good changes that are being made in parliamentary institutions in other parts of the world.

I suggest that the reform of the procedures of this house should take place from top to bottom and that it has to be considered by a standing committee over several sessions perhaps. This is not a stop and start matter. It is a matter of a fundamental review which should take place over several years if we really mean what we say and are not just paying lip service to reform.

Parliamentary procedure boiled down to its simplest aspects has only two reasons. First of all, it enables the government to get its program through parliament. Second, it provides an opportunity for those who sit in opposition to the government to prevent the government from running the whole show. As a matter of fact we have had an excellent example recently of the effectiveness of parliamentary procedure during our long consideration of the transport bill. The original bill proposed to parliament was in no way comparable with the one which was finally enacted. I myself may criticize the length of the debate but I think the end result and the work of the standing committee were a tribute to parliament and to those hon. members who participated in the eventual enactment of this legislation.

Money is the basis of our system and the control of the spending of money is really one of our main functions. There may be an easy control in that some people who take refuge in easy solutions to problems just say "No". In a way that is control. However, there is another way to control, the way which I believe parliament should follow. I refer to the examination of programs and policies. It seems to me that those of us who are members here should never lose an opportunity to discuss the working of parliament in other places because there are many people who think that our main function is to legislate and there are many people who have really set up what I might call a false god of legislation and have allowed emphasis upon legislation to supplant the control of spending.

Members of the parliament in Australia have brought about an interesting reform in their procedure. Perhaps it would be a little too fundamental for us yet although it needs the attention of the committee on procedure. I am referring to the change by which all major financial debates in Australia now occur during the various stages of the legislation. In other words, there is no committee of ways and means. Perhaps this is a drastic reform but Australia too is an offshoot of the mother of parliaments and it has seen fit to adopt this procedure. From what I read it has not meant that the rights of members to comment, criticize and exercise control have been inhibited in any way.

There was a tragic example not so long ago in connection with the pay of civil servants. I believe this is an occasion where parliament goes too far. I do not believe that the withholding of supply should be pushed to the limit so that a man who works for the government may be without his properly earned salary.

There is another reform which I should like to be considered and that is the allocation of time for debate. I believe that the special government proposal in this connection was the result of a compromise and is therefore much too complicated. I think a better way would be for the operations of the house to be a matter of day to day negotiation between the whips and house leaders to a greater extent than I am informed they have been up to now.

With great respect to the Speaker, I feel that the question period should undergo drastic reform. I am not saying that because something is done in Britain it is good. Obviously the geographic area of Britain and the fact that Britain has a national press make it easier to have a more disciplined question period than we have. However, I feel it would be a great reform to have to give 48 hours notice of questions. I believe that the Leader of the Opposition, as an officer of the house, should have the opportunity without notice to ask a question of the Prime Minister or a minister each day.

The fact that the order paper is cluttered with hundreds of questions makes it a poor thing. There is no such cluttering of the order paper in Britain. If there is not time to answer questions on orders of the day, written replies are sent promptly. In this way there is no back-up of questions. I feel sure this procedure would be welcomed not only by those who produce the documents but by those of us who have to wait weeks and sometimes even months to get answers to written questions.

In September, in another part of this building, one of the committees of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Conference considered the problem of parliamentary reform. It interested me to find that there was no parliamentary representative from anywhere in the Commonwealth who did not feel that some aspect of the parliamentary system could undergo fundamental revision. One of the British members set out his views quite succinctly and perhaps at this point of my speech I may share his comments with you on the real reason for parliament. I refer to the remarks of Mr. Daniel Awdry, a member of parliament in the United Kingdom. He said that parliament is the assembly which provides the government and, incidentally, the Prime Minister, to the nation.

The next function of parliament, he said, is to control the executive and, of course, control of the nation's money is at the heart of our parliamentary system. However, he said that the truth today is that control of spending by the House of Commons is largely nonexistent. No one in this chamber could say that comment does not apply to this place as well. The third function that Mr. Awdry suggests is one of information. He said:

> It is the duty of parliament and parliamentarians to create new ideas, to produce original thought and to pass information on to the electors—

[Mr. Fairweather.]

Finally, Mr. Awdry believes that it is the function of parliament to pass laws. It interested me to note that in his catalogue the passage of legislation was last. I know that the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Turner) would take a keen interest in the third function of parliament, that is, information and the creation of new ideas because he and a good many of us share the view that from the conception of an idea to its eventual enactment, or even first of all its discussion, there is a trail that even the most careful explorer would find difficult in tracking to its end. I think this is tragic and I believe it is part of the reason for the declining respect for members of parliament and their role as initiators.

It has been my experience, and I hope I can say this objectively and modestly, that when we are in a forum where we can share ideas with people they seem to be, first of all, amazed that members of parliament have ideas. Once they get over their amazement they are quite pleasantly surprised to find that some members of parliament are reasonable. The third source of wonder they express is, why can you not do something about these things? Most of the forums I have attended have not sufficient time in their programs to allow members to tell these people why it is so difficult to translate an idea into eventual action by the government.

Mr. Stewart: May I ask the hon. member if he would not agree that it is very difficult to make headlines out of an idea?

Mr. Fairweather: I am accused sometimes of being a cynic but I am not really cynical about the reform of parliament. I know quite well that a speech on parliamentary reform, made at 3.30 on an afternoon when other events in this building will get headlines, is not likely to get much attention from the press. This does not disturb me one bit. I think ideas are worth sharing. I hope that government members, including the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Stewart), will join issue on some of the things I have been saying.

Mr. Stewart: May I ask the hon. gentleman another question? I do not believe I want to join issue with him on many of his statements, but does he not insist that the problem to which he is now referring, the problem of better public discussion in our democracy, is really one which encompasses far more than improving debate in this house?

Mr. Fairweather: Yes, and I could attempt to show why by having a discourse here or somewhere else about it but my time is rapidly moving along. Obviously one of the functions which would stand high in my list of the functions of parliament would be the sharing and gathering of information. It is for this reason I really have not too much respect for those who say the duty of a member is to sit in this chamber day in and day out for 200 or 300 days a year. I think that is a sacred cow that is trotted out whenever it is convenient. A member who is able to get around the country comes here better prepared for debate.

The restructuring of our committee system as recommended to parliament by the committee on procedure would have worked better than the one that was finally set before us by the government. It was the feeling of those of us who served on that committee that there should really be no more than 15 committees of parliament with fewer rather than more members. This would make them more efficient. We now have 21 committees, if I am properly informed, each with 24 members. Today is probably a good example of how impossible the system is when ten committees are sitting. As a matter of fact, I am on two committees that have meetings called for 3.30 this afternoon and it is now 3.40.

I believe that the quorums of committees could be greatly reduced without any harm, particularly for those committees which in the early part of their agenda are receiving a large number of briefs. It is apparently assumed that a great many members do not take the trouble to read briefs. Perhaps if the quorums were reduced and more attention were paid to the preparation and reading of briefs, committee work would move along a bit faster.

There are two reforms I should like to mention which have been adopted by the United Kingdom parliament and I think would be helpful to us. One concerns what is known as the early day motion, which is a system whereby members representing the various parties sometimes set down a motion in order to test public opinion on issues, thus giving a particular matter publicity, as the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough mentioned earlier. If the matter is serious enough an opportunity is given to the opposition or to those members who want to press the motion to have a day set aside for debate.

I feel that this proposal is an important one. I notice that it was used recently when 70 or 80 members of the British House of Commons put their names on an early day motion which deplored the fact that the government was raising fees for foreign students from outside the United Kingdom who were studying there. These 70 or 80 members were not necessarily supporters of the government; they represented the various parties in the house. I think many more opportunities should be given for that type of challenge to policy.

Another reform which, though in the embryo stage, I think would be worth while considering is that known as the second reading committee. Those of you who read the Observer will know that Mr. Richard Crossman has recently been discussing the second reading committee concept. I should like to refer to an article by Mr. Rudolf Klein entitled "Mr. Crossman's New Time-saver" which appeared in the January 29 edition of the Observer:

> Crossman's basic idea is simple. Ministers want "certainty and predictability" in getting their measures through the Commons. Backbenchers want more opportunity to influence government policy. Here, he believes, are all the makings of a possible deal, since "business-like predictability is worth paying for."

In other words, Mr. Speaker, if the government could be sure of a legislative pattern it should be prepare to make certain days available for debate on issues that the opposition members feel should take place

To return to the second reading committee proposal, I point out that this committee processes bill which both parties in the United Kingdom—in the case of Canada it would be all parties—agree are non-controversial. The article states:

> It is a system which could gradually give greater influence to backbench M.P.'s while leaving the government's power of initiative intact. For instance, during all the long hours devoted to the steel bill, M.P.'s never once discussed how the steel industry is going to be organized under state ownership.

I do not want to apply the steel bill example to Canada, but I do not think it will take much imagination on the part of hon. members to realize that this type of thing happens all too often in this chamber. In other words, although legislation is debated the ultimate result of the legislation is rarely given any meaningful consideration.

The report which instituted the second reading committee in the United Kingdom was made to parliament on March 25, 1965, so that they have had a year or so to test this system. An examination of our order paper discloses that there are many non-controversial bills which would receive better attention if they were referred to a committee such as the second reading committee. In our experience it often happens that at the end of a day the house leaders are able to arrange for certain items to be brought forward, and usually the house takes an ambitious initiative and passes them very quickly without any consideration at all. A second reading committee would mean that these non-controversial items would have some attention.

Mr. Churchill: That is before or after second reading?

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, my colleague has asked a most interesting question. This is done before second reading. I understand that in all cases the actual second reading is left to parliament itself. In other words, parliament can either accept or reject the recommendation for second reading made by this committee, so that parliament's rights are properly protected.

My reading of literature on parliamentary reform tells me, Mr. Speaker, that two rather simple steps have been taken. The first one was in the early 1880's the other in 1902. Until the 1880's it had been felt that parliament should be untrammelled and everyone bowed to freedom of speech and other shibboleths. Parliament had to face an interesting group of members from Ireland who used every device and delaying action to hold up parliament. As is usual when challenged, parliament found a means of using freedom of speech to its proper end. In other words, Mr. Speaker, these proposals have had historical origins, and I am intrigued to think that the trouble encountered by the Irish M.P.'s really instituted the first great procedural reform in the British House of Commons.

However, we in Canada have not had that experience so our rules, with very little variation, are the rules that we adopted prior to the reforms which took place in Britain in the 1880's. There are, of course, certain exceptions, and we can all think of them. That is why I plead with the government to take the initiative in re-establishing as a standing committee the committee on procedure, because reform is not a matter that should be handled piecemeal.

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, if reform is to be anything more than just a matter for discussion by members of parliament throughout the country we should examine the fundamental reasons behind each and every one of our rules. Perhaps a case can be made, as it was made in Australia, for abandoning the committee of ways and means procedure. Perhaps a case can be made for, shall I say, having a slightly more disciplined question period. Perhaps a case can also be made—I think it can—for reducing the number of members on committees, reducing the quorums, and widening the scope of the responsibilities that those committees are called upon to undertake.

In last month's issue of "Encounter" there is an article by Mr. Henry Fairlie. In it we are reminded of a phrase used by Mr. R. A. Butler—"the patience of politics". Mr. Fairlie says:

> The phrase is R. A. Butler's. It expresses, more vividly than any other single phrase, the character of politics in a free country.
> In the politician, it demands that he should accustom himself to the inevitable fluctuations of political fortunes; that he should find defeat and failure only an invitation to renewed efforts; that he should overcome the galling frustrations of enforced idleness and opposition, and be able to look forward to ten years in the wilderness with equanimity and self-assurance.

That is something from which a good many of us would profit if we took it to heart.

> It demands that he should never try to seize imaginary initiatives or seek speedy results; that he should wait calmly for his opportunity; that he should never despair or panic.

> It demands that he should bear obloquy, misrepresentation, and injuries without complaint; that he should expect no gratitude; that he should remain silent when one word would justify him, if that word would injure his cause. Above all, it demands that he should never, whatever the provocation, cease to trust in the right instincts of a free people; that he should believe always in their ability, in the long run, to distinguish truth from falsehood, justice, from injustice, the sound from the meretricious; that he should, in this belief, patiently pursue the task of bringing different ideas and interests into contact with each other, never doubting that the arts of a free government are among the most rewarding of all the arts of a civilised people.

We have a responsibility to so enlarge the scope of this chamber and the character, if I may use that word, and attributes of its members that our people may indeed believe we are good practitioners of the art of politics.

Mr. D. R. Tolmie (Welland): Mr. Speaker, it should be recalled that the whole tenor and philosophy of the March, 1966 budget, which met with general approval, was one consistent with a burgeoning economy showing danger signs of unrestrained growth. That anti-inflationary budget contained provisions designed to prolong prosperity without dire inflationary price spirals, exacting hardship on low and fixed income segments of our society. Among other things the moderate income tax increases on medium and upper incomes and the judicious decrease on low incomes, the elimination and postponement of certain capital projets and the progressive removal of the 11 per cent sales tax on production equipment and machinery, contributed to maintaining our spectacular boom. I felt at that time that the finance minister deserved the highest commendation for coolly and efficiently introducing a reasonable budget, with some unpalatable provisions, designed to achieve for all our citizens full employment and sustained or increased purchasing power enabling them to live in comfort and security in this prosperous land.

It has been generally conceded and the Economic Council of Canada has endorsed the view that the economy at present is rather delicately balanced. There is a strong suspicion that it is heading for a slowdown. No economist can say with exactitude the precise inclination of our economy. I suggest that the minister, with commendable alertness, has kept a constant protective vigil. Now, based on statistics and the best economic opinions available, he has introduced a realistic budget which should maintain the intricate balance between inflation and recession so essential to the material well-being of all Canadian citizens.

This budget, designed to make no radical impact on our economy, makes provision for raising sufficient funds to pay for the guaranteed income supplement for our senior citizens. Parliament, representing the wishes of the people, has provided a new revolutionary concept in the guaranteed income plan for our senior citizens. This plan without a means or needs test, as opposed to a flat increase of $25 a month, will provide some half million of Canada's old age pensioners with $60 a year more than the Conservative and N.D.P. flat rate proposal would have provided. What is most important, the guaranteed income supplement, unlike the flat $25 a month increase, is weighted in favour of those on low and modest incomes. In effect the government has not raised the pension for people in high income brackets but has provided for increases for older people who definitely need a supplement to their incomes to live in security and dignity in a land to which they have contributed so much.

These additional payments to pensioners are expected to cost the federal treasury between $260 million and $280 million. The government, after reviewing all the possibilities of raising the required funds to pay for this very necessary and worth-while plan, decided to raise the maximum amount payable by an individual by reason of the 4 per cent tax on personal income under the Old Age Security Act from $120 a year to $240 a year. This increased tax only affects those taxpayers with taxable income exceeding $3,000 after all exemptions and deductions. In effect the result is that a married taxpayer with two children will not have an increase unless he is earning more than $5,700 a year, which is well above the current national average of wage earnings. Significantly, the tax increase will not affect two thirds of our present income taxpayers. In addition, the general sales tax was increased from 11 per cent to 12 per cent, but it should be emphasized that this increase will not apply to building materials and will not affect the cost of food, fuel and services exempt from this tax.

It is self-evident that funds must be provided for this novel and enlightened guaranteed income concept, and I submit that these budget proposals achieve this as neatly and fairly as possible. Fiscal and monetary policies are for most of us lofty concepts; often they are dull and incomprehensible. These Policies are formulated by brilliant, intellectual experts with charts, computers and statistics. They are instruments to be played for our material welfare, and the tune to be produced depends on many complex and variable interlocking economic factors.

There is, however, one factor which we can all understand, the rising cost of living. Though inextricably bound with general economic conditions, living costs are amenable to diagnosis and prescriptions for at least a partial cure can be applied. Here the government can play a role. Happily it has taken a commendable step in setting up the Senate and House of Commons joint committee on consumer affairs. No one pretends that this is the complete answer to the rising cost of living as painfully revealed in high food prices, but if the consumer, which is every man, woman and child in this nation, is being unfairly exploited by dubious business practices and exorbitant profits such a committee can reveal this and suggest remedial legislation to prevent the continuance of such abuses. Frankly, I feel that the very fact our large food suppliers know their operations are subject to public scrutiny will make them loath to pursue practices inimical to the best interests of their customers. There has been some indication that since the formation of this committee certain prices in some categories have decreased. Quite conceivably some of this decrease could be attributed to the work of the committee.

Emerging from all economic theory, one stark fact remains. Our present and future wealth and well-being depend upon our productivity and the preservation and enhancement of our national resources. My thesis is simple. All policies and factors which increase the productivity of this nation and husband and strengthen our national resources eventually add to our total economic health. Preservation of our water resources through war on pollution, the improvement of the general health of the nation through the passage of the medicare bill, more liberalized and enlightened immigration policies, social reform—all these contribute to our wealth. These influences are less easy to gauge and assess as factors affecting our affluence, but though not as discernible they are real and quietly and unobstrusively play a significant role in the improvement of our economy.

What is the point of manipulating economic levers if we neglect to preserve and increase the source of our wealth? By and large, our policies in respect of water, land, minerals and forests have been enlightened and constructive. However, one of our irreplaceable and basic resources, our water, is in jeopardy. In dire straits are our great lakes with their treasures of fish, matchless beaches and residential shores attracting millions of tourist dollars and providing rest, relaxation and peace of mind for thousands of our citizens.

What is shocking is that for years there has been a continuous insidious deterioration of these assets because of water pollution, and until quite recently few, if any, steps had been taken to prevent this vicious onslaught. In December, 1965, the International Joint Commission issued a most disturbing report on pollution in the great lakes in which it practically stated that lake Erie was fast becoming a large septic tank and an open venomous sewer. It stated that algae growths curtail commercial fishing and recreational activities, impart obnoxious odours, impair filtering operations of industrial and municipal water treatment plants, lower waterfront property values and generally threaten destruction of the lakes as a valuable water resource. Certain recommendations were made urging the Canadian and American governments, in association with state and provincial governments, to take action to ensure that industries refrain from dumping chemical wastes into our great lakes, that municipalities be forced to treat their sewage properly and that an accelerated program of research into the baffling causes of water pollution be instituted.

[Mr. Tolmie.]

It is always most difficult to get action in fields of jurisdiction divided among the United States government, the federal government, the provincial government and municipal governments and consequently there has been a welter of confusion and ambiguity as to the progress we are making in the war on pollution. In order to erase any lingering suspicion that nothing has been done by the federal government, it should be noted that among other things the following measures have been taken. At present there is a massive research program endeavouring to ascertain the baffling causes of pollution. Three important federal agencies, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Fisheries Research Board are combining forces, with each agency contributing money and scientists to conduct special studies for which they are best qualified. For part of the program the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has chartered the 136-foot stern trawler, Brandel. The department has fitted out this modern vessel as a survey and research ship and it has been working out of Kingston, Ontario. Two 30-foot launches will be employed in the national health and welfare departmental program.

Under contract with the federal government, the great lakes institute will be making co-ordinated studies in lake Ontario and lake Erie. A research laboratory on pollution will be constructed at Burlington, Ontario. Over $1.5 million was invested in this study of the lower lakes in 1966 and 90 per cent of the cost has been borne by the federal government. This investment will grow from year to year, reaching an estimated level of over $5 million by 1970.

This intensive survey program is only one facet of the total federal effort, and it is not generally recognized how large the federal government contributions have been toward the installation of sewage treatment facilities. Over $200 million has been advanced as loans by the federal government for this purpose at a low rate of interest and with a lengthy amortization period. Over $50 million of these loans will be forgiven as part of a special arrangement for the encouragement of such construction. The federal government has also contributed through its winter works program which supports, among other projects, the installation of sewage systems and treatment plants. It is estimated, for example, that at least $17 million of federal funds has been contributed to the construction of these installations and systems in Ontario alone.

The federal government has made special concessions to assist companies to instal improved treatment facilities. The income tax regulations have been amended to permit a fast write-off of the capital cost of these installations. It should also be noted that the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has been reorganized so that one special branch will have jurisdiction over water pollution. In addition, the council of federal and provincial resource officials is constantly studying this problem and they will shortly make recommendations to their respective governments. I mention these steps to indicate that the government has not by any means been indifferent to the menace of water pollution. However, in my opinion the situation is now so serious that even greater efforts must be made. A veritable crash program is required immediately if we are going to preserve this most prized national resource.

One of our greatest resources, of course, is the number and quality of our people, and our immigration policies have a tremendous impact upon our future growth and prosperity. The government has indicated in its white paper on immigration that it proposes to implement a more liberal immigration policy consistent with the needs and demands of a young and growing country. Personally, I favour a broad, liberalized immigration policy based not only on the economic advantages but for social and humanitarian reasons. Skilled manpower is urgently needed at the present time. Expanding industry is pleading not only for skilled tradesmen but for unskilled workers who can be trained. If we are to sustain our economic expansion, if we are going to push ahead to new frontiers, if we are going to realize the potential explosive power of this lusty giant which is only barely flexing its biceps, if we are to realize our manifest destiny of becoming one of the richest nations on earth, if we ever hope to decrease our dependency on the United States and avoid a satellite status vis-à-vis that country, then we must encourage the regulated flow of new Canadians to this country, who in turn are producers and consumers alike.

We have water in abundance, minerals, lumber, oil and farmlands. The only resource not in ample supply is people. To cite an example, does it not seem incongruous in a new and developing nation at this time in our history when one realizes that instead of considering additional rail transportation across this land one transcontinental train was cancelled because allegedly there were not enough people to use it? With more people we could not only have presented the cancellation of the "Dominion," with all the attendant inconvenience and hardship, but the annual C.N.R. debt, running into the millions, could be reduced. We must welcome these people as Canadians have always welcomed new immigrants. We need their skills, their know-how, their enthusiasm. We need their purchasing power and their consuming power. We need all the positive things they can contribute.

This does not mean we open our portals wide and encourage an uncontrolled influx beyond our national capacity to absorb. We must be sure that we do not allow our immigration policies to impose added burdens on our unemployment situation, our housing or our social welfare facilities. I believe that we must welcome these people for other reasons less selfish, less pragmatic and less definable. We have a gigantic country beckoning for people to fill it, tremendous expanses untouched, soil to be tilled, minerals to be mined. We must welcome people because we have a wonderful country and a splendid way of life which we should share with those less fortunate. We have a duty to mankind to embrace other peoples of the world and allow them to share with us the opportunities and promise this happy land provides. My riding is a good example of an area where people from all races have mingled and enriched each other with their respective customs and cultures. This all makes an interesting and refreshing mosaic of life and adds vibrancy and colour to any community. This same dynamic pattern of growth can be emulated throughout Canada, adding sparkle and zest to our national life.

The most crucial factor in productivity is, of course, the industry, talents and efficient output of our people. The added energy and drive of a well adjusted, happy people, unhampered by nagging social and domestic problems, can add immeasurably to our total wealth as this increased unleashed productive capacity is infused into our national economy. Apart from all humanitarian considerations, reforms in many spheres can improve the vitality of this young nation.

This government has provided a glittering array of social welfare programs, unsurpassed in our parliamentary history. I feel that as we enter our centennial year there should be a shifting of emphasis to social reforms which not only would relieve abuses, inequities and human misery and could be effected without plundering the treasury but would, in relevance to a budget debate, strengthen the economic sinews of this nation. We have made a good start. The introduction of medicare will eventually ensure, through the improved health of our nation, a continued and more rapid exploitation of our full productive capacities. We are in effect husbanding and fostering the growth of our greatest national resource, the health of our people.

Highway accidents exact a staggering financial toll. The curtailment of this wanton destruction of life and property is a most direct way to contribute significantly to our material well-being. I strongly advocate, as one way to fight this plague on the national level, the introduction of a national safety code making it mandatory for automobile companies to instal certain minimum safety features in all automobiles built or sold in Canada. I admit that there are inherent constitutional problems involved but I submit that they can be circumvented, and in the national interest this type of legislation should not be delayed.

Our divorce laws are generally conceded to be savage, unrealistic, archaic, completely inconsistent with prevailing philosophies and crying out desperately for change. As a lawyer I have seen the human misery and degradation caused by cruel divorce laws. As a member of parliament I have received more poignant, pitiful and heartrending pleas for changes in this domestic field than in any other sphere of human relations. In a civilized country which prides itself on its enlightened views on the great social questions of the day, this cancer has been allowed to grow and thrive for a hundred years of our history, gnawing at the very vitals of our social fabric.

At least this government, for the first time in the history of the country, appointed a joint committee of the house and Senate to investigate divorce reform, and it is painfully probing this pathetic picture of human misery. Frankly, I think it is time we got a recommendation from that committee, and then the government should take immediate action and bring about a realistic broadening of the grounds for divorce consistent with our existing domestic realities and attitudes. I would like to see divorce reform passed during our centennial session because 1967 could be a commemorative year signalling the end of 100 years of human bondage. I can think of no more worth-while centennial project for our centennial session. Relevant to a budget debate, the peace of mind, the renewed interest in life and the happier social adjustment afforded by divorce reform would release a well of human energy, long stultified and dormant, which would pour forth into our life stream, adding renewed vigour and strength to our entire nation.

A genuine attack on hate literature, which demoralizes and saps the will and strength of many segments of our society, would, by dissipating neuroses and anxieties, again release latent energies which could add strength and vitality to our national economic life. A joint Senate and House of Commons committee is studying the question of hate literature and I would hope that an early report will recommend effective action against this concealed, insidious but nonetheless devasting social disease.

In summary I say this. We have the economic weapons to promote material well-being—a consumer committee, fiscal and monetary policies as enunciated in our budget—but we must keep constantly in mind one salient fact, that our real wealth resides in the natural resources of this land and the energies of our people. In this our centennial year, by social reforms based on humanitarian concepts and social justice, we must also release the explosive energies and talents of our people to their fullest potential. In this way and in this way only will we ensure lasting prosperity.

In this our centennial year we should give prayerful thanks for the rich blessings of this gracious and bountiful land, but should be ever mindful of the needs of every segment of our society and must ensure that all of our people share fairly in the almost limitless largesse of this proud nation. On our one hundredth birthday a dazzling vista of golden opportunities unfolds before us. A much blessed nation, proud, and master of its own destiny, with eager hope peers ahead into a warm, bright and glowing future. How fortunate we are today to share in this great dream.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I represent the great agricultural district of Athabasca and in the short time at my disposal I want to repeat a warning to this house and to the government in particular that agriculture will remain the backbone of Canada as long as we have a country. There are a great many experts in agriculture today, even in the farm unions, who are giving up hope of retaining the family farm. Sometimes through lack of vision and leadership the government finds it is necessary to impose quotas and hold prices down, rather than up, because a support price at a low level across the board can tend to force farmers to enlarge their farms and increase their production in the vain hope of closing the cost-price gap. I take an entirely different view.

I think that if we concentrate on markets, principally markets abroad, and instead of asking farmers to increase their acreage and buy out their neighbours, ask them to become efficient on their own small acreage, these are the only answers to the problem of maintaining a large and happy rural life in Canada.

The small farms in Quebec, the maritimes and Ontario are being harder hit now than ever before. They are no longer able to compete in the labour market for skilled operators of machinery, especially since farm labourers are not covered by unemployment insurance. On two occasions we have introduced private bills dealing with this problem but have had no success in having it rectified by the government.

The small family farm cannot operate without help. The young people who are expected to stay at home seek, if not direct wages, that the family farm be put on a paying basis. I am not one to get up and criticize government policies without making specific suggestions. I have made some previously and I do not hesitate to do so again.

I believe we are ignoring a tremendous market for meat products, particularly in Asia. When it was difficult to sell Asians our grain because they said they did not have the money, we decided to sell them grain on a time basis and by doing so we opened up a whole new vista for agriculture in western Canada which had the grain to sell. So far we have not even explored the possibility of selling meat products to Asia. The purchasing power of Asian countries is low. They do not have American dollars and are forced to buy from us with sterling. Our job should be to consult with financial experts and find some way to give purchasing power to Asia. On this narrow issue hangs the whole future not only of the agricultural industry of Canada but possibly of the peace of the world.

We should send trade missions not only to Asia but to every other corner of the world and find out intelligently what the rest of the world wants that we can produce. Canada is one of the few countries left in the world with virgin land. We can still plow new land in Canada. Most of the old countries of the world, particularly the over-populated ones, have worn-out soil. But in Canada we still have new land, and in western Canada new potash deposits are being developed.

Certainly Asia and the underdeveloped countries of the world cannot pay for many of our products, but we shall have to find some way of financing purchases for them. When we go abroad to sell a product such as potash we should use the combined brains of a number of industries. From the point of view of being able to sell pork to China, have we considered the possibility of renovating old steel drums from the oil industry, which are no longer capable of carrying high naphtha products but are still capable of being used for the shipment of products like canned meat and fruit? We might line the barrels with an inch or two of petroleum wax. Backward countries do not yet have electricity and in a place like China the people could convert the barrel linings into candles. We could ship our meat in steel, aluminum or plastic pails. The peasant people of Asia could use the pails for irrigation purposes or for household needs and thus we could sell them two products in one.

I know that the price of pork or any other meat or fruit product when shipped across the Pacific is likely to be prohibitive unless we employ all our know-how in providing proper containers for the food when it is being sent there. By this means we will be able to help them increase their standard of living and thus help them get on their feet so that they can afford the high standard of living to which they are as much entitled as we are.

The former administration took up this matter very seriously. The idea was not received with deaf ears on the part of the government headed by the then prime minister and so ably assisted by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Hees) in the Department of Trade and Commerce. There was a deficit of several hundred million dollars in 1956-57 but when we left office we had a favourable trade balance of $1,300 million. I note with some horror that we have now slipped back to a position even worse than that in which we were in 1957. The estimated trade deficit this year is approximately $2 billion, or three times as high as it was in 1957. This is not wholly the fault of any one department.

I suggest that in 1967 at least those people who are making money and are able to balance their own budgets should think about staying at home and spending here the $800 million or $900 million currently being spent abroad. Let us make our centennial year a successful one financially. We can do this simply by staying home and spending this $1 billion here. This would cut our deficit in half. In order to buy Canada back let us buy Canadian products. I shall not speak of tax incentives for they are there already. The Canadian people should wake up to the fact that it pays to invest in Canada. If they would do this and take advantage of the existing tax incentives we could reduce the unfavourable balance of trade still further.

I suggest to the Department of Trade and Commerce that as a publicity stunt they might mark clearly all Canadian products which are produced by Canadian owned corporations. The percentage to which these companies are Canadian owned could be marked on the cans containing their products. This could be done by using coloured bands. By the size of the maple leaf and the colour of the band on the can, one would know the extent to which the product was Canadian when buying it in a store. In the affluent society of which we are so proud we should make sure that a very large percentage of the money we spend remains at home. A sensible way in which to buy Canada back is to buy things made in Canada. We cannot afford to make things in Canada unless we buy them when they are made.

I think that the subject of taxation is a good place to bring up a favourite suggestion of mine again. I have in mind the problem of double taxation. In the somewhat tax free province of Alberta one pays as much as $600 or $700 a year in taxes on an ordinary six-room house. There is no exemption whatsoever from income tax in this respect. In the United States mortgage payments are deleted from taxable income. I suggest that we might take a lead in this regard from our great neighbour to the south and do away with what I call double taxation as applied to householders. The whole burden of education is carried by those who own their own homes or, worse still, by those who are trying to buy their own homes under one of the existing mortgage plans. This is unfair. It is inequitable and actually it makes the purchase of a new home at present prices almost an impossibility for the average wage earner.

I think that centennial year would be a good time to set up the Indian claims commission. This is something which has been promised ever since the treaties were signed. If the Indian claims commission were established, the Indians would have a forum in which to air their complaints. The Indian claims commission could decide once and for all whether or not we have kept the treaties with the Indians. Perhaps it would be able to determine whether or not the twentieth century interpretation we have made of these treaties is an adequate one.

Those who are our first citizens should be given their proper place in this country. I notice with some satisfaction that the efforts made particularly by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Fane) have borne fruit. The Indian reserves at Saddle Lake and Goodfish Lake are getting electrification. They have waited a long time for this. I congratulate anyone who has had anything to do with this. In this twentieth century the Indian people are just as entitled to the amenities of life as we are. Now they will be able to wash their clothes, light their homes, study and enjoy themselves.

For too long a time the Indian affairs branch has taken a paternalistic attitude toward the Indian people. I suggest that the sooner we fill the Indian affairs branch either with Indians or with persons who have a first hand working knowledge of Indian problems, the sooner we will be able to improve the lot of the Indians. There is no point in educating one Indian and then sending him back to the reserve to become submerged in the hopeless task of trying to raise the standard of living of the people there. We must direct a mass attack on the Indian problem. As I say, we will accomplish nothing until the initiative which the Indians have to a marked degree is encouraged to the point where they can be put in charge of their own affairs. I have seen drafts of one or two of the bills to set up this commission. One of the proposals is that the Indian appointees on the commission could be removed at the whim of the government. In one case it was suggested that this could be done by a joint order by the two houses of parliament. I do not care from whom the orders come. The Indian appointees to the commission must be responsible to the Indian people and to the Indian people alone; otherwise it would be better not to have any such commission because it would not be respected by the Indians. It would be something which would drive the Indians farther back rather than bring them ahead.

I am pleased also that something is being done about housing. There is no point in building shells of houses on Indian reserves and then expecting the Indians to finish them. The houses which are built for the Indians should be ready to be occupied. They should be equipped with proper doors, windows, heating equipment and everything else that is necessary so they can live in the extreme climate in which most Indian people live. It is absolutely a waste of time and money to build a shell of a house in which these people have to sleep on the floor. If these houses are not warm and comfortable the Indian people will not sleep in them. They will move back to the tent which has been the Indian's home for generations and they will keep themselves warm in the manner to which they have become accustomed for thousands of years. They will live in these tents and rip the lath off the walls and the shingles off the roofs of the houses so they will have firewood to keep themselves warm. Where the Indian people have had a chance they have measured up in every way to their brethren of European origin.

We have just passed the omnibus transportation bill which portends strange things for the future of railroading. Let me refer again to the vision of the former administration which built lines such as the one to Thompson in northern Manitoba and the Pine Point line in the Northwest Territories. I never thought this was a gamble, as did some others, and it has paid off magnificently. Instead of busily considering where lines should be abandoned we should be considering where new ones may be built.

I have in my hand a map indicating proposed rail line abandonments. One need only look at it to see the great need for railway facilities in certain areas. Let me remind the house again of a promise made by many governments to the people of northwestern Saskatchewan and northeastern Alberta. They were promised a rational railroad system in order to move their agricultural products to market and bring in farm machinery, building materials and fuel. They feel, and rightly so, that they are paying exorbitant freight rates.

As an example of the situation let me refer specifically to the 38-mile gap in the rail line between Lindbergh, Heinsburg and Frenchman Butte, Saskatchewan. If that gap were filled 328 miles could be cut from the round trip between Heinsburg and Saskatoon. I brought this situation to the attention of the house before I had been a member of parliament for a month. I brought it to the attention of the railway experts in Montreal. They indicated they had no intention of completing this line unless I could show them how they could make money. They suggested that money could not be made because there was not a sufficient amount of freight to be hauled. They also indicated to me that they received additional money because of hauling freight the extra 328 miles. By the closing of this gap the farmers of that area would save a great deal of money. It would also effect a saving because boxcars would no longer have to be shunted in Edmonton at a cost of $11.70 per car. The railway indicated that was the cost some nine years ago and I am sure it has not gone down since.

The former administration took a step in the right direction a few years ago when the two rail lines to which I referred were built. That was an experiment which paid dividends. I see no reason why the building of other new lines would not have the same result.

There are tremendous deposits of natural resources in that area. Several years ago I indicated to hon. members that there is enough salt under the prairie lands around Lindbergh to last the human race for 1,000 years. I am glad to see that no one in the house is roaring with laughter over that statement. There is a vast vein of salt, of the table variety, in that area. It is believed to be from 88 to 250 feet deep and stretches for 350 miles. It encompasses an area about the size of Ireland.

In the area where the Peace river runs through the south end of Wood Buffalo Park there is a cliff of solid crystal gypsum. It is 100 feet high and stretches for approximately 17 miles. No one knows how far back it reaches. No one is particularly worried because there is enough gypsum in that cliff to fulfil construction requirements to rebuild every building in the world without even scratching the surface of that deposit.

In spite of all these natural resources our railway experts sit in Montreal biting their nails trying to balance their budgets. I suggest they cannot balance their budgets because they are lacking vision, guts and imagination. These experts should have some of the courage and imagination which brought people to these areas of our country. These people still hope that some day we in Ottawa will wake up and fulfil the promises made when they moved to these areas.

Nine years ago I promised these people that if the government would not complete this 38 miles of line I would go out and build it myself. I hope I will not have to leave this place to do so but I am a man of my word and I intend to hammer at the government until something is done. If the present government will not keep this promise I shall work harder to put the previous administration back in office. I am sure such an administration would do something about this situation rather than spending its time with the railway experts worrying about which lines should be abandoned.

Over a period of six years I have been talking about building a dirt road to McMurray. Both the provincial and federal authorities have said that the road cannot be built economically because there are not enough people in the area. However, when Sun Oil of Pennsylvania decided to develop the tar sands and spent $69 million on a pilot plant someone decided there were resources in northeastern Alberta and built a road.

The young people of this country are beginning to think we in Ottawa are nothing but a bunch of old fogies who spend our time fighting each other, looking for scandal and running each other down. They say that if they were in Ottawa things would be different. We are busily training these young people to think. It is a dangerous experiment if we think we can sit here and keep them out of public life. The way the red guard is acting in China is nothing compared to what will happen here unless we smarten up, and I do not think our young people will give us 20 years to do so. They want action and they want it now. If we are to provide free education we had better provide also work and opportunity. If we do so I am sure we will not have to worry about a brain drain to the south. Great opportunities exist in Canada but our young people are not getting the advantage of them. This is our fault. It is the fault of those who were frightened by the depression as a result of which they lost their vision. If that vision has not been lost it has been seriously dimmed in the last five years.

I was proud to be a member of parliament nine years ago and I am still proud to be a member of parliament but, like my friend who just spoke, I want to know when we are going to give up the dull habit of arguing and go back to the old habit of acting. I think that 1967 would be a very good year in which to act at least as much as we talk. If the government is short of ideas, I and others on this side of the house have them. If the administration is tired and has lost its vision, let it not worry. Hon. members on the government side said ten years ago that we could not form a government which would accomplish things, but we did.

I close my remarks by reminding the house again of the three figures which I think are significant. I believe they should be a warning to the present administration. If in five short years we were able to change a deficit of $700 million a year to a figure of $1,300 million on the blue side of the ledger, we can do it again. I admit that the job will be three times as hard because now we are $2 billion behind. However, we on this side of the house have men who know how to do it and who have had some practice. They did it once and they can do it again.

I do not necessarily want to wait for an election. Perhaps it will not come for a year or two because the government is being well supported by hon. members on my extreme left. So I beg the present government to start acting now. If it is too tired, we are willing to take over any time; if it is not too tired then let us have a few results. If it does not have ideas itself, let it ask us. Let us have a parliamentary committee working with dedication, and I do not mean the kind of dedication which is found in history books; I mean the kind of dedication which ends up on the blue side of the ledger in the bank. This is the only kind that has any real appeal for the people of this nation who are becoming very restless indeed.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, the mini-budget debate we are continuing today proves to us once again that the government is unable to administer the country adequately and democratically, according to the wishes of Canadian taxpayers; otherwise, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) would not have had to bring down this so-called baby budget which will be fraught with consequences for the Canadian taxpayers.

The Minister of Finance does not seem to realize that the heaviest burden of the government rests on his own shoulders; as a matter of fact, he has to face problems which are all the more serious as he is attempting to carry out his duties in a modern age with antiquated, obsolete and out-of-date methods.

The government is aware that older people, for instance, need more income in order to meet the steadily increasing cost of living. After numerous pressures from all quarters, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) agreed to increase the old age security pension, but one soon realizes that the purchasing power of those people will in no way increase when all the taxes announced in the present budget will come into effect. As a matter of fact, not only will the old people not get more goods and services and not be paid more than before but the purchasing power of all the others will also be reduced because of higher taxes.

The minister and his parliamentary secretary have tried and are still trying to convince the people that in order to make some under-privileged classes a little more affluent, a little more must be taken away from the workers, those who toil, those who transform and develop the country. That is unfair, in my opinion, because I know that what the older people were asking for was economic freedom, the freedom to choose the things they need to live decently the remainder of their lives.

We are capable of supplying the elderly with all they need without depriving any member of the Canadian community. The old people mainly require food, lodging, clothing, medical care and recreation, goods and services which we can produce and supply in abundance without depriving anyone.

Why then, must we deprive younger men and women through taxes in order to provide for our senior citizens? Why not simply lay down an up-to-date accounting system that would truly reflect the actual wealth of the country? Earthly goods were created to meet the physical needs of the whole human race, not only for the few or for certain classes of people. All need not enjoy the same degree of prosperity but all should at least be able to satisfy their basic needs. The means and methods of acquiring wealth are legitimate inasmuch as they are organized to this end. They are evil or distorted to the extent that they defeat this purpose. We know that Providence has placed upon this earth, especially perhaps in Canada, in one form or another, all that is required, with man's co-operation and, naturally, with an adequate social structure, to meet the essential needs of all human beings. The old people as well as Canadian families still have unsatisfied needs. As a result of the constant increase in the cost of living, the average income is inadequate to provide a decent standard of living.

And what about those with a low income or no income at all? They are dispossessed in the midst of plenty; they are dispossessed in the midst of undeveloped natural resources which we fail to transform into natural wealth.

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the government can no longer govern according to the wishes of our society. But we are organized into a society and every well-organized society exists for the benefit and welfare of its members.

But because of an out-dated, obsolete economic system, many members of our society do not benefit from the advantages our Canadian society has to offer. Can we blame our methods of production, our industrialists, our farmers, our workers, our transport services, our teaching and health services? Not at all.

The whole problem lies in our distribution system. Available goods and services do not meet the needs of the members of our society. That is why everything goes wrong. That is why there is so much discontent and so many strikes of all kinds. That is the reason for so much undue hardship and for the imbalance in our distribution system. It does not serve its purpose.

Our economic system is not social, it does not allow each and every member of our society to enjoy the earthly goods provided for their welfare. According to the very words of His Holiness Pope Pius XI:

> For then only will the economic and social organism be soundly established and attain its end when it secures for all and each those goods which the wealth and resources of nature, technical achievements and the social organization of economic affairs can give.

And he adds, still in the encyclical Quadragesimo Anno:

> These goods should be sufficient to supply all needs and an honest livelihood and to uplift men to that higher level of prosperity and culture which, provided it be used with prudence, is not only no hindrance but is of singular help to virtue.

Then, it is recognized everywhere—at least I hope so—that production will attain its end only when it reaches the consumers, all consumers, and we must not stop or slow down the production of goods and services until all the needs of every member of our Canadian community have been met.

If the government keeps on operating through loans at the pace we have known since confederation, we shall never be able to celebrate our second centennial. If the government continues to tax the small wage earners, the poor, the have-nots, in order to give them a hand-out in social welfare from time to time, before 25 years we will live under a system of state socialism.

And to all those who would like to depend upon the state to fully ensure their wealth or their goods, I say that they would be well advised to consider the fate of our Indians in Canada. When we see how the government is managing the assets of the Indians, we are not inclined to try it out.

The system of private property and free enterprise has been able to supply goods and services in abundance. It is our responsibility to see that those goods and services attain their end, consumption.

To do that, it is necessary to have a modern economic system which meets the needs of our time. If our present economic system leads us to constant indebtedness, to the loss of private property, let us change it and follow the monetary system based upon the real value of our production and our productivity.

Let us adopt a monetary system that will allow a profit on production, although the ultimate objective of production should not be profit, but the fulfilment of man's needs. Profit is a tried and true incentive. Removal of this incentive altogether would jeopardize the output and would thus hurt consumers by forcing hardship upon them.

We need a system capable of maintaining the profit incentive and ensuring, at the same time, an adequate sharing and distribution of goods and services produced, thus serving the interests of both producers and consumers.

Only the Créditistes are proposing such a system and have been doing so for a long time. As a matter of fact, it was submitted to this house when I was only 10 years old. At that time, right in the middle of the depression, the social credit proposals were laughed at and Canadians were starving from coast to coast in the midst of plenty. People were starving while food was destroyed and production stopped. The Créditistes continued to advocate their monetary system during the war; however, our war effort was not financed by social credit but by social debit, so that at the end of the war we had a debt of $18 billion.

The Créditistes continued to ask for a monetary reform. They were still laughed at. But although this is peacetime, we have a deficit of $27 billion. And that is not the end. The minister keeps on borrowing more, mortgaging our future even more. He keeps on taxing Canadians, dispossessing them even more to the benefit of high finance.

My colleague the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) puts it very well when he says:

> The big ones grow bigger in smaller number and the small ones get smaller in larger number.

That is the result of a debt money system, a false system.

Money and credit being a title and a call to production of any kind, the total amount of money and credit to be applied to production must be truly proportional to the volume and price of the total production realized or realizable on demand. That is why Social Credit feels that money is based on all the production existing or immediately possible, meeting the needs of the consumers and not on the selfish motives of some profiteers, such as the private controllers of money and credit.

Since, in modern society, you can have goods and services only if you can pay for them, then all members of society must have a minimum amount of money in order to get a minimum amount of goods and services.

Nowadays, money is obtained through salaries, dividends, social security measures and inheritances. This distribution does not, as we know, affect all members of society; therefore, another way must be found to guarantee each member of society a share of the goods offered.

This is one of the reasons why the Créditistes advocate the payment of periodical dividends to everyone from the time he is born until he dies. Many problems, today more than ever, stem from the fact that salaries do not give workers the purchasing power necessary to buy the necessities of life for their families and themselves, and this brings about repeated demands for higher wages and a whole series of strikes. But each wage increase is accompanied by an increase in the price of goods, new taxes on production and sales, which are added to the price of the goods. Wages, therefore, can never keep up with prices and, as a result, we always have this inadequate purchasing power. The Social Credit answer to this problem is the national dividend, which would increase purchasing power without affecting production costs, and the compensated discount which lowers prices without prejudice to manufacturers. This would supplement the income of consumers and enable them to purchase the goods they want.

With modern production techniques, automation as we call it, we no longer have to fear a dearth of goods, unless we really want it that way. It is becoming easier all the time to produce with less work, and this production must be brought within the reach of consumers. The only way to do this is to give them adequate purchasing power.

Economists, businessmen and labour leaders now admit what we have been advocating all along. Mr. Robert Theobald, a British economist with the United States government, says that we must separate the concept of work from that of remuneration, adding that each citizen should, as a matter of admitted and constitutional right, be assured of a minimum income during his whole life.

I should like to quote Mr. J. Fenwick, vice-president of O.F.L., who said:

> Automation endangers our traditional concept of a salary as remuneration for work. A new means to distribute purchasing power must be found.

May I also quote Mr. Gilles Endicott, director of research with the United Packinghouse Workers Union. According to Mr. Endicott:

> Automation requires that we change our fundamental notion that wages must correspond to the work accomplished. However revolutionary this may seem, and even though it is contrary to the Calvinist moral code, we have accepted the principle that income should not necessarily be related to work.

Such statements confirm what we have been advocating. Since production is made easier through automation, we should adjust our financial system to achieve maximum production and consumption. We cannot do more and we should not do less.

We cannot and should not shirk progress which frees man from labour. There is obviously only one solution to the problem. If we want to keep the machines, we must develop a method whereby workers will be paid for the work performed in their stead by machines.

Income should be determined by the amount of wealth produced and not by the amount of work done. To distribute unpurchased wealth, we advocate the establishment of a national dividend, so that this wealth surplus can be distributed.

The establishment of a national dividend is not only feasible, it is justified from a moral point of view: it is required by justice. The increase in wealth resulting from a common effort represents collective and not individual earnings. This increased value due to a collective effort through automation and development of nuclear energy today fills up our store-houses to full capacity and it is the result of individual independence and skilfulness.

In the remote past, man worked alone, he was independent of his fellow-men, but he did not produce much. When he came out of his isolation, his production increased, but at the expense of his independence. When he tilled his own land, raised his own sheep, weaved his own fabric, he was a workingman independent of his fellow-men. But when he was torn away from his land to be assigned to special tasks and closely connected with his fellow-men, he had to give up his independence. He took to shoemaking perhaps, but others were weaving for him, tilling the soil for him. He no longer could be self-sustaining. His production capacity increased but he was just as poor as before. All he was getting—I am referring to workers in general—was a living allowance. The first theft was perpetrated at that time.

However, when the advent of the machine age reduced his work to the 20th part of a pair of shoes, he lost both his ability as a craftsman and his self-reliance. All he kept was his livelihood. Although his production kept on increasing afterwards, his livelihood, and nothing more, remained his sole reward. Uneasiness increased along with theft. And finally, when machines reached a state of perfection, and automation made its appearance, man had lost everything: independence, manual skill and his livelihood. He had to accept hand-outs and the theft was consummated.

This surplus of wealth is a collective inheritance after all. It does not belong to anybody in particular. It results from life in society and it depends upon it.

The national dividend is an alternative to sabotage. It eliminates vexation, disarms the social rebel and brings class struggle to an end. It provides encouragement to collective work and fosters social fellowship. It enables us to foresee a huge growth of our basic liberties for the future, crowning political liberty with labour liberty.

The dividend makes a free man of every individual. It frees the manufacturer of his chains by bringing him customers, by sparing him the alternative of official control which threatens him and subordinates the superior mind to the domination of an inferior mind. It does away with the obstacles to innovation in techniques and equipment, and encourages the invention of organization.

The national dividend gives freedom as well as security. It spares us the danger of an acquisitive society.

Mr. Speaker, to allow the distribution of our wealth, our monetary system must of necessity be reformed, and the reform must go much further than substituting nickel coins for silver coins.

Thanks to a distributive rather than restrictive economy, the position of minister of trade and commerce will be far more pleasant, since it will enable the government to guarantee every citizen's security without tampering with anyone's freedom.

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I am prompted to enter the budget debate because of the remarks earlier this afternoon by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Fairweather), who dealt with the rules of the House of Commons and some of the efforts that the house has been making to reform those rules.

The budget debate provides us with wide scope, perhaps almost as wide as that provided by the speech from the throne. It is also fitting that at this time a member of the House of Commons should choose to discuss the rules of the house, for it is only by amending our rules and modernizing them to meet the needs of a modern world that we are able to examine the accounts of government and the taxes of the people which are applied to pay those accounts. Therefore a discussion this afternoon of the rules, which was so ably introduced by the hon. member for Royal, is very fitting and I should like to add some suggestions of my own, if I may.

In the course of his remarks the hon. member made some very significant comments about the rules of the early days and the amendments which were made to the British rules at the time of the Irish troubles and the Parnell incident. At the risk of repeating some of the points he made on that subject I wish to emphasize what is an important phase in the history of the rules of our House of Commons as well as the British rules from which our rules have evolved.

In 1867 we in this house inherited the rules of the British House of Commons of that day. They were rules which were fitted to the easy pace of the Victorian era and at that time served them very well. These rules, with some amendments, became the rules of the Canadian House of Commons. The British then moved from 1867 into the era of the Irish troubles, during which the British House of Commons was brought to its knees by filibustering and a performance which verged upon bloodshed on the floor of the house. At that time men behaved in a way in which men had perhaps never before behaved in an English speaking House of Commons.

When one reads the record of the Parnell incident and the assault which was made on the rules of the house of that day, one finds that the debates certainly exceeded in violence the pipe line debate which took place in this house, and the British House of Commons was shocked into reforming its own rules, particularly in respect of closure and the guillotine, reforms which went far beyond those that we have come to adopt and apply in this house, even to this day. Following the reformation of the rules in Great Britain the Commonwealth of Australia inherited the post-Irish trouble rules adopted by the British House of Commons. So there were in the old dominions three sets of rules which governed our respective Houses of Commons. In Canada we had the old pre-Parnell rules, the rules of the leisurely Victorian period. Then there were the rules of the British house, much more modernized as a result of those incidents and speeding up the work of the House of Commons of that day. Then there were the Australian rules which over a period have been considerably revised and are patterned along very advanced and modernistic lines compared with the other legislatures of the old dominions.

In looking at the old dominions today, Mr. Speaker, we in Canada find ourselves the custodians of the most antique set of rules of all. Therefore any discussion of how to improve these rules in a way which will assist us to understand such problems as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) brings before the house in the presentation of his budget and to deal with the matter of supply is indeed appropriate at this time.

We cannot consider any debate on the budget without also considering what the budget is to do. The purpose of the budget is to raise taxes from the people in order to meet the government's financial needs or its supply. Supply comprises a great deal of the subject matter of debate on this floor, and much of the work of committees. It entails an increasing task for all committees of the house. They measure what the government has done in all its departments, review their proposed spending and make an intelligent assessment of it.

We are governed by three principles in handling the money which the government receives from taxation of the people. Those three principles are, first, that no tax shall be levied without the approval of parliament. This is the purpose of a budget and the budget resolutions. Second, money cannot be spent without the approval of parliament. This, of course, is done through the estimates which are brought down early in the year and presented to us to be reviewed. Third, all accounts of the government shall be audited by parliament's own auditor and his report must be tabled in the house. We have a body known as the public accounts committee to which those accounts are referred. The report of the Auditor General reveals how many horses are on the payroll, how many streams flow through the printing bureau, or how many contracts have cost two or three times what they should have cost when the tenders were let.

Those are the three ways in which we in the House of Commons control income and outgo. I want to discuss each of them in the light of amendments to the rules and the provisional rules under which we now operate. This year we have an interim or second budget in the course of a single year. I recall some remarks of the minister not long ago when he said that perhaps we should be reviewing the fiscal needs of the country more frequently than once a year and should be examining two budgets a year. In reviewing the current budget one wonders whether we should not adopt the practice of having a major budget in the spring of the year to review the economic picture and an adjusting budget six months later to make those adjustments deemed necessary in the light of the economic conditions of that time. In Canada we are beginning to control our economic affairs on a basis which has taken many of the peaks and hollows out of the economy and is providing a much steadier flow to the economy than we formerly had. We should perhaps be looking to a House of Commons before which two budgets are presented, a major budget and an adjusting budget after a six-month interval.

I wonder whether more could not be done to test tax ideas in committees of the House of Commons. For the most part the budget remains a mystery to us. We sit here listening to the minister uttering the preliminary paragraph of his budget and wonder what he will reveal to us as a tax pattern. The budget has always been a carefully guarded secret and it is always difficult for a backbencher to know what form taxation will take. The backbencher feels he may not have much to do with taxation. He must wait to learn what is in the budget and the minister's budget resolutions. I wonder, for instance, whether it would not be possible to present white papers from time to time on the subject of taxation setting forth, let us say, two or three systems of taxation. Such a white paper could be examined by the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs or by a special committee of the house.

When the long-awaited Carter report comes before us I think we should have an opportunity to review a number of alternative methods of taxation. Members of the House of Commons not sitting on the government or treasury benches should have opportunities to make recommendations to the government and to the Minister of Finance in respect of tax systems. I think that we in the House of Commons lack a regular opportunity to make recommendations to the Minister of Finance in respect of tax systems.

With regard to the estimates, we have improved our committee system by forming 21 standing committees roughly paralleling each department of government to give the estimates that detailed examination which we attempt to give them on the floor of the house, but always fail to do so. Over the course of the last year there were more than 300 committee meetings for the examination of estimates, more time than has ever before been devoted to this purpose. Hon. members had opportunities to ask detailed questions of senior officials of the civil service in respect of their own regions and constituencies. It was a feast of examination. It was good not only for hon. members, who had an opportunity never available on the floor of the house to examine the estimates in detail and to understand problems, but also for the civil service. It had a salutary effect on that body whose officials had an opportunity to come before many of these committees and present their ideas to members of the house. These officials took pride in what they were attempting to do and in the services of their departments. It was a worthwhile experience for all of us, one which members on both sides of the house would agree was desirable and not one from which we would wish to retreat.

The hon. member for Royal said that he felt there were too many standing committees and that their number should be reduced to 15, I believe. I am not sure that a reduction of the number of standing committees from 21 to 15 would be an improvement. It might be wiser to wait a little longer to test the present system and provide an opportunity to fit it into our method of working before deciding to reduce the number of committees to 15 or to some other number. After all, the 21 standing committees roughly parallel each department of government. As they stand they provide an effective means of examining estimates in detail, as we found last year. I suggest that we exercise a little caution before deciding we want fewer committees or more committees. We cannot judge precisely at this time whether 21 committees do or do not satisfy our needs.

I think it would be better to have smaller quorums, but even this is a difficult question to decide. We are a multi-party house and as nearly as possible proportionate representation on committees is given to all parties in the house. At the same time I think the introduction of the rule permitting members generally to go to committees and ask questions about matters in which they are interested has done much to provide opportunities for examination of the estimates. As long as this rule exists perhaps it is possible to reduce quorums to nine, let us say.

With respect to the examination of estimates I wonder what we are going to do about a situation such as developed in the broadcasting committee. It began examination of the C.B.C. estimates last year, got stuck on one estimate and became involved in a special investigation that is still continuing. I think we will have to come to some kind of subcommittee system in which we are able to split the work of a committee when we find that some item of the estimates is expanding into a special investigation. We can never complete examination of the estimates and return them to parliament if committees are held up by a matter such as that involving the C.B.C. which was presented to the committee reviewing its estimates last year. Therefore I believe we are ready for experimentation in the field of striking subcommittees from time to time to examine some aspects of estimates as they move through committees.

In recent months a number of committees have travelled from place to place, and I think they have done so with very great effect. In its examination of a bill the transportation committee travelled from coast to coast. The agricultural committee is at the present time travelling to western Canada particularly to investigate matters concerning the handling of grain. I can think of nothing more useful to members of the House of Commons examining estimates or bills in committee than to travel to those places where they can see what is going on so they can assess the picture for themselves—and come back to the house better equipped to make recommendations. I believe it is also very useful for the people of Canada to see their members of parliament in the field from time to time taking a look at Canada and getting to understand the picture on the ground.

I know that in my province the M.L.A.'s have from time to time travelled from the capital city to various parts of the province, even to hold cabinet meetings. This has had a great effect upon the people of the area who like to see and meet their legislators and show them on the ground what is going on. I do not think this house should be inhibited by the cost of such travel or by such words as "junketing" and so on. I believe the people of Canada are glad to see their members of parliament coming to them on serious missions and taking up committee tasks in the field. I think this is an area we can explore and which we should expand.

There has been considerable discussion in regard to the appointing of staffs for committees over and above the clerical staff with which committees are now supplied through the committees branch. I refer to consultants, specialists, lawyers, accountants, and so on. I think we could become involved in enormous cost if specialists were attached to each standing committee and became entrenched as a kind of growing bureaucracy within the House of Commons. I would be much more favourable to a system which enabled committees to utilize experts for a short time while dealing with a particular topic, so that when a particular subject was before them for discussion they could employ a chartered accountant, an engineer, a lawyer, a university professor or a person of that kind who knew the subject and could be useful to them over the span of the discussion. I view with caution ideas to enlarge upon what seems to be a growing bureaucracy of people who spend a good deal of their time chatting amongst themselves and drinking coffee.

In the recent meetings of the transportation committee we found the services of an expert in this field a very useful addition to the work of the committee. Members from both sides of the house made use of the knowledge of that gentleman and referred to him difficult matters with which they wanted to deal in the examination of witnesses. I would like to see this process expanded within the committees of the house.

I wish to refer briefly to the public accounts committee, for here is a committee of the house that is already set up with a staff of specialists working under the Auditor General. It is one committee that has a staff capable of researching the accounts of the whole of the government service of Canada and of reporting to that committee. I think the public accounts committee might expand upon this work by undertaking some research into the problem of analysing how members of parliament can best go about the business of overseeing the work of government and departments.

When I look at the estimates and open up that great big sheet which sets forth some 30 or 40 standard objects, as they are called, into which accounts are broken down, I realize how primitive are the tools available to a backbencher to examine the accounts of government in an intelligent way. I can look at that chart and it tells me how much the Secretary of State spent on telephone calls or postage. In my opinion that is not a very useful item when I come to examine the accounts of government. It is the kind of item that one might dig out of the archives when this parliament has long since disappeared and look at with great curiosity, but it is certainly not useful to us in the examination of the public accounts. I wonder whether we should not perhaps be working through the Auditor General and the public accounts committee in devising better ways of examining the estimates that are presented to us so that we as members of parliament may become more efficient in our task of examining estimates in committee.

I now wish to say a few words about the proliferation of committees of the house. I believe we tend to proliferate committees in two ways. First of all, not only do we have 21 standing committees, which I believe are doing a very effective job, but we continue to appoint a number of committees to do special things. We have special committees appointed by the House of Commons and we have joint committees appointed by the House of Commons and the Senate, so that we have committees far beyond 21 in number. I would be much in favour of such special work being referred to the existing standing committees of the house so that they would become long-standing and expert committees capable of handling work under a method with which their members had become familiar. I would like to see less of the setting up and knocking down of ad hoc committees to attend to matters as they arise.

The other way in which we proliferate committees is by failing to take out of circulation committees which have been doing a job for a long time, have virtually completed their work, and should be retired from the field at times when we are introducing other committees into the stream to carry out other jobs. We cannot expect to operate our committee system efficiently if committees are not retired from the field when additional committees are appointed.

This is why we have a situation such as we have today. In the current week there are 47 committee meetings, each lasting an hour and a half, making a total of about 70½ hours of work for the week. By comparison the House of Commons itself puts in 34½ hours work a week. At present there are twice as many hours of committee meetings as there are hours of meetings of the house.

One can imagine the pressure of these hours of work not only on the members who attend committees but on the inadequate numbers of staff who have to cope with such a situation. As we advance into each session and place this load upon our services the services gradually break down. The time taken for committee reports to flow back from the printer becomes longer and longer, our capability of getting translation done becomes less and less, and we compound our problems as we go along.

Having created a system of committees which is doing an effective job of examining the estimates, we now have a long way to go to learn how to control the services, to program the committees, to refer matters to committees, and to retire matters from committees when those committees are reaching the end of their work. If we learn to do this adequately we shall be at the point where we can build for ourselves a highly effective committee system which will benefit the backbencher, who can become more capable in examining the work of government, and will benefit the government and the civil service which can call upon the effective work of backbenchers in committees.

I listened with interest to the remarks made by the hon. member for Royal about the British system. Last September I visited London and had an opportunity to talk to some people about the British system. One of the interesting things there is that there is no publicity attached to their committees. Meetings are held mainly in camera and nothing is said or known about the committees until they emerge with their report.

Such a system would have a very deadening effect upon committees in this house because I think every member of parliament likes his constituents and the press to know what is going on in committees. I think it enlivens the work of the House of Commons to have the press attend committees every day and comment on the work of committees as it proceeds. We certainly would not be prepared to accept the British system under which the work is carried on behind closed doors until a report is released and a cold piece of news tabled in the house.

After talking to some of the people over there I left with the impression that we were making advances more quickly than they were, particularly in the field of committee work. I do not think we should be looking around us to see whether we can emulate the British system. Rather, we should be looking at our own system and carefully examining it to see whether or not we can improve upon what already is an improving system which has done so much good over the course of the last year.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on this unnecessary budget which we are debating today and will continue to debate for some days. It was supposed to be necessary in order to deal with the old age pension supplementary payments. Let us examine that argument.

At the time the legislation was passed there was over $300 million in the old age security fund. The legislation itself will not take effect until March 1. The main budget will be brought down in April or shortly afterwards, and thus it could have dealt with this matter. I realize it is only human to err, but to me this is an odd type of error. Not only does this budget take up the time of the house but it reflects on our senior citizens. It over-emphasizes the pittance we are going to give them, even with a means test. The fact that the money is being raised by taxation is going to be broadcast across Canada in a six-day budget debate, and this at the very least must be embarrassing to our senior citizens.

We in the official opposition believed that our senior citizens should have been given the increase without a means test as a matter of right and that further taxation was unnecessary. In reply the government has stated that any social service must be paid for by the taxpayer. I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, that all other services provided by the government also have to be paid for by the taxpayer, and only when it came to the question of an additional payment to our senior citizens was it said that we would have to have a budget.

By this budget taxes are raised to provide a supplementary allowance ranging from $1 to $30 a month to our senior citizens. The old age security tax is increased from $120 to a maximum of $240, which should have been sufficient to cover the cost of the supplementary payments if it needed covering. I see no good excuse for imposing an additional 1 per cent sales tax which will probably mean an additional 2 per cent at the retail level. This hits the average fellow with a family with the same impact as it hits a millionaire. It also hits the old age pensioner whom it is supposed to help.

Let us take a look at what we are doing with regard to the old age pensioner. If he has an income or is able to earn $50 a month gardening or at some other work, the government taxes him $25 a month and in return pays him $5, but only after he has filled out an application form. The filling out of the form will be done with some difficulty in many cases and the form may even get the pensioner into difficulty if it is not completed accurately. In other words, Mr. Speaker, for every $2 of private income that he earns up to $60 a month, he sacrifices $1 of his $30 a month supplementary old age pension payment.

But that is not all, Mr. Speaker. If he is under 70 years of age he also has to fill out an income tax form and pay income tax if he is liable. But even that is not the end of it. In one of the provinces, and perhaps in others, he has to make a payment for medicare. In the province of Ontario, from which I come, he has to fork up $30, which is a whole month's supplementary payment. How much is taken from him? Well, there is income tax and medicare. Does he lose his $30 a month supplement for the full 12 months? Is it taken from him if he has to live in a hospital or home where he gets custodial care? How about his hospitalization insurance? Then, of course, there are the increased taxes. As I have already said, there is an increase of 2 per cent on articles which are subject to the sales tax. I will stop there.

I think this indicates how our senior citizens are being treated in a country where at all levels of taxation governments take $18 billion from the people. The gross national product is around $52 billion. This means in round figures that we are taking from the people in taxes approximately one third of the gross national product.

Let us consider the municipal field. Here over 50 per cent of the taxes go for education. I contend that not a dollar of municipal taxes should go for education. This is something which is national in character and is necessary for our very survival economically. Therefore I contend that education should not be included in municipal taxation at all. The old age pensioner pays those taxes if he has property. If he does not pay the taxes, he pays the increased rent which is necessary to help the owner pay them.

I agree that municipal taxes should be levied to provide services such as sewage, utilities, police, roads, parks, and so on, and that they should be a deductible item for income tax purposes up to an amount of $500. Otherwise taxes are heaped on taxes resulting in double taxation. Never in the history of this country have we had so many payroll deductions. The other day a man came to see me. He works in a factory. He told me that there are seven deductions from his pay cheque. This man is the father in a family of four. He came to me because he was in difficulty. He was not receiving enough money to get by. He was receiving enough to provide the necessary food, shelter and clothing for his wife, his family and himself. You should have seen the clothing he was wearing. I think we have become a little case-hardened. We do not seem to realize in some of these cases that we are leaving these people with just enough money to barely get by. In other words, we are rapidly making them pawns of the state. We must accept the responsibility then for looking after them.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it was necessary to increase taxes. I should like to place on the record a little item concerning the waste of tax dollars. It is taken from an article in the Globe and Mail of February 14, 1966, dealing with a speech made by the Chairman of the Ontario Economic Council. It reads in part as follows:

> To back his statement that the governments do not seem to be concerned with the amount of sheer waste in government programs, he cited the report of the federal Auditor General that governmental overhead was up 20 per cent in the past three years. More than $7,000,000 went down the drain for bomb toss computers we didn't plan to use, and inadequate planning for low-level radar installations led to extra costs of $3,500,000, he said.
> The C.B.C. paid out $450,000 to its employees for work not performed and is paying out hundreds of thousands of dollars in program content subsidies for private commercial T.V. programs. More than $500,000 alone is involved in one subsidy.
> "Do we worry about this sort of thing?" he asked. "We are professedly concerned about private industry's alleged failure to train its personnel adequately. Are we ourselves, through our government, setting an example?
> If most public efficiency levels were judged by the competitive standards now applied to the private sector, the results might not be too happy. Are we concerned about this fact? Waste in government costs us just as much as featherbedding, waste and inefficiency anywhere else."

I wish to draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, that our expenditures are now over the $10 billion mark. In 1962-63 they amounted to $6 billion. This to me seems to be a tremendous increase in expenditures. I am also concerned about who pays the taxes and how we are treating the little fellow in this country. I am concerned about the man who is raising a family. As I have stated previously; I saw this man in my office the other day who has a deduction problem, but I see many more. I have an article here which I think covers their complaint pretty well. When there is an increase in the sales tax of 1 per cent or possibly 2 per cent at the retail level, the little fellow is being hit pretty hard. He is being hit just as hard as the millionnaire or the person who has an income of $15,000 or $25,000 a year. In many cases the little fellow is being hit harder because often he has a larger family. I think this excerpt from an article by George Bain in the Globe and Mail covers the situation very well:

> He was an unremarkable figure with a nervous smile, the man with two dependent children (all taxpayers for the purpose of budget reports are either single or have two dependent children, whether they like it or not) and an income of about, say, $8,750.
> Old $5,000-a-year-and-two-dependent-children was $700 short of qualifying for the privilege of paying more income tax to help build up the old age security fund to accommodate the projected supplementary old age pension of up to $30 a month.
> He could argue, of course, that he was being called upon to do more than his fair share (as usual) in that the minister was also adding one per cent to the sales tax, which would be payable by everyone.
> Since the man with $15,000 a year obviously wouldn't be buying three times as many (or three times as expensive) toothpaste, grass seed, television sets, socks, washing machines, kids' clothes, detergents, umbrellas, cars, cigarets and snow shovels, he, with his $5,000 and two dependent children, would be contributing relatively more to the take from sales tax than would the $15,000-a-year man.
> Old $15,000-a-year-and-two-dependent-children could reply, of course, that the finance minister was going to be tapping him for $240 a year in income tax to sustain the old age security fund, an increase of a cool one hundred per cent from what he had been contributing for that purpose.
> However, the maximum of $240 will be reached at income of $10,000 with the result that for every dollar earned of that last third of his income, $15,000-and-two-dependent children would be paying no penny more for old age security.
> So that leaves the group between $5,700 and $10,000 enjoying the best of both worlds. And somewhere in there stands our hero, still (like the $5,000-a-year-man) spending all or almost all his income on necessities and necessary luxuries and therefore a relatively large contributor to sales tax revenues, and, at the same time, eligible for all or most of the increase in income tax.

• (5:50 p.m.)

I think that sets out the situation. Let me take a moment or two to speak about investments, particularly those made some time ago by people who are now elderly. Many people invested in perpetual bonds in 1936 which cost between $97 and $100, par being 100. These people need this money now but find the bonds are only worth $53 or $54. Some $55 million worth of bonds were sold to people most of whom had to scrape and save to purchase them. They did so in the hope of providing something for their old age. I know of one lady who has $4,000 in these bonds and she now needs this money badly. All the coupons were used up by 1966, and I think anyone who is fair-minded would agree that these bonds should have been redeemed at that time at their par value. There is no basis for the argument that many of these bonds are now in the hands of investors in this country, because it should not make any difference who holds them. The government should redeem them at par value.

One can come to no other conclusion than that the government has reneged in respect of these bonds and has allowed those people who purchased them to be the goats.

I could refer to many other situations of this kind. Let me just say that a great deal of money has been going out of this country during the past year, creating a very serious situation in so far as our financial institutions are concerned. For every dollar that went out of Canada in 1965, six dollars went out in 1966. Perhaps this is the result of people becoming worried about the safety of Canadian investments.

I am not particularly concerned about the safety of Canadian investments because this country on a per capita basis has the greatest resources of any country in the world. Let us do some housekeeping and housecleaning and restore confidence in this country. The first thing that must be done in this regard should be done by the government. The interest rate on these perpetual bonds should be increased to 5½ percent or they should be redeemed at par value. An increase of two per cent will only cost about $1 million.

Is it fair in a country with a gross national product of approximately $55 billion, for the government to shake the confidence of the people by reneging on its responsibilities, particularly when it would only cost, as I have said, in the neighbourhood of $1 million to increase the interest on the bonds? I urge the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) to consider this situation and make some effort to correct it at once.

For a few moments I should like to refer to federal-provincial affairs. We in this house have set up a health resources fund and recently we passed the Canada Assistance Act. There was some urgency to do these things and yet the Canada Assistance Act is not yet in operation. The health resources fund was established to provide medical centres of various types to train doctors and paramedical personnel. A fund of $500 million was set up to be spent over a period of 15 years. The premier of Ontario, Mr. Robarts, has said that the federal government shortchanged Ontario out of $280 million as a result of which he will have to reconsider all his health and welfare and educational measures and find out where he has to pare.

As a result of different approaches taken to health resource measures, construction of some training centres may have to be abandoned or put off for some time. This will create a slowdown in the training of the number of doctors and other personnel associated with the health and welfare of our citizens at a time when the numbers available are far below requirements and requirements for these services are rapidly increasing. Mr. Speaker, may I now call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we call it six o'clock and suspend the sitting from now until eight?

Mr. Starr: Yes, Mr. Speaker, from now until eight o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock this day are as follows: The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard), External Affairs—Viet Nam—request for ban on arms shipments to U.S.; the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette), Broadcasting—request for review of regulations governing political programs; the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken), Northern Affairs—departmental press release.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

THE BUDGET

ADDITIONAL FINANCIAL MEASURES OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Monteith.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying before our dinner recess, we have to put more money into research. This has become a vital factor in the world competition in which we find ourselves today. It perturbs me greatly when I realize that the provinces can only spend money and provide the buildings, on a matching basis, if they have the funds to do it. I think the solution of this problem in dominion-provincial relations is of paramount importance at the present time, and I mean the allocation of taxes.

As I said previously, the province of Ontario has been short changed to the tune of over $280 million and it is feared that not only education but also some of the health and welfare programs which have been set up in that province will have to be cut back. However, regardless of whether there are sufficient funds for construction of all the necessary buildings there is also a crying need for more teachers and researches. I hope that the Minister of Finance is listening.

There is today in Canada an urgent need for more teachers, to enable the schools to operate so as to educate more researchers and doctors. The first need which must be met is to provide sufficient funds to build the schools and to educate more teachers and researchers to train our graduates who, in turn, can themselves become teachers.

I do not think there is any need to elaborate further on this subject. Studies which have been carried out in the United States have shown that the social return from university education is between 8 and 11 per cent. This is a pretty good return, when one considers that it includes income tax and other taxes. According to those studies the private return alone is in excess of 12 per cent which indirectly in the long run will bring back more taxes. In Canada similar results have been obtained in the social field. The private return has been from 15 to 20 per cent. Therefore I say to the minister that if he wishes Canada to develop economically and to lay the foundation for this development he will have to provide the money with which to do it. In view of all this it is very hard to understand why the scholarship awards have been delayed.

This attitude on the part of the government applies not only to the field of medicine and medical science but also to industry. The other day I was looking at a brochure in which it was said that most of our engineers leave Canada to go to the United States, because if they stay here they only become some sort of managers. Surely the incentives to keep them here are insufficient when, through our own fault we cannot keep our well trained engineers in this country. Not only does industry suffer, but so does the whole economy of the country.

As I have pointed out on more than one occasion, this represents a very serious loss. The minister is well aware of the situation because he has been quoted as saying that we cannot expect the same standard of living in Canada as is enjoyed by the average American, because our productivity does not equal that of the United States. Surely, the way to cure that is to have better and more research scientists and more education. This is very well illustrated by the fact that in 1963 43 per cent of the male labour force between the ages of 25 and 64 in the United States had 12 years of education, as compared with the same age group in Canada in which only 25 per cent had the same number of years of education.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have pointed out that research was cut back. I think this is the highest type of folly that has been exhibited by this government. We are cutting off the hand that would feed us and keep the economy of this country strong. I do not feel there is anything to be happy about, in the performance of the government. People say, look at our productivity; it has gone up and our manufacturing has gone up by 50 per cent since 1961. This is correct, Mr. Speaker, but in the same period of time we had a greater percentage of increase in our imports. Where are we going? At the end of last year we faced a $2 billion deficit. Our manufactured exports picked up to the extent of 64 per cent in the same period of time, from 1961 to 1966 but when we examined the picture we found there was an over-all decline in the comparison with the same trading groups—or with other countries.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is not good enough. If we are going to build a sound Canada, we have to educate the young people of this country and we have to keep our trained personnel in order to give us the research that will produce the goods and bring our productivity up to par with the United States. I believe we could even outsell the United States, Mr. Speaker, because in this country we have the natural resources. We do not have to buy them, we do not have to bring them in; they are in Canada. All we need is the skills for processing them; but we cannot get those skills by cutting back on research expenditures. We must provide the money, we have the taxing ability to do so. When we cut back on the provinces, they cannot go ahead with the projects they need to provide the trained personnel for this country.

I want to go back for a minute and say that I do not believe the people are going to tolerate this type of thing much longer. We are living in a country with the greatest resources per capita in the world. We have resources of all types right at our back door, but we need the skills to manufacture them. Sometimes I get annoyed when the government points out that we are proceeding more and more toward free trade, because I believe that if our productivity is now only 70 per cent of that of the United States, then the logical conclusion is that with a free trade economy we would have little manufacturing in this country. I do not believe this is the way to build Canada.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to spend too much time on the minister's budget. There is not much one can say about it. The minister himself described it as a mini-budget. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, like the mini-skirt, it occasionally reveals more than was intended, not for information of course or to show the condition of the economy, but rather to reveal the condition of the minister's personality. I have the idea that, having got himself into a position of promising a budget, because of a condition that prevailed in the economy at that time, and when, as is always likely to happen, conditions changed, the minister felt himself in honour bound to bring forward a mini-budget anyway. I think he may have had some purpose in doing so, but I suggest it had nothing whatever to do with the economy of Canada.

I seemed to detect on the part of the minister a desire to point a moral. I could really see all of the minister's Calvinistic ancestors peering over his shoulder as he drew up this budget. It seemed to me he was determined to underline and emphasize the old adage, that in this sad vale of tears you get nothing for nothing and damn little for sixpence.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that is a point of view with which one could agree. No one will deny it. I suspect also the minister hoped to raise some question in the minds of the Canadian people the next time they begin to demand the expansion of social services or increased amenities for living. The minister hoped they would connect this clearly in their minds with the brutal fact of taxation. Again, I think one cannot quarrel with that point of view. On the other hand, I would suggest to the minister that the people of Canada may be asking themselves some rather different questions. I do not believe for a moment they are now likely to question the necessity and desirability of having adequate pensions for old people, adequate services for children, adequate disability pensions, retirement pensions. Most people in Canada accept the fact we are going to have these things. If we have any pretentions to being a civilized, progressive people, we must see that we get them for the Canadian people.

The sort of questions the Canadian people likely will be asking themselves are, not can we afford better old age pensions, but can we afford to allow businesses to evade taxation via the expense account route? Can we afford to have executive salaries undisclosed and untaxed in the form of cars, houses and the various perquisites that are provided by large corporations? Can we afford the insanely generous depletion and depreciation allowances which are permitted? Can we afford untaxed capital gains? Finally, can we afford to allow the gross misallocation of resources, which sees service stations being built on all four corners of an intersection, luxury apartments, fancy office buildings, when the housing needs of the Canadian people are crying aloud? These are the questions that are likely to be raised in the minds of the Canadian people by the minister's mini-budget.

Some of my colleagues have dealt perhaps a little more harshly, a little more decisively with this aspect of the budget. I do not propose to spend much more time with it, because in my mind the minister's mini-budget was a piece of rather ill advised nonsense. I think there is something about which the minister must be thinking now as the time comes close for the presentation to parliament of the real budget. I hope when he does so he will not regard this merely as a method of accounting for the housekeeping for the government of Canada, but that he will realize in the modern age the budget is one of the weapons in his control by which to control economic development in Canada.

For a few moments, Mr. Speaker, I should like to present the idea that we are now moving into an extremely different world than the one we have known up to this time. We have to regard our economy, not as a happy hunting ground for various people, whether they be labour or management or shareholders, but as a complex and extremely precariously balanced productive and distributive machine. If we look over the world today we will find that, no matter under what political philosophy this machine is being developed, it invariably takes the same form. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I think one might paraphrase the phrase of the famous professor, Marshall McLuhan, that "the medium is the message" by saying that technology is the organization. The technological development of the age dictates a certain form, a certain size and a certain type of productive organization.

What is important, of course, from a social point of view is what we are going to do with the products of that particular machine. The important thing is that we must grasp the idea that this is a machine, a structure, shall I say, that must inevitably be built to fit the technological stage we have reached today. One of our troubles is that we have allowed a great many excrescences, shall I say, of this machine to very severely hamper its efficiency. We have allowed a whole host of comparatively useless intermediaries who contribute little or nothing to impede progress toward the development of an effective and productive machine in this country.

One of the most important cogs in a modern industrial productive machine is provided by the financial institutions which contribute to its operations. Here in Canada we are at the present time in a very sad way in this regard. I do not need to point to the various collapses that we have had in the financial world; to my mind the matter is much more serious and goes much deeper.

I know it is not proper, Mr. Speaker, to refer to proceedings before a committee, but I think I can remind the house that at the present moment one of the committees of this house is dealing with some of the experiences of two or three financial institutions. We have allowed to grow up in Canada a whole conglomeration of financial institutions of various sorts and under different jurisdictions, some properly controlled, some completely uncontrolled, but all of them intruding themselves into the operation of our productive machine—a sort of ramshackle growth of financial institutions which apparently contribute nothing except confusion and doubt as to the ability of the Canadian people to produce the things they need to produce.

We have had before the committee on finance and economic affairs for some time a bill dealing with the major financial institutions of the country—the chartered banks. But always appearing over the horizon in all of our discussions are the heads of these various subsidiary financial institutions who are apparently beyond our control, or at least beyond the control that this government is prepared to exercise. As a consequence, Mr. Speaker, there is a growing concern in the public mind as to whether Canadian financial institutions are indeed as stable and efficient as we like to believe.

I think we should realize that they deal entirely with the savings of the Canadian people. If we are going to build a modern productive and distributive machine, such as we have not now and, indeed, such as no country in the world has yet, the sort of machine that is going to be made completely necessary by technological development, then we have to tackle this question of these institutions which we allow to dabble in the pool of the savings of the Canadian people.

We are doing almost nothing to streamline these institutions, Mr. Speaker. We are doing almost nothing to bring a vast body of them under adequate control; and we are not doing this because of the strictly doctrinaire approach of this government—and I might say it is the same doctrinaire approach that is displayed by the official opposition—a doctrinaire approach which is very pronounced when we come to deal with such institutions as trust companies, loan companies, insurance companies.

The principal doctrine, Mr. Speaker, is that it is the inalienable right of Canadian citizens, or some of them, to be able to collect the savings of their fellow citizens and themselves decide what they are going to do with those savings. We are, of course, trying to bring some of them under control through the deposit insurance legislation; but I am most struck by the fact that this government is not prepared to make a definite statement that it will exert its authority under the British North America Act over all institutions that could be defined as doing banking business. The consequence is that no one at present knows exactly how our financial institutions are going to operate in the course of the next ten years.

We may feel at the present time that the institutions that we have controlled—that is, the banks and to some extent trust companies—are sufficiently controlled for the time being; but we must have some doubts about some other institutions when we see what happened to the Prudential empire, to Atlantic Acceptance Corporation, and when we saw the other day that the creditors of North American General Insurance Company would be fortunate to get 58 cents on the dollar.

I hear someone asking me about the socialized industries in Saskatchewan. I would be glad to deal with the socialized industries in Saskatchewan, but I do not think that the subject would be germane to this discussion. I know it must annoy members of the official opposition, and probably members of the government party, when I point to the fact that today they are the doctrinaire parties of this country. They are not prepared to abandon their doctrine—their sacred doctrine of the right of Canadians to exploit each other, and particularly in the financial field to have some control of the savings of others.

I think there is a very growing concern about this question. One of the matters we must deal with, one which I am sure we will have to deal with before the next decennial revision of the Bank Act, is the bringing under adequate control of the host of financial institutions of varying function, varying development and varying power.

I have been quite struck with the hesitation of the government to move in this regard, because it leaves them in a very precarious position. I have been struck by the way in which the government fears the reaction of provinces which have assumed squatters' rights in an area that is definitely assigned to the federal government and the federal parliament. But apparently nothing can be done about it because, as I say, this government is wedded to the doctrine of what they call free enterprise.

One of the major types of financial institution, one that deals very closely with the savings of the Canadian people, is the insurance company. I have been disturbed—I have mentioned this in this house several times—by the endless proliferation of new life insurance companies which this parliament is asked to incorporate. We are being asked to incorporate more hands to dig into the pool of the savings of the Canadian people. It fragments this pool of savings. It robs us of any power to direct the investment of the savings of the Canadian people, because we leave those savings in the hands of these various individuals who have their own axes to grind, instead of being interested in the development of the Canadian economy.

I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that before too long this government will be prepared to consider doing what we in this party have suggested to them on a number of occasions, and that is to expand the operations of the Canada Pension Plan so as to offer the Canadian people a wide range of options. There is no reason for a Canadian citizen, who wishes to provide for his old age at a more generous rate than is given by the basic pension under the Canada Pension Plan, not having the opportunity to decide to contribute a larger proportion of his income in return for a larger retirement allowance, when his time comes to retire. I cannot for the life of me see that we should admit the right of any private individual in this country to acquire those savings with his enterprise and decide, himself, what he will do with those savings. So long as we can be sure—and we are not always—that the people who have contributed their savings, get their money back, get their savings back, we are asked to believe that that is enough. I do not think that it is enough. I think the savings of the Canadian people upon which all future expansion depends, should be firmly in the hands of public authorities.

None of us in this house yet knows what the government policies about the vexed questions of foreign ownership are, whether the simplistic views of the former minister of finance will prevail. Does the government hope to solve the problem by having 25 per cent of corporations foreign owned, or does it hope to persuade Canadians to buy 25 per cent of their shares? I do not know. This has never been cleared up.

I say that if we are to follow the policy of the former minister, it is an extremely simple minded policy, unlikely to yield results redounding to the interest of the Canadian people. On the other hand I see a vast opportunity for government initiative for developing the Canadian economy further, beyond this stage. If we have not too much pride we could take a leaf from the books of some of the developing countries of the world and invest jointly, publicly and privately. Some developing countries find no difficulty in getting foreign investors to bring in their capital, to erect industries with their know-how and entrepreneurial knowledge for 49 per cent of the enterprise. In country after country we find this is taking place. They get foreign capital without losing control of their economy.

I might say, as an interesting little footnote of history, that that great Canadian, Lord Thomson of Fleet, has recently entered into a contract with the government of Yugoslavia by which he is providing 49 per cent of the capital required to build a string of new tourist resort hotels on the Adriatic coast. Everybody seems pleased with this. Lord Thomson, with his well known desire to make money, appears quite satisfied, and the Yugoslavs seem quite satisfied that they will control the hotels being built partly with Lord Thomson's money.

The government also has not been quite forthcoming with what will happen to the project, the Canada Development Corporation, suggested by the former minister of finance. That was to be a vast, privately owned mutual trust, with government backing and public assets to help it along its way. Perhaps the government will go ahead with this idea; I do not know. This is another of the mysteries to be cleared up when the cleavages within the government party have been resolved.

I suggest that there is a place for a Canada Development Corporation different from the one advanced by the Minister without Portfolio. It could very well be attached to a revamped Canada Pension Plan. From that plan, I suggest, most of the funds could come. They could be made available to private enterprise, to joint public and private enterprise and to public enterprise, for the development of the Canadian economy. The result would be that in future the proportion of our economy in foreign hands will be much smaller than it is at present. We should not attempt to cut down that proportion by the ill advised investment of scare Canadian capital in minority shareholdings of existing corporations.

These are some of the things that I hope the Minister of Finance thinks about when he presents us with a real budget—not the rather funny little budget we had a few weeks ago, that does not appear to have had any justifiable purpose, except a moral one. The minister must also consider what fiscal policies he will institute with regard to the allocation of resources. It is not good enough for the minister to rely merely on the statistics of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, when speaking of our gross national product. He ought not to say that we have reached the limit of our development at the present time; we want to do too many things, and we have to call a halt. Unless he will examine the allocation of resources and devise a fiscal policy that will give us an allocation of resources better than the one we have at the present time, we can expect disappointments. I can think of a number of things which can be done. The sales tax can be adjusted, for instance, to encourage certain types of construction, certain types of industrial development and to discourage others. No one can suggest that there should not be a reallocation of resources in this country.

It is not good enough to go on shouting that we shall make war on poverty, when we do nothing to provide educational opportunities for vast numbers of our people—opportunities through which they might climb out of poverty. It is not good enough to say we have reached the end of our capacity to produce and to build, when we see around us in every city in Canada resources being wasted on projects of doubtful social value. We still have no houses.

It will not do for the Minister of Labour to content himself with holding a housing conference in the city of Toronto unless the government has solved the problem of reallocating resources. I might quote perhaps some evidence given to our committee by the governor of the Bank of Canada. When I asked him if he thought it was possible to use the interest rate as a means of allocating resources, Mr. Rasminsky told me bluntly, "No, I do not think it can be done". He said that that has to be done by fiscal policy. I asked him to make it quite clear that he meant that the government must get into its hands sufficient revenues to be able to make public expenditures in fields, such as housing, to which I have referred.

I hope the Minister of Finance will consider this question of the allocation of resources. I hope the next time he comes before us with a budget he will be able to tell us that the allocation is now discouraging redundant gas stations, redundant shopping centres, redundant luxury apartments, absurd prestige office buildings, but is on the other hand encouraging housing for the Canadian people, schools for Canadian children, hospitals to care for Canadian sick and educational institutions to provide our badly needed health and educational services. I hope he will not read us a couple of paragraphs from his report and say, "As you see, our gross national product is at its highest level in history, therefore we must be prosperous, and we must have reached the limit." I do not think the Canadian people will be happy if the government continues with this kind of approach to their problems.

We have another problem also. It is about time we began looking at it. We should not be so ingrowing that we ignore looking at it. I was struck the other day with an editorial which quotes Mr. Escott Reid, a former extremely distinguished Canadian public servant who is now in the academic world. The heading reads, "The Most Awesome Problem Confronting Modern Man," and Mr. Escott Reid has this to say:

> "The value of the present net long term official aid provided every year by all the rich countries of the western world to all the poor countries of the world is about the same as what the United States spends every year on space research.

> If the western world had last year increased its aid by just one tenth of last year's increase in its income, the flow of aid from the west to the poor countries would have doubled.
> In recent years, Canada has been raising the level of its foreign aid by $50 million each year. Fifty million is less than 2 per cent of the annual increase in our wealth."

The editorial goes on to say:

> Surely Mr. Reid is on the right track when he urges that Canada increase its aid from the present $300,000,000 mark to about a billion in the next four or five years. Our present figure is only half the UN standard of giving 1 per cent of the national production figure—and we are improving it much too slowly.
> As Mr. Reid says:
> "If we of the western world persist in our present policies on aid to poor countries, we will have earned the contempt of our children and our grandchildren for the kind of world we will have bequeathed to them. They will not easily forgive us for our short-sighted and ignoble policies on foreign aid."

I would hope that Mr. Escott Reid—and I am sure he does, because I know him—realizes that a prerequisite of doing what he advocates in the interests of our own preservation depends on the development in Canada of an effective and efficient productive machine; it depends on eliminating from our economy all these nonsensical financial institutions that hang like barnacles on this productive machine and are allowed to hang there because the government of this country is in the hands of a doctrinaire party that tries to fit all its policies into the Procrustean bed of so-called free enterprise; that still believes there is some sense and justice in permitting private individuals to play with the savings of the Canadian people, to decide where those savings shall be invested and to ervation depends on the development in Canada.

I am convinced that sooner or later this government or another government will have to enter the modern world and realize, as I said earlier, that, to paraphrase Professor McLuhan, technology is the organization. If you go across the world, if you go to the Soviet union or any of the countries of eastern Europe, you will find exactly the same type of productive machine being built, because technology calls for it. The only thing is that they have scraped some of the barnacles off, but unfortunately they have also allowed some other barnacles to remain which are equally unpleasant, if not perhaps so destructive of their efficiency.

If we are to operate on any doctrinaire basis, whether it be a free enterprise doctrinaire basis or a socialist doctrinaire basis, we are going to land in trouble in the world of the future. Let us grow up; let us wake up, and let us realize that Canada is a country which can influence the course of world events if we are prepared to put our own house in order and clear out the rubbish which we deal with eternally and everlastingly because we seem to think there is some God-given right to fool around with the surplus values created by the people of Canada. These should be devoted to the development of a new Canada that can take its place in the world, as we have not done in the past because we have been afraid to do so, because we have not true wealth, because we know we are dependent on other powers to keep us going; and we are dependent on them because we have refused to rationalize our own society, industry and economy. I hope our own Minister of Finance, when he brings down his budget, will have some of these ideas in mind, and will have in mind particularly the idea of a reallocation of our resources in Canada so that we will wage a real war on poverty, so that we shall begin to eliminate the type of poverty that now afflicts us, so that we will cope with the problem mentioned by my hon. friend the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) the other day, when he pointed out that poor housing is not merely a matter of living accommodation but is closely linked with juvenile delinquency, with general unhappiness and misery, and with social problems, for which we pay a tremendous economic price.

It is not good enough to say that these things must always be with us. It is perhaps all right for the godly to say that the poor will always be with us; but it is perhaps time we revised our idea of God and what is permissible in a modern, civilized country.

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, I am arrogating to myself a privilege in taking part in the debate which ordinarily follows the budget speech, particularly with respect to the supplementary budget presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) before Christmas.

Once again, the government of Canada has added a page of sound economy to our parliamentary history by providing, through rational and evenly distributed taxation, a minimum vital income for all Canadian citizens. This is yet another addition to social security measures recently implemented, such as the Canada Pension Plan and Medicare, which will undoubtedly place all Canadians on a superior level as compared with the standards of living throughout the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Isabelle: Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity to call the attention of hon. members to a phenomenon developing in the country which, I greatly fear, will soon lead us to a situation from which there will be no turning back. I am referring to medical personnel, particularly the family doctor.

We all know of the difficulties experienced by our government in passing the medicare bill; as time goes by, we become even more conscious and proud of the responsibilities we took upon ourselves, when the four great principles were put forward by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) in July, 1965.

Still, Mr. Speaker, although we have accepted those four basic principles, although everyone seems to agree that health is a fundamental right of every citizen, that governments must recognize it as an undeniable natural right, the right to mental and physical health, although governments say "We have that responsibility", it remains that such a right must not be handed over solely to medicine, that is doctors, medical associations and medical colleges across Canada.

Ministering medical care belongs exclusively to medicine, as well as the structures of internal control. But the fundamental rules bearing on the right of the individual to health, are strictly a government responsibility.

I can already hear voices clamouring against the word "government", especially in view of the tempestuous climate created by the interpretation of the constitution in matters of health.

The central government, for the protection of citizens across the country, has the right to impose the principle of stable balance and general protection to which its nationals are entitled, whatever the province in which they live. That is what the present government is seeking to do and must do.

The method of practical implementation of this principle is within the provincial jurisdiction to the same extent, I would say, as the equalization principle which in fact, enables rich provinces to take an indirect hand in the fulfilment of, and the economic assistance to the so-called have-not and less favoured provinces.

Such is the spirit that must prompt each of us. The problem, sir, is that, in my opinion, there will be a lack of family doctors in Canada. And here is why. We must agree that medical research in Canada can be increased considerably. Nobody can deny that. The present government has already made a commendable effort by earmarking $500 million to medical research. There has already been so much discussion on this matter that it is not necessary to come back to it. It was also dealt with sufficiently in this house. It is better to start off as we do and to be sure to progress, by a sustained increase, toward higher peaks.

Mr. Speaker, let me pay a tribute, here, to the scientist who is commended for his extraordinary qualities and his highest merits because of his essential necessity and his untiring devotion in a modern nation. I refer to the family doctor, the general practitioner.

Unfortunately, if modern society can praise the merits of this man who is disappearing and abandoning this type of medical practise he loved so much, we must now examine our consciences and repeat what Professor Pasteur Valléry-Radot, then co-president of the 23rd convention of French doctors, stated namely: "I have no hesitation in saying that, in its daily practice, medicine is erring. Why? Because it ignores the physician, the general practioner and is concerned only with the specalists."

We would have a lot to say in this regard but it is impossible for lack of time. We know that general practice is centred essentially on the family which is the basic unit of society. The family doctor is undoubtedly the best doctor in the country. He can look after the expectant mother, the children, the adults. He can treat people in his office, at the patient's place, the hospital, when it is necessary.

The family doctor should be really the medical practitioner and not only a switchman for the specialists. In that respect, I should like to quote the words written by one of my colleagues, Dr. Georges Desrosiers, in Le Devoir of February 1962:

> The public should be informed as to the role and value of the family doctor because a certain thinking has developed here, as everywhere else, which results in the fact that in some quarters, people only swear by the specialist who is consulted directly, and who often refers the patient later on to another specialist.
> The role of the specialist would be namely that of a consultant. He would supplement the work of the family doctor when necessary. To allow the family doctor to play the part assigned to him, the general practice should be viewed as a special branch of medicine and we should take as much care to determine its standards and requirements as we did for the so-called specializations.

Unfortunately, although the medical associations throughout Canada are still praising to high heaven that courageous worker and saying how indispensable he is when it comes to dispensing medical care, in short in spite of all those bouquets, one cannot but feel that those are treacherous words and that the man whose talents are so highly esteemed —is doomed to oblivion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Isabelle: On November 30, 1965, some witnesses appearing before the Hall commission, stated that:

> Two per cent of Canadians had to see their specialist each month and that, therefore, the greater part of medical care given to Canadians should be administered by general practitioners or family doctors.

However, other witnesses stated that:

> Demand that general practitioners be given consideration by the profession as well as by hospital and government authorities.

This, Mr. Speaker, means total reform, particularly with the advent of medicare, of the whole concept of medical associations and of all medical school structures, which are also outdated. These organizations have become encrusted in a dangerous but regular routine and have accumulated more dust than prestige over the years. They have become much like stagnant waters and are even now in need of purification. Their only significant accomplishment boils down to resolution passing committees, whose powers are whittled down from year to year.

In certain areas, a great gap has been created, or at least everything has been done to widen the gap already existing between family doctors and specialists. I wish to point out to hon. members that if we do not have enough medical practitioners, if Canada is in 22nd position, with respect to the relationship between medical practitioners and population, having only one doctor for 852 persons, it is not because of a lack of federal research grants. It is rather due to the confusion within the medical profession; this situation must be remedied in the near future, if we are to have more family doctors.

It is inconceivable that, in 1967, some hospitals should have general practitioners as active members of their medical boards and that these practitioners should not be allowed to vote in the medical departments when general decisions in which they are involved are taken.

It is inconceivable that, in 1967, the general practitioner who makes a house call and finds the patient dying or almost, should have to telephone the specialist on duty at the hospital to ask permission to hospitalize the patient. That is scandalous, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Isabelle: It is also incredible that in 1966 and even in 1967—and I am ashamed to say it—certain hospitals in Montreal should have gone so far as to build separate washrooms for general practitioners and specialists.

We should regain our senses and realize the nonsense of such fantastic figures. As a matter of fact, in the last few years, the number of specialists has increased by 43 per cent, whereas the number of general practitioners throughout Canada has only gone up by 39 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, this makes no sense at all; in this case, there are more chiefs than Indians. Out of the 24,000 doctors in Canada at present, 2,880, that is 12 per cent, are interns, and 90 per cent of them are specializing or preparing for a career in industry. After the arguments I have just put forward, one could hardly think of improving the medical situation by creating such ridiculous situations as the one in which we find ourselves today.

Mr. Speaker, may I refer to an item published in the magazine College of Medical Practitioners of Canada of August 1966, and I quote:

• (9:00 p.m.)

[English]

Too long has the medical profession soft-pedaled the short supply of Canadian physicians. Too long has it concealed the urgent need for more family doctors from such groups of foreign physicians as those of the United Kingdom. Too long have Canadian doctors refused to come to grips with the excessive work load being carried by many of their members, and this load will be increased when universal health insurance is established.

Everyone knows or should know there is a shortage of physicians in Canada. This may not apply to a few of the specialties, but it is true generally and particularly of general practitioners or family doctors.

[Translation]

In an article published in Le Droit some time ago—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am quite hesitant to interrupt the hon. member in his flight of oratory and in the midst of such an interesting speech but I am wondering about the relationship that may exist between the speech he is making and the discussion on the supplementary budget now going on. There may be a very close connection between the two but it does not appear quite obvious to me.

Mr. Isabelle: Mr. Speaker, I thank you for your remarks but I might point out that we are concerned with moneys that may be expended on research and somewhat imply the expenditures to be made to ensue a minimum guaranteed income. It is, Mr. Speaker, a problem related to the medical profession inasmuch as it may supply the care.

May I quote an editorial from the newspaper Le Droit entitled "The Family Doctor", relating to an article I read in a newspaper published by the College of General Practitioners of Canada:

There should have been a royal commission to tell the authorities concerned, that is the governments and the universities, that the general practitioner only—the good old family doctor—seems to be in a position to treat mankind as a whole.

I will go further, Mr. Speaker. A few years ago, a prominent lecturer, Cardinal Paul-Emile Leger of Montreal, said at the University of Ottawa that the time has nearly come when a person calling on the doctor to have a particle of dust removed from his right eye, will be told: I am sorry but I am a left eye specialist.

I think the general practitioner is practically indispensable in rural areas, and far from useless in large towns where many heads of families with small incomes cannot afford the luxury of paying a specialist unless absolutely necessary.

Instead of making recommendations, I shall simply conclude by saying that more university centres with university hospitals should be built, without necessarily adding to the present number of medical schools. We should also make use of every available means, particularly electronics and television. Furthermore, medical associations and colleges of physicians across the country should be asked to put some order in their indescribable and legendary mess so that, in 1967, the general practitioner might be considered as qualified to practise general medicine everywhere, even at the hospital.

If those suggestions are accepted, Mr. Speaker, then everything else will follow: medical research will grow, the number of family doctors will increase, Canadians will be better taken care of, and more young people will enter medical practice in Canada.

We must put an end to the snobbery of medical education where most of the high-priests or heads of medical schools have embalmed themselves throughout Canada. Instead of fostering the progress of practical medical science, they have basked continually in the luke-warm routine of pompous and pious speeches which basically gratified only their pride to the detriment of general medicine, that is those who worked humbly and silently ministering the sick. The time has come to put an end to all this, to forget the old saying: "If you cannot become king, become a doctor."

[English]

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in this wide ranging debate I too might make a few remarks which are not directly connected to the budget, but which will be connected to the fiscal policy which comes under the jurisdiction of the minister. In this regard, while perhaps ranging a little wide, I am in the position of hon. members on the other side, because very few of them have spoken directly on the budget. I think they might be in the position, as the saying is, of "damning with faint praise", because their silence on the budget, I would say, certainly has been very faint praise. Admittedly there is very little to praise in the budget. It could be described as a give and take budget. Actually it takes more than it gives. It imposes taxes to provide a graduated extra payment to some old age pensioners ranging from $1 a month to a maximum of $30 a month; at the same time it takes income away from many of the pensioners through income tax.

This budget, called the mini-budget, hits the pocketbook of our senior citizens in another way. It does this through the 12 per cent sales tax on drugs, which has been called a tax on illness. That description, in my opinion, is a very fitting one. Whom does it hit the hardest? The old age pensioner, our senior citizens who have helped to build this Canada we have today. I have a letter here from the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association. The Minister of Finance knows about this letter, because I understand he also has received a copy. I should like to quote very briefly from this letter, because I think it sets out very clearly the situation in respect of the 12 per cent tax on drugs:

During the past few years in particular, considerable public comment has been directed toward the cost of drugs. Since the early 1950's, our Canadian Pharmaceutical Association has repeatedly emphasized that the federal sales tax levy contributes significantly to the price of drug preparations. Only six specific drugs (not drug classes) are exempt from this tax.

In appearances before many committees and commissions having to do, in one way or another, with the provision of pharmaceutical services, our association has attempted to factually relate the dollars and cents effect of the federal sales tax on drugs. We have pointed out that the application of the eleven per cent tax—a highly improper tax on illness—cost the ill and diseased over $14 million in 1964. Now, with increased utilization of health-restoring pharmaceutical preparations, it can be assumed that the new twelve per cent levy, if not abolished immediately, will constitute at least a $16 million portion of their prescription drug dollars during 1967. Added to this will be the multi-million dollars effect on those drug preparations which the individual may purchase for purposes of self-medication.

That outlines the situation very clearly in relation to the mini-budget.

Many speakers have referred to housing or the lack thereof. I am pleased that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson), who is directly responsible for C.M.H.C, is now in the house. We have heard a great deal about the serious housing situation in Toronto. This situation is also in existence in other major cities in Canada.

Recently a conference on housing was held in Regina. This conference was attended by the Minister of Labour. Actually this should have been headed a conference on the lack of housing because that was the subject under discussion. Also in attendance were the mayors of several cities, town officials, reeves and councillors. They all wanted information about how to obtain more housing loans.

An article which appeared in the Globe and Mail on January 5, 1967 was of particular interest to those who attended this conference at Regina. I should like to read briefly from this article which states:

> Canada's housing program, both public and private, is a failure. Experts have different opinions on what to do about it. But almost all of them—public enterprisers, private enterprisers and middle-of-the-roaders—agree that the housing program has failed in the following ways:
> Housing construction is falling behind the population increase. Fewer than 135,000 dwellings were started in 1966. H. W. Hignett, President of Central Mortgage and Housing Corp., said there should have been 150,000. He warned that 170,000 will be needed this year for new households, new Canadians and replacements for worn-out housing. Chances are that the number will be much less than that.
> Housing is not being built fast enough to substantially reduce the backlog of slums and overcrowded dwellings.

There was a great deal of interest in that article at the Regina conference and it certainly sets forth the feelings of those people in attendance.

Let me now refer to some suggestions in this article regarding what can be done to relieve this housing shortage. It is suggested that the following should be done:

> Create federal and provincial ministers of urban affairs and housing. Draw up a clear list of goals.
> Launch industrialized mass-production housing at once, with standardization of parts and plans, but provision for variety to avoid monotonous ugliness.
> Greatly step up production of public housing. Acknowledge that housing is a public utility. Mix income levels. Try to avoid ghettos for the poor.

There is one suggestion in this article which refers to something already being attempted near Ottawa. This is suggested to overcome the difficulties involved in crowded urban centres. The paragraph states:

> Plan balanced satellite towns near metropolitan areas, to contain houses, apartments, stores, industries, ample playing space; schools, churches, community centres, social services; transit links with downtown.

That may sound a bit far-fetched but it is something to be looked for in the future as a means of avoiding overcrowded city conditions.

The National Home Builders Association made certain suggestions to offset the mounting cost of home production, one of which was to exempt from sales tax, building materials on residential construction just as is done in the case of schools, universities and public libraries. That association also suggested as an incentive to home building the deduction from income tax of municipal taxes and of mortgage interest. It may not be feasible or practical to allow the entire amount to be deducted, but a deduction up to a certain limit would certainly be of assistance to home owners.

I should like to read one paragraph of this challenging program of the National Home Builders Association. It states:

> Economists maintain that the industry should be increasing its production each year until it has reached a capacity of some 200,000 units per annum by the mid-70's. It is difficult to see the industry being able to gear itself to this production unless some method is found to assure a steady supply of mortgage funds.

At the Regina conference reference was made to a new method of apartment ownership. Under this arrangement apartment occupants actually own the building, pay taxes and operating costs. This type of project has been in existence for some time in Canadian cities, notably in Vancouver. Perhaps this would be the answer to the problems facing members of parliament who wish to obtain accommodation within a reasonable distance from the parliament buildings. I hope the Minister of Labour will give some consideration to this suggestion. It may well be that enough members are interested in such a project that an apartment block under this ownership arrangement could be constructed as a centennial project.

In a recent survey conducted by the publication "The Independent Businessmen" the following question was asked: Has tight money touched your business? The answer was: "Yes, 57 per cent; no, 39 per cent; no opinion, 4 per cent. This particular survey was taken last February but I believe the same answers would be given today, perhaps with the larger percentage in the "yes" column with regard to the effect of tight money on their business.

I have a letter here from two young people who displayed great initiative and self reliance in starting a poultry farm. They have written about their difficulties in obtaining financial help to expand their operations. I will not read the letter. I will just say that they were told by various people that both the federal and provincial governments were backing the poultry industry and therefore they attempted to find out just where and how such help could be obtained. However, they have not been able to find any government agency which would help them to expand their business. They have asked for any arrangement which could carry them through until July, when their new flock of chickens will be producing. They said they had ample markets for all they can supply, including a contract for 1,800 dozen eggs per month and another for 1,000 dozen eggs per week in June or July. They asked where they could get help.

I have suggested to these young people that they should contact a branch of the Industrial Development Bank. I believe that the I.D.B. can help them in financing this project, and if not I believe that there should be some changes made in the set-up to make this possible, because these young people are looking for help, they are ambitious and certainly have the background for operating this sort of enterprise.

There is another point which I should like to make, Mr. Speaker, and to which I should like to draw the attention of both the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson). It concerns the high valuation placed on farm land for estate tax assessment upon the death of the owner. I have taken up this question more than once with the Department of National Revenue.

Estate tax valuations of $125 to $150 an acre on farm land which was the deceased person's original homestead, or which may have been purchased by him a few years ago for $25 to $30 an acre, appears to be a capital gains tax. I do not believe the government has as yet adopted a policy for the imposition of a tax on capital gains. The valuation on farms for estate tax purposes appears to be very arbitrary and final.

These valuations do not always appear to be equitable. I have drawn to the attention of the Department of National Revenue three cases in a little over a year where the estate tax valuations on three farms in the same area were set by the department at assessments ranging from $85 an acre to $125 an acre for what would be considered to be the same kind of land.

The particular point I want to emphasize in these estate tax valuations concerns the preservation of the family farm. Consider, for example, an 800-acre farm which has been built up by a farmer in the expectation that his son will carry on. In one case I have in mind the son is actually operating a farm owned by his father. The father has died. The estate tax valuation on the 800 acres is $125 an acre. This amounts to $100,000. The widow benefits by an exemption of $60,000 but the estate tax levy on the remaining $40,000 could well be such as to force the widow to sell the farm in order to pay the tax, thus removing the farm from family operation.

I suggest that the government should lighten this burden by lowering the estate tax valuation on farm land. I contend this should be done at least where a son or a daughter is taking over the land from the father. Such a policy is essential if family farms are to continue.

My main concern, as I have indicated, is with regard to these high estate tax valuations on farm land. Perhaps I should take this occasion to put on record suggestions from influential sources that the estate tax should be abolished. I am referring to an editorial which appeared in the Regina Leader Post of November 25, 1966 headed "Tax on Estates Should Go". I think this editorial will commend itself to the government because it was discussed at the provincial Liberal convention in Saskatchewan which expressed the opinion that the levy should be abolished. I will quote one paragraph from the editorial, which reads as follows:

> Spokesmen for the farm interests gave strong support for the proposal. Eventually a resolution was passed which requested either the elimination of this tax, or a reduction in the size of the slice the state takes out of taxable estates.

Again I will draw the attention of the government to the fact that this was passed by the Liberal association at its convention in Saskatchewan.

In the same connection I wish to refer to the 1966-67 statement of policy announced by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, which I believe is very influential and has the ear of the government. Rather than paraphrase what they said with regard to the estate tax I should like to put on the record the verbatim text of their statement:

Among the criteria generally employed in evaluating a tax are its revenue producing character and its effects on the growth of the economy. A strong case can be made for the abolition of the estate tax on this basis.

As a source of revenue the estate tax was estimated to yield in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1966 only 1.4 per cent of total estimated federal budgetary revenue. The income tax, on the other hand, yields approximately 50 per cent of total revenue and the sales tax nearly 20 per cent. Of all the different types of federal taxes levied, the estate tax yields the least.

With regard to the effects of this tax on the economy, to the extent that it discourages the accumulation and retention of capital in Canada which would be available for equity investment, it has a depressing effect on the rate of economic growth. On the positive side, it is, today, clear that the repeal of this tax would be the greatest attraction to permanent equity capital that we could devise.

I should like to draw this to the attention of the Minister of Finance because essentially it is in accordance with what he preaches. It goes on to read:

With respect to incentives, the effect of the tax is difficult to determine but in various cases the tax obviously acts as a deterrent to saving, and through this, capital formation. It has undoubtedly encouraged estate planning and the development of increasingly sophisticated and successful devices to avoid both its impact and the onerousness of its administration.

At a time when the federal government it trying in other ways to discourage the sale of Canadian business to foreign owners, the impact of this tax, particularly on small and medium sized business, is to force such sales in ever increasing numbers to the detriment of both Canadian ownership and our balance of payments.

In view of the adverse effect of the estate tax on the economy, and the relatively small amount of revenue produced by this tax, it is recommended that the estate tax be abolished.

The following is an excerpt from a letter which I received from the editor of "The Independent Businessman".

Here's our latest issue. I hope you will be interested in our story on the front page telling how the anticipation of succession duties is preventing the expansion of one company.

It is unfortunate that a tax, which is unproductive, should prevent productivity.

I think these quotations certainly emphasize what I was trying to say.

I agree with earlier speakers that the mini-budget was not necessary but was rushed in at the last minute because a budget had been promised by the Minister of Finance. The 1 per cent increase in sales tax, from 11 per cent to 12 per cent, has raised the cost of living. The minister admitted this in his budget speech. The sales tax increase would not be necessary if the amendment before us were adopted. It is for this reason I support the amendment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I could not feel the least bit antagonistic to the government at this time because a few minutes ago I saw the hon. lady member for Westmorland (Mrs. Rideout) sitting with the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell). I know they were talking over the events of the last few days. I should like to tell the hon. lady, however, that I watched her on television a few nights and I thought she was doing a wonderful job for a lost cause. If they had more people like her, possibly the results would have been a little more favourable for her party.

However, all those who have participated in this debate brought about by the mini-budget presented on December 19 have stressed the futility of this exercise, and I do not intend to pursue it any further. It would have been much better if we had had a statement from the minister dealing with our financial conditions. This would have given us an opportunity to assess the situation and bring forward suggestions for measures which could have been undertaken to assure the continued growth of our economy and to reappraise the measures which we now have for increasing productivity. These measures would have been assessed then in a positive way, instead of in the negative approach this government has taken since the budget of last spring to offset these elements in our economic life which have tended to strangle progress and development.

It would have been much better if the Minister of Finance had re-read his budget speech of last spring and removed some of the restraining measures which he applied to our economy and which, in his own words, would have been those which tended to have inflationary effects. The monetary situation has been getting worse, with tight money being the major cause of the lack of increased productivity. Certain taxes have tended to discourage increased production, and here I refer to the sales tax on building materials and production machinery. I believe the minister will admit that if positive measures had been taken, such as the removal of the sales tax on building materials and the advancement by six months of the removal of the tax on production machinery, many of our firms who have today curtailed their development programs would have gone ahead with their plans.

The minister knows quite well that a company with plans on the drawing board usually schedules its developments for execution in a definite period, and only those firms that have sufficient capital can go ahead with their plans. Others are being restrained and in many cases, as the minister will eventually find out, the curtailment of their plans will probably lead to a definite cancellation, thereby reducing their productive capacity.

In so far as the sales tax on building materials is concerned, it is quite evident that the removal of this tax would not have placed any additional burden on the manufacturers of these materials. We could have had a specific reduction in the price of these materials because of the ample supply and the ever increasing consumption of them. There was more at stake in this than simply a monetary measure, because this government has forgotten that the consumption of this material would have been in the formation of housing units which were a necessity to thousands of low income people in this country.

As most speakers have already mentioned, if positive measures had been taken to encourage the building of housing units we could have contributed to the elimination of suffering and delinquency. Moreover, such a step would have contributed in a positive way toward the construction of recreational facilities near the housing units, and the children of these low income families would have been able to fraternize and know each other better, thereby contributing to a will and a desire for a better life.

While I am on the subject of the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials, I believe it would be proper to discuss the discrimination which I believe exists now in the imposition of the sales tax on these building materials. A retailer pays the 11 per cent sales tax on building material based on the manufacturer's cost, but the same retailer selling lumber for the same purpose has to pay the 11 per cent sales tax on the retail price. Admittedly, it is not the retailer who suffers but rather the consumer. This has the additional effect of increasing the cost of housing in the way that I have already described as utter discrimination.

[Mr. Keays.]

I wish the minister would take into account these questions which I am now raising and inform the house of his reasons for allowing the continuation of this situation. For my part, I cannot find any justification for this discrimination because I accept the principle that the taxation of these commodities should be on an equal basis, and that one product in a certain category should not carry a heavier charge than another. I intend to raise these questions again at some future time if answers are not forthcoming from the minister. In order to balance the economy it is necessary for the monetary and fiscal policy of the government to work hand in hand. I can see that the government has paid only lip service to this basic requirement.

On many occasions the government has suggested that it will be necessary to curtail its own spending on capital projects. Mention has been made of the cancellation of an expenditure of roughly $100 million by the Department of Public Works. I shall be very interested to see, when the details of the estimates appear, which expenditures have been curtailed by the department. I notice the Minister of Public Works (Mr. McIlraith) is taking quite an interest in my remarks, and I know he has the welfare of all Canadians at heart. I wonder whether he has had much to do with any curtailment or reinstatement of expenditures in his department.

It is wonderful to be able to plan construction and to develop a national capital, Mr. Speaker, but was it not premature to begin construction of the centennial arts centre without first knowing its fabulous cost? Other statements have been made recently in connection with the construction of other buildings in the national capital zone, and although I would be the first to suggest that these buildings are needed by the administration, I doubt whether it is necessary to undertake them at a time when the government believes that curtailment is still required in order to defeat inflationary pressures. It seems to me that the government's statements in this regard are contradictory. Perhaps they prefer to remain blind to the proper means for eliminating these inflationary pressures on the economy.

Notwithstanding statements which we have heard in this house, Mr. Speaker, the economy of this country is not as buoyant as we have been led to believe. Looking ahead a few months to the completion of many major projects in Canada we can well ask ourselves where our people are going to find employment. Signs are already evident that the pace of the economy is slowing down. It is time for the minister to reassess the situation and perhaps consider the disbursement of the refundable tax collected under the terms of our last regular budget.

The elimination of the sales tax on building materials, as I have already said, would accelerate to some extent the construction of homes so badly needed in this country. With the backlog that is now evident and with the normal requirements of the year, the government has a tremendous task on its hands to encourage private industry to invest its money in the mortgage market and to get small investors to reactivate their capital.

When we consider, Mr. Speaker, that billions of dollars in savings accounts across the country could be used to greater advantage both to depositors and to the economy, I fail to understand why a program of information cannot be undertaken to tell these depositors of the advantages of investment in the housing field. Far be it for me to say that some of this money is not being used to advantage by the banks for lending purposes, but there is still room to encourage a substantial amount of these deposits to be used to the benefit both of investors and the general economy.

The government seems fearful of inflationary pressures, Mr. Speaker, yet it is contributing to the prolongation of the period of inflation every day that it fails to take steps to correct the housing problem. It is evident that if we are called upon to perform in 12 months what should normally take 30 months we are going to put some additional burdens on our manufacturers, on machinery and on the labour required for our housing construction plants. In this way we will have too many people chasing too few materials and too little labour, thereby causing inflationary pressures on the economy.

The increase of 1 per cent in the general sales tax has also had the effect of increasing the cost of goods at a time when we should be concerned with the problem of reducing costs. The additional amount of $120 which the government is going to extract from the taxpayers is again threatening to kill the chef that serves the main course.

Private enterprise and initiative has been the cornerstone upon which this country has been built and has prospered. It is time that we began to ask ourselves if we have not reached saturation point in the matter of taxation of the individual and of the corporation. What initiative is there for progress, for increased productivity and for the welfare of employees when systematically in every budget we seem to wish to take a little more from the corporations?

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that government expenditure has to be met by taxation. So has the cost of social measures. But do we have to do everything within a given period? Is some planning not possible whereby some public capital expenditure is delayed or spread over a longer period, thus giving a chance to industry to have a few years respite from extra taxation in order that it may make a larger contribution to the development and advancement of our country? Spending at all levels of government is such that every Canadian is being taxed way beyond his means to pay. Also the period for which we are mortgaging our revenue is getting way beyond any rational planning.

The very first day of confederation was founded on the wish and will of every father to embark on a pilgrimage, to erect a solid basis for our future. That was private enterprise. Let us not now falter and embark on a system destined to bring misery, unconcern, and evil to this way that has brought us through the first hundred years.

There is room for improvement. Let us improve this system. Let us rededicate ourselves to the vow, to the initiative, which will reward our personal wishes, which will be to the welfare of our country and will be to the benefit of the path we all pursue.

Private enterprise needs encouragement; corporation taxes need to be eased. We always look to corporations to fill the gap when we need taxes. These words I feel are noteworthy, and I feel depict the argument I have tried to advance.

Corporate profits as a whole clearly have not gone ahead of economic growth. They have lagged, if anything; they have not kept pace with the increase in labour income. Manufacturing profits lagged appreciably last year, the most profitable year in our history. Those profits trailed, reflecting the intensified cost price squeeze that has become more acute than ever. This has not stopped Ottawa from taxing profits more heavily in 1965 than in 1956. The investment of manufacturing industries in new plant and machinery has risen more rapidly than its profits have risen. In 1965, as in 1956, total outlays came near to equalling industrial profits before taxes. Those investments are nearly double the profits, after taxes. Some of this investment represents newly raised capital, financed out of retained earnings. In other words, it is that part of profits not distibuted to shareholders as dividends.

There is no question that corporate profits in this country at this moment are reasonable, and that the shareholder has a right to share in this income. Let us be aware of overtaxing corporations, because in taxing private industry we tax the individual who contributes to the capital needed by corporations, needed for the development of industry, for the increase of productivity, and to offset the cost of living. The investments of the individual make our corporations competitive and satisfying.

I have but one wish. I wish that the government would become more realistic and see in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith) the warning signal that a new look must be taken at the government's policies. We must implement measures while will encourage industry, not discourage it; which will activate, not slacken and which will incite and not weaken the will of the individuals who are the pillars on which rests our future.

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my speech in this debate will be as relevant as the rest have been. It will have something to do with the budget, something to do with estimates and a great deal to do with government finance. I do not have much time this evening, and I will simply introduce the aspect of the subject I want to deal with, the federal government's role in the financing of universities, and research in Canada.

When the estimates are presented to us soon for the next fiscal year, the large amount for university grants, included in last year's estimates, will be removed. In that regard I think this government has made a regrettable decision.

Hon. members will recall that on October 31 last the Minister of Finance speaking for the Prime Minister—this was just following the tax-sharing agreement conference with the provincial premiers—announced the federal government's intentions concerning university grants, technical and vocational education, and adult education. He announced that the federal government was getting out of the field of university financing; that it would transfer four points of personal income tax and one point of corporation income tax to the provinces, and let them do the job the government had done before.

The same thing held true for vocational and technical education. At the same time there was staked out a field in adult education, which was defined. I am glad to see the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) is here this evening. He is interested in the question of education and the federal government's role in it. I hope he will be here tomorrow when we continue.

May I call it ten o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—VIET NAM—REQUEST BAN ON ARMS SHIPMENTS TO U.S.

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, on January 18 last, in this house, I stood for discussion on an adjournment motion the following question, and I quote:

> Since our sales of arms to the United States seem to have increased by 82 per cent in 1966, is it not the government's intention to ask for some changes in the Canada-U.S. defence production sharing agreements, so that our claims for peace in Viet Nam would not be merely rhetorical and our participation in the International Control Commission would be more consistent and effective?

According to recent statistics, in 1966, the United States has placed orders totalling $300 million for arms to be manufactured in Canada, while Canada has placed orders for an equal amount of U.S.-made arms.

The increase in United States purchases in Canada is explained by the Viet Nam war. A good part of the expenses is for aircraft, electronic equipment and explosives.

Such exchanges of arms and of manufacturing originate from a 1959 Canada-U.S. agreement on armament. From then to last September, the United States spent $1,430 million in Canada, as compared to $1,230 million agreed to by Canada.

What are the implications of such military transactions between the two countries on Canada's military and diplomatic policy?

Facts show two things. First of all, our ties with the United States are sweeping us in the wake of American policy, on the military, diplomatic and economic fields. Second, our diplomatic policy does not always reflect our military policy and our economic interests.

On the diplomatic front, at the international level, Canada is seen as the promoter of peace. It often offers itself as a mediator. It makes many efforts, secretly and publicly, toward a peaceful settlement of the war in Viet Nam. Together with India and Poland, Canada is a member of the International Control Commission in Viet Nam. Within international organizations, Canadian representatives condemn war, deprecate poverty in all forms and advocate aid to underdeveloped countries.

Those are surely fine gestures, Mr. Speaker; but, on the other hand, we let the United States use Canadian made weapons in Viet Nam. Such an illogical action might embarrass us greatly and reduce, on the international level, our influence and our role as peacemaker.

Of course, we are bound to the United States by defence sharing agreements. But such an exchange of arms should be used exclusively for the common defence of the North American territory and our other joint undertakings under NATO and the United Nations. We should not get mixed up in this way with military and diplomatic objectives of the United States which are strictly their own.

That is why we should know from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) whether, on account of the presence of Canadian arms in Viet Nam, the letter or the spirit of the 1959 agreements between Canada and the United States have been violated. Otherwise, the Canadian government should ask for a proper review of those agreements right now so that our position does not appear so contradictory and controversial to Viet Nam.

[English]

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the first observation that I think should be made about the question asked by the hon. member is that the facts cited by him in his question were refuted in the answer given to a question placed on the order paper. That answer is to be found at page 12520 of Hansard.

The basic issue involved in this question is not limited, as I am sure the hon. member would like to limit it, to what is the balance sheet of operations between Canada and the United States with regard to Viet Nam; rather it extends to the total of relationships between Canada and the United States in the entire context of the western alliance.

That alliance was formulated many years before the present involvement of the United States in Viet Nam. It is the hope of this government, and I would hope of the hon. gentleman also, that this alliance will continue unimpaired after the present hostilities in Viet Nam have been brought to a peaceful conclusion. Let me interpolate at this point that every diplomatic effort on the part of the government of Canada has been pressed toward a peaceful conclusion of these hostilities.

What is really involved in this suggestion is whether Canada should, for the reasons cited by the hon. member, throw over or risk throwing over the efficacy of the NATO alliance. The suggestion made by the hon. member that the government should take this action is not a new one. It has been made by a number of thoughtful Canadians who are concerned about the current conflict in Viet Nam. Only recently a group of university professors made representations to the government about this matter and some of their representatives had the opportunity of discussing it with the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin).

The Prime Minister explained to these representatives that the government, while it understood and had sympathy with their concern about the war in Viet Nam and their desire to bring it to an end, could not agree with the request that Canada impose a ban on arms shipments to the United States until the end of that conflict. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister referred to these matters in the house on January 19, and in his statement he made it very clear that the export of arms and defence equipment to the United States is covered by our defence production sharing agreement with that country, and that it is not the government's policy to stop the export of defence equipment to our NATO allies.

No commercial exports of any kind from Canada to the United States have been prevented by government action, in accordance with long-standing practice, and I suggest that reflects the principle of the open border with respect to export controls between our two countries, so that no licences are required for the export of any Canadian goods to the United States.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

May I point out in conclusion that there have been no direct shipments of armaments of any kind to Viet Nam from Canada.

BROADCASTING—REQUEST FOR REVISION OF POLITICAL BROADCAST REGULATIONS

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Béchard) for being kind enough to stay a little later than usual, even though some friends from his riding have come to see him about the return to Gaspé of La Grande Hermine. I appreciate the gesture of the hon. member to whom I am putting my question, and I ask him to kindly submit it to the minister concerned.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Jean Pouliot, of the Canadian Association of Broadcasters, recently submitted a brief to the parliamentary committee on broadcasting on behalf of the organization of which he was the spokesman.

Among the interesting suggestions made by Mr. Pouliot, some dealt with possible amendments to the Broadcasting Act which, as is well known, is old and obsolete and contains undescribable anachronisms. Such anachronisms occur particularly in sections 17 and 18 of the act concerning political broadcasts.

It is a known fact, Mr. Speaker, that private stations, particularly private television stations, are hesitant to carry such programs because, according to many, political broadcasts lack animation and colour. They are likely to reduce the number of viewers, or "ratings" as we say in French. Thus, very little sympathy is shown for political broadcasts, for which the broadcasters must not be blamed.

This is partially explained because the act is not too good. Clearly, it is an old act that has not been brought up to date for years. And while dramatization is mentioned, there is no definition of dramatization. The word is simply there, without its meaning being specified. As a result, the private stations are concerned about dramatization and will not grant political broadcasts any latitude, a latitude that would enable them to become much more interesting and to reach the public much more easily.

The first suggestion I make to the minister, through his parliamentary secretary, is that the term "dramatization" should be clearly and well defined so that we know once and for all what that means, and in what framework a political program may be presented. Private television stations have a much higher rating than C.B.C. channel 4, in Quebec city, as well as channel 10 in Montreal have certainly more viewers than the C.B.C. Then—

Mr. Allard: Channel 7 in Sherbrooke.

Mr. Choquette: And channel 7 in Sherbrooke—I thank the hon. member for having mentioned it—has a higher rating than C.B.C. Now as the private stations have no political programs, politicians are unable to reach the general public.

And forcing private stations to have free broadcasts, that is almost impossible, and as Mr. Pouliot said in reply to a question of mine: We have expenditures to meet and we cannot afford to offer that free of charge, to put free broadcasting time at the disposal of politicians. The C.B.C. does it.

Mr. Speaker, what I would suggest is that the state should subsidize the private stations to allow them to broadcast political information on the same basis as the political broadcasts made by the C.B.C., that is to say private stations should also have political broadcasts subsidized by the state. One might say: Where will the money come from? We could start by saving money at the C.B.C. The time has come to appoint the president of the C.B.C. and I hope that the man chosen will be a real administrator. When it is realized that programs such as the one dealing with the Munsinger affair cost millions of dollars, that the one on the von Thadden affair cost thousands of dollars and that René Lévesque was sent to interview a premier in Paris when the C.B.C. already had a correspondent there. The C.B.C. is overdoing it and if it had a competent administrator we could save enough money to subsidize the private stations which could allow politicians free broadcasting time. It is almost unbelievable that politicians cannot use private stations to broadcast their message as they have every right to do. Those are the grievances I wanted to call to the attention of the hon. member for Bonaventure to whom I wish much success in his efforts with the mayor of Gaspé to get the Grande Hermine back to Gaspé.

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to offer my sincere thanks to my friend, the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) for supporting, along with many other hon. members, the repatriation of the Grande Hermine to Gaspé.

Mr. Speaker, anyone who knows how cool and quiet the hon. member for Lotbinière is when appearing in political television programs or elsewhere, will not be surprised at the protest he voices against this anomaly contained in the Broadcasting Act, with respect to political programs.

Since it is my duty to defend the act, I must say at this point that, in my opinion, the tragedy of political broadcasts has not been criticized very much by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or the public, when one thinks of the supersaturation of programs across Canada, particularly in the province of Quebec and in some other areas. I am referring to certain hon. members very well known to everyone here; I should like to mention the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) for instance, simply in order to point out that I feel the act leaves quite a lot of freedom in this regard.

However, I agree with the hon. member for Lotbinière when he says that private stations should receive certain grants in order that political parties may make their policies known through more widespread broadcasting facilities.

I will convey with pleasure to the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) the remarks the hon. member for Lotbinière made tonight and which I feel, are most appropriate.

As the hon. member for Lotbinière knows, an amendment to the Broadcasting Act will soon be introduced, if not by the end of this session, at least at the beginning of the next one. I trust this amendment will be satisfactory not only to all the members but also to all who, throughout the country, stand for justice and freedom for all citizens.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS—DEPARTMENT PRESS RELEASE ISSUED BY MEMBER FOR ST. JOHN'S EAST

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I asked the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development a question regarding a press release issued by his department under the name of a private member. Very often that type of question is taken as an accusation, and I am sure that some of the minister's colleagues assumed that because I asked the question I was implying, first that the minister was wrong, and second, that I would not have done it myself in his position. I did not intend to leave that impression. We sometimes say in legal terminology that to cross-examine does not mean to examine crossly.

Quite the contrary, at times I am sympathetic toward the idea that recognition should be made of the services of private members in announcements of this kind. As an example let me refer to the proposal put forward by the Secretary of State regarding the presentation of centennial honours by private members in their constituencies.

At this time I should like to know whether there has been a change in policy, a new policy adopted, or is this a specific and isolated case. This is only one announcement I selected from a number I receive in my mail every morning. This is the first I have seen of this particular type and I wonder whether some change in policy has been made.

So far as the reference today by the Prime Minister to the policy of the then Mr. Walker, now Senator Walker, a former minister of public works, let me say that he followed a similar course. He did at times give recognition to private members in this way. Even then I was not sure what the exact policy was.

If this is a new policy I should like to know how far it extends and under what conditions the names of private members will be associated with announcements in respect of public projects. I feel this does involve a matter of policy, rather than the isolated recognition of a particular private member for some reason. I would appreciate some advice from the minister regarding this matter, and I should like to know whether this policy will apply only to members on the government side or to other private members as well.

Mr. Knowles: After all, there are more of us on this side.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I should like to thank the hon. member for his remarks and particularly for abandoning the acerbity with which he asked the question this afternoon. Apparently he has had second thoughts. Let me assure him there is no policy in this regard. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. O'Keefe) worked so hard on the Signal Hill project I thought it only fair that his name be associated with the announcement in respect of the contract.

The hon. member has suggested that this is the first time the government has embarked on such a policy. I had occasion to check through only the past press releases of my department, and found many similar cases in days prior to 1963. The first such press release referred to C. J. Oliver Limited of Calgary which was awarded a contract amounting to $107,400 to build a new administration building in Kootenay National Park. This was announced by Arthur Smith who was then the member for Calgary West.

• (10:20 p.m.)

Another one is dated January 4, 1962. It reads:

> The administration headquarters of Kootenay National Park is to be moved away from the Sinclair Creek area of Radium Hot Springs according to M. L. McFarlane, M.P., for Kootenay.

Another one reads:

> A contract valued at $437,585 for the supply of 169 buildings, to be erected in communities in the Northwest Territories and arctic Quebec, has been awarded to Dalite Corporation (Canada) Limited, Toronto, it was announced by Miss Margaret Aitken, M.P. for York-Humber, on behalf of Northern Affairs Minister Walter Dinsdale.

In another one Mr. Arthur Smith, M.P. for Calgary South announced a building contract of $33,210 had been awarded to Engineered Buildings Calgary Limited, of Calgary for the supply of an office building. Jasper Sedan Chairlifts Limited has been awarded the concession to operate a 3,000-foot-long gondola lift as announced by Dr. H. M. Horner, M.P. for Jasper-Edson. And then Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams, M.P. for Bow River, announced on behalf of resources minister Walter Dinsdale that a $308,826 contract has been awarded.

I have a whole sheaf here and I will make sure that the hon. member gets a copy of them so that he can refresh his memory. It would appear now that he does not wish me to embark upon this program—

Mr. Aiken: I would like the minister to answer my question.

Mr. Laing: —because he is afraid that I would permit one good habit to corrupt the world. I have been as fair to hon. members on the other side of the house as any minister. On the occasion of the opening of the Pine Point railway I asked the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and the hon. mem ber for Athabasca (Mr. Bigg) to accompany me. Some time ago we announced the opening of a penitentiary. At that time we may well have associated the name of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams). We will consider each of these on their own merits and we may be making announcements through the member in certain instances. This will not be a definite policy, but we will take them as they come.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, February 8, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

JUSTICE AND LEGAL AFFAIRS

Fourth report of standing committee on justice and legal affairs—Mr. Cameron (High Park).

[Note: Text of the foregoing report appears in today's Votes and Proceedings.]

HOUSING

TABLING OF NEW RENTAL SCALE FOR PUBLIC HOUSING

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the house I should like to table a new rental scale for public housing in Canada; and I suggest, if the house is agreeable, that it be appended to Votes and Proceedings.

I am not going to make an extended statement, but I think I should say that a number of provincial governments have expressed concern about the rent to income scale for public housing that has been in force in Canada without material change since 1962. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has given careful consideration to the matter, and the rent to income scale that I ask leave to table is the result. It provides for reductions in rent averaging $16 per month per unit.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that Ontario, the province most directly affected by the new scale, agrees with the new scale and proposes to introduce it; and as I understand it, the responsible minister is tabling it this afternoon in the legislature in Toronto. The new scale is available immediately to all provinces wishing to adopt it in public housing projects.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house agree to appending the document to which the minister referred to Votes and Proceedings?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

INDIAN COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT OFFICERS

Question No. 2,123—Mr. Howard:

1. How many community development officers are employed in the service of the government of Canada?

2. Of these, how many are (a) of Indian status (b) of Indian origin, (c) of non-Indian origin?

3. What is the salary paid to such officers and if the salary varies, how many such officials fall within each salary group by the categories (a), (b), and (c), in part 2 hereof?

4. How many assistant community development officers are employed in the service of the government of Canada?

5. Of these, how many are (a) of Indian status (b) of Indian origin (c) of non-Indian origin?

6. What is the salary paid to such assistant officers and if the salary varies, how many such officers fall within each salary group by the categories of (a), (b), and (c) in part 5 hereof?

7. Have any community development officers resigned and, if so, how many and what reasons were given in each case?

8. Have any assistant community development officers resigned and, if so, how many and what reasons were given in each case?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. 32.

2. (a) 3; (b) 0; (c) 29.

4. 18.

5. (a) 18; (b) 0; (c) 0.

6. (a) 17, $4,434 to $5,052*; 1, $2,961 to $3,456. (b) 0. (c) 0.

7. There have been three resignations by community development officers and the reasons given were: in one case to pursue further studies and in two cases personal reasons.

8. No.

* As a result of the classification conversion program these salaries may be increased if the incumbents qualify to fill the established positions as amended. The salaries of this group, effective from October 1, 1965, would then be $4,627 to $6,085; and effective from October 1, 1966, $5,085 to $6,693.

 The term "of Indian origin" has been interpreted as "of Indian origin but not of Indian status."

COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT OFFICERS

Question No. 2,177—Mr. Howard:

1. What is the name of each community development officer in the employ of the government of Canada, and upon what date was each appointed?

2. What is the name of each assistant community development officer in the employ of the government of Canada, and upon what date was each appointed?

AMNESTY TO PRISONERS DURING CENTENNIAL

Question No. 2,281—Mr. Saltsman:

In view of the intended visit of Her Majesty during Canada's centennial, does the government intend to grant amnesty to prisoners in federal institutions in honour of the occasion?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): It is not intended to recommend that amnesty be granted to prisoners in federal institutions on the occasion of the forthcoming visit to Canada of Her Majesty the Queen. Amnesty was granted to prisoners on the occasion of Her Majesty's visit in 1959. However, on that occasion the Minister of Justice stated that, as the operations of the newly established National Parole Board became effective, so that every inmate thereafter would receive detailed consideration, under the process of automatic review, as to his eligibility for release prior to the termination of sentence, it was not anticipated that a general amnesty would be considered on the occasion of visits of Her Majesty to Canada thereafter. It is to be noted that all sentences in federal institutions are now in fact reviewed automatically by the National Parole Board and paroles granted in appropriate cases. Prior to the visit of Her Majesty in Canada in 1964, the Minister of Justice at that time stated in the House of Commons that, in view of the implementation of the Parole Act, it would not be proper that an amnesty be granted on the occasion of that royal visit, and none was granted. For similar reasons, therefore, the government of Canada will not recommend a grant of amnesty in connection with the Queen's forthcoming visit to Canada.

MONEY GIFTS TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Question No. 2,393—Mr. Godin:

1. During the last ten years, did Canada make any gifts of money to foreign countries?

2. If so (a) what amounts were involved (b) on what dates were such gifts made (c) for what purposes were they made?

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Although Canada has made available contributions in the form of Canadian goods and services to under-developed countries under economic and technical assistance programs, there have been no outright gifts of money.

2. Not applicable.

STUDY OF HALIFAX HARBOUR

Question No. 2,417—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Is a land-waterfrontage study of Halifax harbour and Bedford basin presently being carried out by the Atlantic Development Board?

2. If so, what are the terms of reference for such a study?

3. When will it be completed?

4. Will the study be made public and, if so, when?

5. Who is conducting the study?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I am informed by the Atlantic Development Board as follows: 1. The board has engaged consultants to carry out a study of waterfront land for industrial uses of the Halifax harbour-Bedford basin area.

2. The terms of reference are as follows: 1. The consultant will perform, in a manner satisfactory to the executive director, the following, hereinafter called "the project": Prepare a master plan of land use for the Halifax harbour and waterfront area, as defined in paragraph 2 hereof. For this purpose, the consultant will: (a) examine the role and future of the port of Halifax in relation to the economic development of the Atlantic provinces and to Canada's external and inter-regional trade; (b) carry out an inventory of existing land uses in the waterfront area and assess their present and prospective economic function. The possibility of alternative land uses will also be considered and will include a review of other uses which have been proposed; (c) examine the potential land needs of harbour-related industries in the Halifax area and in particular of industries requiring waterfront land; (d) determine the potential supply of waterfront industrial land. This will involve an assessment of the industrial land presently available within the area and the possibilities of further development by appropriate government agencies and/or private interests; (e) estimate the approximate cost of developing various sites, including the cost of site preparation and layout and the installation of necessary services; (f) make recommendations concerning the extent and location of additional waterfront industrial land to be developed and the appropriate timing of such development, taking into account such other uses as may be found under (b) above to require waterfront location and the cost of development estimated under (e); (g) make recommendations concerning the desirability of reserving for future industrial development, whether by zoning regulations or other appropriate action, any areas for which such protection appears appropriate; (h) furnish preliminary engineering estimates and make recommendations for any further studies which appear to the consultant to be desirable in order to clarify issues, particularly of detailed engineering problems; (i) submit its final report in a form acceptable to the executive director not later than August 31, 1967; and (j) furnish the board with 75 suitably bound copies of its final report.

2. The waterfront area to be examined extends from Sandwich Point on the Halifax side north to and around Bedford Basin and continuing on the Dartmouth side south to South-End Passage, and includes McNab, Lawlor and Devil's islands.

3. In the performance of the project the consultant will: (a) make use of all existing relevant data and studies available from government and private sources; (b) review the development plans (including urban renewal proposals and transportation plans) of the county of Halifax and the cities of Halifax and Dartmouth as they relate to the waterfront; and (c) maintain continuous liaison with local government bodies as well as provincial and federal agencies, in particular the National Harbours Board.

3. August 31, 1967.

4. After receiving the report, consideration will be given to the question as to whether the report should be made public.

5. Murray V. Jones & Associates Ltd. of Toronto.

SUBSIDIES FOR FISHING VESSEL CONSTRUCTION

Question No. 2,442—Mr. McQuaid:

1. What requirements must be met before subsidies can be received under the Fishing Vessel Regulations, 1964, by those fishermen who built boats in the 35 foot to 45 foot class?

2. How many inspections have been made in Prince Edward Island of boats in this class to determine eligibility for subsidy?

3. How many inspectors are, or have been, employed in Prince Edward Island to do this work, and who are they?

4. How many inspection reports have been received by the department and of those received how many (a) have been approved for payment (b) have been rejected?

5. Of those approved for payment, how many have been actually paid since February 21, 1966, and to whom have the payments been made?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): 1. Vessel to be recommended for subsidy and application made to the federal Department of Fisheries by a provincial loan board under terms of a formal agreement entered into in accordance with the conditions and requirements of the fishing vessel assistance regulations, 1964, under P.C. 1964-855 as amended; vessel to be of approved experimental design reflecting improvement over conventional types for the size class; vessel to meet provincial construction standards and Department of Transport regulations in so far as the latter apply; vessel to be registered with the Department of Transport; vessel to be adequately outfitted and equipped to show sufficient evidence of diversification capability over and above lobster fishing.

2. 107.

3. 4. Mr. Bruce Parsons, marine consultant, Halifax, Nova Scotia; Mr. Islay Mutter, shipwright consultant, Victoria, British Columbia; Mr. Murray Lusher and Mr. Dick Ross on the staff of the Department of Fisheries.

PAYMENT OF TAXES BY CROWN CORPORATIONS

Question No. 2,444—Mr. Grégoire:

1. Do provincial crown corporations pay (a) excise tax (b) the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials (c) other federal taxes?

2. Have provincial crown corporations ever protested against the payment of taxes in their capacity as agents of the crown and, if so, what was the result of such protestations?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): 1. (a) and (b) Yes, however, under specified conditions they may qualify for refund pursuant to section 46, subsection (2) of the Excise Tax Act. (c) A corporation, not less than 90 per cent of the shares of which is owned by Her Majesty in right of a province or by a Canadian municipality, or a wholly owned corporation subsidiary to such a corporation, is exempt from income tax and old age security tax by virtue of section 62(1)(c) of the Income Tax Act.

2. Yes. Such protestations are necessarily resolved within the provisions of the law.

Questions

PAYMENT OF BUILDING MATERIALS TAX BY CROWN CORPORATIONS

Question No. 2,446—Mr. Grégoire:

Do the crown corporations belonging to class D of the Financial Administration Act pay the 11 per cent tax on building materials?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): Yes.

INFORMATION DIVISION CHIEF, INDIAN AFFAIRS

Question No. 2,461—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Who is the chief of the information division of the administration directorate of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

2. How long has he held the position?

3. What are his academic qualifications?

4. What is his previous experience in working with Indians either in the department or elsewhere?

5. What are his duties and responsibilities and to whom does he report?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. No such position is established.

2. Not applicable.

3. Not applicable.

4. Not applicable.

5. Not applicable.

PERPETUAL BONDS

Question No. 2,470—Mr. Watson (Assiniboia):

1. How many private citizens bought government of Canada perpetual bonds in 1936?

2. What percentage of these bonds are still held by private citizens?

3. What percentage of these bonds are held by corporations?

4. Will the government consider paying those held by private citizens?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): 1, 2 and 3: Since almost half of the issue of perpetual bonds was and is in bearer form, it is not possible to establish the percentage of the issue originally or presently held by private citizens or by corporations.

4. As indicated on several earlier occasions in reply to similar questions, if the government were to redeem perpetual bonds held by private citizens, or by others, it would provide those who purchased the bonds at a substantial discount with a large windfall profit. Such action would be unfair to previous holders of perpetual bonds who had sold them at any appreciable discount. It would also be discriminatory vis-à-vis holders of other government of Canada bonds which are quoted at a discount. If the issue were redeemed it would have to be refinanced at current market rates and this would involve an additional interest cost to the government of approximately $1,400,000 per annum.

[Mr. Benson.]

3. What are his academic qualifications?

4. What is his previous experience in working with Indians either in the department or elsewhere?

5. What are his duties and responsibilities and to whom does he report?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Mr. Paul Deziel.

2. Since September 1, 1954.

3. Academic qualifications, (a) University of Windsor, B.A.; (b) Ontario College of Education, high school teacher's certificate.

4. None.

5. His duties and responsibilities are: "Under direction to administer the capital program of federal school constructions; to develop standards for the operation of residential schools; to direct the program of pupil transportation; to administer regulations relating to public service living accommodation for teaching staff; maintain an inventory system covering furnishings and equipment in over 400 Indian day schools and 60 residential schools; to supervise staff; to assume responsibility for the operation of the directorate in the absence of the director." Mr. Deziel reports to the director of education.

CHIEF OF SPECIAL SERVICES DIVISION, INDIAN AFFAIRS

Question No. 2,473—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Who is the chief of vocational training and special services division of the education directorate of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

2. How long has he held the position?

3. What are his academic qualifications?

4. What is his previous experience in working with Indians either in the department or elsewhere?

5. What are his duties and responsibilities and to whom does he report?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development):

1. Mr. Lyman Jampolsky.

2. Since August 6, 1964.

3. Academic qualifications, (a) University of Alberta, B. Ed.; (b) University of Alberta B.A.; (c) University of Stanford, one year post graduate studies.

Mr. Jutras reports to the director of administration.

SALES TAX ON CHILDREN'S SPORTS EQUIPMENT

Question No. 2,517—Mr. Barnett:

1. Is the federal sales tax required to be paid on children's sportswear and sports equipment?

2. If so, at what rate?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): 1. Yes.

2. 12 per cent; prior to January 1, 1967, 11 per cent.

ADHERENCE BY CANADA TO UNESCO TREATY

Question No. 2,527—Mr. Stanbury:

1. Is Canada a party to the UNESCO treaty (sometimes referred to as the Florence agreement) concerning trade in educational, scientific and cultural materials?

2. If not (a) for what reason (b) will the government give consideration to Canada becoming a party to this treaty?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In so far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned: 1. No.

2. Although the Florence agreement is commendable so far as it goes, it does not provide for the removal of non-tariff barriers which are by far the most important obstacles to Canadian exports of educational, scientific and cultural materials. These barriers consist of quantitative import controls and particularly protective restrictions embodied in the copyright laws of some of our major trading partners. The agreement requires only the removal of tariffs. On this point Canada already provides duty free entry under the Tariff Act for most of the categories of materials covered by the agreement. The remaining tariffs are quite moderate.

It would therefore be of doubtful value at this time for Canada to abandon the limited protection of the residual tariff without a corresponding reduction in the most important form of protection, non-tariff barriers, employed by other countries. The unilateral removal of these Canadian tariffs would achieve little in terms of improved access for Canadian exports of educational, scientific and cultural materials and would not confer substantial benefits to the Canadian consumer.

At the same time the importance and value of the Florence agreement as a means of furthering cultural and scientific exchanges among member countries are fully recognized and the question of eventual Canadian adherence to the agreement is kept under continuing review.

CUSTOMS TARIFF ON IMPORTED CARS

Question No. 2,528—Mr. Langlois (Mégantic):

1. What are the customs tariffs on cars imported from (a) the United States (b) Great Britain (c) France, (d) Belgium?

2. If the tariffs vary, what is the reason?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): 1. Automobiles imported under the regular provisions of the Customs Tariff are subject to the following rates of duty: (a) 17½ per cent ad valorem; (b) free; (c) 17½ per cent ad valorem; (d) 17½ per cent ad valorem.

Automobiles imported by a manufacturer entitled to use tariff item 95001-1: free of duty from the countries named.

2. (a), (c) and (d) are under the most favoured nation tariff; (b) is under the British preferential tariff.

Importations free under item 95001-1 can be made only by a manufacturer who qualifies under the item.

FIRE DAMAGE TO FERRY "AMBROSE SHEA"

Question No. 2,530—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

1. What was the total estimated damage as a result of fire to the vessel Ambrose Shea now being constructed at Marine Industries Limited?

2. Was an investigation carried out to determine the cause of this fire and, if so (a) what decision was reached as to the cause (b) who carried out such an investigation?

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

3. As a result of this fire and damage to the vessel under construction, will the cost of construction exceed the original contract amount?

4. What was the original amount of the contract for the construction of the Ambrose Shea submitted by Marine Industries Limited?

5. What were the names and amounts of all others who tendered for the construction of this vessel?

6. What was the original estimated date of delivery of this vessel?

7. As a result of the fire, what is the new estimated date of delivery?

8. When is it expected that the Ambrose Shea will go into service between North Sydney, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland?

9. Will the Ambrose Shea carry general cargo, automobiles, trucks or railway box cars between North Sydney, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The total estimated cost of the damage repairs is $4,000,000.

2. Yes. (a) the cause has not been definitely established; (b) Amyot, Bohl & Associates, consulting engineers, Montreal, P.Q.

3. Damage repairs will be to marine underwriters' account and the contract cost of the vessel will not be exceeded.

4. $11,779,239.50.

5. Port Weller Dry Dock Co., $12,131,705; Canadian Vickers Ltd., $12,288,548; Davie Shipbuilding Ltd., $12,456,000; Collingwood Shipyards, $12,910,000; Halifax Shipyards, $16,467,961.

6. June 30, 1967.

7. November, 1967.

8. November, 1967.

9. Passengers, automobiles, and trucks between North Sydney, Nova Scotia and Argentia, Newfoundland.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK LOANS, RIMOUSKI COUNTY, QUE.

Question No. 2,538—Mr. LeBlanc (Rimouski):

1. How many loans were granted by the Industrial Development Bank during 1965-66 in the constituency of Rimouski?

2. What is the total amount of these loans?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): 1 and 2. The annual report of the Industrial Development Bank for the year ended September 30, 1966, contains information regarding the number and amount of loans by size, by province and by type of business. A further breakdown of the information is not a matter of public record.

NEW FERRY, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND-NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 2,540—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. When is it expected that the new car ferry for the Prince Edward Island-New Brunswick service will be in operation?

2. What was the previously announced target date for completion?

3. What factors have caused the delay?

4. What steps are being taken to minimize the delay?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. June, 1968.

2. September, 1967.

3. Electrical engineering and manufacturing problems during construction have resulted in considerable delay in delivery to the shipbuilder of the main diesel electric propulsion system.

4. Constant liaison is being maintained with the main propulsion supplier by the director, shipbuilding branch of the Department of Transport in a continuing effort to improve upon delivery schedules.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY, MONTREAL TO ONTARIO BOUNDARY

Question No. 2,543—Mr. Isabelle:

1. What was the cost of the section of the trans-Canada highway between Montreal and the limits of the province of Ontario, (highway No. 17)?

2. What amount did the government of Canada contribute toward the construction of this highway?

[Translation]

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): 1. and 2. The shareable cost of trans-Canada highway construction is limited to the cost of the two-lane highway provided for in the trans-Canada highway agreements. This department keeps records only for those costs which are shareable under the agreements.

The following figures cover the trans-Canada highway section from the Western limits of the Ile-aux-Tourtes bridge to the limits of the province of Ontario: Total shareable costs approved to date, $11,142,933. Total estimated federal share, $7,218,424. Total federal payments to date, $5,044.332.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY, QUEBEC TO MONTREAL

Question No. 2,544—Mr. Isabelle:

What was the cost of the Quebec city to the Montreal section of the trans-Canada highway and what was the contribution made by the government of Canada for the construction of this highway?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): The shareable cost of trans-Canada highway construction is limited to the cost of the two-lane highway provided for in trans-Canada highway agreements. This department keeps records only for those costs which are shareable under the agreements.

The following figures cover the trans-Canada highway section from the point of access to the Quebec bridge, to the southern limits of the Louis Hyppolite Lafontaine bridge-tunnel: Total shareable costs approved to date, $64,463,979. Total estimated federal share, $32,796,399. Total federal payments to date, $26,942,564.

INVESTIGATION INTO DESIGN OF P.E.I. CAUSEWAY

Question No. 2,556—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. Has any department of the government commissioned O. J. McCulloch to investigate any aspect of the proposed design of the Northumberland strait crossing?

2. Has any report of an investigation by Mr. McCulloch been made available to any department of the government?

3. If so, what was the source of such information?

4. Has the government of Prince Edward Island suggested any alterations in the proposed design for the Northumberland crossing?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): 1. No.

2. Mr. O. J. McCulloch sent a commentary to the Department of Public Works in July, 1966. A revised version of that commentary, under the title "Report to the Department of Public Works on the construction proposed for Prince Edward Island Crossing" was received on February 6, 1967.

3. Mr. O. J. McCulloch.

4. No.

FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN B.C. TRADE FAIR

Question No. 2,558—Mr. Groos:

Does the Department of Trade and Commerce intend to participate in the fourth British Columbia International Trade Fair to be sponsored in May of 1967, by the government of British Columbia and, if so, what form will the participation take?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes. The Department of Trade and Commerce and the centennial commission are collaborating in an information exhibit combining the themes of Canada's centennial and Canada's international trade.

Questions

SALES OF N.H.A. MORTGAGES

Question No. 2,563—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

1. How many mortgage sales of N.H.A. mortgages have been conducted by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and on what dates?
2. What was the total amount of mortgages sold at each such sale?
3. What plans has the government or Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for further sales of N.H.A. mortgages?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): 1 and 2. Fourteen offerings have been made; one in June, 1962 was withdrawn. A total of $304.75 million was sold in the 13 completed auctions. Particulars of the auctions are shown below:

3. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation expects to resume sales by auction later this year.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, would you please call motions 191 and 193?

I ask that the remaining notices of motions be allowed to stand.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Could these motions stand, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

[Mr. Cantin.]

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

FAILURE TO DISPLAY PORTRAIT OF THE QUEEN IN CENTENNIAL TRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I trust you will allow me to bring to the attention of the Prime Minister of Canada a message of true Canadianism sent to me by the student body of the General Brock School in Vancouver, the classes of which visited the centennial train. These youngsters objected strongly that Her Majesty's portrait is not displayed in any part of the centennial train. I ask the Prime Minister to bring this to the attention of the authorities. Canada is a monarchy. Her Majesty's picture should be in any train representing Canada.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): This is the first I have heard of this matter. I shall look into it immediately. It is most appropriate, of course, to have a picture of the Queen of Canada in our centennial train. I shall look into the matter at once.

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister would also investigate reports that the historical narratives are different in French and English. Might we have one authentic history in both languages on this occasion?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker; I shall be glad to look into that matter too.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—POSSIBLE EXTENSION OF PROPOSED CEASE FIRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Considering that a cease fire for the four days of the new lunar year has been arranged in Viet Nam, and considering that the Viet Cong have shown a willingness to extend this cease fire to seven days, I ask the minister whether the government of Canada has made representations to both sides to extend still further this cease fire, that a climate might be created within which it will be possible to carry on effective negotiations.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it would be a very happy circumstance if the truce, now limited to four days, were extended not only to seven days but for an even longer period. Suggestions of that kind have been made in the ways we believe appropriate. We think this is the most effective course.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Considering the widespread interest and concern in this matter, can the minister not say whether representations have been made to Hanoi and Washington? If so, have they been made through diplomatic channels, through the international control commission, or both?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I prefer to say that the answer I gave is stronger than any specific answer that my hon. friend may expect to the question he asks.

Mr. Douglas: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Considering that all people will suffer if the conflict in Viet Nam escalates into a major war, does the minister not feel there is value in mobilizing public opinion to extend the cease fire? Would it not be helpful if the people of Canada and the peoples of the world knew to whom the representations I referred to were being made, and what the reaction was to those representations?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I can well understand the hon. gentleman's feelings in the matter. I am sure he will understand that we are no less interested in this situation, and we have taken the steps which we believe will be most effective in achieving the result which I hope will be realized.

[Later:]

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Could the minister explain to the house and to the Canadian people how a cease-fire agreement can be reached for three or four days and the hostilities resume afterwards?

Mr. Speaker: It would be difficult, I think, to answer that question. I do not feel it is in order.

INCOME TAX

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR PROVISION OF BILINGUAL FORMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board.

I have here a copy of the income tax forms sent to the taxpayers in the province of Quebec. Many people complained to me because the forms they received are in English only. I would therefore ask the minister to use bilingual forms, should it be impossible for his department to send French forms to Quebec, so that the people in Quebec can read them in French and the people in the other provinces can read them in English.

Is the minister prepared to do something along those lines?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): With six and a half million tax forms to deal with each year it is inevitable that a few mistakes will be made in sending out the forms. However, we have a rule that in cases where a person files a French tax form in a particular year, he or she will receive a French tax form in the succeeding year. Similarly, when a person files a tax form in English, an English tax form will be sent the following year. When errors occur we are very sorry but, as I say, when the department is dealing with six and a half million taxpayers it is inevitable that some errors will be made.

Mr. Caouette: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

I know from personal experience that until last week, there were only English forms at the Rouyn post office; it was only last week that the French forms were received. Why were the English forms sent to the Rouyn post office two or three weeks earlier than the French forms? I would like the minister to reply to this point: would it not be possible to have bilingual forms? The mistakes referred to by the minister would thus be avoided.

[English]

Mr. Benson: One of the things we have been trying to do is to simplify these tax forms.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Benson: The tax legislation is difficult enough in Canada without our trying to issue the forms in both languages so they will be twice as long for people to consider. Everyone in Canada who has filed a previous tax return is sent a tax return addressed to him personally. The tax return forms sent to the various post offices are intended for people who for some reason have not previously filed, and we send these out ordinarily, as they are available, in French and in English to post offices where they are required.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has already taken up five of the thirty minutes we have for the question period today. I feel it would not be fair to the other members if this discussion were allowed to continue. The hon. member knows that, according to standing orders, supplementary questions are under the exclusive control of the Chair. It is felt that a supplementary question should not be allowed at this time.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, you allowed earlier the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) to put four brief supplementary questions. I am only asking my third one, which would take only a few seconds, and everything would be over.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Villeneuve might perhaps take up the matter again later on.

[Later:]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I should like to come back to the supplementary question I wanted to put to the Minister of National Revenue.

Several accountants are complaining at this time that they have difficulty in obtaining forms from the department. A sufficient number of forms is not being sent to meet the demand in their areas.

Is the department in a position or making arrangements to have such forms readily available for the accountants? As a second part to my question a while ago the minister referred to simplification of the forms. Does he not feel that the best way to simplify would precisely be to remove income taxes?

[English]

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will direct my attention to those places where accountants are unable to obtain forms I will be glad to look into the situation. If the hon. member will also indicate to me how the government of Canada can operate without imposing income tax, I should like to hear that also.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Mr. Benson.]

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF AUTOMOBILE AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Industry. In view of the announced intention of General Motors to permanently lay off 100 more employees, and the serious effect of these lay-offs upon the lives of the workers who are displaced, does the hon. gentleman not think it advisable to establish a committee and refer the question of the auto pact to that committee so we might be able to find out why these people are being laid off on a permanent basis, and why work is being reduced?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, this morning a delegation of the United Automobile Workers had a very long and very profound discussion with three government members concerned with the matter. The group was assisted by the distinguished Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin)—

Mr. Starr: It must have turned out to be a heck of a mess.

Mr. Drury: —whose presence, while it contributed largely to the success of the meeting, turned out to be perhaps not as important as it might otherwise have been, in that the discussion was related mainly to the problem of Oshawa.

It was agreed that the difficulties facing those who have been laid off in quite substantial numbers in Oshawa are indeed great, and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand), the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) and I assured the delegation that in the light of the facts they brought forward we on our part would see what steps could be taken as a matter of urgency to deal with the situation.

I outlined to them some of the parameters of the automobile agreement, and in particular pointed out that as of January this year, in relation to the operation of the automotive agreement as a whole, the levels of activity in this field were substantially in excess of the levels achieved in 1964, the year before the pact came into existence. Indeed, above the level of 1964 there was an increase represented by 60 per cent of the total increase in the Canadian market, plus a further $197 million—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just what is this?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Starr: Just a lot of nonsense.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This nonsense should not be permitted.

Mr. Starr: I ask the minister a supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. There seems to be agreement in the house that the answer given by the minister is perhaps too long and the information which he is seeking to convey might have been better conveyed by way of ministerial statement. However, I understand the hon. member for Ontario has a supplementary question.

Mr. Starr: In view of the fact that the 3,000 permanently laid off workers in Oshawa are not interested in the minister's propaganda, will he on behalf of the government definitely decide to set up a commission to find out why they have been laid off?

Mr. Pearson: It isn't a commission they want; it's work.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I would ask him to see to it that no further steps are taken to enter into free trade agreements with the United States until the Canadian people and their interests have been served.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not a question.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Industry. If the government is not willing to set up a parliamentary committee to look into the effects of the automobile agreement upon workers, will the government at least set aside a day next week when the minister, and whatever other ministers want to, will report to the house on what measures they intend to take to help the workers, in order to give the house an opportunity to hear all the information, an opportunity such as we do not have at the present time?

Mr. Starr: That is a negative approach. We want the lay-offs stopped.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I would derive much more pleasure than some members on the other side of the house from an opportunity to outline the benefits which have been flowing from this agreement to Canada—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Starr: Stop this nonsense. Tell that to the 3,000 people laid off because of your phony auto pact.

Mr. Pearson: You don't want to listen to the facts.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You should listen.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Starr: You keep out of it, because you will only mess it up like you did external affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Industry if he will answer my question. I did not ask him if he would make a statement on the general question of the auto agreement. I asked him if he or some of his colleagues would make a statement as to what steps the government intends to take to alleviate the adverse effects which this agreement has had on many of the workers not only in Oshawa but in other parts of the auto industry.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, when I was about to answer the supplementary question I was interrupted. I would be glad to discuss with my colleagues the possibility of doing this next week.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry. Did the minister discuss with the U.A.W. officials the reason that cars made in Canada and exported to the United States are sold there for $400 to $500 less than the same car is sold for here in Canada?

Mr. Drury: No, Mr. Speaker, that was not discussed.

An hon. Member: Why not?

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I am wondering, when the minister is looking into this matter, whether he would extend the ambit of his investigation into other related industries in places other than Oshawa. I am informed that many people in the textile industry and other industries in my constituency have been laid off because of the same thing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about Windsor?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The employment situation has never been better in Windsor.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, an interruption was just made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in respect of these widespread lay-offs in the automobile industry. He had better get up to date on the facts when he says this does not apply to Windsor. What particular measures were taken there which were not taken elsewhere?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, compared to Oshawa, Windsor has a good representative.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair is very grateful that there are only 30 minutes for questions today.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the right hon. the Prime Minister based on a sudden outburst by the premier of British Columbia in the legislature of British Columbia yesterday. Can the Prime Minister inform the house whether the premier of British Columbia has any recent basis for the statement he made in the British Columbia legislature yesterday in which he branded the Liberal party as an enemy to Canadian confederation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is out of order.

[Translation]

TRADE

TEXTILES—EFFECT OF POSSIBLE IMPORTS FROM AUSTRALIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

On January 17, in this house, I asked him about the intention of Australian manufacturers to glut the Canadian market with textile products, and the steps which should be taken to prevent such a threat. The minister took my question as notice. Would he be in a position to give me an answer today?

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

[English]

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. gentleman asked the question, I believe on January 17, I did write him and gave him the information available to us. I have been looking into the matter since and I find that the amount of textiles being imported into Canada from Australia is only in the order of some $30,000 a year, and that is in a particular class of textile related to high fashion. If the hon. member has any specific instance he would like to bring to my attention, I would be glad to take up the matter with my appropriate colleagues.

TRANSPORTATION

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON MARITIME STUDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Minister of Transport, who is bereaved today because of Moby Joe, would permit me to ask whether the report of the special study on maritime transportation is now in his hands, and if so when we might expect to have it before us in the house.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the question is that it is not in my hands.

[Later:]

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which perhaps I should have asked earlier. The Minister of Transport advised us that he does not have the special transportation study in his hands. I am wondering whether he will stop pussyfooting—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

POWER

ESTABLISHMENT OF RESEARCH INSTITUTE BY HYDRO QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether he has had an opportunity to look into the question I asked him yesterday concerning the possible assistance by the government of Canada to the research institution which is to be established by Quebec Hydro.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I inquired this morning and I can say there has been no official correspondence in respect of this matter.

Mr. Fulton: The minister said there was no official correspondence. I should like to ask him whether there have been any official contacts, approaches or considerations made in respect of the matter of federal assistance or co-operation.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to repeat my request of yesterday for more time in order to fully answer the question.

AIR POLLUTION

SUDBURY, ONT.—SULPHUR DIOXIDE LEVEL AT INTERNATIONAL NICKEL PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could answer the other question posed to me yesterday by the hon. member for Kamloops having to do with the SO_2 content at the INCO plant at Sudbury. Officials are aware of the allegations that have been made and I understand that the environmental health division of the Department of National Health and Welfare is making inquiries in this regard. As you may know, I am responsible only in respect of water pollution, not in respect of air or soil pollution.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Will the minister give consideration to the suggestion made in the Ontario legislature that this government take the initiative in working out an acceptable national standard of measure in the anti-air pollution field, and will the minister refer this matter specifically to the council of resource ministers?

Mr. Pepin: I intended at first to give that information, Mr. Speaker, but the Chair is quite severe on us in respect of long answers. The short answer is yes. Last November a conference was held in Montreal on air, land and water pollution. The results of that conference have now been compiled and at the next meeting of the council of resource ministers on May 5 this will be studied. I hope a cleaner understanding will be arrived at between the federal and provincial governments in the subject of the distribution of responsibility in these areas.

FINANCE

DEPOSIT INSURANCE—PROPOSED LEGISLATION IN ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. In the light of varying circumstances can the minister tell us whether he has had negotiations or contacts with the government of the province of Ontario in respect of the announced implementation by that government of deposit insurance? Has he been advised that this is in the nature of a gap filler until federal legislation is implemented?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have had frequent conversations with Mr. Rowntree, the Ontario minister concerned. Our governments are working together as far as it is possible to do so. I understand that the province of Ontario intends to introduce legislation similar to the bill we read the second time last week.

I am very happy to say that Mr. Rowntree has indicated he will require Ontario companies to insure with the federal scheme when it comes into effect. I hope we in this house will be able to proceed with our legislation as quickly as possible.

Mr. Lambert: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister inform the house whether the same arrangements have been made with the province of Quebec?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the government of the province of Quebec has not been in touch with me recently in respect of this matter.

FARM MACHINERY

REPLIES FROM COMPANIES RESPECTING INCREASED PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture and ask him whether he is prepared to indicate why he is withholding the contents of his letters addressed to the machine companies in respect of increased prices, and their replies?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated on several occasions in the house, I am considering the reports and will announce when I make my statement whether it would be in the public interest to table these letters.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Korchinski: I have a supplementary question. In view of the minister's reply is he prepared to indicate whether in his letters he protested the increases, or whether he merely requested an explanation as to the necessity of the increases?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, the request made to the farm machinery companies was for a report as to the factual circumstances in respect of any increases that had been made.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION AND EDUCATION AGAINST NICOTINE ADDICTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to direct to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Perhaps in his absence I may be allowed to address it to his parliamentary secretary. My question relates to the departmental report of yesterday and the minister's telecast of last night, both of which called attention to the link between heart disease and cigarette smoking.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member ask his question.

Mr. Mather: Having this fact in mind, will the minister consider doing what the British and United States authorities have done, namely adopting legislation as well as education to combat nicotine addiction in Canada?

Mrs. Margaret Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will bring this matter to the attention of the minister.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDIA—REPORTED UNJUST TREATMENT OF CANADIAN ENGINEER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Chester MacRae (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is the minister in a position to report on a matter which I drew to his attention three weeks ago, regarding the case of a Canadian citizen who has been very unjustly treated by the government of India?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this matter is being looked into, and as soon as I have a report I will reply to the hon. gentleman's question.

[Mr. Greene.]

TAIWAN—POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF CANADIAN EMBASSY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. I wonder whether he would be kind enough to inform the house whether the hon. member for Leeds has the authority and blessing of the government to negotiate the opening of a Canadian embassy in Taiwan.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, that is not in his terms of reference of his trip.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF NEW GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to pose my question to the Minister of Labour. Now that many of his symposiums with provincial authorities regarding the housing crisis have been completed, will the government announce its new housing policy soon in order that starts can get under way on time this year?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to advise the hon. member that starts are getting under way, though perhaps not as rapidly as we should like. When all the conferences have progressed to the point where we can announce a change in government policy, that will be done.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the serious housing situation is the minister considering the complete abolition of the 11 per cent tax on construction material in order to alleviate this situation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the answer to that question must be no.

Mr. Grafftey: I have a further supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are only two or three minutes left in the question period, and in fairness to other members we should allow them to ask their questions.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

POSSIBLE INCREASES IN CEILING AND BENEFIT RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of his statement this morning to the Canadian Labour Congress, that he shares the view that the ceiling and the benefit rates under the Unemployment Insurance Act should be raised, can he say whether or not this will be done this year?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as I have already advised the house, this depends to some extent on any recommendations that might come from the Unemployment Insurance Commission, to which parliament has delegated certain responsibilities in this field. I can assure the hon. member that so far as the Minister of Labour is concerned, he meant sincerely what he said this morning, and my views are well known. I hope we will receive some recommendations shortly.

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the act permits the government to ask the commission for recommendations, has the government asked for such recommendations?

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I have asked the chief commissioner to let me have his views and those of his fellow commissioners.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

INQUIRY AS TO PREPARATION OF REGULATIONS UNDER ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I intended to direct my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare but in his absence perhaps I can direct it to his parliamentary secretary. Is the hon. lady in a position to tell us how soon the regulations under the Canada Assistance Act will be ready for promulgation so the many very needy cases can obtain assistance as soon as possible?

Mrs. Margaret Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will draw this matter to the attention of the minister.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF CENTENNIAL REPRESENTATIVES FROM EDMONTON, ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, may I bring to the attention of the house the presence in the galleries of a number of truly centennial representatives from Edmonton, Alberta representing Klondike Kate. They are here in our capital for the surveyors' convention.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I can assure the hon. member that this has already been noticed by all of us.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I would like to know whether his close friend and colleague the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Transport was speaking for the government when he wrote a letter to several newspapers in British Columbia which contained the following reference:

> The Crowsnest rate has been referred to, ad infinitum, as the Magna Carta of the western prairies. The analogy is completely erroneous.

Does that represent the government's policy?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I have not seen a report of that statement, Mr. Speaker.

THE BUDGET

ADDITIONAL FINANCIAL MEASURES OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 7, consideration of the motion of Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Monteith.

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned at ten o'clock last night I had just time to introduce the subject with which I want to deal in this budget debate. It has to do with the role of the federal government in the financing of higher education in Canada, particularly universities. I had mentioned that the government announced in October that they were withdrawing from this field, and that I did not like that idea. I want to point out in the course of my remarks today that the federal government has a legitimate role to play in the financing of universities and that they have abdicated this responsibility.

On October 31 the Minister of Finance, speaking for the Prime Minister, made an announcement following the tax sharing agreements with the provinces. He announced that the federal government was going to leave the field of technical and vocational education and the field of university grants and was going to transfer to the provinces four points of personal income taxes and one point of corporation income tax, so that the provinces could handle these responsibilities themselves.

As I said last night they did one positive thing in their announcement in October.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I bring to the attention of hon. members that it is very unfair to carry on conversations in the way it is being done at the moment when a member of the house if trying to deliver a speech. I suggest that conversations that are essential and urgent should be carried out behind the curtains.

Mr. Prittie: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Speaking on motions on October 31 I did say that there was one positive result of the government's announcement on that day. It was announced that the government would concern itself with the field of adult education, and the following definition of "adult education" was given. I will quote the remarks of the Minister of Finance from page 9290 of Hansard of October 31:

> We must recognize that rapid technological and industrial change now require more and more training and retraining of adults. This is of fundamental importance if full employment and increased productivity are to be achieved. The federal government has a responsibility for ensuring that the required training is financially possible for people in the labour force.
> For this purpose, the federal government proposes to pay training allowances directly to adults who are taking occupational training, in place of sharing provincial costs as we are now doing.

A little farther on he goes on to define who adults are. He says:

> Our proposal was to define an adult as one who has been three years out of school and in the labour force. Several of the provinces felt this was unduly restrictive. We undertook to discuss immediately with the provinces whether some modified definition is possible which would meet more of the training needs of people who have been in the labour force for less than three years, while still preserving the important distinction between this training program and the school system.

I agree completely with that step. I think that the federal government should concern itself with the field of adult education, and indeed the job cannot be done properly in any other way. Unfortunately it has taken a very narrow view of the word "education" as it is carried on in the regular institutions of learning such as elementary and secondary schools, universities, community colleges, and so on. It seems to me a very narrow point of view and one which cannot be defended.

As I have stated in the past, one can reasonably argue that the federal government has a role to play in the field of university financing. The move which the government made is wrong on two counts. It gave the provinces too great a control of the universities. I think it is a healthy thing that universities in this country should receive their money from several sources. They receive money from the provincial governments, they receive some money from the federal government, and they receive money from private sources. Furthermore they still collect, unfortunately, a great deal in student fees. I believe that if the universities of this country are to have the type of independence which they should have, their revenues should come from several sources so that no one source can have complete control over the educational institution. I realize that universities cannot be completely independent; all educational institutions have to respond in some way to the society which they serve. However, they should have as much independence as is possible, and I do not think this can be achieved if they receive all their money from one source.

The difficulties from too great a provincial control have been borne out since the government statement at the end of October. We have the example of McGill University in Montreal. This university is not receiving from the province of Quebec the amount of money which it feels it needs to operate during the next year. I do not blame the province of Quebec. They may have very good reasons for not taking out of their provincial revenues and giving to McGill as much money as that university requires. The educational responsibilities in that province are very great at the present time. It is trying to build new universities and colleges and to establish new institutes of education. However, the important point here is that McGill is not just a provincial institution. It does not just serve the province of Quebec. It serves all of Canada. A great many of its students come from other provinces. It has specialized graduate schools to which people must come if they want that kind of education in Canada. So the point here is that McGill is a national institution serving the whole country, and therefore it should receive some of its funds from the whole nation.

My second point is in connection with my own province, British Columbia. Just the other day the premier of the province, who is also the provincial minister of finance, announced that the three universities in British Columbia will receive $53 million next year for their operating and capital building costs. Now, the president of the University of British Columbia, Dr. John B. MacDonald has said that the three universities would require as a minimum $66 million for the coming year. Under the transfer of funds which is to take place from the federal government to the provinces by means of the transfer of certain taxes, British Columbia will get for university purposes about $28.6 million during the next year. I do not know whether the provincial government is going to apply all of that to the universities of the province. It may be that they are, and it may be that they are not; I do not know. The point is that the grant is unconditional. There is no guarantee that once a province receives that money the universities will get their share. Here we have the universities of British Columbia that are going to be short $13 million this year at a time when enrolments are rising, when they are in competition with universities all over the world for staff and when they can look forward to increasing enrolments in subsequent years.

As I have pointed out in past debates, a very good case can be made for federal involvement in higher education, that is at the university level. I have stated in the house in the past that when the Fathers of Confederation used the word "education", they probably meant the type of education which existed in Canada at that time and which was mainly primary school education. We did not have very many high schools in Canada in 1867, and very few colleges and universities. Most of the schools were primarily of the one room, country school type. I am sure the Fathers of Confederation did not have in mind higher education because there was virtually none in existence in the country at that time, very few institutions.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Laval University.

Mr. Prittie: Yes, it is exactly that.

[English]

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that the University of Laval existed, McGill and some others, but there were not many.

It is always interesting when you can get some good, academic support for the point of view you are trying to advance. I should like to quote rather extensively today, Mr. Speaker, from a speech made by Dr. J. A. Corry, principal of Queen's University and which was published in "University Affairs", December, 1966. This speech was delivered in October, just at the time of the federal-provincial tax-sharing conference. The Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) was to have spoken at that meeting, but Dr. Corry had to take her place. He said his views were probably different from those of the Secretary of State. In this case, I am very glad the Secretary of State could not speak because I very much like the views outlined by Dr. Corry. I want to quote rather extensively from this speech because I believe these views do constitute support from a very distinguished academic for the role of the federal government in education:

> Let us look at first principles. On first principles, where should the responsibility for education rest in a federation? The answer is not easy.

May I interject to say that is probably the understatement of the year: The answer is not easy.

> On the one hand, any denial in 1867 of provincial control of education in and for the province would have made a mockery of plans for ensuring provincial autonomy. No community, then or now, can ensure its life or mould its future unless it has the say on education in that community. In any vital federal system, the province must be able to shape the main features of education in and for the province.
> On the other hand, if there is indeed a nation to be spoken for and protected, then the federal government—

Again, I interject, Mr. Speaker, to add that the word "nation" as Dr. Corry has used it is the ordinary meaning of that word in the English language. I realize this may be different from the way it is used in French. He speaks of the nation, the state or the country.

> On the other hand, if there is indeed a nation to be spoken for and protected, then the federal government must speak for the nation, take steps to ensure its survival and nourish its growth. If the nation is also a living community, it cannot be shut out of all influence on the direction of education. At times, it may be that mere adding up of the educational effort of ten provinces will give a sum that covers federal concern in education. At other times, it will not, and then parliament and the government of Canada must have the power to give special emphasis and some direction to selected aspects of education. When that emphasis and direction will be needed must depend on the exigencies of particular times.

I continue quoting from another part of the speech:

Let us look at this matter in the widest possible frame. The training of the militia, a citizen army, is a form of education. In 1867 the Fathers of Confederation did not hesitate to confer that authority on the federal parliament because a sturdy trained militia might well be vital to the security of the nation. Today, when a sturdy militia, whether well trained or not, seems largely irrelevant other forms of much more sophisticated skill are vital to the nation. At any rate, the arguments of the Economic Council of Canada are fully convincing to me and I shall not rehearse them here.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the following sentence is, I believe, a most important one in Dr. Corry's speech.

In the competition of nations for power, place and welfare, the prizes are going to the countries that bet on education. Can the body responsible for the peace, order and good government of Canada blandly assume that ten provincial governments, each thinking for itself and about its own needs, will produce all the highly educated skills that are needed? The government of Canada, on mandates given to parliament by the people of Canada undertakes a wide range of complex functions, many of which call for civil servants with a great variety of skills. Does the government of Canada do its duty if it fails to make sure that enough people acquire these skills?

I will not quote the next paragraph in the speech which has to do with the bilingual responsibility of the federal government. The inference is that this should be a proper concern of the federal government in bilingual education. This is an idea that I heartily support, but I will omit that paragraph at the moment. I am very glad that the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) is here because he has a great interest in these matters, and I think he will want to listen particularly to the next paragraph.

But it will be asked, does not section 93 of the British North America Act give exclusive power over education to the provinces? This is correct, subject to a limitation that is likely to become more portentous as time goes on. Literally, the words of section 93 are, "in and for each province, the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education." If there are national needs and objectives that require concerted educational policy in two, several, or all provinces, no provincial legislature is by itself competent in the matter, and judicial interpretation on other comparable aspects of the distribution of powers under the British North America Act makes it clear that parliament is competent under "the peace, order and good government" clause.

It must be on this ground that Prime Minister Pearson, in his proposal to the federal-provincial conference now meeting asserted federal jurisdiction in the training and retraining of adults for participation in the labour force. It is to be hoped that a reading of this particular assertion along with other general disclaimers in the text of his proposal about federal authority in education will not give rise to inferences that the federal government has neither status or lively concern in the education of highly skilled and highly educated manpower in the universities. It would be incongruous to be asserting federal authority over training for run-of-the-mill jobs in the labour force and abandoning it totally for all professional, scientific and technical personnel educated by the universities. It is the latter who will be critical for national objectives in the future.

At a time when the federal government is attempting to make clear that it has a constitutional responsibility for adult retraining programs, for research, and for cultural development, and that these are not, constitutionally speaking, educational matters falling within the jurisdiction of the provinces, from which the federal authority is excluded, I think it timely to recall that in 1867 none of the newly formed provinces regarded university and college education as being a matter for provincial jurisdiction. All the universities then existing (including my own) operated under royal charters or other non-provincial authority. Since then provincially supported institutions have developed but these were not considered to be the exclusive responsibility of the provinces. Indeed it is worth noting that McGill University and Queen's University, to name only two, were in the habit of appealing from time to time to business, industry and individual benefactors on the grounds that they were private institutions catering to a national (and in some respects international) constituency.

It is only within very recent years, since the provinces have provided immensely increased support for universities that they have become concerned to exercise substantially increased control. To the best of my knowledge no province has yet claimed exclusive jurisdictional control. Universities and colleges are free to solicit funds from business, industry, foundations and benefactors inside and outside the province, inside and outside Canada. Most provinces in addition are prepared to accept a federal concern and the federal government should be reluctant to disclaim its concern.

I feel that this federal concern is there and should be exercised by the federal government.

Federal concern, Mr. Speaker, does not mean complete federal control. Regardless of its recent announcement the federal government will continue to provide some finance for universities. For example, through agencies such as the National Research Council, the Defence Research Board, the Canada Council and the Humanities Council funds do pass from Ottawa to universities across the country. But it seems to me that it is very artificial to separate this aspect of research from the general field of university education, particularly graduate education.

I feel that there should be some agency here in Ottawa which will concern itself with this whole field of university education and post-graduate education as well as with general grants for research. If we are afraid of appellations like "department of education" or "office of education", we do not have to use them. We could call such a body a department of science and technology. I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, that Dean Bladen in making his report on higher education in Canada recommended that all of the agencies in the federal government concerned with making grants to education should be responsible to one minister. This recommendation is to be found at page 67 of the Bladen report.

I now come, Mr. Speaker, to this question: Why did the federal government take the stand it did and say that it would concern itself with adult education for people who have been out of school for three years, but that it would forget about existing universities? I think this decision was taken particularly as a result of the advice given to the government by the so-called three wise men who entered the Liberal party a year ago. I am not using those words sarcastically in referring to the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Pelletier), the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand); they are all very intelligent men.

However, Mr. Speaker, these hon. members are trying to develop the theory that all of the provinces should be on exactly the same footing as the province of Quebec. For example, if there is any objection from Quebec to there being a federal concern in a certain field, then they contend the federal government should have nothing to do with that particular field. Hence they are saying to the other provinces that Quebec is withdrawing from a certain program or a certain field, and they put all provinces on the same basis.

They are arguing, Mr. Speaker, against the case which others have made during the past few years that Quebec is not a province like the others. I would agree, Mr. Speaker; I think Quebec is not a province like the others. It is a different case and we should recognize this. The very fact that Quebec has a very large language group, which carries with it its own culture, does make that province different from the others. If Quebec has to be dealt with differently in some aspects of national policy, then let us recognize this fact.

Even the United Kingdom, which is not a federal state but a unitary state, recognizes it must deal with different language groups. Take the case of Scotland. If by mistake you asked a Scotsman from which part of England he came, then you should stand back and wait for the blow. The same is true of the Welshman. This difference is recognized in the United Kingdom. Scotland has a different type of educational system from England. The British Broadcasting Corporation operates a separate Scottish service and in Wales even broadcasts in the Welsh language. Scotland has its own laws. So as I say, Mr. Speaker, the United Kingdom does recognize this fact. The parliament of Westminster, of course, makes laws for the whole of the United Kingdom; but there is recognition that the people who live in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland are different from those who live in England and in some respects, including education, require different treatment.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there would be no great objection from most of the provinces to a continuing federal role and federal concern in university education. This concern may be directed through a government department, or could be handled in the way university grants were handled previously, through the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada. If this is the best way then perhaps we should use that channel.

If there is a vital objection from the province of Quebec to a certain proposal then we can make a special case and treat that province differently. But it seems to me that the government is moving in the wrong direction. At a time when, as Dr. Corry has pointed out, the prizes in the world go to the best-educated nation, it seems to me that we must move in the direction of some type of federal concern. I am using the word "concern" deliberately and not the word "control". I think that the federal government has to put up some of the money and show some of the leadership.

I should like to illustrate one area where leadership in higher education is necessary. We do not have unlimited resources in Canada to give grants to all our universities. Universities are very expensive. Scientific training and graduate training are expensive. I do not think that every university in Canada can have a medical school or that every university in the country can have a nuclear physics department. Therefore some decision must be made as to where a given specialization should be located.

I think that this has to be done on some type of national basis, with the government in Ottawa giving some leadership. Yesterday the Department of Forestry and Rural Development issued a press release announcing that the department was making equal grants to the forestry faculties of the University of New Brunswick, Laval University, University of Toronto and the University of British Columbia. These happen to be the only four schools of forestry in Canada. Perhaps they are all we need, I do not know; but this is the sort of thing with which some federal authority has to concern itself.

We are not going to make very much progress, Mr. Speaker, if we keep surrendering any possible leadership which can be shown here to the provinces. Ten provincial systems of education—and again I specify university education—do not add up to a national system. It seems to me that we are going to fall very much behind other countries which have shown some type of national concern.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I want to deal with the situation in the United States where the constitutional position is almost the same. It is generally recognized that the predominant authority in education in the United States is in the hands of the individual states, and they run the elementary and secondary schools. But the United States federal government has set up a federal office of education which allocates funds in very great amounts to universities throughout all the states, and as far as I can determine no great objection is taken to this. I hope that before too many years pass we will think this situation through and try to reverse the unfortunate decision taken by the present government last fall after the conference with the provinces.

My last point, Mr. Speaker, is that I do not think there would be very great objection to a similar proposal on the part of most provinces. If we do have to make a special case let us admit the fact, and make special provision for whichever province may object.

Mr. Terence Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin my remarks today in a manner that always gives me the greatest pleasure. I should like to thank the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) for his courtesy in making it possible for me to be heard now, rather than himself. One of the more pleasant aspects of being a member of this house is that a political adversary, in recognizing a certain situation, can make a kind gesture of friendship such as this. I offer my heartfelt thanks, and I am grateful.

I am pleased to have the floor at this time because today, from Edmonton, a distinguished group sits in Mr. Speaker's gallery. They are distinguished because they show that spirit that I am proud to think is Edmonton's. These people are dressed in the Klondike garb of the gay '90's. They bring to Ottawa a little of the spirit of Edmonton.

The National Surveyors Association has decided for the first time that it will hold its convention elsewhere than in Ottawa. It will hold the convention in Edmonton. In honour of this, our good friends in the gallery have the spirit to visit this city. This is something which must be encouraged.

They have brought down Klondike Kate; in fact, 26 charming people have come down. The men are dashing, gallant and handsome; the ladies beautiful, charming and gracious. I deny that these people were hand picked for these qualities; they form only a cross-section of Edmonton. If you visit our city you will find our streets filled with such beautiful, charming and gracious people.

Mr. Nugent: I also want to thank hon. members of the house for their courteous consideration, for that spontaneous parade staged around the dining room today. It was not done for advertising. Because so many of my friends were interested in seeing the beautiful girls, I asked them to walk around, that my friends for a few moments might see what I enjoy so much always in Edmonton.

I am afraid, having spoken so kindly in the house, that I shall now have to fire a few volleys I have saved over a considerable period. Having spoken kindly of everybody, I shall now revert to my normal self. At times I might sound critical, and when my hon. friends on the other side hear me, it might occur to them that they have made mistakes. If I enlarge on their errors, it simply means that those errors may be more fundamental than hon. members on the other side realize. What I have to say involves the Canadian people. If I complain about this institution, about parliament, which hon. members opposite do not seem to understand, it is because of what the Liberal government is doing to Canada.

The whole country is concerned about where it is going. Some of us are more concerned with this question than others. I, for one, cannot understand these commissions inquiring into the status of women, or into our two languages—I refer to the B and B Commission. What utter balderdash they are. Nobody married needs to be educated about the status of women. Anybody with half a brain in his head knows he has to learn two things quickly: to say "Yes, dear" when she is right, and "Yes, dear" when she is wrong. That is the situation a man has to cope with, and it needs no royal commission to tell him that. That is the situation existing.

I do not care how many reports the B and B Commission brings in, they will not help me to learn French. I shall learn far more French by meeting one of those charming ladies from Hull, Edmontons' twin city.

There are no difficulties between English and French speaking Canada. That question I settled long ago. I have a secretary from Quebec, and when I do anything wrong she tells me. She can straighten me out more effectively than any B and B Commission could.

Our charming people from Edmonton display the Canadian spirit in a way that makes us all in this country proud to be Canadians. They are prepared to travel over Canada, to the United States and to Europe advertising the existence of their city and its charms. So long as we have people like that we need not worry about who Canadians are. Canadians are individuals. A Canadian is that type of individual with the gumption to be what he wants to be. He respects his neighbour's right to be the kind of Canadian he wants to be. Who wants people stamped from a pattern? Who are those who say that Canadians should be recognizable, by our friends across the pond and by our neighbours to the south, as coming from a distinct pattern? The greatest compliment that can be paid to us is that we are not typed, not stamped. Because you can go anywhere in the world and be recognized as an individual is the greatest compliment anybody can pay you.

We have the heritage of free speech in our democratic society. We have the right to be individuals. Are these not the objectives of our society? Who are those people so afraid of being themselves? Who is afraid of not being recognized, of not being taken for a Canadian. What is wrong with us? Is it that fear in the atomic age has strenghtened the herd instinct. Has the danger in the world herded us together? Why is there this unreasoning fear that we shall not be recognized as Canadians? I tell you, Mr. Speaker, when the time comes that Canadians can be picked out of a crowd, when other people can say that a Canadian does this, is this, and behaves this way, I shall leave. I shall not put up with that.

I am proud of being a Canadian. I have nothing against the United States—I have many excellent friends, first cousins, in many states, and many acquaintances in that country. But I would rather be a Canadian, because here we are individuals. The individuality of the Canadian is something our neighbours envy.

In our society we have ten times the freedom that conventional types of men have. Conventionally stamped men are so restricted that they cannot appreciate the freedom of being an individual. That is the freedom I appreciate in Canada. That is what I hope every Canadian student, growing up in our land, will appreciate, care for, and cherish.

There are actions which are taken for the right motives, but which are distrusted because they are done in the wrong way. I am sure we are all familiar with one illustration which I might use in this connection; there are some people who can tell a joke well, and others who simply cannot do so. This is all I have to say by way of introduction to my next thought, which concerns the way in which this government operates. The manner in which a thing is done is just as important as the object which is being sought. I made the same observation during the flag debate. Perhaps on reflection hon. members sitting opposite will come to understand the importance of doing things the right way. Mr. Mackenzie King began with a committee of about 20 members. He gave them unlimited time, told them the government would agree with whatever the committee decided, and the result was unanimity in the committee, except for one member. Then Jean Lesage said: "If you accept that decision I will destroy the Liberal Party in Quebec." So the government could not go any further.

By contrast, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) made a political football of the issue from the start. Only after fighting positions had been taken did he refer the matter to a committee. As a result, the flag which was introduced is still associated in the minds of far too many people with the cavalier and idiotic way in which it was imposed. There are political overtones. It is a Grit flag, rather than the unifying symbol which the government said Canada would be given.

How can we in this country accomplish anything if decisions are to be taken in this way? Those who wanted to change the national flag may have been in a majority in Canada. Those of us who did not think a change was necessary were certainly prepared to follow the majority, if change was what they wanted. There is no doubt that the majority of Canadians wanted to be proud of that flag; they wanted a national symbol around which to rally. And there is no doubt that the majority of Canadians were sadly disappointed by the manner in which the change was brought about.

I am afraid that what the government is doing through the commission on bilingualism and biculturalism is having the same disturbing effect. It has never been my belief that differences can be healed by talking about them, rather than by curing their causes. If I have a quarrel with my neighbour there is no point in having a discussion as to how we express ourselves in our quarrel. But this is what the B and B commission is doing. We need to find out what it is that French Canadians resent about us in the west, and what we in the west resent about French speaking Canadians.

I suggest that despite a lack of understanding, due in part to an exaggerated importance being given to symbols, there is, in fact, complete identity of purpose between the province of Quebec and western Canada as to what both wish Canada to be. When I was in Quebec city, I found the people there living a western mode of life, if I may be excused for expressing myself in that way. Their hospitality was overwhelming—the kind of hospitality we talk about in the west but do not always find.

They were French but, if they will forgive me for saying so, they thought like westerners, and when I heard their complaints about Canada they reminded me very much of the expressions westerners used back in the 'thirties about "Bay Street crooks" hogging all the money, while we did not have enough to go around. There are one or two things which are basically wrong and which affect relations between French speaking and English speaking Canada. In the province of Quebec the ordinary labourer is paid less than his counterpart across this country, and the Quebec farmer generally receives a lower income than do farmers elsewhere. Our problem, then, is very simple and its solution is: monetary justice for Quebec.

When this party formed the government it was supported by a very large number of members from western Canada. We still have most of them, thank God. But I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that those members from western Canada were realists. They were not unduly concerned about symbols. They wanted legislation which would put some bread on the table and ensure a few of the amenities of life for the people they represented. They wanted legislation which would put some money in their pockets and lead to a better standard of living. And that was the legislation which was brought in.

I do not want to be too critical of our French colleagues but I am afraid they were not as persuasive as they might have been. They spent too much time in the discussion of symbols, such as cheques written in both official languages. There was not forthcoming from that group in the house the necessary flow of suggestions for increasing the economic wealth of the province of Quebec.

I will admit that we did not do the great job for Quebec that we did for the rest of Canada. We did a good job for western Canada, though, and this did help all of Canada. I cannot blame the citizens of Quebec who say: Lord, how long must we wait for our turn; we are being discriminated against. It is not discrimination against Quebec. But the man whose family is going short of the amenities of life cannot be expected to appreciate the distinction between failure by intent, and failure with the best of intentions. He is not likely to be impressed by people who say: We will give you a flag and make you feel more Canadian.

I had not intended to be vehement on this subject, but I want my hon. friends from western Canada to understand something which I believe they have so far failed, to some extent, to appreciate. When you yourselves find that things are getting along much better, when westerners engaged in farming and in industry now have a real opportunity to reap a good return for their labour, it is harder to realize that there are areas in this country which are not so favoured. When the disagreement or the unhappiness in Quebec is expressed by way of symbolism that we in the west cannot understand, it leads to a widening of misunderstanding between various parts of the country. I know that French Canadians are exactly the same type of Canadians as the western Canadians, but the people in western Canada do not know it, and the people in Quebec do not know it because we have had so much talk about the symbols, so much talk about the side effects and the politics of it.

As I have said before in this house, it is as simple as this: the people of Quebec want simple justice. You take away that core that gives them a solid complaint and then there is nothing to exaggerate on; give them simple justice, and the rabble rousers, the separatists and unreasonable people will get no audience whatsoever.

There is no basic difficulty of Canadianism between Canadians, but there is that one problem which we shall always have to watch, and the solution is a matter of simple justice. What the Conservative government did for western Canada, the pieces of legislation we brought in that were so helpful to raise the standard of living out there, must be matched for Quebec in legislation by the federal government. I cannot believe that any amount of handouts, any raise in pensions, or any raising of grants is going to do anything to help solve this problem.

I am proud to be a Canadian and the reason I believe I am like my French Canadian friends is that they do not want handouts. They do not want assistance. They only want justice. All they ask of the government is: Quit giving us pensions; quit giving us commissions and assistance; give us simple justice; give us a chance to earn that kind of living which hard work and our native ingenuity can provide and we will be very happy to say we are all equal Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think I could end on a happier note than to hope the house will agree with those last words of mine.

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the kind words from the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Nugent) I rather hesitate to confess that in actual fact, since the lovely young ladies are sitting directly above him, I was trying to catch their eye and had nodded my head to them, not knowing he had been asking me for my consent to speak before me. Thus I accommodated the hon. gentleman; but I think I would do it again.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) has left the chamber. I was going to congratulate him on his tenacity for remaining throughout the debate, although many of the subjects touched upon have had little to do with his department. However, I wish to talk about some points which I think will be of interest to all Canadians, and especially to the minister's department, when it comes to the preparation of the financial items to be presented in the main budget.

By and large, Mr. Speaker, I believe we all recognize that for the next few years we are going to be concerned with the repatriation of our industrial destiny. I am not concerned with the amount of control, as is the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gordon), and neither are Canadians in general, because control is really an ambiguous thing. I believe Canadians are concerned with the goodies, the dividends, the profits. These are the things they want; and it is no great mystery, because anywhere one goes throughout Canada he cannot help noticing the great mountains of raw materials we have.

It is no secret that we Canadians have a monopoly of uranium. It is an obvious fact that we have a seaway running into the middle of our country. We have the Churchill Falls project now developing. We are rich in hydro power and fresh water. In short, we have an advantage but are troubled that we cannot use it, that we cannot get dividends and profits from it. We know this advantage is being developed, but we also know we do not appreciably share the benefits of it, especially when we compare ourselves with countries like Germany and France, where the action is, but which do not have half the resources that we possess.

This is the problem that concerns Canadians. It is the problem that concerns the cabinet. It is the problem that concerns the Liberal party. We have these good intentions, but the problem is that we could be described as a government of innocence—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Otto: —a government of innocence, in the sense of people who are innocent, who could be naïve and fail to face the realities of life. It might be said that with our good intentions we may even be paving the road to oblivion. As the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona said, good intentions are not enough: We have to face reality. We cannot be naïve. We have to be slightly cynical. We have to be realists. This is the problem that faces us with respect to control of industry or repatriation of our industry.

We know that 67 per cent of our industrial strength belongs to foreigners. We also know that about 80 cents out of every dollar invested in mines goes to promoters' profit and only 20 cents, if that, goes into the ground. Recent history has shown us that when we try to get Canadians enthused about buying into Canadian companies, something like the Prudential collapse or the Atlantic collapse happens. We run into problems like that of the Western Bank and the Mercantile Bank.

There is a deep rooted problem which must be solved before we can accomplish what we are trying to accomplish. Even if we had the Canadian Development Corporation and got people convinced that they should buy into Canadian industry, and even if the Minister without Portfolio, with all his restrictive measures, could force Americans to throw their shares on to the stock exchange like confetti, nobody will pick them up because of a fundamental weakness at the stock exchange and the security exchange level.

This is where we have failed. In this area we have said that the responsibility under the B.N.A. Act is given to the provinces. The blame is placed on an antiquated piece of paper, which no one has any faith in, but the provisions of which have been overcome many times. In actual fact the B.N.A. Act will permit us to do anything.

We have been able to pass hospital insurance legislation. We have passed the pension legislation, medicare, and assistance to education. We know what has to be done in this regard and I will venture to suggest—and I hope the minister gets the message—how it can be done. We must clear up this whole stock exchange fiasco. We cannot expect Canadians to put in good money and have it disappear into great mansions on Post Road in Toronto, great palaces in Bermuda, yachts, and so on. In other words, we must convince Canadians that if they invest a dollar in a Canadian company they will receive a return. They must be assured that that money will go into the industry, or into the ground, and not into someone's pockets. This is the first task which faces us.

We have already heard about the Canada Development Corporation. I do not think it will be successful if the corporation buys up shares and then tries out some method of distributing them. I think Canadians are so security conscious now, as they should be after the experiences they have had, that they want some stamp of guarantee. You know, we do this in respect of mortgages. We have a National Housing Act and are trying to get Canadians to invest in bricks and mortar. We guarantee this: We say that if you put in $1,000 you will get it back. So, naturally we are great mortgage investors. But, when it comes to shares and equities, we are not yet becoming involved, but there is no reason why this cannot be done.

I would have introduced a private member's bill in such a way that the Canadian Development Corporation would ensure the purchase price of shares of approved companies. This is not so radical as it may seem. It is done every day. This is the job of the commercial banker. If you have a thousand shares of General Motors, General Electric, or any shares, and go to a commercial bank, they will insure them for you. The only thing is that you have to deal with million dollar lots, and a small investor cannot take advantage of that insurance. So we must make provision for this. In that way, without going to the stock exchanges and the provinces telling them that they must abide by our regulations, we can accomplish exactly the same thing by stipulating which companies will be approved by the corporation, and which shares will be approved for insurance. In that way we could control the administration of these stock exchanges.

There is the matter of the prospectus. I am sure you have read many Canadian prospectuses. You can put just about anything in them, so long as it is true. You do not include in them the fact that there is no gold in this particular moose pasture. All you say is that Dr. Jones, a famous geologist, says that in such and such an area of Tanganyika they have found 90 per cent gold, and this type of thing. They have a perfect right to do this, and this is how we get hoodwinked. If you have ever seen the United States prospectuses, especially those filed with the Securities Exchange Commission, you will know that they are not allowed to do this. It is practically a matter of true and false: Is there gold or is there no gold; what is the company's future and what is not the company's future. What we must do in our regulations, before we approve of these shares which will come within the Canadian Development Corporation, is say that we will not take them unless the prospectus follows a certain pattern and is absolutely factual.

Then, there are the financial statements. We should be able to approve of the financial statements. We do not want to see at the bottom of them a statement by the accountant to the effect that the information supplied is only from documents given to him and therefore that he does not accept responsibility for them. Every chartered accountant firm, or any person who is doing the accounting for a public company which wants to be approved, must say that he guarantees the particulars as of that date. Then you would find there would be a big change and that we would not get into as many of these Prudential and other messes as we have.

Now, let us take the directors of the companies. In the United States, and in fact in most countries where there are successful industries and successful corporate structures at least 50 per cent or 51 per cent of the directors of the companies make their money from the companies. In Canada, except for the president, none of the directors depend on the company for a living. Some very strange disclosures came out last night in the evidence of Mr. Stevens of Westbank. He said that one of the plums of a directorship in any Canadian bank is the right to borrow about $10 million from that bank. This is what the directors are there for. They do not know the banking business, they do not know the construction business and they do not know the manufacturing business. I would say they are professional directors—the elite; they are very conservative and very cautions. How do they make their money? They make their money on the subscription of the shares, because they have control over when the shares will be issued, and by that time they have sold their own.

So, one can see that we have a faulty mechanism. If we insist, before the shares of a company are acceptable to the Canadian Development Corporation, that at least 51 per cent of the directors are internal directors, sales managers, production managers, and so on, then you would have people who would depend on that company and on that industry for a living. We would also have to simplify the procedures. There is no reason that it should cost about $250,000 or $300,000 to put a company on the stock market. By the time you get through with the bonus shares, rights and privileges, there is very little left. Out of $4 million that the investors put in, only $2 million, after the promotion costs, winds up in the treasury of the company and with this the company must try to make a profit to pay the $4 million invested. This is something which must be remedied.

Then, there is the shareholders register. I do not know whether or not anyone has ever tried to contest the directorship of a company. The inside directors know exactly who the shareholders are and, at the expense of the company, they can send out proxies to all the shareholders and, since most of the shareholders send them back, they are in control. But if you are a shareholder and want the list of shareholders, you must give six months' notice, pay the cost, which sometimes is about $18,000, and then by the time you get it is six months behind and therefore is useless to you. You can, however, buy a directorship of a company; it is practically on the market.

This must not continue, because we will not be successful in any of our efforts in respect of the Canadian Development Corporation or in respect of getting Canadians to purchase the shares in companies unless we get this straightened away. The way in which to do it is to set up regulations with which the companies must comply before the government will accept them into the Canadian Development Corporation, and put its stamp of approval on them. When you have done that, no company will be able to opt out of this, because if they do no one will buy the shares. They will all come in; and if all the companies come in, then you will have exactly the same regulations you would have if you change the security exchange commissions.

There is no excuse at all for the government saying "Oh, we would like to do it but we cannot because of the British North America Act". The most overrated piece of dead fish I have ever heard of or read in my life is the British North America Act. It was devised at a time when we were worried about the American invasion. This was 100 years ago, when the provincial and federal rights were absolutely different from what they are now, and even the responsibilities. If we take the initiative first and do this, we can get around it, and no one will contest it; because after all Canadians, regardless of where they live, do not give a darn whether it is a provincial right or a federal right. They do not even know it. They are disgusted to know that they are electing provincial members and federal members in order that they can sit down and fight with each other.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Otto: Yes.

Mr. Herridge: Does he not realize that the British North America Act to which he referred as a dead fish was drafted in Canada and was simply accepted by the British House of Commons as a formality, and that this document was the wish of the Canadians at that time.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Otto: The hon. gentleman made an important statement when he said "at that time". The gentlemen who drafted the agreement are dead, and they had no idea what Canada was going to be like today. I do not blame the British government at all, and I have not said that I do. I said that this was a dead piece of fish as far as we are concerned. I do not understand this continual harping about inherited privileges and responsibilities. To suggest that we have certain rights because our ancestors did something is one thing, but the question is what are we going to do today. That is the situation we must face.

The federal government is at this time responsible for the canal systems. This was perhaps necessary for defence purposes, but I do not understand why canal systems should now be under federal jurisdiction. I think we would be better off if they were under provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Herridge: That would not help us.

Mr. Otto: I am suggesting that we should disregard the act and take the initial steps, because we want Canadians to buy shares in their companies. We must admit that even if the United States gave us the shares we probably would not accept them because basically we are not share buyers. We are cautious and apprehensive because our money has come to us the hard way, through sweat and saving. The only money which is invested in shares is money come by easily. Money received from dividends will be reinvested, and we need that kind of money. We must induce Canadians not to put their money into bricks and mortar and not to buy mortgages or perhaps even government bonds. Let us sell our bonds to the United States, because we want Canadians to buy equity. Equity grows and brings dividends and profits. These profits can be used for further industrial expansion.

The only way we can accomplish this is by providing some sort of guarantee, and this will not work unless we clean up this whole investment field. One cannot expect good results from good intentions if the basis is wrong. Let us make sure the basis is right. We must acknowledge that in spite of what we do we must have a clearinghouse. Canadians must be able to buy equity through a Canadian clearinghouse; but as long as the rules of such a clearinghouse allow corruption, corruption will take place. The result will be that Canadians will lose faith and we will not accomplish what we are trying to accomplish.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I was intrigued by the assertion of the hon. member who has just taken his seat that we have a government of innocents. He implied that the government has not been able to deal with all the problems which have faced this country because they are innocent. The hon. gentleman has not been here as long as many members on the government front benches, but let me tell him that I recall when they sat on this side of the house and said they had all the answers to our problems. At the time the previous administration was laying the foundations for the prosperity we are now enjoying, hon. members now sitting on the government side travelled from one end of this country to the other claiming they had all the answers, and belittling the foundations for prosperity then being placed on the statute books.

This government of innocents has brought about the highest cost of living, the highest interest rates, the tightest money policy and the highest burden of debt on the individual, municipal, provincial and federal governments in the entire history of this country.

This government of innocents has created a situation in which our balance of payments is almost greater than at any other time in our history. We have a trade deficit in spite of our rising exports. Perhaps what is worse is the declining influence of this nation in the councils of the world. One must also keep in mind the labour unrest which has developed in this country in the last two years. We should also consider the number of bankruptcies and financial finaglings that have taken place furing the last two years. We must then look at those innocents opposite and ask ourselves why they did not do something during the period they have been in office to come to grips with the problems which have faced Canadians.

Only a few short years ago when those gentlemen were on this side of the house they said the pigeonholes were filled with answers to the problems of this nation. These pigeonholes are still filled, because this government has failed to supply those answers, and bring forward legislation to solve our problems.

In this centennial year, three years after the government came into office, we find the present Minister of Finance, (Mr. Sharp) still faced with problems of bankruptcy, and that there are other serious problems faced by individuals in our society who are trying to find a place in this country and do something to make this the nation it should be.

Mr. Sharp: Just think how much more prosperous it is.

Mr. Nasserden: If the minister believes that the highest consumer debt in the history of this country represents prosperity, then let him laugh and point to that with pride. If he thinks the highest interest rates in the history of our country is something to laugh about, then let him laugh.

Mr. Sharp: I am pleased about the lower rate of unemployment.

Mr. Nasserden: Millions of Canadians today must face the increasing costs and increasing taxation which this government has brought about as a result of waste and extravagance in the administration of the affairs of this nation.

Mr. Sharp: I have not heard any suggestions from the hon. gentleman about how to reduce these expenditures.

Mr. Nasserden: What is the government opposite doing to solve these problems? They are the ones who said the pigeonholes were filled with answers. The government has set up one royal commission after another to study these serious problems, but in the past several years they have not attempted to find a solution to them. Most of the measures adopted by the government have been window dressing.

I remember when the minister brought his budget in some months ago. Apparently at that time he did not think it would be necessary to bring in a mini-budget. At that time he pointed out the unemployment figures to show how they had gone down, but he does not talk about the unemployment situation today. In my hand I have a copy of the Ottawa Citizen of February 8 which indicates that unemployment is increasing. I do not intend to read the figures, but this is another indication of what has happened as a result of the careless administration of the government opposite.

A great deal has been said about the housing situation in Canada. I should like to congratulate the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) upon sponsoring a series of seminars in this country. I had the privilege of attending one held at Regina, the capital city of Saskatchewan. At that seminar the Minister of Labour contradicted himself in much the same way this government has contradicted itself on so many occasions. When the question of the 11 per cent sales tax and its effect on the cost of housing in this country was brought up by one of the contractors at that meeting, the Minister of Labour had the audacity to suggest that, after all, there was no reason why there should not be a tax on building supplies, since there was a tax on everything else. He forgot the important objective of successive governments in this country, to try to do something with regard to the provision of a measure of housing development which would take care of the needs of the new Canadian families which are continually entering our labour markets. When I look at what this government has done with regard to housing and when I think of this 11 per cent sales tax, I cannot help but feel that it has almost destroyed the hope of the young people in this country to own a home and build a future for themselves in the years when they will be raising their families. The Minister of Finance can laugh if he wants to, but I notice he is not laughing now because he knows it is true, and he acknowledged this in the budget last spring when the government decided to remove progressively the sales tax which they had put into effect.

I ask through you, sir, why the government does not go all the way and remove this tax at this time, so as to restore to those who wish to purchase a house some equity in their purchases. After all, these are people who need housing. All I can say to the Minister of Labour with regard to his statement today, that he will reduce the rent by $16 a month, is that this reduction in the monthly payment for rentals does not even cover the increased cost that had been put into effect by the action taken by the government through the 11 per cent sales tax, alone. I want to say to you, sir, that this apparently innocent government since it came to office has cost the individual householder and the individual family in this country a great deal of money.

I wish to speak now about the sales tax on production machinery and building supplies. I believe that in his speech on December 19 the minister estimated that the raising of the sales tax by 1 per cent would bring in revenues of approximately $155 million a year.

Mr. Sharp: I think it is more than that.

Mr. Nasserden: That is what the minister stated as reported on page 11337 of Hansard. The minister thought it would be approximately $20 million for the remaining portion of that year. If that estimation contained in the minister's statement on December 19 represented approximately the situation, then we can multiply that figure by 11 and take a look at what it has cost the average Canadian citizen in the last few years to keep in office a government which imposed a major taxation of this kind. This deliberate action by the government has cost the Canadian family approximately $400.

Mr. Sharp: What taxes would the hon. member substitute for that?

Mr. Nasserden: If I were sitting in the minister's seat and had his responsibility I would be able to answer that question a lot better than the minister. After all it was his government which brought in the tax two and a half years ago, and then two and a half years later had to withdraw it progressively because of its effects on our economy. When this tax was brought in we on this side of the house warned the government of the dangers of inflation and of the problems involved in the increasing cost of living and the increasing cost of industrial production.

Mr. Sharp: Look at what we inherited.

Mr. Nasserden: And what did the members on the opposite side say about our warnings? Mr. Speaker, you will recall that they almost called us the enemies of society because we dared to think that anything they would do would endanger the livelihood of the Canadian people. What has happened has been almost exactly what we had forecast, except that it was far more serious than we on this side of the house indicated at that time.

I recall suggesting during that budget debate that the former minister of finance should resign. I recall the vote that followed and the fact that the members of the New Democratic Party in this House of Commons sat in their seats voicelessly when the crucial vote came. They share with the government opposite part of the responsibility for the high cost of living we are experiencing today, for the inflation and for the danger that it presents to the institutions of this country. What happened to the sense of responsibility of the members of that party sitting in opposition, when they remained silent on that issue and refused to vote on a matter which has brought to vast numbers of Canadians an increased cost of living, as well as privation and suffering? This is something that I will never be able to understand. I do not understand how a party which puts humanitarianism first could have taken the action which the New Democratic Party took on that day and in this way denied the very existence of those people whom they claim to represent here in the House of Commons. I am referring to people with limited income.

However, there are other factors which enter into the financial picture in this country. One of those is the lack of incentives in agriculture. When I look at the decreasing production of some of our dairy products and the resultant reduced take-home pay of many of our agricultural people I cannot help but wonder what this government has been thinking of in this regard. I know that the former minister of agriculture said: The Conservatives had a good agricultural policy. However, I suggest to you, sir, that any policy, whether agricultural or other, cannot stand still in this country, in view of the changing situation which is taking place on a daily basis throughout this country. If we do not improve the legislation which is brought forward from time to time, we cannot hope to cope with the problems which face our people.

This brings to my mind our defence expenditures and the fact that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) refused in this house to give information on one of the most vital changes in our armed services that has ever been considered by the House of Commons. I believe that Canadians are concerned about the money that is going into defence expenditures today, because it represents approximately 25 per cent of our tax dollar. There are some people who believe that the best way to economize is to say no, and there are people who believe that real economy is to spend money judiciously and to do the job that has to be done without unnecessary frills. As I survey the plans which have been put forward by the government in this regard, I cannot help but feel that the result of their policies can only endanger Canada's position in the realm of external affairs.

You, sir, know that there are other problems that face this nation. The economic problems are great and every member on the other side wants to call himself innocent, but he realizes the government has the machinery at its disposal, the studies that have been made, and if they wanted to come to grips with the economic problems they could act.

This has been one of the significant failures of the government—the failure to act, the failure to make a decision when that decision was right. This has been followed by a period of deterioration which destroyed a part of the heritage of the Canadian people. We face a situation in this country today when this failure is more significant than it ever was before, particularly when we consider the minister's reversal with regard to the problem of research.

Canada is an exporting nation. All of the nations of the world, and many of them are older than we are, are spending tremendous sums of money on research. Here in Canada, a nation with untold undeveloped resources, we have adopted the reversal of that attitude which has been taken by many other countries around the world. Canada should be putting millions and millions of dollars more into research than any other nation in the world. We have tremendous natural resources. The hon. member who spoke before me referred to them, and was worried about who was going to own them. Well, if we do not undertake any research to develop these resources for this nation, we are not going to be able to own them or to develop them. We will have to depend upon outside interests. I think that is a trend that cannot help but trouble the average Canadian, and which I cannot help but deplore.

The significant fact is that today we are discussing the mini-budget. I recall when this minister became the Minister of Finance. He was going to solve all the problems this nation had, and even when he presented the budget last spring—

Mr. Sharp: Can the hon. gentleman quote his authority for that extraordinary statement?

Mr. Nasserden: Well, there is no better authority than the minister himself.

Mr. Sharp: I never said anything like that. You must have said it; I know you have a great deal of confidence in the minister.

Mr. Nasserden: The minister may not have said that, but he looked it. This afternoon we saw a member of his own party rising to attack the former minister of finance. I think he was thereby aligning himself with the cohorts of the present minister. So far as I can see, there has not been much change. The change has been so small you can hardly notice it.

Canadians are worried about the financial institutions of this country. I am not referring to the ones that seem to be in trouble at the moment or to those that were making he news a few months ago. If we had had this financial uncertainty in Canada in 1961 and 1962, I wonder what the attitude of hon. members opposite would have been? I wonder what their contribution to a debate of this type would have been, with a government such as we have at the present time? These are the people who said they had the answers and now, three years later we find they have not done anything substantial to uphold the financial integrity of this nation. It is a very intriguing thought, to wonder why this has not been done during these three years.

We have had references to the Bank Act, and the position taken by the minister. This position has driven interest rates up, and has encouraged interest rates to rise more rapidly than at any other time. This is one of the things for which this Minister of Finance will be remembered—the highest interest rates in Canadian history and the tightest money in Canadian history. This Minister of Finance will not even rise to the bait; he will not even defend himself against these charges, because he knows they are true. The minister knows this government is responsible for the financial chaos in this country today.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question? Would I be permitted to make another speech at the present time without concluding the debate?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Will the hon. member accept the question?

Mr. Nasserden: I would be glad to answer any questions.

Mr. Sharp: I have no questions for the hon. member. I asked whether I would be permitted to make a speech without concluding the debate now?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. I think that this type of interruption is highly unnecessary. I suggest the hon. member continue.

Mr. Nasserden: It does not surprise me at all when hon. members opposite claim they are a bunch of innocents, because I believe there is a feeling across the way that they have failed in their responsibility to the Canadian people. This is one of the reasons the minister not only in the house but across the country, has failed utterly to demonstrate to the Canadian people the soundness of the policies that have been followed. These policies have not been sound.

Mr. Sharp: The most prosperous time in our history.

Mr. Nasserden: Now, he is talking about prosperity. The only thing that has permitted the continued prosperity of this country during the tenure of this government has been the tremendous sales of grain made to the communist nations. The minister cannot deny that. He said in his budget speech, I believe a year ago—pardon me, it was the former minister who said this a little over a year ago, but the same statement is contained in the annual report of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Nasserden: I say to you, sir, the minister—

Mr. Sharp: May I ask the hon. gentleman to quote his authority? There is no such statement to be found by me or by the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Nasserden: I have no trouble in doing that, Mr. Speaker. The statement is found in the annual report of the Bank of Canada for the year 1962 or 1963.

Mr. Sharp: Well, quote it.

Mr. Nasserden: I do not have the report with me, but I remember it very well. I recall that the minister of finance of that day placed the statement on the record of the House of Commons during his budget remarks. I believe most members of the house recall that very well.

When we speak of prosperity in Canada today, let us not forget that a great deal of credit for that prosperity must be given to the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr). During those difficult years, when we assumed the mantle of responsibility, after the people of this country threw out the Liberals, the hon. member for Ontario brought into being a vocational training program that resulted in the construction of a great number of vocational training schools across this country. I have read in the press not only of Canada but of the world that this was the greatest training program of its kind to be found anywhere. It is a tribute to the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) that he had the inspiration and the vision to bring it about. Thousands of Canadians are able to work today because they are trained and are able to meet the challenge that industry and a modern age presents. I recall, Mr. Speaker, that when we on this side of the house formed the government hon. members opposite attacked the program as being something which was too little and came too late. Yet it has been hailed the greatest program of its kind in the entire world at any period.

The hon. member who preceded me made some remarks about the British North America Act and I think I should say something in this regard, though I had not planned to. I believe he said that it was an antiquated piece of paper which no one believes in anyway; and he called it an overrated piece of dead fish. This statement comes from a member of the Liberal party, a party which believes in the rights of the provinces and in a united Canada, a party which says it stands for national unity in this 100th year of confederation. Yet no one rose on that side of the house to deny that statement.

Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps all of us in this house believe that the British North America Act can be improved upon. All of us would like to see the provinces get together to restate and to re-emphasize the unity of purpose that existed in 1867. But I think the remarks of the hon. member that this founding paper of our nation is an antiquated piece of paper which no one believes in anyway, that it is an overrated piece of dead fish, are an insult not only to the members of this house but to people in every part of Canada.

The year 1967 is the centennial celebration of the founding of our nation and gives us an opportunity to re-establish the purpose of Canadian life, to re-emphasizs the role of the individual in our society, to create opportunities and incentives that will give to all of us a vital, living part in the development of our nation, and to reward individual effort. I am glad that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) will present centennial awards to Canadians, because I believe we pay far too little attention to the achievements that Canadians are able to chalk up in private life, in the university and scholastic field, and also in industry and labour. I do not think it is any denial of the status of a free people to show appreciation to those who have made an achievement; to single them out and set them on a pedestal so that others may try to accomplish similar achievements.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. I regret to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Raynald Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, for over a year now the federal government has been trying to sustain the present economic expansion, which is now entering its seventh year. This is the longest period we have ever known in peacetime. With sound administration, there is no reason to believe a recession must inevitably follow the present period of prosperity in the country.

On the other hand, if we allow certain pressures to increase, if we do not try to relieve them, prices and costs will become excessive. Capital expenditures will become too great and a period of digestion or indigestion will follow.

The government is trying at present to reduce capital expenditures in order that Canada's long-term needs may be met without causing violent fluctuations, and our present capacity to satisfy capital expenditures may not be exceeded by demand.

In its second annual review, the Economic Council of Canada shows how company investments can become a factor of instability in the economy of our country;

> Declines and expansions in investment have historically been an important factor contributing to the unstable and uneven growth of the Canadian economy.

The council then goes on to point out that although > —the actual volume of such investment will need to continue to expand considerably from current levels if potential output is to be attained in 1970—

> —the recent rate of expansion in investment spending is clearly not sustainable on a long-term basis to 1970 and beyond.

The council suggests that any program aimed at stabilizing expansion, > —must endeavour to encourage a growth rate of business investment related as closely as possible to the potential growth in production.

That is why the council recommends > —that serious consideration be given to the possibility of putting off or staggering certain important building projects in areas where a lack of manpower and other resources is particularly serious.

Mr. Speaker, the federal government has accepted these recommendations. In fact, in August 1965, steps had already been taken to prevent excessive accumulation of investments. When the government took this position in August, 1965, not to mention the measures regarding its own investments and those providing assistance to the provinces and municipalities in staggering their programs, it was already asking others to do the same.

The measures announced in last year's budget speech shore up this policy which consists in deferring clearly excessive investment demands, so as to ensure stable and continued expansion.

Three complementary measures have been designed so as to supplement each other.

The measure concerning depreciation, under which businessmen can claim a lower abatement for capital costs with regard to a certain type of assets in the next three years, if they make investments in the next 18 months, is designed to prompt businessmen to defer, as far as possible, their capital expenditures until the end of that period.

The purpose of the third measure providing for a 5 per cent tax on cash profits, that is, profits after taxes, principal repaid on a long term debt, in addition to capital cost allowances, depletion allowances and some other factors, is to consolidate the other two. In view of the $30,000 exemption, it is not aimed at small concerns which, on the whole, will not be paying this tax. The purpose, however, is to temporarily deprive companies of part of the available cash they might otherwise be tempted to spend on capital expenditures. As there is already a shortage of manpower and materials in capital goods industry as well as in the construction industry, any additional expenditures would inevitably bring about an increase of costs and prices due to competition between industries for manpower and materials already in short supply.

The funds remitted to the federal government will bear interest at 5 per cent per annum and will be reimbursed at any time after 18 to 36 months; this will enable the federal government to release them when pressure weakens on supplies and will allow capital investments to maintain their advance at a rate more easily supported.

The idea of a refundable tax on cash profits is entirely new. It resembles somewhat the Swedish plan intended to regulate capital expenditures. It differs in that, apart from the $30,000 exemption, all companies must pay the tax, whereas under the Swedish plan this is optional. It differs also in that the Swedish authorities did not commit themselves to a set time limit for refunding the tax. Finally, in Sweden the funds may be released only for specific purposes, that is only if they are to be used in specified areas. We believe that, in Canada, our aims will be more easily achieved through the provisions we have proposed.

I should like to point out that special attention was given to the designated areas where the rate of unemployment is usually above average and where extra help is needed. The increased capital cost allowances will still apply to ventures in the designated areas which are eligible to subsidies for new capital investments, thus giving them a double advantage. The income of new manufacturing industries located in designated areas will be eligible for a three year income tax exemption plus an exemption from the 5 per cent refundable tax.

Finally, may I point out that, apart from tax exemptions the federal government will greatly help designated areas through the Area Development Incentives Act, the Rural Development Fund and the Atlantic Development Board Fund. Through all those measures, huge amounts will be spent for the development of the areas concerned.

In closing I should like to point out to the government the urgent need for building at St. Romuald, a most important industrial centre in eastern Quebec, a deep sea wharf which will permit development of the area and cut down unemployment there.

[English]

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, may I begin by saying that it has been brought to my attention that cabinet ministers, having consulted senior officials, have concluded that approximately 100 subject matters requiring legislation await passage through the Canadian House of Commons. Immediately we ask the perennial question, why is parliament so behind in its work? My general answer is this: First, in many instances we have adopted horse and buggy practices and attitudes in the electronic age; second—and I cast no aspersions on any political party—for a young nation, Canada has built into its legislative practices an incredible number of delay procedures.

Since 1867 we have had hundreds of royal commissions. Other speakers this afternoon have mentioned them. Many royal commission findings have been excellent, yet successive governments have implemented not more than 10 per cent of commission recommendations.

I am not an expert on the rules of the House of Commons. I am anything but an expert. Yet it seems that there is a general consensus in the house that many of our rules and procedures are suited more to a bygone age. We have not adopted the committees system of the United States. In Canada, governments continue to send urgent or embarrassing questions to house committees, often not for further study and clarification, but to postpone the necessity of deciding. Many members of parliament take an initial delight in saying that the committees system, as it works these days, serves a great purpose in shedding light on contemporary problems. Through the system members of parliament become profoundly aware of the detailed implications of problems.

I suppose the electors of my district hope that by spending more time in Ottawa I shall become more educated. That is not the raison d'être, per se, for my presence in the House of Commons. To educate and shed light is not the raison d'être of the committee system. Its real raison d'être, as in the United States, should be to quicken the decision making process of government. But, in Canada, the committees system is another part, an added factor, of the built-in delay procedure developed in a supposedly young, pioneering nation.

What else have we done in Canada? We have developed inquiries of all kinds, some of which admittedly are useful. Contemporary problems facing big governments obviously need to be inquired into. The bigger government becomes, the more inquiries are necessary. It is obvious that individual members of parliament cannot be experts in everything. Of course we need some inquiries. Some have been useful; others merely serve to delay the decision making process.

Today we have a new phenomenon. The Minister of Labour has had, within his federal jurisdiction, one strike after another. The strike problem is extremely urgent, and the people of Canada want action. Of course we must study the problem. We can study many precedents in Sweden, and elsewhere in Scandinavia relating to problems under federal jurisdiction. But what do we do in Canada? The Minister of Labour sets up a task force to look into strikes under the federal jurisdiction.

We have a housing crisis such as we have never had before. Instead of action what do we get? We get study groups, symposiums—in plain language, part of the built-in delay procedure of the Canadian approach to contemporary problems.

When President Kennedy came to power, the moment he talked about a task force, the urgency of the problem was denoted, and the tentacles of the White House went out into the nation. Every expert in the nation was told to apply his knowledge to the problem, to bring about as speedy a solution as possible. The experts were given a delay period within which to report. If they could not report within a specific delay period, under reasonable circumstances the president would grant an extension.

What do we do in Canada? Having had strike after strike within the federal jurisdiction the minister tells us we now have a task force. He sets a few able men at the university level to study the problem of strikes under the federal jurisdiction, yet he has allotted them no time within which to report. We hope that some time in 1968 the minister will report to the House of Commons.

In the meantime this house is faced with tremendous difficulties vis-à-vis strikes under the federal jurisdiction. So we have a new delay of verbiage built into the Canadian experience—the task force. As I have said, one of the real reasons we are approximately 100 pieces of legislation behind in our work is that we have developed horse and buggy attitudes and techniques in the electronic age. We are told that in this electronic age an instantaneous poll of public opinion can be made available on any given date about any given issue. What has this meant to leadership in the western world?

Obviously, if Churchill or Franklin Roosevelt had relied on such polls as these, Churchill would not have stood up to Hitler the way he did and Roosevelt would not have led America out of isolation into the second world war. Today's political leaders are relying more and more for guidance on poll soundings made possible through modern techniques. Instead of speeding up the decision-making processes of modern government, the new facilities are, in fact, delaying them.

Statesmanship and the art of government is just that—an art form. It is not a matter of trying to lead on the basis of poll soundings. Far too many leaders are reading the polls instead of going ahead on courses which they believe to be correct. Of course, they must read the polls; they must read them scientifically and intelligently so as to have a good knowledge of the obstacles they would face when they try to "sell" their policies. But far too many cabinet ministers in this government, and far too many political leaders in the western world, are today being led by polls instead of reading the polls to make a scientific analysis of the kind of persuasion they will have to use in order to carry out programs and policies which they deeply believe will be good for the people. This is one of the reasons for the delay in the decision-making process in modern government.

I pause briefly, here. In 1867 the Fathers of Confederation faced certain basic problems as they tried to pull this country together. These included relations between Canada and the United States and the relationship between the French speaking and the English speaking people—federal-provincial relations, and the like. In 1967, both domestically and abroad, the same two basic problems face Canadian legislatures—the unity of our country and our relationship with our great neighbour to the south. It is my impression that we are not making progress in the solution of either of these two major problems, because of our horse and buggy attitudes in an electronic age.

I believe that one of the greatest causes of delay in our decision-making process here in Ottawa lies in the area of federal-provincial relations and constitutional reform. The buck is passed between Ottawa and the provinces while urgent issues are held up.

[Translation]

Why? Because we did not really improve the system of permanent consultations between Ottawa and the provinces and second—

Mr. Pepin: That is not true.

Mr. Grafftey: It is true. The minister says that is not true, but look at what he is doing about the problem of pollution; it is one study after another. However, as far as the Canadian people are concerned, we do not need all those studies. What the people are asking for today is action and nothing is being done in the field for which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is responsible, because we have not brought our constitution up to date or set up permanent consultations between Ottawa and the provinces.

It is all very well for the minister to study the problems of air and water pollution, but the time has come when the Canadian people are asking for action. Let me tell you simply that this results from the fact that we did not improve the permanent consultations between Ottawa and the provinces, because we never really solved in co-operation with the provinces the problems of our economic and social priorities and also because we never did modernize our Canadian constitution, in short we did not adapt it to the present times.

Mr. Pepin: Would the hon. member permit me a question?

Mr. Grafftey: Yes.

Mr. Pepin: Since he is now complaining about insufficient federal-provincial relations, how is it that, in other circumstances, he and his colleagues from the Progressive Conservative party are precisely complaining about the fact that those federal-provincial conferences are so numerous and have become so important that they tend to take away powers from parliament? This is something I cannot understand.

Mr. Grafftey: I quite agree with the hon. minister, we must have conferences. The minister is very sincere and I would not like to minimize the importance of such studies, of such conferences with the provinces; but I think we have discussed this matter together outside the house.

I wish to make the task easier for the minister by suggesting a modernization in depth of our constitution. At any event, we have not modernized the Canadian constitution, and I do not want to prejudge the results of conferences that must be held with the provinces. Perhaps the British North America Act is flexible enough for our present needs; perhaps it must be amended in one way or another; perhaps it is absolutely necessary to have a new constitution adjusted to modern times, but assuredly it is high time for us to study the matter, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

What has happened in the United States where there is today a fairly good relationship between the states and the federal government? In the United States, the federal government is taking direct action on all questions affecting one important new form of government, namely metropolitan areas. Here in Canada, failure to act in terms of planning priorities, both social and economic, in conjunction with the provinces; failure to improve consultative machinery between Ottawa and the provinces, and failure to embark on the work we must do in order to obtain a modern constitution suited to modern times means that many important contemporary problems are not being attacked by any level of government. I do not say this in any partisan way; I realize the extent of the difficulties which are involved.

What has happened in this house in the past few months? The Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) says we can do nothing more about the cost of living because we do not really have sufficient constitutional power. The provinces say, "That is not our responsibility, it is the federal responsibility." What is the minister in charge of C.M.H.C. saying as he goes around the country? He is saying it is really a provincial responsibility, and the provinces are saying that the federal government should take the real initiative. The buck gets passed between Ottawa and the provinces and so we have no real action on the cost of living and on prices.

We question legislators on both the provincial and federal level about the greatest housing shortage the nation has ever seen, but what is happening is that the two levels of government are bickering, one with the other, while this supposedly rich nation, with the second highest standard of living in the world—

Mr. Sharp: Hear, hear.

Mr. Grafftey: —is ill housed. I agree that the standard of living is high, but wouldn't the Minister of Finance agree that we are running out of housing while the Minister of Labour goes across the country having symposia, study groups, and tête-à-têtes with authorities on the provincial level? If he does not act now, we will not be building the houses that we need for Canadians this year.

Mr. Pepin: Oh, oh.

Mr. Grafftey: The minister groans, but I am sure those who are ill housed will groan with him.

There are other examples of problems not being dealt with because of our failure to strengthen federal-provincial relations. There are the problems facing our cities such as urban blight, urban renewal, water and air pollution, and transportation communication difficulties. We are told by the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) that we cannot have any real, immediate action on auto safety because of possible confusion about jurisdiction in Canada. Have you ever heard anything so ridiculous in your life, Mr. Speaker —a young, pioneering, dynamic country going to wave the constitution over people dying on the highways?

The Canadian people will not tolerate the delay procedures built into our system, while Ottawa and the provinces pass the buck, one to the other, and we fall 100 pieces behind in legislation. We are not even dealing with many of the major problems facing modern constitutional governments.

Mr. Pepin: May I ask the hon. member a question or two?

Mr. Grafftey: Yes.

Mr. Pepin: Does he recognize the value of the federal system in Canada?

Mr. Grafftey: I recognize the value of the federal system in Canada.

Mr. Pepin: In the federal system is it not normal that jurisdiction should be divided between two orders of government?

Mr. Grafftey: Right; jurisdiction should be divided between two orders of government.

Mr. Pepin: Then is it not normal when one order of government does not do what it is supposed to do, for the other order of government to remind it of what it is supposed to do?

Mr. Grafftey: Right. In 1867 the Fathers of Confederation did the best possible job they could, but in 1967 a whole host of new problems have arisen which they could not possibly have envisioned. I contrast this with what happened in the United States. The Americans drafted their first constitution; it did not really work so they had to do the job again. We drafted the B.N.A. Act. We passed it in England. We put it in a museum case and we are told there is something about it that we cannot touch.

Just this afternoon a supporter of the government suggested that we at the federal level cannot protect investors in Canada, and that the Minister of Finance was having trouble in that respect. I say the Minister of Finance is having real and sincere difficulties doing his part to protect the Canadian investors because of our out-moded approach to federal-provincial relations.

In Canada we shall have to do what they did in the United States. We shall have to face up to the task of drafting a new constitution. The Americans scrapped their Articles of Confederation and wrote a new constitution, which seems to be working quite well for them now. We shall soon have to begin that second stage in Canada. I am not saying we should necessarily tear up the B.N.A. Act, but we should form an all-party committee of this house as soon as possible, to meet with similar bodies in the provinces. I do not minimize the difficulties which we are going to have, but I do say that every day we wait is a lost day.

The Minister of Finance is supposed to be doing some good with his counterparts in the provinces in trying to get financial agreement, but that job will be easier for him if we can get on with the job of fundamental constitutional reform first. Let us not put the cart before the horse.

Mr. Pepin: That is what you are doing.

Mr. Grafftey: The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Pepin) and I are having an honest argument.

Mr. Pepin: May I ask another question.

Mr. Grafftey: Yes.

Mr. Pepin: Does the hon. member not recognize that in recent years we have had tremendous de facto changes in the whole balance of power and revenues between the two orders of government?

Mr. Grafftey: Of course we have. I have to agree.

Mr. Pepin: Does he not recognize that this was done without formal constitutional amendment? Does he not recognize that this was done within the old B.N.A. Act as it stands now?

Mr. Grafftey: Well, supposing I admit all these things, does that get us away from the fact that we have had delay because of bickering between the federal and the provincial level? I am not saying this in a partisan way. It happened when we were in government and when other Conservative governments were in office, and it will happen again unless we do something about it. For a young, modern, so-called pioneering nation we have too many delaying procedures built into our structures, with the result that we are continually passing the buck between Ottawa and the provinces. I am sure this buck passing does not happen to the same degree in any other nation of the world.

As a government supporter said so well a few minutes ago, investors in Canadian companies do not really care whether they are protected by the federal or the provincial governments. All they ask is that they be protected. Let us stop having this bickering in these areas between both levels of government and find out some other method of tackling the problem.

If the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources thinks my approach to constitutional reform is wrong, can he suggest some other approach to me that can minimize the effect of what is going on because of this buck passing between Ottawa and the provinces? I may say that I think the minister is doing a very remarkable job in the resource field, even under present conditions, but this buck passing is the main reason which creates disillusionment in the body politic in general.

Mr. Pepin: My main reason for objecting to this colossal Congress-of-Vienna approach to constitutional reform is simply the implication placed behind it, that nothing is being done now. That approach distracts from the reality of constitutional changes now taking place in Canada. Second, faith is being planted in the minds of the people that this great conference would solve all problems.

As I said yesterday in Montreal, such a meeting would turn into a circus because you would have at it all the representatives of all the parties in Canada, all the provincial leaders, all the presidents of all the important public-minded organizations, the Saint Jean Baptiste Society, the Canadian Clubs, the universities and what not. People are being led to believe that this would be the beginning of a great constitutional reform in Canada It should be obvious that progress does not come that way. Again the population is being distracted from the real changes now taking place.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. The minister and the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) will appreciate that many of us are being entertained by this repartee or discussion, but it is hardly in order for the debate to be transferred from one side of the house to the other except through the medium of a question, and I suggest that the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi should continue his remarks.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I hope that the dialogue between the minister and I was not pure entertainment. I thought his interventions were very informative, and I welcomed them. Maybe they were not exactly in the form of questions, but we shall have to have the kind of intervention that we are having now, because basically speaking, Mr. Speaker, whether we like it or not, constitutions are political documents and it is politicians who will have to deal with them in the end.

I would agree with much that the minister has said, but I maintain that we need to do something. We should change our horse and buggy attitude in the electronic age, and modernize federal-provincial relations so as not to give the Canadian people the impression that nobody has direct authority over questions such as the housing shortage, the cost of living, water and air pollution, questions facing modern metro government that did not exist in 1867, and even questions regarding automobile safety. If not, this country is going to fall farther and farther behind. The time to face up to this job of work is now and, as I said before, every day we delay is a lost day.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my remarks in this debate will be limited and perhaps a little parochial in nature. I trust that the house will bear with me. The first matter with which I should like to deal is in respect of a situation of which I am sure the minister is aware. This is something which arises from time to time. I should like to use a specific example so that the minister will understand just what it is I am speaking of. This is a case where an individual enters into what could be, and has been, construed as a business venture for gain. In the course of seeking advice from the local income tax authorities, he was left with a misunderstanding or unawareness in respect of the full extent of the application of the Income Tax Act with regard to what is and what is not taxable income. Subsequently, however, in making out his return he included information concerning certain money earned together with a computation of profits made, and so on. In other words, he made no attempt to hide a particular transaction; but in the computation of the tax payable he does not include this as taxable income.

His return is filed and, in this particular case, three years go by. Cases arise, either by way of automatic spot checks or accidentally, where certain returns are checked. In any event, this particular return was checked. It was determined that while indeed the taxpayer had been completely honest and factual in filling out his return, he failed to include this amount as taxable income. From his point of view there was justifiable reason for this. The whole matter then becomes a matter for review. The individual is persuaded that his original interpretation perhaps was not correct or that the advice given him by his solicitor was not correct. He then pays the overdue tax. However, in this particular case he finds that he is subject to a 6 per cent penalty in respect of the intervening years when this tax was not paid.

I am sure these are not rare cases and I am concerned about the unfortunate situation in which such persons find themselves when they are assessed this penalty. I suppose the question is, who ultimately is responsible. Is it not the responsibility of the people in the department to properly assess and check all income tax returns? Are we faced with a situation in which people are playing a game of Russian roulette? Are there hundreds of people—unlike this person who was honest in filing his return—who are playing a game of Russian roulette with the officials in the Department of National Revenue in an effort to escape paying taxes? Is this what is happening?

This has caused Mr. Fryer, to whose case I have been referring for the past few moments, grave concern. It has caused him concern to the point where he is asking pertinent and, I think, quite justifiable questions. I should like to read into the record part of a letter, so that we can understand the extent of his concern about this:

> As a taxpayer I am convinced that inefficiency does exist in this department and I cannot accept the excuse that they do not check all the income tax files every year but only spot check them. It is a well known fact that the employees in this department are not overworked and never have their work up to date so with the number of employees they have and with all the latest computing machines available the checking of each file every year should be a very simple matter—

He raised numerous other points. There is no attempt on his part not to pay what it has been decided and determined by due process of assessment by the taxation division of the Department of National Revenue is due. What he objects to, after having acted honestly and in good faith, is that three years later he finds that he must not only pay the tax that is due but also this additional penalty. It seems that the attitude of the department is a mechanical one. The act says one thing and that is the way in which it is interpreted and enforced. There seems to be no capacity to absorb what in effect Mr. Frank Fryer of Halifax, in this particular case, understands not to have been his responsibility. I would hope that at some point in the near future the minister would be able to deal with this as a general problem.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise one other matter which has been of some continuing concern, I am sure, to all members from the maritime provinces. This is a very broad and general matter. It has to do with the whole field of government incentives and the approach which the government now is taking in a haphazard fashion to raise the standards of the people, and the opportunities for employment in the Atlantic region, up to some kind of an acceptable level in relation to the rest of Canada.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, unemployment in the maritime provinces now runs somewhere in the order of 10.5 per cent. Apart from the attempts of the previous government, over the last 25 years there has been absolutely nothing done in a positive or concrete way to overcome this difficulty. Depending upon the area, I understand that unemployment in Canada runs from about 3.8 per cent to 6.4 per cent. The average is only about half as high as it is in the maritimes. The government must accept a part of the responsibility for this situation, because of the shotgun approach which is currently in vogue in respect of incentives. On a number of occasions in this chamber arguments have been put forward in support of extending the area incentives program to embrace the Atlantic region. That argument has been shot down for a number of reasons, the paramount one being that it would establish a precedent which the government does not want established. That is a very short-range view, and shows a lack of imagination or intelligent approach.

We must appreciate the extent and magnitude of the unemployment situation in the maritime provinces. The solution to this problem has been associated with incentives to increase secondary industry. As long as the government continues to follow the shotgun approach to these problems connected with industry, fishing and farming, as well as defence, power, import and export traffic, and the broad field of transportation, no lasting solution will be found. The government must adopt one concerted plan before this extremely high level of unemployment in relation to the rest of the country will be changed.

Recently we passed a massive transportation bill. Transportation is a key factor in the lifeblood of the Atlantic provinces. A good transportation system would encourage and make possible the development of viable secondary industry, and without it secondary industry cannot even locate there, let alone flourish or participate in the growth of national income. At this time we are experiencing a waiting period. This is a further frustration in our attempts to bolster a sagging economy; it is a further frustration in our attempts to catch up to the rest of Canada.

We are waiting for the conclusion of a special study of maritime transportation problems. It is hoped that this special study will have embraced the entire economic spectrum of transportation and its effect upon the economy of the maritimes. If it does not, I am sure when we reach such a debate the maritime members of parliament, regardless of their political affiliation, will band together to overcome the shortcomings and shortfalls of the recommendations.

The government must apply to this whole massive problem the philosophy that in the long run it will be good for Canada to build a viable, live and prosperous Atlantic area. I am sure no one disagrees with that philosophy; yet we find ourselves unbolstered and unsupported by any co-ordinated federal activity in this field, such as that which fires the imagination of those people who have some understanding of the situation when they contemplate the proposed Fundy tidal power development project. The conversion of this tidal power to electricity is of such tremendous magnitude that in the Bay of Fundy this could provide the greatest source of water-power on the North American continent. The potential source of electric energy is of such tremendous magnitude it could be the largest single source of hydro power on this continent, even if only a small proportion of it was tapped. What should such a tremendous source of power mean to the maritime provinces? I could not even begin to outline the economic impact that would result, or the impact that would result if a start were made on this project some time this year.

In answer to those who object to this massive development of hydro power, let me say that I do not believe this will be a complete answer to the problems of the power hungry Atlantic provinces at this time, or perhaps even in 25 to 30 years. Let me remind hon. members that at this time United States authorities have plans to expand the power capacity of the Hoover dam complex. The United States is not only prepared to go forward with this project, it is in the advance stages of doubling or tripling the power capacity of that complex at an expenditure of some hundreds of millions of dollars.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

I have no idea what it would cost the Canadian taxpayer to move into this Fundy tidal power project, but such a development would have a tremendous impact on the economy of the Atlantic provinces. We have all observed the delays in respect of the Churchill Falls development. This whole development has been a matter of attention for a considerable number of years, but we are still not using power developed there. I do not know why this is so. Many obstacles have had to be overcome. However, the point I wish to make is that it took many years to get to the stage at which we find them now. Because of these obstacles, are we not to proceed with the Fundy tidal power? We know it is a transmission route, and therefore the cost to the power-hungry centres in the northeastern United States and in central Canada, areas which are closer to it, will be a lot less. We are aware that massive investments would have to be made in order to bring this about, but if it is approached on a reasoned basis it could mean the total rejuvenation of Nova Scotia, and indeed of all the Atlantic provinces. They say that it is difficult to describe the total power potential of the tides of the Bay of Fundy.

Mr. Speaker, before I run out of time I should like to mention one other point, and this again is something that the government can do if it is not prepared to bring all of the approaches to maritime problems under one authority, and that is to take a serious look at the import-export traffic, the future of international shipping, and in particular the adequate development of the port of Halifax to absorb and accept the cargoes that will be transported by water within the very near future. Already we have seen the extension of massive ships into the bulk cargo transportation scheme, such as oil transportation. The government should be encouraging our oil industries in Canada to give consideration to the development of central depots for receiving oil from South America. It has been explained that in view of the present planning and technological developments it will always be cheaper to bring oil from South America than from the west. We are not asking for massive expenditures which would be required to put a pipe line into our area; indeed this is not what we want. We can accomplish the same thing, which would have a good effect on our balance of payments, by trading this great natural resource.

What we have to do in order to accomplish this is not only to talk about it for the next four or five years, but to decide now to move ahead with it so that the industries and the interests that are directly concerned and involved in this kind of enterprise can themselves plan accordingly. The establishment of a central oil depot which will accommodate three, four and five hundred thousand ton bulk carriers must be considered now. We have the natural facilities in the harbour, we have the necessary depth of water and all we need is a determined decision on the part of the government to move ahead with it. It is a self-liquidating expense. I assure the minister that the cost involved would be returned much more quickly than will be the cost of the seaway.

The port of Halifax must be developed now to accept cargo ships of this magnitude. It must be designed so as to include the concept of the integral train. We must stop thinking of transportation in a dual sense; it is not. Goods moving from the source of manufacture to the source of sale must be considered as an integral transportation package. Like the Fundy power, the theory of the integral train staggers the imagination. It is a simple extension of the ship to the rail. It is the movement of cargo out of the ship and directly to a massive train which is not owned by either the C.N.R. or the C.P.R. but rather is owned by a corporate entity involved in the movement of the particular goods. It may be a consortium of interests, it may be west coast lumber interests moving lumber and lumber products into the European market, and it may be a consortium of interests which has bought the rolling stock and accepts the responsibility for everything that is involved.

Preliminary studies have demonstrated the benefits of this system of the integral train. The massive or unit train system is a slightly different concept. However, surveys have shown us that we can now accept the proposition that transportation by rail can be even cheaper than transportation by water. The salvation of the port of Halifax as a viable economic contributor to the economy of Canada depends on this. These are not rhetorical propositions. Lack of action on the part of the government can only result in a chronic unemployment situation in the maritimes. I wish the St. Lawrence would stay frozen until around 1980, at which time the government may get around to doing something about these two or three necessary developments. The number of people working on the waterfront today compared with five years ago is staggering, and the impact has been felt on the economies of the two principal ports in the maritimes. May I call it six o'clock?

Mr. McIlraith: Go ahead.

Mr. Forrestall: I wish to say a few more words about unemployment. Unless the government acts in these three major areas, namely the secondary industries, the Fundy tidal power and the harbour development, the maritimes will continue to suffer from a lagging economy. Unless something is done quickly our share of the national growth will not increase and we will continue to have high unemployment throughout the winter months. At present I believe it is some 10.5 to 11 per cent.

Mr. Drury: Will the hon. member permit a question? I wonder if he, in relating the question of high unemployment in the maritimes to the failure adequately to develop sea transportation, is aware that the British American Oil Company is proposing to establish a $40 million refinery on tidewater in Nova Scotia?

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Stewart) who for the moment is sitting on the wrong side of the house, has welcomed this announcement, just as much as I welcome it. British American Oil has been talking about this for many years. I am sorry that the Minister of Industry had not mentioned this half an hour ago, so that I could speak on it.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Will the hon. member permit a question? Is he certain that the minister really knows where the Atlantic provinces are, because he has forgotten them throughout the time he has been here?

Mr. Forrestall: May I answer this question briefly, Mr. Speaker? I am not yet sure whether the minister knows where the Atlantic provinces are, but if he made such an announcement every day he might convince some of us by the end of the year.

May I call it six o'clock.

• (6:00 p.m.)

Mr. McIlraith: Before we call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if there would be some disposition to pass some of the resolutions and introduce the consequent bills? I have in mind items Nos. 122, 126 and 127.

Mr. Starr: Agreed.

Legislation

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps we could call resolution item No. 122.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent to proceeding with these three resolutions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNORS GENERAL OF CANADA

MEASURE TO PROVIDE ANNUITY UPON RETIREMENT

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (for the Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the payment of a retiring annuity to Governors General of Canada and to their widows.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Batten in the chair.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. McIlraith thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-265, to provide for the payment of a retiring annuity to the Governor General of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PUBLIC SERVICE

AMENDMENT OF VARIOUS ACTS RESPECTING SALARIES OF OFFICIALS

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (for Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Canada Grain Act, the Income Tax Act, the International Boundary Waters Treaty Act, the National Energy Board Act, the Railway Act, the Tariff Board Act, the Canada Elections Act, the Financial Administration Act, the Representation Commissioner Act, and the Appropriation Act No. 4, 1964, with respect to the salaries of certain public officials.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Batten in the chair.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. McIlraith thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-266, to provide for the revision of certain salaries fixed by statute.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

JUDGES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SALARIES, TRAVELLING EXPENSES, ETC.

Hon. L. T. Pennell (for Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Judges Act to revise judicial salaries and certain provisions of the said act respecting the payment to judges of travelling allowances and other expenses; and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Batten in the chair.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McIlraith: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we will continue—

Mr. Starr: What about the introduction of the bill?

Mr. McIlraith: The Clerk informs me that the bill covering the last item is not on the table. Tomorrow we propose to continue with the budget debate, and following that the budget bill consequent upon the budget.

It being ten minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 9, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication.

Ottawa, February 9, 1967

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Robert Taschereau, P.C., Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 9th February, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
A. G. Cherrier
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Twelfth report of standing committee on public accounts—Mr. Hales.

Fifth report of standing committee on justice and legal affairs—Mr. Cameron (High Park).

[Note: Text of the foregoing reports appears in today's Votes and Proceedings.]

• (2:40 p.m.)

SPORTS

HOCKEY—TABLING OF REPORT BY COMMITTEE OF ADVISORY COUNCIL

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I should like to table two copies in English and two copies in French of the report on amateur hockey in Canada by the hockey study committee of the national advisory council on fitness and amateur sport dated January, 1967.

Mr. Speaker: Does the minister have permission to table these documents?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INCOME TAX

IMPLEMENTATION OF VARIOUS AGREEMENTS RESPECTING DOUBLE TAXATION

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (for Mr. Benson) moved the first reading of Bill No. S-56 (from the Senate) to implement agreements for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax between Canada and Trinidad and Tobago, Canada and Ireland, Canada and Norway and Canada and the United Kingdom, and to implement supplementary income tax convention between Canada and the United States of America.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

FAILURE TO DISPLAY PORTRAIT OF THE QUEEN IN CENTENNIAL TRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I would ask the Prime Minister whether he got in touch with the centennial commission regarding the unjustifiable omission of the Queen's picture from the confederation train. Did he receive from a high official of the centennial commission the answer which was given yesterday by that official, that the reason for the failure to display the Queen's picture was that "this is a Canadian train"?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I did get in touch with the commission, who informed me that the monarchy, and the place of the monarchy in our history, is evoked by various displays in the train but that there is no picture of the Queen herself in the confederation train. The centennial commission is taking immediate steps to repair that omission.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

JOINT DISCUSSION WITH AUTOMOBILE COMPANIES RESPECTING MAJOR CHANGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour with respect to a meeting which he and his colleagues had yesterday with the delegation of the united auto workers from Oshawa? Press reports indicate that the delegates renewed the request they made last year asking the government to urge the auto companies to enter into joint discussions regarding any major changes which were likely to cause dislocation in the labour force. I should like to ask the minister whether such an appeal has been made to the auto companies and, if so, what response has been received from them.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and I discussed this matter with a delegation whose membership had hardly changed since November last, soon after the question also arose. I told them at that time that our approach to the companies collectively had not been too successful, and I had hoped we might work it out with the individual companies concerned rather than on an industry basis.

I reported yesterday that we were making some progress with one of the companies, and I expected to have a meeting within the next 10 days or so with the chief executive of this one company that has shown interest. Actually a date has been fixed for this meeting, not next week but the week following, and I am hopeful that my colleague the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury), and I will both meet with him on that occasion. Further action will depend on what transpires at that meeting.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): As a supplementary question I would like to ask the minister would he give consideration to informing the companies that refusal on their part to co-operate with the government and labour in this important consultation might mean that the government would reconsider the whole question of the auto pact?

Mr. Nicholson: That may be the way the hon. member would act, but it is not the way I would act.

Mr. Douglas: As a further supplementary, may I ask the minister whether the government is still adamant in its decision requiring the workers to use up all their supplementary unemployment benefits before they will be eligible for transitional assistance benefits? Is this a firm decision, or is the government giving it reconsideration?

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and I assured the delegation yesterday that the further representations they had made would be carefully considered, and I might add that we were in conference with them for some two and a half hours.

Mr. Orlikow: As a further supplementary I would like to ask the minister if in the event that his type of persuasion, which has not worked until now, does not work, and if the minister is opposed to direction, what other course does the minister propose to take?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is doubly hypothetical.

NATIONAL SECURITY

CALVIN MACDONALD—APPEARANCE BEFORE ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the government received any request from Mr. Coldwell, commissioner on the national security inquiry, that he be relieved from his functions so Mr. Calvin Macdonald might testify before this commission and receive a fair and unbiased hearing?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have received no such communication, nor do I expect one. There is nothing to prevent Mr. Macdonald appearing before the commission.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): As a supplementary question, would the Prime Minister consider looking into this problem and studying all its aspects, and then report back to the house as to the intentions of the government in this respect to give Mr. Macdonald a fair hearing?

Mr. Pearson: I have looked into it, and I know of no reason why Mr. Macdonald should not have a fair hearing before the board.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Arising out of the question asked by the hon. member for Mégantic and without in any way prejudging the situation, does the Prime Minister not feel in view of all the circumstances that when Macdonald appears—if he does—before the commission, Mr. Coldwell, if any suggestion were made, would withdraw while Macdonald was giving his evidence, Macdonald having advanced the idea that he had already made representations that had been swept aside?

Mr. Pearson: I have no information which would warrant any request to Mr. Coldwell that he should withdraw from this commission in any of its activities.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just for that particular witness.

Mr. Pearson: I think it would be a reflection on Mr. Coldwell and the commission if he were asked to withdraw in respect to this particular hearing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is done every day in the courts.

TRANSPORT

DORION, QUE.—FURTHER ACTION FOLLOWING LEVEL CROSSING ACCIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport which relates to the recent inquest into the Dorion school bus level crossing tragedy, which criticized both the C.N.R. and the Board of Transport Commissioners. Is the minister taking any action himself to clear up this inquiry, or are there any plans afoot that will deal with this level crossing problem in a more effective way?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, without making any observation about the verdict of the coroner's inquest, which I think would be unwise for me to do, I may say that I believe the inquiry by the Board of Transport Commissioners, which was postponed until the coroner's inquest was completed, is to start on Monday. Until that inquiry has been completed I think it would be premature for me to make any observation at all on this subject.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport supplementary to the question asked earlier by the hon. member for Red Deer. In view of the strong criticism in the report of the coroner's jury both of Canadian National Railways and the Board of Transport Commissioners, will a study be made to make sure that there are not other similar level crossings still in existence at which other tragic accidents might take place?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, as I am sure the hon. gentleman well knows, these matters are under consideration all the time by the board. I did not want to be obliged to say that the Board of Transport Commissioners has made recommendations about this particular level crossing and unfortunately the other parties who would have to be involved have not responded in this particular case. It is very regrettable that this should be the case.

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the charge that there was negligence on the part of the Board of Transport Commissioners, should not something be done to make sure that the consideration is more effective?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am quite sure that in this particular case there was no negligence on the part of the Board of Transport Commissioners.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—POSSIBLE EXTENSION OF PROPOSED CEASE FIRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I should like to ask the minister whether he has knowledge of any possible extension of the truce in Viet Nam. I should also like to ask the minister whether the Canadian government accordingly is making any contribution.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I dealt with that question yesterday when I replied that we had taken appropriate steps. I have no further information to give now, but I can say that every effort is being made to extend the period of the truce from four to seven days. I sincerely hope that if that is agreed the truce will last beyond the seven days.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, a thought has just come to mind. Because this matter is one which affects the people of the world and because I believe Canadians generally feel there should be a cessation of the bombing—I believe this is the feeling across the country—would it not be helpful if a resolution to that effect were given consideration by the House of Commons?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, this government has made it clear that we believe there should be a cease fire. Our views with regard to the cessation of bombing are well known. The United States government has said that it is prepared to stop the bombing provided there is some reciprocal action. There was a statement the other day by the minister of foreign affairs for North Viet Nam which we believe may have advanced the position somewhat. The statement was to the effect that they were prepared to enter into talks once the bombing was stopped. In the light of these statements this whole question is again being carefully examined.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR UPWARD REVISION OF MORTGAGE CEILING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question which is directed to the Minister of Labour is based on the D.B.S. figures published yesterday which show spiralling increases in housing costs. In view of this situation, is the government seriously considering revising the mortgage ceiling for home loans in the near future.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing that I can usefully add to the answer I gave yesterday on this subject.

Mr. Grafftey: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The question asked yesterday was not in respect of the mortgage ceiling. In view of the present situation, particularly as it exists in Toronto, could the minister assure the house that the government is going to come to a conclusion very quickly?

[Translation]

ACCELERATION OF CONSTRUCTION IN SAGUENAY-LAKE ST. JOHN AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alcide Simard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Labour in connection with his statement to the house last January 30.

Can the minister tell the house whether he will recommend to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation any increase in residential housing in Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question is rather specific in character and deals with a particular area; for these reasons, I suggest it cannot be put now.

Mr. Simard: At ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

BANKRUPTCY

MANITOBA—PROCLAMATION OF LEGISLATION RESPECTING PAYMENT OF DEBTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the President of the Privy Council, although I believe it should be addressed to him in his capacity as Registrar General of Canada. Could the minister tell us whether the regulations under part X of the Bankruptcy Act, which we amended earlier this session, have been enacted; and whether part X, having to do with the orderly payment of debts, has been proclaimed for Manitoba?

Hon. Guy Favreau (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my hon. friend for having given me due notice of his intention to put this question. The answer is no, but I think it requires a very short explanation.

The superintendent of bankruptcy, in cooperation with the Department of Justice, has prepared draft rules and forms for the purpose of part X, and these draft rules and forms have been sent to the provincial authorities in Manitoba for their comments. As soon as these draft rules and forms are accepted by the provincial authorities they will be submitted to the governor in council.

We have not as yet received a request from the lieutenant governor in council of the province of Manitoba pursuant to section 198 of the Bankruptcy Act that part X be proclaimed by the governor in council to be in force in that province. My understanding is that before making such a request, the provincial authorities wanted to satisfy themselves that the proposed rules and forms for part X would make the legislation operational.

TRANSPORT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAUSEWAY—POSSIBLE CONSTRUCTION CHANGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works and relates to an answer he gave yesterday afternoon to a question posed by my colleague the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie). In view of the fact his department has received Mr. McCulloch's report I am wondering whether he will give us some information as to whether any changes will be required in respect of the Prince Edward Island causeway construction?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, if any need for changes arises I presume it will be announced.

REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON DIGBY-SAINT JOHN FERRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he is in a position to give a progress report on the discussions taking place in respect of the Digby-Saint John ferry. Will the minister confirm that Mr. Darling of the Canadian Maritime Commission is involved in these discussions?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the second part of the question is yes, and the answer to the first part is, not yet.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I have a supplementary question. May we expect some action in this regard before the commencement of the tourist season this year?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, is the hon. member seriously suggesting that a new ship could be built before the commencement of the tourist season this year? If he is, I think he ought to consult his local shipyards.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

INQUIRY AS TO PREPARATION OF REGULATIONS UNDER ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the minister as yet in a position to indicate how soon regulations under the Canada Assistance Act will be ready for promulgation in order that many very needy cases in the country can be looked after?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the regulations have been approved and appeared in the Canada Gazette on February 8.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

CHICOUTIMI, QUE.—PROTECTION FOR MANPOWER MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. Solicitor General of Canada, who is the minister responsible for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Could the minister tell us how many members of the R.C.M.P. went to Chicoutimi during the last week-end, in order to protect the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think this question is in order.

Mr. Grégoire: At ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

WOMEN

INQUIRY AS TO PERSONNEL OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister when we may expect an announcement regarding the appointment of the rest of the members of the royal commission on the status of women, and when that commission will commence its work.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope to be able to make that announcement this week, and expect the commission will then be able to commence its work next week.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST THAT OLD CRIMINAL RECORDS BE EXPUNGED

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the resolutions passed by the John Howard Society and the Ontario Bar Association suggesting that during the centennial year provision should be made to expunge from the criminal records any convictions of individuals who have served their time or have been granted full pardons and who have not returned to crime for a period of five or ten years, does the government intend to take any steps to adopt these suggestions in order that the records of these individuals may be cleared? I have particular reference to the case of a New Waterford, Nova Scotia individual which was directed to his attention for examination some ten days ago.

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the right hon. gentleman for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. I respectfully agree that this is a matter worthy of serious consideration, particularly at a time when the Criminal Code and the Parole Act are under study for possible amendment.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF FEED GRAIN BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development. I am wondering whether the minister can indicate when we may expect an announcement of the setting up of the feed grain board.

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Before March 15, I hope, Mr. Speaker.

QUEBEC—MANAGEMENT OF RESOURCES UNDER ARDA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Forestry and Rural Development.

Has the agreement under the ARDA program to carry out the eastern Quebec development scheme been signed with the province of Quebec? If not, will it be signed soon?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Negotiations between the two governments are proceeding normally, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SEAFARERS UNION—CHARGES LAID IN U.S. COURT AGAINST CANADIAN OFFICIAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Labour. I apologize for not sending him notice, but I had intended to ask it tomorrow. A few days ago I brought to the attention of the minister that Mr. Donald Swait, secretary treasurer of the Seafarers International Union, had been named as a co-conspirator in a court in Chicago with respect to the bombing of a Canadian ship. The minister said he would make inquiries. Has he anything to report?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): I must confess that I have not, Mr. Speaker. Had I received notice I would have had an up to date report. It happens that recently I have been away from Ottawa quite often or I would have followed up this matter. I will do so and let the hon. member know very shortly.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO EXCHANGE ARRANGEMENTS BETWEEN FRANCE AND CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Industry and of Defence Production.

As a result of the trade mission to France and the report published in that connection, could the minister tell the house whether profitable relations and exchanges have been established between France and Canada regarding technical development and other joint projects?

Mr. Speaker: I feel this question is much too general to be put on the orders of the day.

Mr. Allard: At ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

QUEBEC WINTER GAMES—ATTENDANCE BY MEMBERS AND SENATORS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. René Tremblay (Matapédia-Matane): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In view of the fact that the winter games are starting in Quebec over the week-end and that these are important events in the centennial of confederation celebrations, would the minister consent to make representations with the organizers of these events so that all members and senators may be invited to participate at the inauguration of these winter games?

[English]

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will be delighted to have this matter brought to the attention of the president of the winter games. The Prime Minister will be holding a reception in Quebec city on Saturday at noon, and I hope all members of parliament will find it possible to attend.

COAL

INQUIRY AS TO PERSONNEL OF PROPOSED CROWN CORPORATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. May I ask the right hon. gentleman what success he is having in recruiting personnel for the Cape Breton development corporation, announced by him some weeks ago, or how soon may we expect an announcement of the personnel of this corporation?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, negotiations in regard to the establishment of the corporation are still going on. We hope to be able to make an announcement shortly on this very important matter.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENTS TO FILL VACANCIES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in connection with appointments, would the Prime Minister advise the house the present position regarding the presidency of the C.B.C.? Mr. Ouimet is left in a state of suspended animation, and there are the positions of general manager and vice president to be filled. When will these positions be filled, so the C.B.C. can function with that efficiency and sense of direction that parliament can expect when that organization has leadership?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in view of the criticism that is levelled at the C.B.C. by hon. gentlemen opposite I would not think it is in a state of suspended animation. Without accepting the premise of the right hon. gentleman's question, I would point out that the C.B.C. has a president. The vice president resigned the other day. Steps are being taken with a view to filling that particular post. I believe these matters were being considered last night at a meeting of the board of directors.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There was some reference in the press to the effect that certain names were before the government with respect to the presidency. I cannot ask, of course, whether that is so, but does not the Prime Minister agree that in recent months there has been a grave uncertainty in the C.B.C. which is a natural consequence of the failure to appoint officials to that body?

Mr. Pearson: I am also aware of the fact that there is a white paper dealing with broadcasting which will be considered by a parliamentary committee. After that consideration has been completed there will be a report. That report, I assume, will be the basis of legislation in regard to broadcasting in Canada so far as it concerns the C.B.C. and will have a very direct bearing on the organization of the C.B.C.

Mr. Starr: This session?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have one other question, Mr. Speaker. Are the appointments to await consideration by a parliamentary committee on broadcasting? Surely the Prime Minister does not expect such further delay, because already the delay has been inexcusable.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, there are no vacancies at the moment except the one I mentioned, and that is being filled.

FISHERIES

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—REGULATIONS REGARDING LOBSTER SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the recent announcement with respect to regulations for district 7B for the lobster fishing season, I wonder whether the minister will be able to provide more definite instructions for fishermen planning for the spring season.

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I believe the announcement I made recently regarding the trap limit for district 7B was clear and to the point. I am sure it was well understood by the fishermen and by the delegation that met with me to discuss this matter a few days before I made the announcement.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In the regulations referred to by the minister there was the comment "extenuating circumstances" which I think interested many fishermen. I wonder whether it is planned to give some clarification about this expression.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the question period is the time for me to explain what "extenuating circumstances" means.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt that either of the questions asked by the hon. member was in order. It seems to me his question is a little too limited, and I think it should be placed on the order paper or discussed at ten o'clock.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HEALTH AND WELFARE

STILBESTROL—POSSIBLE HARMFUL EFFECTS OF OVERFEEDING TO ANIMALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture but in his absence I will address it to his parliamentary secretary. In view of the reports of the possibility of overdosage in the feeding of stilbestrol to animals, with possible harmful effects to humans who may consume their flesh, has the government asked for further investigation into this dangerous situation?

Mr. Bruce S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to bring the hon. member's question to the attention of the minister.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

"GRANDE HERMINE" TRIP TO GASPÉ FOLLOWING EXPO '67

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Having met this very day a very important delegation from the Gaspé peninsula, does the Prime Minister intend to join those who will board the Grande Hermine when that ship leaves Montreal for Gaspé, the cradle of Canada, after Expo '67?

Mr. Speaker: I would suggest that the parliamentary secretary come back tonight at ten o'clock to answer his own question.

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question which you might allow.

Will that ship be seaworthy?

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

MASSACHUSETTS—PROPOSED HOLIDAY ON JULY 1 TO HONOUR CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. It refers to a bill in bilingual form which is now before the Massachusetts state house of representatives which in effect declares July 1 a state holiday in honour of Canada and our centennial. I wonder whether the Prime Minister is contemplating some suitable gesture in response to this significant display of friendship and affection between the peoples of Canada and the United States of America.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I will certainly be glad to look into this, and I thank the hon. gentleman for bringing this matter to my attention.

THE BUDGET

ADDITIONAL FINANCIAL MEASURES OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, February 8, consideration of the motion of Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Monteith.

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I think my opening remark must be that in my opinion and from my experience in this house the speech made by the Minister of Finance on December 19 was the most peculiar budget speech that was ever presented to this house. I say it was peculiar because in theory the minister was saying that he advised the government to proceed cautiously in one direction, and at the same time condoned the action of the government in proceeding at full speed in the opposite direction. The minister on the one hand cautioned the government and on the other condoned the action they have taken although he is against it.

The main message I get from the budget speech is that the government is spending more money than the Canadian people can afford to spend. I think the minister has presented this problem to the house very well, although he has offered no solution whatsoever and no suggestions as to how to stop this trend. In certain parts of his speech the minister appears to advise against any action which would cause an increase in expenditures, but admits that he has been unable to convince his colleagues in the cabinet that his theory is correct, so he proceeds to explain to the nation how additional revenues can be obtained to enable the government to continue its present spending spree.

Some questions come to my mind which I would like to ask the minister. Has the minister admitted his failure to impress upon the cabinet that the danger flag is flying with regard to expenditures, or are his right wing ideas being overruled perhaps by some more powerful personalities in the cabinet? Last night on television I heard a speaker say that the present government has two ministers of finance; one to tell the people what they should do and the other to advise the cabinet to do the opposite. Is the minister making provision for a way out when the balloon eventually goes up so he can say "Don't blame me. I gave you this warning but you took no notice of it"?

In my view the most important statement in the minister's budget speech of December 19—and it appears on page 11331 of Hansard —was when he said:

> I want to repeat what I said in this house on September 8 and on other occasions, that we must moderate the rate of increase in new public expenditures.

Apparently the minister repeated this statement time and time again in the house but no notice has been taken by his own colleagues of what the minister said.

Further on he goes on to say:

> Neither the capacity nor the willingness of Canadians to pay higher taxes should be taken for granted.

I should like to ask the minister why the government is prepared to impose higher taxes. How much money is the public of Canada paying in taxes every year? The sum is astonishing, and the minister has given us the figures in his speech. I suggest the Canadian people have a right to expect the Minister of Finance, who is supposed to understand Canada's financial position, to take steps to see that the goose that lays the golden egg is not killed.

I am afraid this is not what he has done. We have a right to expect our Minister of Finance to issue warnings not only to the public of Canada but also to the government which is spending this money. As he said, he issued a warning to the government on September 8 and on many other occasions that it must curtail its expenditures. From all the evidence in the house it appears that the minister has voted on every occasion to accept accelerated expenditures, although he now tells the government that it should not be spending so much money.

Mr. Sharp: The trouble is that I get no help from the opposition.

Mr. McIntosh: You would get some help if you put pressure on the former minister of finance. We are not quite sure which one we should support, but if the present Minister of Finance supported his own statements by appropriate action we would also support him.

Mr. Sharp: May I ask the hon. member why he advocates even larger expenditures?

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, I think I should clarify this. When did I ever advocate larger expenditures? All I can say to the minister is, either put up or shut up.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek should be allowed to continue his speech.

Mr. McIntosh: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Not only did the minister issue this warning; he also confirmed it in his budget speech. He said:

> It is already evident, however, that our expenditures will continue to rise next year quite apart from the guaranteed income supplement.

He also said:

> I now forecast that our budgetary revenues before the tax changes I shall propose would be approximately $8,240 million compared to $8,300 million forecast in the budget last March.

In fact there would be a decrease of $60 million from the budgetary revenues forecast on September 8.

The minister stated further:

> Our surplus in terms of the national economic accounts I would forecast at roughly $140 million compared with the budget forecast of $455 million.

In fact the surplus in the national economic accounts will be reduced by some $315 million. The minister continued with more proof which he has apparently put before the people of Canada and before the cabinet. He went on:

> Our net financing requirements for non-budgetary transactions, before tax changes and excluding transactions in our own debt, I estimate to be $342 million compared with $190 million at the time of the budget—

That shows an increase of $152 million in net financing requirements for non-budgetary transactions. These several statements of the minister add up to the fact that we are close to the point where the government is spending more than the people of Canada can afford. As the minister himself said, it is all too easy to anticipate growth in our revenues and to commit ourselves to spending programs that outrun it.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is exactly what the present government is doing. Its spending is outrunning the money that is coming in. The government is even running out of ideas on how to collect additional revenues from the people of Canada. We on this side, knowing the dangers and the problem of financing the budget, ask the minister why he does not prevail upon his colleagues in the cabinet to hold the line on expenditures within the several departments. We want to know the reason that each department is not holding the line on its expenditure. I can find nothing in the budget speech of the minister to indicate that the government is making any effort to curtail its expenditures.

It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, that the minister has been warned by his officials that the danger flag is flying, but that he has been unable to stop the spending spree launched by the government, or that this spending spree has been accelerated to such extent that the government has lost control of the brake and cannot stop it. It seems that each department is trying to race the other to obtain cabinet approval for the largest possible expenditure, without regard to the source of revenue.

The minister stated that to raise all the revenue which is required by all governments in Canada, which to use his figure is currently running at about $18 billion a year, a large variety of taxes and charges must be levied. This includes not only federal expenditures but provincial and municipal expenditures. In fact, Mr. Speaker, if my arithmetic is correct the tax requirements amount to $900 for each man, woman and child in Canada today. If I break that figure down, for the average family of four the breadwinner must provide $3,600 in taxes each year before he can even consider feeding and clothing his family.

This amount of $18 billion required by way of taxation every year within this nation amounts, I believe, to roughly the total amount of money on deposit in Canadian banks at the present time. In other words, almost a lifetime of savings is required to pay each year's taxes to run this country. Therefore I suggest that a halt must be called at some point. There must be a revision of our tax laws and a halt called to government expenditure until revenue catches up with expenditure.

Such a figure as that to which I have referred, Mr. Speaker, I suggest is alarming considering the income of the average family in this country. I contend that this government should be stopped from spending more than it can afford, and stopped before we find ourselves in an accelerated inflationary period or are forced to devalue our currency to the point where it is useless as a medium of exchange. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the government must be stopped before it bankrupts the country.

One would expect, Mr. Speaker, the press and financial critics to have a responsibility to the people of Canada and to focus attention on the uncontrolled spending taking place in this country. I suggest, as others in this party have suggested, that the press are not doing their duty by failing to focus attention upon proper topics. They would much rather take something speculative or sensational and blow it up. I suggest they are not doing the service to the country that is expected of them. The press at this time should prove to the people of Canada the value of the freedom of the press in a democracy by informing them of the financial dangers which lie ahead for Canada if this government's uncontrolled spending is not curtailed.

Why is the press so reluctant, we would ask, to criticize this government and give the public the true facts? It appears that the majority of publishers are more political than the politicians, or at least more Liberal minded than the Liberals. They belittle any attempt on the part of the official opposition to offer constructive criticism at any time on practically any subject to come before parliament. The press, knowing the political affiliation of their publishers, time and time again have charged the opposition with filibustering and obstructing practically every major piece of legislation which has been debated in this house during the current session, and I would say perhaps also in former sessions.

This point, Mr. Speaker, was well documented by one of my colleagues, the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard), in a press release a short time ago, in fact directly after the debate on medicare. I should like at this time to put on record, for the sake of the press if for nobody else, this paragraph which is contained in the press release of the hon. member for Simcoe East.

Mr. Pepin: Does he agree?

Mr. McIntosh: I agree with what he said, and it was this:

I have used this example of the needless debate on medicare because of the frequent government charges that we, in the Conservative party, are obstructing the government's legislative program. Indeed, this charge is levelled at us every time that we are not prepared to go along meekly with whatever legislation the government brings in. We are charged with obstructionism when we opposed the Hon. Walter Gordon's first budget. That our opposition was well-founded was proved by the fact that little of that budget lasted beyond the debate stage. We were charged with obstructionism when the first Canada pension plan was introduced. But that bill, too, you will recall, was withdrawn and one almost entirely different in its concept was substituted.

I might interject here, Mr. Speaker, that to my mind either one was a monstrosity. The hon. member continued:

We are being charged with obstructionism in the bill to unify the armed forces and in our efforts to eliminate the "means test" from the present proposal to increase old age pensions only for those who have incomes of less than $60 monthly. I think I can safely claim that, in many cases where we have criticized government legislation, where we have opposed passage of the legislation in the form in which it was introduced, our opposition and our criticisms have been constructive and have been in the best interests of the Canadian people as a whole.

We make no apology, Mr. Speaker, for the action we have taken on most of these bills, or for the constructive criticism we have offered. In fact it is our duty as members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition—indeed it is the duty of all members of the opposition—to constructively criticize government legislation; and I am only sorry that other parties in the opposition have not taken the opportunity of offering similar criticism.

I wish to deal for a few moments with charges of obstruction with regard to the armed forces bill. Our criticism of the Minister of National Defence is identical with our criticism of the Minister of Finance. Both have informed the Canadian public of problems within their jurisdiction, but neither appears to offer concrete or realistic solutions to overcome these problems. This has been the basis for most of our criticsims all through this session, Mr. Speaker.

The Minister of Finance has told us that we are spending more money than we can afford to spend but at the same time he is making provision to spend additional sums beyond that which the government is now spending and has in its treasury. Rather than being realistic about the problems in his department and solutions to those problems, the minister has launched on a program of mystification with which he hopes to lead the public down the garden path.

I am convinced that the term "unification" is coined. It means nothing. Speaking before in the house I have said that the unification issue comes down to nothing more than a change in wording, with the word "royal" being deleted from "Royal Canadian Air Force" and "Royal Canadian Navy". It may mean a common uniform for all forces but it does not mean much more than that.

For the press the unification issue was an excuse to build up a potential leader for the other side. We have been told we ought to be careful not to destroy the Minister of National Defence. Our own followers tell us, "Under no conditions do we want him destroyed. We do not want his chances to be leader of the Liberal party destroyed. So far as we are concerned, we should like to see him as leader of the Liberal party". I say, God help Canada if the minister ever becomes prime minister.

The sum total of the minister's efforts in jockeying with the term "unification" will prove, when the smoke has cleared away, that he had no conception of the real problem facing his department, the lack of any national defence policy for Canada. The problem is not whether the forces should all have the same uniform or whether the word "royal" should be deleted from the names of some formations, which the minister has shown may be done under his definition of unification. As I said before in the house, the minister's propaganda about his mysterious policy of unification will prove to be the most gigantic hoax ever perpetrated on the Canadian public. It involves nothing but a change of uniform and deletion of the word "royal".

In the process of obtaining information from the minister we in the opposition were charged with filibustering, obstruction and an anti-unity conspiracy. I tell the minister there was no conspiracy, no filibuster and no obstruction. I am sure every member who spoke on this issue was genuinely concerned about the radical change implied in the minister's press statements or in the inferences the press drew from his statements. The minister did not realize what he had implied but it became plain after the press had dealt with it that it was something very serious. In fact, so serious was this matter that a great number of senior officers in all services threw up their hands in disgust and resigned.

We do not apologize for our concern about national security. In a democracy it is not enough to trust blindly that the government will decide wisely vital matters such as finance and national defence. Every responsible citizen has a duty to understand what is happening and to exercise his judgment on questions that seem complicated and difficult. It is not hard to understand that we cannot spend more money than we have. Only a certain number of sources yield money.

Even the Liberal press became concerned about the minister's lack of clarification on the issue of unification. They ventured such statements as:

> One reason for the doubts and questioning of the opposition is that the government's complete plans for integration or unification are as yet vague and undefined.

Those plans are still vague and undefined. They are still mysterious. For what purpose are funds allocated to the Minister of National Defence? The situation remains the same as it has been. The government never has had complete plans in regard to national defence and it still does not have complete plans. The Liberal press has also said:

> Critics of the integration program have three major objectives: 1. They want to see maintained the identity of the three services, even within an integrated defence organization.

I understand that the three services will be retained.

> 2. They would like to see a halt made now in the integration program so that problems that have arisen can be examined.

There will be problems with integration but problems would arise with any process.

> 3. And they would like to have a full inquiry made into future plans of the government in this field so that their impact can be properly assessed.

I suggest that on this occasion the press made a fair assessment of our objectives. The liberal press went on to state:

> In the circumstances it is no more than right that the government should be willing to lay its cards on the table so that the armed services and the Canadian people can see what the government is trying to do and can then give the government's plans the consideration they deserve and should have.

After listening to the minister's introductory remarks on Bill C-243 and observing his silence with respect to questions about press statements he released, it became obvious to many of us that the government has no up to date defence policy. The minister, perhaps because he is taking advice from the wrong people, as we have suspected for some time, is not aware that in our time the technique of war is changing rapidly and that all nations must adjust their thinking to cope with these changes. Canada is no exception. We have suggested several times that the minister look at what France has done. The French realize they have not too much money to spend. They cannot increase their national defence budget, but their armed forces are as effective, perhaps more effective, as they have ever been. The French have cut down their manpower and increased their firepower. That is what our defence policy should achieve.

For the minister to formulate a realistic defence policy he must accept some modern facts. I will enumerate some. I have said time and again in the committee and I repeat now that it is the minister's duty to inform the public of these facts rather than to bewilder them with the myth of unification. Unification means nothing; it is no different from the integration which would take place in any event.

An hon. Member: Mystification.

Mr. McIntosh: Yes, that is a good word. The minister has mystified everybody, including his department.

Returning to the point, first, and possibly most important, I believe the minister must accept that the only defence possible for Canada now and in the future is on a continental basis. Our friends across the border to the south have for some time developed the defence of their country on that premise. In so doing they will defend Canada whether we want them to defend Canada or not. These are facts which must be faced and dealt with. We are a proud nation, wishing to retain our sovereignty, but if we wish to share the benefits of this security we must share a proportionate burden of the cost. I do not say we should bear half the cost and the United States the other half, because we have 20 million people and the United States has over 200 million. But we should pay 10 per cent of the cost to defend the North American continent. We should be proud to pay that share in order to retain our sovereignty.

We want some say in what will take place in connection with the defence of the North American continent because, though small in numbers, we own a large part of it. In fact, the only justification for Canada having a defence force of any kind in the latter half of the twentieth century is in order to participate in some system of collective defence. This is another fact we must face. In other words, our defence policy, if any, must be based on alliances in order to be effective. I see the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux); he will note that I say "if any". Once our forces have been dissipated in accordance with the system of collective defence to which we are committed there is not much left. So why bring in the question of unification which does not mean anything very much—a change of badges, a change of name and putting everyone into the same type of uniform?

For a number of reasons, chiefly geographical, Canada cannot afford to assume an isolationist or neutral role. The old role of neutrality has gone by the board. No country can be neutral unless an aggressor will observe that neutrality. This was clearly demonstrated during both world wars in the case of Belgium and Holland. What did it profit either of those countries to be neutral when the aggressor decided to move his forces through them anyway? This is something Canada must accept.

If the Minister of National Defence wishes now to form another force to be placed under the United Nations to act as a police force and carry out an armed police role, I would not quarrel with him. That might be a good idea if the government, in its wisdom, decided that such a thing should be done. But let us not fool the Canadian people as to the value of our forces. I say the government was right in limiting the budget of the Department of National Defence to $1.5 billion. Our role now in the collective defence of the North American continent is defined. We know what equipment we need. I suggest it should not be exceeded in the absence of good and just cause.

Before I resume my seat I should like to take this opportunity of thanking the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Transport for focusing attention on the government's views with regard to the Crowsnest pass rates. In a publication which I believe is issued in his constituency there is an article written by the hon. member himself. The heading is "The Crow's Nest Rates" and beneath it we read: "By James A. Byrne, Kootenay East MP". If this represents the policy of the government it is beyond me how we can ever expect to have unity within our country. I would not mind if the statements made in the article were correct. Maybe I would blush if they were correct. But they are not. Surely the parliamentary secretary, who deals with this type of thing, should understand what he is doing. I can see no hope for our country when the people who are supposed to be running it for us do not understand the situation. The hon. member said in this article:

> The western farm members of the House of Commons are continuing a blockade of a bill to amend the Railway Act this week—

This word "blockade" is a new one. The government has accused us of obstruction, it has accused us of conspiracy it has accused us of filibustering. But now the word is "blockade". The hon. member went on:

> What is it all about? Mostly their fear, it would seem to me, that the public may be provided a means under the act to determine some of the facts about statutory grain rates, commonly known as the "Crow's Nest Rates".

Later we find these words:

> The farm members, well aware that they have a good thing going for themselves (rates for the carriage of grain that were in effect in 1897) do not want the taxpayers in the rest of Canada to learn the facts.

That is an out and out lie. I think the majority of Canadians know the facts, and for no consideration would we try to hide those facts from them. In case the hon. member does not know, let me remind him of what happened at that time. There was an agreement between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian people. The hon. member said further:

> Following a prolonged discussion with the government the C.P.R. entered into what hindsight has proven to be one of the most imprudent arrangements in the history of railroading.

But in any agreement there are two sides to the question. The hon. member has implied that the people of western Canada are enjoying a privilege which other people in Canada do not enjoy. I say this is an out and out lie. I could go into details about the tariff situation which we in western Canada condone.

I wonder whether the hon. member knows what the C.P.R. has obtained in return as a result of the concessions which were given under the agreement at that time? I suggest that no assessment could possibly be made now as to the advantage which this agreement brought to the C.P.R. In any case, the fact remains that an agreement was made at that time. I presume it was made by intelligent people representing the government and the railway company and both sides must have been satisfied that a good deal had been made. To say at this point that the C.P.R. came out on the short end of the stick is utter nonsense. Wise as the hon. member appears to be, and wise as he may appear to his constituents, he has failed to bring out both sides of the argument. He has not only told a falsehood; he has not been fair. Let him tell us how the C.P.R. is benefiting from the agreement before he starts an argument.

Again, let him not forget for a moment what the production of wheat in western Canada means to the whole economy of this country. If he would follow this up he would find that in Vancouver, for instance, where no wheat is grown, a great many thousands of dollars flow in daily because wheat is grown on the prairies and transported to that port.

Had it not been for the revenue Canada obtained from wheat sales the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) would have been in a very difficult position a couple of years ago. It might be accepted that the Crowsnest rates constitute a type of subsidy. The fact remains, however, than an agreement was made between two bodies and once an agreement is signed that agreement sticks. We are here to see that people like the hon. member for Kootenay East and the minister he supports do not bring in by the back door something which they could not bring in by the front door.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, studying as we are in this house the supplementary budget, or rather the mini-budget as it has been called, reminds us that more than ever federal budgets tend to condition our economy, to stabilize it, and to spare us the type of disastrous depressions we have known in the past.

Consideration of the consequences the budget can have leads us to examine certain deficiencies in our economy, to attempt to diagnose them objectively and to suggest remedies. For my part, one of the sorest spots, one of the most damaging deficiencies in our economy at the present time is the proliferation of labour conflicts throughout Canada.

While keeping in mind the workable possibilities of a budget on the economy, I should like to refer, as briefly as possible, to the situation regarding labour disputes, to the possible cause, in my opinion, of this proliferation of labour disputes, of strikes, if you like, to their effects on the economy and the desirable aims of those concerned with labour relations, and finally to suggest briefly some solutions which the government could consider and perhaps eventually apply through appropriate pieces of legislation.

I believe we have reached the point where the Canadian people are desperate in the face of the great number of strikes being announced every day. The point has been reached where the workers involved and the unions themselves are wondering whether strikes, as a means to settle labour disputes, are not outdated by the current economic situation and whether the time is not ripe to seek less costly solutions first for the workers but also for the public affected by the disastrous consequences of such strikes occurring too frequently these days.

To obtain a clear understanding of the situation, Mr. Speaker, we should take a look, for instance, at the number of strikes in Canada since 1961, let us say, up to 1966 inclusive. For 1966, the figures must be estimated for the last two or three months of the year. Since 1961, we have figures which are accurate enough and we find that, from 1961 to 1966 inclusive there have been in Canada, 2,870 strikes and lock-outs. This means a yearly average of 480, which represents about 40 per month. And there is no indication of any reduction in sight. Looking at the figures, they seem to be increasing every year. Some will claim that strikes are a symptom of health. I have some doubts about that.

Mr. Speaker, 2,870 strikes and lock-outs mean 11,424,050 man-days lost to the country, and I do not include the last five months of 1966, because the statistics have not yet been published. You will admit that this is fantastic. Those are days when the Canadian economy has failed to operate, when the Canadian production has brought no profit to the country. Whatever the reasons to justify that—and I submit that there are justifiable reasons—I must nevertheless say that that is disastrous to our country's economy.

If you try to assess those things in terms of dollars, Mr. Speaker, and if you take as a basis something very modest, for instance the five-day week at eight hours per day, at an average hourly rate of $1.50—everyone will agree that this is very modest and, in my opinion, even below average—this means a loss of $137,088,600 in wages in Canada between 1961 and 1966. This does not take into account the days and the wages of workers indirectly affected by the strikes, who were forced to stop working, even though they were not on strike, because certain related industries were themselves paralysed during that period; neither do we take into account the loss of income suffered by companies affected by 11,424,000 man-days lost. Mr.

Speaker, I feel the situation has reached disastrous proportions for the economy of Canada.

You will note, and I wish to make this clear right away, that I am not trying to blame anyone. I want to make my comments as objectively as possible. I am not trying to find fault with the labour movement nor the government. I am trying to analyse a problem and make positive suggestions to the responsible members of government, with a view to correcting this situation because, as I said, the labour movement itself is beginning to feel this has gone too far; I am referring here to the rank and file, which does not necessarily include leaders of labour organizations who, because of their position, are not always free to express personal opinions or say everything they know; I am talking about the ordinary worker who is the first person affected by these strikes, in his personal economy.

It is therefore a truly alarming situation and, just to make the information complete, some of my hon. friends may be interested in knowing how these strikes were distributed, between 1961 and 1966. I have the doubtful satisfaction of saying that my province suffered the greatest man-day losses during this period, although this is not where the greatest number of strikes occurred. My mistake, Mr. Speaker, I am not referring to the whole period, this only covers the month of July, 1966. So that the facts may be better understood and in order to present a clearer case, I will only quote figures for the month of July 1966.

In July 1966, there were 27 strikes or lockouts in the province of Quebec, causing a loss of 445,263 man-days, whereas the 46 strikes in Ontario were responsible for 312,150 man-days lost. The other strikes were as follows: 12 in British Columbia, 3 in Newfoundland, one in Prince Edward Island, 2 in Manitoba, and 4 both in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Mr. Speaker, all this confirms what I said earlier, that the situation has become critical and must absolutely be remedied.

At this stage, I should like to quote part of an editorial published in the Montreal newspaper La Presse and written by Roger Champoux who concluded his comments on the strikes in the province of Quebec as follows:

> Baffled politicians, idle civil servants, teachers flourishing signs, interns and residents in study sessions, a hundred suggestions and few solutions, 18,559 strikers in all... the sight is ridiculous. And this is only the first act.

As I said, this is only the first act of the play, because there is talk of an imminent strike in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, it might be timely to question ourselves about the cause of this proliferation of strikes in our country. There are many causes, of course, and to make a cursory analysis, there is, for instance, the rising cost of living, which increased from 129.2, in 1961, to 144.2, in 1966, and which is still rising; this affects the budget of individuals who want many of the good things of life. On the other hand, workers cannot be blamed, because they need and are entitled to a minimum standard of living. According to St. Thomas Aquinas, this is an essential condition for salvation, even if it may surprise some people.

Automation, of course, is another cause, because it creates problems and causes great concern among workers. From one month to the next, some of them may be laid off and may, after many years with a firm, have to readjust to new conditions, new trades, or go back to school and sometimes leave the place where they have enjoyed their family life for many years.

Another cause might also be this sort of quest for emancipation which is going on in the world and which is not found only in Canada, but in all parts of the world. Everybody seeks freedom and wants to get rid of all restrictions, all constraints. Now, the labour movement, like all the others, has been bitten by the bug and wants to look tough to employers, and most of the time they have reasons to. This emancipation crisis has created problems, even among labour leaders who—a phenomenon more and more apparent than heretofore—can hardly control their members any more and who are often led into courses which they were reluctant to follow originally. Such a state of affairs has created some disagreements among unions, disagreements which, in my opinion, are too much in the public eye and which are not at all favourable to the progress of labour movements in our country.

Moreover, there is perhaps the obsolescence of our negotiating machinery which was suited to other times but is no longer adequate in this atomic age of ours. It must be reviewed. Our governments, it would seem, hesitate to do so because the situation grows more complex every day, the demands are piling up from day to day; the labour climate has grown fluid and lacks the reasonable stability it had a few years ago.

Perhaps there is also the other phenomenon that is due to the restrictions imposed to control the economy and especially credit. Faced with the competition which is growing ferocious in domestic, local and world markets, some employers harden their attitude, sometimes unreasonably, which provokes the worker indirectly and leads him to resort to that extreme measure which is called a strike.

We always thought that it should only be used to deal with extreme situations. However, we wonder now if extreme situations have not become commonplace, and those who watch our economic situation, especially those who assume responsibilities, namely the members of the government, are concerned. The members of this parliament, who must co-operate with the government to ensure a sound economy, examine the results of those strikes, which are more and more numerous and find that they create problems for our foreign trade, for the delivery of goods we have sold as a result of agreements or contracts, also problems of competition on international markets. Those numerous strikes mean, in many instances, complete disaster for some sectors of our whole economy; they certainly cause a great deal of apprehension to some investors who might have been able to put back on their feet some of our wealth producing businesses.

They certainly ruin the economy of those individuals who are affected by those strikes. In fact, during weeks and months, they see their debts piling up at the grocer's and other stores because they are not getting any pay. And what about all the family problems this implies. Those strikes constitute, in many cases, especially when they are related to public services, a sort of penalty on the public in general, which is to the prejudice of the common good and in many cases, involves extremely serious consequencies that I cannot discuss at length right now for lack of time but that might perhaps be usefully analysed most carefully one of these days.

And all those numerous strikes contribute in the end to the worsening of this climate of emancipation I was referring to a while ago, this climate of revolt, to use a word that might be more accurate and will express more exactly the situation, this climate of revolt that is certainly unhealthy, that often finds expression in open and organized rebellion, in fields where, up to now, everyone admitedly respected what was called authority, which should still be termed thus and without which we will drift into anarchy before long, confusion before long, and the first to be affected will be precisely those workers we are attempting to protect.

Mr. Speaker, after analysing all these things, it might be advisable to set forth some principles. We might ask ourselves what our objectives should be before considering remedies to rectify this alarming situation; what should be the principles motivating the labour leaders, the government, the members of parliament and all those who seek remedies to these problems?

There is one principle mentioned here, in the C.L.C. report which was published yesterday following an interview with the government. It mentions the measures to be taken to settle the labour situation:

> It should be something allowing the settlement of disputes in fairness and objectivity.

Fairness and objectivity, it will be understood, obviously require that we consider everybody's welfare, first, that of the workers concerned, who are entitled, like everybody else, to a reasonable share of worldly goods, but also, let us not forget it, the general welfare which we are agreed to call the common good.

Mr. Speaker, I have found elsewhere a description of what should be the main objective of those who are concerned with finding solutions to the numerous labour disputes. This is an article which was written by Mr. A. H. Raskin, assistant editor of the editorial page of the New York Times. This article was published in June 1966, in the magazine Atlantic Monthly, and was reprinted in the November issue of the Labour Gazette—and I shall open a parenthesis here to point out to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson)—

[English]

So that he will be aware of the situation, I point out to the minister that the French edition of the Labour Gazette which has just been issued is the edition for the month of November. It is at least two months late.

Therefore, as Mr. Raskin was saying:

> For the community, the most important question is whether collective bargaining can be used to protect the interests of the general public, and not only those of the unions or the management—

That, again, was Mr. Raskin, and the quotation is taken from an article of his published in the Atlantic Monthly. He asks the question and, a little further on, suggests several solutions himself, to which I shall come back later. Meanwhile, I should also like to mention something which the labour congress said yesterday should be the aim of all those concerned with the settlement of these disputes, and I quote from an article published in La Presse yesterday:

The C.L.C. recognizes that the government is responsible for protecting public interest, sustaining the economy and fulfilling Canadian commitments abroad.

Now, that is just fine; it is comforting to know that labour itself understands these major objectives. Naturally, it raises certain objections further on; for instance, and I quote:

We are absolutely convinced that the government will not solve labour problems by limiting or refusing workers the right to withdraw their services, by forcing them to return to work against their will.

Here we must ask ourselves: do workers seek the right to strike for the fun of going on strike, or are they seeking it to solve their problems? To my mind, the answer is obvious: workers do not want the right to strike for the fun of going on strike: they want to solve their problems.

Therefore, if we could find another formula, if a more modern technique could be found to settle labour disputes, I am convinced that the workers themselves would be the first to applaud and rejoice, since they would no longer have to suffer the hardships of strikes.

The C.L.C. report adds:

This is usual practice among dictatorial governments throughout the world, but it surely could not be applied here.

That would be dramatizing the situation a little; it would be true if we were really trying to abolish strikes, without any substitute acceptable to all parties concerned.

Our main objective therefore, Mr. Speaker, must be the common good. That makes it simple and clear-cut. What then, would the remedies be?

I do not want to be so presumptuous as to try and invent them all by myself, Mr. Speaker; for that matter, I readily admit that my ability in this field is quite limited. However, the Economic Council of Canada recently made public certain suggestions which were discussed in an article published in the January 31, 1967 issue of Le Devoir. Among others, there was the following statement:

The measures suggested by the council in order to ensure adjustment of manpower to technological changes deal with giving notice of changes to workers, natural cut-down in personnel, elaboration of transfer programs, transferable pension privileges, and the creation of labour-management committees in every factory governed by a collective agreement.

This is an important suggestion: "the creation of labour-management committees in every factory governed by a collective agreement".

Labour-management committees would function the year round with the help of neutral advisers from outside the factory.

This last comment is my own. Now, to continue:

The document published by the Economic Council also suggests three financial measures which collective agreements should also take into account; these would become applicable when recourse to other means would not compensate for all losses of employment due to technological changes.

These are: a generous lay-off allowance, supplementary unemployment benefits provided by a fund to which employers would contribute, and mobility allowances.

Naturally, the economic council refers here to workers affected by automation or by drastic technological progress. But there are surely other reasons for strikes, other problems must and could be settled as one—I will come back to these later—by implementing in a general formula the creation of labour-management committees operating all the year round, with the help of expert and impartial advisers.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, I am not the only one to think that the time has come to do something. I said so in this house a few weeks ago.

Mr. Walter Reuther, a respected leader of an American union said, following the New York transportation strike, which took place I believe in January 1966, and I quote from memory: It is time for the governments to devise some machinery which would prevent the workers, when they belong to a labour union and when they have a problem to settle, a problem affecting utilities, from always having recourse to costly strikes. It is time to find up to date machinery. That was Mr. Reuther's testimony and I think that I am very objective. Earlier I quoted the evidence given by the C.L.C. and we could discuss it much more fully, but I would not want to labour the point. I see for instance that the C.L.C. suggested as a remedy:

> Among those measures, the C.L.C. advocates a critical appraisal of the level of government expenditures in the field of construction, the abolition of the existing sales tax of 11 per cent on building materials, the need to extend immediately welfare programs and the need to ease our tight money policy.

And this is the objective:

> The purpose of those policies should be to promote good and steady development of our economy.

I take this excerpt again from a summary of the C.L.C. brief published yesterday in La Presse. But it seems to me, after reading the brief presented by the C.L.C., that it suggests negative rather than constructive formulas and that it settles some aspects of the problem but not the overall problem.

I think that the most efficient remedies—and here again we could quote another excerpt where remedies are suggested—might be centred around some headings.

For instance, the federal government must undoubtedly continue and increase its control of the Canadian economy to prevent it from going suddenly through a period of recession when the worker has to tighten his belt to the point that eventually he becomes impatient to have recourse to claims which are not always objective.

Then, the federal government must try and control the economy in order to guarantee, inasmuch as is reasonably possible, to all the sons of the nation, that minimum standard of living to which he is entitled. That is beyond argument and in this connection I think it must be said that the government has already done something. On the other hand, perhaps it should still accentuate its policy and direct it mainly towards the protection of the small defenceless people, of the workers, rather than toward the protection of certain financial powers which can take care of themselves.

I was impressed, for instance, when I heard the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), during the debate on the National Transportation Act, say that this bill is greatly concerned with the protection of financial interests of the railways but very little with the protection of the financial interests of workers.

I think that the hon. member for York South hit the mark there. But the government should also be urged to modernize considerably its labour legislation in view of the new problems facing the labour movement.

Once again, time will not allow me to give all the details. I am sure that the minister himself receives lots of briefs and that his own experience suggests to him many measures which could be included in an up to date labour code. In my opinion, it is urgent to go ahead with it.

I will now deal, Mr. Speaker, with what is probably the most important of my suggestions—which I mentioned earlier—namely that we should find a way to generalize here, in this country, those permanent bargaining bodies made up of representatives from labour and management which would include experts, economists, neutral people who are not on the payroll of employees or employers and who will take part in the discussions to express their views. I would not even be against government negotiators who could, if need be, point out the principles which determine the common good.

Such bodies should operate all year round—not only after the conflict had been going on for months and months—to try to prevent labour conflicts as much as possible.

It might be advisable for the federal Minister of Labour, of course, to hold regular meetings with the provincial departments of labour to synchronize the efforts of all the provinces and the federal government. But this is something which the minister is well aware of, I am sure.

I further suggest, Mr. Speaker, that provision should be made for the creation of labour courts as soon as possible. We should not have to look around for special negotiators, special mediators, and other interminable investigations every time disputes arise.

I believe we should have permanent labour courts in Canada. I know that workers will fear that the members of these courts would simply favour the employer; I also am aware of the fact that employers will fear that these same people might favour the employees, but I submit that mediators must be chosen in our midst or else we will get nowhere. When a dispute arises, we refer the whole matter to ordinary courts of law; but if labour courts were established, presided by the most competent personalities, people who are cognizant of all aspects of the labour problem, there would be no need for strikes, in most cases, because the parties involved would accept the verdict handed down by these labour courts.

Mr. Speaker, I see that the time allotted to me has expired, and I do not wish to overtax the patience of the house. I merely wish to summarize my comments by saying this—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order. I understand that the hon. member would like to continue his comments. Is the house ready to allow the hon. member to continue his speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Mongrain: I have only a sentence to say and I will not abuse this privilege, Mr. Speaker. I thank the house for its kindness and I will merely summarize my remarks. According to Canadian public opinion, the proliferation of strikes has reached an alarming degree and I think that all governments concerned, whether federal or provincial, must give urgent consideration as a priority to introducing and enforcing, without delay, after consultation with the parties concerned, the legislation suitable to the needs of 1967.

[English]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, let me first congratulate the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) on the excellent, dispassionate, clear-headed and objective speech he has just made. He has touched a raw nerve in our body politic and he has done it, I think, in a most objective way. There is no doubt that last year demonstrated a wastage of millions of man-hours and effort at a time when this world can ill afford it. I think it is tragic, when society is now reaching with the calm assurance of success to probe into outer space and the planets which we once thought were forever beyond our reach, that we should still be struggling with an archaic and obsolete system of dealing with our major problems. I suggest that the genius of mankind which has brought the world to where it is today, if one defines genius as being a capacity to take infinite pains, should surely bring us to a position where we cannot afford to allow this situation to continue. I hope the government will examine and heed the words which the hon. member uttered.

At this stage in the discussion of a budget it is sometimes difficult for an opposition member to say something new, particularly with regard to this budget. Hon. members who were overseas during the last war will recall posters hanging in the railway stations and bus depots in the United Kingdom with a giant finger pointing to the passengers and bearing the caption, "Is this journey really necessary?" I would think this is the sort of poster which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) should have had in front of him but with the word "journey" blotted out and "budget" put in its place, because it takes a certain amount of shrewd ingenuity to discover why this budget was necessary.

My colleagues in this party and other opposition members have demolished with such clarity the features of the budget that there is not too much to say about it. I think one could call it the Muhammad Ali budget. Like the unfortunate victim of the so-called sporting event the other night, the budget has been knocked down so often that it is now wilting and drooping and does not present much of a target to anyone else who wants to take a poke at it. I think it will probably sink into the oblivion of parliamentary history as the budget which was unwept, unhonoured and unsung. In fact, it never should have emerged from oblivion. However, it does give us the opportunity, as an opposition party, to cast before the members of the government those pearls of wisdom which the opposition is presenting with increasing efficiency and effectiveness, but unfortunately with no tangible results indicating that the government is taking heed of them to any extent.

I should like to deal with two matters which I hope are of interest to the house and possibly to some limited extent to the country. I want to comment first on what I consider to be the failure of the government to follow through with the program of northern development which the previous government undertook with such a marked degree of success and such a measure of accomplishment. The minister who is responsible for this department has made some gestures in this respect. I am afraid, however, that he seems to lack the full support of his colleague in this very essential part of the development of our country at the present time.

I have made one or two suggestions in the past with respect to this question. On one occasion I dealt with what I thought was the necessity of a greater degree of international co-operation in scientific improvement and techniques with regard to northern development. I was very interested, when looking through an editorial in the Christian Science Monitor of yesterday, to see that my views as to this objective are shared by this independent newspaper. I will not quote the editorial in full but it points out that Scandinavia, Canada, the United States through the state of Alaska, and the U.S.S.R. have complete control of all areas of the north and of the Arctic. The editorial suggested some steps which might be taken because of this particular fact. It suggested that great advantages could be reaped from the nations concurrently seeking to develop these lands. It was suggested that this could perhaps be done through a Northern Area Institute in which geologists, physicists, meteorologists, agriculturists, and many other natural scientists from America, Canada, Russia and the Scandinavian countries could pool their discoveries and help correct each other's mistakes.

It seems to me that relations between the east and the west are not fraught with such serious difficulties as they were. There is not the same measure of hostility now, and I can think of nothing more useful at this stage in the development of our resources, bearing in mind the necessity of providing for a vastly increasing world population, than making arrangements for the proper settlement of the north. I do not mean the kind of settlement we have now wherein all too often people and corporations go into the north with one idea, to explore, exploit, lay waste and retire. We want people to settle, live, and make their homes in the north. It seems to me that the research which might be pursued independently to a limited extent by the scientific apparatus and people of these nations might, if pooled, bring about a greater degree of improvement, a greater realization of our joint hopes to settle, live in and harvest the rich resources of northern Canada and the northern parts of these other nations.

There is another matter about which I wish to speak. The time has now come when we should have some clarification of the very confused situation and the doubt and uncertainty which prevail in regard to confederation, our constitution and what is to be done, what changes are needed and how we will obtain them. I was not in the house yesterday but I read the dialogue between the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Pepin) and the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey). Unfortunately, the minister did not intervene actively in the debate but acted more as an irritant at the time. Mind you this is a very essential part of our parliamentary system. We might have an opportunity to hear from the minister later on this very serious and developing situation. The matter has come more to the fore recently because of the exchange of correspondence between the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and the premier of Ontario following the announcement in the speech from the throne at the recent opening of the Ontario legislature in connection with the holding of a constitutional conference. I have the correspondence here. I think it would be interesting to read into the record parts of what was said by the premier of Ontario and also the reply of the Prime Minister of Canada because I think that the correspondence, together with the answers of the Prime Minister given on orders of the day and at other times in the house, indicates the point of view and the attitude of this government. The last paragraph of the letter of the Prime Minister to Mr. Robarts is important and I believe should be considered by hon. members. After being somewhat critical, in the usual polite way in which these documents are formulated, of the fact that the government of Ontario was taking the initiative in this matter the Prime Minister went on to say:

> It seems to me that an alternative to the approach you have suggested could be developed that would be consistent with the practice hitherto. The initiative that the government of Ontario has taken in raising the subject could, if you so wished, be translated into action through having an item suggested for possible inclusion on the agenda of a federal-provincial conference that might be called in the normal way at some time in the coming months. While no conference is scheduled at present, there is no reason why we could not explore—

This is a word beloved by statesmen, who use it frequently in their correspondence.

> —with provincial governments the desirability of having a conference and determining when this would best suit the convenience of all concerned. Alternatively, you might, of course, think it best to use the vehicle of an interprovincial conference as a first step.

I would say that this was in effect a complete brush-off of the proposal made by Mr. Robarts.

Mr. Robarts replied in a letter dated February 1, 1967, which contains some views of which this house should take heed. He said in part:

> Then there was need for unity. Today there is a swelling chorus of millions of voices expressing a similar need. Perhaps once again, in some measure at least, by appropriate discussion in a conference, unfettered by the techniques and procedures in effect at the various types of conference held over the past several years, achievements might result from representatives of the governments of Canada sitting down together: to examine confederation and to take stock of the state of affairs after one hundred years of partnership together; to take the time to discuss and review, in an atmosphere free from rancour, areas of agreement and disagreement; and to explore through our ingenuity and kinship what can be done to ensure a strong and united Canada.

Surely no harm can result from conducting an inventory of the happenings and events of our century of progressive history since 1867. Out of it, in my opinion, can come suggestions for plans to chart our future and to shape the second century of our nation based upon a sure and firm foundation.

The penultimate paragraph reads as follows:

The one objective I have in mind for this conference is that it will serve the interests of the Canadian people and their nation which the provinces created and in whose continued existence, unity and strength, the provinces are vitally concerned.

I say amen, as should all other members, to this very statesmanlike and sensible suggestion.

Following the announcement by the government of Ontario in its speech from the throne some questions were asked in this house. For example, I observe that on February 1 the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) asked the Prime Minister whether in view of the statement made by the premier of Ontario the premier of Quebec would also be interested in taking part this year in a conference on the constitution. The question was as follows:

Would the Prime Minister agree to change his attitude and take right now the initiative in calling such a national conference?

The Prime Minister answered:

Mr. Speaker, I think I should wait for the prime minister of Ontario to reply to my communication before making further statements on this.

Some questions were asked by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) and the answers which were received indicated quite plainly that the Prime Minister did not think very highly of the suggestion eminating from the province of Ontario and did not intend to do anything about it.

I think this is the only impression that can be obtained by anyone making a fair, objective and rational examination of the documents and of Hansard. The impression I get is that the Canadian government is not really interested in this subject at this time, does not want to think about it, does not want to talk about it, and does not want to give any information, mainly because it does not have too much to give, but also does not want anybody else to do or say anything about it. Surely the reason for this is not that the matter has not been brought to the attention of this or previous governments or to the attention of provincial governments, and surely it must be acknowledged that there is a very urgent need at this time for a review of the situation and an attempt to make the rules conform in a better way to the present requirements.

In 1964 I placed a resolution on the order paper in which I suggested the following:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should forthwith consult with the provinces for the purpose of establishing a centennial constitutional conference to consist of a given number of Senators and members of parliament and an equal number of members of all of the provincial legislatures; which conference should meet in Ottawa and in all of the provinces to consider amending the British North America Act in accordance with the experiences of the past, the exigencies of the present and the needs of the future—

However, the fortunes of the draw were not with me and I never had the chance to have the resolution debated. Other hon. members have brought up this question from time to time, and so have members of the provincial legislatures, learned professors and people interested in and concerned about the needs of Canada. They have said: we cannot ignore any longer the necessity of examining the present-day situation, the status of the constitution and the relations between the federal and provincial governments, and so we must see what if anything can and should be done about it.

It seems to me that what in effect the Prime Minister is saying is: "Do not worry about it. We are going to look at it. We have some experts and we have my parliamentary secretary who is advising these experts. Some day this body will labour and produce something to show for its discussions." The impression I get from listening to what the Prime Minister and other ministers have stated both in and out of the house is that the whole subject is something so rare, so precious and so exclusively in the domain of experts that ordinary common mortals must not be allowed to give their opinions or help in any way to mould and shape the form which our constitution must take during the course of the next 100 years.

I think that perhaps the Prime Minister visualizes a scene some day in the future when like Moses he will ascend the mountain and some time later will come down, clutching to his bosom stone tablets on which will be engraved new changes to the constitution. He will then say in a tone of wonderment and joy: "Look what my experts have hatched up. This is not to be questioned. The experts have produced it." At that point all that the people will be able to do will be to fall down, worship and say: "Hosanna, wonderful, great, we will accept it."

Mr. Pepin: Is that not what you would expect the conference to do?

Mr. Baldwin: By no means, Mr. Speaker. I would like to see a conference held in every province in this country. Such a conference should have been started several years ago. I do not expect it to come up with changes in a final, finished and polished form, but surely the people who are the beneficiaries and who will be affected by the changes made to the constitution should have some say before and not after the event. The minister knows—I think he is a practical man—what happens. When the experts are finished with the matter it will come before a parliamentary committee, though not with any intention of changing it. It will then be presented to the nation as a fait accompli.

I should like to see a number of these conferences held at which people will have an opportunity to express their views and opinions. There should be a great national debate carried on in all parts of the country. Perhaps the debate is one which will never really be concluded, but when we can say at a point in time that we have reached a certain stage, certainly the matter can then be handed back to the experts to polish, finish, and put the proposals into practical legislative terms.

Mr. Pepin: Would the hon. member permit a question? Is this not the equivalent of what is taking place in Quebec now with les Etats généraux, the general kind of debate where all of the intermediary and pressure groups will be represented to give their opinions? Or would it not be what I have been told it would be, a meeting of premiers, leaders of oppositions, heads of national institutions, etc?

Mr. Baldwin: I would hesitate to suggest to any province the form which its own inquiry should take. I think that is a matter for each province to determine, having in mind what changes are to be made. It should also be borne in mind that the people of Quebec, the people of Alberta, the people of British Columbia, the people of all the provinces, are also Canadians and must be affected deeply and fundamentally by the problems now confronting us, such as the fact that there is not a clear and decisive line of demarcation in certain areas as to problems which various governments must solve. I think that each province should establish its own forum of inquiry. I will not suggest what is desirable for the province of Quebec, but my view is that it is essential at this time that this step be taken so that before the experts are finished the voice of the people will have been heard and felt.

Mr. Pepin: But is there not such a debate going on in Canada at this time? How many conferences, seminars, lectures, panels, has the hon. member been invited to in the last two or three years? How many conferences and royal commissions have we had on the future of confederation, on this and on that aspect of our constitution? I would simply suggest that the debate is going on now. If the kind of conference the hon. member has in mind is one only to examine and analyse what is taking place and to suggest answers, then I dare say we have already had it.

Mr. Baldwin: What we have had is a series of hole-in-the-corner discussions. There have been a very few open and legitimate discussions but not of the type that I envisage at which each provincial government must take the responsibility for canvassing, in the way it thinks best, and securing a body of opinion from its citizens or its citizens' representatives. In recent months we have seen examples of the problems posed because of the present obscurity of certain constitutional lines of authority, problems involving manpower, education, security, pension plans, medicare and transportation, and so on. All of these problems intimately affect and concern the lives, fortunes and futures of the people of Canada.

All I want to achieve is some means by which these people can indicate whether they want their provincial government or their federal government to deal with questions of medical health, certain questions of transportation, certain questions of pensions and pension rights. During the course of such discussion debate of a far more tangible and meaningful form will take place. When this debate has concluded and the matter crystallizes—this operation should have been commenced years ago and been in the process of conclusion today—then the experts will put into final form the proposals which will be made.

Let us remember once and for all, Mr. Speaker, that all too often this business resolves itself into a matter of two dogs quarrelling over a bone: the civil service and establishment in the provinces struggling with the civil service and establishment of the federal government, each one anxious and desirous to retain the spheres of authority they now have and to enlarge them. I do not say that this is done deliberately, intending to do harm, but that is the nature of an establishment of this kind; it is reluctant to give up any form of authority.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, governments and legislatures as well as parliament have failed in their attempt to solve the problem. What I am suggesting is that in his own way the prime minister of Ontario has indicated that he feels some attention should be paid to providing a means of securing an indication of the views of the people of his own province. I suggest this proposal should be adopted by all provinces.

Mr. Pepin: Would the hon. gentleman permit another question? Would the premier of Ontario need federal authorization to set up such a seminar or conference within the borders of Ontario?

Mr. Baldwin: Did the minister ask whether he has the right to do this?

Mr. Pepin: Yes.

Mr. Baldwin: I can see no constitutional, legal or practical impediment. I suggest that he not only has the right to do it but has a duty to do it at this time. I would say that every premier has a duty to undertake a responsibility of this kind. In fact, they are two or three years too late. The initiative should have been taken by the federal government. Ottawa, Mr. Speaker, is very remote from Peace River and from other parts of this country. What happens here sometimes reaches us in a very diluted form. For the people of this country to be seized of knowledge of this problem, steps must be initiated to bring it home to them through a debate of the kind I have mentioned.

As I have pointed out, there are a great many fields of jurisdiction where there is room for doubt. I can think of some examples where the best interests of the people of Canada would be served by deciding to give to the provinces certain jurisdictions which they do not now possess. Equally, I can think of a number of areas where the best interests of the people of Canada would be served by investing in the federal government certain rights which it has exercised but not always legally. There are some rights that I submit we should make certain are legally exercised by the federal government.

There was some mention of federal-provincial conferences. They have a useful purpose but I think this purpose has been exaggerated. These are conferences where the experts burrow into the darkest corners and holes of secrecy and privacy. Sometimes this is essential, but the difficulty is that I am afraid this sort of thing is emerging in the form of a third form of government, a type of government where there is not the same degree of publicity or the same measure of criticism, argument and examination. True enough, Mr. Speaker, it may be said that all of the proposals which are discussed and canvassed and which ultimately emerge in the form of legislation are brought back to the respective legislatures and to parliament. But once they have become crystallized in a certain form and are brought forward as legislation, governments being what they are there is very rarely any hope of changing them. While they have a function to serve I caution the government to be most careful about trying to build federal-provincial conferences into an ad hoc third form of government which the people of this country have never given authority to the provinces or federal government to exercise. It may be nice and tidy and easy for the governments to do this but it is not, I repeat, in the best interests of the Canadian people.

I believe that premier of Ontario has served a useful purpose with his proposal. I hope it will be copied in various forms in other parts of Canada. Before the debate is through I hope that the minister, who has been most helpful, may see fit to present the government's views on this issue.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Forest (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, the supplementary estimates tabled last December by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) have been well received, generally speaking, in spite of the limited increase in personal income tax and the increase in the sales tax levied against manufacturers to finance the pension supplement granted to our senior citizens; it might not have been as well received by those who think that social measures are thus becoming less popular because they have to be paid for immediately through new taxes.

The Minister of Finance proved to be a practical man when he made it clear to the people that the government could not increase social benefits without getting the money somewhere.

If all social benefit increases were introduced in this way, that is by offering a gift with the right hand and presenting the bill with the left, everybody would then be in a position to determine whether, at a given time, any additional levy imposed on the taxpayers and on the country's economy would constitute an excessive burden.

During the last few years, government expenditures in Canada, at all levels, have increased considerably and if we do not curb or stop them, they might bring about a reduction of investments in Canada and make our competitive position more difficult on the international market.

It is a fact that more than 30 per cent of our gross national product in Canada is absorbed by taxation and such a situation is not only frightening but unfavourable to our country, because it brings not only our economic development to a standstill but it lessens initiative, dampens any liking for risk and prevents the achievement of many plans.

Government expenditures in Canada increased from $12,098 million in 1961 to $16,127 million in 1965, that is an increase of 30 per cent in five years, while in the United States, during the same period, they increased by 25 per cent only, in spite of larger expenditures due to the war in southeast Asia.

If we figure the percentage on the basis of population, per capita, and if we consider that the population in Canada has increased much more than in the United States, our increase then is 24 per cent and that of the United States only 18 per cent. The Canadian people must be concerned, and rightly so, about that serious situation which could be detrimental to our economy and our standard of living.

One way to reduce taxation is to increase productivity and the labour output. The federal government has given these goals priority, in an attempt to improve present possibilities, and to give everyone the education and training which are indispensable in this day and age.

We will improve our competitive power by developing more highly qualified professional management and skilled labour.

The state of our economy and its future must become a growing concern because, compared with it, all other matters lose importance. Our people would not accept a lower standard of living without creating upheavals.

[Mr. Forest.]

Our economic experts have warned us that 750,000 new jobs must be created by 1970, and this need must induce us to modify certain obsolete economic concepts, to consider new methods.

The normal growth of our population will require industrial expansion, but automation and improved production methods will reduce the number of new jobs thus created. New needs will have to be created; we will also have to encourage industrial research in order to discover new products, different materials or improved finished products, so as to get the markets and open up new avenues.

The greatest discovery of the nineteenth century is said to have been that of the creative approach. More and more, creativity is the prerogative of organized research, particularly in the manufacturing industry. Technical progress depends more and more on organized research for innovation and improvement.

Economists generally agree today that investing in education and research is just as important as capital expenditure. Progress is not so much a function of the amount of money invested in machinery and factories as of technical improvement which can be expected from a given investment.

The supremacy of the United States on world markets is mostly due to innovations, new ideas in industry and ability to invent a great many new products; all this in turn depends on performance in research development.

Industrial development requires an extensive activity promoted by governments in industrial research.

The announcement made in the past few days by the Quebec government concerning the establishment of an important international research centre in electric energy should therefore be particularly welcomed.

Mr. Speaker, we should become less dependent on the United States for capital and new industries by urging our fellow-citizens in various ways to invest their money, their savings, in our Canadian corporations, especially those which develop our natural resources. We should put our own means to a more efficient and a more productive use.

We must consider what we could do in order to strengthen our position without unfairly penalizing foreigners who have invested here their money and their competence for their own benefit, of course, but also for ours.

We must take positive action in order to secure a more efficient control over our economy and to reduce our trade balance deficit.

Several methods have been suggested to make our economy sounder, better adjusted to our needs, to our aspirations and among those, the establishment of the Canadian Development Board can, under certain conditions, make it possible to channel the savings of Canadians toward the promotion and the development of our industries and resources.

However, it would not be an adequate replacement to an effective policy designed to promote private investments to merely provide enough protection and some relief in taxation.

An improved legislation designed to protect investments and the purchase of bonds and shares of our corporations is essential, especially in the light of some recent events.

Canadian and foreign companies should also be required to supply complete and more detailed information on their financial structure. Succession duties should be abolished or substantially altered. Some provinces have already indicated their intention to alter them. In my view, in an area where both the federal and provincial governments collect taxes, there should be agreement reached on that score.

These succession duties produce very little, slightly more than 1 per cent of the federal government revenue, but on the other hand, they are a major drain on capital available for investment.

We all know that some families had to sell their business or their private industry to strangers in order to avoid this tax or else they have taken up residence elsewhere to avoid these high duties. There is also the fact that several families, several people from Europe or elsewhere, might be interested in investing their capital in Canada if such duties were abolished. We are faced with the progressive disappearance of capital built up in this country and which should serve the economic progress of the country.

The Carter commission, which was established in 1962, is scheduled to present an early report. It will doubtless suggest a thorough shake-up of the entire tax structure and a more sensible distribution of the taxation fields.

In the meantime, the government must maintain its policy of promoting production, exports, a more advanced technology and investment of our own resources in our economy.

Canada will not succeed overnight in financing its own development and in eliminating its present trade deficit with other countries, but it should right now continue to revise its economic policy to achieve long-range objectives, which are possible if the effort is made.

• (5:00 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenberg): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak on the mini-budget introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) on December 19. Speaking as a Conservative I commend the minister for his frank review of our economic situation. His statement was a strong reminder to all Canadians that additional welfare measures must be paid for out of their own pockets.

However, in view of the size of the surplus in the old age security fund, a surplus in excess of $350 million at the end of last October, I think the minister placed undue emphasis on this aspect of expenditure. In fact, the hon. gentleman when introducing his budget seemed to be looking for a scapegoat on which to lay the blame for his government's deficit. He pointed his finger directly at the senior citizens of this country and blamed them entirely for the tax increases which seemed to be necessary. However, his statement served only to emphasize the smallness of the pittance we are giving to our senior citizens even when there is a means test attached to it, a test which would have to be taken every year in which a supplement was paid. We in the Conservative party believe that our senior citizens should have been given this increase as a matter of right without the necessity for a means test. We do not think an attempt should be made to lay the blame for the government's deficit on senior citizens who through no fault of their own need a little assistance in their old age.

What did the Minister of Finance do? In the present government the right hand does not seem to know what the left hand is doing. The minister tells the economy to go forward and backward at the same time. He raises the general sales tax, making it 12 per cent instead of 11 per cent, a move which will bring about an increase of approximately 2 per cent in prices at the retail level. What effect does this have upon Canadians?

A large contractor in the plumbing and heating business in my constituency has written to me bringing two points most specifically to my attention. He states:

1. To date there is no way to escape paying the increase on materials, ordered, but not delivered, before December 31, 1966. This also applies to contracts entered into months ago. In our business this is going to amount to a sizeable amount of money. The suppliers will not absorb the increase nor is there any provision in our contracts under which we could collect it from the owner. So, unless a change is made, we are stuck with it.

2. Of course insult was added to injury by exempting certain materials. We inquired about a list of exemptions and we were told that those materials exempt before June 14, 1963, will remain subject to the 11 per cent tax rate—big deal. Naturally, there must be some reason for all this but I am sure that only the Liberals could dream it up.

This serves to increase the price of homes, for example. What is needed at the present time are measures which will increase the tempo of housing construction in Canada. The price of houses and factories should be reduced, not raised. The increase in the sales tax hits not only the millionaire but the average man with a family who is already finding it difficult to pay his bills in Canada's inflated economy, as well as the old age pensioners whom the budget was designed to help.

Some of our senior citizens are today subsidizing their basic old age pensions. I refer to the minister's action in declining to retire the bonds issued by the Liberal government in 1936. I raised this matter in the house on previous occasions when I deplored the action taken by the government in this connection. As a result of my concern over this question I have received a letter from a lady in Ontario. It reads as follows:

The bonds of any responsible government are not normally bought for speculation. Most purchasers regard them as a vehicle to earn a modest rate of interest in the meantime, and provide a retirement nest egg that can be liquidated as older age needs arise. Certainly we can recall the speculation in the bonds of some weak European governments following the first world war; but I can recall no case of British, Canadian or U.S. purchasers of their government's bonds over the last 50 years having received the lack of consideration or integrity given those citizens who entrusted their savings to the Canadian government in 1936 in exchange for perpetuals regarded as safe as the old time British Consuls.

As it has turned out, the "oldsters" who needed the money have been obliged to sell at losses of 20 per cent to 40 per cent or more to speculators, but to what extent who can say? But the fact that some have been sold reflects either dire need on the part of the owners, or complete loss of confidence in the integrity of your government.

[Mr. Crouse.]

No responsible company doing business in this country would permit their bonds to sink to such values, if only to protect their own good name and credit rating. Some companies even support their common stock by buying it in when the price falls excessively, assuming they have funds available.

Can it be that the Canadian government is on the verge of bankruptcy, and unable to refund a relatively modest issue? If so, God help your reputation both at home and abroad.

This is a copy of a letter which was sent to the Minister of Finance. It is indicative of the feeling of Canadians about the manner in which the government is dealing with the country's finances. With this type of thinking on the treasury benches, I can only describe the Minister of Finance as a wrong-way Robin Hood who robs from the poor in order to give to the poor while extracting for Mitch and his merry men a token to be paid the hunters whose job it is to make certain that the aged and needy have no other income.

The minister has stated that approximately $18 billion is required annually by all governments in Canada, and I deplore the shameful manner in which he has singled out our senior citizens as the target or the excuse for his recent tax raises while ignoring many other government expenditures which deserve to be questioned. There is no evidence that he and his colleagues plan to attack this problem at the core, namely, the waste and extravagance practised by the government which have brought about a sky-rocketing, inflationary spiral of prices in Canada.

Surely the taxpayers who are now required to surrender even more of their savings to provide for the cost of a guaranteed income plan for pensioners have a right to expect some evidence of increased efficiency in government and some restraint in government spending. But what are the facts? The record of the government's financial position, according to the minister, shows that this year's expenditures will reach a record high of $8,580 million, and since corporate profits are lower than the minister anticipated his revenues have dropped and Canadians are still not paying their way despite all the taxes which are being levied upon them.

I ask the minister what has happened to the theory of cyclical budgeting? In times of economic boom we were supposed to have a surplus budget so that in times of economic depression the government could prime the pump with deficit financing. What do we see today? We are told by the Minister of Finance that Canadians never had it so good, that in fact the economy is so overheated the minister must apply the brakes. But if we are enjoying an economic boom, why are we having budget deficits? The minister cannot have it both ways.

The fact is that Canadians are dancing but they cannot pay the piper to the tune of approximately $340 million in this fiscal year. What does the minister promise us for next year? More of the same. Listen to his words as recorded at page 11331 of Hansard for December 19, 1966:

> It is already evident, however, that our expenditures will continue to rise next year quit apart from the guaranteed income supplement.

As a smokescreeen the minister then listed as his reasons the commitments in equalization payments to the provinces and substantially increased assistance for higher education. He knows that if we criticized these reasons it would be like criticizing motherhood. We are not going to fall into this kind of trap, but some of the government's policies and programs are open to criticism.

I say to the government and to the minister that if they believe they have the right to control the economy of Canada through the imposition of new taxes, which in effect limit the spending of Canadian citizens, then it is up to the government to examine its own position and set an example of good housekeeping. Any argument that this cannot be done, that savings cannot be made in administration, is indicative that the barnacles of indecision and the rust of indifference have settled deeper and thicker on the Liberal hull than has been realized by many Canadians.

There is a growing concern among many of our citizens that they are being swept up in a whirlpool of bureaucratic controls from which there is no escape. The list of payroll deductions grows longer and longer, and with prices inflated by excessive taxation the average Canadian the man earning $4,000, $5,000 or $6,000, is having extreme difficulty making ends meet. In my opinion the government must take action on this pressing problem. Failure to do so could have serious effects upon the Canadian economy within the next 18 months.

The minister may well ask, where do we begin? The Auditor General has stated that government overhead has increased by 20 per cent in the past three years, and a study of the report of the public accounts committee should give the minister some leads in the right direction. For example, they recommend an end to payment of C.B.C. production employees for work not performed. At present union agreements put employees on the job even when there is no work for them to do. By eliminating this wage bill when current union agreements come up for renewal the government owned corporation could save $450,000 annually.

In my opinion public funds should not be disbursed for work not performed, and the government should direct the C.B.C. management to halt this practice. Incidentally, when is the government going to appoint a president for this organization? Today the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) that question, and I listened carefully for the answer. We were told that the C.B.C. has a president, but it is my understanding that the president, Mr. Alphonse Ouimet, has tendered his resignation. Whether or not this resignation has been accepted is open to question, but I believe that a crown corporation should be managed just as efficiently and as independently as one run for profit.

Nobody doubts that Gordon MacGregor runs Air Canada, but when I look at some of the C.B.C. programs I begin to suspect that the C.B.C. is somewhat like a rudderless ship operating without a captain. I cannot help but believe that this is exactly what is wanted by the so-called creative minds employed by the corporation. The idea is to keep things in an uproar. They believe in the freedom of the C.B.C., freedom being an all-embracing word which should cover their bad taste, sensationalism and irresponsible actions. In Nova Scotian language, this is nothing but bilgewater.

However, if this is the way these so-called artists want it and if there is no one in authority to direct them to do otherwise, then Canadians can call themselves lucky that the creative talents of the C.B.C. clique have not produced programs even lower in entertainment rating. Quite frankly, I believe in responsible freedom for the C.B.C. but not in the right of its hired staff to air anything they individually regard as reputation making or reputation breaking, without any interference. They may make great personal reputations by resorting to sensation-mongering, but this is not the purpose for which the C.B.C. was established.

The Canadian people are subsidizing the C.B.C. by more than $100 million a year. I say that in the public interest it is time for parliamentary intervention in the operations of this sacred cow. The government has the responsibility to find a programming boss for this organization, and the sooner this is done the quicker the government will effect savings on C.B.C. operations which have gotten entirely out of hand.

Another field in which I believe the government could pare expenses is its foreign embassies and missions. I know these are necessary, but a periodic audit by our external affairs department would indicate to the people serving in our embassies throughout the world the truth of the finance minister's statement that neither the country nor the willingness of Canadians to pay higher taxes should be taken for granted.

Defence planning is very much in the news these days but the spotlight should not be thrown entirely on the problems of unification. More than a shudder went up and down the spines of many people when they heard the Auditor General report that more than $7 million went down the drain for bomb toss computers we did not plan to use, and that inadequate planning for low level radar installations led to extra costs of $3.5 million.

However, without question the most extravagant waste of taxpayers' money has been through the establishment by the Liberal government of the commission on bilingualism and biculturalism. In three and a half years the government has set up 15 commissions, but this has been the biggest and most bewildering of all commissions. To date it has splurged more than $7 million, with no visible, concrete results for anyone. Its purpose, as I understand it, is to alter the shape and style of our country. But in effect it has only served to rub salt in the wounds of division between our two founding races. In my opinion it has created greater disunity in Canada than any other act by a Canadian government since confederation.

A wound will never heal if it is ripped open every day, and I ask the government to terminate the hearings of the B. and B. commission and let it bring in a report. I ask this not only on behalf of the Canadian taxpayers but also in the best interests of Canada as a nation. It should now be evident that it is impossible to pass laws demanding that a man be bilingual or bicultural. This commission was set in 1963 and its members have been drawing salary and expense cheques of $120 every sitting day. Every Canadian is aware of the French and the English fact. I believe that if we could do away with hyphenated Canadianism we would build a better Canada.

These are some of the changes which could be made by the Minister of Finance if he really desired to bring expenses in line with government income. If the minister does not act to help bring this about, it is possible that Canada could face another exchange crisis in 1968. It is not inevitable, but all the elements of a crisis are now in existence. It originated with wage increases far in excess of productivity increases last summer and fall, and it is sustained by a continuing clamour for parity with wages in the United States. It is also strengthened by monetary and fiscal policies which will continue in the foreseeable future to inhibit the capital investment in productivity needed to overtake these wage increases. Quite frankly, in my opinion the Canadian economy is being priced out of competition.

If this process continues exports will fall, imports will increase and the deficit in current account will widen to the point where Canada can no longer pay its way in international transactions. In the meantime the awareness of these developments is a large factor in discouraging foreign investment in Canada, while encouraging Canadian investment abroad.

The government is obviously aware of this situation as indicated by the advertisements put out by the Department of Trade and Commerce which urge Canadian businessmen to export. This is supported also by the fact that the department has set up an export advisory council. Personally I hope these efforts are successful. I believe the minister is sincere in trying to do a good job. As I say, I hope these efforts are successful because among this country's principal needs are more investment funds and managerial talent. In some instances the one follows the other.

There is, however, a biblical quotation which states that one cannot serve two masters, and from experience we know that a house divided against itself cannot stand. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Gordon) cannot be given a voice in the government. This is a man who proposes further bureaucratic measures such as the Canada Development Corporation, a man whose budgets had to be completely withdrawn because they almost brought about the downfall of the Liberal government when he was finance minister, a man who opposes foreign investment capital. You cannot give such a man a voice in the government and expect the investment community, both Canadian and foreign, to show confidence in this government and in this country.

Those who wish to lead must give some evidence of their ability along these lines. However, as long as maritime Gordon, as he is affectionately know in Nova Scotia because he wanted to give its people a one-way ticket to some other part of Canada, remains in the cabinet it will be difficult to establish confidence in the minds of Canadian and foreign investors that Canada offers better opportunities for their investment funds than other areas of the world. To clear the air with regard to these differences within the cabinet, the Prime Minister should make an early statement of policy on foreign investment in this country.

Having suggested to the minister a number of proposals which if implemented would effect some savings, I should like to turn to the Atlantic provinces, an area of Canada still haunted by excessive unemployment and one which could use some of the funds presently being wasted in the departments I have mentioned. My own province of Nova Scotia has gained recognition internationally for its stable institutions, its intelligent and adaptable labour force, and its strategic location in the trading world. However, though we can rightly feel encouraged by this progress we can hardly feel satisfied. We have not as yet narrowed the gap between average incomes in Nova Scotia and those in central and western Canada. The simple fact is that we are still too dependent upon forms of employment which do not offer good prospects for growth. We must continue to modernize our economy because despite the progress which has been made unemployment still is twice as high in the Atlantic provinces as it is in the rest of Canada.

To help narrow the gap I believe the government must put forward more programs which will help us progress at a faster rate. This is necessary because we are so far behind; we seem to have to run like the devil just to stand still. Our concern is also increased by the changes we see developing under this government which could be harmful to our Atlantic economy. For example, no longer do we have regional allocations for ship repair work. We are concerned about the effect any changes in our army, navy and air force bases will have on the Atlantic provinces. We are watching with interest as each year the government builds at tremendous cost larger icebreakers to keep the St. Lawrence river open for shipping, because this cannot but have a very adverse effect on the ports of Halifax and Saint John. Surely there must be some quid pro quo to offset the damage to our economy which these federal policies are bringing about.

There is much to be done. For example, there is the causeway to Prince Edward Island which must be finished. There is a corridor road to be built through Maine which would bring Montreal within a five-hour run of the maritime border. Such a road would literally bridge the gap separating the maritimes from the markets of central Canada. Then there is tidal power to be developed in Minas Basin. The last of these projects would provide the cheap electricity we need to entice secondary industry into Nova Scotia and the maritimes. Once it was established the sale of electrical energy would amortize its cost over the years.

The Minister of Finance should also take some steps to help our tourist industry. Last year, for example, the United States government brought forward the date for free entry of antiques into the United States from the year 1830 to 1860. The free entry date for antiques coming into Canada is 1847. The tourist industry is of great importance to our country, especially Nova Scotia. Under the existing laws controlling the entry of antiques, Canadian dealers cannot compete with United States dealers when buying abroad. Dealers in the United States can import duty free goods manufactured at a later date than the goods we are allowed to import. This increases our costs considerably. Many United States citizens come to Nova Scotia to buy antiques and this is a stimulant to the country's economy. Since we are celebrating our centennial in 1967 I suggest to the Minister of Finance that one of the steps he might take by way of celebration would be to permit free entry into Canada of antiques manufactured in 1867 or prior thereto.

One of the steps which the Minister of Finance could take immediately would be to declare the entire Atlantic provinces a designated area so that it would be eligible for benefits under that program. This would attract industry to the Atlantic provinces which is now forced to go to other areas of Canada. This is especially true if such industries are thinking of locating in Saint John, Fredericton, Halifax or Darmouth where the incentives available under this program are denied. By exempting these areas from the incentive benefits the government has indicated to the people of the Atlantic provincs that it is not yet aware of their needs nor of the fact that special legislation is required to aid them. These are not my views alone. I am supported in this opinion by the Economic Council of Canada which stated in its third annual review, page 39:

> During an economic expansion, the typical pattern is for considerable inflationary pressure to develop in some regions or large parts of them (notably from Montreal westward) while elsewhere there is still substantial slack and unemployment. There are few countries where there is a greater need than in Canada for specific regional policies and for additional instruments which are capable of being applied on a differentiated basis from area to area.

In the next paragraph the report states:

> We have not ourselves any magic cure or simple formula to propose, but only a combination of tried and new approaches, shaped as far as possible to what seem to be the significant peculiarities of the Canadian economy. Followed with energy, reasonable foresight, and consistency, in a favourable climate of public understanding, these approaches should be capable of progressively diminishing the problem.

I commend these thoughts to the Minister of Finance and to the government. I hope they will follow the sage advice of the economic council so that the people of the Atlantic provinces and of Nova Scotia in particular will share equally with other Canadians in the economic benefits of a developing nation. For the reasons I have given in my speech I intend to support the amendment moved on December 19 by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith).

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, in participating in the budget debate I should like to re-emphasize the position of the New Democratic Party that in our opinion the mini-budget was unwarranted and unnecessary. It was unwarranted and unnecessary because in the words of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) the undesirable acceleration of the demands of our economy had moderated and there was some economic readjustment taking place following the excessive rates of expansion which occurred earlier this year. This trend in the growth of our economy, in the minister's judgment, was more in line with the capability of our economy to grow steadily without inflation.

[Mr. Crouse.]

Why, then, the imposition of tax increases related to the old age security fund and the 1 per cent increase in the sales tax? We feel that the minister made a deliberate move in increasing the maximum rate of contribution to old age security from $120 to $240 to let the Canadian people know in no uncertain terms that so far as his party and colleagues are concerned any advances in our social welfare programs will be met and paid for by an increase in their taxes. This was the minister's method of saying thank you to our senior citizens for their past contributions to the growth and development of our country. He is saying, in effect, that if taxpaying Canadians want to see the senior citizens of our country decently housed, and have adequate food and clothing and a few extra dollars for medical and social needs, then the taxpaying Canadians must pay for it. In the words of my colleague from York South, the minister wants to rap the knuckles of Canadian citizens who desire advances in our social services.

We in the New Democratic Party say that if any supplemental increases in pensions are to be paid to our senior citizens they should be paid to all our citizens without any test whatsoever. The increase could have been paid in full by the increase in the old age security maximum rate and from the increases in productivity that Canadians are making in our economy. There is no reason why senior citizens should not share the fruits of present increases in view of their past services and contributions to our economy.

The increase of 1 per cent in the sales tax was uncalled for. The exemptions on building materials and food were necessary, but the housewife was hit in other areas such as family needs for clothing, appliances and furniture. This tax, imposed with apologies, will doubtless increase the prices of the items on which it is imposed because the retailer and manufacturer will merely pass it on to the consumer.

In exempting housing materials from the 1 per cent increase in sales tax the minister recognized the serious housing problem facing Canada today because of both housing shortages and the high cost of houses. However, mere recognition of the problem is not sufficient. As a first step he should have removed the 11 per cent sales tax from housing materials, thereby helping to bring down the cost of homes.

On November 21 last year the Ottawa Citizen indicated in an editorial that I was exaggerating when I stated in the House of Commons that Canada is facing the worst housing shortage in its history. However, when the facts are reviewed the results are more in line with my conclusion. In 1966 construction starts on new houses amounted to 134,474 units compared with 166,565 units in 1965, a decline of almost 20 per cent. What is the picture for 1967? The Economic Council of Canada in its third annual report set a goal of 170,000 dwellings a year to take care of the increase in population and new family formations.

Mr. Hignett, the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, stated in the Globe and Mail of Tuesday, January 31, 1967, that he was doubtful about starts going much above 150,000 this year. It is obvious we will be falling short of the projected goal of 170,000 this year, which does not take into account replacement of older houses. The 1961 census showed that of a total of 4,500,000 single dwelling houses 2,500,000 were built before 1945, that nearly 25 per cent of these houses do not have bath or shower facilities and that 21 per cent are without flush toilets.

Mr. David B. Kirhup, an economist and statistician for the Toronto Real Estate Board, made an interesting projection of housing needs in the future. He stated that it took Canada 100 years for is population to reach 20 million but it will only take 35 more years for the number to reach 50 million. This means that from 10 million to 12 million new housing units will have to be built by the year 2,000, an average of 300,000 to 350,000 dwellings per year. He also stated that one-third of all Canadians live in only eight major cities. If the present trend to urbanization continues five cities, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver, will house 35 per cent of all Canadians by the year 2,000. A lot of new accommodation will be needed in the cities. This projection is indicative of the serious attitude toward housing that must be taken by all levels of government.

Many Canadians have asked why there is a housing shortage. We in the New Democratic Party feel that there are at least five major reasons for the shortage. First, all levels of government are blind or apatheric to the housing crisis. Federal, provincial and municipal levels of government are failing to take their full share of responsibility to solve the housing problems; second, the moneys available for housing have been diverted into the building of shopping centres, office buildings and high rental apartments because of the high rates of interest payable in this sector; third, the high rates of interest payable by the purchasers of the new homes, now range from 7¼ per cent on N.H.A. loans to 8 to 8½ per cent on loans from conventional lenders such as insurance and trust companies; fourth, the high cost of building materials and the high cost of serviced land in urban areas and, fifth, the failure of C.M.H.C. to promote its aims and purposes.

I should like to develop these five reasons a little further and then suggest a program of action that should be seriously considered by the government. I have said that all levels of government have been blind or apathetic to housing problems in Canada. The federal government has failed to take the initiative in setting up a federal ministry of urban affairs and housing which would be responsible for the co-ordination of the national housing needs of the country, with the necessary consultation with the provinces and municipalities. It has taken the position of the friendly banker and has regarded housing on the basis of an economic tap to be turned off or on depending on economic conditions in the country at the particular time. The provincial and municipal governments have not taken the initiative in determining housing needs, more especially in public housing and housing for senior citizens, and have not co-ordinated their physical housing needs with federal financial assistance to meet these needs.

I quote the following from the Toronto Star of Friday, January 20:

> The apathy of municipal governments has deprived the poor of public housing in Canada, the Senate-Commons prices committee was told yesterday.
> The Canadian Welfare Council said in a brief that "remarkably little" use has been made of federal assistance to build more public housing for low-income groups.

Mr. Michael Wheeler is quoted as having said:

> Sometimes this apathy is the result of a lack of knowledge. Sometimes this apathy is the result of the fear that the local municipality cannot afford the share expected of it.

He is also quoted as saying:

> In some countries, up to 30 per cent of the housing stock is public; in Canada, only 1 per cent of housing is in this category.

Mr. Wheeler is also reported as having

> Meanwhile, the housing crisis is worsening... Canada will need 180,000 new units annually for the next four or five years and we have never built more than 153,000 units—

I note that the Ontario Housing Corporation has announced that it will soon allow limited income families to purchase the homes they rent from the corporation. We in the New Democratic Party disagree with this proposal because of the almost impossibility of payment and the reduction from the stock of public housing available.

• (5:40 p.m.)

In an editorial in the Toronto Daily Star of Monday, January 16, 1967, this argument was set forth. The editorial reads in part:

> This is one of those projects which sounds wonderful when you say it rapidly, but which looks increasingly impractical when you examine it in the light of present day realities.
> Let us consider, for example, the position of a tenant earning $5,000 a year—one of the group this proposal is apparently intended to benefit.
> At the present time, it is virtually impossible to build or purchase a new three bedroom house in Metro (except perhaps in the most remote suburbs) for less than $20,000.
> If the corporation charged only 5 per cent interest on the purchase price—and this is far below the going rate and would require subsidization—the interest payments would amount to $1,000 a year.
> Let us add to this $250 a year for taxes and $300 for heat and utilities. Our $5,000 a year man is now paying $1,550 annually or 31 per cent of his income.
> This is equivalent (in terms of per cent of income) to the highest rent the O.H.C. charges. It goes beyond what is considered a reasonable percentage of family income for housing.
> Yet in all these calculations, we have so far made no provision for repayment of the principal owing —in this case $20,000.
> It is obvious that if realistic monthly or quarterly principal payments are added to the interest in the usual manner, the burden would be altogether too great for a man with a $5,000 or even $6,000 income.
> The only way O.H.C. could sell houses on this basis would be by not only subsidizing the interest rate but by forgetting about repayment of the principal—in effect making the purchaser a present of the capital value of the house.
> This would be an inordinately expensive procedure. To supply a relatively few people with homes of their own, the corporation would have to cut back drastically on its funds for building or buying rental accommodation for those in need.
> Moreover, the houses it sold would be subtracted from the stock available for public housing, and might easily wind up being sold to some real estate speculator—perhaps to become the nucleus for a new slum.
> The establishment of the Ontario Housing Corporation represents public recognition of the fact that the province has an obligation to help provide decent living accommodation for those who cannot provide it for themselves. But it is wholly unrealistic to try to extend this into an obligation to provide full ownership of a house for everybody.
> Having made its bow to the spirit of Toronto past, the O.H.C. should quietly bury the whole idea.

May I call it a quarter to six, Mr. Speaker?

[Mr. Gilbert.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member should continue.

Mr. Gilbert: Second, Mr. Speaker, the moneys for housing have moved into the building of shopping centres, office buildings and high rental apartments because of the high yield of return in these fields. This underlines the importance of direct government participation in the housing field and the necessity of change with the government being primarily responsible for financing housing needs. In 1965 the government was responsible for 35 per cent of house financing and the conventional lenders, insurance and trust companies, 65 per cent. The figures are not available for 1966 but I am sure the participation of conventional lenders was much lower. In the early part of 1966 private moneys were almost nil and this placed the builders in a mortgage strait-jacket in getting their housing programs under way for the year. This in large part was the reason for the substantial drop in housing starts for 1966. The trouble was not that houses could not be built but rather that lenders sought projects yielding higher interest rates, thereby leaving housing needs unfulfilled.

Third, the high interest rates payable by purchasers of new homes now range from 7¼ per cent for N.H.A. loans to 8 per cent to 8½ per cent on money borrowed from conventional lenders. I can only give again the example of the cost of interest on a mortgage to a purchaser, which discourages the purchase of homes. Let us look at the dollars and cents cost of interest. Consider a $15,000 mortgage to be paid off over 25 years. At last year's N.H.A. rate of 6¼ per cent, payments on principal and interest would total nearly $29,500 or nearly $2 repaid for every $1 borrowed. At 8½ per cent, and some borrowers are paying that much for home mortgages right now, the cost goes out of sight. On a $15,000 25-year mortgage the interest alone would total $21,000. The added interest cost over last year's 6¼ per cent mortgage would be $6,500. This breaks down to extra monthly payments of $21.65.

Much has been made of the chartered banks entering the mortgage field, thereby easing the shortage of mortgage moneys. It should be noted that the bank rate will probably be the same as the conventional lenders, 8 per cent and 8½ per cent. It should also be noted that Mr. S. T. Paton, the president of the Canadian Bankers' Association, said on January 31, 1967, at the National House Builders Association conference, "it will be difficult for the banks to come in immediately with a substantial flow of funds for housing." This offers little help to solve present housing needs.

Fourth, one must consider the high cost of building materials and the high cost of serviced land in urban areas. The best thing that the Minister of Finance could have done at this time to help the housing problem would have been to remove the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials. It has been estimated that the costs of building a home are made up of 75 per cent for materials and 25 per cent for labour. These percentages indicate the substantial saving on home costs if the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials was removed.

The builders claim that the costs of housebuilding have been cut to a minimum. As reported in an article in the Globe and Mail of Wednesday, February 1, 1967, the president of the National House Builders Association said:

> Unless the house, as we conceive of it, changes drastically, we can't reduce its building cost much—

That was said in an interview at the twenty fourth annual convention in Toronto. Then he said:

> I have my doubts that any new concept is close. We are as advanced in our technological accomplishments as any industry.

The article continues:

> In the N.H.B.A. he has been particularly active—

In the National House Builders Association.

> —in the research committee. He is also a director of the Urban Development Institute.
> Yesterday's session heard a report on an N.H.B.A. research project carried out in his subdivision in co-operation with C.M.H.C. and the building research division of the National Research Council.
> It showed that on a three bedroom bungalow of 1,150 square feet, selling at about $18,000 with land, and costing $10,476 to build, savings of $367 are possible by taking advantage of existing minimum standards and improved techniques.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: The questions to be considered this evening are the following: The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), Criminal Code—possible amendment respecting electronic listening devices; the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), Canadian Centennial—failure of armed forces tattoo to appear in Kootenays.

Royal Assent

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

• (6:00 p.m.)

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

> An Act to amend the Canada Corporations Act to facilitate the incorporation by letters patent of corporations without objects of pecuniary gain.
> An Act to incorporate The Evangelical Covenant Church of Canada.
> An Act to amend the Judges Act.
> An Act to define and implement a national transportation policy for Canada, to amend the Railway Act and other acts in consequence thereof and to enact other consequential provisions.
> An Act to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways System for the period from the 1st day of January, 1965 to the 30th day of June, 1967, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions (papers), private bills, public bills.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether it would be agreeable to the house to dispense with this hour and adjourn for dinner until eight o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: Is there agreement to the suggestion that has been made?

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I think the order that has been called is notices of motions for papers, a debatable item. I had understood informally that the one standing in my name was likely to be called. I have no desire to make extended remarks, and if there can be some agreement among those members present who desire to say something on this item that after they conclude their remarks we will then suspend our sittings until eight o'clock, this would be quite satisfactory to me.

Motions for Papers

GEOGRAPHICAL CO-ORDINATES RESPECTING BASE LINES

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni) moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house a copy of all notes and other communications exchanged between Canada and the United States of America since the enactment by parliament on July 16, 1964, of the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act having to do with the issuance by the Governor in Council of one or more lists of geographical co-ordinates of points from which base lines may be determined in accordance with the provisions of the act.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I would be most happy if we could have immediate agreement to carry this motion but I have some doubt, in view of the fact that the motion had to be transferred for debate, whether that could be achieved without the advancement on my part of at least some argument.

The subject matter of this motion concerns a matter which in my view represents a piece of uncompleted legislation in the sense that a very important part of an act that has been passed has so far not been acted upon by the government. While there may be times when I would readily agree that the kind of documents asked for in this motion could be properly considered as privileged and it might not be in the public interest to table them in the house nevertheless I feel that under the particular set of circumstances prevailing in this case the general rule has in effect ceased to apply. I believe the time has come when we in this house and those Canadian citizens who are particularly interested in this question should have some factual knowledge of what has been going on rather than being left, as we have been over such an extended period, in a sort of never-never-land on this particular matter.

I hope to be able to prove my point, Mr. Speaker, largely by means of words which have come from the mouth of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) on this subject. In order to do that I should like to recall to the memories of the minister and other hon. members something of what he had to say about the act referred to in the motion when the bill was brought before the house for second reading on May 20, 1964. My motion has to do with the co-ordinates involved in the determination of base lines. On page 3409 of Hansard of that date the minister referred to the matter in these words:

The second important purpose of the bill is to apply the straight base line system to the Canadian coast line. This part of it, unlike the section concerning fishing zones, will be of an enabling character. When the bill comes into effect the Governor in Council will be authorized to draw straight base lines. The question may be asked: what does this achieve? In response, I would say that what the bill accomplishes is of great significance. It makes applicable the straight base line system to the Canadian coast. These straight base lines will be drawn in accordance with international law, on the basis of the decision of the International Court of Justice in the Anglo-Norwegian fisheries case and of the Geneva convention on the territorial sea and fishing zones and taking into account Canadian historic interests in the bodies of water off our coasts.

Then he went on to say:

...it makes applicable, on proclamation, the general system of straight base lines to the Canadian coast line. The authority that is given to the Governor in Council is with respect to the specific lines to be drawn and the exceptions to be made. The larger effect of the bill is to make applicable the principle of the straight base line system to Canada. Hon. members will note that the bill specifically provides that all areas enclosed by the new straight base lines will be internal waters of Canada. This is important and may have far reaching consequences.

He also said:

I am convinced that in taking this action now—as the government is doing, unilaterally—Canada is acting in accordance with present day international law and practice. The government is convinced that we are following the wisest course in immediately seeking agreements with the countries affected by our action.

Later he referred to the pros and cons of the course Canada should have followed after having referred certain things to a Geneva conference on the law of the sea. He said:

When the present government took office a year ago we came to the conclusion—and we regretfully came to it—that for the foreseeable future there was no possibility of reaching general agreement on a 12-mile fishing zone.

Canada had to make a choice. There were two possibilities. We could have decided in favour of postponement. This would have meant an indefinite delay. This would have meant that we would not have for a long time the 12-mile fishing zone which this legislation will make possible. Meanwhile, our resources would have continued to be depleted, as greater and greater fishing fleets drew nearer our shores.

Then he went on to say:

Our experts looked at the situation in international law.

He followed that by saying:

In the circumstances the government concluded that a decision by Canada to establish a 12-mile fishing zone from straight base lines would be soundly based on present-day international law and practice. We chose this course, and so the government has brought forward accordingly the legislation we are now considering.

He went on to say that at the same time Canada recognized that our action had international implications, and it will be recalled that the Prime Minister informed the house a year ago that we would consult with the countries affected by our action and seek to work our satisfactory arrangements with them.

I want to be fair to the minister. He also said:

> ...we did not minimize the problems involved in some of the negotiations lying ahead of us. Nor do we minimize them now. These negotiations may be difficult and we must accept this fact.

He spoke about negotiations further and then said:

> This is what the government of Canada is now in the process of doing. We have already had three rounds of negotiations with the United States. In the last two months we have had a round of discussions with Norway, Denmark, Britain, Portugal, Spain, Italy and Japan.

He explained that these countries had sent officials to Ottawa for talks. Then he said:

> We have made clear that the United States and France will be allowed to continue to fish in those areas where they have fished before, subject to agreed arrangements and regulations for the protection of the fisheries concerned.

I wish to draw to the attention of the house that the remarks of the minister were made on May 20, 1964, and that as he explained, we had already had three rounds of negotiations with the United States. The government had made clear that the United States and France, because of our conventions with them, might continue taking fish within fishing zones that would be included as internal waters of Canada under the bill the minister proposed.

The minister gave this explanation, as will be found on page 3411:

> I have said that the bill makes applicable the straight base line system to Canada. When the specific base lines are delineated, all the waters inside these lines will become internal.

He spoke about the effect that the bill would have on other interested countries, and said:

> —we have decided to allow a short period of time to elapse before starting to enforce Canadian laws in the fishing zones of Canada.

As found on page 3412 he made this statement, which I was prepared to accept as rational and reasonable:

> While negotiations are under way with foreign powers, friendly though they may be, no disclosure may be made until such time as it is in the interest of the parties concerned.

I come to the crux of my argument in respect of the motion before us, that the time has come when it is in the interests of Canada and the people of this country to know what has happened since May 20, 1964. We want to know more specifically what has happened.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Barnett: Three years ago we were told that there had been three rounds of negotiations with the United States on this subject prior to the passage of the bill. In replies to numerous questions in the house since the bill was proclaimed, we have been told that continuous negotiations have gone on and on and on. I am prepared to accept the statement of the minister and his colleague, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Robichaud) that negotiations have been going on. Apparently, from the way things stand, these negotiations might go on until we celebrate our second centennial. That is not good enough. Parliament gave its assent to a bill. The minister will recall that some of us disagreed with the approach but nevertheless the house did assent to a bill which authorized the Governor in Council to proclaim straight base lines by which the fishing zones would be measured.

• (6:20 p.m.)

The time has long passed for this action to have been taken. If it is not going to be taken we should be fully informed of the reasons why no action will be taken. This consideration, I now submit, overrules the accepted practice with regard to what has transpired by way of exchanges of notes and communications between this country and a friendly power, to use the minister's expression. On that occasion he said:

> I am confident the United States and Canada will be able to work out a solution in this field, as we have to other difficult problems. In view of our tradition of the closest co-operation, I remain optimistic that we shall reach a satisfactory common accord.

My understanding at the time was that this was something on which we could expect fairly speedy action. In fact the minister himself, as I recall it, said he hoped that the base lines, or some of them at least, could be proclaimed before the end of 1964.

I know the minister is always anxious to convince us that he is hard at work. On the other hand he should recognize that members are anxious to know what he is doing from time to time. I will refresh his memory as to the continuing interest taken by hon. members by pointing out to him that in the session following the 1964-65 session this subject was raised in the house on four different occasions by various members. While we were not disposed to push the minister too hard in the 1965 session we clearly indicated that we were anxious to see some action taken.

I checked the index of Hansard up to the end of December and I found that during the current session this subject matter had been raised on no fewer than 24 occasions either by questions or in the course of discussion. This reflects the growing impatience on the part of those who have a particular interest in the subject at the delay which has occurred and, if I may say so, at the kind of replies we have been getting from the government.

I have picked out at random some of the questions which have been asked and some of the answers which have been given on this subject. On April 30, 1965, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) had this to say:

A supplementary question to the Minister of Fisheries, Mr. Speaker. In his capacity as a swift actor—

An hon. Member: "Actor" is right.

Mr. Howard: —I wonder if the minister would mind telling the house how he is progressing with the establishment of straight base lines which matter was dealt with in the house about a year ago now.

Mr. Robichaud: This matter is under very active consideration.

A little later in the same year I addressed this question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs:

Have the negotiations for the establishment of base line co-ordinates been completed? If not, what is the minister doing to assist his colleague, the Minister of Fisheries, in this connection in view of the minister's primary responsibility for external affairs?

The Secretary of State for External Affairs replied:

What am I doing, Mr. Speaker? I am working very hard together with my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries, in respect of a negotiation that is proving very difficult.

Mr. Barnett: Is the Secretary of State for External Affairs aware of the fact it is almost a year now since the act was proclaimed in connection with the extension of our fishing zone?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am only too well aware of the fact.

[Mr. Barnett.]

Then the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) asked a supplementary question in reply to which the minister said he could give the necessary information in more detail to the meeting of the committee on external affairs.

Let me now refer to the answers we have been getting during the current session. On January 19, 1966, as reported on page 20 of Hansard, the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Crouse) directed the following question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs:

Would the minister take the house and Canadian fishermen into his confidence and tell us when his department or the government plans to name the geographical co-ordinates so that base lines can be drawn which will establish the 12-mile limit as set out in the legislation?

To this the Secretary of State for External Affairs replied:

Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows, the government has already introduced this legislation, which has already been accepted by the house, to establish a 12-mile fishing zone limit based on the straight base line system. Before these straight base lines can be determined agreement has to be reached between Canada and several other countries. These negotiations have not yet been completed but just as quickly as these difficult negotiations have been completed I will be in a position to give a more definitive answer.

On March 9, as recorded on page 2466 of Hansard, we were discussing fisheries estimates. I inquired what was being done and the Secretary of State for External Affairs said:

May I assure my hon. friend that this question is a matter of great importance, and I share his view of that importance.

I know we can always enjoy the words of the Secretary of State for External Affairs but I am much more concerned at the moment to have more tangible evidence of his interest than has been given to the house so far in response to questions.

I have one more reference. On December 19, 1966, the minister was asked by my hon. friend from Skeena whether he would be in a position to fulfil his commitment that the straight base lines will be proclaimed before the end of the year. He did not say which year. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said: "I doubt that I could assure my hon. friend—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to interrupt the hon. member as his time has expired. Unless he is granted leave to go beyond his allotted time—

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Barnett: I am at the point of concluding my remarks in any event. I simply wish to emphasize that in view of the long series of answers about negotiations going on and on, the time has come when in my view the house should be given something more definite to indicate what has been taking place. It was for this reason that I decided to put this notice of motion for the production of papers on the order paper. I think we are entitled to know just what the government has been doing or not doing in its dealings with the United States. If it has become apparent that we shall not reach agreement with the United States on this matter the time has come when we should know about it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think we shall.

Mr. Barnett: Unless the minister or his colleague the Minister of Fisheries can persuade us otherwise, I think the house is entitled to the documents referred to in my notice of motion.

• (6:30 p.m.)

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up much of the time of the house, since apparently there was an agreement that we might rise before seven o'clock for the supper hour. However I want to express my appreciation to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) for giving us the opportunity to have a brief debate on this important subject.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the law of the sea with regard to the width of national fishing zones and national waters has been a very live issue for a number of years, joined with the tendency to make greater and greater demands on the living resources of the sea as a source of food, especially by countries such as Japan, which have a relatively small agricultural base and big populations.

It will be recalled that at one point the United Nations convened a conference in Geneva to try to reach agreement on the width of territorial waters and straight base lines. There were two conferences. The Canadian proposal, which was known as the Six Plus Six formula, provided for territorial waters with a width of six miles, plus an exclusive fishing zone of an additional six miles. That proposal failed to carry by a very small margin.

This was a great disappointment to Canadians, and in the next election campaign there was much loose language used by certain people with respect to this item. I am not looking at the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Robichaud) when I say this, but representatives of his party did indulge in this loose talk. They said, "Why, there is no problem at all. All that is lacking is resolve on the part of the government of the day. If we should come to power we will wave a magic wand, the foreign fishing vessels will disappear over the horizon, and there will be no more problems. All we have to do is unilaterally declare a 12-mile zone, and everything within a straight base line is Canadian waters for the exclusive use of Canadian fishermen."

However, when the Liberal government came to power it found the problem was not quite so simple. My greatest objection to the course being followed by the government is on the long delay in coming to a conclusion; but an even greater misdemeanour, if one may use that term, was perpetrated by the Liberal party in leading the Canadian people to believe that this was a simple problem that could be quickly and satisfactorily solved.

From experience I know there are great difficulties involved, but the question in the mind of the fishing industry is, where do we stand now? I recognize the necessity for a period of negotiations during which the negotiators on behalf of the Canadian people would not disclose the exact situation, while still in the midst of the bargaining process. But it should be recalled that the government was about a year in office when it had this legislation passed, and the legislation itself did not declare unilaterally that the straight base lines system would be brought into effect.

The bill had the effect of creating exclusive fishing zones from the nearest coastline, excluding nations that did not have historic fishing rights; but the important thing dealt with by the bill was the establishment of headland to headland base lines which would enclose large, important bodies of water, such as the gulf of St. Lawrence, the bay of Fundy and Hecate strait. The catch, however, was that the base lines were to be established by order in council following negotiations with foreign countries. These negotiations have now been going on for three years.

Only history can tell which is the better of two possible approaches to a problem. When I was minister of fisheries my colleagues and I felt that negotiations should be advanced as far as possible before one started to wave a big stick, saying what one would do unilaterally. In some respects our bargaining position may not be as strong as we would like it to be, but the question now is how long the government can hide behind the proposition that while negotiations are going on in confidence, parliament and the Canadian people cannot be informed of the exact situation.

Technically I agree with the government that these are privileged documents which should not be produced, because if they were produced it would create a bad precedent. Nevertheless the government in conscience cannot go on year after year telling us the negotiations are continuing, and that it is doing everything it is possible to do. This may be perfectly true; but we have to accept the government's word for it, and no matter how sincere its judgment may be it is bound to be a judgment which favours its own position. The time has come when parliament and the Canadian people must be let into the government's confidence, unless of course that would destroy the hope of an imminent agreement being reached.

But if real progress is not being made, then the government may have to take the responsibility of starting all over again, and possibly of taking action to initiate another law of the sea conference. If such a conference were held now I believe the Canadian proposal might carry, because in the interim there has been much change. There are many new members in the United Nations, and in addition many countries which attended the previous conference have since unilaterally declared 12-mile exclusive fishing zones.

• (6:40 p.m.)

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Including the United States.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Exactly, and Ireland; there is a whole long list. In this connection I might suggest also that the bargaining position of the Canadian government might be enhanced if this parliament ratified the conventions that were agreed to in Geneva at the last conference. I think there are three or four of these. I believe in some cases the required number of nations have already ratified them, and that this is something which should be done. I believe I am correct in saying that none of these conventions as yet has been ratified by Canada. These are suggestions I make to the ministry at the present time; but I say with all the force at my command that I think the time has come when the government must decide what its course is at the present time, and must conclude its negotiations at a very early date so that we can be brought fully into their confidence as to what the situation really is.

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the two hon. gentlemen who have just spoken, that this is a matter of considerable importance to the fishermen of our country. Strictly speaking, the motion which is before the house is not one which would allow us to examine the government's policy with regard to establishing a 12-mile fishing zone based on the straight base line principle. However, I understand the interest of the two hon. gentlemen and other members of this house in the substance of the proposition, and therefore I have not raised a point of order.

The issue before the house is not whether the government has made progress in its negotiations. The issue is whether the house should be given documents which have been exchanged between the government of Canada and other governments. That is the issue before the house, and nothing else. I would submit—and indeed the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) has agreed that this is the case—that it is not right for hon. members to ask the government to disclose the house the contents of documents, aide-memoires, and letters which have been exchanged between one government and another in respect of negotiations which have not yet been completed.

It is clear why parliament has devised this rule, because if the rule were otherwise it would not be possible for the government to carry out its diplomatic intercourse and it would not be possible for the government to maintain its diplomatic position in its negotiations with other countries. It is clear that until such time as negotiations have been completed, those negotiations would stand in jeopardy and would suffer if there should be a premature disclosure. I do understand however the impatience of hon. gentlemen. I share that impatience, and so does the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Robichaud) who has toiled arduously during the past two and a half years in an effort to implement the full provisions of the bill.

The situation briefly is this: We passed a bill authorizing the establishment of the 12-mile fishing zone that is now in effect. It now is the law of the land. There was objection to this measure. Indeed, it will be recalled that when the Prime Minister met with President Kennedy at Hyannis Port in the spring of 1963, the Prime Minister intimated that it was the intention of Canada to establish a 12-mile fishing zone and that we proposed to do so by measuring the 12 miles not on the basis of the sinuosities of the coast but on the straight base line system. The president was not too happy about this declaration of intention. The government nevertheless, while recognizing the cordial relations which exist between our two countries, caused such a measure to be introduced into the house.

As I have said, the law of the land provides that there be a 12-mile fishing zone. This was done because of the frustrations which were experienced by others who had sought to achieve the same thing by the process of international conference. I am not criticizing the former government for having tried by the conference method to bring about what we did legislatively. My friend, the hon. member for Queens, has discussed this matter in most objective terms tonight, and on the other occasions when he has participated in this debate. We felt however that the conference method, desirable as it is and preferable as it is, had not succeeded in achieving its purpose. There was then no other course open to us but to resort to a legislative measure in order to do what other countries—almost half the countries of the world—had done by unilateral action.

So, we have before us an accomplished fact. We could not establish the straight base line system without at the same time asserting with success ownership of certain bodies of water over which we claim a proprietary interest and title. The negotiations with the United States and other countries such as Spain, France, Norway and others have been protracted. They have taken a longer time than I ever anticipated they would. But no one can criticize the government because of the action taken by other countries with regard to our proposal to establish the initial measurement of the 12-mile system based on the straight base line principle.

All has not been in vain. Not only have we established a 12-mile fishing zone, but so also has the United States. As a result of the action taken in this house we have built up a jurisprudence in this matter. There can be no doubt that the United States would not have embarked upon the establishment of its 12-mile fishing zone, in the light of the attitude it took at international conferences when an effort was made to resolve this question, if it had not been for the fact that our parliament at the instance of this government did establish the 12-mile fishing zone.

It had been my hope that we would have been able to start to establish the co-ordinates long before this. As my friend, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni observed, I did say that perhaps by the beginning of 1965 we might be able to do so. But we had to make a choice between doing that and subjecting ourselves to litigation, which would have caused a greater delay than these negotiations have caused or, I am sure, will prove to have caused.

I believe it will not be long now before we will begin to establish some straight base lines. I do not say that we will complete them, but I believe we will be able to establish some straight base lines very soon. If we do not I will be greatly disappointed. I am making this prediction on the basis of my assessment of the state of the negotiations now with a particular country. I am awaiting a reply to a proposal that the government made as a result of negotiations between the Minister of Fisheries and myself with the United States. I believe that we should hear from the United States within the course of the next few days. When this reply reaches us we will have a better appreciation of when we can begin to establish co-ordinates and straight base lines, and when we may take other steps to further the objective we have in mind.

I believe that, while the negotiations have taken a year and a half longer than I thought they would, the fact is that during that time we have steadily built up a body of opinion to the effect that the Norwegian case is not without application to Canada in the situation we are discussing.

On the question of procedure, it must be clear that I cannot agree to tabling the documents sought in this motion. Hon. members know that diplomatic usage does not permit the government to make available to the public without the consent of the other party, the instruments used in negotiations, until and as long as agreement has not been reached. Whether or not we have this consent from the United States I feel we would not be discharging our responsibilities as a government if we agreed, on our own, to such disclosures. This would make difficult any further negotiations we have with other countries.

This question has been decided many times in the house. My hon. friend, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett), it will be recalled, on October 6, 1963, moved for a copy of cabinet minutes and other official documents authorizing the Secretary of State for External Affairs to notify the executive director of the International North Pacific Fisheries Commission that the commission's recommendation for removal of halibut stocks in the Bering Sea had been accepted. I pointed out on that occasion that it was a well established rule in Canadian parliamentary practice that documents and cabinet minutes could not be revealed, for the very reasons I am advancing in this instance. Our procedures clearly establish that documents involving international negotiations which are still incomplete cannot be made available against the wishes of the government, and certainly not without the consent of the other government and without the consent of the other parties to the negotiations.

I remind my hon. friend of a decision in this house on January 24, 1955 when the then secretary of state for external affairs, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), refused to produce an exchange of letters between the government of Canada and the government of the United States concerning the imposition by the United States of total or partial impediments to the importation to the United States of some agricultural products. The then secretary of state for external affairs said that this motion concerned diplomatic corresondence with a foreign government and dealt with negotiations then in progress. He said that according to well established practice of the house, this information was privileged and it would not be possible to table it. That motion was withdrawn.

Likewise in 1957 a motion was made by an hon. member for the tabling of the preliminary report concerning hydroelectric development of the Columbia river system in Canada. The then acting minister of northern affairs and national resources, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) expressed his opposition. These reasons undoubtedly were in the mind of the hon. member for Prince, who concurred in the position I am taking with regard to the application of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I am sorry, I meant the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean). The hon. member is such a prince I always confuse his status with that of his colleague's constituency.

This is what the hon. member for Calgary North said on that occasion:

> —negotiations with the United States in regard to the Columbia river system and the development of hydroelectric power on that system have been going on and will probably continue for some time. We do not consider it in the public interest that this document should be made public during the time these negotiations are in progress—

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

That motion was actually voted on and was rejected.

There have been a whole series of other similar requests. My hon. friend, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Robichaud), played a part in a similar request for documents under similar circumstances. That request was rejected on June 5, 1963. The minister refused the production of a copy of a recommendation of the International North Pacific Fisheries Commission, and all exchanges between the government and the commission and other parties relating to this recommendation. As a result of his opposition the motion was modified.

On May 5, 1965, the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury), found himself in the position of refusing a demand for documents concerning an agreement between the governments of the United States and Canada providing for free exchange in the automobile industry.

We are all familiar with these precedents which one could go on reciting. I think the case for the request is so clearly contrary to our practice and procedure that I am not asking too much of the hon. gentleman, now that he has delivered himself of his irritations and impatience, to acquiesce in the request to withdraw the motion which, in the interest of what he seeks, should not be adopted. I ask my hon. friend not to lose heart, because I am sure he will find that the negotiations the Minister of Fisheries and myself have had are not inconsistent with his objective, and very much in the interest of the fishing industry and fishermen in Canada.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, for the sake of clarification of the minister's statement, and so it will be readily understood by anyone reading Hansard, I should say this. The minister said that we now have a 12-mile fishing zone. That is legally correct; but I am sure he will agree that this does not apply to a number of countries, because of their historic fishing rights in these waters, and that many foreign vessels are actually still fishing within 12 miles of our coasts.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right. Of course, as my hon. friend knows, if our negotiations succeed, the arrangement is that we will recognize the historic rights of those nations, which will still enjoy the right to fish in these waters for a period of time.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Will the minister agree that if this had been brought about by international agreement, rather than by unilateral declaration, the litigation would be greatly lessened?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As my hon. friend knows, this was attempted twice at an international conference. We gave this idea consideration, but we were satisfied as a result of exchanges we had with other countries that international conferences for this particular purpose would not prove successful. We decided the only way we could do this was to act on the basis of our sovereign power in this country, just as almost 40 other countries have done.

• (7:00 p.m.)

I am sure that in this way we have not only achieved our objectives regarding the 12-mile zone but we have encouraged other countries to adopt the same practice.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that it is now seven o'clock perhaps I might be allowed to meditate upon the minister's request that I withdraw my motion. I will, of course, have to keep in mind the minister's own record of persistence in seeking the production of documents when he was on the opposition side of the house, which was a precedent he did not cite—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Do not remind me of my mistakes.

Mr. Barnett: —in his review of past precedents in the house.

Mr. Speaker: The hour appointed for the consideration of private members business has now expired. The house will return to the consideration of business interrupted at six o'clock.

THE BUDGET

ADDITIONAL FINANCIAL MEASURES OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Monteith.

Mr. Speaker: Do I understand that there is agreement that the house adjourn until eight o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, just prior to the six o'clock adjournment I had set forth the fourth reason why we in the New Democratic Party think there is a serious housing shortage in Canada today, and I said that it was due to the hight cost of building materials and the high cost of serviced land in urban areas. I put forth the builders' claim that the cost of home building had been cut to a minimum, and I quoted from an article in the Globe and Mail which supported the builders' contention.

Another aspect of this matter is the high cost of serviced land in urban areas, which is a very serious problem. This has been caused by land speculators. May I note that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) who is in charge of housing, has been urging Canadian cities to become active in the land market to prevent the prices of lots being forced upwards by speculators. He indicated also that federal legislation has existed since 1949, empowering the C.M.H.C. to help finance residential land development, but he indicated that the provinces and municipalities are not making full use of it. The minister said:

> It is our view that provincial and local governments in Canada by a large scale commitment in this activity could market serviced lots at reduced prices at no net cost to the taxpayer either federal, provincial or local.

I agree with these views. However, encouragement should also be given to these bodies to change the expropriation laws in the provinces to ensure that fair and reasonable compensation is paid for such expropriated lands.

The fifth reason is the failure of the C.M.H.C. to promote the aims and purposes of the National Housing Act and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act. The housing programs financed by N.H.A. and C.M.H.C. have not begun to take care of low income persons. For example, in 1965 the average income of a borrower under N.H.A. was $7,200 and in 1966 it was $6,600. No help was provided for persons below the $6,000 level. In fact, figures indicate that only 8.5 per cent of N.H.A. loans were given to persons earning between $4,000 and $6,000 and .5 per cent to persons earning under $4,000. This reminds me of Professor Murray's saying that this is socialism for the rich but not for the poor.

Another important aspect is the high percentage of income that a person must pay toward principal, interest and taxes. The gross debt service of these three items is not supposed to exceed 27 per cent of gross income according to N.H.A. regulations. This amount is too high. The striking feature in this pattern is that those families which can least afford it spend proportionately more for their housing, and usually get the least value for their money. For families earning less than $4,000 and purchasing homes under the N.H.A. in 1965 the average ratio of gross debt service to income was 29 per cent. For families earning between $4,000 and $6,000 it was 25 per cent and for those earning $10,000 or more it was 13.8 per cent.

The rule of thumb commonly used is that shelter costs should not exceed 20 per cent of income, rising possibly to 25 per cent if such services are included as heat, light and water in rental accommodation, or principal, interest and taxes for home ownership. Such a ratio must be adjusted for persons in the low income brackets to take account of their family needs for a decent and adequate standard of living. For example it has been suggested that a family with a net income of $200 per month should not spend more than 15 per cent on shelter costs.

The federal government has failed to take the lead with the provinces and municipalities to ensure that homes are provided for persons with low incomes and for senior citizens.

Having attempted to set forth reasons for the failure by all levels of the government to find solutions to our housing problems, I should like to suggest the following 10 point program to meet the problems:

1. The setting up of a federal ministry of urban affairs and housing, with the C.M.H.C. being directly responsible to the new minister and having the responsibility of suggesting an overall housing policy for Canada based on surveys of housing needs conducted by and in consultation and co-operation with the provincial and municipal authorities.

• (8:10 p.m.)

2. The federal government through C.M.H.C. should make available large amounts of money for new houses, public housing, senior citizens housing and co-operative housing. The target for the next three years should be at least 250,000 new homes a year to take care of increases in population, new family formations and replacement of older housing.

3. Moneys for the new projects should be obtained by the sale of home bonds guaranteed by the government in denominations of $500 and $1,000, repayable in five or ten year terms and bearing interest at attractive rates for sale to Canadian people and firms. Canadians who bought war bonds during wartime to protect Canada will be prepared to buy home bonds in peacetime to build Canada.

4. Rates on all new mortgages to purchasers of homes should not exceed 5 per cent, and the federal government should subsidize interest rates above these levels either by income tax adjustments or by direct payments. All mortgage loans should include, if necessary, an extra $2,000 for the purchase of fixtures, furniture, furnishings and appliances.

5. There should be large-scale land assembly projects initiated by both provincial and municipal levels of government, with financial participation by C.M.H.C. This would cut down the high cost of serviced land in urban areas.

6. Assembled lands by provincial and federal governments should be leased for development purposes, enabling reduced prices of serviced lots and community control over land use.

7. Municipal services relating to urban renewal schemes such as schools, recreation centres, parks, streets and sewer improvements should be included in the total cost of an urban renewal project and subject to the three level cost sharing. The cost of renewal should include the relocation and renewal expenses of displaced residents and business firms. Displaced homeowners should be offered special loans to help purchase a replacement property, if they cannot obtain suitable housing with a moratorium on repayment of the special loan until the property is sold.

8. Direct loans below market interest rates should be provided to low income families for property improvement.

9. Senior citizen homes and public housing must be an integral part and a first priority of any crash housing program.

10. We must study and develop new techniques for the mass production of housing and the streamlining of building codes. Habitat is an excellent example of new building techniques.

If the government were to adopt the above measures and develop them into a housing program for Canada, Mr. Speaker, we would be facing our next hundred years with a sense of purpose, pride and concern for all Canadians. Our pledge should be: Decent housing for all Canadians as a basic right guaranteed by government action.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice-Laflèche): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks particularly on the resolution introduced by the official opposition. Since the vote will be taken in a few minutes, it would be advisable, in my opinion, to dissect— if I may use that expression—the two parts of that resolution.

First of all, the resolution states that the government should have paid the old age pension —by drawing on the surplus now in the old age security fund.

I admit that the old age security fund has now a reserve of several hundred million dollars, but it would be irresponsible to draw from that reserve for several reasons. First of all, when the government, in 1963, drew up its policy of increasing the old age pension by $10 and of reducing the eligible age from 70 to 65 years, it provided for a higher amount than needed to be collected in the first years, so as to have enough money available when the eligible age would be 65 years.

If we were to act in accordance with the suggestion contained in this motion, it would only be postponing the difficulty for a year and the weight of taxation would be twice as much next year when, in addition to the increase to $105 for the year 1968, it would have been necessary to collect more taxes to cover the increased number of pensioners due to the lowering of the age limit to 65.

When a plan is made, when provision is made for a long period of time, the plan should be followed. That is basic. We hear more and more about planning in the various platforms of the political parties. This is a plan that was providing for the payment of old age pensions in the years to come. Now, the suggestion is that we use in one year all that is left in the fund so that in one year, or two, or three, the whole cost will be borne by the taxpayer for that year. In my opinion, it would be detrimental to the pensioners as well as to the economic situation in the years to come.

The motion also mentions inflation and the rising cost of living and it is claimed that the tax will exert undue pressure on that economic phenomenon. Mr. Speaker, this claim runs counter to the most elementary economic notions. There is inflation because demand is too great. Inflation often results from a lack of production to meet the demand and hence, in many cases, to stop inflation the demand must be reduced. This can be done in one of two ways: either through fiscal policy or through monetary policy.

It is recognized that, in the Western hemisphere, countries have placed too much dependence on monetary policies in recent years.

That is why we saw the rate of interest go up at a frightening pace throughout the world.

The present Minister of Finance was one of the first to see the problem and the first to act. The March 1966 budget showed that the government wanted to reduce inflationary pressures through a more vigorous tax policy calling for the imposition of taxes to the extent necessary to balance the budget.

The most interesting aspect of this attitude is that this economic policy inaugurated, or at least ushered in a change in the tax policies of several countries of the western hemisphere.

During the summer, in July 1966, we saw Prime Minister Wilson follow this trend and, more recently, the United States increased their own taxes in order to meet their greater obligations. The greatest reproach made against the American administration during the last seven or eight months is that it lacked courage to increase taxes while the country was confronted with inflation.

To be consistent in his policy, the Minister of Finance was forced to present his mini-budget in December. As the House of Commons had increased the government's financial obligations toward our old age pensioners and had promised taxpayers, in March 1966, to maintain a balanced budget, we had to find the $280 million needed to pay the increased pensions. This is, in my opinion, the main reason for the presentation of that budget on December 19, 1966. An important result of this budget was to bring the voters back to the world of reality. Because of the numerous elections held in the last few years, political platforms tended to outdo one another in the field of social security.

Now we know that one cannot get anything for nothing. It will now serve no purpose to try and deceive the voters by telling them that they will be given this or that. We know that if $5 are spent, the money will come from the taxpayer's pocket. One may be all for social security or for any new scheme; that is fine. But why try to deceive anyone? When introducing new programs, we should be practical enough and show enough maturity to tell the people how much it will cost, so that they may pass judgment on the way the country is being administered. What is the use of telling them that it is not costing them anything? They find out otherwise six, eight or 12 months later and hold it against our public bodies.

If we always act as we did in December, they will know that they now have responsible people in the government. It is no use making them believe that money grows on trees because they all know that it must come out of our pockets and that waiting six or eight months, or a year or two, is only putting off the same thing and then it is difficult to go back to the people and tell them that we intend to administer their own money properly.

But when taxes must be collected to pay $280 million, it is never an easy matter. One must always choose the less of two evils.

In his December 1966 budget, the Minister of Finance chose two sources of taxation. First of all, he felt it would be appropriate to increase from $120 to $240 the maximum old age security tax. Thus, only a third of the taxpayers in higher income brackets are affected, that is, with the maximum old age security tax being raised to $240, the head of a family with two dependent children who earns less than $5,800, does not pay a cent more. Of course, it is not much for someone with a $5,800 income, but he must consider—according to the facts and statistics—that he ranks among the third of Canadian taxpayers with higher incomes.

To make up that amount of $280 million, we have raised the sales tax by 1 per cent. But it must be remembered that this sales tax does not apply to all areas of our economy. It does not apply to food; it does not apply to fuel; it does not apply to building materials; it does not apply, in fact, to the most essential products which the consumers must purchase.

As for the two new taxes we have had to impose—it is always a problem to impose new taxes—I am convinced by the general reaction—that people have found them quite normal and that they are willing to pay them, knowing that they are directly related to a social security measure which everyone in this house wanted, that is increasing the old age pension to $105.

Mr. Speaker, since we are now entering our sixth year of continued economic expansion, since 1967 will again be a year of expansion, and since our economy appears to be more balanced at the present time, we must be cautious and go into action at the slightest warning of inflation or deflation. This is an extremely critical point in the history of our economy.

In years past, after two or three years of continuous expansion, we would have a year of recession. We have succeeded, through dynamic economic policies in maintaining this expansion for six consecutive years. And I feel we must continue to act when the time is right, just like we did in December, taking whatever remedial steps needed.

The motion presented by the opposition is pure political nonsense; it does not take the present situation into account. The mere fact that it contains a meaningless economic statement, at a time when expansionist policies have the upper hand in fighting inflation, makes this a ridiculous motion; no argument whatsoever has been brought forward which could really destroy the theory of the Minister of Finance, in establishing his mini-budget.

The serious and timely economic policies adopted by the government since 1963 have resulted in the longest period of expansion in the history of our economy. A theory such as the one upon which we will vote later tonight will surely not provide for continuation of economic progress. However, praise be the Lord. The Conservatives are sitting on the Speaker's left, and it looks like they will be there for quite a while yet.

[English]

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Kings): Mr. Speaker, I intervene in the debate this evening, not so much to discuss the items arising out of the budget as to take advantage of this opportunity to bring to the attention of certain government departments grievances which should be rectified as quickly as possible. Some of the matters with which I shall deal are purely local, but there is one which is of national concern and which, I suggest, is of extreme concern to all people of Canada.

I refer to the present provision in our Income Tax Act whereby the statutory exemptions allow only $1,000 to single persons and $2,000 to married persons. I have done a little research on this matter. Surprisingly, I find that in 1919 the exemptions, then, were $1,000 for a single person and $2,000 for married persons.

The Income Tax Act in 1919, in its provision dealing with this aspect, read as follows:

> —upon all income exceeding one thousand dollars but not exceeding six thousand dollars in the case of unmarried persons and widows or widowers without dependent children, and persons who are not supporting dependent brothers or sisters under the age of eighteen years, or a dependent parent or parents, grandparent or grandparents, and exceeding two thousand dollars but not exceeding six thousand dollars in the case of all other persons,—

If there ever was an outdated, antiquated law, this is it. Surely we must consider that living costs have increased since 1919, that they have particularly increased over the past number of years. Our present law, I suggest, is ancient history when we take into account the steady increases, year after year, of the cost of living on the one hand and living standards on the other.

It is ridiculous to have on our statute books a law allowing only a $1,000 exemption for single persons and a $2,000 exemption for married persons. That law has been in effect since 1919. Does the government suggest that the 1919 standards are adequate for today? Surely not. This exemption, Mr. Speaker, goes back to the time when a Canadian dollar had real value. That is certainly not the situation today.

As far back as 1956 a distinguished Canadian tax expert, Mr. J. Harvey Parry, a director of the Canadian Tax Foundation, pointed out that a man who was earning $5,000 before the last war had to be making $10,450 in 1956, or his financial position had worsened. That was more than ten years ago, and the situation has changed since then; the difference would be even greater. I would therefore seriously suggest that this exemption be raised. What brings this particularly to my attention is the realization that old age pensioners will receive $1,260 a year when the increase becomes effective. An old age pensioner whose wife is also receiving $1,260 will only be able to claim as a single man. Income from pensions is considered to be taxable income, and the wife's income will be above the amount which is permitted under the present law. The figure is, I believe, $1,250. So an old age pensioner whose wife is also an old age pensioner will have to claim as a single person. I suggest this is most unfair to our pensioners.

This situation was brought to my attention in a letter which I received the other day from a man who this year is celebrating his 100th birthday. This man has lived in Canada for more than 100 years during which time he has contributed to the economy of this country. He happens to live in Prince Edward Island where last year, for nine months of the year, old age pensioners were receiving $100 a month. For the rest of the year they received $75. So this man and his wife each received $1,125 by way of pension. In addition, the man received from his former employer a superannuation allowance of $700. In the course of 100 years he had naturally accummulated a certain amount of savings, which should be to his credit. As a result, he received by way of interest $304 in 1966. So his total taxable income is $2,129. All that this man will be able to claim for his wife is the difference between $1,125 and $1,250. I suggest that this is a hardship and one which should be corrected as quickly as possible.

As a matter of fact I think it would be a very good idea as a centennial project on the part of this government if all those who have reached the age of 100 years were exempted from the payment of tax, irrespective of what their incomes might be. I do not think the Minister of Finance, (Mr. Sharp) would find his budget much affected by such a gesture. I do not think there are many people in Canada today who have reached the age of 100 years, and I doubt very much whether those who have would be contributing heavily in any way to the coffers of the government.

Then again, I believe consideration should be given to raising the exemption allowed single persons to $2,000 at least. In the case of married persons the figure should be at least $3,000. These figures are more realistic than those we have been using since 1919. I am not criticizing any particular government. All governments throughout the years have followed a "stand pat" attitude and refused to increase these exemptions.

I believe we should also take a look at the exemptions allowed in respect of children. Is there anyone in this chamber tonight who can raise a child on $300 a year? The figure is altogether unrealistic. It may be possible during the first three or four years, but I should like anyone to tell me that a child from the age of ten onward does not cost more than $300 to rear and educate. Put this exemption up to a realistic amount; it would not cost the government too much money and it would be fair to parents.

The next item I should like to discuss concerns the Department of Fisheries. I am sorry the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Robichaud) is not in his place but I hope that he will somehow find time to scan the matters which I intend to discuss for the next few minutes. On January 31 last the minister issued a press release. It has not yet been put on record, and I think it should be. I will quote from it now, as follows:

> Requests from a large majority of lobster fishermen on the north shore of Prince Edward Island have led to a lobster trap limit of 500 per boat for this year in a portion of district 7B. This covers the area between East Point and North Cape on Prince Edward Island. It will be effective for the season from May 1 to June 30 of this year.
> The high limit is set in view of the short notice being given and must be regarded as a first step towards a trap limit in subsequent years which will probably be established at a lower level on the basis of further experience. This is an area where fishermen use an unusually large number of small traps.

The press release went on:

> The Minister also announced a further interim measure on the shore of Prince Edward Island. Operators' licences in this part of district 7B will be issued in 1967 only to those who held such licences in 1966 in that district.

I wish to make it abundantly clear that I am all in favour of this lobster trap limit. I think it is something which has long been overdue and the department is to be congratulated on having introduced it. Many people have the mistaken belief that the fish in the sea, or in the ocean, are inexhaustible in number. This is not the case. It has been proven that some of the most valuable coastal and ocean fisheries are susceptible to decline over the years. This has been recognized by those who are vitally interested in the lobster fishing industry. I quote the following from a report of a meeting which was held not long ago in one of our centres on Prince Edward Island, after a group of fishermen had met to discuss their problems.

> The group unanimously passed a resolution calling on the Department of Fisheries to proceed without delay in setting up machinery necessary to introduce and implement a lobster trap limit and lobster fishing licence restrictions in district 7B.

That is fine. Unfortunately—and I cannot for the life of me understand why—the department did not go all the way. They made this restriction applicable only to a part of district 7B—they made it applicable to the north shore of Prince Edward Island, so that a man who fished in that portion of district 7B and who had put out, say, 1,500 traps would only be able to put out 500 traps. As I say, this is a good thing and it is, I believe what the fishermen want. But that man who fished 1,500 lobster traps last year is going to be able to put out only 500 in the restricted area this year. So he has 1,000 traps sitting on the wharf. What does he do with them? It is only a distance of approximately 12 miles from the north shore to the south shore of P.E.I. The danger to those fishing on the south shore in district 7B is that, the fisherman on the north shore—the restricted area could haul his traps across that 12 miles distance and set them in the waters off the south shore of the island, thereby crowding out those who fished in that portion of district 7B last year.

I do not think the Department of Fisheries would want to do anything to inconvenience seriously the lobster fishermen this year, but if it is not too late I would recommend to the minister that he make all of district 7B a restricted area. Thus a man who did not have a licence last year on the north shore would not be able to get one this year on the south shore. We shall never be able to have this problem successfully resolved until we get lobster trap limits and licensing limits throughout the whole of district 7B, and I hope the minister will give serious consideration to the implementation of such restrictions.

Yesterday in reply to a question I placed on the order paper some time ago, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Robichaud) gave an answer which astounded me, an answer which is appalling, an answer which constitutes a complete reneging by the government on a promise it made to the fishermen of my province. This matter dates back to 1964 when regulations were made under the fishing vessels assistance regulations whereby fishermen who constructed small open boats in excess of 35 feet in length were promised a subsidy.

They were told, without any strings attached, that all they had to do to qualify for this subsidy was to construct boats in excess of 35 feet, in the 35 to 45 foot class. Some 95 fishermen in the province of P.E.I. took the government at its word. They constructed these boats—boats which were larger than they ordinarily would have required but which nevertheless they could make good use of; and there was also the question of the subsidy in their minds. They acted in good faith.

This took place in 1965, prior to the election in that year. No specifications were set out at that time. As a matter of fact the provincial fishermen's loan board tried its very best to obtain specifications from the federal Department of Fisheries. First of all the loan board drew up a set of specifications which it submitted to the federal department for approval. No answer came back from the federal department. There was no prior consultation at all with the province of P.E.I. so far as specifications were concerned.

Finally the federal department asked the P.E.I. government, or the fishermen's loan board of the province, to draw up a set of specifications. This its members proceeded to do, as best they could. A committee from the loan board was appointed to prepare the specifications. That committee consisted of provincial departmental officials and representatives of the boat building industry.

On February 16, 1965 the committee's recommendations were forwarded to the federal department in Ottawa. No answer was received. The provincial loan board wrote again to Ottawa on March 9, 1965, asking for acceptance or non-acceptance of its recommendations. At that stage the local fishermen wanted to know if they were going to have to build to certain specifications, and what those specifications were, so that they could get construction under way in order to have the boats in the water by spring.

The P.E.I. government told the federal department at that time that if it did not get an answer the boats would be built as closely as possible to the standards which had been approved by the P.E.I. loan board. Still there was no answer; so naturally the provincial government took it for granted that everything was O.K. and the fishermen went ahead in good faith and built their boats.

Very shortly after the boats were completed and just prior to the November, 1965, election, six of the 95 people who constructed these boats were paid their subsidy. How these six were chosen nobody has been able to determine. Possibly the names were drawn from a hat, but anyway the six were paid without any prior examination of their boats.

Applications were sent in by the other 89 fishermen who built boats, but no money was forthcoming and no answer was received from the department in Ottawa. Over a year ago I placed questions on the order paper in connection with this matter but got evasive answers to every one of them. At that time I was told that the boats were being inspected. I tried to find out on what basis this inspection was to be made, what specifications were being followed by the inspectors. Only yesterday it was revealed that 64 of the 95 applicants had been turned down because their boats did not meet specifications; specifications which the fishermen knew absolutely nothing about at the time the boats were constructed, and which the boat builders themselves knew nothing about.

I say that this is most unfair. These 64 fishermen are not going to stand for it. I earnestly suggest that the minister should take a second look at this situation and pay these 64 men the money which was definitely promised them before they constructed their boats.

In the answer which he gave yesterday the minister said that these vessels which were built must be "of approved experimental design." What is approved experimental design? How in the name of common sense can you build a boat to approved experimental design if there is no design and there are no specifications? Did you ever hear of anything more ridiculous in your life, Mr. Speaker?

The minister also said that they must reflect improvement "over conventional types for the size class." I suggest that if a fishing boat is 40 feet long rather than 28 feet long, this constitutes an improvement.

The minister also said that the vessels must meet provincial construction standards and "Department of Transport regulations in so far as the latter apply," and the vessels are to be registered with the Department of Transport. There is no trouble with that. He also said that the vessels are to be "adequately outfitted and equipped to show sufficient evidence of diversification capability over and above lobster fishing." That is a high sounding phase, if ever there was one; but that kind of language is not going to satisfy the 64 men who are waiting for their cheques from the Department of Fisheries. I want to know when these cheques will be issued. The fishermen did want to know. I suggest to the minister that he is in conscience bound to pay these men. If there is any conscience over there at all, the government will get these cheques out just as quickly as it can.

The government, or federal department, set up an examining board to go around and examine these boats. That board made 107 examinations. The government took a shipwright consultant all the way from Victoria, B.C. to P.E.I. to look at these boats. I suggest it cost almost as much to bring him there as it would have cost to pay the subsidies to these 64 men. I repeat that the minister should get the cheques out to these men as quickly as possible, because just as sure as I am standing here those 64 fishermen from P.E.I. are not going to put up with this treatment.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Mr. Jack A. Irvine (London): Mr. Speaker, I have been very interested in the number of members who have spoken and the content of some of their messages. I am sure that many good suggestions have been made to those on the government side of the house. I hope many of these are suggestions which perhaps will be incorporated into some future legislation. I did not intend to speak at this particular time, but I feel I should because of something which I believe many of us fear most; that is, an increase in taxation.

As indicated in the mini—or baby, or whatever you might like to call it—budget of December 19, we have an item which was placed before the house which actually blames the senior citizens for the increase in taxation that was applied at that particular time. It is my belief that this taxation was unnecessary, and I should like to give my reasons for this. The increases which we had to make available to these people by way of a supplement were caused by the inflationary tendencies in this country. Many of these people retired many years ago. The value of the dollar on which they retired has diminished considerably today. Had the government kept prices in line, this increase might not have been necessary.

In taking the position I do—although this was recommended in the house—I am not recommending, nor am I in favour of government control over prices and wages. Under certain conditions, however, for a certain short period, it is possible that it might be advisable. This was found to be necessary upon the outbreak of the last war and was implemented, I believe, under the Emergency Powers Act. I think sometimes that if we reflect back on the past year we will realize that we were in a state of very serious emergency in that year. In most cases, these people who are receiving the supplement, are no further ahead than they were three or four years ago. Some of them, who are in the old age bracket, find themselves in the position of having to pay higher taxes. We are supposed to be increasing the taxes in two different areas in order to help these people. It is my submission this is ridiculous; in fact it might even be termed subterfuge.

[Mr. McQuaid.]

In the first place, it was not necessary to raise the taxes. Surely this is the time when we should be carrying on a complete job evaluation program throughout all departments of government so that we might get rid of some of these square pegs in round holes and vice versa. I think a program of this type would be very much worth while. Perhaps we should give some serious consideration to this at the present time.

We should stop this empire building. I should like to say something about empire building, because there has been so much of it in the past. It is not more taxes that are needed; it is more savings. We need to cut and pare all our unnecessary expenditures. If people are not willing to make a contribution of their own, then they just are not interested in the welfare of their country. I wonder how the following suggestion would fit, for size. We might give every employee who earns in excess of $10,000 a year a 10 per cent cut in pay for Christmas. I wonder how it would be if we were to follow this up a little, and even extend it to members of parliament. I do not think there is a member in this house who would object to giving 10 per cent of his money in order to assist the people in the lower income brackets. This is something we could think about; we might even consider including those in the other place.

What we need, Mr. Speaker, is more efficiency and less of this issue concerning increases in taxation. At the present time 14 per cent of every dollar is used to service our public debt. I should like to refer back to the budget of December 19 and quote from page 11334 of Hansard where the minister made the following statement:

> In introducing the guaranteed income supplement we are adding $280 million a year to our cash outflow, and this must somehow be matched by increased cash revenues if we are to avoid increasing our cash deficit with all its financial and economic consequences.

There is not a word here about cutting down or paring our unnecessary expenditures. Further down on the same page the minister says:

> The first measure I recommend to the house, therefore, is that we raise the maximum amount payable by an individual on the 4 per cent tax on personal income under the Old Age Security Act, from $120 per year, as it has been for the past three years, to $240 per year.

I do not think anyone objects to that, because it is not the people in the very low income brackets who are being hurt too much; it is the people in the higher income brackets, and they are the people who should expect to pay. Further on the minister says:

> This would yield about $135 million a year at current income levels. It would be effective from January 1 but since deduction at the source cannot start immediately, relatively little will appear in this fiscal year's accounts.

I contend that it was quite unnecessary to introduce a budget at all at that time because these people who will receive the old age supplement, according to all the information I have, will not receive any of this money until some time late in March. It would have been quite possible to have ended this session, start another one, have the throne speech debate, and bring in a new budget retroactive to January 1. Therefore I say that at the time this budget was introduced—mini or whatever you may wish to call it—it was almost a redundant item.

Further, at page 11336 of Hansard the minister had this to say:

> I have come to the conclusion, therefore, that we should obtain the revenue we need by adding 1 per cent to our general sales tax, making it 12 per cent in total, instead of 11 per cent, with two exceptions.

Then he goes on to deal with the exceptions. At page 11337 he says:

> I am also proposing that the increase in the sales tax should not apply to building materials.

He is referring to the 1 per cent. This is a wonderful gesture. The people who are engaged in building houses—something which we are very short of—must have been very pleased with this 1 per cent. Certainly we know there is a very serious housing shortage at the present time. Since the present government came into power our old age security tax has been increased by 33⅓ per cent. It is wonderful to think that they should get credit for having set such a record. It is no wonder the present government is becoming known as a high tax administration, when they increase the amount of money for the old age security tax from 3 per cent to 4 per cent. What will it be in 1968, 5 per cent, 6 per cent? There is a limit to just how much the taxpayer can bear.

Let us refer to another item which has been talked about in this house on many occasions, and I refer to the Carter commission report. We were supposed to have its report a year ago. The minister stated about that time that the had read some parts of the report. The members of this house would like to know what has happened to it. Suggestions have been made that it has not yet been printed in both official languages. My contention is that if it is printed in either English or French it should be made available, and certainly it should have been available last October during the conference between the federal and provincial finance ministers, and treasury officials. It was not available at that meeting. We do not know what the complexities of the tax structure are for the coming year.

Let me now refer to an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail recently under the heading "A guide line to trends in 1967". It states in part:

> The direction the economy will take in 1967 can be judged by watching a few of the main indicators:
> The level of business capital investment is likely to be the most important single determinant of the trend of the economy during the next year. Investment has increased by about 20 per cent in each of the past three years. Any major fall from this rate of advance, when Ottawa announces its investment forecast early in 1967, would point to an easing in demands for labour, materials and credit.
> Housing could play an important role in 1967. The decline in housing starts from 166,000 in 1965 to about 135,000 in 1966, besides moderating demands for labour and materials, has diminished the short-term prospects for sale of household appliances and furniture. An upturn in housing starts would take up some of the slack, if business investment weakens. Early action by Ottawa to increase direct lending would probably indicate the authorities believed the economy needs stimulation.
> Weakness in auto sales in both Canada and the United States in 1966 was one of the first hints that the boom might have run its course. Continuation of this trend into 1967 would transmit weakness to a wide range of other industries, such as the steel, glass, paint, and rubber industries. If sales recover, it would help put some bounce back into the economy.

If we do not do something in the way of stimulating building and it drops back again in 1967 the result will be increased rentals of homes, apartments and other types of dwellings. This is turn will cause more inflation.

Let us take a good look at the auto pact. We know of the difficulties being experienced in the Oshawa area at the present time as pointed out by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) yesterday. It is hardly feasible that at automobile made in Canada should be sold in the United States for $500 less than the Canadian price. These inequities must be considered. Surely it is our responsibility and duty as members of parliament to look into these matters.

It has been my pleasure to serve on the joint committee on consumer credit and the committee on trade, finance and economic affairs. It has been difficult at times to attend the meetings of both committees because they often sit at the same time. It has been suggested that the government should establish a department of consumer affairs. I suggest there is such a body now in existence in the committee on consumer credit. It would cost a great deal of money to set up a ministry of this kind. A minister would have to be named along with the deputy and various other officials and staff. Such a ministry would extend outward from Ottawa into various constituencies, creating a local super snooper in each riding.

Surely it is the responsibility of all members of parliament to act as liaison officers between consumer groups and appropriate federal agencies. I suggest this is the procedure which should be followed in respect of consumer credit and prices. Representations should be made by members of parliament, and they in turn should voice these representations at meetings of this joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons.

The establishment of a ministry in respect of consumers would cost millions of dollars each year with no more advantages than now exist as the result of the established joint committee. Members of parliament can always discuss things on friendly terms with the chairmen of committees. Sometimes it is very difficult for members to get satisfaction from ministers or departmental officials.

The committee on consumer credit is doing a good job and is working hard. The members of that committee are already receiving remuneration for their efforts. Let us make this a permanent committee in order that the people can make representations to parliament without having to go through an unnecessary and expensive procedure.

On August 3, 1964, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) was reported as having said that the Dominion Bureau of Statistics reported that there was an increase in employees under government control during March of last year. This increase was set out as follows: in National Defence, 2,181; in the Post Office Department, 2,368; in the National Revenue Department, 2,652; in Public Works, 414, and in the Department of the Secretary of State, 135.

This report also indicated that there was an increase of 629 in the number of employees in the Department of Trade and Commerce, in spite of the fact another department was established. It also indicated an increase in the staff of the unemployment insurance commission. The total of these increases in staff amounted to 9,896. Using an average income for these people of $7,000 per year—and I am sure the average would be higher—this would amount to an additional $70 million. That is an example of exactly what can take place.

Let me say something about training of skilled workers in this country. We have been bringing skilled employees from other countries to fill our needs in Canada. Surely we should give consideration to the training of our own people for specialized jobs. On November 21, 1960 the then minister of labour, the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr), presented a resolution to this house which was followed by a bill stipulating that the federal government should pay 75 per cent of the total cost of constructing educational and vocational training schools in Canada. This program was to be administered provincially, and 25 per cent of the cost was to have been picked up by the provincial government. Based on agreements signed on June 1, 1960, all the provinces of Canada with the exception of Quebec immediately came into this orbit, and I believe they followed suit some six months later.

I have seen the work in these schools. I know in particular the work carried out in the Thames Vocational School in the city of London, which I have visited on many occasions. They cater to people who do not have the academic ability to go further than this type of training. They teach people in machine shop work, as mechanics, and various vocations of this type. I know many people who have been trained at this school and have gone out and filled their place in society. If we do not do something for them, I am sure that sooner or later we will have to contribute to their welfare by way of social security programs, which of course shatters their confidence in themselves and do not improve their ability to work in any field.

We have in our area the Sir Wilfrid Laurier school. I am very proud of the fact that I had not only the privilege of opening this school but of presenting a picture of Sir Wilfrid Laurier to the students. I was proud to do this because I recognize this man as one of the outstanding Canadian statesmen of all time. It was a pleasure to have the privilege of making this presentation. A third school is in the process of construction at the present time. However, Mr. Speaker, I submit that we need more of these schools. From June 1, 1961, to September 30, 1966, there were 814 of this type of school, classrooms or additions constructed in Canada at a total cost of $1,250,000,000, with a student capacity of approximately 380,000 for vocational and training.

I submit that we have a large group of people, and always will have, who require this type of training and we should continue this plan. I was very much dismayed when on October 26 last the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) made the statement in this house that his government was phasing out this program. I am sure we will rue that day. I am also sure we will have to come back to this program in four, five or ten years time. I ask what is to happen in the interval with respect to that group of people who do not receive this kind of training. Will they become charges upon their municipalities? Will they become victims of our society, having to receive support from some of our social welfare programs?

If this program is to be carried on in any way after the federal government opts out of it or phases it out, the whole burden of the cost will have to be carried by the municipalities; and they cannot afford this sort of thing because they are already overtaxed. We need these facilities to train workers in order to increase our productivity and meet the growing demands of what we might call an affluent society. By increasing productivity we can in some way help to relieve the inflationary pressures which now exist.

Let us turn to the university level. Let us think in terms of the medicare bill which passed recently and will become operative July 1, 1968. I would ask the government this pertinent question: Where will we obtain sufficient doctors to make this plan work? I did a little checking on this matter with the University of Western Ontario and with the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) to ascertain whether my figures were correct. In Canada at the present time we have one medical practitioner for approximately 900 persons. In the United States they have one medical practitioner for every 700 persons. We graduate annually about 800 medical practitioners, but the drain-off to the United States is approximately 200, or 25 per cent. However, in recent years this drain-off has been compensated by the immigration of doctors, mostly from England, to the extent of about 400 per year.

In the past, if a person had a cut on his little finger he put a piece of tape on the cut and suffered the discomfort. However, Mr. Speaker, when you have a medicare plan I think it is only natural that people will request further treatment. To cope with this demand we will need many more doctors. We will also need more teaching facilities in our universities to produce more doctors. The opinion I received from the medical school was that out of 100 doctors who graduate there is one person who is qualified as having the ability and desire to impart knowledge by teaching. Then we get into the area of being short of teachers in a profession that will be overworked. Something must be done by way of providing aid and incentive to keep doctors in Canada. I do not know what can be done in this respect, but I am sure the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen)—I am sorry he is not in the chamber this evening—is giving this question serious thought, because it has become a very serious problem.

Another question that arises is as to how we will be able to increase the number of hospital beds available to those in need? We need a continuance of the program for technical and vocational training. We need a continuance of and a great expansion in university facilities to provide this training. Some two or three weeks ago—and I recognize the fact that the minister is a very busy man—I made representations by mail to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) asking that I might have an audience with him to discuss this very subject. As yet I have not had an audience with him. I am sure that when he has an opportunity he will discuss this matter with me, because I have found him to be a very understanding person every time I have had the occasion to approach him with a problem.

If we are to expand our university training facilities we shall have to increase the 10 per cent ceiling on charitable donations if they are for the purpose of expanding the facilities in our universities. We shall have to increase it from 10 per cent to 25 per cent, because if we do not obtain the money in this way to provide these facilities we will have to obtain it in some other way. We must provide this extra university training before we can make the medicare plan work—and it must work.

I hope the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue will get together and give this question some very serious thought before the preparation of the 1967 budget. I think now, in our centennial year, is the time for every person in the house and in the country to be proud to call themselves Canadians, and I am sure they are. I believe it is time we got down to business. I believe it is time we obtained a little business acumen in government affairs. I know it has been said that you cannot run a government like a business because it is not exactly the same thing; but you can incorporate many business ideas into government, and I am sure if we did this it would be very helpful.

Let us cut and pare, particularly when dealing with the estimates for the coming fiscal year, every unnecessary expenditure. Let us get on with the job evaluation program. Let us get down to the basics of running this as we would run a business, and let it be resolved that we save, not waste, and that we do everything we can to stop this incessant empire building. When the estimates come before us in the next fiscal year I think we should be really tough.

There is one other item with which I should like to deal very briefly. I received a letter dated yesterday from a person in my riding who will have to remain anonymous, and who wrote:

> I believe some time ago you brought the question before the house and Mr. Pearson stated that there were no funds available for any increase in retired civil servants' pensions.

Then he says that if they could only get a $10 or $15 a month increase it would be a big help, even if it were given on a means test. He encloses in his letter a clipping out of the London Free Press of February 7, 1967. It reads as follows:

> The pension fund of the federal civil service had a balance of $2,390,383,091 last year and is drawing more in interest than it pays out in retirement benefits.
> In the fiscal year ending last March 31, interest amounted to $89,499,085 and benefits to $69,906,914. The previous year's interest was $78,715,785 and benefits $64,160,629.

In view of the fact that the money is there, that these people have paid it in, and that many of them have retired, five, 10 or 15 years ago, some of them on a pension of $50 a month, I think that this should be reviewed right away. The money belongs to these people and I think that this should be re-assessed.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Walker: May I ask the hon. member a question?

The Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The time allotted to the hon. member has expired.

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on a matter which is often spoken about in the house but which perhaps requires action rather than words. I should like to speak of education and educational expenses, although in a purely constitutional sense as it affects this house, instead of wasting my time on dreams which do not take into consideration the present constitutional realities in Canada.

The proposition I wish to put forward has to do with the income tax. I think it has a great deal to recommend it, particularly the factor of simplicity. At the present time the government of Canada allows students attending universities and institutions beyond the secondary school level to deduct from their income tax the money they pay out in tuition. This is fine as far as it goes and it certainly has been of assistance to a great many Canadians, particularly people like myself who have found that because of this exemption in one year they were able to continue their education in another year when they were particularly short of funds.

The suggestion which I should like to make is that the government should allow students from areas where there are no universities to deduct from their income tax, or that of their parents, the money that they have to spend for room and board. As an example I should like to refer to myself, when I was attending the University of Manitoba. I lived in a town called Atikokan but I attended the university in Winnipeg. I had to pay room and board, and this was the biggest single expense that I had to bear; the tuition fees were a secondary matter. I understand that nowadays tuition fees have gone up considerably, and now they have become a bigger obstacle for people coming from rural areas and wishing to attend universities in the city.

I suggest that under such a program people who live in a city where a university is available should not be exempted, because they have already the option of either staying at home or not. A student coming from an area like mine has no option at all. He must pay room and board if he wishes to attend a university because there are no universities in these areas. Another factor to their disadvantage is that the standard of living in these areas is below that which is in existence in cities. Also the standard of education is not as high, and other facilities such as night schools, correspondence courses or extension courses are not as easily available, if at all. Therefore this is a very important consideration.

In view of the fact that job opportunities for students during the summer months are diminishing as the number of students attending universities increases, students who wish to work their way through college are less often able to do so. In fact for many students this opportunity has disappeared completely.

The second suggestion which I should like to make has to do with federal aid to universities. I recognize, as do most hon. members in the house, that university education is a matter of provincial responsibility. I understand also that the federal government does participate in certain aspects of education, namely in manpower training. However, it does so mainly because of its overriding responsibility for unemployment, and not because it can participate legitimately in education. And yet this happens to come under federal jurisdiction. Nevertheless there are other areas in which the federal government does have responsibility. For example there is the area of the federal government's control over interprovincial truck transportation. Provincial trucking agencies are the responsibility of the provinces, but interprovincial trucking agencies come under the jurisdiction of the federal government.

One of the problems that is facing Canadian universities today is the fact that more students are crossing provincial boundaries to attend university. I am a perfect example of this. I was raised in Ontario and I attended university in Manitoba. It seems to me that just as the federal government has legitimately exerted its jurisdiction in interprovincial trucking, it can also exercise a certain amount of jurisdiction over students who are crossing provincial boundaries to attend universities on the other side. I suggest that the government provide capital funds to universities in which a certain proportion of students come either from outside the country or from other provinces. It should also redeem its promise to provide 10,000 scholarships and to award them to students who attend universities outside their province. It seems to me that this would avoid the constitutional confusion which exists at present, and which prevents the government from assisting in this particular problem. I do not think this would impose a greater burden on the universities and it would provide capital funds for a number of institutions.

I am not suggesting that the government do more than it does at present. As a matter of fact the Department of Indian Affairs and Norther Development does provide capital grants to municipal schools to make available a certain number of places for the education of Indians. All I am proposing is something that is in existence already and that is being done in a very successful way. I think that the government might take these two suggestions under consideration as their 1967 centennial project.

Mr. Clancy: May I say to the hon. member who just sat down that I congratulate his father for sending him to university and that I also send him my regrets for the fact that he had to do so.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): I thank the Minister of Transport for applauding. I also try to give him as much support as I can.

I regret that the time given me is so short. If I had more time I would have been able to conclude the subject matter before me. However, I am apt to break my train of thought because of the restrictions imposed on me by the shortage of time.

I know that if the minister were in the house he would say that there is another member of the opposition who is trying to tell him how to spend money. The government endeavoured to curtail debate when we were discussing estimates, but in such a debate as this one has an opportunity to advise the government how to spend the funds that are available through taxation.

Tonight, because this is our centennial year and because a certain situation was brought to my attention not too many days ago, I should like to place this matter before the house and the country. This is National Heart Foundation week and I think this matter is an appropriate subject for debate. A few evenings ago the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) was singing his own praises in regard to the medicare program and the benefits which will flow to Canadians. At one point in his address, when dealing with the question of facilities, and so on, the minister said:

> But whether we have medicare or not, we will never have a sufficient supply of personnel and facilities.

This matter was brought to my attention, Mr. Speaker, through a program on the C.B.C. directed by a Mr. Bob Cohen of the press gallery. I found the program very topical and I should like to read an extract from the script in order to put my thoughts on the record:

> Canada's medical researchers have just gone through their annual week of meetings.

These were held at the Chateau Laurier here in Ottawa.

But these seemed to be sessions with a different flavour. Canada's medical scientists are getting more and more anxious about the federal government's lack of support of their research. Last year at this time the government was handed the now-famous Gundy report on medical research in Canada. Charles Gundy is a Toronto financier and chairman of the Hospital for Sick Children. The report said there would be no staff for Canadian medical schools unless the government gave more money for research done by teacher-scientists.

This is the nub of the matter, Mr. Speaker. I believe the teacher-scientist problem is the great one.

Without it, the report suggested, the professional people needed to staff Canada's medical schools would not be attracted to either stay in Canada or come here.

Well, one year later, virtually nothing has happened. The government has expressed sympathy with the researchers' needs. But as one doctor said, "We don't want sympathy, we want firm government policy." Sometimes governments need a bit of a push from outside to establish policy.

I know that this body does not want to become a political pressure group, but I recognize their need. Then the script goes on to point out that the Canadian Association for the Advancement of Health Sciences was established in order to impress upon the government the need in this particular field.

In our centennial year, Mr. Speaker, one of the great things that can be done by Canada is to establish such a program in order to eliminate disease in the world through the means of increased research and scientific development. This would be a lasting monument in this year of celebration that is before us. The government has in many other ways seen fit to spend large sums of money, with which expenditure perhaps I do not disagree. On the other hand, we have commissions and boards spending millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money on projects which are not necessarily what the people of Canada want. They are forced upon the people by the government at a time when a massive, centennial project such as this would be a good and lasting monument throughout the world in this great year of ours.

I shall have to skip a lot of this text, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to bring to the attention of the house and the country one development which has arisen from this meeting of researchers. I should like to draw attention to an invention by a young medical doctor and researcher whom I have known very slightly during the last few years. The text goes on:

The most exciting research news to come out of the meeting concerns a unique heart operation which promises to be eventually an outstanding procedure for curing the possibly fatal effects of heart attack. It was invented by Dr. Ray Heimbecker, a 43-year-old Toronto surgeon. His research work on the procedure earned him this year's royal college medal in surgery.

This young man, who fortunately had the facilities and the wherewithal to follow up his important work, is making a contribution to Canada and to mankind that cannot be overlooked by the members of this house and by all Canadians. I know that the whole world will benefit from this young man's efforts, and I also know he will also have that satisfaction which comes from hard and earnest endeavour in his chosen profession.

I have before me a letter from the Canadian Heart Foundation which is addressed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) and reads as follows:

The provisional committee of the Canadian Association for the Advancement of the Health Sciences is alarmed at the disastrous consequences that would flow from any restraint, even temporary, on the growth of research in Canada. More particularly, we draw your attention to the need to recruit over one thousand teacher-scientists—

Again there is stress upon the teacher-scientist aspect of the profession.

—in the health field to staff our universities in the next five years. Research is essential to the recruitment of this personnel.

We reaffirm the recommendations of the Gundy report as necessary to change the climate of medical research in Canada and urge the government to give an early indication of its long term plans for a drive for medical manpower.

In view of the fact that we are celebrating Heart Foundation Week and that this problem has been with us for some time, I think we should expect some announcement of massive assistance in this as well as in related fields.

Also on the same subject, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read a letter written to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) written by Charles L . Gundy as follows:

The governments in Canada have made it evident that they wish to maintain a first class health care service. It is recognized that to achieve this there must be suitable facilities for medical research and education.

The accompanying report—

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Hurry up.

Mr. Winkler: May I have that again?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): I said, hurry up.

Mr. Winkler: I do not have sufficient time to permit me to say all I should on this matter, but I will do my best.

The accompanying report, "Medical Research in Canada", examines in detail the vital role of medical research in attaining the highest possible standards in the fields of medical education, health care and health services.

The report considers it urgent to establish a favourable medical research environment in Canada which will encourage teacher-scientists—

Once more stress is placed on this teacher-scientist aspect of the question.

—to remain in Canada and in teaching and research, which will attract back to Canadian universities—

There has been a tremendous flow of these people out of this country.

—teacher-scientists and graduates now working elsewhere for lack of opportunity in Canada, and which will encourage undergraduates to pursue medical research as a career.

The report states that a failure to establish such an environment in Canada will result in erosion of the standards of Canadian medical schools and the quality of health care provided to the Canadian people.

To establish a favourable medical research environment, the report recommends a major increase in federal government support—

Which is what I am asking for, Mr. Speaker—

—of extramural medical research. Such financial support should be accompanied by a federal government policy statement to assure scientists and potential scientists that there is, and will continue to be, a good future for medical research in this country.

The idea for this report originated in conversations with scientific friends, particularly among the Canadian Society for Clinical Investigation and the staff of The Hospital for Sick Children, Toronto. These friends told me of their alarm at the shortage of funds for medical research in Canada and the seriousness of the threat this held for the future of medical standards. Accordingly, Woods, Gordon & Co., management consultants, was commissioned to prepare a study of the problem which led to the report we are now presenting to you.

A list of those endorsing this report is attached—

—and so on.

This report is one of the most comprehensive reports that one could ever read, Mr. Speaker. I contains the material to prove that there is a need and it illustrates what is happening. In this regard I have an editorial in front of me which points out that the $500 million established by the government in the health resources fund is insufficient, that we need a minimum of $100 million a year. The grants the government has been supplying up to the tune of $12 million a year I am sure the house realizes are quite inadequate to meet requirements. These amounts are minimal. The stress, as I have said, is upon preparing medical students with ability for the teacher-scientist field.

• (9:40 p.m.)

This is a priority. The priority should be for medical research and education, as stated by Dr. Merriman, Associate Professor of Medicine in Saskatchewan. When we realize what we spend per capita for this purpose in Canada and compare it with what is being spent in the United States, we realize something lacks in our thinking in this field. They spend in the United States more than 100 per cent more than we spend in Canada—far more. Last year in the United States, from one source alone, the sum raised was $1,072 million. When we realize how much we depend on foreign medical services, on immigrants from other countries, also bearing in mind that we lose as many people to the United States as any other country loses, something should be done. Nothing would be more fitting for our centennial year than a government supported program such as I have talked about. Every member of the house would support it enthusiastically.

I have time to read one short extract from the Gundy report to show the status of research in Canada. Actually, the report covers the entire field. The quotation is as follows:

Research is today an absolutely essential element in the preparation of young doctors and in the continuing education of established physicians. A medical school can no longer prepare a doctor with the detailed procedures for diagnosis which he will need throughout his later career. The whole art is changing much too fast... medical schools must concentrate on imparting a broad grasp of the basic principles of medicine, and skill in applying these general principles to specific cases. Above all, they must help their students to understand how medical investigation produces new knowledge and how one evaluates the new findings as they appear. This means in turn that most students in good medical schools today must learn the research attitude, even though a majority of them may never become full-fledged research workers themselves.

Brief as that was, lacking in detail as it is, and I wish it had more detail—I am glad that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has just walked in—the extract does permit me to say this. The best centennial project the government of Canada could embark upon would be a massive program in support of research. We need teachers and facilities. I believe that such a program would be the best dedication we could make to our centennial year. It would be to the benefit of all mankind.

[Mr. Winkler.]

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Ormiston). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mrs. Wadds: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I wish to move the adjournment of this debate.

Mr. Speaker: It being after ten o'clock—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the house that the question be placed on the main motion?

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I wish to move the adjournment of this debate.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

CRIMINAL CODE—POSSIBLE AMENDMENT RESPECTING ELECTRONIC LISTENING DEVICES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, some days ago the Attorney General of the Province of Ontario, Mr. Wishart, made a statement in the Ontario legislature to the effect that Ontario Provincial Police were using wire-tapping equipment for investigation purposes. I asked the Minister of Justice (Mr. Cardin) the following day whether or not the government was giving consideration to the implementation of legislation in this regard. I also asked whether the government would agree to send this whole matter to the standing committee on justice and legal affairs for study. The minister stated that he felt no useful purpose would be served by such referral.

I believe it was Mr. Justice Holmes, that famous United States Supreme Court Justice, who said that wire-tapping is a dirty business. We as Canadians in the past have tended to think if we simply ignore problems, if we do not talk about them and do not admit their existence they will somehow or another go away. Unfortunately it has become obvious in recent years that wire-tapping is taking place in Canada extensively, and police forces as well as private investigation agencies are involved.

A royal commission at the present time is investigating charges of wire-tapping in British Columbia. During the course of the hearings of that commission an R.C.M.P. corporal is reported in the Vancouver Sun of December 7, 1966, as having used this method of investigation. That article in part states:

> Richards said he had used listening devices during his 15 years with the R.C.M.P.
> He said he had done a two-week course in Ottawa on operating tape recorders with listening devices and was familiar with equipment which does not need wires.
> Richards said he has used listening devices in the city of Vancouver on instructions from a higher authority.

An alderman of the city of Saskatoon said that in 1965 he discovered that on the instructions of the chief of police the only telephone available to prisoners in the city jail had been tapped so that police could listen in to phone calls made by prisoners who were awaiting sentence or transfer, or individuals who were in jail but not yet tried. Let me point out that telephone calls of prisoners to their lawyers are highly confidential, and under our law should not be listened to by police.

In 1964 a Toronto Star columnist, Ron Haggart, documented a case of wire-tapping in the city of Toronto. In his column he referred to the name of the officer, the licence number of the R.C.M.P. vehicle used and other pertinent facts.

Bell Telephone officials in the city of Toronto who were interviewed by the Globe and Mail admitted that wire-tapping was taking place, and said it was being done by police officials. It is understood that when it is done by police officials prosecutions were not being pursued.

Members of this house have heard a great deal about the Dorion inquiry. Testimony was given before that inquiry by R.C.M.P. officials that they had wire-tapping equipment and were prepared to use it. Let me quote from page 4815 of the transcript of the Dorion commission. An R.C.M.P. officer, Inspector Carrier, was asked the following question:

> Mr. Carrier, do you presently have at your disposal, or did you at that time have, that is to say, did you have at your disposal the necessary technical means to tape, amongst other things, telephone conversations?

The answer was, "Yes." Then at page 4816 Mr. Carrier was asked this question:

> Mr. Carrier, does the word "cover", in your mind, simply mean that Mr. Crevier was to sit beside another telephone and listen to the conversation, or could it not also have meant tape the ongoing conversation?
> A. It could mean either, either to listen or to record it.

Therefore, it seems to me there is no question that the evidence is conclusive that wire-tapping is going on. Newspapers from one end of Canada to the other have written editorials in recent years deploring wire-tapping and calling for legislation to outlaw it. I will not quote them tonight, but I would like to quote a couple of paragraphs from a submission made to the royal commission on civil rights appointed by the Ontario government. The Canadian Civil Liberties Association, an organization in Toronto which includes some of the most respected and best known lawyers in the city of Toronto, made a submission to Mr. Justice McRuer. This association said, under the heading, "The Existing Law":

Amazingly enough, there appears to be no legislation of any practical consequence which inhibits scientific invasions of privacy in this jurisdiction. The Criminal Code contains no specific provisions of this nature.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret that I have to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in spite of the quotations the hon. member has just put on the record I cannot give any more specific answer than the one I gave the other day, to the effect that I did not think it would be useful to have this matter referred to a parliamentary committee. The reason is that the whole question of wire-tapping is being studied, not only by the department but by a commission of inquiry in British Columbia, and will no doubt also be part of the study made by a commission on crime.

The hon. member referred to wire-tapping as a "dirty business." I would prefer to refer to it as a very difficult problem. I think no one would contradict the stand taken by the hon. member in connection with the protection of civil rights, the independence of individuals and the right to carry on conversations without being overheard. However, I think the hon. member will also realize that an important aspect of our life is the prevention of crime, and national security.

This is one of the problems that government has to resolve. It is a two-edged sword and the question of wire-tapping is not an easy problem to resolve. Wire-tapping is only incidental to a whole series of electronic devices in this area. I feel it is not something with regard to which a decision can be easily or lightly reached.

• (10:20 p.m.)

I believe that the study which will be undertaken in British Columbia will be useful to us. The studies which are now going on in the department as a result of the suggestions made during the meeting of attorneys-general a year ago have also been very useful. However I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North will appreciate fully the difficulties involved and the necessity for coming up with a solution which will in fact bring protection to honest citizens and at the same time permit the government to prevent crime and to protect our national security. This is what we are trying to do.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL—FAILURE OF ARMED FORCES TATTOO TO APPEAR IN KOOTENAYS

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I represent a riding which is very interested in celebrating our centennial year both by public events and by projects that have been carried on, even in some of the quite small communities. Quite recently they heard through the press, on television and on radio, about the proposals for the tattoo train which will be visiting various parts of Canada in the near future. The matter was brought to a head by persons who read the magazine "The Legionary" which is read by about 10,000 people in my riding. I want to quote from this magazine for the minister's information. It reads in part as follows:

The Canadian armed forces will play a large part in Canada's centennial celebrations by taking one of the greatest road shows in Canada's history across the nation.

From St. John's, Newfoundland, to Victoria, British Columbia, Canadians will have the opportunity of seeing the Canadian armed forces tattoo which will be the principal contribution of the services to Canada's centennial celebrations. This colourful spectacle will provide the ultimate in military entertainment within the framework of the development of Canada's armed forces from their French and British origins to our time.

Scheduled to appear at 40 locations across Canada during 1967, the tattoo will feature music, pageantry, colour-sweeping spotlights, history, action, comedy, fantasy and variety to provide entertainment, while at the same time making use of a subtle historical line to link the various scenes.

This was read by a number of people and then the matter was discussed at various meetings of the Legion and of other organizations in my constituency.

I should like to quote a letter which I received from J. C. Hall, president, Pacific Command, Royal Canadian Legion, who happens to be a resident of Trail. It reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Herridge:

It has been brought to my attention that the Centennial armed forces train which will be travelling across Canada and performing a tattoo at various locations, will not be stopping over in either the East or West Kootenays.

A number of veterans and other citizens have brought this to my attention hoping that the government can be persuaded to have either one or the other section of the trains make a stop in the Kootenays.

As you are aware, the Centennial train itself, is making a short stop of one day in Castlegar, which is considered by the commission to be a central location for some 67,000 residents in this area.

This particular location will involve the transportation of thousands of school children a distance over mountain highways of up to 100 miles in order for them to enjoy the Centennial train, which their parents, as taxpayers have contributed to.

In view of the fact, that we have been informed that no change in arrangements for the Centennial trains schedule can be made at this late date, I hope you can convince the government to take a second look at the schedule for the tattoo train to bring it into the Kootenays.

As a result of that letter and of other correspondence which I received from various persons in Kootenay West I asked the following question in the house on February 6:

I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Defence based on representations from Kootenay West and Kootenay East. Can the minister inform the house why the Canadian armed forces tattoo "Red Train" will not appear in any place in the Kootenays, British Columbia, during centennial year?

At that time, Mr. Speaker, you kindly informed me that this was not the type of question which should be asked at that time. I am therefore taking this opportunity to bring this matter to the attention of the Associate Minister of National Defence and I shall listen with interest to his reply to my plea.

Hon. Leo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the tattoo itinerary was planned with a great deal of care, bearing in mind that it was intended to take the spectacle to as wide a cross section of the populace as possible. However, from the outset this planning was dominated by a series of rigid criteria, the more significant ones being as follows:

First, the availability of indoor performance facilities from one end of the country to the other at a time of year when arenas were still normally involved with various hockey schedules.

Second, certain anchor dates requiring the tattoo to be in given locations at specified times of year; for example, Expo '67, the C.N.E., and Ottawa as the federal capital.

Third, a mandatory release date for the trains, since the railways required much of the rolling stock used by the tattoo for other purposes before the end of June, 1967.

Fourth, recognition of the fact that, whilst revenue from the tattoo was not necessarily the guiding principle in selecting out of the way performance centres, costs had to be kept continually in mind and responsible judgments reached on the areas in which it would not be economically feasible to appear.

Add to these criteria the fact that there was little more than a six-month period within which to complete the entire project and it will be readily appreciated that there were many deserving areas in which the tattoo could not be presented. The Kootenays happens to be one of these places.

In planning tattoo appearances with the province of British Columbia, Victoria and Vancouver were naturally chosen. Prince George and Kelowna were selected as two additional locations, but only after such factors as time, communications, performance facilities and their availability, geographical situation, and population had been carefully considered. Early in the planning phase these choices were submitted to and approved by the British Columbia centennial committee, which recognized the factors influencing the selection.

The itinerary was therefore approved. It is not considered possible at this time to re-examine the question without jeopardizing the whole program. At the same time, Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the hon. member that this matter will again be referred to the officials, and if I am given any encouragement I will certainly communicate with the hon. member. I will try to do my best to see whether we can accommodate the Kootenays.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.29 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, February 10, 1967

The house met at 11 a.m.

HATE LITERATURE

ESTABLISHMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENTS

On the order: Government notice of motion:

February 8—The Minister of Public Works—The following proposed motion:—That this house do unite with the Senate in the appointment of a special joint committee to study and report upon amendments to the Criminal Code relating to the dissemination of varieties of "hate propaganda" in Canada as set out in Bill S-49, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code";

That 12 members of the House of Commons, to be designated by this house at a later date, be members of the said committee; and that standing order 67(1) be suspended in relation thereto;

That the committee have the power to call for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee; and

That a message be sent to the Senate informing that house that the House of Commons do unite with the Senate for the above purposes.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of standing order 21, this government notice of motion stands transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders at the next sitting of the house.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF DEPARTMENTAL REPORT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

On the order: Government notice of motion:

February 8—Minister of Public Works—The following proposed motion:—That the report of the Department of External Affairs tabled on January 28, 1966, be referred to the standing committee on external affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of standing order 21 this government notice of motion stands transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders at the next sitting of the house.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENTS TO FILL VACANCIES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the Prime Minister a question in regard to the vice president of the C.B.C., and his answer read in part, as recorded at page 12829 of Hansard:

The vice president resigned the other day. Steps are being taken with a view to filling that particular post. I believe these matters were being considered last night at a meeting of the board of directors.

Is the Prime Minister in a position to add anything further to the answer he gave yesterday?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I understand that the management of the C.B.C. and the board of directors are taking steps by readjustment of duties within the corporation to fill the vacant position.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, is it not a fact that the vice president is appointed by the governor in council, and that the board of directors have nothing to say with respect thereto? Also, Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister is answering will he inform the house whether he expressed himself to this effect regarding the president a few days ago, as stated in one of today's newspapers, that "we have stopped looking for a president for we have found one." Is that statement correct? Has the voyage of discovery for a president of the C.B.C. been consummated with success?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the right hon. gentleman got that statement or what he is quoting from, or indeed whether it is a quotation, but if it is a quotation it is entirely false.

Mr. Diefenbaker: False? Fine.

[Later:]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, a moment ago the Prime Minister cast some doubt on a quotation I gave. I did not have it before me at that time. Now I should like to draw it to his attention and ask the question again. It appears in the Globe and Mail of today's date. The quotation is as follows:

Rumours persist that Mayor Moore will be asked to take one of the two top posts—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the right hon. gentleman, but he knows there is a rule which I try to enforce that questions shall not be prefaced by the reading of telegrams and newspaper articles. There also is a rule that a member should not ask for confirmation of the accuracy of a press statement. I am sure the hon. gentleman can find some way in which to ask the question without infringing the two rules I have mentioned.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is far removed from my thinking that I would do anything like that. If the Prime Minister doubts the quotation I suggest that he read the front page of the supplement. I should like to ask him this question. Did he say to a group of Canadian international affairs scholars at a private session last week:

We have stopped looking for a president. We have found one.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker; it is still unfounded. I might add that there are some strange rumours appearing in the Globe and Mail these days.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am surprised that you bite the hand that feeds you.

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF TELEVISION SERVICE IN KOOTENAY WEST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State. In view of the recommendation of the Board of Broadcast Governors that the C.B.C. television network should be extended to the Northwest Territories and to three points in western Newfoundland, would the minister mind informing the C.B.C. that residents in certain considerable areas of Kootenay West are also looking forward to enjoying C.B.C. television services?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is submitting a representation. That is not a question.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

TRADE

MIDDLE EAST—REPORTED BOYCOTT OF CANADIAN EXPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. What is the government doing in regard to the boycott of certain Canadian exports to the Middle East, which is reported to have been precipitated by actions of the Arab countries?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the best I can do is take this question as notice. I have not heard of this specific instance.

FINANCE

DIVIDEND PAYMENTS BY CANADIAN SUBSIDIARIES OF U.S. COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is it a fact that wholly owned subsidiaries of United States firms in Canada have increased payment of dividends to their parent companies in the United States, and are thus greatly worsening our balance of payments problem with the United States?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I presume that question was precipitated by a story in the business section of the Globe and Mail this morning, and I anticipated it. The period reported on is prior to the application of the United States direct investment guide lines to Canada, and before the introduction of our own program of guiding principles.

The United States survey covering transactions of United States parents and their Canadian subsidiaries showed a somewhat larger proportion of profits paid out as dividends in 1965 as compared to 1964. However, the rate of dividend payment as reported at 47.6 per cent of the profits in 1965 was not extraordinarily large. On the other hand a substantial volume of financing continued to flow from the United States parents to their Canadian affiliates.

Careful attention is being given to any possible effects of the United States guide lines on Canadian companies and, as I stated previously, any shifts in financing arrangements between Canadian subsidiaries and their United States parents have not prevented the realization in Canada during 1965 and again in 1966 of substantially larger capital expansion programs. We are, however, keeping this matter under closer review.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the minister wish to revert to motions?

Mr. Winters: No, thank you.

TRANSPORT

PAYMENT OF MUNICIPAL TAXES BY RAILWAY COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Margaret Rideout (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Now that the transportation bill has received royal assent, has the minister anything to report concerning what the railways intend to do about municipal taxation?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I thank the hon. lady for giving me notice of her question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: I must say that one would not have to be very discerning to guess that such a question would be asked this morning.

The government has authorized the Canadian National Railways to pay grants in lieu of taxes as though the bill had passed before January 1. That is in respect of the year 1967. Last night I received a telegram from the president of the C.P.R. which sets out their position. Since the telegram is very brief, perhaps I might read it. I could paraphrase it, but I would rather read it. Also I would be glad to table it, if that should be the wish of the house. It reads as follows:

> On learning of royal assent to the national transportation bill I am sending this message so that you may inform parliament that Canadian Pacific will carry out its proposals as set out in my letter to you of August 29 1966 regarding municipal taxation as though the national transport bill had become law before the end of 1966.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for answering the question which I had planted twice previously. Now I should like to ask him what is the position with regard to the National Harbours Board, which also is of concern to municipalities.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman would like to put that question say next Friday, I think I might be in a better position to answer it.

Mr. McCleave: Will the minister guarantee that he will not feed it to one of his followers on that side of the house?

Mr. Pickersgill: I will undertake, sir, that I will not feed it to Moby Joe.

Mrs. Rideout: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I should like to inform the hon. member for Halifax that as a member of the transportation committee I missed very few of its meetings, as I am sure my record will indicate. In addition, I attended a meeting of representatives from all across Canada concerned with this very matter, which was held in the minister's office. I assure the hon. member that this question was not planted, sir.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, may I offer my apologies to "Moby Marg".

REPORTED SURCHARGE ON CARGOES FROM JAPAN TO VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether we should infer from the minister's comment that he feels the hon. members on his side are as dead as Moby Joe.

I actually rose to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he had received a telegram from the Vancouver merchants exchange pointing out that Japanese shippers are adding a 15 per cent surcharge on all cargoes shipped from Japan to Vancouver, and whether the minister will make representations to the government of Japan in this regard.

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am aware of this fact, and I did receive the telegram. We in turn sent a telegram protesting this action. The National Harbours Board also sent a telegram. I learned from the National Harbours Board just before coming to the house that this contemplated action has been deferred until March 1.

Mr. Fulton: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Am I right to assume that further representations and discussions will be immediately instituted and will take place between now and March 1.

Mr. Winters: Yes, this is being done, and the deferment was arranged to provide an opportunity for consultation.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL DEFENCE

AMOUNT OF MONEY AVAILABLE FOR PURCHASE OF EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Now that it has been shown that his policy is providing less rather than more money for the purchase of defence equipment, will he instruct his propaganda agents to cease attempting to mislead the public?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Certainly the question as framed is out of order.

PRINCE ALBERT, SASK.—REPORTED INTENTION TO CLOSE RADAR LABORATORY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence a question which will not require the assistance of propaganda agents to be answered. My question relates to the Prince Albert radar laboratory, commonly known as "PARL". I received an indication of the intention to close this facility just before coming into the house. Will the minister indicate whether representations will be acceptable to the government from the city council of Prince Albert, the chamber of commerce and scientific bodies to the effect that the work being done by this institution has not been completed? I am wondering whether it is merely coincidental that this particular station is to be closed down at this time.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, we naturally would welcome representations from any group of individuals, either civic or scientific. I can assure my hon. friend that this station was not scheduled for closing without a great deal of thought. As a matter of fact it was recommended for closing a year ago, but we kept it in operation for an extra year in an effort to determine whether some group in the country such as a university would take over some of the functions previously carried out by the Defence Research Board. If the right hon. gentleman can persuade any group or educational institution in this country to assume responsibility for this station he will receive every co-operation of the Department of National Defence in making the equipment available, and in every other way possible. I believe that would be a good solution, but so far we have not been able to find sufficient interest on the part of a responsible organization to make this kind of transition possible.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, will the minister indicate whether the University of Saskatchewan, which has a high reputation for scientific research, has been consulted in this connection? Has President Spinks been consulted? He is known to the officials of the Department of National Defence for his outstanding work. Perhaps the minister will also indicate whether the government would continue to pay the 14 officers and technical personnel connected with that station if the University of Saskatchewan were prepared to operate it.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I suspect that the problem is really financial. I understand there have been consultations with the university. As a matter of fact it is because some of the university students are doing work there this spring that we are keeping it in operation for some additional period. We are doing this in order that they may complete the projects they have under way at the present time. I think if some reasonable method of financing could be worked out at the university level, either there or in co-operation with other universities, we would be glad to receive any submissions they might care to make. But it has been decided by the Defence Research Board that the continued operation by our department is not justified, with respect to the actual need for it at this time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would ask the minister, are there any more of these radar institutions across Canada? If so, are they being kept open? Also, in view of the fact that the work has to do with the aurora borealis, there must be further scientific research that could take place, as the minister suggested, and does he not think this work might be carried out by the universities?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the right hon. gentleman and the Minister of National Defence that perhaps we are going a little too far in the consideration of this matter. Perhaps it is urgent, but I do not think we should engage in much more discussion of the subject.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I simply point out that until I received a notice this morning, as member for that constituency, there was never a word said to me by the minister or the department.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman knows that I am always willing to have his advice; but in this case the decision was really made by those responsible for scientific endeavour and it was on their advice that the recommendation was accepted. No one would know better than my right hon. friend—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION RESPECTING ABOLITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Solicitor General. Yesterday in response to a question put to him by the Leader of the Opposition the Solicitor General referred to a study that is being made of the Criminal Code for possible amendment. May I ask the minister whether a decision has yet been made by the government to include in any amendments to the Criminal Code the abolition of capital punishment?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to the answers I have given on previous occasions.

EDUCATION

UNITED KINGDOM—INCREASED UNIVERSITY FEES FOR OVERSEAS STUDENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the right hon. Prime Minister. Having regard to the recent announcement by the British government substantially increasing university fees for overseas students, could the Prime Minister tell us whether our government has been in contact with the government of the United Kingdom with regard to this serious problem?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am wondering whether the question is so urgent that it could not be placed on the order paper.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

PROHIBITION BY U.S. COURT OF CANCER VACCINE DISTRIBUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the attention of the department been drawn to a report that a temporary United States federal court order has ended the distribution of a controversial cancer vaccine and that Canadian residents—one in particular in Ladysmith is mentioned—are claiming that this order is a death sentence to them? Will the minister investigate the situation with a view to determining the reasons for this order?

Mrs. Margaret Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will bring this matter to the attention of the minister.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

LIMITATION ON BLOWING OF WHISTLE ON CENTENNIAL TRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Walker (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Will the minister inform this house whether transport board regulations limit to once a day the blowing of the unique "O Canada" musical whistle on the centennial train?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Walker: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. To whom should I appeal in an endeavour to allow the centennial train to blow its popular and melodious tone more frequently than once a day on its tour across Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may appeal to the Minister of Transport, but he cannot do so now.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address my question to the Secretary of State. Inasmuch as lotteries are illegal in Canada it is to be presumed that the C.B.C. does not encourage them. However, hockey pools are being operated throughout Ontario, and the other day the C.B.C. gave the wrong time for the last goal scored. May I ask the Secretary of State to provide the news department of the C.B.C. with another colour set so that members of that department can watch the game and get the exact split second of the goals for the benefit of the hockey pools?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CRIMINAL CODE

POSSIBLE AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO FAMILY PLANNING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General with respect to amendments to the Criminal Code. I should like to ask him whether the recommendations of the health and welfare committee with respect to family planning will be included in the amendments to the Criminal Code which will be dealt with in the next session.

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will bring this question to the attention of the Minister of Justice.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

HALIFAX—COMMUNICATION FROM DOCKYARD LABOUR COUNCIL RESPECTING WAGE NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Associate Minister of National Defence I wonder if I may ask the minister whether his colleague has discussed with him the recent lengthy communication received from the dockyard trades and labour council in Halifax with regard to wage negotiations.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): No, he has not, Mr. Speaker. I am sure that he will take note of this question and communicate with my hon. friend.

EXPO '67

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE IN FINDING HOTEL ROOMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roger-E. Régimbal (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is responsible for Expo. Will the minister use his good offices to help me find 2,000 hotel rooms in Montreal during the month of June?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

POWER

ESTABLISHMENT OF RESEARCH INSTITUTE BY HYDRO QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, last Tuesday I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources a question with regard to the research establishment proposed by Hydro Quebec. Can he or the Minister of Industry furnish me with a reply now?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I was not in the house when the hon. member for Kamloops asked about the announcement made by the premier of Quebec regarding the proposal to establish in that province a very large research facility to be put up by Quebec and operated by Quebec Hydro. The federal government, through the National Research Council, has recognized the importance of increasing research into high tension transmission of electricity, and for some time has been discussing with Quebec Hydro a co-operative arrangement. We are pursuing these discussions and hope to co-operate effectively in this project.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether we can attach some special significance to this with respect to the development of a national transmission grid. Will this be one of the matters specifically discussed between the National Research Council and Quebec Hydro with respect to this research?

Mr. Drury: Not directly, Mr. Speaker. The purpose of the research facility is not to discover and provide solutions for problems relating to the establishment of the grid and the transmission of high voltage electricity. Obviously if some of the problems related to large grids and to these kinds of transmissions can be solved it is more likely to lead to the successful introduction of a national and international grid.

COLUMBIA RIVER—REPORT BY CANADIAN MEMBER OF JOINT ENGINEERING BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has the minister received a recent report from the Canadian representative on the joint engineering board regarding the Columbia river

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that it is not a matter of urgency whether or not the minister has received a report.

THE BUDGET

ADDITIONAL FINANCIAL MEASURES OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Thursday, February 9, consideration of the motion of Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. Speaker: It has been mentioned to me that the hon. member for Kootenay West called it ten o'clock last evening. Because of this I suggest to hon. members that he should be called first today if he wishes to take part in the debate. Does the hon. member intend to speak this morning, or did he complete his speech yesterday at ten o'clock?

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): No, Mr. Speaker, I wish to return to the debate for a particular purpose and reason. First of all I want to thank the minister for his prompt replies to various matters which I brought to his attention with respect to taxation and so on. May I say that the minister, who is so delectable socially, unfortunately considers himself financially impregnable when it comes to the question of budgets.

Before I continue I should like to mention that after having spoken to a number of people in the press gallery I discovered that their feelings were hurt when they were referred to as vultures. I told one member this morning that I would correct that. I believe it is safe to say that the press gallery represents two doves, and the rest of the press are hawks.

Last Monday the hon. member for Kootenay East, who is parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Transport, delivered an amazing speech both in my view and in the view of the members of this group and of other hon. members in the house. His speech dumbfounded hon. members on all sides of the house regardless of party. The record will indicate that the great majority of members of all parties objected to his thesis, his arguments and his presentation. I give him full credit for his willingness to swim against the tide of public opinion, of experience and of the wishes of the government, as well as against the wishes of farm and labour organizations, credit unions, and professional teachers and women's organizations in Canada.

These wishes have been clearly expressed to various governments since 1946. I must say that in this age of "me too-ism" it is refreshing to see a man get up and say something which he knows is unpopular with a large majority of the Canadian people, and I give credit for that to the hon. member for Kootenay East. However, I must say that it was a rather trying and sad experience for me to listen to an hon. member who has been the president of a trade union, and connected with movements of this type in his own constituency, advance the arguments of the chamber of commerce for the taxation of co-operatives and credit unions. I am sure he would not have done that were he not convinced that his argument was sound and that this was the right thing to do. I give him credit for that also.

I must say that the principles of co-operation are eternal. As a matter of fact I would not be here today if there had not been some measure of co-operation in my connection some years ago.

Mr. Pepin: Explain.

Mr. Herridge: I do wish to bring to the attention of hon. members the fact that I am not speaking from an academic point of view. I have been in very close association with co-operatives and credit unions for the greater part of my life, because these organizations are very strong in the constituency which I have the honour to represent. In association with Lord Brockway's brother in law I formed one of the first consumer co-operatives in the interior of British Columbia prior to the first world war. I was active in the organization of the first fruit growers co-operative exchange on the Arrow lakes. I was also the representative of the Kootenays to the B.C. Fruit Growers Association when we organized the associated growers of British Columbia, and then in 1942 I was one of five persons who met together to arrange for the organization of the Trail credit union which now has nearly $7 million in assets. I might say that since that time branches of the credit union have been formed all over the Kootenays, and in Kootenay West their total assets exceed $15 million. This is all the result of self help, of working together and mutual aid.

• (11:40 a.m.)

The co-operative societies and credit unions in Kootenay West have become an integral part of the economic life of the country. In my opinion any interference with their operations or changes in our taxation laws would have a serious effect on the lives of many residents of the area and, in some cases, the whole community.

Take for instance the transportation co-operatives. These, designed for a specific service, have been built up out of dire necessity for a cheap and reliable method of transporting the men employed at the Trail smelter who reside in the outlying communities of Rossland, Castlegar and Fruitvale to and from their work each day. At Rossland, out of a population of some 4,000, upwards of 1,000 are members of the transportation society and depend upon it as a means of getting to and from the source of their livelihood. In effect, the society is secondary only in importance of the job itself.

For the past 35 years, Mr. Speaker, these people have been doing their own transportation business in the co-operative way, that is at cost. Like every genuine co-operative, they have made a practice of distributing surplus earnings back to the members at each year's end. The resulting savings in the hands of members, amounting to thousands of dollars, have meant more purchasing power for other necessities of life, and to this extent all other business establishments in town have benefited, to say nothing of the effect a cheap transportation system has had in attracting new residents to the community. What is true of Rossland is equally true of the other communities surrounding Trail, except as to numbers.

Another form of co-operative endeavour which has grown out of necessity in this West Kootenay area is the producer farm co-operatives. Up and down the fertile valleys of the Arrow lakes, the Slocan valley, the Kootenay lake area and the wider spaces of the Creston valley are scattered some thousands of large, small and medium sized ranches and farm homes. Fruit growing, cattle and dairying, poultry ranching, seed and feed growing are all practised on varying scales. Bumper crops can be and are being raised in each and all of these lines of farm industry, but the No. 1 problem of the farmer in this, as in many other parts of the country, has always been to find a profitable market for his product.

For years the fruit grower and poultryman, as well as other classes, were at the mercy of the monopolistic packing houses and trading concerns, and the consequence was that the farmer had to accept such prices for his product as were dictated to him. I had that personal experience during the depression years, and I expect some of the members on my right have had that experience also. Slowly and painfully the farmer learned that the only hope of improving his condition was by co-operating with his neighbour in marketing products of a similar nature. In the same way that the industrial worker learned that in unity there is strength and that the only hope of improving conditions in the shop and factory was by bargaining collectively, so the farmer came to realize that in order to improve his standard of living he too would have to bargain collectively through his producer co-operative.

Thus the great wheat pools, the fruit growers co-operatives, the egg and poultry producers associations, are simply the primary producers' systems of collective bargaining for their members. The success of these forms of co-operatives can be measured in the increasing returns that the members have secured from the sale of their products, and naturally the increased prosperity of the members has resulted in increased prosperity for the different communities in which the members reside or in which they do their business transactions.

It is difficult to estimate the number of members of such organizations in this West Kootenay country of ours, but a rough guess would put it at somewhere between 2,000 and 3,000. If we supposed that through their producer co-operatives these members have increased their net incomes by only $100 each per year, the immediate effect would be an increase in spending power in the hands of these people of some $300,000. A further note in this regard is that as the incomes of the individual members of such co-operatives reach a higher standard, more of them are brought within the scope of the Income Tax Act on individual earnings.

A third branch of co-operative activity which is to be found in operation in this area, although not so extensively as the other two, is the consumer type of co-operative. Now, Mr. Speaker, instead of a few special groups being the recipients of government favours, as implied by the hon. member for Kootenay East the operations of these groups have brought benefits to large sections of our part of the country, even to whole communities, and any interference with the smooth operation of such benefit-conferring organizations would be a calamity indeed.

Since 1943 we have had many branches of credit unions organized throughout the district with an approximate capital of $15 million, to which a large number of the Cominco employees belong. Although some members suggested that a member of Cominco might have written the hon. member's speech, I am quite sure that anyone reading the hon. member's speech in Hansard would absolve the company of its authorship. I believe the hon. member made it on his own because he believed in what he was saying.

In reply to the hon. member for Kootenay East I wish to point out that co-operatives and credit unions are, first, a source of personal education. Co-operation is based primarily on self help. It requires each one, no matter how humble he may be, to look after his own affairs, to become accustomed to rely on himself rather than on a middle man or on the state. Each co-operator, being personally engaged in a co-operative association, is naturally spurred on to develop his own personality that he may better face his responsibilities. Co-operatives and credit unions are a movement for family welfare. This movement has made it a general rule to take the family or the household as a constituent unit.

I am just outlining these few reasons to give an idea of the philosophy behind the co-operative movement which has done so much for the development of our country. The co-operative movement is not directed to the individual alone but as integrated in a family group. Preoccupied with family needs and aiming at satisfying these, it gives the family in economic life its natural role of a social cell, a role of which individualism has taken little consideration.

Then again, co-operatives and credit unions are a means of civic and social education. It is not necessary to elaborate further to realize that the practices of co-operatives and credit unions create among people habits of understanding, mutual help, concerted action and so on, thus supplying an efficient remedy for those social evils which are individualism, class struggle, incomprehension, etc. Co-operatives and credit unions also make it a duty to perform social work whenever they can. I could give a number of instances in which they have gone beyond their actual line of duty to perform services for the community as a whole.

Co-operatives and credit unions give a first hand training in democratic principles and methods. Each co-operative or credit union is a miniature democracy. Each co-operative and credit union encourages the co-operator to do his democratic duty better in his co-operative association, so he is then better trained to accomplish this in his political life.

Co-operatives and credit unions are a school for national unity. Co-operators, non-denominational, neutral to political and racial questions, all learn in their co-operative how to work together in spite of their religions or political divergences and in spite of their ethnic differences. I have had personal experience with this situation because I have met members of all political parties in this movement. I want to say that, strangely enough, in the constituency which I have the honour to represent the movers of the co-operative movement, historically from 1906, happen to have been a group of old country Tories who were very interested in building the co-operative movement and who saw its advantages. They were supported wholeheartedly by other persons who believed in this principle.

Co-operatives and credit unions are a factor for peace. The fundamental principle of the movement is the opposite to that of fighting and competition which results in war. Co-operatives give men a sense of fraternity and solidarity. As I say, this is the result of their working together and their better understanding of one another.

While I cannot take time to quote at length from the speech made by the hon. member for Kootenay East in his plea for the taxation of co-operatives and credit unions, I do wish to quote one or two of the choicer tidbits. They are found at page 12705 of Hansard of February 6:

> The co-operative movement, as it chooses to be called, is nothing more nor less than corporate enterprise enjoying the benefits of $3 billion worth of business each year in Canada. Co-operatives have become a corporate colossus in competitive enterprise, but with a difference. Co-operative profits are almost completely exempt from income tax.

Then at page 12710 we find the following:

> On the avenue of fertilizer production involving Cominco and Western Co-operative Fertilizers Ltd. there appears to me to be a head-on encounter.

At this point I want to mention that Cominco, as a company, has been very interested in the formation of co-operatives in the district, principally the transportation co-operatives and credit unions. They have carried on community work and I think it is quite fair to say that under the circumstances in which we live today, Cominco is known as a very decent employer involved in the communities in which the company operates. I give them credit for that, though I quite often differ with their policies and actions.

On page 12710 the hon. member also said:

> The first year Western Fertilizer came into production they took over 25 per cent of Cominco's market on the prairies. The sales pitch was to instruct their co-operative controlled retail outlets to quote the going price but offer a patronage refund at the end of the fiscal year.

In connection with the hon. member's remarks with respect to Cominco I must quote from Hansard of February 6, at page 12709. The hon. member for Kootenay East said:

> The assumption that co-operatives hold down prices, too, is a completely erroneous one. Consumer co-operatives simply do not undercut prices, but offer their patrons a nebulous patronage refund which is paid in cash only if the co-operative does not entertain expansionist ambitions. Producer co-operatives such as Western Co-operative Fertilizers Limited, after they got into production, instructed their retail outlets to meet the going price and to promise a patronage refund. Such refund, made possible by the avoidance of income tax and current taxes, is a legacy of the co-operative privileges.

To inform the house I wish to quote information supplied to me by the Co-operative Union of Canada with respect to fertilizers on the prairies. This is the information I am given:

> Up to about three years ago Cominco and the Co-ops had a contract whereby Cominco supplied the Co-ops with fertilizer. This contract was renegotiated annually. Federated Co-ops began construction of its own fertilizer plant in Calgary. One year before this plant was to go into operation Cominco informed the Co-ops that they would only sign a ten year contract. As a result the Co-ops were forced to go on to the open market for their fertilizer supplies for that year, and it caused them a considerable amount of trouble.
> Prior to the opening of the Co-op fertilizer plant in Calgary the price of fertilizer varied from $115 to $145 a ton. After the Co-op plant went into operation the price dropped to $99.50 a ton.

The price went slightly above that in some instances. This has not hurt Cominco. I find, looking at the record, that Cominco sold 739,080 tons of fertilizer in 1964 and 754,550 tons of fertilizer in 1965. The information of the Co-operative Union of Canada shows that in these areas the co-operatives had been able to reduce the price of fertilizer to the farmers of western Canada.

To get this matter correct, Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member understands the situation as it exists with respect to taxation. I do not think he understands the argument he puts forward in that respect. A co-operative pays all the taxes any other company pays. It pays property taxes, taxes on dividends, on share capital, on general reserves, yes and on business done with non-members, too. A co-operative, however, does not pay tax on what it saves the members. Any business can cut down its earnings by returning profits to the customers, and reduce its income tax in this way. Only co-operatives do this as a matter of basic policy, and that is the whole explanation of taxation of co-operatives.

I wonder if the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development would support the argument put forward by the hon. member for Kootenay East. I am informed that the minister is a strong supporter of co-operatives among Indians and Eskimos, and that today in the Canadian Arctic there are 22 co-operatives and two credit unions carrying on business and helping improve the economy of their respective regions. This is according to a staff member of the co-operative development section of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

I wonder if the Minister of Agriculture would agree with the hon. member's views. The Minister of Agriculture is a strong supporter of the co-operative movement. Recently he returned from a trip to the Caribbean during which he gave speeches on the co-operative movement as it relates to marketing in agriculture.

Instead of listening to the plea of the hon. member for Kootenay East I suggest the government would be well advised to listen to the representations of the co-operative movement, the farmers' and labour organizations, the consumer organizations, teachers and professional organizations and, in effect, the vast majority of the Canadian people. As the result of experience throughout the years the government would be wise indeed to promote this form of mutual aid and self help, this business of helping yourself rather than depending on somebody else.

Finally, consider the recommendations to the house ways and means committee of the United States congress. This study, prepared by the house small business committee following a year's investigation as well as consideration of a treasury department report on the tax advantages which co-operatives enjoy, otherwise gave co-operatives a clean bill of health and extended no support whatever to those who have sought to curb this form of business enterprise. The house small business committee, in urging a strengthening and continuing support of co-operatives, emphasized that:

—the growing trend of economic concentration into large scale organizations may well intensify the abnormal conditions that led originally to the co-operative movement.

Admitting that tax exempt co-operatives may have some advantage over competitive businesses in the same field, to the extent that income available for dividend payments and accumulated in reserve escapes federal taxation, the committee sought to justify the advantage after lengthy hearings. It was said:

Since the apparent intent of congress in levying taxes has been to levy on ability to pay, it does not appear to be reasonable or equitable to attempt to levy a tax on a co-operative for income which does not belong to it, nor to levy a tax for which it has no funds to pay.

For the alleged preference enjoyed by co-operatives in obtaining loans, a charge which has been made frequently before congressional committees, the house group said there is "no evidence" to show that a type of preferential treatment has been granted. Records of all government lending agencies show that thousands of private companies have enjoyed the same benefits as co-operatives, it was stated, and substantial evidence was claimed to show that:

—many of the strongest opponents of co-operatives are themselves members of such organizations—

The report disclosed that one opposing industry group has organized and operates one of the largest co-operative insurance companies. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, the committee presented this view to congress:

The theory that the co-operative movement is seriously endangering other economic forms of business operating can be utterly disregarded in as much as the volume of business enjoyed by co-operatives and their degree of participation in the national income is very nominal.

That report was made after a study of the tax laws in the United States, and after considering co-operatives and credit unions, and its conclusions differ from those of the hon. member. This committee was composed of Republicans and Democrats, members from the north as well as from south, and this was their attitude toward the taxation of co-operatives and credit unions in the United States. It was a complete contradiction of the attitude taken by the hon. member for Kootenay East. I trust that after reading my speech the hon. member for Kootenay East may become converted.

• (12 noon)

Now I wish to bring to the minister's attention three matters which have been drawn to my notice throughout the years. The first concerns travelling expenses allowed as deductions for income tax purposes to workers who have to travel considerable distances to and from their employment. In my own constituency workers often have to travel between 20 and 40 miles to their places of employment, while at the same time I have personal knowledge of salesmen travelling 200 miles to sell a few dollars worth of material to a store, with expenses deductible. I hope the minister will take this opportunity to improve the situation in which these people find themselves.

Then there is the question of the taxation of centennial projects. As the minister knows, a museum is being built in Rossland as a centennial project. It is being built with federal funds, provincial funds and community and voluntary donations. At the same time the people concerned are required to pay sales tax on materials used. To me it seems illogical to ask that sales tax be paid in connection with centennial projects, particularly when those projects are made possible by governmental grants and voluntary effort. To encourage participation in these projects, the federal dollar per capita grant was established. Now to offer this grant with one hand and reclaim part or all of it with the other is to defeat the original purpose of the grant. Since the grants are on a per capita basis regardless of the magnitude of the projects, it is conceivable that in the extreme the complete grant might have to be returned as sales tax.

One community could decide to sponsor the building of a park with spacious green lawns and pleasant planting areas. This type of project would not be faced with very much sales tax. But a project consisting solely of a building would be faced with the dilemma of having to pay back anything from 25 per cent to 100 per cent of the federal grant involved. I urge that further consideration be given to this situation.

Finally, I have received a good many letters from persons generally well on in years complaining about the situation with respect to the perpetual bonds issued in 1936. Many of these bonds were purchased with the idea that they would provide some security against retirement and an income when earning power had decreased. I urge the government to consider raising the interest on these bonds from 3 per cent to 5 per cent. I am not fully informed on the amount issued but I understand that the amount involved is not large. I urge the minister to give consideration to correcting what appears to many of us to be an unnecessary injustice to the persons involved as a result of the government's decision to continue these bonds at the present 3 per cent rate.

That is all I have to say at this time. I hope after looking at the minister that possibly we shall get a favourable response later in this debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, we are studying for the fifth day the mini-budget brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp). The main provisions of that posthumous birth, since the mini-budget came nine months after the main budget of March 1966, boil down to this: starting on January 1, 1967 the maximum personal income tax deduction for old age security is increased from $120 to $240 per year and the sales tax is increased from 11 to 12 per cent.

The income tax increase for old age security applies to one third of the taxpayers with higher incomes, that is 2,300,000 out of 6,500,000.

The sales tax increase will not apply to building materials or to production machinery and equipment. The hike in the sales tax will lead to a price increase, but will not mean more than a one-point boost in the cost of living.

The minister foresees a $340 million deficit for this fiscal year, as compared with one of $150 million forecast by him last March.

The present rate of economic growth is such that expansion can continue without inflation.

Salary and price increases are still excessive, but tend to become moderate.

Those are, sir, the major points that come out of this mini-budget. If the main budget of March 1966 had not made Canadians too enthusiastic, this mini-budget, in turn, deepens the frustration of millions of Canadians. I want to read to the house what Roland Charbonneau, editorial writer at the Sherbrooke Hebdo, has to say about this mini-budget, and I quote:

> This is further proof that Mr. Lester B. Pearson's Liberal government, and particularly his Minister of Finance, Mr. Mitchell Sharp, are incompetent in the field of public economy.
> [Mr. Herridge.]
> While increasing old age pensions by 40 per cent, he doubles the contributions of individuals so that the $120 maximum contribution to the Old Age Pension Fund is now set at $240.
>
> Sure, the manufacturers will pay the 1 per cent sales tax increase, but they will collect that, and more, by raising wholesale prices.
> And if we follow the sales pattern, once again we find that this additional tax burden falls upon the consumers' shoulders, the majority of whom earn small and modest incomes.
> It might be acceptable if the manufacturers and retailers did not go beyond this 1 per cent increase. But experience has shown that whenever the tax is raised on a particular product, the retail price is increased a lot more.

Those are the very sound comments of an editorial writer for the Sherbrooke Hebdo.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, in the eyes of knowledgeable Canadians, this mini-budget certainly did not provide dynamic and progressive measures to solve the various economic and industrial problems of our country.

• (12:10 p.m.)

Just read, for instance, several warnings, and I quote this one given early last January by Mr. R. B. MacPherson, economist with DuPont of Canada:

> The Canadian economy is heading toward a period of recession that will reach its peak between the latter half of 1968 and 1970.

In addition, here is the statement of a man who, for several years, has not feared to express himself on Canadian problems, whose judgment has proved sound, far more sound than the measures we are offered by the Minister of Finance in his budgets, since he has taken over that post. I am referring to Mr. A. T. Lambert, president of the Toronto-Dominion Bank.

Dealing with the need for a reasonable stability in prices, Mr. Lambert said the following in mid January 1967:

> This is an urgent problem and we cannot remain indifferent in the face of the level of inflation now reached. We cannot ignore either that this factor may have far-reaching consequences for the Canadian economy. Inflation darkens the economic future and if we fail to check it, we are in danger of bringing about a reaction which would have unpleasant effects for all Canadians.

Is it still necessary to emphasize the meaning of the brief submitted to the government a few days ago by the C.L.C.? This responsible, democratic and representative body gives fair and proper warnings to the federal government and to the Minister of Finance and I quote:

> The Canadian Labour Congress is concerned that the country may suffer increased unemployment and slip into the slow rate of growth and the high level of unemployment which struck the Canadian economy from 1957 to 1962.

The Canadian Labour Congress report also says:

> The rate of increase of the gross national product has diminished substantially. The number of housing starts is considerably lower as compared to 1965, and we have noted remarkable reductions in the sale of some durable consumer goods. Pundits of the business world anticipate a reduction in capital expenditures this year.

And the brief goes on:

> —the leaders of this great labour organization are calling on the federal government to refrain from imposing any general restrictive measure, either monetary or fiscal, "that would only accelerate the slackening of the economy", which seems to have begun already.

People often find exaggerated and too systematic the complaints and grievances presented in this house. I have the privilege to sit here as a free man without any political affiliation and I am here to represent all the electors, men and women, of the Sherbrooke constituency, the great majority of whom, namely about 72 per cent, belong to the class of average Canadian citizens, namely the labour class and office workers of small businesses. Now, the great majority of Canadians are included in that category. My electors, male and female, and millions of Canadians, and also people as well versed in the matter as the hon. Minister of Finance and Receiver General (Mr. Sharp), his advisers, his officials, criticize this government and warn it, because the government itself does not seem to know where it is going. All those people complain that the economic, financial and fiscal philosophy of this government is not distinguishable, no more than its economic direction, at the industrial level and in all the fields of social legislation.

It is a government which gropes along, with inconsistency and which does not prevent problems and events and which awakes only when a complaint has become very severe to apply what is quite quaintly described as a poultice policy. He waits until the abscess or the tumour has become enormous before he treats it or removes it.

That is a backward policy which Canada can well do without in these rather difficult times.

I say the Pearson government is irresponsible and hesitant. It is assertively irresponsible. It refuses to make decisions, or puts them off indefinitely. It intervenes when it is too late and then propounds disjointed and contradictory theories. This want of vigour and courage not only costs Canada millions of dollars but prolongs conflicts, worsens situations, spreads distrust and confusion and alienates Canadians from each other, one region from another and one culture from another.

The Pearson government is a past master at procrastinating; it is the very expression of mediocrity and platitude in Canada. There are thousands of examples, Mr. Speaker. What about its refusal and its hesitation to revise the Canadian constitution, a century old, and to create an official parliamentary committee to consider that matter, giving such a responsibility, not to individuals hidden in officialdom, but to legislators in this parliament who have the responsibility and the duty to guide Canada and all Canadians toward a better and more substantial future.

There is also this contempt on the part of the present central government for the rights and needs of the provinces, its timorous and discriminatory policy with respect to bilingualism and equality of the two cultures. The attitude of the government is that of the ostrich with regard to inflation, price increases, monopolies, the decrease in productivity accompanied by an increasing rate of unemployment. This is also reflected by its bourgeois selfishness in restricting credit, distributing national income in a way which is contrary to democratic principles, aggravating cases and areas of poverty by the implementation of pitiful and mathematical legislation.

One could also criticize the non-interference attitude of the government, waiting until disputes arise before taking action and legislating; added to this, we have a lack of foreign and national defence policy based on principles of simplicity, logic, practicality, efficiency and economy; we have a blind and haphazard commercial and industrial policy, where several of our industries are subject to pressures, oppression and even bankruptcy—and I want to mention, in passing, the difficult situation in which the Canadian textile and shoe industries are now placed—and the government has neglected important sectors of our economy, such as housing for small wage-earners, because even the recent proposals made by the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) do not meet the needs of the small wage-earner, the average Canadian, the head of a family.

If this government would add a touch of moral and social philosophy to its legislation, there would be criteria enabling the head of a family to raise and shelter his dependants decently, enjoying a reasonable 5 per cent rate of interest. But no. In spite of the representations made by a number of hon. members, the government goes on its cold-hearted way and once in a while introduces inadequate measures, which do not meet the real needs of the Canadian head of a family.

There is no moral, human and social philosophy in the elaboration of legislation. Indeed, only administrative concern can be found: uniformity, portability, state control, not to mention a heterogeneous cabinet, without cohesive thinking, evasive, obese, marking time, versatile. No doubt Canada lacks leadership and drive, as well as economic, fiscal, financial, commercial, constitutional and patriotic direction. The government should wake up and the centennial year should make it offer at last some means of action to the citizens of Canada and members of parliament, that is a parliamentary committee on constitutional and fiscal reform.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, in spite of the happy innitiatives taken by the premier of Ontario, Mr. Robarts, and the premier of Quebec, Mr. Daniel Johnson—these two provinces represent almost two thirds of the country's population—who call for a conference on the constitution in order to remodel it in a 1967 context, so that all Canadians might close their ranks, work toward the development of this country with a feeling of brotherhood and stop bickering on discussing misunderstandings and imprecisions of the constitution, the federal government is displaying tremendous irresponsibility.

It should be severely blamed for refusing—and this is the position taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) in this house since January 18 last—notwithstanding numerous requests, to the members of the house, to the legislators in this parliament, an opportunity to meet, to trust each other's goodwill and intelligence, in order that we might, in fact, formulate precisely, according to the responsibility we hold from the Canadian people, a renovated Canadian constitution, modernized and amended according to the aspirations of Canadians in 1967.

That is proof of the Prime Minister's weakness and faint-heartedness, for he refuses to believe in the good faith expressed not only by hon. members but also by the premiers of the two largest provinces which have more than two thirds of the population of Canada.

We have been needing a constitutional court for a long time but this government refuses to set one up to settle our problems as is done in other countries. I shall bring this up again when the discussion bears solely on this subject and I urge hon. members to study the operation of the constitutional courts in Switzerland, for instance, or in Western Germany. In so doing, hon. members will realize that such a thing is not impossible since it really exists. Members of the constitutional court of Switzerland are not appointed unilaterally, as are the justices of the Supreme Court of Canada which, as it now stands, is inappropriate to solve our constitutional problems. The constitutional court in Switzerland is made up of representatives of the federal legislature and of representatives the Assembly of the cantons, which is the equivalent of our provincial legislatures. Such things are possible and they have been in existence for a long time, in fact, since the constitutional revision in Switzerland many years ago. Why, then, try to run a country by marking time, by playing blind-man's buff, seeking blindly, without finding it, a solution to our problems, letting the country seek its future right and left, in a perpetual see-saw, when energy and enthusiasm should be shown to finally make Canada the most beautiful country in the world, a dynamic country? We have all the possibilities, but the present government refuses to give us the necessary means to enable all Canadians to work hand in hand to make this a dynamic country, a country of brotherhood.

Why is there so much misunderstanding from Halifax to Vancouver? Why are so many Canadians living on such a vast territory, separated by such distances? It is because our present government refuses us the necessary framework and policies to bring all Canadians together, to start the flow of a geyser of brotherhood, friendship and co-operation which our country needs so much to make a future for itself.

Reference was made to an organization which would control prices, profits, combines and wage readjustments. It is too bad, Mr. Speaker, but the people who sit on the government side of the house, here in Ottawa—since the federal authorities want to have such a leading role to play in the direction and orientation of our national economy—will have to assume their responsibilities in the economic field. A democratic policy will have to be established, a democratic policy regarding distribution of national income and, at certain times, the government will have to hurt certain categories of citizens getting as rich as Croesus, here in Canada, while millions of other Canadians are suffering and living in miserable conditions.

This, Mr. Speaker, represents a great gap and it was heartwarming to see, a couple of years ago, the Quebec government attempt to pay expenses incurred during an election. We should have this at the federal level. The federal government should, in order to establish an objective policy, a fair and equitable policy concerning all Canadian citizens—and the need is urgent—pass legislation whereby all election expenses of candidates in federal elections would be paid. I realize that all candidates might be limited to three or four television appearances and to less publicity, so as to prevent election expenses from becoming wasteful nonsense.

But it should be necessary for the government to have a free hand after it is elected. The Liberal government should not receive or should not have received $100,000 from some financier or industry. The Progressive Conservative party should not have received $75,000—a little less—because it had been anticipated by the rating, as in 1965, that it did not have a chance to return to power. The New Democratic Party should not receive either—possibly much less, but just in case, in 20 or 25 years, it should accede to power—from certain financiers or industries, $10,000 or $15,000, as compared to the $100,000 contributed to the others.

There is need for a piece of legislation enabling the government, in the present economic situation—regardless of the visits made to ministers' offices by Toronto or Montreal financiers—to have a free hand to pass legislation designed to control prices, readjust salaries, restrict profits and prevent price fixing by combines. What a revelation it was in the committee on consumer credit and cost of living to realize how some companies operating in the consumer field make excessive profits; the same applies to finance companies, namely Household Finance and others. This is scandalous, when millions of Canadians suffer and are destitute.

What we really need is a democratic government—it matters not whether it is Liberal, Progressive Conservative, or any other political party—but it must be free to work for the common good, free to look to the right, to the left, in front and behind, so that when legislation becomes imperative it is not blocked by a small group of citizens who do not want to lose the interest on their capital or exorbitant profits.

Mr. Speaker, that is now sadly lacking and I trust the government will consider introducing legislation to that effect, in order that the administration of the country might become more democratic.

In the next few minutes, I wish to call attention to the statement of the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) which caused me much grief.

Last week-end the minister went to Chicoutimi. I know he is very dynamic, very spirited. But, because a number of students, my young compatriots, expressed their dissatisfaction over certain injustices, because my young compatriots in Chicoutimi—the same thing occurred at Sherbrooke University, at Laval and at the University of Montreal—refuse to spend, as their forefathers did, their time in confederation in the kitchen, because they too want to spend time in the livingroom once in a while and share in the well-being of the country on an equal footing, because my young compatriots expressed their dissatisfaction and were at times aggressive, the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration called them young punks.

Mr. Speaker, I deplore this attitude on the part of the minister who, with two other wise men, as is often said in the house, came here a year and a half ago after some soul searching to save the Canadian confederation. What did those three wise men have in mind? Did they come here to save the Canadian confederation or to further their own interests and ambitions? After watching them closely and studying their statements, I am in a position to say today that although they come from the province of Quebec, from that proud nation thirsting for justice and equality, they do not represent in any way the aspirations of the province of Quebec and the French Canadian people or the French culture in this country. And I will prove it in a moment.

Mr. Speaker, how come the Minister of Manpower and Immigration—

Mr. Laflamme: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Allard: You ask questions when I am through with my speech.

How come the Minister of Manpower and Immigration is taking this attitude in the light, for instance, of an answer given, hardly two months ago, to a question asked by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) concerning the number of high officials who are French Canadians. Out of 1,200 senior officials in Ottawa, only 135 are French Canadians.

My young compatriots are dissatisfied with such discrimination. And how many inequalities are still being inflicted on our compatriots in the civil service today? We have evidence of this when we meet them in the various departments. And because our young compatriots are not satisfied with that situation, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) calls them young punks. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, who are the young punks in Canada. For instance, with regard to the department of immigration: in 34 foreign cities, where that department has offices, out of 2,186 employees, scattered in the 34 offices in those 34 foreign cities, there are only 25 French Canadians. And, because my young compatriots from Chicoutimi, Sherbrooke, Laval, Montreal, are not satisfied with the situation, and denounce that discrimination, which we shall try and correct, the minister of immigration calls my young fellow Canadians young punks.

The young punks are certainly not in Chicoutimi. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration, came here, from a trade union representing 200,000 members, to save confederation; what is he doing in this house? For the last ten months, this trade union, the C.N.T.U., through its leaders, Messrs. Pepin, Sauvé and many others have been urging the government to settle their problems, to define what has not been defined by legislation, to correct the wrongs done by the jurisdictional decisions of the Canadian Labour Relations Board to certain classes of Canadians, with regard to trade union freedom and the liberty of the workers; to define the units of bargaining and to recognize them naturally and locally. What did the Minister of Manpower and Immigration do? Nothing at all; he forsook his 200,000 subalterns whom he served when he was the leader of the C.N.T.U.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time is up.

Mr. Laflamme: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): I am sorry, but the time allotted to the hon. member for Sherbrooke has expired.

Mr. Laflamme: Would the hon. member answer a question, with the consent of the house?

[Mr. Allard.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): I shall ask the unanimous consent of the house so that the hon. member for Québec-Montmorency (Mr. Laflamme) may put a question to the hon. member for Sherbrooke. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Laflamme: I would ask the hon. member for Sherbrooke who criticized the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) a moment ago for certain justified statements he made in Chicoutimi—

Mr. Allard: You too.

Mr. Laflamme: —what he thinks about quite similar statements made by one of his supporters, the mayor of his city, Mr. Nadeau, last Monday or Tuesday. He spoke to the same effect as the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, I note that the hon. member did not read verbatim the statements of the mayor of Sherbrooke which were not made in the same light or in the same circumstances as those of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Laflamme: It was the same thing.

Mr. Allard: What the mayor of Sherbrooke railed against was the irresponsibility—

Mr. Béchard: Exactly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Allard: —of some individuals. You are applauding here but go before your young compatriots of Laval. What they want is a special status and equal treatment for Quebec. They have had enough of being pushed around by those who come to the House of Commons and forsake them and their aspirations to further their own ambitions, like the hon. member who just asked that question.

Mr. Knowles: It is the same thing.

[English]

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make some comments this afternoon while we are debating the merits of the mini-budget, and I can assure you they will be as relevant to the subject as the last speaker's remarks. Let me make a few observations regarding the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the von Thadden incident to show the amount of double talk that pervades the operations of the organization. In fact it is present in so much of its activities it should be adopted as its trade mark.

Early in January it was announced that a leader of a small German party had been invited by the C.B.C. to come to Canada and take part in a national network show, of course at the expense of the taxpayers of Canada. A considerable uproar followed this announcement and some well justified complaints were made. In response to the complaints that were made regarding this announcement that von Thadden was to be brought to Canada, the president of the C.B.C. issued a statement. I have in my hand a copy of this statement which was provided by the C.B.C. information services. The statement is dated January 16, and leads off as follows:

> The following statement by President Ouimet was released to the Canadian Press in Ottawa; C.B.C. news rooms; and dailies in Toronto after 7:40 p.m. January 14, 1967—

Mr. Ouimet was commenting about the fact that the C.B.C. decided not to bring Mr. von Thadden to Canada because of the opposition which arose following the announcement of the C.B.C. In the last paragraph of Mr. Ouimet's statement we find these very interesting words:

> This action does not mean that the corporation will abrogate its responsibility in terms of the principle of the right of the Canadian public to information.

These are noble words, almost fit to be carved on some tombstones, but I will not mention whose. I will repeat them:

• (12:40 p.m.)

> This action does not mean that the corporation will abrogate its responsibility in terms of the principle of the right of the Canadian public to information.

We have been rising in this House of Commons for the past five years asking for information on how the C.B.C. operates, and always getting the same answers; either that the C.B.C. is in a competitive business and never divulges this kind of information, or that the salaries or payments made to stars on the C.B.C. payroll are never divulged.

For instance, I asked how much money was paid to Mrs. Baskin, whose husband was a private member of the House of Commons, and how much was paid to Mrs. Sauvé. The reply was quite interesting. I got the answer as to how much was paid to Mrs. Baskin, in which I had no interest whatsoever, and was told I could not get the answer with regard to Mrs. Sauvé because the C.B.C. did not divulge that kind of information. Talk about a two way answer on the same subject. This is an example of it.

At the time Mr. Ouimet was making this high sounding statement on behalf of the C.B.C. the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked a question of the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh), who answers in this house—I do not like to say she "answers", but she represents the C.B.C. in this house. I will not say she answers for them because the answers are always the same, that it is not in the public interest to divulge anything regarding the C.B.C. On January 16 the hon. member for Prince Albert rose in his place and asked a question of the Secretary of State. Part of her answer can be found on page 11819 of Hansard for that day. It was as follows:

> But there is the principle of respecting the right of the Canadian people to know what is current in the world—

That was the answer given by the Secretary of State of the Canadian cabinet regarding the von Thadden episode.

It was at this very moment that a Toronto newspaper came up with the interesting discovery that two stars on the C.B.C. John C. Ricker, M.A., of the Ontario College of Education, and John Tupper Saywell, Ph.D., of York University, Toronto, were the joint authors of a book "Nation and Province." I have photostat copies of pages 58, 59 and 60 of this book in my hand. These gentlemen devote a couple of paragraphs to parliament and the press. I have been in the press business all my life, 40 years with Canadian newspapers and Canadian magazines, and feel I am entitled to speak on behalf of Canadian newspapers and the Canadian press.

I object strongly to the idea put out by these two gentlemen who appear regularly on C.B.C. On page 59 of the book, when commenting on the giving of information about parliament, these men have written that newspapers being in private hands, and private radio stations being in private hands, "they may well be reluctant to print or broadcast news or opinions which could have an adverse effect on advertisers' interests."

On page 60 they talk about the "dangerous tendency toward centralization." These are two comments made by these C.B.C. stars regarding private industry which produces in Canada the newspapers and magazines as we know them today. I would like to ask, what is the dangerous tendency toward centralization? We see it going on in all fields of activity. I do not know that it is dangerous. I do not know why Messrs. Saywell and Ricker should have the audacity to think that because they want to use the adjective "dangerous" in connection with centralization in the publishing world, it becomes dangerous. It is not ipso facto simply because these two men wish to make a comment of that nature.

Before I proceed to their extolling of the merits and virtues of the C.B.C., in their own eyes, I would like to refer to a very unfair attack that was made on three Canadian press representatives last fall through the medium of a C.B.C. commentator, Knowiton Nash. I have in my hands, provided to me by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's Toronto office, 354 Jarvis Street, under date of October 12, 1966, the text of a broadcast by one Knowlton Nash on the national news, August 11, 1966. In the cource of his remarks Mr. Nash created the impression that anyone who accepts free transportation or hospitality from anyone is their slave, is indebted to the host and will report only in a manner acceptable to the host.

Speaking of these three Canadians—and I will make direct reference to a personal friend of mine although I know two of the gentlemen very well—Mr. Lubor Zink of the Toronto Telegram—Mr. Knowlton Nash, who is paid by the C.B.C., commented about their flying to Saigon and pointed out:

> The United States agency says that it does not want to identify the newsmen because it says this might lessen their credibility.

He stated that the action of the United States information office in asking these three men to fly to Southeast Asia was in the best press agency approach. During his comments he remarked that they would, of course, be favourable to the host. If Knowlton Nash is so certain in his opinion that people who accept the hospitality of the bureau of information of the United States will be favourable to that bureau or to the United States, what about the C.B.C. that has flown hither and yon both French crews and English crews in Canadian government planes whenever a minister travels abroad or has anything to do somewhere in Canada? If these newspapermen will be influenced by the hospitality shown to them by hosts such as the information bureau of the United States, what about the C.B.C. commentators who are flown hither and yon with government officials, with the government picking up the check?

[Mr. Cowan.]

I cannot see for one moment how the C.B.C., through Knowlton Nash, can comment in this way with respect to private newspapermen when it is simply a case of the pot calling the kettle black. I cannot see any justification for the attack made by Knowlton Nash on August 11 last. These three men, two of whom are well known to me, are independently minded gentlemen and can be counted on to express their opinions whether or not they were the guests of some would-be host at any time.

To come back to Mr. Saywell and Mr. Ricker, I would point out that after they paid their respects to the operators of private newspapers and raido stations in Canada on pages 59 and 60, after referring to the "dangerous tendency toward centralization" they go on with these choice words on page 60:

> The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, owned by the government and the people of Canada, does an admirable job in keeping the public informed on events in parliament; being the servant of public rather than private interests, its news is impartial.

I did not know I was going to be speaking on the mini-budget this afternoon, but I wonder how many hon. members heard the marvellously impartial newscast of the C.B.C. last night. Maybe the opposition did not know this. According to the C.B.C. last night and this morning, the four opposition parties ganged up last night to defeat the government by a vote of 87 to 75. That is straight from the C.B.C., which according to Mr. Ricker and Dr. Saywell is keeping the public informed. What kind of reporting is that? I admit that the four opposition parties ganged up in an effort to defeat the government last night, but no responsible, self-respecting newspaperman in Canada wrote such a phrase as "the four opposition parties ganged up to defeat the government last night." When the newspaper reporters' reports are available later today I am certain you will find that they said "the four opposition parties ganged up in an effort to defeat the government."

That is just one episode in the news reporting of the C.B.C.—it can be multiplied a thousand times in the course of a year—which illustrates the inaccuracy of the reporting of the C.B.C. Yet Mr. Ricker and Dr. Saywell said:

• (12:50 p.m.)

> The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, owned by the government and the people of Canada, does an admirable job in keeping the public informed on events in parliament; being the servant of public rather than private interests, its news is impartial.

Has anyone ever tried to get anything out of this public servant? The answer comes saying that that kind of information is not given, that this is a competitive business and they cannot divulge such information.

Relying on the forthright statement of President Ouimet that this action —does not mean that the corporation will abrogate its responsibility in terms of the principle of the right of the Canadian public to information.

And relying on the statement made by the Secretary of State which reads as follows:

But there is the principle of respecting the right of the Canadian people to know what is current in the world—

I filed a question with the clerk of the house asking the Secretary of State how much money the C.B.C. had paid Professor Saywell and Professor Ricker year by year during the past five years. I did not wish to indicate thereby that the high opinion of these two men for the C.B.C. was based on the money they had been paid. I just wanted to point out that if Mr. Lubor Zink may be influenced by the fact that he is given a free trip to southeast Asia, it is possible that the high opinion of the C.B.C. held by these two men might be based on the amount of money which has been put into their pockets.

Hon. members at that time did not see the answer that came back from the C.B.C., and I must thank the Secretary of State and her parliamentary secretary for being so kind as to show me the letter. It said, despite the statements of Mr. Ouimet and the Secretary of State, this information had never been given in the past and they do not believe that it should be given at this time. If that is not double talk in its purest and simplest form then I do not know the meaning of double talk.

Hon. members saw and heard the Secretary of State rise in the house the other day and ask me whether I would not withdraw the question because the C.B.C. had not been in the habit of giving this information in the past. She did so in spite of the statement she herself made that there is the principle of respecting the right of the Canadian people to know what is current in the world. I said I would transfer the matter for debate, and hon. members will find at page 39 of today's routine proceedings my motion No. 200. I would have waited to discuss the matter perhaps a couple of months from now after the house leader arranged for it to be brought up when the subject was dead, but having the opportunity to speak on the mini-budget today I wish to draw this matter to the attention of the Canadian public so they can see the duplicity and double talk which pervades the operations of the C.B.C., and I have given the house a couple of examples. I certainly would like to know how much money was paid to Messrs. Saywell and Ricker during the past five years, year by year, just so we will know whether their opinions are as pure, unadulterated and free as those of Mr. Zink, Mr. Henderson and the third gentleman who went overseas at the expense of the United States government.

I do not wish to speak at any length on the mini-budget, but I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport, although I do not expect to receive an answer from him before the vote is taken. Three or four years ago when I was a member of the transportation committee a bill was brought before us to incorporate the Ottawa Terminal Railway Company. One of the clauses in that bill specified that there would be a monopoly operation of the taxicab service at the proposed new Ottawa station. Quite a few of us are incensed at the monopoly operation of taxicab service out of airports throughout Canada stretching from Victoria to St. John's, Newfoundland. This is taking place despite the fact that the cabinet talks about free enterprise and the competitive system, and while they do not allow the setting of prices by competitors. They have a law to prevent collusion by competitors but whenever competition rears its ugly head around an airport or a station it is amazing how quickly the cabinet forgets its dedication to free enterprise and the competitive price system.

When the Ottawa Terminal Railway Company Bill was brought before the committee and objections were raised to the last clause, we were told that it would be struck out. I must give credit to the Minister of Transport for having seen to it that the clause was struck out. We were then presented with a new bill in which the late member for Hull, a highly regarded friend of mine, Alexis Caron—I am sorry he is not with us now —raised an objection to the composition of the board of directors. The bill never did come before the House of Commons. We waited for a new bill with regard to the Ottawa terminal station but it never came forward, and now we are told that the new Ottawa station is being run co-operatively by the C.P.R. and the C.N.R.

Recently when coming off the train in the Ottawa station I noticed with interest that there were starters for the Blue Line taxis, of which there were about 20, to take the travellers to their destinations. I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether we have moved again into the field of a monopoly operation by a taxicab company in the new station. When I spoke to one of the starters on the platform he informed me that that taxicab company had just got the contract. This means that another monopoly is in operation right here in Ottawa under the nose of the cabinet.

I would like to see a little more faithfulness on the part of the cabinet to the doctrine of free enterprise and competition in business, particularly here in Ottawa. I will not go into a discussion of the Malton airport at this time; there may be another occasion for that.

Before I conclude I should like to ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, who I believe is doing a magnificent job and certainly is giving satisfaction to a large number of newcomers to Canada in Toronto and in the riding of York-Humber, whether he will be introducing a bill before this parliament is prorogued which will make naturalized Canadian citizens the equals of native born Canadians. At the present time a naturalized Canadian citizen can lose his citizenship by one means or another, while this cannot happen to a native born Canadian. We have been promised that amendments would be brought to the immigration bill which would remove this anomaly among Canadians. We have been promised this in four consecutive speeches from the throne.

The opposition pointed out that in 1919 the Liberal party moved a motion with regard to medicare. I looked up that motion, and found it reads that the Liberal party favoured medicare when the nation could afford the cost. The opposition conveniently dropped that last phrase and simply stated that the Liberal party favoured medicare in 1919 and it took us until 1966 to get around to it.

I have sat through four speeches from the throne in which we have been promised amendments to the citizenship and immigration laws so that naturalized Canadian citizens would not be subject to loss of their citizenship for any reason whatsoever. This has never been introduced to the house. I am sure if it were brought forward it would be passed in no time. I cannot imagine anybody in the opposition, and certainly no one on the government side of the house, objecting to such a bill; yet after being mentioned four times in speeches from the throne it has not yet come forward. Do we have to wait for another 47 years, like the medicare bill, to have this anomaly removed? Can we not let our naturalized Canadian citizens realize right now that they are the equals of native born Canadians once they have gained Canadian citizenship by observing the laws and regulations of this land? As it is now, if certain regulations are broken the citizenship of naturalized Canadians may be taken away from them.

I have had personal experience with this in connection with some Italians who were advised by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration that they had lost their citizenship status. The matter was drawn to the attention of Hon. Guy Favreau, the magnificent former minister of immigration, and was corrected at once. I do not believe this situation should be allowed to continue. Every naturalized Canadian should have the same rights as a native born Canadian, and that includes no loss of citizenship unless it is forsworn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order. It being one o'clock this sitting is suspended until 2 p.m.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at 2 p.m.

FINANCE, TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

NINTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Ovide Laflamme (Québec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, may I have the consent of the house to revert to presentation of reports by standing and special committees?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Laflamme: I have the honour to present the ninth report of the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs, in English and in French.

[Note: Text of the foregoing report appears in today's Votes and Proceedings.]

THE BUDGET

ADDITIONAL FINANCIAL MEASURES OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. L. M. Brand (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I should like very much to take a few minutes of the time of the house this afternoon, at the end of my first year in the House of Commons, to voice some of the frustrations with which I have been surrounded since I was elected to this august chamber. These frustrations, it seems to me, have become magnified by the fact that this is the centennial year in our country's history. These frustrations have been magnified further by the constant dialogue we hear, as Canadians, about a search for our identity, whatever that may be. We hear phrases such as the B and B commission, welfare, the C.B.C., housing crisis, war on poverty, pro-American, anti-American, and so on. These phrases seem to stick out, and I believe they are symptomatic of the morass of mediocrity in which we as Canadians find ourselves mired in our search for the good life.

Goodness knows, we have heard that term often enough over the past years. I believe that we as Canadians and as parliamentarians have lost track of who we are and where in fact we are going. After all, what do we mean by "the good life" for every Canadian? Is it perhaps the Christmas present of $30 per month in the form of a guaranteed income supplement referred to so proudly by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) in his mini-budget? Perhaps in his heart he feels that $30 per month is the answer to all the problems of the aged. He pointed out, and I agree with this, that he must raise taxes for some in order to make payments to those in need. I have no quarrel with that.

Am I and other Canadians to believe that we shall have the good life with the addition of 1 per cent to the sales tax on prescription drugs? Imagine that increase being imposed in face of the great amount of evidence presented to the committee of the house meeting at this time to discuss high drug costs? To give us the good life there was no change in exemptions in the mini-budget. As a result some married pensioners must pay back some of their increase. They must obey the rigorous income tax laws of Canada. Is this the good life for all Canadians? It makes one wonder.

We hear voices from the government side, tinged with pardonable pride, saying that these are prosperous times. Are they prosperous while millions of Canadians struggle under the weight of increasing taxes, prices and debts they must assume to keep themselves and their families alive? Is this the good life? Do we have the good life when we can find $10 million to found a feature film industry but at the same time sit idly by and watch some Canadians suffer kidney failure? From this serious disease many die. They die because we do not have enough artificial kidney machines for dialysis. Here we are in our centennial year and not only do we not have enough machines, not only do we have this basic inconsistency, but we have a jury deciding which victims shall be helped and which shall not be helped by means of the kidney machines. The jury passes the ultimate sentence. Not all patients can have their uremia controlled because there is a lack of funds and equipment. Because of this lack patients see their lives ebb away. Ten million dollars is spent for films but not even $1 million is spent to save a particular group of Canadians. Yet these are prosperous times.

These are the times when treasury bench members can point their ministerial fingers with pride at the number of jobs created by the Canada-United States auto parts agreement. These ministers brush off all statistical arguments showing how many have lost their jobs as a result of the pact. Men and families suffer. After all, it is little comfort to be reminded of those who have lost their jobs as a result of entering into the pact when speaking of the new jobs brought about by the pact.

Is this the good life for all Canadians that we are proud of? Is this the heritage we shall leave our children in the second century of our history? Does the government believe the Canadian people are blind? Does it believe that the bland assurances that all is well with the world will blind the average Canadian to what is around him? The average man can see old age pensioners in substandard rooms in rooming houses, children running ragged in city slums and Indians on our reserves, their pride gone and spirit broken, huddling together in one room. I wonder sometimes whether our Indians are not trying to protect themselves from the white man's benevolence. Is this the good life for all Canadians? Is it enough, I wonder, for the government to express regret when four or five children on an Indian reserve are burned to death and in the next breath answer a member in the house, as happened the other day, with the words: "What's the matter? Don't you like prosperity?"

Are we expressing Canadianism and the idea of the good life when we find that centennial projects include such things as providing plumbing facilities for prairie towns and putting our fighting men into green gabardine? It may be necessary for some prairie towns to have good plumbing and the amenities of modern life, but do we regard plumbing as a centennial project? Surely the aim of government should be to see that all Canadians have the good life. Instead of spending everything on material things we should spend a little providing something for the mind.

It is time that not only we in the house but people all over Canada began to build a Canadian pride, to forge a true sense of Canadian destiny. It is time we looked to see what is happening in our own country. It is time to stop being blinded by the glow of our smug self-satisfaction and confused by our national dichotomy. If we suffer from self-satisfaction it is merely a thin veneer hiding our national uncertainty. Somebody said—I forget who—" Let's stop being a nation bounded on the north by the aurora borealis and on the south by an inferiority complex." For the centennial year let us stop being French Canadians, English Canadians, German Canadians or what have you and become truly unhyphenated Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brand: It is time the so-called English speaking parts of Canada recognized the basic fact of life, that the French were in Canada for 225 years before confederation and the British for 108 years. It is time our schools taught proper history. It should not stop in French Canada at the Plains of Abraham in 1759 and begin in English Canada when Wolfe died. It is time we started teaching our children about our country. It is a historic fact that when John Cabot sighted Nova Scotia in 1497 he did nothing to colonize it. But when Cartier sailed up the St. Lawrence in 1534 looking for a passage to the Indies he began the great story of our country. There was the great Champlain who founded Port Royal in 1605 and the settlement of Quebec in 1608. Surely we should try to forget dates such as 1759 and the deaths of two great military leaders, the Marquis de Montcalm and General Wolfe.

• (2:20 p.m.)

I believe that we in this house and certain of the schools across the country have failed in the duty to teach the children exactly what we have here in Canada. I ask my English speaking compatriots to realize that in many ways the French have a greater right to be here than we have. I believe we should recognize this fact and go on from there. I do not believe this is a time for recrimination. It is a time for toleration. It is a time to accept each other as equal partners in this great and glorious Canada of ours.

In my view we should stop wasting our energies and talents on deciding foreign policies for other countries. I believe we should start playing a role as an individual nation. We waste far too much time in this house discussing whether or not the United States is doing the right thing in Viet Nam. I find it difficult at times to put into words how strongly I feel about these things but perhaps as I grope for the right expressions Your Honour will understand the ideas I am attempting to articulate.

I mentioned Viet Nam. I believe we should stop criticizing one or other of the parties concerned and start criticizing ourselves. Regardless of the rights and wrongs of this situation, certain facts are self-evident. One of them is—and I speak as a physician in this sense—that there are men, women and children, non-combatants, in that strife-torn country who are in need of medical care and medical supplies. Instead of blaming one side or the other for what is happening I should like to see the people of Canada, not just the parliament of Canada, doing something about this situation. I know we are doing something now. But is it enough?

I should like, for example, to see the Canadian Medical Association of which I am a member encouraging doctors, surgeons and plastic surgeons to volunteer their services, as I know many of them are willing to do, for one, two or three months at a time in Viet Nam to help repair the broken bodies of the civilian population who are suffering needlessly as a result of this conflict. I am sure that not only would they volunteer their services but that the great pharmaceutical industry of this country would be willing to donate supplies to help civilians in those areas.

We can go beyond Viet Nam to other areas of the world. Help is being given now by such wonderful organizations as CUSO, MEDICO and so forth. But it is not enough. I believe that if we as Canadians could voluntarily set out to repair the ravages of war we would do more to build a Canadian identity and give ourselves a place of prominence in the councils of the nations than all the emissaries and missions we could send to Hanoi or Saigon.

In our own country, could we not recognize honestly the extent of our housing problems? Could we not seek to ensure that all our citizens have the means to buy their own homes and that our old folks have a decent place in which to live in their declining years? There are so many areas in our own country which urgently need attention; yet we are so busy trying to solve the problems of the world outside our borders that we cannot see what is in front of our eyes. I believe it is time we found our own identity and tried to do something worth while here in Canada. Then we could hold out a helping hand to other areas of the world which need help.

As I think about this problem I think about the plumbing in prairie towns. I think of my children and what they are learning in school about the centenary. Plumbing does not seem to have any heritage associated with it. It does not seem to provide very much by way of a Canadian identity though perhaps it sets us apart from those countries which do not have plumbing. What does it do for Canadians as such?

I believe it is time in our centennial year for us to begin to honour those Canadians who for too long have remained unsung in their native land. Put their pictures on our postage stamps. It is very good to see a puffin or a loon or other wildlife of our country. But how about some of those people who have done so much? How about Pierre Radisson?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Next year; 1968.

Mr. Brand: I am pleased to hear it. I believe that in every possible way, not only on our stamps but through broadcast and other media, we should put the lives of great Canadians into proper perspective in song and story and allow our children to see that there really are Canadians whose lives and works are just as fascinating as those of Daniel Boone or Jessie James.

I mentioned Pierre Radisson. I might mention another man in whom I am perhaps even more interested because he was essentially a physician. Since the Postmaster General (Mr. Côté) is here I would point out that Canadian physicians have not fared well in having their likenesses placed on postage stamps. I believe that Alexander Graham Bell was so honoured at one time, but his doctor's degree was an honorary one.

An hon. Member: Charles Tupper.

Mr. Brand: Charles Tupper was on a stamp because he was at one time prime minister. It is true he was a doctor. But what about Sir William Osler? What about Robert Tait Mackenzie? Hon. members ask: Who is Robert Tait MacKenzie? Many people will not know anything about the life of this great Canadian. Most people will admire what he has done without realizing to whom their admiration is directed. Let me give a brief biographical sketch of this great Canadian. He was born in Almonte, Ontario, on May 26, 1867, 100 years ago, and like so many of the geniuses nurtured in Canada he died an expatriate in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on April 28, 1938. Despite the fact that Dr. MacKenzie spent many of his working years in the United States he remained a Canadian in every way. Every summer throughout his sojourns below the 49th parallel he returned to Almonte to the home he called The Mill of Kintail, named after the ancient seat of the clan MacKenzie.

• (2:30 p.m.)

Why, you may ask, is Robert Tait MacKenzie worthy of centennial recognition? I see that the Postmaster General wonders too. In 1892 he graduated in medicine from McGill University and, because of his intense interest in physical education, became the first professor in charge of physical education at that institution. His work in the field of physical education became known through many publications and was continued at the University of Pennsylvania and indeed all across the free world. He was in fact one of the prime movers in emphasizing the need for a healthy body to house a healthy and alert mind. A classmate in his early school years by the name of James Naismith, who also became a physician, went on to fame in the United States as the founder of the game of basketball.

While Tait MacKenzie was carrying on his duties as medical director of physical education at McGill University he was also teaching anatomy. He looked for a better method by which to teach anatomy to his students. He had a hobby, that of sculpture, and he decided to put that talent to use in the anatomy laboratory as a means of teaching his classes. He did sculptures of various parts of the human form in order to illustrate his points. It was not long before these rough clay models were recognized for their intrinsic beauty as well as for their practicality. Following this he enlarged his work to include sculpture of athletic forms considered by many to be the finest of their kind since the days of the classical Greek sculptors.

It is an interesting aside and of great importance to me in Saskatchewan that the figure of the swimmer on the top of the trophy for intercollegiate swimming in western Canada was donated by Robert Tait MacKenzie. This statue has become famous as "The Plunger". If you should see a statue of a swimmer it would likely be a copy of this piece of sculpture. His work and fame as a sculptor grew until finally his sculpture took him literally around the world. Among his works are included the Scottish-American memorial at Edinburgh, the statue of General James Wolfe in London, the "Youthful Benjamin Franklin" at the University of Pennsylvania, and many, many more. Members of this house who are not familiar with his work may see the statue of Captain Guy Grummond in the archives in this city and, in the foyer outside this chamber, the heroic statue of Lieutenant Colonel George Harold Baker, M.P., executed by Robert Tait MacKenzie.

Despite what this man did in his lifetime there is no argument that he did not receive the honour due him by his countrymen. It seems only fitting that this authentic genius of Canadian birth who had great pride in Canada should on the centennial of his birth and in the centennial year of our history receive from his countrymen the honour that was denied him during his lifetime. What this honour should be I leave to the Secretary of State and to the centennial commission. I am sure the minister, in co-operation with the Canadian Medical Association and the council on health, physical education and rehabilitation, can come up with a fitting memorial for this great genius. His sculpture has been given to the world. His fellow countrymen should recognize its origin.

To my French speaking friends let me say that Robert Tait MacKenzie believed very much in the importance of French culture within our nation. One of his first accomplishments was to become proficient in the French language, so much so that at one time in his career he was invited to France by the government of France, which of all the European continental countries appealed to him most. As a result of this invitation he helped to put in practice in France a system of rehabilitation which assisted in restoring the manpower of that country after the devastating losses of the first world war.

His home, The Mill of Kintail, still stands. Many members here may have seen it. Many of his original works still decorate the studio. This is due not to government help but to the interest of the present owner of the mill, Colonel James F. Leys. I should like to see something done in our centennial year to honour this man.

There are many other Canadians who fall in the same category and perhaps could become household words so that when the children come home from school they will say, "Did you hear about so and so? We learned about him in school today." I think we must do these things now in our centennial year. We should do something within our country to build a true Canadianism—one country, one Canada, with all citizens having equal rights. We should do something to honour those who in the past have helped make Canada the great nation it is today.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion this is an important debate, dealing as it generally does with a variety of important subjects and with discussion of a general nature. I think it underscores a fact which never should be forgotten, that parliament is something more than a mere legislative mill which eventually turns out the emissions of a government in legislative form. This chamber is a body which seeks and must seek the views, and give thought to the concerns, anxieties and needs, of the people who send us here. Before we had responsible government we had representative government. I think that in our general debates we emphasize the representative aspects of our democratic structure.

As usual in debates of this kind, and as usual with regard to most constructive utterances in this chamber, the speeches which have been made in this debate have been given little attention in the press with its proclivity for the controversial and sensational and its seeming indifference to the reasoned and the reasonable. Yet in my opinion the remarks by members in the various parts of the house during the past few days have been valuable contributions to important public issues. I say that about many of the speeches I have heard and have read, and I certainly say it about the one just delivered by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Brand).

When one intervenes in a debate at this stage there always is the difficulty that so many things which one would like to say himself have already been said. I can only express my agreement with many of the contributions which have been made. The hon. member for Royal (Mr. Fairweather) and the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey), especially the former, spoke about the procedures of this house. Their comments were thoughtful and I think useful. We must be concerned about the efficiency of our procedures. Smoothness of the operation of this body is not the be-all or end-all—far from it. I would rather we remained hopelessly archaic than that we whittle away or diminish one bit of our freedom of expression. But we do not ensure democratic values by enshrining inefficiency. I think the hon. member for Royal was very helpful to all of us in outlining some important and valuable projected improvements in our procedure. I shall only mention two aspects of this field which are elementary and elemental.

By now we should realize that sessions of parliament are year-round operations. We find now that it is 13 months since we began this session. In other words, the calendar year is not long enough for the parliamentary year. Surely we must recognize that this is a year-round business and schedule our adjournments for appropriate preconsidered times so that they are not subject to constant hit or miss, hope and happenstance, with the result that we never know when we might or might not end a certain session.

I also believe, and this is becoming an old chestnut with me, that we have to look at our voting procedures. During the last vote I attended in this house not long ago—I do not miss very many—I sat for 49 minutes while the bell rang and rang and rang. I do not mind being up so late at night or hearing bells ringing in my ears, but even I could find more useful things to do than sit and wait while bells ring. In this case, after 49 minutes of waiting, I stood up and announced that I was paired with an hon. member who had missed the bell-ringing session. I think we could entrust our democratic procedures to an electronic voting device. We could wait five minutes for the vote to be taken and then cast our votes in five seconds.

Someone told me after the last suggestion I made along these lines that I was doing some personal pleading. At one time I was accused of being embarrassed and red in the face because I voted with the New Dtmocratic Party. Let me defend myself and recall that I suggested this procedure long before the time the New Democratic Party was so abundantly right that I voted with them.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), spoke about constitutional developments or the lack of them. I have been disturbed in recent months after the former premier of Quebec torpedoed the Fulton-Favreau formula despite his earlier commitment to it and despite approval by all other legislatures. In the past we have looked for initiative from the national government and the national parliament. I am proud that recently Premier Robarts of Ontario has taken an initiative, but I regret that it was necessary for a leader in the provincial arena to give the lead in matters where the initiative lies with the national parliament, with the national government and with national leaders. But in the vacuum which he as an intelligent Canadian saw, he took an initiative which I heartily welcome.

We should have set up a constitutional committee long ago and we should have invited the legislatures to do something similar. We have great and important problems of a constitutional nature and we should not have sat inert and relaxed during the months which followed the demise of the Fulton-Favreau formula. I salute Premier Robarts in this connection. He has shown himself as a great Canadian. I believe Canada can rejoice in the fact that during the last few years the populous and prosperous province of Ontario has not been led by a Mowat or a Hepburn. Had that been the case the frail fabric of federation might have been badly sagging by this time.

It is now 13 months since this session began and I have been distressed by the paucity of discussion on external affairs. I am convinced that there is a strong desire on the part of the great majority of members in this house to give the widest possible degree of support to the execution of our nation's foreign policy. Irrespective of the label which is borne by the party in power, I believe there is a genuine feeling, which has been in existence for a long time, that our foreign policy should be bipartisan, multipartisan or possibly non-partisan in so far as it is practically possible.

I am convinced that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin), sometimes described as a "former political person", agrees with the virtues and values of departisanizing our foreign policy. In this assumption, because I believe him to be a sincere and able internationalist, I offer him a suggestion or two which are intended only to be helpful. I regret that he is not here. When he is not here I do not vote, but I have not taken that self-denying ordinance in so far as talking is concerned.

In the first place, although his practised skill in evasive equivocation is always appreciated as an art form, and it truly is, it is not always universally beneficial to a broadening of the base of parliamentary and public support of his government's actions on the international scene. The broadening of such support should be a goal toward which he should strive. In a word I would say that he should be more forthcoming in his answers to those members who seek information on the many vital areas of Canada's external affairs policy. There is no one in this house, I am sure, who would hesitate for a moment to take on the mantle of silence if he believed that silence, per se, would be conducive to any worth-while accomplishment in our diplomacy. Sometimes I fear that my good and long-time friend, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, shows an increasing tendency to invoke the aura of high confidentiality around foreign policy areas and incidents which at some times are widely discussed outside this chamber.

How often are we enjoined here in this house to maintain silence on the Viet Nam question lest some imminent solution or impending accomplishment be destroyed utterly by the slightest reference to it in this parliament? We are made fearful lest a phrase, sentence or syllable might mar some impending achievement. Yet Mr. Ronning speaks publicly. How often have we been enjoined to silence in this chamber when later during the same day we have turned on our television sets and heard senators of the United States evoke from the secretary of state, Mr. Rusk, fulsome answers, or indulge in the quizzing of Mr. McNamara, or the eliciting and publicizing of views of a very distinguished newspaperman, Harrison Salisbury? If in the United States, where great responsibility for world affairs resides, their democracy may be so functional as to allow, and indeed encourage, full discussion of vital areas of diplomacy, surely we here, whose responsibility is less, need not be inhibited from exploring and discussing our role in this issue, which of course concerns us although naturally it does not concern us primarily.

[Mr. Macquarrie.]

I think that candour and earnestness in the discussion would be valuable. I believe that the external affairs committee should be much more active than it is. I think we should be examining in depth various aspects of our country's foreign policy and drawing upon the expertise of specialists in world affairs. I am happy that committees generally have become more active and more useful on the parliamentary scene, although I think we have to use a little bit of skill in organizing their schedules. There seems to be something wrong when for many, many weeks no committees are sitting, and then we have a great splurge when there are more committees sitting than members to go around or rooms in which to hold them. But I see an increasing initiative within and on the part of committees, and I think this is to be welcomed. I do not think the external affairs committee should content itself with merely examining the estimates of the department. I think we should move into great questions and help to further our own knowledge and give leadership to our people.

In the far off days of Mackenzie King and O. D. Skelton foreign policy was regarded as something so esoteric as to not really to be suited to the amateurs, members of parliament, let alone the public. Such an attitude was deplorable then but at that time our role in the world was not so important as to make our diplomatic efforts of much significance. It really did not matter too much whether Mr. Skelton and Mackenzie King handled it all themselves or whether there was the odd reference to it in parliament. But things are different now. Canada has a different role and there is a relationship between public opinion and foreign policy. The public, which always had a stake in the decisions of the diplomats, now has far greater influence on the decision-making than ever before. Canada is not a great power; we do not have great power roles; we do not have big power responsibilities. But we are capable of making an impact upon the world.

I think we must do all we can to strengthen our role, to make more valuable our contribution. I think that we as parliamentarians could enrich our knowledge and increase our participation in discussions which will lead to the most meaningful policies. We talk often about the various stages in our foreign policy development, how we began in the early days of nationhood with no policy, how people like

Borden led us into an era of responsibility on the world scene, how we carried on in an isolationist attitude in the League of Nations and did nothing while talking about American isolationism at the same time.

In the post-war era, under Mr. St. Laurent we took a positive and valuable role. Perhaps we are now at a stage where we should do something more fundamental in re-examining the situation. I am always a little ill at ease when I hear people say, "Isn't it wonderful that we are so much more popular than the Americans, and that no one dislikes us?" I think possibly we are at a stage of our development when we may have to risk being disliked somewhere in the world as we try to give meaning to the things that we believe are important in world affairs.

I would like to see us take part in a thorough analysis of our role in NATO. What about NATO itself? The dry words of the treaty of 1949 are not of themselves sufficient. What changes should the alliance undertake? What changes does Canada envisage for the alliance and for its own role therein? I wish the minister were here, because he and I used to be companions of the order which supported Canadian membership in the Organization of American States. I have kept my membership in that group intact but I do not think the minister belongs to the club any more. I would like to know why. I was hoping I would be able to salute and applaud him as he led our country into a greater role of hemispheric responsibility. Has he forsaken his belief in Canadian membership, or is it yet to come?

I wonder, too, whether we are taking sufficiently careful note of what is taking place in the United Nations. Is the United Nations itself abandoning what used to be regarded by us as its most hopeful field of operation, namely, the peace-keeping role. Things which have happened in the general assembly of the United Nations cause me grave disquiet. Are we adopting our foreign policy vis-à-vis the United Nations to an attitude which that body has itself abandoned? I am concerned about that.

There are many areas of possible Canadian initiative. What is the status today of the one China, one Taiwan policy? It is an interesting question. Have we yet been able to find a meaningful measure to register in a practical way Canadian disapproval and distaste for the actions of the Ian Smith régime in Rhodesia? Unless that which we are doing on the international scene or in the Commonwealth context has some meaning when applied to the object of the action, it is useless. We should either look for something meaningful or advise our Canadian people that no meaningful role has been found.

Should we be more specific in our external aid programs? Are we spreading our own resources too thin? Should we, for instance, undertake a special role for the small islands in the West Indies to the solution of whose economic and political problems we could make a meaningful and perhaps decisive contribution? I am convinced that there is no part of the world whose future both economically and politically depends more upon Canada than those small islands to the south. I think we should launch into a program that is imaginative, that is new, that is massive. A step has been taken, and we welcome it. But those islands are much more than places for fun in the sun; they are places which will have great difficulty in surviving. This might give us a great opportunity to make the Commonwealth idea mean something more than a mere good will expression in an after-dinner speech. I should like to see us face up to the ultimate responsibility for the small islands in the Caribbean and offer them every economic and political aid that they will accept.

There are many other problems which I think are ripe for discussion and which the people of Canada would like us to discuss. Some of us believe that Canada would improve its effectiveness on the diplomatic scene by developing full diplomatic relations with the Vatican State, and perhaps it is best that someone from the reformed religious tradition give utterance to that view and underscore the fact that the Vatican State is much more than the seat of a great religious leader. It is a political entity, it is a state among the other states of the world, and I think we could enrich our role greatly and enhance our effectiveness by developing diplomatic ties of a closer nature than we have at present.

There are a host of questions calling for serious appraisal and sustained discussion. I think we limit our effectiveness in the world if we fail to ask questions and seek solutions. I see an item on the order paper relating to the external affairs committee. I agree with my colleague that it is not necessary for the committee to be set up or put in operation by the minister or the Prime Minister. I believe that with greater effectiveness, greater research and a more searching inquiry as to our goals we will bring external affairs out of the area of casual reference and equivocation. I believe we can move toward greater leadership for our country in the world and within this country by those of us who are on the national political scene. I would invite the minister, who is a good minister, to be more fulsome, more frank in his discussions with us.

Miss LaMarsh: Did the hon. member say more full?

Mr. Macquarrie: Would the minister prefer me to say "more full"?

Miss LaMarsh: I think "frank" is fine.

Mr. Macquarrie: Perhaps I should say: not so full but more frank.

Miss LaMarsh: Fine.

Mr. Macquarrie: The Secretary of State is living up to her reputation. She knows what to say at the right time and she uses the right word in the right place. We want more candour and more frankness. If the Secretary of State for External Affairs were more frank and more candid perhaps we would not object to all the time he takes. However, we must be kind to the minister who is not here today. Speaking in all seriousness, there is room for strengthening our role in foreign policy by drawing upon the house, the committee and all concerned members of good will in the house who are anxious about our foreign policy, who wish to help and who know that our people are becoming concerned about this matter. Foreign policy is no longer ignored as it was once because, if nothing more, the so-called instinct of preservation would drive us for we all know how fatally we would be affected if the avenues of peace were forsaken for that which it is too dreadful to contemplate.

Mr. C. F. Kennedy (Colchester-Hants): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to make a few comments in this debate which I feel was not necessary because I do not think a mini-budget between regular budgets is necessary for the simple reason that it comes on the eve of the annual budget. Under the arrangements made with regard to the old age pension supplement the payments will not go out at least until the time the next budget is due. Furthermore, there is an accumulation of funds in the old age security account which would allow the payments to be made until such time as the annual budget is brought down.

What concerns me most is that this budget has directed the attention of the taxpayers of Canada to the fact that its purpose is to support the old people of this country. I think this is grossly unfair. If the government is going to single out certain people to budget for especially and to whom special attention must be paid, then I believe the government should go further and do the same in other areas. It should bring down special budgets to cover the costs of expensive royal commissions to which the attention of the public is not drawn too often. For example, the current commission on bilingualism and biculturalism has cost this country now well over $10 million and there seems to be no end in sight. Editorial comments have referred to it as a most expensive exercise in futility.

I am concerned about what has been taking place in recent times with regard to financial matters which has undermined people's faith in investing in their own country. We hear from the government benches diverse opinions on whether we should allow foreign capital into this country or limit ourselves to our own capital. I think that we need both, but we must put most of our efforts into encouraging our own people to invest in our own country.

The public debt of Canada is reputed at the present time to be in the neighbourhood of $1,000 for each man, woman and child. In many funeral services we are told that we bring nothing into this world and we certainly take nothing out of it, but apparently every child who comes into this world in Canada brings with him less than nothing and when he departs leaves less than nothing behind. Not only do we have an inheritance of debt but we are committed to the servicing of this debt which is getting more costly as interest rates go up. At the present time everyone is faced with a charge of $60 to $70 per year to service the debt which we inherited, and the government has made no effort to reduce it. On the contrary, even now in these good times we still face deficits.

A good example of the situation would be a person who inherits a growing farm and instead of paying his way keeps spending money and borrowing money against the property until eventually he has nothing left. Government expenditures in general are directed to consumable goods and services and they are made for things which are useful today but which in future days will either wear out or become obsolete and have to be replaced. I think every encouragement should be given to the government to put more investment into permanent structures, something that will stand for years, such as transportation facilities and other facilities which affect the economy of a particular area.

The recent failures of financial institutions in this country have upset a lot of people. I feel that in this regard the government must move strongly in order to ensure that people who invest in what is known as the trust class of securities will have protection. There is nothing more humiliating for a person than to invest his hard earned savings and find later that the investment is worthless. I say the government should take the lead in this situation because recently there have been indications the government has not even considered honouring some of the commitments of the past. I am referring to the issue in 1936 of $55 million of 3 per cent perpetual bonds. Whether or not the people who purchased them realized they might never be honoured, I believe that as time went on people treated them as being worth their face value. Since interest rates have risen they have found that these bonds are not tradeable at face value. In other words, these people are stuck with something for which they paid $100 in 1936 only to find that in 1966 and 1967 these bonds will not bring any more than $50 on the market. If you multiply that loss by the amount of inflation which has taken place, you find that the value of these bonds is down to about $20 or $25 on an original investment of $100.

I believe this is a great injustice and should be rectified. If the minister cannot make a new issue at the present time and refund the face value of these bonds, I feel he should set a date a few years hence when these bonds will mature. This action would stabilize the market for the bonds and if people wanted to hang on long enough they would realize their face value. I believe they are entitled to some encouragement to hope that some day they will get the face value of these bonds purchased with money they had put aside in those days.

I believe that the government must provide more funds to aid the country. There should be greater government participation in education in order to assist those who are able to absorb higher education. On the other hand, those who for one reason or another are not able to pursue higher education should also be looked after and something should be done for them. Although some provision is being made now for these people, I think more could be done to bring them to a place where they could participate in the production of the country and earn a decent living for themselves and their families. In this regard the government could also help in the general development of the country in order to provide opportunities for these educated people. There are many parts of this country still underdeveloped. I did say that if Canadians perhaps put more of their money into development through private enterprise, this would provide opportunities for young people. However, private enterprise must be assisted by government in the fields of communication within the country and in trade relations with other countries.

I should like to turn now to a more local aspect of my theme. In the province of Nova Scotia from which I come there is probably more room for development with the limited resources we have than anywhere else in the country. We have an organization called the Atlantic Development Board. It was set up to deal with certain aspects of development in that area. The Atlantic Development Board is very much concerned now with studying the development of tourist attractions in the maritime provinces. In this day and age when highways are better and people have more leisure, the tourist industry is becoming one of our greatest industries.

The Atlantic provinces have much to offer to tourists. We do need more access roads to some of the assets we have there. A highway has been projected from the United States border around the head of the Bay of Fundy to the southwest tip of Nova Scotia. This highway would go through a great scenic area. As a matter of fact, much of the highway is already there but there are certain links that need to be developed in order to make it truly a vacation trail. One of these links is the crossing of a major obstacle near Truro known as the Shubenacadie River. The construction of such a crossing would shorten the mileage and also attract people to the seashore along which are the highest tides in the world as well as many other attractions which one cannot see anywhere else.

This crossing would not only be of great benefit to the tourist industry but also to the people in this area who are in reasonably close proximity, as the crow flys, to the town of Truro which is fast becoming an educational and industrial centre as well as a health centre as a result of recently expanded facilities. It is only fair to the people in this area that they have access to this town, and a crossing of this major obstacle would reduce the mileage one would have to travel. As a matter of fact, in so far as health is concerned it would probably save lives because of the ability to get medical help quickly.

This trail, I believe, would also benefit another depressed part of that area, namely, the area to the west of Truro which has unfortunately been more or less bypassed by the development of the trans-Canada highway. It is an area which certainly needs some development. Actually it is one of the most beautiful parts of the province. Every effort should be made to get tourists into that area so that they could feast their eyes on the beautiful landscape. I would commend to anyone visiting Nova Scotia the north shore of Nova Scotia and the hundreds of miles of ocean beach which are practically unoccupied and readily accessible along the sunrise trail. Facilities are available there, land is reasonable and the municipalities will co-operate in making it economically feasible for people to move in and build cottages. The waters are warm, sheltered and shallow, suitable for swimming in the summer months and good for other water sports. I commend this area to anybody visiting Nova Scotia. They will enjoy it.

• (3:20 p.m.)

An hon. Member: Brule beach.

Mr. Kennedy: Yes, Brule beach is one place. I have mentioned the high tides in the bay of Fundy. I am glad to know that a study is being made to harness these tides to produce hydroelectric energy. It is estimated, according to experts, that the tides in and around Minas basin alone can develop enough power to heat and light half of North America. It would cost a lot of money to develop this undertaking but once developed it would operate with little cost for 100 years. The government would have to participate in the study until it can be shown to private interests that it would be profitable for them to take over and develop the project. The project would serve generations to come. It is not something which would have to be renewed twice in every generation.

It has been a pleasure to take part briefly in this debate and I thank the house for its attention.

[Mr. Kennedy.]

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, it is permissible and customary for members speaking on the budget to discuss practically anything but the budget. I shall confine my few remarks to the budget and to some of the circumstances which appear to me to influence it.

Mr. Knowles: You will need the permission of the house.

Mr. Mather: My hon. friend says I shall need the permission of the house to confine myself to the budget.

An hon. Member: Then you will not speak for long.

Mr. Mather: The Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) has said: "Well, we have increased the old age pension to certain old age pensioners and now we must find the money to pay for that increase." The only way to do that, he suggests, is by increasing taxes. I hope to contradict his proposition.

To show the mixed-up society we live in and the inflationary spiral in which we are involved, let me point out that before those old age pensioners most in need have received the increase their rents have gone up. We are receiving letters from old people saying their rents have been increased. This situation results from the housing shortage and not from mean landlords. The housing shortage is part of the general inflationary situation. The housing shortage means a greater pressure on rents. Rents are rising not only for young wage earners who may be able to afford them but for old people who have little to exist on. I do not blame the government for the housing shortage, though had it acted earlier and more resolutely the housing situation in Canada could have been better than it is today.

It is only fair to say that though the government might have done better the greatest factor influencing inflation in this country is generated not here but south of the international border. The United States is at war. This is the big fact in North America today. What happens in the United States affects our budget, education, pensions and production. The fact is like it or not, that the United States is at war. We are geared to a warfare state. At this time the United States is spending $55 million a day in Viet Nam, $1 billion a week for general defence purposes and $40 billion a year in general war contracts. This is a massive injection of public money, representing an increase of debt, into the private enterprise or capitalistic system. In large measure this enormous amount of money is going into the production of non-consumer goods. One result is that there are fewer consumer goods to be bought by the greatly extended numbers of dollars in circulation.

To increase taxes in our country, particularly sales taxes, in the light of the tremendous economic influence and impact we face from the United States will defeat the purposes the minister has set forth. The minister believes that his policy is anti-inflationary. I contend, particularly in regard to the increase in the sales tax, that his policy will lead to higher prices and higher wages followed by even higher prices and higher wages, with the latter pursuing the former.

There is an alternative to increased taxes open to the government. I have been amused, as a former newspaperman, to read the editorial pages of many Canadian newspapers whose editors sagely nod their heads, agreeing with the Minister of Finance that the only way to get money for the increased old age pensions is to increase taxes. Surely there is a simple and clear alternative to increase taxes—reduced spending.

We should be like a family living on a budget. When a family decides to spend more money on one project it decides to spend less money on another. In my opinion we have a great, shadowy area, national defence, where we might well explore a reduction of expenditure. Let me quote figures for the record. In the last 20 years we have spent in the order of $25 billion on defence. We are now spending $1.5 billion yearly. In this country of 20 million people we spend no less than $4.24 million a day on defence. The total federal personal income tax for the fiscal year April 1, 1965, to March 31, 1966, was little more than $2 billion. In that same period we spent more than $1.5 billion on so-called defence. We spent a sum on defence approximately equal to three fourths of all federal personal income taxes. If we also include the hundreds of millions of dollars we spend on veterans affairs and veterans pensions, which are an adjunct of defence, we see that our total defence spending equals practically all the money received from personal income taxes. We have spent $25 billion in the last 20 years on defence. Though we have done this, and I do not think that all the money has been wasted by any means, I have yet to meet anyone who really contends that in this atomic age Canada can defend herself against nuclear attack. I believe this is an area which ought to be considered seriously before attempts are made to raise more money by increased taxes.

I should like to remind the house of the remarks made by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) who spoke on the subject of defence some time ago outlining some of the economies which must be made and suggesting that in line with the realities of 1967 we should change our defence commitments in such a way as to bring about the withdrawal of our brigade and air divisions from Europe, the closing down of the obsolete Bomarc SAGE air defences, and a review of our present antisubmarine role. He went on to say that in place of today's expenditures we should concentrate on a tri-service or unified, efficient force available for peace keeping roles.

I wish to place before the house the general proposition that instead of moving toward increased taxes we should study means of reducing our expenditures. With this point in mind, I intend to vote against the budget resolutions if I have the opportunity to do so.

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, it had not been my intention to take part in the debate on the mini-budget but since I did not have an opportunity to discuss the main budget last year I felt I had a few remarks I would like to make which would be pertinent at this time. Many of the problems which face us have, of course, already been discussed at length by earlier speakers.

I was impressed by the suggestion of the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Brand) that we should mark our centenary by commemorating our great Canadians by portraying them on stamps or by using other means of keeping them before the public eye for a century to come or for several centuries in Canada's future.

When dealing with budgets we naturally think of taxation. That is the first thing which comes to mind. In the past year there has been no lack of evidence as to how unpopular the government is becoming by trying to go too far too fast so far as taxation is concerned. Simple and direct evidence of this can be found in the postponement of the medicare program which had to be sidetracked and put off for a year until July 1, 1968.

The federal government has increased revenue from income tax and sales tax by about $300 million and will likely raise this sum to $500 million when the national health insurance plan comes into effect. This, of course, is one of the main causes for the rise in the cost of living in Canada until it has reached its highest point in Canadian history. The increase in the present year alone amounted to between 3 and 4 per cent. We are hoping, of course, that the government will take account of some of the suggestions which members of the opposition have put forward during the present debate and on previous occasions to bring about a halt in this inflationary spiral before our goods are priced right out of the world market upon which Canada depends so greatly for its economic survival. All these questions have been discussed already at some length but I refer to them in passing so as to re-emphasize the need to take a serious look at the direction in which we are heading in this centennial year.

I wish to turn now to a subject about which I have been concerned for a long while—our national parks policy. Over the years as a member of this house I have been advocating the development of further parks as well as the development of the tourist industry generally in Canada as one of the basic ways by which we could enhance and accelerate our economy. As we know, Canada is a veritable gem, one of the most beautiful countries in the world. In the last few years I have had the privilege of visiting many parts of the earth's surface and I have come home more satisfied than ever to be a Canadian, to look at this fine land of ours and realize what a potential it has.

If we study our economy we find that our first source of income is the pulp and paper and wood products industry and the second is the export of our agricultural products. Our third source of income—this is not realized by many Canadians—is the tourist industry. Figures indicate that in 1966 the revenue derived from tourism amounted to more than $600 million. In the present year, with the impetus given by the world fair in Montreal, it is anticipated that this figure will reach $1 billion. This shows the extent to which the tourist industry has become an important part of our economy, something to which we should continue to pay serious attention.

I have been advocating a reconsideration of our national parks policy particularly as it applies to Saskatchewan. I was very pleased when the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Laing) told us a year ago last April that at long last it would be government policy to develop a second national park in the province of Saskatchewan. This statement naturally interested and excited the people of our province. As hon. members know, over the years we have lacked a varied basis for our economy. We have been dependent for the most part on agriculture though in the last 10 or 20 years we have begun to come into our own, thanks to attention from the government, particularly the attention paid to some of our problems by the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). Having come from that province and lived there for many years the right hon. gentleman realized that we could not live by bread alone and began to develop a policy to help the western provinces and, of course, the maritimes, whose problems are somewhat similar to ours in the west. The roads to resources program was a basic part of this policy and it is paying off, as Canadians fully realize.

As I say, I was glad to hear the minister announce two years ago that we were going to have a second national park. Since then we have been waiting patiently for its finalization. You, Mr. Speaker, will remember that I questioned the minister about it in the house and on one occasion at your discretion I was ruled out of order. I then placed questions on the order paper as to why the new park was not being brought into being. So far nothing definite has been stated about when the park will be developed or where it will be situated in Saskatchewan. Again I point out to the minister that the people of Saskatchewan would like to hear soon when this development will take place. I am disappointed that it is not being developed this year as another centennial project in the economic life of this great land of ours.

A number of years ago, during the time when the party of which I am a member was in office, we discussed diversification of our economy and the desirability of having subsidiary industries located in various parts of the country which lacked industry. We in Saskatchewan felt it was a province in which there should be such diversification. Through automation our agricultural industry was beginning to increase in productivity, but our population loss was becoming very serious because we were not able to provide sufficient jobs for all the young Saskatchewanites we were raising and educating. The young people had to leave home and move to other provinces. Our loss was the other provinces' gain. Bearing in mind the economics of human resources and the potential of having a lot of people in one particular area, I do not need to emphasize how serious was the problem to Saskatchewan.

Of course we had another problem in Saskatchewan for a number of years. The political climate there was not compatible to the retention or development of industry. The C.C.F. party there does not like to be reminded about this, but its policies were such that industry did not feel too happy about the prospects of going into Saskatchewan.

I can think of one example to emphasize this point, Mr. Speaker, where the former government of Saskatchewan took it upon itself to tax oil companies on the road allowances adjoining land which had been leased to them. This irritated some of the companies to such a considerable extent that they deliberately moved their head offices from Saskatchewan to other provinces rather than pay that unfair tax.

Many other such instances could be cited, but it so happens that we now have another free enterprise government in the province. Of course I do not think it will do quite as well as if a Conservative government were in charge of the province, because I do not feel it is doing a better job than we could in inducing industry to establish in Saskatchewan.

One of the things we greatly hoped for in Saskatchewan was the promised heavy water plant which was discussed on numerous occasions in this house. The fact that it did not materialize was a great disappointment to me as the member representing the area in which it was to be developed. It was a great disappointment to Saskatchewan as a whole, and I know it was very embarrassing to the present premier of Saskatchewan when the proposed project fell through.

To me it is passing strange that two years ago the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) announced that tenders had been advertised for a second heavy water plant. He said that the tenders would be considered in January, 1965. In the month of February, 1965, tenders were opened and the minister got up in the house and made a very positive announcement to the effect that the world's largest heavy water plant would be constructed at Estevan, Saskatchewan, with construction to commence about August of that year.

I do not think I need to relate in great detail the gruesome disappointment that faced the people of Estevan and that part of the province, and the Premier of Saskatchewan, when early in August, 1965, word came over the wires that Western Deuterium Limited had withdrawn its proposal. It had not broken a contract but simply withdrew its proposal to build the plant. Immediately we knew that there had not been any hard and fast agreement with Western Deuterium. The government had just taken the proposal and the minister came into this house and made a positive announcement leading Canadians, particularly the people of Saskatchewan, to believe that at last Saskatchewan was being recognized so far as industrial redistribution was concerned.

I need hardly mention also the furore which was created in the city of Estevan. This was to have been a $40 million plant. You, Mr. Speaker, can appreciate the planning that had to be undertaken in a city like Estevan, with a population of around 9,000 people, to provide the facilities that would be necessary. Such facilities normally cannot be provided overnight. Real estate began to change hands. Several contractors were starting to build apartments to house the 500 people required to build the plant and were making plans to build permanent homes for approximately 200 engineers and technical workers who would be running the plant when it came into operation. The city fathers had to call on the provincial government for support and advice with respect to municipal services that would have to be provided, water facilities, hydro, and sewage. A great deal of expense went into this preparation and it was a very great disappointment to the people of Saskatchewan and the people of this area in particular when the proposal was withdrawn.

Examining the matter in retrospect it seems to me that at that particular time the ministers responsible for national parks policy and the proposed heavy water plant must have been taking advantage of a situation in which they thought they could develop good political propaganda, because everybody seemed to anticipate that there would be an election either in the spring or fall of 1965. These great promises, headlined in the Saskatchewan daily newspapers and supported by the Premier of Saskatchewan himself, made it look as though the federal Liberal government was on its toes and would finally do something for our great province. I maintain that the government now owes us something to compensate for these disappointments, particularly the disappointment over the proposed heavy water plant. Once again I strongly urge the ministers concerned to take serious cognizance of these remarks.

Another matter it is pertinent to mention at this time is Expo '67, which is referred to so often in the House of Commons and of which we are so proud as part of our centennial celebrations. During the Christmas holiday I had the pleasure of visiting our great sister nation to the south for a couple of weeks. I was relatively far south for a period of a week or two. When I mentioned our centennial celebrations and used the phrase "Expo '67", no one seemed to know what I was talking about. They said, "What does that mean?" They were not familiar with the expression. On the contrary, when I spoke of the world fairs at Brussels or Seattle or the recent one in New York city, they knew what I was talking about. It was necessary for me to go to some length to explain that Canada is celebrating its one hundredth birthday and that as a part of the celebration we are developing what we hope will be one of the greatest world fairs in history.

Just a few days ago, during a discussion on a C.B.C. program, the point again was brought home to Canadians that we are not selling Expo '67 in the proper manner. I am not saying this with the intention to disparage the officials of Expo. I believe most of us in the House of Commons, because we are adjacent to the area, are very well aware of what Expo '67 is and are looking forward to attending this great exhibition. I am thinking, however, of the economic welfare of Canada and the population as a whole.

I am sorry the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters) is not in the house. I believe he should take a serious look at this situation to see whether emphasis should be put on the words "Canada's World Fair" instead of the words "Expo 67". The expression "world's fair" amplifies the importance of the event. This is something about which I believe all of us should be concerned. I was very disappointed and concerned when I learned of the lack of knowledge on the part of a great many people who live farther south, people whom we hope will visit us in large numbers this year. They did not know what I was talking about when I used this terminology.

[Mr. Southam.]

Recently, of course, we have been interested in what has been going on closer to home. This brings me back to the budget and finances, as well as the row over the Mercantile Bank. The principal points involved in the Stevens-Coyne-Westbank-British International Finance dispute are set forth in a recent issue of the Financial Post. I believe it would be worth while to quote this editorial for the record because I am in agreement with the opinion stated therein in respect of this matter. This is what the Financial Post has to say about this dispute:

> In 1964, the Porter royal commission on banking and finance, appointed by the Diefenbaker government, recommended that Canada should not allow control of Canadian banks to fall into foreign hands. It was concerned about the grave concentration of power that might shift outside Canada, particularly to New York.
> Canada is not the only country which has faced this problem. Britain hasn't much formal organizational control through legislation but it has immense influence in practice over the conduct of foreign financial institutions. In France, licensing of a foreign bank is subject to the discretion of the government. Japan insists that at least 50 per cent of the stock of all corporations, including banks, must be owned by Japanese, and has extensive controls on foreign exchange and capital movements.
> Denmark, Sweden, Spain, Australia, South Africa all arrange, one way or another, to set limits on foreign banks.
> Even in the U.S., only six states or areas—Washington, Oregon, California, New York, Puerto Rico and Virgin Islands—specifically permit foreign banking and none permits a complete range of banking service.
>
> Canadian policy, at the time First National City Bank was buying Mercantile, was clearly aimed at keeping control of Canadian banks within Canada. If there was any doubt, Canada's finance minister personally made this policy plain to the Citibank people. He didn't have to warn them, but it was surely in their interest that he did so.
> Washington charges that Ottawa is discriminating against U.S. banks. But the new ownership rules are being applied to the Canadian owned banks as well as to the Mercantile. All Canadian banks will have an upper limit of 25 per cent foreign ownership now, and a limit of 10 per cent in any one foreign holder's hands.
> No small nation could have a better big next door neighbour than Canada has, and Americans have reason to feel lucky that they have a bountiful friendly Canada close by.
> Unfortunately, the Mercantile dispute involves an issue on which Ottawa can't back down.
> The U.S. banks accept local restrictions in other countries. Perhaps Washington will have the good sense to realize that Canada's stand is reasonable.

In my opinion, this puts in a nutshell the general thinking of most Canadians. I do not always agree with the policy of the government in respect of economic matters, but here is one instance in which I do agree with them. I think the Financial Post puts this whole matter into proper perspective.

Another matter about which I am concerned has to do with our economic welfare. I am thinking now of western Canada and the proposed increase in the St. Lawrence seaway tolls. I was very interested to receive from the Great Lakes Waterways Development Association a copy of a speech made by Mr. Paul Yakabuski, M.P.P. for Renfrew South, in the Ontario legislature quite recently. I think this more or less exemplifies the feeling of the people in western Canada as well as the feeling of the people of Ontario about this matter. I should like to quote a few excerpts because I think it puts forward my views even more effectively than I could.

When the costs of moving such essential bulk commodities as coal, iron ore, limestone and petroleum products to the industrial heart of Canada go up, a very unfavourable influence is exerted upon the economy of this province.

Higher power and raw material costs to primary manufacturers mean higher costs and prices of semi-finished products to secondary manufacturers. Hence, the cost of Ontario finished goods to wholesale and retail distributors in all parts of Canada go up; and this multiplier effect is reflected in prices to consumers in every part of this country.

In similar fashion, the costs and prices of Canadian natural and manufactured products destined for foreign markets go up, thereby lessening the ability of producers throughout the Canadian economy to compete in the ever more competitive world market.

It is for those reasons that the province of Ontario, along with the governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan—

I should like to re-emphasize this, because it is equally effective in, and pertains to, the western provinces.

It is for those reasons that the province of Ontario, along with the governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan, opposed the seaway toll and Welland ship canal lockage charges recommendations of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority at the toll hearings held in Ottawa on May 25th and 26th last year.

It is interesting to note the following:

Of the 58 submissions with respect to its recommendations presented to the Seaway Authority at the Ottawa toll hearings last year, only two were in favour of the recommended increase in seaway tolls, and the imposition of lockage charges on the Welland ship canal.

But despite the opposition of the Ontario, Alberta and Saskatchewan governments, and of very highly qualified and responsible organizations, to the toll and lockage charges recommendations; and despite a unique debate in the House of Commons on May 26, 1966, inspired by that overwhelming opposition, when members of all five of our political parties including four courageous members of the Liberal party, opposed the recommendations, the Seaway Authority has ignored all the submissions.

I spoke on this matter during the debate in the month of May last year. At that time I emphasized, and I emphasize again, that if these tolls are imposed the people in western Canada will be faced with a double impost because the tolls will affect the shipment of their grain to eastern markets through the St. Lawrence seaway. Eastern Canada is the heart of our industrial area. This is where all the heavy goods such as cars, machinery, refrigerators and so on are manufactured. These goods are shipped through the seaway to the head of the lakes and then through the great area of the west which is not heavily populated and now will have no bridge subsidy formerly payable on goods shipped by rail through northern Ontario. By the time these products reach our markets in western Canada the penalty of any increase imposed in the St. Lawrence system is doubled or tripled. I implore the minister to consider our recommendations not to increase these tolls.

The article to which I referred makes reference to the courage displayed by Liberal members who have spoken in opposition to this measure. This should be an indication to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) that he should look seriously at this policy before making a final decision.

Let me reiterate something said by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Brand), and touched upon by another of my colleagues, the hon. member for Colchester-Hants (Mr. Kennedy), regarding education. The greatest resource in Canada is not gold in the ground, wheat in the field, minerals or forest products, but rather the human resource.

It was interesting and rather disconcerting to read Dr. Deutsch's report on education in Canada and how it affects our productivity. This is something about which we should be concerned during this centennial year. We should try to assist our provinces in turn to provide assistance at the primary, secondary and university levels of education in order that we may utilize to the maximum degree the potential ability of our population.

I was interested in an article written by Dr. Spinks, president of the University of Saskatchewan, who was quoted in the following terms:

"Contrary to a widely held belief, our average educational level is considerably behind that in the United States. In 1961, only 6 per cent of the whole working force in Canada held a university degree compared with 11 per cent in the United States. About 25 per cent in Canada had four years of high school compared to 50 per cent in the U.S."

This same article also states that—

—Dr. Spinks referred to a 1961 National Research Council report which said that unless Canada as an industrial power is content to remain inferior to the U.S. and the United Kingdom, a way must be found to induce industry to devote more of its resources to research.

Another paragraph of the article reads as follows:

Noting the emphasis placed by recent economic studies on "the overriding influence of education" in increasing the gross national product, Dr. Spinks said, "it is not just chance that for many years Canadian productivity has been only 70 per cent of that of the United States".

Dr. Spinks said it was not just chance that productivity has been only 70 per cent of that in the United States, but because our standard of education has not been developed on a basis similar to the one in that great country. These facts should weigh heavily on our minds, and the authorities responsible for alleviating this situation should adopt as a centennial project—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. I regret to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Southam: Mr. Speaker, I have just about concluded my remarks, and can do so within a minute or two.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Has the hon. member leave to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Southam: Thank you. A survey was conducted a number of years ago in the province of Saskatchewan regarding the relationship between education and income. At that time the average income there was approximately $5,000 per year. That was approximately ten years ago. That survey was based on a productive life expectancy of 40 years, from age 20 to 60. On that basis the average individual would contribute something in the neighbourhood of $200,000 to society over a period of 40 years.

Using that as an example it seems to me that we could enhance our productivity by increasing average annual salaries to $6,000 or $7,000. This can only be done by developing the potential capacity of individuals through higher education. About 30 years ago Saskatchewan had a population of roughly 850,000. It gradually increased to about 860,000, but then started to decrease because of automation in agriculture and an unfavourable political climate. The people in Saskatchewan desire to enjoy the same standards of services and education as are enjoyed by other areas of Canada. Because of this decrease in population the tax load was borne by a smaller number of citizens. This resulted in a very high tax structure. It is imperative that we maintain some even distribution of population and industry. We must improve our educational system as quickly as possible in order to obtain a better balanced economy.

Some months ago a very interesting article appeared in the Weekend Magazine regarding secondary education in schools of the non-academic type. The minister of labour in the former Progressive Conservative administration the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) realized that one of the basic causes of unemployment in this country was lack of knowledge or specialized training. As a result of his efforts our vocational and educational trade school program was developed. Very few people realize what this program has done to increase our productivity and economic strength. We have been happy to note that the present government has not cut back on this program, although there has been some indication that it may place more of this load on provincial governments. Vocational training is something that should be emphasized throughout Canada, because not everyone can become a professional. This is an age of specialization and we must have people trained in specialized fields.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the government to consider seriously the comments which have been made, particularly those in respect of the province of Saskatchewan. Any improvement in the economy of that province will naturally be reflected by a general improvement in the economic welfare of this country.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I wish to deal with one major issue. It is an issue that is not new to this house and is one about which I am sure we will hear much more in the ensuing months. I am particularly glad that the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) is in her seat this afternoon, because I am hopeful that these words will provide some impetus or motivation, particularly on the part of her department, with regard to what I consider to be a critical problem in our country today. This is a problem related to the whole sphere of political action and political responsibility, not only in respect of those who are elected representatives or civil servants, but people generally.

Perhaps because I am a freshman member of parliament some of my reaction to the systems by which we govern ourselves will be considered rather bold. Perhaps, in some senses of the word, they will be even naïve. But one of the things that has never ceased to amaze me since becoming a member of parliament is the very close relationship that exists between those of us who work on this floor and those who occupy the press gallery. It is that crucial relationship, indeed, that establishes some kind of rapport and understanding in the country for what politics and political action are all about. When that relationship breaks down or becomes confused, not only does parliament suffer but I think the whole process of self-government suffers greatly.

One of the things that has continued to concern me very much about this whole question is the fact that we have invoked in our political processes and parliamentary activity a kind of discrimination that I think would not be tolerated for one moment in any other sphere of human activity. We have continued to acquiesce in this discrimination, to allow it to be accepted, almost without question, until we have given a kind of preferential treatment to one aspect of the mass media of communication and discriminated against the rest. I think that part of the problem of relating the process that takes place in this house to people generally is faulty and inadequate communication. Marshall McLuhan would put it this way, I suppose, that we have moved from the era of print to one of the electronic age in which now it is possible for people to become, almost quite literally, plugged-in on the important events of our civilization. I believe that in our time we have seen this most uniquely and clearly when events of great national and international significance have taken place.

I do not believe it would ever have been possible in any previous era for a whole continent, and one might say almost the whole of a civilization, to become related as one community to the events in Dallas and Washington on a particular week end in 1963, had it not been for the availability of television. Television transformed what was a national and somewhat localized event into an international, indeed almost universal, experience. We also have the further experience that continues to take place from time to time of the occasional satellite attempts, particularly by the United States, to which immediate access is given by television to millions of viewers.

We have had events of national significance in our country over the past few years, but they have not commonly been available to people in some of their most important points because we have exerted a kind of media discrimination. This discrimination is not something that began this year or last year, but rather it has been going on for a number of years and has been tolerated almost without comment by nearly everyone.

So I speak out for a new understanding of the nature and uses of mass media and ask that they not be used to expose for purposes of power or popularity any individual in this house or outside it, but to create a more genuine, a more thoughtful and a more purposeful dialogue between our activity in the house and the thoughts and desires of the nation. I think it has been interesting to observe over the past few weeks the reaction of many people—it has been almost general across the country—to one of the most recent television dramas of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I refer to the Quentin Durgens program. I wonder whether hon. members have thought, as I have, why this program so immediately created an interest on the part of people living all across this country.

I am sure that many members of this house have discovered in their travels to their constituencies that this popular program, which was on the television screen for the short period of seven or eight weeks, established a whole new series of thoughts and considerations and, perhaps what is even more important, sympathy for those who labour within the confines of parliament. Perhaps we could say that one of the reasons was that it was a very good drama, that the writer George Robertson and the producer David Gardner were men of exceptional ability and were able to provide us with good television entertainment. I believe there was more to this program than entertainment, because time and time again it has been made quite clear to me by many friends and neighbours that here, for the first time, people who had never had the opportunity of coming to grips with parliament were able to get inside, to understand strange and baffling terms like "caucus", "party whips" and "parliamentary committees". They were able to understand even in some minor way what they meant. I think this is crucial.

If there has been cynicism, and there has, on the part of many as to the effectiveness of our parliamentary process today, I think this one, short television series did more to dispel it than any other single thing in modern day experience. This program taught us a lesson, I hope, that we have in our systems of mass communication, radio and television, an unparalleled opportunity to greatly facilitate and make much more effective our whole program of self-government. I think it is tragic that we have for so long barred the door against these two important media and exercised a kind of discrimination in this respect.

I am told that a number of years ago when radio first became significant in our country, the only reporters allowed in the press gallery were those who were providing written reports for newspapers, magazines and journals; but of course some of the radio systems wanted to have access to what was going on in parliament and I am told they made application to become members of the press gallery.

Somehow it seemed odd and strange to allow these people who were not writing the news, but speaking it, to be given that access, and therefore in the early years those who provided news for the radio waited outside the press gallery, and when some member came out they asked him questions to find out what had been going on inside. This seems ridiculous to us today. I do not think that anyone would rise in his place in the house and demand that all those who report for radio and television should be kept out of the press gallery. But we do. I know we allow them to come in physically to write down what they hear or what they see, but when it comes to someone recording either on film or on tape the events which take place in the house, objections are raised as if this would almost defile this house. I think that this is a tragic misreading of the opportunities which both the radio and television provide to us in this electronic era.

It seems strange also, when politicians are so inclined to look for precedents for actions, that we are more than willing to ignore a number of precedents both in our system and in other countries that have made available to the mass media the great forums for decision making and legislative action.

A few years ago when I was travelling in Australia I remember being able to tune in the radio at any point in that country and hear at that very moment what great matters of state were being discussed in their legislative chambers. It seemed to me a great thing. I am not sure whether the audiences there are very large, in fact I believe that the reverse is true, but the opportunity is there, and that is of immeasurable value.

I am not so much concerned about this chamber specifically but about the various urgent, important and interesting matters that are being discussed in our committees. Surely this has been a year in which it would have been more than interesting to have live reports, video taped records or tape recorded reports of the various committee discussions such as perhaps the discussions which are going on this very afternoon in the defence committee, those that dealt earlier with the problems of the Mercantile Bank, or more recently the altercation between Mr. Coyne and Mr. Stevens, or even earlier in this session the long discussions over the "Seven Days" controversy. I am sure there was a great deal of public interest for all these matters, and yet in each and every one of these committees the cameras were treated as if they were some kind of furtive alien.

In some instances the television camera was poised outside the committee room door, lurking as if it were some kind of an unwanted interloper, and occasionally when the opportunity arose, glimpsing some picture within. And yet, sitting at the very front desk in each committee, was the press, writing, if they wished, every single word that was expressed in that committee and also adding for the benefit of the reader any particular emotional expressions or nuances that might not be expressed in the verbalized word.

I cannot understand why, when we have encompassed so much that is modern and new in our technology, we have continued to exercise a kind of prejudice against the visual and the aural, because it is true as true can be that the major decisions of people that are being made with respect to the whole of the democratic process are largely being made in response to what they have seen on the television screen, or what they have heard on the radio. Indeed if we were to take a survey I am sure that we would discover that the great majority of our population today spends so much time watching television—well over 20 hours a week on the average—that this is their great forum of communication.

In spite of this we have effectively blocked year after year the availability to people of what is happening in this place. I think we have done a great disservice to parliament, and even more than that we have done a great disservice to the people of this country.

This matter has been raised on a number of occasions during the present session, and at this point I would like to remind the house of what has been said, and of the understanding which we now have on this matter. On one of the earliest occasions in this session, on May 4, 1966, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), in discussing the questions related to the establishment of quorums in the house and in committees, said the following, as recorded on page 4675 of Hansard:

> I have on more than one occasion—and this is an opportunity to raise this matter again—expressed the view that if we wish to restore parliament so the people will understand its operations, one means to bring that about would be through broadcasts or television representation of parliament from day to day. I can tell you, sir, that if this practice were adopted in committees as an experiment there would be no difficulty about having a full quorum in committees at all times.

It has been argued sometimes that to introduce these dangerous communication instruments of radio and television into this house and into committees would cause many hon. members who sit here faithfully day after day to simply sit in their offices, or wherever they might be, and watch television or listen over the radio to what was taking place in the house. Anyone who makes that kind of a statement does not understand the nature of these media and, even more more than that, does not understand the nature of politicians, for I have found very few politicians—and these were not politicians for very long—who were anxious to run away continually from these media and, even more than that, very reverse would be true, as the right hon. gentleman remarked. If we introduced these mass media into this house we might indeed find that more members would be sitting here during the debates, and in fact it might indeed be difficult to extract them to their offices or to committee meetings, where they have to be from time to time.

On Thursday, November 10, 1966 the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Mather), in dealing with the same matter, asked the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) the following question:

> I have a question for the Secretary of State, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister consider doing what the British government is doing at this time in respect of a study regarding the televising of the proceedings of parliament?

And the minister answered:

> I had the opportunity this summer of observing what is being done and contemplated in this regard in Australia, New Zealand, Italy and Britain. I am informed that Mr. Speaker on behalf of the House of Commons has made a very detailed study of the U.K. experience and plans to telecast in this regard.
> This might be a question about which, under the estimates to which they are related—those for the B.B.G. and C.B.C.—the broadcasting committee might well decide to hear witnesses and to discuss this matter. It will be remembered, however, that when such a motion was placed before that committee to televise the committee proceedings during the Seven Days matter, it was rejected. Perhaps Mr. Speaker on behalf of all members will discuss this matter with the broadcasting committee on the basis of that information which I am sure he now has.

An interesting footnote to the comment by the Secretary of State—and of course her information on the first decision of the broadcasting committee was correct—was that at a later date this fall the committee reversed its recommendation and indeed recommended to Mr. Speaker that broadcasting of committees be attempted on an experimental basis.

A further question was raised on the same matter by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition on November 30, 1966 when he asked the following question:

> Now that the question of television in the British parliament has been dealt with by a free vote of the British House of Commons on a motion moved for the purpose, would the Prime Minister consider having a motion placed before the house, free of the whips, to provide for television in this house? I suggest that it might be done on an experimental basis to start with so as to allow us in the house to decide whether it is appropriate at present and in the public interest that an opportunity be given to the Canadian people to see parliament in action. Such a move also would enable Canadians to appreciate better than they otherwise can the operation of this institution.

• (4:30 p.m.)

The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) replied as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, this is a very important question of course and I will be very glad to give it my consideration along the lines indicated by my right hon. friend.

Unfortunately, that was on November 30 last and we have had no further indication in this house as to what action might be taken. I have been heartened from time to time, Mr. Speaker, by the comments of the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Turner), who has in two or three public speeches made remarks to the effect we are moving in the direction of understanding when we permit the accessibility of radio and television to our parliamentary activities.

Finally, I should like to read some letters which form part of the evidence of the broadcasting committee. The first letter is from the chairman of the broadcasting committee to Mr. Speaker and it reads:

> I am instructed by the standing committee on broadcasting, films and assistance to the arts to convey to you the committee's opinion that consideration should be given to radio and television broadcasting of a committee's proceedings on an experimental basis. Enclosed for your information is a copy of the twelfth report of the committee's subcommittee on agenda and procedure which was adopted by the committee at its meeting last night.

The Speaker's reply reads as follows:

> This will acknowledge your letter of December 13 in which you bring to my attention the recommendations contained in the report of your subcommittee on agenda and procedure.
> I am sure you share my doubts as to the committee's authority to submit recommendations regarding radio and television broadcasting of committee proceedings. Looking over the terms of reference of the standing committee on broadcasting, films and assistance to the arts it would appear that it is not empowered by the house to consider the proposals contained in the subcommittee's report.
> In my view authority to broadcast or telecast committee proceedings can only be given by the House of Commons itself and I, as Speaker, cannot substitute my judgment for that of the house in this regard.

This would seem to leave the matter squarely in the hands of this place. It is my urgent hope that the government, and more particularly the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh), will bring this matter before the house this year. We have talked in a very grandiose way of the great things we are going to do in 1967. Everyone has been making so many comments that it has become almost a standing joke as to what your own particular centennial project will be. Surely, along with the many other things we have set aside for ourselves to do as worthy projects on this 100th birthday, there is one we might consider for parliament itself. We should make a real attempt to make accessible to the people of Canada what we do in this place. I think if we adopt an enlightened, realistic attitude to the nature and purpose of the mass media we will effect some changes here of real importance.

[Mr. MacDonald (Prince).]

We will look to the extension of opportunity in this house and in committee for the radio and television media. I frankly think we have missed the boat time and again by denying the rights and privileges to radio and television which we have granted to the print media for 100 years now. Surely it is high time, in this centennial year, that we adopted the same fair attitude toward radio and television. There are many benefits to be gained by it, not the least of which I think is an enlightened public opinion. As every member of this house knows, little can be done in this place unless the public will it to be so. If we are anxious to increase the quality and effectiveness of the legislation that is passed by this house, that is discussed in the various committees, we will have no fear whatever of making available in our many forums complete accessibility to the media of radio and television.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): If I might, Mr. Speaker, for a few moments I should like to follow along the same theme as the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacDonald). I should like to make a few comments that appear to me to need to be said in so far as the image of parliament is concerned, and in so far as the great demand that seems to be pressing upon his institution to modernize its rules in such a way as to make what many feel has to be a more effective day to day working operation.

What concerns me, and has concerned me for some time, is that on many occasions in this forum we are asked to give up some of the rights we have as a legislative body and turn them over to the executive. More and more, the executive is becoming all-powerful and the legislative body less and less powerful. Whether you look at the problem of the separation of powers from the point of view of political science or philosophy, or whether you look at it on the basis of the day to day work of this institution as compared with the executive, I do not believe you will find there is a great deal of merit in the suggestions that are put forward.

In my opinion, this is a debating forum. This is the forum in which we try to get an expression of opinion from all corners of the house, from all parts of the nation, as to whether or not a given piece of legislation is of real benefit to the development of the nation. At the same time, we give careful consideration to the ways in which the taxpayers' money is being spent. So long as that is the main responsibility of this forum, I do not believe we should tamper too much with the individual rights of members of parliament, nor do I believe we should greatly strengthen the already strong executive arm of government.

At the same time, I believe there is a responsibility to go into all the various areas of the economic spectrum in our committees. I do not believe this necessarily means we have to develop to a greater degree the kind of thing that seems to be developing in our committees system. For instance, at the moment we have a large body of members who belong to a certain committee of this house away in another part of the nation taking a first-hand look at a certain problem. I do not believe there is anything wrong with committees travelling, if first-hand information is going to be of value. However, I do not believe you need 30 or 40 members away looking at this particular problem. I do not believe the money spent carrying out such a project is really necessary, and I believe our committees ought to be a good deal smaller. At the same time if we spend money, making available to this smaller group of members a greater research capability, we shall be in a better position to get from them a better judgment. They will be able to judge whether the government is approaching a matter properly.

We could learn a great deal from the United States committees system. Studying the congressional committees system of the United States would be money well spent, especially if two or three men could do a job, instead of having large bodies of members having to travel over the country.

The present committees system of the House of Commons is unfair to committee members. Ministers, arguing for their legislation come before committees with batteries of individuals who prepared the legislation, studied the problem in detail, and who tell the group of committee members why the legislation ought to be approved in that particular form. In the end the members of parliament are brainwashed. Who are they, to argue with the battery of professionals? The individual members have other responsibilities. They can do research work, but their time and financial resources are limited. The resources of the country are available to the minister who wants his legislation approved. It is almost impossible, under the present system, for legislation not to be approved.

Let us take a look at the situation as it exists. Twenty four or more committees are sitting, most with a quorum of 20 or more members. If all the committees should meet at the same time nobody would sit in the house. Yet, when people come to this chamber they look down and say: "My goodness, only 20 or 25 members are in the chamber. Where are the rest of them, who have been elected to this institution?" Parliament is given a black eye because the public does not understand that a member may be doing something outside the chamber which he feels is important to his constituents. All too often the impression is that members are away.

When the bells ring for a vote you find, suddenly, that 100 members appear to vote for something. All I say is that in any given time too many committees make too many demands on the available members. Another thing not considered is that, though 265 members are elected to this chamber, 27 are cabinet ministers, a few more are parliamentary secretaries, and some others are involved in the operation of the house. Less than 265 members therefore are available for committee work.

Ministers and parliamentary secretaries are involved in the day to day operations of government and cannot be available for other duties. The number of members available to serve on the 24 committees becomes smaller and—I am looking at the Liberal whip—the whips of the parties have an awful time rounding up members for committees, or to form a quorum in the chamber. Yet the public, looking at the chamber and seeing 25 members, say, "Well, that's parliament for you." Often we cannot explain to the public what a member of parliament does outside the chamber.

If you cut the number of committee members down and gave every member of the house the right to ask questions of any committee with the consent of the chairman, and if you gave research assistance to those serving on committees, you would soon find that experts would develop in the various fields of government. They need not be members of the government.

I must mention something else. When you come to Ottawa, especially if you are a young man and ambitious, you will find that besides intelligence and aggressiveness, religion, where you come from and many other things will determine whether you will sit on the treasury benches—that is, assuming your party forms the government. We cannot do anything about that, but we can do this: We can make the position of a committeeman truly significant. We can arrange affairs so that, by spending time and energy, a man may become an expert in a field. If a minister came before a committee seeking approval of his legislation, his battery of experts would not in those circumstances brainwash the committee members. The minister would find himself confronted by men who know their subjects. Cabinet ministers in the United States are not elected, but they have to convince their committees, often composed of experts. In our country, if this suggestion were adopted, the minister would know that his legislation would be subject to educated, learned criticism.

Surely, if we left our rules alone, if we stopped eroding the responsibilities of individual members and endeavoured to make our committees system more effective we would find that legislation returning to the chamber would secure a quicker passage than at present.

Where a committee is composed of, say, 20 men, the majority of them are government members concerned first and foremost with the government's image, whether in committee or in the house. They have at all times to be concerned about the government's image, whether in committee or in this house. The opposition members find great difficulty in amending the legislation. They must either approve or vote against it. So little progress is made before the legislation comes back to the house, and once again hon. members find themselves in the same position as before; I do not see that we are much further ahead.

I understand there is another committee which is supposed to leave in the course of the next two days and go in two directions, taking with it a large number of the members of the house. I do not see anything wrong about members getting across the country, talking to people and hearing different points of view. But I think we are sent here, basically, to do the countrys' business, and most of the country's business can be done here. Most of the groups which desire to make presentations to committees are financially capable of coming here and explaining their position.

On far too many occasions members are not as well equipped to understand these submissions as they would be if better research facilities were available to them. I have been down to Washington on more than one occasion on Canada-United States parliamentary trips. What impressed me there was that when a congressman or a senator walked into a committee to discuss a subject he had either one or two men behind him, and when a question was referred to him he could turn to them and discuss it, very much as is done in this house when estimates are before us for consideration and the deputy minister, and other officials, are available to the minister for consultation. These men in Washington were capable of speaking on a great range of subjects in a very learned way, because they had the services of research assistants who could bring them up to date at all times on any subject.

If we are to have a more effective parliament we shall need more learned members of parliament. In my opinion there is nothing wrong with the I.Q. of any individual who can get himself elected to parliament; but it is one thing to have the I.Q., and another to be able to develop knowledge in many different fields. The complexity of government in Canada today as compared with 1867 is so great that, rather than saying "penny wise and pound foolish" we would be pound wise and penny foolish if we did not soon move into an area where we tried to assist all members of parliament, regardless of the party with which they are associated, by providing research facilities which would make them better able to understand and criticize whatever was being done. After all, the object of all members should be to produce the legislation which will bring the greatest amount of benefit to the Canadian nation, and this is one way in which this can be accomplished.

There are several ways and means of streamlining some of the rules of the house. For example, I do not see any great value in retaining any longer the resolution stage of bills. During the resolution stage we talk on the same subject as we debate when second reading is discussed. It is a duplication. While the present arrangement may have had merits at one time, I do not think any useful purpose is served by its continuation.

The arrangement for the question period has worked out very well. I was concerned about what might happen when this new idea of a limited question period was introduced, but I think it has worked to the satisfaction of all members of the house. However, there are some other suggested provisional rules which cause me concern. Certainly the rule with regard to the time allotted for a discussion of estimates causes me concern, because we ended the last session without an opportunity—because of a choice made by the opposition—for having any kind of discussion on estimates, which represented a great deal of the money which was spent. I do not think this is of benefit to parliament in the long run.

If it is necessary to set a time limit—and I do not think it is, necessarily—I believe some time must be spent on all the departments, so that no department is allowed to pass unscanned, without any kind of surveillance by members.

There are other rules which might be streamlined. I do not think it is necessary for speeches to be as long as they are now. We could save time there. I do not know whether the debate on the speech from the throne, or the debate on the budget need to be as long as they are at present, though when we have a chamber composed of as many members as this one is, we must make sure there is reasonable opportunity for everyone to speak.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills and private bills.

• (5:00 p.m.)

TOBACCO RESTRAINT ACT

REPEAL OF LEGISLATION RESPECTING USE BY JUVENILES

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-36, to repeal the Tobacco Restraint Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill which I have introduced to repeal the Tobacco Restraint Act was given first reading in the house in July, 1964, and now almost three years later we have an opportunity to discuss the question. I have had to re-introduce the bill on April 8, 1965, and on January 24, 1966. I am happy that in February, 1967, it has been called for debate. I note an hon. member is applauding the speed of the cabinet in making it possible for the bill to come forward so fast.

I would like to state at the very first moment of moving second reading that the act which this bill seeks to repeal, chapter 266 of the revised statutes, entitled "An Act to Restrain the Use of Tobacco by Young Persons," is being broken every day that the House of Commons sits throughout the entire year. It is broken with the open consent of the members of the house and absolutely nothing is done about it. No charge is laid under the act.

I make this statement without any fear of contradiction because under this ridiculous chapter 266, an Act to Restrain the Use of Tobacco by Young Persons, any juvenile under the age of 16 who has cigarettes or cigarette papers in his possession at any time is guilty of an offence and can be convicted. Yet in the House of Commons we have a fine force of page boys, of whom the great majority are under age 16. I do not smoke myself, but I know for a fact that members of the house who do indulge call the page boys to their desks time without number each day, give them the necessary funds and ask them to go to the cafeteria on the fifth floor and purchase cigarettes for them.

The moment a juvenile buys the cigarettes not only is he guilty but the person selling them to him is guilty as well. But no charges are ever laid.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Cowan: Yes, shame. The page boys bring the cigarettes back to the members and most of them retire, either behind the curtains or into the members' lobbies, and indulge in the pastime of smoking.

There are sections of this act, chapter 266, that cause offence to me and to those who have read it—and I am sorry to say that is a minority of the house—because under this act presumption can be the convicting force.

In section 2 of the act it is stated:

> Every one is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction in the case of a first offence to a penalty.....who.....sells.....cigarettes or cigarette papers—

—to a juvenile; and then there are these words:

> —which tobacco he knows or has reason to believe is for the use of that person.

How in the name of heaven can anybody tell what is in the mind of a tobacconist when he sells cigarettes or cigarette papers to a child under the age of 16? How do you know the tobacconist "has reason to believe" the child is going to use the tobacco?

Section 3 of the act goes on to point out:

> It is the duty of any constable or person having the powers of a constable, or person authorized so to do by any by-law in that behalf made by any authority or person having power to make such by-law, to seize any cigarettes, cigarette papers or tobacco in any form other than cigarettes in the possession of any person apparently—

—note "apparently"—

—under the age of 16 years whom he finds smoking or chewing—

And this is the stumbling block in the whole thing to which all members of the House of Commons must object—

—whom he finds smoking or chewing or about to smoke or chew tobacco in any street or public place.

How is anyone going to tell whether someone is about to smoke or chew tobacco just because he may have some in his possession? Mr. Speaker, I had a hard time in the city of Ottawa getting this plug of chewing tobacco which I hold in my hand. I have had it for three years, having bought it when I first introduced this bill in 1964, and this act says that a person may be guilty who is "about to chew tobacco in any street or public place."

Mr. Knowles: So that is what we smell about you.

Mr. Cowan: It is Sweet Briar. The fact that I have this plug of chewing tobacco in my possession and in my hand I can assure you is no assurance that I am about to chew it, but under this act it is an offence for a juvenile to be about to chew it, and I would like to find the police officer or crown attorney who can prove it.

Section 4 of the act returns to the child under the age of 16 and says of him:

—who, being under the age of 16 years... has in his possession, whether for his own use or not,—

And this is what covers the page boys here.

—any cigarettes or cigarette papers—

—is guilty of an offence—

—and liable on summary conviction in the case of first offence to be reprimanded, in the case of a second offence to a penalty not exceeding one dollar, and in the case of a third or subsequent offence to a penalty not exceeding four dollars, who, being under the age of 16 years, smokes or chews tobacco in a street or public place, or purchases or has in his possession, whether for his own use or not—

These are the cigarettes the page boys are taking back to members.

—any cigarettes or cigarette papers, or purchases or has in his possession for his own use tobacco in any form other than cigarettes.

I draw this to the attention of the house to show how ridiculous the act is. The act was introduced in 1908, which is only 59 years ago, and there is not a recorded conviction under it. Why have the statute books been cluttered up with an act like this, which is ridiculous on the face of it, which presumes people to be guilty, and on top of that has never had a conviction under it in 59 years?

We come again to those under 16 years of age. Section 5 says:

If, on complaint to a justice, it is established to his satisfaction that an automatic machine, for the sale of cigarettes, cigars or tobacco in any form—

I might interpose, Mr. Speaker, that somebody has been kind enough to send me a cigar. It is a Simon Statesman. Thank you. I am glad it is not a "Politician"; and referring to the cigar I would like to jump for a moment from section 5 of the act to section 7 which says:

For the purposes of this act the word "cigarette" includes any small cigar made of tobacco rolled up in paper, tobacco leaf or any other material.

So, the act covers cigars as well.

To return to section 5, it says:

If, on complaint to a justice, it is established to his satisfaction that an automatic machine, for the sale of cigarettes, cigars or tobacco in any form, kept on any premises, is being used by persons under the age of 16 years, the justice may order the person on whose premises the machine is kept to take such precautions to prevent its being so used as are specified in the order, or, if necessary, to remove the machine within any specified time.

Now, down in the Chateau Laurier hotel, which is government property operated by the C.N.R., there is a cigarette vending machine in the front lobby, and it has this prissy statement on the face of it, "Sales of cigarettes to minors are forbidden by law." I watched that machine for a while the other evening when I was down there and you would be surprised at the number of young lads who came in and purchased cigarettes by putting the necessary funds in the slot, pressing the proper lever, and out popped the cigarettes.

No one was there to see whether they were under 16 years or not. The machine will sell to anybody. You just put in the proper amount of money and press the proper lever. How can you convict a machine for selling to minors when you cannot question the machine in court?

Section 5(3) reads as follows:

Any person upon whose premises there is any such machine may himself or by his agent seize any cigarettes, cigars or tobacco obtained from such machine and in the possession of any person apparently—

Note the word "apparently".

—under the age of 16 years using such machine or smoking or about to smoke such cigarettes, cigars or tobacco.

I would like someone to define just what is that state of smoking in which you find a juvenile "about to smoke such cigarettes, cigars or tobacco."

Then in section 8 you have in my opinion the most heinous part of the act:

For the purposes of this act any person who appears to the justice dealing with an information or complaint hereunder to be under the age of 16 years shall be presumed to be under that age unless it is shown by evidence that he is in fact over that age, and the provisions of the Criminal Code relating to the proof of the age of young persons apply to offences under this section.

● (5:10 p.m.)

Here we have an act which presumes a person to be under the age of 16, and if he has any tobacco in his possession for his own use or not, he is automatically guilty. These words which presume a person to be in a situation where he is automatically guilty go against my grain. This recalls to me only one thing; that is, the proceedings in this house in respect of section 98 as we knew it. All of us are aware of that nefarious section which in 1919 was introduced by the late Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, and which was known in Canada as the section relating to unlawful association. I am not one who was unfriendly toward the former Co-operative Commonwealth Federation or is unfriendly to the New Democratic Party. I have admired their stand on many questions for many years. I maintain that section 98 might still be on the statute books of Canada had it not been for the insistent demand of the late J. S. Woodsworth that the section be repealed and the continuous support that the Toronto Star gave to the demands that this be repealed. I take off my hat to Hon. Ernest Lapointe for his great efforts in this matter.

I have before me a photostatic copy of section 98 and also copies of sections 97A and 97B. Prior to 1919 the sections were 97A and 97B. Then when amendments were made in 1919 they came into the Criminal Code under the number 98. The first section is labelled "Unlawful Associations." In section 2 of that nefarious act we have:

Any property, real or personal, belonging or suspected to belong to an unlawful association—

Then in section 4 we have, with regard to any prosecutions under this section, the words:

—if it be proved that the person charged has

(a) attended meetings of an unlawful association ... it shall be presumed, in the absence of any proof to the contrary, that he is a member of such unlawful association.

This was a miserable piece of legislation. Hon. Ernest Lapointe on April 23, 1928, in introducing a bill to kill this section stated:

A bill similar to this has been adopted by this house five times, and in each case it has been rejected by the other chamber.

He went on to point out the nefarious features of the act. In that debate Mr. Woodsworth, as reported at page 2308 of Hansard for April 23, 1928, refers to any property belonging to or suspected to belong to such an organization, and then makes the ringing declaration:

I have always entertained the idea that British justice presumes a man innocent until he is proved guilty. In this case the presumption is that he is guilty until he can prove himself innocent.

In this ridiculous tobacco bill of 1908 the child is presumed to be uder 16 years of age until he proves he is over. I would ask this house to agree to the repeal of this ridiculous piece of legislation. Machines are selling tobacco to anyone who can put money in the slot. We know children under 16 years of age are smoking. No convictions have ever been made under this act in 59 consecutive years.

In calling for the repeal of the act, I should like to read to you the explanatory notes, which were written by a more able person than myself:

The long title of the act which this bill purposes to repeal is: "An Act to restrain the use of Tobacco by Young Persons."

This legislation which has been on our statute books since 1908 has certainly not accomplished what it started out to do. No doubt its purpose was excellent but it has had a contrary effect to what was intended. Like all law which is a dead letter and is not observed it tends to bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

Furthermore it is vicious legislation in that it is an attempt at thought control for it provides punishment (section 3) for a juvenile "about to smoke or chew tobacco" and (in section 4) for a juvenile who "has in his possession, whether for his own use or not, any cigarettes etc."

Many people have been killed by blows from a hammer or an ax, perhaps it should be made a crime to be found in possession of one of those horrible instruments.

Mr. Speaker, I ask the members of the house to repeal this act. An Act to restrain the use of Tobacco by Young Persons, in the same manner this house repealed section 98 because under our system of justice a man is presumed to be innocent until proven guilty.

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I am sure many members of this house, and I think particularly members on this side, regard the hon. member for York Humber (Mr. Cowan) as an intermittent source of entertainment and enlightenment. In my view he is rather like the lightenment. In my view he is ratherlike the lighthouse with the revolving light which between periods of darkness flashes out, illuminating the landscape and revealing usually its unattractive qualities.

In rising today a few words in respect of this bill, frankly I am of two minds whether I should support it or oppose it. As some hon. members may know, I am one of those in the house who has taken an interest in trying to encourage the government and the country to become aroused over the epidemic disease connected with cigarette addiction. From that point of view it might be supposed that I would naturally oppose any step which would repeal any legislation intended even to reduce or curtail cigarette smoking among our young people.

Imust say that I think so little of our existing Tobacco Restraint Act that two years ago I brought forward a bill to amend it, in the hope that we might be able to put some teeth into it and modernize it so that it will meet the modern conditions of 1967, rather than those of 1908, the year of its origin. Therefore, personally I do not very much care whether the bill the hon. member brings forward is successful, or whether the existing Tobacco Restraint Act is repealed or not. I believe it might be better to amend it rather than repeal it. At any rate, I welcome the opportunity to say a few words and to put some of my views on record concerning the very serious need in this country for better legislation on this subject.

The situation regarding cigarette smoking among our young people in the year 1967 is very different from what it was when this legislation was enacted in 1908. Today we have some 9,000 young people every month starting to smoke cigarettes. They do so partly as a result of the inducement-type advertising on television, radio and in the press. The Tobacco Restraint Act of 1908 has no control over that situation. Throughout the world we have health departments and health experts who have looked into the disease situation. They have all come to the same basic conclusion, that there is a proven link between cigarette smoking and lung cancer and heart disease.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Our own Canadian Department of National Health and Welfare has done great work in recent years in this sphere. Early this week it released another report underlining the link between cigarette smoking and heart disease. In spite of these educational efforts by health departments, the epidemic of cigarette smoking, with its attendant ill health, continues.

Perhaps it would be appropriate to quote from what has been said on this subject by a medical man of another country. The chief medical officer of the ministry of health in Great Britain said this, as reported in the New Statesman of January 20, 1967:

> The increase will go on so long as these undoubted causes of death and illness are sold to a gullible public. Lung cancer and chronic bronchitis, the legacies of cigarette smoking, are not idle threats conjured up in these reports. They are the causes of five times as many deaths as follow road accidents in a year; yet they excite far less comment.

He was, of course, referring to cigarettes.

I should like also to quote very briefly from a United States authority, R. T. Ravenholt, as reported in the August-September issue last year of the National Newsletter. He said:

> The "cigarette disease" has been described ... as the foremost preventable cause of death in the United States. He stated that for the American male aged 35 to 65 who smokes 20 or more cigarettes a day, tobacco is a hazard to life which is equal to all other hazards combined.
> It is known that 80 per cent to 90 per cent of all lung cancers occur among smokers of cigarettes and more recently it has been recognized that the smoker has an increased risk of dying prematurely of other types of cancer, of heart disease or of chronic chest disease.

It is refreshing to find some progress being made in the combat against the cigarette disease. In England for ten months, there has been no television advertising promoting cigarettes. Quite recently in the United States the New Yorker has joined the Reader's Digest in refusing to carry cigarette advertising. In Canada we find that the government on the one hand spends money to discourage young people from smoking, yet on the other accepts revenue through tobacco taxation. It spends a great deal of money in the development of better types of tobacco. These things all take place at the same time.

Our government continually declines to request the C.B.C. to set an example by refusing to promote cigarette consumption through advertising. No matter how our legislation is worded, as the hon. member has suggested, and no matter how active is our educational work in this health field, we cannot succeed in preventing a great number of our children and young people from beginning to smoke, until we take some legislative step to stop it.

In conclusion let me quote from the April, 1965, issue of a Canadian publication put out by the Health League of Canada. It contains an article written by Harry Medovy, head of the department of pediatrics at the University of Manitoba, in which he says:

> The hope that the available scientific evidence of cause and effect and the pressure of public and medical opinion would persuade the tobacco industry to curtail the huge sums that it now spends on advertising has not been realized. This is particularly regrettable because so much of it is directed to the recruitment of school children and teenagers to cigarette smoking by methods which can only be described as audiovisual seduction.

Finally I should like to say that the time has come, whether we repeal the present Tobacco Restraint Act or not, for Canada and other countries to take a stand against cigarette advertising.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be very brief and to the point. I support the comments of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Mather) regarding the use of tobacco and the dangers presently faced by our young people who become addicted to smoking. This house owes a debt to the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) because of his ability to ferret out these inadequate and redundant pieces of legislation. Certainly the act the hon. member seeks to repeal has no practical use. I am sure no one in the house could find any reason for allowing it to remain on our statute books.

Like the hon. member for New Westminster, and the hon. member for York-Humber, I do not use tobacco. I also believe that if we really intend to do something about curbing the use of tobacco we should do away with the Tobacco Restraint Act and start from the beginning to draft an act to deal effectively with the problems associated with smoking.

It would be a fine gesture at this time to give unanimous consent to this motion to repeal this act, which is chapter 26 of the Revised Statues of Canada, 1952, thus removing it from our statute books. To this end I earnestly plead to hon. members of this house to support the bill.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with those hon. members who have spoken in the debate on this bill. I also congratulate the hon. member for York Humber. This statute concerning the use of tobacco is about as useful as legislation requiring water to run uphill.

The government on one hand spends money to curb the use of tobacco, while on the other it permits open publicity by tobacco companies. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) stated that he was shocked by the effects of the use of tobacco. Perhaps we should all be shocked to the point that we adopt some good legislation to restrain its use. I am sure everyone would benefit, except perhaps the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson), because of the loss of revenue through taxation.

Let me touch for a moment upon the scientific aspect of this whole problem. In my constituency there are asbestos mines. Many of the employees or workers in these mines have developed over the years what is known as pneumonoconiosis. In many cases these people have died prematurely of heart ailments. There is a direct relationship between this disease and heart conditions, similar to the association between smoking and heart disease.

Some of the persons who perhaps are best able to observe the effects of this occupational disease in the province of Quebec are those employed by the Workmen's Compensation Board in Quebec city. Any medical doctor will admit that the inhalation of dust from these mines causes the blocking of the lungs, preventing oxygen from being absorbed into the system. The symptoms these miners have can be directly related to a lack of oxygen.

The best example of that is to be seen in a chronic sufferer of pneumonoconiosis. The minute a person suffering from this disease tries to climb the stairs he becomes out of breath and has to sit down. You find that his heart is pumping at twice the normal speed because it is not receiving through the lungs the oxygen necessary to permit the normal functioning of the bloodstream.

Tobacco has about the same effects. I am not talking about the effects of nicotine, which are psychological and everything else. Some 10 years ago I read an article in Reader's Digest on this subject. I did not check the accuracy of the facts set out in the article; I had no means of checking them. I suggest that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) could find out whether the article is accurate. It stated that the person who smokes one large packet of cigarettes a day inhales in one year the equivalent of 27 glasses of tar. Twenty seven glasses is quite a lot of tar to put into one's lungs. Naturally, when you exhale some of it goes out, but it leaves a coating on the inside of the lungs and cannot but harm the person who smokes this many cigarettes. Any athlete will tell you that if he becomes a heavy smoker he immediately becomes short-winded. Why is this? It is because the bloodstream does not receive the amount of oxygen it needs to function properly.

It does not matter whether the cigarette is filter tipped or not, you still inhale this amount of tar. You can make your own test with handkerchief or Kleenex; you will find tar is inhaled. If you start smoking at the age of 10, 12 or 13 it is not long before your lungs are clotted with tar. Anyone who starts smoking at this age has never given the lungs a chance to absorb oxygen normally.

I stress that if these are the effects, and they are scientifically proven and medically accepted, the government should take a very serious look at this question and make whatever changes are necessary, as suggested by the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan). The hon. member set out his arguments very clearly and has taken the initiative of introducing this bill to repeal the Tobacco Restraint Act. That act should be removed from the statute books altogether, because it is absolutely useless as it stands, or repealed, as is suggested in this bill.

If the government is concerned about the health of the people of this country, not only with regard to water pollution, air pollution and things of that kind, but because of the smoking that goes on under our noses every day, this problem should be looked into and we must see whether legislation can be enacted that will fulfil the hopes of the government in regard to national health. The government should look into this whole problem, if it is to achieve what it hopes to achieve in improving the health of Canadians.

The hon. member for York-Humber has brought this matter to the attention of the house and the departmental officials responsible in this area. I hope the government will take action to remedy the situation and that the efforts of the hon. member for York-Humber and other hon. members of the house who are anxious to see a solution to this problem will not prove to be wasted. I hope this matter is not just on the record so that people can say, "On February 10, 1967, the house spoke on this matter" and we will find ourselves facing the same situation in 1987. The government should take action in this regard. I congratulate the hon. member for York-Humber for having brought this question to the attention of the house.

[Mr. Langlois (Megantic).]

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I must congratulate the hon. member for Mégantic (Mr. Langlois) for his excellent statement on pulmonary biology and physiology. I knew he was a professor of mathematics but I was not aware of his talents where human physiology is concerned.

Mr. Speaker, I now rise to take part in the debate as a medical doctor, and also as one who has seen several patients suffer from lung cancer because of their immoderate, and even moderate, use of tobacco.

After reading this bill I felt it my duty to make a few remarks. This private bill proposes the repeal of the whole of chapter 266 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, that is the Tobacco Restraint Act.

I need not define the word tobacco. We know it comes from an indigenous American language. It belongs to the solanaceae family, which is native of Tobago, and whose leaves can be smoked, snuffed or chewed in various preparations. Let us say, incidentally, to make a long story short, that tobacco is a vigorous, strong, pleasure-giving and habit-forming plant that may grow as high as two metres, and has large leaves. Probably native of the Caribbean, it was imported into Europe by the Spanish and popularized by France, thanks to the ambassador of Catherine de Medici, Jean Nicot. It is now grown in almost every country. It is all the more dangerous as it is mainly grown in Cuba.

Mr. Speaker, I am not sure I share the views of my friend from York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) on the desirability of removing or repealing altogether the act to restrain the use of tobacco by young persons.

Several antiquated laws should be removed from the Criminal Code, I am sure. Yet, in many cases, a law, by its mere presence, has a deterrent or, to use a medical term, a prophylactic effect. If the presence of some laws in a few statute books succeeds in preventing certain offences, I am sure this particular piece of legislation could be used as medical prophylaxis, that is, to prevent people from starting the sad and bad habit of cigarette smoking at an age when they should refrain from doing so.

I agree with my colleague that this particular measure seems stupid. But such a legislation is often necessary to make individuals, especially young people, behave decently, which they would not do otherwise. Having a father and mother has often prevented teenagers from misbehaving, simply because they thought of their parents or possibly of the authority the parents represent.

I am convinced that, more than ever, it is necessary to feel such authority, whatever its source, in order to have respect for it.

I was speaking of prevention a while ago, Mr. Speaker. There has been considerable study carried out on the subject and more is still being done. But there is one indisputable fact and it is that we are now almost sure that tobacco is a cause of lung cancer.

If we compare the higher death rate among male smokers with that from other causes, it will be noted that lung cancer accounts for 21 per cent of deaths, heart and blood vessel diseases account for 22.2 per cent, coronary diseases for 36.6 per cent, other cancers for 11.9 per cent, other causes for 2.4 per cent, and accidents, poisonings and violent deaths for 2.9 per cent. It is obvious from this that the Canadian people should definitely be brought to realize the dangers of nicotine. And the danger is even greater for cigarette smokers.

Let us look around a bit, if you will. First of all, chances of a cure, in the case of lung cancer, remain very slim, in spite of irradiation and radical surgery. Therefore, prevention rather than treatment should be insisted upon.

Let us take for example coronary diseases. In 1962, arteriosclerosis, the most frequent coronary disease, was the primary cause of death in Canada, having been responsible for the death of 25,549 men and 13,683 women. Cigarette smoking is related to an increase in the mortality rate from coronary disease, particularly among middle-aged men.

Several surveys have demonstrated the existence of a close connection between smoking and death caused by coronary disease. One need only look up page 32 of the report of the Royal College of Medicine and read the American report published on this subject. The mortality rate from coronary disease is higher among cigarette smokers than among non-smokers.

Studies have shown that the mortality rate for cigarette smokers is 1.7 per cent higher than for non-smokers, that the mortality rate due to coronary disease is directly related to the number of cigarettes a person smokes in one day, and that the mortality rate is even higher among middle-aged smokers, as compared with non-smokers.

The results of another study show that, for men between 40 and 49 years of age, the mortality coefficient is 3.9 per cent; then, the coefficient goes down to 2.1 per cent, 1.5 per cent and 1.3 per cent respectively, using ten-year age groups as a basis for comparison. Therefore, there is greater chance of death by coronary disease among middle-aged inveterate smokers.

It may therefore be said that the number of deaths due to coronary disease is lower among those who quit smoking cigarettes, as compared with those who did not.

The following statement may please some hon. members: the mortality rate due to coronary disease among pipe and cigar smokers is the same as that for non-smokers, which now stands at approximately 1 per cent.

The Dominion Bureau of Statistics reports that the following related diseases, namely chronic bronchitis or, if you would, chronic asthma and emphysema which also lead to respiratory troubles, caused 1,197 deaths in Canada in 1962.

Studies on the expected effects of cigarette smoking on men reveal that the number of deaths caused by chronic bronchitis, chronic asthma and emphysema is higher with smokers than non-smokers.

There is no doubt that those who suffer from chronic bronchitis or emphysema cough themselves hoarse every morning, especially after having smoked a cigarette on an empty stomach, as shown by the popular expression which many patients use when they come to see us: "Doctor, every morning I almost spit my heart out."

This irritating phenomenon is most conclusive, and it certainly contributes to causing lung cancer. Yet, coughing and spitting are not nearly as common with old smokers as they are with those continue to smoke in general. One needs only refer to the chronic cough of coughers, or smokers' cough, as it is commonly called.

There is improvement when victims of broncho-pulmonary diseases quit smoking. Mr. Speaker, the one who now speaks to you quit smoking almost eight years ago. I may have put on a little weight but, even at that, I feel very fit. I can say that in the morning I feel as gay as a lark. I am no longer, Mr. Speaker, a slave to the cigarette.

It is also true that inveterate smokers always keep in their lungs as much as 50 per cent of the smoke inhaled. A few drops are deposited directly onto the walls of the bronchia, others are picked up by mobile cells mostly in the air sacks; several of the cells emigrate into the bronchia and travel up the walls of the membrane. We also note that the breathing capacity is inhibited in smokers.

It has been proved that those who begin smoking at an early age are short of breath, particularly when doing physical exercise or engaging in certain sports such as hockey, ski or basketball. Moreover, it has been established that cigarette smoke inhibits certain functions of the normal respiratory system, as I have just shown. It has also been noticed—and this is very serious—that a cerebral pollution occurs, causing a certain haze on the brain of the inveterate smoker, who will often put forward obscure and not too clear arguments, resulting in a foggy October morning type of reasoning. This is important for us, in this chamber, for we often feel the lunatic and confusing effect of smoke on the brain, during certain speeches.

There was some reference to the habit of cigarette-smoking in Canadian children. Unfortunately, many of them begin smoking when they are very young. Among their more active members are those in their early teens.

A survey conducted in Canada shows that one half of the boys and one third of the girls are habitual smokers at age 17. If one refers to a survey conducted by a James B. Morrison and published in the Canadian Journal of Public Health in 1964—in that case the survey was conducted among children between grades 5 and 12 in a Winnipeg school—one finds that children smoke very little before age 12, and that progress in school was slower among smokers and this, to a marked degree.

Tobacco addiction finds most of its recruits between the ages of 12 and 16 and, as I said before, at the age of 17, 50 per cent of the boys and 30 per cent of the girls declared themselves smokers. Of course, at the age of 18, those ratios have increased to 55 per cent and 33 per cent respectively.

Finally, let us say, that there is quite a close relationship between the smoking habit among students and their parents. According to the same inquiry, published in the Canadian Journal of Public Health, boys smoked more if one or the other of their parents or both smoked. This is also true of girls, but that habit was connected more frequently with that of the mother. That parental habit influences the girls more than the boys, according to the studies which have been made.

Reports have also shown that the parents' example in this field will necessarily contribute to increase, decrease or abolish the smoking habit in young people and teenagers. In the United States, 68 per cent of men and 32 per cent of women of 18 years or more were registered among regular cigarette smokers.

Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to show that this bill seems absurd at first sight, especially on reading subsection 1 of clause 4:

> —Every one is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction in the case of a first offence to be reprimanded, in the case of a second offence to a penalty not exceeding one dollar, and in the case of a third or subsequent offence to a penalty not exceeding four dollars, who, being under the age of 16 years, smokes or chews—

And I doubt that one could chew at 13 years of age—

> —tobacco in a street or public place, or purchases or has in his possession, whether for his own use or not, any cigarettes or cigarette papers, or purchases or has in his possession for his own use tobacco in any form other than cigarettes.

I hardly need to tell those who have reached a certain age and who have lived a bit, that children hide to smoke corn silk, particularly in the fall.

Contrary to my hon. colleague from York-Humber (Mr. Cowan), I feel that chapter 266 should be maintained as is in the statutes.

It is already a warning, and one representative of authority. And when the young people read or hear about someone who, 60 odd years before thought of them so that they might not be caught by the habit that will lead them to an early grave, I feel they will appreciate it. This may represent a very small benefit, but it is something that should stay in our mores since we are a people who have always had and continue to have a healthy fear of authority and who submit to it willingly, since fear is often the beginning of wisdom.

Section 4 of this act to restrain the use of tobacco among young people stipulates that a person guilty of a first offence is liable to be reprimanded and, in the case of a second offence, to a penalty of one dollar, as I have said. But this is symbolic rather than punitive. And I am sure that in certain areas today, the law is enforced not as a penal law but simply as a reprimand, to warn children that they are getting into a very dangerous habit.

Mr. Speaker, times have changed, but people have always remained relatively stable in their modus vivendi. As I said before, this act is enforced from time to time and appropriately so. And I cannot understand why it should be repealed, since it is now considered as part of prophylactic medicine, inspiring fear while at the same time pointing out a great danger: slow and painful death by lung cancer.

I hope that someday—resolutions to this effect have been brought forward in the house before—a skull will be printed on packages of cigarettes, under which there will be a warning of real danger, particularly for young people.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must point out to the hon. member that the time at his disposal has expired.

[English]

Mr. Thompson: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if we could stop the debate at this time and complete second reading of this bill or refer it to a committee?

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, during the few minutes that are left—

Mr. Thompson: Talk it out.

Mr. Deachman: —I should like to make a few remarks about this very interesting bill. This little bill concerns the Tobacco Restraints Act, and that act is not one I would want to see removed from our statutes. I do not say this because I disagree with the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) because I find myself in agreement with much of what he said. However, I should like to see this act remain on the statute books because it is a child's introduction to the statutes of Canada. I think it should be left there to continue to perform that purpose.

I can recall as a child, and I am sure other members of this chamber can, when it was a common thing to have the privilege of rushing down to the corner store on Sunday morning to get a package of cigarettes because there were none in the house. Generally there was some reward for this. In addition, one had a feeling of daring because he was violating a statute in performing the errand. I think it had a salutary effect.

Mr. Herridge: Had you read the statute then?

Mr. Deachman: I had read it, and I read it at the age of six. It is for these reasons that I should like to keep it. I think this statute helps to stimulate wonderful addresses in the house, such as the address of the hon. member for York-Humber and hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Mather). The hon. member for New Westminster has a long and distinguished career in addressing the house on the subject of smoking. He was well known in British Columbia, Mr. Speaker, where he almost had a career as a non-smoker for years before coming to this house. As perhaps some hon. members know, he was the president of the Never-Touch-Em Club. He was not the founder of the Never-Touch-Em Club. That club was founded by a Vancouver newspaperman who thought of the idea of handing out badges which read, "Never-Touch-Em".

If you smoked you carried one of these badges behind the lapel of your coat, and when you gave up smoking you flashed the badge whenever people offered you a cigarette. This newspaperman had been president of the club and a non-smoker for some time. Then he was sent by his newspaper to do a story in South America and he was found skulking through the Andes with a fag in his lips. He had to relinquish the presidency of the Never-Touch-Em Club and the presidency then fell to the hon. member for New Westminster. He has upheld the tradition of that club without fail ever since. It is for this reason he is able to come before us and address the house on this subject, and it is for this reason we would like to hear him again. As I say, it is for this reason I do not want to see this statute removed from the statute books or we may be denied that privilege.

May I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hour for private members business has expired.

Mr. McIlraith: On Wednesday last, Mr. Speaker, the resolution was adopted providing for the Judges Act amendments bill. The bill was not given first reading, so I should like to move first reading of that bill now.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

JUDGES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SALARIES, TRAVELLING EXPENSES, ETC.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (for the Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-267, to amend the Judges Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

• (6:00 p.m.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McIlraith: On Monday the house will be asked to continue consideration of the supplementary budget. At the conclusion of that it will consider that Canada deposit insurance legislation, which has been reported back from committee today. Then we shall continue with the budget resolutions, and the legislation flowing from them.

It being three minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, February 13, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

FINANCE

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN QUEBEC PREMIER AND PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table an exchange of letters between the Prime Minister of Quebec and the Prime Minister of Canada on federal provincial discussions on the working of our financial institutions and on securities legislation.

Mr. Speaker: Has the Prime Minister leave to table these documents?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

POWER

TABLING OF REPORT OF COLUMBIA RIVER ENGINEERING BOARD

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table the annual report of the Columbia river treaty permanent engineering board.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table this document?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

JUDGES ACT

FURTHER AMENDMENT RESPECTING BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. L. T. Pennell (for the Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to amend the proposed measure to amend the Judges Act, Bill C-267, now before the House by substituting the words "eighteen judges and junior judges of the county courts" for the words "seventeen judges and junior judges of the county courts" in lines seven and eight of page 5 of the said bill, under the heading "British Columbia".

Motion agreed to.

KINGSTON PENITENTIARY—RECEPTION OF FRENCH BROADCASTS

Question No. 2,147—Mr. Lachance:

1. Is it true that the inmates in the Kingston penitentiary, of whom 30 per cent are French speaking, are not given the right, or the privilege, of listening to a French speaking channel over their radio system, in their cells?

2. If so, does the government intend to correct this situation?

3. Does the same situation exist in the other penitentiary institutions in Canada?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): 1. No. The Kingston penitentiary cellular radio system relays broadcasts on two nets with a two net receiver located in each cell. One of these nets relays French broadcasts on the basis of two hours per day. The other net is used almost entirely for sports programming.

The radio system programming is governed by the wishes of the inmate population and reflects such wishes on a proportionate basis.

It should be noted that French radio broadcasting is not available in Kingston city, nor in the immediate geographical area. The reception of such broadcasting presents technical difficulties, since it originates from Cornwall, Hull or Montreal, and the quality of sound reception varies from time to time.

2. Yes. Equipment and material have been requisitioned to provide a third net with a view to providing more extensive French radio reception.

3. Yes. A similar situation exists at Dorchester penitentiary where French programs are broadcast on the basis of one hour per day, in accordance with the wishes of the inmate population, as expressed by the institutional inmates' recreation committee which includes French representation.

EXPO '67 PRIZE WINNING SONG

Question No. 2,397—Mr. Coates:

1. In what way does Expo '67 plan to promote the use of the prize-winning song for which $6,000 in prizes was awarded and why has this song not received the same degree of exposure as has been evidenced by the song produced by Bobby Gimby for the centennial commission?

2. Was any consideration given to commissioning Bobby Gimby to produce a song for Expo '67 rather than promoting a contest with prize money available?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): 1. The $6,000 in prize money was provided by the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada and La Fondation des Amis de l'Art.

Under the contract entered into by the Le Festival du Disque Inc., the Sun Life Company of Canada and Expo '67, Le Festival du Disque Inc. agreed to promote the publication, reproduction and performance of the winning song in Canada and throughout the world so as to obtain the maximum practical distribution. This is being done through a direct mailing campaign to the U.S. and Canada song publishers and radio stations throughout the world.

In addition, the Expo song will be played by the Expo band and Sun Life carillon for the duration of the exhibition. Recordings made by the Expo band will be distributed by Expo's p.r. department. Sheet music is being sent to all amateur choirs, throughout Canada, to be included in their repertoires.

In addition, the youth pavillon plans to promote the Expo song.

2. No.

ADVERTISING COST IN "HOLIDAY" MAGAZINE

Question No. 2,398—Mr. Coates:

1. How much has been paid by either the centennial commission or Expo '67 or both, to Holiday magazine for the full-page ads which have appeared in that magazine promoting Canada's centennial and Expo '67 to date?

2. Is any additional advertising anticipated in this magazine and, if so (a) how much (b) what is the estimated cost?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): 1. Advertising on Expo appeared in Holiday magazine, starting in 1966 in the following issues: April, May, August and November which cost the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition $40,035.

Advertising placed by the Canadian government travel bureau in support of the centennial commission during 1966 cost $13,-115.75.

2. (a) Yes, advertising on Expo will be made in three more issues in 1967; March, April and May. (b) $44,100.

(a) Advertising will be placed by the Canadian government travel bureau in support of the centennial commission in the March issue in 1967. (b) $11,405.

YELLOWKNIFE, N.W.T.—COST OF SUPPLYING TELEVISION

Question No. 2,405—Mr. Laprise:

What are the C.B.C. estimates for supplying television for the population of Yellowknife?

[Translation]

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the C.B.C. that the cost of the technical installation at Yellowknife and the recording facilities at Edmonton to supply the required program package is estimated at approximately $84,000. The estimated annual operating cost of the proposed station at Yellowknife is approximately $22,000 a year, based on an initial and experimental four-hour daily schedule.

ADMINISTRATION SECRETARIAT CHIEF, INDIAN AFFAIRS

Question No. 2,439—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Who is the chief of the secretariat of the administration directorate of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

2. How long has he held the position?

3. What are his academic qualifications?

4. What is his previous experience in working with Indians either in the department or elsewhere?

5. What are his duties and responsibilities and to whom does he report?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Mr. Harold Grenville Sprott is the acting-chief of the secretariat. 2. Since June 27, 1966.

3. Academic qualifications: (a) Queen's University, B. Comm.

4. Since joining the branch, ten years ago, Mr. Sprott has held responsible positions in both headquarters and in the field. During that period his duties have required him to work closely with individual Indians and with band councils.

5. His duties and responsibilities are:

"Under the director of administration to be responsible for securing information and preparing replies to parliamentary questions, correspondence from members of parliament and others and inquiries of a general nature pertaining to the functions of more than one division; for discharging the branch responsibilities relating to the liquor provisions of the Indian Act, band council elections, band by-laws, and regulations pertaining to community order; to prepare instructions, reports and correspondence required on matters concerning band council procedure, law enforcement on reserves; Indian status and legal rights and other matters of a quasi-legal nature".

Mr. Sprott reports to the director of administration.

BROADCAST EXPENSES, QUEBEC PROVINCIAL ELECTION

Question No. 2,447—Mr. Grégoire:

What were the total expenses incurred by each political party during the Quebec election campaign of June 5, 1966, in connection with political broadcasts over private radio and T.V. stations, as reported to the Board of Broadcast Governors?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Board of Broadcast

Governors as follows: Each political party is not required to inform the Board of Broadcast Governors about the amount of money they spent during the electoral campaign preceding the Quebec provincial election of June 5, 1966, in connection with political broadcasts over private radio and T.V. stations.

RESIGNATIONS BY NATIONAL DEFENCE HEADQUARTERS OFFICERS

Question No. 2,455—Mr. Forrestall:

How many resignations have been submitted by serving officers of the Canadian forces while on duty at national defence headquarters, Ottawa, since January 1, 1965?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): There were 1,987 officers serving at national defence headquarters on 1 January, 1965. The number had decreased to 1,649 by 1 January, 1967. During the intervening period there was the normal posting of officers to and from NDHQ and it is estimated that approximately 3,000 officers served in NDHQ during the two years. During this same period, 264 officers at NDHQ submitted their resignations. Of these, 56 had a minimum of 25 years service and were eligible for voluntary retirement pension or annuity benefits. Most of the remaining 208 were in their last three years of service, a period where many officers negotiate for, and accept, civilian employment.

ADMINISTRATION DIRECTORATE CHIEF, INDIAN AFFAIRS

Question No. 2,462—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Who is the director of the administration directorate of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development?
2. How long has he held the position?
3. What are his academic qualifications?
4. What is his previous experience in working with Indians either in the department or elsewhere?
5. What are his duties and responsibilities and to whom does he report?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Mr. Jules D'Astous.

2. Since June 9, 1964.

3. Academic qualifications: (a) B.S.A.

4. Mr. D'Astous held the position of regional supervisor of Indian agencies from 1951 to 1954; during that period his duties called for frequent contacts and meetings with individual Indians and band councils in the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick.

While occupying the position of the chief of agencies division and of the chief of the economic development division at headquarters between 1954 and 1964, Mr. D'Astous' duties involved meetings, discussions and field trips to Indian reserves and agencies.

5. His duties and responsibilities are: "To have over-all responsibility and authority for providing a branch secretariat and information service; for the formulation of policy, related planning and the administration of Indian lands and band funds in accordance with the provisions of the Indian Act; for the compilation and maintenance of records and legal surveys with respect to Indian lands; settlement of estates; keeping of band membership lists; for carrying out transactions relating to the crown's obligations under treaties and maintaining a record with respect thereto; for the provision of office services, supplies and equipment and for paper work management, systems and forms control; for the editing and issue of all general instructions".

Mr. D'Astous reports to director of Indian affairs branch.

POLICY DIRECTORATE CHIEF, INDIAN AFFAIRS

Question No. 2,463—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Who is the director of the policy and planning directorate of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development?
2. How long has he held the position?
3. What are his academic qualifications?
4. What is his previous experience in working with Indians either in the department or elsewhere?
5. What are his duties and responsibilities and to whom does he report?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Mr. Cyril Irvin Fairholm is the acting director.

2. Since June 27, 1966.

3. Academic qualifications: (a) Queen's University, B.A., (b) Alberta Normal School, Edmonton, teacher's certificate.

4. Since joining the branch, 17 years ago, Mr. Fairholm was in continuous touch with Indians in their homes on the reserves, attended meetings with individual Indians, chiefs, councillors and various representatives of the Indian people throughout Canada.

5. His duties and responsibilities are: "Under the branch director, to have authority and responsibility for the formulation of broad policy and the related planning; to collaborate with the directors of development, education and administration in the establishment of long term goals and to co-ordinate the formulation of policies and the planning leading thereto; to supervise and direct research specialists in the task of gathering, co-ordinating and interpreting new or existing data, including statistics, as a basis for recommending new activities and evaluating ones now in progress and recommending changes in emphasis or direction of programs; to review Indian legislation, recommending amendments required by policy changes and provide liaison with drafting officers".

Mr. Fairholm reports to the director of Indian affairs branch.

INSTRUCTIONS TO ARMED FORCES RECRUITS

Question No. 2,502—Mr. Harkness:

Are recruits applying for admission to the armed services now told that they must join the armed forces, rather than the navy, army or air force?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): No. In the initial application a potential recruit must designate the service of his choice. There is no method in effect whereby a recruit applying for admission to the Canadian armed forces can be enrolled in other than one of the three existing services.

PENSIONS OF RETIRED ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL

Question No. 2,515—Mr. Irvine:

1. How many former members of the Canadian permanent armed forces who have retired previous to 1950 are receiving retirement pensions?

2. How many of the above mentioned who retired prior to 1940 are receiving retirement pensions?

3. How many of the above mentioned who retired prior to 1930 are receiving retirement pensions?

4. During this time, have their pensions been reassessed and increased and, if so (a) how many times (b) when (c) to what extent?

5. When reviewing pensions for retired civil servants, is it the intention that a review of pensions for former members of the Canadian permanent armed forces might be considered?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): 1. 1,708.

2. 204.

3. 48.

4. (a) For those who were eligible, once. (b) on July 1, 1958, (PC 1958—1366 dated 2 October 1958). (c) The extent varied from 1 to 32 per cent for those pensioners whose pensions did not exceed $3,000 in the case of a former member, or $1,500 in the case of a widow of a former member.

5. Yes.

LEASES FOR BUILDING ON CHAREST BOULEVARD, QUEBEC CITY

Question No. 2,521—Mr. Ricard:

1. Has the federal government signed any leases with the owner of the building located at 750

Charest blvd. east, in Quebec city and, if so, who is the owner of the building?

2. If the answer to part 1 is yes, what buildings or parts thereof have been rented and what is the size of the premises in each case?

3. What rents are paid?

4. Did such leases follow a call for tenders?

5. If so, what are the names of all tenderers and the amounts of the rents asked for?

6. Since what dates have such leases been in force?

7. When shall such leases expire?

8. Is it the intention of the government to renew such leases?

9. If so, will the government call for tenders?

[Translation]

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): 1. Yes—Maurice Pollack Realty Company Limited.

2. Whole of the fifth and part of the fourth floor of a five-storey building—comprising 38,658 net square feet of office space—located at 750 Charest Blvd., East, Quebec City.

3. $90,000. per annum payable monthly.

4. No.

5. Not applicable.

6. The present lease has been in force since February 1, 1964.

7. January 31, 1969.

8. No.

9. Not applicable.

PAY RATES, ARMED FORCES MEDICAL AND DENTAL OFFICERS

Question No. 2,522—Mr. Lambert:

1. With the introduction of the revised armed service pay scale effective October 1, 1966, what is (a) the basic (b) the total rate of pay and allowances of a dental officer during each of the first five years of service?

2. What are the comparable rates of pay and allowances for a medical officer?

3. What are the reasons for the differences, if any, taking into account the cost and extent of training and of respective responsibilities in the course of duty?

4. Have protests been received or representations been made within the services with regard to any differences in the pay scale and, if so (a) what consideration has been given to such representations (b) with what result?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): 1. The revised Canadian forces pay, effective 1 October 1966, for dental and medical officers is at consolidated rates. Dental officers allowances and medical officer allowances were abolished on 1 October 1966. The rates for dental officers in the rank of captain during each of the first five years are: 1st year, $10,572; 2nd year, $10,980; 3rd year, $11,388; 4th year, $11,844; 5th year, $12,300.

2. The comparable rates for medical officers in the rank of captain during each of the first five years are: 1st year, $8,328; 2nd year, $8,736; 3rd year, $9,144; 4th year, $12,504; 5th year, $13,080.

(Note: The majority of medical officers who stay in the Canadian forces are promoted to major after four years and receive an annual rate of $14,160).

3. The salary scales for dental and medical officers in the civil service were taken into consideration when the above rates for dental officers and medical officers in the Canadian forces were established.

4. Protests have been received from junior medical officers concerning rates of pay for the first three years of service. Consideration is presently being given to revising the rates paid during the first three years of service for medical officers.

SALES TAX ON JEWELLERY

Question No. 2,554—Mr. MacRae:

Is the government giving any consideration to abolishing the sales tax on jewellery?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): This question concerns budget policy. If the government proposes any change in the Excise Tax Act affecting jewellery, it will be announced at the appropriate time.

COMPANY OF YOUNG CANADIANS—ACTIVITIES IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Question No. 2,560—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

1. In what areas and locations are members of the Company of Young Canadians engaged (a) in Nova Scotia (b) in New Brunswick (c) in Prince Edward Island (d) in Newfoundland?

2. On what date, in each case, did they commence their work and to what specific projects have they been assigned in each area?

3. What are the names, ages, addresses and qualifications of each of the members of the Company of Young Canadians chosen for assignments in the aforementioned provinces?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I am informed by the Company of Young Canadians as follows:

1. and 2.

Province	Project	Location	Start of project
(a) Nova Scotia	Eskasoni Indian reserve	Eskasoni	June, 1966
	Three-Mile Five-Mile Plains	Windsor	August, 1966
	Nova Scotia project	Halifax	August, 1966
	Glace Bay project	Glace Bay	August, 1966
	Halifax Welfare council	Halifax	August, 1966
(b) New Brunswick	Urban renewal	St. John	August, 1966
	Killarney road	Fredericton	October, 1966
(c) Prince Edward Island	No active projects
(d) Newfoundland	Northern Peninsula Co-op development	Brig Bay	August, 1966

3. The names of volunteers working on projects in the Atlantic area are Mr. Bill Poole, Miss Barbara Hall, Mrs. Joan Jones, Miss Carol Oliver, Mr. and Mrs. K. Pattison, Miss Susan McLean, Miss Patricia Ross, Mr. Darby Eddy, Mr. and Mrs. G. Fatels, Miss Sue McAdam, Miss Sara Williamson, Mrs. K. Embleton and Mr. Ron McKay.

Specific information on individual volunteers is confidential, but their ages range from 18 to 30, the average age being 22. Nine have completed post secondary school education, three of these have graduated from university, one is a registered nurse, and one a trained teacher. The balance have completed at least junior matriculation.

* HISTORIC SITES—PRESERVATION OF PLAQUE FROM ABBEY HOUSE, LONDON

Question No. 2,566—Mr. McNulty:

1. Has the government any plan to preserve or re-locate the tablet commemorating the drawing-up of the terms of the British North America Act now situated in a conference room in Abbey House, London, England, which building is soon to be demolished?

2. If so (a) what is the nature of the plan (b) what steps, if any, have been taken in this regard?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is yes. The answer to the first part of the second question is: To recover a plaque when Abbey House is demolished and relocate it in either Macdonald House or Canada House. For structural reasons it is impossible to remove the plaque until the supporting wall is being demolished. The answer to the second part of the second question is: Because original demolition plans have been postponed by some 18 months, the London office of the Canadian government is maintaining a watching brief.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

TENDERS FOR SALE OF JEEPS, QUEBEC

Question No. 2,372—Mr. Racine:

1. In the past six months has the Department of Defence Production called for tenders for the sale of jeeps in Quebec city and Sorel?

2. If so (a) how many tenders were submitted (b) what was the amount of each tender (c) who was awarded the contract?

Return tabled.

OWNERSHIP OF ISLANDS, HALIFAX HARBOUR

Question No. 2,418—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Who owns McNab Island, located at the entrance to Halifax Harbour?

2. Who owns Lawlor Island, located adjacent to McNab Island?

3. If not under total federal control and/or ownership, what individuals, firms or other interests have any control or ownership of the land on the two islands?

4. If under any federal jurisdiction, which department or departments are concerned?

5. To what present use are the two islands being put?

6. What are the future plans for the two islands?

7. When will such plans be put into motion?

Return tabled.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before orders of the day are called I rise on a question of privilege. It is becoming more and more difficult all the time to obtain answers from the C.B.C. I cannot understand this. Parliament is entitled to have these questions answered. I very seldom place questions on the order paper, but I do want this information. Starred question No. 2,509 has been on the order paper now for 20 days. The question is:

1. What are the names and addresses of the chosen officials and/or employees of the C.B.C. who are to be the recipients of and have free use of the coloured T.V. sets recently purchased by the C.B.C.?

2. From what companies and/or individuals were such coloured T.V. sets purchased?

3. Was such purchase preceded by a resolution passed by the C.B.C. and, if so, on what date was such resolution passed?

Questions that are starred are supposed to be answered. In the British parliament they are answered within three days. This is a flagrant disregard of questions by the C.B.C. Unless the answer is immediately forthcoming I will have more to say on this.

FINANCE

U.S. ORDER RESPECTING INSPECTION OF BANKS IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a number of questions to the Minister of Finance in connection with an order of the federal reserve board of the United States which permits United States government inspection of banks controlled by United States banks outside that country. In view of this, is it the intention of the government to re-examine the sale of shares of Canadian banks to United States banks? Has any reply been received to the protest, if any, which has been made to the United States in respect of an order which extends the authority of the United States government beyond its territorial boundaries? I should also like to ask the minister whether he will table the terms of the Canadian objection and the United States reply so that Canadians may know, not second hand but directly, what is the attitude of the government of Canada in this connection.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I reply to the first of these questions and then ask my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs to reply to the remainder.

It is not the intention of the government to ask for any further revisions to the Bank Act as a result of the regulation of the federal reserve board of the United States. I believe the proposals the government has put before parliament by way of amendments to the Bank Act are sufficient to ensure that no bank controlled in the United States can expand in Canada. That is the purpose of our law and I hope it will be confirmed by this parliament.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, to supplement the reply by the Minister of Finance I should like to say that we have made representations to United States authorities concerning what we believe to be the extraterritorial implications of the proposed revision of the regulations—

Mr. Diefenbaker: On what date?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As of Friday, soon after they were brought to our attention. These representations were made in respect of the proposed revision of the regulations of the United States federal reserve board governing the foreign operations of United States controlled banks. Our ambassader was instructed to express the well known Canadian government view on the unacceptability of the principle that laws and regulations of one country should have extraterritorial effect in another.

It will be remembered that in March of last year this was the position taken by Canadian ministers at the United States-Canada ministerial meeting. This was the position I took in Washington in July in regard to other measures we felt had an extraterritorial effect. It is and has been the policy of the government of Canada to state that it cannot accept from the United States or any other country any regulation or law which has an extraterritorial effect in this country.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am glad that what was described as the heresy of the government I had the honour to head and which was condemned at the time, has become the cornerstone of this government's policy. Is it the intention of the government of Canada to make a declaration to those firms operating in Canada—I was going to say a unilateral declaration of independence—that they shall not follow guide lines except those issuing from the government or parliament of Canada?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, after the discussions that were held in March and the position we took regarding the guide line policy of the United States, I should be surprised if the representations made by Canada on Friday do not receive equal consideration; namely, that the United States government will recognize that U.S. corporate enterprises in this country must conform to the laws of Canada and are not subject to the laws of the United States.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the new United States federal reserve board regulations come into effect today I should like to ask the minister two questions. First, does this mean that the Mercantile Bank will now be required to report directly to the U.S. federal reserve board, which fulfils much the same function as the central bank in Canada? Second, is it the intention of the Minister of Finance to allow the Mercantile Bank to report directly to the United States federal agency, thus violating Canadian sovereignty?

Mr. Sharp: There is really nothing I need add to what my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs has said, Mr. Speaker, namely that we will not permit the laws of the United States to apply in Canada because we would consider this a violation of our national sovereignty.

Mr. Douglas: Do I take it from the minister's reply that he will make it clear to the Mercantile Bank that it must not report to the United States federal agency, and that any action of that kind would result in disciplinary action by the government of Canada?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think we should go further and insist that the United States government does not require the Mercantile Bank or any other Canadian bank to report to the United States.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the hon. Minister of Finance and Receiver General. In view of this very logical Canadian policy aimed at having the Americans obey our Canadian legislation, have the United States authorities threatened the Minister of Finance or the government with restrictions on operations of Canadian banks in the United States?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CONVERSATIONS BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER OF U.K. AND PREMIER OF RUSSIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the week long talks between the Prime Minister of Great Britain and Premier Kosygin of Russia ended last night, and reports that telephone conversations were also held with the President of the United States in the late hours of last night, I wonder whether the Prime Minister can tell us whether he had any communication today or yesterday from Prime Minister Wilson with regard to those talks.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have been in touch with the British government in regard to the very important conversations which my hon. friend has mentioned. We hope very shortly to get a fuller report on those conversations.

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF AUTOMOBILE AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Industry. Since he has acknowledged a letter from the city of Oshawa dated January 30 last, when does the minister expect to reply to their request, which was as follows:

> We urge you and your government to consider immediately a study, either by a joint committee of the House of Commons and Senate or by a standing committee, of the implications of the auto pact agreement leading to a complete reconsideration of this pact.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I hope to be able to furnish a reply to the city of Ottawa very shortly indeed.

Mr. Starr: You had better address it to Oshawa.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

ISSUANCE OF DOLLAR BILLS BEARING NO SERIAL NUMBERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. Is the centennial issue of $1 bills which bear no serial number but simply "1867-1967" in the spot on the bill where the serial number normally appears, in contravention of any international or national law concerning the issuance of paper currency?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would not think that question should be asked at the present time.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, the reason I asked my question in that form was that there are rumours that these bills will be produced only in a certain quantity, and there are also rumours that they will not be good as currency following 1967.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would rather allow the minister to answer the question.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. gentleman that any bills issued by the Bank of Canada will always be legal tender.

[Translation]

[Later:]

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Not too long ago I put a question to the hon. Minister of Finance. Since he did not answer at the time, I shall repeat my question today.

Have the necessary measures been taken in order to keep a close watch on the printing of $1 bills bearing no serial number, in order to prevent any counterfeiting of these bills? Is there any control at the present time?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has just stated that all bills and coins issued by the Bank of Canada will be legal tender.

Can the minister tell the house whether the figures created by the Bank of Canada are also legal figures?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. Monteith: I have a further supplementary question for the Minister of Finance related to the subject we were discussing earlier. Since these $1 centennial bills are reported to be selling at a premium as high as 100 per cent in certain quarters, could the minister assure the house and the people of Canada that there will be a sufficient supply to satisfy the demand?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I shall make inquiries from the Bank of Canada and answer later.

[Mr. Monteith.]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

SASKATCHEWAN—REQUEST FOR INCREASED ASSISTANCE FOR HOSPITAL CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the government received representations from the government of the province of Saskatchewan regarding the need for increased assistance for hospital construction?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have received representations from almost all provincial governments, if not all, on the question of increased assistance for hospital construction.

Mr. Nasserden: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell us whether he has decided to provide an increase for hospital construction?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, a decision was announced last year that the aid would continue for an additional two or three years.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, that was not the question I put to the minister. I asked him whether any additional increase in assistance for hospital construction was contemplated by the government at this time.

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker, it is not proposed either to increase or to extend, this particular program.

[Later:]

Mr. Nasserden: I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the minister aware of the fact that 3,000 people are awaiting admission to hospital in the city of Saskatoon?

Mr. MacEachen: I thank my hon. friend for giving me this information.

OLD AGE SECURITY

YEARLY COMPLETION OF FORM RESPECTING INCOME SUPPLEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I wish to thank him for the booklet and the application form for the guaranteed income supplement to the old age security pension. Although I am not yet old enough to complete this form I would like the minister to tell the house for the guidance of our old age pensioners whether it will be necessary for pensioners to complete a form similar to this one each and every year, in view of the fact that the form I have before me only asks for a statement of income for the year 1966?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker, it will be necessary to do so.

TELEVISION

PROGRAM ON C.T.V. RESPECTING USE OF CERTAIN DRUGS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have not given notice of this question to the Solicitor General, so he may not be able to give me an answer at this time. My question has to do with a program on C.T.V. called "W5" which had to do with marijuana and LSD and could not but have the effect of encouraging experimentation by young men and women across Canada. Has this program been brought to the attention of the law enforcement officers of the crown, and what action will be taken to prevent the flagrant exploitation and encouragement of crime in this manner?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have no personal knowledge of the program referred to by the right hon. gentleman, but I will discuss it with the officials of my department.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—REPORT OF ENGINEERING BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address two questions to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. First of all I wish to thank him for answering my out of order question last week by tabling the report about which I was inquiring, at that time.

My questions are as follows: Will members of the house receive copies of this engineering report on the Columbia river, and will this report be sent to the appropriate committee of the house for its study?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, may I say with respect to the first question that tabling the report is one way of making it available to members of the house. If some hon. members would like a copy I will do my very best to provide them with one for their own personal use.

With respect to the second question, I think this matter should be brought to the attention of the chairman of that particular committee.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED RENEGOTIATION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS CONVENTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that an application to appeal has been approved by the Supreme Court of Canada on a further conviction of a treaty Indian hunting migratory birds out of season in Canada, can the Prime Minister say whether the government is in a position as yet to do something about the conflict which exists between the Migratory Birds Convention Act and the treaties which the federal government has signed with the Indians of Canada?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe when this question was answered the last time it was stated that we were considering the desirability or otherwise of taking up the matter of a revision of the treaty with the United States government. That consideration has not yet been completed, but as soon as it is I will be glad to announce it to the house.

Mr. Simpson: Does the Prime Minister not consider that this centennial year is the appropriate and right time to get this matter straightened out once and for all?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

SPORTS

HALIFAX—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE FOR SUMMER GAMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): My question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. However, before putting it I should like to extend my congratulations both to him and to the Prime Minister for their presence in Quebec the other day when the temperature was 30 degrees below zero. They did very well. I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he is in a position at present to shed light on the summer games for Halifax?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Forrestall: The question is not asked in any sense of jest at all, Mr. Speaker. Time is running out on some of the preliminary work and more delays have been indicated. I wonder if the minister could reply.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member would put a starred question on the order paper.

TRADE

FRUIT—REQUEST FOR TARIFF ON IMPORTS FROM U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. It is related to my question of January 30 having to do with the fruit growers of Ontario and the adverse effect upon them of large scale imports of processed fruit from the United States. Is the government considering the imposition of a tariff on fruit imported from the United States? I have not yet received an answer to this question.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The Minister of Finance is in a position to answer that question now.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): I should like to apologize to the hon. member for Ontario. I have had this answer with me on a number of occasions, but I thought perhaps he had lost interest in the matter. Personally I have not received representations of this kind, but I understand that my colleagues the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Prime Minister have both received representations. Matters of this kind are considered during preparation of the budget, and these representations will receive very careful consideration.

Mr. Starr: May I ask a supplementary question, then. Would the Minister of Finance consider it his duty to put into effect the promise of the Prime Minister made in this respect in Hamilton last fall?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is argumentative.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

AIR CANADA

SUGGESTED INCREASED USE OF WINNIPEG MAINTENANCE BASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of reports that the Air Canada base at Dorval is not now adequate for its maintenance and overhaul work and that its facilities will have to be expanded, could the minister remind Air Canada of the fact that its base at Winnipeg could handle both the Viscounts and the DC-9 aircraft?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I have no doubt Air Canada will take note of the hon. gentleman's representations.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PRESENTATION OF WORLD WAR I DECORATIONS—COMMEMORATION OF BATTLE OF VIMY RIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance said a moment ago that he thought perhaps the hon. member for Ontario had lost interest in a question. May I direct my question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Has he lost interest in the question I asked him the other day with regard to awards, and the trip to Vimy?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): With regard to the first part of the question, it is true of course that the Victoria Cross and the D.S.O. have always been presented by the monarch. In the case of other awards this has not always been the practice. The conclusion has been arrived at that it would be impractical to attempt to do this during Her Majesty's visit this year.

With regard to the second part of the question concerning the trip to Vimy, the hon. member will recall that in 1936 a ship was engaged to carry some 8,000 veterans overseas. This boat was paid for by the veterans themselves and their dependants. This time there has been no attempt to do this, and I suspect it is because of the difficulty in making arrangements. The pilgrimage will be arranged in the traditional manner, with the Canadian government supplying an official delegation.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, you will permit me to use this occasion to invite every member of parliament who was present at Vimy and every member of the other place who was present at Vimy to be part of the official delegation. If any member of this house or the other place was at Vimy I would be pleased if I could be advised.

Mr. McIntosh: The minister has asked if I remember what happened back in 1936, but I can assure him I was not interested in military affairs in 1936, 30 years ago. The number of survivors of Vimy who would wish to visit that place has been substantially reduced since then. I suggest that as a centennial project the government could do nothing better than offer these veterans a free trip to Vimy.

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the federal government will not assume this responsibility, I wonder if the minister would ask each provincial government to be responsible for sending its Dieppe veterans to the Vimy celebrations, just as the government of Newfoundland did for its celebrations last year.

Mr. Teillet: I am sure, Mr. Speaker, the provincial authorities will have noted the hon. gentleman's representations.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

VANCOUVER—PROPOSED SALE OF NORTH SHORE PROPERTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Mr. Speaker. In view of the reported imminent sale to private developers of Vancouver north shore property presently owned but not now required by the Department of National Defence, will the minister give consideration to recommending that this and similar properties be first offered for sale to the municipality or the provincial government for public use?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question should be placed on the order paper.

CO-OPERATIVES

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE CHANGE IN TAX LAWS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I have a question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of a recent editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press, a newspaper known for its support of government views, and the kite flying speech delivered by the hon. member for Kootenay East, is the government contemplating any change in the tax laws applicable to co-operatives in Canada?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE

PRODUCTION IN NORTHWESTERN QUEBEC—DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCIAL AUTHORITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Did the minister recently enter into negotiations with the Quebec provincial authorities with regard to the assistance the various governments can give the development of gold mines in northwestern Quebec?

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if that question, as put by the hon. member, is in order under the present circumstances. To my mind, it bears on a matter of general nature and I would suggest that the member put it on the order paper.

[English]

CANADA LABOUR CODE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT RESPECTING APPLICATIONS FOR DEFERMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): In the absence of the Minister of Labour I wish to address this question to his parliamentary secretary, who I know is at least one person in that government who has the interests of labour at heart. I should like to ask him if any decision has been made on applications for exclusion from the provisions of the labour code pertaining to hours of work.

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): I was rather suspicious of this backhanded compliment, so I did not quite grasp the question. However, the minister will be back tomorrow and I would prefer to have the minister answer the question.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg South): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary would ask the Minister of Labour to tell the house at a very early date when he intends to finalize his decisions in connection with the requests for deferments which have been made with respect to the hours provision in the Canada labour code. Until the minister does so the 18-month deferment which can be granted stands in abeyance, and this may go on for years.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, tremendous progress has been made in this particular field, contrary to any opposite impression the previous speaker may have given in his speech. I can assure him that the matter is under constant review and that the department is well aware of the necessity for bringing this particular legislation to a logical conclusion.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would ask the parliamentary secretary whether he is aware of the fact that applications for deferment have been made, that opposition to those applications has been presented, and that the department has not taken any action on the matter for months.

[Later:]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I should like to direct this question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Labour. When the Minister of Labour replies to the question already asked about the implementation of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code would he also tell the house whether there are still outstanding applications for deferment from Canadian railway companies and, if so, how many workers are still not covered by the provisions of the act?

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REQUEST FOR COMMEMORATIVE STAMP IN 1970 HONOURING KINSMEN CLUBS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria (Ont)): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. In 1970 the Association of Kinsmen Clubs marks its golden anniversary, and I should like to ask the Postmaster General whether he would consider issuing a special postage stamp to mark this memorable occasion.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think this question could easily be put on the order paper.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

UNITED NATIONS

SUGGESTED CREATION OF SPECIAL CANADIAN PEACE KEEPING FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister of external affairs if he will support me in my submission to the Minister of National Defence that we provide for our peace keeping activities under the United Nations by the creation of a special force quite separate and apart from the armed fighting services of Canada, that we may thus retain the identity and the role of the navy, army and air force and at the same time assist the United Nations.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the indication that my hon. friend has now become a convert to the concept of United Nations peace keeping. I have examined what the Minister of National Defence has said, and it seems to me that the policies he has devised are consistent with the excellent record that Canada has of perhaps greater efficiency in responding to United Nations peace keeping efforts than any other country.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. I wonder whether I could convert the minister to giving a direct answer to a question. May I ask him, has he examined the proposition that I put forward with regard to this matter?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will make a deal with my hon. friend. If he could be induced to put a direct question he would receive a direct reply. But I would say to him this—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —that the—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Monteith: You are not in opposition now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The minister is rising on a question of personal privilege.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, my personal privilege is this, and I am sure it is good advice for my hon. friend. When a question is asked for the purpose of embarrassing, one should never jump to one's own bait.

CANADA COUNCIL

INQUIRY AS TO GRANT FOR PSYCHEDELIC WEEK END

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State, but inasmuch as the hon. lady is not here this afternoon I wonder whether her parliamentary secretary would take it as notice. Would she inform the house whether the Canada Council supplied a grant for the recent psychedelic week end at the University of Toronto?

Mr. Speaker: This question should be placed on the order paper.

FINANCE

GOLD—DISCUSSIONS WITH FRANCE RESPECTING INCREASE IN PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Minister of Finance whether there have been any discussions with the Republic of France in connection with the Rueff plan for doubling the price of gold. Has this question been discussed and has consideration been given to an increase in the price, without which, according to Maurice Schumann of the foreign affairs committee of the French national assembly, the European market application of Britain would not be accepted?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not had any discussions with the French government about this particular plan. When Mr. Débré was here in Canada some weeks ago we talked about this, as well as a number of other matters, because of his great interest in the subject.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is consideration being given by Canada to the acceptance of any plan that would increase the price of gold in order to meet the subject of the discussions between the minister and the representative of France?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker.

GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE

PRODUCTION IN NORTHWESTERN QUEBEC—DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCIAL AUTHORITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Speaker: On reflection I have reached the conclusion that the question asked a moment ago by the hon. member for Villeneuve is of the same nature as the one asked by the Leader of the Opposition, and if he still wants to ask his question I will certainly allow him to do so now.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

I am pleased to put my question again to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Did he have any discussions recently with Quebec provincial authorities with a view to increasing the subsidies to gold mines so as to promote the gold mining industry in northwestern Quebec? Did the minister get in touch with provincial authorities in that connection?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the decision to increase or merely to maintain the gold mining subsidies concerns solely the federal government.

Now this problem involves a social factor of interest to the province of Quebec and several times I have reminded the provincial authorities of the role they could play in the retraining of the miners presently employed in the production of gold.

In somewhat similar circumstances involving the textile industry, the Quebec Minister of Labour suggested to the hon. member for Drummond that he should write his federal member of parliament. May I now suggest to the hon. member for Villeneuve that he should write his member of the provincial legislature?

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance and Receiver General.

A little earlier, in reply to a question from the Leader of the Opposition, he said that there is no question of increasing the price of gold. I think the minister will agree with me that increasing the price of gold would stimulate the mining industry throughout Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member ask his question?

Mr. Caouette: Yes, Mr. Speaker, with pleasure. Does the minister feel that increasing gold production in Canada would help us to improve our present balance of payments with the United States?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is asking for the minister's opinion and such a question is out of order.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SYDNEY, N.S.—FURTHER LAY-OFFS AT STEEL PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry. May I ask him if he or his colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare has received a communication from the city of Sydney steel committee to the effect that another 100 workers have been laid off by DOSCO at the steel plant, and that now some 30 per cent of the employees have been adversely affected? Has the minister any program to deal with this situation, or has he been able to give any reply to this committee regarding this very unfortunate situation?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): I do not know about my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but I have no knowledge at the moment of any such communication. I will be glad to have a search made.

[Later:]

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry. In view of the fact that the minister has been informed by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam that an additional 100 people at the Sydney steel plant have been laid off, may I ask the minister what steps he or the government plans to take to alleviate this very serious situation, which now brings the total number who have been laid off to around 1,100?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman will recognize that the government is concerned about this problem of continuing job opportunities in the Cape Breton area. He will recall the recent announcement of the intention of the government to establish through legislation a corporation, the specific task of which would be to endeavour to find new job opportunities in Cape Breton to replace those that seem to be in the course of disappearing.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the hon. gentleman how soon this legislation will be brought before the house?

[Mr. Caouette.]

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, we are working intensively to try to get the corporation organized and set up as quickly as possible. I am glad to see that, as the recent announcement by the British American Oil Company shows, work in the right direction is continuing in spite of the absence of a corporation.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In view of the answer just given by the Minister of Industry with respect to the crown company's intention to take care of the lay-offs at the Sydney steel plant, will the ministers get together with the Prime Minister so as to ascertain just what is the intention of this crown company, since the other day the Prime Minister denied that there would be any take-overs of the steel plant but that the intention of the crown company was to deal with the closing of the mines.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The corporation was not set up for the purpose of taking over the steel aspect of the industry. We intend to do everything we can through the corporation and in other ways, as my hon. friend has just said, to improve job opportunities; and I am sure the hon. member shares the satisfaction of the government with the steps already taken at Port Hawkesbury by private initiative, assisted by the two governments, to improve job opportunities at once in that area.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the fact that the legislation has not yet been introduced and the crown corporation has not yet been established, would the government give consideration to including the steel industry, in view of the fact that the steel industry appears to be next on the list for a phasing out program? Would it not be better to anticipate events rather than deal with the steel situation a year or two from now?

Mr. Pearson: Without accepting all the statements made by the hon. gentleman, may I say this. He will realize the implications of the government taking over, through a crown corporation, all those industries in this country which appear to him, or to the government, or to parliament, to be in the process of disappearance.

Mr. Starr: We do not want another box factory in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Douglas: It is not a matter which concerns a number of industries. DOSCO operates both a coal and a steel industry. Instead of taking over part of the DOSCO operation would the government not consider taking over the entire operation, which would include both coal and steel?

Mr. Pearson: In this particular plan we are taking over only the Dominion Coal Company of the DOSCO operation.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): The Prime Minister has put his finger on the difference between the statement he has made and the statement the Minister of Industry made a moment ago. When and how will members opposite make up their minds with regard to their intentions for this industry? Is assistance to be directed toward solving the coal problem only, or will both steel and coal be covered?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to rule that the question asked by the hon. member is argumentative. He asks when and how the Prime Minister and members of the government would get together on something or other. The hon. member knows that the purpose of questions at this time is to extract information.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I have another question. It is a supplementary question and is similar to a question asked by an hon. member on the back benches last week and allowed by Your Honour. He asked for clarification of a statement. I would ask the Prime Minister to clarify his statement as to the aims of this crown company. Is it intended to alleviate the position of the coal miners or will it improve the prospects in both coal and steel, as implied by the Minister of Industry?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that this very question was answered by the Prime Minister some moments ago.

[Later:]

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I have a question for the Prime Minister arising out of a recent remark he made. What federal assistance was given to B.A. for the establishment of a refinery at Port Hawkesbury?

Mr. Pearson: A great deal of assistance. It would take too long to go into all the details now, but I would be glad to send them to the hon. member.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): This year?

Inquiries of the Ministry

BANKRUPTCY

WINNIPEG—FAILURE OF LIVESTOCK COMMISSION HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Since the Minister of Agriculture has just left his place I would ask his parliamentary secretary to take this question as notice. What course of action is the department taking with regard to the bankruptcy about a year ago of a federally licensed livestock commission house in the Winnipeg-St. Boniface stockyards involving allegations of default on the part of the bonding company and allegations of interdepartmental dispute between the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Justice?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question should be placed on the order paper.

WOMEN

REPRESENTATION ON UN COMMISSION—PERSONNEL OF CANADIAN ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Is the Canadian government officially represented at the 20th session of the United Nations commission on the status of women which opened in New York today?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, the government is officially represented.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): May we know who are the representatives?

Mr. Pearson: Miss MacPherson, a member of the Department of External Affairs.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask whether Donald Gordon, Jr., if I may use that expression, has been appointed as one member of the royal commission on the status of women?

Mr. Pearson: I indicated at the end of last week that I hoped to be in a position to announce the appointments to that commission today. I am sorry I am not able to do that because there has been a delay in releasing one or two members of the commission from their present activities. I hope to be able to make the announcement tomorrow or the next day. Any speculation before the announcement has been made here would be entirely speculative.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not want anything speculative, but I am wondering whether Mr. Gordon has been released by the C.B.C. so that we will get more objective reporting.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

APPLICATION TO PENSION APPLICATIONS OF OLD AGE SECURITY QUALIFICATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): I have a question for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Inasmuch as today we received a copy of the application form for a guaranteed income supplement to the old age pension, and inasmuch as insurance benefits or moneys received from the sale of possessions or investments are excluded from the financial statement which is requested, will the minister bring these qualifications to the attention of his department when pensions are being awarded?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The only answer I can give the hon. member at this moment is that the department keeps closely in touch with developments in this area, and our veterans are being informed accordingly.

OLD AGE SECURITY

EXTENSION OF SUPPLEMENTARY BENEFIT TO RECIPIENTS OF WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question relates to two departments. May I therefore direct it to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, now confirmed by the explanatory booklet on the old age pension supplement which is out today, to the effect that receipt of war veterans allowance does not stand in the way of the supplementary pension benefit, and in view of the fact that a letter from the war veterans allowance board tells war veterans who receive allowances that they cannot receive both these payments, will some action be taken to clarify this situation, particularly for recipients of war veterans allowances?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, I will discuss it with the two ministers concerned.

[Mr. Pearson.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO POLICE REPORTS ON BOMBING OF YUGOSLAV BUILDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): I have a question for the Prime Minister. Has the right hon. gentleman any announcement to make with regard to the bombing of the Yugoslav diplomatic and consular offices? If not, when does he expect to be in a position to make such an announcement?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I made some inquiries about this the other day. The investigations are not completed. They are being pressed. I hope that before long there will be a report, but the inquiries are international in their scope and require consultation with other governments and with the international police bureau, and I am informed it will take a little time before they are complete.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Has the Prime Minister had an opportunity to look into the question I asked him in this connection, whether the federal government has any responsibility for damage done to property adjacent to the embassies and consulates in question, and whether any compensation will be paid?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I am advised by the legal officers, to whom this matter was referred and who studied it, that the position of the persons involved is similar to that of any private person who suffers loss or injury as the result of criminal acts by others known or unknown, and in general the law makes no provision for compensation in circumstances such as these. There can be little doubt that many persons have suffered loss in criminal actions for which no compensation has been paid or is payable. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am informed the government has no legal obligation in this matter.

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the government giving consideration to the desirability of making ex gratia payments to these people?

Mr. Pearson: This matter is still under consideration, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL.

REQUEST FOR REPEAT TOUR OF CONFEDERATION TRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State. In view of the tremendous public interest in the confederation train and the fact that many persons will not have the opportunity to visit this super excellent centennial project, has consideration been given to a repeat tour by this train next year?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS

LOUISBOURG FORTRESS—DISMISSAL OF SENIOR EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. On January 27, as recorded at page 12331 of Hansard, the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria asked a question based on charges that one Jeremy Akerman was discharged from a senior position at the fortress of Louisbourg restoration project as a result of political activity on behalf of the New Democratic Party. The hon. member asked if the minister would institute an investigation into this very serious charge and make a report to the house. The minister was not present that day, and the Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board replied that he would like to take the question as notice on behalf of the minister, adding that he was sure the minister would look into the matter. I would now like to ask the minister whether he has made an investigation and, if so, what are his findings?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I anticipate giving an answer in the house on this particular case within the next two or three days.

THE BUDGET

ADDITIONAL FINANCIAL MEASURES OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Friday, February 10, consideration of the motion of Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to participate in this debate which centres around a budget which many hon. members have said had no real purposes and was really unnecessary because the money to be raised by the $300 million tax increase imposed upon the citizens of Canada purportedly to pay the increase in pensions to senior citizens, establishing what has become known as the basic wage for senior citizens, was already available in the old age security fund and will still be in that fund when the pension increase takes effect on March 1. It was really shameful for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) to make the senior citizens of Canada the goat for this tax increase. It is something which was resented and will be resented in the years ahead by our senior citizens.

The financial year 1966-67 will go down in history as a very interesting one. Canadians will remember two things in particular about it. It will long be remembered as a year in which the country had a great deal of labour difficulty and a great many strikes. It will also long be remembered as a year in which Canadians saw their country suffer many financial difficulties. These two major difficulties, labour strife and financial strife, are the direct responsibility of the government because of the actions it took.

We are debating a budget which increases taxes and the cost of living and is a backward attempt to put the brakes on inflation. Some of the most interesting comments on the budget were made in a C.B.C. "Viewpoint" telecast by a Montreal Star newspaper reporter. He said that as a result of the budget 2,300,000 Canadians will pay higher income taxes. He added:

> A married couple just getting going on less than $100 a week will pay more on income.
> A man struggling to keep a wife and four children on $120 will pay more on his income.
> And every Canadian will pay more in sales taxes. Nobody escapes.

He wound up by saying:

> If this is a mini-budget, heaven deliver us from a maxi-budget.

In essence the budget was too severe. It was unnecessary and it was shameful of the minister to blame our senior citizens for the tax increase. To analyse the budget fully one must go back to 1963 when the government took office. Even though the Liberal party was a minority in the house it formed the government and its immediate aim was to call another election and get a majority. How was this to be accomplished. Members of the government had to create the impression of a boom in Canada. Most economists agree that our economy started to boom back in 1961. However, the boom was not increasing fast enough for members of the government and so they decided to create an excessive boom.

The government immediately set to work to double the money supply. The total money supply in Canada today has increased very nearly 50 per cent over what it was in 1963. In fact I have a letter from a minister in which he states quite frankly that the government made a deliberate decision to increase the money supply. Such an increase in the money supply could only result in inflation, and there is no need for me to repeat the story of that inflation. Citizen's groups all across Canada have been writing to members of parliament complaining about inflation and 1966 will long be remembered for the tremendous increase. In actual fact the inflation was ignited by the too rapid increase in money supply as a result of the deliberate decision of the government, and it has been perpetuated by the government's action in granting huge wage increases to a number of labour unions without any regard for the effects these wage increases would have on the unions themselves and on all citizens. One might wonder how they could do so many things and not really affect the economy of the country.

I think this is one reason we became involved in a great many financial difficulties in 1966. One financial house closed down and others barely stayed alive as the result of huge loans by the government. One need only take a look at the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation report for 1965 in which the following statement appears:

> Under section 11 of the National Housing Act, holders of N.H.A. mortgages may be provided with a source of short-term credit if required. Ten loans were made under this provision of the act in 1965, representing the first activity under this particular section of the housing legislation.

In other words, this is the first time the government has lent money to financial houses. They did so because they feared the collapse of a whole series of financial houses after the failure of Atlantic Acceptance Corporation. They bailed out some of these companies by making loans available. The report states further:

> The loans were approved late in the year as a result of the difficult conditions in the mortgage market which prevailed at the time. The loans amounted to $29.9 million on which the balance owing at year-end was $24.4 million.

[Mr. Horner (Acadia).]

It became very difficult to ascertain the names of the ten companies. The government was very sensitive about this point. One can hardly blame them, because if the information became public knowledge perhaps more finance companies would be in difficulty since no doubt money would be withdrawn and they surely would collapse.

Why did the finance companies find themselves in danger? Because of the oversupply of money which caused inflation. Then there was a severe clamping down on the money circulating throughout the economy resulting in a tight-money situation. To a large extent this is what caused the financial houses to be in difficulty. In some cases, mind you, there were other things which had a greater effect, but this is the reason ten houses in particular were in difficulty. First of all, there was the government's announcement that the bank interest rate would be increased. Perhaps they thought this would be a curb on inflation. In these days when there is so much money being borrowed by everyone action of this type tends to create more inflation because the people who borrow money continue to borrow even at the higher rates and the result is that the goods produced cost more.

We find Canada getting into a great deal of difficulty in respect of banking. We saw the Mercantile Bank get into difficulty because all of a sudden the government decided it must place restrictions on a foreign-owned bank. Many people forget the fact that the Mercantile Bank was completely foreign-owned when First National City Bank of New York bought it. It was owned by Dutch interests. When the Dutch concern applied for a charter in 1949 we had a Liberal government. The government did not tell them that if they did receive a charter they must allow Canadians to participate in their company. Rather than say that the government simply hoped that this bank would remain small and not become too much of an influence.

I would be the first to say that we should have absolute control over our banking system. The error was made in 1949 when the Mercantile Bank was first given its charter. It never said it was going to become Canadian. It asked for and was granted a Canadian charter. When the original owners of the Mercantile Bank decided to pull out the government should have said "All right, set your price and we will buy you out; we will put the bank in trust and sell it to Canadians". After all, this is the party which has been advocating the setting up of the Canada

Development Corporation. How better could a development corporation start than by having a bank charter? This is one of the positive steps the government could have taken which would have bailed it out of a lot of trouble. But no. After a series of manipulations and meetings at which notes were made on pieces of paper by individuals the government said, "We hope you will not buy". They should have been firm at that time. If the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Gordon), the minister of finance at that time, really thought that Canadian banks should belong to Canadians he should have said to the owners of Mercantile, "If you do sell we want the privilege of meeting the price and buying the bank". This is what should have been done. It was not done.

Finally, after the bank is sold to the First National City Bank retroactive legislation is brought in to curb it. In other words, as soon as the bank, which was in Dutch hands, is sold to a United States concern the government steps in and limits the expansion of the bank in Canada. Retroactive discrimination is the only term which can be applied to this legislation. The government is not yet out of the mess.

Last week there was some concern over the newly granted charter of the Bank of Western Canada. Mr. Coyne came marching down to Ottawa to tell the finance committee and the house what the trouble was all about. It was all nonsense. When Mr. Coyne brought the matter before the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs he knew the facts and he knew exactly what would happen. But for some reason or other Mr. Coyne believed that Mr. Stevens wanted to get rid of him and he said, "No, you are not firing me, or if you do I will cause you trouble". Apparently Mr. Coyne is good at causing trouble when someone wants to fire him.

I think the interesting thing to note is that the government knew Mr. Stevens' finance companies were in difficulty at the time they granted the charter to the Bank of Western Canada. The government knew this. I defy the Minister of Finance to stand up in the house and say that none of the companies owned by Mr. Stevens' syndicate is among the ten companies mentioned in the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation report that the government bailed out. Some of them definitely are. I think I can safely say two were or perhaps five. The government knew. That is the point which is most interesting. The government knew that some of the companies in the B.I.F. group were in financial difficulty. Yet they granted the charter. It was logical to expect that the charter would bail out those few companies. It is interesting to note this article concerning Mr. Coyne in the Winnipeg Tribune of Thursday, April 28, 1966. The article is headed "Coyne Gets Keel-hauled" and reads in part as follows:

> James E. Coyne, former governor of the Bank of Canada, encountered some sharp criticism of his investing judgment on Wednesday.

That has to do with one of the questions which was involved when the charter of the Bank of Western Canada was being obtained. The article continues:

> Mr. Coyne confirmed that $1.5 million of N.H.A. mortgages had been purchased from Fort Garry Trust and $1 million from York Trust and Savings Corp. of Toronto. He said that it had been hoped that C.F.I. would be able to sell these notes on the general market but this proved impossible and C.F.I. was bearing a carrying loss on them.

• (3:50 p.m.)

I do not want to bore the house by reading all of this rather lengthy article, but toward the end the following is stated under the heading "They're Demand Notes":

> He was asked if the N.H.A. mortgages were in the form of demand notes. Yes, they were. And if they were demanded "we may sustain a loss", Mr. Coyne said.
> Mr. Coyne said: "I don't think there will be any trouble getting the money" if the Bank of Western Canada suddenly received its charter. "We have the ability to raise the funds when the time comes."

That is what Mr. Coyne had to say about the difficulty of raising money in relation to these financial houses owned or controlled by himself or Mr. Stevens. This is absolutely contrary to the pledge made to the governement that money would not be borrowed from the Bank of Western Canada. The government knew of this intention, and that is as obvious now as it was during meetings of the committee. This group should never have been granted a charter.

This group was associated with about 14 eastern investment houses, most of which were then experiencing difficulty. The group wanted a charter and applied for one because with a charter it is relatively easy for these people to increase their funds by 20 times. Mr. Coyne and Mr. Stevens both admitted that to the committee as did the Inspector General of Banks. That is why Mr. Coyne said there would be no difficulty in handling C.M.H.C. loans as far as the Bank of Western Canada was concerned. He said they had the ability to raise the funds when the time came.

The government knew exactly what it was doing when it granted this charter. It is no wonder the government has found itself in difficulty in handling banking affairs, having regard to the Mercantile Bank and the Bank of Western Canada. One might well ask why I as a westerner should oppose this.

Mr. Sharp: Would the hon. member permit a question? Let me point out that the Bank of Western Canada was granted a charter by parliament, not by the government.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Never before have I seen such an obvious attempt by a minister of finance to evade or weasel out of a responsibility that was his all along. No wonder we fought the passage of the transportation bill two weeks ago because it included a study of the Crowsnest Pass rates. We did not want the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) to be in a position to stand up in the house and evade his responsibility by saying that parliament had passed that measure. The Minister of Finance knows very well that he and he alone must accept responsibility for granting that charter, even though in the narrow sense parliament approved it. The Minister of Transport knew exactly what he was doing at that time.

Mr. Sharp: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I have the floor, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the government did not sponsor that bill; it was sponsored by a private member.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I have the floor. The minister can make a detailed explanation in respect of his action regarding that charter when I am finished.

We in this house all know how these charters come about and how private members' bills are sponsored in the house. The minister can sit there and say that the government had nothing to do with it, but we all know what the situation was. One can look up the facts and find that on July 4 of last year the charter was granted to the Bank of Western Canada. During the last month when the bill was being debated the government moved it to the top of the order paper day after day. The minister may well say he knows nothing about that, but that was done time after time with the consent of the government because it wanted to see this group given a charter. I can only guess why, but it certainly was not intended to improve the position of western Canada.

During the committee meetings I asked Mr. Coyne why he wanted a charter for the Bank of Western Canada and he pointed out that he wanted to help that area. I asked him what particular industries he was interested in helping in a financial way and he said he had not studied the matter to that extent.

At the same time I asked Mr. Coyne if that area of Canada could be considered a surplus depository area and he answered in the affirmative. I found it difficult to believe that until he presented the facts. I then asked the Inspector General of Banks whether or not he would agree that western Canada was an area one could call a surplus depository area, and he said yes.

Under these circumstances what do we end up with in western Canada? I suggest we have a new bank operating in a surplus depository area in order to assist some 14 financial investment houses operating in Ontatio, with 53 per cent of the shares held by three men living in Toronto. Most of these financial houses were in difficulty at that time, and the minister, whether he likes to or not, must accept full responsibility for granting this charter. He can sit there and say that parliament granted the charter but he knew then as he does now the ten companies associated with the B. I. F. group.

Mr. Coyne was completely aware of the situation as indicated by the article which appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune on April 28. There is no doubt in my mind that the government also knew of the situation and, having known, it should have stepped in to prevent this group from getting a charter. The government should have refused to issue the charter even after parliament passed the private member's bill. Perhaps the government felt it owed Mr. Coyne a special favour. I can only surmise what the factors were, which is a dangerous thing to do without knowing the facts. One must do the best one can without the facts. I tried to find out the names of the ten companies involved in the B. I. F. group but I could only find out two.

It is my felling that the trouble in which Canada now finds itself in respect of financing has resulted from poor management on the part of the Liberal government. This government has handled the financial affairs of the country very badly. We all realize that our money supply must be increased, but the government increased the supply too rapidly and then followed that rapid increase with a too severe and lengthy tight-money period.

The government must accept responsibility for the difficult financial circumstances which now exist because of its attitude toward labour problems. It has set a precedent by allowing a 33 per cent wage increase to certain workers, as a result of which other labour unions are attempting to obtain similar increases. It is all well and good for the government to suggest that Canadians should invest more in Canada, but how can they expect Canadians to invest more when their confidence has been so badly shaken in the past year? One would have to use a pretty big stick to make Canadians invest in Canadian investment companies because of the government's mishandling of our financial difficulties. The government must bear the burden of its mismanagement in this our centennial year. For the sake of Canada and Canadians I hope the government will do a better job of dealing with labour problems, inflation and financial institutions in 1967, than it did in 1966.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to miss this opportunity to say a few words about the mini-budget brought down in the house by the Minister of Finance and Receiver General (Mr. Sharp). It is probably the first one in our history to impose new taxes on the people to get money for the old age security fund.

Before examining closely all the statements made by the Minister of Finance and Receiver General, I would like first to set out clearly the four basic principles which guide us, the Créditistes of Canada. I see that the minister is in his seat. He is an intelligent man, since he presides over Canada's financial future and I feel that he will easily understand the four basic principles which guide us, the Créditistes in our country, Canada.

Here are those four principles. First:

[English]

Social Credit firmly believes that the individual is the most important factor in organized society. Because he is a divinely created being with spiritual, mental and physical needs and potentialities, he has inalienable rights which must be respected and preserved. Because of this belief Social Credit is inalterably opposed to communism, fascism and all forms of totalitarian government which make the individual citizen subservient to the state. It stands opposed to political organization whose aims are the furtherance of the sectional interests of organized labour, business, or finance.

[Translation]

The following is the second basic principle which guides us in our work:

[English]

Government must serve the individual. The major function of democratic government in organized society is to secure for the people the results they want from the management of their public affairs, as far as such results are physically possible and morally right.

[Translation]

I think the hon. Minister of Finance will agree with us that the essential task of a democratic government in an organized society is to serve the people and to try to obtain the results which the people expect of the government, in so far as these results are physically possible.

The third basic principle of the Créditistes is this:

[English]

The individual must be free and have economic security. The individual can only attain his full stature in a society where his ability to make moral choices is restricted as little as possible. Economic security is a necessary means for attaining this freedom not as an end to be attained by restricting it.

[Translation]

This is the fourth basic principle:

[English]

The physically possible must be regarded as the financially possible. Whatever is physically possible, desirable, and morally right, can and should be made financially possible.

[Translation]

Those, Mr. Speaker, are the four basic principles of the Créditistes. The hon. Minister of Finance often tells us, as he did a while ago, that a bank charter, for instance, is granted by parliament and not by the government. He said a few minutes ago, speaking of the Western Bank of Canada, that parliament granted the charter and that the government had nothing to do with it.

Mr. Speaker, I maintain that though the Canadian people are told that parliament decides, we know, here in the house, that the government decides, because the party line must be followed. It is understood that the Liberals on the government side will vote for the government when the time comes to grant a bank charter. As the government has the majority in the house, government decides and not parliament.

Parliament should decide, parliament should be free to decide important issues such as granting bank charters in Canada, but that is not the case. The government has always decided, whether it was the present, the former or any of the successive governments, ever since confederation. In fact, we have had instances where the members of the government rose to speak in favour of increased old age pensions, but who voted against the amendment to increase them proposed by the opposition. Why? Because party discipline required that they vote against their convictions, because the matter became a political game.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Finance takes pleasure in often repeating: We, of the federal government, have only two ways of finding money: loans and taxes. As I see it, there could be a third way: inflation. Those are the answers of the hon. Minister of Finance. Third way: inflation. But the only two ways the government can find money are through loans and taxes.

I say there are other ways of finding money and credit. The minister of Finance and Receiver General knows quite well that money and credit do not grow on spruce or on fir trees, whether in Lotbinière or Villeneuve ridings. That is not where they grow.

Money and credit originate somewhere. But where? This the Minister of Finance and Receiver General never explains. He never mentions the creators of credit and money, never. He always answers: there are only two means at our disposal: borrowing and levying taxes. But before borrowing and taxing, the money had to originate somewhere. Where? The provinces do not create money and credit, they do and say what the federal government does and says. we borrow and we levy taxes. The municipal authorities and school boards say: we borrow and we levy taxes.

And the federal government, the central government, the supreme government gives us the same answer: we borrow and we levy taxes. These are our only ways of creating money and credit.

While the house is in session I sometimes attend sittings of the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs where we are given the opportunity to question presidents of various banks, the governor of the Bank of Canada and others. These people admit that $8 enables them to create $100 worth of credit, that they are authorized to give as much expansion to the Canadian credit as they wish, but we must pay interest on this credit.

[Mr. Caouette.]

I believe it was to a Bank of Nova Scotia economist that I once said this: When the federal government issues or buys $1 million worth of bonds, the Canadian chartered banks are immediately authorized by law and by charter to grant loans totalling $12.5 million.

Mr. Speaker, where does that credit come from? From the pen and the ink stand. Twelve million and a half. Would it not be as easy for the government to use the Bank of Canada and to tell it to create those twelve and a half million for the benefit of the Canadian people, instead of giving that power to a few individuals who control the economic lifeblood of the nation and who crush, as they see fit, industry, private enterprise and even the government because, in many cases, the latter is obliged to kowtow to those controllers who dispense credit as they please, with the blessing of the federal government.

We are not the only ones to ask for the use of the means available to us to appreciate the assets of our country, to make the development of our natural resources possible, to avoid the chaos which results from inflation and deflation. The means are available to us, and parliament has the power to decide and to legislate.

We do not use the powers available to us. We prefer to grant special licenses to individuals so as to let them exploit all the people.

The Minister of Finance and Receiver General knows fully well that parliament has the right to give orders to the Bank of Canada under section 91 of the B.N.A. Act. It is the prerogative, the right of the federal parliament to legislate in money matters. The provinces do not have that right. Then, why does not the federal government allow the provinces, the school boards, the municipalities, to cope—not with the possibilities of physical expansion—but with the financial possibilities to do so. Ask the provinces, the municipalities, the school boards what is their problem?

At the present time, in the province of Quebec, thousands of teachers are at loggerheads with school boards and the provincial government. Why those recriminations, those discussions and such an alarming situation in the province of Quebec? The question of finance. The school boards do not have enough funds to meet their obligations under their budget at present. Increased expenses are required, which they cannot meet.

• (4:10 p.m.)

On the other hand, the teachers are entitled to better treatment, they have a right to recognition. But if we look at the situation at present in Quebec, I say this is complete anarchy, because they do not put the finger on the cause of the evil, because they are afraid to touch the system which has placed the school boards in the position where they are at present, which has placed the government in its present dilemma, which has put municipalities in their present state of stagnation. Why? Because we have been using for one hundred years a debt-money system.

The cost of building a school is doubled, because of the interest required. The cost of building a road is doubled, because of the interest to be paid. The cost of building a city hall is doubled when the interest to be paid is included.

But the value of a city hall is never doubled; on the contrary, every year the building depreciates in value. A road has never been worth twice the amount it cost. Now, to double the cost of such public services is to resort to inflation 100 per cent, because over a period of 20 years you have to pay back double the amount of the capital borrowed originally.

This system may still not worry some of the people, but I can assure you that it is coming to an end. When school children are throwing tomatoes and rotten eggs at their teachers, when teachers are up in arms against school trustees, when school trustees are up in arms against the government, in short, when one sees what is going on in some places across the country, I think it is high time for a responsible government to set the financial system in order.

Otherwise our children will pay the piper and will never forgive us for not having taken proper steps at the proper time.

I am not the only one requesting that the financial system be set in order, I know that among Liberals—I see my hon. friend from Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Tremblay) who is an expert in this field and knows that the financial system is faulty, that it needs to be improved and amended. He knows that the Bank of Canada should be used, instead of encouraging and granting to a few individuals the right to exercise financial control right across Canada. He knows that.

Some members of the Conservative and N.D.P. parties know it too. The parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance knows that the Bank of Canada could be used, if a decision was taken to that effect. Such a decision could be taken under our constitution.

We are not facing up to our responsibilities, and when we know—I will quote again today—

Some hon. Members: He is going to repeat himself.

Mr. Caouette: I am. To bring some people to reason sometimes one has to repeat oneself over and over again, continuously.

Now, I want to quote three presidents of the United States who were up against the problem we are facing today. Here is what Thomas Jefferson said, and I quote:

[English]

I believe the banking institutions are more dangerous to our liberties than standing armies.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, Thomas Jefferson was not a stupid man nor a moron. He knew what he was talking about.

[English]

Already they have raised up a moneyed aristocracy that has set the government at defiance. The issuing power should be taken from the banks and restored to the people to whom it properly belongs.

[Translation]

That is what a former president of the United States had to say, and to reach that station in life, or to become president of the United States, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that one has to use one's head, at least a little.

In 1829—not in 1967—John Adams made some remarks that, in my opinion, could very well be applied to the situation that exists in Canada in 1967. I quote:

[English]

All the perplexities, confusion and distress in America arise, not from defects in their constitution or confederation; not from want of honor or virtue, so much as from downright ignorance of the nature of coin, credit and circulation.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, when one considers those who object to confederation or the constitution, in short, the citizens of the east who attack westerners, French Canadians who blame Englishmen and Englishmen who blame French Canadians, one may wonder what will be the effect of such an attitude on our financial system.

The constitution is not faulty. When we examine sections 91, 92, 93 and 94a of the constitution, we become aware of the fact that each province enjoys exactly the same privileges and rights. But we do not know them and we are fighting within confederation against confederation. We accuse others and blame them for what we have not had the courage to do ourselves; we attack everybody, except those who are really responsible, because we are not yet convinced in 1967 of our—

• (4:20 p.m.)

[English]

—downright ignorance of the nature of coin, credit and circulation.

[Translation]

There lies the essence of the problem. As soon as we decide to set things right we will see that no one is afraid of confederation; neither I nor the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) will lie awake at the propsect of a visit to Canada by Her Majesty the Queen, that is for sure; she can come if she wants to. We will show her respect; to us she will represent those who at least permitted us to become what we are today. She will be that much to us, and we will discover the cause of the present faults in our responsible financial system.

As for the financiers, their great motto is simple: Divide and rule. It does not matter whether we have separatists, co-separatists, separatists to a greater degree, to lesser degree, fanatics in other areas, Anglo-Saxon fanatics, or what have you. As long as we remain divided one against the other, with as many groups as possible, right and left, finance will remain master.

It is not the Queen of England who rules in Canada, it is the financial system.

We may say Her Majesty the Queen, yes, but "the power behind the throne" is stronger than that, Mr. Speaker. There you have the all powerful master.

When Abraham Lincoln, another one-time president of the United States said:

[English]

I have two great enemies—the southern army in front of me, and the financial institutions in the rear.

[Translation]

He said: The financial institutions behind and the southern army ahead. The army, he could see. Those behind, he could not see, he could feel them.

[English]

Of the two, the one behind is my greatest foe.

[Mr. Caouette.]

[Translation]

Lincoln said: Of those two enemies I have, the most dangerous, the one which is the most troublesome, is the group of financiers who are behind me. As a matter of fact, to win the war, he had at one time to issue what were called greenbacks, and that enabled him to pay his soldiers without having to call on the financial institutions. But they caught up with him later on, because he did not have the support of the American Congress, because he did not have the support of the government. But if the government had the support of a parliament like ours, to get high finance to toe the line, it would be as easy as passing the act to increase old age pensions in this country.

And Lincoln said:

[English]

The government should create, issue and circulate all the currency required to satisfy the spending power of the government and the buying power of consumers. The privilege of creating and issuing money is not only the supreme prerogative of government, it is the government's greatest creative opportunity.

[Translation]

That was Lincoln speaking.

[English]

The people can and will be furnished with a currency as safe as their own country. Money will cease to be master and become the servant of the people. Democracy will rise superior to the money power.

[Translation]

That is precisely what the Créditistes are asking for. Not an unlimited financial credit or monetary creation. Not flood the country with greenbacks, as we say, or paper money, but create credit up to the exact amount of the existing resources in Canada. That is all we are asking for. Put things in order, set a balance between the purchasing power and the goods and services produced by the Canadian people.

Is there a sensible economist who can pass by this logical and plausible solution?

[English]

Money will cease to be master and become the servant of the people. Democracy will rise superior to the money power.

[Translation]

That is what the members of the Créditistes request, Mr. Speaker.

And at this point, we might quote other bankers who, for their part, defy governments:

[English]

The chairman of the United States Federal Reserve Board, Marriner J. Eccles, said:

The banks can create and destroy money; bank credit is money. It is money we do most of our business with, not with that currency which we usually think of as money.

[Translation]

It is so true that 95 per cent of the business in Canada, at the present time, is transacted by transfers of figures from one bank account to another. Figures only, for which there is not a nickel in circulation. Five per cent only of Canadian business is transacted with paper money or with hard cash, money in the pocket as we say in good French, while 95 per cent is done by transfers of figures from one account to another. And where are those figures created? In the government? No, the figures are created by the Canadian chartered banks. That is where.

The value of a bond can be created, as I said earlier. The government issues its bond series for one million, the Bank of Canada buys it for one million. But as soon as the Bank of Canada has bought it for a million, immediately, the reserve of the chartered banks increases and, that way they can multiply by 12 and a half times the initial amount of one million, which clearly allows a credit production of $12.5 million which are going to be loaned later on to the government at a rate of 4¼, 4½, 5, 5½ per cent. But the government will quench its thirst, will feed itself out of the hands of those people to whom we gave the right in Canada to create millions and billions practically without restriction. Mr. Eccles said:

[English]

It is money we do most of our business with, not with that currency which we usually think of as money.

• (4:30 p.m.)

[Translation]

Another banker, Mr. Mayer-Anselme Rothschild, said:

[English]

Let me issue the money of a nation and I care not who makes its laws.

[Translation]

It is exactly that. When the Minister of Finance and Receiver General tells us: "We have only two ways at our disposal to find money: loans and taxes", it means that he has to admit what Mr. Rothschild said once:

[English]

Let me issue the money of the nation and I care not who makes its laws.

[Translation]

Those people are above the law, and we realize this in the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs, the meetings of which we attend. We ask questions but receive replies that are not too precise. We ask them whether they create credit and they answer as follows: No, we do not create credit, we only "expand" credit.

[English]

It is a credit expansion, it is not the creation of money. It is just the expansion of credit.

[Translation]

What is the difference between expansion and creation, in the circumstances? Mr. Graham Towers, former governor of the Bank of Canada said the following and he is an expert in banking affairs:

[English]

That is the banking business (creating money), just the same way that a steel plant makes steel. Now, if parliament wants to change the form of operating the banking system, then certainly that is within the power of parliament.

[Translation]

That is precisely what I was saying a while ago, that parliament has the right to change this banking system, to amend it, to improve it. This does not mean cancelling all bank accounts and eliminating chartered banks in Canada. No. Let us keep the chartered banks, in order to finance the private sector of our economy. It is all very well, Mr. Speaker, for a businessman, a manufacturer to get credit from chartered banks, but when it comes to public capital, our municipalities, our school boards, our provincial government—

The Acting Speaker Mr. Rinfret): I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Caouette: Only two more minutes and I will be through, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Does the house agree to the member for Villeneuve continuing his speech? Agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Caouette: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will not take advantage of my colleagues' generosity. I shall be brief.

To conclude, I want to say this: We believe that the government should use the Bank of Canada to finance the public sector of our economy. Our provinces, our municipalities, our school boards should have the right to borrow from the Bank of Canada, in a branch of the Bank of Canada, in any province, without interest, because they are public, non-profitable organizations. We have no objection to those public organizations being able to finance themselves from the source of credit of the Bank of Canada, without interest, and to the private sector continuing to use the money which chartered banks are in a position to provide, for the smooth running of their business.

We do not want to nationalize anyone, but we believe that it is time for the government and parliament to use the Bank of Canada not only as a mainspring to give more power to the chartered banks but also to use it as a national institution which will help the economic development of our country and enable us to develop confederation in unity of all who inhabit Canada, including the French Canadians in Quebec as well as the Ukrainians in Manitoba and the Englishmen in Toronto or Vancouver.

Mr. Speaker, that is where the trouble lies. That is where we should bring a solution to help us make Canada the greatest country in the world, where life is good, the best country where there is agreement, where people do not tear each other apart but co-operate in its expansion.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member who has just sat down will understand that if I do not try to reply directly to his remarks, it is because, on this occasion, I must deal with a completely different matter. He will doubtless understand that I have obligations in this field. I have listened with considerable interest even though I have not accepted the seriousness of his arguments.

[English]

I have outlined our policy on Viet Nam in this house during 1966 on two occasions, Mr. Speaker. In extended remarks I discussed Canadian policy on January 25 and July 8, 1966, as well as on five different occasions before the external affairs committee.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret).]

I believe that this house must reorganize its work. I believe that by accepting principles for the allocation of time we could more efficiently cover our agenda; and this we are not doing at the present time. In this way too we could have more discussion on the vital problems which affect international stability.

Mr. Winkler: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would prefer—

Mr. Winkler: Does he not think that this has been a very productive session?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I quite agree that this has been a productive session, Mr. Speaker, but I am trying to make our sessions more productive. Unless we have some acceptance of this principle we are not going to be able to meet the heavy obligations that face the government with regard to its legislation and which deny us, I think regrettably, the opportunity for fuller discussion on matters of serious concern to Canada in its relations with other countries, and particularly on some of the major problems that concern all nations in the world at this time.

As a result, Mr. Speaker, there are people who say that they are not aware of what Canadian policy is on Viet Nam. I certainly believe that we should encourage the right of discussion, and equally the right of dissent. What those who say that they do not understand Canadian policy really mean, of course, is that they do not agree with this policy. Canadian policy on Viet Nam involves efforts by this country and certain other countries to help bring the war in Viet Nam to an end.

Now, Mr. Speaker, obviously there is room for disagreement about what our policy is. I do not ask everyone to accept that policy, but I do ask the house and the country to understand the circumstances in which foreign policy here or elsewhere must be conducted, particularly when vital issues are involved, issues that affect the peace of the world.

I believe that much of the criticism of the Canadian government's policy in this area is based on the unrealistic view that Canada is in a position to compel acceptance of its analysis of the Viet Nam situation. We are not a combatant power. We are a member of an international supervisory and control organization that has been in existence for 12 years. Yet much of the criticism levelled against us, and not only against us but against Poland, India and certain other countries, almost seems to presuppose that these countries have some direct responsibility for this regrettable conflict.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, I welcome discussion. I am not concerned about the criticism. I am concerned, as I said to the students of McGill University on Friday last, that there be understanding of the role that Canada is seeking to play in this very difficult and important question.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, what is it open to Canada to do in this conflict? What has Canada in fact been trying to do? First of all, we have tried to form the best possible judgment of the position of the parties to the conflict. We are in a good position to do this because of the close relationship we have, first of all, with our neighbour the United States, and also because of the access which we, among very few countries, have to Hanoi as a result of our membership on the International Control Commission. This gives us the opportunity not only to make reasonably informed judgments but to keep abreast of the evolution of the positions of both sides.

Second, Mr. Speaker, we can try to devise formulas which stand some chance of bridging the gap which still separates the positions of the two sides. This we have been doing, and so have other countries. It is not always possible, because of the very nature of the situation, to disclose all that we are doing, and particularly if we wish to enjoy the confidence of those who are prepared to use our good offices. The real problem is not the dearth of such formulas but the complexity of the problem to which they must be addressed. What is at issue here is not Canadian influence or initiative but the urgent need to find a way out of the present impasse which both sides can accept as not being incompatible with their real interests.

Third, we can try in common with our other partners on the International Control Commission, as we are doing and as we have been doing for 11 months, to make the instrumentality of the commission available to the parties when the circumstances are right. We believe that the circumstances may now be ripening. I would like to think that our two colleague states will come to agree with that judgment in the light of events during the past few days. But the commission is powerless to compel the parties to do what they are not prepared to do on their own account. All that the commission can do is provide an umbrella which, when the time comes, may enable them to take certain steps and allow certain steps to be taken which in any other context they might find it difficult to contemplate.

I may be asked: what are those steps? But if I say that I cannot indicate what those steps are I shall perhaps be accused of evasion. I do not mind the accusation, but I can only say that if I do not state them it is because we have made commitments—I hope no one will say commitments to the United States only—to the parties involved in this matter which, if violated, would in my opinion mean that our future efforts would not be respected or trusted.

I believe there is a valid distinction to be drawn between the role of the individual in this kind of situation and the role of a government. The possibilities open to an individual for constructive political action are different from those open to a government. Individuals do not have the responsibility of discharging foreign policy and cannot, naturally, be made fully aware of all the facts. In a democracy there must never be a denial of discussion of commitments the government makes in its relations with other states. Before policy is finally decided, parliament and the public certainly have a right to know. But in matters of negotiation, particularly when questions of war and peace are involved, it cannot be expected that a government should on every occasion make disclosures which are not in the best interests of achieving the objectives we all have in mind.

In the final analysis it must be the foreign minister who makes the decision with the support of his colleagues. I am prepared to make it. I will not change in any way the course I have pursued in this matter because my primary aim, and that of the government, has been to enable Canada along with other countries to try to bring an end to the war in Viet Nam.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It will not be brought to an end by engaging in wild denunciation. The house must not expect me to take such a course and then to enjoy the confidence of both sides. Lose that confidence, and anything we might do or attempt to do would be destroyed.

There are those who urge us to speak out against this or that aspect of the war. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked me the other day whether I would agree that this house should pass a resolution condemning the bombing in the north or that we should pass a resolution urging that the bombing in the north be brought to an end. I ask the house to reflect. If I had given an immediate, positive response, what would have been the consequence? What would have been the consequence for whatever service this country might perform in an intermediary capacity, either alone or collectively with other nations? I do not question for a moment the sincerity or the sense of urgency which lies behind these demands, and I take no exception to whatever hon. members of this house may urge me to do today. But I would ask the advocates of political activism to pause for a moment and reflect on the practical consequences of their proposal. Do they believe that if a government—and I mean the Canadian government—made a series of strong public declarations the basis of its Viet Nam policy, the tangled and dangerous problem in that country would begin to unravel itself?

To be more specific, let us look at the question of the bombing of North Viet Nam. I have said already that this may be the key to the whole problem. I am confident that if it is not the key element in the present military-diplomatic puzzle it is certainly a most important factor. There are other factors. Even though I hope the bombing does stop, there are other actions and responsibilities which must also be fitted into the total pattern of steps toward a peaceful settlement. Until at least some faint outline of a pattern can be established through what has been called quiet diplomacy, it seems unlikely that the bombing would stop for a long period simply in response to a Canadian government demand or appeal, regardless of what individual Canadians or members of the government personally might feel about this aspect of the policy of the United States.

I suggest it would be self-defeating if our public statements, no matter how widely acclaimed they might be in this house and this country, were to have the effect of slamming doors instead of opening them, or closing off potentially useful dialogues instead of stimulating and nurturing the confidential exchange of view points. I ask members of this house, who can influence these matters by their pronouncements and by their deliberations, to appreciate the significance of what I am saying. What government in the free world has taken any other course? Under what foreign minister, in Britain, for example, under a Labour government, or in any country except France, has there been a lack of restraint in criticism against the policy of a particular country?

In one of his despatches from Hanoi Mr. Harrison Salisbury of the New York Times formulated the following prescription on the basis of his conversations there. He said:

> What is needed are not headlines, publicized missions, pressures or formulas but the quiet and painstaking uses of the old-fashioned confidential techniques of the pre-electronic era.

• (4:50 p.m.)

I subscribe to that view. As long as I hold this particular portfolio that will be the course I will pursue. I am convinced it is the right one.

Canada does occupy a special position in Viet Nam because for 12 years, along with India and Poland, it has shared in the frustrating experiences of service on the international commission. It enjoys, as no other institution does, contact with both sides and reflects by its composition a wide variety of international opinion. The efforts of the commission in the war situation have had minimal results but that is not because we have not tried. The commission cannot impose its will on the United States, on North Viet Nam, on South Viet Nam, on China or on the Soviet Union. It may not be the instrument that will be finally used to promote agreement but it is our duty, as Canada sees it, to be ready for the slightest opportunity to achieve that end and, who knows, that opportunity may not necessarily be far away. I cannot say so positively, but I feel there are elements in the present situation that might cause India, Poland and Canada to recognize that there may be a special role for them in the Viet Nam situation as it is now unfolding.

I took the view last March that, if we could not get an understanding with Poland and India as to the time when the commission should be used according to our proposals—and these were discussed privately and confidentially in Warsaw and in Delhi—then we should try ourselves. It was with that objective that on two occasions Mr. Chester Ronning, as a representative of the government of Canada, was sent to Hanoi to carry on certain conversations with the government of North Viet Nam.

I can say this, and I can confirm it as of recent days, that the channel which was thus established is still open. Perhaps it was this channel, amongst others, that Mr. Rusk had in mind in his press conference last Thursday. I am not saying this is the only channel, but it remains open. For that reason I resented the publicity given to a groundless report that Mr. Chester Ronning's services would no longer be used by the government because he had exercised the right to express private opinions, no longer being a permanent member of the Department of External Affairs. There was no foundation for that story. We can use that channel or the mechanism of the commission, depending on the circumstances.

I am often asked in the house, what did Mr. Ronning say in Hanoi, what went on there? I am often asked what was said in the discussions which took place a few weeks ago when Mr. Victor Moore went there, indeed, what took place last fall when Mr. Victor Moore was in Hanoi, and because I do not give a forthcoming reply I am charged with evasion. I do not mind the charge, but I am asking for an understanding by this house and by the country as to why I cannot say more at the present time.

Mr. Ronning, in anything he has said publicly, has not disclosed the detail of his conversations in Hanoi. Naturally we want to enjoy the confidence of all sides and to do that we must respect commitments which we have made to all sides. Other countries have tried their best, sometimes with one side. We have tried our best with both sides and we will continue to do so.

I believe that it would be helpful if the Canadian position on a settlement of the Viet Nam conflict were restated so that those most directly concerned, particularly in Asia, would know precisely where Canada stands.

First, we believe that a military solution alone is neither practicable nor desirable. We have always made it clear the we look to negotiation to settle this conflict. We have said this because we think that the Viet Nam situation cannot be isolated from the security and stability of southeast Asia as a whole. We have not been alone in saying this. If there is to be a settlement which will hold out a reasonable prospect of long-term stability in that area of southeast Asia it will have to be based upon an accommodation of the interests of those primarily concerned. I do not believe this will happen as the result of military action alone.

Second, peace discussions should take place on the basis of the Geneva agreement. We believe that, without any prejudice whatsoever to the ultimate solutions, the first stage of any settlement will have to envisage a return to the status quo ante. By that we mean the conditions which were envisaged as ensuing from the Geneva ceasefire agreement of 1954. According to my understanding the government of North Viet Nam does not take issue with that position. In practice this involves a continuing of the de facto division into two Viet Nams, if only to allow time for the scars which have been opened by the conflicts of the past quarter century to heal and for new dispositions to be agreed upon for the eventual reunification of the country.

Third, we recognize the unity of the people of Viet Nam. We have no wish to inhibit the reunification of Viet Nam. We are bound to recognize, however, that the temporary division of that country reflects the political realities of the situation and cannot be abrogated by force. It is for the people in the two parts of Viet Nam to decide how soon and under what conditions preparations for reunification can be set in train. This is not something which can be imposed upon the people of Viet Nam from the outside or in disregard of the principle which they must enjoy, like anyone else, of self-determination.

Fourth, we believe that any Viet Nam settlement will have to involve an international presence. We believe it is generally agreed that as soon as conditions permit there must be a withdrawal of all outside forces from both parts of Viet Nam. This would be consistent with the terms of the Geneva agreement. The same applies to military bases maintained in Viet Nam.

We believe that it is likely to be necessary, for some period at any rate, to have international supervision of any settlement agreed to by the parties. The purpose of such supervision would be to give each side adequate guarantees that the terms of such a settlement were being fairly carried out. We have no firm views as to what form that international supervision might take.

If it were decided that the three powers represented on the present international commission should assume a new mandate in an expanded form, I can assure the house that Canada would be prepared to co-operate fully in the constitution of a new supervisory force. In that event we shall have to consider, in the light of our experience, what powers and what resources should be given to such a force if it is to carry out its mandate effectively and with the best interests of the parties in mind.

Fifth, we believe that it is for the Vietnamese people themselves to determine their own political future and the shape of the institutions under which they wish to live. We welcome the progress which has been made in South Viet Nam to bring about the conditions in which a constitutional government, responsive to the interests of the people of the south, can be elected. We understand that this process will be completed within the current year. We would hope, when the hostilities have ceased and a settlement of the current conflict has been reached, that all segments of the people of South Viet Nam will be afforded an opportunity to participate on a fair, constitutional and peaceful basis in the political life of South Viet Nam, but so far as the representation of the Viet Cong at a conference is concerned, in the words of Mr. Goldberg's recent statement, this did not seem to present an insurmountable problem.

Sixth, we can see merit in proposals which have been made for the neutralization not only of Viet Nam but of a wider area in southeast Asia.

Seventh, we believe that in southeast Asia, as in other parts of the developing world, there is a close link between the requirements of stability and the requirements of economic development.

I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that the governments of North and South Viet Nam would take note of this statement of our view concerning the nature of a possible peace settlement. I would hope they would regard it as an earnest of our desire to help bring about an end to the war in Viet Nam.

There are many things with which I should like to have dealt on this very subject, but there will be an opportunity when the external affairs committee meets.

One question is addressed to me from many quarters: How can you say that you are pursuing the objective of peace when instruments of destruction manufactured in this country find their way into Viet Nam? The Prime Minister dealt with this question on January 18. I should like to supplement what he said by pointing out that we have a defence production sharing agreement with our great and friendly neighbour. This agreement was formulated in 1959. At that time it was warmly approved by every section of the house and was endorsed by the people of Canada.

The fact is that although there may be illogicalities, the government of Canada does not itself authorize the shipment of arms made in this country direct to any theatre of war. I know the answer that will be given to what I am saying now. In general it will be said that we must know that military equipment sold by Canada to the United States may find its way to Viet Nam. I will not try to dodge what is obvious, but I do ask those who make this argument to do it in fairness and with a sense of the circumstances in which this situation has developed.

I could say something now about what other countries on the other side are doing. I could say something right now about what some countries who do not support our point of view and who give strong support to Hanoi are doing by way of direct assistance. I could do that and I could enumerate the items. But if I were to do that, then I would have to ask myself how that would help with those with whom we are engaged at the present time in trying to bring about a basis for preliminary talks.

Mr. Speaker, I have restated some of Canada's positions with regard to the war in Viet Nam and outlined the principles which we believe should apply if and when peace is achieved in that regrettably divided country. I say to members of the house, not because I want sympathy but because I want to assure them that the government is not in any way relenting in its efforts, that there is no problem before the department over which I preside which during the past year has engaged more of our attention, more of the energies of our personnel, and which has brought us into contact more closely with Poland and India as well as with the governments of the south and the north and the government of the United States, than has this question.

When the time comes to give to this house and to this country the record of what we have been trying to do I will be content to let the record speak for itself. I have been in politics a long time. I know as well as any man in this house the art of debate. I know what people can do by way of rhetorical questioning, and I received a lot of this the other day at McGill University.

Mr. Winkler: And answers.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Did my hon. friend say I cannot answer?

Mr. Winkler: I said "And answers".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend is not satisfied with my replies. Some of my replies are purposely indirect, because sometimes if I were to answer some of the questions asked I would certainly not be pursuing the course of peace which we all have in mind. I find it difficult to accept that there could be any disbelief anywhere concerning the specific intentions of the government of Canada. I would regard it as an inconsistency with my own profession, my own conduct in public life, and my own training in public life.

I can only assure this house, on behalf of the government, that we will do our utmost to help bring to an end a conflict which we have not started and in which we are not engaged but the solution to which we regard as indispensable for building a more orderly world. I believe we are in the throes of great achievement in the international community. I look forward shortly to signing for Canada a non-proliferation agreement in respect of nuclear weapons, an agreement which I hope will take into account the position of those countries whose nuclear capacity is dedicated to peaceful purposes and who must receive some guarantees and some assurances if they too are not to join the nuclear club.

We have just signed the agreement to outlaw nuclear weapons in outer space. These things are all part of a tremendous achievement which demonstrates the easing of international tension that is taking place between east and west in spite of the fact that the uncertain state of things in China must cause us all concern. The visit of Mr. Kosygin to Britain the other day, his being received by the Queen and speaking to the British parliament, are indications of what is happening. I ask this house to believe that with the influence at our disposal we are doing all we can to bring peace to the people of Viet Nam.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether he will permit a question. During his remarks, as I recall, he pointed out a number of principles that Canada would like to see implemented in the ultimate peace settlement for Viet Nam. The fourth or fifth point was that he hoped all foreign troops on both sides would be withdrawn from North and South Viet Nam. Did the minister imply that the supply of arms to both sides should also be stopped?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My parliamentary secretary indicates to me that he believes I said "outside", and that certainly is what I intended to say. I was looking at a very important note just handed me and I may have missed part of the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. Nesbitt: I wanted the minister to indicate whether when he referred to the withdrawal of outside troops from both sides he was also suggesting that the supply of arms to both sides be also stopped.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would think that any form of assistance that would be inconsistent with the withdrawal of troops or with the terms of a cease fire or armistice must be excluded.

I regret to tell the house that I have just been advised that combat operations against military targets in Viet Nam have now been resumed. The suspension of these operations initiated at the beginning of Tet, the lunar new year, was continued beyond the end of Tet for an additional time in order to avoid any possibility that an early resumption would be misconstrued in relation to Mr. Kosygin's visit to London. May I just say by way of parenthesis that the position of the United States is that it is prepared to stop the bombing if there is given to them, privately or otherwise, some indication of even the most minimal reaction or reciprocal act. I can only say that in spite of this news, which I had hoped might be otherwise, we must renew our determination to contribute in some way to bringing about a cease fire.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the minister a question? I did not want to interrupt him while he was speaking. He spoke of the Canada-U.S. defence sharing agreement. I should like to ask him whether it is true that the Canadian government appealed to the United States not to send any armaments sold to them by Canada to the Viet Nam theatre of war and, if so, was this request refused?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I hope my hesitation will not indicate that I do not want to answer that question. I would not have any hesitation in telling my hon. friend privately what the situation is. I hope no one will take exception to that offer. We have an agreement with the United States which is a solid commitment and one that is very important to the economy of this country. I hope no one will say that because I make that remark our economy in my judgment is more important than bringing about peace in Viet Nam, because that is not the situation. Will any hon. member of this house advocate that we should abrogate this defence production sharing agreement? We have had consultations with the United States in respect of this matter, and these consultations have not failed to achieve in a particular instance what was the basis of the negotiations. I cannot go beyond that.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, it had not been my intention to speak on Viet Nam, during this debate. I am certain that had we known the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) would be speaking on this subject the leader of our party would have made arrangements to express our views in detail, but the speech of the minister is so important I feel it incumbent on me to say something in reply. As I listened to the minister I could not help thinking about a book recently written and published by Professor Eayrs in which he recounts in detail the dreary record of the Canadian government during pre-world war II years and the record of the former prime minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, a record full of platitudes, inaction and refusal to play any part in a real system of collective bargaining.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has said that Canada does not believe that the war in Viet Nam can be solved by military means alone. Yet he has refused today, as he has in the past, to join with people such as the Secretary General of the United Nations, Mr. U Thant, Pope Paul and important political figures such as Senator Fulbright and Senator Morse in saying to the United States very clearly that in the opinion of the people of this country there can be no real negotiations for the settlement of the war in Viet Nam until the United States stops bombing North Viet Nam. That is a very simple proposal and I think we ought to make it not just privately, as I am sure the minister has done, but publicly because world opinion demands that Canada express its views.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would my hon. friend permit a question? He has suggested that I should make this appeal and he states he has knowledge of the fact I have done so privately. Will he explain to me why the foreign ministers of Britain and of every other country in the NATO alliance but one have felt that the course to pursue in a matter of this sort is the course that we are pursuing in this country, which I believe to be the correct one?

Mr. Orlikow: Let me point out to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the Prime Minister of India has made this kind of a statement. I am not here to defend the government of any other country; I am here to discuss what I think this government and this country should do.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has suggested that because of our position on the International Joint Commission we must not do anything to jeopardize our impartiality. I cannot think of anything we could do to jeopardize that so-called impartial position which would be more damaging than what we are doing, namely, selling war material to one of the combatants in this war.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs asked whether any member would suggest that we should unilaterally abrogate that agreement with the United States. I suggest that we abrogate it, and if the minister does not want to listen to members of this party I suggest he read the reports of the statement made by the president of the University Liberal Federation at their meeting yesterday and the resolution introduced by the son of Mr. Carl Goldenberg, one of the most respected citizens in Canada. That represents the position we think the government of Canada ought to adopt.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Perhaps my hon. friend would allow me to state that I have just received an urgent message and must leave the chamber. I regret to leave while he is speaking but I am sure he will understand.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Orlikow: I am sure that if the Secretary of State for External Affairs leaves he will do so because he must. In any case it was not my intention to spend much time on this subject. I am simply saying it seems to me that, as has happened in the past in this country, this government says all the right things in theory but when it comes to the implementation of the very things about which the Secretary of State for External Affairs talks, when it comes to what Canada can do to end the war in Viet Nam, the action the government is prepared to take publicly is virtually nil. I want to deal in the few minutes available to me today—

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? Could the hon. member tell the house whether he speaks for his party when he advocates the unilateral abrogation of the joint defence sharing and spending agreement with the United States of America?

Mr. Orlikow: To the extent that I refer to the sale of war materiel to the United States at a time when the United States is involved in an unofficial war in Viet Nam, I think I speak for my party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I have a limited amount of time in which to speak. It was not my intention to speak on the subject of Viet Nam. We had no notice that the Secretary of State for External Affairs was going to make a statement. I say very clearly that we did not have time before he spoke, while he was speaking or since to adopt what might be called an official position on behalf of our party, but I think the things I have said represent our views. While I do not ordinarily mind questions, I would like in the time I have left to deal with the subject which I intended to discuss. Therefore I would appreciate not being asked any more questions on the subject of Viet Nam.

The mini-budget which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) presented to the house some weeks ago, like the budget he presented early in 1966, seems to me to have one main purpose, namely, to slow down those programs outlined by the government itself in earlier years and during election campaigns. We have had a postponement of the date for implementing medicare. We have had a disastrous slowdown in housing starts which has led to increasing hardship for people both in the low and medium income groups in regard to finding adequate housing. This hardship has been described in detail by a newspaper as close to the government as the Toronto Star as a "major disaster".

We have had the complete ignoring of the solemn pledge made by the government during several election campaigns that the Liberal party, if returned to office, would implement a program of 10,000 university scholarships. That program has gone with the wind and I suppose it will not reappear until 1968 or 1969 when an election is forthcoming, or perhaps not even until some time in the 1970's if the Liberal party thinks this kind of proposal will get it votes at that time.

It is my intention today to speak about the kind of programs which are being ignored by the Minister of Finance and are of basic importance to this country. I refer to programs for the fostering of education and scientific research, without which this country cannot meet the needs of the 1970's. The Economic Council of Canada dealt with this important question in their second annual review issued in December, 1965, when they said:

> To advance educational levels through the formal education system, attention currently needs to be focused on five particular areas.

I refer to the fourth point which they make:

> The more rapid development of facilities for a sharply accelerating flow of professional and other highly skilled manpower at the postgraduate university level—the level at which we have made least progress to date in the Canadian educational system.

In the same report they give some very interesting statistics in comparing Canada with the United States. If hon. members will look at page 84 of the report they will see that in terms of the percentage of the male labour force, only 4.2 per cent of Canadians in the year 1960 had a university degree compared with 7.2 per cent of the male labour force of the United States. That kind of thing is a disaster for this country. What it has meant is that we have had and continue to have a very serious exodus of the most highly trained, most highly skilled people from Canada to the United States.

In the year 1965, according to figures supplied in answer to a question which I put on the order paper, 242 scientists, 863 engineers, 133 professors and instructors, and 380 physicians and surgeons left this country for the United States. It has been claimed by some that this is not very serious, that what we lose to the United States we make up by people coming to Canada from Europe. One of the organizations best able to judge this question, the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, issued in 1966 a special report on the subject of the loss of scientists and engineers to the United States. I wish to quote from a summary of that report which appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail of April 13, 1966. The article reads:

> The O.E.C.D. Observer, in a special issue on science, calculated that the average annual loss of scientists and engineers to the United States was 662 for Britain, 425 for West Germany, 136 for the Netherlands, and 82 for France. The Canadian annual loss was 1,239—almost equal to the combined total of 1,305 for the four major countries of western Europe.

They go into the reasons for this and say:

> In relation to output, U.S. spending on research and development was equal to 3.1 per cent of gross national product in 1962. The figure was 2.2 per cent for Britain, 1.8 per cent for the Netherlands, 1.5 per cent for France, 1.3 per cent for Germany, and 1 per cent for Belgium.
> The O.E.C.D. did not calculate a figure for Canada, but Ottawa authorities have estimated that research and development spending in 1963 was running at about 1 per cent of gross national product.

Is it any wonder that Canadian scientists, professors, doctors and engineers leave this country for the United States? The Dominion Bureau of Statistics, in a publication it issues annually entitled "Federal Government Expenditures On Scientific Activities" reports that for the year 1965-66 Canadian government expenditures for scientific research totalled $396 million. I want to compare this figure with that for the United States. To do so I quote in part a report which appeared in the very authoritative magazine "Science" published in the United States. I refer to the issue of January 27, 1967.

• (5:30 p.m.)

In gross amounts, according to the administration, annual federal expenditures for R & D will rise from $16.5 billion to a trifle over $17 billion.

Of this sum $1.7 billion will be spent for academic research and development. It continues:

Congress has held the National Science Foundation budget to a trifle under $480 million . . . In fiscal 1966, for example, NSF awarded 3647 research grants; in the current fiscal year the number was 3600; next year, if NSF gets the money, it is seeking, it plans to award 3870 . . . These figures do not include the now separately budgeted National Institute of Mental Health, for which expenditures are budgeted to rise from the current nearly $200 million to $257 million.

One of the reasons, according to some people, why we have not been able to do the job in the field of research is that the constitution of Canada leaves education to the provinces.

Professor J. A. Corry, principal of Queen's University, in a speech which he made some time ago and which was printed in the December, 1966 issue of University Affairs, dealt with this matter quite effectively, I think, when he said:

But, it will be asked, does not section 93 of the British North America Act give exclusive power over education to the provinces? This is correct, subject to a limitation that is likely to become more portentous as time goes on. Literally, the words of section 93 are "In and for each province, the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education". If there are national needs and objectives that require concerted educational policy in two, several, or all provinces, no provincial legislature is by itself competent in the matter, and judicial interpretation on other comparable aspects of the distribution of powers under the British North America Act makes it clear that parliament is competent, under "the peace order and good government" clause.

That the provinces would agree to an increased expenditure on the part of the federal government in the field of scientific research is made obvious in the recent report according to which the province of Quebec is proposing to build a $28 million research centre in the field of electrical problems and in the fact that Mr. Johnson, the premier of Quebec, has expressed the hope that the federal government will participate in the financing of that research project. If the province of Quebec is ready to agree to the participation of the federal government I am certain that no other province would object. It seems to me that this government should have faced up to the problem by now.

Two or three years ago we set up with a good deal of fanfare the scientific secretariat headed by Dr. Forward. If I am critical it is certainly not of the scientific secretariat because I am sure that the staff of that secretariat is very competent. This year the announcement was made, with still more publicity and fanfare, of the establishment of a science council the membership of which is made up of some of the ablest and most respected scientists in this country. However, what can the scientific secretariat and the science council do if the government of Canada is not prepared, and it has not been prepared to this day, to do more than go through the gesture of increasing support for scientific research?

I referred earlier to the fact that the amount of the gross national product which this country is devoting to scientific research is less than a third of the amount which the United States is devoting for the same purpose. The situation is even worse than those figures would indicate because while they refer to what the governments are doing the fact is that Canadian industry spends on research only a fraction of what United States industry does. In a report on the establishment of the science council which appeared in Science magazine—and I believe it is a very fair report of what is happening in Canada—this very subject is dealt with, namely, the fact that Canadian industry does not spend the money and does not have the kind of research programs which United States industry has. I wish to read a paragraph dealing with this subject which appeared in Science magazine dated September 2, 1966:

Much of the explanation for industry's inferior position vis-à-vis the government in matters of research lies in the peculiar nature of the Canadian economy. For a variety of reasons Canadian industry has been slow to undertake ambitious R & D programs on its own initiative, although this is no longer as true as it once was. Firms oriented to Canada's small, protected, internal market often have had neither the resources nor the incentive to do research. The branch plants and subsidiaries of American and other foreign companies, which dominate some major industries, frequently have looked to their parent companies for R & D work.

It is true that in the last couple of years we have improved our position somewhat through tax incentives and direct grants, but in relation to the problem as a whole and to the tremendous role which scientific research should be playing in this country what we have done is virtually nothing. I want to document the charge I have made by referring to a report submitted to the Bladen commission dealing with research by the committee on research of McGill University. I want to read a few paragraphs from this very excellent report. Here is what it says about the biological sciences:

> While comparatively well-supported, these sciences are in fact not given the support they should have, and their strength is comparative only. Canada is not putting enough money and effort into research and therefore all the areas of endeavour are under-supplied. In the case of the biological sciences, the main concern at present is the loss of American funds due to the change of policy whereby research funds are to be spent within the United States rather than outside it.

I want to remind hon. members and bring it to the attention of the public that Canada is spending for medical research not one-tenth of what the United States spends, which we should do since our population is one-tenth that of the United States, but only one-hundredth of what that country spends. Therefore it is not surprising that every year, for the last ten years 100 or more of our best doctors and best medical researchers have left Canada to go to the United States. It is surprising not that they go but that more have not gone.

In the same report the McGill committee writes about the physical sciences and says:

• (5:40 p.m.)

> The physical sciences are in a worse plight, both comparatively and absolutely. The cost of sophisticated equipment is now becoming such that a scientist being invited to join a university staff will often detail his equipment and funding needs as a condition of his acceptance. The shortage of staff in the physical science departments, due in part to the opening of new universities, the drain to the States, and the continual movement into industry, put the chairmen of these departments into a most unenviable position.

In the few minutes I have left, Mr. Speaker, I want to deal with the problem of medical research, a problem which has been dealt with by a number of other speakers in this debate. It is a problem about which I and other members have spoken on a number of occasions, a problem which the government seems determined to ignore and one which has led within the last year to four of the 12 medical colleges in this country being threatened with loss of their accreditation. The names of the schools involved have not been made public. Steps were taken to assure that they would not lose their accreditation. Some money was made available. In fact, however, the position of these medical colleges is now precarious.

A report was presented to the government more than a year ago, which was prepared by Mr. Gundy of Wood, Gundy and Company. I understand the firm is really associated with the firm Woods, Gordon, a name which has some status in this house.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, that is not right; it is not even spelled the same.

Mr. Orlikow: The parliamentary secretary says I am wrong but the letterhead seems to indicate this. In any case the report signed by Mr. Gundy was prepared after consultation with, and the assistance of, competent and experienced medical researchers in this country. It is a report which ought to make every member of this house hang his head in shame. Yet, Mr. Speaker, so far as I can find out it is a report which has been virtually ignored by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp), the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson).

I should like to summarize, in the few minutes I have left, some of the comments made in this report:

> We wish to emphasize that a substantial increase in support for medical research is needed at once. There is an alternative view, that time is required to bring about an expansion of physical facilties, and in well-qualified staff and research of merit. While this view has substance, it overlooks the major injury which would be caused to medical research in Canada unless an immediate indication is given of a greatly improved level of support.

This report was made 15 month ago, but there has been no indication from the government of the support requested. I continue quoting:

> Unless a more favourable environment for medical research is provided as a matter of urgency, the skilled manpower on which all else depends will be inadequate both in quantity and in quality to bring about the longer-term expansion needed.

The report has some very interesting tables. For the year 1965-66, the funds available for medical research from various sources totalled $21.5 million, of which $1.5 million came from the United States. This was $7.5 million less than the amount requested by the people involved in medical research. I want to emphasize that medical researchers, having had lots of experience in dealing with this government, had already pared their requests to the bone.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted for his speech has expired.

Mr. Orlikow: I wonder if I could have just one minute?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Is there agreement for the hon. member to continue his speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Orlikow: This is the last day of the debate and I know there are many other members who want to speak. I do not want to interfere with the right of any other member.

I hope I have made my case in a factual way. What I have said with regard to scientific research is not the view of this party alone. What I have said, I am convinced, represents the views and desires of people who are involved in scientific research, who realize the tremendous importance to Canada of expanding what we have done, who realize that unless we do these things now Canada will rapidly become a second class country. I can only say in conclusion that I join with others in urging the Minister of Finance, when he introduces his next budget, to give serious consideration to this problem so that we do not have more patchwork, another few million dollars, but that we have, if not an immediate solution to the problem, at least a first step to a solution to the problem of financing scientific research which will be arrived at in the next three or four years.

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): I am pleased, Mr. Speaker, to have the opportunity of speaking briefly this afternoon on some matters which I should like to bring to the attention of the government. They are matters to which reference is permitted in a wide-ranging debate such as that on the Speech from the Throne debate or the budget. I want to commence my remarks this afternoon by dealing very briefly with some of the problems that we face almost daily within the department of immigration.

I have before me a clipping which refers to a speech I made in the house on April 8, 1965, during the throne speech debate. At that time, I emphasized that the immigration department, under not only the present but past administrations, had not eliminated the discriminatory sections of the act. I said that I did not understand why one could sponsor a relative, no matter what his qualifications might be, if he came from France, the United Kingdom or the United States but if one wanted to sponsor a relative from the European community or from Asia one would run into a brick wall. Government propaganda, Mr. Speaker, attempts to stress equality. This government should find another word to replace the word "equality". Equality means equal consideration for every Canadian and special consideration for none.

I am aware of hundreds, and I am sure there are thousands, of applications within the department of immigration in the city of Ottawa, without taking into account the various branches across the country, of people who wish to sponsor a relative from a country other than the three I have mentioned. The criteria for admission appear to emphasize particular skills or professions and that the person be financially able to look after himself upon admission. Many of the people for whom I speak own small businesses and want their relatives to come to Canada to assist them in operating their small businesses. I am pleased to see that I appear to be getting some agreement from the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai) who knows the problem as well as I do. I thank him very much for his attention.

The criteria for admission to Canada, Mr. Speaker, require the possession of certain skills, membership in one of the professions or sufficient financial means with which to support oneself or to go into business. To me this is a ludicrous attempt to try to convince the Canadian people that we are sincere in trying to encourage more immigrants to this country. Surely most people who possess skills or are members of a profession and are financially able to look after themselves in the country in which they reside would hardly be interested in coming to Canada unless there were very substantial reasons for their doing so.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that I happen to be a member of the committee on immigration. To our displeasure we were told at a recent committee meeting that even though persons are successful in sponsoring relatives, if they come from certain countries the sponsors must assume full responsibility for their maintenance during their stay in Canada. If the sponsored relative dares to get a job, then under the terms of the act he becomes a deportable person.

I should like to place on Hansard a point made by the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Gray) when this matter was discussed with the deputy minister last December. The hon. member stated that under the present law immigrants from western Europe, South America, Israel, Lebanon or Egypt can sponsor the entry of parents or grandparents without restriction but that the new regulations would limit sponsorship to those entering the labour force. To this Mr. Kent replied that the object was to strike a balance between the requirements of the labour market and those of family relationships. The hon. member then asked whether this was not totally inconsistent.

If these people were to join the labour market they would be deported. To this the deputy minister replied that the same restrictions, with modifications, would apply to any parent or grandparent of immigrants who become Canadian citizens if they planned to take a job. In the first place they would have to be literate and, if male, have the minimum educational or trade qualifications. So in effect, Mr. Speaker, if these people do not possess such skills it means they would be deported. I think that the best place to deal with this matter and to fully delve into the problem is probably in committee, and I am sure we will be allowed that latitude.

I wanted to bring to the attention of the house this feeling which is prevalent among Canadians that they seem to be running up against a brick wall every time they attempt to bring to Canada one of their loved ones from a country which is other than one of the three to which I referred.

Another point I want to make is that the minister of immigration should examine the questions that the officers at border points between Canada and the United States are required to ask of persons entering Canada from the United States. Every time I have crossed the border into the United States I have been asked where I was born, and usually the question: "Are you a Canadian citizen?" Surely, Mr. Speaker, when a Canadian citizen is returning to Canada from the United States and states he is a Canadian citizen, this should be sufficient to readmit him to Canada. I should like to know why officials of the immigration department at these border crossings insist on finding out where persons seeking re-entry to Canada were born. If Canadian citizens are to be treated as equals the mere production of a citizenship certificate should be sufficient information for the immigration officer.

I should like to say a few words now about the disgraceful demonstration which took place a week or so ago in the city of Toronto against those of German race in Canada. This demonstration arose over the interview conducted by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation of von Thadden of Germany. We talk of hate literature, Mr. Speaker, but this type of demonstration is, I think, disgraceful. No Canadian has the right, either directly or by use of subtle propaganda, to damn any other citizen of Canada. Most of those of German origin who are living in this country are good Canadian citizens. Most of them know nothing of nazism and despise it as much as I do, and I am not of German origin. To allow any group, no matter who they may be, the privilege of making such a demonstration is bad enough, but to have a government entity such as the C.B.C. film the event and screen it across the country is disgraceful. When we come to deal with hate literature this might be one place to start.

I should now like to turn for a few moments to the B and B commission which has interested me for some time as it has, indeed, many other members of the house. Last November I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) when the house could expect this report and his answer was that it should be before the house by Christmas. A week or so ago I again asked when the report could be expected and this time I was told it was not expected until June or July. I really do not blame the people on that commission for taking their blessed time in filing their report. At $100 a day who wouldn't?

I have before me some questions which were asked and some answers I was given and I should like to put them on the record, if I may. First of all, I think it is important that the Canadian people should know what amount has been spent on the commission to date. In reply to that question I was told that up until October 31, 1966 the commission had spent $5,373,198.66. Expenditures beyond the end of the current fiscal year would be included in estimates which have not yet been approved.

• (6:00 p.m.)

Another piece of information I want to put on record concerns the salaries paid to certain of the commissioners. I draw attention particularly to the variations in their salaries. I was interested to know where some of the $5 million had gone. I can well understand that a great deal of it has been spent on research. But I would be very interested to know why Cormier has received $25,000, Dunton $40,350, Frith $35,250, Gagnon $58,500, Laing $29,150, Laurendau $66,100, Lacoste $11,150, Marchand $14,450, and Rudnyckyj $28,650. Dunton and Laurendeau are the two men heading this commission. Why would Mr. Dunton be paid $40,350 and Mr. Laurendeau $66,100? Does it cost more to listen in one language than in another? Does Mr. Dunton put on smaller parties than Mr. Laurendeau? Why the difference?

As you know, Mr. Speaker, I was not very happy about the commission when it was first appointed because I felt that one third of the people who make up this nation were being ignored. As I said in my remarks on this subject two years ago, no nation can be a great nation if it tries to cater to one group of its citizens in preference to another. Surely the policy of treating everybody on an equal basis is what will make Canada great. I notice the hon. member for Montreal, or wherever it is—

Mr. Mackasey: The riding of Verdun.

Mr. Skoreyko: —snickering at my remarks.

Mr. Mackasey: On a point of order, I was not snickering. I was thinking how pathetic it was that anyone would stand in the House of Commons and make such bigoted, biased remarks. It was not snickering; it was a reference—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order.

Mr. Skoreyko: I can well forgive the hon. member's narrow view. I have listened to him in the committee and I know what little contribution he has made. He understands the problem about which I am talking as thoroughly as a grade 1 student would.

I should like to deal now with another matter which in my view has been neglected. I refer to the question of unemployment. I was a backbench member of the party in office during the years 1962-63 and I well remember how that paragon of virtue now Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) used to pop up almost daily and ask my hon. friend who was minister of labour at that time what he planned to do about the serious unemployment situation—well over 400,000 men were unemployed, he said. This happened day in and day out until the hon. gentleman had "sold" to the Canadian people the idea that the employment situation was really drastic.

I have before me the bulletin issued by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics on February 9. I commend this to the hon. member who does not agree with my opinions with regard to immigration. There are more than 521,000 people unemployed in Canada today, representing more than 5.2 per cent of the labour force. No government can be proud of such a record. I believe the Liberal government is misleading Canadians in its definition of unemployment and employment and that, equally, it is misrepresenting the employment figures derived from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics in a way which I can only describe as politically calculated reporting and analysing.

I want to substantiate my argument by placing on record part of an article which appeared in the Toronto Telegram recently under the name of Peter C. Whitehouse, a very competent newspaperman. The heading is "Unemployment: An Economic Blight". He writes:

> Canada's misleading definition of employment and the equally misleading employment figures derived from it obscure an unconscionable economic blight —the underemployment and unemployment of huge numbers of men over the age of 45.

Those are not my words. They were written by a competent newspaperman, broadcaster and writer whose specialties include science, politics and economics. He goes on to say:

> Some of the 450,000 to 500,000 men 45-64 out of work due to age are included in the 140,000 men of 45-64 the government officially classes as "not in the labour force." Some are in the 61,000 classed as unemployed, and some in various groups such as the 15,000 men classed as not working for "miscellaneous reasons."
> But it seems definite that the majority are hidden away in the hundreds of thousands of men who work only a few hours or days a week, and yet are falsely classed as "employed."

Mr. Whitehouse deals with the "safe age". He says:

> The problem of over-age unemployment isn't one that starts at 45, and that until that age a man is "safe." Age begins to be an obstacle long before 45. Government figures show that 43.6 per cent of all jobs are closed to men of 35, and a study of the newspapers will reveal that many employers set 27 or 28 as their maximum age for hiring.
> Forty-five, however, is the watershed, the age at which, if a man leaves his job (or as is so often the case today, his job leaves him) he has virtually no chance of ever working again.

• (6:10 p.m.)

We stress retraining, and we litter executives' desks with propaganda saying that existing staff and older people should be retrained. We also stress that new immigrants coming into the country must be skilled people trained for specific jobs. Is it not our responsibility first to create a situation where we can provide 50,000 or 500,000 new jobs and then lay emphasis on retraining and on admission to Canada by reason solely of skills? This is one of the reasons why I feel that government policy today in this area is totally inadequate.

When one reads present unemployment statistics one must agree that the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) cannot be held blameless. For instance, it was not too long ago that General Motors laid off a number of men for a given period of time. Only last month, January, Chrysler in Windsor laid off some 5,000 workers which resulted in a production decrease of 2,900 cars. Something other than the infamous Canada-U.S. automotive agreement has to be brought to the fore before we can adequately look after the unemployed who are walking the streets of our cities.

Although I am sure the Minister of Finance has read it, I wish to quote an article from the Toronto Telegram, reprinted in the Edmonton Journal of February 8, on a speech delivered by Mr. J. A. Coates, a Toronto lawyer who was a member of the Carter royal commission on taxation. These are some of the suggestions he made, and I commend them to the minister:

> A consideration that could give our ailing home building industry a shot in the arm is the deductibility of interest expense on mortgage loans. "It's generally agreed that interest makes up about half the amount of most mortgage payments."

He also suggests:

> Exemption of tax on state and municipal bonds. Thus an interest rate of, say, 3 per cent, is equivalent to a 6 per cent coupon for persons in the 50 per cent tax bracket. "This is a real concession to municipalities," he added, "as it cuts borrowing costs quite drastically."

Mr. Coates also dealt with income tax returns in the United States and mentioned that the cost of care of children while the wife works is deductible to varying degrees—the lower the family income the greater the deduction allowable.

Although Mr. Coates did not say that certain recommendations are going to be made in the Carter commission report he did state that the absence of a capital gains tax in Canada is one of the reasons for the absence of risk capital in this country. That portion of the article reads as follows:

> "The U.S. principle maintains that there is no capital and no income . . . there is only loss and gain," he explained.
> "This brings up the question of which rate will you apply to certain gains, and what deductions will you allow for certain losses."
> It is this recognition of possible loss that tends to make the U.S. citizen more venturesome. If he loses money on a venture, he may recoup some of it through tax deductions.

I suggest that part of the money which the Minister of Finance is seeking in order to buy back Canadian industry could come from the less venturesome Canadians if they were allowed to write off some of their investments in the event of loss.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that this has been one of the longest sessions I have attended since I became a member of parliament in 1958. I am pleased to have had the opportunity to give the government some of my views on problems that need attention, and when another opportunity presents itself I hope to deal with these matters further.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Before I recognize the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Robichaud) I would like to bring to the attention of hon. members the business for the adjournment debate this evening; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), Unemployment Insurance—possible increases in ceiling and benefit rates; the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Simard), acceleration of construction of Saguenay-Lake St. John area; the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Schreyer), Department of Agriculture—bankruptcy of a livestock commission merchant at the St. Boniface stockyards.

[Translation]

[English]

THE BUDGET

ADDITIONAL FINANCIAL MEASURES OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to participate in this debate until the hon. member for Kings (Mr. McQuaid) invited me last Thursday to explain certain matters which he raised during the course of his remarks and expressed his disappointment that I was not in the house at the time. He referred to a press release which I issued on January 31 dealing with trap limits and licence control in a portion of lobster fishing district 7B in Prince Edward Island. The hon. member said he was all in favour of the lobster trap limit and added that he was rather disappointed that the department had not gone all the way, meaning that the trap limit should have been applied to the whole of district 7B instead of being limited to a certain area of Prince Edward Island.

Last year a lobster trap limit was imposed in district 8 for the 1966 fall season, which opened on August 10 and closed on October 10. The district where the trap limit was imposed comprised part of Northumberland Strait, including Kent and Westmorland counties in New Brunswick, part of Cumberland county in Nova Scotia, as well as the county of Prince in Prince Edward Island. We are now assessing the results of this trap limit after a full season's operation. I am sorry the hon. member does not happen to be in his seat at the moment because I am sure he would have liked to listen to my remarks which I hope will clarify what he said on Thursday last.

On January 25 I had a meeting in my office with representations of the P.E.I. Fisheries Federation, including representatives of the fishermen, of the industry and of the co-operative groups. It was at the request of these gentlemen that I agreed to amend the regulations imposing for this year's spring season, a trap limit and some licence control in part of district 7B, in that portion which comprises the area from North Point to East Point, including all of the northeast coast of P.E.I. The gentlemen at that meeting told me this was a good area to make a dividing line. It was agreed that in that particular area the problem was most urgent and required immediate action, if possible.

I have stated already outside the house that it is our intention to carry out a survey of all lobster fishing areas during the next few months with the intention of introducing some controls and further trap limitations in other areas as soon as feasible. If in my announcement of January 31 I had included, as suggested by the hon. member for Kings, the whole of district 7B, this would have included also the southern part of Queens county and the southeastern part of Kings county in Prince Edward Island as well as part of Cumberland and all of Colchester, Pictou, Antigonish and Inverness counties in Nova Scotia.

[Mr. Robichaud.]

I wish to warn the fishermen of all the maritime areas at this time that they can prepare now for further controlling action in respect of lobster fishing in 1968. I have stated before outside the house that we are not ready to impose trap limitations in all districts of the maritime provinces this year but that we wish to review fully the results of the application of the new regulation in district No. 8 last fall.

The present fishing activities are beyond what this resource can stand. The natural reproduction cannot support the accelerated and active fishing which now is taking place. If this most important natural resource is to be saved for future generations of fishermen, we will require the full co-operation of all fishermen presently engaged in the lobster fishing operation.

The hon. member also raised another question which concerns the Department of Fisheries. In 1964, in order to assist the inshore fishermen of the Atlantic provinces, I initiated a policy of federal subsidies for fishing boats from 35 feet to 45 feet in length. At that time I made clear that the purpose of this change was to obtain better boats for inshore fishermen and to help them diversify their operations. I also made it very clear that the purpose of this subsidy was not to increase the number of boats engaging in lobster fishing because this resource was already too extensively fished.

It would not be logical for the Department of Fisheries to approve the trap limitation, curtail licences, and then assist the lobster fishermen by means of subsidies to build additional boats. At the time of the announcement when we defined the purpose of the subsidy we made very clear that it was not the intention that this should apply to boats engaged exclusively in lobster fishing. In April of 1964, before making this announcement, I had a long discussion with representatives of the provincial governments of the Atlantic provinces. I also had a meeting in Charlottetown which was attended by the Minister of Fisheries for Prince Edward Island and his officials. So I do not think it would be fair for the hon. member for Kings to say, as he did, that these fishermen were not told that there would be strings attached to what they had to do to qualify for the subsidy in respect of the construction of boats in the 35 to 45 foot class.

The government of the province of Prince Edward Island and the Fishermen's Loan Board of that province were made well aware of our intention. In fact, in July of 1964, following the meeting which took place at Charlottetown which was followed by a meeting between federal and provincial officials, I issued a press release which read in part as follows:

> During the first few years of operations under the new regulations assistance to vessels under 45 feet in length will be limited to approved experimental designs. The Fishermen's Loan Boards in the provinces of New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, and the Minister of Industry and Commerce in the province of Quebec, will continue the direct administration of the new regulations. Close control over the design and specifications of craft eligible for assistance will be maintained by federal-provincial co-operation. This will include consideration of the numbers to be built each year, and their location, and the co-ordination of their construction with training projects designed to provide skilled manpower for a modern Atlantic fleet.

The hon. member also stated in his remarks that there were no prior consultations with the province of Prince Edward Island in so far as specifications were concerned. I wish to state that there was full consultation with officials of the Prince Edward Island government. In November of 1964 a special meeting took place in Charlottetown between officials of the federal Department of Fisheries and representatives of the Prince Edward Island government, including officials of the Fishermen's Loan Board, to discuss the subsidy program. Further meetings took place, and on July 12, 1965 an agreement was signed with the Fishermen's Loan Board of Prince Edward Island. The agreement was further amended in September of that year. I repeat that this agreement was signed after full discussion with the representatives of the province.

It is true that six applications which were presented by the Fishermen's Loan Board of Prince Edward Island were accepted as submitted because these met the requirements regarding construction standards as specified in the agreement. However, some time later, in the latter part of 1965, a total of 96 applications were received from the Fishermen's Loan Board of Prince Edward Island. It was found that these applications had not been screened according to the agreement with the Fishermen's Loan Board of that province. In December, 1965, just a month or two later, my deputy minister requested an immediate meeting with the deputy minister of fisheries for Prince Edward Island to discuss the problems relating to the subsidies. For reasons unknown to me, the then minister of fisheries for Prince Edward Island refused to agree to such a meeting. It became evident to us that a full inspection of all boats for which applications had been received was necessary if public funds were to be protected. It was then that we made arrangements to have all boats inspected. This applied to all the Atlantic provinces, not only to Prince Edward Island. Immediately, between January and February of 1966, arrangements were made to proceed with this inspection.

After the inspection of these boats was completed, each individual case was discussed and reviewed with representatives of the fisheries department of Prince Edward Island at a meeting which took place in July of last year. It was agreed by officials of the federal Department of Fisheries and representatives of the Prince Edward Island government that a limited number of applications only was acceptable under the established criteria and that a certain number of boats needed some improvement before qualifying for the subsidy. It was also agreed that a larger number did not meet the requirements either of the Prince Edward Island Fishermen's Loan Board or of the federal government. Furthermore, we made clear to the representatives of that province that we were willing to pay the subsidy on the additional cost of the improvements which were required on 15 or more boats for which applications had been received provided the improvements were carried out as required by our agreement with the Fishermen's Loan Board of Prince Edward Island.

The inspection of the boats was made on the basis of the following specific policy and regulation:

> —vessel to be of approved experimental design reflecting improvement over conventional types for the size class; vessel to meet provincial construction standards and Department of Transport regulations in so far as the latter apply; vessel to be registered with the Department of Transport; vessel to be adequately outfitted and equipped to show sufficient evidence of diversification capability over and above lobster fishing.

• (6:30 p.m.)

Therefore I want to make it very clear that the decision not to accept a number of applications was made only after full consultation with the government of the province of Prince Edward Island. We felt it was our responsibility and duty to protect the spending of public funds. Subsidies had to be paid according to established criteria and regulations.

Before I resume my seat I should like to take a minute or two to put on record certain facts relating to a matter which has been of great concern to me in recent years, and which has created quite a bit of interest in Canada and abroad. I refer to the sealing operation in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and on the front.

On December 9 in reply to a question addressed to me by the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. Johnston) I stated in part that—> —we now have evidence that the film taken in 1964 was taken three days before the opening of the season. We have signed declarations by the participants that they were paid to perform certain operations not in accordance with regular practices in sealing.

I was not in a position to go into more details at that time. May I say that I have seen certain programs which were carried on television questioning that statement. Let me make it very clear that the film produced in 1964 by Artek Films Limited of Montreal for the C.B.C. French television network was partly staged. The cameramen participating in that filming admitted that it was filmed three days before the opening of the sealing season. The script was written by one Serge Deyglun who also voiced the script for the film. The same man was the one shown in the film shooting and wounding adult seals.

When I visited Îles de la Madeleine last year I took this film along and it was shown at Cap aux Meules, Îles de la Madeleine on Monday, March 7. The two cameramen who participated in the original filming were present and they admitted participation. They also admitted having shot a part of the film before the season opened. One of them admitted that he was the individual attempting to cut open a baby seal while it was still wriggling. He admitted that he was so disgusted he could not finish the job and had to ask a local fisherman, who was hired to participate in this operation, to finish the job for him.

Furthermore, a second film which was made in 1965 by Fleury Productions, which was shown on C.B.C television, and a portion of which was shown abroad, was composed of cuttings from the original film made in 1964, and part of an older film made by a former director of the Arctic biological station.

Following the showing of that film at Îles de la Madeleine we obtained a sworn declaration from one of the fishermen who was engaged in the operation. I wish to put this declaration on the record, Mr. Speaker. I have it in translated form, and it states this:

> I, the undersigned, Gustave A. Poirier, of Le Pré, Îles de la Madeleine, declare having been engaged by a group of photographers, one of whom had a beard, and this was on or about March 3, 1964, to skin an adult seal for a film that they were taking at the time. I also solemnly declare before witnesses that I was asked to tease the said seal and not to use a club but only my knife for this operation. It is well known that in normal practice during a seal operation we use a club or a gaff to kill the seals before we skin them.
> Gustave A. Poirier
>
> Witnesses: P. A. Beauchesne
> Albert Delaney
> Taken at Havre-aux-Maisons, March 12, 1966.

This is the type of film or extracts of film shown in Canada and abroad which have been so damaging to the image of this country. I am the first one to admit there have been abuses in seal hunting, but I think it fair to say that since 1964 we have taken a special interest in amending existing regulations in order to enforce methods of killing which are as humane as humanly possible. The new sealing regulations which will be in force this year will go a long way in this regard. I hope that during the next season, which opens on March 7 in the Gulf of St. Lawrence—

Mr. Nasserden: Will the minister permit a question? Can he tell us whether action is contemplated against the companies which produced these films?

Mr. Robichaud: Unfortunately, because of the difficulty experienced in obtaining this information, two years passed before we were in a position to prove who the persons involved, were, and because of the regulations and existing laws no action could be taken against those who participated. We are amending these regulations in order to change the situation in respect of further actions of this kind.

Following this year's amendments sealing will be defined and will include all phases of the operation, from hunting to the transportation of pelts. Fisheries officers will be present aboard every sealer operation in the gulf and an officer will be present at every landing point of aircraft and helicopter. These points will be specified in advance, and in this way we will be able to control the quotas which we have imposed. Every hunter will be required to carry a special licence and wear an identification which will be issued with the licence.

Today I sent a circular to the owners of all large vessels operating in the gulf reminding them of their responsibilities and our intention to apply the regulations to the letter of the law. I hope the result will be the prevention of inhumane methods of killing seals.

Last year all the S.P.C.A. officials and veterinarians who attended the operations agreed that the most efficient and humane method of killing the seals was with a hardwood club. Some of them brought their own types of weapons, but in the final analysis they agreed that the hardwood club was the best weapon.

This year we have specified that every hunter will have to carry a hardwood club not less than 24 inches nor more than 30 inches in length, and not less than two inches in diameter. This year we have chartered four helicopters to carry the extra fisheries officers to the various ice flows in an attempt to control this operation and enforce the regulations. Many people are inclined to believe that this operation takes place on many fronts. That is not so. It takes place normally on a limited front, because the herds are together drifting with the ice.

During a survey last year 1,250,000 adult seals were spotted on the ice. In designing our regulations we must consider the fact that during periods before and after breeding or whelping these adult seals in the Gulf of St. Lawrence consume 15 pounds of fish each per day. When we are reminded of the quantity of fish that over a million seals would consume in one day, we also have to take into consideration the human aspect of this operation; we have to consider the fishermen from Newfoundland, Magdalen Islands, Prince Edward Island and the north shore of the St. Lawrence who are engaged in this operation. We also have to consider the some 40,000 fishermen from the Atlantic provinces who derive their livelihood from the fishery resources of the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

• (6:40 p.m.)

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): On that point, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would accept a question.

Mr. Robichaud: Certainly.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I understand that there has been some kind of controversy about the value of the sealing industry. Could the minister place on the record any information with regard to that matter? It has been said that the value of this industry is so insignificant that we should completely eliminate the killing of seals.

Mr. Robichaud: I was just coming to that very point, Mr. Speaker. I am glad the hon. member has reminded me of it, but I was just coming to it. This kind of statement has been made by people who have been accepted in this house as being responsible. The statement has been made in connection with the sealing operation, particularly by those who have been insisting upon its complete abolition, that the total value of seals to the sealers and landsmen is in the vicinity of $180,000 a year, and sometimes it has been said it is $300,000 a year.

I have the most recent figures. Last year the total landed value of seals during the seven weeks season was $1,889,121. This was during a period when there was no other type of revenue for the fishermen; they could not engage in fishing operations because of drifting ice. It is a period in which they are given the opportunity to earn a few dollars, perhaps enough to buy fishing gear and equipment for the fishing season which opens a month or two later. With regard to those who have been reported as earning $200 or $300 during the season, I would point out that those engaged in the large sealers as crew members earned from $1,100 to $1,300 during the sealing season last year. This information comes to me from two of the operators. I felt, Mr. Speaker, that these statements should be placed on the record. I want to clearly express my concern for this operation. It is my intention to impose regulations that will prevent any inhumane methods of killing in the operation, but I believe it is my responsibility to allow the sealing operation to continue.

We have also been criticized for not doing anything in the area called the "front" in which foreign sealers operate. We have succeeded in having the Norwegians agree not to fish in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and to allow us to enforce in full the existing regulations. We have also succeeded in having the sealing operation brought under the protocol of the International Convention of the North Atlantic Fisheries. This was achieved at a meeting which took place in Madrid in June of last year. It was agreed that the sealing operation would be accepted under the protocol of ICNAF. This again was followed by a meeting in Copenhagen, I believe, around the middle of October at which further steps were taken in this regard. Agreement was reached on an abstention of hunting during the breeding and whelping season and limited hunting seasons were accepted. This is a step forward. We hope at the next meeting, which will take place in Boston this year, we will be able to get these countries to accept further regulations so we can fully control this operation.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would accept a question. Before posing my question I wish to commend him on his statement that the regulations will be amended. It is most regrettable that charges could not be laid against those mentally deranged people who carried out the filming and actual killing of seals before the season opened. Because it is only a few hours away from St. Valentine's Day I do not wish to get into either a controversy or a lovefeast between the hon. member for Kings (Mr. MacQuaid) and the minister. I regret, also, that I was not in the chamber for the whole of the minister's remarks, during which he may have referred to this matter. Has any consideration been given, similar to the program carried out last year, to paying supplementary insurance benefits or supplementary assistance to inshore fishermen who have had misfortune and catch failures?

Mr. Robichaud: No, Mr. Speaker. I think I made a public statement to that effect around January 15 or 17 last. I think the hon. member will agree with me that last year the catch failure was almost general, it was not limited to small isolated communities, and we were able to apply a program of catch failure assistance on a national level; it was applicable all over Canada. This year I have received very few requests from individual fishermen. I admit that there are a few isolated communities in which there has been a catch failure, but this failure has not been comparable with that of last year.

I also reminded some of the individuals who wrote to me, who in some instances had good cases, that this year most of them were able to qualify for assistance under the Canada Assistance Plan, which was not in operation last year. I may add that we are trying to find a solution to this problem. We are trying to come up with a type of legislation that will provide catch failure assistance to fishermen on a national level. We have not arrived at a final conclusion, but we are making progress in this regard.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, has the minister no idea at this point whether something can be done on a regional basis? I pose the question because I have received a number of letters on this subject from men who have suffered bad failures in fishing.

Mr. Robichaud: In reply to the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, I think he will find that most of the applications are from fishermen whose activities are limited to a fishing period of a few weeks—six, seven or eight weeks. This is the type of application I have received this year. I believe we should give further consideration to this matter, because I do not think you can qualify as a bona fide fisherman a man who expects to make a living in a six weeks operation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The time allotted to the Minister of Fisheries has expired. I gather that the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox has been waiting patiently to participate in the debate.

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to join in the budget debate at this time because there are a number of topics that I wish to discuss. I bring most of them to the attention of the house because of the attitudes of this government, because of the lack of action of the government in some cases, and in other instances because of certain decisions they have made which are adverse to the welfare of the citizens concerned. Last Thursday evening in the division vote taken as a result of the amendment put forward by the official opposition, the government was sustained by only 12 votes. I was pleased to see all the opposition, and some independents, signifying their disapproval of the government's actions and policies.

• (6:50 p.m.)

The budget, since it represents the policy exemplified by the chief function of government, that of levying taxes, reflects not only the political but the administrative image of those to whom the people have given power. As reflected in the division last Thursday evening, to which I have referred, 60 per cent of the Canadian people do not approve of this government's policies and actions. I wish to commend the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) for the speech he made last Wednesday in which he severely criticized the administration for what amounts to its ineptitude, and its paralysis in the face of certain serious national situations. It is obvious that in order not to be too critical of his own party he dubbed it "a government of innocents", "a naïve government that fails to face the realities of life".

Mr. Speaker, I submit that there is no room in Canada, big as it is, and even in its centennial year, for a government of this kind. The hon. member for York East is quite correct when he warns his own party and its shaky administration in the following words:

> It might be said that with our good intentions we may even be paving the road to oblivion.

I am not using his words to embarrass the hon. member for York East. On the contrary, I think he is a man who stands on his own feet in this house and who voices strong, well founded and firm opinions.

I know that the people of this country at this time deplore the many failures which have taken place in several of our finance and insurance companies. Many arguments have been advanced here on this topic. I have received letters from people who have recently lost their investments. One of the powers given to the federal government by the British North America Act is the control of banking. That control should extend to all financial institutions. This government has recently taken umbrage as a result of criticism levelled at it in this regard, and when criticized they have iced the puck into the provincial end of the rink. I submit that federal authority over all finance is a prime necessity in this country, and the government should be the first and most important overseer, ensuring the rectitude of all finance across this land.

I have here a letter that I was most shocked to receive in December from lifelong friends, in which they tell me about having lost their entire savings of over $11,000 in the Prudential Finance Corporation fiasco.

I wish to state that in my opinion the federal government is as much responsible as the provincial governments, if not more so, for allowing this financial crime to occur. There is evidence that even as far back as 1956 suspicion as to the soundness of this company had been voiced. The reason that I place blame on the federal government is that they have not had the courage to place the securities exchange rules under federal jurisdiction. The past loose arrangement was probably satisfactory 100 years ago or even 50 years ago, when the stock market did not play such a vital role in our economic life. Since the government is trying to entice Canadians to invest in equity shares it is its prime duty to take over jurisdiction of all stock market operations and investments, similar to the ill-fated one made by my unfortunate friends, and to place them securely under strict regulations, despite the protests of any other level of government. In my opinion a government that has not had the courage to do this must accept full blame for consequences, such as the Prudential Finance Corporation disaster and other recent instances.

We have heard some talk of suggested forms of remuneration to these unfortunate investors, but I think that as usual the government has no policy regarding this embarrassing question. It is both ominous and ironic that Canada, with all her apparent prosperity, is experiencing so many bankruptcies and instances of financial irresponsibility and lawlessness. Of course the government has brought a lot of its troubles upon itself because of its reckless method of vote getting in the last couple of elections. If the government, through its policies, will prostitute and weaken federal authority by toadying to the clamour of one province or any group of provinces, it must then seem to be patronizing in part the petulance of all of them.

Since this Liberal government came to power there has been a marked and ominous eroding of federal power at an alarming rate unknown in former years. Part of the reason for this is that the present administration has not earned the confidence of the people. Canadian people as a whole are indifferent to this administration because it has not been either responsive or responsible to their needs. The Liberal party has masqueraded too long as a pretended agent of all things to all people.

We know in ordinary life that we cannot assume such a role successfully. Let us take for example the government's attitude with regard to their own self-espoused policies on bilingualism and biculturalism. I warned the people of Quebec last year in a speech here dealing with the policies of the Prime Minister in this regard. I told them to put no trust in liberalism, and that they would regret the day that they did. You have noticed, Mr. Speaker, that only one month ago the majority of the Liberal convention in Quebec voted to support bilingualism and biculturalism in the rest of Canada, but endorsed unilingualism and monoculturalism only and exclusively in Quebec. Is this the way to unite our nation? Mr. Speaker, I suggest that you agree with me when I say no, this is not the way to unite Canada, even in its gala centennial year.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to a special order of the house this sitting is suspended until eight o'clock.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Speaker, at the time the house rose for dinner I was about to bring up a matter pertaining to the employment of firefighters in the armed services in my constituency and the unfair manner in which this government advertises for and hires firefighters and other personnel for Department of National Defence installations in Prince Edward county, namely the Mountain View airport and Camp Picton. The competition for the most recent openings for firefighters at Mountain View air station was first opened to Prince Edward county residents only. Later this was changed, and the competition was opened to residents of Trenton, Belleville and other points on the mainland.

The final results of the competition were that none of the applicants from Prince Edward county was considered or hired. The Civil Service Commission sets itself up as being an objective, non-political organization to serve all the people of Canada. However, they too are obviously tainted with Liberalism and, in this case, with the desire of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) to placate some of his disgruntled servicemen at Trenton. Two of the successful applicants for these jobs are air force personnel due for retirement within two or three years.

I have here, Mr. Speaker, two brief letters from two of the unsuccessful applicants, both residents of Prince Edward county, both qualified, and who have been discriminated against by the government and this supine, co-operative Civil Service Commission. The first letter I wish to put on the record reads as follows:

In October 1966 a notice of a position as firefighter, Department of National Defence, for Mountain View, Ontario, was posted. The position was open to Trenton, Belleville and Prince Edward residents. Then in November another notice appeared in the post office for the same position but stated Prince Edward residents only. Then, in December another notice was posted. It was then open to the residents of Prince Edward county, Ontario, Mountain View, Ontario and Trenton, Ontario and locations.

I myself applied on all three notices and qualified. Then on January 9, 1967 a competition was held at 6 RD Trenton. The board consisted of three air force officers and the civilian C.P.O. As to date I have not received any notice of my standing on competition, but four men have been notified by phone they have the positions.

This is a photostat copy, and it is a little dim in places.

Not one of these men are residents of Prince Edward county. Two are from the town of Trenton and two are air force personnel. These men are up for retirement within two and a half to three years. They applied for release from the service where they are employed as firefighters with the understanding that if they did not get the job at Mountain View they could stay in the service and finish out their service time. One of the servicemen that has been rewarded the position will receive a pension in the neighbourhood of $300 a month, and to add more, these servicemen start at top rate where other men start at the same job at the bottom and take three years to get top rate.

I, myself, am a veteran.

He gives his service number here, but I shall not reveal it.

I joined the army in 1952 and was honourably released in 1955. During my three years I served with Canadian army in Korea for 13 months. My personal feeling is that while Prince Edward has not too much industry, surely when there is an opening of any job class, a man from the county should be given first choice for work to be performed in the county.

Now, the other letter reads as follows:

Air force personnel with two or more years to go on retirement will receive jobs at Mountain View. Two other civilians living north of Trenton will be coming to work at Mountain View. They are volunteer firefighters in their own area. One service person retiring on pension with considerable time on enlistment is to receive one of the jobs. The other service person, not a resident of the county, also has enlisted time remaining but is retiring on full pension to take a job as a firefighter at Mountain View. The civilian personnel receiving jobs as firefighters at Mountain View are not residents in the county but are living at considerable distance from Mountain View and holding jobs in their respective areas. There are a number of applicants from the county who I feel have the adequate education, age and health standards to fill these vacancies.

• (8:10 p.m.)

These letters are from two of the applicants who felt so hurt by this treatment that they took the trouble to write to me. There are many more applicants from Prince Edward county who feel likewise but have not written. Some of them have phoned me regarding this injustice.

Now the harm has been done. These rejected applicants ask nothing more from this government. They do not expect to be hired for the job, because by this time the government's pets in Trenton have received the nod from officialdom. The government is desperate in its efforts to try to retain electoral support in the town of Trenton and at the Trenton air station. This has been dwindling away and Liberalism is finished at Trenton. A drowning man will grasp at a straw, Mr. Speaker.

In closing this incident I would ask the government please to be good enough to show enough manners to write the unsuccessful applicants for this position, who live in Prince Edward county, to thank them for taking the trouble to apply, and give them a reasonable explanation, if possible as to why they were unsuccessful.

Next, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make reference to the dairy industry, which is so important to our part of the country. As a result of representations from the official opposition, and other members in this house, certain legislation was brought about last autumn that implemented a justifiable and deserved improvement in the price of milk paid to the farmers of Canada. I told the house at the time that even that increase, with all its merit, was too little and too late.

The rapid escalation of all farm overhead and of the price of all the things that the farmer and milk producer has to buy has wiped out the economic benefits of the last increase in the federal subsidy. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) has said that milk producers must look elsewhere than to government for any further benefits, or for any further economic stabilization of their industry. I am sure you will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, that such a statement is far too final and inadequate. It is a statement that ill becomes a minister in whose authority rests the economic and physical welfare of such a great industry as the milk producing industry.

What the minister has said in effect reveals his thinking concerning this problem. It is this: "Don't bother me any more. I gave you $4 and some odd cents per hundred for milk. You should now be satisfied. I am not a farmer, but as an Ottawa Valley lawyer I should know what is sufficient and good for you."

I am still quoting the obvious thoughts of the minister, Mr. Speaker. He must be saying to himself: "Now look somewhere else. Look to the markets for any further benefits that might save you from bankruptcy."

It is now common knowledge, Mr. Speaker, that every year, right across this country farmers are turning away from the production of milk at an alarming rate. Some 2,000 sold out their herds and quit last year in the province of Ontario alone. If this trend and the lack of interest now shown by the Minister of Agriculture continues, one of these mornings he, and all the milk consumers for that matter, will open the front door and there will be no bottle of milk there. Then there will be hell to pay. The government will unjustly blame the farmers for all our troubles.

We read of the great days of the past, the 1880's, the 1890's, of the days when that giant cheese was produced at Perth and shipped to London for a famous world's fair of the past. The milk and cheese production figures of those days were many times what they are now. Moreover the powdered milk industry did not exist at that time. Much of the world population today is starving and we could be feeding them. But no, we sit here in our imagined affluence and opulence and ask a little group of islands, a few dots on the map in the south Pacific ocean, to supply us with butter. How ridiculous can the situation get, Mr. Speaker?

Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is true that in all phases of farm production except in the production of wheat and western grains we have seen better and more productive days. Canada as a nation today in her industrial choice is personified in the hymn: "Lead Kindly Light", where the pilgrim says:

> I loved the garish day in spite of tears;
> Pride ruled my will,
> Remembering not past years.

Yes, the gaudy and showy United States standard of living, and its standard of commerce have lured the Canadian people to its luminescence. It has lured us away from our primary industries, one of which is dairy production, and placed us to a large part in the uncertain economy of secondary industries and manufacturing, much of which cannot compete successfully with countries like the United States, Japan and countries in central Europe.

I ask the house this question, Mr. Speaker: Are we too proud to continue to conduct an honourable primary industry when, with more assistance from the very people who must have dairy products, the dairy industry, both the production and the processing parts thereof could flourish and compete with the whole world, as they should, with the production potential that is latent here in Canada?

To go further, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to state that hand in hand with the lack of interest shown by this government in the dairy industry we have another department, the Department of National Health and Welfare which, through the Food and Drugs Act is also putting some farmers out of business. As I come to this point, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state—and I am sure that this opinion is shared by every member in the house—that there must be certain standards of purity and cleanliness in all our food products, including milk. And if the bacteria count or the sediment sample of a farmer's milk production exceeds a certain minimum, the milk should be refused access to the market and should not be processed for human consumption.

In this regard I wish to protest strongly against the methods used by the Belleville office of the food and drug division of the Department of National Health and Welfare. They are far too high-handed and autocratic. I have received many complaints from milk producers in Prince Edward county whom these officials have hailed into court and prosecuted.

These government inspectors, it seems, do not come into the farm premises, but work a cloak-and-dagger game, a gestapo game along the road. The department allows its inspectors to take samples of milk somewhere along the road or at the factory after the milk leaves the farm. I am told by reliable sources that they do not have the fortitude to go into the farm and present their credentials and take a sample of the milk from the milk can at the farm, as they ought to, but instead have developed a habit of lying in wait along the road somewhere between the farm and the factory. They stop the milk truck and take the samples at a time and place unknown to the producers of the milk. This is nothing but a sneaky, despicable, bureaucratic practice. Although the cans are numbered there is a high chance of error in determining what sample came from what can; I would remind hon. members that the interior of a completely enclosed milk-hauling truck is dark, which does not make identification easy. I strongly recommend to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) that the present practices of his inspectors in connection with milk sampling and the high-handed manner in which they are treating the farmers of Prince Edward county be stopped.

I wish to point out, Mr. Speaker, that in every case I mention when milk has been condemned by the food and drug office it has subsequently been processed for human consumption. Nevertheless several Prince Edward farmers have been fined $100 each, plus costs, for producing this same low quality milk, and yet this milk was processed along with the approved milk.

[Mr. Alkenbrack.]

Apparently the samples are sent to Toronto. Bacteria counts show a rapid increase on the way. Are the results obtained in government inspection laboratories always reliable and truthful? I strongly doubt it, under certain circumstances I have mentioned. Samples should be taken at the farm and analysed locally.

One farmer was hauled into court last week at Picton. He obeyed his summons, appeared, and pleaded not guilty. The government then refused to go ahead with the case and had it remanded for a week on the ground that the evidence was not quite in shape. Do these officials think farmers have nothing to do but appear in court periodically for one and the same alleged offence? I would think that whatever evidence the government had would have been ready for presentation, since the Crown had had this evidence since last September 14, the date of the farmer's alleged offence against the act.

I am not saying there is no need for inspection. Certainly, we must have milk inspection, but not by the methods which are now being used. Then again, Mr. Speaker, I submit that a fine of $100 for the production of allegedly inferior milk which the government permits to be processed, and which is used and consumed by the people of Canada—yes, and exported abroad—is too severe a penalty. The money might better be used for the installation of more sanitary conveniences in the milk-producing industry—I refer to bulk tanks, milk transfers and improved stabling conditions. The department should be making grants of up to 40 per cent of the cost of such improvement to farmers who are willing to enter and stay in the milk production industry. In order to build this industry, to guard against its imminent extinction and to assure the attainment of the national stature which it deserves, the government should be giving it the assistance which I have outlined, instead of adding to its local problems.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Restigouche-Madawaska): During the debate last Friday, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie) deplored the fact that, unfortunately, there were not as many opportunities to deal with external affairs problems in this house as there should be.

While I do not necessarily agree with his other views, I must also admit that these opportunities are very few indeed and time for discussion is very limited. In fact, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) mentioned it himself this afternoon. I am sure that several hon. members in this house who have specialized in this field, either through personal studies or research, or because of their experience abroad, could make imaginative and constructive contributions.

Unfortunately, it always seems that immediate requirements of other parliamentary business, together with the deficient and antiquated standing orders of this house, do not permit a fair distribution, a proportional allocation of time available for each subject. However, I wish to take this opportunity offered by the debate on the mini-budget to discuss certain matters regarding external affairs.

Generally, I feel that our discussions on international matters should deal more often with specific fields. Canada can play a direct, important, influential and efficient part. I do not for one moment wish to set aside important issues of the day, such as the situation in Viet Nam, which was dealt with in such an admirable way by the Secretary of State for External Affairs this afternoon. I submit, however, that lengthy and acrimonious discussions of such issues can be more futile than constructive. There are other areas in the world where Canada must play an equally natural and positive part. I would first like to refer to the Organization of American States, where the door is still wide open and an empty chair awaits Canada.

I also think in terms of our relations with the West Indies. I have already had the opportunity, in this house, to point out the tremendous possibilities of which Canada must take advantage in that part of our hemisphere. Those small islands, some of which have just acquired their independence, are looking for support.

I had myself the opportunity to meet several of their prime ministers when they visited Canada last summer; and I know that their eyes are focussed on Canada. The government must carefully study the Patrick proposal for the establishment of a customs and monetary union between eight of those islands and Canada.

They have what we lack: the climate, the winter beaches, the tropical products. We, in turn, can offer them capital, technical knowledge, defence and foreign affairs facilities.

Mr. Speaker, the Organization of American States and the customs and monetary union between Canada and the West Indies are only two of several positive matters that parliament should consider.

The first subject I should like to deal with this evening is of very special concern to me: the NATO parliamentary conference, now known as the North Atlantic Assembly.

Some hon. members of the upper house, including Senators Aird and Lefrançois, have already explained the important part played by the Canadian delegation at the conference held last November. There is no need to repeat in this house what they have so well expressed. Suffice it to thank them for their contribution and to extend once again my own thanks to the Canadian delegates representing every political party in this house who behave as true Canadians. I must say that they all did credit to our country. The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Ryan) was highly successful in heading this delegation with great diplomacy.

• (8:30 p.m.)

One of the resolutions of the political committee of this conference recommends that governments of member countries prepare and adopt the report making the conference an official assembly, officially related to the North Atlantic council. As is now known, the conference is now called the North Atlantic Assembly. But it is not yet recognized as such. I feel that Canada could play a practical role in taking the lead and giving full support to this resolution.

The main functions of the assembly as stated in the draft report of Sir Geoffrey de Freitas would be the following:

A. Make recommendations to the North Atlantic Council on all questions of common interest as the NATO Parliamentary Conference did and to keep informed on the implementation of such recommendations;

B. To receive regular reports of the Secretary General of NATO;

C. To submit questions to the President of the North Atlantic Council and to receive replies or official refusal to reply;

D. To invite representatives of the Secretary General or of the North Atlantic Council to appear before the Assembly or the committees and to put oral questions to them.

These functions are among those imparted to the European assemblies. They should also include the right to make recommendations to the governments or to parliaments as was always done by the NATO parliamentary conference. But relations with NATO other than those aimed at making recommendations, should obviously be maintained directly with the Secretary General who represents NATO and not with the North Atlantic council composed of national representatives who should be seeking an agreement to adopt a common position on a request or a study prepared by the assembly.

Mr. Speaker, our Canadian statesmen never hesitated to show their faith in the Atlantic alliance. I think this is a splendid opportunity to prove that we wish to strengthen the political ties uniting the Atlantic community. If NATO is to survive, it must adapt itself realistically to the present situation and become much more than a defensive military alliance. It must broaden its base and become an economic and political alliance.

I think that all right-thinking people today, all those who truly want peace in the world, are glad to see the gradual lessening of tension between East and West. Without weakening our defensive structure, we should, I think, explore every possibility of improving the political climate between the NATO countries and those of the Warsaw Pact.

Under the circumstances, the conference held last November recommended that the North Atlantic Council take definite steps toward establishing good relations with Eastern Europe on the economic, political and cultural level.

The NATO Assembly is aware that the main task of the Organization is always to ensure that security and integrity are maintained in the free countries of the West. However, it asks that a serious study be made of the advisability of organizing unofficial meetings with the representatives of the assemblies of the Eastern European countries.

In my capacity as Chairman of the Assembly, I intend to communicate to this effect with the competent authorities of the 15 countries of NATO and the eight countries of the Warsaw Pact in order to sound out their reactions.

I hope that parliament and the government of Canada will heartily support such an initiative that can only contribute to easing the international situation and to the peace of the world.

During this conference, several delegates from other countries belonging to the Alliance came to see the Canadian parliamentarians and told us they would be happy to hold the next conference in Canada. Besides, upon his return to Canada, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) asked, on November 24, a question to that effect of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson). There are many factors in favour of such a proposal.

First, it will be the first time the conference will sit under the name of the North Atlantic Assembly. Considering the fact that Canadian statesmen have greatly contributed to the birth of the NATO concept and the first president of the conference was a Canadian, people naturally look to Canada.

Speaking of the first president, I must avail myself of this opportunity to pay tribute to Senator Wishart Robertson, of Nova Scotia, who has now retired. This gentleman has acquired abroad a very enviable reputation which will outlive him.

The centennial celebrations, especially Expo in Montreal represent a great attraction for the parliamentarians of the other 14 countries of the alliance. It is in 1967 that people from abroad will see us in our most favourable light, and in our finest array. Moreover, Canada has yet to host the conference.

I feel our prestige abroad could only be enhanced by the presence of so distinguished a group during our centennial. Unfortunately, it seems that due to the extra activities in Canada this year, this is practically impossible. Another argument deserves consideration. Holding the first meeting of the assembly in the very headquarters of NATO at Porte Dauphine in Paris will prove the interdependence between the NATO assembly and council.

Let us only hope that the headquarters at Porte Dauphine will still be accessible for the last meeting before the move to Belgium.

I also hope that Canada may be in a position to invite the assembly to sit in Ottawa in the near future.

Our delegates to the conference noticed the excellent reputation our country enjoys abroad. Of course, ours is not the prestige of a great power. It is rather a matter of friendship and respect our allies feel toward a young industrial nation which does not aspire to domination but wishes to contribute toward the development of sound and constructive international relations.

Mr. Speaker, we must continue to make the best of that favourable situation to help others while helping ourselves.

External aid is one of the most powerful instruments of our international policy. I feel that the great majority of Canadians agree that external aid is amply justified from a humanitarian point of view since it answers the basic principle of charity. There is no doubt, either, that external aid is fully justified from an economic point of view since it creates employment at home and paves the way for future markets.

• (8:40 p.m.)

[English]

In his recent book titled "A Samaritan State", Keith Spicer had this to conclude about Canadian external aid:

> A meaningful global judgment on the numerous activities of Canada's aid program seems objectively impossible. It is easy enough to assess each kind of aid separately on its own merits. But there exists no universally accepted standard for evaluating a total program; criteria purporting to serve this function are invariably tainted with the narrow prejudices of single disciplines: economics, politics or sociology.
> Until adequate methods of measurement are found, general judgment cannot really reach beyond the subjective and impressionistic. Has Canadian aid been "successful" or "effective"? The question is no more manageable than one asking whether a person "likes" a certain country. One can scarcely do more, in a few words, than reply vaguely that Canada's aid, compared with that of other large donors, appears to have been consistently high in quality, and free of spectacular waste or scandal; its administration has grown from makeshift to mediocre, then, since about 1960, to a steady competence tarnished only by a cramping weakness in the field and by understaffing at home. Finally, its operations have enabled Canada to forge with several developing countries relations of intimacy, trust and fairly stable understanding. Any more precise opinions must be sought in detailed criticism of each type of aid taken by itself.

Mr. Spicer has many interesting proposals under the heading "Machinery of Policy Review", one of which I should like to draw to the attention of the government. I quote from page 248:

> The crucial arena of policy co-ordination is, of course, the cabinet. A cabinet committee reflecting the whole range of foreign policy instruments would have to include the Prime Minister as chairman, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the ministers of National Defence, Manpower, Trade and Commerce, Finance and (for cultural diplomacy) the Secretary of State. Attached to this group of ministers would be a permanent interdepartmental committee of high civil servants, sometimes including, for the Secretary of State, representatives of the C.B.C., the National Film Board and the Canada Council. Both these committees would operate in the customary fashion, civil servants advising, ministers deciding.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I have thus made some remarks as regards our foreign policy and external aid.

In closing, I feel duty bound to state that my remarks and suggestions set out to be constructive. I have never had to be ashamed of our international role. I simply want this role to keep growing at the same pace as our national development and destiny.

[English]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my sole reason for taking part in this debate is to make a few comments regarding the speech made this afternoon by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) in connection with the unhappy state of affairs in Viet Nam. I must say that in some ways it was a pathetic speech, because it was so apparent that the minister's heart was not in it. I have had the privilege of knowing the minister for a long time. He and I entered parliament in the same election. I have a very high personal regard for him. I believe him to be a man of peace and deep sensitivity. I am sure there were many things he would have liked to say this afternoon which he did not say.

At least the speech made by the minister was an improvement over some other speeches he has made in connection with Viet Nam, because in the past he has mainly spent his time defending the United States policies in Viet Nam. Today he delivered an apologia for Canada doing nothing. We witnessed today the Secretary of State for External Affairs, like Pontius Pilate of old, publicly washing his hands of all responsibility. The minister today contented himself with avowing the government's good intentions and disavowing any actions which might give effect to those intentions.

The minister told us that Canada could not do very much in this unfortunate situation because we are a member of the International Control Commission, we are a neutral, we are a non-combatant, and the best thing for Canada and for him to do is just not rock the boat. I should like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that in the first place Canada's neutrality has not in the past prevented the minister from defending United States policies in Viet Nam. I can recall when the people who were protesting against the war in Viet Nam were parading in front of the parliament buildings the minister and his aide were handing out mimeographed copies of a brief which was a rehash of the United States white paper. I can remember also some of the speeches the minister made in this house in which he defended the domino theory with as much enthusiasm and eloquence as John Foster Dulles ever managed to muster.

I should like to refer the house to Hansard of April 2, 1965 at page 13108 where the Secretary of State for External Affairs said this:

> Mr. Chairman, Viet Nam is a test case; I suggest that if the North Vietnamese aggression with Chinese connivance succeeds, it will only be a matter of time before the next victim is selected. The issue then concerns the security, integrity and independence of small nations, not only in Asia but all over the world. If the United States were to leave Viet Nam at the present time, what would happen to that country? What would happen to Burma? What would happen to India, a Commonwealth country? What would happen to Malaysia, a Commonwealth country? What would happen to the Philippines, and what would happen to those island countries of Australia and New Zealand? What would be the position of Japan? These are considerations that must be borne in mind by anyone who simplifies the problem in the way that my friend, the hon. member for Kootenay West, has sought to simplify this complicated problem.

Well, Mr. Speaker, that does not sound very neutral. That sounds to me like a very spirited defence of United States intervention in Viet Nam. Nor has our membership in the International Control Commission prevented Canada selling some $300 million worth of war materials a year to the United States, with no assurance whatsoever that it is not being used in an undeclared war upon a small country in southeast Asia.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would my hon. friend permit me to ask whether he said we were selling $300 million worth of equipment to Viet Nam?

Mr. Douglas: No. I said we are selling to the United States some $300 million worth of war materials, and we have no guarantee at all that none of that material is going to the war in Viet Nam. If the minister could give us the assurance that it is not going there I would be one of the happiest persons in this house. I am sure the minister cannot give that assurance, and I shall be dealing with that matter later, because I think the Canadian government has tried to get that assurance but has been refused.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Canada is not in a peculiar position in that it is a neutral, a non-combatant or a member of the International Control Commission. Other countries which are neutral have spoken out. The government of France has expressed its opinion on what is happening in Viet Nam. India, which is also a member of the International Control Commission and much more dependant on United States' good will than is Canada, has spoken out. The Prime Minister of India, Indira Gandhi, within the last ten days has made a personal appeal to President Johnson of the United States to cease the bombing of North Viet Nam. Sweden, which has always prided itself as a neutral, has not only spoken out against the bombing of North Viet Nam, but has halted the shipment of any war materials to the United States until such time as the war in Viet Nam is brought to an end.

Therefore the fact that we are a neutral and a member of the International Control Commission, it seems to me, does not justify for one moment the minister's contention that Canada must be silent, that Canada must be inactive and that Canada instead of speaking out should take refuge in what he calls quiet diplomacy. We are not talking about some dispute over a boundary. When we are discussing the Viet Nam issue we are discussing the greatest moral issue of our time. As I have said before, in the opinion of the members of this party the bombing of North Viet Nam is legally indefensible and morally inexcusable. What is happening in Viet Nam is shocking the conscience of the world more than anything that has happened since Hitler tried to exterminate the Jews in Europe. The bombing not only of military targets but civilians, now proven beyond any shadow of a doubt, has caused millions of people in the world to question this disastrous military conflict. The use of anti-personnel bombs and the use of napalm has made the war in Viet Nam a bloody and barbaric incident that has no equal in our time.

This is why his Holiness Pope Paul VI has spoken out in protest and has pleaded for the cessation of the bombing; this is why the World Council of Churches has pleaded for the cessation of bombing and for negotiations, and this is why the Secretary General of the United Nations, the world's foremost civil servant, has called for a halt to the bombing and the beginning of negotiations. Scientists, university faculties and university students all around the world have pleaded with the government of the United States to stop the bombing in the hope that this will be the first step toward finding a solution to the trouble in Viet Nam.

In today's Globe and Mail there appeared an article entitled "End Ties with NORAD, Student Liberals Urge", which states in part:

> A ban on sales of Canadian weapons to the United States for the duration of the Viet Nam war and withdrawal next year from the U.S.-Canada North American Air Defence Command were called for Saturday by the Canadian University Liberal Federation.

It then states:

The original resolution called for a halt to bombing of North Viet Nam, recognition of the National Liberation Front as a legitimate political group in the south and de-escalation of military operations and gradual withdrawal of U.S. forces.

That is the attitude of university students in Canada who belong to the Liberal party. After reading that report this morning I am not surprised that the minister felt it was incumbent upon him to make a statement this afternoon regarding government policy in respect of Viet Nam. The minister must be aware that Canadians, like people the world over, are aroused by what is happening in this barbaric war, the effect it is having on the people who live there, the consequence that may follow in escalating into a major war, and the long term effect it will have in building up barriers between the oriental people and the people of the western world. People are aroused; Canadians are aroused and I want to tell the minister that it will take more than verbal soporifics and platitudinous declarations to quiet their fears and their concerns.

It is recognized by almost everyone that the first essential step in finding a solution to the Viet Nam situation is to bring about a halt in the bombing of North Viet Nam. This is one obstacle which must be resolved before any progress can be made. This was apparent when the representative of the North Vietnamese government located in Paris made a statement a short time ago which was reported in the Globe and Mail on January 6. The report is from Paris, by Richard E. Mooney, who says:

North Viet Nam's chief diplomatic representative in western Europe said yesterday that if the United States "definitively and unconditionally" stopped bombing his country, the Hanoi Government would "examine and study" U.S. proposals for negotiations.

This is one thing that must be done. Newspaper reports have indicated that as a result of the Warsaw discussions the United States and North Viet Nam came close to agreeing on negotiations. The Globe and Mail of February 2 carries a dispatch from the United Nations which states:

Diplomatic sources said yesterday that the United States and North Viet Nam agreed in early December to hold preliminary peace talks in Warsaw but U.S. bombings near Hanoi broke up the agreement.

The article also states:

They explained that that was because the United States has agreed to talk about some things North Viet Nam was especially interested in—such as the neutralization of South Viet Nam.

The discussions on a date first were discouraged, the sources said, when the U.S. bombs hit a Polish-built school for Vietnamese children in the Hanoi area Dec. 2. Still, they proceeded until the December 13-14 raids.

After that the discussions broke off. It is only human nature that it is difficult to get people together around a negotiation table when their homes are being destroyed and their wives and children are being killed by anti-personnel bombs.

The United States government had a similar experience when Mr. Goldberg went to the United Nations, and, with great fanfare, said that President Johnson was prepared to give the Secretary General U Thant, complete carte blanche and an unconditional free hand to work out any kind of agreement he could for negotiations. What happened when U Thant came back with a three-tiered proposal, first that the bombing of North Viet Nam come to a stop, second, that the National Liberation Front be allowed to sit at the bargaining table, and third, that eventually all foreign troops should be withdrawn and the principles of the Geneva accord put into effect? The United States government, which had said that U Thant had a free hand to work out any terms he wanted, gave a firm, negative response to the very first proposal, namely a halt to the bombing of North Viet Nam.

During the past few days, in the city of London, Premier Kosygin and Prime Minister Wilson have been holding discussions. I am one of those who has been critical of these two countries, Great Britain and the Soviet union, who are joint chairmen of the International Control Commission, for their inactivity. I have expressed this criticism to Mr. Wilson. When our parliamentary delegation was in Moscow in the fall of 1965, I expressed the same view to Mr. Mikoyan, who was then president of the U.S.S.R. I think they could have done more than they have done. But at least in the past few days the representatives of these two great powers have been examining this problem and exploring some means by which negotiations could be commenced.

While these negotiations are still going on, the government of the United States has resumed the bombings that had been temporarily suspended during the lunar new year. If ever there was a piece of bad timing, surely this was it. I can well understand the sadness in the voice of the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he had to tell the house this afternoon that the bombing had been resumed. I would imagine that if the discussions of Premier Kosygin and Prime Minister Wilson come to naught, the resumption of the bombings will certainly be a major factor in that result. The minister said this afternoon, in announcing that the bombings had been resumed, that the United States of course is only waiting for some minimal response in order to cease the bombings. I would like to know what kind of minimal response is required to persuade someone to stop doing something they have no right to do. What is the minimal response required? No one has spelled this out.

Some United States spokesmen, such as Dean Rusk, have said, stop the infiltration of men and supplies from the north to the south; but Secretary of Defence McNamara told the defence committee of the United States Congress within the last 10 days that there has been only a trickle of men and supplies since last June going from North to South Viet Nam. The fact is, as Walter Lippmann the dean of American commentators has pointed out, that the United States has never faced up to the major points which Secretary General U Thant placed before it: first, whether or not they are prepared to treat with the National Liberation Front, recognizing that they have a right to speak for some of the people of South Viet Nam and, second, whether or not they are prepared to grant the right of self-determination to the people of Viet Nam. Every time the President or one of his spokesmen talks about returning to the principles of the Geneva accord, they say at the same time that South Viet Nam must remain as a sovereign power—which of course is completely contrary to the principles of the Geneva accord, which says that the people of Viet Nam have the right to decide whether South Viet Nam will remain a sovereign power or whether it will be merged with North Viet Nam into one nation.

Walter Lippmann put it well in an article which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of January 12 last, when he said:

> The real obstacle to a negotiated peace is a very substantial one. It is whether or not, on any terms that are practicable in the actual world, the United States would evacuate its military positions on the mainland of Southeast Asia.

That puts it in a nutshell. Does the United States eventually intend to withdraw from Southeast Asia, or does it intend to retain a military foothold, not only in Viet Nam where it has spent billions of dollars in military installations, but now in Thailand where it is building up tremendous military forces? Negotiations will come to naught unless the United States is prepared, in all sincerity, to say that it will abide by the principle of the right of self-determination and allow the Vietnamese people to decide for themselves what government they want and whether they want the North and the South to coalesce and, if the people decide that, have the United States and all other foreign troops withdraw.

I was glad to hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs this afternoon say that the Canadian government is in favour of a return to the principles of the Geneva accord. Yet I would remind the minister that it is not too long ago, about a year and three quarters, that he told us in the external affairs committee that the government of South Viet Nam, because it had not signed the Geneva accord, was not bound by it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Not legally bound.

Mr. Douglas: Not legally bound. I think this is a preposterous interpretation, since the Republic of France signed, and France was the governing power at that time. But this is exactly the kind of political and legal legerdemain which is making it very difficult to get any negotiations under way.

I want to say that in the opinion of the members of the New Democratic Party the time for quiet diplomacy is over and the time for speaking out is here.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, could I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. Douglas: Certainly.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does this mean that my hon. friend is advocating that Canada should disclose publicly at this time the nature of the conversations that Mr. Ronning had in Hanoi, and the nature of the conversations that the Canadian commissioners had recently in Hanoi?

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, when the minister spoke I agreed to leave my questions until the minister had finished. I wish he would do the same, because the question he has asked now has no relevance. I am not suggesting to the minister that confidential discussions between diplomatic couriers ought to be made public. What I am saying is, and if the minister had curbed his impatience I would have told him what I mean, that the time has come for the Canadian government to make a clear-cut declaration, as other governments have done. The minister tells us that the intentions of the Canadian government are pacific. I have no doubt about that. I have no doubt about the minister's own intentions, because he is a man of peace. What I am questioning is their lack of courage in giving voice to their convictions. I am questioning the veil of silence which they have assumed at a time when, on a great moral issue, this government should be speaking out for the people of Canada.

The minister said this afternoon that if we make any declaration that might be construed as being critical of those taking part in this unhappy war, this would close up channels and would prevent our being effective as a peacemaker. I suggest that we have had quiet diplomacy; it has gone on for several years, and nothing has come of it. Now we have reached the place where the world leaders are speaking out because they recognize that the time has come for action.

This afternoon the minister ridiculed the idea of having a resolution passed by parliament calling for the cessation of the bombing. Why should parliament not pass a resolution, as was suggested by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. The minister said this would close doors. But it also might open eyes and open ears; it might strengthen the hand of those in the United States and in the United States government who are trying to persuade the United States government to change its policy. It might help those who are endeavouring to have a moderating influence on the hawks in the American administration and I think it would have an effect on the American public.

The American people know that we are a friendly people, that we like the Americans, that we visit back and forth, that we trade with them, and that in our culture, our language and our habits we are probably more like them than any other nation in the world. I think it would give them reason to pause and think, if they found that their friendly neighbour to the north had come to the place where they could no longer remain silent and that we are calling upon them, in the name of justice and humanity, to stop this barbarous bombing of a small undefended people in an undeclared war.

After all it is a rather new theory of liberalism that on moral issues one should not rock the boat. The great star of liberalism was William Ewart Gladstone. When he was an old man he came back from retirement to rouse the British people in moral protest against the atrocities of the Turks, and he did rouse them. I see no reason why on a moral issue that is much greater, that affects many more people and is a greater threat to the peace of the world, this government and this parliament should not speak out.

I think that Canada should have the courage at this time to say that we will not sell any armaments to the United States unless we have the assurance that those armaments will not be sent to Viet Nam. My information is that the Canadian government has already appealed to the United States government and asked for assurance that none of the $300 million worth of armaments we sell them each year will go to Viet Nam. My information is that that plea has been rejected, and certainly nothing that the minister said in answer to my question this afternoon—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to his speech has expired.

Mr. Douglas: I wonder if I could have the consent of the house to finish the point I am making.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Is there agreement that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam continue his speech.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Douglas: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, the answer that the minister gave this afternoon certainly does not convince me that my information is wrong. I think the United States government has refused to assure us that any of the arms we are selling them are not going to Viet Nam. We have been very strict in saying to the French that any uranium we sell to them must not go for military purposes, and I support the government in that. Why do we not do the same with reference to the sale of arms? The minister said that we signed a defence sharing agreement. Mr. Speaker, this is not defence. These are weapons for aggression, and we have a perfect right to say that if weapons which we are selling to the United States for purposes of defence are going to be used in a war of aggression, then we will not sell those weapons to them.

The minister said this afternoon that we received $300 million a year for these arms and that this is a very important item in our trade. The Minister of Agriculture emerged from his cave of silence to ask my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) if he was suggesting that we abrogate the Canada-United States defence sharing agreement, and if that was the policy of this party.

I will tell the minister the policy of this party. Our policy is that if the United States will not give us a firm commitment that none of these armaments which we are selling to them are going to the war in Viet Nam, then we should be prepared to abrogate that agreement. Because while a loss of $300 million in our trading position would be serious I am not prepared to get $300 million of trade, if it is at the price of the tears of mothers who have lost their children, and if it is to be at the cost of seeing villages annihilated and defenceless people killed.

I will close by saying that I cannot accept the minister's thesis that there is a difference between an individual's convictions and a government's declaration. The minister's thesis this afternoon was that, irrespective of what one may think personally, if one is a member of the government he must not express his opinions publicly. Mr. Speaker, most of the war and bloodshed that we have seen in our lifetime has come because of the cowardly silence of governments in days gone by. I was a member of this house when the Liberal government withdrew Dr. Riddell from the League of Nations because he dared to suggest oil sanctions against Mussolini—he was rocking the boat.

I stood in my place in this house and protested against the sale of copper, scrap iron and nickel to Japan when Japan invaded Manchuria. We were told we must not rock the boat, and this silence, this apathy and inaction has brought us again and again into the maelstrom of war.

I say that the time has come when a government in a democracy must speak for the people of Canada, and I believe the majority of the people of Canada would want this government to speak out on their behalf, to speak out against what is happening in Viet Nam, to call upon this government to express on behalf of all Canadians our desire that the bombing of North Viet Nam cease, that negotiations begin on the basis of the Geneva agreement, and if we cannot get that assurance that the Canadian government will not sell armaments if they are destined for use in Viet Nam.

[Mr. Douglas.]

Mr. Speaker, every man and woman must live with his or her own conscience, and in this hour of crisis in the world this parliament has to speak out. Someone has said that the modern world is treading a tightrope between Utopia and cremation. Surely we can do our part to see that the world comes down on the side of Utopia and of human survival.

Mr. Crouse: Would the hon. gentleman permit me to ask him a question? What does the hon. member think would happen to the free world today if it were not for the leadership that is being provided by the United States?

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Douglas: I think that the United States has done many fine things in giving leadership in the free world. I think of the Marshall plan. I think of the assistance which they gave militarily in Europe when the free world was threatened by Soviet aggression, and when they helped preserve the peace of the world. However, the leadership of the United States in the forties and fifties took place in a world in which we had a great communist, monolithic structure that was in danger of spreading across the world.

What has happened is that the world situation has changed, but United States foreign policy has not changed with it. This communist monolithic structure is fragmented today; the Soviet union and China are sparring with each other; the satellites of the Soviet union are demanding more and more independence; and with the detente in Europe, the danger of military aggression by the eastern powers has greatly receded.

Men like Senator Fulbright and George Kennon, men like the former United States ambassador to Japan, have all been appearing before the foreign relations committee of the United States, pointing out to them that we are facing a new situation. The situation we face today is, how can we mobilize all the nations of the world who want to preserve freedom and to work together for freedom. Taking the position the United States is taking, that of forcing a country to accept a military dictatorship because it may be anti-communist, is only going to incur their antipathy rather than win their friendship.

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, it was my intention to take advantage of this budget debate to speak about the auto pact and some of the problems that have arisen from that auto pact, such as the dislocation of labour. However, having listened to the leader of the New Democratic Party for 35 or 40 minutes, I thought perhaps I would take advantage of the fact that I am the next speaker to express a few comments of my own, not only about the war in Viet Nam but more essentially and more basically on the observations of the leader of one of the more respectable parties of the House of Commons. I suppose I should not have been upset in any way, shape or form by these remarks, because I have been in the house since 1962, nearly five years and six months, and I have yet to hear from the leader of the New Democratic Party at any time, on any subject, any expression of opinion that could be considered in the slightest degree—pro United States. In fact there are times when I think the only thing he believes is good about the United States is the financial contribution that comes from some of the international union headquarters through their Canadian subsidiaries to the N.D.P.

Surely, the hon. member should not be suggesting there is anybody in the House of Commons, regardless of what political philosophy he endorses, whether he be Liberal, Conservative or a member of the New Democratic Party, who in any way endorses or approves of the war in Viet Nam. I believe it was very unfair of the leader of that particular party to cast aspersions on what I thought was an objective, fair and restrained speech by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) to a responsible audience in the galleries this afternoon. Perhaps the hon. gentleman, in his anxiety to be the leader of the government some day, believes that this anti-Americanism is a short-cut into the intellectual field, into the university group. I can assure him this is a short range policy. What could be more dangerous to the harmonious relationships that have existed for so long between the United States and Canada than the efforts of the hon. member tonight, which were nothing more than plain demagoguery?

Mr. Prittie: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Mackasey: I would have been glad to answer questions, but the leader of the New Democratic Party expressed the opinion that questions should be left to the end, and I am only following the advice of this very experienced debator.

Mr. Prittie: Anti-American, like Fulbright and Morris.

Mr. Mackasey: I know the members of that party have nothing to sell but a negative attitude. There is definitely an anti-American bias within certain groups in this country, and the New Democratic Party has based its whole philosophy on an attempt to get all these dissident groups in Canada together in the faint hope that they would all add up to a majority.

I am just as appalled by this war as any member of the New Democratic Party. However, I respect the opinion, judgment and experience of men like the present Secretary of State for External Affairs, who has been in this House of Commons for 25 years, and who has a great moral responsibility, since we are one of the few places left in the world today that can speak with equal validity to the two warring factions, North and South Viet Nam. If we were to do what the leader of the New Democratic Party suggested tonight, we would close that door and make peace virtually impossible between North and South Viet Nam.

Mr. McCleave: The Taiwan trip is already spoken for.

Mr. Mackasey: There may be fellows like the young, misguided socialist over there who would not—

An hon. Member: He was a Tory.

Mr. Mackasey: —but let me say I respect the opinion of the editorial writer of the New York Times on the role of the present Secretary of State for External Affairs, over and above any two or three hour speech by a representative of the New Democratic Party—that is, whenever the members of that party have time to make these speeches, when they are not running out in front of the United States embassy along with a lot of other misguided people.

There are times when I listen to the members of the New Democratic Party that I wonder who our neighbours are. I had a chance to visit Poland this summer and I have seen the difference in attitude in a country located geographically next door to Russia and our own country which is next door to the United States. I am appalled by the fact that not once in five years has any member of that party ever praised the United States in this House of Commons. The only kind word the member said about the United States tonight was in answer to a logical, objective question from a member of the Conservative party.

The leader of the New Democratic Party asked why the Secretary of State for External Affairs apologized this afternoon for doing nothing. He did not apologize for doing nothing. Would you say that the efforts of Chester Ronning were nothing? Would you suggest that the visits of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to Poland and Russia were nothing? Is there anybody in this house who doubts for a minute why the minister made these trips, if it were not to find some solution to the war? When the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam outlined so eloquently tonight the damage done by the bombs dropping on the villages of North Viet Nam, we all felt the same degree of horror. However, not once in his hour speech did he show the slightest degree of sympathy for the bombs that were dropping on South Viet Nam, or the infiltration that is taking place, the assassinations and bombings that have been going on in South Viet Nam by the Viet Cong. Are these civilians not entitled to a little bit of sympathy as well?

• (9:30 p.m.)

The hon. member who has just finished speaking is one of the senior members of the House of Commons. He is one of the most respected voices in Canada in the field of politics. One would have expected him to take advantage of the 40 minutes at his disposal to find some solution to the problem. However, if members look in Hansard tomorrow, they will not find a single objective suggestion by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam as to how he would handle the situation if he were Secretary of State for External Affairs. He knows of course that the Canadian people will see to it that he is never in that position. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, one would have hoped that instead of attacking the minister of external affairs, who is highly respected around the world, he would have tried to offer some concrete solution which would assist the minister and those who, earlier this afternoon and this evening, were sitting in the diplomatic gallery.

I made some reference earlier, Mr. Speaker, to the New York Times. I may respect the opinions of the leader of the New Democratic Party on the virtues of socialism, more than I do the views of the New York Times, but after listening to him this evening I must say I prefer their editorial a little more than his opinions. According to the New York Times for Sunday, February 5—

—Foreign Secretary Paul Martin of Canada has made plain the eagerness of his country to help end the Viet Nam conflict, both through its own mediatory efforts and through its membership in the International Control Commission.

[Mr. Mackasey.]

Let me repeat the last part of that sentence —"through its membership in the International Control Commission".

Mr. Orlikow: Where did you get that clipping? You just happened to have it, eh?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, the idiot fringe has spoken again. I have learned that anything that comes from that part of the house should be ignored. I am not too sure whether it is the influence of their leader that has penetrated to their back benches, or whether the flow has been the other way; but there was a time when the leader of the New Democratic Party would stand up in the House of Commons and speak on external affairs and we would take him seriously. But not tonight.

Canada's role in the Viet Nam affair differs from the role of Sweden and from the role of France. It differs because we are members of the control commission. As such, along with Poland and India we have a responsibility, a moral responsibility, to restrain our statements. After all, if it were only a matter of adopting a resolution in the House of Commons to the effect that bombing in North Viet Nam must cease, and if we thought even for two minutes that passage of such a resolution would stop the bombing, we would sit overtime this evening to pass it.

Mr. Prittie: Then come on, let us try it.

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. member says: Let us try it. That shows the type of responsibility taken by hon. members in that party. The minister of external affairs spent half an hour this afternoon explaining why we could not do this. As long as we are a member of that particular commission we have to be as neutral as possible. As the New York Times points out, we are one of the few voices still respected by North and South Viet Nam.

The members of the New Democratic Party, in their dislike for the United States, would close one of the few remaining channels of mediation in the world. Do they really think we would be so stupid as to take this course, simply because the leader of the New Democratic Party vents his wrath on the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and once more shows a degree of anti-Americanism? If he had offered one objective suggestion we would have been able to discuss it. The minister would be discussing it with his officials. Who knows where any suggestion coming from the leader of the socialist party may end. But once again, Mr.

Speaker, not a single, solitary suggestion was offered.

Mr. Richard: He has not got any.

Mr. Mackasey: We all know that. But the members of that party get up and try to pretend that they have the solution to all the problems in Canada. They tell the senior citizens of Canada: We are your saviours. They tell the C.L.C.: We are the voice of labour. They go to the university students and tell them: We are for peace. What are they against, Mr. Speaker? And what are they for? They hope to turn any little area of dessension existing in the country into a parcel of votes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mackasey: Now they are talking among themselves, Mr. Speaker. When they get a little handed back to them they do not like it, and they panic. They get all excited. They have not got their advisers around them from the universities, or their beatniks walking up and down—as they are busy walking up and down in front of the United States embassy tonight.

Why do not some of these hon. members suggest to the North Vietnamese that they co-operate a little more? This afternoon the minister of external affairs pointed out to the House of Commons that there is no doubt that President Johnson of the United States is in a mess. We all agree that this war should never have occurred. They would like to end the war. To the best of my knowledge the Americans are not warmongers by nature, and never have been. If they had we would not be here.

The important thing to remember is that all they have asked of the Viet Cong and the North Vietnamese is for some conciliation, for some indication that they are sincere in their desire to de-escalate the war. There has been a fair period of truce when no bombing in North Viet Nam has taken place. I share the same view as everyone else in this house, including the minister of external affairs, that we wish this pause would continue. But we must remember that American boys are dying, not Canadian, and they have to make the decision. We are trying to be a mediator.

This is a particularly difficult role that Canada has, along with Poland. It is a role that Sweden does not have and that France does not have. President de Gaulle can say what he likes about the United States: He does not have the same responsibility that our Department of External Affairs has.

If we were to follow the suggestion made by the leader of the New Democratic Party tonight, we would pass a resolution which condemns the United States for bombing North Viet Nam. Then the following week the minister would be criticized for not using his good offices to prevent a war and would be wondering why he is no longer welcome among old friends, who could perhaps at the snap of their fingers end the war, at least in so far as the participation of North Viet Nam is concerned.

Mr. Orlikow: Are you looking for some more notes?

Mr. Mackasey: I have notes, yes, but I do not need any notes to tell the N.D.P. how outdated and outmoded is their philosophy. The Canadian people have told them that since time immemorial, and will continue to tell them. I have notes but I will put them away.

It is about time somebody stood up and let the Canadian people know what the happy little gang in the corner represents—not what they think they represent, but what they do represent. They represent socialism in its worst form. They represent anti-Americanism in its worst form. They had an opportunity to help the farmers of this country, and they helped them until it became an embarrassment, not to the farmers but to that party. So they then threw the farmers out and said they would support labour. Now the marriage to labour is getting a little embarrassing, especially to the New Democratic Party.

In this day and age of modern communication the members of the N.D.P. cannot walk into Quebec and say one thing to rival trade unions, and then go into Ontario and tell another group something else.

Mr. Starr: Like the Liberals do.

Mr. Mackasey: When they start telling the present minister of external affairs what he should be doing in Viet Nam they should at least come up with one constructive suggestion, which would be one more than the leader of the New Democratic Party did this evening in the course of a half hour speech.

An hon. Member: How about Saskatchewan?

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Mackasey: What about Saskatchewan? When the leader of the New Democratic Party ran in Saskatchewan he could not even get elected from that province as a representative to the federal House of Commons. This reflects nothing against the integrity of the hon. gentleman, who is one of the more respected of the senior politicians of this country. It is what he represented—an outmoded way of life which held the province of Saskatchewan back for 20 years.

One has only to check the growth of population in Saskatchewan during the 16 years of socialist rule, and compare it with the growth of population in Manitoba, British Columbia and Alberta. This was not France or England. There were no border points to prevent people going from one province to another. Canadians from the other western provinces could have flowed into Saskatchewan during those 16 Utopian years. Instead, as statistics reveal, the flow was the other way. They could not get out of there fast enough.

When we were talking the other day about potash, and all the benefits that now may come to the province as a result, someone in that party had the audacity to say: We were about to develop potash when we were thrown out of office; we finally got our hands on the money. Which money? I have been doing some research and I find that the money to develop this potash was coming from the United States.

During the recent pipe line debate we heard nothing but anti-American statements from them. We have heard nothing but anti-American statements in connection with the Viet Nam crisis. But the fact is that in Saskatchewan people had 16 years of socialism and chucked them out. It is not only the experience in countries like Sweden, with its strong central government, that we must consider in evaluating the socialists. Now they stand in this house and tell the minister of external affairs how he should handle foreign policy.

That is the right of every member of the House of Commons, and no one can take it away from the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas). But one would expect a man of his integrity, a man of his reputation and a man with his years of experience in the political arena to have made a positive, concrete speech offering suggestions to the minister, one which would have been sympathetic to his delicate role, and worthy of the leader of a party in the House of Commons. He did just the opposite.

Mr. Speaker: It being 9.45 p.m. it is my duty according to section 6 of standing order 46 to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put the question on the main motion.

Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Starr: On division.

Motion (Mr. Sharp) agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Batten in the chair.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT RESOLUTION

Resolved that it is expedient to amend the Old Age Security Act to provide that for the 1967 and subsequent taxation years the maximum old age security tax payable on the taxable income of an individual be increased from one hundred and twenty dollars to two hundred and forty dollars.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister one or two questions about this resolution? Am I correct in recalling his statement that the amount of revenue to be raised as a result of this proposed change would be $135 million a year? I believe that is the figure he gave us on December 19. He indicated that this was a way of raising part of the money necessary to pay the guaranteed income supplement which, in the first year, would cost about $280 million. May I ask the minister this question? Is the $135 million being raised by raising the ceiling on the old age security tax the only part of this new revenue that is going into the old age security fund?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Chairman, that is right.

Mr. Knowles: Is this not a bit strange? The minister gave us an excuse for this budget the fact that it would be necessary to match the expenditure required to meet the cost of supplementary payments to old age pensioners, but although that expenditure amounts to $280 million he is raising, by way of new taxes which would go into the old age security fund, only $135 million. It seems to me that the minister has not been completely fair to the country and certainly not completely fair to the old age pensioners. He has created the impression that all of the taxes now being raised are made necessary because of the increase in the old age pensions. But he now admits that only $135 million, the return from only one of these taxes, is being used for this purpose. In other words, when we get to the sales tax it will be admitted by the minister that the receipts from that tax are going into general revenue.

This is all part of the reason for our complaint about the government's approach to this subject. We recognize that money which is held in an account such as the old age security fund is only figures on the books, but the fact remains that the funds being collected as old age security taxes are in excess of what is being spent for old age pension purposes. We object strongly to this attempt to create the impression that these taxes have to be raised because we are doing something more for our old age pensioners. The minister admits by what he has said just now that he is asking this house to approve of two tax changes, but that in only one case is the money being raised for pension purposes. We think this is quite unfair and quite unnecessary, and certainly when we come to the other resolution, the increase in the sales tax, we shall register our opposition to it.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, I agree completely with what has been said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. We feel that the public has been completely misled, misled. A section of the press has given the Minister of Finance credit for saying he was going to increase taxes to meet increased payments for old age pensioners. I would like to reiterate what I said during the budget debate, to the effect that the increase in taxes is unnecessary.

There is a surplus in the old age security fund, and expenditure on the old age assistance supplement will not be due for some time yet. As a matter of fact, only today did we receive a sample of the application form which the Minister of National Health and Welfare is sending out to old age pensioners, and earlier that minister admitted payments could not be made until March, or possibly April, because the forms have not all gone out to old age pensioners.

I shall also have something more to say when we come to the second part of the resolution dealing with the Excise Tax Act. We do not think this tax is necessary at this time.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Chairman, I wish to go back to some of the arguments that were put forward when we were discussing the possibility of increasing old age security payments, and the methods of doing so. I can only say that the funds which are presently available to the government for social security purposes are sufficient without imposing any additional tax on taxpayers. Time and again we told the government that the money in the old age security fund could be used to pay the old age pension supplement, which would have obviated all this confusion and the signing of forms by old age pensioners.

Even though the minister did not think it good to increase old age pensions on a flat rate basis, he will find out that the Canadian taxpayers are very much opposed to the terms of the resolution before us. As other speakers have said, we shall also oppose the second part of the resolution.

I also believe that the government is creating a further area of inefficiency. As I mentioned at one stage of the debate, the government now has three agencies for the collecting and distribution of benefits of Canadians. If the government examined these areas of inefficiency I am sure it could effect some savings for a change, instead of placing a further burden on the taxpayers. It is high time the government thought of the taxpayers.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, may I just comment briefly on one or two things that have been said. Mainly I wish to answer the charge made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in which he suggested I had misled the house and the public in some way. Perhaps I might be permitted to refer to the speech I made when proposing these measures, as recorded at page 11332 of Hansard for December 19, 1966. On that occasion I said:

> Consequently, I am not proposing tonight any general changes in taxation for the purpose either of stimulating or of applying further restraints to the economy. The measures proposed are intended only to counterbalance, financially and economically, the expenditures on the guaranteed income supplement with a small margin to allow for the fact that the payments we make to the old age pensioners are sure to be spent while some of the revenues we get will come out of savings.

Then later on, when I was talking about the old age security tax, as recorded at page 11334 I said:

> I am proposing therefore that we act to meet our immediate cash requirements and also to provide properly in our accounts for the burdens which parliament has imposed and is now imposing on the old age security fund during the next four years while the age reduction program is coming fully into effect.

Further, as recorded at page 11336 I said:

> The second tax change I am recommending is intended to add to our general revenues to provide the remaining cash required to pay the guaranteed income supplement.

The general purpose of these measures was made very plain, Mr. Chairman. I think they are justified, and certainly the present Minister of Finance did not mislead either the house or the country.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the Minister of Finance convicts himself by quoting his own words. At each of the places from which he has quoted he has made it clear that he was giving the country the impression that the taxes being collected by the proposed measures were to counterbalance the amounts going out. He told us that the amount going out would be about $280 million and that the amount being collected in new taxes would be about $200 million.

I suggest that from the way the minister put it, and even from the quotations that he has given us tonight, the impression given to the country was that the amounts from these two taxes, $135 million by raising the ceiling on the old age security tax and $155 million from the sales tax, were for old age pension purposes. Now we are told that only $135 million is going into the old age security fund, and the $155 million from the sales tax is going into general funds. In other words, the payments for the $280 million that will be required in the first year for the guaranteed income supplement, will come out of the old age security fund into which only an additional $135 million is being put. The rest of the money is going into general revenue, and I submit that is quite contrary to the impression that the minister has given the country.

Mr. Sharp: I cannot accept this, Mr. Chairman, and I think this is an important point. The hon. gentleman has overlooked the fact that we were requiring capital of the order of $280 million in order to meet these expenditures, and that is what we are raising. The question of what goes into the fund and into general revenues is not relevant to the question of how much cash is needed.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow the house will be asked to consider item 121 on the order paper, house in committee of the whole on Bill C-261, an act to establish the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation. Then we return to the budget resolutions and the legislation consequent upon them. Then we proceed to item 116, house in committee of the whole on the resolution to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, and then item 129, second reading of the income tax agreements bill.

Mr. Starr: I wonder if the house leader could give us an assurance that this will be the order in which we will take these matters up that he has enumerated, and that there will be no change in respect to the sequence.

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. McIlraith: Does the hon. member mean during the day tomorrow? Yes, Mr. Speaker; this is our intention.

Mr. Starr: Is it the intention of the government to announce tomorrow night a different sequence of business for Wednesday and Thursday?

Mr. McIlraith: That may be the case, depending on what happens in the meantime. I do not foresee any change. We intend to finish the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation bill and the budget resolutions and legislation consequent thereon. I had added two other bills standing in the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp).

Mr. Starr: Is that the order which will carry over into Wednesday?

Mr. McIlraith: I hope that will carry over.

Mr. Starr: I hope so too.

Mr. McIlraith: After that we propose to go to the legislation standing in the name of the President of the Treasury Board having to do with collective bargaining in the civil service, and other related bills.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—POSSIBLE INCREASES IN CEILING AND BENEFIT RATES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, February 8, as recorded at page 12797 of Hansard, I put this question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson):

> In view of his statement this morning to the Canadian Labour Congress, that he shares the view that the ceiling and the benefit rates under the Unemployment Insurance Act should be raised, can he say whether or not this will be done this year?

The minister's reply was as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, as I have already advised the house, this depends on the recommendations that might come from the Unemployment Insurance Commission, to which parliament has delegated certain responsibilities in this field. I can assure the hon. member that so far as the Minister of Labour is concerned, he meant sincerely what he said this morning and my views are well known. I hope we will receive those recommendations shortly.

Mr. Speaker, in a moment I wish to refer to the supplementary question I asked and the answer given to it. First may I say, however—and I say it with some fear and trepidation in view of the fact that the parliamentary secretary who probably will be answering me is in full flight tonight and there is no telling what he will do to me—that I have very seldom heard such a lame excuse for failing to act as the excuse that the Minister of Labour gave me last Wednesday. He said in effect that the government has to wait until it has a recommendation from the Unemployment Insurance Commission before it can raise the ceiling on the benefit rates set out in the Unemployment Insurance Act.

May I point out that these figures, both the ceiling and the benefit rates, are in the statute passed by parliament. Changes have been made from time to time over the years since 1940, but they have always been made by government bills amending the statute. I know of no case when this was done on any other initiative than that of the government itself. It is a lame excuse for the government now to say it cannot act on these matters until it gets a recommendation from a commission which, though provided for by parliament, has been appointed by the government.

The fact of the matter is that it is a period of eight years since the present benefit rates were fixed. They were fixed in 1959 at $27 per week maximum for a single person and $36 per week maximum for an unemployed person with dependants. During that period the Gill committee sat. It made a recommendation about five years ago that these figures should be raised respectively to $36 and $48. If the government wants a recommendation, it has received one from the Gill committee, although even those figures are now out of date.

If the parliamentary secretary will look up the act he will find there is a section in it which gives the governor in council the authority to ask the Unemployment Insurance Commission to ask the advisory committee to state its opinion on various matters including the ceiling and the benefit rates. That does not say that the government cannot bring the matter before parliament, even if the commission or the advisory committee has not made such a recommendation. As I suggest, in my experience in respect of this legislation decisions have been taken by the government and brought before parliament on the government's own responsibility.

I said a moment ago that I should like also to refer to the supplementary question I put to the minister last Wednesday, and his reply. My supplementary question was:

> In view of the fact that the act permits the government to ask the commission for recommendations, has the government asked for such recommendation?

The minister's reply was:

> Mr. Speaker, I have asked the chief commissioner to let me have his views and those of his fellow commissioners.

Please note that I asked the minister a question based on my reading of the act; had the government asked the commission, or had the governor in council passed an order in council requesting the commission to give its opinion. The minister's reply was that he personally had asked the chief commissioner personally to give him his views and the views of his fellow commissioners. Surely that is not carrying out the intent of the act, namely that there can be an official reference from the governor in council to the Unemployment Insurance Commission. This is based on a chat over a cup of coffee, if you please, which I suggest is quite out of keeping with the terms of the act.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

This is the second time in the last two or three weeks I have raised this question during a late show. I hope I have made my point with the parliamentary secretary, whether I have made one or not with the minister, the department or the government.

This is a matter of government responsibility, and it is a lame excuse indeed to say the government has not had a recommendation from the Unemployment Insurance Commission because there has apparently not been a formal request by order in council. It is eight years since the present maximum rates were set. It is time to increase these rates, and certainly the increases must go even higher than those proposed by the Gill committee. I call upon the government not to use any more excuses but to act on this matter without further delay.

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, even though I may be in full flight, as the hon. member said, I have been around long enough to know that there is no member in the house that I would turn to with greater rapidity than the present member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) if I wanted advice on unemployment insurance matters in particular, or labour matters in general. I agree with his interpretation. The government does have the responsibility, and does have the means at its disposal to ask in a formal way the Unemployment Insurance Commission for its recommendations, and indeed has the right to ignore those recommendations and act on its own.

I do not want to express an opinion as to whether the minister's answers were a little abbreviated, but I have taken into consideration the fact that Your Honour, in running this house with great dignity, emphasizes the necessity for all questions being answered in rather concise form. Perhaps the hon. member should have posed his question in such a manner that the minister could have answered in more detail. This points up the wisdom of the observations of Your Honour made many times during the question period.

But again, knowing the source of the question and the tenacity of the questioner, the hon. member can rest assured that not later than first thing in the morning I will try to find out what the government has done, if anything, in a formal capacity. If nothing has been done I will certainly point to the authority of the remarks of the hon. gentleman and see that something is done. I agree with the hon. member, as one who has studied the Gill committee report in some detail as a member of our committee, that many of the recommendations of the Gill committee are long overdue.

HOUSING—ACCELERATION OF CONSTRUCTION IN SAGUENAY-LAKE ST. JOHN AREA

Mr. Alcide Simard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, as reported on page 12826 of Hansard for February 9, I asked the following question of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson):

> Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Labour in connection with his statement to the house last January 30.
> Can the minister tell the house whether he will recommend to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation any increase in residential housing in Saguenay-Lake St. John?

Mr. Speaker, it is undeniable that there is throughout Canada a very acute housing shortage.

The authorities, federal and provincial, are asked to do something about the problem which comes under their jurisdiction. It seems that the complaints directed at them will get the representatives of the federal and provincial governments, the mayors and other city officials concerned moving.

It is unanimously agreed that adequate housing must be provided for each Canadian family but what has been done to prevent increases in the price of new houses, higher interest rates, higher prices for building materials and tools, higher salaries and higher taxes of all kinds? It is surely the responsibility of the governments and municipalities to cut their expenditures and taxes to bring down prices and interest rates because the higher interest rate on mortgages granted under the National Housing Act can only stimulate a certain kind of construction but not that of low rental housing.

In the realm of the Saguenay-Lake St. John, the crisis is especially due to the absence of salubrious, low-rent housing accommodation. Most industrialized towns in that area are facing the inhuman problem of slums where large families whose head is a small wage-earner are crowded. These families have a right to hope for better housing which would favour their self-achievement. In Chicoutimi, queen of the Saguenay, there is practically no suitable houses at a cost in keeping with the budget of small wage-earners. There would be room for large apartment buildings in that municipality.

In Port Alfred, there is a trend to convert basements into apartments renting from $60 to $90 a month. I wonder whether they meet all the standards of hygiene and safety to which the public is entitled.

In the town of Jonquière, a survey carried out in September 1966 shows that certain parts of the city are faced with the crucial problem of slums. It reveals that out of 967 houses, 403 are in a state of major disrepair and 123 others are absolutely untenantable.

Mr. Paul Tremblay, town clerk of Alma, county seat of the constitutency I represent here, comments that a housing crisis would surely develop in that community if the 25 units considered unsanitary and housing poor people were condemned.

I ask the minister to tell us what action he intends to take to remedy this serious problem affecting our area.

[English]

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Lac Saint-Jean for his concern about housing in his particular area of the province, and I would like to tell him also that, as I am sure he knows, this is essentially a provincial matter. I would like to tell him that last Monday or Tuesday I had the privilege of meeting the minister of municipal affairs for the province of Quebec, Hon. Paul Dozois, who indicated that one of the first pieces of legislation which the Quebec legislature intends to adopt in the very near future is the establishment of a Quebec housing corporation. As the hon. member no doubt is aware, most provinces across Canada have similar corporations dedicated to the eradication of slums, to urban renewal developments and to public housing in general.

I would suggest to the hon. member that the best way of proceeding to obtain what he wants, that is better housing for his district, is first to create a demand on the civic level from the various towns and municipalities which need this help, and second to send a formal indication adopted by the council to the minister of municipal affairs or to the Quebec housing corporation when it is established.

They in turn will assess the necessity of housing in that particular area, and should they feel that it is a logical project the province will then approach Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation here in Ottawa for financial assistance, co-operation, and I hope to seek the benefit of the experience that central mortgage can place at the disposal of the province of Quebec.

I agree with the conclusion of the hon. member that this is indeed one of the main problems facing Canada. I must point out to him, as one Quebecker to another, that this problem is provincial in jurisdiction; but this should be no impediment, particularly in view of the very cordial relations that exist between Quebec and Ottawa.

BANKRUPTCY—WINNIPEG—FAILURE OF LIVESTOCK COMMISSION HOUSE

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day I asked the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Agriculture whether he would look into the matter of the bankruptcy involving a livestock commission merchant in the Winnipeg-St. Boniface stockyard establishment, and find out why it is that for almost a whole year now it has not been possible to make arrangements so that the farmers who delivered their cattle there would be reimbursed for their deliveries. It is my understanding of the matter that the bankruptcy of the livestock commission merchant is further complicated by what seems to be an apparent default on the part of the bonding company, and by allegations that there is some disagreement between the federal departments of agriculture and justice as to what the proper course of action should be.

• (10:20 p.m.)

In any case, Mr. Speaker, I should like the parliamentary secretary to indicate whether the department is fully apprised of this situation. I should like to know whether any special course of action is to be undertaken. It certainly seems that a special set of circumstances prevail because, as I said, this matter has been in this state for almost 12 months now. I hope there is some specific answer available.

Mr. Bruce S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for bringing this important matter to the attention of the house. I have had an opportunity, since the question was asked, of checking into it. I am authorized to say on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture that this matter is currently under active consideration or pursuit by the Canadian Department of Agriculture and the Department of Justice, in close co-operation. We do hope to have a report in the very near future.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO CONFERENCES ON FINANCIAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL MATTERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of the exchange of letters between himself and the premier of Quebec. Pending the convening of the suggested conference dealing with the urgent matter of protecting investors in corporations, particularly those under federal jurisdiction, what steps is the government taking at this time to apply existing federal authority; and will the Prime Minister say whether any federal investigation is taking place at the present time into the North American General Insurance Company which operated under a federal charter and federal jurisdiction?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, a number of questions were asked about the North American General Insurance Company at the time this company suffered as a result of the failure of its parent, the Prudential Finance Company. I think I answered those questions adequately at that time. If there are any further questions the right hon. gentleman would like to ask I will endeavour to answer them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I just asked what steps are being taken now. Will the minister say what steps are being taken to assure foreign investors of the security of Canadian companies, other than the distribution of the Prime Minister's statement of February 1 by the Canadian consul general in New York to United States business leaders?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the question is of such a general character I am unable to follow it. It may be capable of answer but I think it should be more specific before I undertake to reply.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is the minister aware of the fact that the consul general in New York, in order to assure United States businessmen of the security of Canadian shares and stocks, had the Prime Minister's speech distributed to United States business heads? That should be simple enough even for him to understand. When he is answering that question will he also state whether there has been any suggestion that in order to reassure businessmen in the United States regarding Canada's attitude, the Minister without Portfolio be sent on a speaking tour of the United States?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear that the right hon. gentleman intended to make a statement. He did not ask for my comments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You haven't got an answer. You did not even know about it.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Further to the exchange between the Prime Minister and the premier of Quebec regarding the federal-provincial conference on financial institutions and securities, I would ask the Prime Minister this question. In addition to the whole question of deposit insurance, what other items does the federal government propose or intend to suggest be placed on the agenda for this conference?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the proposed conference will cover the work of our financial institutions in a general way. We will be communicating later today with all the provinces, and if they have detailed items to suggest for these meetings they can make them known to us. There are discussions going on, I believe, at the present time among the officials of the various governments that will be concerned in working out the agenda for the ministerial conference.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a further supplementary question to the Minister of Finance and ask him how many of the provincial governments have so far officially informed the minister that they intend to introduce legislation making it mandatory for the financial institutions coming within their jurisdiction to bring themselves within the purview of the legislation with which we will be dealing later today.

Mr. Sharp: The province of Ontario through Mr. Rowntree, its minister concerned with these matters, indicated in the Ontario legislature that it would require all Ontario companies to be covered by federal deposit insurance. The attorney general of British Columbia, Mr. Bonner, made a statement to the effect—I have not had any confirmation as yet—that this is the intention of his government. I have communicated with all the other provinces and drawn to their attention the statement I made on second reading. I have not had replies other than those I have mentioned.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have supplementary question for the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that he has acquiesced in the suggestion made by Premier Johnson of Quebec as to the holding of a conference on deposit insurance, would the Prime Minister reconsider his position in respect of Premier Robarts' call for a conference on our constitution, which would be very appropriate at this time?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Pearson: In the first place, Mr. Speaker, it is not a conference on deposit insurance. In the second place, it is a conference to deal with a matter for which we have already been preparing with the provinces. Premier Johnson's suggestion is that we might have that meeting earlier than had been contemplated. Third, there is no connection whatever between a conference on constitutional matters and a conference on financial matters.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, does not the Prime Minister think that a constitutional question is one that comes within the purview of the provinces, or is it only within the jurisdiction of the federal government?

Mr. Pearson: It is also—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think the question as asked is not acceptable.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should point out, as it is important, that there is also a difference between the two situations, in that Mr. Johnson asked the federal government to call the conference.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Starr: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would not the Prime Minister take the initiative in respect of the call of Premier Robarts and have the federal government, now that we are in our centennial year, call a conference on the constitution?

Mr. Diefenbaker: We have asked for it over and over again.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, we have already indicated that in our view this is not the moment for a full conference on the amending of our constitution, until all the preparatory work has been completed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What is constitutionally wrong with a provincial government convening a conference, in the absence of the federal government taking the action it should?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the provincial governments do that every year.

EDUCATION

REQUEST FOR INCREASED ASSISTANCE TO CANADIAN STUDENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in connection with the answer received to my question No. 2,090 concerning our external aid program. The government answered that on an average each student under the foreign aid program cost the government $5,467.29 per annum. Does the federal government contemplate changing its present policy in order to accommodate Canadian students and provide them with about the same amount of money, that is $5,500 per annum, to attend Canadian universities?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I fail to see that this is the kind of question which should be asked at this time. The matter does not appear to be one of immediate urgency, and I suggest that the hon. member place it on the order paper.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): I placed a question on the order paper on October 25, Mr. Speaker, and it took the government so long to answer it that I hesitate to put down another. In the present circumstances, when a good deal of discussion is taking place at university level—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows his remedy. If he feels there is real urgency attaching to it he can debate it this evening.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON STUDENT SCHOLARSHIP PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): I have a question for the Prime Minister. I should like to ask how long we must wait for an announcement with regard to the Prime Minister's urgent desire to provide 10,000 scholarships for Canadian students.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Before long, Mr. Speaker.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON PENSIONS COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): I have a question for the Minister of Veterans Affairs, of which I gave him verbal notice yesterday. Can the minister advise the house when he expects to be in a position to table the report of the commission established to inquire into veterans pensions and make recommendations with regard to them?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): According to my most recent information it will take some little time yet, because of a printing delay. But I will inquire again and obtain this information for the hon. member.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF NEW GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): In view of the acute housing shortage now facing this nation I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister. Is the government seriously considering the recommendation made to it last week end that a ministry of housing should be established?

If not, is the government considering any other reorganization plan for the direction of housing policy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, I would think the question is of too general a nature to be asked now. I fail to see how it could properly be asked at this time.

Mr. Grafftey: May I then direct another question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the critical housing situation at the present time can the minister inform the house when he expects to bring his cross-country study groups and symposia to a conclusion so we may get some action?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): When the hon. member has concluded his histrionics and asks a new question, I will gladly give him an answer. I have already told him when the symposium will be brought to a conclusion.

Mr. Grafftey: The minister seems irritated. He is not as irritated as the thousands of Canadians who are looking for homes.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Grafftey: A further supplementary question, directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the record levels of immigration we have experienced and the consequent need for new housing, has the hon. gentleman impressed on his colleague, the Minister of Labour, the urgency of announcing this new policy very soon?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think the supplementary question is sufficiently urgent.

Mr. Grafftey: The urgency is that thousands of Canadians are looking for homes, and they want action. Is that not urgent?

Mr. Speaker: I doubt whether the problem can be solved by asking a question at this time, though.

INCOME TAX

LLOYDMINSTER, ALTA.—ALL FORMS RECEIVED IN FRENCH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. S. Smallwood (Battle River-Camrose): I have a question for the minister of National Revenue. It arises out of a letter I have received from one of my constituents complaining that all the 1966 farm and fishery income tax forms sent to the post office in Lloydminster, Alberta were in the French language.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Smallwood: Can the minister explain why all these forms were sent to the Lloydminster post office, Alberta, in the French language?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): I did not realize that my department was taking bilingualism so seriously, but I will be pleased to look into the matter.

Mr. Smallwood: Is this the Prime Minister's way of promoting bilingualism in western Canada?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

SMOKING—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the deep anxiety caused by recent disclosures of the effects of cigarette smoking respecting the cardiovascular system and lung cancer, will the minister advise what further steps are being taken to control the consumption of cigarettes and decrease the mortality rates from these diseases?

[Mr. Grafftey.]

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the department's health and education program concerning the well recognized and controllable hazards in connection with smoking, which are mainly cardiovascular and lung diseases will be continued. In addition, further research is being undertaken to learn more about the habit of cigarette smoking. There are a number of other programs in the department in the general area which are being accelerated.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister allocated any funds for research in this regard to try to remove the offending carcinogens from cigarette tobacco so the industry may not be ultimately destroyed or severely damaged?

Mr. MacEachen: I should like to take this particular question as notice.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if he can inform the house whether there has been any increase in the program of research in the cardiovascular field?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the relationship between cigarette smoking and lung and cardiovascular diseases has been demonstrated by recent studies released by the department. The research program in this general area is being continued and as well a chronic disease program is being developed.

Mr. Winkler: My question was in relation to the request of Canadian researchers who met some weeks ago at the Chateau Laurier in Ottawa.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): I have a further supplementary question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. After the information has been made available as a result of these tests and inquiries, is it the intention of the government to amend the Tobacco Restraint Act so it will become more efficient and more practicable today?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the question is too vague for an intelligent answer at this moment.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR CLEMENCY FOR JAILED UNION LEADERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): My question is for the Solicitor General. On several occasions on orders of the day the minister has been asked what consideration has been given to the release of two Vancouver trade unionists who are now serving sentences resulting from trade union activities. Can the minister inform the house now whether this consideration has reached a conclusion, and if so when will the men be released?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the royal prerogative of mercy has been extended to the two men in question and the balance of their sentence, which was due to expire on March 31, will be remitted as of February 15.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—SUGGESTED RECONVENING OF GENEVA CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who is now an advocate of quiet, old fashioned diplomacy. Why did the minister not arrange a meeting with Messrs Wilson and Kosygin a few days ago to consider reconvening the Geneva conference on Viet Nam? Are these gentlemen not yet aware of the minister's assessment of his importance in foreign affairs?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PORTUGAL—REPORTED INTENTION TO EXILE POLITICAL PRISONERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I have notified him of the subject matter, if not the precise question.

Does the government intend to make any representations to the government of Portugal about the recent reintroduction of a decree providing for the exile outside of metropolitan Portugal of political prisoners, thereby reviving fears of the use of the concentration camps of the past?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder whether the hon. member would suggest that this is a matter of such urgency that this question should be asked today on orders of the day.

Mr. Brewin: Your Honour has put a question to me. I think it is a matter of very great urgency because of the fact that many of the people languishing in jails in one of our allied countries are threatened with deportation or exile to concentration camps outside Portugal. This is a matter that concerns all people who are interested in the liberty of human beings and in human rights.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, would you address a question to me? I should like to make a speech, too.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps that is why I did not put a question to the hon. member.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ARRANGEMENTS FOR TRANSPORTING YOUNG PEOPLE TO EXPO '67

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. It has to do with transportation by the Canadian National Railway of school students, scout troops and great numbers of other young people who are planning to visit Expo this summer. Some of these people have waited for ten months to get a reply from the company. Can the minister say how soon this transportation problem will be solved?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): If the hon. member will let me have the data, and if he has not had a reply, I will do what I can to see that a reply is sent by the railway.

SPORTS

QUEBEC WINTER GAMES—NON-ATTENDANCE OF SECRETARY OF STATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which is appropriate for Valentine day which I address to the Secretary of State. In view of the fact that the minister for cultural affairs for Quebec, Hon. Jean-Noël Tremblay, has said that his heart belongs entirely to the Secretary of State, or so reports the Montreal Gazette, would she now confirm her regret that she did not go to Quebec city over the week end, where her department provided $700,000 in centennial funds for the winter games for which no credit seems to be given to the hon. lady?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I had suspected for a long time that the gentleman in question was a man of great cultural achievement. Now, of course, he has proven it. I should like to say that like my hon. friend he will have to stand in line, and I thank him for the valentine.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS

LOUISBOURG FORTRESS—DISMISSAL OF SENIOR EMPLOYEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of northern development. May I ask him whether he is in a position today to reply to a question I posed some days ago with reference to the charge that one Jeremy Akerman had been laid off from his position as an archeologist at the fortress of Louisbourg project because of political activity on behalf of the New Democratic Party. The minister will recall that he promised me some days ago that he would investigate the matter.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for drawing this matter once more to my attention. The hon. lady member for Vancouver-Kingsway asked yesterday whether I would give a reply.

Mr. Jeremy Akerman was employed by us under contract as a junior archeologist on the Louisbourg project. It became apparent very quickly thereafter that he was interested in other things, when he made a very heavy attack on the operations of the federal fisheries department. My officers drew this to my attention and said that in light of the fact that this was not affecting his work at Louisbourg they did not intend to discipline him; and I agreed with that entirely.

Some time later he went on television and radio attacking his own senior officer in archeology, and my officers have now advised me that they have not the intention of renewing his contract when it expires; and I agree with that, too.

I am now reliably told, Mr. Speaker, that on February 13 Mr. Akerman accepted a nomination from the New Democratic Party in a riding in the province of Nova Scotia. From this I can only conclude that this young man is determined to spend all his life digging into the past.

[Mr. McCleave.]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that if he were to dig sufficiently into the past he would find the minister there. May I ask the minister whether he has confirmed by examining the text of the alleged radio and television programs that such an attack was made by this man upon his superiors; and has the minister himself checked to see whether it is true that he did become a candidate for public office? I would also ask the minister whether it is forbidden for civil servants to accept nomination for public office.

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, I am assured by my officers that their decisions in both these affairs had nothing to do with any political activity this man was carrying on at all. The contract expires on March 31, 1967 I think, and I assume he will continue to work for us until then. Their decision not to renew his contract had nothing at all to do with his activity but only with his professional capacity.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Was the gentleman in question a civil servant?

Mr. Laing: No; he was working for us under contract, a term contract.

Mr. Douglas: A further supplementary question. If the fact that he might be a candidate or that he had indulged in political activity had nothing to do with the minister's decision, what relevance has it in the minister's remarks today?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SEAFARERS UNION—CHARGES LAID IN U.S. COURT AGAINST CANADIAN OFFICIAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on two recent occasions, latterly on February 9, the hon. member for Kootenay West inquired whether Donald Swait, secretary treasurer of the Seafarers International Union of Canada, had been named a co-conspirator in a United States court in Chicago where five persons are charged at present with the bombing of a Canadian ship, with the bombing of port tracks and the interstate transportation of dynamite for this purpose. The hon. member also asked whether I had any information to give to the house regarding this matter.

In reply, Mr. Speaker, I would say that I have obtained a copy of a lengthy indictment in the United States district court, northern district of Illinois. In this indictment, which is dated January 17, 1967, five persons are named as defendants. Six other persons, among them Donald Swait, are named as co-conspirators but not as defendants in the charges referred to in the indictment. Swait is not charged with an offence. He is named as a co-conspirator and I have been given to understand that he denies any complicity in the conspiracy.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

ISSUE OF DOLLAR BILLS BEARING NO SERIAL NUMBERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Perth asked me a question about the centennial issue of Bank of Canada $1 bills. He asked whether I could assure the house that there will be a sufficient supply to satisfy the demand.

I should like to reply, Mr. Speaker, that there is no reason why anyone should pay a premium for these notes. The Bank of Canada has already issued 518,000 of the notes in response to requests, and I can assure the house that the Bank of Canada will arrange for a sufficient supply to satisfy all demands.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Does not the minister think it is a very serious undertaking to issue credit notes with no serial numbers on them?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is argumentative.

LABOUR RELATIONS

C.B.C.—CHOICE OF C.N.T.U. AS BARGAINING AGENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour.

In view of the fact that union recognition by the Canada Labour Relations Board of the C.B.C. employees has become urgent and important as a result of the statement by a fourth labour organization to the effect that the C.B.C. employees should join them, is the Minister of Labour in a position to say whether the report of the special cabinet committee set up to consider this question has been supplied to the members of the Canada Labour Relations Board? Could he also inform us whether this report will be tabled in the house?

[English]

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker. The report will not be tabled in the house, and the cabinet does not instruct the Canada Labour Relations Board.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Since this problem has taken on a national importance and is rather a matter of principle in labour relations, does the minister intend to intervene in this particular dispute and to put forward the terms and conditions pointed out to all Quebec members by the C.N.T.U.?

[English]

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would draw to my attention any sections of the act he thinks I should consider I shall be pleased to look into the matter further.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR ANSWER TO QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, because of the government's decision to soon bring in Bill No. C-267 and its related resolution, I ask the Secretary of State when she anticipates being able to answer question No. 2012, which I put on the order paper on October 12. I feel that perhaps the hon. lady could rise to the occasion and answer the question, as she has done on a previous occasion this afternoon.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I do not know why that information has not been available since October 12. Of course it must come from practically every agency and crown corporation and all branches of the armed service and so on. It is difficult to answer, but I shall inquire into it.

Mr. Lambert: I hope the hon. lady manages to stir up the various departments. This is just foot dragging by somebody.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Miss LaMarsh: I spend most of my time stirring up my department to answer questions.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT RESPECTING APPLICATIONS FOR DEFERMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Labour. Yesterday I addressed a question to him through his parliamentary secretary asking whether a decision has yet been arrived at with respect to applications for exclusion or deferment of the hours of work section of the labour code. Can the minister answer?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Some time in January, Mr. Speaker, I assured the house that I would table a comprehensive report. I hope to be able to table the report tomorrow or Thursday, showing action taken under the labour standards code.

Mr. Starr: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister could answer verbally whether a decision has been reached on all applications.

Mr. Nicholson: No, Mr. Speaker. The report will show the reasons for some deferments, and for at least some of the delays where matters require further consideration.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

INQUIRY AS TO STUDY OF HOSPITAL CONSTRUCTION COSTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Is the government or a committee of cabinet studying rising construction costs as they apply to hospital construction?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is much too general, and I suggest should not be asked on orders of the day.

AGRICULTURE

EGGS—REPORTED RECENT DROP IN PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker. I was waiting for the Minister of Agriculture or his parliamentary secretary to come in, but I have a question of urgency and I shall direct it to the minister from whom I always get a prompt reply, the Secretary of State for External Affairs. My question has to do with the prices of eggs. Those prices recently have dropped by as much as 20 cents per dozen. This is the biggest drop in prices since hens started laying eggs.

Mr. Starr: This is right up to the minister's street. He knows more than anybody else about this.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Perhaps I might discuss this question with Mr. Kosygin.

[Translation]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I apologize for not having given him notice, but I wish to discuss it at ten o'clock.

My question is as follows: Has the minister received from the Estates General of French Canada a request for assistance in favour of French minorities in western Canada, in order to help them to take part in a plenary meeting which will soon be held?

Ten o'clock please, sir.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[English]

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

HAL BANKS—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON EXTRADITION PROCEEDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Solicitor General. I have not given him notice but he is well informed on the topic. Has any final decision been reached yet with respect to the return of Harold Chamberlain Banks, who some are pleased to term that wonderful gangster who escaped to the United States from Canada?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, this matter is being considered by the crown attorney in Ottawa. I am awaiting word of his decision.

WATER RESOURCES

PEMBINA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO COMMISSION REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): My question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Some time ago I asked the minister if he could report on the Pembina river project, the development plan being studied by the International Joint Commission. Can he reply to that question?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am sorry; I should have answered this long ago. The report of the International Joint Commission has not been completed. I inquired the day after my hon. friend asked this question and was told that the report would be available fairly shortly. I shall inquire again.

CANADA DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION

AUTHORIZATION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF CORPORATION, MAKING OF LOANS, ETC.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. C-261, to establish the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dubé in the chair.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I should not want clause 2 to carry in the hubbub of the resumption of the sitting. Clause 2 is the interpretation clause. Because of the rush to get this bill through, the transcript of evidence of the previous proceedings having been delivered to opposition spokesmen only during the lunch hour, it may be a little difficult to operate. With the evidence given by the minister and other persons with regard to this bill coming to hand so late we shall operate under a handicap. However, we shall do our best to discuss this bill section by section. Should there be some duplication between questions asked in the house during the course of debate and questions asked of the minister in the committee, that duplication I hope will be readily understood.

• (3:20 p.m.)

On the definitions clause the first point I would raise is the question of the definition of a deposit. There was a good deal of discussion on what should be a deposit receiving or accepting institution. In that connection the transcript is wrong where it classifies this as a deposit excepting institution, and I hope whoever has the responsibility for the transcript will make the necessary correction.

If it is impossible for parliament to define in this clause what a deposit is, then what hope is there for a definition of a deposit in the by-laws of the corporation? Why must the power to define a deposit, or the ambit of this bill, be assigned to the corporation by parliament, particularly since the corporation will not be directly responsible to parliament and not subject to review by parliament, except that its report will be tabled and I suppose we can discuss it on the estimates of the Minister of Finance?

This once more raises a subject I have discussed on many occasions, namely that delegated powers of this kind must at all times be subject to review by parliament, and not by the present procedure. This is a delegated power and parliament, or a committee thereof, must be in a position to annually assess performance under such delegated powers and the delineation of such powers. So far as this house and the other place are concerned, this is writing a blank cheque in that the government, in proposing this bill, has again refused to face up to its responsibilities.

The minister quite candidly admitted that there was difficulty in determining what is a deposit. Do deposits include certain types of demand bonds? Do they include Canada savings certificates? The government are quite content to say "Well, we will let the corporation determine what is a deposit." I cannot conceive any greater type of abdication of government responsibility. I could continue to speak about the abdication of responsibility in regard to the supervision and control of banks and near banks, but I shall not do that now because I will have a great deal to say about the matter when we are discussing the amendments to the Bank Act.

This, Mr. Chairman, is a stop gap measure. The minister said so before the standing committee. If it had not been for the action of the government of the province of Ontario the other day, this measure would not be under discussion now. Right at the very beginning, from page 4 of the transcript, we know that in the ordinary course of events the government would not have come forward with this bill. Why has the government suddenly got cold feet now? It had an appropriate opportunity to cover this matter of supervision and control when drafting the amendments to the Bank Act. It is as if the government came up to the front door, refused to open it, and then came back and tried to get in through a side door with respect to the control and inspection of near banks.

I shall have more to say with regard to the provision respecting the consent of the provinces, but on this particular clause I ask the minister why it is that we in this house cannot define what is a deposit, in either in general enough terms to accept evolution in, shall I say, quasi banking practices, or if preferred by the draftsman, by itemizing what is meant by a deposit so that it may be clear cut?

The committee is considering deposit insurance, but it does not even know what is a deposit. It merely knows that the corporation, a group of individuals appointed by the crown, will at some future date determine what shall be a deposit. I would have thought an eminent lawyer like the Minister without Portfolio would have wondered at this. I mean the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, since the other Minister without Portfolio is just an accountant in the terminology of other people. Why would the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George accept such a definition in this key clause? The bill is to be known as the "Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act," yet we cannot tell what is a deposit. Somebody else will have to tell parliament what it is. I would like the minister to interpret and explain just what is meant so far as this particular clause is concerned.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, one of the principal reasons that no attempt has been made in this parliament to define a deposit is that we are going to make these facilities available to provincial corporations as well as to federal corporations. We do know what constitutes a deposit for the purposes of federal institutions. Indeed, the officers of the government are very well aware of the operations of federal institutions which they inspect. However, we are not in a position at the present time to know exactly the form of all the instruments which are issued by provincial companies, since we do not exercise any supervision over them. We have been urged by the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec to leave some flexibility in the legislation so we do not inadvertently leave out of the ambit of a deposit some instrument that, on examination, we might wish to insure.

When I spoke on second reading of the bill and in the standing committee I gave a general idea of the kind of deposits that would be insured. Of course in the bill itself such deposits are limited to $20,000, so we are not asking for carte blanche. There are limitations in the bill, but generally speaking we would try to include deposits of up to five years maturity.

Another reason that I think it would be undesirable to attempt to define a deposit too precisely in the bill is that we shall endeavour to persuade institutions that come under our policies to make clear, on the face of those deposits that are insured, that they are in fact deposits. This may require a change in nomenclature or description, and for these reasons I believe the government is justified in asking the house to approve the bill with a considerable degree of flexibility in it. After we have had some experience it may be possible for us to describe more precisely in legislation the kind of instruments that hereafter would be insured. At the present stage, since this is the first legislation of its kind ever introduced in the house, I submit that some flexibility is desirable.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, we in the New Democratic Party have serious objections to the failure of the government to define a deposit. Probably the minister is aware that in the United States under the Federal-Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation and also under the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation a deposit is defined. In the Federal Savings Loan Insurance Corporation accounts are defined as all forms of savings and insured savings including share and investment certificates, while the F.D.I.C. insures demand savings and short-term deposits in commercial and savings banks.

The hon. member for Edmonton West has raised an excellent point with regard to what constitutes a deposit. One of the things which worried so many people in Ontario with regard to the Prudential Finance fiasco was that they thought they had deposits in particular institutions because they held guaranteed savings certificates. If we do not include these in our definition, we will be in very serious trouble because, as the minister well knows, the coverage in this bill does not include finance institutions. Many people making deposits in these institutions may well think that they are covered by this bill when in fact they will not be. One of the disappointments with regard to the Prudential affair was the failure of the government either to set up a royal commission on its own or jointly with the province to determine the reasons for the failure of that company. Such a commission could have made recommendations with regard to such types of institutions which will not be covered by this legislation.

One comment made by the minister which is most welcome is the statement that depositors who will be covered by this legislation should and must know whether they have deposits within the definition contained therein. We welcome this because of the complexity of the definition and the difficulty which most people have in determining whether they have deposits.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make one short comment on the statement just made. While it is true that the provision before us does not define a deposit, deposits will be defined by the corporation and due notice will be given to all institutions and to all depositors of the exact description of the deposits which ultimately will be insured.

Mr. More: Mr. Chairman, perhaps this point is open to argument. We are going to allow the corporation to define deposits if we pass this bill. By delegating the authority to the corporation we are taking it away from parliament. Why cannot parliament define deposits?

As found on page 8 of the transcript of evidence, in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, the minister said that he had not seen the Ontario legislation but that he understood it would require all Ontario companies to join the federal scheme once it is in effect. I take it that this means all Ontario companies taking deposits. Therefore it would seem to me that Ontario at least must have a definition of deposits.

I claim, that some of the provincial companies actually are under federal jurisdiction with regard to deposit-taking but the government does not exert its authority. However, in respect of the companies which are under federal jurisdiction because of the definition in the Bank Act and because of their charters, surely the minister must know which of their instruments are going to be insured. Therefore, why can they not be defined in the bill by such words as "such other instruments as may be determined by the corporation in consultation with the provinces"? At least parliament would have indicated its authority to that extent.

What we object to is the principle of delegating to a corporation the power to define what the bill actually covers. Our position, which I feel is justified, is that parliament when it is passing an act should define what it covers. When it is necessary that we know the definition of instruments in respect of federal companies which are going to be insured, why can this not be stated?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I do not think we would advance our legislation very far if we were to say that deposits include what clearly are deposits, such as notice and demand deposits of chartered banks. That would be easy and obviously is covered by the bill. The more difficult cases arise when we get into deposit receipts which could be regarded from one point of view as a security and from another point of view as a deposit. That is where the complications arise. In preparing this legislation it seemed to us that in order to make the bill as useful as possible it would be satisfactory to the house to give the corporation some flexibility. Anything which obviously is a deposit will be insured. The problem is, what is the difference between a deposit and a security? We felt it desirable to study this question at some length, have some discussion with the provinces about the differences in practice, and endeavour to persuade the institutions concerned to make a clear distinction. In that way the public would be given greater security.

I do not think it will advance the cause at all if we say that deposits include notice and demand deposits in the chartered banks. That is obvious. If the committee wishes to amend the bill to the effect that it shall include notice and demand deposits and such other instruments as may be defined by the Governor in Council, I have no objection, but I do not think this will in any way clarify the situation for the general public nor for our discussions with the provinces.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister would be just a little more precise in respect of one form of deposit. In recent times perhaps the most popular instruments which have been issued by near banks are what are called guaranteed investment certificates. Is it clear that guaranteed investment certificates are intended to be insured by this legislation provided their term is not more than the maturity mentioned by the minister, five years?

Mr. Sharp: It would be my intention to recommend to the Governor in Council that guaranteed investment certificates of up to five years and debentures of loan companies up to five years would be covered.

Canada Deposit Insurance Corp.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I want to make only one further general comment on this clause. When the bill was at the second reading stage on February 3 I endeavoured to make my position very clear. I submitted that the minister had approached this problem in the wrong way. In my view the trouble is that parliament has abdicated its proper authority over banking. I am bothered because we have definitions such as the one in (j), "provincial institution", because there would be no such thing as a provincial institution in relation to deposit-taking if this parliament asserted its proper authority. Deposit-taking is the very heart and core of banking, and being the heart and core this parliament should assert its own exclusive authority over it. I am not going to argue further with the minister, but I wanted to make my position completely clear.

The minister ought to have moved to bring near banks under the supervision and control of this parliament, and having brought them under that supervision and control this legislation should have been universal and enforced in respect of all deposit-taking institutions. Because this has not been done I want to make it clear that I am not ready to be a party to the further abdication of the authority of this parliament. Because many of the clauses of this bill can be so interpreted, they will be passed so far as I am concerned on division.

Mr. Lambert: In this clause I believe we come up against the essence of the whole problem, and I fully subscribe to the views advanced by my colleague, the hon. member for Carleton, regarding the abdication of authority. Surely that suggestion has been supported by the minister as a result of his statement of a few minutes ago when he said it was all right for the government to recognize what are deposits in relation to federal institutions but it would be improper or impossible for the government to do so in relation to those institutions such as near banks operating under provincial charters of incorporation. That is the only right of supervision that should be granted to provincial authority in this field, the right of issuing a charter of incorporation.

The constitution makes it quite clear that the parliament of Canada has the exclusive right to deal with currency, interest and other financial matters. Let me refer to the precise terms of this exclusive right. In section 91 of the B.N.A. Act the following are listed: subsection 14, currency and coinage; subsection 15, banking, incorporation of banks, and the issue of paper money; subsection 16, savings banks; subsection 18, bills of exchange and promissory notes; subsection 19, interest, and subsection 20, legal tender. What more could you require in this regard?

I find it incredible at this time that because of some unknown fear the federal government does not want to assume its exclusive right in the field of deposit insurance. Let me refer the minister to the representations of my colleague, the hon. member for Kamloops, at the committee hearings. Apparently there is a fear that because some isolated near bank might challenge the legislation such a challenge would ipso facto make this legislation suspect and non-operative. That proposition seems to be implicit in the minister's remarks. Quite contrary to the truth of the matter, there seems to be a feeling that if the parliament of Canada passed this bill and some corporation should challenge it it would not remain in effect. That is not so. It would remain in full effect until a judgment had been delivered ruling it ultra vires.

I want to know why we should allow the provinces to enter this field. I recognize the rights of provinces in their own spheres of jurisdiction, but this is one field which the constitution places exclusively within federal jurisdiction. Why should we now in respect of deposit insurance give the provinces the right to determine banking practice? The minister has said that the exact nature of deposits shall be determined by the interpretation of the provinces. Let me refer to the words of the minister as they appear at page 8 of the transcript of proceedings. He said that the Ontario minister, Mr. Rowntree, in his speech introducing the provincial legislation, had said that he was going to require all Ontario companies to join the federal scheme once it is in effect because he believes this problem can be handled more efficiently on a national than on a provinccial basis. I agree wholeheartedly with Mr. Rowntree in that respect.

What about the conflict in determining what is a deposit? What will happen to rights which may accrue to individuals during the interval between the provincial legislation and the federal scheme if a province determines a certain obligation in respect of a near bank and that determination is challenged by some of the holders? Where do we stand from a federal point of view? Individuals and institutions are entitled to certainty. Some provincial governments may pass concurrent stopgap legislation. Why is it that the federal government will not recognize its responsibility in this regard?

If the minister is prepared to recommend to the Governor in Council that deposit obligations shall be covered for a period up to five years by deposit insurance, why does he not say so in the bill? The minister is making a decision by his statements to the house. Why does he not say so in the bill so that parliament will know what this corporation is going to do?

I may sound overly critical but I am concerned about the efficacy of this legislation. I am also concerned about the people who must be protected against delusion by the use of the phrase "guaranteed investment certificate" because the word "guarantee" only has a meaning in respect of an interest rate, not as to liquidity. If only these people knew that they could get just as good or better returns by going to reputable solicitors and placing their money in mortgages or by buying government of Canada securities they might not need so much protection, but we have to deal with all kinds of people. I suppose we must protect the most foolish of depositors.

Why, in legislation in respect of which we presumably have the initiative, are we unable to determine what is a deposit? After all, this bill is known as the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act. Perhaps I should paraphrase that and call it the Canada "we do not know" Insurance Act, because the government refuses to tell us what it means by a deposit. I fully agree with my colleague, the hon. member for Carleton, on this point. I am not going to labour the question of "provincial institution" under subclause (j). I shall have to reserve judgment on this matter, and the clause at best will have to pass, on division.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I should just like to repeat what I said before, that there will be no uncertainty about the application of this legislation when the bylaws are issued. Full publicity will be given to the extent of the guarantee both to the institutions themselves and to the public. I can understand the comments of the hon. gentlemen who would like us now, before we have examined all these instruments, to define precisely what is a deposit. I regret that I am not in a position to do so, nor are my officials. They have a fairly good idea of what should be included but they are very reluctant at this stage, before having examined the kind of instruments being issued by provincial institutions, to be too precise. I hope they will be able to do so shortly. They have been examining some of these instruments but have not completed their work.

May I comment upon another point. It is being assumed by the hon. member for Carleton and the hon. member for Edmonton West that one could define the business of banking as the business of taking deposits, but in fact, as we have seen from this discussion, what constitutes a deposit is subject to some uncertainty. I should like to draw attention to the Ontario act which was approved the other day, an act to establish the Ontario Deposit Insurance Corporation. That act says:

> For the purposes of this act, a deposit shall be,
> (a) moneys deposited with a member institution in respect of which such institution is liable to the depositors;
> (b) moneys received under section 82 of the Loan and Trust Corporations Act by a trust company that is a member institution; and
> (c) debentures or like obligations issued by a loan corporation that is a member institution.

Then it goes on to say:

> Each deposit with a member institution is insured by the corporation except,
> (a) a deposit that is not payable in Canada or in Canadian currency;
> (b) so much of any one deposit, including interest thereon, as exceeds $20,000; and
> (c) so much of a deposit as is insured under the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act.

That is the bill now before us. The fact that there can be a difference in the definition of "deposit" is an indication that if one were to use the taking of deposits as a test of banking there would still be great uncertainty whether particular institutions were actually engaged in accepting deposits or whether they were engaged in issuing securities. So I suggest to my hon. friends opposite that even accepting their argument, which may be right and may be accepted eventually by the courts, that the taking of deposits is of the essence of the banking business, one still would not define precisely how far federal jurisdiction extended.

Mr. Lambert: To come back to this argument, Mr. Chairman, of course no definition of banking is limited to the acceptance of deposits, and no one has suggested that. The minister has bolstered the case of the opposition in this regard by quoting from the Ontario act, because as a lawyer I can go down the list and determine precisely what deposits are covered by the Ontario act. As a matter of fact, the last paragraph which the minister cited from that act is an anticipation by the government of Ontario that we are going to be weak-kneed or limited in this respect, and they have covered their people by saying: We will cover deposits in so far as they are not already covered by the federal act. This is perhaps anticipating a more limited coverage by the federal legislation.

A fair interpretation of that section clearly indicates what deposits are covered and what deposits are not covered. I am sure that any person contemplating investing money, making a deposit or buying securities in a near bank could go to his solicitor now and say, "am I covered or am I not covered, and the solicitor could answer with a reasonable degree of certainty, But why is there this abdication in the bill before us? I do not know why the minister feels that his officials at some indeterminate date in the future—I say "his officials" because the Superintendent of Insurance, the Inspector General of Banks and other people are to be part of the board of the deposit insurance corporation—will be able to determine this question better than parliament. Why is that? Is it that the government is afraid that parliament cannot face up to its responsibilities? I must confess that this seems to be the pattern of legislation which is presented to us. I do not know whether the minister's previous training in public affairs has conditioned his thinking in this regard and he is prepared to accept this philosophy, but as a member of the House of Commons I find it a rather repugnant principle that we always pass these questions to officials to determine. In this instance we will be leaving it to the officials to determine what shall and what shall not be the application of this legislation. When one looks at the title of the bill one sees it contains the word "deposit"; yet the minister cannot tell us what is a deposit. In other words, Mr. Chairman, frankly this is an exercise in frustration because we do not know what we are trying to do this afternoon.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I should like to mention first of all that contrary to the announcement made at noon, we have not received, at least myself, a copy of the report of the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs concerning Bill No. C-261, an act to establish the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation. The committee chairman, the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Gray), I believe, announced that the committee report had been tabled, but every attempt on my part to secure a copy has been unsuccessful. I think a few members of the house have received copies, and copies are available for only one or two and not for everyone, especially those who sat on the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs. If no copies are available for those interested in dealing with this problem, I wonder why the committee chairman bothers to announce the tabling of a copy of the report? I see he is about to rise. Would he have a copy for me? I am not sure if that is his intention, but we are now discussing this matter without a copy of the report of the committee of finance, trade and economic affairs. Could the chairman give us some information on this subject? Afterwards, I shall proceed with my remarks on clause 2 of Bill No. 261.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, I must tell our colleague from the province of Quebec that the committee report was tabled on Friday, February 10, as reported in No. 205 of Votes and Proceedings. I would ask our colleague to kindly consult the Votes and Proceedings and acquaint himself with the official report of the committee.

This afternoon, I tabled in the house the official report of the proceedings which were held on this bill. True, there are not enough copies for all members of the house. The reason for this, as everyone knows, is that the transcript of the proceedings is not immediately available upon the adjournment of the committee. It is unfortunate, but this is not within the purview of the committee. We might ask those who handle the business of the house to change the system. But I made a particular effort to secure a few copies of these proceedings recorded on tape for the minister and the spokesmen of the political parties in the house. There are surely four or five photostats available for the minister and the spokesmen of the various parties.

The hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) is in the same position as the other members of the house who have not had the complete report of the proceedings either. If the hon. member feels this will hamper his consideration of the bill at this time, I shall be very happy to show him the photostat I have, as chairman of the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I was not referring to the report tabled last Friday, February 10. I clearly repeated when speaking of the report, what the chairman of the committee said himself, namely official evidence.

Now then, four or five hon. members received a copy, while the others did not.

Mr. Chairman, you will tell me that copies are distributed to official representatives of a group. But we, the three independent members, have received nothing. Even though we do not form a group, I can see no reason why all hon. members should not be treated equally. When one hon. member receives a transcript of official evidence heard before the committee, enabling him to examine the bill in the light of this evidence while another member cannot do so, then I submit that the 260 members of parliament who did not receive a copy—with the exception of the five hon. members and the chairman of the committee —should voice their protest.

I see some hon. members looking on, who did not receive a transcript of the official evidence. What are you doing there? Are you here solely for the purposes of the 20-member quorum? Should you not be here to consider the legislation before us? If that is the case, we should all have copies. There should be no question of distributing them to official representatives of each party only. Only one transcript per party is not enough, far from it; all hon. members have a right to the same privileges, whether they sit on the government side of the house, with the opposition, or with another minority party. Either we all have the same privileges, or else we no longer have a democracy; it becomes a plutocracy, and the administration of a country lies in the hands of a few persons who are not elected and who surely do not have more rights than other members.

I say, that when the chairman of the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs rises to table the report of the evidence given before that committee in connection with Bill No. C-261, every member of the house should have a copy of it, in French and in English, even before we start studying the bill. How do you want us to study a bill seriously when we are not even given a copy of the official evidence heard before the committee?

Mr. Chairman, I would go so far as to say that an attempt is now being made to make us pass this bill rapidly, because the Ontario legislature has introduced a bill on deposit insurance. The federal government prepared its own in a rush and brings it before the committee so as to push its passage. As the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) said a while ago, this is a bill to establish the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, but it does not even define a deposit. Therefore, let us call it instead an act to establish an Insurance Corporation, to be defined later on by Canadian officials. That appellation would be more fitting, because though the bill proposes to set up a Deposit Insurance Corporation, it does not define a deposit. I shall therefore support the hon. member for Edmonton West when he moves that the title be modified to read: An act to establish the Canada "X" Insurance Corporation. It will make more sense than "Deposit Insurance Corporation", since it does not even define a deposit.

And we are asked to pass this bill on the double, before anyone else takes the same initiative or attempts to move into this sphere of jurisdiction.

Mr. Chairman, I have here a special coverage of the conference given by the president of the Québec Prêt et Revenu group. This group consists of four companies whose assets total $140 million—these are not small and insignificant companies. Now, Mr. Jean Paul Tardif, president of Prêt et Revenu, made the following statement, as reported on page 20 of the Saturday edition of La Presse of February 11, 1967:

> According to the president of Prêt et Revenu, the bill as it now reads will cause provincially chartered financial institutions to come under federal jurisdiction.

He asks that the provinces be consulted before Ottawa passes the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act.

Has the minister consulted the provinces? No. Federal-provincial meetings have been requested in this connection, but to no avail. And the president of Prêt et Revenu, who is well known in Quebec—I see before me my friend the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Laflamme) who must be very familiar with this group and who must know its president very well. Mr. Jean Paul Tardif added:

> The province of Quebec must absolutely obtain the convening of a federal-provincial conference on deposit insurance before the bill introduced last week by the federal Minister of Finance is passed, because Mr. Mitchell Sharp's bill as drafted means, in practice, that provincially chartered financial institutions would be transferred to the jurisdiction of a federal authority.

And the article goes on:

> Such is the theory advanced yesterday—

That is on February 10.

—before the study committee on financial institutions, by the president of the Prêt et Revenu group of companies, Mr. Jean-Paul Tardif. Mr. Tardif, together with officials of the four companies in the Prêt et Revenu group, presented a brief to the Parizeau committee which carries on its public hearings at Quebec.

And further:

The bill introduced in parliament by Mr. Sharp provides that a provincially chartered company must secure beforehand the authorization of its own province to be able to participate in the federal deposit insurance plan. But, Mr. Tardif pointed out, when such authorization has been granted, the provincially chartered company will have to comply with the federal requirements of the federal deposit insurance corporation.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member for Lapointe allow a question?

Mr. Grégoire: Yes.

Mr. Chrétien: Has the hon. member for Lapointe read clause 16 (a) which provides that no provincial institution can become a member of this corporation without the prior consent of the province concerned?

• (4:10 p.m.)

Therefore, no provincial institution is forced to participate in the present plan without having secured beforehand the approval of the provincial authorities. The hon. member would not be saying any of this now had he read the bill in full.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, that is exactly what I just said. I will repeat the last paragraph I just read and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) will realize that I said it just before he took the floor. Was he listening? I will therefore repeat the last paragraph I read:

The bill introduced in parliament by Mr. Sharp provides that a provincially chartered company must secure beforehand the authorization of its own province to be able to participate in the federal deposit insurance plan.

I just said that and the Parliamentary Secretary wants to know if I read the bill. I would rather ask him if he had been listening before he asked his question, because I think he was not listening at all.

But, Mr. Tardif pointed out—

That is the important part and as I said, the parliamentary secretary was not listening and chose to ask a question about something he had not even heard.

But, Mr. Tardif pointed out, when such authorization has been granted, the provincially chartered company will have to comply with the federal regulations and the requirements of the federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

I read the whole paragraph earlier. As pointed out by the president of the companies Prêt et Revenu, it really means that under the terms of this bill the provincially chartered financial institutions will fall under the jurisdiction of the federal government.

Mr. Chrétien: Only if the provincial government agrees.

Mr. Grégoire: That is why we ask whether the provinces were consulted beforehand, whether there was a federal-provincial meeting on that subject. But no. They want us to pass a legislation in haste; they want to rush everything. In fact, they do not even want to take the time to consider what is taking place in that case.

I heard a moment ago the member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) say that the major business of banks was accepting deposits. I think that the member for Carleton does not know much about banking operations because, as the Minister of Finance stated the other day before the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs, the main and major business of banks is to create money. The minister himself stated in committee that banks were creating money. He cannot deny that, because it is entered in the proceedings of the committee and it was recorded on magnetic tape.

The minister stated that chartered banks created money. This is the major operation of banks rather than accepting deposits, because other institutions, such as trust companies and credit unions—which are not included among banking institutions—accept deposits but do not create money. This is the main difference between banks and near-banks. The former have the right to create money, whereas the latter have not, but both have the right to accept deposits.

The hon. member for Carleton added—as well as the hon. member for Edmonton West, I think—that he was surprised that all deposit accepting institutions did not come under federal jurisdiction.

But, Mr. Chairman, the right or the privilege to accept deposits is not provided for in the B.N.A. Act quoted earlier by the hon. member for Edmonton West. Section 91 does not deal with currency or with the minting of coins. This is not part of banking, of the bank charter, of the issuance of bank notes, nor of the savings banks, nor of the letters of exchange to order nor of the interest on money.

There are institutions that accept deposits such as, for instance, dealers who tell their customers: If you want to buy a fur coat for your wife next year, start depositing now and when you have paid 50 per cent of the price of the coat, it will be delivered and this is not banking. The difference between banks and near-banks, is that the banks are allowed to create money.

Nothing in section 91 of the British North America Act prevents the provincial governments from giving out charters to financial institutions which would be authorized to accept deposits and make loans. But, such financial institutions would not be empowered to create money.

It would have been much more beneficial to the Canadian people if the hon. members for Edmonton West and Carleton had given vent to their indignation with regard to the intention of the government to leave in the hands of chartered banks the exclusive privilege of creating credit and money in Canada, since the government could have a state bank in order to finance public works.

At a sitting of the committee, the Minister of Finance was telling us that a system of debts was a very good thing indeed, and that we had to stick to such a system. This is accepted by the Minister of Finance. When I asked him if a system whereby debt free money would be created would not be preferable to a system whereby money is created through a debtor system, he replied: "I see nothing wrong with a debtor system". But each year, however, he presents us with a budget providing for interest payments totalling $1,250,000 million. That is all very well, that is acceptable; let us tax the Canadian people, they do not mind. Let us increase taxes—

Mr. Laflamme: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Grégoire: —sales taxes—

Mr. Laflamme: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to interrupt the hon. member for Lapointe who will undoubtedly have the opportunity, when the house resumes consideration of the Bank Act, to resume his present speech, but I respectfully submit that we should not have to listen once again to the Creditist philosophy this afternoon; it will once more be set forth when the house resumes consideration of the Bank Act, and it was explained to the committee for several months.

We are presently considering Bill No. C-261, namely the deposit insurance bill, and I cannot see why, at this stage, any member should be allowed to discuss the complete banking system and the details of transactions between banks.

I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but I feel we should be considering the bill before us and the hon. member should wait until we resume consideration of the Bank Act to make his speech.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank my colleague the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency for his comments. I feel that, at any other moment, he would be right and the arguments he put forward to support his point of order would be perfectly justified.

Now, something different is occurring today. This is the first time we have been asked to study a bill without being told what it is about. We are told that a Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation will be set up, but a deposit is not defined. This doubtless leaves us much more scope, seeing what we are considering is not clearly defined, namely deposit insurance. What is a deposit? Section 2, (e) defines it thus:

—"deposit" means a deposit as defined by the by-laws of the Corporation;

Now, should the corporation which will govern this deposit insurance act define a deposit as the result of created credit, which is possible, for a deposit can stem from credit —if a chartered bank grants new credit, supposing I deposit it, my deposit is the product of credit—then, I claim I have the right to discuss the creation of credit. If the regulations of the corporation in fact do define a deposit as the result of the creation of credit, and I should discuss, today, the creation of credit and its products, I feel that I am in order and would say that in any other circumstances, my colleague would be right.

Mr. Laflamme: Mr. Chairman, I know of no ruling by virtue of which a member may do indirectly what he may not do directly. I rose on a point of order and maintain that the hon. member if out of order when he attempts to speak of the creation of money and credit; these matters fall within the scope of the Bank Act which will be studied later. His remarks have nothing to do with the section of the bill now under study.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I will say to my hon. friend that I do not propose to discuss that point any further. However, when we resume consideration of the Bank Act, we shall have every opportunity to do so. Mr. Chairman, you have noticed, no doubt, that I was recalling some remarks made by the hon. member for Carleton and the hon. member for Edmonton West. Besides, I was using them to show the Minister of Finance that, at the present time—I think that the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency should realize it also—and as was said earlier by the hon. member for Edmonton West, the government asks us to consider a bill that it cannot explain. We want to establish the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, but when the time comes to give a definition of what is a deposit, we are told:

• (4:20 p.m.)

"deposit" means a deposit as defined by the by-laws of the Corporation.

Then, the word "deposit" will be defined later on. That is why I wanted also to take this opportunity to mention to my hon. friend, the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency, that actually this legislation encourages a discussion in indefinite terms.

But in any event, Mr. Chairman, I should like to return to the main point of my interjection and say that the provinces should have been consulted. In this connection, I should like to quote Mr. Jean-Paul Tardif, president of the Corporation de Prêt et Revenu of the province of Quebec:

—the provinces must be consulted before the Deposit Insurance Act is passed by Ottawa.

Mr. Chairman, I believe the Minister of Finance should suspend the examination of this bill and convene a federal-provincial conference, so as to have the views of the provinces. There is nothing urgent as far as the passing of this bill is concerned, except that the minister would like to get on with it before the Ontario government passes its own measures. On the other hand, should the Ontario government wish to co-operate, it might be willing to wait and have its own bill go through only after such a federal-provincial consultation.

Besides, the minister is aware of the reaction of the Quebec government upon the announcement of the institution of such a Deposit Insurance Corporation, since that government declared it would create its own Deposit Insurance Corporation.

[Mr. Laflamme.]

Again, the federal government, through its Minister of Finance wants to proceed alone in a joint jurisdiction, without taking into account the opinions and suggestions of the provinces. Now, in view of this stubbornness of the federal government to legislate without consulting with those who may be involved, I strongly urge the Quebec government to organize and create its own deposit insurance corporation and to refuse provincially chartered companies—as mentioned in Bill No. C-261—the authorization to have their customers' deposits insured through the federal corporation.

I may say that in view in this stubbornness of the federal government, I shall urge the Quebec government to create its own corporation and to stand in the way of such constant infringements by the federal government, be it in social security, indirect taxation, or in the field that concerns us all at the moment.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Grégoire: Certainly, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Lambert: Since the hon. member is saying that the government of the province of Quebec has the right to set up its own deposit insurance corporation, could he tell me how the jurisdiction of the said corporation on the deposits of the institutions holding a Quebec charter and operating outside the province would be determined? Could that corporation insure the deposits of trust companies such as the Montreal Trust or the Royal Trust operating in Alberta or British Columbia? Could he also tell me what difficulties would arise from a disparity in the regulations of the province of Quebec and those of the other provinces since one must admit that if the province of Quebec states that it has the right to do this, that right still does not exceed that of the other provinces in that field? Would any province have the same right?

Could he explain how he could avoid the difficulties which might result from that?

Mr. Grégoire: Of course, Mr. Chairman, the state of Quebec has the right to establish such a Deposit Insurance Corporation since Ontario saw fit to introduce a piece of legislation to that effect. If Ontario has that right, the state of Quebec undoubtedly has it too. Quebec has the right to establish such a Deposit Insurance Corporation.

In reply to the question asked by my hon. friend, the hon. member for Edmonton West, I point out that some corporations and financial institutions are federally incorporated. In such cases, of course, the federal government may require that deposits made in federally incorporated financial institutions, such as chartered banks with their head office in Quebec, be insured by the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation. That is normal.

In the case of provincially incorporated financial institutions operating in Quebec, they may be insured by the Deposit Insurance Corporation which will be established by the state of Quebec. If these financial institutions operate outside Quebec, nothing will then prevent the provincial government from authorizing the provincially incorporated financial institutions from Quebec to insure deposits from other provinces through the federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. Just as is done in the case of foreign countries, provincial institutions accepting deposits from corporations in other provinces could do the same thing. Those are normal financial operations for institutions dealing in one or many provinces or in many countries. This will not disturb the financial operations of provincially incorporated institutions dealing with other provinces in Canada or with other countries.

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to get into another discussion with the hon. member for Lapointe about the intricacies of Social Credit theory. We had our preliminary go during the committee meetings and I expect that when the Bank Act revisions come before the house we shall repeat the performance. However, so as not to anticipate the pleasure that the rest of the house will have in this dissertation and my reply, may I simply make one or two points.

First of all, I should like to assure the hon. member for Lapointe that it is not only pressure from Ontario that is persuading us to move immediately to ask the house to approve the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation. I have had requests from all provinces except the province of Quebec to move quickly. They believe that this is a major step forward in improving the safety of deposits in Canada and improving the standards of financial supervision.

Second, it is, of course, important now that the province of Ontario has moved that federal institutions should not be at a disadvantage in attracting deposits. There are some smaller federal institutions in addition to the great chartered banks that would like to have the same assurance given to their depositers that is now enjoyed by Ontario institutions. I think that is an additional reason for proceeding quickly. But even if it were not so, Mr. Chairman, I would recommend to the house, apart altogether from any action that Ontario might have taken, quick action on this bill. I suggest to the hon. member for Lapointe that this legislation is very much in the interests of all Canada, including the province of Quebec.

Mr. Ballard: Mr. Chairman, I believe that the once very clearcut definition of the responsibilities of the federal government and the provincial governments in the British North America Act has with the passage of years become very unclear. I suggest to the minister it is legislation such as this that has contributed to the muddying of the clear-cut definition. I agree with the hon. member for Carleton and the hon. member for Edmonton West that banking is strictly a federal responsibility. I believe it has been the lack of responsibility on the part of the minister and his predecessors in taking a stand in matters involving provincial and federal jurisdiction which has caused the definition to become clouded over the years.

In my view the reason given by the minister for not defining a deposit, namely, that he was reluctant to do so, is certainly not acceptable to hon. members. We are asked to give carte blanche approval to a bill 15 pages long which deals with nothing but deposits. If we in this house, cannot define deposits, how are we to express intelligently an opinion on a bill which deals with deposits? It seems to be a futile exercise.

I suggest to the minister that unless we are given a clearcut, precise definition of the word "deposit" before proceeding further with the bill, the minister is abrogating his responsibility. The minister has said that he is reluctant to define deposits, so what does he suggest? He suggests that the corporation will at some time in the future define the word "deposit". But what is the corporation? The corporation consists of some senior civil servants. The corporation is made up of the chairman, the governor of the Bank of Canada, who is not a civil servant, the deputy minister of finance, the Superintendent of Insurance and the Inspector General of Banks. If these senior civil servants can at some future time define what "deposit" means, surely the minister could approach them now and have them define the term. The minister, in turn, could inform the house. We do not know now what we are talking about. It is the responsibility of the minister to attempt to define deposits.

We cannot buy the minister's argument. The Ontario government did not lack courage. In its legislation it came out flatly and defined deposits. The Ontario government knew where it was going and took the responsibility of defining deposits in its deposit insurance act. The minister has the responsibility to do the same thing.

How will the minister define deposits finally? Will he hold a series of provincial conferences to ask provincial ministers of finance how deposits should be defined? If the minister intends doing that he will probably end with ten different definitions of deposits. To cover the wishes of the provinces—I am sure the minister would like to do that; he wants to be popular with the provinces—he will have to accept the weakest definition so that universal coverage may be extended throughout Canada. That is not good enough. The minister should take the responsibility of defining a deposit. The provincial governments should fall in line. Any provincial government not falling in line would have to contest the legislation before the Supreme Court of Canada. We would then have a clear ruling whether the federal government is empowered to direct banks and banking in Canada as defined by the B.N.A. Act.

To leave the responsibility for this definition to a group of civil servants is not good enough. It is an extreme example of the worst type of government by bureaucracy. We as a parliament are being asked to set up regulations to control something and we do not know what we will control. That is not clearly put but neither is the bill. For 15 pages the bill refers to deposits but does not define what a deposit is. As the hon. member for Edmonton West suggested, we might as well call this measure the "general X insurance corporation" bill, for all that we know about the matter. We cannot buy the minister's argument that he cannot define deposits because he is reluctant to do so. That is a poor argument. The minister ought to take the bill back to the committee and bring it back later with a clear definition of deposits in it.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, the only definition we could put in the bill that would help the hon. members concerned about the lack of a definition would be one that limited the term "deposits". This is the principal reason that we have been reluctant to place a definition in the bill. We believed it would be wiser and more in accord with the intent of parliament if we could make a careful examination of the kinds of instruments being issued by provincial companies—there is no difficulty with respect to federal companies—before finally laying down the lines.

Once the bill is passed with a limited definition in it parliament has acted and we would have to bring the act back at a later time when there was a further opportunity to consider a redefinition. It is most desirable, we believe, to make the definition as broad as possible, consistent with one principle. We do not believe that we should insure securities. We should insure deposits. In committee I indicated what we had in mind and I have no hesitation in repeating that here.

Mr. Lambert: That does not mean anything.

Mr. Sharp: It is an indication of the kind of thinking we are doing now and the kind of discussions we shall be having with the provinces. May I also add this word. If any province wants to define instruments which we are not insuring that it wants to include in its insurance plan, that is perfectly valid and proper. We have to decide what constitutes deposits and the criterion we have in mind is that they are deposits and not securities that are traded. If a province wants to insure securities traded, that is perfectly proper. They can do that. Indeed, it is implicit in the Ontario act that if our definition of deposits does not accord with theirs they will nevertheless insure those obligations that we do not insure. That is quite within the competence of the provincial legislature.

We have in mind, first, moneys received by a member institution that are repayable on demand; second, repayable on notice, the notice not to exceed five years; third, repayable on a fixed date not more than five years after the date the money is received. We propose in addition that if moneys are received in exchange for the issuance of a receipt or other instrument, as contrasted with merely an entry in a running account, those moneys would not constitute part of a deposit unless the instrument was called a deposit on its face. We would also exclude instruments made payable to bearer or instruments designed to be readily negotiable. Thus, for the future we would include demand deposits and term deposits up to five years but to avoid confusion we would not include anything not specifically called a deposit on its face.

This might mean that the term "debenture" or "guaranteed investment certificate" would virtually disappear in respect of maturities of five years or less. Instead, such instruments might be called "deposit receipts" or some such term. However, if a company wanted to continue to issue debentures for periods of five years and under it could do so but the instrument would not be insured. If a company wanted to use the term "deposit" in respect of an instrument with a maturity over five years and not callable earlier, the instrument would have to be stamped "not insured".

For the transitional period we would propose that all obligations on a member institution's books at the date the act comes into force, in respect of moneys received prior to that date, would be insured no matter what they are called if they are, first, repayable on demand, second, repayable on notice of not more than five years, third, repayable on a fixed date not more than five years after the act comes into force. This would mean that some instruments called debentures and some called guaranteed investment certificates, issued prior to the date of the act, would be insured, but this would be justified on the ground that prior to that date there was no reason to use one name rather than another. For the transitional period, it would do no harm to extend the insurance a bit wider than people might expect.

That may illustrate the reason for our reluctance at this stage to define too precisely what a deposit is. Otherwise we would not have the flexibility it is so desirable to have in dealing with instruments that would normally be insured. If we define the instruments now in some limited way we may find we have interfered with some very desirable kind of deposit taking activity that we would wish to insure.

Mr. Ballard: The minister has given a good definition of what he expects deposits will mean. I would hope the definition he has just given would be a minimum standard for deposits. We would be satisfied if this definition were included in the bill with a provision for further extension of it. What I am saying is that we should have some starting point for a definition of deposits before we consider the rest of the bill.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member's remarks illustrate the point precisely. No sooner would we start with a definition than there would be somebody who felt they were left out. I believe it is very much in the interests of the success of this legislation that I should define generally what is the intention, for which later I and the government can be called to account, and then to leave the precise definition to the governor in council in the form of approval of the bylaws of the corporation. I should point out to the hon. member, who may have missed the point, that the corporation is not going to be free to define the nature of the deposits that are insured. The bylaws will have to be approved by the governor in council.

Mr. More: If I understand the minister correctly, there is no question as to what instruments will be insured so far as federally incorporated companies are concerned. Am I right in that?

Mr. Sharp: Generally speaking we know a good deal more about the kind of instruments they are issuing than we know about provincially incorporated companies.

Mr. More: Do I take it from the minister's answer that some instruments issued by federally incorporated companies may not come under the provisions of the bill, that there is some question whether they will be insured?

Mr. Sharp: If, after discussions with the provincial governments, we come to the conclusion that it would be desirable to include a particular form of deposit or a particular form of certificate, we would want to be free to extend the same treatment to federal institutions. We have a general idea what instruments issued by federal corporations we would insure, but until we have had an opportunity of discussing the matter with provincial governments and provincial institutions we cannot be precisely sure how far we want to go with the federal institutions. It is desirable that the coverage should be the same across the country in all provinces.

I wish to contradict what was said by a previous speaker, that there is going to be a different set of rules in each province. The exact, same set of rules will apply everywhere. We should have the same rules for federal institutions as for provincial institutions.

Mr. More: Earlier in answer to the hon. member for Broadview the minister spoke of the need for maintaining some flexibility and he mentioned the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Subsequently he indicated that he was being pushed by nine provinces but not by the province of Quebec. Would he indicate to the committee when Quebec expressed its views and what consultations he had in which that province said it wanted some flexibility, which would indicate some interest on its part in this legislation? There seems to be a contradiction in what the minister said. Has Quebec expressed the desire that its provincially incorporated companies should come under this bill?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, the discussions that have been held have been at the official level with all provinces. We have had a chance to have our officials visit the provincial capitals and, as I said previously, in nine of the provinces there is a very strong interest in having the federal legislation proceed immediately because they all wish their provincially incorporated companies to take advantage of it.

At present in the province of Quebec an investigation into financial institutions is proceeding. When we originally brought forward the proposal for federal deposit insurance I said in the house that we would not proceed immediately with the legislation but would welcome the views of the provinces on it. However, because of the great pressure that began to be put on us by various provinces and because of the pressure in the house to proceed with the legislation, I decided the best thing to do would be to proceed with it.

The province of Quebec has not yet had an opportunity of deciding what its position will be. It may be that that province, like Ontario, will want to have its own legislation relating to its own institutions. So far as I know that is certainly well within the jurisdiction of the province of Quebec, as it is within the jurisdiction of Ontario or any other province.

The exchange of correspondence that took place between the premier of Quebec and the Prime Minister of Canada is not directly but only partly related to this subject. The conference that has been proposed by Quebec is to apply to the whole range of financial institutions. It is to involve discussions about deposit taking institutions, finance companies, acceptance companies and so on. I even think it will extend into the field of securities legislation. We welcome that. We believe such a conference on a comprehensive basis would be a step forward because all of us have reason to be concerned about recent developments in Canada, and governments as a whole ought to co-operate.

There is only one point which the province of Quebec made about this legislation. They hoped that this house would support clause 16, under which the permission of a provincial government is required before an institution can take advantage of the bill. I am referring to clause 16(a) which reads:

(a) the provincial institution is authorized by the province of its incorporation to apply for deposit insurance;

The province of Quebec said they hoped that this house would approve the bill with that provision in it because they would like to talk with us about the extent of the application.

Mr. More: The minister's answer indicated that perhaps universal coverage will be the largest common denominator of the views of each provincial government. I ask the minister whether on this basis the coverage he wants for federal institutions would be secure. It might be conceivable that the largest common denominator with respect to deposit proposals would be objected to by some of the provinces and therefore the coverage provided by the bill would not be as extensive as desired.

Further, I believe the minister told the standing committee that the insurance would come into effect for provincial and federal companies at the same time. He said it was desirable that this be so but that if provincial companies came into the scheme with the consent of their provinces before an examination had been made of their deposits, any losses that arose in such instances would not be a charge upon the deposit insurance corporation. The minister said all instruments would be covered during the transition period but subsequently some might not be because after examination they might not prove to be the type of instrument that this bill is designed to cover, even though during the transition period they came within the orbit suggested by the minister.

The minister speaks also of the prodding which caused him to speed up the examination of this bill by the committee and by parliament. What concerns me is that by this prodding which came about because of recent events—in my interpretation the collapse of Prudential Finance—the public may be misled to believe that this bill will in effect insure those instruments which Prudential issued and in respect of which they now find they cannot recover. I think this should be clarified. The flexibility of which the minister speaks in not defining deposits is not a flexibility which will in effect cover instruments such as those used by Prudential Finance in its operations. During the transitional period when the instruments that will be insured are being determined, will the provincial companies which will be involved in the inspection be required before inspection to stamp on instruments a clear indication to their customers that the instruments they are purchasing are in fact covered by this bill?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, there seems to be some slight confusion in the mind of my hon. friend about this matter, but that may be understandable in view of the complexity of the problem. Before institutions are brought under the terms of the act there will be a clear definition of which deposits are and which are not insured. We will not bring the act into force until the governor in council approves the bylaws of the corporation. So there is no question about the range of instruments which would be insured. The purpose of inviting the provinces to bring their institutions under the deposit insurance provisions quickly at the same time as the federal institutions are brought under them is to give the provinces which wish to do so an opportunity to provide this insurance to depositors and to institute as quickly as possible at least the beginnings of the process of inspection. We will not discriminate among instruments on deposit when considering coverage. What we will be examining is whether the institutions as such are worthy of being covered by insurance. In other words, we will be looking into the financial management and the financial stability of the institutions themselves.

If it is found that an institution is not measuring up to the standards laid down by the corporation, then it will be given notice that it no longer will be covered. That will be the sanction. However, the kind of instrument which will be insured during the period of the insurance will be quite clearly defined in advance.

Mr. More: Did I understand the minister to say that if the instruments should be defined before the companies have been inspected they would not be the responsibility of the fund set up under the provisions of the act? It has been indicated to the public that if they apply even before the inspection they are insured. As I understood the minister there are no resources to which they can apply before they have been stamped "approved" after inspection. Therefore, will we have to wait until each provincial legislature has taken action and guaranteed these instruments during the transitional period before these companies can come under the scheme? Is this the position?

Mr. Sharp: The position is that if a province wishes its corporations to be covered before the federal corporation has an opportunity to inspect them, the province may ask that this be done. In this case the corporation will make an arrangement with the province concerning indemnification in the event of any losses in respect of an institution which is covered before there has been an opportunity to inspect it. During that period there will be no question raised concerning the safety of the deposits. Any losses incurred by depositors will be paid by the corporation and the corporation would look to the province for indemnification.

Mr. More: Would that agreement not require legislative action on the part of the province?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I really cannot answer that in advance. It would depend upon the provincial statutes. It is possible.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, I think the minister indicated that this act will not be proclaimed until the definition of deposits has been determined. At what stage in time is he anticipating that this will be done?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, when the bill was before the house committee it was indicated that it would probably be in less than a month.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I should like to put a question to the minister for clarification. I am not sure whether I misinterpreted him or whether he and I are at cross purposes. An hour ago I asked the minister specifically whether the important form of instrument known as a guaranteed investment certificate would be covered and I received from him an answer which I understood to be an unequivocal affirmative. A short while ago, in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Calgary South, the minister said that during the transitional period some forms of guaranteed investment certificates and debentures would be covered. Earlier the minister said that probably once deposit insurance is permanent the use of the term "guaranteed investment certificate" would disappear and that this form of instrument would be called a deposit receipt.

There is some confusion between the minister and myself in relation to this matter and some confusion on the record. I wish the minister would make this very clear. When he does, would he also clarify what he said with relation to the appearance on the instrument itself of the word "deposit"? If I understood him correctly, he said it will be in the future a prerequisite to the insurance that there appear on the face of the instrument that it is a deposit. I certainly hope the minister will not take such a technical position that the word "deposit" must appear. There is no magic in the word. If it is in fact a deposit, then, before it is an insured document, why insist that that word shall appear? Indeed, I think that this very well might defeat the whole purpose of the legislation. It might be that some unscrupulous company would deliberately leave off the word "deposit" while advertising that the deposits are insured. They might leave off the word "deposit" in order to avoid paying the premium. Therefore, if I understood the minister correctly, the loan would not be insured. I venture to suggest that if there is to be some magic attached to the word "deposit" and it must be on the face of every document, this legislation very easily might be completely frustrated.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the hon. gentleman inadvertently has given support to the position I have taken that at this stage it is very difficult to define too precisely the meaning of "deposit". The answers I gave were intended to indicate the thinking that we had been doing in advance. It is our intention that, in general, guaranteed investment certificates of up to five years should be covered. We do believe it is desirable, however, after the corporation has passed through its process of formation and has gained some experience, that the public should have a clear idea of the kind of instruments that are insured and those that are not. I ventured some ideas as to how the distinction might be made. However, we are not quite satisfied yet that this is precisely the way it should be done. I thought it desirable to give the committee a general idea of our approach to the problem.

We do not want to interfere with the normal sort of operation now being carried on by institutions that we intend to insure. We do believe it is desirable, however, to have some uniformity or a greater approach to uniformity in future so that the difference between insured and uninsured instruments will be quite clear.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Will the minister answer the second point in connection with the use of the word "deposit" on the face of the document?

Mr. Sharp: The point the hon. member raised about a company engaging in the practice of deliberately not putting the word "deposit" on the face of the document has been considered, and I am advised by one of the future members of the corporation that there would be a very severe penalty for any such practice. As to whether or not the word "deposit" ought to be included, let me say that obviously it follows from the fact that this act is for the insuring of deposits that no better word, so far as I am concerned, could describe what we are insuring. This would mean there would be a minimum of confusion.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I should like to urge upon the minister most vigorously that there not be some magic attached to that word. Surely it is the fact that is important, not the word attached to an instrument. If use of a word is made a condition of validity, then I submit very earnestly to the minister that this whole plan may be frustrated. There have been many instances of legislation which has been so technical that it has been frustrated by its technicalities. I suggest that will be the case if we do make as a condition precedent to the validity of an insured document that it contain a particular word to which some alleged magic is attributed. I urge the minister with great vigour not to fall into that trap.

Mr. Sharp: I thank the hon. member and I will take his views under very serious consideration.

Mr. Lambert: In respect of comments regarding different systems the minister suggests there will be a unified system of insurance. The minister cannot guarantee that, because if the provinces have the right to enter the field of deposit insurance they can do what they want. There may be great differences in definition between the provinces and theoretically at least there could be nine, ten or 11 different systems.

Mr. Sharp: May I interrupt the hon. gentleman? I did not intend to convey that impression. I meant only that the federal legislation shall apply uniformly throughout the country.

Mr. Lambert: I agree with the minister in that regard. I think that goes without saying. What the minister says about the nature of deposits here does not matter one whit because in the final analysis the courts will interpret what is the law as parliament passes it and what the regulations are as authorized by the act passed by parliament. Those are matters the courts will decide and they relate to the rights of individuals vis-à-vis depositors and the member institution. Therefore the regulations the corporation may pass may not be the same although they may have a general resemblance to what the minister has indicated this afternoon. I am not calling into question the intentions of the minister, but it does not follow that what he suggests this afternoon will become established legal rights. I therefore return to the question in respect of the definition of deposits.

There has been no indication so far that any provincial government has the authority to consent to an institution incorporated under provincial charter joining a federal deposit insurance scheme. Provincial governments cannot go beyond what they are authorized to do by law. I should like to know whether or not the minister is satisfied that any or all provincial governments have the legal authority, without the passage of express legislation, either to direct, as some provinces have indicated they intend to do, or consent to a provincially incorporated institution joining a federal scheme. We do not seem to have much information about the powers of provincial governments to do precisely what I have mentioned.

In order to bring this matter to a head, Mr. Chairman, I should like to move:

That clause 2, subclause (e) be deleted and that the following be substituted therefor:

(e) "deposit" means any obligation of a member institution payable in Canada in Canadian funds to the holder thereof on demand or on notice within a maturity date of five years from the making thereof;

In considering the general terms of this definition I point out that a member institution is defined by the act, and this falls within the terms the minister indicated he thought should apply to a deposit. It refers to a deposit payable in Canada in Canadian funds on demand or on notice within a maturity date of five years from the making thereof. The word "obligation" covers all the types of instruments listed by the minister. It might even go further, and I suggest it does, to include any possible form of deposit that might be authorized under a provincial scheme.

It is my hope that the minister will refer this amendment to his law officers. This is a very serious point. If the minister can show me that there is something gravely wrong with this definition I am prepared to accept that, but I put it forward in all seriousness. In an effort to assist the consideration of this bill I would agree to allowing clause 2 to stand while we consider subsequent clauses in order to give the minister and his officials an opportunity to consider the amendment.

Mr. Sharp: I am quite agreeable to the suggestion to go on with other clauses. I will have a look at the proposed amendment and make my comments later.

• (5:10 p.m.)

The Chairman: Is it agreed that this clause shall stand?

Mr. Lambert: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I understand the minister accedes to my suggestion that the clause stand while the legal implications of the amendment I have moved are considered.

The Chairman: Is it agreed by the committee that clause 2 shall stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

The Chairman: The committee will proceed to clause 3.

On clause 3—Corporation established.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I ask this question for clarification. With respect to clause 3(1) is the minister satisfied that the power to acquire, hold and alienate real and personal property would be sufficient to grant authority to the corporation to sell the assets of or merge an institution which had taken advantage of the lender of last resort facilities under the act, had failed to make good its obligations to the corporation and was in default?

It is all very well to say what shall be the procedure for entering into lender of last resort negotiations, determining the obligations of the corporation and of the member institution, and determining when there shall be default, but as in all legal contracts there must be a provision for resolving the default. How do you proceed once default has been established? I believe there are provisions under the United States legislation whereby the deposit insurance corporation may take a defaulting bank and sell its assets to another member institution, or merge the bank with one or more institutions. I think this is a salutary provision. It provides further flexibility in that the corporation, rather than acting as the curator and liquidator of a defaulting institution, in order to obtain the best deal, if one can use the word "deal", for the shareholders of the defaulting member institution is able to sell its assets or merge the institution under some form of share exchange with a going concern. Is the wording of clause 3(1) sufficient to achieve this purpose, or subsequently when we are considering—

Mr. Sharp: Clause 11.

Mr. Lambert: Yes. There are also the objects, powers and duties set out in clause 8, but certainly clause 11 applies. In any event, I think the relationship is much more closely established in clauses 3 and 11.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, clause 11(c) provides:

> The corporation may do all things necessary or incidental to the objects of the corporation and in particular, but without limiting the generality of the foregoing, the corporation may, in furtherance of its objects, . . .
> (c) act as a curator of a bank or liquidator or receiver of a member institution when duly appointed as such and appoint qualified and competent persons, whether employees or not of the corporation, to carry out any or all of the functions of the corporation as curator, liquidator or receiver;

Therefore, provided the court approved the corporation could as receiver bring about a merger or adopt any similar method of protecting the interests of the shareholders and depositors.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, is the minister satisfied that the wording used is sufficient, rather than specifically spelling it out?

Mr. Sharp: Yes. This was in the minds of the draftsmen in the Department of Justice when the bill was drafted.

Mr. Lambert: Is the minister satisfied that a judge interpreting the act would be able to read the minds of the draftsmen?

[Mr. Lambert.]

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 agreed to.

On clause 5—Board of directors.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the hon. member for York Centre, who is somewhat of a carrier in these matters, would be able to give us the benefit of his knowledge in this connection.

Mr. Walker: Some loads are lighter than others.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister where he would seek alternate directors? I know there are four individuals specified who hold senior positions with the government, and I think we are quite satisfied with the incumbents of those positions as members of the board of directors. But what about the alternate directors and why is there the limitation of a period not exceeding 30 days in respect of the time these alternate directors shall serve on the board of directors? Are these appointments to be made by order in council? What will be the position if, for instance, there is a long absence from the country by a director, or a long illness? I do not understand why there should be the limitation of 30 days.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, the limitation was for the purpose of requiring that the officers named shall in fact carry out their duties. We felt that the appointment of alternates for 30 days would be sufficient to provide for any temporary absences; otherwise the governor in council might be able to replace the officers that are named in the bill by others that are not. With regard to the first question asked by the hon. member, we would have in mind appointing as alternates to these directors other public officials, probably their deputies.

Mr. Gray: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I think I should draw to the attention of the committee that the finance committee in its report to the house recommended certain amendments to clause 5 which are found at page 1310 of Votes and Proceedings for February 10 last. Perhaps I might take a moment to point out to the committee of the whole that the amendments are as follows:

> (a) Immediately after subclause 2, add the following:
> "(3) A vacancy on the board of directors does not impair the right of the remainder to act."

"(4) Where the office of chairman is vacant, the minister may appoint, for a period not exceeding 90 days, an acting chairman who shall, while so acting, be a member of the board of directors and have and exercise all the powers of the chairman."

(b) Renumber subclause (3) as subclause (5).

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps I should point out to the committee that the amendments referred to are recorded in Votes and Proceedings No. 205 for Friday, February 10. There are copies of Votes and Proceedings available at the table.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Has the minister considered whether any conflict arises between the role of the superintendent of insurance and the inspector general of banks under clause 5(1), and the role which they are given under clause 21? Under clause 21 these two officials are given the duty of inspection. In effect, they report to themselves in their capacity as directors. While I suggest there may possibly be a conflict between these two roles, I want to make it abundantly clear that I have the highest confidence in the present superintendent of insurance. He is a man in the great tradition of that office and I am sure he would not consciously involve himself in any conflict. But he has duties to carry out under the inspection clause. Is it appropriate, having inspected and reported to the corporation, that he should then be one of the controlling members of the corporation? Is it appropriate that the inspector general of banks, having carried out duties of inspection for the corporation, should be one of the directors?

I will put the position this way. If the two officers were other than such distinguished members of the public service and persons of such high integrity, I would oppose this clause vigorously as involving a conflict of interest. I do not wish to do so in view of my confidence in them, but the minister might consider that the matter I have raised does involve a point of some importance.

Mr. Sharp: I find it difficult to discover how a conflict of interest could arise. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would indicate the kind of circumstances in which there might be a conflict of interest, and on that basis I would be glad to comment.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): A case in which a conflict obviously arises is where the Superintendent of Insurance inspects and reports on a certain company. Then the private institution upon which he has reported, perhaps unfavourably, takes its case before the board of directors. The institution now finds it is dealing with the very person who made the unfavourable report, a person who is both the inquisitor and the judge. As I say, I have the highest of confidence in the integrity of the superintendent of insurance and of the inspector general of banks but a situation might easily occur in which great difficulty would ensue and I do not think such an invidious position should be allowed to arise.

Mr. Sharp: May I point out to the hon. member that insurance cannot be withdrawn from a federal institution? Insurance can only be withdrawn from a provincial institution. It is compulsory for a federal institution.

Mr. Lambert: The hon. member for Carleton has raised a point which escaped me entirely. I believe a difficulty arose in the United States during the last two years where the comptroller of the treasury has power to authorize the incorporation of banks. He gives them a certificate allowing them to commence business. There were two or three banks in the Pacific area which went bankrupt or got into difficulties to the extent that they closed their doors. They are, I believe subject to deposit insurance.

But let us look at the situation in Canada. A bank is authorized to commence business on the issuance of a certificate by the Treasury Board on the recommendation of the inspector general of banks. It is the inspector general of banks who gives the O.K. Cases might arise where an inspector general was over generous in his estimation of the ability of the incorporators of a bank to carry on the business of banking. Then the same inspector general sits in judgment as a member of the board of directors acting as a lender of last resort. One can see—and this is no reflection on the present incumbents of the two offices concerned—that the inspector general might be tempted to grant rather too generous terms in order to save his neck after he had authorized the issuance of a certificate to a banking institution when someone else might not have done so. He would be in a difficult position. It might be said that is only a theoretical possibility but unfortunately it is these theoretical possibilities which so often come to pass.

It seems to me on reflection that while the superintendent of insurance could carry out the duties of inspecting and reporting to the board the board must sit alone while assessing the reports made to it. The same applies to the inspector general of banks. I am persuaded that the view put forward by my hon. friend from Carleton is well founded and that notwithstanding the dignity of their offices and the probity of their reputations it is conceivable that the two officials who have been mentioned might be placed in a situation in which a conflict of interest could arise.

Mr. Sharp: I find it difficult to agree with these arguments. I certainly think it would be a waste of public money if we had to duplicate the work which is being done by the inspector general of banks and the superintendent of insurance by having one federal official sitting in judgment on the other, which is in effect what is being suggested here. We created this corporation and provided that its directors should include the inspector general of banks and the superintendent of insurance because they were in the best position to know about the functioning of federal institutions; they have to inspect them in any event.

It seemed to us that the standards which they apply would be of the same kind in connection with insurance as were applied by them in connection with their responsibilities under other statutes. I find this is a highly theoretical and hypothetical argument and I suggest to the committee that if we were to start again to create a corporation we would appoint to its board of directors precisely those officers who are in the best position to judge the financial stability and the management standards of the corporations which they are supervising and which make applications for advances under the rediscount facilities. I can see little which would be gained by naming the deputy minister of trade and commerce or some other official rather than those officials who are most expert and who must report to the minister in any event about the operations of those institutions.

Mr. Lambert: I admit that the minister has an argument. It is an arguable case. But surely the superintendent of insurance and the inspector general of banks have to submit to the judgment of the deputy minister of finance, the Governor of the Bank of Canada and an outsider who is to be the chairman. So why would it be more invidious if they were to submit to the judgment of two others in a situation where there would be no conflict of interest?

Mr. Sharp: At least they could bring to the deliberations of this corporation more expertise than any other two officers I can think of.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Undoubtedly that is true but it is not an answer to the question. Expertise on a board of directors can sometimes be very dangerous. I want to ask the minister about an answer he made. In purporting to reply to my initial question he said there was no possibility of cancellation of the insurance of a federal institution. Was he by that answer implying that someone other than the superintendent of insurance would be the person designated under proposed section 22 to examine the affairs of a provincial institution? I confess that I have been proceeding on the assumption that it would be the Superintendent of Insurance who would be designated under this provision.

Mr. Sharp: It would not necessarily be always those officers. In fact it is envisaged that sometimes provincial officials would be employed.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Of course it would not necessarily be, but is it not the intention in fact to have the superintendent of insurance do this work?

Mr. Sharp: Some of the staff of the superintendent of insurance may be engaged in these inspections. They will be reporting to the corporation as well as, of course, to the chief of their section. It is a very interesting point that has been raised by the hon. member for Carleton but I think it is more interesting than substantial.

On clause 6—Chairman.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Is the minister confident he will be able to secure a chairman of the standing he wants for a term as short as five years?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I have received one or two suggestions concerning very competent and highly experienced men. What we will be looking for, if there are any other applicants around, will be people such as retired bankers.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 7 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 10—Provincial institutions.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 10 carry?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): On division.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 11—Powers of corporation.

Mr. Ballard: I am wondering whether there is not a conflict of interest in connection with clause 11, which I do not believe should occur. I am referring to subclauses (d) and (e). We have a peculiar situation here whereby a corporation that is a creditor of another corporation that is winding up becomes the liquidator and also the creditor corporation is capable of receiving, under subclause (e), the assets of the member institution from a liquidator or receiver thereof. I am just wondering whether this provision is not directly opposed to the Bankruptcy Act in that you have a creditor also acting as the liquidator. There may be a logical explanation for this but it seems to me incredible that the corporation should act in a dual capacity such as this.

Mr. Sharp: This clause was designed to enable the corporation to wind up the affairs of a deposit-taking institution in the most orderly way possible and with the least loss to the corporation that is being wound up as well as the least loss to its depositors. The provision was designed deliberately for that reason. It may be unusual, but the circumstances under which one of these institutions would be wound up would be most unusual because the depositors would be insured.

It is certainly in the interests of the public at large that the assets of the insured institution should be disposed of in as orderly a fashion as possible. The corporation, we believe, would be in a better position sometimes to engage in the business of liquidating or receiving than anyone else of whom we can think. This does not mean that in every case the corporation would act as liquidator or receiver, but we believe it should be empowered to do so.

Mr. Ballard: Would the minister not agree that there are people in the business of winding up companies of various types who are more experienced in this process than the board of directors of this corporation? I suggest to the minister that he give consideration to appointing an independent liquidator in order to avoid the possibility of being accused of being partial in the sale and distribution of the assets of the liquidated corporation.

Mr. Sharp: Of course, the corporation as such will not have the staff or the employees to engage in liquidation or receivership. It would employ professionals for that purpose. The purpose here is to give the corporation complete control when circumstances arise where this seems suitable.

Mr. Lewis: As I read the clause the corporation would not be appointed to this function except by a court. Is not that what subclause (c) means? Presumably the various reasons for having this corporation as liquidator or receiver would be before the court as against the interests of the other creditors. It seems to me that there may easily be a situation in which the corporation would be the best person to act in that capacity.

Mr. Sharp: I thank the hon. member for York South who is very experienced, I am sure, in such matters.

Mr. Lewis: No, I am not; I have no knowledge at all.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 12—Powers of directors and bylaws.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I should like to direct the attention of the committee to subclause 2, line 21, page 6. Under subclause 2 the directors of the corporation have all the powers conferred upon commissioners appointed under part II of the Inquiries Act. Then lines 21 and 22 of that clause read in part as follows:

> —the directors may delegate such powers as occasion requires.

Here is a blanket delegation of authority under part II of the Inquiries Act. Part I of the Inquiries Act is of course the one that is more familiar because it gives power to royal commissions and the like. Part II deals with departmental investigations and is confined to a commissioner or commissioners appointed by a minister with authority of the governor in council. You know precisely who the commissioners are. The governor in council has to take responsibility for the person appointed as commissioner. These commissioners have substantial powers. They can compel the attendance of any person. They can compel such persons to produce documents and books. Where a person refuses to answer a question or produce any documents he is liable, on summary conviction, to a penalty of as much as $400. It seems to me that there is no real objection to this when the exercise is made by someone who is identifiable. But here we have a blanket delegation. We know not who may have the power under the Inquiries Act. Does the minister really believe that such a blanket delegation is necessary to carry out the purposes of this legislation? I think a considerable danger may creep in in this way.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, quite frankly I don't know. I should like to have the opportunity of consulting with the draftsmen of the bill to find out why they included those words. There may have been a very good purpose with which I am not acquainted; nor is the official who is advising me. Therefore I should like a little time to consult with the draftsmen of the bill.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I would be very glad if the minister were prepared to let this clause stand. I personally think that all the words after "oath" in line 21 should be struck out. If there is any power of delegation that power of delegation should be subject to some supervision, such as the supervision of the governor in council.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I should like to add another reason for holding this clause for further consideration. We are holding clause 2 to consider the amendment I put forward. Under subclause (1) (g) power is granted to the board of directors to define the expression "deposit". If the expression "deposit" is defined in the definitions clause, then this power need not exist. Therefore, both for the reasons advanced by my colleague for Carleton and for this other reason perhaps this clause could stand.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that clause 12 stands?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

On clause 13—Duty to insure.

Mr. Ballard: Mr. Chairman, clause 13 of the bill seems to exempt certain depositors from insurance coverage. I believe one type of depositor has been omitted from this exemption. I have before me a financial statement of a Canadian bank which has just come to hand and I notice in this financial statement that there are several types of deposits listed. The liability for deposit is listed under five different nomenclatures, namely, government deposits, Canadian provincial government deposits, personal savings deposits, other deposits, and deposits by other banks.

I believe that in the categories "personal savings deposits" and "other deposits" there must be a number of deposits which are placed in a bank by trust companies and loan companies which are incorporated under the federal Trust Companies Act or Loan Companies Act. There are also a number of deposits in this institution which are received from other banks. Initially those deposits from other banks and from trust and loan companies were insured under these acts. I submit that on that ground those deposits will in part, if clause 13 is left as it is, be covered a second time by deposit insurance, and I do not think that is the intention.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I propose to move an amendment to clause 13 which would exempt from insurance coverage deposits from any other federal institution as described in clause 9 of this bill, which clause defines federal institutions as banks and companies incorporated under the Trust Companies Act or the Loan Companies Act.

Specifically, the amendment I propose to suggest to clause 13 is as follows:

Delete "and" at the conclusion of subsection (b) and add a new subsection (c) as follows:

"a deposit of

(i) a bank;

(ii) a company incorporated by or pursuant to an act of the parliament of Canada that accepts deposits from the public and to which the Trust Companies Act or the Loan Companies Act applies; and

(iii) a company the incorporation of which is continued by or pursuant to an act of the parliament of Canada that accepts deposits from the public and to which the Trust Companies Act or the Loan Companies Act applies.

Renumber the present subsection (c) as subsection (d).

Mr. Lambert: What about provincial institutions?

Mr. Ballard: I am making reference here only to what are already defined in the act as federal institutions.

Mr. Gray: May I ask a question for clarification purposes? If under this bill it would be possible for provincial institutions to be members of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, if I were to follow the hon. member's line of reasoning, which of course I do not accept, why should they not be included in the amendment as well as long as they belong to this scheme?

Mr. Ballard: My answer to that is quite a simple one. When I drew up the amendment I hoped that the minister would be more definitive in his presentation of the bill and make it apply to all companies in Canada whether provincial or federal incorporations. I would not want on my own to go so far as to cover provincial institutions that may come under this bill. However, I believe that the amendment I have proposed will alleviate this problem almost entirely. Therefore I would not be averse to some amendment being made which would include provincial institutions. However, I would not want to propose it myself.

Mr. Lewis: Has the minister any comment to make on the likelihood of double insurance?

Mr. Sharp: In the first place I would point out that we are only insuring deposits up to $20,000. There are a great many people whose deposits will be insured but who will get very little insurance on the amount of their deposits. People with millions of dollars on deposit can get insurance only up to $20,000 of those millions. So even though we do in fact cover these deposits the amount of the coverage is quite infinitesimal.

Moreover, I think the question of double coverage can be answered in this way. Some institutions place deposits with other institutions. Indeed, one can imagine a situation where there is a complete circle. One institution deposits in another, the second in a third, the third in a fourth, the fourth in a fifth, and the fifth in the first. Only one of those institutions is likely to fall at one time. So the question of doubling up insurance is not a substantial point.

I would suggest to the committee that this introduces a quite unnecessary and unimportant amendment to the bill. It does nothing to make it more acceptable to the people and it certainly does not add anything to defray any cost to the institutions that might have to pay the small amount of insurance involved. But it would add enormously to the complications if it were to be accepted.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Chairman, I should like to know the reason for providing insurance on deposits only up to the amount of $20,000. There must be many people who, between the sale of one asset and the purchase of another, have hard earned money they would like to have insured and perhaps put on deposit for a certain length of time. Why would these people not be entitled to insurance to any amount?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is quite clear. It is to insure the deposits of people with modest means. Those who have large amounts on deposit are presumably able to make their investments or deposits with full knowledge of all the risks involved. The purpose of this bill is to provide insurance for those small depositors who cannot make the inquiries that are necessary to establish the relative risk of putting their deposits in one institution rather than another. I do not think this parliament needs to be concerned about larger depositors at the present moment.

• (5:50 p.m.)

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps I should read the amendment for the information of the committee.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, in the light of the explanation I have made I wonder whether the hon. member really wishes to proceed with his amendment?

Mr. Lambert: Something may be said for part of what the hon. member for Calgary South was saying. There are deposits that may be held, for instance, by credit unions as clearing accounts with the chartered banks. They would be insured up to the amount of $20,000. There are the accounts of all near banks with the chartered banks, used also for clearing purposes. They would be insured up to the amount of $20,000. Another area is the accounts of the treasury branches of the province of Alberta with the chartered banks, to participate in the clearing system. After all, the province of Alberta may insist that its treasury branches are not to be member institutions and that therefore they will not come under the aegis of this legislation. Notwithstanding that, the province may ask all trust companies and other institutions operating within the province to become member institutions.

I wonder whether one could say that the province would be a preferred claimant and should not be covered by deposit insurance. I think the provinces will assume part of the cost or responsibility for some time until this scheme gets going. I do not know why the government of Canada should be the sole government to put this matter beyond the pale. I would have thought that the provincial governments would also take the same position. If they are asserting and are being granted a right to intervene in the question of deposit insurance, I think they are having it both ways.

As to the point made by my colleague from Huron, I think the minister will agree that the deposit is limited and not the depositor. I take it that a person who comes in with $100,000 and wishes to deposit it for six weeks, say, to bridge a transaction, has to split his money into separate accounts. I should like the minister to comment on this interpretation. Could one split up that sum of money into five trust accounts each of $20,000 but together adding up to $100,000, with all accounts being insured?

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Chairman, can the minister say whether that could happen? Is the minister aware that banks pay the maximum interest on amounts of over $25,000? Should there not be some togetherness between himself and the banks with respect to this legislation?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I think it is wise to restrict the coverage in this legislation to the smaller depositors. With regard to the definition of "deposit" it is the intention that the definition shall not be evaded by establishing a whole series of deposits in the name of a single individual. In other words, we shall establish the meaning of "deposit" in such a way that it will not be possible for a person to get coverage on $100,000 by making five deposits. The intention of the bill is to cover only $20,000 in a particular institution. Of course, anybody can make deposits in various institutions and cover the risk that way. All institutions are not likely to fail at once. I doubt whether that would be a profitable endeavour.

I am given to understand that the reason for clause 13(1)(b), which excepts from coverage a deposit in respect of which Her Majesty in right of Canada would be a preferred claimant, arises out of a provision of the Bank Act. I inquired from the inspector general of banks exactly what the position of a deposit by Her Majesty in right of Canada is. Because there are particular rights attaching to deposits by Her Majesty in banks, the clause is included.

Mr. Lambert: The minister speaks of deposits in the right of Canada. What about deposits by Her Majesty in the right of any province participating in this scheme? The minister should look at that.

Mr. Sharp: The provinces do not have specific rights under the Bank Act.

Mr. Ballard: My purpose in moving the amendment to clause 13 was to remove what I considered a minor annoyance to the banks and other like institutions which feel they are being covered twice by the insurance offered by this bill. After the lucid explanation and assurances of the minister that the banks will not mind to a certain extent paying double insurance, I am prepared to withdraw my amendment.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 14 and 15 agreed to.

On clause 16—Insurance of provincial institutions.

• (6:00 p.m.)

Mr. Lambert: This is the clause which authorizes a province either to direct or to agree that an institution carrying on business in that province and incorporated within that province shall have the right to participate in this deposit insurance scheme. I have made many comments, both at the resolution stage and on second reading, about what I consider to be the unwarranted intrusion of the provincial authorities into the business of banking. They have no business whatsoever being there. At the moment they are being let in by default, and if this provision were challenged there would be justifiable argument that the provinces have no authority to engage in the business of banking or authorize the business of banking and near banking. I contend that they do not have the authority to direct near banks to participate in a federal system of deposit insurance.

I raised this point earlier with the minister, who did not answer it. Have the provincial governments the legislative authority either to direct or authorize provincially incorporated institutions, carrying on the business of near banking, to participate in a federal deposit insurance scheme? This point was discussed in the standing committee by Mr. Ryan, the department's legislation counsel, and my colleague, the hon. member for Kamloops, as recorded at page 24 of the unrevised transcript of the committee proceedings. Mr. Ryan was replying to a question and he said:

> On which point, Mr. Chairman? On the authorization of the province? With respect to the authorization of the province of incorporation, I would like to point out a gray area that does exist ... These provincial institutions would be incorporated under the heading of a company with provincial objects. They would be authorized to carry out certain activities including the ones we are concerned about there, by their incorporating charter or their act, and they would also acquire in some cases all of their powers from that act, charter or statute, depending on the jurisdiction therein. In some of these cases it may be beyond the powers of the company to take out insurance or to come into this scheme.

I do not know how it could be suggested by Mr. Ryan that this federal bill would cure a deficiency in the charter of a provincially incorporated company by providing that the provincial institution should be authorized by the province of its incorporation to apply for federal deposit insurance. I do not think any federal statute could do that.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the hon. member a question? I happen to agree with him in opposing this particular subclause. I am not a member of the standing committee but I have read what Mr. Ryan said. Am I wrong in my understanding that what Mr. Ryan said was that the provision for provincial authority would mean that a provincial statute could give companies, incorporated under provincial statute or charter, the authority to enter into this deposit insurance, which authority they otherwise might not have? In other words, I understand Mr. Ryan to have said not that the federal statute would cure the deficiency in the charter of a provincial company but that provincial authorization, presumably by provincial statute, would cure it. Am I wrong in that?

Mr. Lambert: This may be what Mr. Ryan meant, that there would have to be a provincial statute curing any deficiencies in the charters of any companies lacking this power.

Mr. Lewis: That is what I thought he said.

Mr. Lambert: That may be one interpretation, but on the other hand on examining the unrevised edition of the transcript of last week's committee hearing I feel it was also suggested that clause 16 (a) would be deemed to cure such a defect by saying that if a province authorized a provincial company to apply it would qualify. This may be a less valid interpretation of what Mr. Ryan said than that suggested by the hon. member for York South.

If the argument put forward by the hon. member for York South is correct, then it will take some time for the various provinces to act and pass the necessary statutes. In addition, I believe some trust companies are incorporated by private bills and a lot of cleaning up will be required in the provincial legislatures. Further, I question whether without legislative provision, without a special act authorizing a provincial cabinet or cabinet minister to direct provincially incorporated companies to participate in the federal scheme, provincial cabinets or ministers can so direct because the executive of a provincial government, like the executive council of the federal government, cannot act beyond the powers granted to it by some specific statute.

I doubt that there is any general provision whereby an order in council may be passed to do this. Some of the provincial authorities may say that simply because the premier of a province delivers a ukase that is sufficient, but I would like to know first whether the Minister of Finance is satisfied that provincial governments have the authority to direct provincially incorporated companies to participate in this scheme or to consent to their participation.

Second, since provincially incorporated companies are authorized to operate within the confines of a province, participation in the federal scheme would be an extraterritorial operation, and it may be that the charters of such companies are not wide enough to permit them to participate in any activity outside the province. In that case a provincial statute might be passed to cure defects in companies' charters. Personally I do not like to see this provincial authority included in the subclause and I am going to move an appropriate amendment in that regard.

Mr. Sharp: When the bill was originally drafted clause 16(a) was not put in the terms that "the provincial institution is authorized" by its legislature "to apply for deposit insurance." It was put in much more general terms, saying "as authorized by the province of its incorporation."

The intention, and this certainly would be the practice, is that the deposit insurance corporation would accept from any institution a letter from the responsible minister giving permission for the institution to apply for insurance. That is the intent of the legislation and I am advised that that is why the bill is drafted in this form. It was deliberately drafted in this form to avoid requiring legislative action to permit a provincial institution to apply. Of course it may be that some provincial institutions may not possess the corporate powers to enter into a policy of insurance, but I am advised that this is very unlikely.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the minister whether this advice comes from Mr. Ryan, because it was Mr. Ryan suggested it?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, it is possible that Mr. Ryan, being a lawyer like my hon. friend, is always concerned about the exceptions and not the general rules.

Mr. Lewis: Speak for Mr. Ryan and not for this lawyer.

• (6:10 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: It is quite possible that some corporations might not possess the powers. If I were in the position of a law officer of the Crown, I would be very careful in my answers to see that I should not get tripped up by some exceptional case. If a province requires its companies to take out deposit insurance, as some of them may, then of course legislative action is required. It may also require legislative action for a province to assume the responsibility for losses if it should want to bring its institutions under deposit insurance before we as a federal corporation have had an opportunity to inspect them. All these things might require legislative action. This is another reason that it is desirable to get this bill through all stages while the provincial legislatures are still in session throughout the country. In connection with the particular point raised about the kind of authority that is required, it is our intention that the corporation would accept a simple authorization by a responsible minister.

Mr. Lambert: Again, Mr. Chairman, I am wondering what is the authority of the responsible minister to give that consent. The minister is much too experienced both as a senior public servant prior to his entry into politics and in his present position as Minister of Finance not to know that some powers are seriously circumscribed by statute. I might mention the Financial Administration Act, for instance. How can he be satisfied that a letter from a minister of the Crown of any province has been written based upon the appropriate power? This is what I want to be satisfied about. I wish to be satisfied that there shall be sufficient authority.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, we do not anticipate any practical difficulty in this regard. After all, if the provincial institution itself has the power to enter into a policy of insurance with the corporation, it will go to the provincial government and say in effect that it would like authority to take out the policy. Either the provincial government gives it that authority or it does not. The evidence the corporation will accept is the written permission of the responsible minister.

[Mr. Lewis.]

Mr. Lambert: What is it worth?

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, we also are opposed to clause 16(a) of the bill which gives the provinces the power to consent to an application in respect of deposit insurance. We feel that the federal government is tacitly approving of the provinces participating in the monetary and financial affairs of the country. We also feel that it takes away from the voluntary aspect of a corporation participating in deposit insurance if the consent of the province is required. We believe the onus should be on the province—

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, may I call your attention to the fact that we do not have a quorum at this time? There are not 20 members in the house.

The Deputy Chairman: I very much appreciate the hon. member's co-operation, but I am advised that there are a few members behind the curtains, and accordingly—

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I apologize; at least my remark will have had the effect of bringing in those who stand behind the curtains.

[English]

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, I was stating that we feel the onus should be on the particular province and that it should pass legislation if it does not wish its provincial institutions to participate in deposit insurance. This really is a tacit abrogation by the federal government. For these reasons I should like to move the following amendment:

That clause 16 be amended as follows:

1. By deleting subclause (a).

2. By renumbering subclauses (b) and (c) as subclauses (a) and (b) respectively.

The Deputy Chairman: May I have the indulgence of members of the committee to read the adjournment proceedings which will take place tonight at ten o'clock. It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be considered are the following: The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), Canadian Centennial—request for repeat tour of confederation train; the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe (Mr. Asselin), Historic Sites and Monuments—restoration of home of Sir Alexander Galt; the hon. member for Mégantic (Mr. Langlois), Education—request for increased assistance to Canadian students.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, an amendment similar to that now moved by the hon. member for Broadview was moved in the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs and after some discussion it was defeated. I suggest it should be defeated again. The purpose of including clause 16(a), as I said in the committee, is to improve the climate of co-operation between the provinces and the federal government in the operation of deposit insurance. I believe it is very important for the success of this operation that the provinces should co-operate with the federal government in making this plan a success in so far as it applies to provincially incorporated institutions. If that clause were not included in the legislation a situation could arise in which, if an institution wanted to apply for federal insurance contrary to the wishes of the provincial government, it could be very difficult, it would seem to us, to provide the kind of inspection that is desirable.

Wherever possible we would like to use provincial officials. We believe, since these are provincial institutions, that we should have not antagonism from the provincial governments but active co-operation. We put that clause in the bill after mature consideration of the various points raised both in the committee and in the house. It would have been possible for us to have left it out. I gather that that is the view of the members of the Progressive Conservative party and the New Democratic Party who have spoken.

I agree that if we had been able in advance to have discussions with the provinces about the operations of deposit insurance it might have been possible to avoid having a clause like this. On the other hand, it might not have been possible because we might well have come to the conclusion even after discussions with the provinces that this clause should be kept in if only to show our good will and desire to avoid unnecessary conflicts with provincial authorities.

The Prime Minister tabled in the house an exchange of correspondence between the premier of Quebec and himself regarding a conference on financial institutions that Mr. Johnson had asked the Prime Minister to convene a conference of all provinces with the federal government. This is another reason I believe it would be desirable to retain this clause. During the discussions the Prime Minister had with Mr. Johnson following receipt of the letter the premier of Quebec specifically asked that this clause be retained. He said he thought it would help greatly in discussing the problem as a whole.

If we in this house were to remove this clause I believe we would create a bad impression and would not help improve the chances of active co-operation between the province of Quebec and the federal government, or with other provinces, in the promotion of a desire shared by all of us, namely, the improvement of the safety of investors and the improvement of the standards of financial management in this country. Let me say to members of the committee that I have not changed my view after the discussions which took place in the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs. Indeed, developments since those discussions have only reinforced my view that we should ask the provinces for permission before we insure deposits in institutions that up until now, under the laws of this land, have been supervised by the provinces.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, my only comment is that I think that supervision in respect of certain of the operations of these institutions fell to the provinces by default. This does not involve a question whether the federal government has or has not jurisdiction. In view of the absence of my colleague, the hon. member for Kamloops, who carried on the main discussion with the minister during the committee meeting the other day, I think it would be of value to place his views on the record. I was not able to attend that meeting but I should like to quote from the unrevised transcript beginning at page 27. The hon. member, who had been carrying on the discussion with Mr. Ryan and the Minister of Finance, said:

> To make a contract for insurances with this deposit insurance corporation. That is your point.
> Mr. Ryan: Yes.
> Mr. Fulton: My answer to that is that if the company is in the business of taking deposits and the federal parliament legislates as to Canada wide requirements that must be met by all companies taking deposits, in my view that legislation is within the federal jurisdiction; the province could not stop its company from entering into that contract.
> Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, that is not what this bill is about. This bill is about the insurance of depositors, not about the taking of deposits.
> Mr. Fulton: My point is that if you say that all companies who take deposits are required to insure with the federal deposit corporation, in my submission no provincial or power exists to prevent a deposit-taking corporation entering into a contract of insurance. It is made a requirement of the taking of deposits in Canada.
> Mr. Sharp: That may be, Mr. Chairman, but that is not what this legislation says. We are not trying to go as far as that. That may be eventually an act of this parliament, but that is not one that is before us for consideration today.

Mr. Fulton: I realize that. I tried to stay off the ground, there are other grounds of difference between us. I think you should have made it mandatory, and it is not, and we have not time to change the legislation in that respect. I am speaking now in the narrow sense, but very fundamental objection by this subsection (a) of giving the provinces the jurisdiction which I do not believe they have and doing something which I do not think is necessary to the efficacy of your scheme because I said if you leave it purely voluntary—that is the present situation—and a provincial incorporated company takes advantage of that voluntary opportunity, then if it enters into a contract of insurance, in my view the contract would be valid unless legislation were to be successfully attacked and even while the court case might be proceeding the contract still exists and the depositors are protected unless the court should ultimately declare our legislation (ultra vires) which I think, neither you nor I feel there is the slightest possibility of happening.

That is the end of that exchange. I fully agree with my colleague. The hon. member for Broadview must have been reading my mind because I had an amendment drafted in precisely the same terms as the one he has presented. The remarks of the minister have reinforced my view that this provision represents the purchase of political peace. The price is being paid today for something that will come back to roost in the future.

I respect provincial autonomy in certain fields and I believe the federal government should stay out of those fields. I also believe that provincial governments should reciprocate, and in the particular field of banking and banking practices there is no provincial jurisdiction. One cannot assume provincial jurisdiction merely because these institutions have been provincially incorporated and supervised. I agree that the provinces can supervise these institutions in respect of annual reports and changes of directors and shareholders just as they do in respect of broadcasting companies and aircraft operating companies, but that is where their authority ends.

Provincial governments have no authority to say anything about the actual operation of broadcasting companies or aircraft operating companies. Because those companies are incorporated under provincial charter, that does not give the provinces the right to supervise their actual operation. They have no right to supervise or control the operations of banking institutions in spite of the fact that near banks are incorporated by provincial charter. The practice of banking followed by near banks comes under the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal authorities. Anyone who wants to move into the field of broadcasting can apply for a provincial charter or letters patent or may apply for incorporation by memorandum. This is all the province can grant. It is merely the registration of a document. The provincial government breathes life into an inanimate corporate body. The same thing applies in respect of any trust company or other company operating in the field of banking and banking practice, but this does not give the provinces the right to enter the field of banking practice. They have full rights in other fields but none in this specific one.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I shall not be very many minutes. One statement the minister made is of great importance. I think it is his fault and the government's fault that we are in this position. Nonetheless I think it would be irresponsible not to consider that statement. I am sure the hon. member for Edmonton West shares with me the concern about the statement to which I shall refer, and will want to consider it very carefully.

I understood the minister to say that the premier of one of the provinces has specifically requested that paragraph (a) of clause 16 be not removed. I believe I understood the minister aright. Obviously you would really get into a battle which may be unhelpful to the total question of federal-provincial relations, not only in this field but in many other fields, if this committee and this House of Commons deliberately slapped the face of one of the premiers who asked that something that had already been proposed be not removed.

I say to the minister that in view of that statement we would like to give the amendment moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Broadview, a little more thought before eight o'clock. I repeat that I, as one Canadian, cannot feel that it would be to the benefit of Canada's future to slap the face of one of the premiers who made a specific request that a certain matter be retained in a bill. What I object to, and personally would like to make clear, having said what I have said, is that I think the government was weak-kneed and timorous when it included this paragraph in the clause.

I understand the policies of this government with regard to our constitution to be as enunciated particularly in the last year or so, namely that the federal government was taking the position that the powers given to the respective jurisdictions by the British North America Act were going to be honoured, and the federal government therefore said it was withdrawing from certain activities in which it had formerly participated, to give the provinces added opportunities to obtain revenues so that the provinces could carry out those activities within their jurisdictions.

The same thing is true on the other side of the question. Canada will be a much happier place, in terms of the constitutional differences between the federal and provincial authorities, differences that I suspect can never be wiped out in any federal state—they will always be there, whatever the circumstances; there will always be differences—if the federal parliament asserts its authority within the jurisdiction that it clearly has. I believe if this were done it would be much better for those differences and the future of Canada.

I am not any more of a constitutional authority than the Minister of Finance, even though I have had some legal training and he has gained his knowledge by osmosis. I do not know whether legal training by osmosis is not really better than legal training in a lecture room. But I know of nothing in the law of Canada's constitution, or in any legal principle, that makes mandatory a provision in a federal statute offering deposit insurance to companies in Canada, whether federally or provincially incorporated, when they have the choice of accepting or not accepting it as they voluntarily decide. This is particularly the case when you are dealing with deposit taking institutions, particularly when there is so much legal opinion that a deposit taking institution is probably—in my humble opinion I would say "certainly", but the least one can say is that it "probably" is—carrying out banking functions and operations. It may have other operations and functions, but in so far as it is a deposit taking institution it is carrying out, some people will say "probably" but I would say "certainly", banking operations. In that situation paragraph (a) of clause 16 was not needed.

You do not, I suggest, improve the climate of co-operation by constantly giving way and compromising, and doing these things to a point where the ordinary depositor might suffer through some particularly angry exchange between the federal and provincial governments, that may have nothing at all to do with deposits.

If the federal government and a provincial government, whatever the provincial government may be, has an altercation of some sort and the provincial government says, "We are not going to let our provincially incorporated institutions come under this deposit insurance plan", the depositors of those particular institutions may be made to suffer for reasons that have nothing to do with deposits. I regret very much that the minister and the government felt it necessary to make this kind of concession in a field where it was not necessary and where I am personally confident —perhaps I have not sufficient evidence and the minister has better evidence than I, and I should be surprised if he has not—on the evidence I have that the provinces would not have objected, and the minister would have been able to sit down with the provincial authorities while the bill was before committee and the house, before it became an act of parliament, and work out some of the details that concern him with regard to inspection and the like.

I regret that paragraph (a) is in clause 16. I repeat what I said at the outset, that as a practical matter, the fact—and I have heard it for the first time, as I am sure other hon. members have—that the premier of Quebec specifically asked the Prime Minister, I understood the Minister of Finance to say, to make sure that this paragraph is not removed from the bill is a matter that deserves careful consideration, and my colleague and I intend to consult some of our other colleagues with regard to the amendment which we have moved.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, may I add just a word to what I said previously, to emphasize one point. Clause 16(a) is not in the bill because we believe there is any constitutional limitation upon our right to enact this legislation, nor that it would be inappropriate that it should be offered to all provincial institutions that accept deposits. The clause is there simply because, as I said previously, we had reason to believe, on the basis of our earlier discussions with the provinces, that by seeking the permission of the provincial authorities we would better the chances of active co-operation in the inspection of these institutions. I say that because I would not want it thought that by including this clause we are in any way prejudicing the authority of this parliament.

Mr. Lewis: You may not be prejudicing it, but you are certainly questioning it.

Mr. Sharp: I question that statement, Mr. Chairman. I am not questioning our authority. That is the reason I made this intervention. This clause is there purely for diplomatic reasons; it is not there because we have any doubt about our authority.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the minister should have learned from his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and undertaken a little quiet diplomacy instead of putting it in the bill.

Mr. Sharp: I think this is a very good instance of quiet diplomacy.

• (6:40 p.m.)

Finally, one other point. If we were asserting the jurisdiction of parliament over banking, then of course it would be most inappropriate for us to say that the ambit of our legislation could be effectively stopped by any province. But that is not the purpose of this particular clause. It is simply for the purpose of inviting greater co-operation from the provinces by giving them an opportunity of saying that they wish their institutions to come under deposit insurance.

Mr. Thompson: It almost seems that my remarks may sound redundant at this point I must, however, express my disagreement with the arguments which have been presented by the hon. member for Edmonton West, by the hon. member for York South and by the mover of the amendment; the hon. member for Broadview. I cannot agree with the arguments which have been put forward by the minister, either. To say, as he did, that the clause is here only for the sake of diplomacy is to make a very weak statement. I believe there is a principle involved which is far more important and basic.

If the clause were in the bill simply for the sake of quiet diplomacy, I would say the mover of the amendment was right. But I say that something far deeper is involved. We agree with the principle that monetary policy and banking legislation are within the province of the federal parliament. What the government has done is to exclude the near banks from the banking legislation we are considering at the present time. The committee records will show that both the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance stated in reply to questions that they did not think it necessary at this time to include near banks under the umbrella of the banking legislation, chiefly because their operations accounted for only 1 per cent of the total banking done in Canada in any year. Nevertheless the function which the near banks perform includes the expansion of credit, so we find ourselves in a difficult position with regard to this legislation.

I do not agree with the hon. member for York South that this is a case of being weak-kneed in our dealings with the provinces. But I do not think it is correct to try to assume, in this act, an act having to do with deposit insurance, a responsibility which really relates to the Bank Act itself.

Neither do I think the argument advanced by the hon. member for Edmonton West applies. He drew a parallel with a situation involving an aircraft company or a broadcasting company. This legislation basically provides deposit insurance protection for those institutions which are incorporated under the federal jurisdiction, and it leaves the door open to those institutions which are incorporated under provincial legislation as long as the provincial government which authorized the formation of those companies gives permission. If in this legislation we were dealing with something which was to happen in the future—the future incorporation of finance companies, trust companies or other forms of deposit accepting institutions—there would perhaps be reason for asserting that the legislation now before us could assume responsibility for such companies. But the fact remains that many of these trust companies have been operating under provincial legislation for many years, simply because the federal government had not assumed the responsibility which was theirs over this whole area of financial operations. I do not think parliament has any right to assume that in this present legislation it can impose upon provincially incorporated companies conditions which were not part of the original undertakings given by them, at least not without consultation with the provincial governments concerned.

It is my belief that every provincially chartered institution will want to be covered, and that it will make application accordingly. It will be much more simple and certainly much less expensive if all the deposit banking institutions in the country do come under this scheme. Nevertheless, to make membership a requirement for all deposit receiving institutions would be a direct infringement of the responsibility which the provinces have assumed, because the federal government has not occupied this field in the past. Since the provinces have assumed this responsibility I do not think we have any right to say that all companies must be included under this legislation.

I agree that the door is left open. If there should be some financial institutions which cannot obtain provincial permission to join, I believe they should take the logical step of applying for a federal charter. That is a course which is open to them. In the committee, the minister said he would welcome such applications if it proved impossible for institutions of this type to join under the conditions set out in this bill in clause 16(a) where we find the proviso that the provincial institution must have authorization from the province of incorporation.

If this provision is included for diplomatic reasons only, then let us take it out. I believe it is here because it respects the jurisdiction which by practice and default has come into the hands of the provincial authorities. Its presence will lead to much greater co-operation from the provinces. Therefore, for the reasons I have advanced, we cannot support this amendment, though we are not giving our support to the legislation for the reason put forward by the minister, that of quiet diplomacy. That is not a basic reason.

Let us not try to cover one mistake by making another. I believe the provinces will realize the worth of this legislation. They will see that it is good and necessary, and they will co-operate of their own volition. If it takes a special act of the provincial legislature to permit the necessary coverage, it does not really matter—the door is open. And if some provinces do not agree, then the companies concerned can become federally incorporated companies.

• (6:50 p.m.)

Mr. Lambert: A few minutes ago the minister indicated there was one premier who made a request with regard to this particular clause. I was wondering whether the minister was referring to the correspondence which was tabled on February 13, an exchange of correspondence between the Premier of the Province of Quebec and the Prime Minister. Is this the request to which the minister had reference?

Mr. Sharp: The request is not contained in the correspondence. This was a request made of the Prime Minister by Mr. Johnson when the two of them met in Quebec city.

Mr. Lambert: This past week end, at the winter games?

Mr. Sharp: Right.

Mr. Lambert: I think the request must be looked at in the context of Mr. Johnson's letter to the Prime Minister dated February 10. I believe I should put the pertinent portions of that letter on the record.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, at the beginning of his letter, the Quebec premier indicated that several intergovernmental conferences had been held to study this or that aspect of how to protect the public and the small depositors, especially what steps to take to that end, and also how financial institutions operate. And he added this:

> In the course of their work, our officials have been called upon to meet yours as well as those from Ontario and the other provinces. Out of those meetings came the idea of a federal-provincial conference to study the whole field of financial institutions and securities. Such a conference would review all government legislation now in force in that field in order to recommend, in the light of our constitution and the amendments which could eventually be made thereto, the steps to be taken by each level of government to solve that problem once and for all.

In short, Mr. Johnson is suggesting that a conference could start with a meeting of officials to whom outside experts could be added to pinpoint the aim of the conference and orient their work.

A preliminary conference of the ministers concerned could also be held within a few weeks and we would suggest to the Prime Minister of Canada to submit to the premiers of the other provinces Mr. Johnson's views on the advisability of calling such a conference to study the control of financial institutions and the steps to take to protect the small depositors; the securities business could also be studied.

Mr. Chairman, I am quite willing to share Mr. Johnson's views in that respect. But, first of all, there must be a common legislation, with a common base, for the whole country. It is all right as far as business and securities are concerned, but there must be security for the public, not only in western Canada but also in the province of Quebec. There is no contention in that regard. But I do not think there is any reference to Bill No. C-261 or to section 16a not only in Mr. Johnson's letter but also in the Prime Minister's answer. I know that the minister told us that it was after a personal meeting, during the last weekend, that we learned about that request, but I would like to have more details.

It is not in the official release which we saw here in the house.

[English]

Mr. Sharp: I did not rise to interrupt the hon. member on that point. However, the letter the Prime Minister wrote to Mr. Johnson does contain, in its final paragraph, a reference to the bill that is now before us. The Prime Minister told Mr. Johnson that parliament was proceeding with this bill and he hoped it would be through in a few days.

Mr. Lambert: I think we can all share those sentiments. I am sure my colleagues do, too. We have no objection to the principle of deposit insurance but we feel that the government is going at it, to use a term, in a backhanded way. Certainly the provisions of the bill will be of considerable benefit but we are disagreeing with some of its details.

One of the essential features of the bill, of course, is this matter of provincial consent which, it seems to me, is introducing the question of a provincial veto in banking matters. I might comment upon the argument put forward by the hon. member for Red Deer, that notwithstanding the fact there may have been some vacuum into which provincial authorities have moved, this does not cure a situation in which they have no constitutional authority.

The fact that some provinces have assumed a jurisdiction which has not been challenged, in some instances an almost negligible jurisdiction, is no argument that we should not now assert the jurisdiction of the federal government.

May I call it seven o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Pursuant to an order of the house passed on Friday, February 3, I do now leave the chair and the committee will resume at eight o'clock.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, at the time of the adjournment I had been reading extracts from the letter written by Premier Johnson to the Prime Minister, and an exchange between the Minister of Finance and myself had followed. One argument I find rather strange in light of this letter is that of the Minister of Finance, who says that as a result of the request of a provincial premier the government felt impelled to include this particular clause in the bill in its present form.

We now know, Mr. Chairman, that this request was made at the week end. This bill has been considered on second reading and has been to the committee in its present form, so how the request of Premier Johnson, which was a verbal request made at the week end, could affect the nature of the clause I fail to see. The form of the clause was determined upon weeks ago and was not conditioned by any intimation, either verbal or written, given by Premier Johnson. So I just cannot follow that argument.

I would agree that perhaps the government's decision to include the clause in the bill in its present form, in view of the events of the week end, has as far as the government is concerned served to bolster an extremely weak case. On the basis of the speeches made by the minister on second reading and prior thereto, there is no doubting the fact that we were left with the impression then and this afternoon—the term "diplomacy" has been used but I would put it on the basis merely of political peace—that that was the reason this particular provision was put in the bill.

Regardless of whether this is the result of diplomacy or political peace, or what you will, it is still my view that it is wrong in principle to allow provincial governments to enter into this field, when according to my interpretation of the constitution, and I think according to the interpretation of many other people, they have no business to do so. On the other hand, the provinces do not hesitate to tell us, please, to remain on our side of the fence in other matters, and for that we respect them. I think that to have a frank exchange of opinions in this regard is fine, as long as they know they are going to be heard.

I notice that the government is anticipating a vote of some sort, Mr. Chairman, because even the members of the defence committee are now coming into the chamber, so just for their benefit I think I should cover one other aspect of this question.

I should be much more interested in knowing from the minister what official intimation has been received from the government of the province of Alberta in connection with this legislation. All we have seen in print is some very briefly reported comment from the provincial treasurer. I am sure that the minister has received an official communication from the government of the province as to its attitude toward the bill, and the applicability or otherwise of the bill to what are the principal non-bank operations in that province. I am referring to the treasury branches of the province of Alberta, which have very extensive operations, some of which are of a banking nature and some not. If the minister could tell the committee just what is the impact of this legislation on the treasury branches, then I think we could get a certain facet of this operation cleared up.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, may I comment on the remarks which have just been made by the hon. member for Edmonton West. During the preparation of this legislation some discussions were had between the officials of the federal government and the officials of the provincial governments. During those discussions the officials came to the conclusion, and so recommended to me, that in order to promote co-operation between the provinces and the federal government it would be desirable to include in the bill a clause like clause 16(a).

Mr. Lambert: This is the camel in your tent.

Mr. Sharp: The hon. member then asked: What connection is there with the discussions which took place over the week end? During the discussions which took place between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premier of Quebec, the Prime Minister reported to Mr. Johnson the nature of the debate that had taken place in the committee and the motion that had been made to strike out this clause. He said to Mr. Johnson: "We had believed that it was desirable, in order to promote the purposes of this legislation, that we should have such a clause, and I should like to know whether you consider that this is important, as we had concluded from discussions at the official level".

Mr. Johnson then told the Prime Minister that he believed it was important to retain clause 16(a), which requires a provincial government to give its permission before any of these institutions came under deposit insurance. That is why I said, when speaking earlier, that recent events had reinforced the views we had formed when preparing this legislation for presentation to the house.

The province of Ontario has made its views known in connection with this matter, in legislation. We have not yet had formal representations from Alberta, nor any indication yet of their intentions. As I said earlier, I sent to all the provincial ministers a copy of the bill and my remarks on second reading, so that they would be acquainted with our policy and intentions. I have had a reply from only one province, British Columbia, in which Mr. Bonner notified me that he would let us know the attitude of his government as quickly as possible.

I am not as yet in a position to say what the official views of the provincial governments are nor what their intentions are. I do not know, from discussions my officials had with the provinces after the introduction of the bill, that all provinces are interested in the legislation and urge us to proceed as quickly as possible.

Mr. Lambert: This reinforces me. I quite understand the attitude of the premier of Quebec. He is the only one who has really shown the views of his government. Obviously if he has obtained the right of intervening, consent or veto, he will not give that up. I look upon this much as I look on an old saying: Once the camel puts his head in the tent you are stuck with him. That is what I am afraid of; the provincial camels have their heads in the tent of banking. But there we are.

I cannot agree with the provision. The hon. member for Broadview has an amendment, and I do not know what his revised attitude may be, with regard to it. His party indicated it might take another look at it. I hope its members have been able to look at the contents of the letter from the premier of Quebec that I read into the record, which has no reference to this matter. There was a passing reference to the last paragraph of the Prime Minister's letter, but there was no question about a reference with respect to the consent of the provinces, or otherwise.

I will be interested in knowing from the hon. member for Broadview what are the intentions with regard to the amendment.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I very seldom agree with the Minister of Finance and Receiver General (Mr. Sharp) but for once and with regard to clause 16, I must admit—and I am pleased to say so—that I agree with the minister's idea to retain section 16(a).

It refers to institutions operating under a provincial charter and if we refer to Quebec financial institutions, they operate under a charter granted by the Quebec government. Besides, if those companies are provincially incorporated, it is quite appropriate for their operations to be subject to provincial control. And that is why it will rest upon the authority, in this case the provincial authority, to decide whether or not those institutions must contribute to the deposit insurance fund.

Then, Mr. Chairman, I want to tell the Minister of Finance and Receiver General that I, myself, support his decision to retain clause 16(a) in this legislation.

[English]

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to cover again the ground, I have argued earlier at length. I only want to say to the minister that I consider this subclause to be a real evil.

One of these days, and it may be fairly soon, there will be a reference, or a case before the Supreme Court of Canada in which the direct issue will be the interpretation of the word "banking". When that comes about I have no doubt counsel will take this particular clause and say, "Why, the Parliament of Canada itself admitted that it has no jurisdiction over deposit taking institutions incorporated by the provinces. Those deposit taking institutions are not within the field of banking."

Sir, that abdication, if permitted today, will become firmly and improperly imbedded in our constitution. It is because of that that I point out the evil, and I protest against it as vigorously as I can.

Finally I want to urge the minister again to have this parliament occupy the full field of its jurisdiction over banking. If the minister does occupy that field he will not have any difficulty.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Gilbert) negatived: Yeas, 27; nays, 46.

• (8:20 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, in connection with clause 16—the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger) can go out, it does not matter a bit to me, for I would rather speak in front of an empty seat than an empty head.

Clause 16, Mr. Chairman, reads as follows:

On the application of a provincial institution therefor, the Corporation may insure the deposits with the provincial institution in the manner and to the extent provided in this Act and the by-laws, if

Subclause (b) reads as follows:

the provincial institution agrees, in carrying on its business, not to exercise powers substantially different from the powers exercisable by a trust company under the Trust Companies Act and a loan company under the Loan Companies Act; and

This means that we would ask a provincial institution to abandon the privileges it may exercise under its provincial charter, whereas it would have no other privileges, if it were given a federal charter. To me, it is irregular to ask a trust company or a loan company for instance, that is carrying on business under a Quebec charter or a charter from any other province, to abandon certain privileges in order to become subject to the terms of a federal charter only, whereas this provincial institution could benefit from some other advantages, if it had a federal charter.

Now, I would like to move an amendment to subclause (b) of clause 16. I shall read the amendment, Mr. Chairman. I do not know if I am going to have someone to support it, a seconder, but I am appealing to my friends opposite. Unfortunately, I could not explain the amendment to them, for lack of time, but I am going to read it and they are quite free to second it, should they wish to do so.

So, I move: That subclause (b) of clause 16 be amended to read:

"if the provincial institution agrees, in carrying on its business, to exercise the powers defined following an agreement between the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation and the provincial authorities concerned."

The Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation and the provincial authorities could in this way open discussions in order to allow the provincial institutions to continue to take advantage of the privileges they may have. Therefore, I believe this motion is acceptable, and I see that my friend, the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier), is willing to second it.

Some hon. Members: There is no need for another seconder.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, that is why I move this amendment, and I hope the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) will not object, since after all the only change being made is that instead of compelling the provincial institutions to obey a fixed and definite rule, as can be found in subclause (b), they are allowed to use their powers which will be determined after discussion and agreement between the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation and the provincial authorities concerned.

I feel, therefore, that the suggestion is wholly acceptable. The Minister of Finance will probably not object, since those powers will only be accepted after discussion and agreement between the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation and the provincial authorities involved.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Do you have a copy of your amendment for the minister?

Mr. Lachance: Do you have an English copy?

The Deputy Chairman: By leave, I shall read over again the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire):

That subclause (b) of clause 16 be amended to read:

"if the provincial institution agrees, in carrying on its business, to exercise the powers defined following an agreement between the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation and the provincial authorities concerned."

[English]

Is the committee ready for the question?

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, might the Minister of Finance and Receiver General (Mr. Sharp) not give us his opinion on this matter?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I cannot accept this amendment. I do not think it carries out the intent of the bill. The intent here is to see that institutions that apply for insurance are not carrying on businesses of quite extraneous character that might affect the security of the deposits that are made with them. The whole purpose here is to see that, if a provincial institution comes forward and wants to be insured, it is carrying on a business under the same lines as provided by the Trust Companies Act and the Loan Companies Act. A provincial institution does not have to be insured. There is nothing compulsory in this bill. This is a way of bringing about some homogeneity and uniformity in the kind of institutions that are being insured.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, we share the views of the minister on that point as it ties in with the amendment we moved a few moments ago. We want uniformity, across the nation, in this regard. This matter lies within federal jurisdiction. We can avoid, then, seeing Alberta stepping on the left foot, and the British Columbia on the right, and Quebec, who knows, on either the right or the left foot.

Therefore, I feel that we should share the views of the member for Lapointe on that point.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, if you will allow me, it is obvious that this is federal legislation since it was introduced by the Minister of Finance and Receiver general.

None the less, it might happen that the legislation applies to provincial institutions. In any province, it will have to apply to institutions having a provincial charter.

Then, the fear inspired by the Minister of Finance and Receiver general clearly softens since the powers of such provincial institutions are defined not only by the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation or the federal government, but jointly, after discussion between the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, which remains free to accept the terms, and the provincial authorities concerned, and these, also, will be free, according to circumstances. Consequently, this amendment would insure much more flexibility in the enforcement of the law in connection with provincial institutions and might allow a much greater number of these provincial institutions to become members of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation established under the act. This amendment would allow some provinces which, otherwise, would not give up the jurisdiction they have on provincial institutions, to agree to these provincial institutions joining the Canada Deposit Insurance program, for, then, the provincial authorities concerned will have had an opportunity to discuss with the authorities of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation and to enter into adequate agreements according to the circumstances in each province.

Then, I believe that if the minister will consider the amendment in that context, he will realize that it will introduce much more flexibility in the administration of the act, might allow a much greater number of provincial institutions to benefit from the legislation, in short, that it will make the act better and more profitable.

Amendment (Mr. Grégoire) negatived: Yeas, 3; nays, 78.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Clause 16 agreed to.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Clauses 17 to 21 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 22—Provincial institutions.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 22 carry?

Mr. Lambert: There is an amendment to clause 22, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: I thank the hon. member for Edmonton West for reminding the Chair that this clause has been amended by the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs.

Mr. Lambert: With the greatest respect. I think it is incumbent upon the Chair to draw to the attention of the house as a whole that there is an amendment because the house now is much more heavily populated than earlier today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lambert: Some hon. members may moan, but I believe we would proceed a little better in this way.

The Deputy Chairman: I should like to apologize to the committee for the oversight.

Shall clause 22 as amended by the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs carry?

Clause 22 agreed to.

Clause 23 agreed to.

On clause 24—Reporting defects or breaches.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, on clause 24, could the minister indicate what real sanction or penalty there is here. Assuming there is a finding by the corporation that the member institution is following unsound business or financial practices, or is breaching the bylaws and a report is made and incorporated in the minutes of the member institution. If nothing happens, then what transpires at that stage? Where is there any sanction if the member institution simply ignores the report of the corporation?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, the disciplinary action comes through the superintendent of insurance or the inspector general of banks reporting to the minister in the course of their regular duties.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): What disciplinary action could be exercised in that event?

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. Sharp: The powers of the inspector general of banks and the superintendent of insurance are very extensive; they would extend to such things as publicity if necessary.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Is there any power in the superintendent of insurance to suspend the operation of the member institution; is there any power in the inspector general of banks to suspend the operation of the bank charter?

Mr. Sharp: I am assured that while neither the superintendent of insurance nor the inspector general of banks could suspend such an institution, I could, as Minister of Finance.

Mr. Lambert: But, Mr. Chairman, there is nothing in the act which says that the minister shall suspend the operations of an institution if it has not carried out its undertakings with regard to deposit insurance. This applies to a federally incorporated institution so far as clause 24 is concerned. But in clause 25 there is the limitation which I think my colleague from Carleton is looking for under this clause; that is, the termination of the deposit insurance.

In this particular instance I am just wondering whether there would be a case for suggesting that, in the event there is a default we would proceed on a basis parallel to the procedure in respect of provincial institutions, and rather than suspend the whole operations of the federally incorporated firm or trust company that it be given notice of cancellation of its deposit insurance—which I am sure, provided the system is working right, will be a very great sanction and would not be quite the blunderbuss of putting it out of business, to which I believe the minister referred.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, the dilemma, if it is a dilemma, is that all federal institutions, whether banks, trust or loan companies, which accept deposits must insure those deposits. We cannot at one and the same time declare they are not insured and insist that they must be. It would be incongruous for the corporation to make a report—this is what is envisaged in clause 24—and for me as Minister of Finance to permit those institutions to carry on business without restriction.

Mr. Lambert: This means that there is a mandatory death sentence on any federal institution for infringement of the deposit insurance regulations. On the other hand, a provincially chartered institution which might lose its right to deposit insurance can just retire within its shell within the province and carry on business. I am afraid that the minister will be resorting to the guillotine in the case of any infractions. There is no lesser penalty with regard to a federal institution. There is under the operations of the Trust Companies Act and under the Loan Companies Act, but there is not under deposit insurance. I doubt that the minister has given the flexibility which he would like to have in practice.

Mr. Sharp: Licences under the Trust Companies Act and the Loan Companies Act, for example, are issued annually, and if I had received a report from the corporation to the effect that one of these institutions was following unsound business or financial practices I would issue the licence for the following year subject to certain conditions which would require them to change those practices. If they did not do that, of course they could not go on doing business. So, I have both the flexibility and the necessary authority. I do believe it is quite impossible to have both compulsory insurance and to have as sanction the withdrawal of the insurance.

Mr. Lambert: It is the same thing with the provinces.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, allow me first to rise on a question of privilege.

Earlier, I made some unkind remarks about the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger). I would now like to withdraw them without any mental reservation. And I say that, at the present time, neither his seat nor his head are empty. I take everything back, Mr. Chairman, fully, without any restriction, and furthermore without being asked to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 24 carry?

Clauses 25 to 44 inclusive agreed to.

• (8:40 p.m.)

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Lambert: Did the Chair call clause 1?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Perhaps we should deal with clause 12(2).

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the wish of the house that we now consider clause 12 in respect of which there is a pending amendment for consideration?

Mr. Lambert: Clause 2 should be considered first.

The Deputy Chairman: We shall proceed by considering clause 12, to be followed by clause 2 and clause 1.

Mr. Lambert: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but clause 12 is consequential in respect of whether or not the amendment to clause 2 is accepted. Therefore I believe we should proceed with the consideration of clause 2.

The Deputy Chairman: Following the suggestion of the hon. member for Edmonton West we will now consider clause 2.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, an amendment proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West to clause 2 is now before the committee for consideration. It is:

> That clause 2 subclause (e) be deleted and that the following be substituted therefor:
> "(e) deposit means any obligation of a member institution payable in Canada in Canadian funds to the holder thereof on demand or on notice within a maturity date of five years from the making thereof."

During the dinner interval my officials have looked at this proposed definition and I should now like to give the committee some of their considerations, which I think will persuade them that this amendment is not suitable, and why it might throw doubt upon the ability of the committee at this stage to incorporate a definition which might be sufficiently comprehensive or exact—

Mr. Lambert: How do the officials acquire all the science?

Mr. Sharp: Let me comment on the deficiencies of this definition. It says that "deposit" means any obligation of a member institution payable to the holder thereof. That suggests it covers bearer instruments such as trading securities, bearer bonds or something of that character. It is not our intention to cover that kind of instrument. Our intention is to cover what might be termed "deposits", although it is very difficult to define them.

In addition to what is mentioned in this amendment we want to cover instruments payable at a fixed date rather than on demand or on notice. I referred to that in the course of my remarks on the definition of "deposit". We intend to cover not only deposits payable on notice or demand, such as would be found in trust companies and, in some cases, in banks, but also instruments payable at a fixed date. They would not be covered by this definition.

Mr. Lambert: Oh, no.

Mr. Sharp: They would not be covered because this amendment states, "payable to the holder thereof on demand or on notice within a maturity date of five years". That would not cover the deposit that is payable at a fixed date. We may want flexibility in order to cover the type of instruments to be insured, although there is no desire to go beyond five years. It would be unfortunate if during discussions with the provinces we found that we wanted to go beyond five years. This is not a substantial point and I do not urge it strongly. There are some substantial difficulties involved in this definition which are more important.

We want to lump together all deposits by a particular person in a given institution, and this definition would not enable us to do that. This would treat each separate obligation as a deposit to be insured, and that is not our intention. We do not want anyone to circumvent the intention by getting insurance of more than $20,000 in any particular institution. This proposed definition would upset that intention.

We also need special provisions to deal with obligations on the books of institutions at the outset of the plan. For example, what would be the situation under this definition in respect of a ten year investment security that has only two years to run, when this act comes into force? Such an investment would also fall outside this definition. We want to deal with certified cheques, drafts and money orders on the books of member institutions in order that they may be insured.

The phrase "any obligation" as it appears in this proposed definition is so broad it would include trading debts and go far beyond receipts for money deposited. Those are some of the difficulties which have occurred to my officials on a cursory examination of this definition. With a little more time I am sure they could find ten more. These also illustrate the difficulties involved in trying to find a definition of "deposit" which will not unnecessarily limit the effect of the legislation.

It will be necessary for the bylaws of corporations to have quite extensive definitions to cover a multitude of deposits. I am very reluctant to suggest any definition at this time because I believe it might be unnecessarily limiting or, on the contrary, might require us to insure obligations beyond the intent of the legislation.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I put forward the amendment in an attempt to find a basis for a definition of "deposits". I certainly agree that when putting forward a manuscript amendment during the course of a debate in committee one cannot necessarily cover all the points involved. The fact that the minister's officials have been able to suggest that this amendment could not cover all the requirements is a clear indication that they did not do their homework and come up with a definition, so this committee would know precisely what this bill covers.

While I recognize and object strenuously to the philosophy behind this measure, let me make it clear that we should not give a blank cheque to officials without providing some kind of review. We should know specifically what obligations are to be covered by this bill, and a definition of the term "deposit" should be clearly spelled out. Under the terms of this measure the officials could determine that the pay-off could be made in green cheese from the moon and we would have no review. Of course I use an extreme example.

Mr. Knowles: In this day and age that may not be too far beyond the realm of possibility.

Mr. Lambert: As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggests, green cheese from the moon may not be beyond the realm of possibility.

Mr. Knowles: That may happen before very long.

Mr. Lambert: I am confused and amazed by the attitude of the minister in this regard. He has said the department is experiencing difficulty and requires more time to consider this definition. I am sure the minister will agree that he has been considering deposit insurance since July or August of last year.

What on earth has been done in the past six or seven months to determine or define what is a "deposit"? We are now told that we must wait while another conference is held to determine what is meant by "deposit", yet we are not to be given the right to review that determination. I do not care what they say about the definition, but if hon. members want to study the mechanics of house rules in respect of the regulations to be made under this act they will realize, if they allow it to go through as it now stands, that they may as well kiss goodbye to any possibility of review.

There is no provision at all that the regulations shall be brought before, say, the standing committee on finance. I am sure the hon. member for Charlotte would be most interested, as a member of the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs, in seeing what will happen in this regard. There is nothing that requests the government or makes it obligatory upon them to have this matter examined by the committee, to see whether it is worth while.

The minister says, "I will draw a great big sheet over this question now, and it is forever hidden from the House of Commons. My boys will look after it. You can trust us". Mr. Chairman, I do not trust them. As a member of parliament, I am concerned about this question, as I think every hon. member should be. We are being asked to pass legislation to deal with a very pressing problem. What is being done? It is being fobbed off to somebody to determine just how far this measure will go.

I would suggest that the minister has shifted from the position he took before dinner to that which he has taken after dinner with regard to the items that would be covered. We were told categorically that the period would be five years, but now the minister says we might go beyond five years. We want to take another look at this question. We do not know, nor does the minister, what this bill will cover. For this reason I confess that I am very disappointed in the bill.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, in so far as the amendment in concerned, I want to see it and I will call for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member of course has that privilege, but I suggest to the committee that this would be a very unsuitable amendment to accomplish the purposes that all of us have in mind. I understand the wish of the hon. member to have this question of deposits defined somewhat more carefully. But may I point out that the government does not have very much leeway to add to the burdens upon the treasury nor to reduce them very much, because the main limitation on the insurance is that of $20,000.

I suggest to the committee that in view of the wishes of all the provinces that they should have an opportunity of discussing the kind of instruments that are issued by their institutions, we should approve this bill giving the governor in council the authority subsequently to approve the bylaws. It would not be disagreeable to me at any time if the bylaws and the approval of the governor in council were discussed in any committee. I have no doubt whatever that we shall be back to parliament within a year or so to ask for amendments to this bill on the basis of experience, at which time we will have plenty of opportunity to take positive action in this house to determine more precisely than we are in a position to do now the definition of "deposit".

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I will make a reasonable offer to the minister. If he would undertake that the regulations will be tabled in the house within 15 days of the promulgation of this bill, or within 10 days of their proclamation, and that they shall be referred to the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs for consideration, I am quite prepared to withdraw my motion. But imperfect as my amendment may be, I want to register the intentions of this house with regard to the definition of "deposit", to make the bill meaningful.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I will certainly do everything I can to co-operate with the hon. gentleman and the house. The government has no objection to having a discussion in the committee on the terms of the bylaws of the corporation. I should point out, however, that I have no doubt, also, that before many months pass we shall be amending the definition of "deposit" on the basis of later experience. The great advantage of having a little flexibility is that we shall be able to do this and will not require to come back to the house within a short period of time and ask that some of the mistakes we have made in the definition of "deposit" be corrected in the house.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I want this matter referred to the committee on finance within 10 days of the promulgation of the bill, if parliament is sitting, or 15 days if parliament is not sitting. Then we can consider this matter.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I am personally willing to give an undertaking that we will do this as quickly as possible. I see no reason why it should not be within 10 or 15 days, as the hon. member says. The regulations will be published, and I have no objection to their being discussed in the committee.

Mr. Lambert: I am satisfied with that, Mr. Chairman. Then, with the consent of the committee I will withdraw my amendment to paragraph (e) of clause 2.

The Chairman: Order. Does the committee give unanimous consent for the hon. member for Edmonton West to withdraw his amendment to clause 2?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Lambert) withdrawn.

Clause 2 agreed to.

The Chairman: The committee will now consider clause 12.

On clause 12—Powers of directors and bylaws.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, the minister was going to consider over the dinner hour the last part of this clause, namely lines 21 and 22.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I am advised that the wording of clause 12, subclause 2 is copied from the Bank Act, in which the right to delegate powers conferred upon the directors as commissioners under the Inquiries Act is similar to the powers which can be delegated by the inspector general of banks. This wording was carried forward from the Bank Act and involves the same sort of powers. I do not know whether the hon. member has a substantial objection to this wording. I think it is desirable that the corporation should have powers similar to those of the inspector general of banks in relation to the Bank Act. They may be useful, and I do not think they extend the powers under the Inquiries Act to an undesirable extent.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, the objection is that we have no means of knowing to whom these very great powers under the Inquiries Act may be delegated. I have no objection if this house knows who may be exercising these powers, but here it may be any person. The clerk in the office, for example, would have the power to compel an examination and take evidence on oath, to seize books and command the production of books. There are very substantial penalties for refusing to do this. I believe there should be supervision in this respect. Under part II of the Inquiries Act the commissioner is a person who has been designated as such by the minister with the authority of the governor in council. Here we know not to whom these powers may be granted. I object to this situation.

The Chairman: Shall clause 12 carry?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): On division.

Clause 12 agreed to.

The Chairman: Perhaps this would be a proper place for me to point out to the committee that in the original bill clause 45 was deleted by the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs and was not called during the discussion of the other clauses. Shall clause 1 carry?

Clause 1 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill as amended?

Bill reported.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Mr. Lambert: Since amendments have been brought in the house would normally expect the bill to be printed with the amendments and the measure would be given third reading tomorrow. However, in the spirit of cooperation, we are quite agreeable to letting the bill go through with the amendments, and for it to be read the third time tonight.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall the bill be read the third time, now?

Some hon. Members: By leave.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): You will put the motion, will you not, Mr. Chairman? I wish to speak on third reading.

Mr. Sharp moved the third reading of the bill.

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): Let me say that I am enthusiastically in favour of a system of deposit insurance, and this bill makes some progress toward that end; but I want to express certain reservations which I have felt from the outset. There are grave dangers attached to this bill by reason of the fact that it amounts to an abdication by this parliament of the authority of the federal parliament over the field of banking.

I believe the minister has approached this question in the wrong way. He ought to have brought into the field of banking all the functions of the so-called near banks. Then this legislation would have been universal and it would not have depended upon the consent or the authority of any of the provinces. If he had done that we would not find ourselves in the situation in which we find ourselves tonight, a situation in which this parliament is admitting that there is a field of banking over which it has no jurisdiction. I, for one, dispute that attitude completely, and when the subject of banking is before the Supreme Court of Canada I hope the admission made in this bill will not be used against the authority of the parliament of Canada in this field.

I trust that in the near future the minister will decide that he will occupy the whole field of banking, as was intended in the British North America Act.

Mr. Donald S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): I intend to make only a few remarks in response to what the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) has said, and also in reply to remarks made by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) earlier in the proceedings on this bill.

As a good lawyer, the hon. member for Carleton knows that this parliament can neither appropriate nor abdicate a power conferred under the British North America Act. His suggestion that by this bill the federal government is in any way abdicating its power in the field of banking is therefore, as he knows, entirely false and misleading. If it should happen that this bill or any question with repect to jurisdiction over banking goes to the Supreme Court of Canada, the court will decide the issue in accordance with the law as it stands, and not in accordance with any statutory assertion made by this house or by any provincial assembly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

An hon. Member: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Batten in the chair.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

Resolved that it is expedient to amend the Old Age Security Act to provide that for the 1967 and subsequent taxation years the maximum old age security tax payable on the taxable income of an individual be increased from one hundred and twenty dollars to two hundred and forty dollars.

Mr. Knowles: It is not my wish to carry on ad infinitum or ad nauseam or in any other way the discussion which the Minister of Finance and I were having last night. But I should like to say another word or two with respect to the point I was trying to make.

It is my contention that the Minister of Finance is trying to have it both ways with respect to the raising of taxes for old age pensions. On some occasions he tells us that the old age security fund must be kept in balance. He goes on to say that we must look ahead and consider the charges to be made on that fund in the years immediately in front of us, and that our whole plan of old age security pensions must be related to the concept of a fund which is kept in some kind of balance. But when I pointed out last night that less than half of the new taxes now being raised will go into the old age security fund he replied that what had to be taken into account was cash inflow and cash outflow, and not the fund. His exact words as recorded on page 12998 of Hansard for yesterday were:

> The question of what goes into the fund and into general revenues is not relevant to the question of how much cash is needed.

In other words, the minister argued last night that although he is collecting $135 million in additional old age security taxes and putting that money into the old age security fund, what has to be considered is that the $155 million he is collecting from an increase in the sales tax, and which does not go into the fund, must be looked on as part of the inflow required to meet the outflow. In other words—and I see that I am stating the minister's position to his satisfaction, at any rate—the hon. gentleman is arguing that pensions are on a pay-as-you-go basis. This is what I have in mind when I say the Minister of Finance is trying to have it both ways. He throws the old age security fund at us when it suits his purpose. He would not agree to our contention that there was a balance in the fund at the present time and that no immediate increase is needed, asserting that one must look ahead and consider the needs of the future, when more money will have to be put into the fund. But when the minister is asked to explain the fact that he is not putting all the money into the fund, he says: "That is irrelevant; what matters is cash inflow and cash outflow." This is looking at the old age pension question strictly on a pay-as-you-go basis. Frankly, I favour that basis. Frankly, I think that was the essence of the old age security concept. I thought that the fund was irrelevant, but the government keeps using the fund when it suits its purpose.

It was for this reason I contended last night that the government was misleading the country in this particular instance because it had talked about two quantities as seeming to be related to each other. The government has talked about the fact the extra money for pensions will amount to $280 million a year. On the other hand, it has talked about taxes of $290 million a year. The impression has been created therefore that these taxes have been made necessary by the increase in the old age pension. When we get down to the actual bookkeeping the minister is doing, he admits that he is putting into the fund $135 million from raising the ceiling on the old age security tax, but the other $155 million is not going into the fund at all; it is going into general revenues. This is part of the basis of my charge that the minister is misleading the country.

The impression is created that all this money is being raised for old age pension purposes whereas, in point of fact, the 1 per cent increase in the sales tax, which we will be discussing in the next resolution, is not going into the old age security fund at all; it is going into general revenues. People believe they are having to pay this 12 per cent tax because of the increase in the old age pension. However, the money is not going into the pension fund, it is going into general revenues.

If the minister wants to come back and say the fund is irrelevant, as he said last night, then I suggest he should ask for the abolition of the fund and for the acceptance of the fact that old age pensions are, as in my view they ought to be, on a pay-as-you-go basis.

Mr. Sharp: May I comment briefly, Mr. Chairman, on what has been said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. First of all, as he is aware and as I put on Hansard for December 19, page 11033, the fund itself during most of its life has been in substantial deficit. These deficits were to be found in the fund in every year from 1951-52 to 1959-60. There were small surpluses in 1960, 1961 and 1962. Then the fund went into deficit again. Part of these deficits were written off. This fund has never been, in that sense, in balance or anything like it.

[Mr. Knowles.]

In my speech on December 19, I dealt with two separate questions. The first question was the responsibility that parliament had toward the old age security fund, that is that it should be more or less kept in balance. This responsibility has been honoured more in the breach than in the observance. At any rate, that is the responsibility that is laid upon the government, to propose measures to keep the fund broadly in balance. As a means of doing that, I proposed that there should be an increase in the ceiling on the 4 per cent tax. This discharged the responsibility of the government toward the fund. Although as I say, in the past if you take the whole history of the fund there has never been enough in the fund to pay the costs of old age pensions, nevertheless as long as we have the fund we have a responsibility to keep it in balance.

I proposed changes in the old age security tax that will ensure that the fund is kept reasonably in balance for the foreseeable future. I did not feel I should make provision beyond a few years because that would be usurping the authority of later parliaments.

Then, as Minister of Finance, responsible for the finances of the country, I had to provide for the extra outlay over and above the amount that I was putting into the fund. From the point of view of the finances of the country, there was no place I could get the money except either from taxes or borrowing. There are no funds lying around in the old age security fund, for example, of which I am able to get hold. I did what I felt was wise, and what I think has appealed to the country as a whole, and that is that to the extent that government expenditures over all were being raised at that time by some $280 million, it was in the public interest that they should be offset by tax revenues, whether the moneys went into the old age security fund or whether they went into general revenues.

Mr. Knowles: If there is no fund into which the minister can dip to find the money when we want to raise old age pensions, why does he argue that there is a fund that has to be replenished when, according to the books, it is in deficit?

Mr. Sharp: Well, Mr. Chairman, I have felt that I had a responsibility, since the old age security fund was established, of seeing it remains in balance or that it did not run into a big surplus, and I discharged that responsibility. Sometimes in the past it has been neglected. I did not feel, as Minister of Finance, that I should neglect that responsibility or that duty. It was for this reason I made two separate provisions, one of them to keep the fund reasonably in balance in the foreseeable future, and the other to raise the remainder of the money which, one place or the other, I had to find.

Mr. Knowles: I will keep my promise not to carry on this discussion interminably. It seems to me that the conversation we have had back and forth does underline the fact that this fund is just a device to be used in argument as to whether or not the pension should be increased. I hope that the day will come when the bookkeeping and the legislation will reflect the reality of our pension situation, namely that it is and should be on a pay-as-you-go basis.

Mr. Johnston: I listened with interest to the reply of the Minister of Finance concerning the necessity for this extra tax for old age pensions. He may feel that his approach has been well received across the country, but I can assure him he does have critics. Within the last few days, I have received this petition signed by over 90 people. I should like to read a bit of the preamble to the petition as an indication of the thoughts that are in the minds of some people concerning this matter:

> We the undersigned members of the old age pensions group No. 17 Winfield, B.C. and sympathizers of this group do protest the insinuation of Finance Minister Sharp in his speech on television pertaining to the cost of the increase in old age pensions whereby like all skilful politicians who do not make an iron clad statement at any time, but imply that the cost of the increase in old age pensions is the cause for the increase in taxation and increase in taxation means increase in the cost of living.

The community from which this resolution comes is a very pleasant one indeed. It has a goodly proportion of old age security pensioners, so it was not a difficult task, I am sure, for people to obtain over 90 signatures to this petition. I can understand the minister when he says his approach was well received because I know from my own reading that he was given a very good press across this nation for what was regarded as a very hard-headed approach to this particular addition to payments that are generally regarded as being part of the welfare payments. In some ways this hard-headed approach, I suppose, provided a certain balance for the guaranteed annual income scheme of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, which in many quarters was regarded as being something rather radical. At the same time, these old age pensioners had this petition drafted to make a point. They go on to inquire why certain other expenses have not had certain taxes raised as a means of covering these expenditures. They mention the costs of Expo '67 and the cost of aid to foreign countries, for example. I am not using these examples to suggest in any way that these projects, Expo and aid to foreign countries, are not worthy. The point is that the Minister of Finance knows that they are very worthy. Indeed, he would not want to impose any tax on these particular sections of government spending because they would then provide too easy a target for criticism.

• (9:20 p.m.)

With the old age security pension, which everyone in the house agreed well over a year ago had to be increased, there was no alternative but to increase the pension. The minister is perfectly free to point out that a certain tax has been applied to produce the revenue required. Although this may annoy some sections of the populace, there can be absolutely no possible demand that any of the amount paid to the old age pensioners should be reduced to prevent this increase in tax. The minister is perfectly safe in designating a tax as providing for this particular area of government spending. I very much doubt whether within one year's time when the medicare plan comes into operation it will be spelled out very clearly to the people of Canada which particular section of the tax bill is applied toward offsetting the cost of that particular scheme.

The sad thing about the reference to a tax designated for this specific purpose is that it strikes again at the heart of the concept of the guaranteed annual income, a policy that I urged the minister to put into practice some time ago and which he took up.

I realize that the mini-budget is unnecessary. Had the government acted with dispatch the minister's main budget would have included the provision for the old age security pension increase. It was obvious at the time the budget was introduced that something had to be done; that the old age security pension was a national scandal which would have to be rectified some time during the year. There was no way around that. The thing is, I suppose, that there was a hope that the Canada Assistance Plan would prove sufficiently palatable to allow the postponing of any increase in the old age security pension.

When this proved unworkable, then the government was happy enough to bring in the guaranteed annual income scheme, because this was a difficult concept and required several months of working out, thus giving the Minister of Finance time to dream up additional sources of extra revenue. But this hits at the heart of the idea that was in the mind of the minister of health and welfare when he talked of guaranteeing a certain income. It is basic to the idea of the guaranteed income that it is given as a right of the people.

The unfortunate thing about using this tax increase in this way is that the supplement to the old age income takes on the appearance of an extravagance instead of a right. It is as if the minister were saying: "All right, if you want that you will pay for it another way". I am sure that this is causing a great deal of annoyance, even anguish, to our old age security pensioners, many of whom regret that the basic pension was not first raised and the guaranteed income used to supplement that amount. Some of these pensioners will not profit very much from this supplement.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I think these petitioners are on good ground. The last paragraph is as follows:

> Our government talks strongly of the wealth and prosperity of our people. We think finance minister Sharp should apologize to the old age pensioners for such an insinuation. If the government needs a scapegoat why don't they get someone more able to fight back than the old age pensioners?

Certainly this group, Mr. Chairman, is not in a position to fight very effectively against this measure that will, after all, provide them with some assistance. However, I regret that the minister, perhaps through lack of foresight or through failure to realize the determination of the people of Canada to insist that something be done for our old age security recipients, should have chosen this particular area to teach his hard-headed lesson in economics to the people of this country.

Resolution agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee will now proceed to the consideration of a certain proposed resolution to amend the Excise Tax Act.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Resolved that it is expedient to amend the Excise Tax Act to provide that, effective January 1, 1967, the rate of the consumption or sales tax imposed under section 30 of the said act be increased from 8 per cent to 9 per cent with respect to all goods subject to the said tax, except articles enumerated in Schedule V of the said act and building materials that were exempt from the said tax immediately prior to June 14, 1963.

[Mr. Johnston.]

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to hold up the committee but I should like to reiterate my previous comment that this tax is hitting the very people to whom the minister in his budget speech on December 19 intimated he was attempting to present a Christmas present. This increase in the sales tax on all goods other than building materials, and so forth, of 1 per cent is going to hit the very people it presumably is intended to help.

As I have tried to argue before, I am not in a position to say what a difference of 1 per cent actually means to the consumers, but at any rate it does amount to a substantial sum to the pensioners who will have to buy clothes and other essentials out of their $75 plus. I say "plus" because a means test is applied above that amount, and in most cases the old age security recipients will not get the full amount.

This tax will undoubtedly increase the cost of living. We know that the people of Canada as a whole are being taxed to the very limit and beyond. We are now imposing a 1 per cent increase in the sales tax and this will affect everyone. I am not pleading the case of the medium income or high income groups; I am pleading the case of the low income group, people who will definitely be affected by this increase to the same degree as people in the higher income brackets.

I can only repeat that this increase in sales tax is detrimental to the welfare of the country. It will certainly increase the cost of living and will hit those old age security recipients whom the minister has intimated were going to be given a Christmas present.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, while we had some discussion on the other resolution we did not register any objection to it. We are in favour of the idea of raising the ceiling of the other tax; as a matter of fact we think it should be taken off altogether. But this resolution is a different kettle of fish. We are opposed to this increase and we shall make this clear at the appropriate opportunity if we do not manage to make it clear in debate.

We think that a further increase in sales tax at this time is inimical to the functioning of our economy. We think it is unfair to the consumers of this country, and that means all of the people of Canada. We think it is particularly unfair to the old age pensioners, on two counts. In the first place it is unfair to them because it effects an immediate increase in the cost of many items they have to buy, and therefore cuts into the increased pension that some of them will be able to get.

It is also unfair to our old age pensioners, and this is the second point I alluded to a moment ago, because it creates across Canada the notion that this tax is made necessary because of the increase in the pension. No matter how much the minister may want to argue the difference between cash balances and fund balances, this legislation is drafted to make clear that the 1 per cent increase now being asked for in the sales tax is not for old age security purposes.

At present the federal sales tax is 11 per cent, made up of 8 per cent as a general tax and 3 per cent for old age security. If this resolution and the bill to be based on it passes, we shall have a 12 per cent federal sales tax, of which 9 per cent will be general tax and 3 per cent will still be for old age security purposes. In other words, when people have to pay 12 per cent instead of 11 per cent they are contributing the additional 1 per cent in sales tax to the general revenues of this country, despite the impression left across Canada that this additional percentage point is related directly to the old age pension question.

These two quantities, $290 million of taxation against $280 million of increased pension make, I would say, 99 people out of 100 think that what I have alluded to is the purpose for this increase in the sales tax. In this connection there is no more reason why old age pensioners should be labelled as responsible for a particular segment of our taxation than other items on which we spend federal money. If we are to follow this principle, why not have our taxes divided into little compartments, so that we know how much we pay for national defence, airports, to subsidize the railways, customs services and a whole raft of things. The hon. member for Edmonton West says it might have been further divided—by provinces.

We do not do that. We accept the theory of government finance and the theory of civilization as we know it, that taxes levied according to ability to pay are put into a common fund. Out of that fund we meet the costs of the services required for our kind of society. I do not think old age pensioners should be singled out for the complaint that is levelled against them by this kind of taxation method, that they are a particular charge on the funds of the country.

Even calling these things transfer payments is not really in keeping with the kind of society we have today. I want to register most strongly our objection to this tax, to this increase from 11 per cent to 12 per cent, to this increase in general sales tax from 8 per cent to 9 per cent. I want also to register my strong objection to the way this has been done, creating the impression that old age security is this kind of particular charge on the revenues of this country, on our economy. Old age security has as much right as a charge on our total revenues as has national defence, roads, airports and any of the other services we provide. That is the way it should be, instead of this business of pinning it down and somehow attaching a stigma to our old age pensioners.

Let it be clear, if we can possibly make it clear to the country, that the sales tax change being asked for is not for an increase in the old age part of the sales tax. It is for an increase in general sales tax. When the tax becomes 12 per cent, if it goes through, the old age security tax will still be 3 per cent. The general sales tax is being raised to 9 per cent, and when people have to pay this extra money it will go into the general funds of this country.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, many of the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre are applicable to the criticism of the division of tax. The minister tried to justify the imposition of this tax at the time of the budget. He justified it as paying for increases in the old age security. The position of this party was that there was sufficient in the old age security fund to pay for the increases which, after all, will not be disbursed until late next month or possibly in April. There was no great rush to get money into the old age security fund.

But when we look at the tax increase, that is not the way it will be done. None of this money will go into the old age security fund. It will go into the consolidated revenue fund. Next year, if the old age security fund has enough in it to pay the demand upon it, the minister can apparently turn around and use any of this money in the consolidated revenue fund for practically any purpose. One wonders at all this when he looks at the minister's position with regard to the necessity for delivering his budget late in December, after many postponements. As I said in the budget debate, the minister's dilemma was whether to tax or not to tax.

He had to justify giving the budget speech. In August or September he had unfortunately said, apparently to take pressure off the government because of the increase in the cost of living, that he would bring down a budget. That pressure was the primer of the movement. Of course, the budget must be justified by some tax measure.

How convenient it was, Mr. Chairman,—how convenient. There is the promise to provide up to $30 a month for persons under a so-called income test. There was no need for money until March. We must remember that the tax was not to spoil Christmas, because the voters might get excited; so, from January 1 we had a 1 per cent increase in the sales tax.

The government came along and said to the older people of this country: "Look at the good boys we are. We are giving you a fine Christmas present, a fine end-of-the-year present with the increase in old age security payments for those people who need them." I should not say, "need them", I should say, "for those whose incomes are below a certain level."

But they did not turn around and say to them "We will take all of that increase, plus some more, from each and every one of you." There is no doubt that the full sales tax is paid, whether it be by a four-year-old infant who buys a taxable item, or an 85 year old senior citizen. The tax is paid by all concerned, and therefore the older persons are paying their share of the increase through taxation.

It was the same thing two years ago at the time of the introduction of the Canada Pension Plan. There was a gap for persons aged 65 to 70 and the government came along with a great fanfare of trumpets, introducing an amendment, something like a little trailer or rumble seat operation, whereby over a period of five years the government would pay old age security to older people progressively downwards from age 70 to 65. But the government did not tell those people that they were going to lose their $500 exemption under the Income Tax Act, and there was that loss for people between the ages of 65 and 70. There was also to be a diminution in benefits under the War Veterans Allowance Act.

Oh yes, Mr. Chairman, the government was handing it out with one hand, and with a number of hands was withdrawing a good deal of the benefit that elderly persons were deriving from the increase in old age security.

I believe the government should admit what it is doing, should tell old age pensioners just how their pension increase is being financed and how much they themselves will have to pay for it; but I will wager my bottom dollar that there will not be one piece of government propaganda to that effect when they describe social welfare measures. Millions of dollars were spent to publicize the Canada Pension Plan, but the publicity never mentioned the negative aspects of the amendments to the Old Age Security Act, the Income Tax Act, and the War Veterans Allowance Act to indicate what was being withdrawn from the elderly people.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare goes around the country trumpeting about this increase to $105, this so-called guaranteed minimum income for elderly persons, but he does not dare tell them that they are paying for part of it through this increase in tax.

This is the only justification for the mini-budget because in the minister's speech, which no doubt somebody prepared for him, we heard a lot of self-evident observations and platitudes with regard to the state of the economy. It was interesting to note that many of the members on the government side did not even utilize the time available to them during the budget debate to review the economy or to plead with respect to particular problems presented to them by their constituents. A budget debate is much like a Throne Speech debate. Participation by members on the government side is expected to be equal to that on the opposition side, or even greater if the government has a majority. This is as it should be if there is going to be meaningful examination of the state of the economy.

Mr. Sharp: Does the hon. member think we ought to go through a budget debate like this twice a year? Does he not think it would have been a better use of the time of the house if this debate had been foreshortened?

Mr. Lambert: Members of the opposition used the time available to them in a responsible manner to discuss the economy, but the non-participation of government members was the sort of slick operation that the minister likes to see. Mr. Chairman, the minister had no need to bring in a budget at all. He is the man who occasioned the use of six days on a budget debate because it was the government's decision to bring in a mini-budget. It was not done by decision of the opposition, and under those circumstances the opposition accomplished what it had to do. It discharged its responsibilities in examining many aspects of the economy.

Mr. Sharp: So did members of the government.

Mr. Lambert: For the first two days they did not participate at all.

Mr. Sharp: The major speech in this debate was made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Lambert: I suppose the biggest blanket of smoke was spread by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, because from his convoluted phrases one has a great deal of difficulty extracting any iota, any glimmer of government policy. However, Mr. Chairman, we will now get the bills and I think they will be fairly short.

By the time we next discuss the Excise Tax Act I hope we will have seen the Carter commission report. If I remember rightly, its appearance should be just around the corner, although it has been a corner with many curves in it over the years. It has been difficult to reach the corner and see what is ahead, but I hope we shall reach it soon. When we do we will be able to make up our minds whether the excise tax can be changed so that this increase to 12 per cent may not be necessary. Quite frankly, the spread between the prices of commodities which are subject to excise tax, and the prices of commodities which are competitive as to use and not subject to excise tax, is far too wide, now that the tax has reached 12 per cent. That spread was too wide even at 8 per cent or 9 per cent, and it is getting worse as time goes on.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak briefly on the amendments to the Excise Tax Act which raised the sales tax from 8 per cent to 9 per cent on most of the articles sold in Canada. Like other hon. members I deprecate the attitude of the government in blaming old age pensioners for this increase in the sales tax. The government has to get the money somewhere, but it turns around and says, "You dear old people over 70 years of age are the cause of all this." To my mind that is wrong. As other speakers have pointed out, it was wrong in inception, wrong from the start, and wrong at the finish.

Members sitting on the government benches have never changed their minds with regard to old age pensioners. In 1957 those members were only too glad to say, "We are going to give you $6." From that time on they were known as the Six Buck Boys. On that occasion everybody in opposition said, "No, that is not enough." The Liberal party lost the ensuing election.

When the Conservative party took office it said the minimum rise should be $15, and that is what we paid. Later it gave a further increase over and above that $15. The old age pension was $40 under the Liberal régime. It was increased to $55 under the Conservatives and again to $65 under the Conservatives. Then what happened?

Mr. Sharp: It went up to $105.

Mr. Chrétien: Under the Liberals.

Mr. Pugh: The minister says it is up to $105. Never has a more stupid statement been made in this house. If you will bear with me for a minute, Mr. Minister, I will tell you exactly why I say that. You were one of the people who sat in this house after the 1963 election, during which you promised the old age pensioners $75, and said, "No, no, no; we never said $75. That was only an election promise and we really did not mean it."

• (9:50 p.m.)

Many said that they did not even promise it. I listened to this on many, many platforms. I heard Liberal candidates stand up and say "$75—the heck with that; $100 it should be". In any event, what I am trying to tell the minister and all his colleagues is that after coming back here, for years after 1963 they resisted any increase in the pension from $65.

I might point out that the Conservative government, on supply, brought in a motion to the effect that it should be raised immediately to $75. The Liberal government, sitting over there in minority, suddenly realized that everybody on this side on the house, the Conservatives, the New Democratic Party, the Social Credit party and the Creditiste party, were saying that this must be put through. At that stage, mealy mouthed, they finally came through and brought it in. They now say, as the minister said, "We are giving $105". They are not giving that. They are saying that it must be proven by a means test that it is needed. So, do not say that you are giving $105, Mr. Minister, because you are not giving it to all old age pensioners.

In rising tonight I did not intend to prolong this question. It was only the rather silly interjection by the Minister of Finance which prompted me to continue with this. Today Canada is fighting for export markets. The sales tax is one thing which cuts in so deeply into our ability to enter into export trade. It not only affects our ability to produce in our own country for the export market, but also helps those who wish to sell to Canada from other countries. This 11 per cent sales tax on production equipment and building materials is bad enough. It cuts tremendously into Canada's ability to cope with outside manufacturers, those who would export into Canada. There is no question in my mind that the rather stupid raising of the sales tax will produce another inequity; that is, Canada's ability to stop those who would bring into Canada goods, and our ability to export outside. We fought this all through the years. When the former minister of finance brought this in I rather believe it was hoped by many members of the Liberal party that it would be discarded as another example of silliness on the part of the minister. Apparently, however, it is being perpetuated; not only that, it is being increased now from 11 per cent to 12 per cent.

Let me reiterate one more point. To step up and blame our old age pensioners for this, to my mind is completely and utterly wrong. Once again may I close by saying to the Minister of Finance that to say to the old age pensioners they will receive $105 is an utterly ridiculous statement. This is a statement which the minister has interjected from time to time as other hon. members were speaking.

It is great propaganda to say that the old age pensioners will get $105 a month, an extra $30. This just is not so. Many old age pensioners in Canada will not be entitled to qualify for this additional $30. As I have said, this was a stupid statement for the minister to make. There is no argument which he can put forward which will suggest otherwise.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I should not like to gloss over the 1 per cent tax increase. Naturally, the hon. minister can say: We are increasing the sales tax by 1 per cent to help the aged who would have no other source of income. But on closer look, we see that this 1 per cent increase leads to inflation, in fact it leads to an increase of far more than 1 per cent, it increases the cost of living by almost 4 per cent.

And in order to prove my contention, Mr. Chairman, let me illustrate my point by referring to an article or object a manufacturer would sell for $10.

The federal sales tax is said to have been increased from 8 to 9 per cent but, in fact, in view of the other 3 per cent federal sales tax, the hidden federal sales tax will rise from 11 to 12 per cent.

Let us take the case of an article a manufacturer sells for $10. Formerly, with the federal sales tax of 11 per cent, the article was sold by the manufacturer for $10 plus $1.10, that is the 11 per cent tax, which totalled $11.10. Since the sales tax has now reached 12 per cent, the wholesaler will have to pay $11.20 for the same $10 article. If the wholesaler wants to make his usual 10 per cent profit, since the article which used to cost him $11.10 and which he sold for $12.20 will now cost him $11.20, he will have to sell it for $12.32. This shows that the price of an article increases by more than 1 per cent when it passes from the manufacturer to the wholesaler.

If the commercial traveller also wants to make his profit of, say, 10 per cent, he will not make it on the $12.20 he used to pay, but on the price he must pay today, which is $12.32. This means that the retailer will pay not $13.42, but $13.55 because of this 1 per cent increase. And the retailer, who still makes a profit of 10 per cent on that, will sell it for $14.76, or if he sold it before for $14.76, he will sell it today for $14.91. This means that, in the past, the federal government could get 10 cents on $10 and that today the retailer sells it for 15 cents more. And when the retailer charges the 6 per cent provincial tax, he does charge it also on that federal tax. In the past, he charged 6 per cent on the 11 per cent federal tax; today, the federal government will charge the sales tax on 12 per cent, which means that, with the provincial tax, the $10 price will reach $15.81 instead of $15.64, and the price will be 17 cents higher. And the federal government will only get 10 cents out of that. But, through the process, the profit margins remaining the same, the consumer will pay 17 cents more, even if the federal government gets only 10 cents, which means that the cost of living has practically gone up 2 points.

And when the cost of living increases by two points, the worker asks for a salary increase of two points, that is, 2 per cent. This will not increase his purchasing power at all, but will merely counter-balance the higher cost of living. We have now reached a 4 point increase in the cost of living, that is, goods will cost 40 cents more, whereas the federal government will only have obtained 10 cents, the elderly will only have received a 10 cent increase and the purchaser, the payer, the consumer will pay 40 cents more for any $10 item.

Well, Mr. Chairman, the minister wants to collect an additional 1 per cent tax in order to increase the old age pensions of those with an income less than $105 per month, but let us keep in mind, on the other hand, that the consumer will be paying 4 per cent more, rather than 1 per cent, in sales tax, but—

Mr. Chairman, since some are in a hurry to call it ten o'clock, may I point out that it is ten o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether someone acting for the house leader tonight can indicate that the program of business for tomorrow will be the same as announced last night?

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, it is our intention to proceed with the business in the same order announced last night by the house leader.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL—REQUEST FOR REPEAT TOUR OF CONFEDERATION TRAIN

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to the attention of the government and the house certain suggestions of my constituents contained in correspondence and by telephone calls regarding the appreciation of those who have had the opportunity to visit the confederation train. As a result of their comments to individuals who have not had such an opportunity it has been suggested that this train should make a repeat tour next year in order that as many Canadians as possible may have the opportunity of seeing this train before it is dismantled.

I should like to read one letter, Mr. Speaker, to illustrate the type of letter I have received in his connection:

> Dear Mr. Herridge:
> I am writing as a temporary resident of Vancouver and a permanent resident of Kootenay West (Rossland); also because you have a reputation for answering all your mail.

I see that the minister has noted that fact. The letter continues:

> The centennial train has just left Vancouver after a very successful visit—people wanting to visit the train had to wait in line for up to four hours throughout the time it was here. Several times radio announcers warned people to stay home because they didn't have a chance of getting on the train. It is very obvious that only a small proportion of people who wanted to see the train actually were able to see it.
> This is my question: What is going to happen to the train after centennial year? Is there any chance that it will be able to make a repeat tour next year—including the places to be missed this year? Is there any possibility that it could become a permanent exhibit, or would the costs be prohibitively high? It seems a shame to take it apart.
> I hope the answers are affirmative. Incidentally, I was one of the many who did not see the train and would very much like to see it. We were turned away because of the crowds.
>
> Yours sincerely,
> Mrs. G. C. Bilodeau.

That is the type of letter I have received in this connection. Because of these representations, yesterday in the house I asked the following question:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State. In view of the tremendous public interest in the confederation train and the fact that many persons will not have the opportunity to visit this super excellent centennial project, has consideration been given to a repeat tour by this train next year?

Then Your Honour said, "Order, please." With due respect to Your Honour, I must point out that while in the first instance these representations came from my own constituency, this is a matter of national significance; and in the second instance there is a question of urgency because if there is to be any arrangement for a repeat tour next year, some revising of the schedule of the tour this year may be necessary and, of course, the cost of such tour will have to be considered in connection with next year's estimates.

I have taken advantage of this late show, Mr. Speaker, to bring my representations to the attention of the parliamentary secretary. I urge that serious consideration be given to the representations received from my constituents—and I understand other hon. members have received similar representations —so that the greatest number of Canadians will have the opportunity to enjoy this excellent confederation project.

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I first wish to thank the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) for the great promotion he is giving to the magnificent confederation train on its tour throughout Canada. Prior to the suggestion of the hon. member for Kootenay West the centennial commission ascertained, at the request of the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh), the great interest of the population of Canada in this train. The centennial commission has made a serious study of the practicability of the confederation train repeating its tour during 1968.

It is true that a great part of the population of Canada will not have the opportunity to visit this magnificent train during its tour during our centennial year. While I am not in a position this evening to say to the hon. member for Kootenay West that the train will tour Canada for a second time in 1968, I can assure him that his very great interest in this matter, and that of his constituents and of the majority of the population of Canada are being taken into consideration. Every possible step is being taken in regard to this matter, and the progress is very encouraging.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS—RESTORATION OF HOME OF SIR ALEXANDER GALT

Mr. Patrick T. Asselin (Richmond-Wolfe): My question was addressed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in his capacity as minister responsible for the Historic Sites and Monuments Board. It was intended to lead to positive action; it was not an attempt to cry over spilled milk.

I feel it is useless at this time to try to find out who was to blame for the demolition of what we call Galt House, though I do believe the minister should make a complete and detailed study of this matter, and that those responsible should be punished.

Sir Alexander Galt emigrated to Sherbrooke in 1835 and in 1849 was elected from Sherbrooke to the legislative assembly of Canada, where he served until 1867. He sat in the House of Commons until 1872. He was a delegate to the Charlottetown and Quebec conferences of 1864 and to the Westminster conference of 1866 and was one of the chief architects of the British North America Act. In 1867 he became the first finance minister of the Dominion and in 1880 was appointed the first Canadian high commissioner in London.

Time does not permit me to continue with this great man's accomplishments, but I wanted to draw these facts to the attention of the house to show why we felt it was so important to preserve his home. I understand the minister has announced that a monument, not just a plaque but a real monument, will be placed in Sherbrooke to commemorate this statesman. Of course we appreciate this very much. Nevertheless the Eastern Townships Historical Society has requested that the remaining portion of what we now call Galt House, the stable, or the carriage house—the portion of the house which was attached to the original house and which formed part of it—be preserved. Fortunately this portion was not demolished when the original home was destroyed. The preservation of the carriage house would, we feel, be preferable to the erection of a monument which in itself would have little of historical value. I may say that I have quoted a portion of an editorial which appeared in one of the local newspapers.

I do not wish to labour this question, I should like the minister to give us, if he can, a definite date on which he and the officials of the historic sites division can come to Sherbrooke to study this matter. At the same time I would be glad of an assurance that his visit will be made before any definite decision is reached with regard to the carriage house. We understand that the minister is burdened with other work in the department, but I should like to suggest to the hon. gentleman that he take the opportunity of meeting the people in the area and hearing them explain the historical value which they attach to this site—that he should visit the area before a final decision is taken and discuss with those people who are interested exactly what his department is prepared to do.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it seems the happiest circumstance surrounding the commemoration of Sir Alexander Galt is the interest of the Eastern Quebec Historical Society. This is one of the finer evidences, I think, of the value of perpetuating places of history in this nation. We are apologetic still, and very sorry, over the disaster which befell our efforts to move the house itself. It was going to be demolished in any case. We hurriedly put in a contractor who told us he thought he could move it, but when he touched the house it fell apart. We do not want the same thing to happen in any attempt to move what the hon. member calls a carriage house, but which I believe was actually a stable. We think that probably the same thing would happen in that case, because it is set upon rock. When we move the rock of 100 years ago, it just falls apart and we do not want that to happen again.

What we are planning at the present time, and the Historic Sites and Monuments Board has reviewed this on a number of occasions now, is to use a plot of land at the side of the estate about 300 feet from where the house stood and erect there a monument to Sir Alexander Galt. We have commissioned the well known sculptor Madame Guité of Quebec to make submissions to us which will be studied by the Historic Sites and Monuments Board. I want to assure my hon. friend that the officers of the historic sites division are going to the site later this month and will review the whole situation again.

We came to the opinion, based upon the recommendation of the Historic Sites and Monuments Board, that commemoration at this site was extremely important to Canadians. We intend to make a commemoration there worthy of Canada and worthy of Sir Alexander Galt and his contributions to Canada. I would be very happy indeed, and I will assure the hon. member that some time this year I will endeavour, to visit the site myself. We will seek there the co-operation, which I know will be forthcoming, of the historical society, because of all the efforts made theirs is the most valuable to the area and to his memory.

EDUCATION—REQUEST FOR INCREASED ASSISTANCE TO CANADIAN STUDENTS

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I am just looking for the representatives of the Prime Minister's office and of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The subject matter which I wish to discuss tonight is, I believe, very important since it relates to Canadian university students. Evidently no one in the Prime Minister's office or the office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs is interested. I understood that on this late show there was to be at least some representative of a minister who would supply some information on this subject. However, in view of the information I obtained in answer to question No. 2090 on the order paper, I feel the Canadian university students will answer for themselves. Then, perhaps the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs will give a more attentive ear than they are giving tonight.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to our external aid program under which students from foreign countries are helped to attend Canadian universities. I was astonished to learn from the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the average amount of money Canada extends to these students is $5,467.29 per annum per student.

How many Canadian students get that kind of money to go to school? Our students have to do part time work in restaurants to pay their way through school, because their parents cannot afford to finance the entire cost.

I have been wondering why there has been so much bickering and hollering over foreign aid. Canadian students at the present time are undergoing an injustice. We finance foreign students to come to Canada to study, students who do not have the same problems Canadian students have. As far as finances are concerned, they are treated better than Canadian students.

I would ask how many Canadian students have about $5,500 a year to go through university? This amounts to $22,000 over a four-year term; and this is the average figure, Mr. Speaker. Out of 900 odd students only 515 graduated. Some of these might have required $6,000; the average was $5,500. These are students who have been changing cars every year. They are about the brightest students from these underdeveloped countries. Some of them do not have to work so hard and some attend a minimum of courses. Their financial problems are minimal compared with some Canadian students who have to slave their way through university.

I am not saying that this amount is too much, but not many Canadian students can afford to pay this sum. If we can spend this amount on foreign students, then we can spend the same amount on Canadian students. The federal government is going to award 10,000 grants to Canadian students. Yet it can afford external aid to the tune of $259,360,000 in 1965, which is a staggering figure.

I believe the purpose of external aid is missed entirely. In one way or another the goals and aims of the external aid program are unrealistic. We give these foreign students an education or train them at a Canadian university for a trade or for the professional field, so they can return to their homeland to render their country a service. The problem is, Mr. Speaker, they do not go back home. Some of the responsibility for this is upon the federal government at the present time for providing them with a high standard of living. No wonder they do not go back home to an underdeveloped country, when we spend $22,000 on them over four years.

The United Nations has also produced some staggering figures in this regard. Some 85,000 medical doctors did not return to India after taking their course. They are scattered around the world. They might not all be in Canada, but anyone versed in external affairs knows that Canada's reputation internationally is such that if they are trained here they are fitted to enter any country they desire. I know of no restrictions. At present we are not doing India a service in this respect, or any of the other underdeveloped countries; we are doing them a disservice. We are taking their best students away from them. They do not return to their homeland to practise what they have learned here, which was the main objective of the external aid program.

I suggest this program should be revised as soon as possible. Our own Canadian students are in no way assisted by these circumstances at the present time. They have to attend the same universities and undergo the same expenses as foreign students. Very seldom can they raise more than $2,000, but they have to compete with students from other countries who are financed by the Canadian government through Canadian taxpayers. It is the government's responsibility to look into the question of paying this $5,500 to Canadian students.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order, please. The time allotted for the hon. member's speech has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, if the member for Mégantic (Mr. Langlois) allows me to answer in French, I will tell him first that I regret the absence of both parliamentary secretaries to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson). But as the member for Mégantic knows probably, both of them have been away; one came back late tonight but I have been unable to reach him to ask him to answer the question of the hon. member. As for the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin), I think he is not at all involved in the question put today by the member who was only making a comparison with the answer given by the government to question No. 2,090 concerning aid granted to foreign students.

The question of the hon. member for Mégantic which was couched in Shakespearean English, was as follows:

[English]

Does the federal government contemplate changing its present policy in order to accommodate Canadian students and provide them with about the same amount of money, that is, $5,500 per annum, to attend Canadian universities?

[Translation]

As I am not informed of the studies of foreign students financed by the Canadian government, I am not in a position to give a satisfactory answer to the hon. member for Mégantic. However, since he asks whether the government of Canada could not give the same assistance to Canadian students, I may tell him that for many years, here in this house, the party which he represents has always insisted on provincial autonomy in matters of education. I will tell him in closing, that education is the exclusive responsibility of the provincial governments.

[English]

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

BRIDGE CONSTRUCTION OVER OTTAWA RIVER

Question No. 2,506—Mr. Davis:

How many bridges have been built with financial assistance from the federal government over the Ottawa river since 1950, and where are these bridges located and what was the percentage and total amount of the federal contribution in each case?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): So far as the Department of Public Works is concerned: the number of bridges is three. Between Ottawa, Ont. and Hull, Que., 33⅓ per cent; $3,281,979. *Between Alumette Island, Que. and Pembroke, Ont., 100 per cent of centre bridge; $894,173. Between Portage du Fort, Que. and highway 17, Ont. (under construction), 50 per cent; $382,628. (est).

*This is a system of three bridges. Quebec contributed 100 per cent of the cost of the bridge on the Quebec side. Ontario contributed 100 per cent of the cost of the bridge on the Ontario side.

*PROVISION OF COLOUR TELEVISION SETS TO C.B.C. STAFF

Question No. 2,509—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What are the names and addresses of the chosen officials and/or employees of the C.B.C. who are to be the recipients of and have free use of the coloured T.V. sets recently purchased by the C.B.C.?

2. From what companies and/or individuals were such coloured T.V. sets purchased?

3. Was such purchase preceded by a resolution passed by the C.B.C., and, if so, on what date was such resolution passed?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the C.B.C. that:

1. Colour television receivers are assigned according to requirements of senior positions and remain with these positions in the event of the departure of present incumbents. They are used by those whose duties require program viewing.

2. Sets were purchased mainly from RCA Victor, Canadian General Electric, Canadian Admiral and Philips Electronics and, in a few cases where delivery from these companies was not available, from Clairtone, Fleetwood, Zenith, Philco and Electrohome.

NURSING SERVICE, WESTMINSTER HOSPITAL, LONDON, ONT.

Question No. 2,514—Mr. Irvine:

1. How many registered nurses are employed at Westminster hospital, London, Ontario?

2. How many nursing assistants are employed at the above hospital?

3. How many practical or other classifications of nurses not listed above are employed at this hospital?

4. In each category what are the (a) rates of pay (b) rates of overtime pay (c) number of work hours per week?

5. Where their work calls for a 40-hour work week, do they always work five consecutive days and then have two days off duty and, if not, under what circumstances are any of them required to work more than five consecutive days?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. 199 full time, 35 casuals.

2. 51.

3. None.

4. (a) Nurse 1: $4,500, $4,650, $4,800, $4,950, $5,100, 5,300. Nurse 2: $5,157, $5,326, $5,495, $5,665. Nurse 3: $5,686, $5,884, $6,085, $6,283. Nurse 4: $6,198, $6,466, $6,736, $7,004. Nurse 5: $7,335, $7,601, $7,868, $8,137. Nurse 6: $8,099, $8,433, $8,767, $9,167; or $20 per day for casuals. Hospital nursing assistants: $3,207, $3,339, $3,472, $3,604. (b) Time and one half. (c) 40.

5. Nursing services in the hospital require staffing 24 hours a day, seven days a week and three eight hour shifts on a rotational basis are employed for this purpose. In order to vary the two days of rest and to provide a fair distribution of week ends off duty it is necessary that nurses periodically work more than five days in a row during the shift cycle. Between changes of shift the normal two days of rest per week are extended to balance out the 40 hour work week.

FOG SIGNAL, MALASPINA STRAIT, B.C.

Question No. 2,516—Mr. Barnett:

Was the fog signal, Westview, Malaspina strait, British Columbia, discontinued, as indicated in notices to mariners, January 13, 1967, page 10 and, if so, for what reason?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Yes. No longer served a need. A fog signal is maintained at Powell river, 2¼ miles to the northward.

[Miss LaMarsh.]

*SUICIDE ATTEMPTS IN QUEBEC PENITENTIARIES

Question No. 2,525—Mr. Howard:

1. Since January 1, 1966, how many persons in any federal penitentiary in the province of Quebec attempted to commit suicide?

2. What is the reason for each such attempt, the name of the institution within which the attempt was made, and what psychologic or psychiatric help was provided to each such person and the results thereof?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): 1. Since January 1, 1966, seven persons attempted to commit suicide.

2. (a) The reason for each such attempt appears to have been as follows: (i) personal problems of a sexual nature, two cases; (ii) depressive feeling of rejection by family or friends, two cases; (iii) mentally ill inmates suffering from schizophrenia and under treatment in the psychiatric ward of the penitentiary hospital, three cases.

(b) These attempts were all made at the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary.

(c) All these inmates were hospitalized in the psychiatric ward of the penitentiary hospital and treated with various medication. One of them was treated by electroshock therapy in addition to medication.

(d) The results thereof were that one inmate was released from the psychiatric ward and transferred to another federal institution in another province in the hope that a change of environment would be beneficial; two inmates were released from the psychiatric ward and have resumed normal prison routine; two inmates are still hospitalized in the psychiatric ward but are allowed to work with the inmate population during the day, and two inmates are still under treatment in the psychiatric ward.

ANNIVERSARY OF CAPTURE OF VIMY RIDGE

Question No. 2,533—Mr. Pascoe:

1. Has the government received letters from veterans of the Vimy ridge battle regarding observance on April 9 of the fiftieth anniversary of the ridge's capture?

2. If so, have these letters indicated that a large number of the veterans wish to participate in the anniversary observance at the Vimy ridge memorial?

3. Is the government considering the suggestion that a ship be provided for such a voyage overseas at excursion rates?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. Yes, the government has received a number of such letters.

2. The writers of several letters have indicated a wish to attend the ceremony at Vimy to mark the 50th anniversary of the battle.

3. No.

AFFILIATION OF CANADIAN UNIONS WITH AFL-CIO

Question No. 2,539—Mr. Émard:

On the basis of the latest figures available (a) how many unions affiliated with the CLC are also affiliated with AFL/CIO (b) what percentage of the total number of unions affiliated with the CLC are also affiliated with the AFL/CIO (c) what is the total membership of unions reporting CLC affiliation (d) what is the membership of unions reporting affiliation with the CLC, which at the same time are affiliated with the AFL/CIO in the United States (e) what is the total of dues and assessments from Canadian members of unions going to international headquarters outside of Canada?

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): (a) As of January 1966 there were 112 international and national unions affiliated with the C.L.C. In addition, there were 160 local unions directly chartered by the C.L.C. Of the 112 international and national unions, affiliated with the C.L.C., 90 were also affiliated with the AFL-CIO. (b) The percentage of the total number of international and national unions affiliated with the C.L.C. that were also affiliated with the AFL-CIO was, as of January 1966, 80 per cent. If the number of directly chartered locals is added to the number of international and national unions affiliated with the C.L.C., making a total of 272, the percentage that AFL-CIO affiliated unions comprise of this total would be 33 per cent. (c) As of January 1966, the total membership of unions reporting affiliation with the C.L.C., including the membership of its directly chartered locals, was 1,282,039. Of this total, C.L.C. directly chartered local unions comprised 18,414 members. (d) As of January 1966, the membership of unions reporting affiliation with the C.L.C. which, at the same time were affiliated with the AFL-CIO in the United States, was 1,070,008. (e) Information is not available as to the total of dues and assessments from Canadian members of unions which actually goes to international headquarters outside of Canada. The report for 1964 under the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act (table 24 on page 49 of Part II) indicates that the income of international unions from net dues and assessments from Canadian members amounted to $25,516,000. It does not indicate how much of this money actually left the country, nor does it give complete information on the amount spent in Canada.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, notice of motion for papers No. 206 is acceptable to the government.

Notice of motion No. 204 is acceptable to the government, subject to the reservations concerning privileged papers.

Would Your Honour call notices of motions Nos. 191, 193, 203, 207 and 208?

Mr. Speaker, I ask that all other notices of motions stand.

[English]

C.B.C. APPLICATION FOR DEFERMENT OF LABOUR CODE

Motion No. 191—Mr. Howard:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all correspondence, telegrams or other documents exchanged between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, or any official thereof and any other person, group or organization, excepting any other department or agency of the government, relating to the application of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code or the deferment or suspension of any part thereof.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): The house will recall with respect to this motion, which was dropped and replaced by my hon. friend, that as I told him at that time I was informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that the only correspondence, telegrams or other documents in existence are internal papers and thus are considered by the C.B.C. to be privileged. Under the circumstances I would therefore ask my hon. friend whether he would withdraw the motion.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I would be quite agreeable to doing that, but some of the correspondence is between the C.B.C. and a particular local of the international alliance of theatrical and stage employees.

I do not see how this could be an internal matter since it involves the C.B.C. and a group outside the corporation.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member proposing that the matter be transferred for debate?

Mr. Howard: I am just suggesting that in my view the reason given by the minister is not factual. I think the only alternative would be to put it to a vote.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, although this is the only information I have received perhaps, in view of what my hon. friend has said, the matter might be allowed to stand for another week until I check with the corporation to make absolutely certain of what they told me.

Mr. Speaker: Stood.

LABOUR (STANDARDS) CODE—CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN DEPARTMENT AND C.B.C.

Motion No. 193—Mr. Howard:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all correspondence, telegrams or other documents exchanged between the Minister or Department of Labour and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation relating to the application of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code or the deferment or suspension of any part thereof.

He said: Mr. Speaker, some weeks ago the Minister of Labour made some comments in the house with respect to this particular motion. In spite of the fact that it might be very desirable to have this information made public, in the light of all the circumstances and the reluctance of the government to disclose the information it might be best to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

Motion withdrawn and order discharged.

RENTAL OR SALE GOVERNMENT LAND, LONGUEUIL, QUE.

Motion No. 203—Mr. Douglas:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house a copy of all correspondence between any department or agency of the federal government and the city of Longueuil, Quebec, and any other individual or company concerning the rental or sale of government owned land in or near the city of Longueuil since July 1, 1963.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I had a conversation with the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, and I would like to say that this motion is acceptable as it relates to a major piece of property, that is some 20 acres of dominion lands which were sold to the city of Longueuil and are now put to use as a commercial zone and a shopping centre.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, that would be agreeable if I could get some information whether other pieces of land are involved, and if there is other correspondence. If so, I can request that in a separate motion.

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, there are one or two other small properties having to do with the realignment of roads.

Motion agreed to.

C.B.C. "THIS WEEK" PROGRAM ON NEW BRUNSWICK

Motion No. 204—Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert):

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and any other documents exchanged between the Secretary of State, in particular the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and any other person, groups or organizations with respect to the program concerning New Brunswick which was televised on "This Week", Tuesday, January 17, 1967.

Motion agreed to.

WINTER WORKS IN QUEBEC ELECTORAL DISTRICTS

[Translation]

Motion No. 206—Mr. Racine:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of the correspondence exchanged between members of the federal electoral districts of Beauce and Mégantic with the appropriate departments concerning winter works in Saint-Ephrem (Beauce), Saint-René (Beauce), and La Guadaloupe (Mégantic) from 1962 to this date.

Motion agreed to.

BRIDGE OR TUNNEL TO VANCOUVER AIRPORT

Motion No. 207—Mr. Prittie:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house a copy of all correspondence, telegrams or other documents exchanged between the minister or Department of Transport and the Department of Highways of British Columbia relating to the proposed construction of a bridge or tunnel across the north arm of the Fraser river from Vancouver, British Columbia to Sea Island, Richmond, British Columbia, site of the Vancouver international airport.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to oppose this motion if it can be understood that of course we would have to extend the usual courtesy to the provincial government and make sure they were agreeable to the correspondence being tabled, and if it could also be understood that any intermediate correspondence with respect to negotiations that are not completed would not be tabled until the conclusion of such negotiations, and then only the final documents.

Mr. Prittie: That is quite acceptable, in view of the fact that negotiations are still in progress.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and ask him whether he is in a position to give the house and the country any report on the progress of negotiations in connection with Viet Nam.

Can he tell us also, in view of the admirable speech he made on Friday on the subject of Viet Nam, whether the secret plan being advanced by Prime Minister Wilson is the one which the Secretary of State for External Affairs could not reveal to the house, and understandably so?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I thank my hon. friend for his kind words about what I said the other day. With regard to the last question, I can only say that it is not so to my knowledge.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I have a supplementary question. I wonder if I could ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether, in the light of the statement by the British Prime Minister that peace in Viet Nam was within our grasp and a very small movement could put the whole machinery for peace keeping in motion the government would consider sending Mr. Ronning once again to Hanoi to see if he could remove the small obstacle that apparently remains to negotiations.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I have made it clear that the government will not hesitate to use this channel if, in the government's judgment, there is the slightest possible reason for using Mr. Ronning again. I was in communication with Mr. Ronning within the last few days and my hon. friend may be assured that the government, having established this contact, is fully conscious of its important potential value.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS

LOUISBOURG FORTRESS—DISMISSAL OF SENIOR EMPLOYEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Mr. Speaker, regarding a statement he made in the house yesterday concerning Jeremy Akerman, who was dismissed by the minister's department. Yesterday, as recorded at page 13008 of Hansard, I asked the minister the following question:

May I ask the minister whether he has confirmed by examining the text of the alleged radio and television programs that such an attack was made by this man upon his superiors—

I received a telegram, a copy of which I have sent to the minister, in which Mr. Akerman denies categorically that he has ever appeared on radio and television attacking fortress officials as suggested by the minister. I want to ask the minister if he or his officials have checked to ascertain whether the basis upon which this man was dismissed, a television attack on his superiors, is true or whether it is based on hearsay.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, a report was made to me that such had been the case. I want to thank the hon.

member for having supplied me with a full account of the basis upon which his question was going to be asked. I draw his attention to the telegram Mr. Akerman sent, in which he stated he had never publicly criticized his superiors prior to the decision to terminate his contract.

Mr. Douglas: Read the rest of it.

Mr. Laing: He says he never appeared on radio and television attacking fortress officials. He says he had not done this prior to the termination of his contract. I would tell the hon. member that I have to be guided by the advice given me by my officials and not the advice tendered to the hon. member by Mr. Akerman. In both instances that I recited yesterday, I followed the advice of my officials. First, I was protecting Mr. Akerman and, second, confirming the termination of his contract.

Mr. Winkler: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Surely we have proceeded with this question sufficiently, and it is not of national importance today.

Mr. Speaker: I will allow one supplementary question. I ask the co-operation of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, because I do not believe this matter should be proceeded with much longer during the question period.

Mr. Douglas: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say it is important if an injustice has been perpetrated upon this man.

Mr. Speaker: There is no point of order. Will the hon. member kindly ask his supplementary question.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the fact that this man categorically denies ever having appeared on television and radio attacking his superiors, will the minister ask for copies of the radio tape and investigate this matter, or have his departmental officials investigate it, so an injustice may not be done this man if his statements, as contained in the telegram are accurate?

Mr. Laing: I will certainly make these inquiries and endeavour to obtain the tape if it is available. The difficulty of Mr. Akerman is possibly no worse—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

LABOUR RELATIONS

QUEBEC—POSSIBLE MEDIATION BY MANPOWER MINISTER IN TEACHER'S DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Is it true that, according to a rumour that reached me this morning, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration has been invited to act as mediator in the dispute involving the teachers, the school boards and the government of Quebec?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[English]

ROYAL VISIT

REPORT THAT QUEEN MOTHER TO VISIT ONLY ATLANTIC PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I would ask the Prime Minister whether reports are true that the July visit of the Queen Mother is going to be limited to the maritime provinces only. If this is so, why is it that during centennial year she is not visiting Ottawa and Expo?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Queen and Prince Philip, as my hon. friend knows, will be visiting Ottawa and Expo. The Queen Mother will be visiting the Atlantic provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Princess Alexandra will be visiting the western provinces. So the Queen and other members of the royal family will be visiting all parts of Canada during our centennial year.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, it is rather a supplementary question that I should like to put to the right hon. Prime Minister.

He made an announcement earlier that the royal family would come to Canada during 1967. Can the Prime Minister tell us if Prince Charles will be able to visit the Lotbinière riding with the hon. member for that constituency.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FINANCE

FISCAL POLICY CHANGE REQUESTED BY ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the statement made yesterday in his budget speech by the treasurer of the province of Ontario that Ontario cannot reach its economic objectives unless the federal government switches to an expansive fiscal policy, does the minister have in mind the introduction of any measures to give the province this very obviously needed help?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the budget statement of the Ontario minister is directed more at political than at economic developments.

AGRICULTURE

EGGS—REPORTED RECENT DROP IN PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to repeat the question which I addressed yesterday to the Minister of Agriculture. It has to do with the price of eggs, which has recently dropped by 20 cents per dozen. What are the intentions of the minister with regard to halting this decline in egg prices?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am wondering whether the hon. member does not think this is a question that could easily be considered at ten o'clock during the adjournment debate.

Mr. Rapp: Ten o'clock.

[Later:]

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Considering the serious fluctuations in the prices of eggs, will the government not submit the operations of the agricultural stabilization board to the agriculture committee for study?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder if the hon. member would like to join the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale (Mr. Rapp) and debate the matter at ten o'clock.

Mr. Nasserden: I am sure the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale can take care of himself. My question is different altogether and relates to the study of an act which has been in operation for eight or nine years without being reviewed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member can take care of himself also.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

SMOKING—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I asked the minister a similar question yesterday which I believe he agreed to take as notice and answer today. My question is, is the minister's department planning any expenditures for research into tobacco in order to ascertain whether carcinogens and other substances that constrict the arteries can be removed?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think this question should be placed on the order paper.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INTERVIEW WITH A REPORTED COMMUNIST ON PROGRAM "AUJOURD'HUI"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the hon. Secretary of State, who is responsible to the house for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Would the minister check with C.B.C authorities in order to find out why the C.B.C. granted an interview last week to Mr. Vachon on the program "Aujourd'hui", during which the ex-policeman said that he had decided to join the Communist party and that, in the future, he would endeavour to convince our youth to share his views on Marxism? Would the minister inquire—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair feels that the hon. member should put his question on the order paper.

Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix): At ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—PARITY OF PRICES IN CANADA AND U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Industry. In view of earlier statements made by the minister, would he advise the house when Canadian citizens might expect to buy a made in Canada car under the United States-Canada car pact at the same price as the identical car is sold in the United States to United States citizens?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I hope the costs of producing cars and consequently the manufacturers sale prices of cars, manufactured in Canada, progressively will continue, as they have done over the past two years, toward parity. It would not be wise to try to put a date on the achievement of an equalization of these manufacturing costs. The cost to the consumer, as the house is aware, is affected not only from country to country but from province to province by a series of special considerations related to transport, taxes, methods and techniques of distribution and, indeed, methods of sale.

Mr. Hales: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Considering that the treaty has been in force for two years, does the minister not expect to announce something soon?

Mr. Drury: Rome was not built in one day.

An hon. Member: Rome did not build cars.

OLD AGE SECURITY

EXTENSION OF SUPPLEMENTARY BENEFIT TO RECIPIENTS OF WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Is he in a position today to reply to the question asked a few days ago with respect to the relationship between war veterans allowances and other pensions legislation?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I assume the hon. member refers to the questions asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre of the Prime Minister a few days ago. In arriving at an understanding between the two departments on how best to deal with this question, and to avoid the problem of overpayments in certain instances, the officials of both departments concluded that the best method to adopt was to send a letter directly to the recipients of war veterans allowances to make sure that before applications are made the veterans will consult with their welfare officers.

The feeling in the department is that this will adequately cover the situation and will, in the best manner possible, prevent the possibility of overpayments which can be difficult for veterans. My department tell me that they feel this is the best method. My department has supported the wording in the appropriate section in the application form. They are satisfied that this will make the situation as easy as possible.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the Minister of Veterans Affairs not aware that on the application for the old age supplement, there is no warning that the war veterans allowance can be lost if the pension supplement is granted?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked is out of order.

AIR POLLUTION

EQUIPPING OF AUTOMOBILES WITH PROTECTIVE DEVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It involves the immediate problem of air pollution in our metropolitan and urban areas and the United States decision to put the clean air package in cars. Some time ago the minister informed the house that the Canadian government was studying the United States regulations to see whether the clean air package would be appropriate in Canadian cars. Have the studies been completed yet?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Grafftey: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, and I ask this in very general terms. Would the minister inform the house why the studies were started, and what is their general purport?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question is much too general, as I am sure the hon. member will agree.

Mr. Grafftey: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which I address to the Minister of Industry. In examining Hansard I find that the minister undertook to contact the motor industry to see whether the clean air package would be included as standard equipment in Canadian cars. Has he kept this undertaking? Has he contacted the industry to see whether we shall get this feature as standard equipment? Can he inform the house about this?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The question of the so-called package will depend on the outcome of the studies now being carried out by the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Grafftey: Has the minister contacted the industry? That is what I asked.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is now a debate between the hon. member and the minister.

CONSIDERATION OF NECESSARY EQUIPMENT AND STRUCTURAL CHANGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the serious and increasing menace to the health of the nation presented by air pollution will the government give the same consideration to prescribing the equipment and structural changes required for the control of air pollution as it is giving in the case of water pollution?

Hon. Jean Luc Pépin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I do not really know who should answer this question. I am responsible at the Federal level for the prevention of water pollution but my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare is responsible for the prevention of air pollution.

Mr. Starr: You mean the whole thing is up in the air?

Mr. Rynard: I will address the question, then, to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I regret that I did not hear the question. I will read it in Hansard and provide an answer at the earliest possible moment.

TRANSPORTATION

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON MARITIME STUDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): My question is for the Minister of Transport. Can the minister tell us whether his department has now received the special study on maritime transportation?

[Mr. Grafftey.]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): The answer to that question is that the document has not yet been brought to my attention.

LABOUR RELATIONS

APPROVAL OF MEDIATOR'S REPORT IN RAILWAY DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. K. Andras (Port Arthur): My question is for the Minister of Labour. Can he tell us when he expects the final results of the vote by the members of the railway unions, the non-operating members, in connection with the Goldenberg mediation representations?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the count was conducted over the week end. My information is that the leaders of the associated non-ops were to hold a press conference at 2.30 this afternoon, and in view of that I think it is in order for me to release the figures now. The vote is better than two to one in favour of settlement, being 19,042 for the settlement and 8,452 against settlement.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour based on his report of the voting result. Can he tell us whether that result means the approval of the Goldenberg report?

Mr. Nicholson: My information is that the agreement, or rather the minutes of settlement now approved, came about as a result of the mediation by Mr. Goldenberg.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. I wonder if the Prime Minister would tell us now whether the report by Dean Woods in respect to management-labour strife affecting important industries in Canada, is ready for disclosure in the House of Commons.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, and it will not be ready for some time. This is a very important question. The terms of reference of the commission are very far reaching, and it will be some time before we receive their report.

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO BOARD HEARINGS ON REGIONAL POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I have a question for the Minister of Transport.

Can the minister inform the house when the hearings on regional air policy will take place in western Canada? Can he particularly assure the house that these will take place in time to implement the policy established last year, to assist in air traffic during centennial year?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I presume the hon. gentleman is referring to the hearing with respect to TransAir. I would have to ascertain the date.

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO SUPERVISION OF SEAL HUNT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries arising out of the statement he made last Monday concerning the seal fishery. I ask the minister what arrangements he is making for independent observers to witness this year's fishery. In particular, what consideration has he given to the suggestion I made to him privately, that he facilitate arrangements for the members of the standing committee on fisheries to visit the seal fishery?

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I wish to tell the hon. member that arrangements have been made to have four representatives of the S.P.C.A. attend the seal hunt and witness the operation. I remind the hon. member that our main responsibility, as requested by the general public, members of the house and S.P.C.A. societies, is to make sure there is proper supervision. All the transportation facilities we have available will be needed for that purpose.

AIRPORTS

WINNIPEG—REQUEST FOR INSTALLATION OF ESCALATORS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I have a question for the Minister of Transport, who appears to be relatively unemployed these days. Would the minister consider visiting Winnipeg airport and having placed in that airport the escalators which were specified in the original plans, in order that the airport may be ready for the great increase in the travelling public by the time of the Pan-Am games this summer?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): On balance I think that would be more fitting employment for a contractor than for the minister.

[Later:]

Mr. Churchill: My question is directed to the Minister of Transport. I should like to ask him if he would recommend to the Minister of Public Works the improvement of facilities at the Winnipeg airport and thus indicate some interest in western Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think the Minister of Public Works would have any jurisdiction in the matter but I am seeking, as the minister responsible for the establishment, to make every improvement that it is possible to make there.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON PENSION COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I should like to ask him whether the delay in tabling the report of the Woods Committee on veterans affairs is strictly due to a printing hold-up or whether it is due to a delay in getting it translated into French. If the latter is the case, could not the report be released in English in view of the concern felt by veterans about the results of this two year study?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I tried to get in touch with the chairman of the committee this morning but I was not able to reach him. I trust I shall be able to ask him directly what the situation is. I have received two pieces of information which do not coincide, so I should talk to him directly in order to get the information required.

Mr. Winch: May I ask the minister why he stated yesterday that the delay was due to the printing, when he now says he does not know the reason?

Some hon. Members: Order.

EDUCATION

INQUIRY AS TO COST PER STUDENT UNDER EXTERNAL AID

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): My question arises out of an answer given to me by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in reply to a question on the order paper. The answer given in French is not the same as the one which appeared in Hansard in English. For the sake of clarification I should like to ask the minister the following question. The English version says the total amount paid per student by way of external aid was $5,-467.29 per annum. In the French version, which does not say "per annum", it is stated that the average amount paid is $5,467.29 per student. Could the minister clarify—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is not a proper question. Would the hon. member kindly resume his seat and also take into account the fact that today there is a limited period of time available to hon. members. He is asking for clarification of a question which was ruled out of order yesterday afternoon. Certainly this is not the time to ask for an explanation about it.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): May I put my question directly. Is this answer the amount per annum or per student?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

EXTENSION OF TELEVISION SERVICE IN NORTHERN MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Some time ago the hon. lady mentioned that she hoped to have information in her possession soon which would enable her to make an announcement with regard to the provision of C.B.C. network television service in northern Manitoba. I should like to ask the hon. lady whether she is now in a position to make such a statement.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I thank the hon. member for the question. I have an answer I should like to give him in connection with this important matter. An announcement on this subject is also being made in the Manitoba legislature. Perhaps I might read it with the indulgence of the house; it is about a page and a half long.

Mr. Speaker: In view of the comment I made a moment ago I wonder whether the hon. lady would allow me to ask permission to revert to motions so this statement may be made.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Langlois (Mégantic).]

Miss LaMarsh: I am happy to be able to tell the house that I have now been advised by the C.B.C. that its board of directors last week approved the extension of live television service to northern Manitoba.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Miss LaMarsh: The corporation has accepted the latest proposal of the Manitoba telephone system covering television network connections to Flin Flon and The Pas, where the C.B.C. now operates stations using delayed programming on film, and to Thompson and Snow Lake, where the corporation will be applying later this year for authority to build new stations.

Commencement of this service is, of course, dependent on completion of the construction schedule of the Manitoba telephone system. We are assured that this will be carried out as quickly as possible.

On this same subject, and to round out the picture I think I should note, Mr. Speaker, that the C.B.C. already has applied for permission to establish an outlet at Lynn Lake to be served by the corporation's new "Frontier Package" program of recordings. In addition the C.B.C. has provided and will continue to provide recorded program material to the privately operated station at Churchill to ensure that residents of this community continue to enjoy television service.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure I can speak for the hon. member for Churchill as well as myself in welcoming this long sought step forward in C.B.C. television coverage.

Mr. Simpson: I should like, first of all, to assure the Secretary of State that the people of northern Manitoba who will benefit from this new service will be very pleased with the announcement she has just made. I was particularly pleased to learn that the service will include Flin Flon, The Pas, Snow Lake and Thompson.

The minister has mentioned that the C.B.C. is planning a "Frontier Package" program in the Lynn Lake area, and I know this will be well received. She has also announced that the corporation will continue to provide a programming service for the community owned station at Churchill. In this connection I would ask the minister whether as time goes by she would use her good offices with the C.B.C. to persuade the corporation eventually to put in a transmitter at this point. This is not a community antenna system; it is a station which is broadcasting to the public, it is operated solely by the people of Churchill, and I think the people there are entitled to some financial assistance.

Finally I should like to ask the minister whether she would again use her good offices with the members of the corporation to ensure that the completion of this project will not take as long as have our efforts in requesting it.

Mr. Speaker: We were on motions. We are now returning to questions.

[Later:]

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the question which the hon. member for Churchill addressed to the Secretary of State and which resulted in your reverting to motions. Has the minister any idea when she will make an announcement in respect of those other areas of Canada which are not yet serviced by television and which, on a former occasion, she said would be serviced as soon as possible? Certainly the area I refer to is no more difficult than—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member realizes, this is up to the C.B.C. We can use all the moral or other kinds of suasion we like, but each decision has to be made by the board of governors and conveyed to me. As soon as they have done so I will advise the hon. member.

[Translation]

[Later:]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like also to direct a question along the same lines to the hon. Secretary of State.

For ten years now we have been asking for the same services of the C.B.C. in Chibougamau-Chapais.

Could the Secretary of State tell us what the projects are at the present time, and whether that area will soon be served by the C.B.C.?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the question, as worded, is in order.

[English]

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek. I wonder whether the Secretary of State could use moral suasion as well as her charm and untiring efforts, and any other suasion she may deem necessary, to request the C.B.C. to give consideration to providing the same facility for those living in Gaspé.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Gaspé is asking a question similar to that asked by the hon. member for Chapleau. I suggest that it is a representation rather than a question.

TRANSPORT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAUSEWAY—INQUIRY AS TO TOLL CHARGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Kings): My question is directed to the Minister of Transport. I should like to ask the minister whether the Premier of New Brunswick was announcing government policy when he said the other day there would definitely be no toll charge on the Prince Edward Island-New Brunwsick causeway.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am perhaps not as familiar with the subject matter as I should be, but I doubt whether the question should be asked at this time.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

INQUIRY AS TO EMPLOYEES COVERED BY DEFERMENT APPLICATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I have a question to ask the Minister of Labour arising out of the report he tabled today. Can he tell the house how many employees are covered by the 5,200 cases which have received deferment in respect to the Canada Labour (Standards) Code?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking for statistical information, and it seems to me the question cannot be asked at this time.

Mr. Orlikow: On the same subject, I wonder whether I may ask the minister if he could tell the house when the applications which are still before him finally will be processed.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, a great deal of information along this line is contained in the report itself. It will be noted that among the applications which still are under review is one which relates to stevedoring and longshoring operations in the St. Lawrence ports. I think it is only reasonable to assume that that application will not be dealt with until the Picard commission has submitted its report, unless it be unduly delayed. With regard to shipping, including ferries, there has been a request for a special inquiry in one part of Canada, and until a decision has been made on that request it is impossible to give a definite answer to the hon. member's questions. I think, however, most of the information he wishes is set out in the report. If he has specific questions I shall be glad to answer them outside the house, or inside the house if he prefers.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR BILINGUAL STAFFS IN EMBASSIES ABROAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs. At the same time I should like to congratulate him on his excellent appearance on the television show called "Sel de la semaine" last night, during which he seemed to say that he never refused a well-presented request. Here, then, is my question:

In view of the grievances and suggestions made by Mr. Antonio Barrette, former Canadian ambassador to Greece, would the hon. minister or the government immediately take the necessary steps to ensure that the personnel in Canadian embassies is bilingual?

Mr. Speaker: This question, if in order, could be put on the order paper.

Mr. Allard: At ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN FLAG

SUGGESTED PUBLIC HOLIDAY TO HONOUR ADOPTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. Since there is no national holiday between New Year's and spring, last year I asked the Prime Minister whether he would consider declaring February 15 national flag day and a national holiday. I received a written reply that the government was studying this matter. My question, Mr. Speaker, is this. Has the Prime Minister completed his homework, and is he now ready to announce February 15 as a national holiday?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it seems that this is a very appropriate question on this day which is the second anniversary of the raising of Canada's national flag. The matter is still under consideration. I hope to have an announcement regarding it before long.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED PROVISION OF "REAL DOLLAR" BONDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the continuing rise in prices could the hon. minister say whether the government is considering what Professor H.C. Eastman of the University of Toronto, when speaking recently called an "obvious step" of providing "real dollar government bonds which individuals could buy, thus avoiding the loss of their investments through price increases"?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. While I acknowledge the question, I will recognize the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REQUEST FOR HEALTH WARNING ON CIGARETTE PACKAGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Antonio Yanakis (Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Now that his department has published the long awaited study showing the excessive mortality from heart disease, lung cancer, bronchitis and emphysema caused by cigarette smoking, is it the intention of the minister to implement my private bill, No. C-130, an act to amend the Tobacco Restraint Act, which would obligate cigarette manufacturers to specify on the packages of cigarettes

"Caution: Cigarette smoking may be hazardous to your health" and also eliminate misleading advertising?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think the question asked by the hon. member is similar to that asked by the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke. I suggest that both questions should be placed on the order paper.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

EXCISE TAX ACT RESOLUTION

Resolved that it is expedient to amend the Excise Tax Act to provide that, effective January 1, 1967, the rate of the consumption or sales tax imposed under section 30 of the said act be increased from 8 per cent to 9 per cent with respect to all goods subject to the said tax, except articles enumerated in schedule V of the said act and building materials that were exempt from the said tax immediately prior to June 14, 1963.

• (3:30 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, last night when the house adjourned, I was commenting the resolution providing for a 1 per cent increase of the indirect federal tax. In fact, the resolution mentions that the tax is increased from 8 to 9 per cent. However, we know full well that it is not an 8 per cent tax but an 11 per cent tax. We are dealing with an 11 per cent indirect sales tax, hidden in the cost price, and it is being raised to 12 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, recently the minister has been trying, at least according to his speeches, to check inflation, to check rising costs and the devaluation of the Canadian dollar. Still, through these increases in hidden taxes, the minister is the one who contributes the most to inflation and the devaluation of the Canadian dollar.

Yesterday, I explained that a 1 per cent increase in the federal sales tax could lead to a 4 per cent increase in the cost of living, because, as we know, the provincial sales tax of 6 per cent, for instance, applies to the total cost price, including the 11 per cent and, from here on, the 12 per cent. Consequently, when the total cost price of the manufacturer goes up by 1 per cent, the wholesaler, the retailer and all the middlemen will take their percentage off that increase. I showed yesterday, with figures, how an article costing $10 would sell for far more today, due to the increase in the sales tax, from the wholesaler to the consumer through the retailer and other middlemen. I added that we would witness, not a 1 per cent increase in prices but rather a 2 per cent increase.

Mr. Chairman, I say therefore to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) that, in times such as these, where prices are skyrocketing, and everyone complains continuously of the rising cost of living, the move he is now contemplating will lead to even greater inflation than any other decision did in the last year, whether they concerned increases in salaries, or anything else.

Mr. Chairman, I do not hesitate to say that the Minister of Finance is the first to do the opposite of what he preaches in his speeches. Even though he advocates price stability, he is the first to increase inflation by raising taxes as he is doing today.

In my opinion, there is another way to finance old age security pensions without increasing the sales tax. We did not complain, or at least, I did not, about the first resolution designed to provide part of the funds required to pay the $30 old age pension supplement to needy persons, because in that case, the maximum old age security tax on the personal taxable income was increased from $120 to $240, which meant that people with higher income were being taxed more while those in the lower income groups were not. That is why I did not object to that first resolution.

As for the second one designed to increase the sales tax by 1 per cent, I feel that such a decision will have repercussions on the whole economy and all the more as everything is on the increase nowadays.

One can read on the first page of today's La Presse that there will soon be a general increase in Quebec Hydro rates, when electricity rates were not supposed to increase but rather to decrease following the nationalization of Quebec power companies. However, hardly two years later, there is a general increase in electricity rates in Quebec. The construction of power stations is said to be costly. It is because the Minister of Finance imposed all those new taxes that all prices are going up, in the construction field as well. As a matter of fact, who pays for that, if not the small consumer, the small wage-earner who is constantly thrown off balance by the increased cost of living, inflation and the erosion of the Canadian dollar?

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I say to the Minister of Finance that even though he makes eloquent speeches against inflation which presently prevails in Canada, he is the first person to blame because of his tax increases, and I vigorously object to this new increase which will create even more confusion and be the cause of more economic crises in Canada.

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Chairman, I would feel remiss if I failed to speak to this resolution, because it strikes at the very heart of the Canadian people, I should like to ask the minister the reason for these tax increases, the valuation of Canadian dollar and the dissatisfaction all over Canada? The unions are dissatisfied as exemplified by strikes occurring throughout the country. Surely, Mr. Chairman, that is food for thought.

If we take a look at the economy of our country, then I submit to the hon. minister that it is unbalanced. Our economy is not balanced. And, as we go on applying the present system, we go on off-setting the economy, causing Canadians to be dissatisfied and making it more difficult for them to earn a living. Moreover a certain group of people are living off the fat of the land, taking advantage of the fruit and labour of other people; the system is fine for these individuals who succeed in monopolizing all interests and who keep all the profits to themselves. But this group is a minority in our society.

An important part of our population is happy today, Mr. Chairman, that its purchasing power has been increased by about $30 per month, or $1 a day. I am referring to the old people. For that, I extend my congratulations to the government and to all who forced the government to consider the essential needs of a small part of the Canadian people who are without other income.

It is something, Mr. Chairman, I realize it. It is better than nothing. And that is why I say "well done" to the government and to those who have helped in obtaining this increase of $30 per month for our senior citizens who well deserve a softer life in their declining years for having gone through life financially harassed by a tax system that is unfair, inhuman, completely off kilter, inefficient and without any relation whatever with the financial facts of our national production, of our worthy population ever eager to do its best.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, the old people receive a guaranteed minimum income of $105 per month, and they can start to live properly.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

This is cause for rejoicing and calls for congratulations for the government that passed this measure. It was high time.

What is regrettable, Mr. Chairman, is the attitude of the government particularly of the Minister of Finance and Receiver General of Canada (Mr. Sharp) on the means required to raise the monies necessary to meet this additional guaranteed income of $30 per month for our older citizens. I may be blamed for repeating the same thing over again but it is due to the fact that the Minister of Finance and Receiver General of Canada always repeats the same gestures.

And when the minister needs money to administer the business of the country, he always turns hurriedly towards the small wage earners, toward the people to get it. You asked for a $30 a month increase, here in the bill.

And everybody finds that normal. Well-known newspapermen, editors, leading newspapers repeat that wonderful sentence "The people ask for bonuses, the minister grants them, asking them at the same time to foot the bill". And that results in a tax increase, and the people bow to that request and accept that inevitable solution. And the minister is the winner. He might have left the people with the impression that all the increases, all the bonuses granted to the poor subjects of the realm require a tax increase, so that the people say in the long run that what the government gives with one hand, it takes back with the other, even twice as much, according to established practices.

The government can no longer balance its yearly budget. Every year, it shows deficits and the more it taxes, the more it has to borrow in order to make both ends meet. And the people are paying more and more taxes in this country, more and more interest on debts that are forever accumulating.

And yet, it is being said that Canada is a prosperous country. It is the most prosperous country in the world, next to the United States, our neighbour country. If our country is prosperous, Mr. Chairman, how is it that it cannot make both ends meet, that it cannot finance at a profit, why is there always a deficit? When someone is prosperous, he usually can make both ends meet every year.

If there is prosperity in Canada, Mr. Chairman, where is it? Can we see or touch that prosperity? And where do we get the money required to finance the needs of the government?

No, Mr. Chairman, the only way we have of financing the current needs of the government, is to levy taxes, particularly on small incomes, on the purchasing power, on consumption, on small wage-earners, even on the under-fed.

In the bill before us we are being asked to add a further 1 per cent to the consumption tax. The sales tax will be increased to 12 per cent from 11 per cent. That is all there is to it. To summarize this whole transaction, if more purchasing power is given, approximately $30 more per month to our senior citizens, it must come out of the purchasing power of all other citizens in Canada. The purchasing power is increased on both sides, but it is lowered elsewhere. Thus the whole Canadian population is worse off than before.

Indeed, what this involves is the setting-up of a costly system to administer this $30-per-month guaranteed income supplement to people over 68 years of age. When we add about $280 million worth of purchasing power for our senior citizens, that same amount, plus the tremendous administrative costs, come out of the pockets of all other Canadian citizens.

The situation in which people, in general, find themselves is, or will be, worse than before. And who profits by this financing method of our government, of this method of taxation of our government?

Do you want to know who always benefits from the perpetual abuse of the purchasing power of the low income of the Canadian people?

Do you want to know how prosperous part of our population really is, when the rest suffer so much hardship and poverty?

My information comes from no less a source than our national statistics, the statistics of the Minister of Finance which could have shown him where to levy taxes, if he cannot find money elsewhere.

In 1966, Mr. Chairman, Canadian production reached the $56 billion mark but consumption only reached $38 billion. Therefore there was a surplus in Canada of $18 billion, and yet the minister does not know where to find the $280 million he needs.

The common people in Canada, the small tradesmen or the small manufacturers benefitted to the extent of $38 billion only while the other $18 billion went to a few large financial institutions.

Are those $18 billion which went into the coffers of a small group of prosperous companies and individuals in Canada so sacred that this small amount of $280 million could not come out of this sum. Those $280 millions must come out of the limited purchasing power of the poor people instead of the $18 billion surplus earned by a few privileged individuals and companies in Canada.

Who governs in Canada? Are we living in a democracy elected by the people, for the people? Are we a plutocracy elected by financiers, by banks and company directors only? Whom does the Minister of Finance represent? Is he the representative of the whole people or of the rich, the powerful, the scholars only? When he needs $280 million for the administration of his department, he always spares the "big-earners" who capitalized $18 billion in 1966, and he squeezes the low wage-earners whose deficits and debts increase every year.

That is the topsy-turvy way in which the Department of Finance works, Mr. Chairman. The purchasing power of the low income groups is curtailed to increase the capitalization yield of millionaires.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we are not against millionaires, we are not against capitalization but, under the present system, if other means or sources of revenues cannot be found to obtain capital, the small wage-earner should not always be the one to be overtaxed and the protection of large corporations with billions of dollars hidden in their reserves should cease. Big businesses are allowed to hide all kinds of reserves and the people suffer hardship as a result. When new taxes or new credit restrictions are imposed, low income groups are always the ones who suffer, who pay and who are taxed.

The present sheep-shearing system, Mr. Chairman, is designed to fatten the hogs. Is there prosperity in Canada when 2,400,000 small wage-earners cannot support their families because of their low income or are not making enough money to even pay income tax? Yet the cost of living goes up for them through a taxation system which is crushing low income groups for the benefit of big businesses.

How long will this go on, Mr. Chairman? When will those who are getting fat on crumbs falling off the table of the Canadian poor be satisfied?

Mr. Chairman, for over three years now we have repeatedly asked the Minister of Finance to change his taxation methods. He does not seem to know what to do, so he carries on as heretofore. Is that all he can do, carry on as heretofore? It may be true that man is descended from the monkey, but judging from the minister's actions, some men may not have descended yet.

Mr. Chairman, Canada can no longer be administered as in the past. The past is gone. The past has done its work. The future is at our door-step now and the people to-day do not want yesterday's methods. A nation producing affluence will no longer be content to live in poverty, misery, need and insecurity.

Each year, compared with those citizens who deny themselves the necessities of life, others accumulate some 18 billion in capital. Is this what we call economic balance? Is this the result of what we call a sound administration? Is that what is called good currency circulation? Is that what is called equity among the different members of the same society, those who suffer and those who enjoy life, those who are increasingly suffering besides those with ever-increasing enjoyment and assets?

The proper solution to present conditions has been suggested. Drawers are full of data which are gathering dust and are not taken into consideration, because the situation is deemed satisfactory. Those who have provided slush funds must be repaid. This is the secret of the minister's unconcern before the confusion of the people, the deficit of the government and a $18 billion capitalization of a few individuals and private companies.

The minister has a free hand. Now that he is making up the supplementary guaranteed income of $30 per month with taxes levied on the small wage-earner, with increases of the cost of living and price increases on goods, he expects that the people will no longer ask him for any free services. But he must not rely so soon on his success. The old people are not the only ones who need a guaranteed income for a strict vital minimum, for the right of living in Canada.

This is only the beginning. The minister would do better to ascertain where to raise revenues and levy taxes. He should immediately collect them from the $18 billion of annual capitalization rather than from the low income of small wage-earners who must support their family on a salary insufficient even for an unmarried person, a salary which they do not find satisfactory, a salary which is not sufficient to provide for their normal needs.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Chairman, the people will never be satisfied as long as family allowances are not increased, as long as family allowances are not adjusted according to the cost of living and as long as a salary has not been granted to students, to mothers, in short to all those who need it, in Canada.

In any case, what we need in Canada, Mr. Chairman, is consumers. We have them, but they do not have money to purchase products. The purchasing power is reduced by an increase in taxes, an increase in salaries, an increase in interests on capital. The purchasing power is reduced and so is the value of the Canadian dollar. Canadians have less and less purchasing power. The more Canadians produce, the less money they have to purchase those products.

That situation is not normal, Mr. Chairman.

This situation should be remedied. In such circumstances, one should take the advice of those who suggest solutions. If the minister cannot find better solutions, than those suggested to him, he should at least be gracious enough to accept the ones that are offered. In passing, I should like to tell the hon. minister that we do not seek power, but solutions. If the solutions proposed by the minister are not valid socially and do not satisfy the needs of the people, he should change his way of proceeding. If he cannot find other practical ways of stabilizing the national economy and balancing the budget of every family and individual, let him accept the solutions of those who have found some. Those who offer solutions to the minister are not irresponsible people. The problems have been studied for years, and the minister has not been able to find better solutions for them; he should at least accept those that are offered to him. One fine day he will see that he is able to bring about a satisfactory settlement of the unbalanced economic situation that we are experiencing at the present time.

We even want this guaranteed income for those without personal income to be taken from the fiscal and administrative privileges that are enjoyed by large companies and from people who are granted all kinds of tax reductions because their income tax is not deducted at the source.

We have nothing against the people whose income tax is not deducted at the source. We wish everybody could be like that. Once again, Mr. Chairman, if another formula cannot be found besides taxing at the source to get revenue, we should know at least that those who have money, those who make money, those who have capital, those who have hidden reserves, those who benefit from the present system are also taxed.

With all the people, we want that guaranteed minimum income to come out of the capitalization of $18 billion of some people and companies which are the only ones to know prosperity in Canada, next to the governments which accumulate deficits each year, the large families, the many people who are in debt up to their ears, who cannot balance their budget, and much less pay their taxes.

As far as the small manufacturers and businessmen are concerned, they will soon have to give up, because they are so heavily taxed that they cannot make enough money to pay their taxes. They are unable to expand, to increase their production. They cannot do it because they need new capital and the government will get it through its taxes.

The small manufacturers and businessmen are on the brink of bankruptcy, not to mention those who go bankrupt. There will be a great number of business failures within a few months. As a matter of fact, a large number of small businesses, stores and industries are unable to expand, to balance their budget, to pay their provincial, municipal and school taxes or even their federal taxes.

That is why, Mr. Chairman, we should be most concerned. The situation is serious. If the free enterprise system is to be maintained and helped, if we do not want to be led into the arms of socialism, into the arms of absolute communism, into state socialism which controls and plans everything and where the state spends all the taxpayers' money for them, we must be concerned about the present situation, we must be practical and bring in legislation to balance the Canadian economy. In every sphere of society, in industry in business, in private families, there is a general lack of balance, and that is why there is cause for dissatisfaction across the country.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I shall say this to the minister: It is urgent that he open his eyes and ears and consider the deplorable state of our economy. Reforms must be implemented and they are badly needed because the people of Canada cannot and do not want to wait any longer. Families in need of food cannot wait any longer for food on credit because they have been using credit long enough and their credit rating is now nil. They cannot get any more credit. They must have money, "cash money", and it is our job to see to it that families and institutions are able to administer their own affairs, take advantage of the surplus of goods in Canada, even though one quarter or one third of the population are unemployed or non productive for some reason or other, receiving unemployment insurance or social welfare benefits. If our system enabled us to have a balanced economy, all those people would be working and this would increase productivity which would result in a better economy for Canada; at present they cannot even purchase goods since they do not have the money necessary to provide for their needs.

[English]

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, everyone in the house must have wondered at the philosophy of the government in imposing two taxes on the Canadian public for the purpose, as the minister said, of balancing the budget as a result of the granting of the old age supplementary benefit. There must have been surprise and perhaps even shock when the Minister of National Health and Welfare said that we will have to provide all Canadians with at least a minimum standard of living. It is possible that many people in the Liberal party disagreed with that statement and I think one of them must have been the Minister of Finance. When he introduced the increase in the old age security payment he did not take the opportunity to eliminate the ceiling, something which has been recommended on many occasions and would have brought about the same result as raising the limitation on contributions from $120 to $240. Actually the minister has protected the upper level of taxpayers and therefore he has done exactly the reverse of what the Minister of National Health and Welfare intended in trying to establish a minimum income base. Certainly the sales tax affects all Canadians but it is highly detrimental to people with low incomes. The minister has said that such things as building materials will be exempted from this tax.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: Food and rent, too.

Mr. Peters: Food and rent were exempted before, so we are getting into a different field. Prior to 1963, of course, there were taxes applied on building materials, but we decided we were not going to increase the cost of building materials because the opportunity for house building in the low income groups has practically been eliminated. It is a fact that the poor people in every community in Canada are unable even to paint their houses let alone repair them because of this tax on building materials.

I asked one of my colleagues if I would be correct in assuming that an increase in the sales tax of 1 per cent would probably increase the cost of living by 2 per cent. Last night the hon. member for Lapointe indicated that he believes the cost of living would be increased by 5 per cent. I assume, therefore, I would not be incorrect in suggesting that the cost of living would be increased by 2 per cent. I believe the minister had no right to slap the wrists of the poorer people, whom we have been unable to help, by adding to their difficulties through an increase in the sales tax which is not going to do what the minister implied it would do, that is, balance the old age security fund. In my opinion the fund could have been balanced if the minister had removed entirely the ceiling on contributions to the old age security fund made by those in the higher income brackets. These moneys would have gone directly into the fund. The results achieved when we increased the ceiling on payments into the fund from $90 to $120 indicate that if we had long ago entirely removed the ceiling, which only applies to the upper one-third of income taxpayers, sufficient money would have been provided for a considerable length of time.

I feel that the sales tax is extremely detrimental. I believe that the Liberal party should look at the situation because one minister is trying to raise the standard of living of our people to a reasonable level by setting a minimum income of $105 while at the same time another minister is counteracting that proposal. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has said that eventually there should be a guaranteed minimum annual income for all Canadians, and with that I agree. I believe it is time we took a look at the protection that is necessary for crippled children, for those who are mentally defective and others who are handicapped through no fault of their own. They should be provided with a decent standard of living.

But what have we done? Every person who has to buy clothes, which in Canada are a necessity of life, is to be charged an extra 1 per cent. However, the 1 per cent will be multiplied by the effect of provincial taxes, profits and so on. The increase will probably amount to 5 per cent or 10 per cent finally. These people are not able to buy automobiles or luxury goods and they will find the cost of their ordinary needs increased by reason of the increase in the sales tax.

[Mr. Peters.]

I suggest that in some cases the cost of goods will be 100 per cent higher. I suggest there are many members on the government side who recognize the fact that the 1 per cent increase will be multiplied four or five times and will bring undue hardship to all their constituents who are hard-pressed now. The increase will tend to discourage many constituents who are finding it difficult to make ends meet. I was watching a television program the other night on which it was suggested that one family had a bill of $240 for drugs for one child who has a permanent disability. I believe we would not be true to ourselves if we were to increase the burden of this family by 5 per cent or 10 per cent. I suggest this is the effect a sales tax increase will have.

Mr. Sharp: Will the hon. member permit a question? Would he make the same comments about the sales taxes in the provinces?

Mr. Peters: Yes, I certainly would.

Mr. Sharp: Including the sales tax imposed by the province of Saskatchewan under a C.C.F. government?

Mr. Peters: Yes, the same remarks apply to sales taxes across the board. This type of tax is a greater burden on the low income group than on others. I believe the Saskatchewan tax was for educational purposes in the municipal field where most provinces have difficulty. The individual with a low income is harder hit by educational taxes than by other taxes. I believe it is true in Saskatchewan, as it is in Ontario, that the sales tax has had a more prejudicial effect on the poor people than any other type of tax.

I think the minister will agree that the sales tax on commodities that have to be purchased by individuals is normally added on at the manufacturing level and is multiplied by provincial taxes and the profit that is taken. Eventually the consumer has to pay all this. The minister has mentioned that food is exempted, and that is true. However, when you walk into a grocery store you find that many commodities which the poorest people in the nation have to buy are taxable. It has always surprised me that a necessary item like soap is taxed. Toilet paper, cleaning fluid and many other commodities are also taxed. The increase in the sales tax will apply to such items and will work great hardship on the people.

I suggest that the minister has been giving us a lecture. If the increase in the sales tax is a manifestation of his philosophy, perhaps the nation should be given this type of lecture. Perhaps we should be told to pay our way and to balance our budget. However, just because the minister is angry at the decision of some of his colleagues to provide a minimum supplementary benefit for needy old age pensioners, he should not tax those who are in desperate straits. This is particularly so in the case of the old age pensioners and those in the low income brackets.

I believe that the $155 million which will be added to the old age security fund may still not be enough to keep the fund stable, though I have never felt that it necessarily should be. I have always felt that most of the old age pensioners have worked hard during their lives, at times for as little as 25 cents an hour, and that our present gross national product has resulted from their earning power over the years. But because the cost of living is rising today, these people have been unable to prepare adequately for their retirement. If we are unable to work out some system to care for our elderly citizens through a fund to which they have contributed, then I think it is generally agreed by most Canadians, our gross national product being what it is, that some other means must be found to provide for them.

I believe that the application of this tax is wrong and that the minister will hurt those least able to pay it. In my area many people are applying for the disabled person's allowance, widow's allowance or mother's allowance, and they send me a list of their groceries with the prices they have to pay. Their budgets are very tight, and if the increase in the sales tax is applied to even half the items that they buy it will mean they will have to economize in the only way they can, on food. In this event the minister will to an extent be depriving these people of a commodity that is not even subject to the tax.

I suggest that most people will disagree with the minister's effort when he introduced this budget on December 19 to balance the old age security fund by collecting additional tax to help pay for the supplementary benefits. If we wanted the fund to be in a solvent position we would obviously have removed the $240 ceiling. This step would probably affect those in the $10,000 range who would be able to continue making payments to the fund above the amount of $240 and up to the maximum of their earning capacity. This would provide additional revenue to enable the minister to balance the fund. It is very difficult to say whether this would meet the entire cost. I have not looked up the figures to see how much we took out of the fund when we raised the levy from $90 to $120. Therefore I am only guessing that if we went beyond the $5,000 taxable level the fund would be balanced.

However, I suggest that the country is not necessarily interested in balancing the fund. Enough elections have been fought during the past five years on the old age pension issue to convince everybody in the country that all Canadian citizens want old age pensioners to have a decent standard of living. The people are willing to pay for this because they know they have to. No benefit can be provided unless somebody makes the contributions.

I suggest that many members of the Liberal party who applauded so loudly when the minister introduced this measure will have to wrestle with their consciences when they come to vote for the 1 per cent increase in the excise tax raising it to 12 per cent. They know that it will have a detrimental effect on all those in their ridings in need of welfare who do not now receive the old age supplement. If these members are honest with themselves they will realize that this tax will apply to many of the consumer products these people require.

Other hon. members have mentioned an aspect which will probably appeal to some members much more. I refer to the effect this tax will have on the manufacturing processes in Canada which enable us to trade with other countries. Having talked to officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce about trade with other countries, I believe that an increase of even 1 or 2 per cent in the price of our commodities will make the difference between whether or not Canadian manufacturers will be able to export their goods.

So, Mr. Chairman, for many reasons I am prepared to oppose the introduction of the 1 per cent increase in the sales tax. I might say to the minister that had I been a member of the Ontario legislature when that government took the retrograde step of increasing the sales tax in that province, I would likewise have been happy to oppose such a step as being, in my opinion, not the type of tax that is either good for the economy or good for the low income earners.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few comments on this resolution. First of all, may I say that I think one of the bad features of this tax increase is that the cost of living will go up further. We are trying to help the lower income group, which includes the old age pensioners, by introducing a guaranteed income; yet we are increasing the price of many items that these elderly people need to buy.

Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but we are experiencing difficulty today in competing in the markets of the world. We are committing the folly of increasing our sales tax by 1 per cent, thus making it still more difficult for us to compete. I believe, that this principle is wrong and I am wondering just where we are going in the field of taxation.

In the first place, Mr. Chairman, how necessary is this tax increase? As I understand it, there is a fund, though the Minister of Finance does not seem to know where that fund is. I have heard it said in the house that there is $350 million in the old age security fund. While the amount goes up and down, there ought to be some way to keep the fund in balance. That has not always been done. If there was money in the fund why was it necessary to increase the excise tax? Why could this money not have been used?

• (4:20 p.m.)

The minister says that we must pay as we go, that we must keep things in balance. Why could he not have expended some of the $350 million before raising the sales tax by 1 per cent?

Mr. Sharp: May I answer the question? The fund is purely a bookkeeping entry. There were no funds available. They had been used for other purposes. The fund is merely an account of the amount of tax received and the disbursements paid out. I can assure the hon. member that to find $280 million I had to borrow or impose taxes. Under the circumstances I felt I should raise taxes.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, I accept the minister's statement. I still cannot understand why then we do not operate on a pay as you go basis. If there was no money in the fund, it has been used for other purposes. Why could the minister not take the money he needed from the consolidated revenue fund, where it must have gone?

Mr. Sharp: There is no cash available in that fund. It is simply a bookkeeping item covering the receipts and disbursements. I can assure the hon. member that if I had had spare cash I would not have imposed these taxes. I imposed them purely to raise the cash necessary to make the payments. I have no other source except by borrowing from the public.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, in other words, that money has been used elsewhere. It went into general revenues and has been used.

Mr. Sharp: May I also add that the fund was in deficit. The additional money came out of the consolidated revenue fund. If you look at the history of the fund you will see that it has been in an over-all deficit position since its beginning.

Mr. Rynard: In effect we are paying for our past debts?

Mr. Sharp: No. It is bookkeeping.

Mr. Rynard: Will the Minister of Finance not agree with me that it casts a reflection on the old people of this country to say that this tax has been imposed to give them money? I do not feel happy about that. We are saying to our old people, "We have increased taxes to provide you with money." I understand that raising the old age security tax ceiling from $120 to $240 will bring in about $150 million.

Mr. Sharp: About $135 million.

Mr. Rynard: Would this not have been adequate for a while at least without increasing the excise tax?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Chairman. I would still have had to raise money. I would have had to find the remaining $155 million and I found it by applying the 1 per cent increase in sales tax. I would have had to raise money in some way. I went over the various alternatives in my budget address and gave the reasons for selecting this alternative. One way or another money had to be raised; otherwise I would have had to go into the market and borrow the $155 million. It is as simple as that.

Mr. Rynard: This high finance and bookkeeping are somewhat confusing. I would think that the $130 million odd would have covered us for some time in the foreseeable future. This may not be a fair question, but can the minister say how long it would take to use up the $130 million odd?

Mr. Sharp: In the budget address, Mr. Chairman, I believe I predicted that the fund will remain in balance until 1970 when it will again begin to go sharply into deficit. I did not feel I had a responsibility to make provision beyond that date, by which time the age of recipients will have fallen to 65.

Mr. Rynard: I thank the minister for that answer. This program is projected into the future. Some people in the old age group will not receive anything under the guaranteed income plan. Many will receive $1 or more up to $30 per month. The minister is taxing people who earn, say, $50 a month. People who have done a little work and have earned that much will be taxed $25 by the government. They will therefore obtain about $5 in guaranteed income.

It strikes me that somewhere there is unnecessary bookkeeping and bureaucracy. We are probably looking too far ahead. While nobody can predict exactly what future amounts of money will be required, I would have been happier had the minister used the $130 million and then said to the country, "We need more money; we shall have to impose a tax." This would have been a more common-sense approach, more fair to the old age pensioners. They would not have been reminded that a tax was imposed for them.

I can hear some old people saying, "It seems we must be reminded that we are causing increased taxes and raising the prices of goods everybody buys." The old people earned their money, money that some of them found hard to earn, when the dollar was worth one-third of today's dollar and their wages were less than one-fifth of today's wages. It would have been better had the minister or the government brought in a provision to pay something below $105 a month and utilized the Canada Assistance Plan for increases instead of adopting a plan offering up to $105 a month with a means test in conjunction with programs involving another means test administered by provincial governments. If the minister is as good at bookkeeping as he appears to be, why, especially in view of the deficits which have been mentioned, could he not have found other places to save this money instead of going into a field affecting everybody in this country?

To recapitulate, I say that raising the tax by 1 per cent will make competition more difficult. It will cost the people more money for the things they want. I am alarmed about this. Over one third of our gross national product today goes into taxes. The Minister of Finance must be as alarmed about this as I am. Where does it stop? We are not relieving the municipal taxpayer who still has to pay educational taxes amounting to half of his municipal taxes. Yet we are talking about more taxation which will make it more difficult for people paying municipal taxes to make ends meet. Increasing the sales tax by 1 per cent means, in all probability, a 2 per cent increase at the retail level.

Again I express regret that this tax has been imposed. The minister should have used the $130 million he will collect, then used the consolidated revenue fund, and then proceeded on a pay as you go basis. Such a policy would have been better received and would have cast less reflection upon the old age pensioners who are only receiving what is their due.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Chairman, I shall not be very long. I cannot help rising when this new tax is imposed. My colleague, the hon. member for Compton-Frontenac (Mr. Latulippe) made a magnificent speech, and I support him fully when he objects to that new increase or to that new procedure of the government to get funds.

Be assured, Mr. Chairman, that we, in our party, are totally unable to support the government with regard to that legislation. We shall vote against it and we shall invite as many members as possible to object to such a procedure. We must denounce the misleading approach used by the government to impose again a new tax, and make the people believe that it is a gift for them. The legislation starts as follows:

> That it is expedient to amend the Excise Tax Act to provide that, effective January 1, 1967, the rate of the consumption or sales tax imposed under section 30 of the said act be increased from 8 per cent to 9 per cent with respect to all goods subject to the said tax—

Now, Mr. Chairman, here in this expression "from 8 per cent to 9 per cent", it seems that the minister wants to soften the whipping that he is going to give once again to the poor taxpayer, to the small worker. The minister should tell him—at least, he should be frank —that the new tax of 1 per cent that he is imposing will actually increase the excise tax up to 12 per cent. Why not cease to play with words. From 8 per cent to 9 per cent? No, no. The tax actually stands at 11 per cent. Why does not the minister simply say that from now on, it will be 12 per cent, in order to show the people he is a little more frank, because when I hear such an announcement, I am wondering whether a minister can, in all seriousness, go back to the people without putting on at least a mask of sincerity.

That is partly what I do not like in practically all those pieces of legislation. On close study, one realizes that the final purpose of government measures is always to take more money from the taxpayers.

It is somewhat like fishing. The most attractive bait is put on the hook which is as small as possible to catch the whole thing. Successive governments have always proceeded in that manner. They weaken the worker, not enough to kill him but just enough to hold him and deprive him of any energy to revolt against governments.

Such is the rule of the game, because if the taxpayer becomes too strong, if he is given too much money and too much latitude, he would be very likely to revolt. Believe me, financiers secure in their position would not remain that way very long.

The people are weakened by taxes and their purchasing power is reduced all the time. Thus, it is possible to satisfy those who give orders.

Mind you, I am not criticizing the minister at all today. I duly noted his answer to the previous speaker who asked him whether he could not have found those $280 million elsewhere. The minister answered: there were only two things I could do, either borrow or impose a tax. Those were the only two methods, according to the minister: borrow or impose a tax.

I would have like the discussion to go on, because I understood the minister's words to mean that when a tax must be imposed, it always applies to the lower income groups.

I would like to hear the hon. minister say just for once if it would have been possible to get this money from those who can pay, the big financiers, whom he is constantly protecting, to whom he grants favours every day and who are permitted to have hidden reserves totalling two, three, four and five million dollars. We are told that there was no other alternative, that he was forced to introduce this tax. But to whom should it apply? We feel this tax should have been imposed on those who could pay.

I understand the hon. minister's position quite well. They could not act otherwise because they were elected precisely by those important financiers; they owe their seats to these people and they must watch over their interests. It is well known that the two old parties are supported by financial interests. Someone was telling me the other day: "What can we do? They elected us, and we must work for them".

The minister is consistent. He was elected by financiers to protect them, to save them, to let them make money to the detriment of the people, as always and he fulfils his functions. What I do not like is when he tries to make the people believe that he is working in their best interest. This I like much less. Let him say it when he returns before the people: "I have fulfilled my function. I was elected by the financiers and I have worked on their behalf. If ever you want people to work for you, elect them. So far as I am concerned, I have worked for those who have elected me."

Well, Mr. Chairman, this is understandable, especially when it is realized how members of our group have been elected. They were elected with the pennies of the people, of the workers. We cannot put up with this sort of thing and that is why we insist on objecting. And we ask the people to open their eyes and to see how much they are being hoodwinked. If the people fail to open their eyes and if they keep on voting for these people every four years for $2, $3 or $5, I say that within two, three or four years, as the hon. member for Compton-Frontenac mentioned, in this democracy which is not a democracy at all but the worse monetary dictatorship ever in any country of the world, we will not hear anything more about private enterprise. To think that in our small towns the situation is such that certain businessmen are trying to sell their property because they are overtaxed.

There are municipal, school, provincial and federal taxes, and when all those taxes are paid, there is barely a livelihood left. And you have that 11 per cent tax on building materials which will increase by 1 per cent. If the government has no other means than to tax the worker, it should resign, for it has failed at its job.

It is undermining the foundations of this country in order to please a handful of big financiers. I believe the people will refuse to stand such a hoax any longer on the part of financiers and especially of governments which endlessly bait them in order to catch them and sell them to financiers.

Some of the older people will receive a maximum of $30; some others will get $20, $2, $3. In my area, a small group of people, about 15 per cent of the older people, will get a little more. Perhaps more older people will get a larger amount in large centres, but in my area most of them are going to get something, namely $3, $4, $5. Now in order to be able to give $4, $5, $10 or $15 more to older people they are taxing everybody. Yes, everybody, except the rich. When I say everybody, I mean the people as a whole. Great care is taken so that the rich will not be taxed. They are taxing the people as a whole, in order to give crumbs to older people, to provide bureaucrats with a handsome pay or to snoop around in the homes of our older people and then they will go proclaiming throughout the country: See, we gave you $30.

No, Mr. Chairman, I want to draw the people's attention to the fact that it is only a masquerade like most of the welfare legislation adopted here, and we strongly object to all that trickery practiced against the people.

• (4:40 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the criticism of this bill by the opposition. I should like to say a few words in joining with the critics of the government because I have many reasons for blaming the government today and would like to expose them to the house. First, I should like to blame the government for not paying salaries to all Canadians and for not paying 100 per cent of the educational costs of students up to age 30 or 35 or for all of their lives should they wish to continue to go to university. I should like to blame the government for not keeping the three services, the army, the navy and the air force, for not doubling the pay of each member of these forces, and for not tripling the enrolment if possible. I should like to blame the government for not increasing old age pensions to at least $100 week. I should like also to blame the government for not increasing family allowances to at least $25 a month for each child living at home.

I should like to blame the government for not building castles for prisoners and for not supplying them with doctors, psychiatrists, masseurs, secretaries and so on. I should also like to blame the government for forcing everybody to keep on working like hell in this prosperous country of ours. I should like to blame the government for not paying for all our medical, surgical and hospital services and for not paying for monthly vacations, check-ups and so on. I should like to blame the government for not firing thousands of civil servants or at least forcing them to work for the glory of our country.

I should like to blame the government for not bawling out the United States and telling them that we do not need any of their money in this prosperous country of ours. I should like to blame the government for not abolishing the taxes which are sucking the life blood out of all Canadians. I should like to blame the government for not changing this stupid natural law by which man is condemned to work by the sweat of his brow. After all, why should this government which has been elected by the people not make of this country of ours an earthly paradise? Are we not the richest country in the word? Have we not the best government in the world? Have we not the most co-operative opposition in the world? Why should we be prevented from living like millionaires? I would even go further. If there is any Canadian who is well off after all these regulations are passed and is paying income tax at the rate of 40 per cent, 50 per cent or 60 per cent he should be made to pay 99½ per cent.

When one listens to all the critics of the government one might be tempted to go to extremes. One might be led to believe that there can be in this world of ours a government which can provide an earthly paradise for the people without charging anybody any taxes. I suppose we could use our gold mines and perhaps print some paper money—greenbacks—to take care of the cost. I suppose we could work out some kind of a miracle. No, Mr. Chairman, I do not think some of us really are serious when we offer these many and perpetual criticisms, because they are not logical.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, while some members of the opposition blame the government for increasing the sales tax—which is perfectly normal, because we figure that at the present time inflation has spread so seriously that we must resort to any means to try and control it—the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) states the interests of his electors, those small wage earners, those small consumers and says: "That is fine. Why do some blame the government for increasing the sales tax?" Then he ridicules those who blame the government.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege because the member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) put words in my mouth which I did not utter. According to him, I said that things were going well; on the contrary, I said that they were going badly.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, because the member for Trois-Rivières delivered his whole which in English, maybe he did not understand it himself, but to anyone who can read between the lines, and judging from the applause of the Liberal members and the Minister of Finance, it is obvious that the speech of the member for Trois-Rivières had no other object than to manifest once again his wish to join the Liberal party. Once again, he grovelled before the Liberal party. He told them: "Some people blame you, but not me." That is what the member for Trois-Rivières meant.

Mr. Mongrain: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. The member for Lapointe says that I have a tendency to grovel. I want nothing in common with the member for Lapointe.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I leave it to those who heard me, and especially those who will read the speech of the member for Trois-Rivières, to judge which one is grovelling before the government.

While we are here to defend the interests of consumers, workers and small wage-earners, the member for Trois-Rivières approves the tax increases; he is satisfied with that. To prove my case, anyone who will read his speech will conclude that he tried to be facetious; he tried to resort to a low form of wit—but he failed miserably—to prove that those who criticize the government for increasing taxes, are persons who criticize unceasingly.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that those who criticized the government for increasing taxes again were right in doing so, under the present situation. Moreover, I feel that when a member like the member for Trois-Rivières approves such an increase, as is proved by the tone of his speech—I leave it to those who will read it to judge it—as I say, when a member like the member for Trois-Rivières, who is supposed to represent the small wage-earners and consumers in this house, approves these tax increases, he gives precedence to his wish to belong to the Liberal party over the interests of his voters.

We have had proof of it time and time again. I admit the Liberal party may not be too eager to have him, because it already has, within its ranks, enough of those men who set aside their own opinions in order to respect party policy. Having the proof that the member for Trois-Rivières likes to tag along—a question of privilege? No. Well, the hon. member admits it then—I would ask the Minister of Finance to become his sponsor and recommend his admission to the ranks of his party. Then the member for Trois-Rivières will be happy and content, he will have reached his goal, though at the expense of his voters, the consumers and the small wage-earners of the riding of Trois-Rivières.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. The hon. member for Trois-Rivières rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, naturally I did not rise on a question of privilege every time I could have done so for then I should have risen repeatedly, but the member for Lapointe has said that the member for Trois-Rivières likes to tag along. I want to object to that allegation. He said also that the member for Trois-Rivières wanted his admission in the ranks of the Liberal party. This is at least one advantage I have over the hon. member for Lapointe, because I find no party, no colleague in the house who would like to be near him here in this chamber.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mongrain: The hon. member for Lapointe blames me for favouring increased taxes. I should like to tell him that the Trois-Rivières constituents have never been used to listening to demagogues. They have been accustomed to listening to, and electing, those who speak the language of common sense. That is the reason the hon. member for Lapointe will never be elected in the Trois-Rivières area.

Mr. Grégoire: Which only goes to confirm what I said a while ago, Mr. Chairman.

[English]

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

EXCISE TAX AND OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-268, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Old Age Security Act.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we now proceed with the second reading of the bill?

Mr. Monteith: Where are the bills, or is there just one?

Mr. Sharp: There is just one.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it now agreed that we proceed with second reading?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sharp moved the second reading of the bill.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is a very simple bill intended to carry out the two resolutions approved by the committee of the whole. I do not have any comment to make about them, but I will explain the various clauses when we reach the committee stage.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has just said that this is a very simple bill based on the two budget resolutions which we have passed. I might point out that this was done on division in respect of the one relating to sales tax.

As hon. members are aware, the bill has just come into our hands so that I have not had time to read it. I note that it comprises five pages, four of which have reference to changes in the Excise Tax Act, commonly known as the sales tax. In terms of volume, the most significant effect of this bill is that it increases the general sales tax from 8 per cent to 9 per cent. This has the effect of increasing the total federal sales tax from 11 per cent to 12 per cent.

As we have indicated several times, both during the course of the debate on the motion that Mr. Speaker leave the chair and during the consideration in the committee, this increase in sales tax is unnecessary and iniquitous. We also feel that the effect this tax has on the cost of living is particularly serious insofar as people in the lower income brackets are concerned, and that the minister is doing a disservice to the country by raising this tax at this time.

This bill does not sit well with the government's concern about the cost of living, expressed when it agreed that this should be a matter for committee study, and it does not sit well with the government's concern, as expressed at times by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen), in repect of a guaranteed minimum income for citizens of this country. Therefore we want to register our unqualified opposition to the government's proposal to raise the general sales tax.

I want also to indicate, and I shall do it briefly because several of us dealt with this matter at other stages, that we think it is particularly unfair to the old age pensioners of this country that the increase in the sales tax is being brought in at this time. Argue as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) may, the impression created in the country is that this tax increase was made necessary because of the guaranteed income supplement being added to the old age security pension. The fact that the amount of money to be spent on that supplement in the first year is $280 million, and that the government is seeking by two tax changes to raise $290 million, certainly strengthens this impression in the minds of the people of this country. But it is very clear, and that clarity is underlined in the bill now before us, Bill C-268, that although the extra money to be raised by putting the ceiling on the old age security tax up to $240 will go into the old age security fund, the money to be raised by the increase in the sales tax will not go into that fund at all. Therefore, on all counts we are against the proposal to increase the sales tax at this time.

I regret that the minister has taken the course of putting these two propositions into one bill. There were two separate resolutions, one to the effect that the Old Age Security Act should be amended and the other to the effect that the Excise Tax Act should be amended. I think it would have been more proper for the minister to have presented two separate bills. However, for reasons of his own, whatever they may be, he has chosen to put them into the one bill. Despite that fact, we find the increase in the sales tax so objectionable, so iniquitous and so unfair that we want to register our objection to it. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett):

That Bill C-268 be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months hence.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to say that we are heartily in accord with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I would also like to reiterate the hon. member's statement that there should have been two bills. We were presented with two separate resolutions and we think they should have been followed by two separate bills. However, I do not want to deal at length with our disagreement with the government on this particular bill. On several occasions in the past we have expressed our disagreement with the government's action in increasing the sales tax by 1 per cent. It will increase the cost of living and will most seriously affect those whom the minister has intimated are supposed to benefit.

I would also point out that the sales tax will go into general revenue. The thought that has gotten abroad, and I do not think it has been denied publicly by the government, is that both these additional taxes will benefit the recipients of old age security. This is not so. The old age security fund will only benefit by the amount of the increase in income tax; the money derived from the sales tax increase will go into general revenue.

It is a fallacy to believe that these additional taxes will benefit the recipients of old age security, because this is simply not true. I think the people of Canada should be made aware of this fact. Certain newspapers took from the minister's remarks of December 19 last that the two taxes were imposed in order to benefit the recipients of old age security. It must be understood that this is not so. I want to say again that the sales tax increase cannot help but increase the cost of living. It is another tax to be borne by the people of this country and will impose an additional burden on those in the lower income bracket. We feel it is an iniquitous increase and should not have been considered. As a consequence, Mr. Speaker, we heartily endorse the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the resolutions that were introduced, the principles of which are now incorporated in this bill, was allegedly to give the senior citizens of Canada what the minister termed last December a Christmas present. I think this is a rather shoddy way to introduce this measure, because it singled out a particular group of people as being responsible for this obnoxious increase in taxation.

[Mr. Knowles.]

This was very clearly set forth yesterday by my colleague, the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. Johnston), and I do not propose to deal with the matter in detail. Nevertheless, I should like to emphasize the fact that the senior citizens of this country do not look with any degree of appreciation upon the fact that the measure was introduced in this way and, of course, neither do the people of Canada in general.

We all recognize the importance and necessity of an increase in the pensions of our senior citizens. I do not think we have to argue in favous of that principle; it is supported by all hon. members whether they sit on the opposition or government side. Nevertheless we take very strong exception to the principle that was enunciated in this instance which, as I have said, singled out this particular group of people and placed upon them, by implication at least, the burden of a further increase in the already onerous taxation which the people of Canada are called upon to bear.

We do not take too strong exception to the increase in the old age security tax assessment from $120 to $240 mainly because this affects people in the medium and high income brackets. However, we do take very strong exception to the increase in the sales tax which has been outlined in the resolution and is now in the legislation, because it contributes still further to the spiralling cost of living. We all know the strong stand that has been taken by various Canadian organizations with regard to the increase in the cost of living. We are aware of the steps that have been taken to try to discover the reasons for the cost of living spiral. Some of the provincial governments have appointed their own committees. A committee of both houses of this parliament was appointed to study this problem and it is still in the process of considering the factors which contribute to it.

While the joint committee is studying this matter the government has now introduced another measure which contributes to a further increase in the cost of living. I think that this is another example of the government working against its own policies, enunciating a policy and then turning around and frustrating the realization of the objectives which it has indicated it has in mind. The same thing has happened with regard to the emphasis which was put on home construction and home ownership in that immediately after the government introduced policies diametrically opposed to the objectives it had stated were part of its policy. Here again we find that the government has expressed concern about the increased cost of living and then has turned around and adopted a policy which contribute to the aggravation of that very problem.

An increase in taxation does not always result in increased revenue. A point of diminishing return can be reached at which the revenue instead of increasing will decrease because of the effect of the policy upon the economy. Therefore I think that at this time we should impress upon the government the fact that taxation in Canada has pretty well reached the maximum level which the Canadian people can bear.

A few days ago my leader, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson), pointed out that taxation takes more than 50 per cent of the income of Canadian people. Now that Canadians have to work six months of the year to cover the cost of government operations the situation has become serious and we must conclude that there is something drastically wrong with the economy. I believe that the time has come when the government should cut back on some of its unnecessary expenditures in order to meet its responsibility to the Canadian people without increasing the burden of taxation which Canadians have to bear. I understand that the government has given the go-ahead signal for quite a vast program of construction of public buildings in the capital area. Perhaps we could get along without some of those buildings and use some of the money to meet other commitments.

While we support legislation designed to give our senior citizens additional assistance we strenuously oppose and reject the manner in which this measure is being financed. We believe that the government should accept the responsibility and find some other way of discharging it without increasing taxation. We believe that the time has come when a decrease rather than an increase in taxation should be effected. We have stated many times that this should be done.

We have been told that the commission on taxation is studying the matter and will bring in recommendations, but goodness knows when they will be brought in. The minister is very noncommittal. Every time the question is asked he tells us that he does not wish to go out on a limb and commit himself to any particular time because he does not know. In view of the length of time which the commission has spent in studying this matter I suggest that the minister should know. We wish to impress upon the commission the necessity of bringing forth recommendations and tabling its report so that we can find out the results of its months of study. Although we support the increase in pensions we are opposed to the method by which the government proposes to finance this added responsibility.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak on this bill at any length but I feel that I cannot let it go by without voicing emphatically my opposition to it on the ground that it will raise the cost of living for those people in particular who are finding it most difficult to bear at the present time. This group consists to a very large degree of the old age pensioners of this country. When the legislation was announced just before Christmas manufacturers all across the country said quite definitely that an additional 1 per cent tax at the manufacturers' level would mean a minimum 2 per cent increase in the cost to the consumer. Only last fall we saw how hard pressed the consumers are, as expressed through housewives' boycotts all across the country. They did not particularly wish their protests to take this form but they were hard pressed to the point where they had to demonstrate.

It is all very well to speak in terms of averages. Last night I was given an excellent example of how the statistician's definition of average works out. It is like putting a man's head in the furnace and his feet on a block of ice and saying that he should be pretty comfortable, on the average. This is exactly what happens in regard to the average person in this country. The average person may be in a position to absorb this additional tax on top of the higher prices but people in the lower income groups are not in such a position.

I think that the government did the right thing last fall in referring the problem of the cost of living to the consumer credit committee for its study. I have been to a good many places all across this country and I know that people are looking forward hopefully to the results of the study of that committee. They are asking, when can we expect results? It is a good thing to look into the cost of living across the country, but people are waiting anxiously for results in the form of legislation.

Excise Tax and Old Age Security Act

I say to the government that these people are going to feel rather badly when they realize that while the government has established a committee to look into the various aspects of the cost of living it has at the same time introduced this measure which will increase the cost of living in so many fields. People are not going to be deceived too long by this sort of action. When they catch on they will definitely question the sincerity of a government which, on the one hand, establishes a committee to study the cost of living and, on the other hand, goes ahead with measures which raise the cost of living for people who can least bear it.

We feel very strongly that this type of tax should not be imposed as a means of helping people in the old age pension group because at the same time we say we are helping them we are making things more difficult for them by increasing the sales tax. I just want to say, Mr. Speaker, that we in this group feel this is not a straightforward, honest way to meet the needs of this group. We are completely and thoroughly opposed to this measure of taxation.

Mr. Stewart: Will the hon. lady permit a question?

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Yes.

Mr. Stewart: I should like to ask the hon. lady whether she agrees that, at least in the long run, the cost of this increase must be met? If her answer to that question is in the affirmative then what particular tax increases would she propose?

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): It is not my job to propose particular tax increases. I am dealing with the measure before us upon which we are being asked for our opinion. There are other measures and we have mentioned them at various times.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words about this bill and about the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Speaker, I will not have to make a long speech to say once again how strongly I object to sales taxes and especially to any increase. What I will do later will show that I am against those sales taxes.

Late in 1966 when the minister brought down the mini-budget, he asked us to approve that increase in taxes to assume the cost of increasing the old age security pension or rather to assume the cost of the supplementary income.

Mr. Speaker, to accept this bill now would be to accept at the same time the principle that to give a little more to the old people it is necessary to take a little more from the young, from the people who work and others. I do not share that opinion, Mr. Speaker, because before granting an allowance to someone, the first thing to consider is whether the country's industrial or productive capacity can afford it.

It is somewhat the same thing as far as the increase in the old age security pension is concerned. The amount our senior citizens will receive at the end of March or April will be used to buy the things they need. Then, we must ask ourselves whether the country can give them the things they need. If it can, well, let us see to it that they get them, without, however, taking away from others what they are entitled to according to their salary and income.

This is the reason why, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to increasing this tax for I know that industry and production in general can afford to provide the elderly with the things they need. Then if the minister believes that they require a higher income, all he has to do is to request the Bank of Canada to create enough credit to permit the purchase of the goods already produced.

When the minister introduced his mini-budget in December 1966, he said that he needed 290 million dollars, that he would raise this amount by means of this increased tax. However, a while ago the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson) remarked that such a tax increase of 1 per cent, for instance, would not necessarily mean an increase in income, since with an increase in the cost of living people will buy less and the income will decrease accordingly.

To support what was said by the hon. member for Fraser Valley, I shall call the minister's attention to another point. The raise of $30 that some elderly people will get will serve to increase the country's business, purchases, trade and taxes already included in the price of the merchandise offered, including clothing and some consumer products. The higher amount that the older citizens will be able to spend by itself will increase income. Apparently, the Minister of Finance has not taken into account those millions of dollars in circulation during the next year, which will increase incomes.

Then, for all those considerations, I object to the 1 per cent tax increase and this is why I support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice-Laflèche): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments following the speeches made in the house this afternoon on the budget resolutions or on the motion for second reading of his bill amending the Excise Tax Act and Old Age Security Act.

In the first place, and this is quite interesting, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) mentioned earlier that the bill, even if it was quite simple, included four pages dealing with the sales tax and only one paragraph concerning old age security.

However, I wish to point out to him that three of the four pages he mentioned contain nothing but exceptions; in other words, these are items to which the new 1 per cent sales tax will not apply. Therefore, I was rather surprised at the intervention of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). He said that the bill was very significant because it was four pages long, but had he taken the time to read the bill, he would have realized that three of the four pages he mentioned listed nothing but items exempt from the new sales tax.

The hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier), who also took part in the debate did not quite seem to understand the budget resolution. He accused the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) of not telling the truth and of not giving the house all the information available because the budget resolution mentions an increase in the sales tax from 8 to 9 per cent.

I should simply like to point out to him that this is, of course, a question of terminology, and that the Minister of Finance did not at any time mention that he was raising the sales tax from 11 to 12 per cent. The budget speech which he made on December 19, 1966 clearly indicated that the sales tax would be increased from 11 to 12 per cent, except in a few cases. He did not at any time try to misinform the house, and if the budget resolution mentioned an increase in the tax from 8 to 9 per cent, it was because the sales tax is divided into two different sectors, one added to the general revenue fund and the other to the old age security fund. But at no time did the minister imply that the sales tax was only of 9 per cent.

One of the most remarkable interjections, both on account of its brevity and its logic, was, I think, that of the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain).

It is about time, Mr. Speaker, for the members of this house, who have been elected by the people, to start talking sense. It is useless to try to make people believe that we find money on trees or that some obscure mechanism in the Bank of Canada can be used to solve all our problems. Money spent at any level of government comes out of the pockets of the taxpayers.

I think that it is quite logical that we should be able to say to our electors that if we increased the old age security, we are ready to pay for it. It is no use postponing that tax increase for six, eight or 12 months; it would only be lying to the electors.

The hon. member for Trois-Rivières was perfectly right when he said that too many in this house are trying to make believe that by passing legislation we could solve the problems very easily or that through a single piece of legislation we could guarantee a maximum income to all the taxpayers and citizens of Canada. The system is not like that; there is not a single system in the world which works like that. In any country, when an administration decides to grant social or other benefits to the population, it is because they have decided to raise taxes or get the money from the taxpayers' pockets.

This budget shows our concern not to direct taxes against people with small incomes. There is no clearer illustration of this than the raise in the old age security tax. We raised the maximum from $120 to $240. By so doing, we reached only one third of the taxpayers, those in the top income bracket, so that the other two thirds with lower incomes might not contribute at this time to the tax increase required to pay for the increased old age security.

• (5:30 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: Would the hon. member permit a question? May I ask the parliamentary secretary why the government set the limit at $240? If the government was interested in collecting money from those best able to provide it, why did it not apply the 4 per cent across the board with no limit of $240, as the members of this party have proposed on many occasions?

Mr. Chrétien: I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) should take the time to read the budget speech delivered by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) on December 19. He will find the answer there.

Mr. Peters: No, he will not.

Mr. Chrétien: The minister wanted to maintain the balance between those who receive the old age pension and those who pay for it, and it was a good step to take in that direction. I think the old age security fund was established in that spirit, and if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was in the house at the time he can probably testify to that.

Mr. Knowles: You want the poor to pay for their own pensions.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Anyway, Mr. Speaker, back to what I was saying before the hon. member for Winnipeg North cut in, as far as the sales tax is concerned, we know that this tax is unpleasant. But let the hon. members name, if they can, one tax which is pleasant, one single field with regard to which everybody congratulates us and encourages us to increase taxes. There are none and taxes are always painful. However, in this case, we wanted, if possible, a tax without tears. And that is why the sales tax does not apply, for instance, to food, fuel and building supplies.

And if my hon. friends opposite will take time to read the bill, they will find three pages of exemptions and I could enumerate them, if I wanted to take the time of the house. But anybody can read them as well as I can.

Mr. Laprise: Would you allow me a question?

Mr. Chrétien: Yes.

Mr. Laprise: How can the hon. member say that those items on page 2, Schedule VI, Part 1 and 2, will not be increased by 1 per cent when other items, in the same stores, will be increased by 1 per cent?

Mr. Chrétien: Well, Mr. Speaker, I understand that this is a tax raised at the manufacturer level, not at the retailer level. It will apply to the wholesaler and then, he will make the distinction because he will want to charge as little as possible. Naturally, he will not add the tax to the items which he is not compelled to tax, for he himself is answerable to the Minister of National Revenue in this regard.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, throughout the debate on the mini-budget we made it clear to the people that all in all we are for social security. No one on this side of the house can take a more just pride than ourselves in having launched social security in Canada. We now probably have one of the best social security systems in the world. Many countries envy us in this regard.

However, due to the present state of our economy, we can not act irresponsibly. People expect more today, because they are better informed. Perhaps in 1910 or 1911, it was possible to get away with telling the people similar tales, but the information media being what they are today people are not easily taken in any more. I believe they can take their responsibilities and that is what we have been doing for several months.

It is interesting to note that last year, in the United States, newspapers and magazines were filled with articles criticizing the Johnson administration for refusing to accept its responsibilities, waiting until after the expected fall elections to raise the taxes. According to several economists, this delay caused excessive inflationary pressures throughout last spring and fall.

If the government had taken its responsibilities when the Canadian government did with the March 1966 budget, that is when we felt inflationary pressures in Canada; we took immediate action—the results would have been much better for the North American economy as a whole. And if Canada suffered from inflation during the last three months of 1966, it is perhaps mostly due to the fact that the Americans did not have the courage to act as the Minister of Finance and Receiver General (Mr. Sharp) did here in Canada.

In any case, Mr. Speaker, after the mini-budget was brought down the people said, as reported in the Canadian press: It is really painful and taxes are high, but there is a direct connection between government taxes and expenditures, and as the government had committed itself since March to maintain an almost balanced budget, there was nothing else to do than to levy a tax following the increase in old age security. And the advantage derived from this is that from now on, when we see electoral platforms, we might realize that there is a direct connection between the purse and the electoral program. And what is even more astonishing is that today we have heard, for the first time perhaps in 40 years in this house, the members of the New Democratic Party, for instance the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), say this: "It is true that the taxes should be raised when there is an increase in old age security."

I believe that if, by means of this mini-budget, we have only succeeded in bringing home even to the members of the New Democratic Party that whenever money is spent, it has to come out of the taxpayers' pockets, then, this December mini-budget will prove to have been a useful measure, and I believe that the public at large will agree with me on this point.

• (5:40 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, when any minister of the crown comes into the house, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) did with this bill, and says that the bill is a simple one, that statement should serve as a red warning light to all members of the house to have a good look at the measure. I incline to the well-worn phrase, beware of Greeks bearing gifts.

Before dealing with the substance of the bill I wish to comment on its form. At the present time it seems that the Liberal government is showing a desire to lay all its eggs in one basket and then to scramble them thoroughly. I say this because yesterday the house concurred in a resolution preceding a money bill without any bill being introduced for first reading according to the normal procedure which we had expected would be followed. Now we find that we have before us a bill to amend two different acts.

There have been discussions in and outside the house among members about the desirability of moving toward a shortening of discussion on the resolution stage of bills. I suggest that if this trend continues we may find parliament faced one day with a situation where the government brings in all its resolutions at one time and at the end of the session introduces an omnibus bill with all the resolutions in one basket, so to speak. That would make it difficult indeed for members to determine what the principle of the bill was.

While what I have said so far may not be sufficient grounds for supporting the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), nevertheless there are substantial grounds for agreeing that this bill should not be read a second time now. The proposal to increase taxes is open to argument and arguments have already been advanced in that regard. The subject, it seems to me, divides itself into two parts. I can argue, as other members have, that the proposal to increase taxes at this time is unjustified and unwarranted. I propose to say, however, that if in the minister's view a tax increase at this time is necessary the minister has gone about imposing the increase in the wrong way.

I noticed that when my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), was speaking, the canny Scottish instincts of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Stewart) came to the fore. He raised the question of taxation and what we would propose to do. In that connection I say, not only about the proposal we have before us but also with respect to the levying of the federal sales tax in general, that I have long felt it is one of the most regressive forms of taxation in the country. Any proposal to increase such taxation should be resisted because it is regressive. Most of us know that this form of tax has a multiplier effect. The arguments advanced by hon. members such as the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway about the unnecessary effect this tax has on the cost of living and its particular effect on the lower income groups are well justified.

Mr. Stewart: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Would he answer the question that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway declined to answer? Would he tell the house what kind of tax increase he would prefer if in the long run he is prepared to concede that a tax increase will be necessary?

Mr. Barnett: I am coming to that, and if the hon. member will be patient I will suggest something that he and the Minister of Finance might consider. I was about to say that under our marketing system mark-ups are made in percentages. Goods pass from the manufacturer to the wholesaler or jobber and then to the retail level, and the result is that the tax paid indirectly by the consumer is much greater than the amount flowing into the federal treasury as the result of the imposition of taxes. This is a wrong principle of taxation, I submit, and one which we should go to considerable lengths to avoid.

I am prepared to suggest something that the hon. member and the Minister of Finance might consider. We are all aware that between the federal and provincial levels of governments at various times these have been tax rental arrangements whereby the federal government has acted as the agent to collect taxes for remission to the provincial authorities. The Minister of Finance might consider asking for some quid pro quo in this connection. In other words, if at the federal level we collect taxes for the provincial authority, why should we not ask the provincial authority to do the same thing for us? If the Minister of Finance insists on using the sales tax approach to raise additional revenue I think it would be much less unfair to collect that tax at the retail level. Most of the provinces have arrangements for collecting sales tax and the people know how much they pay.

I offer this suggestion as my own idea. If the minister wants to discuss such a proposal at the next meeting of the federal and provincial finance ministers, and if he needs a 2 per cent sales tax increase, why could he not suggest to the provincial governments that instead of collecting 5 per cent they collect 7 per cent and remit the 2 per cent to the federal coffers?

Mr. Sharp: Could I ask the hon. gentleman a question arising out of his interesting suggestion? Is he in favour of a sales tax?

Mr. Barnett: There is always an easy answer, of course, and that is to say that we do not like any taxes. However, we all recognize realities. I see the Minister of Finance applauding. One can say that the minister has a special reason for liking taxes less than some of the rest of us. We all agree that he has a duty to propose the levying of taxes in some form.

Mr. Douglas: What about a capital gains tax? There is lots of room there.

Mr. Barnett: As my leader suggests, a capital gains tax might be considered. That has been put forward from this quarter of the house many times. No minister of finance on the other side has ever seen fit to act on that suggestion. I am trying to suggest something a little different and I do so because, as I argued, the sales tax has a multiplier effect on the cost of goods at the retail level. It is a regressive form of taxation that we should seek to avoid and abolish.

On the general principle of having any sales tax there are arguments pro and con. If I entered into a discussion of that field I fear that Mr. Speaker might question whether my remarks were relevant to the principle of the bill before us. What I am prepared to argue is that a sales tax levied at the retail level is a much less unfair and, to that extent, more desirable form of taxation than the proposition the minister has put forward in this bill.

[Mr. Barnett.]

• (5:50 p.m.)

I think the house might very well support the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre and put the measure on ice, as it were, at least long enough for the Minister of Finance to have an opportunity to explore the possibilities of the alternative I have brought to his attention.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my intervention will not be for very long.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Orlikow: I was moved to rise by the remarks of the parliamentary secretary, which I found to be both amusing and confusing. First of all, we object to any increase in the sales tax because we know from experience that an increase of 1 per cent amounts to a great deal more when it is passed on to the consumer. I can tell the minister and the parliamentary secretary that already the prices of a whole series of prescription drug items have increased not by 1 per cent but by 5 per cent and 10 per cent. If the minister does not know of this I will be glad to supply him with full information together with examples of what has happened.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Rosthern is rising to ask a question if the hon. member will allow one.

Mr. Nasserden: Speaking of detailed information, does the hon. member recall that when the C.C.F. party was in power in Saskatchewan it doubled the sales tax?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Orlikow: I come from the province of Manitoba where only last week the Conservative provincial government introduced a sales tax. The provincial governments, whatever party they may represent, have found to their sorrow that the sales tax is one of the few sources from which they can raise revenue. I do not like it and they do not like it. I am suggesting that the federal government has a great deal more flexibility and that no federal government needs to increase a sales tax which is already too high.

In the few moments at my disposal I should like to deal with the rhetorical question asked by the parliamentary secretary. He knew the answer before he asked it. There are a number of ways in which the Minister of Finance could have raised the money he thought he needed to pay for the increases which will go to the old age pensioners. Several members have already mentioned a capital gains tax. We have also suggested that the $1.5 billion being spent on national defence could be reduced substantially without greatly impairing the efficiency of our defence forces.

I wish to deal specifically, however, with one clause in the bill under which I suggest the minister might have raised a very substantial amount of money. I refer to the proposal in clause 5 under which the act is amended so that 4 per cent of a taxpayer's taxable income for the year is earmarked for his old age security contribution up to a maximum of $240 a year. I made a rough calculation to see how this affects me personally. I found that if there were no limitation of $240 I would be paying $360 or another 50 per cent. I suggest to the minister that members of parliament, cabinet ministers, who make even more money than ordinary members, and the business and professional people of this country who make $10,000, $15,000 or $20,000 a year or more can afford to pay 4 per cent without a maximum of $240 a great deal more easily than the hundreds of thousands who will find that as a result of the sales tax the cost of every item they buy has been increased, save for the few exceptions listed in the bill.

Why has the minister not seen fit to abolish this limitation? He has not done so for a very simple reason. He believes it is wrong for the rich to pay much more than they will get from the pension when they receive it. There can be no other explanation.

Mr. Sharp: The hon. member is attributing motives to me which I deny most forcefully. The reason I have done this is to follow the pattern which he and his party have endorsed over many years. The amount of the limiting figure has been increased in a series of steps—$90, $120, $240. I deny the implication that I am following my present course in order to protect anybody in the community.

Mr. Speaker: Is the minister rising to close the debate?

Mr. Orlikow: I was not imputing any motive to the minister. I read his speech on the mini-budget carefully. I remember his budget speech of April last. I have tried to understand why the limitation is there. I want to tell him that the members of this group have never approved of the limitation. I remember that when the former minister of finance made a similar proposal—he seems to have come back now from the purgatory to which he was consigned—we contended then that the limitation should be removed and that the tax for that purpose should be applied to total income.
