Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock this house stands adjourned.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, may I ask what the business is to be for tomorrow?

Mr. Speaker: It seems that some hon. members wish to discuss forthcoming business. I think I should bring it to the attention of those concerned that if an announcement of business is to be made it should be done before the adjournment has been called by the Chair.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Starr: Can the Solicitor General tell us what the business will be tomorrow?

Mr. Pennell: We will follow the order which was announced last evening with the addition of item 100, Bill C-252, for the expansion of scientific research and development.

Mr. Starr: Are we changing the sequence set out by the leader of the house the other day?

Mr. Pennell: I apologize to the hon. member if I did not make myself clear. We shall follow the order laid down by the leader of the house on Monday but should we finish the business outlined by him we would proceed to consider item 100.

It being two minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 16, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIEFENBAKER—ANSWER TO STARRED QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege that affects the rights and prerogatives of the House of Commons. I hope the Prime Minister, as the custodian of those rights under your direction, sir, will join with me in what I am about to say. I refer to an answer in Hansard as reported at page 13065. The material portion of the question I asked was this:

> What are the names and addresses of the chosen officials and/or employees of the C.B.C. who are to be the recipients of and have free use of the coloured T.V. sets recently purchased by the C.B.C.

You will recall, sir, that the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek first brought this matter to the light of day. Yesterday the answer was given by the minister and, of course, she only transmits that which is given to her by the corporation. The answer to that question which was worded in such a way that there would be no ambiguity, was:

> Colour television receivers are assigned according to requirements of senior positions and remain with these positions in the event of the departure of present incumbents. They are used by those whose duties require program viewing.

Sir, that answer took several weeks in incubation. It was delayed for days on end until I rose on a question of privilege. That answer indicates a cavalier contempt of parliament. The C.B.C. secures the major portion of its income from the people of Canada, and parliament is not secondary to the C.B.C. The question was allowed, it was on the order paper, and parliament's right to obtain this information has not been challenged.

I rise at this time simply to ask for an answer. The answer may be embarrassing to some who have become voluntary recipients of the public benevolence at the expense of the people of Canada, but whatever may be the embarrassment the answer must be given. Unless the answer is given in a satisfactory way early next week it will become necessary in the interests of preserving the rights of parliament to take such action as the traditions and prerogatives of parliament permit. I hope that will not be necessary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition has not chosen to make a motion, so for the time being the matter will be allowed to rest.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I say, so there will be no misunderstanding, that whatever rights I have are held in abeyance at the moment without prejudice to any further action.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS LIMITING USE OF LISTENING DEVICES

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-269, to amend the Criminal Code (invasion of privacy).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is to amend the Criminal Code to render criminal the invasion of privacy by instruments such as the telephone, the telegram, television and films. It is felt that in the interests of all and for the protection and dignity of the individual some limitation should be placed on the use of these devices. It is in effect an anti-bugging bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

UNITED NATIONS

RHODESIA—INQUIRY AS TO EFFECTIVENESS OF SANCTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I regret that I have not given him notice, but it arose in my mind as the result of certain press references to the situation in Rhodesia. It is approximately two months since the imposition of mandatory sanctions against Rhodesia. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether he is in a position to advise us now as to their effectiveness. A year ago the prediction was made that they would be successful within about 60 days. What is the anticipation with regard to success or failure of the imposition of sanctions by the United Nations?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, when sanctions were first imposed within the context of the commonwealth alone it was possible to give an appreciation of the effectiveness of the totality of those sanctions. Since that time, of course, the security council has imposed selective mandatory sanctions. I do not have any information which would show the combined result of compliance with the security council resolution. The security council will be meeting in about three weeks, at which time the secretary general will report to the members of that council on the effectiveness of the sanctions up to that time. Until then I am not in a position to give more details. I can say that the commonwealth sanctions, in themselves, revealed an improvement but not to the point where one could say they would have full effectiveness within a foreseeable period.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Canada is a member of the security council. Has Canada not yet received any word from the secretary general regarding the effectiveness or ineffectiveness of the action taken?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, sir. The representative of Canada on the security council did make some inquiries a week ago, and he was informed by the secretariat that a report would be made pursuant to the security council resolution within about three weeks' time.

TRANSPORT

POSSIBLE SECOND SURCHARGE ON CARGOES FROM JAPAN TO VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask the right hon. Prime Minister if he has received a telegram from the western Canadian regional council of the International Woodworkers of America indicating that in addition to the 15 per cent surcharge which is to come into effect on March 1, imposed by the trans-Pacific freight conference of Japan, a second group, the Pacific westbound conference, has announced its intention of imposing a similar surcharge on ships entering Vancouver?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

In view of the harmful effect this will have on the economy of British Columbia, and in view of the fact that the government's commissioner, Mr. Justice Smith, found there was no undue delay in loading and unloading ships by reason of labour disputes, might I ask the Prime Minister what action the government proposes to take to try to prevent the imposition of this surcharge?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I received a telegram this morning and I took up the matter with the Minister of Transport, who I believe has already replied to it.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the Minister of Transport if he would give the house some idea of what action is being taken to prevent the imposition of these surcharges by the two groups who have made these announcements?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Well, exactly the same kind of protest and representation is being made with respect to this proposal as was made with respect to the other proposal which, as the hon. gentleman knows, has been postponed. Most urgent protests are being made by the harbours board.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the minister whether he has received any reply to the protest he made to the Japanese shipping federation?

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, as the hon. gentleman knows, the most effective reply was that the date for the imposition of this surcharge was postponed so there would be an opportunity for representations to be made. Representations are being made in the most urgent possible manner.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROTEST BY QUEBEC PREMIER RESPECTING PROGRAM "TIREZ AU CLAIR"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): My question is directed to the Secretary of State. I should like to ask whether she received a telegram from Mr. Daniel Johnson containing very strong protests about the program "Tirez au Clair" last night, which dealt with educational affairs. Evidently one of Mr. Johnson's ministers was refused participation in the program and the entire 45 minutes was given to the former minister of education, Mr. Gérin-Lajoie. Has the minister received any explanation for such behaviour from the C.B.C.?

[Translation]

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): No, I did not receive any message from the Quebec premier.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the hon. minister tell the house that she will look into the matter and give the house an answer on the attitude of the C.B.C., or might it be that the problem should be taken up now by the committee on broadcasting, films and assistance to the arts?

[English]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): If I may supplement the answer, just at lunch time I received a telegram from Mr. Johnson protesting strongly about this matter. I had already acknowledged the telegram before coming into the house, to the effect that I would take up the matter with the C.B.C. through the Secretary of State. I sent a copy to the Secretary of State, who probably has not received it yet.

NATURAL GAS

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—REPRESENTATIONS BY U.S. COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is the government taking any steps to answer charges made before the federal power commission in Washington by competing gas line transmission companies that the changes required by the Canadian government in the proposed pipe line to come through northern Minnesota would make it uneconomic and that the plan is not practical to meet the market needs of the United States and eastern Canada?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the members of the federal power commission will be surprised to hear these opinions from competing companies.

SUGAR

ARRANGEMENTS FOR IMPORTS FROM CARIBBEAN COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Northumberland.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, for the first time in a long time I am caught without anything to say.

I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, of which I sent him notice. Were arrangements completed at the recent meeting of officials in St. Lucia to assist the sugar industry in the Commonwealth Caribbean countries? If so, what are the basic features of the arrangement?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this gives me an opportunity to express not only my approval but, as evident from the applause from behind me, the general approval of the announcement made this morning by the hon. member. I wish to add my personal congratulations.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): We will do the same for you.

Mr. Winters: Thank you very much. The problem faced by the sugar producers in the Commonwealth Caribbean countries has been of considerable concern to us, as of course it has to them, for some time. At the Prime Ministers' conference last year we decided that in the absence of a world sugar agreement, toward which we are working, we would undertake some temporary measures to help assure access to the Canadian Market of a reasonable level of sugar imports from that area at a price which was made somewhat better than the world price by the remission of the 29 cents tariff per hundredweight.

At a recent meeting of officials in St. Lucia further progress was made in working out the details, and we expect a final decision will be made shortly.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO SYSTEM OF RETAIL OUTLETS TO BE RETAINED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence which deals with an important matter, as expressed to me during the last few days. Can the minister inform the house which system of retail outlets as a result of the reorganization of the minister's thoughts will be retained for the services, the P.X. which is used for the air force or the M.L.S. as used by the army?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it was explained to the committee the other night that this question is now under active consideration. Once all systems have been examined and the wishes and needs of servicemen, both in Canada and overseas, have been taken into account, a recommendation will be made to the defence council, and following that some decision will be made.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

REQUEST FOR POLICY STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Industry. Since only 1 per cent of highway accidents can be attributed to defective automobiles, will the minister give some indication as to what progress is being made by way of legislation to reduce the heavy toll being suffered through other causes over which the government does have jurisdiction? On January 25 I put a similar question to the Prime Minister, at which time he promised a statement would be made by the minister responsible.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, this is quite a lengthy question and I would be glad to take it as notice.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

PAYMENT OF GRANTS IN LIEU OF MUNICIPAL TAXES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): My question is for the Minister of Transport. Has the minister now the information available about the new National Harbours Board taxation arrangements for the municipalities, mentioned last Friday?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Yes, sir. It has been decided that the National Harbours Board, now paying grants in respect of 1965 equal to 50 per cent of taxes, will increase those grants to 62½ per cent for 1966, to 75 per cent for 1967, to 87½ per cent for 1968 and to the full 100 per cent for 1969.

FINANCE

PERSONNEL OF TASK FORCE TO STUDY FOREIGN OWNERSHIP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister [Mr. Hellyer.] without Portfolio from Toronto—so I may be sure the minister knows I am speaking to him—in his capacity as chairman of the committee of ministers to study foreign control in the economy. May I ask him—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member he cannot ask a question of the minister in the capacity in which the hon. member has referred to him.

Mr. Lewis: May I rephrase my question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Minister without Portfolio whether he can announce to the house the names of the task force which will assist the committee of cabinet ministers in its study of foreign control in the Canadian economy?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister without Portfolio): Not at the present time, Mr. Speaker.

AIRPORTS

VANCOUVER—REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT OF ACCESS FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister about—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, it is very gratifying to receive a welcome like this. I only wonder whether it will continue every time I return from a visit to my constituency.

I want to ask the Prime Minister about a matter of great concern to the people of Vancouver and district concerning access to the international airport on Sea island. Did the Prime Minister and some of his colleagues receive a brief from the Richmond Chamber of Commerce recently requesting immediate action on the improvement of access facilities, particularly in the light of the construction of the new terminal building there? If so, has the government made any decision on that submission?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before I try to answer that question, on a question of privilege I wonder if you could inform me what is all the applause about that seems to be caused by two hon. members of the house today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: A poor joke.

Mr. Pearson: "Tis a poor one but mine own."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: Replying to the question, Mr. Speaker, the matter is under consideration.

SHIPPING

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SAFETY AT SEA AND SHIP MANNING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, could I direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, and ask him if he will soon be in a position to make detailed announcements about the matters of safety at sea and the manning scales of ships.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg.

[Later:]

Mr. Howard: Some time ago I addressed a question to the Minister without Portfolio concerning safety at sea and the manning of ships. Perhaps I did not transport the question to the right minister. I wonder if I can ask somebody else to reply.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): If the hon. gentleman would ask his question tomorrow when the Minister without Portfolio will be the acting minister, I am sure he will get an excellent reply.

Mr. Howard: I will get a more precise reply; I am sure of that.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

REPORTED CHANGE IN TARIFF ON MILITARY EQUIPMENT PURCHASED ABROAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry in his capacity as Minister of Defence Production. Has a change been made in the tariff on military equipment purchased abroad by the Canadian government? If so, what is the amount of the purchase required for full remission of customs duties and why was the change made?

Mr. Speaker: This question should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I placed this question because I am informed that a change was made and it is not applicable to components purchased by Canadian defence companies.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is explaining why he asked his question. That does not change the situation; the question should still be on the order paper.

PUBLIC SERVICE

COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF ARMED FORCES AND R.C.M.P. PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. I wish to ask when will the terms of reference to the public service committee be broadened so they may consider the matter of pensions of ex-armed forces personnel and ex-R.C.M.P. personnel?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, this question was raised by my colleague the Minister of National Defence. I wrote a letter to the chairman of the committee saying that in our opinion it would be proper for them to consider this matter at the same time they are considering the other. If a formal reference is required from the house, however, or should the committee deem this necessary, we would be glad to make such a reference.

GRAIN

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO TENDERS FOR SALE OF ELEVATORS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Minister of Transport.

Can the minister tell us what decision has been taken with regard to the possibility of selling or renting grain elevators in Quebec City?

[English]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I do not believe any propositions have been received for the purchase; therefore there has been no occasion up to now for any decision.

[Translation]

[Later:]

Mr. Ricard: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker—I was also inquiring about the renting of the premises.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Has the minister received any proposals in this connection?

[English]

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the same reply applies to both.

PENITENTIARIES

DRUMHELLER, ALTA.—LACK OF ACCOMMODATION FOR EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General; it affects the national penitentiary service. Would he check into conditions in the new institution at Drumheller, where I suggest he will find that it cannot be opened because accommodation is not available to house 175 employees, so it is impossible to relieve the overcrowding in other institutions.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps this question should be placed on the order paper.

[Translation]

VETERANS AFFAIRS

QUEBEC—POSSIBLE TRANSFER OF HOSPITAL TO LAVAL UNIVERSITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Veterans Affairs.

What action is the government considering with regard to the veterans hospital at Ste Foy? Has the possibility of a transfer to Laval University been discussed?

Mr. Speaker: The question does not appear to be very urgent and I would suggest that it be put on the order paper.

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING DISPUTE BETWEEN EGYPT AND SAUDI ARABIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): My question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In the light of the minister's moving defence of quiet diplomacy earlier this week, a policy with which I largely agree, can the hon. gentleman tell us whether the Canadian government has made any representations to the governments of Egypt or Saudi Arabia with regard to the accelerating conflict in southwest Arabia and Yemen?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I will take notice of that question, Mr. Speaker.

FINANCE

REPORTED CONFUSION RESPECTING TAX ON BUILDING MATERIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Finance, but if the Minister of National Revenue thinks he would be better able to reply, perhaps he would do so. Has the minister been advised about the confusion existing in the building supply industry because of the fact that in some cases the present tax applies at the rate of 11 per cent, while in others it applies at the rate of 12 per cent? If so, does the government intend to take any action to simplify this situation?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): In the implementation of the new tax, that is the increase in sales tax from 11 per cent to 12 per cent, the government decided to proceed as simply as possible by using as the schedule for construction materials the schedule which was used prior to the imposition of the sales tax on construction materials in 1963. Most people in the business of manufacturing construction materials are familiar with this schedule.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SASKATCHEWAN—USE OF SATELLITES TO PROVIDE TELEVISION SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I should like to direct my question to the Secretary of State. May I first thank her for the announcement she made yesterday concerning the intention of the C.B.C. to extend service to northern Manitoba where 7 per cent of the people are without service. Is the hon. lady aware of any plan on the part of the C.B.C. to use satellites to provide service to other remote areas in Canada such as parts of Saskatchewan, where 17 per cent of the people are without service?

Mr. Speaker: Order. A question of the same type was asked yesterday, and I suggested then that it be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Korchinski: With all due respect, I am asking whether satellites are to be used; that is the point of my question.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member will get a reply if he places the question on the order paper.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

AUDITING OF RECORDS RESPECTING CONTRIBUTIONS BY EMPLOYERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue, the minister responsible for Canada Pension Plan contributions. Is it the intention of the minister to appoint auditors to visit employers to find out whether these contributions are being made and remitted?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): This matter is being handled within the Department of National Revenue. People representing my department have to visit a great many employers in Canada and intend, of course, to audit the records in this regard as well as in other areas which fall within our responsibility.

Mr. Hales: If the minister has any notion of appointing auditors for this purpose, will he consult with his colleague the Minister of Labour, who is responsible for unemployment insurance, so that one auditor can do both jobs?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has made his representations, and I am sure the minister will take notice of the question.

[Translation]

AIRPORTS

ST. JOHN, QUE.—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL ASSISTANCE IN DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Paul Beaulieu (Saint-Jean-Iberville-Napierville): My question is for the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker.

I should like to know whether the government intends to subsidize the development of the St. Jean airport, as was done recently for the St. Hubert airport.

In view of the fact that the site of Expo in Montreal is a mere 15 miles away from St. Jean, this municipality is very interested in the development of its airport.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member might wish to place his question on the order paper.

[English]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—CRASH OF MEMBER OF AEROBATIC TEAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I have a question for the Minister of National Defence arising out of the recent unfortunate crash of a Tutor jet being flown by a member of the golden centennaires aerobatic team near the Comox armed forces base. I should like to ask the minister whether any review is being made of the program and the training procedures in connection with this aerobatic team as a consequence of this unfortunate accident.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Since returning to the capital I have not had the opportunity to obtain a report with respect to this accident which occurred yesterday. I know all members of the house share with the hon. gentleman and myself sorrow at this tragedy, and we extend our condolences to the family.

NATURAL RESOURCES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF WILDFOWL SANCTUARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): As a former parliamentary leader in this house I wish to direct a question to the minister responsible for wildlife. Has the minister received any response from the government of British Columbia to the proposal made by him and his department with respect to the joint development of Duck lake at the end of Kootenay lake as a wildfowl sanctuary?

Mr. Speaker: I should think the minister responsible for wildlife would suggest that the question be placed on the order paper.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

HOCKEY GAME BETWEEN MEMBERS AND PRESS GALLERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. R. Sherman (Winnipeg South): My question is addressed to the Prime Minister. Has the attention of the right hon. gentleman been directed to the distinction of a non-partisan nature which was brought to this institution last night by members of the house in their hockey game against members of the parliamentary press gallery?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I feel hurt that I was not asked to take part.

An hon. Member: You would be more hurt if you had.

Mr. L. M. Brand (Saskatoon): In view of what happened at the hockey game last night, and in view of the report on hockey tabled recently in this house, may I ask whether the Prime Minister has taken any measures to protect the House of Commons stars of last night's game? Will he see that any N.H.L. contract signed as a result of their sterling performances will at least contain a provision that they play only on Canadian ice?

Mr. Pearson: I did not think there were any stars, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I believe there were stars in yesterday's game and I would ask the Prime Minister to recognize the ability as hockey players of members of this house.

[English]

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE ON PROCEDURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the government house leader. Can he advise us when it is likely the committee on procedure will be established so far as personnel are concerned, in view of the fact there is some doubt as to the wisdom of retaining some of the temporary rules without first making a thorough examination of how effective they have been?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I hope the committee can be set up soon.

Mr. Baldwin: I have a supplementary question. Will the minister give some thought to whether there is any legal or constitutional basis for the committee on procedure to continue during the next session without having to be reconstituted?

TRADE

DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING U.K. ENTRY INTO EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, in a more serious vein, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can he tell the house whether Great Britain is keeping Canada informed of her initiatives and conversations at present with a view to her entry into the Common Market?

[English]

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, they keep us very well informed. One could not say they keep us informed about all conversations, but we are pretty well up to date on what is taking place there.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

PETERBOROUGH, ONT.—AMNESTY TO MEN IMPRISONED FOLLOWING TILCO STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General, of which I have given him due notice. On Tuesday of this week he informed the house that clemency was being exercised in the cases of two trade unionists in Vancouver. I should like to know what progress is being made in the study regarding the granting of amnesty to the trade unionists who took part in a mass demonstration in the city of Peterborough before Christmas.

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, if I understood the hon. member correctly he is referring to relief in respect of criminal records, because the sentences have been served by the people in question. As I advised the house earlier, this matter has just recently been taken under consideration.

WOMEN

ORDER IN COUNCIL RESPECTING TERMS OF REFERENCE AND PERSONNEL

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I have the unanimous consent of the house to revert to motions I should like to table an order in council setting out the personnel and terms of reference of the royal commission on the status of women.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that we revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Does the right hon. Prime Minister have leave to table this document?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

EXCISE TAX ACT AND OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp for the second reading of Bill No. C-268, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Old Age Security Act, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Knowles.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I should like to take a few minutes to complete the remarks I was making yesterday when we adjourned.

It seems to me that in introducing this bill the Minister of Finance, is doing precisely, in respect of people in lower income brackets and on fixed incomes such as pension allowances of various kinds, that which he warned us about some months ago. He has been warning us since last spring that we are facing a spiralling inflation and an ever increasing and alarming cost of living.

Some time ago the minister suggested that we must exercise care in order to stop or slow down this increasing cost of living, yet what he is proposing by this bill will inevitably have the result of increasing the cost of living for those people who can least afford it, the people on fixed incomes and in the low income brackets, whether they work for wages or derive their livelihood from farming. As was pointed out yesterday, the 1 per cent increase in sales tax applied at the manufacturers' level will increase as it is passed on from the manufacturer to the wholesaler, then to the retailer and finally to the consumer. It has been estimated that this increase will amount to about another 1 per cent, making the total increase to the consumer 2 per cent.

We have heard evidence to the effect that the cost of prescription drugs has gone up by not 1 per cent but 10 per cent or 15 per cent. It must be remembered that this has placed an extra burden on the older people. This has a disastrous effect so far as they are concerned, because generally speaking they need prescription drugs more than others.

Yesterday the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance and another parliamentary secretary invited us to suggest an alternative way of raising funds to cover the increases in old age pensions. I suggested an alternative yesterday. I do not have the facilities to work out whether my alternative would provide as much money as the 1 per cent increase in sales tax.

For many years we have followed the principle of a graduated and progressive income tax policy under which people who earn the most money pay the highest income taxes, and pay them at higher percentage rates. I think most members of this house and most people in this country believe in this principle. That being so, it is completely wrong for this government to suggest that taxpayers should pay 4 per cent of their income with a limit of $240 per year toward the old age security fund. As I said yesterday in answer to the parliamentary secretary, it is much easier for every member of parliament and every businessman in this country who has a taxable income of $10,000, $15,000 or $20,000 to pay the 4 per cent increase than it is for those on fixed or low incomes to pay the 1 per cent increase in sales tax.

Because I believe this proposal is inherently unjust, and because I believe those in the upper income brackets are not being asked to pay their fair share, I have no hesitation in supporting the amendment moved by my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and in effect voting against the proposal incorporated in this bill which will impose a substantial increase in the taxes of the people of this country.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker,—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): If he speaks will he close the debate?

• (3:20 p.m.)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, nothing would have pleased the Minister of Finance more than to have avoided increasing taxes to meet the costs of the guaranteed income plan for old age pensioners, and it might even have made the Minister of Finance much more popular. But as Minister of Finance I have a responsibility to be, not popular but, in so far as possible, wise. Sometimes I may succeed, sometimes I may not, but at any rate it is incumbent upon me as Minister of Finance to be concerned about the interests of all Canadians, and particularly to ensure that steady kind of economic progress that is vital to everyone in this country and particularly to the workers and farmers.

If one looks at the history of governments in the world over the centuries I think one is forced to conclude that it is because governments from time to time have not been prepared to face up to their responsibilities that in the world at large over the centuries we have had too much inflation. The problem we face in the world today in relation to economic expansion is to try to create conditions in which we have steady economic expansion without inflation. No country in the world has ever succeeded in this. Too often in the past we have had a boom and bust type of economy. If one wanted to look around the world for an example of the serious problems that arise when not enough attention is given to this situation, one has only to look at the United Kingdom today, where because of the failure to deal adequately with the problem of ensuring steady expansion without inflation the government of that country is forced to the kind of measures that I sometimes think our friends in the N.D.P. are now advocating.

Mr. Speaker, if there had been any prospect whatever that there would be surplus revenues either during this fiscal year or during any subsequent fiscal year out of which we could have met these large additions to our expenditures, which I hope everyone in this house supports fully, I might have made different recommendations on this occasion. The government, looking at prospects, came to the conclusion that there was no prospect whatever that out of existing revenues we could meet the costs of the guaranteed income plan plus the other obligations the government faces and that have been supported on all sides of this house, as we have introduced legislation and as we have introduced estimates. The government therefore considered it wise on this occasion to avoid adding to any prospective deficit by raising immediately the large sums required for the supplement to old age pensions.

Much has been made of the fact that part of the revenues has been put into the old age security fund and part has gone into general revenues. In my address to the house on December 19 when I introduced these proposals I made quite clear what we were doing and why we were doing it, and I certainly resent any of the suggestions that have been made that at any time I misled the house or the public as to what we were doing.

May I, for the benefit of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who I am sure will continue to make these points regardless of what I say, and for the record refer again to what I said about the old age security fund. I said on December 19, as reported at page 11334 of Hansard:

> When we consider the economic and financial effects of old age security payments, however, we must look not to the position in a single account but to total cash flows. In introducing the guaranteed income supplement we are adding $280 million a year to our cash outflow, and this must somehow be matched by increased cash revenues if we are to avoid increasing our cash deficit with all its financial and economic consequences. The accumulated surplus of the old age security account is not held in a separate cash balance. The cash received and credited to this account is and always has been pooled in the consolidated revenue fund into which parliament requires all revenues to be paid and from which the payments authorized by parliament are made.

This is the situation, Mr. Speaker. It has always been this way. If I thought I had some cash or some revenue that I could substitute for moneys borrowed or moneys raised by taxation, I would certainly have taken a different course. But in fact our expenditures are going up by $280 million, and I feel it wise under these circumstances to raise $280 million, approximately, for this purpose.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the minister a question? Why is it that in the past he has taken 3 percentage points of the sales tax and included it in the old age security fund computation? He is not doing so in this case. Granted, it would make no difference to his cash position, but why is he making this distinction this time?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to answer that question. I answered in part the other day. There is laid upon me as Minister of Finance, upon the government and upon this parliament a responsibility to keep that fund approximately in balance. For that purpose, what we felt should go into the fund was the result of an increase in the ceiling on the tax that was imposed on personal incomes. That, we believe, will keep the fund in balance up to about 1970 or 1971. That was a responsibility upon the government, and that is how we discharged it.

However, that would not provide the cash needed to pay the extra expenditures of the government; it would be $155 million short. We might, of course, have taken the other course, but I am sure hon. gentlemen would have taken even more exception if, instead of raising the ceiling on personal income tax, I had raised the sales tax for this purpose.

Mr. Douglas: Of course.

Mr. Sharp: Yes, of course. The government's judgment was that it was better in these circumstances to use the personal income tax and raise the ceiling there, rather than alter the rates and then get the rest of the money for this expenditure—that is all I have ever said—by raising the sales tax by 1 per cent to obtain $155 million.

Mr. Douglas: Why didn't the minister put the revenue from the sales tax increase into the old age security fund?

Mr. Sharp: It was not necessary for the purpose. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has laid before the house a motion to hoist this bill for six months. In other words, as far as he is concerned there is no need for any more revenues; that is the effect of the six months hoist. I consider this action about as irresponsible as any that could be taken in this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear hear.

Mr. Sharp: I would like to recall to the house some of the proposals that have been made by the party of which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is such a distinguished member. I am proposing, in these tax increases, to raise approximately $290 million of revenue to meet the costs of the supplement to the old age pension, which will amount to about $280 million. If instead of following this policy we had adopted the proposals of the N.D.P. and had established a flat rate pension of $105 a month payable to everyone the cost would have been approximately $400 million. In other words, the additional cost would have been $120 million.

• (3:30 p.m.)

I will refer to a few of the suggestions for immediate action which have been made by the N.D.P. in the house and I want to stress the point that these proposals have been made for immediate action, not for action in the future. Indeed, on many occasions they have gone out of their way to castigate the government for not embarking immediately upon these expenditure programs, the most important of which is the one that I first mentioned. They have criticized the government for not paying $105 a month to all recipients of old age security. They have also proposed the abolition of university fees. I think all of us in the house want to make university education available to everyone in the country as soon as possible, but the N.D.P. has proposed that we provide free tuition immediately.

The N.D.P. proposed that $130 million should be provided which, according to my calculations, would approximately cover the payment of fees but not of course the cost of university education. The N.D.P. has criticized the government also for not increasing its external aid as rapidly as it would like. Here again everyone in the house would like to increase foreign aid as quickly as possible. I am sure this wish is universally shared in the house. The cost of our present aid amounts to $225 million per year. If we were to increase our aid now to 1 per cent of the gross national product, which is eventually our aim, it would cost another $350 million right away. If we had proceeded with the implementation of medicare this year rather than next year, as we had hoped we could do—

Mr. Orlikow: You promised it.

Mr. Sharp: I was just as disappointed as the N.D.P. that this proved to be financially unwise. However, if this had been done it would have added another $300 million to our immediate expenditures.

I have picked out only a few of the proposals for additional expenditures. I find it difficult to keep up with the proposals that are made by the N.D.P. I am sure that if I were to add them all up the cost would be even more appalling. However, the total amount of additional expenditures and additional taxation which the N.D.P. would impose immediately would come to another $900 million approximately, in addition to the $290 million which the government is proposing under these taxation measures, or a total of $1,200 million of immediate increases in government expenditures. This is the party that proposes that we should hoist these modest tax increases for six months. As my colleague the Postmaster General (Mr. Coté) has said, this is the sort of program that one might expect the Social Credit party to propose since they believe in a different form of financing, one that would be very inflationary and under which they would simply print money.

Mr. Orlikow: Who voted for debt free money?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Sharp: Fortunately I can dissociate myself from past actions. I would certainly not be one of those who would advocate at any time that sort of philosophy of government finance. However, the total of $1,200 million, which would be the cost of implementing only some of the measures that the N.D.P. would wish to implement immediately, would be equivalent to about 8 percentage points in the sales tax and would amount to about half of the revenues of our existing personal income taxes. These are the sort of tax changes which the N.D.P. is advocating immediately, I understand, and yet they are proposing that we should hoist for six months a bill which advocates an increase in tax not of $1,200 million but of $280 million.

I should like to speak now about the sales tax increase which is the point that led the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to propose the six months hoist. In supporting this amendment the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) said the following yesterday, as reported on page 13094 of Hansard:

> We feel very strongly that this type of tax should not be imposed as a means of helping people in the old age pension group because at the same time we say we are helping them we are making things more difficult for them by increasing the sales tax.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett), however, took a rather different line and under some pressure from this side of the house admitted that he felt there might be some virtue in a sales tax but he thought it should be in the form of a retail sales tax rather than a manufacturers' sales tax. This is a problem in taxation which has concerned tax experts for a long time and there are arguments on both sides. As I see it, the position taken by the N.D.P. on this question is partly represented by the view taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who does not like this tax at all because somehow he feels it is not right for us to impose taxes to cover the full amount of the cost. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway does not like it either because it has certain economic effects and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni does not like the manufacturers' tax and would prefer a retail sales tax. Perhaps the reason why members of that party are prepared to support this amendment is that they managed to find some common ground upon which they can agree.

However, as I was listening to the debate I asked one of the hon. members who was speaking whether he was equally opposed to provincial sales taxes, to which he said yes. I asked him whether he was also opposed to the sales tax in Saskatchewan and he said yes. I then took a good look at the history of the sales tax in Saskatchewan and

I would like to give a brief recital of the facts. In 1937, following a recommendation of a royal commission headed by Mr. Neil Jacoby, a retail sales tax was introduced at 2 per cent and it was called an education tax. The proceeds from this tax were used exclusively for educational purposes. In 1944 the C.C.F. government came to office under the premiership of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) and in 1950 the tax was renamed the education and hospitalization tax and was increased to 3 per cent. In 1962 the tax was given another name which related more closely to the purpose for which it was to be raised and was called the education and health tax. At that time it was increased to 5 per cent and 50 per cent of the revenues were to be used for education, 30 per cent for hospitalization and 20 per cent for medical care.

Here we have the leader of a party in this house, who as premier of a province at one time imposed a 5 per cent sales tax for education, hospitalization and medical care, now supporting an amendment in the house implying that a 1 per cent increase in the manufacturers' sales tax is iniquitous and is somehow working to the detriment of those whom we are trying to help. Perhaps the hon. member has a convenient memory and will argue that at that time special circumstances prevailed. I suggest that those decisions were taken because he believed that this was a reasonable way of raising the revenues he needed.

Following that, indeed, in confirmation of it, Mr. Speaker, a royal commission on taxation in the province of Saskatchewan was appointed in 1963. I should like to read a paragraph or two of that report about the economics of such a tax. At page 162 of the report of the royal commission on taxation, province of Saskatchewan, 1965, there appears this paragraph:

> The views which we express concerning the retail sales tax are not based only upon its current apparent acceptability—although acceptability or lack of it is certainly a matter of considerable importance in determining the usefulness of any tax form. We have concluded that a properly structured retail sales tax is a "fair" mode of taxation in that it does distribute its burdens according to at least one reasonably adequate measure of income—actual expenditures on consumption. Moreover, to the extent that expenditures on certain basic necessities of life—for example, food and shelter—are exempted from the operations of the tax, then low income groups are relieved of its most burdensome aspects, and it may be levied in accordance with reasonable concepts of ability to pay.

That is a judgment rendered upon the tax structure of Saskatchewan in which the retail sales tax is very substantial. I believe that it does support the reasonableness under modern conditions, of raising part of the needed revenues by a tax on consumption. The report also points out and reinforces the argument I made in my address on December 19, that if one does impose a manufacturers' or sales tax and exempts food, fuel and shelter one arrives at a tax that bears at least some relationship to ability to pay and is certainly not regressive.

As I said at the outset I wish it could have been possible for the government to have avoided any increase in tax. I wish, too, that we could have found other sources of revenue that would have been fairer. If I could have found them, I would have done so. However, I was limited, as I said in my budget address, by the facts of the present position. I should like to remind the house again of what I said in that connection, as reported on page 11336 of Hansard:

> The choice of the tax to increase for this purpose—

That is to increase our general revenues.

> —is a difficult one. Normally one would look to our regular personal income tax because, being progressive, it is one of our fairest taxes. However, we share this tax field with the provinces. We have emphasized to them in recent months that they have access to this field of taxation just as we do and must share responsibility for its use. We are proposing, as I have said, to abate our income tax for 1967 to make it easier for the provinces to raise theirs in order to help finance the rapidly growing burden of higher education. We will want to discuss with the provinces in the coming year or two various ideas proposed to reform the income tax so that we may achieve as much harmony as possible in our use of this most important tax field.

It was for this reason we did not at that time employ the personal income tax. It has been suggested that we could have removed the ceiling altogether from the social security tax on personal incomes. However, I would remind the house that these social security taxes were established for the purpose of having some sort of relationship between benefits and payments. Personally, looking back I wish we had not engaged in this bookkeeping. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was a member of the committee and I happened at that time to have been an official adviser to the minister of finance. In addition, I was advising Mr. Jean Lesage, who was chairman of the committee at that time. If the house will pardon a little personal history I may say I was somewhat of a devil's advocate in that I suggested to the committee—

Mr. Knowles: I did not think you were the advocate.

Mr. Sharp: I was the devil's advocate in the sense that I suggested to the committee they should consider a two-tiered system of pensions, one a flat rate pension and the other a contributory pension. We have arrived at that stage today but it has taken a great many years. I suggested at that time we should begin with a two-tiered system. However, members of parliament quite rightly were concerned mainly with getting rid of the iniquitous means test. They did the right thing.

An hon. Member: We have got back to it.

Mr. Sharp: No, we have not got back to any means test, and the hon. gentleman knows that. At that time there seemed to be a curious mixture of philosophies. It was somehow felt that if you established a fund, you would limit the demands for increase in the flat rate pension. People would see a relationship between contributions to the fund and the amount of the pension. It did not work that way. As I said in the house yesterday in commenting upon a speech made by another hon. gentleman, the fund has been in a deficit position very substantially ever since it was established.

I believe the old age security fund has outlived its usefulness and I am in a mood to consider a change. A good deal, of course, depends upon the sort of recommendations we get for revision of our tax system as a whole. In the meantime, however, I believe we ought to maintain the principle of the old age security fund, that is, that there should be some relationship between the amount of contributions from personal income and the amount of benefit. If one looks back in history one will find that when the tax was first imposed in 1952 there was a 2 per cent tax on incomes with a maximum of $60, in 1959 a 3 per cent with the maximum raised to $90, and in 1964 the rate on personal income was raised to 4 per cent and the maximum to $120. We believe that on this occasion, because of the greatly increased benefits which have risen under this act to their highest level, we were justified in raising the ceiling and, indeed, we were justified in doubling it. I do not believe it would have been in accordance with the principle upon which the fund was established that we should, as hon. gentlemen have suggested, have removed the ceiling. If we were going to deal with it in that way, then it should have been done through the income tax in full consultation with the provinces and not surreptitiously by a method that would be regarded as breaking faith with the provinces.

Mr. Knowles: Just as a matter of interest, since the minister has been recounting a bit of history, does he not recall that some of us discouraged this procedure in 1950 and said there should not be any ceiling and that the tax for old age security should be built into the general income tax structure?

Mr. Sharp: I have forgotten the proposals my hon. friend made in that committee. I know they were considerable. If he says that was one of them, then I accept his statement because I know he would not mislead us.

Mr. Knowles: As an official of the Department of Finance, the minister worked this out for me in a table which was very useful, but it was not implemented.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: I recall now that was so, Mr. Speaker. However, as I say this has been the principle that has been followed on each occasion the ceiling has been revised. I believe in this case we should not depart from that principle. I believe we have put before the house a bill designed to meet the costs. I am a little sensitive sometimes about suggestions that I am taking some philosophical position and that I believe an increase in social security should always be met immediately by an increase in revenues. When the time comes that our revenues are rising rapidly enough to meet such costs without increases in the burden of taxation, Mr. Speaker, if I am still Minister of Finance then I shall be the first to rejoice.

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): There is one thing that always surprises me about the Minister of Finance and Receiver General, it is the nice disposition he seems to have and his capacity to keep it at all times. He is about the only minister capable of doing an unpleasant job—taxing—with a smile. He does it—I hardly know whether to say in an ironic, satirical, cynical or happy way—but in any case, he is the minister who can tighten the screws until Canadians turn blue with rage and misery and still ask them with a smile: Does it hurt?

[Mr. Sharp.]

At a time when the poor get poorer in greater numbers and the rich grow richer and fewer, we can ask how it is that the minister can fail to react more violently against such a state of affairs. People are afraid, they are worried about inflation, about the cost of living which is much too high today.

A little earlier, the parliamentary secretary to the minister, the hon. member for Saint-Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien), seemed to be lost in a brown study—he had some food container in front of him and I wondered if he was just waiting a little before tasting the food or if he was pondering over the price thereof today as compared to what it was five years ago. But now he is sending it back. Either he finds it too expensive or he has decided to wait before having a bite. In any case, I am sure that the price is not what it was last year or the year before that, because as time goes on the cost of living goes up, the people are so short of money that they are not only threatened with want but with abject poverty.

Mr. Speaker, the stub of the cheque is getting longer and the cheque itself smaller, and if we do not put a stop to it somewhere, one day soon we will be given the stub and told simply: That is how your money was spent.

Mr. Speaker, under the circumstances, I do not understand the minister's arguments. I readily agree that our older people needed that $30 supplement. Not only the elderly are in need of assistance, but also veterans and mothers throughout the country at present. I ask the Minister of Finance and Receiver General what the situation will be after Expo '67? What will be the financial situation of the country early in 1968? I would be most surprised if we did not have a revolution in Canada because of the intolerable economic conditions. I hope the minister will then have something other than a sweet smile to offer the Canadian people, that he will have an adequate solution for the people who hope the government, the Canadian parliament will introduce more concrete measures than those he just proposed to them. These are practical but negative.

A solution is being sought through taxes and restrictions. An effort is being made to help one by tightening the belt of another. It is a plaster on a scratch, a poultice on a wooden leg. But the problem is not solved.

I cannot understand the argument of the minister that to limit the effects of inflation, another 1 per cent must be added to the 11 per cent tax. I will admit that it will be added on the price of the product at the manufacturing level, but it will nevertheless be included in the actual sales price. And that is not the only tax the Canadian people cannot see, although they can feel the effects.

On some products, there is an extra excise tax of 10 per cent. And now, over and above that, we have a 12 per cent tax which amounts to 24 per cent, or a little more, because we have to figure 12 per cent of the previous 10 per cent, and there is, besides, the 6 per cent sales tax, in fact, 10, 12, 22, plus 6 per cent, that is 28 per cent. This is complicated. And this gives close to 30, 32 per cent. Those are taxes which the manufacturers can see and which the Canadian people may discover if they look far enough. Moreover, there are other taxes which the Canadian people do not see but have to pay.

Mr. Speaker, why always pick on the eternal taxpayer, the low wage-earner, the one who is the very foundation of our country and our economy? How can we hope to have a stronger and sounder economy if we keep on strangling those who make up the very structure and basis of that economy, the Canadian people?

Sometimes, I cannot understand the way the Minister of Finance and Receiver General goes about doing things. Recently, he brought down a bill covering all deposits made in banks or, at least, comparable institutions, etc. I, for one, always thought, Mr. Speaker, that banks were just about the strongest financial institutions in the country; I realize now that insurance companies may be in a better financial position than banks. Canadians might open their eyes if, tomorrow morning, they all went to the bank asking to withdraw their money and found our that their bank was short of funds. They would be greatly surprised to see that there was not near enough money in bank vaults. I think that if this were to happen the Minister of Finance and Receiver General would surely lose his smile. This might be a very good lesson for our Canadian government with regard to financial structures. By taxing people, by taxing a son in order to give a pension to his father who spent many years of his life working like a slave, so that he may spend the few years he has left living in decency, we choose to put salt on the wounds of the younger generation.

At the present time children have to pay for their parents' survival. Who will pay for those children later on? Who will pay for those who are paying now?

We are getting into a bottleneck where we will be stuck before long. The minister and the government will have to get us out of that mess. They should do it before we get to that point, because then there will no longer be any way out.

Mr. Speaker, in the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs, we were told that 30 per cent of the loans granted by chartered banks were made to directors of chartered banks. Have you ever figured out the fantastic amount that represents for 170 chartered bank directors? If there were less people directly interested in our financial system, it might be to the advantage of the Canadian people. Perhaps if the minister were holding the reins more firmly, had more grip and less give—financiers, of course, would get at him, that is true—he would have the Canadian people behind him. At the present time he has the support of the financiers, which is fine, but they are beside him, not with him, and the Canadian people are on the other side, and not with him either. He is in an extremely dangerous position. You and your predecessors have placed yourselves in a very difficult situation. Of course, you are not alone in the government, and you want to do your very best. But are you doing it?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Address yourself to the Chair.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): I put the question to Mr. Speaker and I know the hon. Minister of Finance understands it, as does also the hon. Postmaster General.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I am addressing directly the minister concerned.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): You may not do so here.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): That is precisely it: here, one often has to go about it in a roundabout way. I can assure you that, at times, one has to grit one's teeth.

The ministers are all nice boys, including the Postmaster General, but the Canadian people are caught in a vicious circle and only he and his colleagues, and nobody else, can get them out of it. The Canadian people place their confidence in you, and you do nothing to get them out of it. And that is why, sometimes, you find yourselves in desperate and exasperating situations. There is talk about inflation. Tighten your belts.

Our governments have always been harping on the same string: tighten your belts when in similar situations.

Mr. Speaker, how come we can afford, at this time, when inflation was feared as well as the rise in the cost of living—which has become frightening—to provide external aid while we are in a financial situation such as the one described by the minister? How can we afford to contribute $1,259,360 to external aid in one year? How can we afford to grant a loan, as we did, to stabilize the pound sterling in England at the cost of $268 million? How can we afford to grant loans to Jamaica or other foreign countries practically interest free, when our domestic situation calls for the same remedies and we fail to apply them?

Why supply foreigners with a remedy and let our own people suffer? Your good will might have been quite appreciated across the border, but not so much here. The hon. Minister of Finance and Receiver General knows it. There are 10,000 approved federal loans to Canadian students, which are held back for lack of sufficient funds. However, we take the liberty of giving $5,467.29 per year to foreign students in Canada. I am not opposed to that, but let us give as much to our Canadian students. Furthermore, let us stop taxing the parents of those students who will make up tomorrow's society. In fact, they are the hope of our nation. We are quite shortsighted in that respect.

Let the hon. Minister of Finance hold the purse strings and let him use the means available to him.

The leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Douglas) suggested to buy the shares of the Mercantile Bank which are offered for sale at the present time to the Canadian people. The president of the bank, Mr. Rockefeller, asked us, the members of the committee, the following question: Who, in Canada, is going to buy them? Who has the money to buy 80 or 90 per cent of the shares offered for sale?

It is the government, on the suggestion of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. It has been suggested here that the government should control its finances. The government should buy that bank; thus, it would at least control one bank in this country and it would not put the financial interests and the economy of this country into the hands of a small circle of financiers that we call chartered banks and which are a private enterprise.

How can the minister accept this answer from a chartered bank president who says: "We are operating in the interests of the bank; we are interested in making profits". You will note that he did not say: "We are interested in the Canadian people or the Canadian government making profits". No. The bank is making the profits. Why is he not buying that bank? He would thus control on what is left, what belongs to him. It would give him an opportunity to take over at least one sector of the financial world. In order to finance what? A reasonable rate of interest at an administration cost. I am not asking the government to finance production, because that is not its field. It should stop interfering in the production field and start taking care, for example, of the distribution field. It should also finance our municipalities in order to relieve them of their tax burden.

Our senior citizen might be in a better financial position today if they had not been sucked dry by direct and indirect taxes, school, municipal, provincial and federal taxes.

Why not use, now, the central Bank of Canada, with provincial branches, to grant the same loans, the same privileges without changing the whole financial system? We could give the other levels of government privileges similar to those granted to Jamaica, to the Dominican Republic, as well as to Britain to stabilize the pound sterling. Why not use the same means to steady the financial situation of our provincial governments and, especially, our school boards, which are burdened by such a heavy load of taxes and debts that they do not know what to do?

If that was good for Jamaica, if it did not bring about or require any changes in the constitution, why should it require any change for the provinces, the municipalities or the school boards? I am not asking to make loans to Peter and Paul so as to develop private production. That is not the role of the government and it should not interfere with production or try to control it. That is why I am, to a certain extent, against government control of private corporations.

Private enterprise has done its duty in this country, but it is the Canadian government that has always allowed private enterprise, or any other body, to realize its fondest dreams.

Mr. Speaker, I submit we can use the Bank of Canada for the purpose of financing public undertakings and we need not upset anything in doing so. Public schemes are not what they were 100 years ago; neither can we compare the present responsibilities of our governments, at various levels, with those prevailing a century ago. The situation is different from what it was at the beginning of confederation, where everyone worried and lost sleep trying to solve the problems involved in laying a railroad track from one end of the country to the other. Now, the problems are much more complicated, much more numerous and much more urgent than they were at that time.

I would urge the Minister of Finance to streamline his monetary and fiscal policy; this is 1967, he should keep up with the times and drop those policies which were used some 250 or 300 years ago in the old countries. Let us leave the banks free to operate—they are private enterprises—but I feel we should limit their prerogatives. They should not be granted powers great enough to place a government in an embarrassing situation, to bring a people down to its knees, to keep this people in a state of submission through an economic crisis or a period of inflation or depression.

A certain professor at the University of Texas once said that only one economy may be allowed to fluctuate from one extreme to the other. However, this is quite contrary to its very constitution. Our economy is subject to fluctuations and I am anxious to see what will happen early in 1968.

Mr. Speaker, if the government resorted to the means at its disposal, it would spare us from this 12 per cent tax. It is the small consumer who will have to pay it. The main duty of the government is to ensure a decent living to the people. Has this been done up to now? Everybody has the right to live.

There is not a single financier who is not empowered to tighten the screws to the point where someone will suffer or be maintained in the most abject misery. I am asking the minister to tell me what is the present financial position of the federal government unemployment insurance fund?

The government has already been forced to inject $5 million into this fund, not so long ago. Is that situation being repeated? We shall see whether, by the end of 1967, the same situation does not recur.

Mr. Speaker, I think the minister is intelligent enough to understand my remarks. Are his hands tied? Is he not authorized by the cabinet to act in accordance with the wishes of the Canadian people? If, morally, it is good for the people, why does the government not act accordingly? That is the question I am asking myself and that many people ask. I hope they will find an answer before the next federal election. The minister may have found a solution before then. But, in the meantime, people are taxed and taxed and overtaxed.

Why not take the initiative, for once, and separate the private sector from the public sector. Interest should be charged, of course, but on production, and not on things that are unproductive. Schools? Because of the ridiculous interest charged, the cost of building a school is doubled and the cost of building a road is doubled or tripled, and after twenty-five years, the road is still not paid for and we are still deep in debt. The same principle applies to bridges and to everything coming under public authority—schools are unproductive, they serve education. However, they depreciate in value, but why?

Why is it finally worth nothing? Why is twice the cost of the school still owing? It is because of the interest.

This is illogical; this is nonsense. Public funds should be used to finance public enterprise; the private sector should be left alone and public funds should not be used to finance private enterprise. Many problems will be solved and the minister will avoid many a headache when he decides to take action; he no longer will have to put a poultice on wooden legs, like he has to now.

Our senior citizens are surely not numbskulls, they have been around; they have had a rough time, but you cannot fool them too easily. They are very much aware of the fact that they must depend on their children for their bread and butter today because of a misconceived and badly administered financial system.

Who will provide for the future generation now paying for this scheme? I ask this of the minister. I hope he is a true statesman and not a financier's puppet. I hope he will find an answer to the present problem in order to avoid the catastrophes of tomorrow.

[English]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in this debate but I think I should make some comment about the speech just made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp).

The minister made a very spirited defence of his budget and told the house why it should reject the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr.

Knowles), an amendment which would have the effect of giving this bill a six months hoist. The minister began by saying that he liked to avoid imposing taxes, that he would be much more popular if he did not have to be a tax gatherer but that he is desirous of ensuring steady progress for the workers and farmers of this country. No doubt this is why he intends to add to their costs of production by increasing the sales tax. He told us he would be failing to live up to his responsibilities if he failed to act, because this country needs expansion without inflation.

Surely, however, the minister is not asking us to believe that the reason he is imposing this tax is that he wants to prevent inflation. The minister himself told us in the course of his budget speech on December 19 that whereas the budget of last spring had anticipated a deficit of $150 million the anticipated budgetary deficit today is $340 million. This is not because of the increased expenditure on old age pensioners. The minister says the anticipated increase in expenditure for old age pensioners will be some $280 million a year, and he has made provision for raising $290 million to meet that cost. The reason there will be a larger deficit than anticipated last spring is that the minister has decided to spend more money on Expo and has put back on the list certain public works which had been removed. I am not quarreling with that. But let him not try to kid the troops that he is imposing this tax because he wants to prevent inflation. The minister himself has increased his deficit, which means he will be spending considerably more in relation to revenue than he anticipated only last spring.

The position which we in this party take is, first of all, that the minister did not need to increase taxes in order to meet the cost of the old age supplementary payments at this time. According to the hon. gentleman's own statement we could have absorbed this increase out of the surplus in the old age security fund up until the middle of 1969. There are sufficient surpluses there, according to the tables the minister placed on Hansard, to meet this increase until the middle of 1969.

Mr. Sharp: Would the hon. gentleman clarify the word "surpluses"?

Mr. Douglas: I will take the minister's own statement as recorded at page 11334. He said:

> It would use up the accounting surplus in the fund by mid-1969 and produce an annual deficit of nearly $400 million in the fund by the time the age reduction already in the law takes full effect.

I am not suggesting that the minister should wait until the middle of 1969. Certainly some increase in taxation would be warranted in the budget for 1967-68 or 1968-69. But no increase is required at this time.

There is no doubt in my mind that the sole reason the minister brought in these tax increases was to associate them in the public mind with the old age supplementary payments in order that the people of this country would be made aware that if they insisted on improving social security they could automatically expect taxes to be increased. A phrase in the Bible says "Ask, and ye shall receive." The minister has a new version: "Ask, and you shall pay for it." He wants to drive home this lesson. Despite the fact that according to his own statement on December 19 the old age security fund had a surplus at the end of October of $235 million—

Mr. Sharp: But no cash.

Mr. Douglas: If the minister is not keeping the cash there he is taking it out for something else and he ought to put the cash back into the fund. The minister has been playing ducks and drakes with the country for too long. He cannot say on the one hand, that there is no cash and at the same time keep bookkeeping accounts on the basis of which he can say: "You have used up all the surplus; I must now raise taxes." This is what he is doing when he imposes the taxes set out in this bill.

One of these taxes, the minister tells us, will bring in $155 million a year, but that is not going into the fund. He says this if for cash purposes. But mark my words, at the end of 1971 the minister, if he is still Minister of Finance and if this country is still solvent, two things which taken together are difficult to comprehend—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Douglas: —the minister will trot out the accounts for the old age security fund and say, look, we have used up all the surplus and it is time we raised taxes again. He will say nothing about the $155 million a year that has been collected through the sales tax to meet the cash demands to pay the old age supplementary income but which has not been recorded in the fund account.

The minister cannot have it both ways. He must put the money which he alleges is going to be used to pay old age supplementary pensions and general pensions into the fund and keep the fund solvent. If he is going to put some into general revenue and some into the fund he might just as well drop the bookkeeping item entirely and pay both the general and supplementary old age pensions out of the general fund.

Mr. Sharp: A lot can be said for that idea.

Mr. Douglas: Of course it can, but the minister should not now try to befuddle the picture still further and confuse people's minds by giving the impression, as his speech of December 19 undoubtedly did, that these two taxes which take $290 million per year out of the pockets of the Canadian people are necessary in order to pay a $30 per month supplementary pension to those old people who can pass an income test. That is just not true. It was not necessary then and it is not necessary now.

By the minister's own statement, even with the increase in income tax, the fund will be solvent to the end of the 1970-71 fiscal year without the increase in the sales tax. The minister does not need the sales tax increase in terms of this fund. The minister says he has to have money. There is no argument about that. The minister needs more revenue for general purposes but the old age security fund as a result of this income tax increase will take care of itself, according to the minister's own statement, until the end of the fiscal year 1970-71.

The minister says he needs other revenue, but we say that if he does, this is the worst possible way to get it, by increasing the sales tax from 11 per cent to 12 per cent. This is a regressive tax and because it is levied at the manufacturers' level it will probably mean that the consumer will pay some 16 per cent or 17 per cent in mark-up on commodities which are taxable.

The minister twitted me with the fact that in the province of Saskatchewan there is a provincial sales tax, that when we took office there was a sales tax, if I remember correctly, of 2 per cent which was later raised to 3 per cent when hospitalization came in and to 5 per cent when medicare came in. There are always degrees of equity which any government has to assess. What sources of revenue does a provincial government have?

Mr. Sharp: All of them.

Mr. Douglas: The minister says "all of them", but he knows better than that. He knows in the first place that under the British North America Act the provinces only have the right to direct taxation, not indirect taxation.

Mr. Sharp: You used direct taxation in a way that at one time was thought impossible.

Mr. Douglas: The minister first said there was no restriction, but provincial governments are limited to direct taxation; they cannot levy indirect taxes.

Mr. Sharp: That is why they have sales taxes.

Mr. Douglas: Perhaps the minister will keep himself calm and in his general good humour while I develop my argument.

Provincial governments have no access to indirect fields of taxation. While they have access to income and corporation tax fields it is virtually impossible to go beyond or very far beyond the amount which is agreed upon under tax sharing arrangements; otherwise there would be double taxation. This leaves provincial governments with several choices.

Provincial governments must acquire their revenue from licences and royalties on the development of raw materials and resources, through direct retail sales taxes or through per capita taxes, which is the most regressive of all forms of taxation. Finally, they can raise taxes through taxation of property, but in practically all provinces this has been turned over to the municipalities as their exclusive field. What the provincial governments have to do is decide within the sources they have which is the least onerous and which is likely to be the most equitable form of taxation.

When the province of Saskatchewan had to raise money for hospital care, and you will remember that Saskatchewan instituted its hospitalization plan 11 years before such plans became general across Canada and financed the entire burden itself, it collected the money in three ways, by a small per capita tax which every family paid, by a sales tax and from general revenue.

When medicare came in the same thing had to be done. Some of the money had to be raised by sales tax, some by a small per capita tax, and some of it came out of general revenue. That does not mean that a sales tax is the most equitable form of raising revenue, but it is more equitable than taxing property and it is more equitable than a per capita tax on every family. Certainly it is not by any stretch of the imagination a tax which is best calculated to obtain revenue on the basis of an individual's ability to pay.

Our quarrel about the bill the minister has put before us is that of the $290 million he requires he will collect $135 million from people who are well able to pay by raising the ceiling on the 4 per cent income tax surcharge from the first $3,000 of taxable income to the first $6,000, but $155 million, more than half the money he wants—

An hon. Member: Which he does not need.

Mr. Douglas: —and which he does not need so far as the old age security fund is concerned, is going to come from the people who have to buy the ordinary everyday commodities of life. This money will be collected with no relationship whatsoever to ability to pay. It has some relationship, perhaps more than a per capita tax, in that people who buy expensive cars, jewelry and other goods like steam yachts, if anybody buys steam yachts any more, will pay a considerable amount into this fund. The thing that is wrong is that no matter how hard up people are, including the old age pensioners the minister suggests he is trying to help by this tax, they will be paying the increased sales tax. This increase in sales tax will increase the price of nearly everything these people buy. Only a few items are excluded.

Mr. Sharp: Like food, fuel and shelter.

Mr. Douglas: If the minister will take a look at some supermarkets he will find out what is happening to costs there. The Montreal Gazette of February 14 reported on investigations made in stores in the city of Montreal in respect of prices. It was found that prices are up on drugs, gasoline, lubricating oils and products such as detergents and margarine. It has now been announced that the cost of cigarettes and clothing is to go up. But the most iniquitous thing is that not only is the 1 per cent increase in the sales tax levied on the manufacturer being passed on but a good deal more is being passed on. This report says:

• (4:30 p.m.)

Dealers obviously are passing many on—and then some. The federal tax was raised to 12 per cent from 11, but many retail prices are up anywhere from 2 to 10 per cent, and sometimes more.

"Everything's going up," says the girl in the drugstore. "Toothpaste that used to be 69 cents is 75 cents. Some face tissue is 25 cents where it was 22. And a roll of black and white film costs 66 cents now, a cent more than on Dec. 31."

One brand of mouthwash, which has sold for 70 cents for years, now is 75 cents in some outlets.

[Mr. Douglas.]

They go on to speak of drugs particularly having gone up. Then the report says:

A. J. McKichan, manager of the Retail Council of Canada, predicts the end result of the increase will be what he calls psychological pricing.

"Some increases are acceptable to the public, others not," he says.

"Retailers will try to recover costs by raising prices on items that can stand it, and keeping them steady on others which couldn't become more expensive without markedly reducing sales."

He forecasts that clothing will probably cost more soon, because generally it still is priced below the "psychological limit."

That is a nice way of saying that it is below what the traffic will bear.

Mr. Sharp: That must have been true of the 5 per cent tax in Saskatchewan too.

Mr. Douglas: No. The minister knows, because he is an economist, the difference between a retail tax and a tax at the manufacturer's level. The tax in Saskatchewan, and in all other provinces now but one, is on the retail price that people pay. If you buy a $1 article you know you will pay an additional 5 cents. Even the minister knows that. That is very different from imposing 12 per cent on the manufacturer's price. Heaven only knows what happens to the retail price then because when you buy an article in the store you do not know how much of the price you pay is federal sales tax and how much you are actually paying for the commodity. The fact is that the minister had to raise $290 million. He is raising the minor part of it on the basis of ability to pay, and well over 50 per cent of it from the people who can least afford to pay it, the people who have to buy ordinary goods in the stores.

The minister says that we in this party are always talking about the things we would like to see done. He made an inventory, and I wish to thank him for it, of the things we have been advocating. He says these would cost some $900 million.

Mr. Sharp: More.

Mr. Douglas: Or more. He wants to know how we would propose to raise the money and suggested that we might have decided to join the Social Credit party and print the money. I would remind the minister, of course, that it was not the members of this party who voted for debt free money in 1962; it was the members sitting across the way who voted for a Social Credit amendment. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) stood just down here on this side of the chamber and made an impassioned speech to save Canada by issuing debt free money.

Mr. Starr: He led them in the vote.

Mr. Douglas: Apparently the Secretary of State for External Affairs has not had much effect on the Minister of Finance.

An hon. Member: Thank God.

Mr. Douglas: The former minister of finance also voted for debt free money. Apparently he has not had any effect on the present Minister of Finance. If the minister wants to talk about printing money, I say to him that he and the members of the Liberal party are the last people who ought to talk about panaceas for solving financial problems, because they showed on the day they voted for that amendment that they were either being completely cynical and hypocritical or actually believed that was how they could solve the financial problems of this country.

Mr. Barnett: It was the first.

Mr. Douglas: I am sure it was the first. Undoubtedly money has to be raised. First of all, the minister assumes that there is a sort of fixed amount of money when as a matter of fact the amount of money available can be increased as we increase our productivity. The theme the Economic Council of Canada has been driving home again and again is that our productivity is lagging some 25 per cent behind the productivity of the United States and that by economic planning, by direction of investment, by allocation of resources in this country we can tremendously increase our productivity. This is one of the ways in which we can get this money. Does the minister tell us for a moment that this country cannot increase its productive capacity by $900 million?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, it can.

Mr. Douglas: If we went to war tomorrow the Minister of Finance would find a great deal more than $900 million, and the people of this country would mobilize their financial, economic and physical resources to produce a great deal more than $900 million additional wealth.

Mr. Sharp: And impose taxes for the purpose.

Mr. Douglas: The other point is that when we require to impose taxes, as we do, we have to decide what is the most equitable way to allocate the burden of those taxes. This is where our quarrel is with the minister. If the minister needs an extra $155 million—he did not need it for the old age security fund, he needs it for cash—where is the best place to get it? The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Stewart) was running interference for the minister yesterday. I suppose that is how one gets to be a parliamentary secretary. The hon. member was jumping up periodically and saying: "Where are you going to get the money?" The minister knows there are better ways of getting $155 million than raising the cost of living by 2 per cent for the great mass of the Canadian people.

First of all, the minister could, if he needed that extra money, have completely taken the ceiling off the income tax surcharge for old age pensions. There is no reason why the 4 per cent should stop at the first $6,000 of taxable income. The minister said today that he wanted to keep it in some relationship to the benefits. There is no relationship to the benefits now; it is up to $6,000 of taxable income. If the minister would study the social security plans in many countries of the world he would see that there is no ceiling. They pay security tax on their entire income. Certainly people receiving substantial incomes can well afford to pay that 4 per cent on all their taxable income. There is no reason why their income above $6,000 should be exempt. There is no reason why a man who has $30,000 of taxable income should pay the same amount of tax as a man who has $6,000 of taxable income. He can afford to pay more.

Mr. Sharp: That man pays higher taxes now.

Mr. Douglas: There is no reason why he should not pay more into the old age security fund. If the minister is really anxious to get money I suggest he look at some of the speeches made by the present Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson), when he was on this side of the house, about the wholesale highjacking of the federal treasury by depreciation allowances and depletion allowances. The minister should read the speeches of the Minister of National Revenue who, when on this side of the house, quivered with indignation at what was being allowed then, and it is still going on. He also referred to the high living on expense allowances which goes on in the upper strata of Canadian society.

Excise Tax and Old Age Security Act

If the minister wants more taxes he should take a look at a capital gains tax. Canada is one of the few countries left in the western world which does not impose a capital gains tax. I have never been able to understand why a man who can make $30,000 playing the stock market, $30,000 as a capital gain as a result of good fortune or a turn of the market, should be exempted from paying taxes on that money while some other person earning $5,000 by the sweat of his brow is expected to pay tax on that. This is incomprehensible to me. Certainly most countries have now recognized the fairness of the view that all income, whether it comes from manual labour or executive services or from speculating in the stock market or in property, is a legitimate taxable item on which a person should pay his share of helping to maintain the services of his country.

We in this party make no apology for suggesting to the house that this bill should be postponed for six months. Both the old age pension and the supplement can be paid until the middle of 1969 without any increase in taxes. The minister can bring in income tax changes at the next session of parliament which will supply him with sufficient money to pay old age pensions until the end of the 1970-71 fiscal year. The increase in the sales tax is not necessary at all. I suggest that if he needs the money he should go into a state of quiet contemplation with himself and come back to us in his next budget and ask for the authority to collect the $155 million or whatever amount he needs by means of taxes which are based on ability to pay. I object to this measure proposed by the minister which puts the tax on the poor and the needy. I think it was Lincoln who said that the Lord must have loved the common people because he made so many of them. The Minister of Finance seems to love the common people because it is so much easier to get the taxes out of them. I suggest that in this case the minister should look to other sources in which there are those better able to pay their share of financing this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, we are now considering a bill entitled: "An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Old Age Security Act".

In my opinion, that measure is nothing but the third act of a play staged in December 1966 when Bill No. 251 to amend the Old Age Security Act was introduced. To get the older Canadians to swallow a bill granting them only 60 per cent of what they had been promised throughout the 1965 election campaign, a good parliamentarian was needed and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) was the obvious choice.

It is obvious that the minister's long discussions at that time, selected excerpts of which were reported by the press gang, were meant to call the attention of the Canadian public to the cost of such a project. And when it was felt that public opinion had been sufficiently awakened to the cause, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) appeared on December 19, for the second act, with the mini-budget.

Times have changed and certain words have changed too with the years. We all remember the word used by our forbears when they needed money and had to go to a more favoured friend to get financing. At that time, that operation was considered a loan; nowadays the word "loan" has almost disappeared in the public service.

When a municipality, a province or a country is in need of money, bonds are offered for sale; the party with empty coffers has become a vendor. With this approach, it is not surprising if certain newspapers have referred to the tax increase then presented by the government as a gift.

The creation of new taxes to get more money from Canadian citizens has become an act of generosity, and it is a smiling Minister of Finance that we have seen reading the speech accompanying that offering. The minister has shown himself very generous by keeping the sales tax on building supplies at the low level of 11 per cent.

Hon. members will remember that, in order to promote the acceptance of this 11 per cent tax, a $500 bonus had been given to those who dared to build a house in winter. Is it generous to deprive of $500 those who, during the present season, are still paying the 11 per cent building tax on the home their family needs? Are there people unenlightened enough to believe that a tax increase was necessary to stop inflation? Are we witnessing a gift or a theft, considering that invalids, needy mothers, people on relief, the unemployed, and badly paid civil servants both in the federal and in the provincial governments will now have to pay a 12 per cent federal sales tax on all clothing and shoes for men, women and children?

A 12 per cent tax is being charged on all clothing which is indispensable in a climate like ours and on all electrical appliances which makes life a little easier for Canadian housekeepers. Are we witnessing a gift or a theft, when we see that a 12 per cent tax will be charged on all household furnishings as well as on linoleum and all other types of carpet for covering floors?

A 12 per cent tax will also be charged on the tools of all Canadian workmen, whether lumberjacks, electricians, plumbers, carpenters, or welders; in fact, this tax will hit workmen in all professions. But when the time comes for those self-same workers to pay income tax, the Department of National Revenue does not allow depreciation on their tools. The car which the majority of those workers need for work, seeing they have to travel to the job, is also hit by this 12 per cent tax.

There again, there is no question of claiming travelling expenses when these workers file their income tax return. The government refuses to grant them that right which, nevertheless, several other groups of society enjoy. The minister, who lives but a block away, can claim exemptions on two scores for travelling, namely an allowance of $6,000 as a member of parliament, and another of $2,000 for the upkeep of his car, as a minister.

A few minutes ago the minister told us how he wants to help farmers. Does the minister have a press release to advise the farmers that from here on they will have to pay a 12 per cent tax on the materials needed for the construction and maintenance offences that are absolutely indispensable for keeping their livestock? Would the minister also take this opportunity to notify farmers that when they purchase an electric fence control—in general, these devices are imported from the United States—in the future, they shall have to pay customs duty and taxes totalling 34½ per cent?

This is so hard to believe that I shall quote a passage from Hansard of April 4, 1966, to corroborate my statement. I had put question No. 1,190 on the order paper; the question reads as follows:

> Are the following items subject to the 11 per cent sales tax (a) galvanized trade wire (b) annealed trade wire (c) oiled and annealed trade wire (d) hay baling wire (e) electrical fence wire (f) barbed wire (g) welded mesh fencing (h) farm fencing (i) chain link netting (j) steel fence posts (k) steel farm gates?

The hon. Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson) answered the first part of my question in the affirmative. Until now, this fact has been well hidden. This tax torments and disturbs the farmers who try to make farming a prosperous undertaking, particularly the Quebec farmers, most of whom earn a mere $1,250.

The 12 per cent tax also applies to farm trucks; even the tractors are not entirely exempt, since the manufacturer has to pay tax on the hydraulic system, the electric system, including lights, wiring, batteries, in short he has to pay tax on the complete system controlling other farm implements. The salesman's complete bill always contains these hidden taxes.

Initially, there is only a 1 per cent increase, but this is another step toward dispossessing Canadian citizens. Most of our manufacturers are already faced with serious financial difficulties and cannot absorb this new tax. Therefore, they will have to recuperate it, which means that they will have to change their price lists. How much will this cost? Every wholesaler and retailer will also have to put out new price lists and the cost of this operation will be borne by the consumers, rich or poor.

The minister can take pride in the fact that he warned the taxpayers, saying: "True, you will pay more, but this is for our many senior citizens."

What would we not do for our aging parents under normal circumstances? Sure, we will pay for our senior citizens, but at this point I would like to tell the minister we also know of another class of Canadians who cost us much more. I am referring here to the minister's friends, those who control money and credit. We, members of this house, know that the pension fund is well provided for and that a further tax was not urgent. But if we take a look at the estimates of the last four years, we note that there is a priority for the debt interest.

In my opinion, the increase of that interest is the first reason for the introduction of the bill before us.

I take the liberty, once again, to quote extracts of previous estimates.

The debt interest for 1963-64 amounted to $881 million. It was $1,035 million in 1964-65. In 1965-66, it amounted to $1,100 million and in 1966-67, to $1,185,488,000.

When the estimates for the Centennial year 1967-68 will be known, all Canadians will agree, I think, that the team now facing us and ably lead by the Minister of Finance will be champion, because in 1963, despite all their efforts, the former teams had succeeded in squeezing only $880 million for their financier friends.

But 1967-68 will bring about $1,300 million to these great treasurers. If it cost only $1,185 million last year, the reason is that we had loans which had been made under good conditions, that is loans the interest of which was costing us only 3¼, 3½ and 3¾ per cent.

But during the past year the government had to borrow again at less favourable conditions and, automatically, expenditures will reach $1,300 million, without causing great concern. It has taken only five years for the government party to increase its friends' share by $400 million a year.

In the last five years of the first century, the servicing of the debt will cost 50 per cent more than for the first 95 years.

This 50 per cent increase over such a short period deserves a special reference, and such reference is to be found in the speech from the throne delivered at the opening of this session, on January 18, 1966, as reported on page 8 of Hansard:

> —Our country is enjoying an unprecedented period of prosperity and growth—
> —My Government intends to pursue policies to ensure that our prosperity and growth continue.

True, the financiers are getting more and more prosperous but Canadians have never paid so many taxes.

Fellow Canadians, tighten your belts. That is the advice of the financiers speaking through the government now in power. Tighten your belts and we will be in a better position to empty your pockets.

In this world there are all kinds of ways to be stupid. In India, for instance, people starve to death in their homes before they will touch or kill a cow chewing up the garden. Custom demands it. For an Indian to eat the meat of a cow is to insult his God. Here in Canada, 70 per cent of the population is deprived of the necessities through the stupidity of the few.

In India, people are second to the cows. In Canada, the Minister of Finance goes beyond our own institution, that is, he goes beyond the Bank of Canada to conduct business with his friends, which is more expensive.

The minister knows that the country can be financed through the Bank of Canada at an administrative cost as low as ½ or ¾ of 1 per cent. But how would his gods, that is those who have financed his election campaign react? What would those who spent $32,000 to have him elected in his riding say? He must follow their instructions. However, in doing so, the minister is extracting $1 billion per year from the Canadian people in additional taxes.

One billion a year for a few financiers; that is more than the total amount to be given to millions of pensioners. It means that the amount of their pension could be doubled with that billion. As a matter of fact, one billion a year, over and above what is collected now for all our needs, would be enough to raise the old age pension to $200 a month. One billion a year is twice the amount received by parents in family allowances.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the Minister of Finance will, while he can, put an end to this shameful looting. Otherwise, the people of Canada will have no other alternative but to believe that the title of "honourable" before the title of "minister" is no longer fitting and that the letters added to his name should never have been given to him in the first place.

Mr. Guay: That is horrible.

On clause 1—

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, I was very interested in the remarks of the Minister of Finance this afternoon. I was rather impressed by the sweet reasonableness of his approach in examining the proposals of the New Democratic Party. He seemed to indicate that he agreed in principle with many of our objectives and that he and other members of his party were in favour of increasing foreign aid and believe in research, education and the need to make university education available to those who could benefit, and medicare, but that it was with profound regret he had to step in and tell the government that his judgment indicated that the government could not afford these things. He also expressed his deep sympathy that the aspirations of the older people of this country who need increased pensions could not be met.

The minister mentioned an estimated cost of $900 million in respect of these programs. It is not my intention to quarrel with that figure because it is not particularly important now. No one questions the fact that these programs would require substantial expenditures. No one will argue that these programs could be carried out without incurring expenditures. However, the minister seems to ignore a number of aspects involved in this kind of situation. He seems to ignore the fact that many of these programs can be considered as investments in Canada's future. When people spend to increase the potential and the productivity of the nation the whole situation takes on a different light. One cannot believe that these programs involve merely an outflow without any return. There has been evidence in respect of foreign aid that frequently the aid giving nation over a period of time obtains very substantial benefits in increased trade, good will and access to markets. Research and investment are important to a nation attempting to achieve growth.

If we consider the remarks of the Economic Council pointing out the lower level of expenditure on education in Canada and the lower attainment of education at the post-secondary level, we have to question whether we can really defer programs of this kind on the argument that we cannot afford them. It seems to many of us that the one thing we cannot afford to do is to ignore the important aspects of these expenditures vis-à-vis the long-run future of the country.

The minister, as I said, was being reasonable in his approach. He was almost professorial, indicating that he had considerable regret in coming before the house and pointing out that the money just was not there for these purposes and therefore we had to accept the proposition he was putting forward. The difficulty in accepting what the minister says in this regard is that he gave us no indication that there are other ways of increasing government revenues without necessarily increasing tax rates.

We all know there is a limit on the amount of taxation people are prepared to accept. But there is an important way of increasing government revenues that the minister has not touched upon that is, the outstanding requirement in this country to increase our level of productivity and the wealth base from which the costs of the social service, scientific and foreign aid programs can be met. We have had a rather dismal record in this country in terms of increasing our productivity. If we refer to a table on page 16 of the third annual review of the Economic Council of Canada which shows the growth of productivity from 1955 to 1965, we see that Canada is 14th in the list of industrialized nations. We have had one of the lowest rates of productivity increase of almost any of the industrialized countries of the world. When we look at these figures and recognize that many of these countries which have a much higher productivity growth rate than Canada spend considerably more than this country in the fields of social welfare, research and foreign aid, we realize that for the minister to come before this house and say "I would love to do all these things but we simply cannot afford it" is to beg the question completely.

Surely the real problem facing the minister is to see that his government brings in programs that will enable this nation to fulfil its obligations and find its proper place in the sun, instead of wringing his hands at the prospect of programs which even he admits are desirable but says we cannot afford. Canada, according to the Economic Council and according to almost any observer who has looked at our economy, is potentially the wealthiest nation in the world. We have in this country almost everything that any nation could hope to have if it is looking for wealth. I think there is general agreement about that. Despite the enormous potentiality in this country our productivity is approximately 25 per cent lower than that of other industrialized nations. The figures vary between 20 per cent and 30 per cent. We have to ask ourselves the question: Why should this be? If we talk about capital investment in this country and say that we urgently need tremendous quantities of capital in order to improve our productivity, this is very true.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Does he not agree that the rate of capital formation in Canada is higher, I think, than anywhere else in the world?

Mr. Saltsman: Yes. I was coming to that, Mr. Chairman. I believe the Economic Council points out that on a per capita basis more capital is invested per Canadian worker than is the case even in the United States. We have the highest capital investment per employee of any nation in the world. But we still have the problem of an approximately 25 per cent lower productivity than other industrialized nations. This is really the major question to which the Minister of Finance must address himself. He has to come up with an answer to this problem. The minister may argue that it is a long-range problem, that we will not increase productivity as a result of one budget, whether it be a mini-budget or a major budget, and I would agree with him to a point. But after all, the party that the minister represents has been in office in this country for a long time. There has been some interruption in its term of office over several years but by and large it has been in power as long as I can remember. Yet today we are faced with a budget that deplores the fact that the government does not have the funds for the kind of things that almost all of us agree are necessary for this country. Why is this? Why should the minister have to come before us with apologies and excuses, not arguing against programs but saying that his government with its policies has not been able to find an answer to the needs of the Canadian people?

To rub salt into the wound or to add insult to injury, instead of apologizing for this failure to bring our nation to the level of its potentiality, he turns on the party for which I have the honour to speak and says, "You fellows are asking for all kinds of things that are not possible." That is only one side of the equation. Certainly we have asked for a great many things, and we do not underestimate their cost. But we have time and time again pointed out to the government that unless there is a stronger degree of government involvement in the economy, unless the government takes a look at our capital expenditures to ensure that we get the maximum use out of our resources, unless we develop manpower policies to get the best use of human resources, we will never find the money to meet the objectives about which we agree.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock this day are as follows: The hon. member for Hamilton South (Mr. Howe), research—request for increased grants for medical research; the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard), External Affairs —exchanges between Canada and France; the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale (Mr. Rapp), Agriculture—eggs—reported recent drop in prices.

PRIVATE BILLS

THE BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY OF CANADA

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Durham) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-239, respecting the Bell Telephone Company of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I shall speak briefly and deal in broad terms with the provisions of this bill. I am hopeful hon. members will feel at the conclusion of this hour that the bill be given second reading, after which it will be referred to the standing committee on transport and communications. I would be surprised if hon. members did not wish to deal in more detail with certain portions of the bill and to hear the officials of the Bell Telephone Company and other witnesses. I hope hon. members will agree with me that this can be done best in the committee on transport and communications.

In moving second reading of the bill I might mention that its objectives may be classified under four separate heads: First, an amendment affecting the corporate name of the company; second, amendments affecting the capital structure of the company; third, an updating of the corporate powers and, fourth and last, procedural and mechanical amendments.

Over the years the company has become known as Bell Canada. In February, 1956 it obtained permission to use Bell Canada as a trade name. Bell Canada has been used extensively in advertising and other material.

The second group of amendments deals with the capital structure of the company. The company's original act of incorporation dates back to 1880. Over the years, as and when new capital was required, the company applied for increased capital authorizations, and this is a further application before parliament at this time.

During the last decade the Bell Telephone Company of Canada has embarked on a construction program which has required the investment of substantial amounts of both equity and debt money. According to the company's estimate the authorized capital will be virtually exhausted by 1968. If this were to happen before the company receives additional authority to increase its capital, a slow down of the construction program would immediately occur with an instant impact on the Canadian economy. It must be borne in mind that the company currently spends $300 million a year on its construction program which is designed to meet growth and to give its customers improved services such as automatic dialing and so on.

If service is to be maintained, the company needs the authority to issue additional stock. At present 40 million shares of a par value of $25 each have been authorized. Over 34 million shares, of which 94.6 per cent are held in Canada, have already been issued and the employees of the company subscribe from year to year more than $22 million a year.

The increase of $750 million for which approval is now being sought is consistent with the pattern which has developed over the last decade. The company comes before parliament every 9 or 10 years to obtain additional capital authorizations. According to present forecasts the sum of $750 million sought at this time should last approximately ten years.

The company also seeks an amendment to have the power to issue preferred stock whenever conditions warrant such a decision. At present the financing of the company is done exclusively by means of common shares and bonds. There are periods when market conditions could make the issue of preferred stock less burdensome upon the subscribers. In order to have more flexibility and thereby finance the company at reduced cost the company requests an amendment authorizing it to issue preferred shares as and when it might be advantageous for the company to do so. The creation and issue of preferred stock would be subject to the procedure outlined in clause 3 of the bill, which is similar in terms to previous authorizations given by this house to other corporations incorporated by special act.

The company further requests an amendment to its charter allowing it to issue its capital stock without the approval of the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada. I might mention that any issue of the capital stock of the company is presently subject to the approval of the Board of Transport Commissioners. The board allowed until May, 1966 a permissive level of earnings in terms of dollars per share. In May, 1966 the board changed the basis of the regulation and stated that rates generating a rate of return not exceeding 6.6 per cent on the total invested capital were just and reasonable.

The third group of amendments deals with the updating of the corporate powers of the company. It was recognized by this house when it amended the Criminal Code that the expression "telephone communications" was much too narrow to describe adequately the field of communications. Everyone is now referring to telecommunications, which is a broader term than telephone communications. This is the purpose of clause 7 of the bill.

The company has the corporate power to own, maintain and operate a telephone company and to manufacture electrical equipment. It also has the power to invest in any company possessing as proprietor any line of telephonic or telegraphic communications or in any company possessing the power or right to use communications by means of the telephone. These powers are specified in clauses 2 and 4 of the incorporating statute as amended.

Section 14 (e) of the Canada Corporation Act gives to letters patent companies the ancillary power to invest in companies having objects in whole or in part similar to those of the company. The purpose of clause 8 of the bill is to give Bell Canada similar powers. Clause 8 also seeks to authorize Bell Canada to invest in companies engaged in research and development work. The need for Canadian research is important to our economic progress.

The company also wishes to introduce two social measures to help its employees. Permission to lend money to employees who are in financial difficulties, even if they are shareholders of the company, is requested under clause 12 of the bill. Clause 13 seeks authority to establish a housing plan to assist employees who are transferred in the course of their employment from one area to another.

The other provisions of the bill are procedural or mechanical in character and can be considered as housekeeping matters. I have in mind the clarification of the power of the company to sell shares for cash and to its shareholders, clause 5, the clarification of the number of authorities to be given by the shareholders for borrowing money, clause 6, or other matters dealing with indemnification given to the directors in suits respecting execution of office, clause 10. The record date for meetings, dealt with in clause 15, also falls in this category of housekeeping provisions.

The company also requests authority to create an executive committee to deal with matters delegated to it by the board of directors. In view of the size of the board of directors and the importance of the matters to be transacted at board meetings, the formation of an executive committee with executive powers becomes more and more important for the smooth operation of the business.

That is all the time I want to take, Mr. Speaker, because I want to give ample time to representatives of the other groups. May I reiterate that I hope we may give the bill second reading today so that we may deal with it in detail in the standing committee.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, as the brief summary of the bill's provisions given by the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Honey) indicated, the bill before the house, even though it is a private member's bill, is in our opinion an extremely important one and should not be passed without very thorough study by the appropriate committee. Indeed, as far as we are concerned we could not possibly support the bill in its present form.

What this bill does, if I may summarize it in my own way, is to seek to extend the field of the Bell Telephone Company almost without limit into the entire area of telecommunications. It seeks to extend its field into the broadcasting area. It seeks to give the Bell Telephone Company powers for very widespread vertical integration by giving it authority to acquire companies without limiting it any longer to those which have or use telephone lines, as was the case formerly. Clause 8 of the bill provides that the company can extend its operations, its purchases and acquisitions very widely, so it is obvious the company can use that power to build an empire of satellite activities, industrial and commercial, almost without limit. Under the bill the Bell Telephone Company seeks to get away in part from the regulations to which it is now subject under the Board of Transport Commissioners. Its rates would still be subject to regulation but the issuance of shares would no longer be subject to any investigation or inquiry by the board. The bill seeks to increase the capitalization of the company from $1 billion to $1¾ billion, which would give it a tremendous base for financial development of a huge size.

Before we do that, Mr. Speaker, we ought to know a great many things about the intentions of the company. I am sure we ought to investigate rather carefully how the company has so far used the powers it has had. If any company has enjoyed a monopoly in its services, this company has. It has almost a complete monopoly in Canada or in the major parts of this country.

The company has had tremendous earnings, Mr. Speaker, and I think some information in this regard ought to be put on the record to show what the company has enjoyed as a result of the incorporation it received in 1880 and the various amendments which have been made since. Since the end of the last war the operating revenues of the company increased from $77 million in 1946 to about $593 million in 1965. The 1965 report of the company, which I have before me, gives the first nine months of 1966 and if you project those nine months to a full 12 month period the gross operating revenue of the company amounted to $638 million last year. The operating revenues, therefore, have increased nine times in the 20 years from 1946 to 1966.

So far as net income is concerned, it was $8 million in 1946 and increased to $86½ million in 1965. A projection on the same basis I have mentioned indicates that the net income for 1966 probably was around $88 million or an increase of 11 times in 20 years.

It is interesting in these statistics to note the effect of automation and how these huge increases in operating revenues and net earnings took place in relation to the work force. I have the figures only from 1959 on in the report which, as I have said before, is in front of me. From 1959 to 1965 operating revenues increased by 57½ per cent and net income increased by over 71 per cent. The work force, however, increased by only 3 per cent in those seven years. An increase of 3 per cent in the number of employees enabled the company to increase its operating revenues by 57½ per cent and its net income by over 71 per cent.

[Mr. Lewis.]

We ought to make a careful study to see what the company has done for the people of Canada to deserve this tremendous growth in revenues and profits. How has it treated its Canadian subscribers? According to some of the evidence given before the Board of Transport Commissioners—I cannot say whether the evidence is accurate but so far as I have been able to find out it has not been contradicted—the company has increased rates over the years to Canadian subscribers by making earnings which for a number of years exceeded the level of earnings the Board of Transport Commissioners permitted. During those years when the permissive level of earnings was based on so many dollars on a certain value of shares. For years, therefore, the company, so far as I have been able to find out, deliberately violated the instructions given by the body set up by this parliament with authority to give those orders, and the company increased the rates to subscribers in order to help it violate those instructions. We ought to know about that. We ought to know whether the consumers of telephone services in Canada have been treated shabbily by this company before we give it these extra powers.

As a result of my study of this material, Mr. Speaker, I would say the company has not taken the national interest into account or the interest of the subscribers to its service. We ought to know, exactly what is the relationship of this company to its subsidiaries. This report tells me there are 16 subsidiaries of the Bell Telephone Company, some of them wholly owned and some of them subsidiaries of subsidiaries. When I see that I am concerned about the additional powers the company wants under clause 8 of the bill which would enable it to go still further afield.

We have the usual consolidated statements, the usual refusal of the parent company to give information, even to the Board of Transport Commissioners, about the precise relationship between Northern Electric and the Bell Telephone Company. There are the usual suspicions, usually well grounded, that the Northern Electric Company sells its products to the parent company at a price which is unnecessarily high for intercompany reasons that have nothing to do with the national interest. There is the usual secrecy about precisely what Northern Electric is doing, how much it is making, and a lot of other relevant information is also denied us.

I was interested to find that this matter has concerned governments over the years, Mr.

Speaker, and I should like to put on record, because I think it is both relevant and illuminating, an extract taken from a brief which was presented to the Board of Transport Commissioners in 1926, when the Bell Company asked for a rate increase, by the Conservative government of Premier Ferguson of the province of Ontario. This is what the brief says in part:

> Reference in this connection might also be made to the covering up and the scurrying-to-cover tactics in connection with the disclosure of all relations and dealings of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada and its subsidiary the Northern Electric Manufacturing Company—

As it was then called.

> —which latter company is merely the directors of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, and the Bell Telephone Company itself manufacturing apparatus and selling it to themselves under another name at high monopoly prices, fixed and agreed upon between each company and its directors thereby making it possible to empty the Bell treasury and create a deficit when a rate case is coming, or at any time it sees fit to do so.

That is the statement that was made by the government of Ontario in 1926. I cannot say whether that statement would still apply in its entirety, but I have no hesitation in expressing the opinion, based on some years of trying to understand operations of this sort, that the prices which the Northern Electric Company charges Bell do not necessarily have any relationship to the market price or cost of the products allegedly sold to Bell. Indeed, they have a relationship to the financial arrangements between these two companies and the eventual financial statement of the Bell Telephone Company itself.

The Ferguson government brief to which I have just referred contains a statement couched in stronger language than I would use but which is perhaps perfectly legitimate language. It stated:

> This is the most barefaced piece of villainy and imposition ever attempted upon a free people ... and its exposure before this honourable board will not be the last this corporate monopoly will hear about it.

I do not want it to be the last, Mr. Speaker. I think that all these matters should be carefully inquired into by the appropriate committee of this house. I want to know what is the exact effect of the relationship between Bell and the American Telephone and Telegraph Company. I know that the Bell Company boasts of the fact that 94 per cent of its shares, or some such percentage, are owned in Canada by some 240,000 shareholders. I think that is the number published in their report and prospectus. If they say so then I have no doubt that their share books will show it. But there has been more than one occasion in our kind of economy when a company which has owned as A.T.&T. does, 2.2 per cent of shares has been in a position to exercise control.

I should like to know, and I am sure the house would, to what extent Bell is at the service of A.T.&T. I want to know whether the service contract between Bell and the American Company, which enables Bell to use certain of A.T.&T. developments in Canada but gives the American company the top 1 per cent of the earnings of Bell amounting to many millions of dollars each year, is a fair arrangement for the people of Canada and the users of the Bell Telephone services.

All of these matters which concern the national interest ought to be gone into by the committee with the greatest possible care. We should be satisfied that Bell is prepared to undertake to make its operations consonant with the national interest before this tremendous extension of power and financial base is given to the company by this parliament.

As a result of its incorporation almost 90 years ago the Bell Telephone Company is able to use and enjoy a natural monopoly, as I have said, over the major part of this country. Even now, if I may say so, in my view as a lawyer it has exceeded the powers given it in 1880 and in every amendment I have seen to its initial act of incorporation. It has carried on activities which are beyond the powers it has had until now. In my opinion it has not had the power under its act of incorporation and the amendments to that act to go into the field of telecommunications, a field it has entered without the authority that it ought to have sought from this parliament.

To a large extent, Mr. Speaker, this bill is now asking parliament to rubberstamp and to give the company authority to carry on activities which it has to date carried on without such authority. This is one of the reasons that it no longer wants to go to the Board of Transport Commissioners over the question of issuing shares. It wants to have more and more freedom. This parliament, and I suggest the people of Canada as well, must be assured that that freedom will be used to the benefit of this country, not merely to increase the net income and earnings of this company.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I was struck by words used in one of the clauses of this bill. I am not going to refer to the actual provision as such but merely to the phrase which caught my attention. In clause 7 of the bill certain things are proposed, namely, the extension of the activities of this company in the entire field of telecommunications. At the end of the clause it is stated that things may be done which in the opinion of the board of directors are "deemed to be in the interest of the company".

I am not concerned, Mr. Speaker, about the interest of this company. I want to make sure, and this parliament ought to make sure, that the extension of this company's activities into the various aspects of telecommunications is in the interest of Canada, not merely in the interest of Bell. Under this bill the board of directors is empowered to take steps to make extensions which they deem to be in the interest of Bell. The things Bell has done up to now have been in its own interest and frequently against the interest of the Canadian people, and it is time the situation was reversed.

This company seeks power to extend its monopoly into various fields. I submit we cannot approve this kind of extension of monopolistic power on the part of such a giant without certain safeguards, Mr. Speaker, and I will mention only a few.

It is our firm belief and conviction that a company like Bell, performing the kind of service it performs, ought to have on its board of directors public representatives appointed by parliament or the government. They should be members of the board who represent the public and are prohibited from having any financial interest in the company or in any of its subsidiaries. This will ensure that on the board of directors of the Bell Telephone Company there are men and women who represent the people of Canada and who have no personal interest in the financial and earnings arrangements of the company or its subsidiaries.

We ought to have a guarantee in this act that Bell will not enter the field of broadcasting, even though it may have facilities that may be used for broadcasting. We now have the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, private television, radio stations and networks; we do not want a giant like Bell to enter that field as well and start new difficulties and new conflicts in this country. We should have provision in the act incorporating this company for Bell to disclose in detail the operations and earnings of all its subsidiaries. Let us have no more of these unrevealing, consolidated statements that hide everything which should be known by parliament and the people of Canada. We ought to have a provision to give us all the information about Northern Electric and all the other companies that Bell now owns, or is likely to acquire under the proposed clause 8 of the bill. We should have a guarantee from Bell respecting the added capitalization it seeks, that any research work it will do will be research work done in Canada, that the powers we give the company may be used for the development of technological research and know-how for the service of the Canadian people.

We ought to be sure that it will not use that money to buy the results of research elsewhere by making another service contract with American Telephone & Telegraph, or some other company in the United States, Britain, or elsewhere in the world. When it boasts about its intention to do research work, we ought to be certain that that research work will be done in this country, and that the results of the work are available to this country. We ought to have many other, similar safeguards before this already too big giant is made bigger still.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member to advise him the time allotted to him has expired.

An hon. Member: Go on.

Mr. Lewis: Could I have a final minute to complete my remarks.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to continue?

An hon. Member: For one minute.

Mr. Lewis: I merely want to conclude by saying that the only reason we in this party agree that the matter go to the appropriate committee is that we want an opportunity to study these things, to make sure that there are public hearings, evidence and submissions by representatives of subscribers competitors, provincial governments and municipal governments, so that we may delve into the way the company has used its power to date and into its intentions for the future.

One minute it was.

An hon. Member: Half a minute.

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, my contribution will be brief, particularly as I follow the hon. member for York South, (Mr. Lewis) who again has shown his eloquence as a debater. He is thorough when tackling any subject. I agree with the hon. member that this bill is too wide in scope to be passed without first being referred to an appropriate committee of the House of Commons. I have little to argue with in the hon. member's remarks.

An hon. Member: That is a change.

Mr. Mackasey: I do not argue with his appraisal of the problem. He was fair. He did not make unsubstantiated charges but posed many pertinent questions to which he felt the House of Commons and the Canadian people should know the answers. Nobody in the house who is the least bit objective can argue that Canada and Canadians, through the medium of parliament, should not be fully protected, and should not have the right to know the answers to many of the questions asked by the hon. member for York South.

When the matter comes before the committee I think the hon. member will be pleased to know that, in all probability, many of the questions he has asked today are already on public record. The answers to many other questions will do much to allay his fears about giant corporations.

My philosophy about corporations is different from that of the hon. member; but, we respect each other's views on this matter. I am particularly concerned about and interested in the relationship between Northern Electric and other subsidiaries. I was surprised to learn from the hon. member's speech—and I know this must be accurate or he would not have said it—that Bell has financial interests in 15 or 16 subsidiaries.

Mr. Lewis: Sixteen.

Mr. Mackasey: I hope that Bell treats all its subsidiaries with the same consideration and respect it shows to Northern Electric and its employees. If Bell's relationship with its many subsidiaries is as fruitful, objective and fair as its relationship with Northern Electric, or at least with the employees of Northern Electric, I shall be pleased. If this information is brought out in committee, then the suggestion of the hon. member to refer this to a committee will have been valuable.

It might be good to know that the request in the bill that Bell be permitted to lend money to its employees and to help in the field of housing is not a new departure for that company. It has had similar relations with its employees, and the committee might be glad to know that.

I do not intend to answer the hon. member's questions because I do not know the answers. I know that the questions were asked in a spirit of objectivity. I know that the development of Northern Electric came about through a need. Companies such as Bell Telephone, which operate as a monopoly but which are regulated by government boards, such as the Department of Transport and other boards, do not justify their existence for any reason except that they are in business to make money. In a free enterprise system this is a logical reason for any company, big or small, to be in business. Bell's rate of profit is regulated to protect the Canadian people, because the company has a monopolistic position. Northern Electric was created essentially to fulfil a need, to make available to the Bell Telephone Company from sources within Canada parts, pieces, components and know-how that could not be obtained here when Northern Electric was formed. This may not be the situation today. It is conceivable, had Bell Telephone been formed today, that with our increased population, more developed economy and increased technological knowledge it would not have been necessary to form this close alliance with a company such as Northern Electric.

The hon. member mentioned research. When this matter is aired in committee I know that we shall be pleased to find that as the result of research in Canada and inventions coming from that research, the Bell Telephone Company and Northern Electric account for a very substantial export business, when measured in dollars and cents.

• (6:40 p.m.)

As the hon. member for York South mentioned, the shares of Bell Telephone are widely dispersed. It is good to think we have a corporation in Canada 94 per cent of whose shares are owned by Canadians and in the hands of 240,000 Canadians, among an investing population probably no greater than half a million. To me, this indicates the high regard felt by the people of Canada for Bell Telephone. Of course most members of parliament, including myself, gripe occasionally at the service they receive, and get letters from constituents occasionally raising particular problems; but in general I believe the relationship between this country and the Bell Telephone Company is a good one.

As was pointed out during the course of a similar discussion last year, if the Bell

Telephone Company were ever to be nationalized—and I do not think anyone in the house would suggest such a thing—it is highly doubtful whether the Canadian people would be half as well served as they are today under this private enterprise system of ours. I invite hon. members to compare the record of the company from this point of view—remembering that it shows a profit ratio of 6.6 per cent—with that of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or any other Crown corporation.

I am as anxious as is the hon. member for York South to see this matter referred to the appropriate committee so that these questions can be cleared up once and for all. If I am a member of that committee—and I want to make this clear—I will take a dim view of any action which would in any way adversely affect Northern Electric and the employees of that company. I say this regardless of whether its relationship to the Bell Telephone Company is improper in the eyes of some people. I must admit my bias. Living close to Northern Electric I am fully aware of the contribution the company has made to the social and economic development of my city and of the area directly concerned. The relationship of the company with its employees has been laudable and one which other corporations might well seek to emulate. Participation by the company in the social activities of the community has been most beneficial. Its willingness to take part in the activities of the 19 communities on Montreal Island, and I am sure, in other regions, has always been evident; the company has acted unselfishly and with the minimum of publicity for the good of the community. As far as I am concerned, Northern Electric have been good corporate citizens.

I would urge the house to take advantage of the remaining few moments by recommending that the bill be sent to the appropriate committee, so that we can seek out answers to many of the questions which were so objectively and eloquently asked by the hon. member for York South.

Mr. L. M. Brand (Saskatoon): When I look at the bill before us I find myself concerned by the reference in some of its clauses to telecommunications. Some hon. members have already drawn attention to the implications of the changes proposed. It appears to me that on the basis of these provisions the company can now go into broadcasting. This is an aspect which should be examined by the committee on broadcasting.

[Mr. Mackasey.]

The bill speaks of the power to transmit, which includes the emission or reception of signs, signals, writing, images, sounds, and so on, whether visual or auditory. This does seem perilously close to transmissions of the sort we have already heard about in the broadcasting committee—community antenna television and educational television, for example. Since, in the near future educational television and community antenna television may be brought under the Broadcasting Act, I am inclined to support those hon. members who advocate a close look at clauses 7 and 8 to see exactly what their implications are.

When dealing with this field of telecommunications we must not forget that a network of telecommunications belonging to the Canadian National already exists in this country. I will leave the implications of monopoly to be discussed by others; some hon. members have already spoken very well on this subject. Generally, I would support the observations the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) has made in connection with Northern Electric, but I would point out that if the bill before us allows a virtual monopoly in the field of coaxial cables, other firms who produce coaxial cables in this country, such as Industrial Wire and Cable, will find great difficulty in breaking into the market now that a wholly owned subsidiary is able to supply all the needs of this large corporation.

In closing, I return to this question of transmission lines. I would remind hon. members that in Britain transmission lines and microwave systems used by the B.B.C. are publicly owned; it is only those operated by private stations which are owned by I.T.V. the private organization. We should look closely at anything which might place one company in control of educational television, or even for that matter of community antenna television systems.

• (6:50 p.m.)

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I do not see the parliamentary, secretary to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) here at the moment, because I should like to make a comment or two about his speech and I should like to do so in his presence. Not having any control over the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Labour, however, I expect I will have to go ahead in his absence. I listened with a great deal of interest to what he had to say about the bill. I should like to commend him, inasmuch as he was speaking from a position of semi-government, for his endorsation of the views expressed by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis). It is gratifying to have a man who is half way into the cabinet endorse the concept of public representatives on the board of directors of this particular company. We look forward to having the support of the parliamentary secretary and others of his party for these proposals when the bill is considered in the committee.

I think the parliamentary secretary's tangent-like comment with regard to state ownership, when he compared public ownership of a corporation such as the Bell Telephone Company with the ownership of the C.B.C., is an impossible equation. I am sure he knew it and just tossed it out in order to fill in some space. I do not believe he was really sincere in suggesting that it would be possible to make any such comparison, and thus try to play down the great benefits which can come from ownership of certain utilities.

I was also quite struck by his love affair with the Northern Electric Company. As he said, he is a bit prejudiced and biased in this regard. I should think that would be sufficient to disclose his real interest in the Northern Electric Company. I think, as he said, that he threw this in because of his own prejudice and I do not believe it in any way detracts from the substance of his remarks at the outset when he endorsed the views of the hon. member for York South, which views were exceptionally well expressed.

After listening to the hon. member for York South, I feel somewhat the way I feel after my wife has finished speaking to me—there is not much left to say. There is a matter here, however, which I think should concern us, and that is the size of the company and the implications it has in respect of our economy, especially the economy in sections of our country in which the Bell Telephone Company operates. We must remember that this company does not operate directly in the four western provinces. At home, in my own province, we have a privately owned corporation, the B.C. Telephone Company. In the other provinces there are publicly owned telephone systems. When one considers that the operations of the Bell Telephone Company are confined to only a section of our economy and a geographical section of Canada, their request for an increase in capitalization to $1\frac{3}{4}$ billion is made even more important. This is especially true when we realize that $1\frac{3}{4}$ billion, being the requested capitalization of Bell Telephone Company, represents just about one quarter of the total budget of the government and the parliament of Canada. When we think in terms of that capitalization being a quarter of the total budget of Canada, and when we remember that Bell Telephone carries on its activities in only a portion of Canada, this carries with it that much more significance and that much more impact and should, I think, lead us more definitely to an understanding that what really exists here, and what has developed since 1880 when I believe the company was first incorporated by a private act, is not only a monopoly but a structure within which private and not public law is involved.

I believe we are giving, and over the years have given, to Bell Telephone Company authority which equals in all respects the authority of the government. This has been done by giving to this company practically the right to initiate its own system of law making, in so far as the bounds of the statutes relating to the Bell Telephone Company permit this. That, coupled with the size of this company and the revolution which has taken place in the telecommunications, electronics, television and other fields, should convince us that a company of this magnitude and with this much power and authority in its grasp ought to have on its board of directors representatives who would protect the interests of the public. This theory and idea was advanced by my friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) and others in this party during an earlier parliament and gained a great deal of support in the house.

For reasons which I do not have to go into at this moment, because it is nearly seven o'clock and I do not wish to impede the progress of the bill at this stage, it was felt at that time that it was desirable to withdraw the proposal for including public representatives on the board of directors of Bell Telephone Company. This attitude was adopted partly because there was very little warning. Inasmuch as that warning was given in an earlier parliament I am sure the Bell Telephone Company will not be surprised when they are asked at the time the bill reaches the committee to endorse this proposal, that the government appoint public representatives to the board of directors.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on transport and communications.

Mr. Wahn: Mr. Speaker, may I have the indulgence of the house for a moment. The time allotted to private members bills in this session is rapidly expiring. I should like to suggest that, as in the case of the Bell Telephone Company bill, the other private bills on the order paper be given second reading en bloc and referred to the respective committees where they can be examined. Those bills which have merit could come back to the house and be given third reading before the session expires. The Bell Telephone Company bill has been by unanimous consent permitted to go to the committee. May I suggest that the same consideration be shown the sponsors of the other bills, even though these other companies may be somewhat smaller.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that at this point we should not engage in a procedural debate on the point he has raised. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members business has expired.

Mr. Wahn: It could be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hour appointed for private members business has expired.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The house will now resume the business interrupted at six o'clock.

EXCISE TAX ACT AND OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-268, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Old Age Security Act—Mr. Sharp—Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 1—

• (8:10 p.m.)

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, before the hour for private bills intervened I was bringing to the minister's attention the fact that he had not exploited the opportunities offered by the increasing productivity in Canada, to the extent that we on this side of the house feel he should have.

Had such emphasis been placed we would not have received the lecture which was given to us tonight, in which the minister indicated the sums of money that would be required for the kinds of programs which everyone in this country agrees are necessary for the nation. I should like to indicate to the minister that since our productivity is about 25 per cent lower than that of the United States—and there is very little reason for this—an increase in that productivity to bring it up to a level comparable to that in the United States, not only at the federal level but at all levels, would bring in an increase of about $4 billion in taxes, using approximately the same rates, because an increase in our gross national product without changing the level of rates in this country would certainly give us a tremendous increase in tax revenues at all levels—municipal, provincial and federal.

It seems to me that the inflation which we are experiencing in Canada would have provided an excellent opportunity for the minister to have introduced measures for increasing our productivity, measures which under circumstances of unemployment are very difficult to implement but under situations of excess demand could have been carried out. However, he did not take that opportunity to bring in those measures and I think he should be taken to task somewhat for that omission. I hope that in the future when he runs into a similar problem, instead of either slamming down on the brakes he will take a more positive approach, forget about the brake completely and use the accelerator on the supply side of the economy to increase the efficiency of its operation.

At the present time there seems to be a great concern on the government side about the effects of U.S. ownership. I think it is a concern that all of us have. However, I suggest that the government has not really examined this problem in the way they should, that just to express concern about U.S. ownership without examining its effects is to start off on the wrong track. It seems to me that the effect of U.S. ownership and the branch plant economy has been to inhibit our productivity and exaggerate the historic difficulties of a nation one-tenth the size of its neighbour, patterning itself on somebody else's experience. If the United States felt it was a suitable policy for them to impose tariffs, we tended to do the same. If the U.S. passed combines and anti-trust legislation, we tended to ape them and do the same. If the U.S. allowed unlimited advertising expenses and gimmicks, so did we. If capital in the U.S. could do practically as it pleased, we adopted the same position.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Would the hon. member permit a question? Does he know that the Canadian legislation preceded the Sherman Act by several years?

Mr. Saltsman: I am aware of that, Mr. Chairman, but I suggest that we knew what was going on in the United States and we tended to pattern our experience on the experience in the U.S. Because the United States developed into the most efficient industrial nation in the world, we concluded that all that had to be done was to play tag, adopt the same rules and receive the same rewards. Canada, however, is a different country—and this is something that our governments have not recognized in the past—with distinct problems requiring answers suitable to its own circumstances.

If the U.S. economy could afford 10 firms of a particular size necessary for mass production, it should be obvious that anything more than one of these in Canada would not achieve the possible efficiencies. Even when we acknowledge the need for such giants, our reluctance to supervise monopoly led us to encourage pygmies. The kind of competition that developed behind our tariff walls was a strange fish: It spawned factories which produced almost every range and variety of product that was being produced in the U.S., but in miniature replica. Every major U.S. manufacturer, especially in consumer goods, rushed to put his brand in the Canadian market, ensuring his share of the second most affluent consumers in the world.

To reinforce this pattern came advertising. It ensured that Canadian consumers would be told that they must live exactly like the Americans, accepting all the products and values of American ingenuity. We are on a permanent treadmill, U.S. ownership or not, unless we can change this topsy-like pattern to one of a planned structure.

I suggest that what this country, and what the Minister of Finance in particular, has to do is to take a second look at the Canadian economy and develop a special approach to the problems that we face. This will require considerable ingenuity and courage. This should be his task. We would be much better served if he were to devote his considerable talents toward that purpose, instead of giving us lectures about economy and what we cannot afford. There is a great deal we could afford, provided we had a government that was prepared to plan the economy and to use the influence and authority which it possesses for the benefit of the nation.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3.

Mr. Keays: Mr. Chairman, since lumber and building materials are both incorporated in this part of the bill, I wonder what is the justification for a different procedure in imposing sales tax on building materials and on lumber. The sales tax on building materials is applied to the manufacturer's cost and in the case of lumber it is applied to the retailer's price. It seems to me that this part of the bill favours the sale of building materials over the sale of lumber because in the case of fibre board, plywoods, laminated woods and imported woods such as redwoods etc., the tax is imposed on the manufacturer's selling price and not on the retailer's, while in the case of lumber the reverse is true. This seems to me to be discriminatory and I have received some letters to this effect. I wonder whether some clarification could be given with regard to the difference in the imposition of the tax.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, first of all I should explain that this question does not really arise under the particular clause with which we are dealing.

• (8:20 p.m.)

The section with which we are dealing really implies that the additional tax of 1 per cent will not be applied to the building materials which were exempted prior to June 13, 1963, and the same schedule is being used. The particular problem with regard to lumber goes back a long way, really to the imposition of the sales tax on building materials. The problem with regard to lumber is one my department has been looking at very carefully since the sales tax was imposed on building materials in 1963. At first we had a great many problems with respect to the lumber industry. However, my department has been working very closely with the lumber industry and the number of complaints that I am getting today concerning discrimination with regard to the lumber industry is minimal indeed.

I should like to point out to my hon. friend that this particular problem does not arise under the clause we are discussing. The problem he has is a problem on which my department has been working since 1963. It is a problem that I believe is soluble, and will ultimately be worked out to the satisfaction of everyone involved.

Mr. Keays: I am fully aware, Mr. Chairman, of the fact that possibly I went beyond the scope of the bill. However, since lumber and building materials were mentioned in connection with this 1 per cent tax, I thought I would bring it up. The minister has referred to certain studies being made by the department in consultation with the lumber industry. This industry has been offered three or four different options in connection with the computation of the sales tax. So long as the problem is under study by the department, I am satisfied that at least it has not been forgotten.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): May I ask the minister to confirm that the phraseology of the schedule which is now being inserted is identical to the former schedule when building materials were fully exempt?

Mr. Benson: Yes, this is the information I am given, that when it was decided to exempt building materials from the additional 1 per cent we adopted the schedule which was drawn up under the government of which my hon. friend was a member.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 agreed to.

On clause 5—Old Age Security Act—Tax payable by individuals.

Mr. Knowles: If I may, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on clause 5 which implements the proposal that the ceiling on the amount of taxable income that is subject to the old age security tax is to be raised. During the course of this debate, we have made it clear that our only quarrel with this provision is that the minister did not go far enough. However, we have stated our respective views in connection with this point. I noticed that the Minister of Finance was getting some support for our position from his left. Hansard may not indicate just who was at his left at that point, but he was well supported in any case.

I rise particularly because I am interested in the bit of history in which the Minister of Finance indulged for a few minutes this afternoon. He referred to the sessions of the special joint committee on old age security which met back in 1950, when he was a very valuable witness before that committee. As he said this afternoon, he was also the devil's advocate. I have a notion what he thought I was. At any rate, there are not many of us left—

Mr. Sharp: My colleague says, the devil.

Mr. Knowles: I thought that was obvious and did not need to be put on the record. In my younger days I was a printer's devil, so I suppose at least I had graduated.

During the course of the sessions of that committee, if I recall correctly, there were a couple of points concerning which the present Minister of Finance, then in his capacity as an official of the Department of Finance, and I had differences of opinion. Those were recounted this afternoon. He indicated that back in 1950 he supported the idea of a separate old age security fund, and I opposed it. The other difference of opinion between us was that he supported the idea of a special flat rate tax that would apply only to a certain portion of taxable income, whereas I favoured both a graduated tax and a tax that would apply on all taxable income. I was interested in learning this afternoon that in these 17 years the minister has come around to my point of view with respect to one of these matters. I think it is fair to say that he indicated he now has doubts about the idea of the special old age security fund. I wish to express the hope that he will pursue those doubts and that before long he will recommend the abolition of the fund and the acceptance of the fact that old age security is on a pay as you go basis.

We have had differences during the course of this debate, some of them perhaps differences of interpretation. However I believe they have underlined the fact that the fund is really a bit of fiction. When it is in deficit, the minister acts as though that deficit were real and wants taxes to make up the deficit. When the fund is in surplus and we want some of that surplus to be used, he tells us it is not there.

Mr. Benson: In the long run, it is there.

Mr. Knowles: In the long run, it is there. He admits there might be an accounting surplus, but he says it is not a cash surplus. Even the discussion we are having back and forth right now proves my point, I think, that the fund is a fiction which, in fact, was set up so that there could be arguments used as to whether or not pensions could be increased without increasing taxation. I welcome this conversion after these 17 years. The minister confessed this afternoon that the idea of the fund is not as sacrosanct as it was when this fund was set up. I hope he will pursue this so we can get the old age security on a basis that is factual, that is, pay as you go.

I hope it will not take another 17 years to win the minister as a convert to the other point on which we differed in 1950, namely, that the taxes for old age security would be better if they were built into the income tax structure. My colleague says, and graduated; of course, and he will recognize immediately that when they are built into the income tax structure, ipso facto, they are graduated because the income tax structure itself is graduated.

Surely there is no more reason that the moneys we pay out in pensions should be given an earmarked tax than should the moneys we pay out in family allowances or in national defence or in services to agriculture or labour or what have you. Surely what we as a civilized society decide to spend is part of a total package and should, in effect, be financed according to ability to pay; and contributions should be made according to need or to the decision that society makes through its elected representatives.

I think it is unfair, and a form of discrimination against one group of our people, to put our old age pensioners in the position where there is a tax earmarked for them. If it were a fund such as the Canada Pension Plan fund on the basis of which people receive a pension which is directly related to what they put in, then there is a different case. For example we have found with regard to the unemployment insurance fund that it too is fictitious; when unemployment insurance benefits have to be paid, they have to be paid whether or not the money is in the fund. Again the same story holds true as to whether or not the money is there. I know that there are some differences in that securities are bought outside by the unemployment insurance commission; but in the main these funds, if I may repeat myself, are really a piece of fiction.

I would think, Mr. Chairman, that we would portray the picture more accurately than at present and we would be treating our old age pensioners much more fairly, as well as the other groups in our society who share in the benefits of civilization, if we were to do away with these fictitious funds. As I say, I welcome the minister's announced conversion this afternoon on the one point, and I hope it will not take him long to become converted on the other as well.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I just want to make three brief points. First of all, I would remind the committee that the result of the increase in the ceiling is to affect only taxpayers who are in the upper third group of taxpayers.

My second point is that I agree with a great deal of what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said. When the old age security fund was first established it was established as a means of relating directly pension cost to the amounts that were being collected. I believe at that time there were some misunderstandings about this. Indeed, if my hon. friend recalls, at one time this was thought to have been a contributory pension plan; but we now recognize—indeed, I think many of us did at the time—that it is only contributory in a very indirect way: It relates the total expenditures to the total revenues from these taxes. I agree with the hon. member that we have got beyond this point and that the existence of this fund ought to be examined in relationship to the revisions in the tax structure we may be considering shortly.

Finally I would say to the hon. member that if in fact a fund had not existed I do not think we would have had the same argument here, because it would have been clear to the hon. gentleman, as it is to me, that I would have had to raise another $280 million to pay out additional benefits.

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister think that would have made it any easier to vote for these increased taxes? It would not.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT AMENDMENT

BROADENING OF LENDING PROVISIONS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act to extend until December 31, 1969 the time during which guaranteed improvement loans may be made under the act; to extend the guaranteed loan provisions of the act to cover loans made to small businesses engaged in construction, transportation or communications; to remove the restriction that now applies in the case of loans made under the act for the purpose of constructing or purchasing premises; to increase the maximum limit that now applies with respect to the annual gross revenue of a small business enterprise from $250,000 to $500,000; to provide that the aggregate principal amount of all guaranteed business improvement loans made by banks during the new lending period shall not exceed $300,000,000; and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Batten in the chair.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the measure before the house is to add a further three year period during which loans made by chartered banks under this act may be guaranteed by the government and to extend the scope of the act in order to make its benefits available to a large number of small businesses.

I am sure hon. members will recall that this act was passed in 1961 to empower the government to guarantee loans made by chartered banks to small businesses engaged in manufacturing, trade or services for purchasing equipment and improving or enlarging the premises in which they operate. An amendment in 1962 extended the purposes for which loans may be made to include the purchase or building of premises, where existing premises cease to be available, or where a new site is necessary for the normal development of the business.

Under the terms of the act, a small business enterprise is that with an estimated annual gross revenue not exceeding $250,000. The maximum amount that can be borrowed at any time is $25,000 and loans are payable over a period of at most ten years. The maximum interest rate that can be charged on those loans is set by the regulations. It has been at 5½ per cent since the beginning of this program.

The act became effective on January 19, 1961 for an initial period of about three years ending on December 31, 1964. It authorized the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) to guarantee any bank against loss of an amount not exceeding 10 per cent of all the business improvement loans granted by the bank over the lending period. Provision was made for a total of $300 million for all loans that chartered banks could grant under the act during the lending period. The act was amended in 1963 so as to provide an additional three year lending period during which guaranteed loans could be made under the same conditions as during the original lending period. The legislation now before the house will provide for another lending period which will extend from January 1, 1967 to January 31, 1969. During this further period, the same guarantee provisions will continue to apply just as during each of the two previous guarantee periods.

Due to the pressure of current business in the house, it was not possible to introduce the resolution preceding this bill before the middle of December 1966 and the schedule of legislation precluded discussion before the Christmas and New Year adjournment. In order to prevent stoppage of the operations being conducted under this legislation, the bill carries a clause making the application of this legislation retroactive to January 1, 1967. Meanwhile, the Minister of Finance has asked the chartered banks to continue lending under the act, pending the passage of the present bill and the minister has been assured by the banks that they would.

The other provisions of the bill concern the scope of lending operations under the Small Businesses Loans Act. They deal with points which may have contributed to the little use made of that act until now.

Every year from the implementation of the act until 1965, chartered banks have granted some 3,000 loans to small businesses, totalling $26 million. Although the final figures for 1966 are not yet available, it seems at first glance that loans in 1966 totalled $21 million. Therefore, during the six first years the act has been in operation an approximate total of $150 million has been granted in loans. Of course, it is not an unimportant amount and it has probably been quite beneficial to borrowers. But it might be possible that it is not a valid sign of the entire potential demand which could exist for such loans.

The rather moderate application of this act is mostly due to a few characteristics of its provisions and the purpose of this legislation is to amend those main features, in order to extend the application of the act to a greater number of small businesses.

A rather secondary factor, which explains the relatively limited use of this act, is the fact that the purposes for which loans could normally be granted included improvement or extension of premises. As I said earlier, the act admitted only the purchase or the building of replacement premises, when the premises used up to then were no longer available. Unusual situations arose from that. For example, the owner of a retail store operating in rented space was not able, under the act, to finance the purchase of the building in which he had settled down, although he could, under the same act, finance the purchase of a building across the street if he was to evacuate the premises he was occupying. The new bill aims at extending the present grounds for loans, in order to allow the purchase and the construction of premises in every case and not only under the circumstances I just mentioned.

Another more significant factor is that the loans at present can only be granted to the small businesses engaged in manufacturing, wholesale, retail, and service. There are several other small businesses engaged in construction, transportation and communications that are not at present eligible for loans, under the act, but the nature of which would permit them to avail themselves of such loans, as well as the retailer or the small manufacturer. The bill provides eligibility to guaranted loans for the small business enterprises falling into these three classes.

A third factor is the present limitation on the size of the small business for eligibility. Such enterprise was defined as having an annual gross revenue not exceeding $250,000. Sometimes, particularly in the case of some retailers and wholesalers, this led to an arbitrary exclusion of businesses which, in other respects, could have qualified for loans under this act. The legislation before us changes the definition of the small business eligible in determining that its estimated annual gross revenue shall not exceed $500,000.

However, I wish to point to hon. members that there is at present no provision for increasing the maximum amount of a loan permissible under the act. In deciding to leave the amount unchanged, the government has taken into consideration other financing sources available to companies needing more than $25,000, one of these being, of course, the Industrial Development Bank. The Small Businesses Loans Act is designed particularly for very small business concerns, where the owner ordinarily deals with the local bank branch for all his financial needs. All the more reason why we must expect businesses needing over $25,000 and those having a turnover exceeding $500,000 to have plans that require financing beyond the scope of the Small Businesses Loans Act. Such projects can be financed either by individual lenders or by the Industrial Development Bank. Of course, borrowers at the intermediate level will prefer loans governed by the Small Businesses Loans Act, since banks cannot charge more than 5½ per cent on loans granted under this act, as compared to higher rates charged by individual lenders and the Industrial Development Bank.

This brings me to another point which, I think, is important. The purpose of the government guarantee, as authorized by the act, is to encourage the banks to earmark, for a given period, a portion of their funds for loans intended for business improvement. However, that provision gives less and less incentive, at a time when the level of interest has substantially increased, while the interest rate on guaranteed loans to small businesses remains at 5½ per cent.

That rate, of course, was set initially on the basis of the 6 per cent ceiling of the interest rate provided by the Bank Act, at a time when the interest rates were generally substantially below the present level. It is unquestionable that the bank rate, under the act, must take into account the guarantee granted to those loans by the government. However, if the act must still benefit truly the small borrowing businesses, the rate must be sensibly determined in proportion to the rates charged by the banks without government guarantee, after the ceiling on interest charges has been modified by the bank legislation which is before the house. Once that measure has been passed and new interest rates have been set, the minister proposes to review the interest rate provided by the act and to recommend to the governor in council, if necessary, a change in the administration rule in order to set a new maximum rate under the Small Businesses Loans Act.

I believe that the average businessmen will welcome this initiative even if it involves a higher interest rate. At the present time, several business men find that they cannot get all, or part of the funds they need, at an interest rate of 5½ per cent and they have no other alternative than to turn toward other means of financing which are considerably more costly. Such an initiative will evidently reduce the difference between the rates imposed on loans granted under the Small Businesses Loans Act and those demanded by the private lenders or by the Industrial Development Bank. The cost of a loan granted under the Small Businesses Loans Act will become a little less advantageous, but the funds available under that act will be increased.

Mr. Chairman, this brings me to the conclusion of the remarks I wanted to make at this stage.

Small Businesses Loans Act Amendment

In conclusion, may I be allowed to say that in introducing this resolution in the house and describing the future financing methods thereby provided, I express my full confidence in the basic soundness of small businesses in our country and in the good judgment of those who own and administer them. I expect them to make a greater use of this piece of legislation, on account of the proposed changes, and that the banks will be better able to meet reasonable loan applications under this act.

Mr. Keays: Mr. Chairman, we are very happy to see the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance and Receiver General (Mr. Chrétien) introduce this resolution. We, on this side of the house, wish him well but we shall nevertheless have some comments to make. However, I know I cannot criticize this resolution, as mentioned by the parliamentary secretary, since in 1961 we approved such a legislation through our vote.

[English]

However, we welcome this proposal for legislation to extend the act to December 31, 1969. We are happy to see that the measure will now cover certain categories of businesses which were not previously eligible for loans under this legislation. It is true that if money could be made available by chartered banks in circumstances in which repayment was guaranteed by the government, small firms or individually-owned firms going into the trucking industry, which has contributed so greatly to the strength of the Canadian economy, would derive valuable assistance in their financial affairs, particularly during the early stages of their existence. And, as I say, transportation and communication play a most important part in determining the cost of all our products today. So everyone would benefit by improvements in efficiency brought about by better equipment and facilities for the transportation of goods. By helping these companies we would be helping to reduce the price of the products we use.

Parliament is here making use of its power to ease the financial burden which our small business people bear. It is also offering an incentive to these people to play their part in the general economy of our country by improving their facilities; it is encouraging them toward greater productivity and, last but not least, to contributing to the employment of our citizens.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

I am confident that the small businessman is an essential spoke in the wheel of industry. The larger corporations with their greater investment capital have of course contributed substantially toward the maintenance of a competitive position in world markets. But the smaller businesses, too, whether engaged in manufacturing or in transportation, in the communications field or the service industries, have made a tremendous contribution to the supply of products necessary to the large corporations I have mentioned. They fill a gap which the large corporations cannot fill. In brief, they are one of the fibres in Canada's network of enterprise which makes this country's financial position strong.

It is perhaps unfortunate that this legislation could not have been brought in before the end of the calendar year 1966. I say this because I am under the impression that some of the potential borrowers have been deprived of the means of borrowing, though I recognize the parliamentary secretary told us that the minister had made arrangements with the chartered banks to continue to lend under this act. Nevertheless I suspect that some people did not receive the money they might have received under the act, possibly because of fear that the legislation would not be renewed or extended. So they may have suffered for a period of 50 days.

Looking over the last available report of the transactions under the Small Businesses Loans Act, I find that in 1965 the total amount lent was of the order of $26 million. The parliamentary secretary tells us now that in 1966 the total was in the order of $21 million. This leads me to wonder whether those wishing to borrow have been finding it as easy to do so as they did previously. It is possible that in 1966, due to the tight money situation, some of those who wished to get loans under the act were denied them by the banks.

This reduction in the amount lent was caused, I suggest, partly by the tight money situation and partly by our failure to amend the Bank Act and bring it forward in 1964. The parliamentary secretary indicates that he does not know. I do not know either, though I have my suspicions that this may be the case.

Mr. Chrétien: I did not say I did not know. As to the Bank Act, I wanted to suggest that responsibility for the delay was much more on your side of the house than on ours.

Mr. Keays: I do not think we held up the Bank Act. I know that according to the act the rate of interest a bank can charge is set at 5½ per cent. I find myself wondering if this will have the same effect in the future as in the past. I wonder whether the banks are interested when a businessman goes to a chartered bank and offers them 5½ per cent interest. We know that the government will guarantee 10 per cent of the total amount of $300 million made available. I am not at all sure that the banks will be interested in making loans at that rate of interest. This might mean the end of the Small Businesses Loans Act.

We know that the banks are to be given the right to take mortgages. Because of this, in some way they will be competing with the Industrial Development Bank. The rate of interest they will be receiving will be 6 per cent; that is the present rate. They hope the rate will be larger. Once the banks have the power to take mortgages I cannot see them making loans at 5¼ per cent. When the small businessman approaches a bank it is quite evident, with the powers the bank will have, the rate he will be charged will be 6 per cent or such other rate as might be established. Under the present system, however, it would be 6 per cent. I am a little concerned about whether this legislation will be of much benefit to the small businessmen of our country. I referred to the total number of loans made in 1966. I would be interested to know how many applications were made in 1966 compared to 1965. Perhaps this would tell us the story, so that we would know exactly what reaction the banks will have when the applications are received. I would also be interested to know the amount of the loans made in the rural areas compared to the urban areas of our country.

When I look at these tables for the year 1965 and see that some banks are lower in volumes of loans than some of the others —although possibly their assets are equal—I ask myself whether all the banks are interested in making these loans. Most of the small business people in our country will be found in the rural areas. If this legislation will be of no help to the people in the rural areas, then there is something missing. I wonder whether perhaps the Department of Finance has continued to keep in touch with the chartered banks to encourage them to see that more money is available in these rural areas. I think this would be one of the most important things the department could do. They should keep in constant contact with the chartered banks to see that they are playing their part in respect of this legislation.

I would be very happy to know whether or not the department is receiving full co-operation from all the chartered banks. I also wonder whether we should publicize this legislation more, or perhaps have further contact with the provinces in order to be sure that they are increasing the activity in this domain. Again when I look at this table I see the total number of loans made with this 10 per cent guarantee. I should like to know from the parliamentary secretary whether the extension of the term in respect of the $300 million is for a further three years and for an amount of $300 million, or does it take into account the millions which have been lent previously. In other words, if $100 million has been lent so far, will this new legislation cover a guarantee of 10 per cent of the $400 million or simply 10 per cent of the $300 million as at the first of January because, as is said, the bill will be retroactive.

I think there possibly are a few other important industries in this country which do not seem to be affected by this new legislation. I am thinking of the agricultural societies which have come into existence throughout the country. These societies have exhibitions, agricultural shows, stampedes, horse shows, and so on. These are found throughout Canada from the east coast to the west coast. It seems that unless these societies in some of the smaller areas are consolidated into larger units they will not be able to exist. I believe that if this type of loan could be made available to some of these societies they would be encouraged to consolidate, grow, and bring additional benefits to their communities. These agricultural societies have provincial charters and if they do not receive aid under this legislation they will disappear. I hope in the near future, by means of this or other legislation, we will be able to assist them.

I am informed that the former minister of agriculture had intended to introduce a program to set up loan facilities for these societies. This has not been done. Perhaps it could be done by means of this legislation. I will have more to say later concerning this new legislation, but this will conclude my remarks at this time.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, in opening my remarks I would first of all like to congratulate the parliamentary secretary upon his lucid explanation of this legislation. It has been most helpful. I also wish to indicate the general approval of this resolution by the members of this party. We believe it is a most worth-while piece of legislation. It has proven its value in the past and I am sure it will assume increasing importance in the future. It is particularly important that the government has recognized the changing role of the small businessman by moving the ceiling from $250,000 to $500,000 because, although we speak of the small businessman and think of his business in terms of infinitesimal sales, the truth is that in many cases today the amount of capital required by even the smaller businesses in our society has expanded enormously, and this resolution takes this into account.

I am also pleased to note that the restrictions in respect of the use of this money have been removed, so far as the construction and communication industries are concerned. The government should have gone further and included other industries, and I intend to discuss this aspect a little later this evening. Small businesses today form an important part of our society and I am sure they will continue to play an important role in our industrial and commercial system.

Statistics indicate that small businesses today make up more than 94 to 100 per cent of the number of industries in most fields of business activity. Although we have witnessed tremendous growth of giant corporations, prospects and needs for small businesses apparently have not diminished. If we consider small businesses with assets of less than $1 million, we find there are some 440,000 small businesses in Canada, most of them unincorporated, with assets under $100,000. A great many of them are engaged in the retail trade, service or construction industries.

I said earlier that it was important to remove the restriction in the application of this measure in respect of the construction industry. There are many efficient contractors in business who will benefit from this measure, and will be able to play an important role in alleviating the serious shortage of houses that exists in this country.

There is a particular need today for special legislation to help small businesses. As the government learns to use and apply monetary and fiscal tools to manage the economy the tendency will exist to tighten the screws on small businesses more so than on larger corporate organizations. The government should go further than it has in terms of laying down guide lines to the banks, which are charged with the responsibility of carrying out the provisions of this legislation so that under the special circumstances of monetary or fiscal tightness the small businessman does not bear the greatest load.

Anyone who has observed what has happened in the markets when money is tightened to control difficulties of an economic nature must recognize that the small businessman is worse off than others. For that reason special consideration must be given. Small businessmen frequently lack alternate sources of credit. The royal commission which studied this problem pointed that out. Larger corporations can float bonds and go to special organizations for money. They can also increase their stock offerings and take advantage of many other sources of money. In many cases they can use their retained earnings. These sources of money are not always available to small businesses, therefore the function of the bank is of paramount importance.

The government has indicated to the chartered banks of Canada its desire to help small businesses. They must be aware of the government's concern in this regard. Following the changes to the Bank Act the situation will become more difficult for the small operator. His bargaining position will not be as great vis-à-vis banks.

In the long run this kind of legislation will be very helpful to the government in obtaining support for its broader proposals under the Bank Act. One thing which has disturbed many of us about the changes to that act is the problem of how small businesses are going to exert sufficient influence under the flexible arrangement proposed by the government to ensure that they have adequate access to funds at reasonable rates. We all realize that money is available at extremely high rates. Small businesses cannot afford to pay these high costs. This act will help to satisfy those of us who have been concerned about difficulties which may be created by the provisions of the new banking legislation.

Let me make two suggestions at this time. I have indicated my general support for the measure before us. There are, however, omissions of an important nature in terms of the future of small businesses. Funds should be made available to small companies for the purchase of other like companies in order that they may enlarge their operations. There is nothing in this bill which would permit such activities. Anyone who is familiar with the operations of small businesses knows that they represent the largest untapped reservoir of managerial talent that exists in this country. Anyone who has tried to operate a small business will appreciate that it is more difficult to operate a small business than a large one.

With advances in technology there is an increased need to enlarge operations. What might have been efficient at one time becomes less efficient with changing technological requirements. Small businesses require more capital and a great deal more management. I think we should allow the small companies in our business community to take advantage of opportunities, and provide funds in order that they may expand. The omission of such a provision in this measure is something that should be corrected. Surely this would be valuable to our economic future. This would allow able and talented managers to develop their operations and provide increased efficiency in some areas. It would certainly enable them to act with a greater degree of knowledge and technology.

The other suggestion I should like to make is this. Since this program provides a great deal of assistance to small businessmen, two things should be done. First it should be given increased publicity. I do not think enough business operators in this country are aware of the provisions of this act and the fact that the parliament of Canada has already passed legislation of this type and will probably pass similar legislation in future. I believe they should be made aware of this fact. This may be one of the reasons that the amounts authorized by the legislation have never been fully taken up.

The other suggestion I should like to make in this regard is that these loans carry an insurance charge. At the present time a loss is sustained from the operation of this fund. This loss is met out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund. I refer to the loss sustained in the lending of money under the conditions prescribed in the act. Last year, if I am correct, the amount of loss was $76,785. This is not a large amount; it is not an amount that perhaps should arouse an excessive degree of concern. But I believe there is a principle involved here. Those of us in parliament are looking at this legislation from the viewpoint of providing every possible assistance to the small businessman, and there should not be any subsidy feature in the program as far as the government or the taxpayers of this country are concerned.

Although the loss experienced is rather small and is, I would think, a very good indication of the healthy state of our business community generally, and the considered use of this fund by our banks, I believe that loans made under the act should be insured. The premium charged should be sufficient to cover this kind of loss, so as to make the entire program self-sustaining. We adopt this principle in connection with other government programs. We do it with home improvements and N.H.A. loans, and I believe it would be a logical extension of that principle to apply it also to this legislation.

Looking at the loss experience, according to the report of 1965, of 14,050 loans made, 25 were in default. If you figure out the actual amount of default, it works out to one tenth of one per cent, as close as I can get it. I quote these figures as an indication of the small amount of the loss and the small premium that would be necessary to ensure that the loans are fully covered and represent no charge on general revenues. This program would then be completely self-sufficient. I believe most businessmen would view this proposal with favour. They would consider that a small charge of this type to insure loans would be acceptable. And it would go a long way toward improving the conception of this kind of program.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I should like again to voice our support of this most valuable piece of legislation. I would urge the government to consider the suggestions we have made for the purpose of improving the provisions of this act, and hope the government will bring in recommendations in the future to implement these suggestions.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Chairman, as usual, I will not take too much time at the resolution stage precisely because we do not yet have the bill. This time, however, the terms of the proposed legislation are clear enough to indicate what will be provided for in the bill, and I should like to congratulate the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) in particular for his work.

Naturally, this legislation is simply a broadening of the act passed in 1961 under the Conservative government; it was amended in 1963 and this year it will be extended to December 31, 1969. Mr. Chairman, I believe the parliamentary secretary will certainly be happy, since the bill will receive unanimous approval, and it is always pleasant when one makes a proposal with the assurance that discussions will not be too lengthy. That is understandable, when we are presented with legislation favouring our interests, the interests of Canadian citizens; it is not at all like being asked to pass a measure causing hardship. We prefer to support this proposal rather than pass a bill resulting in increased taxes, because an increase in taxes is always hard on the people. I therefore wish to congratulate the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance.

This gesture on the part of the government will surely help small businesses, which daily need more help because, on the whole, the government is not assuming an extraordinary responsibility, since its liability is only 10 per cent. In my opinion, this is not excessive.

Even if the government had wanted, while introducing its amendment, to give greater satisfaction to the small businessmen in increasing a little the government's endorsing responsibilities, it would not have taken a great risk as far as money is concerned, because a businessman who makes a loan of $25,000, while he is worth $200,000, $250,000 or $300,000, is not a great financial risk.

I feel that the difficulty will lie in fixing the bank interest rate. It is understood that if the present rate provided by the law, that is 5½ per cent, is maintained, I do not think a single bank would be interested in making loans. In fact, I have discussed the matter several times with some of my electors. They had visited me to obtain a loan, and I can assure you, sir, that at the rate of 5½ per cent, the banks became more and more disinterested, for it should not be forgotten that today the bank lends at rates of 8 and 8½ per cent. People say that the interest rate is 7 per cent, but there are also the administrative costs. The banks are entitled to charge for administration, and they will do it quite willingly.

To my knowledge, most small manufacturers—perhaps 80 per cent of them—having obtained loans applied directly to the banks, since the banks could not make up their minds and accept the government's requirements. Even though the government was the endorser, the banks would rather run the risk, which, in my opinion, was rather non-existent. They preferred running the risk, if any, and lend at 8 and 8½ per cent.

That is why I am reminding the minister he must consider which interest rate will be more acceptable to the banks, because it is useless to pass a piece of legislation while knowing beforehand that it will be impossible to implement it through lack of interest on the part of the banks.

Anyone in their place would not reason otherwise, because the real purpose of banks is to administer their business; their purpose is to make money rather than to suffer losses, even though the government itself advises them to that effect.

If I were a bank manager and the government advised me to lend money at 5½ per cent, I can assure you that if I had the chance to charge an 8 per cent interest, I would certainly do so.

Since nothing is decided yet, in this bill, I suggest that the minister be very careful so as to avoid making this legislation ineffective. These loans are surely more advantageous than those of the Industrial Development Bank, because I think that an enterprise must be in a very difficult position to borrow from the Industrial Development Bank under the conditions offered these days.

Nowadays, if you borrow from the Industrial Development Bank, they will first try to retain a reserve of $2,500 which will be remitted after ten years, if you will, but such $2,500 will be kept in reserve and interest charged on the balance. The borrower will get only $23,500 and the $2,500 will be loaned for ten years.

Now, our bill must prevent tricks of that kind. Banks should not be forced to accept profits on the side. If our legislation is very clear, well defined and if the interests are very obvious and do not cause banks to lose money, I believe the tricks like the ones we see in the Industrial Development Bank will not be repeated. I have known some of the things certain industrialists were asking for. They finally obtained the amounts they were looking for. Now, when an industrialist needs $25,000 more and sees $2,500 of that amount held back, that is not satisfactory at all.

Mr. Chairman, I would also like to draw the attention of the government on the small businesses in our areas. This is a good piece of legislation, but I think that something more should be done in order to save private enterprise in the province of Quebec; I do not know how it fares in the other provinces, but as far as Quebec is concerned, there are serious problems with respect to private enterprise, tremendous difficulties when it comes to securing capital at a reasonable rate. I hope that the government will not merely extend the effects of the legislation already passed, but that it will try to find new ways of expanding our private enterprises a little more.

[English]

Mr. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words on this resolution, which makes provision for amendment to the Small Businesses Loans Act. For many years the small businessman, who has been a very important part of our economy, has been forgotten. There was no legislation on the order paper and no legislation was passed through the house to make loans available to him. And yet, Mr. Chairman, the small businessman, as has been said so many times during this debate, is an important part of our national economy. He is the one who goes to the newly developed areas and brings the goods and services that are so necessary to the development of these areas. He is the man who takes the lead in the municipalities, does work in his church, his schoolboard and commissions. He is the man who throughout the years, as great corporations, chain stores and big manufacturers grew and developed in this country, found it more and more difficult to be competitive. There was no government assistance available to him. Farmers had their farm credit corporations, big manufacturers, and the industrialists had the Industrial Development Bank, but the small businessman had nowhere to go for loans except to his local bank.

Those of us who are small businessmen and who have tried to get loans from chartered banks without having too much collateral have found it pretty difficult. However, the government of which I was a supporter and which came into power in 1958 realized that this was an area which needed assistance. So, in 1958, a branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce, called the small businesses branch, was set up. This was the branch where the problems of small business were discussed, and to which small businessmen could send in their requests and have them answered. I might say that this function is being performed in the Province of Ontario by the department of planning and development. This department has provided assistance to communities all across Ontario by analysing the businesses of small businessmen and providing helpful suggestions in their operations. This has been very valuable assistance in the last two or three years in the Province of Ontario.

As I said, the Conservative party realized in 1958 the importance of the small businessman in our national economy and did something about it. In fact, four days after the opening of parliament in November of 1966 the Speech from the Throne was postponed so as to bring in Bill C-40 which initiated the Small Businesses Loans Act, This was a very important piece of legislation particularly in view of the high rise of unemployment in 1957 and 1958 which we inherited from the previous government. In this connection I should like to read the statement made by Hon. Donald Fleming when Bill C-40 was first introduced in the house. It indicates that the Conservative party of that day was ready and willing to do all that it could to overcome some of the problems with which it was faced. He said the following:

> My ministers are convinced that additional medium-term credit facilities for small businesses would enable many private projects to go forward this winter all across Canada, providing substantial additional employment. Moreover, this addition to our credit legislation will constitute a continuing stimulus to the growth of Canadian private enterprises.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a very important piece of legislation which provides assistance to a group of people who never had any provision made for them before by way of government loans. This act made it possible for them to go to chartered banks and get assistance it they wanted to remodel their store facilities or, if they were in a service industry, to buy a new piece of equipment. These business people would thereby be enabled to meet the competition of larger, more powerful chain stores or bigger service industries.

However, Mr. Chairman, as is the case with a lot of new legislation there had to be a trial period and, as the parliamentary secretary indicated, this bill had to be amended in 1962 to make it possible for people who were in small businesses to move to new premises. This Small Businesses Loans Act has not been as useful or as comprehensive an act as it should be. This fact is indicated by an article in the Ottawa Citizen of June 25 which is headed, "Small Loans to Business off $359,048". This same situation is reflected in an article in Men's Wear magazine which indicates that in the first nine months of this year, small business operators borrowed only $15.1 million compared with $19.8 million in the same period of 1965.

There are several reasons for this situation. I believe one was indicated here tonight, namely the fact that the interest rate is only 5.5 per cent. Probably the banks were not as happy lending money at 5.5 per cent when they could get more for it from other areas. There has been some feeling amongst people who applied for these loans that the regulations were a little too stringent. In addition, as someone said tonight, there was a feeling not enough publicity had been given to this act and there were not enough small businessmen in Canada who knew about this particular piece of legislation.

However, Mr. Chairman, we are very happy tonight to learn there is going to be an extension of this act to make it possible for people engaged in the construction, transportation and communication businesses to participate in these loans. These people will be allowed now to purchase or construct new premises. I believe the lack of this provision has been a detriment to this piece of legislation. I remember many cases in which people wanted to start up in business but were not able to get a loan of this type, because they had not been in business before. I feel that the extension of this act is going to be of great help to many small businessmen in Canada by increasing the number of people who can participate.

However, Mr. Chairman, I believe there is still room for improvement in this legislation. One of these is the need for working capital for some types of service industries. For instance, a man who goes into furniture manufacturing in a small way may use most of his own capital to buy his equipment and purchase his first order or raw material. He has to give credit to his furniture dealers for 60 or 90 days, and during that period he may have to pay for his raw material and equipment, as well as meet his payroll. He often finds himself pinched for funds. Here is a business which, if a few thousand dollars of working capital were provided during this period, may prove successful. I believe the local banker would not have any compunction about helping an industry of that type because in a good many of these small communities the banker has an intimate knowledge of the operator.

I have knowledge of an example of this type of thing. There was a chap who started a furniture business and who knew what he was doing. He came to this particular period in the initial development of the operation when he was pinched for capital. The bank, because of regulations, could not give him any working capital and he was going to have to go to the money markets and probably pay 10 per cent or 15 per cent interest. If working capital were made available during this initial period, it would mean the difference between success and failure for this business.

There is one other area in which I should like to suggest there is room for improvement. When this act was first introduced the maximum amount of loans was $25,000. This might have been realistic in 1960 when the scope of the act was limited to small manufacturers, wholesalers, retailers or service industries. Now, however, the act is being extended to construction, transportation and communications industries. I have not had too much experience with this type of business, but a $25,000 loan to a man in the construction business who wants to buy a bulldozer, for instance, is not of much use. How far will a loan of that amount go for a man in the transportation business who wants to buy a diesel truck? Of how much assistance is it?

I feel there is room for improvement in these two particular areas. I hope the parliamentary secretary will bring these two cases to the attention of the minister and that the minister will give them consideration. Then, this bill will not be too stringent but will make it possible for small businessmen to participate in these loans. This legislation should look after a group of people who have been forgotten for many years. We will support the resolution as it is. As I say, it is our job as an opposition to indicate the areas in which legislation that is being introduced could be improved. I do feel, Mr. Chairman, that with the addition of these two areas I have suggested, this particular resolution which has to do with the amendment of the Small Businesses Loans Act will be more effective.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make one or two brief observations. First I should like to congratulate the parliamentary secretary upon his statement introducing the resolution this evening, and also my colleague who has just spoken, the hon. member for Wellington-Huron who drew to the attention of the house the steps the Conservative government took in 1961 to introduce this most worth-while piece of legislation. I think each of us in this house who comes from a community in which there are many small businessmen has seen the usefulness of this act demonstrated. I think of family businesses that have been handed down from father to son, and this act has enabled them to carry on. I think of some of the new Canadians who came to Canada without capital but brought with them their skills and trades and who, as a result of loans obtained under this act, have been able to start up small businesses or manufacturing concerns. Corner grocery stores and confectionery stores, and so on, have derived great advantage under this act. I can recall main streets in small communities whose appearance has been greatly improved by the erection of new store fronts financed by loans under this act. Therefore I congratulate the government upon broadening its terms to include assistance in construction, transportation and communications. A small business operator can borrow under this act now to purchase or construct a building.

All in all, Mr. Chairman, this has been a good piece of legislation. But it should be better; it still does not have the potential it should have. I am not sure where the trouble lies. Maybe, part of the problem has been that the act is applicable only to those businesses with up to $250,000 gross sales per year. The government is now stepping this figure up to $500,000 and more businesses will become eligible for the benefits of the act.

However, Mr. Chairman, this is still not enough. The government must sell this legislation and must ask the bank managers why more people are not taking advantage of it. Is it because the bank managers themselves are not telling the small businessmen that this assistance is available? The legislation needs a push along the line somewhere.

This government has to do even more than just amend the legislation. There used to be a department of government dealing with small businesses, but to my knowledge this department has been dissolved. If it is still functioning we certainly do not hear anything about it.

There is one other factor mentioned by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat. The amount of the loan available is $25,000. That was the amount prescribed by the act when it was passed in 1961, but this is not nearly enough today. If a grocer wants to modernize his store and to instal modern refrigerating equipment to keep pace with large sales of frozen foods and other products requiring refrigeration today it will cost him $75,000, in order to compete and keep in line with his competitors. So that this amount of $25,000 is inadequate, and I am only sorry that the government did not see fit to raise the amount and include this provision in its amendments to the act.

Many service businesses come within the act, but there is one that does not, one which is very important to the welfare of the country and to society as a whole. I am referring to professional men such as doctors and physiotherapists, osteopaths, dentists, etc. who want to start a practice, or a group of doctors who want to acquire a clinic and buy some of the very expensive equipment on the market today. This should be regarded as constituting a service business. These professional people need this help and should come within the ambit of the act, along with the other service businesses. If we were to look into this question further I am sure we would enlarge the terms of the act to include medical men, dentists, and so on, who could use a loan to great advantage. For example, I think of the young man who has just graduated and is starting up in practice. The provisions of this legislation would be a great help to him and would enable him to render services so badly needed in many of our communities.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the government on broadening the scope of this excellent piece of legislation which we had the honour of introducing in 1961.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I just want to take a moment or two to express my support for the broadening of the terms of this legislation. I think this is a good illustration of the government's having listened to the advice given by the opposition throughout the years since the bill was first adopted and accepting suggested amendments as a result of the experience of hon. members in their own constituencies.

I know that this amendment which provides assistance for the construction of buildings will be very useful to a number of small businessmen whom I have the honour to represent. In some of our smaller communities particularly there are many business buildings which were erected 50 to 60 years ago, and I have heard businessmen say that they would like the opportunity of reconstructing their premises. Under the terms of this legislation, when it is adopted, I think they will have the opportunity to do this.

I also presume, Mr. Chairman, that the government has been listening to the experiences of bank managers. The previous speaker made the point that the bank managers should make an effort to "sell" this type of legislation. As a matter of fact, I have discussed this legislation with the managers of practically every bank in my constituency, and they have brought the legislation to the attention of many small businessmen. In the great majority of cases they have done all they could to see that these small businessmen are able to take advantage of the terms of the act, because they had security and opportunities ahead of them.

I will have something more to say on second reading of the bill, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, I realize the wish of the committee to complete this resolution stage this evening. However, I wanted on behalf of this group to express our approval of the resolution, and to do so in a brief space of time.

I am well aware that small businesses provide two things which are becoming increasingly rare—personal service and neighbourhood convenience, two important items in today's world. We approve of the broadening of this act so as to extend its usefulness, but I should like to say that unless this parliament and the government do a few other things at the same time we may find, as often happens when small businesses are developed, that we are laying the groundwork for a national chain of some kind or other to take over. Often small businesses are sold rather swiftly, not because they do not make enough money but because of the frustrations of their owners as a result of government intervention.

I recall very vividly sitting down with a group of small businessmen at one time and asking them what was their main problem in this regard. There was a short pause, and then came the answer "Well, the government". I can think of a couple of examples. One is the requirement of making quarterly payments of income tax. When a small businessman just starting up business is asked to make quarterly payments of tax prior to the end of the year, with refusal to pay or tardiness in payment involving him in the payment of interest on money which I do not see how he can owe the government anyway, this puts him to some hardship. Another problem has been mentioned over and over again in this house and is created by the Canada Pension Plan, overpayments to which being not returnable to small businessmen. This is the kind of thing we should take care of at the same time as we take this forward step in broadening the terms of the act.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

[Mr. Herridge.]

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. McIlraith (for Mr. Sharp) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-270, to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow the house will be asked to consider items Nos. 47, 58 and 59, the legislation dealing with collective bargaining in the public service and employment in the public service.

An hon. Member: In that order?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, in that order.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

RESEARCH—REQUEST FOR INCREASED GRANTS FOR MEDICAL RESEARCH

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I asked a question in the house about the possible loss of accreditation of four of Canada's 12 medical schools. I asked the question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) because he had suggested that the rate of increase of the medical research council estimates be reduced. I understand that the rate has been allowed to go up again to the 30 per cent that had been allowed previously. In spite of this, I feel that the threat of the loss of accreditation of four of our medical schools is a disgrace to our country. At one time we had one of the best reputations in the world for medical science. What have we today? We have a government that fails to plan. As a result our country is on the verge of medical disaster.

The Financial Post has said this:

> Canada's standard of health care is dangerously close to slipping quickly and quietly to the level of the second rate.

Our scientist medical teachers are going to the United States, where they have continuing money for the advancement of medical research. There, $6.50 per capita is spent, compared with Canada's 90 cents per capita.

Referring to a book put out as a report to the committee of presidents of the universities of Ontario entitled "Health Science in Ontario Universities", I see that it says on one page that teachers and scientists in Canada must be encouraged to remain in academic work and Canadian teacher scientists and graduate students now employed in the United States must be attracted back to Canada if possible. On the next page, page 19, one sentence is worth repeating. It says that at the present time full-time staff will not join faculties of medicine lacking research facilities.

Now we are faced with the prospect of four additional new medical schools in Canada, one in Hamilton, at McMaster University. It is planned to open this in 1969. Prospective students for this are in pre-medical schools, at universities. They started last fall, in 1966. Why would a government commit itself to spending $500 million on health training facilities while not allowing for the payment of a staff of teacher-scientists to run these facilities?

We are still continuing to play musical chairs between the universities, rather than plan for the future and increase one of our most valuable commodities, the supply of medical teachers, by a proper government increase each year of 50 per cent, as requested as a minimum by the deans of our medical schools. The present rate is 30 per cent, a rate which was threatened last year by the Minister of Finance when he decided to cut back the rate of increase of these grants. His statement at that time undermined the morale of the teaching staffs at every medical university across this country, and did almost irreparable harm to the four newly formed medical schools.

In the past two or three days editorials have suggested that the government should spend the money set aside for medicare on medical research. This of course is ridiculous. But research should be a part of any complete medicare scheme. Members of this government have been seen by representatives of all the societies and associations of the medical profession and some of the most prominent and well-respected members of that profession have explained the situation, hoping to get a realistic amount of money, not for their own good but so that essential work might be carried on. But to no obvious avail.

Better planning and foresight on the part of the government would have resulted in a more realistic arrangement for looking after the health of the Canadian people. The research aspect is all part and parcel of the same deal. The government's attitude is comparable to organizing a public teaching system, and teaching only part of the curricula.

This government is encouraging private enterprise to do research for individual profit rather than for the benefit of the people of this country alone. The type of research which comes from private drug firms sets out to combine advantageously two or more well known drugs in a mixture which will bring a larger profit. Any worth while discoveries made in this or in other countries have been made by doctors doing university research. I might use insulin and penicillin, or even the sulphonamides as an example.

To my way of thinking, spending money along the lines I suggest would protect Canadians in at least two ways: it would keep the brains in Canada and it would allow the results of their research to be used to improve the health of Canadians and of others in the world, not solely for the profit of private enterprise. Let the medical schools have this 50 per cent annual guaranteed increase not as a gift but so that they may work for our health—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Howe (Hamilton South): May I finish this sentence?

An hon. Member: Agreed.

Mr. Howe (Hamilton South): —the important thing being that the rate of increase could be counted on each year.

Mr. Jean Chrétien (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): I am glad to reply tonight to the question asked by the hon. member. No one is more inclined to agree with him than I am that a lot more money is needed for medical research, for I have close relatives in the medical profession, and one particularly who is engaged in research work.

I would point out, however, that the government has done what it was possible for it to do. It increased by one third its contribution to research facilities. It is true that we planned a 50 per cent increase, but the problem—and it is a difficult one—is that each time we increase a grant or anything else we have to collect more money.

Those who are most reluctant to permit the government to increase taxation are members of the party to which the hon. member belongs. Recently we increased the old age pension and when the time came to raise the necessary money the motion which we had to face came from the party to which the hon. member belongs. In any event the government is very aware of the importance of medical research to Canada. We also are very aware that there are problems in this field. There is the so-called brain drain to the United States. The government is aware of this problem and a new policy has developed over the last few years. I am very glad about this, because it will permit one of my brothers to come back to Canada.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—INQUIRY AS TO EXCHANGE ARRANGEMENTS BETWEEN CANADA AND FRANCE

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, on February 9 I put to the minister of Industry and of Defence Production the following question:

As a result of the trade mission to France and the report published in that connection, could the minister tell the house whether profitable relations and exchanges have been established between France and Canada regarding technical development and other joint projects?

Last year, a Canadian economic mission went to France with a view to promote closer relations between the two countries. A report has been published, and it would be interesting to know if practical results stemmed from those happy efforts.

From the standpoint of trade, the import-export picture between Canada and France represents a very small percentage, namely 1 per cent of all imports and exports between Canada and foreign countries. Our country would benefit very much by diversifying and increasing our commercial markets, particularly with a country like France who is a member of the European Common Market and in a position to export particular goods to our country in return for farm and manufactured products which abound here.

With respect to immigration in 1966, only 7,872 of a total 194,743 immigrants were of French nationality. There are various reasons for this small number of French immigrants. Canada should establish more immigration offices in France, we should invest more money in advertising programs and the R.C.M.P. should stop investigating each French immigrant, while immigrants from England and Ireland are accepted without any such formality.

French people should receive better assurance that they are most welcome in Canada and that skilled workmen will find here immediately upon arrival permanent and remunerative work.

In the industrial field, direct exchanges of qualified personnel, the establishment of joint industrial research programs and other common projects should be undertaken, so that knowledge and skill would complement each other. Canada should also seriously consider adopting the metric system, in order better to follow the technical and industrial evolution and contend with the aggressive and perfected foreign production.

In the field of investments, Canada would greatly benefit from French capital, and the trade and economic development of both countries would gain a great deal by it.

Any effort by the central government to increase all types of relations with France would please all Canadians, I am sure, and especially the 7 million French Canadians. A bicultural country like Canada has the tremendous advantage of establishing more easily close and profitable relations with the French speaking world and Anglo-Saxon groups.

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the visit of the Canadian economic mission to France has clearly awakened interest in closer relations between the respective business communities.

Individual businessmen in both countries are responding to the encouragement by their respective governments that they seek to develop business with their counterparts. Among the initiatives which have been taken to follow up prospects, we know of Canadian companies which are pursuing particular opportunities with French firms, but we cannot divulge the nature of any of the negotiations now under way because of their private character.

To indicate the trend further, I can advise that we know of the intentions of groups of French businessmen from particular industries to visit Canada during our centennial year to explore trade prospects—in the aggregate a total of over 1,400 persons.

These increasing contacts will give rise to some technological exchange and probably joint ventures.

The full impact of the Canadian Mission will require time to reach and be seen in its full dimension.

May I assure the hon. member that each subject raised in his speech is carefully studied by both governments and businessmen of the two countries.

AGRICULTURE—EGGS—REPORTED RECENT DROP IN PRICES

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to debate a serious situation prevailing in the egg market in Canada and particularly in the prairie provinces. I thank the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) for coming to listen to my presentation.

My argument is based on the following statement which appeared in the Western Producer where egg market prices are given weekly, and also on letters I have received from farmers in my constituency.

After the beginning of the month of January grade A large were selling in Saskatoon for between 20 cents and 29 cents per dozen. A week later prices to producers continued to drop and on January 24 in Saskatoon the price for grade A large was from 18 cents to 30 cents. Another week later the prices declined again. At the end of January in most markets grade A large eggs were priced at 17 cents per dozen.

This is a deplorable and very serious situation. The sad fact is that while prices for eggs have dropped in 1967, up to January 21 Canada had imported a total of 4,386 cases of eggs from the United States. These are subsidized eggs. Surely this is the most deplorable situation Canada has ever faced. We are bringing in these eggs in competition with our prairie producers. Our prices are dropping day by day, yet the Minister of Agriculture allows the importation of eggs from other countries.

To give you an indication of the seriousness of this problem I should like to put some statistical information on the record regarding the wholesale prices of Canadian farm products. These prices are from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, using as a base the 1935-39 index of 100. In 1949 the index stood at 228.7 while in 1963 it stood at 229.9. This is an increase of slightly over one percentage point over a 15 year period.

Let me now refer to the index in respect of wholesale prices for field products. We find that in 1949 the index stood at 191.9 and that in 1963 it had decreased to 184.4 This is a deplorable situation and I should like the minister to consider it seriously. He is travelling from one province to another, and I am sure the letters he has received indicate that there is a problem in this regard. I hope he will look into this situation because farmers cannot be expected to sell grade A large eggs for 17 cents a dozen.

The minister may say there will be a deficiency payment based upon the price of 34 cents a dozen. But the trouble is that when the low prices on the prairie are added to the higher prices in the larger centres in the east, the average price per dozen may be about 34 cents, 35 cents or 36 cents. This will add only 2 cents per dozen to the prices we receive, which may be 20 cents or 25 cents a dozen for grade A large eggs.

I would like to stress this point. I know the minister will do what he can to resolve this problem. He can go out to the prairies and investigate for himself the serious situation. I would like him to do this, and he would be able to satisfy himself that this problem exists and do something to assist the prairie farmers who are faced with this situation.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for drawing this situation to my attention and commend him for his ever-vigilant interest in farmers' affairs, and particularly those affecting his own constituency. With respect to the stabilization payments, the deficiency payments, I think the hon. member will agree that we can at the federal level have only a national basis of deficiency payments. If we were to have regional deficiency payments we would but contribute to the fragmentation, economically, of the nation. Any program we have must be a national one.

I would point out to the hon. member that some provinces have provincial egg marketing boards which work in conjunction with our federal stabilization program and deficiency program, to achieve possibly a more perfect equity for farmers in those provinces. I personally am a believer in the system invoked by the National Dairy Commission, and I think under our constitutional concept the best set-up one can conceive in agriculture is provincial boards that work in conjunction and co-operation with a national board, so that both intraprovincial and extraprovincial marketing can be covered by these two entities within their proper jurisdictional authority.

It is my hope that in the not too distant future there will be a national egg marketing board of the same type and nature as the National Dairy Commission, and that this board can work in conjunction with similar provincial boards to achieve a greater stability in egg marketing and egg pricing and, I think, thus ensure greater justice for our egg producers.

I might point out that there certainly has been a drop in price in the past few weeks, but that during the past year egg prices have been much better than they have been over the past number of years. This of course encouraged increased production. Irrespective of general price trends during any production year there is always an increase of deliveries during mid-January and we always experience a drop in prices at that time. This year the mid-January problem has persisted over the past four weeks because of the current supply-demand picture. Present indications are that production is dropping off and it is expected that when the supply is more in line with demand, prices will become more firm. I can assure the hon. member that the Agricultural Stabilization Board is keeping this situation under constant review.

Mr. Rapp: The minister's suggestion appeals to me very much.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.27 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at 11 a.m.

EDUCATION

REPORTED FINANCING OF U.S. STUDENTS BY CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister, no matter how far down the line that authority may be delegated this morning. I should like to put the question in this way. In view of reports from Washington that the Central Intelligence Agency has been financing students or student groups on campuses both in the United States and in foreign countries, does the government have any knowledge that any of the more than 3,000 United States students attending Canadian universities are financed directly or indirectly by the Central Intelligence Agency?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is no such knowledge that I am aware of, and I expect this is true of all members of the government. However, I would be glad to refer the question to the other departments to confirm that.

Mr. Winkler: May I ask a supplementary question. Will the Acting Prime Minister have the matter investigated to assure us that the espionage division of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police has refrained from similar activities?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, I can give that assurance, Mr. Speaker. I think I can give assurance on the other point as well, but I should like to inquire before doing so.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT OF INSURANCE ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I have a question for the Minister of Finance. I should like to ask if he can inform the house whether his department or the office of the superintendent of insurance is drafting legislation to amend the Insurance Act to overcome the difficulties that North American General Insurance experienced.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, some weeks ago I had a meeting with the association of general insurance companies, at which time we exchanged views on possible amendments to the act. These amendments are still under consideration, and I hope in due course to be making some proposals to the house.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask a supplementary question. May we expect the amendments to be presented some time this year? I realize it may not be possible to do so before the end of this session, but some time this year?

Mr. Sharp: I can say without equivocation it will not be during the present session. I hope it will be possible in the session that will begin after the end of the present session.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—PROPOSED WITHDRAWAL OF UNITED KINGDOM TROOPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): My question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the British white paper on defence that was issued yesterday which forecast the withdrawal of 25,000 British NATO troops, can the minister tell us whether there was prior consultation with the Canadian government with regard to this new policy of the British government? Likewise, would the minister also tell us whether this is going to affect our own commitments to NATO.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the British government had extended the courtesy of advising us in advance that they intended to announce this policy, and the matter is being studied here. I cannot say what our attitude might be. I expect this proposed policy will not have any immediate effect on our plans so far as NATO is concerned, but this, of course, would have to be studied by the government.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): A supplementary question. May I ask the Minister of National Defence whether Canadian representatives on NATO supported or opposed the British proposal?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be appropriate for me to indicate what position we might have taken in respect to this, but I think I can say in fairness and without doing any disservice to the normal channels of communication that anything which weakens the solidarity of the alliance and which would, until such time as a political settlement is effected in Europe, make it more difficult to keep this group of nations working together in a common cause would give us reason for some concern.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO POLICE REPORTS ON BOMBING OF YUGOSLAV BUILDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. I should like to ask him whether the government has a report available in regard to the bombing of the Yugoslav embassy buildings.

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter that has been dealt with in the house by the Prime Minister, and I would prefer that it be left in his hands.

EDUCATION

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL INTERVENTION IN TEACHERS' STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister of which I have given him notice, but in view of the fact that the right hon. gentleman is not here I will address my question to the Acting Prime Minister.

Considering the educational crisis developing in the province of Quebec and the chance of a general strike in that province, I would ask the government and the Prime Minister whether they would consider the possibility of intervening under section 93 (4) of the British North America Act; or alternatively would they consider disallowing the Quebec bill No. 25 under the disallowance provisions of the B.N.A. act?

Mr. Ricard: The hon. member favours anarchy.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the Acting Prime Minister may want to take this question as notice—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Lewis.]

Mr. Speaker: —but for one thing, my understanding of the situation is that the bill to which the hon. gentleman refers has not been passed, so the question becomes hypothetical.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROTEST BY QUEBEC PREMIER RESPECTING PROGRAM "TIREZ AU CLAIR"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State.

Following the protest by the Quebec premier and the statement made in the house yesterday by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), has the Secretary of State ordered that an investigation be made about the refusal of the C.B.C. to allow Hon. Marcel Masse to take part in the program "Tirez au Clair"? Does the minister intend to inform the house later about the result of that investigation?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the hon. member's question is exactly the same as the one asked yesterday and I must take it for granted that it will be answered in due course.

SHIPPING

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SAFETY AT SEA AND SHIP MANNING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, now that the Acting Minister of Transport has been given his voice I wonder whether I could direct to him the question that I posed yesterday.

Hon. John N. Turner (Acting Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Skeena asked whether I would be in a position to make a detailed announcement about the matter of safety at sea and manning scales of ships.

I can say to him that there was a meeting last week in Vancouver on these subjects, as he knows, and it was agreed at that meeting that all parties would deal with the towboat industry as soon as the laker project is completed. The laker project is proceeding; the draft in relation to lake vessels is well advanced and will be distributed to those concerned on both sides of the industry for comment. I expect that this will be done in the next few weeks.

Mr. Howard: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Considering the clarity of the answer I wonder if I could direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister and ask if he would not make the Acting Minister of Transport permanent in this position.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should attempt to—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to have to disappoint the Acting Prime Minister.

NATIONAL MUSEUM

REPORTED REASONS FOR RESIGNATION OF DIRECTOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): My question is to the Secretary of State. In view of the recent resignation of Dr. Richard Glover, director of the National Museum, is the minister able to say when this important structure will be built?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest this question should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): May I ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot ask a supplementary question on a question that has been refused. Perhaps he would ask a separate question.

[Later:]

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): My question is for the Secretary of State and relates to the earlier question asked. I suppose it is more a related than a supplementary question. In view of the frequent criticisms of political interference and difficulties involving the National Museum, does the minister contemplate setting up some form of inquiry, that we may be relieved of the continuing resignations in this particular area?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not heard of any such complaint or criticism, at least during the term of my stewardship. I am informed Dr. Glover resigned, as has been suggested, mainly because it has not been possible to go ahead with the building. When he first came, he had been given an undertaking that the building would be constructed at an early date.

I do not know of any unrest such as my hon. friend suggests. Indeed my information from my staff is that there is no unrest.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if it is contemplated, in connection with the unrest which I think is recognized by most people except the minister, to include further parts of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development within the Department of the Secretary of State. I am thinking particularly of the Historic Sites and Monuments Board.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF FURTHER U.S. DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has the minister received any representations recently from organizations or persons asking that the question of recent proposals for the increase in power in the United States at Grand Coulee dam, from 2 million kilowatts to 9.2 million kilowatts, be referred to the appropriate committee?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The only person from whom I received such representation is the hon. member himself.

IMMIGRATION

ADMISSION OF EUROPEANS FOR WORK ON FARMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): My question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Is it government policy to allow into the country immigrants from Europe who have been guaranteed farm work on arrival?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration: Who have been guaranteed farm work? I did not hear the last part of the hon. member's question.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): I am referring to immigrants who have been guaranteed farm work on arrival in Canada.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, this is general policy. Simply because a person has a job in Canada does not mean that we accept that person. Other conditions are set out in the law.

Public Service Collective Bargaining

[Translation]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I do not know to whom my question should be addressed; I should probably direct it to the government house leader, for it deals with an historical event that had not taken place since 1926, when the Meighen administration was defeated.

My question is as follows: In view of the fact that the hon. member for Mégantic (Mr. Langlois), after a virulent speech against a motion, voted in favour of the said motion, I should like to know whether it is the house leader's intention—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Choquette: —to initiate procedures to—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[English]

Order, please. The question is out of order. The hon. member cannot reflect on a vote of the house.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF COLLECTIVE BARGAINING SYSTEM

The house in committee on Bill No. C-170 respecting employer and employee relations in the public service of Canada—Mr. Pearson—Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Benson: Several months have passed, Mr. Chairman, since the house gave second reading to this bill, No. C-170, an act respecting employer and employee relations in the public service of Canada and to the related measures, Bill C-181, an act respecting employment in the public service of Canada and Bill C-182, an act to amend the Financial Administration Act, and referred them to the special joint committee for the purposes of study and report. My brief remarks at this time relate to all three measures, and it is not my intention to speak on clause 2 of the other two bills.

The special committee under the joint chairmanship of hon. Senator Bourget and the hon. member for Ottawa East has applied itself with great diligence and patience to a very important task. I am sure I voice the feelings of all the hon. members of this committee when I express the gratitude of hon. members to this special joint committee for the study they have given all three bills.

[Mr. Marchand.]

Previously the committee had reported on an act to amend the various superannuation acts, and has now had referred to it the matter of pensions paid to retired civil servants or their dependants. However, this latest reference to the committee is not in any way related to this legislation or to the reports made by the committee arising out of its consideration of these bills.

The reports of the committee on Bills C-170, C-181 and C-182 are set forth at pages 1259 to 1281 of Votes and Proceedings for February 3, 1967, where all amendments recommended by the committee are to be found. In addition the committee has ordered all three bills reprinted as amended, and these are now in the hands of all hon. members.

The committee held many meetings. Representations were heard from all associations and organizations representing civil servants, and from the central labour bodies and other interested groups. I think it can be said that the fullest hearing has been accorded to all those who have an interest in the public service. A great deal of effort has gone into the drafting of these measures and into the studies associated with their preparation. To this effort the committee has added its own very careful and very thorough study. I thank the hon. members of this house and those of the other place for their thoughtful work and the contribution they have made to this legislative program.

I know hon. members would want me to extend a special word of thanks to the joint chairmen. The proceedings took place in an atmosphere of calm reflection and deliberation. This is to the credit of the chairmen, its members and this parliament of ours. I believe there was no other interest in the minds of all hon. members except the interest of the people of Canada and their concern to ensure, as far as can be assured through legislation, that Canadians in the years to come would be well served by their public service.

I want to make clear now that the government is pleased to accept the amendments proposed by the committee to the bills. As we proceed in committee of the whole on the clauses of the bills those clauses will be called as amended, and I hope accepted, because in my view they strengthen the measures previously placed by the government before this house.

• (11:30 a.m.)

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, during my years in parliament few bills have been presented to this house of more basic importance or lasting significance. Indeed, a more intricate and complex bill would be difficult to imagine.

The bill has had a most detailed study in the joint special committee, and in my view its passage through the committee of the whole need not be greatly delayed. The bill which has been returned from the committee is very greatly improved over that which was given second reading in this house. It is still far from ideal, and without doubt additional amendments and improvements will be required in the years ahead.

The immensity of the task of introducing a system of collective bargaining for the determination of pay and conditions of employment in the public service is well indicated by the statistics of total employment with the federal government. The latest available statistics were published in January of this year and are for July, 1966. Total employment with the federal government in July of 1966 was 372,890, of whom 223,850 were employed in departments or departmental corporations and 149,040 were employed in proprietary, agency or other federal corporations. It appears, therefore, that about 225,000 public servants are directly affected by this bill, and there can be no doubt that the pay and conditions of employment of the other 150,000 employed by crown corporations will be indirectly but very materially influenced.

The President of the Treasury Board has commented upon the work of the joint special committee. Personally I have never been a member of a committee which worked more harmoniously, more assiduously and with more complete freedom from political partisanship. That is as it should be. The public service of Canada is an immense credit to the nation. I suggest there is no public service anywhere in the world which exceeds the Canadian service in dedication, responsibility or ability, and there are many, many branches of the public service of Canada which are unequalled anywhere in the world in scholarship, accomplishment or achievement.

I am not generally in the habit of paying compliments publicly to hon. gentlemen opposite. Too often I have found such references to be treasured and used at the time of the next election. Nevertheless, I cannot in justice refrain from paying my respects to my friend of long standing, the hon. member for Ottawa East, for his role and attitude as Commons chairman of the joint special committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): His intelligent guidance of the committee, his firm, dignified but pleasant presiding manner made work on the committee a pleasure, and I thank him for it. I only hope it may help to win for him the long overdue reward of moving his office to the east wing of this building where he may join the Senate chairman. I can say that because I think it would make the role of the party to which I belong much easier in Ottawa East.

The magnitude of the committee's work is best illustrated by the fact that during some 39 sittings a total of 182 amendments were made to the bill, as I count them. I think this must be something of a parliamentary record. Of the 182 amendments, I calculate 49 are of substance and greatly improve the bill originally presented to the house. A better justification for the committee system could hardly be found.

Much of the credit for the improvement in this bill belongs to those who presented briefs. Those briefs were studious and informed. Those of the staff associations reflect great credit upon the calibre of the leadership and research qualities of these organizations. The assistance of such distinguished public servants as Dr. George F. Davidson, Arnold D. P. Heeney, Q.C., Mr. J. D. Love and Mr. P.M. Roddick was invaluable.

Despite this, Mr. Chairman, I remain unconvinced that the government has chosen the wisest course in the presentation of this bill. In my view a better and a wiser course would have been to undertake a complete revision and modernization of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and the inclusion therein of a separate part reflecting the different circumstances in the public service. The closer the provisions for collective bargaining in the public service are brought to provisions for the private sector, the better it will be for both, I am convinced.

There is no doubt that without substantial amendments the I.R.D.I. Act would not immediately meet the needs of the whole public service, though it might well apply to the post office as it does to crown corporations today. But the act, that is the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, is in my view out of date for the private sector and is in most urgent need of revision to conform to modern thinking in industrial relations. It would have been much better to revise that act and divide it into three parts; first, the general sections which would apply across the board to the public service and the private sector alike; second, those provisions which by their nature are applicable only to the private sector under federal jurisdiction. The third part would be those provisions which by their nature are applicable only to the public service.

Several of the briefs before the committee made vigorous representations that an amended I.R.D.I. Act and not this bill should be used. Notable among these were the briefs of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, the Letter Carriers Union of Canada, the Canadian Labour Congress, and the lithographers and the typographical unions. I have considerable sympathy with their submissions. However, the die is cast otherwise and I raise the matter only to say this. No doubt as a result of the study by the task force headed by Dean Woods a modernization of the I.R.D.I. act will be undertaken by parliament within the next two or three sessions, if not earlier. By that time there will have been experience with this bill. Its deficiencies will likely have been disclosed. At that stage I believe the government then in office should give careful consideration to the consolidation of the I.R.D.I. act and this bill into a new three part employer-employee relations code applicable in the manner I have suggested to both the private sector and the public service.

The success of the present bill, C-170, will be largely dependent upon the calibre and qualities of the public service staff relations board. I urge upon the president of the Treasury Board and the government to spare no pains to obtain as chairman and vice chairman persons of the highest excellence. Reports are circulating that the chairmanship will be offered to Professor Jacob Finkelman. I hope the rumours are true, because I believe there is no man in Canada more scholarly and enlightened yet more down to earth and practical in the field of employer-employee relations than Professor Finkelman.

Equally, Mr. Chairman, the initial stages of this legislation will require of the bargaining agents a high degree of responsibility and what I may describe as employer-employee statesmanship. Without it bickering, unrest and loss of morale in the public service could be the result.

A major improvement in the bill, without which I could not support it at all, was the complete revision made in relation to the time the bargaining agent must choose between compulsory arbitration or the alternative of conciliation with the right to strike. In the bill as originally drafted this election had to be made before certification, a time when the election might well be mischievous. The new provisions permit the delaying of election until immediately prior to the commencement of negotiations, clearly a time when the will of the employees themselves is most likely to be known.

The committee was confronted with a grave problem in respect of the rather considerable number of employees in a managerial or confidential category who will be excluded from the operations of this bill. In fact these employees, numbering many thousands, would be in a less favourable position than at present, since they will be deprived of their existing right of consultation pursuant to section 7 of the Civil Service Act, without being brought under this bill and the provisions of collective bargaining.

The special joint committee has strongly recommended the establishment of an advisory committee on the model of the standing advisory committee for the higher grades in the public service in Great Britain. Before this bill clears committee, we on this side of the house will expect a specific and unequivocal commitment from the President of the Treasury Board that the government will establish such an advisory committee.

This leads me to submit that there is still a useful and constructive role for the national joint council. That council has many substantial accomplishments to its credit. I believe it can still perform a most valuable service for all public servants in fields not covered by collective bargaining; for example, superannuation. Before the committee stage of this bill is concluded we shall expect a statement of the government's intentions in respect to the future of the national joint council.

• (11:40 a.m.)

Then, sir, I wish to draw specific attention to the recommendation to the joint special committee as follows:

> Your committee recommends that the government consider legislation to continue the pay research bureau and to provide for the data collected thereby to be available to the bargaining parties under Bill C-170.

I have perhaps a paternal interest in this bureau, because one of my first acts on election to this parliament was to urge its establishment. I succeeded in this urging. It was first established in 1957 on the recommendation of the gentleman for whom I then served as parliamentary assistant, Hon. Donald M. Fleming, minister of finance. Despite some growing pains and some shaky techniques at the outset, the bureau has been of tremendous value in the process of pay determination. I think it is most urgent that in the future there be impartial and factual research about comparability of salary and wage levels in the public service with equivalent categories in private industry. The results of this research, I submit, must be available equally to the bargaining parties. I ask the minister to give the committee an unequivocal undertaking that the government will carry out this recommendation of the joint special committee.

I believe it is of special interest to members of parliament that under this bill the staffs of the Senate, the House of Commons and the library of parliament are excluded. The joint special committee has recommended amendments to the Senate and House of Commons Act, the House of Commons Act and the Library of Parliament Act to provide to these employees rights and advantages similar to those which this bill provides. I confess to some surprise that the President of the Treasury Board has not already arranged the introduction of such amendments to these three acts so they could be considered in association with this bill. I ask the minister to make clear at once the intentions of the commissioners on internal economy and of the government in this regard. The employees in this building must not be placed in a position less favourable than that of other public servants. I submit the amendments to the three acts should be introduced at once and enacted at this session.

During the hearings of the joint special committee the question was raised—and I pursued it—of the inclusion in the bill of a so-called conscience clause to permit the exclusion of those persons who on grounds of religious belief or training object to membership in a bargaining agency or to the payment of fees or dues thereto. It is true that the number of such persons is small, but there is a basic principle involved. In a number of other jurisdictions the matter has been settled by the inclusion of a conscience clause which would permit the objector to make a contribution to an approved charity of an amount at least equal to the fees or dues that otherwise would be payable. I do urge the minister to adopt the model contained in the Saskatchewan act of 1965 as amended in 1966. If he does not do so I propose to test the opinion of the committee of the whole by an amendment at the appropriate time.

The most unfortunate by-product of this legislation is the red circling program. Without doubt collective bargaining requires a simplification and rearrangement of the 700 classes and 1,400 grades which there have been previously in the public service. But in reducing the number of classes to something like 70 the government has brought a grave injustice to thousands upon thousands of civil servants, and has created more unrest and loss of morale than at any previous time ever existed in the public service. I deplore the way in which the red circling was carried out. What I am unable to comprehend is how the Civil Service Commission can be so confident that its present reclassification program is correct, when all it does is overrule and set aside classifications made by that very commission in years gone by. How is it that the commission made so many mistakes—indeed, 10,000 mistakes—in earlier years but has now achieved infallibility? It is the ordinary civil servant who is being made to pay for those alleged mistakes on the part of the Civil Service Commission.

Again, I strongly suggest to the President of the Treasury Board that the only fair way to settle this red circling fiasco—and that it is—is to exempt incumbents completely and permit them to have and enjoy all the advantages which would have accrued to them had their position not been red circled. The reduction in classification would become effective when the position was next filled, when the successful applicant would accept the position with his eyes open.

Red circling is not the only headache there will be in the institution of collective bargaining. There will be other complications and other growing pains. No doubt this bill will require amendment from time to time. Collective bargaining will not create a new valhalla for public servants. But in this day it is inevitable and desirable. I intend to support this bill, with reservations in respect of certain clauses which I shall express when we reach them. My earnest hope is that under collective bargaining the government of Canada will prove to be a model employer, and that the enactment of this bill will accrue to the advantage not only of public servants but of all Canadians.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I should like to join the President of the Treasury Board and the hon. member for Carleton in extending to the hon. member for Ottawa East and his co-chairman from the other place my congratulations for the good temper they exhibited through many days of sometimes pretty sharp exchanges. I should like also, and I believe the hon. member for Ottawa East will approve of my doing so, to extend our thanks to the clerk of the special joint committee, Mr. Thomas, who by some miraculous accomplishment knew exactly what we had left out, what we had stood aside and when we came back to it and why. Without his services I am sure half the bill which is now before the house would have been lost somewhere under the tables of the special joint committee.

I should also like to pay a special tribute—not merely for politeness but for reasons which I will make clear in a moment—to the competence and thoughtfulness with which the officials of the Treasury Board and the Civil Service Commission presented their propositions to the committee and listened to suggestions from members of the committee. I should like to pay tribute particularly to Dr. Davidson and the two gentlemen who now are in front of the President of the Treasury Board, Mr. Love and Mr. Roddick.

I pay this tribute, as I said, not only in politeness and out of a sincere appreciation of the work they did in the committee, but particularly because my experience has taught me that no matter what law you may have and what kind of collective bargaining scheme you may set up whether it will in fact work will depend on the aptitude, the generosity, tolerance, intelligence and competence of the parties at the bargaining table. I am persuaded that if the President of the Treasury Board lets his officials do the collective bargaining, the collective bargaining will be done in the right spirit.

That is not to say that he himself might not have the same kind of spirit, but he was not before the committee. I am confident that Dr. Davidson and his associates will approach the collective bargaining process with a sense of their duty as representatives of the government and people of Canada, and with an appreciation of the collective bargaining process which augurs well for the success of the collective bargaining régime.

Mr. Knowles: And the President of the Treasury Board is perhaps not as permanent as his officials will be.

[Mr. Lewis.]

Mr. Lewis: My friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre points out that the President of the Tresury Board is not as permanent as his officials may prove to be.

Mr. Benson: Oh, just about.

Mr. Lewis: I also want to say a word about the work of the committee. In recent months a good many members of parliament have indulged, as I have—this includes several members of the government and, if I remember correctly, the hon. member for Hochelaga has written about it—in the exercise of calling for a revision of the rules and procedures of parliament in order to bring our work more in consonance with modern requirements. There was no better example, it seems to me, of one of the ways in which parliamentary procedures can be improved than the work of this committee and other committees on which I have served and about which I have been told. It has always seemed to me that when we sit around the table at a parliamentary committee meeting we become a great deal less partisan than we are on the floor of this house. In committee we tend to be much more concerned with the merits of the subject matter before us than with taking positions and stances that are intended for some kind of political projection.

I urge that we learn from the work of these committees and try to find ways of not only handing more important legislation to the committees but of ensuring that the work done by the committees is not repeated on the floor of this house and in committee of the whole, as has happened in the case of one or two bills. I have learned that in committee, much more than in the house it is possible to persuade the government to accept changes if one has reasoned arguments to support them. It is much easier, at least, than persuading them to accept changes in this chamber. I am confident that we can improve the work of this parliament a great deal by not only extending the functions of parliamentary committees but giving those committees powers which they do not now have and arranging our parliamentary rules in such a way that the work of committees, as I have said, is not repeated on the floor of this house.

I am not going to try to cover all the points of this bill. I think the minister was right, and perhaps he understated the position, when he said the bill had been improved by the special joint committee. In my view having taken, as he knows, together with my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the hon. member for Carleton and other members of the committee a very active part in seeking changes, Bill C-170 as it now lies before the members of this committee bears hardly any resemblance in basic principle to the bill which the government originally presented. The changes which have been made are not merely changes of detail or procedure. In every case the amendments that were made, and which the government members on the committee accepted, let me add—the remark I am making is not partisan—were changes of fundamental substance, which now make this bill closer to a genuine collective bargaining bill than it was when first introduced.

Having paid a compliment to the officials of Treasury Board, let me now say something which may not be as complimentary to them. I found in dealing with them in the committee that the original approach of the government and the officials had been to grant the public service employees collective bargaining but to fence it around in such a way that it really would be no more than a shadow of any real collective bargaining process. There was obviously a fearfulness on the part of the officials, which no doubt reflected the attitude of the government, that if there were full collective bargaining the whole thing would run amok, and they wanted to be sure there were limitations here and limitations there, with every "i" dotted and every "t" crossed in such a way that nothing would have been left for real collective bargaining.

It is therefore a great tribute to the officials and those who instructed them to say that when we were able to persuade them, in most cases, of the value of some fundamental change they later came back with wording appropriate to meet the request which was made. I repeat that the bill now before this committee is entirely different in basic principle from that which appeared before us on second reading. That is why, despite the fairly severe criticisms representatives of my party made of the original bill, we will support this bill and its companion bills with much greater happiness than we could possibly have done before.

I have still several very serious reservations about the bill. If committee members will permit me to refer to it, I would say that I had occasion to spend a day last Wednesday with a large group of representatives of the Public Service Alliance, postal employees and others interested in this legislation. I went over with them, so far as I could, some of the matters that will be concerning them in practical negotiations on the basis of these bills. They informed me that Dr. Davidson and Mr. Love, as well as the President of the Treasury Board, had met with the group the day before.

I suggested to them, as I say to the committee now, that there are still some serious difficulties about this bill on which they ought to keep a very careful eye. If the practice shows that those difficulties are real, it will be the duty of this parliament to make the necessary amendments to overcome them. The first difficulty—and I do not put these forward in any order of importance—is represented in the clause now before the committee and on which these general statements are being made. The wording of the exclusions is still extremely broad. It will be easy for the employer to abuse his powers if he wishes to do so. It will be easy for the employer to seek exclusion to such an extent as to remove from the process of collective bargaining thousands of men and women who ought not to be removed from it.

I am very concerned about the breadth of the language in many of the subclauses of clause 2 of the bill. We discussed them at great length in the committee. If I may make a personal reference, I sometimes felt I was making myself an extreme nuisance to the other members of the committee by insisting and digging in my heels on a number of points in this clause, as in others. We made some important changes in this clause, but to my mind some parts of the clause are still far too wide.

• (12:00 noon)

Whether the broad wording will in fact be a disservice to the collective bargaining process and to the excluded individuals will depend on the integrity and care with which the employer—in this case the government, or according to this bill, the Treasury Board —will seek to interpret the broad language used in clause 2.

I agree with the hon. member for Carleton—he and I both raised the matter before the committee—that in view of the fact that literally thousands of public service employees will be excluded from the process of collective bargaining under the heading of managerial and confidential employees, it is of the greatest importance that the recommendation of the special joint committee that a special advisory committee be set up to deal with the government in relation to the terms and conditions of work of such excluded personnel be carried out by the government.

In order to ensure that the government would not use its usual language, namely "we will do it soon" and—"soon" is the most elastic word I have ever heard since I have been on the floor of the house, a word which may mean anything from one to 100 years—I moved that the committee unanimously accept a time limit on this recommendation specifying that the government is to establish this advisory committee within six months from the time these bills are passed. We will watch very carefully to see whether the government will in fact act within six months to set up this committee to deal with the thousands of excluded personnel as a result of the practical application of the bill now before the committee.

However, I am a great deal more disturbed about another matter which I asked members of the house to consider very carefully. We will not move any amendment to these bills on this point either at this stage or at any stage because we have reached the conclusion—and I may say that the people whom I met last Wednesday told me they agree fully with this approach—that the important thing is to get these laws into action as quickly as possible and with the least possible delay, so we may acquire a year or two of experience under these laws. If changes are necessary we will be able to make them on the basis of practical experience rather than attempting to foretell what may happen. My concern stems from the fact that a huge and important area of normal employer-employee relations is excluded from collective bargaining under Bill C-170 and its two companion bills, C-181 and C-182.

I am referring to the areas of classification, appointment, promotion, demotion, lay-off and release of employees. For example, the red circling fiasco to which the hon. member for Carleton referred would not have arisen if there had been collective bargaining on the question of classification. In every case with which I have had some experience where reclassification has taken place the union, if it was strong enough, was able to achieve the result which I suggested in a few questions to the President of the Treasury Board some months ago and to which the hon. member for Carleton referred in his speech this morning, namely that the red circle rates should not apply to incumbent employees. I suggested that the incumbent employee should continue to receive the old rate and all the increases given to other employees, and that the red circle rates should apply only to a new employee in the particular position affected. This is the only way to deal with red circling, because otherwise the government is punishing an employee by unilaterally changing the understanding on which the employee accepted the job. This problem would not have arisen if there had been collective bargaining on classification.

I am very worried that the largest part of job opportunity and job security is excluded from collective bargaining. The reason we finally decided, after many hours of argument, to let it take its course and see how it works, and the reason we were given for the exclusion of this area from collective bargaining, was the desire to maintain the merit system and to ensure that only the Civil Service Commission, or the public service commission as it will be called, will have any authority in making decisions and setting standards with regard to the merit system.

I was not convinced of that at that time and I continue to be unconvinced that it is impossible to bring these areas within collective bargaining and at the same time guarantee that the merit system will continue. I am unconvinced that it is impossible to wed the merit system to seniority, length of service and all the other aspects of job security sought by employees. I continue to feel certain that it would have been possible to do so, but the officials of the department and the representatives of the Civil Service Commission insisted that it was not.

Therefore we decided, and I hope the future will show it to be a wise decision, to let it go for the moment and see how it will work in the next two years. However, let me reiterate to the President of the Treasury Board and to his negotiating officials that this is an area which worries the public service employee representatives more than any other section in the present bills. To give a simple example, they are deeply concerned that on Monday they may negotiate with the government and reach an agreement on a certain rate of salaries, and on Tuesday have that rate eroded by unilateral reclassification in the same way the red circling has affected employees without the right of collective bargaining. This is what has happened on many occasions in private industry.

Therefore let me be presumptuous enough as to say to the President of the Treasury Board and his officials, as well as to the public service commission to be set up, that if those bodies so apply the unilateral exclusive right of classification and appointment of employees, etc., as the law as it is presently worded permits them, and thereby irritate the public service employees, this collective bargaining process will be in danger the day after it begins.

I urge those in the government who are responsible for collective bargaining to make absolutely certain that every avenue of consultation, information, appeal and discussion be explored so the employees concerned are persuaded that they will not suffer as a result of this exclusive power in the hands of the authorities, and as a result of the exclusion of this important area from negotiation.

As I said on second reading of this bill, I continue to be worried about the powers given to the staff relations board and the numerous duties that have been laid upon it, those of certification, of deciding what is to go to conciliation after the negotiations have broken down, of dealing indirectly with adjudication, and a whole host of other responsibilities and duties. I still have a strong feeling that the board will encounter a great deal of difficulty in the practical working out of its functions. Since we were dealing with a field which had not been previously tried it was thought wiser, after drawing these difficulties to the attention of those responsible, to hang one's doubts on the clothes line for the next year or two and see how the staff relations board works out in practice.

My colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre shares these doubts and reservations. I am still very unhappy over the lack of appeal open to an employee dismissed for alleged security reasons. The old section of the Civil Service Act was brought into a companion bill without, in my opinion, sufficient amendment. It is true that after some discussion a provision was inserted providing for a hearing, although the details of that hearing are not put into legislation. This is somewhat of an improvement. I still feel deeply unhappy, however, about the fact that anyone can be dismissed for any reason without being able to appeal to some independent body and have his day in court. We did not press this much further than the amendment we obtained, and which now provides for a hearing, in the hope that the cases will be so infrequent and the actions of the authorities will be so definite and well grounded there will be no injustice in fact.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think I have covered the points I wanted to make. I want to deal with only one final point. After a great deal of discussion about political activities of public servants we were finally presented with a proposition the fullness of which is found in Bill No. C-181 but which leaves us in this party dissatisfied. I have never been able to understand, and I cannot understand now why, subject to certain exceptions, the public service employees should not enjoy the full political freedoms and rights that other citizens of the country enjoy. I just cannot understand it.

I was disturbed beyond words, Mr. Chairman, last Wednesday when I met with a group of the leaders of the public service of Canada and discussed this question of political rights. A leading spokesman said at that meeting that one of the reasons public service employees are not particularly anxious about political rights is not that they do not want them but that many civil servants are afraid that if they are given political rights some of their superiors will demand that they exercise them in a certain direction. Apparently there is a fear about this in the public service which must be widespread. I cannot say from my own experience that this is so, but it must be widespread or this particular gentleman who holds an extremely important position in one of the public service organizations would not have made that statement in the presence of 90 or 100 other leaders of public service employees.

I regret there is this fear amongst employees of the federal government that if they are given such rights some misguided superior, some irresponsible superior, will insist that they exercise those rights in the direction of one political party or another. I am not saying this merely to be friendly or courteous, but if that is the case I am sure it is not the fault of this government or the immediately preceding government, although I am equally sure it is the fault of governments in the past when patronage controlled appointments and promotions in the civil service. This tradition has persisted, and I think it is shameful that it should continue.

One of the ways to remove this fear is to give the people concerned full political rights, and give them protection. In some ways this bill does give protection against discrimination for exercising or failing to exercise political rights. I want to emphasize before this committee, as we had occasion to emphasize again and again before the special joint committee, that those of us who urge full political rights for public service employees are not saying the bill should require them to belong to a party or support a party. This is not what is before parliament or the public service employees. What is before us is the removal of an inhibition that the law previously contained. Civil servants will be as free to be just as apathetic about their political duties as the rest of the people of Canada so frequently are. There would be no compulsion that they exercise the rights which would be given. There would be provision merely that if they wanted to exercise them they could do so.

The proposal which was made to us and which is contained in Bill C-181, Mr. Chairman, contains one absurdity and one humiliation. The absurdity is that this proposal provides that a public service employee may make a contribution to a political party or attend political meetings but he is prohibited, not in so many words but in the total provision, from being a member of a political party. Later one finds he is permitted to apply to the public service commission for permission to be a candidate for a political party. I do not know very much about the constitution of other parties in this parliament, but I would be very surprised if the Liberal party, the Conservative party, the Social Credit party, the Ralliement Créditistes or the independent party, if there is one, were different from the New Democratic Party on the point that before you can be a candidate you must be a member. Certainly our constitution provides it. I am told the Conservative party constitution provides that, and I would be surprised if the Liberal party constitution did not have a similar provision.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted for his speech has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I am prepared to agree, but I venture to suggest the hon. gentleman should confine his remarks to this bill. Some of us want to make speeches on the subject he has been discussing, but we are waiting until the next bill is before us.

Mr. Lewis: There is a reference to this matter in this bill. There is a reason for my speaking about it now, and that is that I may not be here when the other bill is before the committee. I admit frankly it would be more in order to discuss the matter then, although I disagree it is not in order now. I will not be very long.

If a political party requires that before you can be a candidate you must be a member of that party, I should like someone to tell me how the right to be a candidate which is now being extended under certain conditions means anything, if the public service employee is not permitted to become a member of a political party. I hope before this bill leaves committee of the whole we will close the gap in this absurdity. If we really intend that public service employees have the right to be candidates under certain conditions, we will give them the right to be members of political parties. Otherwise the right to be a candidate is a sham and meaningless.

The other point I was going to raise, and I will do so very briefly, was that I still think it is absurd and humiliating that every public service employee, no matter how lowly his job, no matter how lowly his responsibility, must go to the public service commission for permission to be a candidate in a federal or provincial election. I could not see any reason for this humiliation when the special committee met and I cannot see any reason for it now.

Despite the reservation I have expressed, and subject to one or two amendments we shall try to propose in this committee of the whole, we are very happy with most of the very important changes that have been made in the bill. I trust that Treasury Board, the officials, the president of that board and the government will conduct themselves as employers in such a way as to make collective bargaining in the public service a reality and a benefit to the employees of the public service, to this parliament and to Canada.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, while not having had the privilege of serving on the committee that dealt with the legislation now before us I must say that, having watched the progress which has been made, and upon examining the bill before us which has been amended, reprinted and reported by the joint committee, can only be impressed by the tremendous amount of constructive work that has been done. For this the committee is to be commended; certainly the bill now before us is much more satisfactory than the original one. Likewise, Mr. Chairman, we would express our appreciation of the fact that the President of the Treasury Board has stated here today that it is the policy of the government to accept the various amendments which have been agreed to in committee.

I wish to speak on a very limited area of this legislation today. I believe that, apart from this general area, most of the amendments that have been made and which improve this bill meet with the approval of the members of this party. Nevertheless I am inclined to say something which I think is basically important about which the bill does not satisfy us, and in regard to which in my opinion there must be further amendments to strengthen the bill.

The hon. member for Carleton referred to the fact that he intends to move a conscience clause. May I say that we in this corner of the house will give our fullest support to such an amendment, because it is imperative that it be included in the bill. While the bill does set out very clearly the right of public servants to collective bargaining, unless this particular aspect is properly taken care of in this legislation I think this provision will work a very grave injustice upon many members of the public service and will thus be detrimental to the service itself.

It is in this vein that I should like to continue my remarks, and I begin by posing several questions which I think must be answered. What really is the meaning and actual scope of freedom of assembly, freedom of association and freedom of religion as declared in the Canadian Bill of Rights? What is the result of allowing the employer and the union, the employee organization, to include in a collective agreement a provision which in effect intimidates and/or threatens and/or compels an employee to continue to be a member of an employee association?

I would further ask, Mr. Chairman, what protection does the government offer to civil servants who for various reasons, religious or political, cannot in good conscience join with and financially support a particular employee organization? Does it mean that one only has the freedom to do what the majority tells one to do? What does freedom of association actually mean as far as the bill of rights is concerned if compulsory membership in an employee organization is a requirement of this bill?

I would further ask whether the government intends to issue an order to all its employers, its agencies, boards and commissions should this bill become law as it is presently framed, instructing them to safeguard Canadians rights to freedom of association, freedom of religion and freedom from coercion, compulsion, discrimination and intimidation. While this may seem to be a very minor aspect of this bill, Mr. Chairman, it is of vital importance to the well-being of all Canadians and to the perpetuation of the traditional way of life that we in Canada regard as so important.

I should like to refer very briefly in this connection to the provisions of the Canadian Bill of Rights. The preamble to the act reads:

> The parliament of Canada, affirming that the Canadian nation is founded upon principles that acknowledge the supremacy of God, the dignity and worth of the human person and the position of family in a society of free men and free institutions;
> Affirming also that men and institutions remain free only when freedom is founded upon respect for moral and spiritual values and the rule of law;
> And being desirous of enshrining these principles and the human rights and fundamental freedoms derived from them, in a bill of rights which shall reflect the respect of parliament for its constitutional authority and which shall ensure the protection of these rights and freedoms in Canada:

It was on this basis that the bill of rights was enacted, Mr. Chairman, and everyone in the house at the time voted in support of it. There are a few sections of this act to which I should like to make reference as they relate to this particular problem that the bill before us presents. Section 1 in part I reads as follows:

> It is hereby recognized and declared that in Canada there have existed and shall continue to exist without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex, the following human rights and fundamental freedoms, namely,
> (a) the right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property, and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law;
> (b) the right of the individual to equality before the law and the protection of the law;
> (c) freedom of religion;
> (d) freedom of speech;
> (e) freedom of assembly and association:

That last provision is the one which gives me concern for this bill, Mr. Chairman. Freedom of association also carries with it the implication that there shall be freedom not to associate. It was former Governor General Vincent Massey who said:

> Freedom always faces dangers. A free people remains free only through daily acts of courage. A nation's bravery in war cannot atone for timidity in time of peace. We deny our freedom if we do not speak when there is something to be said.

It is support for this thought that causes me to speak in this vein today. We want loyalty and dedication in our public service, and I believe we have it now. I would agree that we have one of the finest public services of any free country in the world. As Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

Freedom breeds loyalty. Coercion always was the mother of rebellion.

I believe that if we are to preserve the loyalty and perpetuate the dedication that we have in our public service at the present time we must be very careful to enshrine in the legislation that we pass in this house basic freedoms which, in my opinion, would include the right of freedom to associate as well as freedom to dissociate.

• (12:30 p.m.)

I mention another thought in this regard. Section 2 of the Canadian Bill of Rights says:

Every law of Canada shall, unless it is expressly declared by an act of the parliament of Canada that it shall operate notwithstanding the Canadian Bill of Rights, be so construed and applied as not to abrogate, abridge or infringe or to authorize the abrogation, abridgment or infringement of any of the rights or freedoms herein recognized and declared,—

Section 3 says:

The Minister of Justice shall, in accordance with such regulations as may be prescribed by the governor in council, examine every proposed regulation submitted in draft form to the clerk of the Privy Council pursuant to the Regulations Act and every bill introduced in or presented to the House of Commons, in order to ascertain whether any of the provisions thereof are inconsistent with the purposes and provisions of this part and he shall report any such inconsistency to the House of Commons at the first convenient opportunity.

I ask the President of the Treasury Board whether this legislation has been referred to the Minister of Justice, to comply with the section of the bill of rights I read. Unless we have the assurance of the Minister of Justice that the provisions of the bill before us are consistent with the bill of rights, we have failed in our examination of this bill.

I urge that before this bill is given final passage we refer it to the Minister of Justice. The bill of rights was passed; we support it as being right. This bill should be consistent with the bill of rights especially with section 3 of part 1 of the bill of rights. I ask that the present bill be referred to the Minister of Justice. We want him to see whether clause 8(2)(c) is consistent with section 3 of the bill of rights. It is vitally important.

[Mr. Thompson.]

I draw the attention of the committee to another important declaration of human rights. Last December I was privileged to be at the United Nations when the universal declaration of human rights was given final passage through the assembly. The United Nations had worked on this matter for 20 years, in draft form. It had been the basis of the agreement that each country made when it became part of the United Nations. I do not intend to go over the entire declaration of human rights; that is now part of the constitution of the United Nations in its final form. I merely want to refer to one or two sections. The preamble says:

Whereas recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world...

Whereas member states have pledged themselves to achieve, in co-operation with the United Nations, the promotion of universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms—

Article 1 says:

All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights.

Article 18 says:

Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience, and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance.

I mention clause 18 because it is a conscience clause, and relates to clause 8(2)(c) of the bill before us.

Article 20 says:

(1) Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and association.

(2) No one may be compelled to belong to an association.

If this legislation compels every member of the public service to belong to a specific or specified association, it contravenes article 20 of the universal declaration of human rights.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question? He refers to clause 8(2)(c); I take it he has it in front of him. Does not that clause protect the right of any employee either to join or not to join an employee organization?

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, as I read the clause I cannot agree that it gives adequate protection to join or not to join. I am confused about one part of the clause. I do not want to become involved in a clause by clause discussion at this time; that will come later, but the point concerning me is this. Clause 8(2)(c) says:

(c) seek by intimidation, by threat of dismissal, or by any other kind of threat, or by the imposition of a pecuniary or any other penalty or by any other means to compel an employee

(i) to become, refrain from becoming or cease to be—

The next sentence which is very confusing says:

(ii) except as otherwise provided in a collective agreement—

Mr. Benson: "To continue to be."

Mr. Thompson: That is very confusing.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member should read the rest of the sentence.

Mr. Thompson: I should be glad to do so. It says:

—a member of an employee organization, or to refrain from exercising any other right under this act;

We shall debate this in detail, but as I read this it does not in my opinion protect a public service employee who does not wish to belong to the public service organization specified in the collective agreement.

Mr. Knowles: Does not that very clause make it clear that even a collective agreement cannot compel an employee to become a member of an organization? The most a collective agreement can do is to guarantee that those who have already become members voluntarily shall continue to be members.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It does not cover the Rand formula.

Mr. Thompson: We shall discuss this in detail later. There have been a number of instances this past year, with respect to collective agreements which lead me to believe that unless these freedoms are spelled out more specifically than they are spelled out here we shall leave ourselves open to the very things I fear and to which I have referred. This matter may be debated more fully at another stage.

My answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is this. I do not think the clause does what he says it does. For that reason I drew the attention of the committee to the human rights declaration, and I now refer to article 23, which says:

Everyone has the right to work, to free choice of employment, to just and favourable conditions of work and to protection against unemployment...

Everyone has the right to form and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests.

From this article I draw the inference that an employee also has the right not to join any such organization. That is the aspect I stress, and I want this bill to protect that right of not joining. Before this bill passes I believe hon. members should scrutinize it carefully to make sure it gives protection to public servants and enables them to join the association of their choice. There are one or two aspects of this question which I think will be adequately covered in the conscience clause, and we shall wait to see the amendment which the hon. member for Carleton has said he intends to move in this regard.

There is precedent for such protection. One of the most far reaching legislative provisions in Canada in this field was passed in the province of Saskatchewan last summer. I refer to the Trade Union Act which was amended by a provincial statute in 1966 and became effective in that year. The hon. member for Carleton has already mentioned it. I would also point out that in the conciliation and arbitration act of 1954, New Zealand makes a similar provision. Likewise the Commonwealth of Australia includes a similar provision in its arbitration act. There is therefore definite precedent for including a conscience clause in this legislation.

I had not intended to refer to political activity as far as public servants are concerned, but the hon. member for York South mentioned the subject and I should like to make one or two statements with regard to it. I believe that within the bounds of discretion and good judgment no Canadian should be denied the right to take part in political activity. It is therefore important that we do not deny such rights to those who are engaged in the public service.

Importance attaches to the way in which this matter is dealt with in the bill, because it came to my attention last week that certain people presently in the employ of the federal government are being told they cannot hold their present jobs because at one time or another in the past they have been candidates in a federal election. If the committee wished, it would be possible to provide evidence of this. I am thinking specifically of cases where members of the farm credit appeal boards in the various provinces have been dismissed on the ground that they stood for political office in the past. This is not something that happened in the old days of patronage. This happened last month, and it is the kind of thing which cannot be tolerated.

On the other hand there is another danger in this regard. I received a communication last week from a gentleman in British Columbia who is currently a paid up member of the Public Service Alliance of Canada. He says that recently a P.S.A. convention overwhelmingly endorsed a recommendation to affiliate with the Canadian Labour Congress. In the December, 1966 issue of the Argus Journal it is stated on page 1 that affiliation with the C.L.C. will cost the Alliance 10 cents per member per month. Since the Alliance has over 100,000 members this means that about $120,000 a year will be funnelled out of the Alliance into the operation of an education program for the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Knowles: Does the hon. member believe that?

Mr. Thompson: It is not a question of believing it; the evidence is here. Look at the Argus Journal of December, 1966 if you do not believe it. One listens to these platitudes about protecting the rights of the individual as far as political activity is concerned, but when that political activity means belonging to a public service association which requires its members through a compulsory check-off to make donations to one political party, I should like to know where the freedom is.

Mr. Lewis: On a question of privilege, if I am in order; if not I will sit down. I should like to inform the hon. member that the statement he has just made is simply erroneous. The Canadian Labour Congress is not affiliated to the New Democratic Party. It makes no financial contribution to any political party, and it is understood under the constitution of the congress that this is the case. It is also understood in the Canadian Labour Congress as a whole that public service employee associations, whether federal, provincial or municipal, are not themselves to be affiliated to any political party. I might further point out that in the bill before us there is a provision which would decertify any public service employee organization which affiliated with us or sent money to a political party, and that this clause in the bill was supported unanimously by the special joint committee which, of course, included the two members of this party who were members of that committee.

[Mr. Thompson.]

Mr. Thompson: I am grateful for that statement, but I repeat for the record that in the December issue of the Argus Journal it is stated on page 1 that affiliation with the C.L.C. will cost the Alliance 10 cents a member. This man who has written to me says:

> I strongly object to paying this 10 cents toward the education costs of a political philosophy of a socialistic party which I do not support in any way.

This is a simple fact, whether or not the hon. member for York South makes the statements he does, and I wish to make sure that public service employees are protected from this sort of thing. I shall not continue much further. I emphasize this point mainly because of my desire to make sure that the legislation does contain adequate protection for our public service employees, that the rights of individuals will be respected with regard to arrangements for association, and that the rights of minorities will also be protected. It is imperative that this legislation contain within itself recognition of the constitutional rights of civil servants to freedom of association and of religion, and that it guarantee to public servants freedom to join the organization of their choice, as well as providing that they will not be required to support any organization as a condition of employment with the federal government.

Having said that, I repeat that all in all this legislation represents a tremendous improvement over the original draft, and that we shall give our support to it, subject to the reservations I have made and our right to consider further amendments which may be made. We think the measure represents a tremendous advance compared with the situation which has thus far existed.

Mr. Chatterton: My remarks will be brief. I too wish to commend the hon. member for Ottawa East and his parliamentary colleague from the other place on the manner in which they conducted the meetings of the committee on the public service. Even if I am patting myself on the back in the process I should like also to commend all the members of the committee on the manner in which they conducted the business referred to them by the house. The fact that so many amendments were accepted and agreed upon by the committee illustrates the attitude of the members of that committee. Let me pay tribute to the staff associations for the excellent service they performed for the committee in the briefs they presented.

• (12:50 p.m.)

Before continuing my general remarks I should like to refer to a statement just made by the hon. member for Red Deer relating to membership as provided for in Bill C-170. Under this bill no one can force an employee by any means to either join or resign from an organization. Even the collective agreement cannot force an employee to join an organization. If the employee had been a member of an organization then the collective agreement can require him to continue, but even the collective agreement cannot force him to join. It can force him to pay dues.

Mr. Leboe: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. gentleman a question for clarification? What is the situation in respect of the payment of dues to these organizations?

Mr. Chatterton: Yes, as the bill now stands it does not prevent the collective agreement from requiring the payment of dues, but it does prevent any person from being made to join the organization. I wanted to clarify that point, which the hon. member for Red Deer did not seem to have clear in his mind.

In the very few moments left to me I should like to point out some reservations I have and which have been expressed to me by a number of people. These reservations relate to the provisions of this bill which will give the right to certain groups to elect to strike. In 1965 when the postal employees went on strike they had the general sympathy of the public, mainly because they had a justifiable grievance. However, I submit that if the postal strike had taken place last year the public may not have had the same sympathy for them because of the great number of strikes which affected the whole of the country last year.

A great number of people have expressed concern that by a government bill groups of public employees are to be given the legal right to strike. In my experience in relation to teachers, firemen and policemen who have been given the right to compulsory arbitration I have found they benefited very greatly, in many cases more than comparable organizations which had the right to strike. Let me express the concern of a great number of people regarding this right. I recognize that the governor in council has the right to declare that certain groups performing essential services will not have this right.

Mr. Benson: The ultimate decision as to groups or individuals necessary for the safety and security of the nation rests with the P.S.S.R.B., not with the governor in council.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It is not the nation, it is the public.

Mr. Benson: That is right.

Mr. Chatterton: There is that provision, but postal employees may not be classified in that category though naturally we cannot assume that. There is some concern in this regard, and I would urge the bargaining agents who elect this course of action to use extreme caution because there is a feeling among the people of Canada about this right that is now being legally given to certain groups of public employees. I surmise that very few groups will elect this course, but just the same the legal right is to be given under the provisions of this bill.

Since remarks have been made about the other two bills, C-180 and C-182, I should like to express very serious reservations about the right of the public service commission to hear appeals. I am satisfied that the public service commission will deal with such appeals in a fair and equitable manner, but that is not the point. The principle that an appeal shall be made to the body which makes the decision in the first place is one which will create the feeling among people that they are not getting a fair deal. This involves the principle that it must not only be fair, it must appear to be fair. A great number of civil servants have expressed some reservation regarding the fact that any appeal from dismissal or demotion will have to be made to the body which made the first decision. I hope even at this late date the minister will consider a provision to set up some other tribunal to which such appeals can be made.

I do not wish to repeat some of the arguments presented to the committee, but civil servants generally are apprehensive about this bill because of the mix-up in reclassification and red circling. The majority of civil servants think of this bill in the same context as the bargaining bill.

Another part of the bill which disturbs me a little, and the minister should be aware that this may cause trouble, is that part relating to certification of bargaining units. It is true that the committee approved a very important amendment to the effect that the board will have the right to change the bargaining unit to the occupational group that is approved by the public service commission, but the effect of these artificially set up bargaining units will disrupt organizations that have performed a very useful service for many years. For example, the custom and excise officers' association has been actively serving its members for the last 30 years, and it is most unlikely that this association will be allowed to continue as the bargaining agent.

We will support this bill, Mr. Chairman. I hope that after a year or so of operation the minister will take another look at it. This is a new attempt to do by legislation that which has been done in Great Britain by use and custom. The minister should keep a close watch on its operation and consult frequently with representatives of the public service with a view to making changes as they become necessary to the efficient operation of this very complicated measure.

Mr. Knowles: May I call it one o'clock?

The Deputy Chairman: Pursuant to an order made on February 3, I do now leave the chair. The committee will resume at two o'clock.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The committee resumed at 2 p.m.

The Chairman: Order. House again in committee of the whole on Bill C-170. When the committee rose at one o'clock we were discussing clause 2 as amended and reported by the special joint committee on the public service of Canada.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, it is hardly necessary for me to take time to offer compliments to all those who have worked on this bill. The compliments were well expressed by those who spoke this morning. However, since every other member who has spoken on clause 2 has handed out compliments, were I not to do so it might be thought that I did not also feel the same way. Just about everyone except the parliamentary secretary to the minister has been complimented concerning the work that was done in the committee. I think he should also receive honourable mention. As a matter of fact I do not know what we would have done without him in those interesting moments during our deliberations when we wanted to know what "they" would agree to. We were never told who "they" referred to, but it was always uttered as though "they" was spelled with a capital "T". He performed that role very well.

I suppose it could be said that I am doing what it might be expected I would do if I add one other name to the list. I think my colleague, the hon. member for York South, deserves mention particularly because of the way in which he brought his lengthy experience as a labour lawyer to bear on the work of the committee which dealt with Bill C-170, Bill C-181 and Bill C-182.

I should like to take another moment to join with those who this morning referred to what we have done with regard to this legislation as an outstanding example of the value of committee work. I think there is no question but that when Bill C-170 in particular was first brought in there were many misgivings about it in the ranks of the public service. I think, however, it is equally fair to say now that public servants generally would like to see this legislation as we have amended it put into effect and given a trial. As I say, this indicates the good job the committee was able to do.

I should like to remind hon. members present that the committee met under considerable difficulties. For example, such major pieces of legislation as medicare and the old age pension supplement were being debated in the house during the time our committee was in session, which meant that on many occasions we had to leave the committee room or suspend meetings because of interest on the part of members in debates taking place in the house. In case this is not recognized as the commercial that it is, it is a plea for doing something to the rules and procedures of this house so that committees can have an opportunity to sit and do a job on legislation at periods when the House of Commons is not sitting. If we could do as good a job under the handicaps we faced, I would say we could have done an even better job had we had fewer handicaps. I think this is a lesson that some day we in the parliament of Canada have to learn.

Speaking of the special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the public service of Canada, I am also glad that the President of the Treasury Board referred this morning to the fact that the committee is still meeting and dealing with an additional term of reference, namely, the pensions of retired civil servants. I hope it will not be very long before the committee agrees to and brings in a report on this question. I feel confident that the committee will make a worth-while recommendation, and I trust that when it does the government will act on that recommendation with dispatch.

I agree with those who this morning said there might have been other ways to approach this problem, that we might have considered amending the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act in such a way as to bring civil servants under the provisions of that legislation. I agree also that we might have given consideration to a separate régime for employees in the public service who would prefer to be under some other legislation than this. But I think it is fair to say the concensus now is that we have sufficiently improved this legislation that it is worth a try. I hope, therefore, it will not be long before it is in effect. In fact, I trust that the deadlines in the legislation itself can be maintained.

Having said that we did improve the legislation in a good many respects, even at the risk of repeating something to which reference was made this morning I should like to pinpoint perhaps the most significant improvement that was made in terms of making this a genuine collective bargaining bill. I refer to the change that was made in clause 36. That clause as it was first brought in required any employee organization that wished to be certified for collective bargaining purposes to indicate before it was certified which of two courses it would follow, conciliation with the right to strike, or binding arbitration. We felt it was most unfair to require this decision to be made in advance and also to be made with effect for a period of five years.

We heard representations about this matter, we argued about it back and forth, and without bothering to take time to say who should get the credit for what was done, the fact is that we now have in clause 36 a provision that says an employee organization, a bargaining unit, does not have to indicate the course that it wishes to follow as between conciliation with the right to strike, and binding arbitration, until it has given notice to bargain. It is also provided that, this choice having been made, it applies just on that one round of bargaining and the carrying out of the contract arrived at at that time. I think this is a very significant improvement and it highlights the fact that the bill has been improved. I have no hesitation in commending the government for having agreed to this important change in the bill as well as to other changes that were proposed.

As my colleague the hon. member for York South has pointed out, there are still some weaknesses in the legislation and we hope that even yet we may get a small amendment passed here and there. If we cannot get that, we hope we will receive some fairly firm undertakings from the President of the Treasury Board on behalf of the government of Canada as employer. As my colleague pointed out, some of the areas that still concern us include the exclusions that are in the legislation, both the exclusions as to subjects that are under collective bargaining and exclusions as to persons.

As I say, we would like to see improvements in the actual wording of the legislation, but if we cannot go any further in that direction we hope that at least we will have some pretty clear statements from the government. We also hope that another look may be taken at the clause in one of the bills that has to do with the rights of persons who have been dismissed. We recognize that a slight improvement was made but we think there is room for still further improvement.

In the field of the political rights of a member of the public service, we recognize that the place for any extended discussion of this matter is on one of the other bills. But in the meantime we hope the government will think about the difficult and rather ridiculous position in which a person in the civil service is placed when he is told he can become a political candidate in an election but at the same time is told that as long as he is a civil servant he cannot join a political party. It makes me wonder how the Prime Minister and a few others over there who were civil servants got the nomination of the Liberal party.

Mr. Benson: They did not have to be members.

Mr. Knowles: The President of the Treasury Board says they did not have to be members. That is a strange way to run a political party—

Mr. Benson: That is democracy.

Mr. Knowles: —but I suppose it is what the Liberals call democracy, as the President of the Treasury Board says. If the Conservative party were run like that, my hon. friend the President of the Treasury Board could find himself a candidate for the leadership of the Conservative party without being a member of that party.

Mr. Lewis: Maybe he is.

Mr. Benson: Who knows? I might be yet.

Mr. Knowles: At any rate, my colleague the hon. member for York South and I have agreed, on behalf of this party, that we had the major battle about this matter in the committee, and perhaps there is no point in our trying again to run the whole gamut that was run at that time. But we do hope that consideration will be given to this one point, namely, the right of civil servants to be members of political parties, even if you want to qualify it by saying "members where political parties require such membership in order to be candidates."

The question of the conscience clause has been mentioned several times this morning. Perhaps we can leave that question until the matter is actually before us. Unless I am persuaded otherwise, it seems to me that clause 8 (2) (c) very clearly protects the right of every public servant to join or not join an employee organization. It seems to me that clause makes it clear that if a person chooses not to join an employee organization he cannot be intimidated in any way; he cannot be dismissed or discriminated against in any way.

My colleague the hon. member for York South has reminded me that even the reference in clause 8(2)(c) to the collective agreement having some effect on the provisions of that subclause makes it clear that the only thing which the collective agreement can provide for in this area is the maintenance of membership which has already been taken out. A person who was a member of an employee organization at the time when the collective agreement was reached, and whose membership in the first place was voluntary, can be required by the agreement to maintain that membership, but no person under any circumstances can be required to be a member of an employee organization. I think this is going pretty far when we consider the whole concept of the rule of law and of our obligations to the society of which we are a part.

The time for lengthy speeches on this first general clause, although it is clause 2, does not need to be extended. However, there are a couple of other points which I should like to make, and I will address myself directly to the President of the Treasury Board. He said this morning when he made his speech on clause 2 that the government accepted—I took it he meant that the government accepted without any qualifications—all of the amendments that the committee made to the three bills. This is not surprising because, after all, all the amendments were passed unanimously. There were divisions of opinion in the committee which were resolved by recorded votes, but somehow or other we always lost on such votes. However, the point I wish to make is that the minister said clearly that the government would accept all the amendments that the committee made and which are now contained in the bills before us.

I wish he would speak with equal clarity and likewise without any equivocation with regard to the recommendations that the committee made. I am referring in particular to the recommendations which appear at the end of the report of the committee on Bill C-170. They are to be found on pages 1274 and 1275 of Votes and Proceedings for February 3, 1967. There are two recommendations about which I am concerned. The first is that within six months a special committee should be established to consider the position of those employees excluded from collective bargaining.

The minister will note that there is a special reference at the top of page 1275 of Votes and Proceedings to employees in the higher grades in the civil service for whom there is no provision under the legislation. I thought I heard the minister say to me across the floor that he will have something to say about that later. I am glad he will. But let me impress upon him that we would like just as clear an undertaking about that recommendation as we have been given about the amendments to the bill.

The other recommendation, which has already been referred to this morning by the hon. member for Carleton and perhaps by others, consists of two sentences which appear on page 1275 of Votes and Proceedings and which I should like to put on the record again. They read as follows:

> Your committee has noted that the employees of the Senate, the House of Commons and the Library of Parliament are not included in Bill C-170 but are covered by other Acts.
> Your committee recommends that consideration be given to the introduction of legislation to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, the House of Commons Act and the Library of Parliament Act to extend to the employees thereunder advantages and rights similar to those provided public servants under Bill C-170.

It seems to me that the logic of that recommendation cannot be pushed aside. If the parliament of Canada has reached the point where it is prepared to pass legislation giving collective bargaining rights to all employees of all the departments of the federal government scattered throughout Canada, surely we should extend the same rights to our own employees here on parliament hill. We had a most interesting discussion on this matter in the committee. Various constitutional experts appeared before us, including our own parliamentary counsel, Dr. Maurice Ollivier, the law clerk of the Senate, Mr. Russell Hopkins, and others.

I think we agreed in the committee that parliament is a separate employer and that therefore our employees must be covered by other legislation than that which governs employees coming under the Treasury Board. Nevertheless, surely the principles in both cases should be identical, and I agree with the hon. member for Carleton who said this morning that he thought the minister should already have prepared legislation on this matter. As the minister knows, a day or two after the report was tabled I asked him whether the government was giving consideration to this recommendation. The answer was, of course, that the government was considering it. It has taken us a long time to get collective bargaining for civil servants in general and I hope it will not take us as long to get it for our own employees here on parliament hill.

I do wish to express our earnest hope that the minister will be just as unequivocal in the assurances he will give us about the recommendations contained in the committee's report as he has been with regard to the amendments that have been incorporated in the bills that are before us.

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Chairman, consideration of Bill No. C-170, which has been dealt with in great detail by a special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, has now reached the stage of examination in committee of the whole.

I took a modest part in the discussions of the committee, and I listened with great interest, along with my colleagues the members of this house sitting on the committee, to the numerous briefs submitted.

I wish to congratulate those who accepted to make representations to the committee; these were, for the most part, very well prepared and made in a very capable manner.

• (2:30 p.m.)

This is an extremely important step toward regulating labour problems in Canada, particularly with respect to civil servants. I agree entirely with the views expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) a while ago, regarding employees on parliament hill.

Surely, special regulations should be drafted as soon as possible. We, the members of parliament, are particularly well placed to see the excellent work of these employees on parliament hill, in the House of Commons and in other related services, but we deplore the fact—and I can say this is a unanimous feeling—that there are no specific regulations protecting these employees whose services are so precious.

The act respecting relations in the public service of Canada raises many problems which have been considered and to which the house must find a solution.

I am sure further amendments could be made, and if they tend to improve the bill, I shall make it a point to give them appropriate consideration.

I would have preferred the government to go a little further at times, but this legislation is already a very big step in the right direction, for it gives civil servants certain rights that they never had before or that they had only by tradition, custom or, perhaps, through the government's kindness.

The government, which is the employer, has agreed at last to be treated on the same footing as its employees in the collective bargaining process. I would have been particularly pleased—and I am referring to clause 26 of Bill No. C-170—if the government had gone a little further with regard to recognizing the special interest of certain public service employees.

So far, the government has agreed to propose amendments and the committee has accepted them unanimously, but I hope it does not mean that the last word has been said.

However, the main reason I am rising to take part in this debate is that even though clause 26 does not go as far as my colleagues and myself would have wished, we hope that the Public Service Staff Relations Board, established under clause 11 and charged with the administration of Bill No. C-170, will exercise its powers in a very broad-minded way, taking into consideration present and future needs of groups of employees, so that certification may be granted to separate units having valid reasons for making such a request.

Clause 26—I hope to speak to this clause again when it comes up for consideration—grants this right at all phases of bargaining whereas, in the first draft of the bill, it could only be granted following specific representations made in the second phase. Therefore, I feel this is a great step forward.

I just want to put on record that the board must give a broad interpretation to clause 26 and clause 32, where the former does not apply. And, at this stage, I also wish to say a word about some initiatives.

I would like to take this opportunity to thank all the officials and members of the government who co-operated fully when the bill was being drafted and considered in committee.

[English]

Mr. Richard: Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to speak at length on this bill, but as one who has been the recipient of so many kind words from my good friends on both sides of the house, particularly my good friend the hon. member for Carleton, I feel I should immediately say "thank you" not only for the kind words but for the co-operation the chairman of the committee received during its study of the three bills. As I have said on previous occasions, I am not addicted to lengthy speeches, but I have always believed that legislation affecting the rights of the people, particularly civil servants, should not be approached in any partisan manner. I appreciate the fact that all who were members of the committee took the same point of view. I believe that is the reason these bills came back from the committee much better bills than they were in the first place. Members of the House of Commons from all parties contributed to making them better bills.

I agree with some of the previous speakers that these bills are far from perfect. However, they represent a new approach to public service employment and I hope that after a couple of years' experience we will receive further suggestions for amendments, as a result of which we will be able to create a better climate for employment and conditions of work for employees of the Crown. There were some real difficulties when we came to study certain features of these bills. We were greatly assisted not only by the members of the committee but by those who represented the Treasury Board, the Civil Service Commission and those associations and organizations that presented such well-prepared briefs.

We have what I consider to be good legislation. It is revolutionary legislation and I hope it will be placed in the hands of competent, dedicated officials who will carry out their duties faithfully. At the same time I hope we will have the usual co-operation from the employees and that they will see to it they are represented by officers who understand the spirit and traditions of the civil service.

• (2:40 p.m.)

As I said before, Mr. Chairman, I did not come here to kill these bills. However, I should like to make one comment about what the hon. member for York South said this morning in connection with committees, though this has nothing to do with the bills. I think the time has come when the powers of committees should be enlarged so that when this house resolves itself into committee of the whole to consider a certain bill which has been reported from a standing or other committee less lengthy study will be required and more favourable consideration will be given to the decisions of such committees. I do not say this boastfully but I should love to see the day when at least on certain measures the chairmen of committees would pilot their own bills through committee of the whole. If this were done I think things would go a little more smoothly.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 8—Employer participation in employee organization.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, there are some problems here which are conditional upon an amendment I propose to move to clause 19. I think the minister is in agreement that clause 8 should stand until the amendment to clause 19 has been considered, and then we can return to this clause.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that clause 8 stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

Clauses 9 to 18 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 19—Authority of board to make regulations.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, already today we have had some discussion of the so-called conscience clause. This question was discussed in committee, though not at any great length, but I do know that a great many hon. members have had a considerable number of representations from persons who, on grounds of religious belief or training, conscientiously object either to joining a bargaining unit or to paying dues or assessments to such unit. It seems quite clear to me that under clause 8 (2) (c) there can be no compulsion of any kind upon a person to join a bargaining agent. I think in that respect there is really no problem. However, this bill could contemplate, and indeed does contemplate, the use of the Rand formula whereby all those persons who are within a bargaining unit might be compelled by reason of a collective agreement to pay dues or assessments whether or not they are members of the bargaining agent.

In those circumstances, sir, I propose to move an amendment to this clause which would give the board the power to make regulations of general application to exclude such persons. The amendment I propose to move, copies of which I have in English and in French is as follows:

That clause 19 be amended by relettering existing subclause (1) (l) as subclause (1) (m) and by inserting a new subclause (1) (l) as follows:

(l) the exclusion from a bargaining unit of any employee where the Board finds that such employee objects on conscientious grounds based on religious training or belief to joining or paying dues or assessments to a bargaining unit, provided that such employee agrees to contribute an amount at least equal to the amount of such dues and assessments to a charity or charities approved by the Board.

The formula proposed in this amendment is one which has been used in other jurisdictions. I would point in particular to the trade union act of the province of Saskatchewan enacted in 1965 and amended in 1966. Under that legislation it is possible for someone who states that he conscientiously objects, on grounds of religious belief and training, to joining a trade union or to paying the dues of a union pursuant to the Rand formula, to contribute an equivalent amount to a charity or charities which may be approved by the labour relations board of that province.

What is contemplated by this amendment is that we should carry forward this formula into our legislation and give the public service staff relations board the right to enact regulations which would be in conformity with what has been done in Saskatchewan, with what has been done in New Zealand and also in a number of other places. There may be some hon. members who will say that this applies only to a very few people, that these people will get some advantage from the process of collective bargaining and therefore no attention should be paid to this question. I care not how numerous or how few these people may be. I believe that a distinct and basic principle is involved here. I believe that this continent owes a great deal to religious dissenters, and I believe that in accordance with tradition we should uphold freedom of worship.

I should like to make it clear, Mr. Chairman, that I do not agree with these people at all. I suggest this amendment not because I am in sympathy with the point of view they represent but because I have the firm belief that they have the right to express that point of view. This is what I seek to uphold by this amendment.

I agree that this amendment needs to cover only the payment of dues and that there is probably ample protection regarding membership in clause 8(2)(c) of the bill. But there are a number of dedicated civil servants who will probably leave their employment rather than submit to the payment of dues to a bargaining agent. Therefore I urge the minister, under these circumstances, to leave the question within the discretion of the board. All I am asking is that it be left to the board to work out this difficult problem. If the minister agrees to do this I think the problem will be worked out in a satisfactory manner and that these people, who otherwise might leave the public service in order to assert their beliefs, may be saved.

I appeal to the minister to make this very minor concession. Let me repeat that I believe that religious dissenters have done a great deal on this continent. It may be that the views of present day dissenters in relation to this matter are right and that my views, which are directly contrary to theirs, are wrong. Nevertheless I insist upon their right to be either right or wrong, and I would ask that they be given the right of conscientious objection as provided by this amendment.

• (2:50 p.m.)

[Translation]

The Deputy Chairman: Order. For the guidance of the members of the committee,

I shall now read the amendment moved by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell):

That clause 19 be amended by relettering existing subclause (1) (l) as subclause (1) (m) and by inserting a new subclause (1) (l) as follows:

(l) the exclusion from a bargaining unit of any employee where the Board finds that such employee objects on conscientious grounds based on religious training or belief to joining or paying dues or assessments to a bargaining unit, provided that such employee agrees to contribute an amount at least equal to the amount of such dues and assessments to a charity or charities approved by the Board.

Shall the amendment carry?

[English]

Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the amendment?

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, like most of my colleagues, I listened with great interest not only to the remarks just made by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) but also to those he made when the bill was first introduced. I must say that, generally speaking, I fully agree with him. I agree with his amendment and feel that it shows a broad-mindedness and understanding of certain human aspects which are all to his credit.

Allow me this digression: I hope he will prove as understanding when, in the preparation of legislation, we will deal with issues concerning language and race. You will note, Mr. Chairman, that this is beyond the scope of the matter now under study. I am perfectly in agreement with the hon. member for I believe that according to the democratic system under which we live, we must thoroughly understand those people who, through religious convictions or conscientious scruples, cannot freely adopt or obey certain technical legislative provisions such as the one now before us.

So, Mr. Chairman, I shall support this amendment, and even at the risk of being out of order—although my impression is that this is conformable to the bill—I believe that this is probably a case where emphasis or insistence cannot hurt.

In any case, the amendment is related to this clause 19.

Something else worries me, Mr. Chairman. If I am out of order, do tell me, and I shall deal with it under another clause of the bill. I note that this board can set up regulations, for instance, concerning the determination of units of employees appropriate for collective bargaining and in paragraph (c) the certification of bargaining agents for bargaining units and the hearing of applications.

I heard, a while ago, part of the speech of my colleague the hon. member for Lafontaine (Mr. Lachance). He referred to the problem which we consider crucial and which I feel comes under this clause of the bill and this amendment. I feel this problem should be covered, because it seems that general instructions have actually been given with a view to setting up on a national basis the bargaining units in some crown corporations directly answerable to the government.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this general principle has some merit and should probably inspire the board. However, certain natural laws are imperious and would seem to apply to particular situations which the amendment presented by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) attempts to cover; incidentally, the amendment has my respect and I intend to support it. These situations would seem to apply precisely to the grievances of a labour organization known in our province as the C.N.T.U. for instance, which cannot accept the establishment of bargaining units on a national basis, regardless of the aspirations of workers.

I therefore feel, along with many of my colleagues, that in such cases, workers should be given precedence over lawfully established boards; they should be the ones to decide who their bargaining agent will be and to which organization they will adhere. I think they should be the ones to decide, if we really believe in democratic freedom as pointed out this morning by the hon. members for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) and York South (Mr. Lewis), and also by the hon. member for Carleton as concerns objections raised for reasons of conscience or religion. There could be other equally serious and sacred reasons different from those mentioned in this house and I feel that the C.N.T.U. has put forth a fundamental reason. Even though it is not recognized in all areas of labour and federal administration, the fact remains that some workers—I am referring here to Quebec workers but if I had the time, I could mention other cases—in other areas of the labour organization might very well have good reasons for not wanting to be assimilated in a national bargaining unit.

I would like to put on record at this stage a very serious concern which, in my opinion, is fundamental and worthy of respect, and which caused certain C.N.T.U. leaders to object to the decision handed down by a government body with respect to Canadian Broadcasting Corporation employees who, according to the board, must adhere to a national bargaining unit. This is one instance where a particular group of workers was forced to accept a bargaining unit which did not suit them.

I have no intention of introducing an amendment, but I want to call the attention of the hon. minister and all hon. colleagues who took part in drafting this bill in committee—and I would like to add my own voice to the chorus of congratulations they have received—to this apprehension on the part of a certain category of workers, which is symptomatic of similar representations which could occasionally be made by other groups. The worker should, in the last analysis, be allowed to choose his negotiating unit, not individually but as a group. If the worker represents a group which is sufficiently large and if arguments as valid as those already submitted are brought forward, namely that the interests of a group of workers in one province might be different at times from those of other workers in other provinces, it seems to me that this group should be certified and authorized to negotiate.

In any case, having made that reservation and having recommended to the minister to try to find a way to recognize the right of some workers to belong to a negotiating unit they have chosen and to select the negotiating agent who, in their opinion, can best look after their interests, I say that I fully support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Carleton, because it simply embodies a conviction as deep-rooted and as sacred as the one I have just mentioned.

[English]

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, the amendment presented to us is similar in content to matters that were considered carefully by the committee during its consideration of this bill. I should like to say that I cannot accept the amendment on the basis that the committee could have proposed such an amendment and it chose in its wisdom not to do so.

I should like to make it clear that nothing in this legislation will obligate or require any public servant to belong to an employee organization. Employees will be free to join employee organizations and will be equally free not to join them. No one's job can be placed in jeopardy because he refuses to become a member of an employee organization, even though that organization has been certified as a bargaining agent and has entered into a collective agreement which provides benefits to all employees in the bargaining unit.

It is true that all employees in an occupational group may be included in a bargaining unit but that is simply to ensure that public servants who do the same kind of work will be treated alike when it comes to their pay and benefits. Without such a requirement equity could not be maintained.

This legislation does not permit a closed or union shop. No person will be obliged to become a member of an employee organization in order to secure employment or to retain his job in the public service. Although most legislation in Canada governing the relationships of private employers to their employees permits the parties to enter into collective agreements which require employees, as a condition of their employment, to be members of employee organizations that have won the right to bargain, this legislation would not permit a collective agreement to impose this kind of obligation on employees. This legislation will, however, permit the parties in bargaining to enter into a collective agreement which provides that all employees must contribute to the employee organization certified as bargaining agent for the employees who benefit from the contract, or to a charitable organization a sum of money equal to the membership fee. This possibility—it is only a possibility because I cannot say that such a provision will in fact be contained in a collective agreement—is based on the formula developed some years ago by Mr. Justice Ivan Rand for the express purpose of protecting employees from being forced to join employee organizations against their will, while at the same time recognizing that the union claim to financial support for the work it does on behalf of all employees in a bargaining unit is a claim which must be respected.

I cannot accept the argument that anything contained in this legislation will cause anyone to be "yoked together with unbelievers". All of us, in any community in Canada, must from time to time work together, go to school together, ride public conveyances together and, if I may say so, be taxed together with other members of the community who do not share our beliefs or hold beliefs that we do not share. This, it seems to me, is implicit in being a citizen. One of the virtues of good citizenship, a virtue firmly rooted in the teachings of Christ, is to show respect and tolerance for the beliefs of others.

I was interested to note in this morning's Globe and Mail—and I think it is very relevant to our discussion—a report of a recent comment on this subject by Mr. Justice Bora Laskin, whose personal contributions to improved and more productive labour relations in Canada have been many and of a very high order. He said, according to the report in today's paper:

> Our society secures to everyone the right to adhere to a religion of his choice and to hold a self-determined political creed.
> It does not, however, give liberty to insist on religious conviction or political creed or both in contexts which the law does not regard as relevant to their free enjoyment and as a ground for thwarting agreements binding on all irrespective of religious or political persuasion. This is presently the case in labour legislation.

I think I may say that Mr. Justice Laskin's views on this matter, as reported in the Globe and Mail, constitute a very eloquent expression of the government's position.

Mr. Bigg: For the life of me I cannot understand why people in the public service should require unionizing of any kind. But if they are to be unionized we should give them at least the minimum protection afforded by the bill of rights.

As I read this bill it provides for compulsory acceptance of an organization as a bargaining agent. We know from the history of the labour movement in this country during the last 50 years that those who sit around the table and bargain with the employer, in this case the government do in the end control every facet of the lives of those who belong to the union, even to the point of their political affiliation. It is my understanding that once this bill becomes law the organization will have the right of check-off by the government of the organization's dues from the wages of employees. At the rate of ten cents a month per employee this will mean that, having regard to the number of employees, a contribution of $120,000 a year will be made for affiliation.

Mr. Benson: Perhaps I might say a word at this point. The amount of dues is a matter for the association concerned and the manner in which they will be collected is subject to bargaining. It is not determined by this legislation. Furthermore, as I have mentioned previously, the closed shop or union shop is forbidden under this legislation.

[Mr. Benson.]

Mr. Bigg: Am I to understand that there will be no compulsory check-off of dues from a man's pay?

Mr. Benson: There could be a compulsory check-off through an arrangement arrived at by bargaining but it is not provided for in the legislation.

Mr. Bigg: This only confirms my suspicions. The bargaining will be done by the organization which represents the majority in the civil service. Those who do not intend to participate fully in that organization will be bound by the agreement made between the government and the organization. This organization will be affiliated with the Canadian Labour Congress.

Mr. Walker: We do not know.

Mr. Bigg: This is in fact what will happen. We know it will occur. I take it that the $120,000 a year will be deducted from the employees' pay and paid into a central fund. So employees would be indirectly, if not directly, supporting a political party which might not be of their choice. Hon. members on our left talk all the time about freedom and the right to bargain in the civil service. Yet they say nothing about this arrangement for compulsory political participation in an organization in which civil servants may not believe. I know there is a prohibition in the bill against political contributions but I do not see how the conclusion can be escaped.

Mr. Benson: Perhaps I should explain—and I am not trying to defend anybody—that the amount of dues required by the bargaining agent will, first of all, be determined by the associations themselves. In the second place, it is forbidden in the legislation that any of these bargaining agents should make contributions to political parties. Third, they may or may not wish to associate with the C.N.T.U. or the C.L.C. If they wish to do so they may pay fees accordingly but I should also point out that the C.L.C. as such is forbidden by its charter to make contributions to political parties. For this reason I do not believe that even indirectly money collected from civil servants will find its way to the aid of a particular political party. Incidentally, this matter was discussed this morning.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. Bigg: That is only one aspect of this situation and I am delighted to find out from the minister that this is so.

I am speaking for a specific purpose. This is perhaps the only opportunity we will ever have to philosophize on collective bargaining within the civil service. This is the place we can try to influence one another with regard to the principle of this measure.

I believe that collective bargaining within the civil service would be unnecessary if we in parliament did our jobs throughly. In the past we have allowed people like postal clerks to drop so far below the average standard of living that they felt forced into the collective bargaining field. Surely there is no better forum than the House of Commons to debate this collective bargaining measure because here we control the pay cheques of about one fifth of the Canadian people, either directly or indirectly.

One of our main jobs is to make sure that Canadians who work in the public service are adequately paid. I cannot help but think this whole question has arisen because we have failed miserably to do our job here. Are we really helping these people by passing a statute with guaranteed rights? The rights to be included in this statute will be both maximum and minimum. We are putting ourselves in a straitjacket by taking away one more of the duties of parliament. By putting the bargaining rights of the whole civil service under one organization I believe we are binding these people and certainly we are binding those who do not think it is necessary to belong to an organization in order to get a square deal from the government.

I think this amendment is only a half way measure but I intend to support it because I want individuals to have at least the right to decide for themselves whether or not they want to join. There should be no compulsion in this regard either by threat of penalty or otherwise. Employees should have the right not to join and still perform their jobs in the public service. I am sure some of them feel that we in parliament will look after their rights. These people should have the right to stand aside and do their duty without any necessity of banding together.

This house has a universal duty to all citizens of Canada to see that their standard of living is as high as possible. We must assure them of a square deal. Surely civil servants would not need bargaining power of the type we are trying to provide through this legislation if they had the right of political association. Any restriction of civil servants in relation to an interest in politics is against the bill of rights, and I speak from some years of experience.

I was employed in a branch of the civil service for 23 years during which time I was not allowed to take an interest in politics. As a matter of fact, in order to become a member of this house I almost had to declare myself a criminal, in the broad sense of the term. Anyone who disobeys the laws of his employer is a criminal in that sense and in some cases the penalties are severe. It should be the right and duty of every person to take an active interest in politics. Members of parliament should keep their doors open to all citizens of Canada and discuss with them their grievances and the welfare of themselves, their families and their community. We should no longer in this twentieth century, approaching our one hundred and first year, deny these people the right to discuss matters with members of parliament.

Some of the penalties now imposed on civil servants who take part in politics are very severe. For instance, they can lose their pension rights. I lost one third of my pension rights until age 65 because I dared take an interest in politics. I mention that only to indicate why I am interested in stopping this kind of thing. We cannot make our laws retroactive in the sense that we cannot undo the harm we have done. I beg hon. members to leave this small escape clause in the bill so that individuals who really feel it is against their principles to join an organization will have the opportunity of making that decision. Again I should like to thank the minister for indicating that civil servants' cheques will not be tapped.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Their pay cheques will be tapped.

Mr. Bigg: The minister has just told me that individuals will not have to join an organization and that their pay cheques will not be tapped.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Under the Rand formula their pay cheques may be tapped.

Mr. Benson: There is no provision for that in the legislation as such.

Mr. Bigg: I am quite sure that eventually their pay cheques will be tapped and in the end some of their money will find its way into the coffers of public organizations to which these individuals do not belong and to which they never intended to give the money.

I think this amendment is only a half way measure because an individual has to pretend to be a conscientious objector in order to obtain his fundamental rights. I do not deny anyone the right to put his neck into a noose but I very much object to making the noose and then forcing him to do so.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister one question. In view of the fact that clause 8 (2) (c) makes it clear that a person cannot be forced to join an employee organization, and also makes it clear that the most a collective agreement can do in this area relates to the maintenance of memberships already taken out on a voluntary basis, will the minister indicate whether it would be possible for a collective agreement to force anyone to pay membership dues if he had not become a member on a voluntary basis?

Mr. Benson: That is possible under a collective agreement but it is not in the legislation. The legislation does not prescribe it, but it would be possible if the Rand formula was adopted under a collective agreement and if the government's and the employees' representatives agreed to it.

Amendment (Mr. Bell, Carleton) negatived: Yeas 23; nays 41.

Clause agreed to.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, at this point I wonder whether we might revert to clause 8 which we stood pending the consideration of clause 19?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 8 agreed to.

Clauses 20 to 24 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 25—Review or amendment of orders.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, clause 25 is one which gives the board power to review, rescind, amend, alter or vary any decision or order. It seems to me that this is a very wide power which under conditions of natural justice ought to be exercised only after notice has been given to the parties who may be involved. This matter was discussed in the committee. The committee took a position different from that which I am now advancing.

I do not believe that unilaterally the board should have the full right to rescind any order or decision without some notice to the parties involved. Therefore, sir, I propose to move that clause 25 be amended by adding the following words immediately after the word "board" in line 41, namely, "after notice to parties affected". The clause would then read:

The Board, after notice to parties affected, may review, rescind, amend, alter or vary any decision or order—

And so on to the conclusion of the clause. I think the reasons for the amendment are obvious.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, this amendment has to do with a matter which was discussed by the committee. I believe the decision of the committee not to amend this clause was based on the opinion given by people who are familiar with the operation of boards such as this that it would cause a good deal of delay in the proceedings of the board in dealing with particular matters if notice had to be given by the board.

Amendment (Mr. Bell, Carleton) negatived Yeas 17; nays 34.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 26 to 35 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 36—Specification of process for resolution of disputes.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, most of what I might have said on clause 36 I said when we were on clause 2, so I shall take only a moment or two of the committee's time. I think it is unfortunate that in the minds of a good many people collective bargaining immediately conjures up the suggestion of a strike. Collective bargaining does not necessarily mean workers going out on strike. In fact, most labour relations are conducted without strikes occurring. However, it was our view that, if we were to give public servants the right of collective bargaining, this right should carry with it the same privileges that are enjoyed by those who have collective bargaining in the private sector. We were disappointed, therefore, when the government brought in this bill in the first place, that although it provided for the right to strike if units wished it, it is provided also for compulsory arbitration and did so in such a way that if that course had been elected it was binding on the unit concerned for five years at a time.

However, as already has been indicated, the consideration of this bill has resulted in compromise and improvements. Therefore, since in its present form the bill is that much better than it was when it was first introduced, we do not propose to move any amendment to this clause. Rather, I wish once again to say a word on behalf of the committee and commend the government for agreeing to the recommendation of the committee, which means that it is now not necessary for a bargaining unit to make its choice concerning which course it wishes to follow until it has given notice that it wishes to bargain and then its choice is applicable for just one time around. This is a tremendous improvement. It now gives public servants in their various groups and categories the right to choose whichever course they want to follow and in particular gives them the right to make the decision at a time when it will be meaningful.

• (3:30 p.m.)

As I said, I believe the committee did a good job in the amendments it made to clause 36 and those clauses which are related to it. I think the government is to be commended for accepting the committee's decision, as I take it the government does.

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, clause 36 defines the process for resolution of a dispute, notice of which shall be given within a specified time limit, and I would like to quote here clause 2 (w) which reads as follows:

"process for resolution of a dispute" means either of the following processes for the resolution of a dispute, namely:

(i) by the referral of the dispute to arbitration, or

(ii) by the referral thereof to a conciliation board;

I would not want to give the impression that I am not joining with all those who have commended the parliamentary committee for drawing up the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I have been rated by the press lately as being critical of those who criticize the government. For once, I have to join the concert of congratulations expressed to the government, which is something unusual in this house. I do not want to appear as though I am not joining the concert, but I would not want to delay the proceedings either by moving an amendment. However, I would like to repeat what I have already said in this house. It seems to me that the referral of a dispute to arbitration, or to a conciliation board, does not solve the problem, because if the dispute is not settled by arbitration or conciliation and if the union concerned does not want to accept the verdict of the arbitration or conciliation board, then their last resort is to go on strike.

The opinion seems to prevail in some circles that a strike is some kind of a picnic for the strikers and that workers should not be deprived of the opportunity to join in. And, as far as those who occasionally criticize strikes, and the over-indulgence in strikes, are concerned, they are often rated as being against labour movements and siding, in a mean and partisan way, with employers. I do not think that is the case, Mr. Chairman.

I have the utmost sympathy for the labour movement. In fact, at times in the past, I have even been on picket lines with certain labour movements engaged in what I thought were reasonable strikes. But, in my view, federal and provincial laws do not provide workers with a suitable mechanism to avoid a greater number of strikes. In too many cases, they are forced to resort to strikes, when they are dissatisfied with arbitration or conciliation. Workers should be given well-constituted labour courts—I am no talking about labour courts made up of laymen or biased people who are necessarily in favour of employers or employees—that would be objective courts of law—and I do not have time to deal with this matter this afternoon—supported by the experience of certain experts, such as statisticians and economists. Those people should be given machinery whereby ultimately they could resort to arbitration courts, particularly when it comes to public service, because most strikes in the public service are made at the expense of the common good and of the population as a whole, and they should be avoided by all means. And I think that workers, if they had their say, if a secret and free vote were called, would indicate that they are in favour of a labour court that would get them rid of that rash of strikes.

A strike is not a picnic for them. It might be that for the organizers. For them, it is funny and it increases their prestige; they have their picture in the newspapers. They are the saviours of the working class. But the worker who does not get any pay for two weeks, a month or two, while his wife has problems of a psychological nature at home because of that, he has had quite enough of that proliferation of strikes. And he is wondering why the government is waiting to create the machinery which will make the strike what it actually should be: a last resort in hopeless situations when all other means have been exhausted.

And I am wondering if there is not a serious failure on the part of the Liberal government or the provincial governments which are so slow in setting up what I call labour courts—they might be called something else, in the bill they are called arbitration boards. But that does not yet cover what I want to point out, that does not solve the problems in a sufficiently final way. The courts I have in mind would go much further. I will refrain at this stage of the proceedings from explaining to the committee my inner thoughts on that matter. But I say it, as I will on every occasion, because I have heard hundreds and thousands of workers, and even labour leaders, say how they are flabbergasted to see that the governments have not set up the required machinery so that, in the last analysis, they would not have to strike as the only way to solve their problems.

Besides too many strikes today are only a way to blackmail the governments concerned. I do not think that it is in the interest of the common good. As a matter of fact, even a large number of workers who are involved in those strikes are beginning to realize that public opinion has had enough.

I am not saying those things to blame necessarily the strikers who must fall into line when the movement gets under way. They undoubtedly realize that in most cases there is no other solution than a strike. On the other hand, because they are personally involved and their own interests or those of their families are affected, they feel that those strikes are costly in the end. And for whom? For those who go on strike. They become the first victims of such a strike and, in most cases, that strike does not bring them any tangible benefits.

Then, I wonder whether something should not be added in the legislation—again, such action might be premature on examination of this bill, since it appears to have gone through a long and complicated procedure, and I am under the impression that most of the members of the house do not wish to delay its passage—that the majority seems ready to try it for a period of one or two years, at the risk of having to introduce amendments next year. However, I submit that among such amendments, one should aim at creating, and this for the public service more than for any other sector, machinery capable of restricting as much as possible occasions to strikes that are ruinous for the workers.

[Mr. Mongrain.]

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister a question before deciding whether I want to make further remarks on this clause. Can the minister tell me whether any other country in the world has a provision similar to clause 36 whereby public servants are given the right to strike, or compulsory arbitration, depending upon their election?

Mr. Benson: So far as I know, Mr. Chairman, this provision does not apply to any other national government. However, I will seek further information.

Mr. Nowlan: I take it then that the minister is including Great Britain, Sweden, Denmark, New Zealand and countries like those which are fairly well advanced in social legislation.

Mr. Benson: I am informed that there is compulsory arbitration in Britain. I am not familiar with the legislation in all the other countries.

The Chairman: Shall clause 36 carry?

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to strike the only discordant note in this chamber. I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Trois-Rivières. I agree wholeheartedly with the majority of his comments about setting up the proper procedure whereby labour disputes may be settled. But as he said, and I repeat, this is perhaps neither the time nor place to develop the thoughts that should be developed on proper procedures to resolve the conflicts that arise between management and labour from time to time. These are natural conflicts because each has its own position to promote and further.

I must say that although I did not participate in the meetings of the public service committee, not having been a member, and thus did not come into contact with all of the briefs which were presented there, I am surprised that the government is proceeding with clause 36 inasmuch as it has commissioned the Woods' Committee study on labour relations machinery and settlement procedures and is awaiting that report which will perhaps give guidelines for more modern labour settlement devices than we have had until now. There is an awakening interest throughout the country with regard to the settlement of labour problems through labour courts and, if necessary, by compulsory arbitration. My information is that the methods used in Great Britain in settling labour disputes go only as far as compulsory arbitration. According to the minister's own words the government is blazing a unique and lonely trail in according the right to strike to public servants in this legislation. To do so before all avenues have been explored in the development of labour settlement machinery is a step that should be considered very carefully and I for one cannot accept it.

Under clause 36 an employee organization can choose whether it wishes to proceed by way of the conciliation procedure and then strike or, on the other hand, agree to compulsory arbitration. My experience of labour disputes has been that employees have obtained substantial benefits through compulsory arbitration. It has been suggested that the postal strike in 1965 was somewhat illegal, and while people go on strike regardless of any legislation the government is to be criticized for presenting legislation with which many people disagree. It is one thing to go on strike illegally but it is another thing to give people the right and the freedom to go on strike.

With all due respect to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, this legislation does not apply to the private but to the public sector. If we extend the right to strike with the left hand—I am speaking symbolically—a right which is not granted by any other country in the world, then surely on the right hand we can take a look at the privileges, benefits and security which compensate public servants for some of the restrictions.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Some of the provinces have given this right.

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, but here we are talking about the federal government blazing the trail in a piece of legislation which perhaps other countries will try to emulate. We are doing this at a time when the whole labour machinery is somewhat unsettled. The province of Quebec, which is the province of the Postmaster General, has already had to face some of the pitfalls which can arise when constructive labour settlement machinery for public servants is not establisehd. I am not against public servants, or against their right to collective bargaining, but I differ with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when he tries to equate the private sector with the public sector.

Various references have been made to different clauses in the bill, which on the whole is a very modern and constructive one, but I am disappointed and surprised that there has not been a little more constructive criticism with regard to clause 36 which is unique. Perhaps it depends on the point of view, but the statements which have been made up till now have consisted of negative criticisms which have failed point out the pitfalls of clause 36.

It has been suggested to me that I should not worry about clause 36 because clause 79 is an overriding clause whereby the governor in council or the board can declare certain industries essential at certain times. Perhaps the minister will comment on this if my remarks are worth commenting on. On the other hand, it has been suggested that if people wish to go on strike they will do so anyway so let us put the right in the legislation. Frankly, I am against giving the right to public servants to strike through legislation. Compulsory arbitration is one thing but the right to strike is an unfortunate blazing of a new trail with which I cannot agree. I suggest that if we are to extend this right on the one hand we should review the privileges and benefits which public servants enjoy on the other and in this way perhaps balance the two because the security and benefits of civil servants may help to offset the restrictions. I do not think the same rules should apply in the public sector as in the private sector.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question? I should like to ask him a question in the interest of hearing from him further as to why he draws such a hard and fast line between the public and private sectors. If the hon. member is speaking about the public interest, is it not true that some work performed in the private sector is perhaps even more crucial than some work performed in the public sector?

Mr. Nowlan: I agree, but, as the hon. member for Trois-Rivières mentioned, we cannot proceed to debate labour settlement devices in all sectors of society. Perhaps I will say something with which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will not agree but it is my belief that there are some sections in the private sector to which I think compulsory arbitration should be applied. For example, the government is the arbitrator in rail strikes and air strikes, as it almost was in the longshoremen's strike in British Columbia.

Mr. Knowles: Will the hon. member permit another question? Even though we may not agree as to what should be done, would he not agree that whatever rules or rights we lay down they should be the same for all people as people, whether they are in the public or private sector, and that any distinction which the hon. member would make would have to be on some other basis?

Mr. Nowlan: This is my point to a degree, that people are people in different areas. In the public sector benefits such as the right to security are granted to employees. Let us consider teachers, a very topical subject right now. I think most school boards would like to give teachers the right to strike or to choose compulsory arbitration. On the other hand, this could be counterbalanced by compensating teachers through regulations with regard to merit pay. This is a very confusing and provocative subject and school boards have not quite resolved their differences with school teachers. These differences should be resolved by agreement.

However, in the public sector certain benefits are enjoyed which do not exist in the private sector. I think that first of all proper machinery should be set up to equate the whole process of the settlement of labour disputes all across the board and the balance should not be upset further by adding to various benefits given to the public sector, such as security, the right and freedom to go on strike which is given to the private sector.

It is not true in all cases that people in the private sector have the same security and benefits as those guaranteed under the public service statutes. Therefore the two sectors cannot be considered in the same way. One cannot treat them equally for one purpose and forget about their difference for another. I am afraid that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre attempted to imply that I am against people. I am the last one who should be accused of that.

I do not wish to hold up the debate on this bill any further but I wish to state that the government is blazing the trail on a new road and should be condemned for opening up this whole new area at a time when it is awaiting the Woods report which might throw new light on the whole subject. In the light of the history of this government, with its convolutions, its digestion of people and previous planks and platforms, it may change its mind in the next three years and realize the folly of its ways. As the minister has remarked, this is a completely new area into which the national government is entering at this time.

The minister, I see, wants to say something, but my remarks will be brief. If you are going to extend this principle and try to equate people completely, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre mentioned, then you should counterbalance it by trying to set up a procedure for public servants that will more nearly equate public servants with those in the private sector than is the case at the present time. As far as I am concerned, clause 36 has elements which are not in keeping with the times in this country and are not in keeping especially with the study the government has undertaken to try to resolve labour disputes. As the hon. member for Trois Rivières said, let us get our procedure settled and not try to continue distinguishing or isolating public servants when we have gone so far in trying to revise their conditions of employment.

Mr. Benson: I should like to correct some information I gave the hon. member at the beginning of his speech. I have now had an opportunity of looking up the information and I find that in France civil servants do have the right to strike. They have this right also in Sweden. In Great Britain, although they do not specifically have the right in legislation to strike, there is no prohibition. Indeed, they have had strikes and slowdowns—

Mr. Herridge: They would not be allowed to strike in Great Britain now.

Mr. Benson: —as my hon. friend has indicated. It is a basic question whether or not civil servants should be allowed to strike. The matter was studied in some depth by the government and by the officials the government has working for it before a decision was made. The decision was made that government employees would be given two paths, binding arbitration or retaining the right to strike. It is assumed also by the government that the vast majority of civil servants will choose binding arbitration. If binding arbitration works well, and I hope it will since this will be a major experiment in binding arbitration in Canada, it may be that the people who have chosen the right to strike will decide that binding arbitration is the better method.

My hon. friend mentioned that we are proceeding on this path while the Woods committee is studying this subject. I believe, however, that it has taken long enough to get a bill for collective bargaining in the civil service into parliament and through the committee. We have been working on this measure for three and a half years. I believe it is time we presented the legislation to parliament and had it passed. If the Woods committee comes up with suggestions which vary a great deal from this legislation, then parliament has the right to change the legislation at that time.

Personally I am in agreement with giving civil servants the same rights as other working people in Canada, including the right to strike if they want to do so. We must bear in mind that if civil servants do ultimately choose to strike, then parliament has actions that it can take if they become necessary in the public interest. I suggest to my friend that he read the submissions of the postal group which was one group that wanted the right to strike. As I understand it, they stated they wanted the same right as other workers in Canada, the right to proceed to a strike, and if parliament then chose to tell them to go back to work they as good citizens would abide by the law. The postal workers said: Do not take away from us what we consider the strongest weapon of labour.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Hochelaga.

Mr. Nowlan: I want to answer the minister, Mr. Chairman, since he was answering me.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Hochelaga.

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Chairman, I was not a member of the committee which studied this bill, any more than the member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan). Therefore, I do not wish to prolong the debate on this section needlessly. On the other hand, I have just heard remarks, from the member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings as well as from the member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) with which I disagree so wholeheartedly that I feel I must express my disapproval.

Of course, it is easy at the present time, because of certain crises which have affected Canada as a whole and certain provinces in particular, to speak of the right to strike as if it were a sort of plague. The right to strike, at the present time, in the eyes of many people, is not very popular. Quite naturally, one goes along with a prevailing trend in public opinion at this time by claiming that the right to strike is above all else, dangerous and that any legislation should first of all protect, or if I may say, vaccinate the public weal against eventual strikes.

I am surprised that the right to strike is not considered in the same manner as most members of this house view other rights which are just as fundamental, such as, for instance, freedom of expression, freedom of speech, and the right of representation. I should like to emphasize here that the right to strike is a hard-won victory by workers and wage-earners.

It is also a fundamental right in a democracy that the right to strike should not be tampered with any more than freedom of expression. I know that some strikes can bring about unpleasant results; I also know that the right to strike can lead to abuse, but I must point out that unpleasant results and abuse can ensue from any of the fundamental freedoms for which members of this house are always ready to fight, except for this one perhaps.

As for me, I find quite natural that this bill should recognize the right to strike as a normal right and it is therefore granted until an exception proves necessary in the case of the public service. They would have us take the opposite view and say that the right to strike is the exception, whereas the rule would be to restrict such right to strike. I feel this latter attitude is unacceptable. The former should prevail and this is precisely what is provided for in the bill we have before us.

I doubt very much that the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) was in order when he tried to have the house believe a minute ago that union leaders were people who toyed with strikes as with some sport, that they benefited from strikes in all sorts of ways, such as having their pictures in the papers while the unfortunate strikers were the ones to suffer from almost every strike. I feel that if the remarks of the hon. member were out of order, any comments of mine would also be out of order but they may be tolerated in view of the remarks of the hon. member for Trois-Rivières.

I feel that an entire concept is being developed in this direction. The member for Trois-Rivières said that he was on the picket lines. I congratulate him for that. I wonder if he ever tried to tell a whole group of striking workers thay they were being victimized by their union leaders at that time.

As for me, I spent twelve years working for a federation of labour unions and I may truthfully say here that I have often seen the majority of a meeting of union members force their leaders to call as strike which they would have preferred to avoid, but not once have I seen labour leaders impose a strike on a meeting of union members who did not want to strike. It is a strange misconception of the psychological atmosphere of the labour movement to suggest that a group of workers can be forced to strike when they do not want to. The workers are marvelously aware of their own interests, and when they do not want to strike they are perfectly capable of realizing it and intelligent enough to make their own will prevail.

• (4:00 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, some of the thoughts that I might have attempted to express have already been put into words by the hon. member for Hochelaga so I will not seek to repeat them. Inasmuch as the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings seemed to make frequent reference in his remarks to my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre, I thought I should like to add a few words to indicate to him and to the committee that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is not alone in this quarter of the house in the point of view that he expressed.

I listened as attentively as I could to the remarks of the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings and it seemed to me that one thing and one thing only emerged quite clearly from his remarks, and that is that the hon. member is against trail blazing. I suppose that that is an understandable position for a Conservative to take, but it is a little sad to see that attitude so rigidly taken by one so relatively young in years and of considerable figure.

I think the hon. member came dangerously close to building a case for saying that he is against people, though I do not think that any one of us in this house who know the hon. member would seriously believe that that is so. However, he was attempting to express feelings that he has, and I think his remarks did reveal that in our society today we are in a state of flux, that there is room for questioning in which particular direction we should go in an increasingly complex society to keep society on the rails, and at the same time preserve the rights and freedoms of individuals. This much I think was revealed by the remarks of the hon. member, and to that extent I give him full credit for voicing his views.

I think that if most of us in this house were honest, Mr. Chairman, we would agree that there is a great deal of room for questions to be asked in this particular field, and that neither in this legislation nor probably in the report that the Woods committee brings in will we have any final and necessarily lasting answers as to how we should proceed in this matter.

At the moment, Mr. Chairman the point at which I differ from the viewpoint expressed by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings is that this is a most opportune time for us to be doing a little bit of trail blazing. While perhaps some of the provisions in this particular area are not ideally what I should like to see, nevertheless I think a little bit of experimenting in this field—if that is indeed what it is—is not something for which the Canadian government should be condemned but rather something which should give us as Canadians cause to be proud that we are prepared to do some venturing and searching into this field, which I think all of us agree is a complicated one, and in many ways fraught with uncertainties.

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, I almost wanted to rise on a question of privilege after listening to the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Pelletier), since I had the honour of being mentioned in his speech a while ago.

Like many others in the province, I was surprised at certain times by our political history, for example when I read in the newspapers that the hon. member for Hochelaga had become one of the guardian angels of the Liberal party, after having renounced his N.D.P. philosophy.

I understood a little better today why people said he looked like a flower transplanted to a climate which did not agree with it too well. He was called some things which I do not want to mention. I have not the same reputation for infallibility as the hon. member for Hochelaga, which he probably earned when he was writing editorials in the Montreal paper La Presse with a vitriolic pen and without giving those he attacked a chance to tell him at least that he was misinformed. However, I should not like to let him say in this house things which are incorrect or, with his well-known intelligence and ability, twist the words of a colleague to give him an attitude which was not really his.

For example, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Hochelaga says that strikes are not popular nowadays, whereas my impression is that they are, on the contrary, quite popular and that those who object to strikes are those who are least demagogic. His attitude proves probably that demagogues do not all wear overalls, and that some are clad in white collars and cuffs, since he now seems to defend strikes by insinuating very cleverly that those who raise questions do so in specific cases, when he says that the hon. member—I have forgotten the name of his riding—and myself ask questions about the right to strike, we do not criticize the right to strike in general and when he says with almost pompous words, in a modest tone, that the right to strike has been earned by costly struggles, we know that too and we do not object to the right to strike in so-called private services or those which could be called ancillary services.

But I still believe that there are some essential services where the common good must come first. To say that, is not, in my opinion, an act of demagogy but it is rather a stand which requires a certain intestinal fortitude since it obliges us to face up to a trend which seems to me quite popular at the present time, that the common good must rank first. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) said earlier: Why are workers not treated on an equal footing? It is simply because all workers do not have equal responsibilities. Even if we wanted to give everybody the same treatment, it would be impossible because they do not all assume the same responsibilities, they are not all placed in the same situations.

Why are judges, for instance, deprived of the right to vote? Precisely because it had been foreseen that objections would be raised in this regard. I could give dozens of examples, but I would probably be ruled out of order.

However, in order to clear up the things which the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Pelletier) has insinuated or fallaciously implied, I would like to say that we do recognize the right to strike in most cases. But we maintain that in the public service there are cases where the common good comes before private interests. For instance, when 100,000 or 200,000 employees threaten to paralyse the economy of a whole country at the expense of millions of citizens, we do not say that the right to strike must be removed entirely, but that some other means should be afforded so that, at least, the possibilities of going on strike would be reduced to a minimum. That is what we are saying and I think our stand is right at the present time. When the hon. member for Hochelaga insinuated that the hon. member for Trois-Rivières would not speak in this house the way he speaks to the workers in Trois-Rivières, to the workers on strike and to their trade union leaders, I invite him to come to Trois-Rivières and he will find that the climate there is not the same as in Hochelaga: we always say the same thing to everybody.

For instance, last Labour Day in the Labour temple in Trois-Rivières, the provincial Minister of Labour, Hon. Maurice Bellemare, myself and the mayor of the municipality appeared before the trade union leaders and I spoke the same way I am speaking in this house.

Mr. Chairman, I am controlling myself a little, for I would have a good mind to recall memories and this may not be the place to do so. Nevertheless, I will not permit anyone to misconstrue the views I have expressed here, which are quite similar to those of my colleague from Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan).

All I want to say is that I do not admit that the commonweal cannot always prevail over the individual interest. In my opinion, the commonweal in the public service cannot be denied; it is a fact that cannot be denied, which is real and which should inspire us. Even though that is not popular in our ridings, even though union leaders or intellectuals who develop labour philosophy, as it is understood now in some circles, in socialist circles, in revolutionary circles, even though it does not please the dilettante writers in the times we live in, I think there are still the rights of conscience which must be expressed.

The commonweal must come before everything. That is why we shall continue to ask all governments concerned to reduce the motives of strike, even in private enterprise, but not to suppress it simply without replacing it. I think that in saying that, I have the right attitude; I probably have a better attitude that the hon. member for Hochelaga. I could refer to half a dozen testimonies but I will mention one, only, that of Mr. Walter Reuther, chairman of an important American union who, a few months ago—I will send the quotation to the member for Hochelaga, for his edification—said:

> It is time governments create mechanisms to prevent labour movements to settle their disputes at the expense of the commonweal, of the whole people.

I did not say that a union leader did. And I could quote half a dozen other similar testimonies. To my mind, to express such ideas is not a matter of making false representations or even of coasting with the tide in order to be popular. On the contrary. I feel that, in so doing, one bucks the current to a certain extent. After all, there must still be some considerations which are more important than that of merely being popular with one's voters.

[English]

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings for entering this debate and for doing such an excellent job of holding the fort while all his leaders, it seems, are out seeking the holy grail of leadership. I suggest, following his excellent intervention this afternoon, that he add his name to the 17 or 18 candidates aspiring for that post.

Mr. Knowles: Elected.

Mr. Johnston: I think the hon. member will find, on the basis of what he said this afternoon, that he will not be without support.

The hon. member also produced a second result this afternoon.

[Translation]

We have now witnessed the second intervention in this session of the member for Hochelaga (Mr. Pelletier). I am pleased to learn that none of the workers in la belle province go on strike on the advice of their leaders. I know, from personal experience, that in British Columbia it is possible for people to strike on the order of their leaders. People do not believe a strike to be necessary, but they go on strike.

[English]

We heard a great deal of fatuous comment this afternoon about people as people. It rings a little false. We must remember the debates we have had in this house, and I think particularly of the special session of parliament that we had to deal with a strike in the private sector that was not in the national interest. We heard this afternoon in this house members of the same party telling us that we should regard people as people, who urged at that time the people involved in that strike to defy parliament itself, and not to return to work if the back to work legislation did not satisfy them.

I am sure the people of Canada listening to the debate this afternoon must groan at the thought of extending the right to strike at this time to the civil service, in the light of the unhappy experiences we have had this past year. We may talk about people as people. I am concerned, as I listen to this debate, with the right of a government to govern. That right was tested severely at the end of August and early in September when we endeavoured to end the strike.

I wonder how possible it would be for a government to carry on in the face of a strike by its own civil service, if the people on strike knew they had the support of a section of the parliament itself, a section which, by itself, would not be strong enough to bring about the collapse of government through the due process of parliament. By the power that is being given to the civil service this afternoon, and through the interlocking connections that exist between the trade union movement in this country and one group of representatives who sit in this parliament, it seems that we pose a very real threat to the supremacy of parliament as we have known it. We have heard a great deal about trail blazing. We may be setting fires in this legislation.

The hon. minister has spoken about the wonderful experiment in binding arbitration. I do not know whether he referred to experiments within the civil service, but he must know that large groups in this country have operated under binding arbitration procedures for many years. I am speaking for example of the teachers groups in my own province of British Columbia. Disputes have been settled by binding arbitration for a long time now.

We have gradually, insidiously, over the past several years in this country—and we are doing that again in this legislation this afternoon—forced ourselves into a situation where only a political party closely tied to labour can govern. That situation has been brought about in Great Britain. One might say, looking at the results there, that when that happens the trades unions and the people involved get exactly what they deserve from their efforts during the years.

At the present time, however, those in Britain who are opposed to socialism, those who hold the political philosophy of the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings for example, can always leave to go to Canada or Australia or New Zealand. But I wonder where our bright young conservatives will go when we have travelled the whole road to socialism in this country.

We hear the hon. member for Comox-Alberni criticize the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings as a young man expressing a Conservative sentiment. But I can assure him that many young people in Canada today resent the gradual loss of freedom, the gradual reduction in incentive which goes with the development of the totally socialist state.

The minister seems proud of this piece of legislation, and it is lengthy and complex, but I should like to hear his ideas as to the possibility of the government being paralyzed as a consequence of some of its provisions. Does he feel that the clauses which come later in the bill are sufficient to override the danger presented by the right to strike being written directly into the legislation?

Mr. Nowlan: My youth has been challenged, and perhaps somewhat exposed and insulted. If I hold tender feelings in common with others of youthful years in the house, then this youthful person throws out the challenge to the hon. member, who personally is a lovable person—and perhaps at the polls at the next election the challenge will be vindicated by the people's decision—that whether he accuses me of blazing trails or being against blazing trails and whether this is done by the youth of the land or by the older or the middle-aged, it is my friend, who may have lived a few more years, who is more hidebound than is this youthful member in his concept of the resolution of labour problems.

I come back to a consideration of the bill in question. I must say I was interested to hear the hon. member from Hochelaga. I suppose we have interrupted the writing of his editorial in the Montreal Star. I hope he was able to bridge the gap between the Star and his comment in this house. But it is not a question of being against trails. I would be the last to be against blazing new trails. It is a question, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni said, of a differing philosophic approach.

The government has already waited three and a half years to get this bill through. No one is against the bill. I think there is little objection to it generally. But having waited so long, what would be wrong about waiting for the Woods report with regard to collective bargaining procedures? Certainly let us go as far as compulsory arbitration. That is as far as Britain has gone and, to the best of my knowledge, as far as any other country has gone. Let us wait for the report to come in before we are faced, perhaps, with the need to reverse decisions we have already taken.

I was interested in the minister's view that all the unions would elect to arbitrate.

Mr. Benson: I said "most of them".

Mr. Nowlan: Well, that most of them would elect to arbitrate, rather than call for a strike. Have they not heard time and time again from the left that labour's ultimate weapon is the strike? This is the weapon which is recognized in the private sector and to me it appears naïve that the minister or his officials would expect the unions to refrain from making use of their ultimate weapon. This youthful member does not follow the logic of their thinking.

I may be youthful in years, but I believe some people are far removed from reality in this country today and unfamiliar with the trails which are being blazed by people who are fed up with the erosion of individual initiative. Talking about philosophy, it appears we have now gone full circle. In the old days, in feudal times, the cry was for individual initiative and individual freedom. People fought against the old laws and their old masters in order to become individuals and express their own individuality. Today the whole trend, leaving aside the question of closed shops and union shops, appears to be completely the reverse. The individual initiative which took centuries to develop is now being restricted and compromised in union bargaining areas, corporations, locals and organized bodies. Individual initiative is leaving the scene, and I think the bill now before us serves to accelerate its departure.

Those who are now employed in the public service joined that service knowing they did not have the right to strike. In return they secured fringe benefits and security of tenure.

Now, upon the initiative of the government as expressed in this legislation, we are extending the right to strike into an area which is relatively new territory and it is for this reason we should consider carefully the implications of the clause now before us.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I should like to say a word or two on this subject before the clause carries. I suggest to the minister that it might be better to let clause 36 stand while we discuss other clauses in the legislation. It seems to me that today, as so often in this house, we find ourselves dealing with important subjects such as this late on Friday afternoon, instead of at a time when more hon. members are aware of what is being done.

Mr. Knowles: Everyone is supposed to be here on Friday.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): That is true, but I believe the planes start to leave Ottawa at 4.10 and it is now 4.30. Members are trying to get home to their families and I, for one, do not hold that against them.

In this clause, however, we are considering a new departure in civil service legislation and in the light of the experience in Canada during the past year I believe we should weigh the consequences seriously. I say this realizing that much of the difficulty in which the government has found itself during the last 12 months has resulted from its failure to negotiate with regard to wage settlements.

Let me refer to the postal strike. I think the government in its efforts to negotiate aggravated the situation and provoked these employees into walking out.

Mr. Benson: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question. I should like to ask him whether or not he is aware that the committee which examined this bill after second reading held 48 meetings and heard from 47 witnesses, and then presented a unanimous report back to the house. Is he aware that any member could have attended those meetings?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I am aware that the committee sat long hours and worked hard, and I know that I might have attended those meetings. Is the minister aware of the fact that I was deeply involved in the meetings of the committee on the transportation bill, which held some 40 meetings and heard numerous witnesses? The transcript of the proceedings of that meeting amounted to something over 3,000 pages.

I am fully aware that the members of the committee studied this question very thoroughly, but that fact does not convince me that I should support this particular part of the bill. This government has found itself in grave difficulty over the past year because of labour disputes, and in my opinion the government's participation in negotiations provoked many of the strikes.

It is all very well for the minister to say that most of the bargaining agents will decide on arbitration, but if he really believes that why do we need this clause at all? Why should there be an alternative? One need only consider the province of Quebec to understand how governments can get into serious difficulty when essential services are tied up. Some time ago there was a hospital strike in that province which had very serious consequences. Today that province is suffering grave educational problems because of teacher walkouts. I am not suggesting these strikes are right or wrong, but their consequences are serious. Students in that province have been forced to hold self-help seminars in an attempt to educate themselves.

I urge the minister to consider the facts very carefully. The committee which studied this bill commenced its sittings nearly a year ago. During that period of time this whole labour problem in respect of strikes has come to the forefront in Canada. I believe that the strike weapon is outdated. If we firmly believe that the people of the world are sufficiently educated to sit down and settle their differences and prevent wars and poverty in various countries, surely we can expect they are sufficiently educated to solve domestic problems. Surely we must believe that world society has advanced to the point that these problems can be negotiated. That being so we should be able to negotiate and settle differences in respect of wages and conditions of work.

Let us face the facts. Last year we faced a threatened strike of air line employees. Some 400 men threatened to tie up the nation's air lines. In fact one group in that association did tie them up. Some 200 men at the Vancouver port practically tied up the whole western economy for some time. The postal strike, legal or otherwise, practically tied up our mail service in those areas where it took effect.

In light of this experience I wonder whether this is progressive legislation. After we pass it can we throw our shoulders back as legislators and say we have done what is best for Canada? I wonder whether our education and ability to be tolerant is keeping pace with developments in the field of scientific research. If we are keeping pace we should be able to settle our differences around a table rather than by strikes which create extreme hardships.

It is time that we in Canada realized that strikes are outdated, particularly when innocent parties are affected and our whole economy is tied up. I am not referring to the small shop operator and his employees who have differences about wages or working conditions. If those employees go out on strike the only people who lose are the employees and the operator. Innocent people would not necessarily be hurt.

On the other hand if we are talking about essential services, strikes can tie up the economy of the country and inflict untold hardships on people not involved. As a result of this bill many of the essential services may elect to have the right to strike. I urge the minister to realize that this is not the time to pass this particular clause. We have just been through one of the worst experiences in our history so far as labour disputes are concerned. Surely this is not the time to give many essential services the right to strike.

Let me say to the minister that when he had occasion to take part in negotiations he did a better job than the Minister of Labour. I am not suggesting that in the rumoured cabinet switch about to take place he should be moved to Labour, but without doubt he did a better job of negotiating than did the Minister of Labour.

I again ask the minister whether he believes that now is the time to give civil servants the right to strike, particularly in view of the difficulties experienced in the province of Quebec and in the rest of Canada in relation to wage negotiations. I ask the minister in all seriousness to reconsider this clause in view of the experience of this country in labour disputes during this last year. Is now the time to adopt this clause? I doubt very much that it is.

It might be that in the years ahead we may reach a point where a clause of this nature could be put into effect. I sincerely think that today the country is neither prepared nor in the mood to accept anything of this nature. Today the country in fact is in a different mood. I should like to refer to a group of people which has been a strong ally of labour on many occasions in the past; that is, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool. This organization presented a brief to the committee on agriculture, forestry and rural development not too long ago urging that now is the time for Canada, wherever essential industries are affected, to adopt a system of labour tribunals to settle these matters in order to avoid serious strikes which can affect our economy. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture last month in Winnipeg recommended that now is the time, when we have reached the stage we have in the development of education and human understanding, perhaps to adopt labour tribunals. The government is moving in the opposite direction.

I do not have any objection to the setting up of bargaining agencies for the civil service. I do think, however, that essential services should be spelled out and that the agencies should not have the right to elect to go on strike if the negotiations have not been successful, because this would result in difficulty for the government and for the economy of Canada as a whole. I agree wholeheartedly with the minister when he says that he doubts very much whether too many of these bargaining agencies will elect to strike. In my dealings with civil servants it has been my experience that they have shown themselves to be responsible in any matter in which the economy of the country is affected. As I have said, I agree with the minister that few civil servants will elect to follow a procedure which eventually would lead to their going on strike. If a vote were taken in the civil service here in Ottawa I doubt very much that they would ask for the right to strike. I am not saying that their leaders would not; I am speaking of the civil servants themselves.

I would like to think that we now have reached the stage in our development when we could negotiate wage settlements through arbitration, particularly in respect of essential services and in respect of operations which have an effect on the economy of Canada. So, once again I ask the minister to stand this clause today, proceed with other clauses, and then deal with this matter after it has had a general public airing. Although it may be true that this matter was under consideration by the committee for quite some time and was aired in the newspapers to some extent nearly a year ago. I do not think that recently it has been brought to be attention of the public generally. I believe hat perhaps it would be wise judgment on the minister's part and on the part of the government to give this subject a general airing in the press for a period of three or four days or over the week end, and then if the minister still is firm in his belief that this should be proceeded with, of course he could do so. This is the manner in which I would hope the minister would proceed now.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, briefly I should like to reiterate a question I asked the minister this morning in the hope that before we close off this debate today we might know whether or not he intends to take action on this over the week end. Could he tell us whether or not he or his officials have consulted with the Minister of Justice concerning whether or not this bill is in keeping with the intent of the basic articles in the Canadian Bill of Rights.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, I can answer the question immediately, if that is the desire of the committee. The bill, before it was introduced in the house, was referred to the Department of Justice in respect of this particular point—as I understand is the case in respect of all bills—and was approved by the Department of Justice. Clause 8 was not changed by the committee.

Mr. Thompson: Is the minister saying that the Minister of Justice has given his decision on the particular point I raised this morning?

Mr. Benson: The Department of Justice.

Mr. Thompson: The Bill of Rights states very clearly that any legislation which refers to the Bill of Rights shall be passed to the Minister of Justice for a ruling as whether or not the Bill of Rights is being transgressed by the legislation.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I doubt that the debate on this bill would have taken the turn it has if at the outset the minister had answered correctly the question put to him by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings. At that time the minister said that in Great Britain there was compulsory arbitration. He left the clear inference that the right to strike was banned. Of course that is not the case. Arbitral tribunals are available in Britain under the aegis of the Whitley Councils and there is no prohibition of the right to strike. There is silence on the subject. Unless we take the position that a strike is treasonable, which I think is unlikely, there is no reason to take the position that the right to strike for public servants is unlawful in Britain today. Under existing legislation in Canada there is silence; there is neither recognition of nor prohibition against the right to strike for public servants.

Those who have suggested this afternoon that in this legislation we are extending recognition of the right to strike are approaching it in the wrong way. What the legislation in effect does is provide a technique for compulsory arbitration and also provide a technique for conciliation. Those who take the road to conciliation retain the right they now have to strike. That is all that is happening under this legislation. This legislation then goes further and in clause 79 gives the right to the governor in council to designate certain employees who shall be called "designated employees" whose duties consist in whole or in part of duties the performance of which at any particular time or after any specified period of time is or will be necessary in the interest of the safety or security of the public.

If the right of the public service to strike would damage the safety or security of the public obviously the governor in council would act under this clause. If my hon. friends who have raised this issue want to go further and say, "All right, we will have compulsory arbitration throughout all employer-employee relations", that is one thing; but I say it is wrong to differentiate completely between essential services in the private sector and the public service. I for one, representing more civil servants than any other member in this House of Commons, am not prepared to have my civil servants made fish, while flesh is made of another group of workers.

I dissociate myself completely from those people who are prepared to say that civil servants do not have the ordinary rights of other citizens of this country. I am as much against the use of the strike weapon as anybody, and of course we all hope that new and modern techniques will be developed whereby strikes will not be necessary. But I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that this principle would have to be general; it would have to apply right across the board. We should not take rights away from and penalize people just because they are members of the public service. In that respect I think this debate has proceeded with the wrong approach, with the suggestion that we are extending recognition of a right to strike where no recognition now exists; in fact, that is not the case and the very reverse situation obtains.

This whole matter was most carefully considered by what I thought was a strong committee. That committee was unanimous in its decision; and I am prepared to accept the opinion of a unanimous committee which gave detailed study to this question rather than the opinion of those who have not read even a line of the briefs or of the evidence presented.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Chairman, I would not want to take too much of the time of the house, but I do want to endorse the suggestion made by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Horner), and if the minister wants to proceed faster, I suggest that he should stand this clause, dealing specifically with strikes, in order to give us an opportunity to take a closer look at it.

Of course, the hon. member says that the committee made extensive inquiries and, as the only member of our party on that committee could not attend all its sittings, being a member of four committees, I believe it would be wise of the minister to stand this clause and to bring it back for discussion on Monday or during the course of next week.

I want to express my confidence in the work of the committee, but I think we are now in a somewhat special situation. In the light of current events and of everything that has happened in the last two or three years, especially in recent months—and I would say mainly in Quebec—I think it is time for legislators to think twice and keep their eyes wide open, because we are being faced today with a systematic series of well organized strikes called deliberately by a power which has infiltrated all other countries. Let us stop hiding our heads in the sand and let us look right ahead. It is a known fact that the favourite weapon of socialism is strikes. Let us face the situation squarely; it is time to think about it. The favourite weapon of socialists, grandchildren of communists, is the strikes they call throughout the country in an attempt to overthrow the established authority and to win their case.

If we consider the general situation, we see the results of our inaction in front of small groups of hard-working socialists, very eager to thrust their opinion on the people. I feel we shall wake up tomorrow faced with the most fantastic revolution Canada has ever known. That is why I am asking the minister to give second thought to this matter.

Today, conditions have changed since the minister embarked upon the consideration of his bill. This is an act respecting employer and employee relations. The employer is the government of Canada and the primary responsibility of the government is the protection not of the interests of a small group or of a large group, but first and foremost of the general interest.

It must be remembered that the end purpose of a government is to protect the general interest.

I have no objection to a group being given certain rights. But, at the same time, the people involved should be told about their responsibilities. Today, some union leaders are only clamouring for their rights, often forgetting their responsibilities.

The hon. member for Hochelaga opened my eyes today, although I was already aware of his advanced and even anti-democratic ideas. As we are still debating here among democratic parliamentarians, I think we ought to save at least what is left of democracy and try to get rid of undesirable elements attempting to destroy that marvellous democracy which our forefathers built at the cost of countless sacrifices.

Do not think, Mr. Chairman, that everybody in the province of Quebec is happy about the strike that is going on. In my own riding, and in many other places, even the teachers are not happy about it. Some teachers are not happy about the dictatorial ways of one Raymond Laliberté. We do not at all approve acts of violence and dissension. We do not deny the right to strike, but we ask the hon. minister to give us the time, through discussion, to create an organization which can lead us out of this depressing state of affairs. Let us create an organization which will allow us to guarantee the rights of groups and, above all, those of the whole population.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it five o'clock.

Progress reported.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, February 17, 1967

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Robert Taschereau, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 17th February at 5.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
A. G. Cherrier
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, before we continue with the consideration of private bills may I announce at this stage the order of items to be considered on Monday. First we will take third reading of the bill to amend the Excise Act. Then we will return to the item before the house today, namely item 47 on today's order paper. Next we will take item 58, followed by item 59. Then we will move to item 83, second reading of Bill C-220, an act to make provision for appeals to an immigration appeal board.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH COURT OF CLAIMS

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni) moved the second reading of Bill C-28 respecting the Canada Court of Indian Claims.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in introducing second reading of Bill C-28 which is entitled an act respecting the Canada Court of Indian Claims I can best sum up its basic principles by referring the house to my remarks which may be found on page 2178 of Hansard of March 3, 1966. At that time we were considering the estimates of the Department of Indian Affairs and I said that the fundamental issue in our relationship with the Indian people in Canada is "whether we of European ancestry are going to be able to hold up our heads before them".

I submit that this is the basic principle involved in the bill. Following that suggestion, which I made in the debate at that time, I went on to recite some of the history of the legislation concerning Indian claims in more recent times. At that time I said:

> On December 14, 1963 the then Minister of Citizenship and Immigration introduced Bill C-130, An Act to provide for the Disposition of Indian claims. As members of the committee will recall this bill had its genesis in the joint committee on Indian affairs which brought out a report in 1961; but Bill C-130 after a preliminary stage in the house, was circulated widely throughout the country, and then on June 21, 1965 we had a successor bill, Bill C-123, which was to have been referred for consideration last fall to a special committee for detailed consideration.
> At this time arrangements were under way for the appearance of Indian people and others before that committee, until the bill, along with a number of other things, came to an untimely end with the dissolution of parliament. I might also draw the attention of the committee again to the fact that in addition to the bills introduced on the government side, to which I have referred, there was in 1963 Bill C-67, entitled An Act Respecting the Canada Court of Indian Claims, introduced by my colleague the hon. member for Skeena.

I may say that the terms of Bill C-28 which we now have before us are identical to those of the bill previously introduced by my colleague.

Having made reference to the various bills that have been brought forward I would like to express the view that the exact terms of any of them including the one which we have before us, are relatively unimportant. What is really important to me is the settlement of a moral issue, that is the restoration to the Indian people of self respect and, perhaps even more important to many of us, the restoration of our own self respect in our relationships with the Indian people. In my view the purpose of such legislation must be to create a situation in Canada where we will no longer be haunted by the injustices perpetrated by our forefathers, which I think we all recognize cannot really be undone, but which in my view can be removed in so far as they are still being visited upon the children of this day and generation.

The important thing to me is to bring about a state of affairs where we and the Indian people can look one another fairly and squarely in the eye, where we no longer need to speak and they no longer need to fear that we will be speaking with a forked tongue. I recognize fully the fact that legislation alone cannot achieve this end, but I do believe that legislation can act as a catalyst to bring about this end. I submit that if this end, which to me is one of the most desirable and important objectives to which this country should be moving, is to be achieved, the basic contents of the legislation that may be put forward in this parliament is not unimportant.

It is no secret, Mr. Speaker, that in my view the legislation which has been introduced by the government so far has been to put it mildly, less than satisfactory for the purposes that I suggest we should all have in mind. My views in this regard are perhaps best spelled out by an amendment which I moved to government Bill No. C-123 when it was before the house on June 22, 1965. This amendment can be found in Hansard on page 2768. At that time I moved, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch):

> That Bill C-123 be not now read a second time, but that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given to the introduction of legislation that will provide for
> (a) an Indian Claims Commission enabled by its terms of reference and its composition to assist the Indian peoples of Canada to prepare for disposition of all outstanding claims arising out of the occupation by non-Indians of territories now within Canada; to search out and hear evidence in relation thereto and to make such awards, both general and particular, as are just and fair, and
> (b) an Indian Claims Appeal Court, the presiding officer of which shall be a jurist, other than a Canadian citizen, of international repute, which shall hear appeals from any decision of the commission.

I believe that principle is in this bill, although rather awkwardly put because of the limitations that are imposed upon a private member, since he does not have the prerogative of financial initiative that the government has. What I believe is implicit in this bill and in the amendment I previously moved is, first, that prior recognition of the fact that claims do in fact exist must be given, and such claims should not be subject to narrow restrictions such as whether they arise from actions of the Crown in right of Canada, or of any of the colonies which preceded the Canadian confederation. These claims should not be subject to the restriction of whether they arise from the actions of corporations such as, for example, the activities of the Hudson's Bay Company or other fur trading companies, or from the actions taken by individuals under what they assumed to be rights conferred upon them under Canadian or other laws, or actions they may have taken outside of the law.

The second thing, Mr. Speaker, which I believe is implicit in the principle of this bill is that the claim must be dealt with as if negotiations were being conducted between equals. This is something which was not done in the past. At that time a superior power simply moved in with all the trappings of imperial colonialism. Since that time there has never been any real acceptance of this idea of negotiations between equals. Ever since the successful encroachment of imperial colonialism into this continent, the relationship between the Indian people and ourselves, both in the state and in a large part as individuals, has been a sort of father-child relationship. The actions of this parliament, indeed the actions of the Fathers of Confederation, in effect created this father-child relationship by making the Indian people legal wards of the federal government of Canada.

It may be argued with some truth, Mr. Speaker, that in recent years the father has become a bit more generous. He has not restricted the child entirely to a diet of cold porridge. He has been prepared to hand out occasionally a few lollipops and perhaps even on occasion what one might term a full bodied meal of meat and potatoes. This basic situation has not been altered in any way by the events which may have transpired because this parliament has been fit to provide the government with somewhat more generous amounts of money to dispense to the Indian people across the country. I submit that handouts are not the answer. More and more the Indian people are no longer content to be treated as adult children. I believe that more and more of us are realizing the futility of attempting to play over and over again the role of father. I believe that negotiations by an Indian claims commission would be the key which could unlock this paradoxical situation in which we and they have involved for far too long.

As we are considering this bill today, Mr. Speaker, I must admit quite frankly that I am not too concerned if it should develop that this bill receives the treatment private members bills so often receive, and is not actually given second reading during this hour. At the moment, I think the important question is for this parliament to understand just where we are at the moment in our relationship to this whole question. I believe this question is answered in part at least by some remarks I made on March 3, 1966, when I drew the attention of the committee to a question which was asked of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Mr. Laing by my colleague the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard). This was the question of the hon. member, which I quoted in my speech at that time, and it appears at page 2178 of Hansard of March 3, 1966:

> Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. When may we expect the introduction in the house of a bill regarding the Indian claims commission? When the minister answers that question perhaps he might also indicate whether that bill has been delayed up to now by revision of any previous bill.

The Minister replied to the hon. member in these terms:

> Mr. Speaker, the delay that has eventuated has had more than one cause. It has come from the quarters with which my hon. friend and myself are familiar, namely, the province of British Columbia where the Indian people seem to prefer to take a concentrated second look before proceeding.
> Some Indians of British Columbia indicated they would prefer to consider their particular position in negotiation prior to the introduction of the bill. I have told the legal adviser of the Indians in the province of British Columbia that I am prepared to discuss with them this subject, and I have had a preliminary meeting with him, before any action is taken.

After quoting the minister I proceeded on that occasion to say:

> I think that the answer the minister gave to the house on February 14 re-opened this whole matter in several very important respects. It particularly re-opened the question as far as the Indian people of British Columbia are concerned, but it also leaves unanswered what the minister may have in mind as far as the Indian people in the rest of Canada are concerned in relation to the proposals that were put forward in the government bill that went down the drain when parliament was dissolved.

• (5:20 p.m.)

I submit that the time has now come for us to move forward once more on this whole question. Some of us in this house are aware that in the province of British Columbia the Confederation of B.C. Indians has now been formed and is prepared to deal with the B.C. land question. I think those of us who have had some participation in the proceedings before the Indian affairs committee have become increasingly aware that Indians in various parts of Canada are anxious to see another forward movement on this matter, which has been resting with some quietude for some little time.

I found myself while on a subcommittee of the Indian affairs committee in Toronto last summer, Mr. Speaker, being asked to explain some aspects of the Indian land question, and after discussion had proceeded for a little while one of the members of the Indian advisory council of the province of Ontario asked me why Indians in other parts of Canada should have to wait while the British Columbia Indians made up their minds what they wanted to do.

Along with other members of the committee one day last week I visited the Indian people in St. Regis and Caughnawaga, and this question of action to deal with the historic claims of the Indian people in that area was certainly brought to the fore in the discussions the Indians had with the members of the committee.

In introducing this bill for discussion today I feel, whether or not the bill receives passage at this stage, that we in this house could usefully be reminded that the time has come for a definite forward move in the direction that I have outlined and in accordance with what I believe are the basic principles of the bill which is before us for consideration.

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) on the presentation he has made of a very interesting case. One of the frustrations that we in this house have had to put up with for some time now has been the fact that before this parliament and the government has moved to change the direction we are taking in Indian affairs, we have submitted the proposals to the Indians themselves for their deliberation and approval.

I think that this is a very good move, but it is also very frustrating because we see a great many abuses and needs which must be met which we cannot deal with as quickly as we would like, because of this outstanding prior necessity for getting the consent of the people concerned. This is going to slow the activities of the government and of the House of Commons in the matter of legislating for the Indians. However, I think it is all to the good and it is a very forward looking step to allow the Indians to have a greater say in the legislation which governs them.

One of the interesting comments that was made by the sponsor of the bill was that although he thought the bill might be deficient in some respects he felt that the principle of the bill should be discussed. To some extent, Mr. Speaker, I disagree with this view, and I should like to take a look at the contents of the bill itself. It is not really enough to suggest that the end is justified unless we take a look at the means. Therefore I should like to make a somewhat academic analysis of a variety of provisions contained in the bill, with a view perhaps to clearing up some of the ambiguities which now exist.

I think that one of the first objections one could make to the bill is one which we are continually coming across in private members hour, and it is, of course, that the bill contemplates the expenditure of public moneys. We are all aware of the well worn phrase to be found in citation 249 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, which reads in part as follows:

> No cases can be found of any private member in the Canadian commons receiving the authority of the crown, through a minister, to propose a motion involving the expenditure of public money. No principle is better understood than the constitutional obligation that rests upon the executive government, of alone initiating measures imposing charges upon the public exchequer.

There are several clauses in the bill Mr. Speaker, which presume to do exactly this. Perhaps the most outstanding is clause 19 which deals with the procedure of the court to be set up under the bill, and with the payment, in whole or in part, of the reasonable costs, fees, or expenses of preparing and presenting a claim or an interest affected, the court being empowered to order that such expenses, either in whole or in part, may be the administrative expenses of the court.

Additionally, Mr. Speaker, the expenditure of money by the judge who would be required if the court were to come within the ambit of the Exchequer Court would have application here, as well as the increased salaries, money required for travelling and administration extra staff and so on.

Mr. Howard: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Reid: Certainly.

Mr. Howard: I should like to ask a particularly pertinent question of the hon. gentleman, and I think that this is a matter of which Your Honour should also be apprised. It is my understanding that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) is now raising a point of order as to whether the bill itself is in order and should be considered? It seems to me that that is what is happening.

Mr. Reid: No, Mr. Speaker; I was just discussing what I thought were some of the technical deficiencies that had occurred to me. Perhaps the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) is right and I could raise a point of order, but I would point out to him that this same question, I recall, was raised when the hon. member for Skeena himself—

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

Mr. Reid: —introduced a similar bill—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Barnett: My point of order is this, Mr. Speaker. In my speech I did state that the bill was a little awkwardly drafted because of the very limitation to which the hon. member has referred. My submission is that the bill is very carefully drafted and has some limitations because of the fact that it does not trespass on the provisions to which the hon. member if referring in his speech.

Mr. Reid: Well, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the drafting of this bill is certainly an improvement over the drafting of the previous bill. Nevertheless, the point I was making, which was that it infringes upon the rights of the crown, is I think a valid one. However, for the sake of argument perhaps I should pass that matter by and if the bill does come up again and is in danger of passing this point of order could be explored in greater detail and much more depth.

There are other deficiencies in the bill, Mr. Speaker, particularly the provisions in clauses 13 and 14. My principal objection to them is that they are vague. For example the process of defining who may bring a claim to the special court is not precise.

Mr. Barnett: Indians in Canada.

Mr. Reid: My hon. friend says Indians in Canada. But Indians are not defined. Does my hon. friend mean Indians or the band? What happens if there is a conflict between the rights of the band and those of individual Indians? Much will depend, of course on the different land holding procedures that exist and, of course, these vary from place to place.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Whose interests are to be paramount? Is it the interest of the band or the individual? There are 550 odd Indian bands in Canada, and this should be spelled out in more detail so that when the court deals with these matters there can be no difference of opinion and everybody will know who may bring a claim.

I also wish to refer to subclause 2 of clause 14. This clause permits the court to hear and determine claims submitted to the court by petition concerning Indians or lands reserved for Indians. Questions must be answered about this. Who may petition? On whose behalf may the petition be lodged? How many are required to submit a petition? Must these people be Indians, or can it be somebody outside the band? For example, can somebody outside the band submit a petition on behlaf of a dissident group within the band who do not appreciate the way things are going?

In this connection I wish to mention something to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. We ran into this when we visited the St. Regis band, which is having difficulty with its elected members.

Because of the situation there,—and the band has been handling some of its own affairs for some time—there has been created a great deal of confusion and a great deal of bad will between two conflicting parties within the band. To avoid such conflicts and to protect the people concerned, this matter should be more precisely spelled out. For instance, can anyone petition on behalf of Indians? We have been objective with legislation covering the rights of Indians with respect to land reserved for Indian use. But this clause to which I have referred is wide open, and the matter is not precisely defined. The objections I previously raised apply to this clause.

Continuing, we find that there is no definition, no basis on which a claim might be lodged. This is not spelled out in detail, and raises problems which should be looked into. For example, the clause as presently drafted does not allow the Indians concerned or the court set up in this bill to determine what classes of claims might be brought to the court. As an example of this in clause 14 (1) paragraphs (a) and (b), which deal with British Columbia land question and the Oka land dispute, neither of these particular things is defined.

It may be perfectly natural for somebody coming from British Columbia to know precisely what is meant by these disputes, but somebody coming from my part of the country might not know about them. It is not fair to assume that the court will know. The bill might have been improved had the hon. gentleman opposite defined more clearly what is meant by these particular paragraphs. I admit that in a legal sense the courts might know what is meant, but I doubt whether this is so.

As a result there are intriguing possibilities when it comes to interpreting the legislation. First, dealing with the three clauses I have referred to, does it mean that any Indian claim, any individual claim no matter how frivolous or ridiculous it may be, must be considered by the courts? Must it be considered equally with more substantial claims launched by other individuals or bands? Second, does the band have precedence, or a superior status with respect to claims started by an individual? This should be resolved one way or the other. Third, can the individual act when the band council does not act? For example, in a case where a legitimate claim is outstanding and where the band has reasons of its own for not taking action, would an individual resident of the reserve be allowed to take action to settle his claim?

Another aspect I wish to raise is, whether individuals and bands can submit claims on one particular matter? That is, can the band and other persons acting individually submit claims to the court? These questions are not resolved in the bill and they cause much confusion. They should be more clearly defined, so that the people petitioning the court and the court itself may have a better understanding of the rights and privileges involved.

Then, turning to clause 15—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member kindly resume his seat. I am interrupting the hon. member's speech because I do not want to disrupt his trend of thought. Will he allow me to remind him that he cannot refer to specific clauses of a bill when we are on second reading. He should limit his comments to the principle of the bill. I am sure the hon. member will be able to limit himself to that aspect of the matter.

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Had I known at the beginning of my remarks what Your Honour has just said I might have taken a different tack.

To comply with your ruling, and back tracking, may I say a few words about the progress of the Indian claims commission and the role we expect it to play. Let me speak of precisely how this bill fits in with the general principle of that commission. The progress we make with respect to that commission is slow. A great many claims in my constituency are to go before the commission. It has not yet been set up, and has not been operating because the various Indian groups in Canada, as I understand it, cannot agree about how it should be set up, what its powers should be and how it should operate. When you begin to deal with Indian affairs you learn about the vast diversity of opinion among the various Indian groups across Canada. Many Indian bands such as the Caughnawaga and St. Regis bands, which the members of the Indian affairs committee visited last week, are relatively able to look after their own interests. Those two reserves that we visited are well able to do without the Department of Indian Affairs in many respects. Perhaps in five or six years it might be possible to withdraw Indian affairs service from those people. They can manage on their own.

This very diversity hampers the government, the House of Commons and the standing committee when dealing with Indian affairs. It makes it difficult to lay down a policy which will apply equitably across the board, taking into consideration the variations which exist, as well as the educational opportunities for integration into Canadian life. The claims commission is a perfect example. There are a variety of claims to be processed, one of which is the exotic series of claims from the west coast about which I do not claim to have much knowledge. But I do know that the claims we have to face arise from a variety of natural causes, as well as from the plain skulduggery of many of our ancestors.

I know that in my own constituency treaty No. 3 has been broken because it was necessary to use the watershed of the lower Rainy River as storage for power. Thus, many areas which were once part of the mainland have become islands and have been lost to the Indians. They were taken over by the Crown and sold to summer settlers. Much land has been lost, some of it valuable.

There are also the leases which were signed in the early part of the century for what was then considered to be a fair price. Today the fair price is no longer fair. For example, under one lease seven bands receive $35 for a considerable territory. In 1905 when the lease was signed this may have been a good deal, but in 1967 it is not a good deal. I think that in the future the Indian claims commission will have to look into these old leases which were signed in former days in good faith by both parties but which are no longer equitable in 1967.

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Howard: I was the one who seconded the motion for second reading.

Mr. Speaker: In that case I will recognize the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I recognize the difficulty which has developed; the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) and I have been allied closely on this particular measure, as with other measures, for some years. I realize that I run the risk of talking out my hon. friend's bill, since at any moment there may be a knock on the door to tell us we are required in the Senate chamber. I have often wondered why we have to put up with these interruptions—why they cannot take place after six o'clock—but that is the way things are.

I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid). I wish you had not called him to order, Mr. Speaker, during his comments about the intimate parts of this bill because it was obvious that the hon. member was niggling around the subject, not getting to the core of it. It is interesting to note that when he was dealing clause by clause with the bill now before the house he complained about its vagueness and generality. Then, when he began to talk about the Indian claims commission as the subject matter of the government's proposal in this regard he stressed the difficulties which arose because of differences across Canada between one region and another, and explained why it was not possible to get a clear picture of the claims made by the Indian people.

I submit that when he made his later remarks dealing with the position of the government he answered his own question and gave a perfect explanation of the reason for drawing up this bill in its present form. It is not possible to clarify a great many of these matters, so they were left open to the court itself.

I think I might usefully give an historical account of what has occurred with respect to the subject of Indian claims in this nation, and begin by referring to a pamphlet published by the Liberal party during an election in 1963. It begins by saying that at Prince Rupert in 1910 Sir Wilfrid—presumably Sir Wilfrid Laurier—promised that the Indian land question would be taken to the Privy Council. Then the pamphlet adds: "The solution in 1963 lies in a totally different course of action". This emphasizes the attitude of successive parties with regard to the land question in British Columbia and in a broader sense to all the claims Indians have advanced with respect to encroachment upon their rights, their traditions and their land. If it is considered as a milestone in the development of our approach to the claims of the native people to refer back to a promise broken by Sir Wilfrid Laurier 50 years ago, there is surely something wrong with the attitude of successive governments in dealing with these matters.

I wish, now to make a comment on the land question in British Columbia because this is a question of vital importance not only to the Indian people in that province but to the government and to all of Canada. I think this is separate from a large number of the claims which the native people have to present about various aspects of the treatment which has been meted out to them. In 1910 it was considered that Sir Wilfrid Laurier or his government would assist in solving the land question. Obviously no solution was reached at that time. In 1926 a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons met to consider what I believe was called the claims of the allied native tribes of British Columbia. That committee concluded that the native people had not proved their claim to aboriginal title. They did not say it was disproved; they simply said it had not been proved. In any event, it recommended a payment of $100,000 a year to the native people of British Columbia. That payment is still being made but it has been greatly diluted as a result of a population increase among the native people, and because of the reduction in the purchasing power of the dollar.

In the late '40's a committee on Indian affairs was established and it delved into many aspects of Indian problems. In 1948 it unanimously recommended that an Indian claims commission be established. Nothing was done about this recommendation, which was supported by members of all political parties represented on the committee. It was forgotten. In 1959 another committee of the Senate and the House of Commons was formed to consider Indian affairs. In 1961 that committee made its report, and again representatives of all parties in the house and in the Senate unanimously recommended the establishment of a court of Indian claims or of an Indian claims commission, I forget which. That committee specifically referred to the British Columbia land question and to the Oka land dispute, and as a consequence these matters are referred to in the bill now before us.

On October 14, 1963, Bill No. C-130 was introduced to establish an Indian claims commission. The intention was principally to introduce the bill at that time—parliament was close to prorogation—in order that copies might be distributed to the Indian people in Canada and to all others who were interested. It was distributed and many representations were made about changes to the bill. Contrary to what the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has said,—and I looked over these representations—there was a considerable body of opinion among the Indian people in Canada that there were great deficiencies in the measure introduced in 1963.

In June of 1965 another bill was introduced, known as Bill C-123. It was almost identical to Bill C-130 and obviously had no regard for that body of opinion among the native people which had been expressed during the examination of the earlier bill introduced in 1963. This fact prompted the Indians of the North American Indian Brotherhood to form a group called the Federation of Indians of British Columbia. The prime function of that group related to the Indian land question. That brotherhood had, among other things, the following to say about the last bill introduced by the government:

> It is considered by the Indians of the North American Indian Brotherhood to be an insult on the part of the then Minister of Indian Affairs the Honourable Jack Nicholson to then reintroduce the bill in the old form except for one minor change, namely that there be provision for one Indian to sit on the commission. All the recommendations except this one, by both the N.A.I.B. and the other Indian organizations of B.C. were disregarded and the N.A.I.B. considers the amended bill in most of its entirety to be absolutely useless in giving to the Indians of B.C., according to the Liberal pre-election promise an "unbiased and unprejudiced tribunal."

Those are not my words but the words of the North American Indian Brotherhood.

Mr. Speaker, someone is knocking at the door so I must cease and desist.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

• (6.00 p.m.)

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bill:

An Act to establish the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation.

It being five minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, February 20, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

FINANCE

TABLING OF REPORT OF AUDITOR GENERAL FOR FISCAL YEAR ENDED MARCH 31, 1966

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): I wish to table two copies in English and in French of the report of the Auditor General to the House of Commons for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1966. As the house is aware, the Financial Administration Act requires that the report of the Auditor General be laid before the house on or before December 31, or if parliament is then not in session within 15 days after the commencement of the next ensuing session. The Auditor General has asked me to express his apologies to the members of the house over the delay, which has resulted from circumstances over which the Auditor General had no control.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

APPEARANCE ON C.B.C. OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Question No. 2,286—Mr. Grégoire:

1. Among the present members of the House of Commons, what are the names of those who have appeared on C.B.C. stations, either radio or television and have received sums of money?

2. In each case, what was the amount received?

3. Does this conflict in any respect with any of the regulations or laws with which members of parliament must comply in the House of Commons?

4. If so, what action does the government intend to take on this matter?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

1. In his statement of December 14, 1966, to the house the Prime Minister gave the house information supplied him by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to the effect that 17 members of the present parliament had accepted payments from the C.B.C. while members of the previous parliament between May, 1963 and September, 1965.

The C.B.C. now informs me, however, that on checking further into this matter, they have discovered that seven of the individuals on the previous list were not members of parliament but rather other individuals whose names happened to coincide with those of certain members of this house. The correct total then of members of the present house who have accepted fees from the C.B.C. while members of the previous parliament is 10, not 17 as previously suggested.

As for the 10 members of parliament in question, the situation in regard to them is as follows:

(a) The hon. members for Royal and York-Humber each received a cheque from the corporation and each endorsed it over to a worthy cause;

(b) A cheque issued to the hon. member for Temiskaming was returned to the corporation uncashed within a few days of delivery to him;

(c) Cheques sent to the hon. members for Medicine Hat and Danforth have, according to C.B.C. records, never been cashed;

(d) This leaves five members who, according to the corporation, received and cashed cheques from the C.B.C. These are the Minister of Mines, Energy and Resources, and the hon. members for Greenwood, Villeneuve, St. John's West and Brandon-Souris.

2. While it is C.B.C. policy not to disclose amounts paid to any individual, in none of these cases did any individual payment exceed $65 and in no case where any of the members of parliament in question received payments for more than one appearance did the total payments to any M.P. exceed $160.

3 and 4. See statement of December 14, 1966 by the Prime Minister as recorded in Hansard, pages 11115 and 11116.

APPEARANCE ON C.B.C. OF CERTAIN HOUSE MEMBERS

Question No. 2,479—Mr. Grégoire:

How many times since September 1, 1966, have the following persons been invited to appear on the C.B.C.'s French radio and television networks to make broadcasts of a political nature: Hon. Lucien Cardin, Hon. Maurice Sauvé, Hon. Léo-Alphonse Cadieux, Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin, Hon. Jean Marchand, Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté, Hon. Théogène Ricard, Hon. Martial Asselin, Mr. Auguste Choquette, M.P., Mr. Réal Caouette, M.P., Mr. Pierre Bourgault, leader of the R.I.N., Mr. Gilles Grégoire, M.P. and president of the R.N.?

[Translation]

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): The C.B.C. informs me that guest appearances by these persons involved interviews or discussions on a variety of subjects of public interest. The number of appearances is as follows:

	Radio	Television
Mr. Cardin	Nil	Nil
Mr. Sauvé	8	5
Mr. Cadieux	1	Nil
Mr. Pépin	2	2
Mr. Marchand	5	4
Mr. Côté	Nil	1
Mr. Ricard	1	Nil
Mr. Asselin	3	Nil
Mr. Choquette	Nil	4
Mr. Caouette	3	Nil
Mr. Bourgault	4	5
Mr. Grégoire	4	1

FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION TO COMMUNITY CENTRE, RIMOUSKI, QUE.

Question No. 2,520—Mr. Nesbitt:

1. Is the federal government contributing to the construction of a community centre in the city of Rimouski, Quebec, known as the John F. Kennedy centre?

2. If so, what is the amount of the contribution?

3. Was such expenditure included in the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1966?

4. If the answer to part 3 above is in the negative, in what year did or will this item appear in the estimates?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by several departments as follows: 1. No.

2, 3 and 4. See answer to 1.

CENTENNIAL TRAIN STOP, NEW GLASGOW, N.S.

Question No. 2,534—Mr. MacEwan:

1. Why is the centennial train not stopping at the town of New Glasgow, Nova Scotia?

2. Will consideration be given to having this centennial train stop at New Glasgow, Nova Scotia, or at another location in the county of Pictou?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): 1. The centennial train itinerary comprises 83 exhibit stops for 315½ exhibit days in nine provinces of Canada. Among the many factors that were considered and agreed to by the centennial commission and the provincial government centennial authorities were population by provinces, physical facilities at each stop and accessibility to the largest area population.

The confederation train is not stopping in the town of New Glasgow because of the heavy concentration of confederation caravan stops in the area. The confederation caravan will be stopping at Stellarton, New Glasgow and Pictou making a total of six exhibit days in an area that, if the train were to stop, could stop not more than one exhibit day.

2. The Nova Scotia itinerary of the confederation train was worked out between the centennial commission, the provincial centennial authorities and the railway representatives over a period of three years. It was agreed by the governments that changes would not be practical or possible.

CIVIL SERVICE COMPETITION 66-H683

Question No. 2,551—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

1. Who was the successful candidate in the civil service competition 66-H683, protection officer—fishery office, held recently?

2. What are the names and addresses of the other candidates who entered this competition?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Civil Service Commission as follows:

1. Competition 66-H683, protection officer—fisheries officer 1, has not yet been completed. A written examination will be held on February 10 at 18 centres in the province of Nova Scotia. There are 227 candidates.

2. Having regard for the right to privacy of candidates and the possibility that the release of information could prove not only embarrassing but prejudicial to them, the commission holds in confidence information concerning candidates whose names do not appear on the eligible list.

ITINERARY FOR CENTENNIAL TRAIN, NOVA SCOTIA

Question No. 2,552—Mr. Bower:

1. In planning the route of the centennial train, was consideration given to having it stop at Shelburne, Nova Scotia, in view of it being the site of the principal Loyalist settlement in Canada and hence one of the early manifestations of Canadianism?

2. In planning the return trip of the centennial train to Halifax from Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, was consideration given to having it do so via the south shore railroad with an additional stop in the constituency of Queens-Lunenburg?

3. If this was not planned, will consideration be given to correcting this 250 mile gap in the train's Nova Scotia itinerary?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): 1. The centennial train itinerary comprises 83 exhibit stops for 315½ exhibit days in nine provinces of Canada. Among the many factors that were considered and agreed to by the centennial commission and the provincial government centennial authorities were population by provinces, physical facilities at each stop and accessibility to the largest area population.

2. This was not practical because the next stop of the centennial train was Kentville.

3. See answer to 1. The Nova Scotia itinerary of the confederation train was worked out between the centennial commission, the provincial centennial authorities and railway representatives over a period of three years. It was agreed by the governments that changes would not be practical or possible.

MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION EMPLOYEES ABROAD

Question No. 2,562—Mr. Allard:

1. Further to the answer to question No. 2,381, what is the total number of public servants or employees working in the 34 cities abroad where the Department of Manpower and Immigration has offices?

2. Among these public servants or employees, how many are not Canadian citizens and what is their percentage in each of the 34 cities abroad where the Department of Manpower and Immigration has offices?

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. The reply submitted to question 2,381 referred only to personnel posted from Canada. There was a total of 128 public servants posted to the 34 cities listed in the reply to question 2,186 and they are all Canadian citizens.

2. In addition to the Canadian employees there are 307 locally engaged staff employed at the 34 cities listed and 9 of these are Canadian citizens.

See table below for distribution of Canadian and locally engaged staff. The figure in brackets indicates number of locally engaged employees who are Canadian citizens.

WORK OF REPRESENTATION COMMISSIONER

Question No. 2,564—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

1. Has any work yet been undertaken by the representation commissioner pursuant to section 9 of chapter 40 of the statutes of 1963?

2. If so, to what extent has it progressed?

3. Has (A) the representation commissioner or (B) any of his officials (a) already undertaken (b) planned for the future, any visits (i) in Canada (ii) to other countries, for the review and study of the matters referred to in said section 9?

4. If so, outline (a) locale (b) purpose of each such visit already undertaken or planned, and (c) results of each such visit already undertaken?

5. Is any interim report contemplated?

6. If so, when may it be anticipated?

7. If not, does the representation commissioner anticipate that the report required by said section 9 will be ready before the deadline established in the said section?

8. If the answer to part 7 is yes, when may such report be anticipated?

23033—835

Questions

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the representation commissioner as follows:

1. Yes.

2. The methods of registration of electors and absentee voting used in the provincial elections in British Columbia and in the national elections in the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, Trinidad and Tobago and the United States of America are being reviewed and studied by the representation commissioner.

3. (A) (a) (i) Yes. (ii) Yes. (b) (i) Yes. (ii) Yes. (B) (a) (i) No. (ii) No. (b) (i) No. (ii) No.

4. (a) Visits have been made to the province of British Columbia, the United Kingdom, Trinidad and Tobago, the state of Pennsylvania, and the District of Columbia in the United States of America. After the review and study referred to in 2 above, are completed, methods of registration of electors and methods of absentee voting used in other countries will be reviewed. A decision will be made at that time to determine if visits by the representation commissioner or any of his officials to any such countries will be necessary to complete the study. (b) The purpose of each visit is to consult with local officials responsible for the administration of their methods of registration of electors and absentee voting and with other persons familiar with such methods. (c) The visits result in a knowledge and understanding of the practical application of such methods.

5. No.

7. Yes.

8. The representation commissioner is required by subsection (2) of section 9 of the Representation Commissioner Act to complete his report not later than two years after the 16 June, 1966. It is anticipated that the report will be completed by such deadline. However, unknown factors such as the number of elections that may be held in that two year period will decide the amount of time required of the representation commissioner to discharge his duties and responsibilities under sections 16 to 21 of the said act and this in turn will determine whether the full two years will be required to complete the report.

IMMIGRATION OFFICES ABROAD

Question No. 2,568—Mr. Schreyer:

1. How many Canadian immigration offices are maintained in each of the following countries (a) United Kingdom (b) France (c) West Germany (d) Italy (e) Poland (f) U.S.S.R.?

2. In what cities are these immigration offices located and what is the size of staff of each?

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. and 2. See table below.

Country	City	Canadian staff	Locally engaged employees
United Kingdom	Belfast	2	3
	Birmingham	2	3
	Bristol	2	3

*ISSUE OF MEDAL TO FIREFIGHTERS WHO SERVED OVERSEAS

Question No. 2,592—Mr. Diefenbaker:

Will the government give immediate and favourable consideration in this confederation year to directing the issue to all members of the corps of Canadian firefighters who served overseas in the second war, the volunteer service medal?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The regulations governing eligibility for the Canadian volunteer service medal state that it may be awarded in recognition of "voluntary service by members of the armed forces of Canada". The medal was not intended to be a campaign award nor a war medal. The corps of (civilian) Canadian firefighters for service in the United Kingdom was not a component of the armed forces and accordingly its members are not eligible for this medal. This does not, of course, imply any reflection on the splendid service rendered by firefighters during world war II. Members of the corps with sufficient qualifying service were entitled to the defence medal and the war medal 1939-45.

TOURISTS VISITING CANADA IN 1966

Question No. 2,604—Mr. Honey:

How many people visited Canada in 1966?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): Data for 1966 are not yet available. The total number of entries into Canada by non-immigrant visitors during 1965 was 34,020,256. This figure includes trips by commuters and other visits of less than one day's duration, as well as longer term visits.

PENSION TO FORMER BANK OF CANADA GOVERNOR

Question No. 2,609—Mr. Sherman:

Is the former governor of the Bank of Canada (Mr. Coyne) currently drawing a regular pension from the bank as a result of his services in that office and, if not, for how long after he vacated the governorship did he draw the pension?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Yes. As indicated on November 18, 1963, Hansard page 4856, in reply to a question by the member for Cape Breton North and Victoria, Mr. Coyne has been in receipt of a pension from the Bank of Canada pension fund effective from the date of his retirement.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EDUCATION

INQUIRY AS TO ORGANIZATIONS RECEIVING FUNDS FROM U.S. AGENCY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been drawn to the number of organizations that have received funds from the Central Intelligence Agency in the United States. Has the Prime Minister looked into this matter to ascertain whether any Canadian youth organizations received funds directly or indirectly from the C.I.A.?

Will the Prime Minister also advise the house—it is all part of the same transaction, apparently—whether the publication of a pamphlet bearing the title "Escape from Freedom" now issued by the Student Union for Peace Action for the benefit of those wishing to escape military service in the United States was assisted by a $4,000 award by the government of Canada through the Privy Council office; and did the government have any knowledge whether the moneys were going to be used for this unusual purpose?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman has asked me two questions. As far as the first question is concerned, we have no information as to any funds from the Central Intelligence Agency of the United States or any other foreign intelligence agency being made available to any Canadian institution. We have learned, however, Mr. Speaker, both from reference in the newspapers and from a letter I received before lunch from the Canadian Union of Students that they have received two grants from an organization called the Foundation for Youth and Student Affairs to assist in meeting the expenditures of a Canadian Union of Students seminar on international disputes and affairs.

The Canadian Union of Students, however, also state in this letter that there had been no direct contact between their union and C.I.A. operatives and that when the grants were received from this organization they considered it to be a reputable private organization. They did not know at the time that it had any connection whatever with the C.I.A., and they state that the grants did not influence the content of their seminars in any way, shape or form.

So far as the second question is concerned, the government has not seen any letter of the kind reportedly being distributed by a private organization which, of course, must bear the responsibility for the kind of literature it publishes. Literature of the kind mentioned by my right hon. friend has no bearing on, neither does it reflect, Canadian government policy on this matter. As I said on February 2, the government does not give financial support to this kind of activity nor does it encourage it in any other way. The grant to which my hon. friend refers as having been made some time ago to the particular organization concerned—SUPA, I believe it is called—has no relationship to this activity in any way.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): A supplementary question. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he can inform the house if any information is available with regard to United States students attending university on Canadian campuses, whether any of these students are supported by this organization.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, we have no information whatever as to the source of support for foreign students at Canadian universities unless those students are here under scholarships or bursaries from the Canadian government or private Canadian institutions. We have no information whatever as to the source of funds of United States students at Canadian universities.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would ask the Prime Minister what was the nature of the work to be done by the Student's Union for Peace Action in return for $4,000 granted them through the Privy Council, which appears on page 34, subsection 4 of the Public Accounts for 1965-66.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I shall get the exact details, but I believe it was to have a report from this organization on their own community activities, in case it might be helpful to know the kind of thing which was being done in relation to government auspices.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, arising out of the supplementary question to the right hon. gentleman, my question has to do with the letter from the Canadian Union of Students to which the right hon. Prime Minister referred. May I ask him whether his reply accepted their suggestion that the Canadian government should protest this intrusion by United States government agencies into Canadian affairs by way of a front organization? Second, can the right hon. gentleman assure this house that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are not engaged in similar activities?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the only information on this matter I have received at the present time would not seem to warrant any protest to the United States government in respect of an offer of a small amount of money through a foundation, the nature of which I am not entirely clear about but which appears to be a front organization of the C.I.A.

I want to make further inquiries to get the background of this award before deciding whether there is any case for an official protest to the United States government. But, Mr. Speaker, if a Canadian organization of the kind we have mentioned, or any other kind of Canadian organization, should be offered financial assistance from any organization or foundation in the United States, the Canadian government would be very glad, at their request, to give them any information it has about the nature of the organization or foundation.

[Later:]

Mr. Ian Watson (Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. Perhaps it should be supplementary to a question asked by the hon. member for York South. In view of reports from the United States that the Central Intelligence Agency has been making use of international affiliations of the A.F.L.-C.I.O., would the Solicitor General indicate whether he has any knowledge of any such authority being extended into Canada through the A.F.L.-C.I.O. unions affiliated with the Canadian Labour Congress and its political arm, the New Democratic Party?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROTEST BY QUEBEC PREMIER RESPECTING PROGRAM "TIREZ AU CLAIR"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Secretary of State. Can the hon. minister give us some information, today, on the C.B.C. and the program "Tirez au Clair" with regard to the question I put to her last Thursday asking why the C.B.C. had not allowed Hon. Marcel Masse, minister without portfolio, to take part in the program?

[English]

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Answering my hon. friend's question, I can tell him that I saw the telegram sent by the president of the C.B.C. to the premier of Quebec which, I believed, explained the situation. Other than that I have no further information.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I have a supplementary question which is directed to the Secretary of State. The hon. lady was asked a question in the house regarding this matter during the course of the week just past. Would she inform the other members of the house what reasons were given by the C.B.C.? I do not know that we should have to read newspapers in order to get the answer to a question asked in this house.

Miss LaMarsh: I have with me a copy in French of the telegram which was sent, and if there is unanimous consent I will be happy to table it.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PARTICIPATION OF CANADA IN ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. It concerns press reports that Trinidad and Tobago have now made formal application for membership in the Organization of American States, and that Barbados is planning to apply almost immediately. In view of the Prime Minister's statement in December 1965 that Canada is prepared to act in unison with the Caribbean nations in making application for admission to the O.A.S., may I ask the Prime Minister whether Canada intends now or in the immediate future to apply for admission to this organization?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I ever said that Canada would probably act in unison. If my friend looks at his source which he probably has before him he will see, though I have not the report, that I said I hoped it would be possible for us to act in unison with the other commonwealth governments in this hemisphere. Trinidad-Tobago having announced their intention of joining, if their application is accepted, with Barbados following up if it does apply within the next month or two, it looks as though my hope will not be realized.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question. May I ask the Prime Minister, in view of the importance of applying for membership in the O.A.S. and the effect this would have on our relations with countries in other areas of the world, whether he can assure us that no such step will be taken by the Canadian government without giving parliament an opportunity to express its views on the question.

Mr. Pearson: I can only say that the normal constitutional position will be adhered to in this matter. I hope, if the decision were made by the government and parliament were sitting, that there would be an opportunity for parliament to debate the decision before it became effective.

SUGAR

INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSIONS WITH CARIBBEAN COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. I note that the right hon. gentleman is about to leave for Antigua, and I am sure we all wish him bon voyage. I should like to inquire whether during his visit he will be meeting with the leaders of other Caribbean islands, and whether the talks which are scheduled will concern the development of a Canadian sugar policy.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it would be quite impossible to have any talks with any government in the West Indies on behalf of the Canadian government without talking about sugar.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT OF INDIAN ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. When does the government intend or plan to bring into this house the extensive amendments to the Indian Act which the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development announced on Saturday last would be put through this year?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): As soon as practicable, Mr. Speaker; but there is a certain amount of very important legislation already on the order paper. It has been stated that this legislation will have immediate priority. When it is disposed of we hope to proceed to other important legislation including the proposal to which the hon. member refers.

Mr. Harkness: Does the Prime Minister means by his answer that he expects to have this legislation introduced and dealt with before the proposed summer recess?

Mr. Pearson: That will depend on the progress we make with the legislation before us, and with the estimates.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Could I ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development as a supplementary question whether he intends at the earliest possible moment simply to introduce the amendments to the Indian Act so they may become public knowledge, thus giving the Indian people a chance to express their views on the proposals before they are implemented?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): The Indian people have already expressed their views at two meetings of the National Advisory Board, and expect to complete their submission at a third meeting which is about to take place.

HOUSING

MEETINGS OF STUDY GROUPS RESPECTING SHORTAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): I will address this question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the most recent reports on Canada's housing shortage I would ask the minister whether he is considering terminating his cross-country symposiums earlier than planned in order that we may have concrete action sooner than originally anticipated.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Grafftey: Then I will have to bring the matter up at ten o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Grafftey: Hon. members laugh, but it is not a laughing matter.

[Mr. Harkness.]

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO POLISH VISITORS TO EXPO '67

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roger E. Régimbal (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

The Canadian Polish Congress stated that about 10,000 Polish people would be anxious to visit Expo '67 but that on account of red tape fewer than 10 per cent of this number will be able to come to Canada. Is it the intention of the minister to take urgent steps in order to cope with the situation?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I shall inquire about this. I do not know where this figure concerning 10,000 people comes from or anything about the 10 per cent figure but at any rate I will inquire about this and see to it that the issuing of visas is progressing normally in Poland.

Mr. Régimbal: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question.

Could the hon. minister justify also the security bond of $500 to $1,000 per individual required by Canada? Could he justify the advisability of such a requirement at this precise moment?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I will simply inquire about the situation and will answer later on.

[English]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. My question is prompted by the concern of several elderly ladies who are very perturbed about what has happened in the defence committee in recent days. Will the minister give consideration to members at future meetings of the defence committee being given battle helmets and battle dress in order to avoid casualties?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I thought I might suggest that my hon. friend be appointed to the committee ex officio as sergeant-at-arms.

OLD AGE SECURITY

INCOME SUPPLEMENT—MEANING OF "CAPITAL COST ALLOWANCE"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I wonder whether the minister is able to provide the house with an explanation as to the meaning of "capital cost allowance" under section 7 on page 10 of the document dealing with the guaranteed income supplement. I have been asked a number of questions about this by my constituents and have not been able to ascertain just what is meant by it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member will recognize that this is not the type of question that can be asked at this time.

Mr. Coates: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the problem I face is that if I put this question on the order paper I will encounter a great deal of delay in getting an answer, yet I am being asked about it daily.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am afraid that is the hon. member's problem, but I am sure that with a little effort he might be able to secure an answer faster than in other circumstances if he can convince the responsible minister that this is a matter of urgency. I suggest to him that the question cannot be asked now.

LABOUR RELATIONS

NEGOTIATION OF CONTRACTS BETWEEN DOMINION COAL AND UNITED MINE WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, my question was intended for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources but in his absence I will direct it to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister authorize the negotiation of contracts between Dominion Coal and the U.M.W., since the miners in the union have been without a contract since August, 1966?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will discuss this matter with the minister.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

ALBERTA—CLOSING OF SOME WARDS IN COLONEL MEWBURN HOSPITAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, to whom I have given brief notice. I wonder whether he would be able to reassure the veterans in northern Alberta that the recent closing of a number of wards in the Colonel Mewburn hospital will not impair the availability of services to veterans. I apologize for asking this question in this way but I face the same problem as the hon. member for Cumberland; and I know the minister is ready to answer.

Mr. Speaker: I normally would apologize to the hon. member for having to suggest that the question be placed on the order paper; but if there is urgency and the minister is prepared to reply, I will certainly allow the question.

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do appreciate this privilege, because it is important that veterans in that area be reassured on this point. I can assure the hon. member that the changes which have taken place in the hospital will in no way affect the services to the veterans of that region; they will in no way downgrade those services, or affect the number of veterans who can be accommodated.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRIES AS TO TRIP BY MEMBER FOR LEEDS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): While the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) is on tour I would ask the Prime Minister whether any authorization has been given to that hon. member to produce a Canadian tartan for confederation year. Was any authority given to him to produce the red and white tartan which he has in his office, which certainly is a studied insult to the Scots if it is to be the one.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The hon. member for Leeds is a Canadian citizen and can produce any tartan he desires. But if he does so it will not be with any official authorization on the part of the government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My question was, did he have authorization? I ask it because, as he travels abroad, every day he issues bulletins. Did he have authorization?

Mr. Pearson: I am very glad to answer this important question with a decided negative.

[Later:]

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the announcements, from Singapore on Saturday and from Malaya this morning, that the hon. member for Leeds is making the most important call of his trip, I wonder if the Prime Minister will inform us which point of arrival is the most important, and what are the terms of reference at these points. Are they political or economic?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of order. Surely the members of this house do not have to depend on the C.B.C. for information as to the perambulations of the hon. member for Leeds. The hon. member on Saturday announced through the C.B.C., as he arrived in Singapore, that this was the most important point of his tour. This morning we heard over the C.B.C., as he arrived in Malaya, that this was the most important point of his tour. We are just wondering when these important visits will cease.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that perhaps the most important point in the trip will be when the hon. member returns to the house.

TRANSPORTATION

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON MARITIME STUDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. I wonder whether the minister can tell us exactly at what stage is the study on maritime transportation problems.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I believe it is progressing very rapidly.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO TAXATION COMMISSION REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Should we take seriously the statements which have been made to the effect that the report of the Carter commission is to be tabled at the end of this week?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Carter, the chairman of the commission, has been in touch with the government. He intends to deliver the report to the government at the end of this week. Our plan is to table it in the house on Friday evening at 6 p.m.

Mr. Knowles: If the report is to be tabled that soon, would the government consider postponing asking for third reading of the bill to increase the sales tax?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

NEW YORK—ARREST OF CANADIAN CITIZEN AT KENNEDY AIRPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Stanbury (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but in his absence perhaps the parliamentary secretary might answer it. Could the parliamentary secretary report on what action is being taken with regard to the seizure during the past week end by United States authorities in New York of a Canadian citizen who had been en route by air from Paris to Mexico City?

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): I thank the hon. member for York-Scarborough for having given me notice of this question. My information is that Mr. Sniderman had been arrested and arraigned for a federal offence before a grand jury in New York in July, 1965 but had jumped bail and left the country.

Last Thursday while en route from Paris to Mexico the aircraft in which he was travelling made a regularly scheduled stop at Kennedy airport, New York, where Mr. Sniderman was arrested and arraigned. I have no reason to believe that there was any irregularity in the procedure followed by the United States authorities in apprehending Mr. Sniderman when he came within their jurisdiction for an offence alleged to have been committed within that jurisdiction. The Canadian consulate general in New York is, however, making inquiries into the matter with a view to ensuring that Mr. Sniderman receives no less favourable treatment under United States law enforcement and judicial procedures than would be accorded to a United States citizen in similar circumstances.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE TO STUDY CRUELTY TO ANIMALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to ask the Prime Minister. I wonder whether the Prime Minister can say today whether he has reached a decision on a question he undertook to give active consideration to some little time ago. The question had to do with the reference to a parliamentary committee of several matters concerning animal welfare.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have made inquiry into this matter, and I am informed that the feasibility study in respect of setting up a Canadian council for animal care, to which I referred in my earlier reply and which now is being made, is to be completed shortly. Indeed, the final report is expected within a few weeks. I think until that report is received I should reserve a decision as to whether it should be submitted to a committee.

HATE LITERATURE

INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS IN CONSIDERATION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the government house leader. I should like to ask him whether he can inform the house what progress is being made in the other place on the bill to amend the Criminal Code with regard to hate propaganda. Also I should like to ask him how soon he expects the legislation to be referred to the special joint committee established for the purpose.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the difficulty is that item No. 130 on the order paper, which is the provision for this house to set up its part of the joint committee, has not been dealt with by the house. I would hope to give it effective priority as quickly as is consistent with the demands in respect of the other items on the order paper. There are some 21 items before the house at the moment. It is just a matter of getting to it as quickly as possible.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON TERMINATION OF SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he can give any firm indication at this time as to when the session will be terminated, so the committees will know how to arrange their business; or alternatively, whether any arrangements are being made for these committees to carry on during the ensuing session without having the deliberations they have engaged in so far go to waste.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I think perhaps the house leaders of the various parties could get together to look at the situation in the light of the progress which has been made. My hon. friend will recall that I had expressed the hope a few weeks ago, when I indicated the list of proposals which we hoped would be dealt with before the end of the session, that other things being equal we might be able to finish this session on March 10 and begin a new session on March 13. I think perhaps that was over-optimistic in view of the progress we have been making.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I take it from what the Prime Minister has said that the intention to end the session on March 10 now has been abandoned. I should like to ask him whether the intention he announced to adjourn for a week to 10 days over Easter is still firm.

Mr. Pearson: I think I will have to reserve a decision on that until there has been a discussion among the various party house leaders. It still is not beyond the bounds of possibility that we might finish this session on March 10.

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works concerning the sequence of house business. Could he advise us when it is intended to bring forward item No. 13 which is the referral to committee of the annual report of the Department of External Affairs?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to indicate the order of the house business in this way. I would be very glad to bring that matter forward, if I thought it would pass without debate.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PILOTAGE

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport and ask him whether he can apprise the house when he may present to it the report of the royal commission on pilotage. I should also like to ask him if he still has the view he always has had that he cannot accept this question, can he explain how such a slowpoke happened to be appointed as the commissioner.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I do not feel I should answer that question in the form in which it is asked. I think we have a rule in this house that we must show proper respect for the judiciary. The royal commission, as the hon. gentleman knows, was appointed by the right hon. gentleman who is now Leader of the Opposition, or his government. I believe it is doing a very thorough and conscientious job. I am very anxious to see this work terminated as soon as can be, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that as soon as the report is received it will receive immediate consideration.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MCKINNON INDUSTRIES—TAB PAYMENTS FOR WORKERS LAID OFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour and ask whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that some 900 workers have been permanently laid off by McKinnon Industries of St. Catharines Ontario and are not receiving the transitional assistance benefits; and that of the 240 females only 120 have been certified and of the 660 males only 255 have been certified by the adjustment assistance board. May I ask the minister what action will be taken by his department to see that these people receive the TAB payments to which they are entitled?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, about an hour before I came to the house I received a telegram containing information along the lines of that in the question just asked by the hon. gentleman. I have asked for an up to date report on it and expect to receive it at about four o'clock this afternoon. I will be guided in any action I may take by the contents of that report.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Mr. Douglas: I have a supplementary question. Has the minister received any complaint to the effect that the union has not been able to secure from the adjustment assistance board the names of those certified, and has not been able to get an interview with the board? Can the minister deal with that matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I will have to take notice of this supplementary question.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When the minister is looking into this matter will he enjoin the members of the adjustment assistance board to give an opportunity to the local union officials to meet with the board and review the situation; because according to the telegram received this unemployment is a direct result of the automobile agreement.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, the government has no wish or intention to give direction to a board headed by a Canadian of the outstanding abilities of Professor Bladen. However, I will see to it that the right hon. gentleman's request is passed on to Professor Bladen.

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON ELECTION EXPENSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi in his capacity as chairman of the committee on privileges and elections. My question is related to the one asked by the hon. member for Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie. In order that we may study the matter of campaign fund contributions to political parties may I ask the hon. member when he intends to call that committee together so we can deal with the report of the election expenses committee?

Mr. G. Roy McWilliam (Northumberland-Miramichi): It is planned to call a meeting of the committee just as soon as possible. I think all hon. members will agree there is great difficulty in getting enough members to form a quorum for a meeting owing to the fact that too many committee meetings are being held at this time. However, a meeting will be called as soon as possible.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

TRANSACTIONS RESPECTING RAILWAY GRADE CONSTRUCTION CONTRACTORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Now that the minister has had time to rest following the passage of his transportation bill may I ask him whether he has had time to give attention to a matter which has been pending now for about three years, I believe, namely that involving the Canadian National Railways and three or four railway grade construction contractors who are facing bankruptcy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As the hon. member said himself, this matter has been pending for a few years. I suggest that in view of these circumstances it cannot be asked at this time.

Mr. Schreyer: I would point out with respect, sir—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

COAL

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NEGOTIATIONS WITH JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and ask whether he is in a position now to make a statement concerning the negotiations which have been taking place over the past three years between the coal operators in the Crowsnest pass area and the Japanese coal industry.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the minister is not in a position to make that statement because unfortunately he is not here this afternoon, but I will take up the matter with him.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF COLLECTIVE BARGAINING SYSTEM

The house resumed, from Friday, February 17, consideration in committee of Bill C-170 respecting employer and employee relations in the public service of Canada—Mr. Pearson—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: When we rose on Friday, February 17, we were considering clause 36 at page 20 of the bill.

On clause 36—Specification of process for resolution of disputes.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Chairman, last Friday when I called it five o'clock, I was asking the government to stand this clause, and I had not quite finished my comments. I am pleased to see that those who wish to speak to the clause will probably have the opportunity to repeat their request to the government.

Further to my intervention on Friday with respect to the clause dealing with the process for resolution of disputes, we see that there are only two ways of settling disputes in this day and age: conciliation and compulsory arbitration.

It was not my intention to take part in this debate last Friday, because I trusted the government, the governor in council would be able to deal with any particular dispute. But I could hardly hold on to my seat after hearing the statements made by the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Pelletier). The hon. gentleman's opinions have always been very different from those of citizens who advocate peaceful and orderly action.

His revolutionary ideas are known across the land. That is why we must denounce them as a national plague. He maintains, in fact, that the right to strike is normal; in his opinion, it is not to be used as a last resort, while union leaders who are not yet socialists consider it as a drastic measure. Striking is akin to revolution against the authority, and I maintain that it is an exceptional measure, that it is abnormal, contrary to what the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Pelletier) has said.

We should study the possibility of passing an act setting out bargaining procedure intent on avoiding the drastic measure at all cost, namely striking, because in the public service, striking attacks a general right. I know this does not suit our petty socialists who need revolutions to slither into power and then do away with the workers' rights. Do you want an example? Go and try to have a single strike in Russia, and it will not be long before you wind up in a concentration camp.

Mr. Chairman, the people of Canada today fear an oncoming revolution provoked by socialist elements that we meet every day and when we see, as I was in a position to observe last Friday, the minister himself consult with socialists in the lobbies, I can assure you that our fears are intensified. Those great socialists, some of who have reached the highest level of management within our social, political and economic institutions, advance at the cry of liberty and ride rough-shod over the most sacred rights of millions of workers, if not the population as a whole.

They start by deducting compulsory dues from the workers' pay cheques, in order to guarantee salaries of $25,000, $35,000, $45,000 or more to prominent union leaders—after all, one must make a living—without guaranteeing anything in return. I have had an opportunity to note this fact in many contacts with unions, such as the railway workers union, etc.

The hon. member for Hochelaga said that never had a union leader used his influence to call a strike. The hon. member should talk to some former strikers of the Aluminum Company in Arvida. Let him suggest to them to strike again and he will see what the workers think of strikes organized by some union leaders.

We are against all strikes, just as the great majority of workers who are forced to use that very dangerous weapon today. That is why, on consideration of this bill, we are asking the 265 hon. members to study the possibility of setting up immediately a permanent non political commission having the necessary powers to ward off that national evil forever. Thus, while sparing our country the experience of the socialist countries, we will guarantee to the workers their rights, while admitting the rights of the employers, and especially while considerng as most sacred the rights of society in general.

Once again, what our people are wishing for is to live in peace and security, guaranteeing our citizens their freedom of action. To achieve that, everyone must accept at the start the principle of authority which is seriously threatened today.

Anarchy has always led to blood baths; let us keep in mind that those who accept the principle have already agreed to the unfortunate consequences. The premonitory sign of all this is when you hear the cry: Down with the authority.

Mr. Chairman, are there not signs in some areas of the country? This is only a warning that I give in passing and I urge you to read the headlines of certain newspapers, to watch television, the perfect haunt of some well-known socialists. Look at some of them parading with banners which, in the name of freedom, insult established authority.

[Mr. Gauthier.]

Mr. Chairman, in the presence of such chaos, I think we could repeat this old saying: "Liberty, what crimes are committed in thy name."

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to amplify the few remarks I made last Friday on clause 36. I wish to make it abundantly clear at the outset that so far as the public service commission that is being set up is concerned I have no criticism of the conscientious and constructive work that committee did in connection with these three bills. These bills are extremely technical and of course the livelihood of over 200,000 public servants is bound up with these bills which deal with this very sensitive field. The work of the committee has resulted in very bold and enlightened legislation which extends for the first time the right of collective bargaining to civil servants as well as the right to political participation, with some reservations, on a national basis.

The man who was the catalyst in respect of this piece of legislation, Mr. Heeney, prepared a report entitled "Report of the Preparatory Committee on Collective Bargaining", to which reference was made the other day. Mr. Heeney testified before the committee and, as indicated on page 346 of the committee evidence, referred to these three bills as revolutionary in concept. Near the bottom of page 346 Mr. Heeney is reported as having said:

> These measures would vest new and important responsibilities in employee organizations and in the Treasury Board—

On page 347 Mr. Heeney refers to these bills again and is reported as having said:

> —they would confer on organized employees a capacity—I am talking now of the present legislation before you—unmatched, I believe, in any public service of comparable size to protect their interests and improve their conditions of employment.

The minister himself in giving evidence before the committee, as reported at page 199, refers to the proposed legislation as introducing reforms in the internal administration of the public service which have only one parallel in our history, namely, the reforms brought about by the Civil Service Act of 1918. The debate on the Civil Service Act of 1918 lasted six days and was primarily concerned with ensuring security for the employeees and removing the large degree of patronage which had bothered the public service up to that time. The general remarks which I may direct to this bill at this time are not directed against the committee or the public service but are directed against clause 36. I believe that even though a great deal of labour has gone into the production of this bold and enlightened legislation, it is the duty of all members, regardless of whether they were on that committee, to scrutinize the legislation as a whole or any section of it and to criticize any principle which a member believes is not soundly based.

I want to make it clear that when I criticize the principle contained in clause 36 I am not directing my remarks to the right of labour in general to strike. I am not suggesting that the bill be delayed. It has had a long period of incubation and it should proceed. I know that the public service is awaiting passage of the bill. Clause 36 for the first time in Canada, gives the public service the right to strike, and I find that offensive. I believe that this clause is dangerous in effect, has a dubious origin and is unnecessary. It gives a licence to strike by legislation, a right found in only two other countries in the world, namely, France and Sweden. I understand, according to the preparatory report of Mr. Heeney, that even in France there is the right for the government to interdict the right to strike if necessary.

While in general the bill is bold and while in particular I am only against clause 36, I frankly resent some of the comments which were made on Friday. The hon. member for Hochelaga, in referring to his Olympian oracle and speaking from a philosophic ivory tower, suggested that to take a stand against the bill was the popular thing to do. To have his second words in this chamber on that point is something I personally resent. He can make his Olympian and Delphic oracle contribution from his philosophic ivory tower, but I would have hoped that he could offer more than that to the debate.

So far as the fish or fowl argument is concerned and some of the criticisms of hon. members that the bill puts fish or fowl into the legislation, the people in the public service who are closest to us physically are the staff members of the Senate and House of Commons in contrast to the other public servants across the country, so I suggest that "fish or fowl" really is not an apt analogy. There is no attempt here to make fish out of fowl or fowl out of fish. Those two species are in different environments. In Canada there are two different environments, the public sector and the private sector. This is recognized by the bill in the exclusion of the House of Commons staff, the Senate staff, members of the armed services and other groups, people within the fish environment or the fowl environment, depending on the analogy.

With regard to taking a position on the right to strike it is suggested that one cannot take a position on the question if one does not hear the briefs or listen to the witnesses. There are, however, minutes of the committee hearings available to us. I suggest you do not have to be a doctor to recognize a pregnant lady. I suggest further that in this analogy you do not have to be involved in all the technical, complicated aspects of this legislation which I am not involved in and obviously do not understand, to recognize one of the basic principles besides political participation for public servants, and that is the right of collective bargaining which can lead to the right to strike. This principle does not involve technical grounds. Accordingly one can constructively criticize the work of the committee in producing clause 36 of the bill which provides for the right to strike.

The hon. member said it was unfortunate to see someone rather youthful criticize this clause of the bill. I suggest that the hon. member knows full well that only two other provinces of Canada, Saskatchewan and Quebec, have anything close to clause 36. In Ontario the rights of public servants are settled by compulsory arbitration. I am informed that Sweden and France, as somewhat reluctantly and hesitantly admitted by the minister on Friday, are the only two countries where there is the right to strike. England, which has a pretty advanced social conscience and legislative record, resolves differences in that country by compulsory arbitration or agreement.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is not true.

Mr. Nowlan: I read from page 21 of the Heeney report, the report of the preparatory committee on collective bargaining:

> In 1925, the employee organizations and the United Kingdom government signed an arbitration agreement which provided for the referral to a civil service arbitration tribunal of disagreements relating to "emoluments, weekly hours of work, and leave". The tribunal consists of a chairman appointed by the minister of labour after consultation with the parties and two members named by the chairman from panels of individuals representative of the interests of the official and staff sides.
> It should be noted that the Whitley Council system has no statutory base. Its mechanisms and processes have been provided for, over the years, in a number of statements of government policy and in agreements between the official and staff sides.

It should also be noted that there is no statutory reference in the United Kingdom—

All I said, Mr. Chairman, was that there was no statutory reference in the United Kingdom—

—to strike action by public servants. The government's policy in this regard was stated in 1946 in the following words:

"...nothing that we propose to do now will make it any more legal than it is today for civil servants to take strike action...I take the opportunity of making it quite clear that this government, like any government as an employer, would feel itself perfectly free to take any disciplinary action in any strike situation that might develop..."

Yet in clause 36 in this piece of legislation we are setting up the machinery for the very strike action that the Heeney report criticized, a right which, according to the quotation I have given the government of the United Kingdom said it would take action against.

Mr. Benson: Would the hon. member permit a question? Perhaps I could ask two questions and clear them both up at the same time. Does the hon. member realize that in the British legislation there is no prohibition of the right to strike? That is my first question. My second question is: Given no prohibition of the right to strike, which we also did not have in Canadian legislation, is it not better to provide in legislation procedures whereby there can be consultation and conciliation before strike action rather than have strike action taken summarily?

Mr. Nowlan: In answer to the first question may I say I am perfectly aware that there is no prohibition of the right to strike. But the reason I read that section from the Heeney report, containing the United Kingdom's statement of policy in 1946, is the inference that can be drawn, I suggest to the minister, that if strike action was taken the government of that country would take disciplinary action. We are not even stopping at that point but are going on to set up strike procedures.

So far as the second question is concerned, I am in full agreement with one of the main principles of this bill, which is to set up the process of collective bargaining. I mentioned that on Friday. You carry on consultation, hope to finish any dispute by conciliation but then, as recommended by the Heeney report, you resolve it by compulsory arbitration.

Mr. Benson: I wonder whether the hon. member would allow me to ask a third and concluding question. Does he not realize that here just as in Britain parliament has the ultimate right to act if the public interest is affected by a strike that might result after all the normal processes provided in this legislation have been exhausted?

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, obviously I would have to agree. We have exercised this right recently. Obviously parliament should have this right. But my objection is that by setting up the machinery you are accentuating the right to strike. We are now silent on this and I suggest we should remain silent.

To return to the remarks made about youth I point out that Mr. Heeney, who has had much more experience in the civil service than I will ever have, prepared a paper on this question. Either the report of the Glassco commission or the Heeney report was the original stimulus for this legislation. His terms of reference were confined by the Prime Minister to making a study of arbitration procedures but he sets out—and he is no youthful man in the context of real youth—his objections to giving the right to strike. He also set out his objections in evidence before the committee. On page 24 of his report the following statement appears:

After reviewing the principles underlying industrial relations law and practice in Canada and the experience of other public services in Canada and elsewhere, and taking into account the traditions and operating requirements of the Public Service of Canada, the preparatory committee, in its early deliberations, came to the conclusion that an appropriate system of collective bargaining and arbitration for the Public Service should have a number of basic characteristics.

A number of these are set out, Mr. Chairman, the second of which is:

It should make available, for use at the initiation of either party under prescribed conditions, machinery for the arbitration of issues on which agreement cannot be reached in negotiation.

I suggest that Mr. Heeney was not too youthful to present that view. Certainly that has been the experience in England and Australia, which also has a pretty advanced social conscience. I quote from page 23 of the report:

In Australia, it is mandatory for all labour-management disputes, including those relating to the public service, to be submitted to a conciliation and arbitration process. Arbitral awards are legally binding.

So you have compulsory arbitration in Australia. The United States is the closest free enterprise country to Canada geographically. An interesting statement is found on page 22 of the report. In dealing with the United States the report says:

> The compensation, hours of work and other conditions of employment of employees of the United States government are to a large extent determined by Congress. To this extent, the executive is not in a position to bargain collectively with employee representatives.

At the top of page 23 of the report appears this sentence:

> No employee of the United States government may participate in a strike. An employee so doing is subject to immediate dismissal and is ineligible for re-employment for a period of three years.

• (3:40 p.m.)

So we have three countries, all more advanced and with longer experience in labour relations procedures than ourselves, and one of the most knowledgeable men in the public service, Mr. Heeney, all saying that the right to strike should be curtailed. Mr. Heeney gave his views before the committee. Members who did not attend the sessions are able to read those views. They are set out on page 351. Some of his evidence is worth repeating, though I will not repeat ad nauseam. He describes the difference between the private and public sectors and on page 352 he says that the unique characteristic of the public service is that those exercising the highest responsibilities were elected to office in part by the employees themselves. This raises most relevant questions. He also says on page 352 that the interest of the whole Canadian community is paramount. He states on that page:

> —we were not persuaded that the parties in bargaining could always be depended upon to preserve the public interest in these two vital areas—

That is Mr. Heeney's view. On page 354 he suggests, and this is his personal view, that compulsory arbitration should be provided. That seems to be his position as I read his evidence. The majority of the staff associations do not want the right to strike; they want the right to compulsory arbitration. Mr. Heeney suggests on page 355:

> —there is little doubt in my mind that the demand of the large majority of organized employees in the public service for binding arbitration and the larger and more evident protection which that method—that is, arbitration—of resolving disputes would provide for essential public services, would, almost certainly in my judgment, have led the preparatory committee to propose provision in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act itself for the arbitration of public service disputes.

He admits that is his personal view, but he does not hedge. Nor is that a naïve view of youth. On page 357 he says that the recommendations of the preparatory committee are imaginative and even bold and radical. He states:

> We do not feel that we have produced a reactionary document. We feel that we have produced a document which deserves a place in the progress of the Public Service of Canada, which is progressive and which does introduce, or would introduce, if accepted, a new relationship between the government as employer and its employees, which would be healthy, consistent with the principles of the outside sector and in every way constructive and advantageous to the employees.

Note, Mr. Chairman, that he did not go as far as the legislation has. One has only to look at the province of Quebec to see the potential dangers inherent in the right to strike where a third party, the public, is involved. Where the public interest is involved I suggest it is reasonable and not reactionary to call for compulsory arbitration between the parties. That is the method adopted by most countries except France and Sweden. The proposals in this bill are of dubious value. One need only look at what the minister said on page 204 to realize this. He stated:

> The preparatory committee, in its July 1965 report, recommended a process of dispute settlement which would remove from the government its traditional authority for unilateral determination of the terms and conditions of employment of public servants, by providing employee organizations who had won bargaining rights, with the right to invoke arbitration which would be binding on the employer, the bargaining agent and the employees concerned. This was precisely the kind of dispute settlement process that most employee organizations had sought for many years, and which the principal associations continued to endorse. The government's response to the proposal of the preparatory committee was positive. In the view of the government the proposed approach to dispute settlement would provide the majority of employees—

He refers to the majority of employees. I continue with the minister's words uttered on June 28, 1966:

> —with the kind of system they had asked for and the Canadian public with the optimum protection against the disruption of public services. The basic concept appeared to be a good one, requiring only a slight amendment to make it quite clear that the government as employer would, in fact, be bound by the awards of the arbitration tribunal.

Then he adds:

> At about the same time that the preparatory committee reported, it became increasingly clear that members of employee organizations in the Post Office Department opposed the recommended system of dispute settlement as a matter of principle. In this position they were supported by spokesmen for organized labour in other areas of the community.

Public Service Collective Bargaining

In the circumstances, the government decided to accommodate the views of those who were opposed to arbitration in principle by including in the legislation an alternative process of dispute settlement directly comparable to that provided in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. The basic decision to provide for two separate and distinct dispute settlement processes created a new and unprecedented situation.

It seems, from the minister's words, that compulsory arbitration would have fulfilled the demands of the majority of the associations involved. It appears that the postal workers did not care for this arrangement, and some evidence of that may be found on page 301 in Mr. Kay's brief. I hesitate to suggest that the postal workers were effective in changing the legislation from that providing for compulsory arbitration to its present form, but as found on page 301 Mr. Kay said to the committee:

We are certain it is no secret to the hon. members of this committee that a majority of the members of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers are prepared on very short notice to withhold their labour power in order to achieve one or the other of these two objectives: either that the I.R.D.I. act be opened to permit postal workers to bargain under its procedures by direct amendment of that statute or, the conversion of the Post Office Department to a crown corporation. We would not pretend to influence this committee by threat, and we want it clearly understood that no threat is being made; we are merely informing the committee of the deep and abiding sincerity in which postal workers approach the issue of full and free collective bargaining.

If collective bargaining is approached in that spirit there can be no objection to it. Yet I wonder what effect the postal union brief had in changing the final intention of the government as set out by the minister in June and as first proposed in this legislation. Regardless of what the postal unions say, it is my belief that the majority of the associations want the arbitration procedure. In that connection I refer to the Woods committee. There is merit in the suggestion that the postal workers be part of a crown corporation. I say that the right to strike ought to have been excluded from this legislation. The majority of the staff associations do not want it.

I believe the minister said on Friday that the associations will not use that right as the public is against it. When one looks at legislation in other areas, including Saskatchewan and Quebec, and sees what the right of strike in legislation does, the government should consider seriously removing the present clause. The staff closest to us in the house—and we are supposed to be model employers—are not included in this bill. They are not in the legislation. This bill seems to make fish and fowl of the same matter at the same time. In accommodating one group of Canadians the minister has forgotten the rights of all Canadians, including the majority of those affected by this bill.

The Chairman: Shall clause 36 carry?

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Chairman, I have some observations to make on this clause, particularly after listening to some hon. members who spoke last Friday. To a great extent I agree with the principles enunciated by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings so far as the right to strike is concerned. I was surprised when I read the opinions expressed by the hon. member for Hochelaga last Friday in this connection. He has astonished me before and he has done so again. I do not know whether these somersaults are typical of him. I had taken him to be a man of fairly sound judgment. He brought in such things as freedom of speech, freedom of association, freedom of the press—all those freedoms which are mentioned in the Bill of Rights. But there is a limit to all these freedoms. Duplessis once said that everybody was talking about rights and nobody was talking about obligations.

I recognize that strikes are a means to an end, not a goal. Strikes are an extreme method of reaching an understanding between the parties concerned. Even so, there are occasions when the government has to step in and block strikes as was the case in the province of Quebec last week. As a former teacher in that province I fully realize that the salaries, working hours and teaching conditions needed improvement. But is it right for an improvement to be brought about at the expense of hundreds of thousands of students who have been wasting their time when they ought to have been following their studies?

We may suffer injustice as individuals but we cannot take strike action when such action will cause social injustice. Two wrongs do not make a right. We need freedom of speech, and we will use it. Freedom of the press is most useful during negotiations. The hon. member for Hochelaga said he had never known organized labour to take advantage of such a situation because those involved in the dispute on the labour side used their own good judgment. They do. Sometimes, however, the workers concerned are not in a position to see the over-all picture. They are not the ones who sit around the table and they are not always given an exact picture when their negotiators come back to them. In the case of the teachers' strike, the negotiations went on behind closed doors. This displeased the public because it was the public which was paying and suffering.

I was myself an executive of a labour organization in my district and I know that on occasions it is necessary to straighten out some of one's own colleagues. The workers can use their good judgment and reason things out if they have all the evidence. But they do not always have access to this evidence; we do not always give it to them.

When workers depend on organized labour to do their negotiating for them, let the negotiating be done honestly and pursued until there is no longer a possibility of reaching a common accord. At that point a mediator has to be called in, and if this is not enough other action may have to be taken to end the dispute. At least we might expect to see a non-political organization established to deal with some of these disputes in their final stages so that the government itself would not be bound to intervene directly every time a serious difficulty arises. If the hon. member for Hochelaga believes there has never been any brainwashing, that is his business. I am very willing to have regard for the employees' side but I also have to consider the management side because the fault is not always on one side.

If we were to eliminate the right of association we would be going far beyond what is called for in any democratic country. But the right to associate does not mean the right to cause national chaos. We do not allow our economic affairs to be controlled by cartels. When cartels or monopolies are formed the government steps in and breaks them up. Similarly we should not allow any association, because of its size or its influence, to exercise monopoly power over the economy or over the rights of the Canadian people as a whole.

Let me refer again to the latest strike which occurred in my own province. Every one of the children affected had the right to go to school, the right to receive an education. I must say I do not like the way in which the vote was taken. Just over 5,000 people voted. The question was put this way: "Do you wish to stop the strike, or continue it? Do you wish to stop it on Monday or Wednesday, or continue?" There were three questions in one. In the result, out of the 5,000 who voted 3,000 voted in favour of stopping the strike that morning. That was the result of the secret ballot. I still say that the vote was not carried out in an honest manner. When the result was announced, there was an uproar in the hall. These people were happy to quit striking; they were happy it was over. But the way the question was put was dishonest. These 5,000 people should have been asked: "Do you want to quit striking tomorrow morning or vote on the Wednesday issue?" These questions should not have been put together in the hope that the split vote would be in favour of those who wished to continue the strike. Let the hon. member for Hochelaga chew on that and digest it for a while. I sometimes doubt his reasoning because he has qualified the Liberal party as a trashcan and yet he jumps in it. Therefore I sometimes doubt what he says.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): I didn't say it; the hon. member for Hochelaga said it. I have never gone as far as to say that the Liberal party is a trashcan. He said it. You can judge for yourself, Mr. Chairman, whether that is right. I know the government does not want to abolish the right to strike but sometimes it is necessary to put a little sense into the other guy's head. Sometimes labour and management go to extremes. We have to arrive at some sort of set-up to deal with these problems before they create a crisis and a national calamity. We had many of these problems last year. I suggest that the government should establish a permanent board to deal with labour-management disputes. It should not be a political board. The board should be able to deal with these problems before they become national crises. Some people will not accept a mediator to settle their disputes. I think we will have to consider at some time setting up a permanent board to deal with situations where there seem to be no possibility of the parties involved reaching agreement. In these situations a mediator can make a clear, concise judgment with which both parties should comply.

This may be considered to be an extreme way of dealing with this problem, but I would point out that when you come before a court it is also an extreme way of dealing with problems. If you cause social injustice and go beyond your rights you appear before a judge, who is an arbitrator, and the judge will make a decision whether you are in the right or should pay the penalty for being in the wrong.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit me to ask a question? Does the hon. member realize that under this legislation conciliation or arbitration is compulsory, no matter which course is taken? If you move in the direction of the right to strike, conciliation is compulsory before there is the ultimate right to strike. If you move through the arbitration channel, you may move directly from negotiation to arbitration and skip the conciliation channel.

Mr. Langlois (Méganiic): I agree with the minister, Mr. Chairman; I go along with that. There is always a possibility that there will be a strike and therefore I have doubts about this matter. I wonder what the law would do if because of a strike people not directly affected were caused hardship? I saw this happen in 1949. There was a miners' strike in my region, and as a result of that strike the miners are extremely careful about striking again. In 1949 many families suffered hardship as a result of the strike and some bills have still not been paid. If the housewives had the vote I think the picture would be somewhat different. We may have the right as individuals to cause our own families some hardship through not providing them with the necessities of life, but if by a strike we cause other people hardship it is a different matter.

I am not reassured about the question of strike. I said it was an extreme means to be used very sparingly, if used at all. I know that in this bill there is the possibility of negotiation or arbitration, which is the normal procedure. These matters have to come to a head at some time and if we cannot solve them by discussion somebody has to make a decision. The government may always keep this one door open, but they should take the steps necessary to enact legislation that will help to solve these problems. I am talking about compulsory arbitration.

I wonder whether, rather than having a different person appointed every time to solve these disputes, we could not set up a non-political board to deal with them. If it was not a non-political board I would not want a board established. Such a board would have the same effect as a judge in a court. Its members would make decisions the same as a judge. We rely on the judgment of a magistrate or judge in other matters. In a capital murder case we rely on their decision when a person's life is involved. Therefore why should we not rely on the judgment of such a person in labour-management disputes? There would not be just one judge involved but a permanent board which would be able to solve these problems to the satisfaction of the parties. In this way the government would be left as far as possible out of this type of dispute. We are legislators; we are not judges to rule on these questions after legislation has been passed. It is our duty to enact the necessary legislation, but the machinery must be provided to make the legislation effective once it has been passed. A great deal of the legislation now on the statute books is as dead as any old wood you can find along a river bank because we have never applied it or perhaps have not the necessary equipment with which to apply it.

This is the problem that we face today in strikes and labour-management disputes. We should have on our statute books very efficient legislation with the equipment necessary to keeep the legislation well oiled at all times to face any emergency before the dispute becomes a national crisis. We should not have to run to parliament to take drastic action when a labour-management dispute reaches national proportions.

I have in mind what the minister has said about compulsory arbitration and negotiation, but I believe we should establish a permanent board to deal with these matters rather than having one man, and a different one every time, deal with them. The government could keep a close watch on the board. In this way we would be able to deal with problems perhaps before they arise. In other words, we could deal with the chicken before it is hatched and prevent a great many troubles that now now beset our society. The purpose is mainly to prevent social injustice. I think we should have as much confidence in a board set up to deal with some of the management-labour disputes that arise today as we have in the judges and magistrates who are appointed to our courts.

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Chairman, the speeches we have just heard show exactly how a Conservative and a Liberal mind differ. A Conservative mind wants all legislation to be tried out by others, or at the expense of others, whereas a Liberal mind is ready to take the risk and try the experiment. In fact, by saying that the right to strike is not recognized by the majorty but merely by some countries in the world and that we should not therefore grant this right in Canada, people only prove that we should precisely await the results of all experiments and then follow the procedure used elsewhere.

Personally, I am proud of the fact that civil servants have been granted the right to strike in my province. I am proud of the fact that my country today is one of the first in the world to take a chance on granting its civil servants the right to strike, to take the consequences and to live through this experience with them.

We are not granting a negative right when we grant the right to strike. On the contrary, we are granting and recognizing a positive right which every member of a free society must enjoy.

It has been said that all employee associations are not urgently demanding the right to strike. I submit that the time is ripe for granting the right to strike. If we wait until conditions become intolerable, if we wait until a knife is put to our throats, so to speak, the associations not being in the mood for discussion any more, then granting public service employees the right to strike under such conditions would mean granting them a right which they would exercise immediately, probably without any regard for law and order. But if we grant it now, while conditions are favourable, at a time when both parties negotiate in an atmosphere of mutual confidence, we will be taking advantage of a unique opportunity to recognize a fundamental right.

Furthermore, in establishing beforehand procedures for the settlement of disputes, we are being wise; we are making provision for future ills, in order to better cure them, because when we find ourselves in the midst of a strike or faced with imminent strike action, we always deplore the fact that no provisions have been made for adequate and flexible machinery for the settlement of disputes, in a way that would be acceptable to both parties. That is when we find ourselves in impossible situations.

On the contrary, when we are in a favourable climate today and give the right to strike to those who are not pressing for it, we are simply recognizing a basic right belonging to any man in an up-to-date and well-balanced society. A basic right, especially if we resort to an analogy and compare it to what is happening as regards private enterprise. In fact, in the public and semi-public service fields, which still belong to private enterprise, we recognize, as regards the worker, the right to go on strike in order to settle his dispute.

Why should the government, which assumes a primary responsibility concerning society, stop setting an example and provide machinery that could be applied in other fields and more especially in the public field? Why should not the government take the initiative of recognizing such a basic right on the part of its employees? Because as far as civil servants are concerned, we are definitely on the footing of employer and employees, which means that we must assume exactly the same responsibilities and not fall back upon the absence of a legislation or act as cowards concerning modern disputes which we shall have to face sooner or later, and it is better sooner than later if we do not want stagnation.

It is too often forgotten that employees do not strike from inclination. When employees strike, it is really because they are fed up and negotiations are no longer possible if that method is not used as a last resort. And the first generally to suffer the after effects of a strike are precisely those who launch it, because they have self-respect, they respect their rights and will have them respected and I believe it is honourable for them to share such risks.

So the risks are not all on the same side. In fact, the risks are on both sides and to think otherwise is to be behind the times and backwards; the facts must be faced.

What is the right to strike today? Is it being exercised only by totally and definitely refraining from work? No. There are many ways to strike today, ways that hurt and annoy the employer as much as using the right to a full strike.

Employees can hold study sessions which are just as harmful to smooth operation of business or government. They can stage a work to order strike which would be just as harmful to a government or a company.

Today, it is not by holding a big stick over employees, by enacting legislation or creating intolerable psychological conditions that we can make them work. Employees must work in a climate of mutual confidence and, if this is lacking, employees must be granted the right to go to the root of the problem in order to discuss it thoroughly, with a view to restoring an atmosphere of confidence. I feel that those who refuse to grant this right are admitting in advance that the climate with respect to relations within the Canadian government can become and could very well be intolerable.

On the other hand, if we admit that this fundamental right can be exercised as stipulated in the bill, we are creating an atmosphere of confidence which the Canadian parliament can be proud of, on both sides of the house.

I hope that there will be enough members of parliament to show to Canada, to the labour world in Canada as well as to the whole world that a government can assume its responsibilities, as much as possible unanimously.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Simard: Mr. Chairman, the brief remarks I want to submit to the attention of hon. members are prompted by the brief of the Civil Service Federation of Canada. In the short time allowed me, I will not try to make an exhaustive study of such a complex question but I want to point out to the house the recommendations and suggestions made by the employees concerned who had the opportunity to study the proposals of the preparatory committee which submitted its report in July 1965.

In order to respect the order of precedence which must be observed in the preparation of the bill under consideration, I should first of all talk about the 66 negotiating units proposed by the preparatory committee; I will refrain from going into such a complex question to deal mainly with negotiations and arbitration.

First of all, it is of prime importance that the employees be grouped according to their job when determining salaries. This basic principle is recognized and fully endorsed by the Civil Service Federation which claims that this can be achieved by having, as a bargaining agent for the public service, that organization or group of organizations which represents the majority of employees coming under collective bargaining in the public service.

It seems that the suggestions of the Civil Service Federation of Canada did not meet with the approval of the preparatory committee, although they have some merit; civil servants have proposed a compromise which legislators might consider more suitable.

Here is what they suggest: "Each job category that comes under negotiations might be considered as a bargaining unit and be represented by the employee association or a combination of the employee associations which represent the majority of employees in the particular job category."

I would not be prone to say that such a policy of compromise would guarantee full consistency in the field of social benefits, but one could reasonably infer that it would be possible to ensure the necessary consistency in the employment classes, without eliminating for all that the idea of a spread between classes. Nevertheless, I wish to point out that the suggestion of having bargaining agents based upon classes will never change our staunch conviction that "only one bargaining unit" with "only one bargaining agent" would be the most desirable system. It is, in other words, the limit of concessions that will be agreed upon by the Canadian Civil Service Federation.

Now, what should be the primary quality of the dispute settling system? It is a matter of common knowledge that the Civil Service Federation has always claimed that "collective bargaining for the federal civil service should contain provisions stipulating that cases under dispute should be settled by means of arbitration, by an impartial and independent arbitration tribunal and that the decision given by such an arbitration tribunal would be binding on both parties to the dispute". Such is the principle that was advocated from the outset of negotiations for collective bargaining for the public service, and the employees will not allow such a principle to be done away with.

Before the 1963 election, officers of the Civil Service Federation wrote to the leaders of the main political parties to find out their position concerning possible conventions or negotiations between the federal government and public service employees. The present right hon. Prime Minister, (Mr. Pearson), then leader of the opposition, explained as follows in his answer the position of his party:

> —the Civil Service should be granted the right to negotiate and to have recourse to arbitration, although it should be recognized at the same time that parliamentary supremacy makes it impossible to grant the right to strike.

This was a rather disquieting and disconcerting statement coming from a party leader who, today, by the wish and majority of the Canadian electorate, has become Prime Minister of our country. The Civil Service Federation accepted this position as explained on the assumption that an arbitral award would be binding on both parties to a dispute. In their discussions with the preparatory committee, the officials of the Federation based their suggestions on this principle of compulsory arbitration and binding awards.

If hon. members will give careful consideration to the report of the preparatory committee, they will find that the public service staff relations bill empowers the government, under clause 66, to > amend, set aside or suspend the operation of the whole or any part of an arbitral award.

Is it right to think that the government, an all-powerful oligarchy, wants to assume the right or power not to comply with, or submit to, an arbitral award? If so, one may doubt its good faith and, if such is the case, the Civil Service Federation will seek a compensatory power as well as the assurance that strikes will not be prohibited. On the other hand, if clause 66 is struck out and the government-employer sincerely rejects the idea of vetoing an arbitral award, then the Civil Service Federation will most likely be prepared to reconsider its own position in regard to the prohibition of strikes.

I feel I can assure the government that the mutual confidence between the two parties concerned will be the best guarantee of genuine and close co-operation with respect to the settlement of any dispute which could arise between them; this is surely the first consideration of the Civil Service Federation, and it must also be that of the government. On this condition alone, can the people of Canada in general be assured that essential services will be maintained. For all these reasons, it is preferable to accept a system providing for immediate recourse to impartial and independent arbitration, binding upon both parties, instead of this inadequate solution, just come out of thin air.

There is also another anomaly causing the Civil Service Federation considerable concern. The proposed legislation seems to ignore the part to be played by long established employee associations in various departments, in a collective bargaining system or in the settlement of problems at the departmental level. I realize that deputy ministers are being granted more and more authority in the administration of their department, but I cannot find in the proposed legislation particular provisions with respect to solving problems inherent in each department.

Employees of the public service, through the Civil Service Federation, recognize the fact that the governor in council will have the duty to appoint the members of the Public Service Staff Relations Board and the chairman of the arbitration tribunal. Hence, they have the right to hope and strongly recommend that the selection of the chairman of the arbitration tribunal be recognized and accepted officially by the two parties concerned and to their mutual and common satisfaction; I am in a position to tell the hon. members, taking as a basis the recommendations outlined in the brief of the Civil Service Federation, that that requirement must be included in any eventual collective agreement of the public service.

I strongly recommend that the Public Service Staff Relations Board be established as soon as possible after the passage of the bills; by the same token, certification should be granted without delay to the bargaining agents.

The official recognition of those rights and privileges will have the beneficial effect of curbing and checking all types of pressures on the part of organizations which seek to interfere with the representation of civil servants.

There is another point on which the Civil Service Federation will be adamant and will not accept; it is the restriction of matters subject to arbitration set forth in the proposed pieces of legislation and included in the report of the preparatory committee. Mr. Chairman, why establish such a distinction between matters which may be negotiated and those which may be subject to arbitration? Cannot both be submitted to a arbitration court, if necessary? In my opinion, it is essential that appropriate legislative measures lay down fair settlement procedures for grievances in all fields where they may arise.

For quite a long time, the Civil Service Federation has been clamouring for collective bargaining legislation, but first of all, for the benefit of its members, it is calling for perfect legislation, in so far as possible. The Federation is happy at the government provisions to establish a collective bargaining system for the public service but at the same time, it is concerned over the means the lawmakers will use to introduce into the statutes legislation likely to maintain peace, order and good will between employer and employees. Whatever legislation is passed, they both will have to live with it; at all costs, the errors made in the civil service legislation of 1962 must be avoided, for this act failed to fulfil the hopes of its sponsors.

• (4:30 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: I should like to ask the minister a question of which I have given him casual notice. Does he not believe that the passage of clause 36, since the federal parliament is the first legislature of the land and the alleged leader, is going to create a precedent which will cause pressure to be applied on all other public bodies at both the provincial and municipal levels to establish a similar strike procedure, notwithstanding the fact that compulsory arbitration is the final solution to labour difficulties in those areas?

Mr. Benson: Undoubtedly, Mr. Chairman, this legislation does create a precedent. However, I have not seen evidence of the fact that municipal and provincial legislative bodies have always been so enlightened as to follow previous precedents set by the federal government. I should like to point out that in many municipalities in Canada the employees already have the right to strike. I should point out that we believe this is correct legislation for the situation which exists in 1967. We feel this is realistic legislation to present to the country at this time. Our view in this regard was completely substantiated by the special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons which reported the legislation back to us in this form.

Mr. Nowlan: May I ask one more question? Can the minister tell me just where on the road to Damascus his conversion took place from the position as indicated by the Heeney report and the evidence he gave before the committee in June, 1966, I believe?

Mr. Benson: I was not a member of the preparatory committee which produced the Heeney report. This report was received by the government, considered by the government, and then the government had to prepare legislation based on the Heeney report as well as any other thoughts the government may have had at that particular time. We consider this legislation to be realistic in 1967 and we support the alternative proposals which are contained in clause 36.

The Chairman: Shall clause 36 carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 37 to 54 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 55—Authority of separate employer.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Under clause 55 dealing with a separate employer, I should like to make a very brief comment. It seems to me there may be a case to be made for treating the Post Office Department in the future as a separate employer. I am not going into the matter in detail; I just wish to raise the point. I draw attention to return No. 321A which was tabled in the House of Commons on Wednesday, February 15, in reply to a question of mine dealing with the Montpetit report. There were 282 recommendations in that report of which 35 have been implemented and 8 have been implemented in part; leaving 239 recommendations which have not yet received attention. I hope the government's record in dealing with the Montpetit report will improve considerably in the very near future. However, my point is that a case may be made for the Post Office Department being treated as a separate employer in the future.

Mr. Benson: I think a great many more of the recommendations of Mr. Justice Montpetit have been dealt with since that return was made.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The return was just presented last Wednesday, February 15.

Mr. Benson: There is a continuous action in respect of the recommendations.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I hope so.

Mr. Benson: So far as the Post Office Department being a separate employer is concerned, I simply say that it is presently a department of government under a minister. Any change from this set-up would have to be considered seriously by the government and ultimately would be a matter for decision by parliament.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I support the remarks made by the hon. member for Carleton. I have received strong representations from the Vancouver Association of Postal Workers and other organizations in this connection. I believe that the hon. gentleman was quite correct in saying there is a foundation for the postal department being treated as a separate organization.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 56 to 59 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 60—Public service arbitration tribunal established.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I believe the success of the procedure of arbitration will be in a very large measure dependent upon the quality of the person who is appointed chairman of the public service arbitration tribunal. I hope the government will spare no pains in getting a person with a wise, judicial mind to occupy that very significant position. If they do that, I believe that the road of compulsory arbitration will inevitably be chosen by almost all public service employees. I underline how significant the quality of the chairman may be.

Mr. Benson: We as a government will undertake to obtain the best possible person that we can obtain for this particular position, just as we have sought to obtain the best persons possible to work on the public service staff relations board which will in turn recommend the personnel of the arbitration tribunal.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 61 to 69 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 70—Subject matter of arbitral award.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, my colleague the hon. member for York South was called out of the chamber a few minutes ago and things have moved a little faster than expected. I know the hon. member wanted to say a few words on the question of exclusions, though this might be possible on clause 1.

We are dealing in clause 70 with the possible subject matters of an arbitral award, and as the minister will recall we have contended that these subjects should be broadened. Would, the minister care to comment on both of these matters right now?

Mr. Benson: Perhaps I might speak first with respect to the exclusion of personnel. I have made other statements outside the house, because the legislation was not before the house at the time, with respect to exclusions of management personnel and I should like to indicate that exclusions will be held to a minimum. We do not want to see a lot of people outside the collective bargaining process.

With regard to the subject matters of arbitral awards, this was gone into very carefully both by the Heeney committee in their suggestions and later by the government committee which considered this particular clause. The matter was again gone into very thoroughly by the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons, where I believe the hon. member for York South put forth his views which were very carefully considered by the committee members as well as by myself that time. We decided that this present clause could best reflect the decision arrived at by the committee and we are quite willing to accept the clause as presently framed.

After we have had some experience in dealing with collective bargaining in the public service there may be an indication that this provision should be expanded in future legislation. If this is indicated in the future and it is possible to expand it, the government will, of course, consider the matter at that time.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 71 to 77 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 78—Establishment of conciliation board where requested by either party.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, on a previous occasion I tried to get what I thought was just a change in typography agreed to but I was told this could not be done. Is it possible to correct the typographical error occurring between clauses 77 and 78 on the floor, or can it be done without too much trouble?

Mr. Benson: I have been told that it is not necessary to do it on the floor, that it is being corrected and will be taken out. It is a duplication of title.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, is the minister saying that the second title is not necessary?

Mr. Benson: That it right; it is in there twice.

Mr. Knowles: The second time there is a typographical error. Has the hon. member for York Centre noticed that?

Mr. Benson: The second title is not necessary.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister draw the attention of the Minister of Transport to this? We had some trouble with him on a matter of this kind.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 79 to 116 inclusive agreed to.

Schedule A agreed to.

On Schedule B—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, does the minister believe it will be possible to hold to the timetable set forth in schedule B? Will there be any difficulties involved in so doing?

Mr. Benson: We believe that these are the earliest possible dates. We have been moving forward as fast as we can in consultation with the staff associations to get the P.S.S.R.B. established. We have some names which are being considered for chairman, vice chairman and members, people recommended by both the employers' and employees' sides. These are the earliest possible dates, but the intention is to move forward as fast as possible.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I take it from what the minister has said that he expects to have the act proclaimed and the board appointed by February 28?

Mr. Benson: That is my fervent hope.

Schedule agreed to.

Schedules C and D agreed to.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I did ask the minister a number of questions in my initial speech, Mr. Chairman, dealing with the pay research bureau, the national joint council, the question of an advisory committee on managerial and confidential employees and the question of dealing with employees of the Senate and House of Commons. I hope the minister is in a position to answer me now.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to assure all hon. members that the government accepts the obligation to give serious consideration to the recommendations made by the joint parliamentary committee on matters related to but lying outside the scope of Bill C-170.

One of the recommendations deals with the desirability of making it possible for "persons employed in a managerial or confidential capacity" to make representations to Treasury Board on questions relating to their pay and conditions of employment. The government believes that in a genuine system of collective bargaining there must be individuals clearly identified to represent the interests of the employer, and believes further that it would be quite inappropriate to have the conditions of employment of these individuals established by the collective bargaining process povided by Bill C-170. At the same time, however, we recognize that in a large public service there may be good reason to provide machinery whereby the views of these individuals can be considered when decisions about their conditions of employment are being made.

For this reason, we will be happy to consider the recommendation of the joint committee on this matter, including that part of the recommendation that draws attention to the experience the British government has had with its standing committee on the pay of the higher civil service. I wish to say, without divulging anything more, that we are very much in favour of developing some such system.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Within six months?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, a long time ago I learned not to tie myself down to specific times in this house. We shall act with all due dispatch.

Another recommendation of the joint committee refers to the fact that employees of the Senate, House of Commons and Library of Parliament are not covered by this bill. It suggests that further legislative action be considered with a view to granting them advantages and rights similar to those provided public servants under the measure we now have before us. The government will be pleased to give consideration to this matter in consultation with representatives of all parties and the appropriate parliamentary officials. It seems to me that this is a very sensitive matter, involving in a rather direct way the rights of parliament, and will have to be treated accordingly.

In our dealings with the employees of parliament, that is, the employees of this house and of the other place, we must have a consensus of all parties as to what sort of procedure we should set up for consultation to determine rates of pay. We are, as recommended by the committee, quite willing to consider this. We shall, in consultation with representatives of the other parties in this house, consider this matter.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the minister when he intends to start these consultations? I agree, of course, that this is a special case requiring special consideration but I want to be sure it is not on the shelf for too long.

Mr. Benson: As the hon. member knows, I never keep anything on the shelf very long. I like to clear things away as fast as possible. I can assure him that we shall deal with the matter with all due dispatch.

The final recommendation contained in the sixth report of the joint committee deals with the position of the pay research bureau under collective bargaining. On an earlier occasion I indicated that the government was generally in sympathy with the recommendations of the preparatory committee on collective bargaining which favoured the continuation of an independent pay research function but called for its transfer from the Civil Service Commission to the public service staff relations board. At that time, I was unable to be more specific because it was our view that no firm decision should be made until the principal employee organizations had been given an opportunity to give us the benefit of their advice in the light of the provisions of Bill C-170.

The organizations have since been consulted and I am pleased to be able to inform hon. members that the government intends to provide for the continuation, under the aegis of the public service staff relations board, of an independent pay research bureau whose services will be available to the employers and certified bargaining agents in the public service. Arrangements for the transfer of the bureau will be made as soon as possible after the staff relations board has been appointed.

In passing I would like to pay tribute to the officers and staff of the bureau who in the past ten years, under the direction of the Civil Service Commission, have provided both the government as employer and the employee organizations with a continuing flow of information on outside rates of pay and conditions of employment, information that has made a very real contribution to the pay determination process and the development of staff relations in the public service.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Hear, hear.

Mr. Benson: It is my hope that with the continuing co-operation of the outside employers who participate in their surveys they will make a similar contribution to the success of the system of collective bargaining that is about to be introduced.

Before sitting down, Mr. Chairman, I would like to mention one other matter which, although not dealt with in the report of the joint committee, was mentioned in the debate last Friday by the hon. member for Carleton. I refer to the national joint council of the public service of Canada, which since 1944 has provided a focal point for joint consultation between representatives of the government and representatives of employee organizations.

I would like to say at this time that the government strongly supports the view that the national joint council, suitably modified in the light of the legislation now before us, should be continued. Some months ago the council in fact recommended a revised interim constitution with this in mind, one that would, among other things, provide membership on the council to all organizations certified as bargaining agents. This recommendation is now being considered by the government. In its essentials it will, I have no doubt, be endorsed and I would hope to be in a position to make an announcement on the subject soon after the passage of Bill C-170. I would like, however, to stress the fact that in the view of the government the form of the council and its method of operation should be left quite flexible for a reasonable period of time so that it can be modified to meet the needs of the parties in bargaining under the new régime.

Mr. Herridge: May I ask a question? I am not as well versed in this subject as some of our members are. The staff of the House of Commons in their various categories are, of course, not organized at the present time. What procedure will be taken to get the views of the various categories of employees on the staffs of the House of Commons and the Senate?

Mr. Benson: I mentioned this matter. I said that the staffs of the House of Commons and the Senate present a particular problem in collective bargaining. I suggested that before the government comes forward with legislation and changes the three bills involved we have consultations with the other parties in the House of Commons to determine what if any steps should be taken. As to the organization of the House of Commons staff, I leave that to my hon. friend.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I think the question just asked by my colleague has real point. I think the minister said that it was desirable to have consultation among the representatives of the parties of the house and I think he said "appropriate representatives of the employees". If those were not his words perhaps he could correct me.

Mr. Benson: I think I said "appropriate officials of the house". I was thinking of the officials responsible for employing and looking after the House of Commons staff.

Mr. Knowles: "Appropriate officials", and not "appropriate representatives of the employees", were the minister's words. On this matter the minister does not envisage the employees themselves being represented in these consultations?

Mr. Benson: That should be left to the various parties in the house when they get together to consider this matter. They should decide whether the employees should be told: "We want to proceed with this matter; would you get together and select representatives to meet with us?" As a representative of the government I should not make this kind of decision. These employees are not government employees; they are House of Commons employees. Any decision about their future must be made by the House of Commons.

Mr. Knowles: We shall accept that proposition as a fair statement of the situation provided the minister understands that we do not want this matter left on the shelf indefinitely, to use the words of my hon. friend from York South.

This is the kind of thing which could be put off from one session to another. We could easily be told six months from now that it would be better to wait until more experience had been gained in the operation of the new public service legislation. Perhaps I should warn the minister that if he fails to act on this matter he will be pressed to do so on the floor of the house. We should extend to our employees the same rights as we are extending to public servants generally, and I hope these consultations will begin to take place very soon.

Mr. Benson: I certainly do not wish that there should be any undue delay in this regard. I have learned from my experience with hon. members opposite to avoid saying that something will be done by a specific date, because it may prove impossible to do it by that date. But the hon. member knows from his experience of my conduct that I never put anything off for a long period.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I will simply say that unless the minister does act with the promptitude he has indicated he can expect harassment from this side of the house.

Clause agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

Mr. Benson moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

[Mr. Knowles.]

PUBLIC SERVICE

LEGISLATION RESPECTING EMPLOYMENT IN GOVERNMENT SERVICE

The house in committee on Bill No. C-181, respecting employment in the public service of Canada—Mr. Pearson—Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: May I draw to the attention of the committee the fact that several amendments were made when this bill was considered by the joint committee on employer-employee relations in the public service of Canada and a reprint of the bill was ordered.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Benson: I should like to say a few words at this time on Bill C-181, the proposed Public Service Employment Act which is to replace the present Civil Service Act. Specifically, I should like to recapitulate the major objectives that this statute is to serve.

The first objective is the reaffirmation of the merit principle as embodied in previous civil service legislation. The application of this principle to appointments and promotions in the civil service has been the practice in this country for nearly 50 years and it is the government's conviction that this practice must endure. In this we have the unanimous support of the special joint committee on employer-employee relations which inquired into the bill, and also the support of all staff associations of the public service.

Bill C-181 extends the application of the merit principle to certain groups of employees who had remained exempt from the provisions of the Civil Service Act of 1961. The proven philosophy of appointment and promotion on the basis of merit is the core of the proposed statute. The security of this policy is again assured by stating explicitly the authority of the commission for all appointments to as well as from within the public service.

Another objective of Bill C-181 is to provide the public service of Canada with as effective and efficient a staffing agency as is required to meet the needs of departments for competent personnel in a labour market characterized by intense competition and increasing specialization over the years. The Civil Service Commission has done an excellent job; it has served Canada well through the continuous application of the highest standards to the business of staffing the public service of Canada, a public service which enjoys one of the highest reputations on the international scene. Bill C-181 will make it possible for the Public Service Commission to maintain this tradition of excellence; it provides for greater flexibility and discretion on the part of the commission to adapt its methods and procedures in order that it might respond quickly and intelligently to changing demands and circumstances.

The third objective is to accommodate the establishment of collective bargaining in the public service. Bill C-181 relieves the commission of its responsibilities in matters of pay and conditions of employment, as it is more proper for them to be assigned to the agency which must represent the employer's interests at the bargaining table. It was considered essential to the preservation of the commission's independence on the one hand and the preservation of the merit system on the other that none of the commission's powers and duties be involved in the bargaining process.

Mr. Chairman, a number of amendments were made to Bill C-181 while it was the subject of review by the special joint committee. The majority of these amendments were made in response to suggestions of the various staff associations who presented briefs and comments on the proposed legislation. The government is in agreement with all the committee amendments to Bill C-181 and I believe that Bill C-181 will be a better statute for them.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, parliament has no duty more important in my view than to ensure to young Canadians that a career in the public service shall be attractive and rewarding. Year by year, government looms larger and larger in the life of every Canadian, and if we are to have enlightened, forward looking, progressive administration the public service must be able to recruit the very best from the ablest young Canadian men and women. Service to the state must be judged and assessed as the very highest form of service with genuine rewards and satisfactions attached thereto.

That is why the bill now before us is so important. In all the discussion about collective bargaining for the public service little attention has been paid to the fact that this measure involves a convulsive change in the familiar pattern of personnel recruitment and management which has been in effect since Sir Robert Borden sponsored the Civil Service Act of 1918. The introduction at that time of the merit system was the foundation upon which we have built our truly great civil service.

In 1918 the Civil Service Commission was made the guardian of the merit system with a threefold role: first, recruitment and promotion; second, classification and establishment; third, recommendations in respect of salary and wage levels. Under this bill, only the first of these remains with the new Public Service Commission. Classification is now a matter for Treasury Board and salary and wage levels a matter for collective bargaining. Whether the complete freedom to the new Public Service Commission to concentrate upon recruitment and promotion will result in greater efficiency and competency in this field remains to be seen.

The bill has received careful study in the joint special committee and with the amendments made by that committee is considerably improved. The staff associations and others presented comprehensive and thoughtful briefs which were most helpful. The expert guidance of the chairman of the Civil Service Commission, John J. Carson, and one of the commissioners, Mr. Sylvain Cloutier, contributed greatly to our deliberations. Both were knowledgeable, articulate witnesses and the latter fascinated some of us by his ready facility to express nuances of meaning in both languages. But I emphasize that the bill is far from ideal and still contains frustrating imperfections.

A major change achieved by this bill is the inclusion for the first time under the merit system of appointments of applicants for prevailing rates positions, and of ships' crews and officers. I support this change fully and believe it will accrue to the benefit of the public service and as well of all politicians. Not all members of the house, I am certain, will agree that the abandonment of political patronage in the prevailing rates positions is good. I do not profess this afternoon to speak for anyone but myself. But from 1957 to 1963 I had the experience of interviewing over 16,000 persons seeking patronage employment, and I am convinced that this type of patronage parade is neither helpful to the politician, to his political organization nor to the public service. Few of us in this chamber have any training or aptitude for personnel administration, and I believe the public interest will benefit when prevailing rates employment is taken out of the hands of members of parliament and the defeated candidates of the party in office.

I would wish, however, to utter a word of caution or admonition to the new Public Service Commission. Appointment by paperwork will not be satisfactory in the prevailing rates field. There must be the human touch, the understanding interview and words of counsel and advice. In my view, the existing examination procedures will not work. It will not be enough merely to hand an applicant a form of application tell him or her to complete it and then test his or her qualifications from paper.

Many of the best potential candidates for prevailing rates employment do not have qualifications which will stand up on paper and could never pass conventional examinations, however simplified they might be. The process of selection for many prevailing rates employees must include personal and individual counselling, a genuine measure of humanity and compassion. Politicians in their so-called patronage recommendations did keep these factors in mind. I can say that never have I asked a widow or an afflicted person seeking prevailing rates employment what her or his politics were. Many widows, long removed from the employment market, many afflicted persons who have suffered major illnesses or other reverses and hardships in life, have the will and incentive to succeed, but they could never qualify in examinations or conventional tests designed primarily for youngsters just out of school. That is why I am this afternoon asking the new Public Service Commission not to institute the coldness of paper in the selection for these positions but to retain what politicians brought to the task, the warmth of personal interview, the compassion and humanity which can come only from face to face dealings.

My major reservation about this bill, Mr. Chairman, relates to the power of delegation. I realize that in large measure this stems from the Glassco commission report, but personally I have never been a worshipper at the feet of Glassco. Unless the delegations are monitored with the greatest care—and indeed even then—grave dangers of a return to political patronage are evident. I say even then. How can any monitoring system really ascertain the real reasons for the appointment of one person and the elimination of another?

I hope the power of delegation will be used most sparingly and only when there is the clearest and most incontrovertible evidence that a deputy head will not be subject to ministerial pressure. I have confidence in the independence and impartiality of the Civil Service Commission and I am sure the same will apply to the new Public Service Commission. But a deputy head is subject to pressures. To return to a system where a deputy head simply confirms a list of prospective appointees that he receives from the minister or the minister's staff would be a most retrograde step.

I have no desire to be unduly suspicious but I do know that a strong minister will normally dominate his department, and indeed to that I have no objection. But I do want to avoid a return to the days before 1918. Let us assume, for example, that the commission delegates the appointment of certain classes of officers to the undersecretary of state for external affairs. Is there any member of this chamber so naïve as to believe that the most politically-minded man in the house, the genial but politically tough Secretary of State for External Affairs, will keep his political fingers out of that appointing role? I think it stretches credulity too far to believe that he would. Or, on a delegation to the deputy minister of agriculture, does any hon. member believe that the Minister of Agriculture, who breathes and sleeps politics, would keep clear?

I believe this is a serious matter, particularly when I draw attention to the fact that there is still the right under clause 6(4) for a deputy head to delegate further his own delegated authority to some officer in a department. There are special dangers in this when the delegation is on a local or regional basis. I say that ministers must be prevented from instructing local officials to whom the power is delegated to consult with local or regional party officials.

It is true that the special joint committee made some limiting amendments to clause 6 and inserted in clause 45, dealing with the report to parliament, a specific provision requiring special attention in such report to the nature of any action taken under clause 6 pursuant to these delegations of authority. My question is: Is that sufficient? I doubt it. I say that the Public Service Commission has a duty to parliament and a high obligation to the public to prevent a return to political patronage through the back door route of delegation of authority for appointment. I for one, as a member of this chamber, intend to check with the greatest care at regular intervals to ensure that the Public Service Commission is fully discharging this duty and obligation.

Another feature of this bill about which I have some reservations is the appeal procedure. The bill was slightly improved in this respect by the joint special committee, but I consider the appeal provisions are still primitive, unsatisfactory and indeed offensive to natural justice. I am satisfied that it will not be long before the Public Service Commission and the government are compelled by events to establish genuinely independent and impartial appellate tribunals. My views in this respect are set forth in a private bill which I introduced earlier this session and which is on the order paper as Bill C-63. I remain unconvinced that the provisions of this bill, even stengthened as they were by the special joint committee, come anywhere close to providing a really satisfactory system of appeal.

Then, sir, may I draw attention to the fact that the provisions of the old Civil Service Act relating to the parliamentary staff have been dropped. By section 72 of the existing Civil Service Act the Senate and House of Commons might apply by resolution any provisions of the act to the staff of this house, the other place or the Library of Parliament. No doubt this right exists even in the absence of legislation. But I believe this chamber is entitled to know from the minister before this bill passes what the intentions of the commissioners of internal economy are in this respect. Will they recommend that the provisions of this bill either in whole or in part be applied to the parliamentary staff?

That leads me to the question of political participation by civil servants. Here, I submit, the government has proposed feeble and halting steps. They are of almost no significance. Personally, I would have preferred the emulation of the three-tiered system in effect in the United Kingdom and now in operation in the province of Ontario. For the life of me I cannot see why a packer or helper or an elevator operator or laboratory technician should be deprived of political rights, whereas on the other hand, of course, any policy adviser must obviously be restricted.

Since I think hon. gentlemen opposite are determined not to go further than the frail and laboured provisions of new clause 32, I do not propose to press the matter further at this time, but I do want to draw attention to the recommendation of the special joint committee as follows:

> The consensus is that the whole question of political participation by public servants should be reviewed after the next general election in the light of experience and knowledge gained to that time. Interested groups might then wish to make more specific representations for the consideration of parliament.

Personally I hope that at that time, with a new government in office, something approximating the new Ontario legislation introduced by a Progressive Conservative government may be achieved. I hope that then there will be more disposition to experimentation and that a genuine attempt will be made to balance the essential impartiality and the imperative non-partisanship of the public service with the ordinary political rights of citizenship in a democratic country.

With these reservations and doubts, I propose to support the bill. On certain clauses I shall have additional comments. After the bill has been in effect for two or three years I believe the operations of the new Public Service Commission should be referred to another special joint committee for study, investigation and assurance on the subjects I have raised. The merit system is a precious one, the very cornerstone of our civil service, and its full preservation intact is the responsibility of this parliament as well as of the Public Service Commission.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, at this stage I do not think it is necessary to make a very lengthy comment. I join of course, with the President of the Treasury Board and the hon. member for Carleton in emphasizing the importance of the merit system and in expressing pleasure that the prevailing rate employees who formerly were outside it are now brought under the merit system through the bill which is now before the committee. I have not had the experience that the hon. member for Carleton says he has had of interviewing thousands of people wanting patronage jobs. I am glad that this will not be possible from now on in his case or in the case of anyone else in government or outside government.

I should like to direct the attention of the committee to another point of progress in this bill which I consider of great importance and which the joint committee considered of great importance, that is, the recognition to a greater extent than was the case in respect of the Civil Service Act of the bilingual character of the federal function. Members of the committee will see, particularly in clause 14, that notices of vacancies are to be given in both languages at all times with certain exceptions which are left to the discretion of the Public Service Commission. Obviously there would not be much sense in having a notice in English in Le Droit or La Presse or a notice in French in an English language newspaper. Subject to such exceptions, however, the bill requires the recognition of the bilingual character of the federal parliament and the federal public service in a way which ought to result in some little step forward in our general Canadian situation.

Like the hon. member for Carleton, I am still disappointed that there is not a special separate appeal tribunal for members of the public service who feel aggrieved because of dismissal or suspension for one reason or another. In the committee we did make some progress in this regard. The commission and the government, through its members on the committee, agreed that the Public Service Commission should have such an appeal board under its umbrella, but as I understand it the appeal board is to be an entirely separate body acting independently of the Public Service Commission.

I should like to draw the attention of the committee again to something I said last Friday in connection with Bill No. C-170 which has passed the House of Commons and I hope will become the law very shortly when the other place has dealt with it. I point out that the commission, under the bill which is before us, will be given exclusive jurisdiction in the field of standards for appointment and in the field of promotion, demotion lay-off, release of employees and so on in the public service. In other words, to use a common management-labour term, the whole area of job security is left exclusively with the Public Service Commission with the intention, we were told, that the merit system not be interfered with. As I said the other day, and repeat, I am not convinced that it would not have been possible to make certainly some areas of the job security problem a part of collective bargaining. Hon. members will notice in the bill that one clause deals with lay-offs, jurisdiction over which is given to the Public Service Commission and deputy heads in certain circumstances. Lay-offs are a very important part of job security.

Hon. members will notice that there is provision for dealing with public service employees who show themselves to be incompetent or inadequate for their jobs. Frequently that is a matter of opinion, and the standards in that regard should be subject to collective bargaining. My colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and I, however, as members of our party on the special joint committee, after discussing this matter at great length decided, as we did in respect of other matters, that the better course for the sake of the civil service and for the sake of parliament and the country was to have partial agreement on at least the things which were conceded in order to see how these bills and the various bodies under them will work out in practice.

I notice that the chairman of the Civil Service Commission is sitting in front of the minister. I am sure he will forgive me if in his presence I plead with the Public Service Commission, in the exercise of its exclusive jurisdiction in the field of job security, appointments, promotions and so on, that at every practical step it consult with the organizations representing the public service employees—the various certified bargaining agents—and make them fully aware of the standards that the commission has in mind to apply generally, particularly where important positions are involved, so that the organizations of employees will have an opportunity at least to explain their views even though the authority to make a decision, of course, will rest with the commission itself.

I say to the members of the Public Service Commission that if, when the commission is established and they are appointed, they carry out their duties without regard to consultation with the employees' organizations, consultation which is meaningful and honest in terms of being frank and full or if they attempt to foist standards, approaches and procedures without taking into account the representations of the employees' organizations, they will pile up for themselves, for the government and for this parliament a great deal of trouble in the months to come. It may be that if they develop a proper avenue of consultation, short of negotiation, with the organizations, the exclusive jurisdiction which they now have will in fact work out well. If so, I will be one member of parliament who will be very glad indeed to have been in practice proven wrong in insisting that this matter must form a part of collective bargaining. I will be very happy indeed if the practical application of this procedure shows itself to be totally acceptable in principle to the employees and their organizations and totally acceptable in principle to the minds of all of us who are concerned about this problem.

I just want to say a few additional words with regard to political rights under clause

32. Like the hon. member for Carleton, I am still very disappointed at the fact that the bill before us only grants partial political rights to public service employees. In the special joint committee I moved an amendment, as recorded in the minutes of proceedings of the committee, No. 26, at pages 1223, 1224 and 1225, in which I attempted to divide the public service into two general groups, the first one consisting of deputy heads, chief executive officers and persons employed in a managerial or confidential capacity as defined in the bill we have just passed. While I did not agree entirely with the idea I must say I was prepared, for the sake of getting somewhere, to make the concession that in those classes of employees anyone wishing to be a candidate for provincial or federal office should seek the permission of the Public Service Commission before doing so. I think there is an argument in favour of that proposition.

I also suggested in my amendment, seconded of course by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, certain prohibitions against certain activities. For example, one of them was that no employee, as defined, or other person employed in the public service should ever do anything which would associate his position in the public service with any political activity in which he was engaged. I was prepared to agree also that members of the public service should desist from speaking in public or expressing their views in writing over their signature on behalf of any candidate or political party, unless of course a person was himself a candidate, so that there could be no possibility of the public service, or of a department or division of the public service, becoming publicly associated with a certain opinion or political view.

As a third concession in this field I was prepared to agree, if other members had agreed with the general proposition, that no political activity of any kind should be undertaken on behalf of a candidate during working hours, or even during non-working hours, on the premises of the employer, so that offices and other places where public service employees are engaged in work would not become centres of political discussion or activity.

With those safeguards which I have enumerated, namely, that the top people in the public service—I am speaking here of top people in terms of function and not necessarily of quality—cannot be candidates for provincial or federal office without getting the permission of the Public Service Commission, and a safeguard against activities on the premises or outside the premises during working hours of a kind that might blur the line between the duties of the public service employee and his political opinions, I cannot for the life of me see why an ordinary public servant, such as a stenographer, a clerk, an engineer, a draftsman, postal worker, or a prevailing rate employee such as an electrician, carpenter or machinist should not be able to run for any party for which he in his judgment decides, without having to obtain permission to do so from the Public Service Commission. I do not see why he should be put to the humiliation of not being able to exercise ordinary political rights. He would not be a person exercising managerial or confidential functions in the public service, he would not be a policy-making or even a policy-advising person in most cases; he would be a functionary carrying out sometimes very routine functions.

I do not see why such an employee should not have the right to be a candidate after having gone to the Public Service Commission and automatically obtained leave of absence without pay for the duration of the campaign. If he were elected he would cease to be an employee of the public service but if he were defeated he could go back to the job if it were available to him or to some other comparable job. I cannot see any reason for denying that right to the ordinary public service employee—by that I mean the vast majority of public service employees—who are not in the managerial or confidential category.

I certainly cannot understand why members of the government and members of the Liberal party in the committee—I also understand there is likely to be opposition on the floor of this house—objected to the simple proposition that public service employees should be permitted to be members of political parties.

At the present time the bill allows them to make contributions to the funds of a political party or candidate. It allows them to attend political meetings and presumably to speak at them. It allows them to seek to become candidates for federal or provincial office but in my view—and this is a matter of the legal interpretation of words—it does not allow them to take out a membership card in a political party. In most cases that will mean, of course, that they cannot become candidates. I understand that some parties in this house, or local associations of parties in this house, do not require membership in the party from anyone who wishes to be a candidate. If such is the case that is the business of the party concerned, although it seems very strange to me that that should be so. As far as our party is concerned there are very few cases where it is possible for anyone who is not already a member of the party to be a standard bearer for the party.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the hon. member tell us how long the period of probation is?

Mr. Walker: Two minutes.

Mr. Lewis: Does the hon. member mean that I have only two minutes left or does he mean that the period of probation is only two minutes? If the minister did not ask the question just to be funny but really wants to know, I will be very pleased to educate him. In our party the provincial constitutions dealing with the qualifications of candidates vary somewhat. Some require six months' membership and some require a year's membership in the party before a person can become a candidate. However, I must say there are exceptions. Under some constitutions the provincial council is given authority to make certain exceptions in cases where that is justified, but by and large a candidate for the New Democratic Party must already have been a member of the party for at least six months. In fact, it seems to me that I saw a provincial constitution which only required three months' membership for candidates.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member mind if I asked the Minister of Transport how long he was a member of a political party before he got his nomination?

Mr. Pickersgill: I became a member in 1936, so the hon. gentleman can do his own arithmetic.

Mr. Knowles: Was the minister a member of his party all the time he was a civil servant?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think I can say fairly that I always voted that way.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Mr. Lewis: As a matter of fact this short exchange between the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the Minister of Transport shows the absurdity of the proposal which we were forced to accept in the joint committee and against which I voted. I may say that all members of the opposition parties, and one senator who was appointed by the Liberals so I assume he was a Liberal senator, voted for the amendment which I moved. All government members voted against it. The exchange we have just heard shows the absurdity of the situation. Of course the Minister of Transport was a Liberal all the time he was in the office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and in the Prime Minister's office giving valuable advice and exercising his great capacity for thought and manoeuvre which he has shown on the floor of this house and elsewhere.

As I said to the special joint committee, what has always irked me about the law with regard to the political rights of civil servants has been its invitation to members of the public service to breach the law. Some hon. members may know that I was a national officer of the C.C.F. for years and lived in Ottawa. I can say that I knew many civil servants who, contrary to the law as it then was, made contributions to various political parties including my own. I knew some who made contributions to the major political parties at that time. They sometimes did it under the table and sometimes used the subterfuge of having their wives make the contribution.

This is the kind of humiliating, basically unlawful subterfuge which you force honourable men and women who have a political interest to use because you deny them the ordinary rights of citizens. The idea that an employee loses his loyalty to his employer because his employer is a Liberal, a Conservative or a New Democrat and the employee is a member of another political party is contrary to my experience both in private industry and in the public service. There is no sense to it. There is no reason for the Minister of Transport—he is here and I say it in his presence—to become visibly flustered when he is asked whether he was a Liberal at the time he was in the public service.

Mr. Pickersgill: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. The suggestion that I was flustered is rather like some of the other suggestions that are made, sometimes irresponsibly, about other ministers. It does not bother me. I was a Tory for 20 years and I have advertised that fact. At the end of 20 years I could not take it any longer and I became a Liberal. I have been a Liberal ever since and I am still proud of it.

Mr. Lewis: I am, of course, most surprised that the minister is still a Liberal. I am equally surprised that he is proud of it. However, he does not have to tell me that. I thought he was flustered but I will withdraw that word. The hon. gentleman is usually very quick to get to his feet and his hesitation seemed to indicate to me he was flustered. If the hon. gentleman was tired as a result of his work over the week end and did not get to his feet as quickly as he usually does, then I accept his statement that he was not flustered. It is regrettable that the question should have to be asked and that the minister should have to answer it by saying, of course I was a Liberal. I would not like to ask him if he were a member of the Liberal party during those years because I would not want him to have to answer that. If being a member of the Liberal party in those years did not require any particular membership card and he did not have to pay any dues, not even the dollar which is sometimes necessary now, then I gather he might have been a member of the Liberal party without being able to show a card. His answer would either have to disclose that he broke the law at that time or he would have to make the kind of answer—I say this with great affection for the minister—he frequently gives which consists of very attractive words that do not get to the point. The minister would have to do one or the other.

I think this is an absurd situation. I do not see any justification for it except the traditional timidity we cannot get rid of. I think the time has come when we should get rid of it and give public service employees the political rights that every other citizen exercises. I was ready, as I said before, to make a concession and except certain classes of employees such as those who are engaged in advisory capacities or in the development of government programs. I certainly cannot understand why the suggestion I made to the President of the Treasury Board that he at least accept an amendment that would permit public service employees to be members of political parties as well as make contributions to parties and attend meetings should not be accepted. I simply cannot understand that.

I am told there are some people who believe that the language of clause 32 does not prohibit public service employees from being members of political parties. I am prepared to argue that. I am not at all sure that the language is clear. I think a strong argument can be made that it is not clear because if the language were clear on that point it would be equally clear on the exceptions from the general proposition. If it is true that when an employee is prohibited from engaging in any activity for a political party, as the present bill provides, that does not mean he cannot be a member, then I cannot understand how you can be a member and at the same time, be prohibited from engaging in any activity of the party. This does not make sense to me. If it makes sense to the minister, then it is equally true that a person can attend meetings if he keeps his mouth shut when he attends them and a person can make contributions to a political party if he keeps quiet about it.

As a lawyer who has had some training, not as much as many others in this house, in interpreting language I would say that clause 32 in the present bill does not clearly give the public service employee the right to be a member of a party. I am putting it that way in order to avoid being dogmatic and starting an argument about it. There may be an argument that he may have the right, but the bill does not clearly give him the right. Unless you clearly give him the right to be a member of a political party, the right to be a candidate is in most cases a farce. My colleagues and I are not prepared to take part in that kind of farce if we can avoid it. I hope the minister will still give consideration to accepting an amendment which, if it does not go as far as the amendment we moved in the special joint committee, will at least make clear the right of the employee to be a member of the political party of his choice without running afoul of the law.

This bill makes perhaps less change in the present legislation than the other two bills, No. C-170 and No. C-182. There are many improvements in it. I have not been living in Ottawa, except when elected to parliament, during the last 16 or 17 years. However, I have had the pleasure of knowing a great many civil servants. My colleagues and I are delighted to agree that we have a very high-class public service in Canada. I have not been to the United Nations as a member of parliament but I have as a visitor. I have heard the representatives of other countries express their admiration for those who represent Canada on various commissions and at various international conferences. When I say "those who represent Canada" I do not mean our political representatives; I mean those from the public service who speak and work for us. As a Canadian I have been very proud of the universal expressions of admiration for our public service.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Equally, Mr. Chairman, I share the admiration of other members for the competence and independence which the present members of the Civil Service Commission have shown, and for all I know their predecessors showed though I did not have the pleasure of knowing them, in the application of the merit system and the law. For that reason we are pleased to support the bill except for the reservations I have mentioned and in connection with which we shall try to get this committee to accept some necessary amendments.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Chairman, just a few words on Bill C-181, because it is interesting, after all, to hear the views of everyone. We just had a discussion between the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) and the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), which showed us something of what happened and is still happening in the public service, in the political field.

In other words, public servants are prevented from engaging actively in the work of a political party, while we have the proof in this house that several ministers have at one time been members of the public service and that it is probably their work in the public service that permitted them to accede to the political life. It seems that some want to close the door to skilful public servants, who would like to devote their talents to the welfare of their country, as members of parliament.

I found enlightening, a while ago, that exchange between the Minister of Transport and the hon. member for York South. I did not know the hon. Minister of Transport had been a public servant once, like several of the present and former ministers that I know, some of whom were more successful than others.

I do not wish to take too much time of the house, because I am anxious—as the minister seems to be also—that this bill be passed without delay inasmuch as it brings certain improvements in the public service, although one has to reckon with human nature with all its evil inclinations.

More and more efforts must be made to relieve the public service from political patronage and to encourage technicians, in short all those who deserve encouragement, regardless of their political affiliation. We should keep in mind that even though a public servant works for the government, he has the right to retain his political ideas and the right to defend them. I am not at all against that.

However, if a public servant wishes to stand as candidate for Parliament, I think that in such a case, he should resign from the public service. He would then be required to resign, to abandon his position, but as long as he does not run for office, I feel a civil servant should not be prevented from expressing his views or even from working for the man he trusts and helping him. In my opinion, if some people can defend a political cause, it is precisely civil servants familiar with the situation and well aware of every administrative strategy.

I am very proud that civil servants are urged to become more qualified; indeed, present employees are far from perfect and there is much room for improvement. Our civil servants are fairly satisfactory and since I am a little more chary of praise, I shall refrain from crediting them with the same qualifications as the previous speaker. But we find that a great number of civil servants are responsible, that they deserve some incentives and promotions to certain positions unattainable by them in the past, not because of their lack of competence, but because of their political allegiance.

It is absolutely imperative that the members act together and stop trying to influence appointments. Such influence has been exerted in the past and today, no one should imagine that there will no longer be any patronage when this bill is passed. No. When it is recalled that appointments to certain commissions are made by the governor in council, one can rest assured that the appointees will not be old-time members or partisans of the Progressive Conservative, the New Democratic or the Social Credit parties. That is understood. Let us not have any qualms about it. Human nature will remain as it is. Let us not make any mistake about it, but let us at least make an effort to be fair. We ask of those who play the political game, who do the picking, to show some fair play to the employees they are to hire. In fact, when I consider the Post Office Department, I think that if I were to go around the post offices in my constituency, I would not find three employees appointed by the Conservatives.

Had the Conservatives been in power, the situation would probably have been the same. Stop trying to make us believe that it will not happen. Let it be said simply that the utmost will be done to treat people with more fairness. Just look at the matter of bilingualism. I feel a little something has been done to promote bilingualism. I say a little something because, to my mind, only 9 to 10 per cent of all public servants will benefit from the new policy on bilingualism.

If the civil servant is a French Canadian and his mother tongue is French, he is normally considered bilingual, since he usually speaks English. But if he works in an office where French only is spoken, I can foresee, according to this legislation, that that perfectly bilingual civil servant will not get the promised premium on the grounds that the work he does in English does not reach a percentage of 10 per cent. This is what I think will happen. The work in another language must be equivalent to at least 10 per cent of the workload. I believe that this is not much of an incentive for the employee, for his rating will be based on production rather than on ability.

I wish the ability or the rating of a civil servant were considered instead of production, for quite often, some politicking will influence production. Knowing that a civil servant is bilingual, the administration will appoint him to some unilingual branch, let us say to a degree of 75, 80 or 90 per cent, precisely to prevent him from getting the premium.

This is the reason why I submit that incentives should apply to technical knowledge, to a civil servant's rating, and that political influence, what is usually called patronage, should go by the board.

If we were to eliminate among civil servants all those who are involved in political activity, well, I think that we should start first with the senators. I consider that the senators are public servants, since they are not elected.

One need only look at the last appointments. Why were certain civil servants quietly appointed to the Senate? To do political work; the great organizers of all the political parties sit in the Senate and organise political campaigns. A young civil servant is to be prevented from promoting his political ideas, while all these sleepy old men are allowed to work all year for their party and scheme for a possible election, trying to bring it about as soon as possible.

If we are to encourage civil servants, we should do so all along the line and use all their talents which they want to place at the disposal of the public, whether in the public service or in politics. I cannot see any reason why we should try to restrict the activity of a capable man. I hope that this bill will attain its objective, but I think that the commissioners must try to free themselves of their old political myth in implementing this bill. It includes everything that is necessary to act honestly, but for one who wants to be dishonest, it is still possible to evade the act.

[English]

The Chairman: Before calling on the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke I wish to announce that the questions to be considered this evening are as follows: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), Air Canada—Suggested increased use of Winnipeg maintenance base; the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), External Affairs—Portugal—reported intention to exile political prisoners; the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. Johnston), finance —suggested provision of "real dollar" bonds.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest to the discussion thus far on Bill C-181. I am pleased that the merit system in the civil service is being extended and I agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Carleton in this regard. As increasingly examinations become the means of deciding employment in the civil service it is important that great care be taken to ensure that examinations are truly valid and test what they purport to test. From my knowledge of education and previous experience I know there is a possibility that the operative factor at work is the frequency and recency that people have written similar tests rather than the tests themselves. In other words, from the test the best candidate may not be chosen but rather the best writer of tests. Though this problem is extremely difficult to solve, it must be kept in mind. I hope that when standards, including educational standards, are prescribed in the selection procedure candidates will know of them and know exactly where they stand when they are writing tests. This will prevent the disappointment and frustration that come from being first in the examination and then finding that other disqualifying factors are announced later.

I am happy to note that the bill has been amended to preclude discrimination on the basis of sex. I suspect it will take more than passage of this bill to remove such discrimination, for it is built deeply into the folkways of this part of North America. All the same, I am happy to see this provision in the bill. People occasionally complain to me that a lady is working somewhere but should not be working because her husband is working or she is middle-aged or some younger man should have the job. Many excuses are put forward why a woman should be removed from her job. I have always felt that if a woman is qualified to do the job and performs her duty satisfactorily she has every right to her position.

• (6:10 p.m.)

I was interested to hear the remarks of the hon. member for York South about the desirability of political activity in the civil service. I find that these remarks contradict earlier remarks made by the hon. member and by many other members of his party. Every time a judicial bill comes before the house we are treated to a lengthy dissertation about the horrible system under which judicial appointments are made. We are told that they are made on the basis of past political activity. If the hon. member was in the chamber he would at once leap to his feet and say he was not talking about that at all. The point is that political activity casts doubt occasionally on the validity of an appointment to the judiciary. In like manner I would expect that political activity of an entirely open nature would tend to cast doubt upon the validity of subsequent promotions in the civil service. If a promotion to the judiciary is suspect on the ground of political activity—goodness knows we have been told as much over and over again from the same quarter of the house and I really am not in disagreement with the observations which have been made in this regard—then overt political activity on the part of civil servants would cast doubt on the validity of some of the promotions which might be made within the service and thus reduce the usefulness of some people who might have been quite qualified to move into new positions.

Nor can I believe that it is a great imposition for a member of the public service to be required to seek permission before running for office. I know that at the present time it is frequently the practice for members of the public service to resign on such occasions. In many cases this enforced resignation has been an excellent stepping stone from which to launch a campaign; perhaps such a start is not altogether detrimental to success in politics.

[Mr. Johnston.]

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 6—Delegation to deputy head.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This clause deals with delegation and I wish to say that as far as I am concerned it carries on division.

Clause 6 agreed to.

Clauses 7 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 12—Selection standards.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): A brief comment on clause 12. In committee I expressed my concern about the importation into the merit system of standards which I believe to be extraneous to it. Take, for example, such matters as age and residence. I believe these are in the nature of job requisites. If residence is of importance it should be specified under clause 13; it is not, in fact, a matter of merit. Indeed, it is entirely irrelevant to the question of merit.

I made my position on this point clear when I was speaking in relation to another group of subjects. I contended that the commission is introducing into the concept of merit factors which properly belong to the specifications which should be laid out for the job itself. On this occasion I merely wish to express the reservation which I argued in detail last April. My position is unchanged.

May I say that the inclusion of subclause 3 constitutes a great improvement in the bill and is something for which the special joint committee deserves credit. It does give opportunity for proper consultation between the commission and the bargaining agents in regard to the matters enumerated and I hope there will be the fullest and frankest co-operation between the commission and the bargaining agent in this respect.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 13 to 15 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 16—Consideration of applications.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): On this clause I merely wish to say that I am not fully satisfied that the provisions for veterans preference are working genuinely in the interest of all veterans. I think the house is satisfied with the concept of veterans preference but my view is that the system may well not be working now as was intended I think the commission should confer with the Royal Canadian Legion and that the question should be considered at some time in a future session by the standing committee on veterans affairs.

Mr. Herridge: I wish to support the view just advanced by the hon. member for Carleton. I think it very necessary that we follow his suggestion in view of changing circumstances and conditions today. I trust there will be consultation between the commission and representatives of veterans organizations with respect to the application of this clause.

Mr. Benson: I should like to assure hon. members that the government is most interested in seeing the veterans preferance work in the way in which it was originally intended and I have been assured by the chairman of the Civil Service Commission, who is the chairman of the new Public Service Commission, that he will be pleased to meet with leaders of the veterans organizations sometime in the near future to discuss this particular matter.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 17 to 20 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 21—Appeals.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I wish to express again the reservation I have already made with respect to the appeal procedures. I believe they should have been spelled out and that an independent and impartial board is to be desired. I believe the commission and the government will within a comparatively short time be compelled to take this position.

Mr. Benson: In reply I can assure the hon. gentleman that the court of final decision, that is, the appeal board, will be an independent group appointed by a commission which is also independent of the government. It is very similar to what was done in Bill No. C-170 which has just been passed, with regard to arbitration tribunals.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 22 to 31 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 32—Political partisanship.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, before I make a few remarks on this clause and propose the amendment which I should like to make with respect to it, may I say I was pleased to hear the announcement which the minister made a few moments ago that Mr. Carson, the present chairman of the Civil Service Commission, will be the chairman of the new Public Service Commission. I would also hope that Mr. Cloutier and Miss Addison will be continued as members of that commission.

Clause 32 is the one which deals with the question of political activity on the part of public servants and, as hon. members are fully aware, the particular provision before us is one which came out of the special joint committee itself. As my hon. friend from York South has pointed out, we moved an amendment which would have broadened the provision of this clause. Really we won, because more parties voted for our amendment than voted against it. But somehow or other the Conservatives, the New Democrats, the Social Credit members and the Créditistes were outnumbered by government supporters.

Mr. Reid: That is why you are in the opposition.

Mr. Walker: Carry on. Everything has been fine so far.

Mr. Knowles: I was wondering what party that voice came from. The hon. member has evidently been reading the Gallup polls and is wondering where the present parties are going.

As has already been indicated, since we lost in the special joint committee on the proposal we then made, we do not intend to divide this committee on the same broad question. But we do think the government and members of the committee should consider the appeal which was made by my hon. friend from York South and which I myself spoke about on Friday. The substance was that we should go one step further than we have done up to the present.

Clause 32, as drafted in its present form, provides for a ban on political activity but it does make three exceptions. It permits a civil servant to become a candidate under certain conditions. We will not quarrel with those conditions now that they have been worked out. In addition, clause 32 says clearly that it is not a contravention of the ban on political activity on the part of civil servants to attend political meetings or to make contributions. The contributions can be either to the candidacy of a particular nominee or they can be to the funds of a political party. It is our contention that one more exception should be added, namely, that we should say it is not contrary to the ban on political activity for a civil servant to be a member of a political party.

We went over this argument in the committee on Friday, and again today, so I will be as brief as I can. We think it is ridiculous to say that a civil servant can contribute all the money he wants to a candidate's campaign funds or to the funds of a political party, to say that he can contribute $100, $1,000 or more, but that he cannot be a member, which may involve the contribution of $1, $3 or some such small amount. We also think it is most absurd to say to a civil servant that he can become a candidate at election time if he wants to, by getting permission and taking leave of absence, and yet leave the civil servant who wants to be a candidate of a political party that requires membership for a certain length of time out in the cold without any chance of becoming a candidate for the party that he happens to choose.

We had a somewhat interesting byplay last Friday and today about the position of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Transport and some others over there who managed to translate themselves from the civil service, where they could not be members of a political party, into the position that they were candidates for the Liberal party. We think that all this is ridiculous and absurd and we should resolve it by adding this other exception so far as civil servants are concerned.

As I say, I am looking particularly at clause 32(2) which says that a civil servant does not contravene the ban on political activity by reason only of attending political meetings or making contributions. We think this clause should say, "by reason only of his being a member of a political party or attending a political meeting or contributing money." If the minister is going to argue that there is at the moment no precise language in clause 32 that says a civil servant cannot be a member of a political party, may I remind him of the argument already advanced by the hon. member for York South, that on those terms subclause 2 is pretty hard to understand. By subclause 2 we say that attending meetings or making contributions is not a form of political activity, but we also use the word "only". The word is right there in the provision—"A person does not contravene subsection (1) by reason only his", doing these two things. Surely it follows that if he does anything else in the political sphere he is contravening subclause 2 of clause 32. Therefore I suggest that common sense, logic and the desire to remove the absurdity from this clause suggest that we ought to amend it. I therefore move:

That subclause (2) of clause 32 of Bill C-181 be amended by inserting in line 4, immediately after the word "his", the following words: "being a member of a political party,"

I have copies of my amendment in both languages. I will not take the time of the committee to impose my French on the members who are here, but I am assured that it is good French. If I may do so, Mr. Chairman, I would like to read subclause 2 as it would read with my amendment incorporated into it. It would then read:

A person does not contravene subsection (1) by reason only of his being a member of a political party, attending a political meeting or contributing money for the funds of a candidate for election as a member described in paragraph (a) of subsection (1) or money for the funds of a political party.

I am assured that the French version, when incorporated into the French text, produces the same result. It is after six o'clock and we are in the closed season on voting in the House of Commons, and I think it applies in committee, and I trust that the government would like to take a little further time to look at this amendment. I would be quite happy if there could be agreement at some time—I do not mean just at the moment I sit down—to letting the clause and the amendment stand until the government can consider it, in the hope that we will not have to vote on it.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, in this regard I would simply like to say that I would agree to the standing of clause 32 until eight o'clock. We could revert to it at that time. I have been considering over the week end the proposition put forward by the hon. member for York South. When this matter was raised previously in the House of Commons I indicated that the government had a completely open mind on it and that we would accept whatever recommendation came back from the committee. There was a good deal of discussion in the committee on this matter. I believe this was one of the last clauses agreed upon by the committee and they made a recommendation in respect of it.

Concern has been expressed by many people that membership in political parties would affect the capacity of public servants to discharge their responsibilities in a non-partisan manner. This was one of the arguments put forward, and it was a concern expressed by the officials of some of the employee organizations particularly the Public Service Alliance, who considered that membership in a political party would tarnish the public image of a public servant. I will not go any further into the arguments in this regard. I would simply like to say that I believe the wording of the clause as it exists was carefully considered by the committee, which made its recommendation to the house, and we are willing to accept the clause as recommended to the house. Therefore we are not willing to accept the amendment. Having said that, I would ask, Mr. Chairman, that this clause stand until eight o'clock so that we may consider it further. We could revert to it at that time.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, before the clause stands there is a question I should like to address to the minister. If I heard him correctly a little earlier, at the time the hon. member for York South was speaking on clause 2 and dealing with this subject matter the minister said there was nothing in the act which prohibited an employee being a member. Doubt was expressed on that point both by the hon. member for York South and a short while ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I would be interested to have the minister suggest on what grounds he bases that statement.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, the statement is based on the advice I have been given by officials with whom I have consulted in respect of this particular matter. You will notice that subclauses 1 (a) and (b) and subclause 2 of clause 32 deal with the conditions which exist at election time and do not deal at all with the matter of membership in a political party. They really deal with activities of civil servants at election time. The other matter is left in the same position it always has been. People say that members of the civil service cannot be involved in political parties. There is no provision. It is the same as it has been in respect of the Civil Service Act. People say that under the Civil Service Act civil servants do not have the right to strike; but if they have that right as an individual, then they have the right to do it and apparently it would be upheld in a court of law. I am informed that the same situation exists under this piece of legislation.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, the minister may theoretically be right when he says this is parallel to the situation in respect of the right to strike. However I think it would be quite unrealistic for anyone in this house to suggest that it has not been understood, and by and large accepted by people in the public service, that they cannot become members of political parties without placing their employment in jeopardy. Personally I have known a good many people employed in the public service who, to paraphrase what they say have told me they would like to be a member of a party if it were not for this rule. These people certainly had that understanding. I do not know from what source such a statement has emanated. It is, however, a very widespread assumption.

Mr. Benson: I think this really is just an excuse for not joining the New Democratic Party. Really there has been no provision under the act in respect of people being members of a political party, but this is quite different to their taking part in political campaigns. This is what the position has been. There are individual civil servants who no doubt believe that if they should be members of a political party this would somehow affect their position in the civil service. This feeling exists in the civil service. I have good friends who have said to me that they would not join the Liberal party even though they support its ideals and objectives because they feel that as members of the public service they should not do this. I believe it would be wrong to write into this legislation something to the effect that a civil servant can be a member of a political party, because then they would be in a position where pressure could be put on them to join a political party.

Mr. Barnett: I must say that I find myself entirely in agreement with some of the remarks the minister has just made. I think that by and large in a great many aspects of employment in the public service it is right and proper that individuals should decide not to belong to or actively participate in the activities of any political party, but on the other hand, the present range of employment in the public service of Canada embraces all types of occupational groups which find employment under types of employers.

As one example I might pick out the teaching profession. I know a great many teachers who feel free to participate actively in the activities of political parties in this country. I certainly have developed the impression, however, that the teachers who are employed, we will say, in the education branch of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, feel there is some prohibition to their participation in political activities, although this is not applicable in the case of their other friends in the profession. I think there is a distinction to be drawn between a person acting directly in a sense, as an agent of the government administering government policies, and a person in a similar professional field which normally is not considered to be excluded.

Whether or not the minister is prepared to accept the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I think we should at least give some of these things an airing in the house so that we might have an understanding in the house and in the country as to what the situation actually is in matters of this kind. I do not feel that the minister has clarified the situation by the rather abstruse reference to a parallel between the theoretical right to strike and a theoretical lack of any prohibition against membership in political parties, where one would normally expect a person to have that right. I believe it is something similar to the feeling one finds in industry, where there are certain employees of corporations who, because of the nature of their relationship to the corporation and its management, are not expected to be members of the union. The minister may not have knowledge of the sort of thing I am talking about but I find it difficult to imagine that he has not come up against this attitude and understanding.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister, if he is correct in his statement that there is now no prohibition against membership in a political party, why he objects to there being included in the bill simply a confirmation of what he says is the status quo.

Mr. Benson: I object to its being in the bill because when this bill went to the committee I said I would accept the recommendations which came back from that committee. The committee held extensive hearings and had extensive discussion on this particular matter. Their recommendation has come back and I accept their recommendation.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, those are noble sentiments the minister has just expressed, but of course he realizes this is one of the very few issues on which in the committee there was a division. Most of what came back from the committee in these three bills was unanimous. On this point, however, it is difficult to say that there was a consensus, in view of the vote.

[Mr. Barnett.]

Mr. Benson: The report was unanimous.

Mr. Knowles: The minister's announcement that there is no ban on civil servants being involved in political parties may, of course, be quite interesting if it appears in the Ottawa newspapers tomorrow and across the country; but it seems to me that one should not be quite so sanguine as to think that all that is necessary is for a minister to give his interpretation of legal language. In fact, we are often told that this is the sort of thing we should not ask a minister to do; so I suppose I should be grateful he has done it, and it will be taken as gospel.

• (6:40 p.m.)

As I said earlier, I think the problem that arises now is perhaps one that was not there before, and that is that subclause 2 specifically names what is contrary to the ban which seems to suggest that other things of a political nature are also contrary. The minister is relying heavily on his assertion that this relates to election time. Would he please define election time in this country? Any time is election time.

Mr. Walker: The time between the sittings of the house.

Mr. Knowles: For most of us in this place election time was in 1962, 1963 and 1965. We missed 1966, and I do not know whether or not we have missed 1967. Not only is there a question of the frequency of general elections but there are also by-elections to consider. There are rumours that a whole lot of them will be taking place in a few months. Actually there is nothing in clause 32 which mentions an election. Some candidates have already been nominated for the next election. In fact I think the hon. member for Carleton was present at a nominating convention not long ago which put a candidate in the field. Is that correct?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes, in fact two of them.

Mr. Knowles: And I believe they come from this area, in which there are lots of civil servants. Were there any civil servants present at the meeting that night?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes.

Mr. Knowles: The latter part of clause 32(1)(a) says: "engage in work for, on behalf of or against a political party". Political parties are not organizations that come into being just at election times. They have a reasonably permanent existence. As a matter of fact some of them have been around too long. So I think the minister cannot say that this relates only to the period immediately surrounding a general election.

Mr. Benson: I did not say "general".

Mr. Knowles: If he means by-elections, we have them all the time.

Mr. Benson: It applies to the time surrounding an election period.

Mr. Knowles: Since hardly a year goes by without a by-election in the federal field, it can affect activity for or against a political party. In fact I would ask the minister to explain this. There is nothing that I can see which would qualify as to time the wording in lines 46 and 47 on page 13 which read: "or engage in work for, on behalf of or against a political party".

Mr. Benson: He can do this at any time.

Mr. Knowles: I agree, and I am not trying to change the ban against working for, on behalf of or against a political party. However I suggest that this very language has ruined the minister's argument about time. He cannot say that subclauses 1 and 2 refer only to a few weeks or months surrounding an election. It seems to me that, as the hon. member for Carleton said, if the minister is satisfied that simply being a member of a party is not in contravention of the ban, then why not say so. Is it not necessary now to say so in view of the fact that in subclause 2 we specify what can be done despite the ban? I suggest that having told civil servants that they can attend meetings and make contributions without contravening the ban, we are using language which may make civil servants wonder whether they have the freedom which the minister suggested they do have.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to see the words "attending a political meeting", because if they were not here I suppose some argument could be made that the chairman of the Civil Service Commission and other public servants should not be allowed to enter the House of Commons to listen to some of our deliberations. However, may I point out right away that I rise to speak on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The minister has suggested that, because as members of the committee we were entrusted with a particular task, once we have completed that task whatever we brought forth would be immutable and unchangeable. Perhaps he offers as a compliment the suggestion that our actions in committee were as fossilized as the laws of the Medes and the Persians, which changeth not.

However, may I point out to him that clause 32 was an amendment brought in by his parliamentary secretary, who stood off manfully any attempts to make changes. Further I will suggest to the minister that it would be only human nature if the aforesaid parliamentary secretary, a very estimable fellow, had checked with higher authority before bringing it in.

I know the parliamentary secretary is an excellent draftsman, but I would go even further and suggest that there were certain officials who undoubtedly had a hand in the wording of this particular clause. Call me a suspicious fellow if you will, Mr. Chairman, but my suspicions go even so far as to lead me to believe that the Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board gave his blessing somewhere along the way to the clause which was brought before us by his parliamentary secretary. So I hope again that, with this little refresher of memory, the minister will accede to the very sensible suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

In reading the various subclauses of clause 32 it does not seem to me out of place or illogical to place such a proviso in there. After all there are other permissible actions such as the contribution of money, and in the practice of Nova Scotian politicians one usually follows up one's money with political action. If civil servants are allowed to make contributions I do not see why they cannot be considered as members of a political party. Indeed I think the backroom boys who collect the moneys for the various political parties would think that almost the only sine qua non of being a member of a political party was to come marching in with monetary support. I appeal to the minister therefore that he consider the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

If I may be allowed to say something which may be considered out of order, because I may not be able to take part in the deliberations tonight—

Mr. Walker: Before the hon. member starts on another subject I wonder if he would permit a question—and the only way in which he will be able to tell it is a question is when I put a question mark at the end of it. Actually it is a question of personal privilege in connection with my role in the committee. I think the hon. member will recall that I brought forward an amendment in the committee which was much broader than the one that has been moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, or the clause that is in the bill.

• (6:50 p.m.)

Frankly, to my regret, I found that there were members on the committee—I want to stress the point that this was a personal amendment—who disagreed with this wide extension of political activity which my own amendment would have accomplished. I believe the hon. member for Halifax had his tongue in his cheek when he suggested that the amendments I put before the committee had been vetted by the President of the Treasury Board. This was not so. The President of the Treasury Board assured me that whatever recommendations came out of the committee in connection with this particular clause would be acceptable to him. He spoke on behalf of the government.

Mr. Knowles: If it was not the President of the Treasury Board, who was it?

Mr. Walker: It was the member for York Centre.

Mr. McCleave: Of course I accept the hon. member's question, but perhaps it should have an exclamation mark after it rather than a question mark. I should like to be out of order for about 30 seconds because I have to be on a committee tonight. I compliment the members of the committee for their contribution, and this includes the parliamentary secretary, the chairman, the hon. member for Carleton, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and all the others.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that clause 32 shall stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

The Chairman: Is it also agreed that the question of the amendment will be taken at eight o'clock, or when the committee resumes?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clauses 33 to 36 inclusive agreed to.

[Mr. Walker.]

On clause 37—Ministerial Staffs.

The Chairman: Shall clause 37 carry?

Mr. Benson: Stands.

The Chairman: Shall clause 37 stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

Clauses 38 to 48 inclusive agreed to.

Schedules A, B, C and D agreed to.

Mr. Benson: At this point, I should like to suggest the committee rise and report progress and that we take a dinner break until eight o'clock.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Why could we not deal with clause 37?

Mr. Benson: I have a small amendment to propose to clause 37. If we wanted to revert to clause 37, I could move the amendment, which could then be considered by the committee over the dinner hour. The amendment to clause 37 would include in subclause (6), the leader of the government in the Senate or the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate. My amendment is as follows; and I would ask the Minister of Fisheries to move it:

That Bill C-181, an act respecting employment in the Public Service of Canada, be amended by striking out line 40 in subsection 6 of section 37 on page 16 and substituting the following:

"Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons, leader of the government in the Senate or Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, as it".

Mr. Robichaud: I so move.

Mr. Knowles: I thought the minister accepted the bill as it came back from the committee, but now he is changing it.

Mr. Benson: The big difficulty was in connection with the position of the staff of the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate. This was brought to my personal attention after the bill came back, and it was something that was not considered at all by the committee. The amendment is being introduced in order to take care of the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate. Actually the present leader of the government in the Senate does not benefit because he is a member of the cabinet now and is covered. However, this might not be the case in the future.

The reason I am putting the amendment forward now is to avoid the bill being amended in the Senate and coming back to the House of Commons for such a small matter.

The Chairman: Is it the wish of the committee to revert to clause 37?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On clause 37—Ministerial staffs.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Amendment agreed to on division.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I have a brief comment to make in connection with clause 37. Under this clause a statutory right to a position is extended to those individuals who are mentioned—executive assistants, special assistants, and so on. Since this statutory right has not always been given promptly but in some instances has been delayed for months and months, this has caused some difficulty. Recently a case came to my attention in which a person holding a position as of statutory right had been red circled. I want to suggest that the red circling of a position held by an individual who has been granted that position as a statutory right is quite improper. I intend to draw the circumstances to the attention of the chairman of the Public Service Commission. When parliament requires that an individual have a role at a certain level, I think that level ought not, indeed really cannot, be reduced, although I understand a legal opinion by the law officers to the contrary has been obtained. This is the only comment I wish to make.

The Chairman: Shall clause 37 carry?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Clause agreed to.

Progress reported.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

EXTENSION OF ORDER GOVERNING HOURS OF SITTING

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion that I should like to put forward concerning the interruption of the sittings for luncheon and for dinner. I should like to move:

That the order of the house adopted on February 3, 1967, and appearing on page 1282 of Votes and Proceedings of that date suspending the sittings of the house from seven o'clock p.m. to eight o'clock p.m. on Mondays, Tuesdays and Thursdays and from one o'clock p.m. to two o'clock p.m. on Fridays, be extended for a further two week period commencing February 20, 1967.

Mr. Knowles: By leave, agreed.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): We are in favour of this motion and would be glad to extend it to the end of the session.

Motion agreed to.

• (7:00 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the wish of the house that we resume the business interrupted a few moments ago?.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PUBLIC SERVICE

LEGISLATION RESPECTING EMPLOYMENT IN GOVERNMENT SERVICE

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-181, respecting employment in the public service of Canada—Mr. Pearson—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. House in committee of the whole on Bill No. C-181.

Pursuant to an order of the house just made, this sitting stands suspended until eight o'clock.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Chairman: Order, please. Prior to the dinner hour the committee had been considering clause 32 and the amendment thereto moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The clause was then stood. Is it the wish to the committee to proceed with that clause now?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Knowles) negatived: Yeas 23; nays 44.

The Chairman: Shall clause 32 carry?

Mr. Barnett: I have been reflecting upon the remarks made before dinner by the President of the Treasury Board. I am wondering, in following his line of logic and the parallel he drew with certain things not being declared, or as not being unlawful—and these things are not spelled out in the bill—whether the minister could not delete clause 32 entirely. The matter would then be left to the judgment of the people in the public service. We agree that in the past these people have shown and most likely in the future they will continue to show the right kind of judgment, without entering into any form of partisan activity.

Mr. Benson: Clause 32 contains certain prohibitions which were agreed to by the committee considering this legislation. I do not think the list of prohibitions rules out any rights possessed by an individual under the rule of common law. I am the last person to be talking as if I were an expert about the law as such. The only point I wish to make is that any common law rights there are still exist. That is as far as we can go. I do not think I can make any more comment.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Chairman: When shall the said bill be read a third time?

An hon. Member: By leave now.

Mr. Benson moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING FUNCTIONS OF TREASURY BOARD

The house in committee on Bill No. C-182, to amend the Financial Administration Act—Mr. Pearson—Mr. Batten in the clair.

On section 1: Responsibilities of Treasury Board.

• (8:10 p.m.)

Mr. Benson: I suppose there is little I need say about Bill C-182, which complements the two pieces of public service legislation with which the house has already dealt. The basic purpose of the bill is to amend the Financial Administration Act in such a way as to provide the Treasury Board with the authority it will require to act as the central management agency envisaged by the royal commission on government organization, and as the principal agent of the government in employer-employee relationships in the processes of collective bargaining.

I should like to say that in the case of this legislation, as in the case of the other bills we have considered, the government wishes to express its appreciation to the joint committee for the careful consideration given to this measure, as well as for the amendments which were introduced, and I should like to indicate at this point that the government is happy to support without reservation the bill as it was recommended by the special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons.

[Mr. Barnett.]

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Most of the comments which might normally have been made on this bill have already been made on its two companion measures. I have only three comments to make, now.

In earlier debate I expressed reservations about the transfer of all responsibility for classifications and establishments from the Public Service Commission to the Treasury Board, a politically motivated body no matter how dedicated the secretary and the officers of that board might be. To this change I adopt what I might describe as a wait and see attitude. As long as I am in this chamber, personally, I shall endeavour to check and monitor the work of the Treasury Board in this respect.

The bill as originally presented to us contained no provision for appeal in the case of dismissal on security grounds. It has been greatly improved in the special joint committee by the inclusion of a mandatory provision for an inquiry prior to a person's dismissal for security reasons. But it is still weak, inasmuch as it leaves the nature of the inquiry totally undefined; the matter is left to regulation by the governor in council, the dismissing body.

I believe that some certainty, some procedure enacted and specified by parliament itself, is not only desirable but essential. Were it not for the fact that this new clause is one which must obviously be studied by the royal commission on security headed by Max W. Mackenzie, I would be prompted to move an amendment to establish formal procedures on appeal. If my words are heard by the commission I submit that they should devise and recommend formal and public procedures or techniques of inquiry for inclusion in this legislation.

Finally, I want to express my grave reservations about the provision for Governor-General's warrants which is re-enacted in this measure. I will await clause 6 before expressing my firm disapproval of this undemocratic technique of public financing.

With these comments made, we have no reason to delay the passage of this bill.

Mr. Lewis: Like the hon. member for Carleton I shall not take very much time. I would point out to hon. members of the committee who have not had the occasion to study this bill as closely as those of us who were on the special joint committee that the measure now before us represents a serious and important change in government organization.

The President of the Treasury Board will now have a great deal more authority, and, what is perhaps more important, a great many more duties than heretofore. I should also like to remind members of the committee that the Treasury Board from now on will be in effect the employer of the public service; in practical effect, if not in law, it will be the Treasury Board which will be the employer of every civil servant who works for the federal government. It will be the Treasury Board which will be negotiating with the certified bargaining agents; it will be the Treasury Board which will agree or disagree with any proposal made by the employee association; it will be the Treasury Board which will be signing collective agreements. So while this may appear to be only a technical bill making certain changes in the Financial Administration Act, it really places on the Treasury Board a whole range of new responsibilities and duties, including responsibility for collective bargaining under Bill No. C-170.

One can only express the hope that the representatives of the Treasury Board when negotiating with the employees will act in such a way as to make this employer a model employer in Canada. The President of the Treasury Board indicates it is already the model employer of Canada. He will forgive me if I say that if I wanted to take up the time I could show him a number of instances where the model needs a great deal of redesigning. I am hoping that Bill C-170, which this house has passed, affords a structure within which this redesigning can take a proper form in actual bargaining between the employee representatives and representatives of the Treasury Board.

I told some leaders of the public servants whom I met last Wednesday, and I repeat it now, that I was most impressed by the attitude of the secretary of the Treasury Board, Dr. Davidson, and Mr. Douglas Love, when they appeared before the joint committee. They appeared to me to indicate an attitude which augurs well for the future of the collective bargaining régime. I hope the actual process of collective bargaining will not revive any managerial prejudices which are below the surface at the present time—that they will remain sunk, even under the pressures of collective bargaining.

I am taking nothing away from the hon. member for Carleton when I take the liberty of reminding, or informing, members of this committee that I had occasion to battle a great deal about the right of appeal for persons dismissed for security reasons. Like the hon. member for Carleton I am dissatisfied with the provisions for inquiry contained in clause 3 of Bill C-182. I still cannot for the life of me understand why the government members could not have agreed to the inclusion of a decent form of appeal in the case of dismissal, for reasons given in the relevant clause. I was told in the joint committee that one of the reasons for this attitude was that a royal commission of inquiry into security matters is now in progress, and that it would be wise to await the results of that inquiry before setting out any complicated appeal machinery.

I was unconvinced then by this argument, and I am still unconvinced. Surely there would have been nothing to prevent the government from making any changes which the report of the royal commission on security might have recommended as necessary or desirable. In the meantime, anybody affected by dismissal for safety or security reasons could resort to a definite form of appeal.

I am glad the government went so far as to agree at least to provide statutorily for an inquiry, but I draw the attention of the committee to the fact that the inquiry is being made in accordance with regulations of the governor in council by the person appointed by the governor in council, and without any requirement that the person concerned is to be given details of the charges against him or, detailed information as to the reasons why he was dismissed, so that he would have a case that he could meet before such an inquiry. After all, it is the essence of any kind of inquiry that is really worth while that the person charged, accused, disciplined, discriminated against or in any other way dealt with as a result of some allegations, should know the precise nature of those allegations and be able to meet them in the proper way.

I therefore echo the criticism made by the hon. member for Carleton and criticisms which I made in the joint committee as loudly and as annoyingly as I could, that this provision for an inquiry, although a step forward, is simply not adequate. I hope that between now and the time the royal commission of inquiry into security matters reports, the government will have no occasion to use the powers conferred by this clause of the bill or that anyone will suffer injustice—because injustice there will be if there is no more adequate provision than this. I also point out that in addition to the dismissal of the employee concerned, there is the problem of what happens to some of his benefits when he is dismissed. I hope this question will be gone into in any inquiry that is set up under this bill.

As I said with regard to the bill that was before us a few minutes ago, I am still very much disturbed by the fact that classification of employees is exclusively within the authority of the Treasury Board, and that the collective bargaining process will not be such as to have any effect on the classification of employees. Anyone who has represented workers at any time knows perfectly well that classification is as related to wage determination as any other factor in the labour-management relationship. As I said the other day, you could easily get a wage increase on Monday and find it eroded on Tuesday by a reclassification that the employer unilaterally undertakes. Fiddling with classifications, reclassifying positions, reducing the rate attached to a particular classification, and all that kind of thing, immediately affects the total salary situation.

Again I repeat what I said in committee and have said once or twice before on the floor of this house, that even though I grant without reservation that it is a normal right of the employer initially to classify the work that has to be done under him, I still see no reason—I did not see any in committee—why the collective agreement could not contain some provision for negotiation in cases of reclassification or changes in classification, even through the initial step is taken. When you have a collective agreement, the collective agreement in this case, I imagine, as in all other cases, will set out in one way or another all the classifications of employees and the particular salary or salary ranges applicable to a given classification. I hold the view that I may say was shared by Mr. Justice Laskin who, before he was appointed to the bench was one of the leading arbitrators and conciliators in the province of Ontario, if not in Canada, that once you have set in a collective agreement particular classifications of employees, it should not be within the power of the employer unilaterally to erode the collective agreement by either withdrawing classifications or fiddling with them during the term of the collective agreement.

That is why I am disturbed by the fact that the area of classification of employees is outside the realm of collective bargaining under a previous bill considered and passed by this house. I can only express again the hope, as I did on another occasion, that Treasury Board officials and the Treasury Board itself will be mighty careful about their behavior with regard to classifications. I do not suppose I have known anything quite so disruptive and, if I may say so in the presence of the President of the Treasury Board and some of his officials, in a sense so shameful as the reclassification and red circling which went on in the federal civil service in the last number of months. The fact that the way it was done was regrettable is, I think, proven by the fact that many thousands of the original reclassifications were abandoned or changed and many of the red circles were removed. In my submission, the only decent way of reclassifying and changing rates for classifications is not to hurt the incumbent employee, not to make the new, lower rate applicable to the person already on the job but to make it applicable only to a new employee undertaking the job for the first time.

I submit that this could not have happened if classification had been part of an existing collective bargaining regime. Perhaps it is too strong to say that it could not have happened, but it certainly would have been much less likely to happen if that had been the case. If Treasury Board indulges in the same kind of reclassification in the future, using its exclusive right in this field to do that kind of thing, namely to red circle and green circle as they have in the last number of months, they will create precisely the same confusion, resentment and loss of morale which the red circling produced in many areas of the civil service, the customs and excise area and many others, in the last number of months. It is obvious that nothing we can say or do will change the government's mind on this question of keeping classification out of the collective bargaining process, because we tried for many, many hours in the joint committee and I personally, as I said the other day, felt embarrassed from time to time at being so annoying and persistent in my demands on this and related issues.

Certainly we could move an amendment on the floor of this committee. If we did that, the Whip of the Liberal party would make sure that those who have gone for coffee, or wherever they have gone, would be brought back into the chamber and there would be further delays, which we are determined to try to avoid. So we have to accept the government's unjustifiably adamant position, in my opinion, on this matter, give the bill a chance, and see whether this provision will in fact work. I hope that the staff associations, which are very much worried about the question of classification, will watch with great care, what Treasury Board does, will note everything that the board does, will keep a very careful record of the results of its actions in the field of classification, and will arm members of parliament of all parties with the necessary information to produce a change in the law if the behavior of Treasury Board should require it.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is anything more I can usefully add at this point. I can only hope and pray that Treasury Board will behave like a good employer. I am not so sure what my prayer can accomplish, but I can at least hope, because if they do not behave like a good employer things will be pretty dismal for the civil service.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the President of the Treasury Board a question which seems to come under clause 1.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, should we not be on clause 2?

Mr. Knowles: Clause 1 is deferred only when it is simply the short title. Clause 1 in this bill, as the minister recognizes, is one of considerable substance. It gives the Treasury Board authority with regard to a number of pension acts, and it is in relation to this that I should like to ask the minister a question.

As the minister knows, the joint committee on the public service of Canada is still meeting, primarily in respect of pension questions. I do not at this time intend to bring in the kind of matters they are dealing with in the committee, but I should like to say to the minister that when some of the delegates which have appeared before the committee have been asked about what should be done in respect of future, with particular reference to the writing of an escalation clause into the pension plan and things of that sort, the reply I think by all the delegates has been that this could be the subject of collective bargaining.

When the specific question, would you favour an adjustment of the rates that are paid to achieve such and such a purpose, was put, the answer was that that could be the subject of collective bargaining. I should like to ask the minister whether, under the provisions of this and the other bills we have dealt with, it is clear that changes in the various pension plans, such as the Public Service Superannuation Act and others could be the subject of collective bargaining between employee organizations and the Treasury Board.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, contributions with regard to pensions are covered under the Public Service Superannuation Act and no collective bargaining agreement can affect a statute. Therefore changes in pensions of the public service are not bargained in the collective bargaining sense. I am informed they would have to be approved by parliament and would take the form of amendments to the Public Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. Knowles: Is that any different from some of the other things which might be agreed to as a result of collective bargaining? Are there not other cases in which the result of collective bargaining would call for an enactment by parliament? As I understand it, the only thing the government can undertake at these collective bargaining sessions is to bring these matters before parliament. If that is the case in respect of other areas, could it not be the same in respect of pension matters?

Mr. Benson: In the new bill clause 56(2) provides:

> No collective agreement shall provide, directly or indirectly, for the alteration or elimination of any existing term or condition of employment or the establishment of any new term or condition of employment,
> (a) the alteration or elimination of which or the establishment of which, as the case may be, would require or have the effect of requiring the enactment or amendment of any legislation by parliament, except for the purpose of appropriating moneys required for its implementation, or
> (b) that has been or may be, as the case may be, established pursuant to any act specified in schedule C.

Then schedule C mentions the four acts, the Government Employees Compensation Act, the Government Vessels Discipline Act, the Public Service Employment Act and the Public Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. Knowles: I still wonder whether we did not have an understanding in the committee that in fact there would be areas in which part of the agreement between the government and the employee organizations would be an undertaking on the part of the government to seek certain changes in parliament.

Mr. Benson: I do not think the government as such in a collective agreement could undertake to change a statute.

Mr. Knowles: I did not say "undertake to change it"; I said "undertake to seek the change".

Mr. Benson: The government at any time could, outside the House of Commons, state that it intended to undertake to change a statute; but this in itself does not change the statute. I do think any government in collective bargaining, if a matter of superannuation were considered, could say that it would take this under consideration. This is a matter for decision by parliament, and if the government indicated in a collective bargaining agreement that it would change a statute of parliament, everyone in this house would say that it was overriding the powers of parliament as such.

Mr. Lewis: The minister is misunderstanding the point, if I may respectfully say this to him. There are two stages. One is the collective bargaining itself; the other is the actual document in which the agreement is embodied. The minister is quite right that clause 56 states that the collective bargaining agreement cannot provide for some term that is not consonant with the acts set out in schedule C. Certainly he is right. Obviously one could not oppose that, because if you have an act of parliament that sets certain standards, you cannot by a collective agreement amend the act of parliament. No one has suggested that.

What I believe my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has in mind, and what I should like the minister to say, is that so far as he is concerned, as the President of the Treasury Board, there is nothing to prevent a staff association putting on the bargaining table matters relating to superannuation and that the government, through the Treasury Board, will be prepared to discuss superannuation at the bargaining table. What the result of that discussion will be, if there is agreement between the Treasury Board representatives and the union representatives, may have to go to the colleagues of the President of the Treasury Board, and he may have to persuade them to make certain amendments to the Superannuation Act. We should like to have on the record, however, a clear statement that superannuation is properly a matter for consideration at the bargaining table.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, any matter to be raised in the process of collective bargaining could include superannuation. What I was attempting to stress was the fact that the collective bargaining agreement as such could not amend an act of parliament. Certainly the matter can be put forward by the employees or by the government. It can be considered and the government then, outside the collective agreement, can indicate it might be willing to undertake certain proposals in respect of amending the particular legislation.

Mr. Lewis: Perhaps the minister can make this a little clearer, without some of the reservations which his words convey. Are there some areas in which the employer—in this case the Treasury Board—would be fully justified in saying that this is not a matter for collective bargaining? When the area is classification of employees, and so on, we may be certain that superannuation or any matters covered by the acts set out in schedule C are not necessarily excluded material from collective bargaining.

Mr. Benson: These are not exclusive managerial decisions, as are such things as classification, whether my hon. friend likes it or not in the present legislation.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, there is one point arising out of subclause 2 upon which I should like to make a comment. This is the clause under which the Treasury Board is authorized to exercise the power of the governor in council under certain acts.

• (8:40 p.m.)

Paragraph (f) is a general provision which reads as follows:

> such of the provisions of any other act respecting any matter in relation to which the Treasury Board may act for the Queen's Privy Council for Canada pursuant to subsection 1 as may be specified by the governor in council.

I would hope that this authority for delegation would be used as sparingly as possible and only for a very good reason. The President and Secretary of the Treasury Board and I, have argued the question related to the production of minutes of the Treasury Board in the house. The President and the Secretary of the Treasury Board have taken the attitude that the minutes are not subject to production in the House of Commons as are orders in council. If the governor in council acts, then the house may get the documents, but if there is a delegation of authority to the Treasury Board then the President of the Treasury Board will probably come to parliament and hide behind the alleged privilege of the minutes of the Treasury Board. If he does, then the house will be denied access to information in some cases which is urgently desired.

Under the structure that is proposed there is no doubt that the Treasury Board will have to act in many of these matters, but I do hope there will be no hiding by way of privilege in the way which I mentioned.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Chairman, I have nothing to add to the remarks made by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) on subclause (7) of clause 3 and on security.

However, Mr. Chairman, I should like to call the minister's attention—to the following subject. There is a problem here under internal administration, grievances that come under the jurisdiction of the internal administration. Some methods of dealing with them have already been established but I should like to get an explanation from the minister. I am referring to internal administration under subclause 1.

Mr. Benson: I am not sure what my hon. friend is referring to when he speaks of internal administration. If he is referring to internal administration in the House of Commons let me tell him that this does not come under this legislation. It comes under the House of Commons Act. Earlier this afternoon I gave certain assurances with regard to it. The employees of the House of Commons are not employees of the government as such but employees of this house. The manner in which we deal with them must be decided by all parties of the house.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): May we have an assurance from the minister that we will have some explanations from him with regard to this matter in the near future?

Mr. Benson: This afternoon I gave some assurances which will be recorded in Hansard.

Mr. Lewis: Can we have some co-operation from those who manipulate the loud speaker system, because we cannot hear the minister too well and we get a good many echoes over the earphones. Words can be interpreted in many ways when there are no echoes, but the echoes can double or triple the meanings.

Mr. Benson: That is no fault of mine.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—Powers and Functions of Treasury Board in Relation to Personnel Management.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words about subsection 7 of section 7 in clause 3 of the bill. I am particularly concerned about this subsection which reads as follows:

> Nothing in this or any other act shall be construed to limit or affect the right or power of the governor in council, in the interest of the safety or security of Canada or any state allied or associated with Canada, to suspend any person employed in the public service or, after an inquiry conducted in accordance with regulations of the governor in council by a person appointed by the governor in council at which the person concerned has been given an opportunity of being heard, to dismiss any such person.

Subsection 7 is a very slight improvement over section 50.

Mr. Benson: It is a considerable improvement.

Mr. Douglas: We will see how much of an improvement it is. I remember that when we were arguing over the Victor Spencer case I think it was the Prime Minister who said that back in the 1950's section 50 had been passed without any strenuous objections. I want to make it very clear that I have strenuous objections to it now. The words "or, after an inquiry conducted in accordance" simply provide for an inquiry. In the case of Victor Spencer it was an inquiry concerning a man who had been dismissed by the governor in council, was to be tried under regulations made by the governor in council by a person appointed by the governor in council. If there is anything more unilaterial than that, I do not know what it is. The governor in council is going to be the judge, jury and executioner.

Mr. Benson: Will the hon. member permit me to clarify this? Under subsection 7 he is not dismissed by the governor in council, but suspended until an inquiry takes place at which he can put forth his case.

Mr. Douglas: Certainly the last part of the phrase which reads "to dismiss any such person" indicates that somebody has to dismiss him. Surely this would be under the jurisdiction of the cabinet after an inquiry had been conducted under the regulations made by the cabinet by a person appointed by the cabinet.

In other words the cabinet will be the judge, the jury and the executioner. The cabinet will set up regulations under which the man will be tried, will appoint the judge, and after this kangaroo court is carefully set up the man will be dismissed by the government, whose original suspension will be fully vindicated by the quasi court which it has set up.

Mr. Benson: May I ask the hon. member a question? Does he really believe this? This is exactly what Victor Spencer asked for and what the government gave him. He asked for an inquiry conducted by someone appointed by the governor in council. Does the hon. member believe that that inquiry was not carried out fairly in the circumstances, or that the governor in council can make this kind of decision with regard to a dismissal without first obtaining advice from the R.C.M.P., and from the committee on security, etc.?

Under this section a person cannot be dismissed summarily as he was under section 50; he can only be suspended. He is given the right which Victor Spencer had when the inquiry was set up. I am the first to admit that this is not a perfect solution, that it is an interim solution as was understood by the committee at the time when it was passed. It is an interim solution while we are awaiting a report from the committee on security.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, to try to refer to the Victor Spencer case in order to gain approval for this subsection is a very weak argument indeed. In the first place Victor Spencer was only given an inquiry after weeks of questioning and protestations in the house. Second, he was granted an inquiry by a person appointed by the cabinet, only because there was no other way of having such an inquiry. Now, if the minister will just possess his soul in patience I can get to the point I am seeking to make.

I suggest that what is required here is not an inquiry. What is required here is the right of appeal to some impartial person or board, and not under regulations set up by the people who want to fire him; not by a person appointed by the people who have already made a decision with respect to his case. First, he ought to have a right of appeal to some impartial person or tribunal. Second, the regulations and the procedures under which that appeal will be conducted should be set out, not by the cabinet but by parliament, or set out under usual judicial procedures. Thirdly, there should be a guarantee that in the course of that appeal he will be allowed two things; one is to know clearly and distinctly what the charge is and what the evidence is against him, and the other is that he will be allowed counsel and that counsel will be allowed to appear for him, and will be given in advance all the evidence that has been collected against him. These are the basic things that any individual going into court would be entitled to under our system of jurisprudence.

However, since this individual is a civil servant, under the cloak of secrecy he can be denied the basic tenets of justice. He may be dismissed by the governor in council. He may be tried by someone appointed by the governor in council under regulations set up by the governor in council. This, Mr. Chairman, is far from any great improvement over the old section 50 of the Public Service Act. This is not a right of appeal. This is simply a situation in which the cabinet can suspend some person with the intention of firing him, and after they have set up an inquiry under their own appointee, with their own regulations, they can get the approval of that appointee for the dismissal of the individual concerned.

This individual, under this subclause 7, has no guarantees at all that he is going to have a fair hearing, that he is going to have an impartial judgment made of his case, that he is going to be given in advance all the facts and data upon which the charge is based. He has no guarantee he will be brought face to face with his accusers. None of these things is spelled out in this subclause. I think the minister ought to be ashamed to ask this committee to approve a subclause like this. It represents a complete abdication of the ordinary precepts of Canadian justice.

I think the minister ought to give the committee at least some idea of the regulations the governor in council proposes to promulgate for the conduct of such an inquiry. What are the regulations to be? What rights will an individual have who appears before this inquiry? Will he be entitled to have counsel and to have the evidence presented against him? Will his accusers appear and be subjected to cross-examination by counsel for the accused? Will all the ordinary court procedures obtain? We do not know. I for one am not prepared to see this subclause pass until the minister tells us what the regulations are which the governor in council has in mind, and which will constitute the framework within which this inquiry will be conducted.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam never ceases to astonish me. Today he seems to be clairvoyant, but on other days he seems to be a little bit short-sighted. I am always embarrassed for the former premier of Saskatchewan. In some respects I am somewhat surprised at the proposal contained in subsection 7 of clause 3. If we recall correctly, this provision was probably amended following the Victor Spencer case which was brought before the house. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam said entire responsibility for this matter lies with the cabinet. Well, I would not know who else would have responsibility. If a person has been accused of a breach of security, it is up to the government to deal with that person. Parliament will know about it when any such action is taken. This is a better system than we used to have.

Everyone, Mr. Chairman, has a right to a fair hearing. If there is no cause for alarm after the hearing has been conducted, the man should be rehabilitated and the case set aside. If there is any doubt in a security case, can that man stay? These remarks apply to a person who has been accused by the government. But suppose it is a case like that of Calvin Macdonald who has not been accused by the government? He has no remedy in trying to get a fair trial. The minister may say this matter does not come under his jurisdiction. However if a man is an agent for the R.C.M.P., part of his pay is withheld to rehabilitate him when he is no longer an agent.

If someone is being accused, then it is the government's responsibility to assure that person a fair hearing. Mr. Macdonald is being tried by public opinion because of the government's silence. If we go around suspecting people and accusing them, then it is up to the government to give these people an opportunity to clear themselves. I am not too concerned with whether or not the government appoints the judge for this inquiry. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam says the government should not name the judge. However, the government names all the judges. I do not believe in this system of nominating judges, but I believe that until it is changed we have to accept it. If a man who has been accused is given a fair hearing and is found guilty, then that should be the end of the matter.

In this case a man and his family and all those involved have been left in a state of suspension, and I think this is a grave injustice. The government says that it cannot do anything in a case like this. I would draw attention of hon. members to what happened in the case of Leopold. So why cannot the same thing happen in the case of Macdonald? If the man was not an R.C.M.P. agent he should be locked up. He has accused members of the former C.C.F. party and other members of the House of Commons, though not in a derogatory way. He made reference to Mr. Coldwell, a man I respect and who was nominated for the commission.

There have been a lot of protests over the Victor Spencer case, yet in the case of Macdonald there has been nothing but silence. Why is this, Mr. Chairman? Is it because some cabinet minister says the guy is a crackpot? Who is any cabinet minister to call someone that? I think some members of the cabinet may be crackpots, but we still have to put up with them. If this man was either working directly or indirectly with the R.C.M.P. and they were paying him, then he was working for the R.C.M.P. Now he has been found out. Nevertheless the government should look into this question and publicly state one way or the other exactly who this man was and what he was doing. This is the responsibility of the government.

In matters like this there may be many doors to pass through and sometimes they are all closed. If this parliament had not acted on the Victor Spencer case, then perhaps this clause might never have been in the bill. Unfortunately he died suddenly before the matter could be cleared up. But the other gentleman is not dead and neither is his family. I think the government should make a public statement on the matter and if under this clause the man deserves to be rehabilitated, then the government should take action.

The only reason I spoke on this clause is that on one side we talk of rights and on the other side we forget about them altogether. You would be surprised, Mr. Chairman, how many people do not know what they are talking about when they discuss Calvin Macdonald. All they know of him is that he was the guy who threw the blood bomb.

If a member of parliament cannot get a reply from the government, Mr. Chairman, just imagine how difficult it is for the little man out in British Columbia. I do not know whether the government is waiting for some brain wave or some fancy idea, but sometimes we forget to take our own responsibilities.

Certainly in this regard I condemn the government for their lack of responsibility. All the government say in cases like this is that they must keep silent. But they did not keep silent during the war in the case of Leopold. If he could be reinstated in employment, then so should Macdonald. If Calvin Macdonald is a lunatic then he should be locked up. If the man stands accused of being a Communist spy for ten and a half years, then why is there any need to wait. He should be brought before an inquiry so that he can tell all he knows. Such an inquiry need not be a public inquiry, but some determination should be made as to whether he should be put behind bars or rehabilitated.

I would suggest that a man like this who has worked for his country deserves just as much justice and attention on the part of the Canadian government and parliament as one accused by the government outright of being a Communist spy and relieved of all his privileges until an inquiry was set up. If we give this sort of treatment to our official spies we should at least give it to one who says he worked for the R.C.M.P.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to make a very brief observation. I think we all accept the fact that the application of the strict rule of law must be superseded at times when the security and safety of the realm is at stake. I think this is the condition precedent which is set out in the first part of subsection 7 in clause 3.

I was not present during the committee sessions, though I did read some of the transcripts. I take it that this particular clause is only a stop-gap, interim measure until the government, through its committee now in operation, has completed examination of this very difficult problem and has brought in some regulations. I do not know whether any undertaking has been given in this regard, but this undertaking should not preclude this parliament from examining the regulations.

True enough, Mr. Chairman, the government must have a responsibility in this matter, but I would hesitate to agree to this measure—in fact, not only would I hesitate but I would oppose it—as it is embraced within the four corners of subsections 7 and 8, if I thought that there would not be any opportunity for this house to debate at some future time not too far distant the regulations under which there would be some process of examination where the safety and security of the state is involved. As I read subsection 8, once the order has been made by the governor in council it shall be taken as being conclusive proof of the matters stated therein. In other words, there is no opportunity for it to be tested or questioned.

I am not going to say any more. If the government is in a position to tell me that following the completion of the proceedings of the committee set up by the government these matters will be brought before parliament and an opportunity given to debate the kind of procedures involved in security matters, which will be the subject of a more permanent arrangement, then I am content.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, I would first like to say that this is only a stop-gap measure for the future until the commission appointed by the government reports and recommends procedures with regard to security matters in this country.

On this commission we have Mr. Max Mackenzie, Mr. M. J. Coldwell and Mr. Y. Pratt. We hope that in the not too distant future these gentlemen will come forward with a report which will advise the government how security matters should be handled. The representatives of the party of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam were sitting on the joint committee. That body came forward with this measure as a possible stop-gap. For the interval I hope that no security cases arise until after the royal commission has reported. I wish to assure the committee that this is a stop-gap measure and will be subject to review when the report of the royal commission on security has been received. In the interim we hope this will be acceptable to the committee.

Personally I believe that this measure is far superior to section 50 of the Civil Service Act. Subsection 2 of section 50 says:

> (2) Nothing in this Act shall be construed to limit or affect the right or power of the governor in council to remove or dismiss any employee.

This is a real step forward. It is not the ultimate solution to the problem. I think we would be guessing at what the royal commission on security will find or recommend if we go further at this point.

Mr. Douglas: I understood, from the minister's previous statement, that this was an interim measure pending the recommendations of the commission set up to look into security procedures. I understand that. I would not expect the minister to move a lengthy amendment, with that caveat in mind.

Though this is an interim measure until the commission reports and until the government brings down legislation to implement any recommendations the committee may make—which may take two or three years—I think this clause could have been much better than it is. We are passing a law: We are not passing a temporary regulation. This matter becomes a law of Canada.

Even though this is a temporary measure I object to two things in it. One of those has to do with the whole procedure under which the inquiry will be conducted and the right of appeal, which goes much further than the inquiry. The framework within which the inquiry will be conducted is to be contained in regulations passed by the governor in council. We have not seen the regulations. As things are, the government is left with a completely free hand as to the regulations it will pass and the framework within which they will be set up. The other objection is that this measure says that the commissioner has to be appointed by the governor in council. That might be somebody in the civil service; it might be somebody closely associated with those who have suspended the man and recommended his dismissal. The minister could have saved himself much trouble by having placed in subclause 7 a provision saying that when a person has been suspended for security reasons the right of appeal would be to some judge named by the Chief Justice of Canada.

In these circumstances the judge appointed would set up the regulations and framework within which the appeal would be heard and the inquiry conducted. This would give the judge the right to decide the extent to which the hearings would be private—I assume they would be in camera—and the procedures for the conduct of the appeal. This gets the governor in council entirely out of the picture. A security matter ought to be referred to a judge, it should be left to a judge to carry out his own investigation in the way he thinks best. That would alleviate any suspicion that the person appointed as commissioner has been selected because he is more likely to agree with the recommendation of suspension and dismissal.

The minister shakes his head. I remind him of the old saying, that not only must justice be done, but it must appear to be done. Beyond a shadow of doubt it must appear to an individual who has been dismissed on security grounds that justice has been done. Those grounds, because they have to do with security, cannot be made public. I point out to the minister that subclause 8 of clause 7 says:

(8) For the purposes of subsection 7, any order made by the governor in council is conclusive proof of the matters stated therein in relation to the suspension or dismissal of any person in the interest of the safety or security of Canada or any state allied or associated with Canada.

We are giving this commission wide powers. Not only has it power to inquire, but the decision it reaches is final and complete. I take it there can be no appeal to the courts. A man can do nothing else. If you are to make such a definite decision, which would end a man's employment with the government and probably ruin him for life—any man who has been fired by the government after an inquiry on the grounds of security, is not likely to find a job anywhere else in Canada or in the western world—it is extremely important that this committee make absolutely sure that when a person is dimissed he has every opportunity to present his case. He should be treated according to the ordinary precepts of justice.

The government for its own sake, I should think, would want to wash its hands of anything that looked like a biased judgment. I do not know why the minister does not consider that when it is decided to suspend a man, the right of appeal should be given to him. Any such appeal ought to be conducted by any judge of the Supreme Court selected by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. It should be left to that judge to decide how to conduct the inquiry.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I want to raise what might be considered a contentious question. I have been asked to do this by some people in my constituency, by some members of the public service in Ottawa, and by some other employees in the public service. I suppose I have been asked because possibly I represent the Victorian values more than any other member of our group.

I want to quote two paragraphs taken from section 3:

(f) establish standards of discipline in the public service and prescribe the financial and other penalties, including suspension and discharge, that may be applied for breaches of discipline or misconduct, and the circumstances and manner in which and the authority by which or whom those penalties may be applied or may be varied or rescinded in whole or in part;

(g) establish and provide for the application of standards governing physical working conditions of, and for the health and safety of, persons employed in the public service;

We take it that persons employed in the public service are proud to be in it. I am rising to ask one or two questions which have not been answered to the satisfaction of employees in the public service, the public or some of the supervisors and administrators of the public service. I ask the minister, with respect to this section related to discipline and so on, are certain standards of deportment and dress required in the public service of Canada? Are they required in all branches of the service?

This has been brought to my attention. In my own constituency we have a young man who was employed as a postman, you see, and there was a dreadful uproar because he went round with the post, delivering the rural mail wearing this postal hat, with his hair down over his shoulders. There was a proper hullabaloo. I might tell the minister that I am inclined to be always on the side of discipline in cases of this kind.

Then again, there is the question of miniskirts in the public service. Are there any standards applied? I am not asking about anything reasonable, but suppose some female employee turns up in anything which might be considered quite outrageous. Are there any standards in this respect? I am lately informed that in some departments of the public service young ladies have arrived in their offices with skirts so short that it has been necessary to put screens in front of their desks. I should like the minister to make inquiries into this. Are there any standards about dress, or with respect to the length of hair and so on? Miniskirts and long hair can be very diverting and provocative in certain circumstances. I am one of those who believe there should be certain standards of dress and deportment required in the public service of Canada and I should like the minister to tell the committee whether there are any standards in this respect at the present time. I ask, not for my own information, but for the information of the public in general, the employees, and in some instances the supervisors who are responsible for the various branches of the public service.

Mr. Baldwin: Also whether they affect the security and safety of the country.

Mr. Benson: There are certain requirements in the public service with regard to those who wear uniforms in the public service, and I believe there are certain standards with respect to the general appearance of those employed. But these are presently administered by departments. I was about to say somewhat facetiously that our standards with regard to miniskirts are pretty high.

But of course this is a serious matter. People in the public service may be expected to report at their work dressed as properly as people in other walks of life in Canada. I do not think the standards in the public service need to be any higher or lower than that. As I say, these questions are at present handled by the departments. For example I received a note from my deputy minister the other day asking whether it would be all right for our customs inspectors to grow beards in areas where beards are being grown as part of the centennial celebrations. I replied that since others in the area were growing beards there seemed no harm in our inspectors growing them as well.

The purpose of these two paragraphs in the bill is really to take important matters affecting personnel administration having to do with standards of discipline and move them into the jurisdiction of Treasury Board, where we could get some sort of standard established throughout the civil service.

In addition I would point out that any standards which are set under the collective bargaining procedure might at the ultimate include standards with respect to hair length and skirt length and would be subject to the normal grievance procedures; if someone disagreed with a decision which was made by the Treasury Board when giving instructions to departments, he or she would be able to go through the normal grievance procedure and the matter would ultimately be determined by adjudication under the terms of Bill C-170.

Mr. Herridge: I thank the minister for his reply, but in fairness to the public and to the employees could the minister provide us with copies of the standards established in the various departments by the deputy ministers or departmental heads?

Mr. Benson: I can undertake to try to do this. I do not know how far these standards are written out in the various departments. One of the purposes of this legislation is to make sure that in future we have something in writing and administered by the various departments.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 4 and 5 agreed to.

On clause 6—Payments urgently required.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): As I indicated when we were discussing a previous clause, I have reservations with respect to clause 6 which I wish now to express. This clause deals with Governor Generals' warrants. It repeals a former section and re-enacts it substituting the President of the Treasury Board for the Minister of Finance.

Now I was brought up in the old school which believed that Governor Generals' warrants were evil in themselves and basically inconsistent with responsible government. I therefore intend to oppose the re-enactment of this provision. In my opinion it is an affront to parliament and to responsible government for any prime minister to seek dissolution of parliament without having secured from parliament financial provision for at least the election period.

The persistent use of Governor Generals' warrants in the past few years is a denial of the basic function of the House of Commons. Four times in 25 years parliament has been totally by-passed and ignored and the national administration financed over long periods through this undemocratic technique. In 1940 Mr. Mackenzie King persuaded Lord Tweedsmuir, improperly, in my view, to dissolve parliament at a time when no provision had been made for the public service until a new parliament might meet. As a result, there had to be massive resort to Governor Generals' warrants.

This precedent was followed in 1958 when Mr. Massey granted the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert a dissolution without consideration of the financial provisions still to be made, and resort was had to Governor Generals' warrants not only for that fiscal year but for the ensuing year. From that date things have gone from bad to worse. When the former government was defeated in this house in February 1963, no effort was made, despite some urging by ministers, to come back to the house the following day and ask for financial provision to tide the administration over until the new parliament could meet. So essential Canadian needs were financed by that government, and by the government which was elected on April 8, 1963, through Governor Generals' warrants, and this was done for many months.

Then, deliberately, in September, 1965, the present Prime Minister induced General Vanier to grant a dissolution without the House of Commons having made any financial provision whatever for the election period. Once again resort was had to Governor Generals' warrants for a period of several months. Four times for extended periods on each occasion this house has been by-passed and ignored and I think this intolerable denial of the basic authority of the House of Commons is something which should be stopped.

I believe this provision ought not to be re-enacted and that the correct procedure before the dissolution of parliament at any time is for the government to come to the House of Commons and secure supply for the period that is likely to elapse before the next parliament meets. Until this is done, parliament ought not to be dissolved. I believe, as I say, that a Governor Generals' warrant is evil per se and on that ground I intend to oppose the re-enactment of this clause.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I can do nothing less than support as strongly as possible the very valid position taken by the hon. member for Carleton. During the time I had the honour to be chairman of the public accounts committee, and subsequently sitting as a member of the committee, this matter engaged our attention year after year after year. I think there can be no better way of bringing this matter to the attention of the committee and demonstrating the seriousness of the situation than by referring to paragraph 48 of the report of the Auditor General for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1966, which has just been delivered to me. This special problem is dealt with under paragraph 48, at page 17. The Auditor General refers to the dissolution of parliament on September 8, 1965, and says:

> The dissolution of parliament on September 8, 1965 before full supply for the year 1965-66 had been granted, necessitated recourse to Governor General's special warrants to provide the funds for carrying on government services until the new parliament was assembled on January 18, 1966. A total of $920,591,867 was provided by five special warrants as follows:

The Auditor General goes on to say:

> When the 1965-66 special warrants were being prepared the departments were instructed by the Treasury Board that each vote and class of payments required special consideration in the light of section 28 of the Financial Administration Act.

That is of course, the act which is being repealed and re-enacted by clause 6 of this bill. This passage in the Auditor General's report continues:

> The Treasury Board also advised the departments to review and take into account the particular audit comments contained in the Auditor General's reports for 1962-63 and 1963-64.

Then the report says:

> In the audit office view these guide lines were not always followed in the preparation of the special warrants and a number of the items provided for did not meet the test of being "urgently required for the public good" as required by section 28 of the act.
> Furthermore, payments under the special warrants continued to be made after parliament assembled on January 18, 1966 until Appropriation Act No. 1, 1966 was assented to on February 8, 1966.

This is a serious problem which of course the permanent officers of the crown have to face when their political masters, for reasons best known to themselves, decide to call elections from time to time. This is something for which all political parties must accept some degree of responsibility. When you look at the original section 28 of the Financial Administration Act, the section that will be replaced by this clause, you find this wording:

> Where an accident happens to any public work or building when parliament is not in session and an expenditure for the repair or renewal thereof is urgently required, or where any other matter arises when parliament is not in session—

Mr. Benson: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, that is not the section that is being replaced now. The section that is being replaced now is the one that was enacted on September 6, 1958.

Mr. Baldwin: I recognize that this section was changed, Mr. Chairman, by reason of another amendment. I am trying to get at the history of the legislation. It is quite obvious, starting on this basis and working forward, that it was intended that when some special or urgent circumstance arose requiring expenditure to be made when parliament was not in session, recourse could be had to this particular section.

I remember that when I was practising law years ago, as a solicitor for some municipalities in Alberta there was a question of whether relief or welfare payments were the responsibility of one municipality or another. The test then was that if it was a case of sudden and urgent necessity, the municipality in which the person resided was liable for these payments. I remember that there were cases of women being delivered of children who tried to suggest that this was a case of sudden and urgent necessity, and we could always argue logically that this had nothing to do with a sudden and urgent necessity because there had been a preparatory period of nine months.

For a government deliberately, two and a half years before its time has come—I have in mind a little different time here—to seek an election and go to the people, and then say there is a payment that is urgently required to be made, I submit is absolute nonsense. We have argued this question in the public accounts committee time after time and this is an opportunity to bring the matter before this committee. If the government is defeated there might be some circumstances in which a payment has to be made urgently, but even then, as the hon. member for Carleton has pointed out, there are ways and means of getting around the difficulty. But when a government deliberately chooses to seek an election knowing it can have recourse to this legislation, and the sum of $920 million is involved, it is a further example of the erosion of parliamentary control of finance. It is all very well to say that under the terms of the legislation the estimates are brought back to the house. Of course they are, but the money has been spent and we cannot undo what has been done.

Over the last two or three elections billions of dollars have been spent by way of Governor General's warrants and this parliament has had nothing at all to do with those expenditures except after the act, in approving the amounts. I suggest that the original intention of the section was to provide for emergency payments of a particular kind, but when a government deliberately seeks an election they should only do so on the basis that they have provided the funds necessary to carry on the essential services of government during that period.

Quite obviously it is going to take a great deal more than a simple amendment to resolve this question. This is a matter which governments will have to consider in the light of parliamentary responsibility. A government has a certain responsibility which sometimes it can only exercise when it sees fit to ask His Excellency for dissolution of parliament, but I suggest they should not do so until they have taken the proper precaution of making available the funds necessary for the carrying on of the essential services of government. I intend to vote against this clause in the hope that it may initiate further discussion of this problem.

There is one other matter that I want to bring to the minister's attention. I have not a copy of the last amendment, but perhaps the minister can answer this question. Will section 28 of the Financial Administration Act contain a provision similar to that contained in subsection (4) of the act, which provides that where there has been an adjournment sine die for more than two weeks, it shall be presumed that parliament is not in session?

Mr. Benson: Yes, Mr. Chairman. The only changes from clause 6 on in this bill amending the Financial Administration Act are the substitution of "President of the Treasury Board" for "the Minister of Finance".

Mr. Baldwin: So we will still be in the position that if parliament should be adjourned sine die to a period of one day more than two weeks, the government is free to ask His Excellency for Governor General's warrants?

Mr. Benson: That is correct, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Baldwin: Then, Mr. Chairman, I propose to vote against this clause.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 7 to 17 inclusive ageed to.

On clause 18—Coming into force.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, on clause 18 may I ask the minister whether it is his intention to have this legislation proclaimed immediately, or in any event before February 28, so that as companion legislation to the collective bargaining legislation it will come into force at that time?

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Benson: Yes, Mr. Chairman; it is our intention to proclaim this legislation as soon as it is passed through the other place.

Clause agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): When shall the said bill be read the third time? By leave now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Benson moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

IMMIGRATION

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF APPEAL BOARD

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-220, to make provision for appeals to an Immigration Appeal Board in respect of certain matters relating to immigration.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, is the parliamentary secretary to the minister going to make a statement at this time?

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in making these comments this evening I am speaking on behalf of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who unavoidably could not be here tonight. This matter came up suddenly. When it came to our attention that this matter might come up this evening, the minister at that time was on his way to another engagement. Therefore it is impossible for him to be here.

All of us who come to this house do so, I am sure, with the purpose of doing our best to ensure that the laws of our land treat people with equality and consistency. We find, however, that this objective, so simple and so important in principle, is far from easy to realize in all cases in practice. Perhaps I am especially conscious of this, because in no other area is equality and consistency so hard to achieve as it is in immigration matters. I believe, however, that in this bill we are for the first time providing a basis on which success in our high objective will be possible not only in theory but in practice.

No immigration law can be both enforceable and fair unless it provides a considerable area of discretion in its operation. The law establishes general rules as to who may come to Canada and who may stay in Canada. The rules necessarily are general. They cannot precisely accommodate all the variety of individual circumstances. They must be capable of being tempered in their application, according to the merits of individual cases. There will sometimes be humanitarian or compassionate reasons for admitting people who, under the general rules, are inadmissible.

This is the responsibility of the minister and his department, in administering the law. It is an onerous responsibility. We cannot expect to discharge it perfectly. Even if our actual mistakes are few, there are bound to be people who feel aggrieved by some of our decisions. To me it is self-evident that this calls for some system of appeals. The minister should not have the final say in cases where the individual has claim to rights in Canada or as a Canadian.

I do not mean that the person overseas, who wants to come to Canada but whose qualifications are not accepted as adequate, should have a right of appeal. To be admitted to a country not one's own is a privilege, not a right. But once a person is in Canada, he should not be deported without a right of appeal. And Canadian citizens, I believe, should be regarded as having a right to bring members of their immediate family to Canada. Like other rights, it is not absolute. But if it is denied in a particular case, the citizen should be able to take his case to an independent body.

Mr. Speaker, an Immigration Appeal Board does now exist. It provides for appeals against some deportation orders but not against all. Moreover, the present board has authority only to allow or dismiss an appeal on matters of law; and furthermore its decisions are, under the Immigration Act, subject to review by the minister. The minister can confirm or quash its decisions or substitute his own. Worst of all, the board cannot make any decision on the non-legal merits of a case. It cannot bring humanitarian or compassionate considerations into play. It may recommend to the minister that the minister do so, but the decision again is up to the minister. The board has no final say.

In these circumstances, the effectiveness of the existing board is extremely limited. The public is aware of the board's limitations. Everyone knows that its decisions may be reversed by the minister or by officials acting on the minister's behalf. Thus the board has no independent status. It is regarded as merely an arm of the immigration division which appears, in effect, to decide the outcome of appeals against the actions of its own officers. This casts doubt on the application of other aspects of immigration law, policy, and procedure. It invites the application of pressure to the minister and the department. Indeed it is through such representations, rather than through the appeal board, that efforts to obtain the redress of alleged grievances are chiefly made.

The purpose of this bill therefore is to establish public confidence in the appeal process and to remove a serious cause of dissatisfaction and criticism. An effective appeal procedure will greatly reduce the discretionary powers of the minister and his officials. The action that may be taken administratively, following a decision by the board, will be restricted and clearly defined by the bill. In effect the board will be able to bring the humanitarian and other non-legal aspects of a particular case fully into consideration. On that basis, it will be able to make final decisions that are as fair and impartial as possible.

The main provisions of the bill empower the governor in council to appoint seven persons as members of the Immigration Appeal Board. It will be a court of record and function accordingly. Its proceedings will be public unless the appellant wishes otherwise. The members will hold office during good behaviour until they reach the age of 70 years. The Chairman and at least two other members will be barristers or advocates. With these and other provisions we hope to ensure that the board commends the respect appropriate to its new function.

The board will be authorized to deal conclusively with all appeals against deportation orders. The one proviso is that provided a deportation order is found to have been legally made, it must be carried out where in criminal or security cases the board is provided with proper certification from the Solicitor-General and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to say that the national interest requires execution of the deportation orders. The one proviso is that provided a one that we expect to use frequently.

The discretionary authority of the board is defined according to two types of deportation cases. Where a legal resident of Canada has been ordered deported and has appealed, the Board can decide what is fair and reasonable in all the circumstances of the case. On humanitarian or other grounds it can set aside a deportation order, however legally valid.

It would not be reasonable to exercise such wide discretion in the case of people who have been ordered deported because they came to Canada claiming to be non-immigrants or who entered surreptitiously without any status, or indeed who are simply seeking admission without having complied with immigration procedures.

In these cases the board, having decided the lawfulness of the deportation order, will have authority either to enforce the order or to authorize entry or landing, but this discretionary power will be exercised only when exceptional circumstances, in the board's view, make it reasonable to grant a special privilege to stay in Canada.

I wish particularly to draw the attention of hon. members to another important aspect of the bill. For the first time sponsorship is recognized in effect as a legal right of the Canadian citizen. The board will have authority to make a final decision on appeals from Canadian citizens who think that the department has been wrong to refuse the admission of relatives whom they wish to sponsor.

This is a new concept in Canadian immigration legislation. But the idea is not new. Sponsors, ethnic organizations and parliamentarians have for years been seeking an objective form of review of departmental decisions in sponsored cases. The minister is very happy to attempt to provide it.

The practical difficulties, however, are considerable. I am sure that they can be overcome, but it will take a little time and experience. I do not think in the meantime it would be wise to risk swamping the board with sponsorship work.

For this reason the bill proposes to leave it to be determined from time to time in the regulations exactly what classes of sponsorable relatives may be the subject of appeals by Canadians citizens. The government's intention would be to provide initially that these classes will be all those dependent relatives who, if the white paper proposals are implemented, will in future be sponsorable by immigrants before they become citizens. We will subsequently reconsider the scope of appeals in the light of experience.

Apart from these basic provisions you will observe, Mr. Speaker, many other ways in which this bill is able to assure the individual not only that justice will be done but that it will be seen to be done, and to be done with humanity and compassion. You will wish to note particularly, Mr. Speaker, that the board will render written reasons for its decision to allow or dismiss appeals. Its decisions, in so far as they concern law, become precedents; and the appellant and the department will both be entitled to appeal the decisions of the board on questions of law to the Supreme Court of Canada with leave of that court.

I should emphasize that every person ordered deported will have access to the board; the case is within the jurisdiction of the board whenever the individual claims that the weight of evidence does not justify his deportation. The existing provisions of the Immigration Act excluding certain persons from the right of appeal will be abolished. The individual will be on the same footing as the minister who may appeal to the board against a decision of a special inquiry officer not to order deportation.

I should mention another special point. Under the Immigration Act only a special inquiry officer may authorize release of a person detained during deportation proceedings. This is in connection with the matter that the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) raised the other day. It is proposed in this bill that in future people who are detained pending disposition of their appeals may apply to the board against a decision of a special inquiry officer to refuse to grant conditional release.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is one of the four routes by which we are seeking to improve immigration policy and procedures. We have begun to make changes in administrative procedures and we will be carrying these further in the light of discussion on the white paper.

In the light of that discussion also the minister hopes to make the changes in the immigration regulations that will remove all discrimination and provide a proper balance in the national interest between manpower needs and the claims of sponsorship. Fourth, as the final and basic stage, the minister hopes to introduce a full-scale revision of the Immigration Act.

Of all these steps, however, the one represented by this bill is the most urgent, because it is the one necessary to assure that the proper concepts of the rights of the individual are applied to our immigration procedures. It is a change not in technicalities, though these are important, but above all in the essential spirit of our whole approach to the problems. As such, it is the most urgent of all the reforms, and as such I hope that it may have the consideration and approval of hon. members.

Mr. Fairweather: I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary a question. Will reasons with regard to security under clause 21 be given?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I believe that it would be best if questions on clauses of the bill could be asked during the clause by clause study, after second reading of the bill.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

Mr. Fairweather: I understand the hon. member cannot give an answer to my question at this time.

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary had no reason to apologize for the absence of the minister. Indeed I am glad that he had the courage to proceed with second reading of this legislation, for I believe that ministers should entrust the presentation of legislation more frequently to the second string, the men and the hon. lady in the third row who are coming along. I am glad that by reason of the minister's absence the hon. gentleman had this opportunity tonight.

This bill represents a significant chance in our immigration procedure and administration. Quite probably it is overdue.

I remember very well when years ago the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) now Minister of Transport, said that there was probably more paper work in the then Department of Citizenship and Immigration than in any other department of government. He spoke from knowledge gained as Clerk of the Privy Council and as cabinet minister, and I think that what he said is probably still true today. This legislation may well prove to be a relief to successive ministers of manpower and immigration.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock? I will continue my remarks when this bill is next before the house.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the house leader what will be our business for tomorrow?

Mr. McIlraith: Tomorrow we propose to submit for the consideration of the house the following items on today's order paper: Items 83, 100, 116, 126, 127, 132, 130 and 131.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that perhaps the house leader is a little presumptuous.

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Speaker, just optimistic.

AIR CANADA—SUGGESTED INCREASED USE OF WINNIPEG MAINTENANCE BASE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, February 13, as recorded in Hansard at page 12946, I put this question to the Minister of Transport:

> In view of reports that the Air Canada base at Dorval is not now adequate for its maintenance and overhaul work and that its facilities will have to be expanded, could the minister remind Air Canada of the fact that its base at Winnipeg could handle both the Viscounts and the DC-9 aircraft?

The reply of the Minister of Transport was one short sentence, not particularly helpful. It was as follows:

> I have no doubt Air Canada will take note of the hon. gentleman's representations.

In view of that answer, I am sure the minister was not surprised when I posted this question for a few remarks on one of these late shows. It would be a gross understatement merely to say that the people of Winnipeg have been disappointed over the various steps that have been taken which have reduced the use of Air Canada's maintenance and overhaul facilities at Winnipeg. These steps have been taken over a number of years, despite the many delegations to Ottawa during two or three different governmental régimes and despite very thorough examination of the whole situation. I recognize, as do most of us in Winnipeg, that whether we like it or not the die has been pretty well cast and that for the most part Air Canada's maintenance and overhaul operations are destined to be performed at Dorval.

However, it has come as a bitter piece of news to workers at Winnipeg to learn that Air Canada is now planning an elaborate extension of its facilities at Dorval. It appears that this expansion is necessary in order to cope with the amount of work that is piling up. The reason that this pill is a bit bitter to the people of Winnipeg is that the Thompson report, which was the last full scale inquiry into this matter, based its approval of the removal of the maintenance and overhaul work from Winnipeg to Montreal on a number of considerations, one of which was that the facilities already established at Montreal were greatly under-utilized.

I have a copy of Mr. Thompson's report here, and I have been noting in particular references on pages 86, 96 and 106, in which Mr. Thompson sets out the various arguments. The commissioner stated, in effect, that in view of the fact the various facilities are under-utilized at Montreal, it would be a waste of those facilities to try to do DC-9 work at Winnipeg or to plan on the indefinite use of the Winnipeg maintenance and overhaul base for any of the company's aircraft. Winnipeg, having been told that one of the reasons it had to see its work go to Montreal was that Montreal's facilities were huge and greatly under-utilized, now so soon after the Thompson report produced on March 3, 1966, less than a year ago, learns that the facilities at Montreal are not adequate and are having to be enlarged. This is a bit hard for the people of Winnipeg to take.

I realize that the Thompson report came down pretty squarely on the side of Air Canada's decision. I know that the Thompson report was sympathetic to Winnipeg and suggested, perhaps, that there were other ways in which the work to be made available at Winnipeg might be increased. Meantime not much of this other kind of activity is taking place and employees see the maintenance and overhaul work gradually being transferred to Montreal.

If Air Canada has now determined that it must enlarge its facilities at Dorval, Mr. Speaker, then this suggests that new factors have come into the picture. If new factors have come into the picture I would urge that Air Canada might again consider the greater utilization of its facilities at Winnipeg. To put it in the plainest, most simple language that I can, Mr. Speaker, if facilities are needed and they are not to be found in Montreal—in other words, if enlargement of facilities has to take place there—and there are facilities which are unused at Winnipeg, does not common sense suggest that the company might take another look at this whole situation? Frankly, why not make full use of the facilities at Winnipeg?

When I speak for the people of my city with respect to what has happened to the use of the base at Stevenson field I speak for a disappointed people. I hope that the Minister without Portfolio, who I gather will be speaking tonight on behalf of the Minister of Transport with respect to this question, will have something a little more encouraging to say than simply that he will send a copy of today's Hansard to the president of Air Canada.

Hon. John N. Turner (Member of the Administration): Mr. Speaker, I regret that that is exactly what I am going to say tonight. What the minister said in answer to this question last week was that he would draw it to Air Canada's attention, and he has done so. On the basis of the fuller argument the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has been able to make this evening, the company will be apprised in more generous terms of the scope of this question. The hon. member knows that I have personal reasons for having great sympathy for the people of Winnipeg and I can assure him that I will report back to the minister what he has said this evening.

FINANCE—SUGGESTED PROVISION OF "REAL DOLLAR" BONDS

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, the question I asked the Minister of Finance last week arose out of three different statements. One was made in an article in the Globe and Mail dealing with jobs and the inflation equation, quoting Professor H. C. Eastman of the University of Toronto. He based his comments on the report of the Economic Council of Canada, their Third Annual Review. According to the Globe and Mail he suggested that the council was remiss in not pressing the government harder to help low-income savers protect themselves against inflation. The article continues:

• (10:10 p.m.)

"An obvious step," he said, "would be to provide real dollar government bonds which individuals could buy, perhaps subject to a stated maximum, thus avoiding the loss of their investment through price increases." Private business, said Prof. Eastman, already has made progress in protecting employees against inflation through such devices as pension plans based on earnings in the final years of an employee's career. "Government should adopt a similar concern for the welfare of society at large by providing safe instruments any individual can use."

I have read Dr. Morton Shulman's book, "Anyone Can Make A Million", not because I wanted to make a million but because I had heard considerable comment about it. In it he says that the price of gold will be raised. He calls this step inevitable. Such a step would result in a more rapid devaluation of the dollar, and a devaluation of government bonds. He calls the process theft and says it is theft against which the individual has no recourse.

With that we have the remarks of Professor David W. Slater of Queen's University, Kingston, made before the committee investigating prices and consumer credit. He also talks about inflation being permanent and something with which we must learn to live.

In that connection may I read a letter I received from one of my constituents. The letter reads:

> At great sacrifice I bought an annuity when the dollar was worth a lot more than now. It is rather cold comfort to be told "Sorry, but you should have thought of the rise in the cost of living, and bought a bigger annuity." Even with foresight a higher annuity would have been impossible. There must be thousands of Canadians in the same position. Could not the interest rate be hitched to the cost of living.

It has been hoped that one of the things to be done for the problem is to institute a prices review board to force prices down somehow. I expect the proponents of that solution have found cold comfort these last few weeks in the hearings of the consumer credit committee. Repeated witnesses have said to that committee that that is not an effective step. Professor Slater says:

> "And to say you can control prices by law or supervision is kidding yourself. You have got to go to the fundamentals. A price review board is not going to do much."

We in Social Credit over and over again in this house have expressed concern about monetary policy and the value of the dollar. Last week we were twitted indirectly by the Minister of Finance when commenting on some proposals of the N.D.P. He suggested that anything put forward by Social Credit was somehow inconceivable. Well there is a very serious problem with the monetary policies being followed by this government. The effects of those policies are shown by the writer of the letter. They affect thousands of Canadians. Those policies do not yet take into account the necessity of living with inflation.

I should like to hear the reply of the minister through the parliamentary secretary about the suggestion that the government issue real dollar bonds that would not lose their value. Perhaps the government could make other suggestions to solve this problem. I should be happy to hear them.

Mr. J. E. Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, the Minister of National Revenue is acting. In the absence of the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance, the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Revenue has been asked to answer.

For the record the question that was asked is the following:

> In view of the continuing rise in prices could the hon. minister say whether the government is considering what Professor H. C. Eastman of the University of Toronto, when speaking recently called an "obvious step" of providing "real dollar" government bonds which individuals could buy, thus avoiding the loss of their investments through price increases?

The answer to this, I suggest, is that the proposal for so-called "real dollar" government bonds to which the hon. member refers is not a new idea. It reflects the widespread and not unnatural desire of investors to be protected against all possible eventualities, including rising prices.

One of the prime objectives of government policy is the achievement and maintenance of reasonable stability of prices. This government is confident that, with the support of parliament and the public, we can follow policies which will achieve this goal.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.19 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. FAIRWEATHER—DISPOSITION OF CHEQUE RECEIVED FROM C.B.C.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which affects my position here and also my integrity. Today's issue of the Toronto Globe and Mail recites that I, among others, endorsed a cheque I received from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

I did receive a cheque from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, Mr. Speaker, and I would not want to take the time of this house to tell the house how hard I tried to get rid of that cheque. I was told by a producer of the program that I should sign what was called a cast sheet because union regulations required every participant in a program to sign one. As a Progressive Conservative, of course, how could I possibly cross a picket line, so to speak, and fail to obey the union's directive in this regard? Therefore I signed the cast sheet.

I was assured, Mr. Speaker, that no cheque would be sent. A cheque was sent. I telephoned the producer in Toronto, who said that there was a memo on this subject which would be reactivated. I said that I was endorsing the cheque to the Canadian University Service Overseas, that I would neither put the cheque into income nor use the receipt as a deduction for income tax purposes. I also wrote to the financial office of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation telling them this, also saying that it was both illegal and unethical for me to accept a cheque. I thought this manner of dealing with the matter would show the corporation and anybody else that no personal impropriety on my part was involved.

• (2:40 p.m.)

UNITED NATIONS

RHODESIA—TABLING OF REGULATIONS UNDER SANCTIONS RESOLUTION

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I wish to table copies in English and French of regulations made today as part of Canada's compliance with the mandatory security council resolution on Rhodesia of December 16, 1966.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to table these documents?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR BEETS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SUPPORT PRICE

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that the government has authorized the agricultural stabilization board to support the price of sugar beets for the 1967 crop by a deficiency payment program at a national support level of $15.50 per standard ton.

The over-all program will include an added stabilizing feature designed to standardize returns in Ontario, which in the past have been adversely affected by low world prices for sugar.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent (Ont.)): Mr. Speaker, we are glad to hear the government announce the increased payment for sugar beets. Certainly the $15.50, the figure quoted by the government is more in keeping with the expenses of the industry today than the $14.35 which prevailed up to this time. This increase will give the industry in Ontario a chance to contract for the necessary acreage for this year.

This is just a temporary measure. In no way does it settle the vital problems facing this industry today. The sooner the government enters into an international agreement on sugar to enable producers to obtain enough from the sale of their sugar beets, removing the need for constant subsidies, the more stable will be the sugar industry not only in Ontario but in the other affected provinces of this country.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): I should like to comment briefly on the announcement regarding the stabilization price for sugar beets. We welcome it. I also reiterate the desirability of having a Canadian sugar policy that would make this type of continuing stopgap arrangement unnecessary.

Inquiries of the Ministry

SHIPPING

HALIFAX—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO SHIPWRECK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport of which I have given his office notice. Will the minister arrange an inquiry immediately into the tragic loss of life by shipwreck on the Sisters' shoal outside Halifax harbour this morning? Would he ask his officials for a departmental review at once of the navigational aids covering the approaches of Halifax harbour, to decide whether more buoy markings are needed immediately, bearing in mind that this is the second marine accident there in less than nine months?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I am sure we all heard with great distress the news on the radio this morning that this ship was in trouble, and I am sorry to have to report to the house that this is a very serious disaster indeed.

The investigation has already begun and every aspect of the matter, including the question of aids to navigation will be looked into. I am sure the hon. gentleman will not expect me, with the paucity of accurate information I have at the moment, to go beyond what I have just said, but I know I will be expressing the view of everyone in the house when I say how deeply we regret this loss and how sympathetic we all feel toward the relatives of those who have lost their lives.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MCKINNON INDUSTRIES—TAB PAYMENTS FOR WORKERS LAID OFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour following the question I asked him yesterday, which he took as notice. It has to do with the 900 employees who have been permanently laid off by McKinnon Industries at St. Catharines and who have been unable to secure their transitional assistance benefits. I want to ask the minister whether any arrangements have been made by which local 199 of the United Automobile Workers can have access to the adjustment assistance board, and whether they will be able to get information respecting those who have been certified and those who have not been certified.

[Mr. Johnston.]

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Following the questions which were asked on this subject yesterday I had my deputy minister or his officials communicate with the transitional assistance benefit board. My information is that the union is not asking for additional certification in numbers but is suggesting that persons actually affected within the numbers authorized are different from those named by the board. We have been in touch with Mr. Burt, the spokesman for the automotive workers, and the matter was to be brought to the attention of the adjustment assistance board this afternoon. I can make no further statement until I have heard what took place at today's meeting of the board.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask whether the board has agreed to meet the representatives of these employees who belong to local 199 of the U.A.W. and who have asked for a meeting to discuss this matter and find out why the TAB payments have not been made?

Mr. Nicholson: I can ask that question and will be glad to pass on the information to the hon. gentleman. I would assume that the chairman or some other representative of the board would be willing to hear representations, but I will be glad to verify this or otherwise.

PUBLIC SERVICE

RECOMMENDATIONS OF GLASSCO COMMISSION REPORT NOT IMPLEMENTED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): I have a question for the Prime Minister in connection with the report of the Auditor General. Is it the intention of the government before the end of the present session to look into the 151 findings, action on which the Auditor General has stated is long overdue, and which were contained in the 1963 Glassco report? Does the government intend to look into these findings and make recommendations before the end of this session?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): All these recommendations have been examined, and I think there will be an opportunity in the appropriate committee of the house to explain the position with regard to those which have not yet been implemented.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): May I ask whether this recent report will be referred to the committee on public accounts as soon as possible?

Mr. Pearson: That is where it invariably goes, Mr. Speaker.

CANADA LAW REPORTS

DIFFERENCE IN COST TO LAWYERS AND GENERAL PUBLIC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a supplementary question to the Minister of Industry following the question asked by the hon. member for Wellington South. It is based on the New Democratic policy of non-discrimination.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Herridge: Can the minister inform the house why the Canada Law Reports are sold to members of the legal profession, who have one of the highest income rates per capita in Canada, at an annual rate of $5 while members of the general public are required to pay $15 for the same reports?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question should be placed on the order paper.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

DISTRIBUTION OF COLOUR TELEVISION SETS TO STAFF MEMBERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): In the absence of the Secretary of State I would ask the Prime Minister to ascertain from the president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation whether an answer to the question is to be given regarding colour television sets and the individuals who became the beneficiaries of the action of the C.B.C. in acquiring them. The information was denied in the reply placed before the house the other day by the Secretary of State. Will he communicate with the president and ask him whether that information will be forthcoming?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, of course an answer has already been given. However, I will be glad to advise the president of the corporation that it is the feeling of the right hon. gentleman that the answer is quite unsatisfactory. As a matter of fact the Secretary of State has been in touch with him on this matter, and perhaps she will be able to reply in greater detail tomorrow.

LABOUR RELATIONS

RAILWAY DISPUTE—EFFORTS TO AVOID COMPULSORY ARBITRATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. Can he tell the house whether his department has initiated talks with various labour union leaders in an effort to forestall compulsory arbitration of the outstanding matters in the rail dispute, and if so what progress can be reported?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, at my request the president, who is also the secretary treasurer, and the vice president of division 4 of the railway workers, the craft workers, came to Ottawa yesterday. I spent the better part of an hour with them. They have returned for further discussions with the officers of their particular division, and I am waiting to hear further from them.

TRADE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON RESULTS OF NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and ask him when the government expects to advise the country regarding the tariff reductions on manufactured goods entering Canada which will come into effect as a result of the Kennedy round of negotiations which are now nearing completion.

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The Kennedy round of negotiations should be completed by mid-year. Any concessions that Canada may win will be announced at the same time as any concessions that we might have to give in exchange for concessions from other countries.

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN PRICE UNDER INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce with reference to the international wheat agreement, negotiations for which will take place in Switzerland this year. Since there is great need for an increase in the price of wheat under that agreement, which directly affects our price, would the minister be prepared to ask for an increase of at least 40 cents per bushel in the high and low prices, which will correspond very closely with the price for which the farmers and farm organizations have asked under the international wheat agreement?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think it is true that international market conditions justify a substantially increased minimum price under any new international wheat agreement. However, the hon. member knows that there are buyers and sellers at the bargaining table, and any agreement reached will have to be on the basis of a price range that is acceptable to both sides.

SPORTS

ABIGAIL HOFFMAN—WORLD RECORD IN WOMEN'S 880 YARD RACE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. P. Cameron (High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. Is he aware of the fact that Miss Abigail Hoffman, an honours student in economics and science at the University of Toronto, won the 880 yard women's race at the Achilles meet at Vancouver on February 18 and established a world record time of 2 minutes 8.4 seconds?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

SELECTION OF REPRESENTATIVES FOR COMMEMORATION OF VIMY RIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. K. H. More (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address my question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs as a result of correspondence which I have received since the public announcement that 70 to 75 Vimy veterans will travel there at government expense for remembrance ceremonies on April 9. Can the minister advise the house how this group will be chosen? Will there be representatives from each province and each unit, and will all ranks be represented?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the delegation will be composed of representatives of each of the units that participated in the battle of Vimy Ridge. The selection of the persons going to France and of the persons attending the ceremonies in Ottawa will be made by the commanding officers of the units now in existence with the aim of continuing the tradition of the units which fought at Vimy Ridge. The commanding officer in each case will select the actual representatives to travel to Vimy Ridge in France or to come to Ottawa to take part in the commemoration services here.

Mr. J. N. Ormiston (Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Will the persons who will be representing the different units be notified before the specified time?

Mr. Teillet: A letter has gone out to all the units concerned. It is our hope that we will have the information before the end of this month so we can complete our arrangements.

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. I am sure the minister knows that many of the units which took part in the battle of Vimy Ridge have since been disbanded. How will representatives of those units be selected?

Mr. Teillet: My understanding is that those units which have been disbanded do have a continuance in other units now in existence in the country. Every effort is being made to make sure that representatives of all units are included in the official delegation.

UNITED NATIONS

EFFECT OF RECENT OIL AGREEMENT ON SANCTIONS AGAINST RHODESIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he could inform the house concerning the possible effect of the recent oil agreement among a French company, South Africa and Iran on the mandatory sanctions against Rhodesia established by the security council of the United Nations.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): My hon. friend's question undoubtedly has been provoked by the statement made last night on television by a commentator. For some days we have been examining this problem. The secretary general will be making a report to the security council by March 1, when I expect there will be some comment regarding this question. I too will perhaps be in a position to say something about that time.

Mr. Lewis: Since Canada now is a member of the security council, could the minister say whether any reports have been made to him concerning the immediate effect of these sanctions or is he awaiting the report on March 1?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The right hon. gentleman the Leader of the Opposition asked me this question I think on Thursday or Friday. I replied that while it was possible to make an assessment of the effectiveness of commonwealth sanctions, I was not in a position to make an assessment of the results of United Nations sanctions. That report will be made by the secretary general when he reports to the security council on the first of the month.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): The minister stated that he would not be able to report on the general situation, but on the basis of the documents the minister filed today, can he report on the success of Canada's embargo? Could he tell us what the trade between Canada and Rhodesia was during the past year and what it is today?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Before the embargo was placed on exports and imports the total trade was roughly in the neighbourhood of $5 million annually. Since the embargo has been in effect the trade is negligible; it is non-existent except for supplies for humanitarian purposes which must be in very small amounts. With regard to the regulations I tabled today, these are in pursuance of the security council resolution of December 15. After an examination of the steps we had taken under the voluntary security council resolution of the year before last, it was felt that to comply with the new mandatory selective sanctions resolution we would have to provide for the application of the selective mandatory sanctions to Canadian operations outside of Canada.

An examination of the regulations tabled today will show that we have now complied fully with the terms of the security council resolution of December 16, 1966, which is mandatory.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. There was the initial embargo placed by Canada, then the further one pursuant to order and direction of the security council in December. Has there been any further reduction in the exports from Canada or imports from Rhodesia in consequence of the security council order of December last over what the situation was on a non-selective basis prior thereto?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, I believe there has been, but I cannot give the exact dollar amounts. I will be glad to try to give them later.

LABOUR RELATIONS

NEGOTIATION OF CONTRACTS BETWEEN DOMINION COAL AND UNITED MINE WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I would ask the minister whether the government will authorize the negotiation of a contract for the miners in Nova Scotia whose contract expired in August, 1966.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, DOSCO has announced its willingness to sell the coal mines to the Canadian government, the Canadian government has announced its willingness to buy them, but no agreement has yet been reached between the two parties. In the meantime it is impossible for the Canadian government to intervene in labour negotiations between the company and the employees.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister a supplementary question. Since the government has announced the take-over of the mines—this buying and selling is something new—under a crown company, how are the men going to negotiate their working conditions unless somebody takes authority to establish a contract?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I am informed that negotiations between DOSCO and the employee members of the United Mine Workers union are going on now, and I have reason to believe that they will come to a happy conclusion.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): A further supplementary question. Am I to understand from the minister's answer that DOSCO had the authorization of the federal government to negotiate such a contract?

Mr. Pepin: I just said I was informed that the two parties were negotiating.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I hate to belabour the point, Mr. Speaker, but I would ask the minister to clarify his statement. If the minister has been informed that DOSCO and the union are negotiating a contract, under what authority can they be so doing?

Mr. Pepin: Under the authority that exists when one party is the employer and the other the employees.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Later:]

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I have a question for the Prime Minister concerning the proposed crown corporation. Is it the intention of the government to let the present management continue in that capacity?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I am not in a position to answer that particular, detailed question.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): May I ask a supplementary question, since the government is not in a position to answer that one. Does the government not think the miners of Cape Breton and Nova Scotia are entitled to a contract negotiated in good faith, and that authorization for such a contract should be given?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, they certainly are.

TRANSPORT

BRITISH COLUMBIA—STEPS TO SETTLE WHARFAGE DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Can the minister advise the house what steps he is taking to settle the current wharfage rate dispute on the west coast?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the other day I asked a senior officer of my department, not in the marine services, to undertake an investigation and make recommendations about this very vexed and difficult problem. I have here a copy of the letter I addressed to him, and if I could have the permission of the house I would be glad to table it.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South).]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

SAINT JOHN, N.B.—POSSIBLE CLOSING OF TELECOMMUNICATIONS OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport of which I have given him notice. Has the minister any information about the plans to merge or close out the individual C.N. and C.P. telecommunications offices throughout the country, in particular the C.N. office in Saint John which will affect 20 to 30 employees?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I did not receive the hon. gentleman's notice. I will have to take his question as notice now.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISARMAMENT—INQUIRY AS TO RECONVENING OF GENEVA CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I understand that the 18-nation disarmament conference is reconvening at Geneva and that the President of the United States has urged all the nations concerned to move quickly toward a treaty for the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons. Is Canada taking any steps or initiative in this regard?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman has said, this morning the disarmament committee opened its proceedings in Geneva. Yes, Canada has been actively engaged in consultations with certain countries, with the expectation that there will be tabled during the disarmanent committee meetings a draft proposal for the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons. I believe I can say that the discussions which have taken place between the Soviet union and the United States, the major nuclear powers, have progressed to the point where there is every reason to believe that agreement may be expected between those two nations.

While there are some problems with regard to certain phases of the agreement, particularly with regard to safeguards, I believe that progress in this whole area should be anticipated. Certainly Canada has been very much engaged in the discussions.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As an indication of Canada's interest in the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons, is the government making any progress in negotiating Canada out of the agreement for the maintenance of Bomarc missiles on Canadian soil?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That question is, of course, not related to the question of an agreement on the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons.

Mr. Knowles: It is a good question, though.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON PENSION COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Has the minister anything further to report to the house with respect to Mr. Justice Woods' report on the administration of the Canadian Pension Commission?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. gentleman for asking that question, because it permits me to apologize to the house for misinforming the members of the house some few weeks ago when I answered a similar question and indicated that the report was completed but there was a delay in the matter of printing. The error occurred in relaying this information to me. Of course I take responsibility for perpetuating the error, but there was no intention on the part of anyone to mislead the house, and I apologize for passing on that misinformation. Yesterday I communicated directly with Mr. Justice Woods in his office in Regina, and he informs me that it will be May before the report can be completed.

OLD AGE SECURITY

INCOME SUPPLEMENT—DISTRIBUTION OF EXPLANATORY BOOKLET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can the minister assure us that every recipient of old age security will receive a copy of the explanatory booklet on the guaranteed income supplement?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Chatterton: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In that case, can the minister tell us why it was necessary to spend $380,000 to advertise this measure?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend realizes that repetition is an important part of education.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: Especially when you have a weak case.

INCOME TAX

REPORTED EVASION OF CORPORATION TAX BY NATURAL GAS INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. I would ask the minister whether his attention has been drawn to an article headed "United States Oil Colonists Outwit Walter Gordon", written by one James Gray, wherein it is indicated that the $250 million natural gas industry is able to juggle its books, in effect, so that it escapes the payment of corporate taxes. If the minister's attention has been drawn to this matter, has he any comment to make on the action his department has taken?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I have not read the article, but I will read it. I would like to assure the hon. member that not many people in Canada avoid paying income tax that is due to the crown, and as long as I am Minister of National Revenue I undertake to try to collect all the revenue that is due to the crown under the legislation enacted by this house.

Mr. Howard: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the minister would mind inquiring in detail into the allegations contained in the article if I send it over to him, because it points out that there are certain arrangements between companies which exist in the United States and have subsidiaries in Canada, and that this book juggling that takes place is on an international scale.

Mr. Benson: I would be very interested in reading the article. I can assure the hon. member that I will not only look into it, but if there is any illegal book juggling we will certainly take action in this regard.

Establishment of Immigration Appeal Board

[Translation]

AGRICULTURE

MILK—REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture. Has he received any representations from Canadian dairy farmers requesting that the direct grant on manufacturing milk be raised to $1.40 a hundredweight, which would guarantee a price of $5.00 per hundredweight of milk with a 3.5 per cent butterfat content, and has he given an affirmative answer to such request?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the federal dairy policy will be announced before April 1.

IMMIGRATION

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF APPEAL BOARD

The house resumed, from Monday, February 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Marchand for the second reading of Bill No. C-220, to make provision for appeals to an immigration appeal board in respect of certain matters relating to immigration.

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose last evening I had just commented upon the significance of the changes in immigration procedure and administration represented by this bill. That drastic changes are needed, I have no doubt. In no department of government is a minister subjected to so much paper work or called upon to exercise so many discretions or subjected to so many pressures—pressures from members of parliament, from candidates, from ethnic groups, from religious and philanthropic organizations and just about everyone conceivable. The very volume of paper work, the incredible amount of time a minister of immigration must spend examining individual files in order to exercise wisely the discretions vested in him, actually deprives him of an adequate amount of working time for the consideration of policy, major issues and promotional activities which are the real prerogative and responsibility of the minister.

Indeed, I believe it is arguable that the system which has been built up compels the minister and the deputy minister to spend so much of their time contemplating the trees that they are unable to see the policy forest, and therein lies much of the difficulty the department has experienced. My hope is that this measure will succeed in relieving the minister and the deputy minister of much of the tedium of labouring over great mountains of individual files, and will enable them to devote their thought and attention to policy matters and to the greatly needed expansion of immigration into Canada.

I believe, as I have said in this house many times, that our whole immigration policy needs to be much bolder; that there needs to be much more original thinking than is represented in the white paper. If Canada is to achieve her potential in this century a much more aggressive, a much more dynamic immigration policy is essential, something which goes much beyond the feeble and halting steps of the white paper.

Personally I believe the present minister has the imagination to conceive and execute such a policy if he were given the leisure and opportunity. However, he has been loaded with the additional responsibility of acting as Quebec leader of his party. The result inevitably will be that he simply will not have the time to attend to his immigration knitting. I do not believe the immigration portfolio can be a part time occupation.

Now, sir, last night the parliamentary secretary painted a rather glowing picture of the potential benefit of the proposed immigration appeal board. We can hope his expectations will be realized. The existing immigration appeal board is without real status or authority. Its terms of reference are so restricted that it is little more than a respectable front for the department, if indeed it is that. It can deal only with questions of law, and it is safe to say that with the sweeping powers vested in the department errors of law inevitably are rare.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member and I apologize for doing so, but the conversations going on make it practically impossible for the Chair to hear what the hon. member is saying.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): As I have said, sir, I believe it is safe to say that with the sweeping powers vested in the department errors of law inevitably are rare. The existing board has no discretionary authority. The moment the board finds the department has acted within the law it has no alternative but to dismiss the appeal. I know this is a frustrating experience for members of the board, particularly since the members of the board are conscientious and dedicated public servants. My principal contacts have been with the distinguished chairman, Colonel J. C. A. Campbell, Q.C., a first class public servant; and the vice chairman, Mr. E. B. Tim Reid, an equally sincere and capable public servant. They have struggled, in my view, against great odds on the existing board.

The proposed new board, of course, will be a very different body. It arises, I suppose, directly out of the report of Mr. Joseph Sedgwick, Q.C., one of the most distinguished and sophisticated counsel in Canada. It is but one of the many recommendations of the Sedgwick report, though perhaps the most important and most palatable.

There are some obscurities in the bill as drafted, Mr. Speaker which I believe need to be clarified before it finally passes. It is nowhere clear whether what is intended is an appeal from a special inquiry officer under ordinary appellate rules or a genuine hearing de novo. It is true that the board is given power to summons and hear witnesses, which appears to indicate a hearing de novo, but the operative provisions in the bill on the other hand, seem to contemplate an appeal on the record. An appeal on the record, in my view, would be obviously unsatisfactory because very often the prospective deportee has almost no preparation and probably very little advice at the time of the inquiry before the special inquiry officer. I think the nature of the intended appeal procedures will need to be explored in some detail when we are in committee of the whole.

I believe it was Mr. Sedgwick who pointed out the importance of building up a body of jurisprudence in the field of immigration practice. Today it is an impenetrable maze in which only departmental officers can venture with confidence. I am not suggesting that precedents be on any rigid, inflexible basis, or indeed that the board establish the principle of stare decisis. However, I do believe the board should give reasons which should be published and from time to time would be annotated so that principles could be readily ascertained by appellants. Building upon these precedents a flexible body of immigration jurisprudence would be achieved.

If this is to be done it is obvious that the quality of board membership is of the greatest significance. The board cannot achieve its objective and be a real success unless the men and women who compose it are persons of flexible mind, devoid of the rigidity of departmental administration, persons of compassionate and humanitarian instincts.

The role of successive ministers of immigration has been to bring fair and impartial administration to the department, coupled with—and I emphasize the words "coupled with"—a warm, sympathetic, compassionate understanding of the basic human problems which are involved in all immigration cases. It would be a sad day, sir, if we were to take away ministerial discretion and landed up with a rigid, legalistic, dispassionate approach on the part of the board.

From that statement, Mr. Speaker, arises what I think is the basic issue that I have had to settle in my own mind relating to this bill. Ought the board's decisions to be final, or ought there to be a residuum of discretionary authority left with the minister after the board has decided? Mr. Sedgwick reported very strongly that the board's decisions should be final, and he gave four reasons to which I should like to refer. I quote from page 8 of the report on immigration, part II, by Joseph Sedgwick, Q.C.:

> In recommending that the board's decisions be final I do so for these reasons:
> 1. To make appeals to the board subject to review and final determination by the minister is to render the board essentially sterile. If the board's decision is unfavourable, recourse to the minister is almost automatic in a great proportion of cases and the board is reduced to a mere stepping stone between the special inquiry officer and the minister.
> 2. This would relieve the minister of a great deal of pressure of an undesirable nature. My inquiries satisfy me that the pressures brought to bear have often dictated the disposition of cases.
> 3. Ministerial duties and commitments are onerous and such that it is impossible for the minister to give careful consideration to a multitude of individual cases.
> 4. I would expect that an independent board exercising discretion along the lines indicated above would soon, on the basis of precedent, evolve intelligible and reasonable guide lines which would be made known to members of the legal profession and others particularly interested in immigration matters as well as to the public generally.

These, sir, are very cogently and intelligently expressed reasons, yet I am not fully convinced. While Mr. Sedgwick was doing the research for his report I argued this issue with him in detail, as did the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), I believe, based upon his experience as minister of citizenship and immigration and as, I believe, did other former ministers of that department.

I understood that the Minister of Transport took a very strong position in favour of the finality of decisions. On the other hand I argued for a limited, carefully guarded residuum of ultimate ministerial discretion. My fear was, and still is, that finality of decision in the board may lead to a more rigid, inflexible administration. To put it simply, I say that I have never seen any board, commission or civil servant, however senior, who is prepared to stick its or his neck out as far as a politician frequently must and will do.

I know there are many persons in Canada today, sir, making good citizens who were admitted by me in the exercise of ministerial discretion, or I should say ministerial instinct, and who I doubt very much would ever have gained admission from any board, however enlightened and superior that board might have been. It is a simple fact of life that politicians must learn to take chances, chances which others in less rigorous occupations do not take.

Without question, sir, the majority opinion is against me; that is to say, the majority opinion of those who have served in this field and who are expert. I press the matter no further. My purpose in raising the issue is really to state a warning and an admonition to the new board that it must import into its consideration of appeals a warmth of human understanding, a compassionate and humanitarian approach, a readiness to take chances, attributes which are not usual, if I may say so, among public tribunals.

Now, sir, a very genuine advance in this bill is the provision for appeals by sponsors. But I am somewhat concerned by the safeguards with which they are hedged in. The authority given to the governor in council to make regulations limiting the classes of relatives in respect of whom appeals may be made is really a power to render the legislation nugatory. I do not suggest for a moment that the minister has any such intention, but I do submit that the house ought to have a clear undertaking from the government as to what are its intentions in this respect. For example, to what classes of relatives is it the intention to limit the appeal; how far does the government propose to go; how limiting will the regulations be? I say to the minister in this particular aspect the government must not give with one hand and take away with the other.

There is an interesting constitutional problem raised by the bill, Mr. Speaker. Departmental decisions on admission to Canada are taken in the name of the minister and may well be taken by the minister personally. Under this legislation, then, there is an appeal to an independent tribunal from an exercise of judgment by a minister of the crown. To many this is constitutional heresy, although the same situation now applies to appeals to the tax appeal board from decisions on fact or law or on mixed fact and law taken by the Minister of National Revenue. I think there may be others in the chamber who may wish to comment on this interesting, indeed novel, constitutional development.

I return, sir, to the principal point I wish to make this afternoon. I venture to repeat myself by saying that the board must bring warm hearted, human understanding to the cold print of immigration laws. Humanitarian and moral considerations are basic, and they must have respect rather than lip service.

Canadian life has been greatly enriched and our culture expanded and advanced by the diverse peoples who have entered Canada both before and since world war II. Each day each of us is reminded of how these new arrivals, filled with enthusiasm, energy and the will to succeed, have enriched our culture and expanded our Canadian tradition in fields such as science, the arts, education, yes and even politics. We need, in my submission to this house, many, many more immigrants from abroad. We on this side intend to press consistently and regularly for a greatly expanded immigration flow and a much more aggressive immigration policy.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, as the parliamentary secretary to the minister said last night, it is obvious that the problems affecting immigration are often very difficult. I suppose they are difficult because of three factors. The first is the need for immigration in Canada. I think we are all agreed, as the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) has just emphasized, that our country can expand more effectively by the admission of appropriate immigrants in as large numbers as the economy of the country can accept.

Second, in order to make sure that admission to Canada follows some kind of objective test we must, of course, have rules to govern such admissions.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Third, there must be human compassion. For the officers of the department each case necessarily is a number, not because the officers are heartless—they are not. In my many dealings with them I have been much impressed with their decency and compassion. But they deal with thousands of applications every week and it necessarily follows that they are less concerned personally with each application than any member of the house would be who has been asked to assist in particular instance.

The requirement to apply human compassion to the merits of each case often conflicts with the equally important requirement of following objective rules and standards which cannot easily be violated or avoided. The bill is inadequate in dealing with the human factor. I want to make clear that I am not criticizing the minister and his department for the sake of criticizing them; nor do I get pleasure from criticizing. I do not for one moment question the minister's sincerity of approach in bringing this legislation before us. But I wish to say that in several important respects the legislation just does not achieve what the parliamentary secretary last night said it does and what I hope the minister wants it to achieve. Perhaps when we are in committee the minister may accept suggestions for amendments so that the objectives may be realized effectively.

I say, as everyone else has said and will say, that in the past the minister has had the discretion to act in human situations, in compassionate humanitarian appeals. They may go all the way from some very unhappy person who has been left alone somewhere to some young person who has arrived here under one set of circumstances and wants to stay under another set of circumstances.

From my limited experience in these matters and from the greater experience of many people with whom I have had discussions, it is evident that the application of the act and the regulations has followed a meaningless and almost humiliating course. For example, the regulations required that before a person could be admitted as an immigrant he must have a visa. If a person came to Canada without one—he might have applied in another country for a visa—and applied for immigrant status, he went through the silly exercise of a special inquiry. An officer would ask, "Have you a visa", knowing perfectly well that the applicant did not have a visa because that officer or some other officer, had refused it. The man went throught the silly exercise of being asked whether he had a visa and, when he said he did not have one, of being told, "In that case you cannot stay."

After that followed the equally silly exercise of going to the old appeal board. The old appeal board would look at the situation and say: "You do not meet the requirements because you have no visa. Our department refused to give you one, therefore out you go." This was what happened in most instances. If security matters were involved you did not really know that this was so. You could only guess that the refusal was for security reasons, because you were not given any reasons at all. Every time the department refused to give reasons one could assume that security was involved. I have always suspected that even the minister did not know what those security reasons were. Possibly all that he and his officers had on file—and I hope the minister will correct me if I am wrong. —would be a note from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, or the relevant section of that force, saying, "Mr. A is a security risk." I doubt that whether the minister himself would find out what the evidence was behind this note from on high.

One argued, of course, until one was blue in the face. I have not acted in any of these matters as a lawyer, only as a person who knew some people in the immigration department before I was a member, and since. When you tried to help someone, when you inquired into the matter and delved into things, you faced a blank wall. You had no information. You did not know what the evidence was. You did not know the source of the allegations and you argued as if you were punching a pillow. Occasionally, by producing all sorts of affidavits and evidence showing the man was not guilty, you were able to prove his innocence. I have had that kind of experience dozens of times.

The important question in this legislation is: Has the appeal board under this legislation the authority to act compassionately, to use its discretion, to consider the particular circumstances affecting the human being before them, appealing through a sponsor, say, or with respect to a deportation order? Despite what the parliamentary secretary said last night, under clause 17, if my memory serves me correctly, the board is not given such discretion in appeals by sponsors. The board is not given the right to consider the human values and elements involved in a case. The parliamentary secretary said last night that this time the board would be able to consider the human elements. I say to the minister that if that was intended this bill does not realize that intention.

On second reading I cannot deal with the precise words of clauses, but I say to the minister and to the parliamentary secretary that clause 17 of the bill gives the appeal board authority to decide whether a sponsor and the applicant he sponsors meet the regulations under the Immigration Act with respect to an application. That is exactly as it was before. If the appeal board faces a situation where the sponsor and the prospective immigrant he seeks to sponsor to Canada have not met one of the regulations, it has no alternative but to reject the appeal. This becomes clear if the minister will look at clause 15 and then at clause 17. If he looks at the clause dealing with deportation orders he will see that the appeal board has specific authority to consider special circumstances where a person might suffer injury in the country whence he came should he be deported. No such authority is given to the appeal board where there is an appeal by a sponsor with respect to a prospective immigrant he is sponsoring.

This part of the bill, and all matters surrounding it, ought to be substantially changed when we go into committee. I may be wrong, and I should like to be corrected if I am wrong, but in my opinion the appeal board has no authority to deal with, as the parliamentary secretary last night called them, humanitarian or compassionate considerations. Under this bill the appeal board has no more authority to consider the humanitarian aspects than the old board had. I say that because of the particular language in the bill.

This, it seems to me, could not have been an accident. I believe that those advising the minister still think that in applications for entry into Canada, as distinct from deportation orders, the rules and regulations must be strictly complied with without regard to the humanitarian considerations to which the parliamentary secretary referred last night.

This is my first objection. If the parliamentary secretary was right when he said—hon. members will find this in the left hand column on page 13268 of Hansard of yesterday—that one of the distinctions the minister seeks to bring about is the one I have been discussing, if he is right in saying that the old appeal board had no authority to apply humanitarian or compassionate considerations and it is now desired that this board of appeal should have the right to apply such considerations, then all I can assert is that the legislation does not in fact carry out that intention. What has happened, I believe, is that somebody persuaded the minister to reduce the authority of the appeal board in relation to a sponsored immigrant to the point at which it may deal only with legalistic considerations, not with the merits of the case on human grounds at all.

My second objection in principle to this bill—I am still dealing with sponsored immigrants—is the unnecessary limitation as to appeals which is carried into this legislation. What is the purpose of this limitation? The parliamentary secretary suggested last night, if I remember correctly, that unless some limitation were imposed the appeal would be swamped with sponsored cases. Those were not his words but I think I have given an accurate paraphrase of his meaning. If that is the case, I say: so what? We are asked to approve a full-time board of seven men, if I understand the bill correctly. All of them do not have to sit at the same time. Obviously the intention is that they should sit in panels. In fact, the bill provides that one member of the board may deal with certain cases. Thus there is no reason to assume that the work load will be such that the board will be unable to cope with it. Nevertheless, the minister saw fit to include in clause 15 words which will enable the governor in council—mind, I do not say this will necessarily be done—to reduce the numbers of sponsors or classes of sponsors who may appeal under this law.

Why should this be the case? Why not make the right of appeal automatically available to all sponsors in all classes? Why give power to the governor in council to issue regulations prescribing which of such classes of relatives referred to in those regulations may be the subject of appeal under this legislation? I am not persuaded that the possibility of the board being swamped by appeals justifies our taking this power to say to some sponsors that they cannot exercise the right of appeal because their relationship to the applicant is of a certain kind.

My third objection is that there is no right of appeal at all for persons who are not sponsored and who are living in Canada. I appreciate fully that it would be impossible from an administrative point of view, and probably undesirable, to attempt to extend the right of appeal to an unsponsored immigrant in Italy or France who had made application and whose application had been refused. But as the minister well knows, there are thousands of cases in which people arrive in Canada as tourists or jump a ship or enter in some other way. Later they apply for immigrant status and their applications are refused. I cannot understand why they should not have the same right of appeal as is given to others.

It may be suggested that in such cases they would, in accordance with the normal procedure, be asked to leave the country voluntarily by a certain date that if they declined to do so an inquiry would be held and a deportation order issued and when the deportation order was issued they would have the right to appeal under clause 17. But why leave it until that point? If I have stated the position correctly I can well understand that these people will eventually have the right of appeal from the deportation order. But why should it be necessary to reach that point? There will be some cases when it is reached, but why put people to the anxiety, the delay and the pain involved in waiting through the period until they are confronted by an order which they must obey or else forfeit their right to come to Canada again either as a visitor or in any other capacity? Is it not perfectly just, reasonable and sensible to give a person who resides in Canada and whose application for immigrant status has been refused, the right of appeal in the same way as it is given to a sponsor in the case of a sponsored immigrant?

Another point which worries me and my colleagues a great deal is the question of the grounds for appeal. The parliamentary secretary to the minister said last night, as reported on page 13269:

> You will wish to note particularly, Mr. Speaker, that the Board will render written reasons for its decision to allow or dismiss appeals.

I do not see any such requirement in the bill and I think it is of the utmost importance that there should be such a requirement. If I am told, as has been suggested by someone, that the fact that there is a right of appeal from the board to the Supreme Court of Canada means that the board will have to give written reasons for its decisions, I suggest there is no such requirement in the law. In the case of administrative tribunals, whether quasi-judicial or not, it is well established that they are perfectly free to issue what the courts have called "silent orders" rather than "speaking orders", and when a man goes into court faced with a silent order he is in an awful fix because he does not know what he is appealing against or appealing from. There is no requirement for written reasons.

I will take the house one step back in the process, Mr. Speaker. Before the appeal board is even reached, where is there a requirement that the person who is refused admission to Canada or who is faced with an order of deportation has to be given the particulars upon which the deportation order was issued or the particulars upon which the decision to refuse admission was reached? There is no such requirement in the law and I see no reason why there should be any change in the practice simply because there is to be a different appeal board. In the past no such reasons were given beyond the cryptic expression: You do not meet the requirements of the act or regulations. That is the umbrella which is thrown at the person concerned and it is an umbrella which is full of holes. It does not protect him at all. I foresee that exactly the same thing will happen again.

My third objection to this bill, then, is that it does not provide statutorily the elementary justice to which everyone is entitled, the right to a bill of particulars as to the reasons for refusal of admission or the issue of a deportation order. I chose my words carefully. I did not say that a person should have the evidence against him or the sources of the information made available to him. I am not concerned about that at this point because this is not a criminal proceeding. What I said was that under the statute we should have the right to require and to obtain the particulars of the grounds on which the action was taken so that a person can be told in general terms that he does not meet certain particular requirements of our law or that he suffers from certain particular disabilities, and that is why an order for deportation has been issued or his application has been refused. Unless this information is available to him the appeal will prove to be a sham, which I am confident the minister and the government do not intend it to be. Unless this person has the particulars he cannot prepare a proper case for the appeal board, and unless the board is given the right to exercise some discretion and to apply humanitarian considerations the appeal by a sponsor will be a snare and a delusion, which I hope the minister did not intend it to be.

In such a case the board would simply be going through the exercise of discovering whether or not the legal requirements were met, and of course they would not have been met or the case would never have reached the board. The board would be going through the exercise of discovering whether or not the officers of the department applied the regulations in every case and not what are the humanitarian considerations. I am quite certain that the officers follow the purely routine technicalities involved in immigration matters and they do this meticulously, with great rigidity and sometimes, in my experience, with too much satisfaction and glee. An appeal is not worth anything if all that an appeal board can do is to deal with the legal requirements without taking into account all the facts concerning the person involved and the humanitarian and compassionate considerations that must be the basis of any law, as they are of most of our laws which deal with the state and condition of human beings.

My major objection to this bill, however, is directed to a provision which carries forward in the new law an idea which is vicious, basically undemocratic in every sense of the word, and destroys much of the good which the minister intended to achieve through this legislation. I say this with words which are not chosen with ease. I am referring to the clause which says that notwitstanding everything else in this act the board simply cannot proceed when it is faced with an alleged security case. The board will receive a statement signed by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) and by the Solicitor General (Mr. Pennell) stating that on the basis of security or criminal intelligence reports received and considered by them it will be contrary to the national interest to admit such a person or not to deport him, and that will be all. The statement cannot be questioned and they are not required to produce the particulars on which their conclusion is based. They simply file a statement with the board that in their opinion a man is a national risk for security reasons or on the basis of some criminal record which they say is in their possession. The certificate which they file is conclusive proof of the matter and no further evidence is required—"no nothin' ".

Please forgive me, Mr. Speaker for such illiterate language, but I wonder what kind of a charade we are playing? If this bill means what it says, then what nonsense is this? If the minister and the Solicitor General make the final decision in any case, then why do they not make it in their offices instead of producing a certificate before the board and putting the person to the expense of obtaining legal assistance in order to put his case before the board, only to be faced with a certificate which tells him nothing except that he is undesirable? If that is the minister's intention, why does he not issue the certificate from his office? This would be evil enough, but to play the charade of bringing such a certificate before the board seems to me to compound the evil.

Why do we do this? I find that every time something is said about security reasons every one of us, myself included, stands up, beats his breast and speaks about the welfare and security of Canada, while rights, freedoms and civil liberties go out the window. I remind the house that in the middle of the last war large numbers of people were arrested under the defence of Canada regulations. Later, as a result of agitation throughout the country, internment tribunals were established and despite the fact that we were at war the regulations which established those internment tribunals gave them the right to demand and obtain from the relevant minister particulars of the charges against a person. They had the right under the legislation to obtain those particulars concerning the person affected. Thousands of internees were able to come before a tribunal with a piece of paper which told them what they were accused of. By definition they were all security risks or they would not have been interned in the first place. Some ministerial authority had already decided that they were security risks and that is why they were interned. We gave them the right to know the nature of the charges against them despite the fact that we were in the middle of the war. They were not given the sources of those charges, the names of the people who made the allegations or the details of the inquiry or investigation that had been made, but they were acquainted with the nature of the charges so they could meet them.

I challenge anyone in the house to tell me how our tremendous and admirable national war effort suffered because we gave people the rights to which they should normally be entitled. Was any part of that war effort eroded or affected in any way by the fact that we gave internees the elementary rights to which I referred? This was done by a government of the same party which is now in power. If we had the courage and vision to act like a civilized society with regard to those whom we interned in the middle of a war, governed as they were by the defence of Canada regulations which took away all normal processes of law as had to be done in time of war, can we not do it now for people who attempt to come to Canada in time of peace? The number of people affected is likely to be very small indeed in comparison with the number of people who were interned during the war, and the dangers to our country's security and our country's future are minimal in peacetime.

Why should there not be this kind of provision in the legislation? I respectfully submit that the minister would do a great service to this country if he included the provision to which I have just referred. Someone in the department could easily find for him the orders in council which dealt with the internment tribunals during the war. If we had something in this bill so that when a person was accused of having a criminal record or of being a security risk he could make his appeal knowing that he would be provided with particulars of the allegation against him, then I think we would meet the requirements of justice. Otherwise the same kind of thing which has happened heretofore will continue to happen.

I have on my desk a letter from the department about someone who asked me to assist him. The letter simply says that they are making inquiries, that some of the reports they have are confidential and that they cannot really tell me why this particular application was refused in a foreign country which I shall not name. They advise that they are making further inquiries to see whether a mistake may have been made. I do not know what allegations are made against these people. Their relatives and sponsors in Canada do not know. They and I are in the dark. I am not at all sure that the minister's officer is not in the dark concerning the precise nature of the allegation against these people who made application to come to Canada. I see no excuse in peacetime for having this kind of a provision in an immigration appeal board bill such as the one now before us.

Those are my major objections to this legislation. It imports into this process an entirely undemocratic and arbitrary procedure which is unjust to the people concerned and totally unnecessary for the security of Canada. If anyone can prove to the members of my party that this kind of thing is necessary for security and, if the officers of the department will forgive me for putting it so bluntly, is not just something which some bureaucrat thinks would affect the security of the country but is based on nobler facts and reasons, then we might be persuaded to accept the principle involved in this bill. But we cannot see any such reasoning. We cannot see that Canada will not be just as protected against security risks if the person concerned is given an opportunity to meet the case against him.

I am not saying that such a person should be admitted. I am not saying that he should not eventually be deported as a consequence of the decision of the appeal board. I am not suggesting that the doors of Canada be opened to security risks. Not at all. All I am saying is that when you provide a procedure for appeal it either ought to be meaningful, democratic, fair and just or it should not be there. If there is to be a ministerial ukase in any event, then let the minister make it in his office. I do not like the pretence of an appeal which in fact is no appeal at all but is merely a process by which two ministers file a certificate with the board, which certificate says to the board that this is what they shall do. You cannot see it, you do not know what is in it, and you do not know why the thing has been done to you. If it were decided there should be no appeal I would disagree, but at least I would respect the forthrightness of that position. I must say frankly that I do not respect a pretension that there is an appeal when in fact there is none at all and when in fact the decision is made by the ministers on the advice of the police and some officer of the department.

In concluding my remarks I should like to say that I agree with the parliamentary secretary that the idea of the appeal board embodied in Bill C-220 is a great improvement over the appeal board which we had under the Immigration Act. I agree with him that the apparent objectives are excellent and I admire and support them. But I am beginning to feel more and more, as I grow older and study the art of political science and government, that all of us, ministers and members alike, are much more in the hands of our officers and the bureaucrats than we like to admit. I cannot help but feel time and time again that as members of parliament or as members of the government we set out with good and sincere intentions to achieve a desirable social result and then on the road the bureaucratic fear and distrust of human behaviour, the bureaucratic desire to bundle everything up in a nice, neat package, the bureaucratic urge to be certain that every "i" is dotted and every "t" is crossed, regardless of the human values which are involved, gets in the way of the governmental and parliamentary intention to have a piece of legislation which really expresses their objectives. You then have a piece of legislation which so fences in the objectives with legalistic and bureaucratic requirements as to leave very little of the sincere desires of those responsible for the original idea.

I say to the minister, with the respect which all of us have for him, that I am afraid this is what has happened in the case of this bill. A genuinely humanitarian objective has been truncated by the fears to which I have referred and the result is a bill which has not achieved its objectives but provides even greater difficulties for many of the people concerned than they had before.

The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) was absolutely right that when we hand these final powers to a board and set out with great meticulousness the limits of their authority we do not increase the chances that human considerations will play a part; we decrease them. Whatever minister we have had to deal with, whether the hon. member for Carleton when he was minister of immigration, Mrs. Fairclough who was minister of immigration during the preceding government, the hon. member for Matapédia-Matane (Mr. Tremblay), the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), the present Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand), or the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson), my experience has been that when a matter reached them, whether they agreed with it or not one was certain that human factors were given weight. One cannot be certain that this will be the case under this legislation. The results under this legislation may be less desirable than they were when the minister had discretion in respect of the final decision in such matters.

I hope with all my heart, therefore, that when the bill comes before the committee of the whole some of the objections I have raised which I believe to be important and valid, if I may say so, will find a responsive ear on the part of the minister and that some attempt will be made by all of us to amend this legislation so that the desirable objectives we had in the first place will be fulfilled.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, we now are considering a bill which has to do with what I believe is one of the most important aspects of government administration, namely, immigration to Canada and the development of our national economy. I am sure too that many members of this house recognize the importance of a continuous stream of new immigrants. There are several reasons for this, one being the fact that we have an extremely large land area and a very limited population. It would seem to me that the only way we can hope to continue to develop our country and make it what it ought to be is by having an increasing population to accept the challenges that exist and to work together to achieve the development that we all desire. On the other hand, I think we must recognize the fact that with an area such as ours and in view of the very crowded conditions in other parts of the world, we cannot expect to keep such a large land area confined to such a small population. Therefore it would seem to me that we must recognize our responsibility to open our doors to immigration and accept into our country those who desire to come here.

Of course, we must also realize the importance of some guiding principles in the acceptance of immigrants. I do not believe we can adopt a wide-open door policy. This would be a disservice not only to our country but to those who seek to enter Canada. But with the conditions that exist in Canada I feel that if government policies were established and implemented to facilitate the absorption into our economic and social life of those who desire to come here, there is no reason why we should not continue a very vigorous program of immigration.

We must acknowledge the fact that those who have come to our shores have made a tremendous contribution to our country in practically every area of life, in industry, agriculture, commerce and finance, as well as the contribution they have made in the sharing of their various cultures. On numbers of occasions in this house statistics have been placed on the record to indicate how Canada and the lives of Canadians have been enriched by these new Canadians. We know this situation will continue as we accept them into our country.

Suggestions have been made from time to time to the effect that our economy is being adversely affected by the entry of those from abroad. I do not believe this is so. In times past our immigration policies have been so restrictive that I do not think there has been any indication that the country has been adversely affected by their entry. Therefore I believe that a broadminded and widely implemented immigration policy will continue to admit an increasing number of people into Canada and will result in nothing but good for them and for us.

However, I believe there have been some contradictions or paradoxes in the various government policies in relation to immigration and their effect upon immigration as a whole. I should like first of all to refer to a statement made by Professor Eastman in his critical analysis of the position taken by the Economic Council of Canada in its third annual review. As I have indicated, Professor Eastman was sharply critical of the council for encouraging governments to step up the immigration of skilled workers during times of shortages as a complement to domestic manpower and adjustment programs. He said:

> The consequence of that policy is to reduce the inducement that is offered to members of the labour force in Canada to enter an industry or to acquire a skill, since foreign substitutes are provided as the acquisition of that skill or status becomes relatively profitable. It also reduces the need for public investment in training for that particular skill and thus reduces or eliminates the opportunity that local labour has to obtain the skill in question or the higher relative income that it implies.
> This kind of immigration policy has been on a sufficiently large scale in Canada to have very much wider repercussions than merely meeting a shortage. Indeed, a good case could be made that it has markedly affected the opportunity and terms on which some young Canadians enter the labour force. Encouragement to this kind of opportunity-reducing immigration policy should not be given under the guise of meeting "bottlenecks" until much fuller study has been made.

I would also call attention to an article headed "Centennial Plan To Mobilize Thousands In Foreign Aid Programs" which appeared in today's Globe and Mail. The first paragraph reads:

> Two new centennial projects to mobilize thousands of Canadians in foreign aid programs are being planned.

I am not saying I object to the present policies of the government but the paradox is that, on the one hand, they encourage the entry into Canada of skilled workers and those in other categories—but I believe one of the qualifications is that they must be skilled or have reached a certain standard of preparedness in order that they may fit into the Canadian economy—while, on the other hand, Canadians are to be sent out of the country on foreign assignments, to assist other countries. This seems a rather paradoxical situation. I hope that the words of Professor Eastman will be noted and very serious consideration will be given to reconciling some of these problems and resolving them in the national interest and for the national good.

There is another aspect of immigration policy that should be subject to question. I refer to the situation in which agriculture finds itself at the present time. It seems almost impossible for those engaged in agriculture to obtain the workers they require to carry on the agricultural industry. I have special reference to periods of seasonal employment. We all know that in the last two or three years there has been real difficulty in securing the number of seasonal workers required to meet the needs of the agricultural industry. I know that the immigration department makes provision for some workers to be brought into the country, but then they turn around and ensure that they are sent back to the country from which they came. I believe that with a redirection of immigration policy it would be possible to bring into this country those who would fit into our agricultural economy and perhaps overcome the difficulty we are having with regard to seasonal employment.

I understand, of course, that the bill now before us has special reference to the establishment of an appeal board. The history of immigration in the past emphasizes the necessity for some type of body that will bring to bear upon immigration a degree of human warmth and understanding that perhaps has not been evident for some considerable time in the operations of the department.

In introducing this bill last night the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration outlined in some detail the terms under which the appeal board will operate. There was an indication of the various fields in which the board will operate, the extent to which it can go in the handling of appeals and the type of appeals it can handle. I suggest there are additional fields that need consideration and study. I think of people who have made application for entry into Canada and there is such a long delay in processing their applications that they begin to wonder whether they will ever have the opportunity of coming to this country. There should be some way in which applications can be processed with a minimum delay in order that a decision can be reached so that those who are applying will know whether or not they are going to be able to make plans to change their residence and take up life in this land of opportunity and challenge.

Some reference has been made today to those who have applied for permission to enter Canada but have been denied entry and wonder why their applications have been denied. Some of these people must be placed in a very difficult position psychologically. They have made their applications but for some reason their applications have been rejected. They do not seem to be advised of the reasons they are not allowed to come to this country.

Questions immediately arise in their mind about what has been said of them or what the situation is. I believe it is imperative that those who have made applications and have been denied entry know exactly why and under what conditions their applications have been denied.

I am thinking as well of those who are desirous of coming to this country but who are in a country in which there are at the moment no facilities for processing their applications. One inquiry was made of me recently and I was advised that at the present time there are no facilities in that particular country for processing applications and there is no immediate prospect of any being established. These are some of the things which I believe ought to be considered when we are considering the administration of the department and overall immigration policy.

I believe the parliamentary secretary made reference to those who enter Canada illegally and then desire to stay in this country. This is certainly a field that requires attention. I understand, of course, that the appeal board will be able to handle such situations. I do not hold any brief, however, for those who for ulterior reasons gain entry into Canada and then seek to carry on illegal practices or illegal activities while they are in the country. Certainly these people should be deported to the country whence they came. Those who have entered Canada without knowledge of all the ramifications of the immigration law, who have perhaps come to this country seeking refuge from an intolerable situation in their own country, should receive the fullest consideration. I believe these are cases in which the warmth of human feeling and compassion ought to be evident. These people should be given every opportunity to prove themselves and to make their contribution to the development of our country.

These are the only general remarks I wish to make this afternoon. Once again let me say that this department is one of the most important departments of government. It is perhaps one the most difficult departments with which to deal because of the human element that is involved and the fact that individual cases and a variety of personalities are constantly being dealt with. It is a very difficult department, but no doubt when we have given attention to it we will finally arrive at a policy that will be adequate and fair and will be in the best interests of our nation and of those who would join us in building this country.

[Mr. Patterson.]

Hon. René Tremblay (Matapédia-Matane): Mr. Speaker, I was greatly pleased to see Bill No. C-220 coming back to the house for second reading.

When that bill was introduced, last July, I believe, I was away unfortunately and I was unable at that time to take part in the debate. I must say first of all that I am sincerely pleased to see the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) submitting this bill to the house now for approval.

One knows that a white paper was prepared by the department of immigration on every aspect of the Immigration Act and that it is now under consideration by a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons. We are now awaiting its report to evaluate the amendments which will have to be made to the Immigration Act which has not been amended since 1953 and of which certain regulations have been amended from time to time by the successive ministers of immigration.

We can, therefore, expect that fundamental changes will be made in the Immigration Act after the publication of the white paper and the evidence given in committee. As drafted in 1953 that act met the particular needs of the time.

Since that time, major changes have occurred not only throughout the world, but in Canada also, and the method of dealing with the increasing number of immigrants to Canada is surely different from what it might have been in the past.

Before opening the debate on the Immigration Act in general, we have a special bill dealing with a particular aspect of immigration, namely the question of appeal in the field of immigration.

In order to understand clearly the reason for the present bill, it is perhaps necessary to review the history of this ministerial discretion which, in fact, the bill before us proposes to change substantially. This ministerial discretion is the very basis of the Immigration Act. There is not one section of the Immigration Act which does not show that the minister may, at his discretion, reverse decisions handed down previously at the administrative level. This went on for years and I was appointed minister of immigration at a time when this ministerial discretion, following various well-known events, was severely criticized in this house and in newspapers throughout the country.

I became head of the department of immigration in February, 1964. It is no secret that I was to be placed in charge of the department of agriculture for eastern Canada and not at the head of the department of immigration. However, on February 4, 1964, I was sworn in as minister of immigration.

As was previously pointed out—I believe it was the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) who made the statement—being responsible for the department of immigration under the present legislation, is one of the most difficult tasks, mainly because of the considerable amount of work involved. The minister must investigate all appeals and decisions, with respect to immigration matters and, in view of the human nature of problems involved in the field of immigration, he cannot always discharge his responsibilities in what could be called a mechanical way.

I do not think any minister of immigration has ever dealt carelessly with immigration records, knowing that the life and future of individuals, children and friends could be completely changed in just overnight because of a decision handed down by the Minister of Immigration. Reviewing immigration records is, therefore, a difficult and delicate task, where all factors, which are often contradictory, have to be taken into consideration. We have to consider security conditions in our country, economic requirements, social, human and political circumstances involving human beings.

But I know that that task must be performed and it has been by all the ministers who have assumed that responsibility. However, as someone said before and as the Sedgwick report states, that takes so much of the time and efforts of a minister of immigation that, very often, he is unable to devote enough time to the consideration of general problems concerning immigration policies.

When I assumed my office, the department included the Indian affairs division which, as you know, embraces a great deal of problems that are as human and complex as immigration. I say this merely to point out that, at the time I became head of the department of immigration, I was aware of taking upon myself a heavy and extremely delicate task.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that certain explanations are in order to make clear why the problem of ministerial discretion was at one point referred to Mr. Sedgwick who later prepared a report which was used as the basis for the bill now before us.

The first problems I encountered as minister of immigration—I refer here to the public aspect of the problem, later on, when I speak of security, I shall deal with specific security problems—concerned ship deserters, which gave rise to many debates in this house.

At that time, it was mainly a matter of Greek deserters, several of whom had been brought before the courts, particularly in the Toronto area.

One remembers the campaign initiated then by the Toronto press. The way they dealt with this problem; the scandalized approach which the Toronto press mainly the Telegram, followed by the Globe and Mail and the Toronto Star, took to this problem of ship deserters who were rotting in jail, at the Toronto Don jail and whom the poor officers of the Department of Immigration in Toronto held in jail inhumanly. At that time, the Minister of Immigration was being held responsible for all the sins of Israel in regard to this problem of ship deserters.

In view of the opposition voiced in Toronto newspapers and in this house, the government decided, on my recommendation, in order to set matters straight, to appoint an investigating commissioner to look into all those cases brought up day after day on the orders of the day and to determine exactly if the good Toronto newspapers were justified in launching an attack against a Liberal government and a young minister who was just gaining his first experience in immigration.

The choice of Mr. Sedgwick was quite sensible and was commended by all parties in the house. He was an outstanding Conservative who had no reason to make things easy for the Liberal government, but he knew a great deal about immigration matters.

This was a man who had practised for many years and was still practising, and who was capable of judging facts objectively, without taking sides, and of giving a ruling based on the facts as represented.

I regret, Mr. Chairman, that the first part of the Sedgwick report which was tabled in the house on April 2, 1965, came in very late at a time when I was ill—my first illness, Mr. Chairman, not the second. I was in the hospital at that time, and the first Sedgwick report which I hold in my hand, was tabled on April 2, 1965, that is on the eve of a recess, at two o'clock in the morning, approximately, by the parliamentary secretary of the then minister of immigration.

No comment was forthcoming from the opposition. I can well understand that, because the report corroborated the position I had held for months in this house on every case that had been criticized by the various members of the opposition except in one case where delays had occurred in the department of immigration and this I had admitted the day after the case was brought up in the house.

In all the other cases, commissioner Sedgwick confirmed the procedure which has been followed. It was the right one. It was the position taken by the department of immigration in those cases, the only one warranted in the circumstances and the only one in accordance with the powers of the minister of immigration and his officials.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal with the other aspects of the legislation. With your permission, I will simply read the last paragraph of the first Sedgwick report which has never been read in this house by the hon. members of the opposition who at that time so strongly denounced the procedure of the department of immigration but never made any comment on the judgment that commissioner Sedgwick made on the cases related to ship deserters. And I quote from the Sedgwick report, part 1, pages 37 and 38, and this brings us back to what I said about the Toronto newspapers which championed all those immigration cases in the name of human dignity and all those great principles which it was easy to proclaim at the time.

Commissioner Sedgwick said this:

> I have perused a great number of newspaper reports relating to these cases. While I am tempted to comment at length on the manner in which some segments of the press chose to represent the "facts" to the public,

And the word "facts" is in quotation marks.

> I refrain from doing so as I do not conceive an exhaustive examination of press comments to be within the ambit of my retainer. I will, however, cite one example as indicative of what I have in mind. In the Toronto Telegram of May 23rd there is an article dealing with the Hooper case under the heading "Man's Crime Was Silence". The tenor of the article is that Hooper was being made the victim of some unique and outrageous law. That is not so. Refusal to answer questions is punishable, and quite properly so, under many statutes, federal and provincial.

[Mr. Tremblay.]

> It is contempt of court, and punishable, for a witness in a criminal or civil proceeding to refuse to be sworn or, being sworn, to refuse to answer questions, and there is no reason why a person suspected of being in this country illegally should not be required to give a true account of himself or be punished if he refuses. In the sense that it is an offence and punishable, silence is a crime, but the article erroneously conveys the impression that silence is peculiarly an immigration offence. Indeed, the courts could not carry on if every witness could with impunity decide for himself whether to speak or be dumb.
> While I have found occasion to level some criticism I should express my opinion that the fault did not arise from any positive or deliberate intention on the part of those concerned to act in an improper manner.
> Many of the attacks which have been made in this affair have been ill-founded or exaggerated, and I regret to say I am left with the impression that a good deal of the criticism is based on nothing more than cynical catering for a variety of motives, to so-called "ethnic groups".

Mr. Speaker, I am not so sure the Toronto newspapers took that stand at the time to please ethnic groups. I am rather inclined to believe that they wanted to destroy the then minister of immigration, because at the same time, those three Toronto newspapers were trying to keep in Canada—the N.D.P. members are well aware of it for they protested repeatedly to me in this regard—those three Toronto newspapers tried to keep the American strikebreakers they had brought over because of the printers' strike. In spite of the representations made by those three newspapers I took the traditional stand of the department of immigration: that of not allowing strikebreakers to stay on the job while the strike was in progress and of refusing the landed immigrant status to those strikebreakers.

I was informed that the people involved were really strikebreakers and I upheld—I did not make the decision personally—the decision of my departmental officials to deport some of the employees of the Toronto newspapers, which naturally was bound to displease these gentlemen of the Toronto press.

I was expecting attacks, and I was not surprised to read constant attacks against the minister of immigration in the three Toronto newspapers each morning. But in the case of those ships, I think their attacks were unfair and unjustified. The first report of commissioner Sedgwick showed that the position taken by the department and which I had defended in the house was eminently defensible and complied with the existing Immigration Act and the current rules.

If there has been procedural delays, this was the fault of the courts and in no way the responsibility of the department of immigration, except in one case where there really was a delay occasioned by the department of immigration; this delay was corrected by a procedure which I announced in the house several days later.

Mr. Mongrain: Would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Tremblay: Certainly.

Mr. Mongrain: I should like to address a question to the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, and I apologize if it is a little personal, but it would be important to see the hon. member's reaction. Was it after that adventure to which the hon. member is now referring that the novel on the furniture deal was invented or before?

Mr. Tremblay: After. The furniture adventure is related to another problem, namely the problem of national security. This is another problem on which I will speak extensively immediately.

The second problem which faced the department of immigration, at that time, is security cases. They are well known, because some of them have been referred to in inquiries; there is the well-known Bonanno case, one of the leading figures of the Montreal underworld; the Minaudo case, the Windsor, Ontario underworld chief; the Violi brothers case in Montreal, the Stonehill case and so on.

Mr. Speaker, under the present act to be amended by Bill No. C-220, the minister of immigration, as I said, is legally empowered, among other things, to reverse a decision of the department or even of the present appeal board in cases of deportation.

It is a known fact that every time a case is appealed before the board and even before a ruling is made, representations are made to the minister of immigration. Such representations can be quite legitimate. It is quite possible for a member of parliament, a political organizer of any party, a religious leader, to have contacted the person concerned or one of his relatives, and to submit representations in writing or in person on behalf of that person to senior departmental officials who exercise that discretion through delegated powers, either the director of Immigration, the deputy minister or the minister.

Experience often proves that new facts can be presented to the department or to the minister as a result of such representations. And it may happen that in view of these new facts, the minister may quite legitimately reverse a departmental ruling.

But, Mr. Speaker, as shown in the second Sedgwick report, that is the danger for the minister who, in addition to being responsible for the department, is a politician who must receive representations often unfounded, from anybody, from people who, for monetary or other reasons, put the pressure on the minister.

It will be said, Mr. Speaker, that in such a case, the minister must act impartially—and I believe this is what every minister does. However, as has often been said, it is not enough for the minister to make a fair decision, his decision must also seem fair.

We see the situation in which the minister of immigration finds himself when he reserves a decision, convinced that he has good reason to do so but who, due to more or less doubtful or biased representations made on the subject by public opinion or political opponents, is accused of taking a position for political reasons, interest or other motives.

Mr. Speaker, I experienced this situation whenever deportation cases were being discussed. I lived through this period when, precisely because I was in the midst of problems such as these, I had to make a decision and did, in fact, make such decisions at a time when all kinds of criticisms or suspicions could be directed against me.

And it is precisely on account of those criticisms that notwithstanding the fact that, in all cases before public opinion, I had made the necessary decision—and I am prepared to place my record as minister of immigration before any committee of the house at any time.

In all cases, such as Bonanno, Stonehill, Minaudo and Violi cases, I acted in the interest of this country. Those were security cases and I explained a while ago the stand I took in such cases.

But, irrespective of the stand taken in individual cases, the fact remained that I recognized, that the government recognized that the minister of immigration was in an extremely delicate situation in security cases involving the underworld, since he could be criticized politically be it rightly or wrongly. It made it very hard for him to justify his stand, particularly in security cases.

That is when, under circumstances I need not describe as everyone is aware of them, it was decided that commissioner Sedgwick be asked to prepare a second report. The letter of the Prime Minister, dated January 27, 1965, asked Mr. Sedgwick to prepare a second report on ministerial discretion in the case of the minister of immigration.

And it is the second report which is before us and which precisely contains commissioner Sedgwick's recommendations on ministerial discretion.

In fact, the commissioner made recommendations with which I am generally in agreement. He recommended that ministerial discretion in immigration matters be abolished. I shall quote his reasons, if you will allow me, because I think they are basic if we are to understand the bill before us. On page 8 of his report, commissioner Sedgwick says this:

In recommending that the board's decisions be final I do so for these reasons:

In other words, it means that any decision by the Immigration Appeal Board would be final and that the minister would have no authority to quash or change the board's decision.

1. To make appeals to the board subject to review and final determination by the Minister is to render the board essentially sterile.

That is very true. My one year experience at the department of immigration showed me that cases are usually dealt with very quickly, at the board level, for an appeal is then made directly to the minister, and this reduces the prestige and authority of the present Immigration Appeal Board.

If the board's decision is unfavourable, recourse to the minister is almost automatic in a great proportion of cases and the board is reduced to a mere stepping stone between the special inquiry officer and the minister.

The second reason:

2. This would relieve the minister of a great deal of pressure of an undesirable nature.

The undesirable pressure referred to a while ago.

My inquiries satisfy me that the pressures brought to bear have often dictated the disposition of cases.

Thus, commissioner Sedgwick indicates here that the decisions were made after pressures had been brought to bear and the cases were solved according to those pressures.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, that influence is legitimate or it is not; often, it is very difficult for the minister himself or the deputy minister or the director of immigration to make a difference between the simple compassionate grounds which may exist in an appeal case and the other reasons which may incite people to act.

The third reason is as follows:

3. Ministerial duties and commitments are onerous and such that it is impossible for the minister to give careful consideration to a multitude of individual cases.

It is a real problem which I mentioned earlier. It was also pointed out by the hon. member for Carleton. It is that the minister of immigration has so much responsibility in the field of general immigration policy that his time could be more usefully spent otherwise than in making decisions, which is something really useful and important but that other people can do possibly as well as he can under more favourable conditions than those in which the minister finds himself most of the time.

And the fourth reason is as follows:

4. I would expect that an independent board exercising discretion along the lines indicated above would soon, on the basis of precedent—

That is the jurisprudence we talked about.

—evolve intelligible and reasonable guide lines which would be made known to members of the legal profession and others particularly interested in immigration matters as well as to the public generally.

Mr. Speaker, commissioner Sedgwick's report contains several recommendations, but this basic recommendation, along with changes we shall discuss later, is embodied in Bill No. C-220, establishing a new Immigration Appeal Board which will be granted much more authority than the present board. With the exception of security cases only, the decision of the board will be final; however, appeal to the Supreme Court is possible on points of law.

A special commission must be maintained with respect to immigration appeals in security cases. I realized very early, upon becoming head of the department of immigration, that security cases are very serious. A report on security problems in Canada regarding immigration had been prepared for me, when I was appointed minister of immigration. A conference was called immediately by the minister of justice, now President of the Privy Council (Mr. Favreau) and myself, including all senior officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the department of immigration and the Department of Justice, in order to elaborate a new and aggressive policy with regard to the underworld and all elements considered as a threat to the security of our country.

This report I have before me was discussed during that meeting and the general conclusions dated March 12, 1964, were to the effect that first the Chinese amnesty should be ended, and this is a secondary problem—secondary compared to the one on our mind now—with which I do not want to deal here. But the main conclusions of that meeting were precisely to set up in the department of immigration a special division which would check all the security cases outstanding and try to detect, in co-operation with the R.C.M.P., the underworld and mafia leaders in the various cities of our country, precisely in order to deport them.

• (5:00 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question? I assume that the report to which he has been referring is a departmental document, not a public one?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: That is right, Mr. Speaker, that departmental report was never published but it formed the very basis of a policy within the department of immigration which was actually implemented through the establishment of this special centre in the department. As a matter of fact, in November 1964, Mr. L. E. Lefaive was appointed head of the enforcement division of the department of immigration which maintained relations with the Department of Justice and the R.C.M.P. precisely with regard to the deportation of special security cases, involving mainly the underworld and the mafia. In fact, at that meeting, authorities of the justice department and the R.C.M.P. were asking the department of immigration to set up a unit designed to help in the fight against the underworld, for deportation purposes.

In fact, the unit, headed by Mr. Lefaive, and his men uncovered Bonanno a few weeks later in Montreal and some weeks later he was deported to the United States. It was precisely Mr. Lefaive and his men who, independently of the R.C.M.P. had succeeded in uncovering Mr. Bonanno who was on the list we had received.

Mr. Lewis: Is Mr. Lefaive still the head of that division?

Mr. Tremblay: Yes. I think he is still the head. In any case, he was until recently.

Mr. Speaker, this important function fulfilled by the department of immigration in matters of security is one that must be maintained and the new bill in fact provides that the minister of immigration and the Solicitor General may conduct very serious investigations in cases brought to their attention. I think the member for York South (Mr. Lewis) indicated that normally the minister of immigration makes decisions in matters of security on the basis of very slight reports. Well, I think that the minister of immigration, in all cases involving security, has all the necessary reports to make a decision and a serious investigation is made for the minister. From now on, there will be two ministers, the Solicitor General responsible for the R.C.M.P. and the minister of immigration who will jointly sign a deportation order. In those cases, the right of appeal will be suspended. I submit that, for the security of the country, this power of the minister of immigration and the Solicitor General jointly to suspend the right of appeal is absolutely necessary if the department of immigration is to continue —and I am convinced that it will, because the minister of immigration has already made a statement in the house on the subject —to co-operate very closely with the R.C.M.P. and with the Department of Justice.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allowed to him is over.

Some hon. Members: Keep on.

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Chairman, I am almost through with my general remarks on Bill No. C-220.

I believe the indications I gave permit an understanding of the context in which the Sedgwick report on the minister's discretion was prepared and the motives that let to it. I think I have succeeded—at least I hope—in showing that this bill meets a need that was felt by all ministers of immigration, that is to unload themselves as much as possible of their discretion on an organization of officials or commissioners where no criticism could be made, whether or not they would be justified. I think the upholding of personal responsibility on the part of the minister in security matters is absolutely essential and I am convinced that with the changes in details which may be made during the debate, Bill No. C-220 was a must.

It was better, on account of the urgency of the situation, to call it at once, even before the report of the joint committee on immigration was submitted, and if this bill is given legislative form, I believe the minister of immigration will be happier from now on than I have been myself in the past and that this country will greatly benefit from it.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house allow the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade) to ask a question?

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. member if he can tell us whether the information concerning the orders for the deportation of members of the underworld or the mafia are sent to him directly or spontaneously by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police or whether they must be passed on to him by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Cardin) at the request of the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand).

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, since I have no responsibility as a member of the government, I do not wish to answer this question. I shall merely say, in reference to the past, that when the department of immigration was my responsibility, the establishment of this unit under Mr. Lefaive within the department of immigration was an initiative taken by the department. This initiative, of course, cannot be taken alone and there is constant cooperation between this unit within the department of immigration and the authorities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

The Bonanno case, which I mentioned, is one where the procedure and discovery initiated in the immigration branch. In other cases the opposite may be true and police authorities may be the ones to discover the matter.

• (5:10 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, having listened to the hon. member for Matapédia-Matane (Mr. Trembley) and to my good friend the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) and in anticipation of what the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) will say, because I assume he will participate in this debate before it has been concluded, let me say at once that I have always held the opinion that in the cases which have concerned me and with which they have had to deal in their capacity as ministers they have given the most careful, anxious and detailed study to the problems involved. As the hon. member who just resumed his seat said, problems which involve the status of people, the status of their families and questions of property are the most serious and difficult problems in respect of which any other human being has to make decisions. I am quite satisfied that in any of the dealings I have had concerning such cases nothing but the greatest consideration has been given by the ministers involved.

Nevertheless, this bill is a recognition of the fact that no one pair of shoulders is broad enough and no one person has the physical or mental capacity to be placed in the position of being compelled to make the kind of decisions which in the past these hon. gentlemen have had to make. The fact is that these problems involve people and also involve hearsay evidence, not first-hand evidence but rather second, third and fourth-hand evidence.

The hon. member for Matapédia-Matane said that certain reports came to his desk. True enough. But as one who has been concerned in the practice of law and who has appeared before the courts for 40 years I still marvel at the infinite capacity of the human mind to twist and turn things and even deceive the person who is making the report. I am not saying this with any intention of castigating people concerned with security or other civil servants. This is a fact of nature. To expect a minister who has administrative responsibilities of considerable scope in addition to his duties in respect of immigration and who also is a member of this house and a politician—a word which I think has a very desirable connotation—to make these decisions is positively repugnant to me. I am very glad to see that at long last this bill has recognized that fact and has taken away from one man these responsibilities which the various ministers have had to try to discharge over a great many years. I only hope that this will be extended to other matters.

Despite the sanctimonious claptrap sometimes uttered in this house about the sacred liberties of people and the rights of parliament, all too often what we see is a bald exercise in divorcement from reality. All too often governments in the exercise of their power arbitrarily seek to make their decisions in the darkest recesses and cubbyholes of government bureaucracy. When there is a choice between legislating through order in council and legislating by coming openly and boldly before parliament, too frequently the first choice is made. I hope this bill is a beginning and that the government will recognize that this is the best way to function. For this reason we now have removed from the minister what always should have been an area of either judicial or quasi-judicial decision. By this bill we purport to set up a board as a court of record with certain judicial functions.

There are still some exceptions about which I am not happy. The hon. member for Carleton and the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) have dealt with these. I do not know to what extent the bill is susceptible to amendment in committee. I am inclined to doubt that it will be. I had hoped that when the government went this far it would have been prepared to take more giant strides. After I have finished and other members have spoken the minister probably will speak in closing the debate and I hope he will indicate the degree of flexibility he intends to exercise when the bill reaches the committee because I think there are some very important changes which should be made, some of which have already been touched upon by other hon. members who have participated in the debate.

We now have established the principle, which I think is very important, that there must be an examination by an independent tribunal. This is a very far reaching innovation and I am very happy to see it. Some mention was made by the hon. member for York South and the hon. member for Carleton of the speech made last night by the parliamentary secretary to the minister who told us that the bill came forward a little more rapidly than was anticipated. I question, as do other hon. gentlemen, some of the statements he made. It is not only this bill we must examine but rather this bill read in relation to the present Immigration Act and regulations and also having in mind some of the judicial interpretations which have been made in cases which have been the subject of discussion, some of which have gone to the Supreme Court. I think we must take all these together. There are concentric rings involved.

Quite frankly, I have not been able to inform myself as well as I should have and it may be that the criticisms I am now making have been made. I listened with great interest to the parliamentary secretary. I thought his speech was well delivered and included many pertinent factors. However, as found on page 13268 of Hansard, for instance, he said:

> The board will be authorized to deal conclusively with all appeals against deportation orders. The one proviso is that provided the deportation order is found to have been legally made, it must be carried out where in criminal or security cases the board is provided with proper certification from the Solicitor-General—

And so on. Then again:

> The discretionary authority of the board is defined according to two types of deportation cases. Where a legal resident of Canada has been ordered deported and has appealed, the board can decide what is fair and reasonable in all the circumstances of the case. On humanitarian or other grounds it can set aside a deportation order, however legally valid.

I must say that I agree with the hon. member for Carleton and the hon. member for York South that there does not seem to be anything in the bill to justify this. True enough, under clause 15, once the appeal is heard and a decision made there is a right to stay the execution of an order on the grounds set out. Under subclause (1) (b) (ii) of clause 15 the board can take into consideration the existence of other exceptional circumstances. But this is in connection with a stay of proceedings. So far as the exercise of the authority in the present act by the board is concerned, there is no right other than to examine the provisions of the Immigration Act as modified by this bill and then act accordingly. Once a decision has been made then, with certain exceptions, I think the board has the right to take into account exceptional circumstances. In the decision as to what are exceptional circumstances the board may be compelled to follow the other provisions of clause 15. I do not know. I hope the minister may be able to convince me that I am incorrect in my view about this.

However, my position is that when the rights and liberties of people are dealt with the whole apparatus of the state is arrayed against the individual. As one who has been active for 40 years in proceedings in which I have consistently acted against the crown, I know what is involved in this question. I know that the crown, with all the money at its command, with all the expert advice, assistance and witnesses it can call, with all this great apparatus at its hand, poses a very considerable threat to any individual, not deliberately but merely because of its sheer weight and bulk.

Over the centuries we have conceived under our criminal law some very sound and sensible principles with regard to the rights of individuals, except in cases where the revenue of the state is involved when the situation is reversed. But where the rights and liberties of an individual are involved, under our criminal law we say, first, that the crown must prove its case. The onus is upon the crown to prove its case and that onus can only be discharged by producing evidence which shows beyond a reasonable doubt that the offence has been committed.

It would seem to me that if we are setting up this board to make decisions with regard to matters which are in many respects on the same footing, because they involve the rights and liberties of people, the same type of principle could have been inserted in this legislation without any great harm being done. A provision could have been inserted to the effect that under these proceedings the onus would be upon the government to establish the facts beyond a reasonable doubt and the responsibility would be upon them to initiate the steps to discharge that onus. I think such a provision would meet some of the objections which have been raised by the hon. member for Carleton and others.

Second, there is the right of appeal from a decision of the immigration appeal board. That right of appeal is given to the individual on facts or law, or mixed facts and law, if I am correct. The same right is given to the crown. I believe that the government, having seen fit to appoint as members of the board men in whom they have confidence as to their integrity, knowledge, capacity and depth of human feeling in assessing and evaluating the facts in a given case and reaching a decision, must be assumed to have decided that they will respect their judgment.

I suggest that in cases of appeal the government should be limited to matters of law alone. Once the immigration appeal board has heard a case and come to a decision in favour of the individual, I suggest that the same principle should prevail as prevails with regard to a great many criminal matters and that the right of appeal of the government should be confined to questions of law alone. I do not know whether the minister is open to suggestion; I do not know how flexible he is. We will have an opportunity to find out before this bill is passed. But I hope he will give these suggestions consideration.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

I wish to make only one more point. This bill has been very adequately dealt with and there will be far more suitable opportunities to deal with the various matters involved when we are in committee. I am concerned about the effect of clause 21. I must not deal in detail with this matter but I cannot speak on the principle of this bill on second reading without expressing my repugnance to the principle involved in clause 21. This problem was before us yesterday with respect to another matter.

I know there are cases when the security and safety of the state must be considered. I agree with other hon. members that sometimes this factor is overemphasized. Sometimes there is a tendency to exaggerate its importance, using it as a peg on which to hang the argument of handing over to the government a far greater degree of power than is required. Nevertheless there is a problem in this area. I admit quite frankly and honestly that we cannot apply the same rules in these cases as apply in ordinary cases under criminal law or where the safety of the person or property of an individual is concerned vis-à-vis the state. Nevertheless, to leave this discretion to ministers of the crown is simply repeating the mistakes of the past.

Surely it is not beyond the ingenuity of the government, its law officers and the civil service to devise a means by which cases which are certified to involve security matters can be heard by this board or a special panel of the board sitting in camera if necessary. These people are human beings, as are the two ministers involved. I assume that the members of the board will take certain oaths at the time of their appointment. Surely there is no reason why, with certain limitations and proper safeguards, the immigration appeal board could not entertain these cases.

I know that the government is now waiting for the report of a committee dealing with the whole question of security, but it seems to me to be repugnant to an orderly state of affairs that people who are properly in this country should be subject to orders which affect them and their families without having any idea of the general tenor of the accusations made against them, without the source of the accusations being in any way disclosed and without having the fullest opportunity to answer to accusations.

I assume that the Solicitor General (Mr. Pennell) and the minister will attempt to turn themselves into a court and decide, as the immigration appeal board will do, on the facts given to them whether the provisions which protect these people should be withdrawn and they should be subject to a deportation order. But I suggest there is no reason why, with safeguards and limiting conditions, the opportunity should not be given to a panel of the immigration appeal board to give careful and earnest consideration to these extremely difficult problems.

We must grow up about these things, recognizing the dangers which exist. Surely we have now reached the stage in our development as a country and a people where we can face these dangers and provide for them. We should provide for them without in any way interfering with the operation of the rule of law, modified, of course, to meet the special circumstances. I do not know whether it is intended that this clause and what is involved in it will be changed when the government's committee dealing with security matters has brought in its recommendations. I hope the minister will consider this aspect of the matter. If there is to be no willingness on the part of the minister to change the provisions of clause 21 now, I hope he will assure us that when the committee has reported and the whole matter is brought before the house for at least some measure of debate he will be sufficiently flexible to advise the government that if changes are possible in the light of the report the committee brings down he will not oppose such changes in the legislation.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, in opening my remarks on Bill No. C-220, to establish an immigration appeal board, I should like first of all to join preceding members in offering to the minister our appreciation of the way in which he has approached the problem of providing an appeal for people who are faced with deportation. We all believe that he is sincere in his very good intentions to provide an adequate appeal board to deal with these very difficult cases. The objectives of the bill are very high but as you have noticed, Mr. Speaker, in the case of the previous speakers, I too would like to voice some fears that the bill, as it stands, does not have all the necessary powers to achieve these high objectives.

As I have said before, I do not doubt the sincerity and concern for justice of both the minister and his advisers. In my personal experience with persons ordered for deportation, I was appalled at the failure of the immigration authorities in some cases to accept arguments on moral and compassionate grounds. I do not find any clause, for example, in this bill which gives any authority to members of the new appeal board to act on submissions made on the grounds of compassion or humanitarian considerations.

The act as it now stands empowers the present appeal board to hear cases only on legalistic considerations. It is true that the act provides for an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, but again only on questions of law. I ask the minister, where in the bill is there any provision to allow the hearing of submission on moral, humanitarian or compassionate considerations which the parliamentary secretary told us would be available?

Another observation I should like to make to the minister is that the provisions in this bill are limited to the hearing of appeals of Canadian citizens only in respect of such classes of relatives as are referred to in the regulations made by order in council. Here again, the new appeal board's decision will be final. Is this the best way that we can treat our Canadian citizens? Is this compassion? We members of parliament, especially those who are members of the joint Senate and House of Commons committee on immigration, have heard numerous representations in person and through briefs to the effect that the present and proposed regulations are in so many cases so restricted that they have often been called unfair, heartless and even discriminatory.

There is another problem in connection with immigration cases, and that is the problem of the deportation of refugee seamen and other refugees who seek asylum in Canada because they fear to return to their country of origin. Some of these refugees have suffered a lot, and some of them are survivors of Nazi concentration camps. There are provisions in certain international conventions dealing with human rights demanding that countries do grant these refugees and political persecutees asylum. I urge all those concerned, therefore, to be guided by the principles in these international conventions, even if formal ratification of them by Canada has not yet been given.

Last week the members of the special joint committee on immigration were in Toronto and heard some interesting and important briefs. One of these briefs was presented by the Canadian Mental Health Association. It stated that mental disorders should no longer be considered as grounds for deporting immigrants or even for barring would be immigrants. Spokesmen for the Canadian Mental Health Association and the Canadian Association for Retarded Children agreed that immigration laws and regulations which bar the way of those who have been in mental hospitals, including epileptics and retarded children, should be swept away. They should be done away with because they are outdated and inhumane.

A new approach based on individual assessment and humanitarian considerations for the immediate members of the family as well should be adopted. These cases should be referred to an independent tribunal of experts in psychiatry, psychology and sociology. Many persons are entering mental clinics of hospitals without being seriously mentally ill. Persons with various levels of education and training enter such institutions for a short time for the treatment of emotional depression. Such persons may recover within three or four weeks and remain well for the rest of their lives. Unfortunately, and unfairly, the present Immigration Act labels these people with the horrible and obsolete terms insane". I should like to suggest to the minister that he update the medical terminology in the act and regulations and remove the word "insane". This stigma should not exist in any Canadian statute.

I have knowledge of immigrants, Mr. Speaker, who on arrival in a strange country suffer a culture shock. This is the shock of trying to adjust to new customs and to a new culture. It could happen that this shock causes a mental breakdown. However, such persons can recover with treatment. I ask again the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand), why should these people be deported? The United States government has relaxed is immigration laws by removing the provisions which used to prohibit epileptics entry into that country. United States laws now permit the entry of retarded children up to the age of 14 who are accompanied by an admissible family. The new United States laws also permit former mental patients to come to that country after the surgeon-general decides they have been free from mental illness for a certain period of time.

[Mr. Haidasz.]

With regard to the position of the appeal board, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister to give us more information about the set-up and especially tell us how only seven members, only two of whom will be barristers, can inquire as a court of law into all these appeals. I venture to say that the board will really be swamped with appeals, especially with those based on humanitarian grounds. The board will find it very difficult to deal with these cases swiftly. Again I say, I believe these cases will be submitted mostly on compassionate grounds. I believe, therefore that a full time staff of lawyers should be engaged by the department to deal with these inquiries which have to be conducted. Immigration officials should be doing other tasks.

Another observation I should like to make to the minister is that interpreters should be provided at public expense at these inquiries. From time to time I have received complaints from citizens and from potential immigrants that the interpretation services which exist today in this country and abroad are either unavailable or inadequate. I believe that these observations, along with others made by previous speakers this afternoon, are worthy of the most urgent consideration by the minister.

I appeal to him to give urgent and closest attention to the requests of so many Canadian citizens and of their elected representatives in parliament. It is our duty to offer constructive criticism and to try, in the crucible of debate, to make the changes which will improve that which we are given. It behooves us to maintain our high standards of Canadian justice.

Mr. Joseph Macaluso (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I also want to join with the former speaker, the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz), in his words to the minister. I for one have often been known to be a very harsh critic of immigration policy and procedures. Perhaps it may be said that on a great many occasions I have been justified in my criticism and that at other times I have not been justified. However, I am sure the minister will believe me when I say that I applaud him for the courage he has shown during his tenure of office and for the drive on his part to get before this house not only the white paper on immigration but the legislation presently before us, for which there have been cries from many quarters both outside and inside the house.

I also applaud him for his efforts to revamp his department. There have been times when I was perhaps one of the strongest critics of people in the department. However, I must say—and it would be very remiss of me not to say this—that in the past year there has been not a marked improvement but a sensational improvement, and I no longer feel I have to deal directly with the minister's office but can deal, with some hope of success, with the department itself. For this I think the department also deserves a great deal of credit.

I make this commendation, Mr. Speaker, even though I and perhaps others may not agree with many of the things contained in the white paper or with some aspects of the bill presently before the house. Nevertheless I assure the minister that my remarks are directed to some grave reservations I have with respect to certain sections of Bill No. C-220. Others have made comments on many aspects of the bill which I will not reiterate. My main concern is with clause 17 which deals with appeals by sponsors.

I am also one who agrees with the very high objectives set out last evening by the parliamentary secretary. I was not able to be here at the time but I have had the opportunity of reading them. As has been said already, objectives are one thing but putting them into practice is another. Trying to establish an independent tribunal to carry out these high objectives is yet another thing altogether, Mr. Speaker. This is because the members of the tribunal are not required to pay attention to these high objectives. For example, I cannot imagine the minister going to the members of this independent tribunal after they had taken a particular decision and saying: "Gentlemen, you are not following the intent that we had in our minds". It would be impossible for the minister to do this. I fully realize the difficulty he faces, but at the same time I am sure that the humanitarian and compassionate objectives envisaged cannot be legislated. I suggest that in no way can we impose upon this seven-man board any obligation to carry out these objectives. Certainly they have not been carried out in the past and I see no way they can be carried out in the future.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, I realize the problem. At the same time I am not one of those who believe that ministerial discretion should be removed completely from the office of the minister. I know that a great many persons, myself included, go to see him about exercising his discretion in a given case. But I am sure that those of us who visit the minister or go to the department seeking a review of a case do not do so simply because the immigrant or constituent in question has asked that it be reviewed. We screen many of these cases ourselves. We do not wish to deal with all of the hundreds of cases which come before us. I would be most happy to tell these people to go to the department but it is very difficult to tell a person who is knocking at your door every week end to go away. Indeed, he may have a justifiable complaint.

In many cases when the department is asked to review a particular file a positive answer is made. Therefore when a sponsor who has made application for a brother or sister or whoever it is he wishes to bring into the country has his application refused, I do not see why he should be put to the expense of retaining counsel. He cannot be expected to appear before the tribunal alone, and although the tribunal deals with both fact and law an appeal to the Supreme Court lies only on a question of law.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, though I hope my fear is unfounded, that this provision will further restrict immigration by sponsorship. According to the provisions of the bill the appeal must be made by a Canadian citizen. According to the white paper a landed immigrant has some rights, but under the bill before us he has no rights in the matter of an appeal because it is a Canadian citizen who has to make the application. Why we should put a sponsor to some expense if he wants to appeal a decision to the Supreme Court, I do not know, and I do not agree with this provision.

I disagree with my colleague from Parkdale on one matter. The board will not be swamped with a great many appeals from sponsors because many applications will not even get to the board even though certain cases may be justified. I believe it was disclosed before the joint Senate-House of Commons committee that sometimes a letter from the department rejecting an application gives reasons for the rejection. I hope this is the case but I do not think that in all cases every reason is given, particularly in cases involving security. Others have dealt with that matter.

I do not know how it would be possible to present such a case. Is a person expected to appear before the board with just the letter he has received from the department stating that the applicant does not meet the requirements of the law or fall within the regulations and therefore the application cannot be accepted, with I presume, the reasons set out? What about documents in the country of origin of the immigrant which may be of assistance to his case? Is this information to be made available to the sponsor so that he can plead a case? These are reservations about the bill that I think many of us have and which create real fear. As I say, one of my fears is that although it is not the intention the bill may further restrict immigration by sponsorship.

With regard to the humanitarian and compassionate aspects, Mr. Speaker, who can deal with such considerations? The independent tribunal? Of course not. These considerations can be dealt with only by the department. The department may say that these matters will be taken into account when the case is considered by the department, and I am sure they will be; but there is no way of establishing this before a tribunal.

I must say that every application made by a sponsor invites a certain amount of pressure being placed upon the minister. I know that parts of the bill have arisen from the Sedgwick report but I have yet to find any editorial writer who approved of the report. With all due respect to Mr. Sedgwick—I articled with him in my final year at Osgoode Hall—not many people agree with his conclusions. The department seems to agree with them. We realize there are problems in regard to ministerial discretion, but where do you draw the line? Pretending the problem does not exist does not wipe it out. One must remember that we are not dealing so much with statute law as with human beings, people with emotions. Some people want to join their families and it is not enough to say to a sponsor that his brother, sister, mother or father cannot come to this country for certain reasons unless you can prove to his satisfaction, which at times may be difficult to do, that it is impossible for the relative to come to Canada.

What is the good of sending out a form letter saying that an appeal must be launched within a certain time? How many people take advantage of such a letter? I can see people coming to our offices screaming that they want to appeal when the time limit has expired. An extension is impossible because we are bound by the law. I feel that the provision respecting appeals by sponsors might inhibit immigration through sponsors.

The present appeal board is not satisfactory. Its decisions may be reviewed by the minister. In sponsored cases the minister has discretion. I ask the minister and his staff to devise some plan whereby a line can be drawn so that people may be helped without the board or department being swamped with appeals. I find it difficult to accept that the ministerial discretion with respect to sponsored appeals should be done away with. I agree with many of the contentions on this subject raised by the hon. member for York South. I hope the minister will review this matter. He must have some answers to the problems.

In all conscience I could not let the opportunity pass of expressing my fear in regard to appeals by sponsors. Under clause 23 an appeal lies to the Supreme Court of Canada. But, Mr. Speaker, the Supreme Court of Canada deals with the law. The regulations are based on the law. Certain conditions are set down in the act and any tribunal will know about those, including the Supreme Court of Canada. The Supreme Court of Canada cannot look at humanitarian and compassionate aspects and it will be impossible for the appeal tribunal set up under this bill to do so.

Canadian immigration procedures throughout our history have always considered humanitarian and compassionate grounds. Ignoring those grounds in this bill is to take a cold-fish attitude to immigration by sponsors. We shall have turned in a full circle. Families will not be reunited. I do not agree with my good friend from Parkdale that we shall be swamped with appeals by sponsors. This bill will have the reverse effect. I fear that such an effect is the purpose of this measure.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend speaking long on Bill C-220. I have not many problems concerning immigration in my riding. I wish to mention one particular instance involving a person who came from the United States and wanted to work in Canada.

The minister ought to clarify one point to which the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Macaluso) referred. The minister cannot attend to all individuals; there are thousands of cases. There ought to be some procedure tc correct injustices which arise from time to time through shortcomings or loopholes in the regulations. I know that hon. members do their best with individual cases. I do not think we should run to the minister with every little difficulty. Hon. members' time is limited, as is the minister's.

Perhaps I can illustrate my point by citing an example. Some time ago a school teacher named Nelson came to the district of Thetford Mines. He had come to Canada as a tourist from New York city where he had taught, I believe, the year before. He was well qualified, having taught in Africa under the UNESCO or Colombo plan or some such plan and was approached by the authorities in Thetford Mines. At first he came to Thetford Mines as a visitor. He was well qualified, having, I believe, a masters degree in science. The school board, needing a teacher, asked him to sign a contract. He signed. He did not know anything about immigration rules. Sometimes I wonder whether anybody but certain officials in the department knows those rules. The man took the job and then the trouble started.

Nelson went to the immigration officials and said he had signed a contract with the school board. He was treated badly. Sometimes I think we treat immigrants more severely than we treated Hal Banks. There were representations by the Quebec provincial government, the school board and the teachers' association. The man was willing to go back to the job which had been given him. He could have been charged with a breach of contract. School inspectors and everybody else jumped into the affair. Finally he was given eight days to leave the country. This was in November.

The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) said yesterday that the former minister of immigration, now the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), had expressed the opinion that in the Department of Citizenship and Immigration there were more papers and trash than in any other department of government. I am inclined to believe this to be true when I see some of these forms whose meaning is so hard to understand.

The officials informed this man that he should sign one of these forms. But that did not help the situation. It made it worse. All he could do was return to the United States and leave the school board short of one teacher in November when it is not easy to find new teachers. He had no criminal record, no criminal convictions. He could have entered this country to teach at any time. He was charged only with entering the country under false pretences. The department said he had come to this country to teach and had not declared his intention.

This was not the case. He came in as a tourist and decided to stay only after he had been offered a post under good conditions which suited him. He did not know how he could get out of the mess except by breaking his contract, returning to the United States and fighting the case from across the border. This is why I submitted the whole question to the minister. I learned later that though under the terms of the expulsion order he was required to leave the country within eight days he was told he could nevertheless remain here until the end of the year. What is the use of issuing an expulsion order with a time limit of eight days if it can be disregarded? Apparently the man is still in Canada and able to finish his school year.

I suggest that this man signed the paper presented to him unwillingly or without reading the fine print and that by so doing he put himself into a situation where he was legally guilty. But from a humanitarian point of view he was not guilty at all. When I saw him he was as perplexed about the whole business as a ten year old might be. The officials really got after him. I do not know what kind of people we have in the department of immigration at this time, but the fact that he signed a contract before telling them he intended to remain was enough to cause this whole mess.

There are ways and means of dealing with matters of this kind which would avoid the necessity of running to the minister and the minister having to send a telegram to his officials telling them to take no further action until the case has been reconsidered. Moreover, when expulsion orders are sent to people telling them they must get out within eight days the department might as well tell them that they can stay on for a year and contest the order.

Maybe I should know more about these matters. If I were an immigrant I would no doubt understand them better. But no one looking at the immigration regulations can understand what they mean. The white paper seems to have clarified the issue somewhat. We now know what standards are required of those who seek admission to this country whereas previously we did not know who could come in and who could not. If the tribunal to be set up will simplify these matters some advantage will undoubtedly attach to it. From time to time, as things are, undesirable people are able to enter this country while others who are likely to make good, honest citizens meet with a great deal of difficulty.

I know of one case in Ottawa which has been dragging on for three years. A Canadian citizen got married in Italy and naturally wished to bring his wife over here. However, he was obliged to send her back to Italy and the matter is still not settled. Someone in the lady's family, a cardinal or an archbishop, I believe, is working on the case on the Italian side without any success. If a cardinal or an archbishop cannot do anything to change the minister's mind, what can I do about it? First of all, the department said the lady had tuberculosis, but after a long time it was found out that she did not. It is time the minister cut off the dead limbs in his department and began clearing out the brushwood so as to make the administration more practical and realistic.

I think the minister is to be congratulated on the effort he has made so far. There will still be shortcomings and loopholes in the act but these cannot all be remedied at one time. It is only through experience that we will learn what has to be amended and redrafted in better form. I am sure the bill will be useful in dealing with cases such as I have just mentioned, and the examples I have given are not isolated instances by any means.

No doubt there will be some hardship if those appealing these decisions have to pay legal fees but I suppose that on balance it will be cheaper than travelling to and from the home country and better than standing on the quayside waiting for someone to say they can come in or they must go back. A person who has found a sponsor in this country, what we call in French un parrain or une parraine, has someone to look after his interests, but the situation can be embarrassing for a person without such an advantage. For one thing, there is the language barrier in some cases. Then there is a whole series of procedures to be followed during which reliance is placed entirely upon the immigration officers who can be very quick about some things when it suits them and very slow about others, depending on the circumstances. They can find a multitude of reasons for delay if they want to—whether good or not, I do not know.

I have received a great many complaints from immigrants who have entered the country to become residents of my constituency.

They feel aggrieved about the way in which the Immigration Act is working at present and I trust that the bill before us will clarify many of these matters. If the new procedures do operate effectively the minister will be relieved of all the knocking on his door that now goes on and the members of parliament will in turn be relieved of the pressures now placed upon them in this area. If some solution is not found, all these problems will end up in the minister's office.

I should like to hear from the minister about the man who entered this country to begin teaching here. I trust there will be no record against him since what he did was, in my opinion, done unknowingly or at least unwittingly. It was the official of the department who actually caused the whole problem by getting him to sign a whole lot of papers whose fine print he did not read. He found out later that by signing these papers he had admitted entering the country under false pretences, which was not the case. He made very strong representations to me. Finally I went to the minister and asked him to look into the matter, after which I heard nothing more. I believe that person is still in the country working as a teacher. I gather that a decision will be taken in June. I do not understand what the purpose is in ordering the expulsion of a man and then allowing him to stay. I think the minister should be able to give us an explanation. I hope that the new appeal board will be able to solve these problems.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, listening to the speeches made over the last few days on the last four bills considered, I could not help thinking as an independent member—if you will allow me this digression—that there is a new climate in the house.

We started our proceedings last year in a climate of distemper and some days, we heard more partisan speeches than objective discussions, to such an extent that after a few months, the press started some kind of discriminatory campaign against this parliament. However, if the reporters have followed our deliberations in the last few months, particularly in the last few weeks, they undoubtedly noticed that there is truly a new climate since the discussions are held on what I might call a high level. Objections, or rather interventions, are objective and I think it is very interesting to follow them, to listen to them from both sides. Members of the party in power have even expressed well detailed and well grounded criticism. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to say, as an independent member, that all this bodes well and is probably of a nature to bolster the reputation of the House of Commons, of parliament in the mind of Canadians, in short to give them back the real confidence they should have in the seriousness of their parliament.

I take the liberty to congratulate all those who took part in the debate, not only on this bill but also on the three bills on the public service which were considered.

Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity to listen earlier, like all hon. members of this house, to the speech made by the hon. member for Matapédia-Matane (Mr. Tremblay). It made quite an impression on me, it was, for me, a source of information I did not have, it made me understand better the background of the legislation which is now before us and of the other which will be introduced later. At one point I allowed myself a more personal intervention as far as the hon. member is concerned and I did it with some hesitation because I did not want to reopen a painful wound.

However, after hearing the hon. member say that following his firm stand on the deportation of some members of the underworld, deportation which irritated some Toronto newspapers, he had had to endure the torment of a campaign of criticism during weeks, I began to wonder if the furniture case had not come to light after that and I found that it was so. In fact, the furniture story arose after the minister had done his duty and sent away people whose departure evidently jeopardized certain interests of Toronto newspapers.

In my opinion, this is a revelation which, I think, gives us a better understanding of the indignity of that smear campaign against the minister and some of his colleagues. It is also a justification of the bill before us which will protect the minister of immigration against such persecutions. If we have reached a point in our country where newspapers as important and as responsible as those mentioned a while ago can afford such campaigns, I think it is an alarming situation and we will have to tighten our security measures in other fields.

Mr. Speaker, I read the bill as carefully as possible, just like other members of parliament. I do not claim to have any special competence. I simply listened to those of my colleagues who know more about this matter and who spoke before me. I wish to point out to the minister that one thing in particular does not seem clear to me; it concerns the appeals. Are time-limits provided —at least, I do not think so—not only to lodge appeals but also to hear them? Are time-limits provided also for execution of the decisions made by this court of sorts, by this board? Are there also some provisions for some special cases where human factors might intervene and involve additional time? I do not intend to give particulars, for I know that the minister can guess what I mean, but I mention this simply because it occurred to me while I was reading the bill.

I was somewhat surprised to hear the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) at one point attack the bureaucrats and tell the minister that some measures are absolutely necessary to prevent abuse of authority among them. Then, and not without some malice, I drew a parallel. I wondered: How can a propagandist of socialism, that is, of the theory of government through bureaucrats, allow himself, even before succeeding in establishing the system in this country, to criticize the bureaucrats? There is a sort of irrationality or inconsistency in such a remark. This might suggest that if our friends in the New Democratic Party ever came to power, they would have to create other bureaucratic institutions to watch over all the bureaucrats that are already in office. We can see from here the unseemly bureaucracy which all this would entail.

I was nevertheless amused—I say this without malice—because the comments made by the hon. member for York South were, in my opinion, timely and of great value for the most part. What worries me most—I believe you will find this is a constant concern of mine—is the persistence with which the hon. member for York South champions the cause —this may not be the most accurate expression—the extraordinary tenacity with which he defends Canadians under suspicion or accused of being security risks, demanding that excessive precautionary measures be taken, fettering the government hand and foot in order to protect the rights of those citizens presumed to be or accused of being a threat to public security.

I know the hon. member for York South means well, because he believes precisely in the rights of individuals, and I think it is a part of his philosophy to protect individuals against abuse of government authority.

Such a concern is worthy of praise in general. I also believe one must not carry it too far and that community rights will nevertheless always come before individual rights. I think that if that reasoning goes too far and the government is deprived of the means at its disposal to protect society against security risks, then the whole common good is liable to suffer disastrous effects.

I believe the appeal board will surely have a part to play in the case of immigrants of merit, the ones that have been carefully selected; I think those immigrants are a real wealth for this country. I am going to add a comment that runs counter to standing orders, Mr. Speaker, but I wish to point out to the minister that publicity should probably be emphasized so that the public understands very well the value of selective immigration in this country. Unfortunately, people are unaware of it. People still think that immigrants come here to fill jobs and cause unemployment in this country, which is not true.

I believe the minister should accede to the requests of those organizations which call for the establishment of reception committees for immigrants, try to create a better atmosphere, to prepare for them a propitious psychological climate and follow them afterwards, during the first months and the first years, to help them become Canadians as soon as possible and as well as possible. I think that in the case of the normal immigrant, great importance should be attached to the human considerations I mentioned a while ago.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that in the case of security risks, the government must be allowed at least some discretion. Let us not require of the government that it make public, for instance, its methods of investigation, with the result that once more the members of the underworld, or the mafia, whatever you would call it, will resort to every possible means to protect themselves against the machinery the government uses to protect the commonweal.

I am of those, who have yet to understand why the member for York South (Mr. Lewis) and his colleagues, at the beginning of the session last year, insisted on defending Victor Spencer who, to my mind, seemed quite content with the way he had been treated and who, once again, as far as one could see, was forced to a certain extent to demand a new investigation. I wonder if all that did not contribute to hasten his death, although he was ill already. Still, I feel that this matter of protecting the individual against the state is being overdone, carried too far, exaggerated. It must not be pushed to the point where troublemakers, security risks, wrongdoers, notorious gangsters, members of the international mafia, are shielded against the legitimate protection the government wants to give the public.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot imagine any government, regardless of the party in power, trying to lessen the chances of any acceptable immigrant to settle in Canada.

We may have different concepts of the commonweal, but I for one still believe in the principle of authority and not in the abuse of authority. I do not believe in despotism nor indictature, but I believe that democracy must accept certain barriers, certain limitations and decide on the authority it has chosen and established legally. Let it have at least the power to use this authority for the commonweal in cases as extreme as security risks.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that the hon. minister could do more as concerns departmental employees at the lower level, for instance, officers in various centers who, it seems, have not received proper training and who seem to lack the necessary tact in matters relating to human considerations such as those involved in accepting immigrants to this country. Some of these officers seem to take the liberty of giving a personal interpretation of government policy, sometimes applying regulations with excessive authority. I am not saying this is a crime, I am not saying this has taken scandalous proportions so far, but I feel that those who mentioned earlier that human factors had to be taken into account were right in doing so.

It might be advisable to submit immigration officers to periodical instruction, having them particiapte in forums at regular intervals, so that they will become aware of the fact that the problems they are dealing with are related to an individual with a family and relatives, who has his life to live and who, therefore, must be treated with great consideration.

It sometimes happens that these people are detained in intolerable conditions. While I am not calling this crime, I feel it must be said, and the hon. minister surely must have given it some thought, even though he has not had time to take action so far.

I have in mind a specific case which I do not want to detail here, in order not to impose upon the patience of the house, but where, it seems to me, a local immigration officer took a certain attitude which I do not think the minister would endorse eventually.

That is to say, Mr. Speaker, perhaps the bill now under consideration is not perfect; indeed, I do not think we will ever see any perfect legislation in this house, even though one is convinced this is the best parliament there ever was. There will always remain differences of opinion about the ways to correct situations. I believe that, generally speaking, it is good, provided that emphasis is placed on this human aspect of the problem and things are not carried too far. And I want to repeat this so that the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), who is here, may realize that there is nothing mischievous in my approach, but that I differ with him as regards the defence of those people known as security risks. Let us not go so far as to take away from the government every weapon at its disposal, for it is its job to protect the common good. I suggest that from that point of view, democracy must not deprive the legally elected representatives of the people of the authority they need to act, to act well and quickly.

Besides, if there should be excesses, Mr. Speaker, well, we are 265 here and surely someone would realize it some day and we would hear about it. I believe I know enough people in this chamber who are diligent and who are aware of all these problems, that it would not take long before we hear about it and before the minister in fault would be tried promptly.

That is to say, Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact, even if I associate myself with certain constructive criticisms that have been made and which the minister will probably take into account in the practical administration of the act, I am one of those who will vote in favour of the bill before us, which provides for the establishment of this Immigration Appeal Board.

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member for Regina City, who is about to rise, might permit me at this time to inform the house that the questions to be raised on the adjournment proceedings this evening are as follows: The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard), External Affairs—request for bilingual personnel in Canadian embassies; the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey), Housing—meetings of study groups respecting shortage; the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), Canada Law Reports—sale price of.

IMMIGRATION

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF APPEAL BOARD

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Marchand for the second reading of Bill No. C-220, to make provision for appeals to an Immigration Appeal Board in respect of certain matters relating to immigration.

Mr. K. H. More (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take very long in making my remarks because I am anxious to see the bill reach the committee stage so that we can discuss it clause by clause. Generally speaking, in my experience in dealing with matters such as are covered by this bill I have received excellent co-operation from the staff of the department, the various officers and the minister concerned with these problems.

I believe we must realize that the departmental officials are faced with limitations which have been established under the law and by practice. When these cases reach us, in most instances they have been considered by the departmental officials. If after reviewing the file we find that in our opinion some legitimate representation can be made, it must be remembered that it is not because of lack of co-operation or lack of consideration by the departmental officials that we refer cases to the minister's office or to the office of his parliamentary secretary.

In our discussion of the bill I believe all of us have benefited from the fact that three former ministers have participated in the debate. I should like to say how pleased I was that the hon. member for Matapédia-Matane (Mr. Tremblay) took part in this debate. I found him to be a very responsible minister. He had to leave the cabinet because of a disability. I am pleased to see him back in the house and participating in this debate. While he was in office my experience was that he gave that careful consideration to these matters which benefits a responsible minister of the department. I should like to say to the present minister and his parliamentary secretary that the same consideration has been shown by them.

After listening to the parliamentary secretary present this bill last night I wish to congratulate the minister for getting out of town and letting him introduce this very important legislation. I think the parliamentary secretary did a capable job. I cannot share the confidence he exhibits in respect of the bill because I have grave doubts whether it liberalizes—with a small "l"—the problems of these people. I believe that in fact it may place greater restrictions upon them. I shall listen with interest to the minister when he closes the debate today after hearing our representations. I have a feeling that if portions of the bill are retained in their present form the result will be to create rather than lessen discontent among Canadian citizens who are interested in sponsoring immigrants to this country.

With regard to the set-up of the board I notice that the chairman or the vice chairman and not less than two other members shall constitute a quorum of the board. As I read the bill I see no provision at all for the board to travel. I notice that travelling expenses can be paid while a member of the board is absent from his normal home, and so forth, but as I read the bill the indication is that all the hearings and appeals will be heard in Ottawa. If this is the case, I suggest to the minister that if we can afford to have appeal boards of the government travel across the country when dealing with matters of dollars only—I am thinking of the appeal boards under the Income Tax Act and the revenue act—surely to goodness when human considerations are at stake the same provision should be made so that this board when hearing appeals could go to the different centres where the appeals arise.

I am not speaking of security cases but of sponsorship cases with which this bill deals. It should be possible for the board to travel on the basis of a reasonable fee being charged that would not work hardship on the people who wish to make representations. It seems to me that in view of the growing establishment of citizenship courts the facilities of these courts might be used for the hearing of appeals by the board. The board will be dealing with cases concerning human values, they will be dealing with people who have come to Canada from other countries, have worked hard to establish themselves, made a success of their lives and contributed to the welfare of this country. I am sure that to impose burdensome costs on them when they wish to launch an appeal concerning a member of the family they are interested in sponsoring is not really the intent of the minister and should not be the result of passing this bill.

[Mr. More.]

We are not dealing with regulations changing the tariffs on goods. We are not dealing with commodities as such. We have to show in the bill that we are dealing with human beings, human values, the consciences of people and the deep emotions that are involved in families concerned in these matters.

I hope that when we reach the committee stage of the bill the attitude of the minister will be similar to that of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) when we were dealing with the transportation bill. I think we came out with a good bill because the minister accepted proper criticism and constructive amendments to that bill. I believe amendments could be made that would be constructive and broaden the scope of this bill, humanize it and make the work of the board much more efficient. The board could also be given much greater scope, which I believe is necessary, than is provided in the terms of the bill now before us.

I hope that when the minister closes the debate he will indicate his willingness to consider amendments to the bill. By "consider" I do not mean superficially consider them and say he cannot accept them. I hope he will seriously consider amendments that I believe can and should be put forward that will make this bill a better instrument than it appears to be in the form in which it is presented to us.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must advise the house that if the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether before the minister launches into his remarks I could, I suppose on a point of order, suggest to him and other hon. members that it might be sensible to suspend the sitting now and listen to the minister at eight o'clock, so that the remarks which he makes are not interrupted by the dinner hour.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps I should point out to the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) that pursuant to an order of the house made yesterday, the house would suspend its sitting from seven o'clock until eight o'clock. If it is the wish of the house to suspend its sitting from now until eight o'clock, the unanimous consent of the house will be required.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, it depends how long the minister will take in his remarks. If he can give us an indication that he will finish before seven o'clock, perhaps he could make his remarks now.

Mr. Marchand: I do not intend to go beyond seven o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether when the minister concludes his remarks we could by leave suspend the sitting until eight o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps we had better wait until the minister concludes his remarks before making any decision on that point.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, my first words are to thank my parliamentary secretary who introduced second reading of this bill. I should state that I am in perfect agreement with the statement he read to the house last night. I also wish to thank the house for the way hon. members have discussed the bill and the interesting suggestions that have been made.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I should like, at the outset, to put the bill now before the house into proper perspective.

Obviously, every one understands that a general immigration act is not involved here, but simply a very limited piece of legislation to establish an appeal board different in character from the one now in existence and to extend the rights provided for in the present act concerning sponsorship.

• (6:40 p.m.)

Those are the two purposes of this bill.

I have listened with particular pleasure to the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) when he spoke of the mentally ill, of psychiatric cases. There is not the slightest doubt that I am in complete agreement with what he said. However, I believe it will be possible to deal with such cases during the discussion on the general legislation, after the white paper has been adopted by the house, not on a bill to establish a particular body.

Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the house eliminates none of the existing rights. Not only are none of the rights removed, but new ones are being added. To start with, for the first time, we will have a board which will be independent from the department.

I believe every one knows that the existing board is part of the Department of Manpower and Immigration and that it is not an independent board. In fact, its members are appointed by the minister, and as far as administration is concerned, it is entirely dependent upon the department, that is upon the minister and the deputy minister.

We are setting up a truly independent board whose members will be appointed during good pleasure and be independent from the department. The chairman will be the chief executive officer of the board; it will no longer be the minister or the deputy minister.

Mr. Speaker, the powers of this board will be more extensive than those of the previous board, in that the latter could only settle or dispose of points of law, whereas the present board will dispose not only of points of law but also of points of fact. Therefore, the board will actually have more authority and be more independent than the former one. It cannot therefore be inferred from my remarks that this legislation contains restrictions which did not exist in the former act. On the contrary, I am under the impression that this board provides guarantees that the former one could not offer under the constitution.

I have taken note of all the main points raised in the house and I think I can arrange them into groups. I am sorry, however, that I shall not be referring to each one of the hon. members who made comments in the house. The main point which struck me and which strikes all who deal with immigration concerns the human nature of immigration problems.

It is true that immigration problems, like many others within our society, are human problems. Mr. Speaker, this new and independent court will comprise two lawyers only. It may consist of more, but to show clearly that this court will not merely judge according to the law but use other criteria, most of the members of the court may be not lawyers but people from other professions. If I am to make a recommendation to the cabinet, I would make this court representative of both those directly concerned with immigration and other social groups concerned with this problem.

The only way to obtain human decisions is to allow these people to decide, to give them full authority and jurisdiction to judge the cases as presented.

In my opinion, this jurisdiction is established by the legislation. The court will be able to judge not only legal problems, but factual problems and then make a decision according to the exceptional circumstances. It will be empowered to do so.

Will the court do it, Mr. Speaker? I cannot swear it to this house and I see no legislation which would allow anyone to swear that a human court, or even a man, will behave in all circumstances in a humane manner. The only thing is that the structure, as it is, gives all the safeguards that human problems will be taken into consideration in the field of immigration. Even if we inserted in the very legislation the word "humane", and asked the court to judge in a humane way, it might not do so, as there would be no real guarantee. We have to know whether the court can do so if it wishes; I think it could and I do not see what we could add to the bill to strenghten our purpose. In that field, I am not satisfied that the text does not offer the safeguards announced in the statement made yesterday by my parliamentary secretary (Mr. Munro).

I should like to say now that, with two specific exceptions mentioned in section 26, the minister retains all his rights; in other words, he will have the power to admit into Canada, by virtue of a permit or under his own authority, people who do not strictly comply with all the conditions spelled out in the act. He will still be able to do so; this ministerial privilege has not been taken away from him. The only privilege withdrawn from him is that of reversing a decision taken by the Immigration Board, as it is, or modifying such a decision. Otherwise, the minister has the same powers as before, and he may, on humanitarian grounds, accept into Canada people who, normally under the act, would not be admissible.

Therefore, even in that respect, Mr. Speaker, I do not think we are worse off than before. I would say to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Macaluso), who said that he was afraid just the same, that I do not see how we can legislate against someone's fear. I try to understand the reason for it and I do not see how we can give greater protection than this.

Now, in the field of sponsorship, Mr. Speaker, we are making an experiment. It must be realized that Canada is, to my knowledge, the only country in the world which gives such a legal right as that granted in Bill No. C-220. I know of no other country which allows its citizens to sponsor by right people, non citizens, with an appeal before the courts, and even up to the Supreme Court, on a point of law. That is surely an innovation.

Now, we can be told, and we have been told, that we could go further. I think there is no harm in saying here, Mr. Speaker, that we would like Canadian citizens to have the right to sponsor all the people that the landed immigrants, as defined in the white paper, can bring into Canada now.

Take the white paper for instance. Look at the category of people that the landed immigrants are allowed to bring into Canada. Well, citizens will be able by right to ask that those people come to Canada. This is only an experiment. We prefer not to include it in the act because we can easily extend it in the future, if the results are satisfactory. How many people will come under that arrangement? We have no idea, however we believe that we must try it with one category of people and then go further if the experiment is successful and if there is need to. Therefore we are not removing any of the present rights included in the act. The immigrants and the citizens will have the same rights they had under the former act.

We are simply adding that legal right to bring someone in, a legal right with appeal before an arbitration board which decides on the case.

The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) pointed out a legal heresy allegedly found in the text. Since he is a lawyer and I am not, I must admit that I cannot give him an answer. The fact that at one point the minister is acting in contradiction with one of his own officials does seem a bit strange. I cannot say if it is really an illegal or incongruous provision. In any case, it is a matter that can be studied.

Mr. Speaker, there is another very important matter, namely the security cases. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) dealt with that and I think that personally all the values he mentioned are as dear to me as they are to him. I know what he is aiming at, but nevertheless, there are problems that he cannot ignore and could not overlook even though he were in my present position. In matters of security—I do not think I am revealing any secrets—but in any case, everybody knows that we obtain a great deal of information from sources which would soon dry up if we brought such information before the court. As soon as we would make use of that information in public, its source would dry up overnight. Such is our problem.

I thought that we might at a given time have some evidence accepted in camera and even, eventually, deny admittance to certain persons, if you like, in order to protect our sources of information, but then, this would be a mockery of the law, and I would rather have none of it. Of course, the responsibility lies with the minister. But in order that the discretionary power be as restricted as possible, we decided upon this certificate, which would require the signature of two ministers. Thus, at least two ministers would see the file and the rights of the individuals would be protected to the greatest possible extent. Now, in that connection, I may not be ready to die for that formula, but I feel it is my duty to tell the house that I am forced to protect what I referred to a while ago.

An inquiry on security is now under way in Canada. That problem will doubtless be discussed. We may eventually find a way of conciliating the rights of the people, the security of Canada, as well as the sources of information which no police force can do without, whether it be in communist, socialist, capitalist countries or any other, including those governed by dictators. In any case, that is the problem we have to face; we have not found a better solution because we are unable to do so. Now, when we discuss the bill clause by clause, if a workable suggestion is made in this connection, guaranteeing what we want to guarantee, I will be the first to accept it. However, it is not easy to do so at the present time.

Mr. Speaker, many other points have been raised. I will take them up when we examine each individual clause of the bill. I simply wish to say that the object of the bill is the establishment of a court which will be independent of the government, the minister, the department itself; in my opinion, the bill does precisely that.

Now, I was asked to be flexible. Just to show how flexible I am, Mr. Speaker, my first gesture will be to inform the house that, when the bill comes up for consideration in committee of the whole, I will move an amendment to clause 10 (1), which provides that the chairman of the board may delegate the powers of the board to any member.

I feel this power should not only be given to the chairman, but to all members of the board, since a designated member will exercize the powers of the board itself. I feel it is only natural that the board and not exclusively the chairman, should delegate its powers.

I also intend to move an amendment to clause 28, which enables a special inquiry officer to review and reverse its own decision, in order to provide for more flexibility in the text.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to move an amendment to clause 15—

Mr. Lewis: What is the number of the clause?

Mr. Marchand: The new clause 28, Mr. Speaker.

Now, I should like to move an amendment to clause 15(2) so as to empower the appeal board to allow a person under a deportation order to remain in Canada. If it is so decided, if the board feels a person can remain in Canada, it can also decide, under the same principle, that a person involved in that appeal may come to Canada, that is, not only will a person be allowed to remain in Canada, but, under the same principle, the person concerned by the ruling will be able to come to Canada from outside the country.

Mr. Speaker, I intend to move those three amendments when we shall study the bill clause by clause.

Many of the questions raised are more relevant to the white paper and to the general immigration policy that to the bill now before us. In due time, we shall have, no doubt, the opportunity to discuss this matter.

At any rate, I feel the bill ensures additional rights, provides guarantees and is worth a fair trial.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Batten in the chair.

Establishment of Immigration Appeal Board

The Chairman: Order. House in committee of the whole on Bill C-220, an act to make provision for appeals to an immigration appeal board in respect of certain matters relating to immigration.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I was prepared to go ahead but I understand that the Minister without Portfolio wishes to call it seven o'clock.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, I think it was the feeling of the house before the minister spoke that we might adjourn the committee, by leave, until eight o'clock.

The Chairman: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Pursuant to an order of the house passed yesterday, I do now leave the chair. The committee will resume at eight o'clock.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: When the committee rose at seven o'clock it was considering clause 2.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, seldom have I heard a more useful and pointed debate on second reading of a bill than that which occurred this afternoon. It was a debate which defined, I think, three basic areas of disagreement with respect to the principles of the bill. I venture to suggest that on clause 2 we should come to grips with these three basic principles.

On all sides of the house there is unanimity of opinion that a new Immigration Appeal Board should be established. There is undoubtedly a desire that that board should be genuinely effective, and that in the administration of immigration procedures and laws it act with that degree of human understanding and compassion which I think is essential.

Some of us on this side of the house feel that the bill, as drafted, is too rigid and too inflexible. It does not permit that degree of warm-hearted administration so necessary in immigration matters.

[Mr. Marchand.]

The first area where some of us disagree with the minister has to do with the powers of the Immigration Appeal Board, and what it may do on an appeal. On this side we feel that the powers of the board are much too restricted; that they are too legalistic; that here it is purely a matter of an appeal from the special inquiry officer, with the ordinary rules of appeal applying, and with little opportunity for the board to consider other factors not directly related to the legalistic approach. This is evident when we find that the board can only allow or dismiss the appeal. If it dismisses an appeal, deportation is ordered. When deportation is ordered a clause in the bill permits the order to be suspended or stayed. This is permitted in two circumstances—and here I refer to a person who is not a permanent resident. It is permitted where there are reasonable grounds for believing that if the order is carried out the person concerned will be punished for political activities in his country or will suffer unusual hardships. An example is deportation behind the iron curtain. That can be most difficult, particularly where a man has deserted from a ship.

The second situation is where exceptional circumstances exist. The use of the expression "exceptional circumstances" in that context, leads me to believe the the board would interpret those circumstances as ejusdem generis with the other circumstances involving activities of a political character, or where unusual hardships will arise. It will be the rarest type of case where there would be a stay of the deportation order.

Of course, once a stay is granted it might be extended and ultimately the board might make an order to admit the person as a landed immigrant. It would seem to be much preferable that this question should not be approached in such a negative way but that the board should be given authority to grant immediately the status of a landed immigrant to a man who appears before it as an appellant, if the circumstances are right. This is a positive approach. It would not simply be a case of staying the deportation order and subsequently, perhaps years later, admitting the man as a landed immigrant. By doing as I suggest we could remove all the suspense and anxiety felt while the fear of deportation was hanging over a man's head. This is the first area of disagreement. We on this side of the house would like to see the board given a positive right to make an order when a case is before them, granting landed immigrant status at that stage.

The second area of disagreement relates to appeal by sponsors. Many of us on this side have the feeling that what the minister is granting with one hand he is taking away with the other. He says there will be an appeal. But he limits the right of appeal to those classes of relatives which the governor in council may prescribe. He says that if this is not so restricted, the board will be swamped with appeals. I must say that if they are legitimate appeals and if their number is likely to swamp the board, the board should be expanded so that it is able to deal with all the appeals which will be forthcoming. I do not want to see this back-door method used to restrict the concessions which are made in the bill—the process of going behind the doors into the cabinet chamber and saying "Today we will cut out this class of relatives". I do not think this is good enough.

Right of appeal is confined to Canadian citizens, but in the present circumstances a landed immigrant has the right to sponsor a relative. However, he has no right to appeal under this clause. Mr. Chairman, as long as a landed immigrant has the right to sponsor I suggest he should have the full right of appeal, exactly as everybody else. When he is under the shelter of the laws of this country he should enjoy every right that they provide.

I hope the restrictions that the minister proposes to establish in relation to sponsorship, confining the privilege to Canadian citizens, will not be adopted finally, and I am concerned that this clause should confine itself entirely to Canadian citizens. I repeat my concern with regard to the power to confine appeals to certain classes of sponsors as a result of executive action which undoubtedly will be taken on the recommendation of the minister of manpower and immigration concerned.

As one looks at the procedures proposed in the event of appeal, it becomes apparent that in fact there will be no necessity for appeal in cases involving sponsored immigrants who meet the requirements of the Immigration Act and the regulations. I am satisfied that generally speaking the department administers the sponsorship procedures fairly and honestly. The department does not try on frivolous grounds to deprive people who are eligible for sponsorship of their rights. Therefore it is my view that unless some discretionary power is placed with the board the provisions of the bill for appeal in relation to sponsorship will be virtually meaningless.

The minister knows that the appeals which are made to him today on behalf of sponsors are for the exercise of discretion and judgment in relation to applicants who do not meet the requirements in full. Occasionally the minister may have to turn a blind eye when he is satisfied that a person who may not meet the full requirements of the regulations may yet become a good Canadian citizen. What I fear is that the appeal procedure will turn out to be of very little value.

The third principal area of disagreement which was defined during second reading this afternoon related to the handling of security cases and cases where there is a criminal intelligence report. This is perhaps the most difficult of all the areas. All of us can understand—and one who has been a minister himself can readily understand—the problems which are involved. But I have certainly never been satisfied with the provision in relation to security as far as the old Department of Citizenship and Immigration was concerned. I have said in this house before that had I remained in the department there would assuredly have been changes made in the procedures, especially the procedure relating to citizenship.

I believe that the procedure which the minister is now advocating—simply the presentation of a certificate signed by himself and by the Solicitor General—is just not good enough. I do not believe one can deal with people on that basis. The minister is opening up the procedure, but it still does not conform to what I believe to be natural justice. I know that the sources of security information cannot be disclosed to an appellant; to disclose those sources would in many cases make it impossible to secure information at all. But I say there must be an examination by an impartial tribunal. As I recollect it this is what was advocated by Mr. Joseph Sedgwick in his report. He considered this problem and this is what he had to say:

> In making their decision the board will have to be made aware of, and take into consideration, any adverse security report. For reasons already stated, it will not be possible for the board to disclose the report to the applicant. The result will be that in some cases where an appellant might otherwise have been successful he will fail without having had the opportunity to challenge the grounds upon which the adverse decision is based. As a matter of general principle this is not a desirable course of action, but in the context of national security I am convinced of its necessity and justification.

Mr. Sedgwick was suggesting that this information should be available to an independent and impartial tribunal—the board itself. I think that if we were to follow the channel which Mr. Sedgwick indicates we would at least reach an interim solution until such time as the royal commission on security under the chairmanship of Mr. Max W. Mackenzie presents its report to parliament. I trust that this field of security information in relation to immigration and to citizenship is one in which this royal commission will dig and delve very deeply indeed.

These are the three basic areas in which differences of opinion have developed during the debate this afternoon. I propose, as we come to the appropriate clause, to move certain amendments. I had hoped to give notice of them before the dinner hour so as to give the minister an opportunity to consult with his officials, but perhaps he will permit me to give such notice now. This will give the minister an opportunity to consider them at the appropriate time.

In dealing with what I call the first basic area of disagreement I propose to move an amendment to clause 14, a copy of which I will send to the minister, to the hon. member for York South and to others who are interested. The amendment reads as follows:

That clause 14 be amended by numbering the present clause as subclause (1); by striking out the word "or" in subclause (b) in line 4; by substituting a semicolon for the period in line 7 of subclause (c) and adding thereafter the word "or"; by adding subclause (1) (d) as follows:

"(d) making an order pursuant to subsection (2) hereof."

and by adding subclause (2) as follows:

"(2) In disposing of any such appeal, the board shall have authority, in its absolute discretion,

(a) to make an order authorizing the landing as an immigrant of the appellant, notwithstanding anything in the Immigration Act, if the board is of the opinion that it might be anticipated reasonably that such person would become a satisfactory Canadian citizen;

(b) to make an order granting the appellant the right to enter Canada or, being in Canada, to remain therein for such probationary period as the board may determine and to renew any such order from time to time or to cancel, rescind or amend it, or at any time when such person is on probation, to make an order pursuant to subsection (a) hereof;

(c) to make an order permitting the appellant to remain in Canada for such length of time as the board may determine, if the board is satisfied that the deportation of the appellant might endanger his personal safety or security and to renew any such order from time to time or to cancel, rescind or amend it, or at any time while such an order is in effect, to make an order pursuant to subsection (a) hereof."

[Mr. Bell (Carleton).]

I recognize that the adoption of that amendment would probably require some consequential amendments to clause 15, although I do not think that they would need to be very substantial in nature. What I suggest is a direct and positive approach. I believe that the minister's approach, which is not only negative but very fainthearted, will not meet the situation and will not give the board the discretionary power which is so necessary.

In relation to what I defined as the second basic area of disagreement I wish to give notice to the minister of the following amendment:

That clause 17 be amended by substituting a period for the comma after the word "approved" in line 21 and by striking out all the words thereafter in lines 21 to 24 inclusive; by renumbering the remainder of clause 17 as subclause (1) and adding as subclause (2) the following:

"(2) In disposing of any such appeal, the board shall have authority, in its absolute discretion and notwithstanding anything in the Immigration Act or the regulations, to make an order authorizing the landing as an immigrant of the person sponsored if the board is of the opinion that it might be anticipated reasonably that such person would become a satisfactory Canadian citizen."

The effect of this amendment would be to eliminate the power of the governor in council to make regulations which would confine the class of relatives which have the right to appeal, and as well, it the would enable the board to take a positive and discretionary approach to the situation.

I confess that I have been working on a proposed amendment, which is not yet ready, to the clause dealing with the security or criminal intelligence reports. I claim no particular excellence in the amendments, except that they represent a point of view which I suggest to the minister we should attempt to meet. Let him draft them in any way he will—I have no pride of draftsmanship whatsover—but I suggest that since he himself said this afternoon that he would be submitting amendments, he demonstrate flexibility by incorporating these principles into this legislation. If he does that, then I believe we will have made a great step forward in making this legislation work to the advantage of immigrants and of all the people of Canada. If it stays in its present rigid and inflexible position, then I am afraid the future immigration administration may well prove to be much worse than it has been in the past.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to repeat what I said before the dinner recess in this general discussion, but I do want to make a few remarks, partly in comment on the minister's reply on second reading and partly and more specifically with regard to some of the clauses.

If I remember correctly, the minister said—and I agree with him—that this is a bill dealing with a narrow matter, namely the establishment of an appeal tribunal, and that all the other matters with respect to immigration in general have to wait for a report from the special committee studying the white paper, and legislation that may follow it. He said also that whatever discretionary power the minister may have under the Immigration Act he will continue to have. As I remember, he did qualify that by saying "subject to this bill", but the point that concerns some of us is that once this bill becomes law, the department will naturally and properly refer to the appeal board any matter in which there is a right of appeal under this bill, namely a deportation order or the sponsorship of immigrants in certain classes.

Any request that the minister consider the matter and apply the discretion which he may still have under some sections of the Immigration Act would, I imagine, be answered by the suggestion that instead of bothering him to use his discretion the person concerned take the road of appeal which is now provided under this bill. What concerns us is that under this bill the role of ministerial discretion is closed in practice if not in law. I find it very difficult to imagine that the deputy minister or any official in the minister's department will consider a case which can properly be placed before the appeal tribunal. It seems to me that they could very well say: This is a matter for the appeal tribunal, you had better go there for your remedy.

With regard to clause 17, the minister said that the reason for the limitation of the class of relatives in respect of which a sponsor may appeal to the board under that clause is that certain classes will be established, and he indicated what they would be. He said that if that works happily—I think he used the French word for "happy"—then we will expand the area.

As I listened to the minister I asked myself for whom it was to work happily. What are the criteria by which one decides whether the appeal board works happily? It works happily only if it functions in accordance with the rules laid down by this bill, and if it gives the parties concerned what lawyers and courts call natural justice. I do not see why the minister needs to arrogate to himself the decision—because it will be he who will make it—as to whether in fact the appeal board works happily. How will he determine whether to expand the list of classes of relatives in respect of whom an appeal may be made, or to reduce it. It seems to me that if sponsors are to have the right of appeal, all of them should have that right and I am afraid I was simply not impressed by the argument of the minister on this point.

Although they are not in typed form, because I scribbled them between six and seven o'clock while sitting at this desk, I too have amendments to clause 17 which I will either propose or put to the minister in the form of a suggestion. One of these is that the landed immigrant, as well as other Canadian citizens should have the right to appeal. I see no reason at all for having this distinction, as the hon. member for Carleton has properly said. If my memory serves me correctly—and I hope the minister will correct me if I am wrong—the white paper proposes that only persons who have been citizens for a certain period have the right to sponsor immigrants. It may be that this was the reason for the limitation in clause 17. Personally I object to that limitation, if I am correct in understanding that it is in the white paper, and I object to the limitation here.

I know for a fact—I am not dealing with theory—that in my constituency and in other constituencies in metropolitan Toronto—and I am sure members from any metropolitan area in Ontario or other parts of the country know likewise—that there are landed immigrants who have made an excellent contribution as workers in this country, many of whom have developed a business, and who for one reason or another have been here for eight or 10 years without becoming citizens or without seeking citizenship. I have spoken to many of these people. I have argued with them that they ought to seek to become citizens. More and more of them will be persuaded to do so.

Some time last year I spoke in this house on a resolution which appeared on the order paper in my name urging the government to change some of the requirements in an application for citizenship, because I am convinced that in many cases with which I have been acquainted the landed immigrant does not seek to become a citizen because the requirements in respect of language, the fact that he has to take time off work to go to a certain place, and the fact that there are no citizenship courts, frighten him. Now, however, they have the right to sponsor the kind of relatives which fall into the classifications for which the regulations permit sponsorship. Why should they not have the right to appeal? The minister may say that if they do not have the right to appeal under this bill, they still have the right to go to him and plead for his consideration. If I understand it correctly, I believe that is the case. I think that whatever is excluded from this bill will remain for the minister to deal with at his discretion.

If there is any validity, and there is, and if there is any logic, and there is, in having an independent appeal tribunal to deal with these matters, instead of having the minister loaded with discretionary obligations—and two ex ministers have said that this is too heavy a load for the minister to carry, and I did not hear the present minister deny this—then surely there is logic in having for a sponsor one who is a landed immigrant, who is not a citizen, and who has the right under the regulations to sponsor relatives coming to Canada. I do not understand this. I do understand the reasons for some cases. I hope the minister will be able to explain the reason that the right to appeal is limited to the Canadian citizen under clause 17.

I had intended to suggest an amendment. Whether or not I will do it now in view of the amendment of the hon. member for Carleton remains to be seen. I was going to suggest an amendment that clause 17 provide no more than that a sponsor has the right to appeal a refusal of an application for admission; put a period there, and then go on to say that the board in disposing of such an appeal may either allow it, dismiss it, or render such decision or make such order as in the circumstances of the case the board deems just. This would leave the discretion with the board to deal with a particular case on the merits and on the particular circumstances and facts which are presented to it. Only then will you have a genuine appeal on the merits where the human considerations which everyone has stressed will properly be taken into account.

Mr. Chairman, the minister in his speech in reply on second reading gave notice of something which he intends to propose in respect of clause 10 dealing with the point provided for in that clause, namely that a single member may be able to do the work which the board itself is empowered to do. If I remember correctly—and again I hope the minister will correct me if I am wrong—the amendment he intended to move was that the board as a whole, rather than the chairman, would designate the member who can do that work.

I should like to say to the minister, so that he may think about it—if he considers it worth thinking about—that I have very grave doubts in my mind about whether one member of the board should be given the authority to determine an appeal. I have no objection to the other part of the clause, namely that instead of the board as a whole or even a panel of the board having to make all the inquiries and hear all the evidence, the work could be expedited if one member of the board does that job for the board as a whole. In other words, he may make the inquiry, hear the evidence and make a report to the board. I have grave doubts however as to the desirability of not only having the one member hold the hearing but also determine the case on behalf of the board. He may at his discretion refer the matter at any stage to the board; but he is the one who decides this, if I remember the particulars correctly.

I asked the minister to consider whether it is wise to have one member of the board, not necessarily even the chairman or vice chairman, not only hear the evidence but also determine the matter in final form. According to this bill which is before us, the decision if final.

I have another matter which, I am sure the minister has guessed, worries me about clause 10. This provides that the member or members shall make the preliminary inquiry or report to the board as a whole, and the board may make a decision on the report or it may hear further evidence if it so wishes. Nowhere in this clause is there any provision which states that the appellant is to receive a copy of that report. I think this is another detail which is of the utmost importance. If evidence is taken by one or more members of the board and the board is given the authority to make its decision on the report alone—it does not have to ask for any further evidence—then I submit that this clause ought to provide that the appellant must have available to him a copy of the report on which the tribunal will rest its decision. Otherwise you do not have the kind of justice which we proudly boast about in our country, and which I am sure the minister and his officials are as anxious to have as are those of us on this side of the house.

Finally, I should like to say a further word on the security matter. I have not been a member of parliament for long, and before I came here I heard—and I hope you will forgive me for putting it in this way—the same excuse for refusing people who are charged for security reasons, with no meaningful opportunity to have their say in respect of such charge. Again, if I am correct, the minister said that everyone must understand that the sources of information are widespread, and that if any of the evidence which the department has becomes public, those sources of information will dry up immediately and the situation becomes impossible.

This is the kind of story one has heard time after time after time. I do not think there is any validity to it. I did not suggest, nor have I heard anyone else suggest, that the minister should be required to provide the person concerned with the sources of the information, the details of the evidence or the precise allegations made. What I suggested, and surely what is possible without hurting the process of security in the slightest, was that the person concerned be given in general terms the particulars of the grounds on which the action against him had been taken. Second, I suggested that he have an opportunity to meet those particulars.

Clause 20 of the bill provides that the hearings of the appeal board may, on the request of the appellant, be in camera. I for one would have no objection at all if the minister amended clause 20 to give the board the authority to hold hearings in camera in security cases. I am not interested in giving publicity to these matters. I agree with the minister that if we started dictating to the board how the evidence was to be taken, we might make a farce of the hearing. But I see no reason in the world why it should not be possible to give the person concerned an idea, in general terms, of the grounds on which the action was taken. I see no reason why it should not be possible for the appeal board to hear the appeal in camera, if it so decided, and the board ought to be given the authority to hold it in camera and conduct the hearing in any way that it found adequate and reasonable in the circumstances. Otherwise, I repeat what I said earlier today, that clause 21 is a delusion; it has no place here.

If the decision is to be made by the two ministers, let them make it. I will object to it as a bad principle, but at least let them make it. Then we will have—and this is the point—the situation wherein if the decision is made by the minister and the Solicitor General, they become responsible for it, and those of us who are concerned with these matters can go to the minister and make an appeal that he use his discretion, in the way that such appeals have been made in the past. But if the matter comes before the appeal tribunal and it is seized with it, and the minister and the Solicitor General plunk a certificate on the desk of the board, that ends the matter; there is no further appeal. I am certain the minister will tell me to go jump if, when that has been done, I come to him and ask him to reconsider the matter. The door is closed at that point.

Therefore it would have been much better, if this is what the minister intended to do, to take this provision out of the bill altogether and let the matter be dealt with by ministerial discretion, as before, so we would know who is responsible and could go to the minister and ask him to consider the case of any person who felt he had been aggrieved. But I want to make clear that I do not recommend that course. I think there is a place for an appeal in security matters, in this case as in connection with the Public Service Employees Act with which we dealt the other day, and as in other cases. I think this excuse about the drying up of the sources of information is not valid; it simply does not impress me.

Perhaps the reason it does not impress me is that I have not had to administer these matters, and there are matters that the minister and those around him know about that are not known to me. But I have exercised whatever mind and imagination I have, and I cannot for the life of me see why it is not possible to devise a simple procedure for giving the man charged an opportunity to be heard before an independent tribunal in camera, in secret—I have no desire for it to be made public—and without disclosing the sources of information but placing him on notice, more or less, as to the precise grounds on which the action was taken. We would thereby be giving him an opportunity to make his answer to those grounds, and counter them with facts regarding his behaviour and life. He has this right.

I think we also need amendments to this bill. I was going to move an amendment as a subclause to clause 19. We need an amendment that will provide that every appellant under the relevant clauses of the bill shall be provided by the minister with particulars of the grounds upon which the deportation order or refusal to approve an application for admission was based, in such manner as prescribed by the rules of the board. It is simply nonsense to tell me that I can appeal to the appeal tribunal, if I do not know ahead of time what I am appealing against. I should not have to guess it. I should not have to rely on a letter from somebody somewhere, which may be complete or may not be complete. I see no reason why as part of the rights of the appellant—the appellant has to give notice under clause 19—in return the minister should not be required by the law to provide him with particulars of the grounds for the action against which he is appealing.

I will be prepared to suggest that perhaps such grounds should be given in such manner and in such form as is prescribed by the rules of the board, so that the board will have such rules and everybody will know precisely how to proceed. I shall repeat what has already been said, and then resume my seat. I think, as I said earlier, that the idea of the independent appeal tribunal is an extremely excellent one, but it will not be a good one in practice if we do not take some steps in committee of the whole to bring the procedures a little more in consonance with the demands of proper hearing and natural justice.

Mr. Roxburgh: Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time to say just a few words. I shall certainly not take up much of the time of the committee. However, having been a member of the immigration committee ever since I have been in the House of Commons, and as one interested in these matters, I should like to make my stand clear on immigration and the bill that is before us. Before doing that I wish sincerely to congratulate the minister, our fourth successive minister of immigration in as many years, for bringing forward at such an early date after becoming minister the white paper on immigration and Bill C-220.

Speaking about Bill C-220, I should like to enter a protest at this time that a bill as important as this one dealing with immigration, and the first time anything like this has been done for years, is not available to all hon. members because there are not sufficient copies to go around. I think this is uncalled for and I should like to enter my protest in this regard.

I have no intention, as I stated when beginning these remarks, of taking up the time of the committee, but I should like to lend my support to the over-all principle of the bill. I do not agree in detail with the hon. member for York South and the hon. member for Carleton, but they have made some good suggestions, as did the hon. member for Parkdale and the hon. member for Hamilton West. I just want to let it be known that I feel some changes should be made in the bill. I can say that during the time I have been in the house and have dealt with men in the immigration department, I have found them to be very fair. However, I have never in my life seen one civil servant make a decision against the government. They just cannot do it.

I want to congratulate the minister upon making it possible to bring about this neutral appeal board. However, I am worried about the fact that the appeal can be taken on the law alone. I am sure that during the short time the minister has occupied this portfolio he has attended a number of meetings and has become aware of feelings such as those expressed on both sides of the house this afternoon. Surely therefore he will take a broader view of this matter and take some advice from members as well as from his department. These members represent different constituencies across Canada, some of which contain as many as 50 per cent of people of European origin who, in many cases, make the finest citizens. I know there is no one here who does not admire the minister, so perhaps he will take a little advice from some of us, as well as from the members of his department.

Mr. More: Mr. Chairman, many of the things about which I spoke in a general way before the dinner recess have been mentioned by the hon. member for Carleton and the hon. member for York South. However, I am still concerned about clause 17, in spite of the minister's reply. In my opinion, this provision is restrictive. When I look at it I think of the cases with which I have had to deal since I became a member. I think of the times I have communicated with officials of the department to ascertain whether or not the facts given to me were correct and the basis upon which the denial had been made. Then, I have had to make a decision as to whether or not there was a legitimate reason for going to the minister, knowing that the officials had gone as far as they could go.

I do not suggest for a minute that every case referred to the minister's office results in the decision being reversed. This would be beyond expectation, and there is no basis for it. I have found from my experience with various ministers that the case does get a consideration beyond that which can be given by departmental officials. I do not mean that these cases have been outside the regulations under which an official could act, but the minister's position enables him to make a favourable decision.

In looking at this clause I notice there is a reference to an application for admission into Canada of a relative, pursuant to regulations made under the Immigration Act. If there is a refusal, a person may appeal. If the board decides that person comes within the regulations made, the application shall be approved. The officials look at the matter in the same light, and they sometimes approve and sometimes deny an application. If you go to the minister you get some approvals and some rejections. I am disturbed by the limitations in the act. If we look at the statement the parliamentary secretary made we find he said that we should treat people with equality and consistently; that no law can be fair unless it provides a considerable area of discretion because sometimes there will be humanitarian or compassionate reasons for admitting people who, under the general rules, would be inadmissible. These are the things about which I am concerned.

In reply to my submissions on clause 17, the minister said it was an experiment in recognizing legal sponsorship. He said we were the only country in the world that gave this right. We set up a board that is independent and which cannot be overruled. These things are fine. However, if I knew of a case in which I thought there was some validity for an appeal, I would hesitate to say to those people, "We have a board and you should present your case to this board. The decision of the board is final."

Clause 26 reads in part:

> The minister may issue a written permit authorizing any person to enter Canada or, being in Canada, to remain therein, other than
> (b) a person in respect of whom an appeal under section 17 of the Immigration Appeal Board Act has been taken that has not been successful.

This is the particular clause of the bill that concerns me. I have not been involved in security cases, but I have been involved in cases of sponsorship. I can think of many cases which do not fall directly within the regulations. but the use of ministerial discretion has allowed the application.

I suggest that the amendments, of which the hon. member for Carleton has given notice, do enlarge the clause and permit a discretion. It is easy to say the board will give humanitarian and compassionate consideration to these things, and that they will do so with equality and consistently. I can think of another board, The Pension Commission with which we have to deal. Time and time again the position of the house with regard to it has been stated by members on both sides. It takes refuge in its interpretation of the regulations and the law.

It is for this reason I say to the minister and to his parliamentary secretary that I feel what we are trying to do is to be more flexible and provide these things; but I am afraid of clause 17. Although it appears to give some of these things, I am afraid it might not do so.

Mr. Marchand: May I say to the hon. gentleman that, as I see it, all the rights and privileges that exist under the present law are being retained. This means going to the department to appeal to the minister. Nothing is removed. However, if you come to me and I say "No, this person is not going to be accepted," you can still appeal to that board. This is an added right. We are not suppressing anyone.

Mr. More: I thank the minister for his explanation. Perhaps I have used too many words in an effort to make clear my concern. I was going to ask the minister directly if he would tell the house whether this clause removed the right to ask him to intervene in a case before it went to appeal. If it does not, then I do not have the concern I was expressing.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, I think the Minister of Manpower and Immigration should be commended by the members of this committee for the aims he is obviously seeking in his attempt to bring a greater degree of humanity and fairness into various aspects of the operations of his department. However, I think it is the duty of the members of this house to try and make sure—and in so making sure to assist the minister—that these aims are in fact carried out by this and other legislation presented by the minister regarding his departmental responsibilities.

For example, if we look at the wording of clause 17 it appears to widen the rights of sponsors by providing for further consideration of applications that are turned down. I should like to suggest to the committee what has also been suggested by other members, namely that under certain circumstances this clause as it is presently worded may in fact narrow these rights.

There is nothing in this bill that defines what is a refusal, or who should determine at what stage a refusal occurs. I think it is important to note that the minister has just told one hon. member that as far as he is concerned there is nothing in the clause that narrows any existing rights, that takes away existing rights; that the section is designed to provide an additional right.

But, Mr. Chairman, not only is it important that the minister should make this statement in the committee at this time; he should also make sure that this is a matter of departmental policy and is an attitude which will be adopted by his officials. Because if the officials were to say to an applicant who wished to sponsor a relative, immediately after the initial letter refusing his application was sent out "That is the end of the matter; you must now go to the board", then in effect this clause does narrow or take away existing rights.

The concern of some in this regard has been allayed, at least to some extent, by what the minister has said; but before this debate is over I hope the minister will go on to assure us that in fact this will not be the approach of his department under any circumstances. I hope the minister will again assure us that there will continue to be the possibility of an administrative review of initial refusals of sponsorship applications, including a personal consideration of the matter by the minister himself.

If this is not to be the case, Mr. Chairman, and a person has recourse only to the appeal board, then as soon as the initial letter of refusal is sent out the obvious problem arises for the sponsor of having to come to Ottawa, to hire counsel to speak for him, with all the expense that this involves.

I would point out, Mr. Chairman, that the bill does not make clear—though this seems to be hinted at in some of the clauses—that the board can and may hold sittings outside of Ottawa. This is one aspect about which the minister should give the committee some assurance. It seems to me it would be unduly expensive, indeed difficult, for a person in Vancouver or in Windsor or in Halifax to have to travel to Ottawa to have his appeal dealt with. Particularly in the case of appeals by persons of foreign extraction who have not been in this country very long—even though they may be citizens—people might be somewhat fearful and concerned about having to appear before this court. If an administrative review were not available, then in the case of people who might be fearful about coming to Ottawa to face this new type of court, appeals that might otherwise have been made under some administrative procedure may not be taken, and to this extent existing rights may be narrowed.

There is another point that I should like to make at this time, Mr. Chairman. At present when somebody applies to bring in a relative from Europe for example and the department refuses the application, no reasons are given for the refusal. All the applicant receives is the bald statement in a letter that the requirements of the act have not been met. Specifically in the case of sponsors I should like the minister to explain how a person can decide whether or not he would want to appeal a case without his having some clear initial statement of the reasons the application for sponsorship has not been accepted.

Certainly this bill should make very clear, or we should be assured that the regulations will make clear, that if a sponsor does decide to launch a formal appeal he should have at the initial stage the necessary information on which to ground his appeal. There would indeed be a narrowing of rights and a deprivation of justice if an applicant were to file a formal appeal and then have his appeal turned down on the basis of insufficient grounds or facts on which to base it—grounds and facts which would not be within the knowledge of the sponsor who is appealing because the information was not made available to him at the outset.

If this clause 17 is to remain in the bill there must be at the very moment the law comes into effect a change made in the administrative procedures of the department so that the reasons for turning down an application for sponsored immigration are contained in the initial letter of refusal. Of course, I recognize there is an area of difficulty where a refusal is based on security grounds, and this may be an exception to the rule. But where reasons for refusal are based on, for example, lack of training or skill—which may be the case if proposals contained in the white paper become law—or on a lack of funds, a lack of economic strength on the part of the sponsor—or even on reasons of health of the immigrant, then these reasons must be clearly set out in the initial letter of refusal written by the department. Otherwise, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that clause 17 will have little meaning.

At the same time, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that except in the case of security matters the basic criteria on which decisions are made—I do not refer to the broad statements in the present law itself or its regulations, but to the basic and detailed criteria—should be made available through the Queen's Printer to members of the public who wish to buy them in the same way that the equally detailed customs tariff is made available to the people of Canada who wish to purchase a copy from the Queen's Printer, or who wish to consult it in a public library. Again, Mr. Chairman, if this step is not taken then the right of appeal will not have the meaning that I think the minister wishes to place upon it.

I would point out, Mr. Chairman, that something else could possibly happen if the change I have suggested in connection with stating the reasons for refusal is not implemented at the time the bill becomes law. Some people, rather than file an appeal, may merely file a formal notice of appeal, and the board would also find itself swamped with numbers of appeals which would not be brought before it if the criteria which are generally applied by the department, and its reasons for refusal of an application, were clearly stated and made available to the applicants at the outset.

Clause 17 does not make clear that an appeal taken under it can be decided on the basis of law or fact or mixed law and fact, in the same way that appeals with respect to deportation can be decided in other parts of this legislation. It could be argued that questions of fact would have to be taken into account under the wording of clause 17, but this is not clear. Therefore one area in which an amendment to clause 17 might be made is in making clear that appeals under that clause could be heard on the basis of law or fact, or mixed law and fact.

I think there is much merit in making the provision that decisions of the board under clause 17 should take into account compassionate or humanitarian considerations, something which is not possible under the existing wording of clause 17, the board being restricted to a consideration of whether or not the requirements of the Immigration Act and the regulations made thereunder have been met. These requirements and regulations, it seems to me, do not leave much area for consideration on humanitarian and compassionate grounds, especially if the right under the present law for the minister to grant permits is eliminated if an appeal is heard by the board. This has been mentioned by another member.

I ask the minister why an appeal on questions of law with respect to decisions under clause 17 should be only to the Supreme Court of Canada. The board itself can hear questions of law and fact. Perhaps I should backtrack for a moment and say that I should not be applying my remarks at this stage only to clause 17, as it is not yet clear whether appeals under that clause to the new board can be on questions of law and fact. My remarks here should be related to the act as a whole, and include questions of deportation.

As I was saying, under clause 23 there is a right of appeal from a decision of the board to the Supreme Court of Canada, on a question of law. But the board itself has jurisdiction to hear questions of law and fact. It seems to me that if the board can make an error on a question of law, it can make one on a question of fact. This seems to be a useful area for amendments—to widen the right of appeal to the Supreme Court to take in questions of fact as well as law.

While I do not claim to have at my fingertips the rules of the Supreme Court it seems to me, if my memory is correct, that appeals to the Supreme Court involving property rights can be made on questions of law and fact. If appeals on questions of fact and law can be taken with respect to matters of property, those rights should be equally available when dealing with the rights of human beings.

It has already been noted that clause 17, as worded, limits the right of appeal to citizens. There is much to be said for extending the right of appeal to landed immigrants. I do not think it would be fair or equitable to limit the right of appeal to citizens unless and until changes have been made in our existing citizenship laws, to make sure that procedures which are uniformly fair are available in every citizenship court across Canada, and give people rights of appeal from decisions of citizenship court judges, rights which do not exist at the present time.

I can understand how the present minister and his predecessors have been concerned about the burden placed upon them by the existing powers under the Immigration Act, which give them opportunity to use discretion. As has been said by other members of the house, much can be said for a power of discretion vested in the minister, especially when it comes to considering matters of humanitarian concern and compassion. It seems to me that the burdens presently placed on the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, because of the opportunity and ability to use discretion, would be lessened to a great degree if there were sufficient highly trained and well paid staff in the field to administer a set of fair and reasonable rules. If there were those rules and officials in the field in Canada and around the world the numbers of cases coming to the minister for the exercise of discretionary powers would decline and be limited to a relatively small number.

There have been suggestions that we move amendments to widen the proposed power of this board to deal with cases having to do with refusals to sponsor immigrants. We should be very cautious about moving any such amendments until we have answers to the questions asked by myself and other hon. members and the views of the minister as to whether the amendments that I have suggested would be useful.

I ask the minister to consider either not having this clause in the act at all, or to add a provision that it be not proclaimed until a proper order in council is passed, in order to make sure that the special joint committee of the house and Senate on immigration, which has been taking a special interest in matters of sponsored immigration, has a chance to study the implications of clause 17. That committee should first have the opportunity to study the clause and to make its report.

Some hon. members have expressed concern about clause 17 being applicable only to such classes of relatives as are referred to in regulations, made by the governor in council. It would be useful therefore if we could receive the assurance that this clause is not made available to the department, the minister, and the new board until the special joint committee presently sitting has had a chance to recommend to this house and to the other place what should be done with respect to sponsored immigration. I am sure that we would want that committee to have the opportunity to say something about this power of appeal in general.

I wish to repeat, Mr. Chairman, that I, and I think all members of the house, commend the minister upon his aims of seeking a greater degree of humanity, fairness and justice in all aspects of the administration of his department. But I think we should look very carefully at this clause, and the other clauses I have referred to that are linked to it. We want to end with something which will be helpful, instead of something that will have the reverse effect. I and other members of the house will await with interest the answers to the questions we have asked about this clause.

[Mr. Gray.]

Mr. Fairweather: I will not take many minutes to say that generally I support what has been said about clauses 10, 17 and 21. It seems to me that we should hear more from the minister about the reason for one member of the board hearing an appeal, and one member of the board designating, then, that the entire board hear the appeal. Were this to happen midway through a hearing, the full board would not have the important advantages of having seen and heard some witnesses.

I commend the hon. member for Essex West for suggesting that the appeal board be peripatetic. Such a thing has worked well with appeals under the Income Tax Act. There is no reason why this board should sit in Ottawa. Many appellants find it easier to appeal in their home milieu. Could the minister answer this question? Will the board be restricted to this city with its appeals?

Mr. Marchand: No; the board can travel. It can go anywhere in Canada.

Mr. Fairweather: That answers that. I hope the board travels. As to clause 17, I protest that only citizens have rights under this clause. From what I read, it seems doubtful that the immigration committee of the Senate and House of Commons will support that section of the white paper restricting to Canadian citizens the sponsorship of immigrants. I believe only what I read in the papers, about this. As other members have said, this situation must be cleared up by the committee, or it should be cleared up before this clause becomes the law of the land.

Referring to the matter of security, I abhor this business of ministerial certificates preventing people knowing what they are accused of. I hope that the hon. member for Carleton or other members will move an amendment—the minister might move it—that if a person is refused on the basis of a security problem, that fact will be communicated to him. I do not say that there must be full disclosure of all reasons.

I commend the minister as others have done on this reform in the law and I hope the illiberal provision now in the act, the security aspect of section 21—and it is an illiberal section—will not be continued.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Before the minister replies perhaps it would be convenient if I were to indicate the amendments I propose to move dealing with security. When I spoke earlier in the evening I said I was in process of drafting such an amendment. Now I have completed it and perhaps I may read it. I intend to move:

That clause 21 (1) be amended by striking out all the words in lines 5 to 10 inclusive and substituting therefor the following:

"if the board finds, on the basis of security or criminal intelligence reports filed with them, which reports the board shall keep secret but the existence of which it shall disclose to the appellant, it would be contrary to the national interest to stay the execution of the order, continue or renew the stay or render the decision, as the case may be."

And that clause 21 (2) be struck out.

I would then propose a consequential amendment to clause 20 as follows:

That clause 20 be amended by inserting the following words after the word "discretion" in line 38, namely: "or if reports have been filed pursuant to section 21 shall"

I am not proposing to argue this at the present time. I am only putting the amendments on record so as to facilitate the minister's consideration of the matter.

Mr. Wahn: Like other members I am concerned about clause 21 and hope that an amendment can be introduced by the minister which will avoid any possibility of arbitrary action under that clause.

I welcome the intention to provide an appeal procedure for Canadian citizens who are sponsoring relatives. In general I believe the departmental officials have been fair and reasonable in such cases. Nevertheless it is in accordance with sound principle that there should be provision for appeal from the exercise of this type of discretion, and I am delighted to know that this bill when it becomes law will provide for such appeals in the case of sponsored immigrants.

It is because I welcome this provision for appeal by Canadian citizens that I urge the minister to extend this right to all residents of Canada. It is possible that for some time the immigration regulations may permit persons who are not Canadian citizens to sponsor the entry of relatives, and in such cases there is no reason at all why residents of Canada who sponsor the entry of relatives should not be placed in exactly the same position in this regard as are Canadian citizens. Indeed it would be unjust to give Canadian citizens who are sponsoring relatives the right of appeal while denying Canadian residents who are not Canadian citizens the same rights. So I strongly urge the minister to extend clause 17 to include all persons who under the regulations are permitted to sponsor relatives.

Moreover I would hope that when the regulations are laid down they will permit applications to be filed in Canada on the part of persons who may be here legally, but on a temporary basis, for example as students or visitors, and who wish to become permanent landed immigrants. Presumably such persons would be entitled to obtain permanent landing privileges, provided they have the skills or the other training which will enable them to become good Canadian citizens.

If, by any chance, an application by such a person should be refused by the officials, I would suggest to the minister that the applicant be given the right to appeal to the Immigration Appeal Board. In other words, I am asking that the right of appeal under clause 17 should be extended to all Canadian residents who sponsor relatives, and further that it should be extended to all persons who are here legally on a temporary basis and who have filed an application for permanent landing. I do not think the extension of the appeal facilities in this way would overburden the appeal board. Moreover such an extension would be in accordance with sound principle, and I urge the minister to agree to it.

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Chairman, just a few short remarks on clause 21, concerning security cases.

The minister mentioned a few minutes ago that the government was carrying out an inquiry on security in Canada and that he considered it slightly repulsive to observe that someone who constituted a security case could not in any way present a defence. On this, it might be appropriate, under clause 21, if the ministers required to sign such certificate were to give a general reason for their refusal in the security case involved. It could be done in a general way, without having to supply evidence to the board, and by filing the certificate in camera, simply to enable the appellant to present a detailed defence, which would be submitted to the ministers concerned who, in turn, could re-examine the record in the light of this defence and then issue either a negative certificate, one that would cancel the first one.

In fact, there is no doubt that in cases of security, it is difficult to introduce detailed evidence to give the opportunity for a defence. But if, at least, the appellant were to get an indication of the general reason why the minister rejects the appeal, the appellant would have the possibility of presenting a defence which might help to make a better balanced and a better informed decision.

In fact, if clause 21 is maintained as it is, once again, the basic right of any citizen to justify himself on a charge laid against him is being denied. All that is involved, then, is giving the appellant an opportunity to present a detailed defence to inform the minister and to prevent misuse of authority.

Mr. Marchand: Many suggestions have been made which could probably be accepted. I think that the first amendment suggested by the hon. member for Carleton, concerning the board of appeal, is already contained in the law. His wording is different and I have no objection to considering some drafting which will suit us both and will suit the house. I do not quarrel with his intention; this is what we are trying to achieve.

So far as his second amendment is concerned, this is something quite different.

Mr. Lewis: Could the minister indicate which was the first and which was the second amendment? I do not remember the order.

Mr. Marchand: The first amendment is to clause 14 and it concerns the jurisdiction of the board of appeal.

The second amendment is much more serious. I do not think it would be wise for this house to outline a new immigration policy in this bill, and this is what the hon. member's amendment is suggesting. This is the amendment to clause 17 concerning sponsorship. From the very moment that this board is given the right to accept anybody, notwithstanding the law, it will have more power than the department or parliament. I think that if the only criteria according to which a new immigrant is accepted is that he should become a good Canadian citizen, then the basic law will have to be amended so that the department will know what criteria it has to follow. Otherwise it will be operating under a restricting law, because the board of appeal will have overriding powers. In such a case it will cease to be an appeal. Clause 8 provides that a person can be admitted on humanitarian grounds. This is a very exceptional case. Apart from that case the law must be followed, and it is the law of the land. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Carleton will give to this board more power than is given under the Immigration Act. If the house wishes that, it will have to achieve this purpose through an amendment to the act and not through this bill.

Perhaps there is good reason for extending this right of appeal, but I do not see how the law can be changed through an amendment to this bill. My first reaction to the amendment is that it would amend the policy and I do not see how this can be done through such an amendment to this bill.

Concerning clause 21 which refers to security—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Before the minister deals with another matter could he indicate his view on whether this clause should be expanded to include the right of appeal for landed immigrants?

Mr. Marchand: I am ready to consider that, but we must be clear on this. The landed immigrants continue to have the right to sponsor relatives. We do not take away this right from them. This bill gives them the right of appeal, as well as the right to sponsor.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): We understand that.

Mr. Marchand: I think it was the hon. member for Royal who said that landed immigrants will no longer have the right to sponsor. That is not so; they continue to have that right. Perhaps I did not understand him well but I will be able to check it in Hansard.

Mr. Fairweather: What I meant was that there was some reference to it in the white paper.

Mr. Marchand: I think it would be wise, before modifying the policy, to wait for the white paper, at which time we can incorporate such amendments. I do not think such amendments can be made to this bill.

With regard to the matter of security under clause 21, the hon. member for York South used the phrase: "We want particulars in general terms". I wrote this phrase down because I wanted to be sure that I understood him. I do not know what he meant, but I am sure he said it. Perhaps his thinking was so fluid that this was the only way in which he could express it.

Mr. Lewis: I do not withdraw those words, because I think they make sense. One can give particulars in general terms, despite the minister's surprise. As a matter of fact I think it was the hon. member for Dollard who made the same suggestion, even though he did not use those precise words.

Mr. Marchand: I think this phrase expressed very well the state of mind of the hon. member for York South. However I know that lawyers in this house will agree with me that one cannot give access to part of the evidence, because the argument will be advanced that the appellant was only able to see part of the file and this would give rise to frustration and to a feeling that in fact he had nothing at all on which to base his appeal. If this house is to make a decision it will have to decide whether to produce all the evidence or none at all.

Mr. Lewis: Will the minister permit a question? Suppose the reason for which a person is not admitted is that he was a member of the communist party in a certain country. Is there any reason why that person cannot be provided with a piece of paper saying that the refusal of his application was due to the fact that he was a member of the communist party in such and such a country from 1939 to 1950? This is the kind of particular to which I was referring. If he obtains this information, he will be able to meet it. He may not know the evidence on which that conclusion was based but he will be able to produce whatever evidence he has to show he was not a member of the communist party during those years, if that is the truth. These are the kind of particulars in general terms which would enable a person to meet the general charge against him, with whatever evidence he may have at his disposal.

Mr. Marchand: Knowing the hon. member for York South as well as I do, I am sure that if ever a board told him that his client was refused permission to immigrate on the basis of a report to the effect that he was a communist, the next step that the hon. member for York South would take would be to ask for proof of such allegation. Otherwise he would be greatly frustrated. Is that not so?

Mr. Lewis: If I am frustrated, it will not be the first time. I will ask the minister whether he recalls an earlier debate with regard to the Spencer case when I cited to the house an actual case involving a security matter in which I was involved? If the nature of the charge were indicated to the appellant he might not get all he wants, but he would get something on which to base his defence.

Mr. Marchand: I think, in this case, the hon. member for York South has chosen his example very well and in general terms. You know very well, however, that there are some other cases which will be much more complicated. If we were to say to a prospective immigrant, for example, that he is refused because we think he is a criminal or related to the organization called the Mafia, this would be stated publicly because it would come up before the seven members of the board. They would know it, the clerks would know it and the lawyers who were present would know it. Even if it were not a public hearing this would be known. Do you think this man woud stand for that? We would have to prove that our report is well founded, and this might lead to many complications. It might even go much further than that, because if this information is revealed some man may be found murdered. I know what you want to cover and I have the same desire. This is the reason I had hoped the house might be wise enough to wait until after we have the report of the royal commission on security. I am sure the New Democratic Party will make its opinions known to that commission. Perhaps at that time we might be able to find a solution which will be satisfactory to everybody.

I do not say that we are trying to put the responsibility on one institution, because in the end we take the responsibility. The Solicitor General and I say that we make the decision. We do not place the responsibility on the board or on any immigration officer. We take the responsibility because we have seen the file. It is we who take the responsibility and say that it is not possible for the person to be admitted. We are not hiding behind the board or any immigration officer. This is a difficult matter and I am not very much at ease in discussing it. I am sure the hon. member for Carleton knows very well, and possibly better than I do, what we are referring to and the difficulties which are involved in getting around this. I do not say there are no ways and means, but it is not easy to have a reasonable law. This is the reason I think, if we are not to produce all the evidence to the prospective immigrant, that it is much better not to give him any. In any event, we are trying to go a little bit further.

So far as clause 19 is concerned the hon. member for York South mentioned that he wanted the report to be made available to the applicant. This sounds reasonable to me. I think this is what is intended. Possibly it would be a good thing to introduce this into the law. We must recognize, according to the Canadian law, that only Canadian citizens have rights; the others do not have rights.

This is the reason we have stated that Canadian citizens who wish to bring relatives or dependants here to Canada shall have the right of appeal, and not the prospective immigrants themselves.

Mr. Fairweather: Does the minister really mean what he said when he said that only Canadian citizens have rights and that non-citizens in Canada have no rights? I am sure he did not mean that.

Mr. Lewis: That is what he said.

Mr. Marchand: If you refer to landed immigrants, of course they have rights here in Canada; but those who are not here in Canada do not have any rights according to the Canadian laws. Therefore, we are not depriving anybody of their rights. To my knowledge—and someone may have other information—we are the first country to give a legal right of appeal against a department in this field. This is the reason we are endeavouring to make the experiment in respect of one class. Even the members are not in agreement concerning the consequences of this clause. One member stated that the board will be swamped and the other said that they would not have any appeals under those circumstances. The truth probably is that it would be busy as usual, but we really do not know. We have to make the experiment. I do not think the house has any interest in putting a burden on the board when we do not know whether it will be able to carry that burden.

I am ready to consider a few amendments along the lines I mentioned with regard to some other points. I do not think it is in the interest of this country to make a substantial modification. I am ready to look at this, but I say again that if the house wishes to modify the immigration policy of this country, it will have to do it through the basic law in respect of immigration and not through this special legislation, the purpose of which is to set up a board of appeal.

Mr. More: Mr. Chairman, may I put just one further question to the minister dealing with this general discussion. Earlier, in answer to remarks I made, he said that actually clause 17 was in addition to the present avenues we now have. I was pleased to hear this. However, I am looking for this in the person of another incumbent minister. I am wondering whether this is a personal assurance or whether there is anything which indicates it would be incumbent on the new minister. I do not see such an assurance in the bill itself.

Mr. Marchand: This discretionary power is given by section 8 of the Immigration Act. It is reproduced, with two exceptions, in this new bill. It appears in clause 26. There are only two exceptions to this discretionary power:

> (a) a person under order of deportation who was not issued such a written permit before the coming into force of this subsection, or
> (b) a person in respect of whom an appeal under section 17 of the Immigration Appeal Board Act has been taken that has not been successful.

This means that if a person appeals to the board to be permitted to bring a relative to Canada and is turned down, at this moment I have no discretion; but prior to such a procedure I have all the discretion I have now.

Mr. More: That is exactly the point on which I should like to have assurance.

Mr. Marchand: This is the reason, as I said, that the only thing this bill does is to add more rights. If a person in the first place comes to me and I say no, that we will not accept this person, then he still has the right to go to the board of appeal and have my decision reversed. This is a right which does not exist now.

Mr. Gray: In other words the minister is assuring the house that the applicant may be told that he may go to the appeal board, and he may have the impression that the right of discretion is no longer available.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to say here what the department is going to do in future years when we may no longer be here, although the hon. member for Essex West probably will be. It is not our intention to do that. We want to add rights; we do not want to take away any rights.

Mr. Wahn: Could the minister tell me what the policy reason is, that a person who is here legally but on a temporary basis will not have the right to appeal to the Immigration Appeal Board.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, there is no reason that all immigrants should not have the right to appeal. In the white paper we have tried to set down a new policy, according to which Canadian citizens have more rights than landed immigrants. I do not know whether this principle will be recognized by the house and integrated into the law, but this was its origin. We think that when a landed immigrant is accepted as a Canadian citizen he should enjoy more rights than a recently landed immigrant. That is the only reason. The question has been asked: Why not extend this provision to all classes? This is a new procedure and we want to experiment with it and know exactly the verdict of the board and what effect it will have on our policy. We want to make an experiment in this regard. We are doing it by this clause. Through order in council we can modify it and extend it to other classes. I believe we are still a democracy, and if this house thinks at any time that this principle should be extended, and political parties think this, I do not think a government would resist that pressure. This principle can be extended. We are making this experiment without taking away any rights from anybody.

Mr. Wahn: Mr. Chairman, would it not be better to write clause 17 in general terms and reserve the right of the governor in council to exclude certain classes while this experiment is continuing? If clause 17 is passed in its present form, even if the experiment proves successful the minister will not have the authority to extend by order in council the classes of people entitled to the benefit of appeal. Would it not be better to re-word the clause to provide for a general appeal for the classes I have mentioned, giving the minister authority to restrict the classes during the period of experimentation?

Mr. Marchand: This is a very good idea and I will consider it overnight.

Mr. Haidasz: Mr. Chairman, the arguments that were made earlier this afternoon and this evening hinge on the point outlined by the hon. member for St. Paul's, and I hope the minister will bring in such an amendment to clause 17.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask a short question of the minister on clause 2. I am one of those who has a French copy of the bill. Paragraph (g) of clause 2 states:

[Translation]

(g) "permanent resident" means a person who has been granted lawful admission to Canada for permanent residence under the Immigration Act;

[English]

Does this mean a landed immigrant is classed as a permanent resident? Is it presumed by the minister that a landed immigrant has gone through all the stages of the probationary period, and under paragraph (g) a landed immigrant is classed as a permanent resident?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, I do not understand which clause the hon. member is referring to.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Paragraph (g) of clause 2.

Mr. Marchand: Because the hon. member read it in French, I did not understand it.

Mr. Alkenbrack: These landed immigrants will probably be like me, bicultural but not bilingual. My question to the minister is this: Is a landed immigrant, under clause 2 (g), classed as a permanent resident? Is it presumed that he has gone through all the stages of the probationary period?

Mr. Marchand: This is a Canadian resident as defined in the Immigration Act. It is the same thing.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, could I ask the minister a question? What is the status of a landed immigrant if it can be proven that he gave false information to the department to obtain landed immigrant status?

Mr. Marchand: If the hon. member has a particular case in mind, I will meet with him tomorrow and study it. I cannot answer that question in general terms now.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3, 4 and 5 agreed to.

On clause 6—Head office.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): On clause 6, Mr. Chairman, would the minister indicate whether the intention is that there should always be one lawyer sitting with the board?

Mr. Marchand: When the board is sitting there should be on it either the chairman or the vice chairman.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I realize there should always be sitting on the board the chairman or vice-chairman, but there is no requirement that the vice-chairman be a member of the bar. I think the intention is that on each board there should be sitting a member of the bar, but in fact I do not believe this clause carries out that intention.

Mr. Marchand: I am not sure that this was the intention, but the hon. member has a point. I thought in the first place that the chairman and vice-chairman should be barristers, but this is not indicated formally in the bill. This is something I will look into.

Establishment of Immigration Appeal Board

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister a question? In answering some questions earlier the minister was quite emphatic that the board could travel. Is his advice very clear that, without saying so in the act, they could in fact travel and hear appeals elsewhere than Ottawa. If, so would there not be value in making this provision in clause 6? It is even required that the chairman and other members of the board have to live in Ottawa or within 15 miles thereof. I wonder whether it would not be better if the law spelled out the fact that the board may travel and hear appeals across the country.

Mr. Marchand: This is something we can consider, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, if the minister is going to consider the question, perhaps clause 6 should stand.

The Chairman: Does the committee agree that clause 6 stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 6 stands.

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Chairman, with regard to this clause, is there any particular reason why the members of this board must live within 15 miles of Ottawa?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, this is because experience in connection with such boards has shown that if members live very far from the capital, it is very difficult to get them together regularly, and it is the usual practice for several of these federal agencies to require that members live within a certain distance from the city, or in the city, so that they may be convened quickly.

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Chairman, are they strictly required to reside in Ottawa?

Mr. Marchand: The act stipulates that they must reside in Ottawa. However, an exception provides that the governor in council may authorize a member of the board to live within 15 miles from the city or elsewhere.

Mr. Langlois: A supplementary question. For instance, this does not exclude the possibility of members of the board coming from other areas of the country, but they must reside here?

[Mr. Marchand.]

Mr. Marchand: That is right, Mr. Chairman. The members can come from anywhere in Canada, but after their appointment, unless authorized by the governor in council, they must reside in Ottawa or within 15 miles of the city.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I have only one question to ask. Since my colleague, the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard), suggested that the regulations were perhaps designed to prevent the minister from appointing some "young punk" from Chicoutimi, I ask the minister to assure me that such is not the case.

Mr. Marchand: If the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) wants to be appointed to the board—

Mr. Grégoire: Is the minister also trying to call the people of Lapointe "young punks", as he did for those in Chicoutimi?

[English]

The Chairman: Is it understood that clause 6 shall stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

The Chairman: Shall clause 7 carry?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I have some comments to make on clause 7, and I see it is after ten o'clock.

Progress reported.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the house would be willing to deal with a couple of items that were indicated for today, namely item 131 and item 130 which refer matters to standing committees? Item 131 is a motion to refer the report of the Department of External Affairs to the standing committee on external affairs. Item 130 is a motion to refer the hate propaganda matter to a joint committee.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, we would be prepared to pass the resolution to refer the report of the Department of External Affairs to the committee, but I think that we would have to take another look at item 130. This should be left for another time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF DEPARTMENTAL REPORT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works) moved:

That the report of the Department of External Affairs tabled on January 28, 1966, be referred to the standing committee on external affairs.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Starr: In view of the fact that item 132 covers an amendment to a bill now before the house which changes only the number of judges and junior judges, and since it is in the form of a resolution, we would be prepared to pass that also.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps we could call item 132, then.

JUDGES ACT

FURTHER AMENDMENT RESPECTING BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. L. T. Pennell (for the Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the proposed measure to amend the Judges Act, Bill C-267, now before the house by substituting the words "eighteen judges and junior judges of the County Courts" for the words "seventeen judges and junior judges of the County Courts" in lines 7 and 8 of page 5 of the said bill, under the heading "British Columbia".

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Is it agreed that this resolution be referred to the Committee of the Whole to be appointed to consider Bill C-267, An Act to amend the Judges Act?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we propose submitting to the house for consideration item 83 on today's order paper, item 100, item 116, item 126, item 127, second reading of the bill to amend the Judges Act, item 130 and item 122. That is the list of the business indicated last night to be considered today, plus the addition of item 122.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—REQUEST FOR BILINGUAL STAFF IN EMBASSIES ABROAD

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday I put in this house the following question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs:

I should like to put a question to the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs. At the same time, I should like to congratulate him on his excellent appearance on the television show called "Sel de la semaine" last night, during which he seemed to say that he never refused a well-presented request. Here, then, is my question:

In view of the grievances and suggestions made by Mr. Antonio Barrette, former Canadian ambassador to Greece, would the hon. minister or the government immediately take the necessary steps to ensure that the personnel in Canadian embassies is bilingual?

I am pleased to have the opportunity to elaborate on the problem I referred to at the time.

It often happens that Canadians travelling abroad note that the staff in our embassies is composed exclusively of English speaking persons who cannot speak French, which is the other official language of our country.

I wish to point out, among other protests in this regard, the statements made recently by Mr. Antonio Barrette, former Canadian ambassador to Greece. Mr. Barrette urged the federal government to place more emphasis, in our embassies, on the bilingual and bicultural character of Canada. Some of my constituents in the riding of Sherbrooke which I represent in this house told me of similar anomalies, noted during trips abroad. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs should take immediate steps to provide all Canadian embassies with bilingual personnel, in order that ambassadors and Canadian employees dealing with citizens of other countries may speak English and French reasonably well, in addition to other languages they may cultivate.

Our bilingual and bicultural character must be displayed outside as well as inside our country. This Canadian characteristic is a source of influence and prestige on the international level, and it will likely greatly improve our relations with French speaking countries.

I understand that, at the present time, the application of Canadian bilingualism gives rise to difficulties in some countries and with respect to certain employees. But despite past obstacles and carelessness, the federal government must spare no effort to encourage Canadian bilingualism in our embassies and henceforth appoint to senior positions Canadians who assert themselves as bilingual, besides speaking the language of the accreditation country.

• (10:10 p.m.)

The minister should also try to appoint more French Canadians as ambassadors. The African and particularly the South American countries would appreciate such Canadian representatives, often because of a common Greco-Latin culture and the French language which is predominant in several of those countries. If the representatives we sent there speak only English, Canada is putting itself at a disadvantage in psychological and fraternal relations.

For example, I remember that in June 1966 the hon. minister for external affairs announced the appointment of nine high commissioners and ambassadors of whom only one, Mr. George-Marcel Olivier, appointed to Indonesia, was a French Canadian.

In this connection, the federal government should distribute foreign aid better and not favour almost exclusively the English speaking countries of the commonwealth.

Canadian foreign aid hardly reflects the bicultural character of our country. In 1965, of $173 million given by Canada to underdeveloped countries, $99 million went to Asian countries, belonging to the commonwealth. On the other hand, 19 African countries where French is spoken received only $5.5 million from us in the form of gifts, and only $2 million in loans. We gave nothing to South America and our loans to those countries did not exceed $10 million.

These facts, Mr. Speaker, show the lack of effort by our government to extend Canadian bilingualism to our embassies, which is so necessary, and to encourage French-speaking countries materially.

I hope the hon. minister or his parliamentary secretary will recognize that the situation must be corrected and that he will announce some appropriate measures in a few moments.

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary of Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) deserves to be commended for the interest he takes in the important question of Canadian representation abroad. This representation, we all agree, should consist of the most able and the most representative personnel having in mind the cultural variety and richness of this country.

[Mr. Allard.]

It is no doubt because such a need has always been recognized that in the past the Department of External Affairs in its diplomatic service has reached, before most other government services, a high degree of bilingualism and of representation of our cultural variety. Of course, the need referred to by the hon. member for Sherbrooke is today, better than yesterday, universally recognized, and this permits renewed efforts which have been made and will continue to be made to improve the situation.

At the present time, from 20 to 25 per cent of the diplomatic officers with the Department of External Affairs have French as their mother tongue and 35 per cent are certainly fluently bilingual. Indeed, it may be said that 50 per cent or more of our officers are bilingual, including those who are in the process of becoming fully bilingual.

But no one wants to leave it at that. All the new recruits, of which there were 50 in 1966, who are not bilingual at the start of their service, are sent full-time, for four months, in the preliminary stages of their training, either to the French or the English schools of the Civil Service Commission. This applies to the middle as well as the higher echelons. Similarly, division or branch heads, are also sent either to schools of language in Ottawa, for full-time courses at St. Adèle or for a full year in Quebec city.

The member for Sherbrooke mentioned Canadian ambassadors to Latin America. He knows already that out of 13, five claim French as their mother tongue. In French-speaking Africa, Canada is represented in 15 countries, either directly or through non-resident accreditation, by eight heads of post, three of whom have French as their mother tongue and others are fully bilingual.

HOUSING—MEETING OF STUDY GROUPS RESPECTING SHORTAGE

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the Minister of Labour whether, in view of the deteriorating housing situation in this country, the proposed symposiums across the country would be held sooner than anticipated in order that we might get action earlier than planned.

Let me say briefly, sir, that Canada's current housing shortage is a national disgrace. Our country is said to have the second highest economic standard of living in the world, yet a large part of our people remain ill-housed. This problem should have been studied months or years ago. This was not done and as a result hundreds of thousands of Canadians are today looking for a decent roof over their heads. Instead of acting, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) criss-crosses the country holding study groups and symposiums and trying to pass the buck to the provinces. The Canadian people want action today and it is action they should have, not study groups and symposiums.

It is delaying tactics of this kind which create disillusion and cynicism in the public mind. What is the problem? Right now, Canadians in the lower income brackets are faced with a real crisis. At the same time, in many areas of the country Canadians in the middle income brackets cannot find homes in which to live. People are flooding into our cities. Recent figures show a record upsurge in immigration. Young married couples born in the immediate postwar period are looking for homes.

Last year in Toronto the average price of a new house was $29,000, while in 1965, we see that 85 percent of the home loans financed by the federal government went to individuals with annual incomes of over $5,000. Where does this leave the low income worker? The answer is—it often leaves him living in squalour, amidst urban blight in the run down centres of our metropolitan areas. Such poverty amidst plenty must be stopped. It will not be stopped by holding cross-country symposiums.

In 1967 housing starts, instead of increasing over 1966, are falling off badly. The winter period is half over and cross-country study sessions have taken the place of the immediate action we need.

Most countries in the western world regard home ownership as a welfare and social matter. This is proper. The right to a decent home is fundamental in 1967. Home ownership should not be attached to fiscal and monetary considerations. In Canada we turn government participation on and off and use housing policy as a fiscal and monetary instrument. I maintain that we must put an end to this retrograde attitude.

I believe that every Canadian family should have the opportunity to own a home or to enjoy the right of adequate rented accomodation. Today in Canada there is a housing shortage. The problem should have been studied months and years ago. Action is needed, now; yet this dinosaur, right wing minister crosses the country holding symposiums and the government tries to pass the buck to the provinces. In any modern state responsibility rests with the federal government to get things done in the housing field and I cannot believe for a moment that the parliamentary secretary, who knows what I mean by social welfare measures, will defend in this house tonight the kind of symposiums which are being held today when it is action we need.

The policies which are required should be realized in co-operation with private industry, provincial authorities and municipal authorities through practical measures which I shall enumerate. These are practical measures, not symposiums; the government already knows about them and we have talked about them for years. These are measures to encourage intensive research into new methods of building lower cost housing, and further research into co-operative building and ownership.

• (10:20 p.m.)

We suggest the federal government should take an active part in meeting this problem in the following ways:

1. By eliminating the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials.

2. By exempting from taxable income an amount up to $500 for school and municipal taxes.

3. By extending the original Progressive Conservative legislation providing low cost long-term loans to municipalities for sewage treatment projects and anti-pollution measures.

4. By the establishment of a municipal capital availability fund for purposes of long-term low cost loans.

5. By extending direct C.M.H.C. loans to include those who today cannot qualify for reasons of insufficient income.

6. By increasing direct loans for older housing and especially where housing shortage exists.

7. By making group mortgage insurance available to all N.H.A. mortgage owners.

Do we need symposiums and cross country tours when this is the kind of action we should take? What about low cost rental housing?

We suggest measures:

1. To provide low cost long-term federal loans and to provide a higher federal share of capital costs and operating losses.

2. To co-operate with the provinces and the municipalities in the setting up of minimum standards or ordinances for rented accommodations, and to provide incentives for both urban and rural municipalities which fight blight and decay in housing by such ordinances.

3. To provide long-term loans to municipalities for the acquisition of land for housing and or recreation purposes.

4. To provide such incentives as are fair to encourage the investment of capital in house financing.

These are just a few of the things which must be acted on today. What does the minister do in the face of the housing crisis? He passes the buck in the most cynical way by going off on a cross country junket in the middle of the winter to discuss the problem with provincial and municipal authorities. This is the kind of delaying tactic which creates disillusionment with political institutions and modern governments and cynicism on the part of the people.

I cannot believe for a minute that the parliamentary secretary, who is attuned to the welfare needs of the people in 1967, will get up in the house tonight and defend the irresponsible action of his right-wing 19th century minister. Let him get up in the house and say that houses will be built in 1967 so that the hundreds and thousands of Canadians who are looking for homes will have them. Let him assure me that when I bring up this question day after day all I will get will not be laughter from the front benches. I mean business, and we are here to listen to what the parliamentary secretary will say in terms of what will be done to encourage home building in 1967. I hope he will not get up and read statistics when hundreds of thousands of Canadians are looking for homes.

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member, who made such a very objective speech, realizes that I am limited to three minutes. However, I would invite him to debate the subject with me the next time the estimates of the minister are before us, or on another appropriate occasion.

I listened with a great deal of interest particularly to the beginning of his speech hoping that he would be as objective and sincere as he pretends to be about the problem of housing. To refer constantly to the minister as the right-wing dinosaur indicates to me at least that the member's appeal is not a sincere one, but just a desire to seek more publicity in the newspapers now that perhaps some of his other activities are not as prominently publicized as they were hitherto.

Mr. Grafftey: That is not worthy of you.

Mr. Mackasey: I am not too sure what the difference is between a junket in the middle of the winter and a junket in the middle of the summer but it is obvious that the hon. member does not understand the reasons for the minister's tour across the country. I am rather appalled at the fact that a member who stands up in the house as often as he does and speaks about the sanctity of the B.N.A. Act refuses to realize tonight that housing is essentially a provincial matter, whether he likes it or not.

The reason the minister is touring the country is to make the provinces aware of the different clauses of the National Housing Act, of which up to date many provinces have been reluctant to take advantage. The result of one of these "useless symposiums" as the hon. member likes to call them, was to convince the province of Quebec to set up a housing corporation when that legislative assembly gets an opportunity to do so. If this is useless in the opinion of the hon. member, then I will not be able to convince him in three minutes. However, I would remind him of the fact that 90 per cent of the suggestions which he advanced tonight are already incorporated in the National Housing Act.

This proves what I have long suspected. He has never read it and is not interested in it. He is motivated by political partisanship and a wonderful opportunity to castigate the minister when he is not here. I will let the minister answer the charge of being a right wing dinosaur, and I am sure he will find suitable adjectives to use in his reply. The fact that the hon. member is now walking out is further proof that his whole motivation in asking the question was to seek undue publicity at the expense of the senior citizens.

CANADA LAW REPORTS—DIFFERENCE IN COST TO LAWYERS AND GENERAL PUBLIC

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in this inspired atmosphere. In perusing the report of the Auditor General to the House of Commons for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1966, I noted that Canada Law Reports were sold to certain persons for $5 while the charge for a subscription through the Queen's Printers promotion sales department is $15 to all other Canadians.

Naturally, in view of the fact that the New Democratic Party is opposed to any form of discrimination on the basis of race, creed, sex or legitimate vocation, my democratic hackles were immediately raised by this gross discrimination against the ordinary people.

This discrimination also has been noted by the press. For instance, Mr. Maurice Western, who writes philosophically about the achievements and failures of mankind, nations and governments, recently wrote a column on the Auditor General's report and particularly noted the losses to the taxpayer from the sale of the Canada Law Report to the legal profession, although this loss previously had been brought to the attention of the government by the Auditor General.

In support of my argument, I should like briefly to quote from the Auditor General's Report, which is well worth anyone's serious study. This is from paragraph 117 at page 71:

> Losses resulting from the sale of the "Canada Law Reports": The Canada Law Reports are periodicals covering proceedings of the Supreme Court and the Exchequer Court. They are prepared for the benefit of the legal profession and distributed by the Queen's Printer in two volumes per issue (one for each court's proceedings) with ten issues per year.
> In accordance with agreements between the Crown, represented by the Registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada, and various law societies in Canada, copies are provided free of charge to officers and libraries of the societies and to judges and court officers, while members of the societies are supplied with copies at an annual rate of $5 per member which is payable by the societies. This subscription rate of $5 is based on a 1962-63 direct printing cost of $4.43 per subscription. It should be noted that this cost does not include any costs of compilation, publisher's overhead, postage or the value of services provided without charge by other departments.
> The charge for a subscription sold through the Queen's Printer's Sales Promotion Division is $15.
> For the year 1965 some 10,100 copies of each issue of the Reports were printed, of which some 460 copies were distributed free to government departments and others entitled to receive government publications free of charge, some 630 copies were distributed free to law societies, judges, etc., approximately 8,670 were sold at $5 per subscription and 360 at $15 per subscription. The paid subscriptions produced an estimated revenue of $48,750. The direct printing costs, which amounted to $99,017, equivalent to $9.80 per subscription, were charged to the appropriation (Vote 5) of the Department of Public Printing and Stationery.

• (10:30 p.m.)

On May 31, 1966, the Department of Public Printing and Stationery advised the Registrar of the Supreme Court that the printing costs had almost doubled since the subscription rate of $5 was set in 1963. He recommended that the price to the law societies be set at not less than $10 per annual subscription commencing January, 1967.

The agreements referred to above are on a continuing basis but provide that "either party may terminate this agreement at any time, to be effective at the end of the then current year, by mailing postpaid notice of such termination to the other party not later than the first day of October in that year".

As no such notifications were mailed prior to October 1, 1966, by the Registrar of the Supreme Court, losses to the crown from these sales will continue throughout the calendar year 1967.

After reading that report of the Auditor General and finding that this gross discrimination was being practised by the Queen's Printer in the sale of these documents, I was moved to ask the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) the following question today: "Can the minister inform the house why the Canada Law Reports are sold to members of the legal profession, who have one of the highest incomes per capita in Canada, at an annual rate of $5, while the general public are required to pay $15 for the same report?"

I trust that the parliamentary secretary will be able to give me some satisfactory reply to this protest, which I think is fully justified and would be supported by the great majority of the Canadian people.

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the main purpose I stayed behind to answer the question was to take advantage of this opportunity to pay tribute to the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) because so seldom have I an opportunity to congratulate him on his wisdom, integrity and concern for the average Canadian. As I say, it was for that reason I stayed behind this evening to answer the question.

Obviously the Auditor General has once again proven to the Canadian public, by bringing this matter to our attention, the justification of his existence and his vigilance. It seems obvious to me that when the annual rate of $5 was established for members of the legal profession it had some direct relationship to the cost of printing. But the fact is that the cost of printing today would justify a fee of $10. I shall certainly add my views to those of the hon. member and through the medium of my caucus in this house suggest that steps be immediately taken to remedy this situation.

I am as puzzled as the hon. member to know why the general public should be required to pay $15. I think the least we should do in establishing the price of $10 is see that the $10 fee is charged to all Canadians whether or not they are members of the legal profession. The hon. member and myself have in common the fact that we are not members of the legal profession, nor do I suspect either one of us would want to be. But if I wished to buy one of these books I can see no justification why I should pay any more than my colleague who sits next to me in the House of Commons.

I think the hon. member is to be congratulated, as is the Auditor General, for bringing this matter to the attention of the house. I will urge on the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury), under whose jurisdiction the department of printing now falls, that this situation be rectified immediately. Obviously, from the hon. member's research, it is too late to do anything this year, but I am certain we would all take a dim view if it was not made known by November 1 this year that the price of these documents will be $10 to all Canadians, whether or not they are members of the legal profession.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.36 p.m.
