OFFICIAL REPORT

Friday, April 20, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

MINES AND MINERALS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the name of Mr. Kennedy (Edmonton) be substituted for that of Mr. Shaw as a member of the select standing committee on Mines and Minerals.

Mr. SPEAKER: By leave of the House.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 113 (from the Senate), for the relief of Jean Elizabeth Burgess.—Mr. Hocken.

Bill No. 114 (from the Senate), for the relief of Thomas Wesley Scott.—Mr. Chew.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend subsection one of section six of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, chapter seventy-five of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, as enacted by section one of chapter seven of the statutes of 1922, and to provide that the words "two hundred dollars for each head of cattle" in the eighteenth line thereof be stricken out and be replaced by the words "one hundred and fifty dollars for each head of cattle"; to further provide that this act come into operation on the first day of July, nineteen hundred and twenty-three, and that the minister may order compensation to be paid to the owners of animals slaughtered on or after the first day of July, nineteen hundred and twenty-two, but which had been valued and ordered to be slaughtered prior to that date, at the rates authorized by statute before the coming into force of said chapter seven; also to provide that the minister may order compensation for animals which may be slaughtered on or after the first day of July, nineteen hundred and twenty-three, but valued and ordered to be slaughtered from the first day of July, nineteen hundred and twenty-two to the thirtieth June, nineteen hundred and twenty-three, both dates inclusive, at the rates authorized by chapter seven of the statutes of 1922.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is the usual resolution which precedes a money bill and while it was discussed incidentally a few weeks ago I think it is well to go into it further at this time. The main feature of the resolution proposes to reduce the indemnity for slaughtered animals, that is pure breds, from $200 for each head to $150. Our reason for doing that is to conform to the general reduction of values in live stock, both commercial and pure bred. The first amount is the rate that was given for compensation during the war, but we now think we have come to pre-war prices both in regard to pure bred and commercial animals. Therefore, we are restoring the rate that prevailed immediately before the war. I may say that the estimates for this year are based upon this lower valuation.

The effect of the balance of the resolution is this: Last year when we made a similar reduction in the amount of compensation for slaughtered animals, the law being brought into force on the first of July, it was found that a great injustice was done to the owners of those animals that were appraised before that date. For instance a farmer, we will call him Jones if you like, had his animals appraised, say, on the 20th June by the government inspector. He might have had a dozen animals and a valuation was agreed upon between the inspector and the owner of the animals under which he expected, we will say, a compensation of $2,000 for the entire number. The inspector went away and the farmer returned home feeling that that was what he was entitled to. The new law came into force on the first of July before any of Jones animals were slaughtered and then the new scale of compensation came into force. Consequently if the government and the government inspectors are to keep faith with that farmer his compensation must be based upon the valuation which took place any time before the first of July. I may say that when I was in Edmonton last summer I met a number of farmers who found they were exactly in this position: They had the certificate of the government inspector assuring them that they would get compensation based upon the act in force prior to last July. Then the new act came into effect and the compensation was lowered. They said that was not fair and I believe they were right. Hence the second part of this resolution makes provision for such cases amounting in all to $4,000. I have the names of the farmers that are affected by this provision if the committee would like to have them. They are located in Quebec, Ontario, Saskatchewan and Alberta, but principally in Alberta where there happened to be a large amount of slaughtering in the last few days of June.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Motherwell thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 115, to amend The Animal Contagious Diseases Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read a second time?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Now.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the House, bill read the second time.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the number of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN: There is no number on it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If the bill has not been distributed, we cannot very well go ahead with it. However, the provisions of the bill are identical with the explanation I have just given to the House. The resolution is the embodiment of the bill, and the bill is in effect couched in the same language as the resolution.

Mr. HANSON: What is the idea of railroading it through at this rate?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We want to get some work before the Senate.

Mr. HANSON: It is not because the minister wants to send out the cheques to-morrow.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have no desire to railroad it through.

Mr. CALDWELL: It is a very important matter, and I think we had better have the bill printed and distributed.

Progress reported.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INSURANCE OF MORTGAGED PREMISES

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Acting Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution.

Resolved, that the Governor in Council may from time to time cause an agreement or agreements to be executed by or on behalf of His Majesty the King, undertaking or guaranteeing that any company mentioned or referred to in chapter thirteen of the statutes of 1919 (first session), entitled: An Act to incorporate Canadian National Railway Company and respecting Canadian National Railways, and in chapter thirteen of the statutes of 1920, entitled: An act to confirm the agreement dated the eighth day of March, 1920, between His Majesty the King and the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada for the acquisition of the capital stock of the said Grand Trunk Railway Company, except the four per cent guaranteed stock, will restore or make good all loss or damage to the mortgaged premises comprised in any mortgage or deed of trust (hereinafter called "such mortgage") at any time executed by any such company occasioned by fire or other casualty against which such company covenanted in such mortgage to insure, and indemnifying the trustee or trustees of any such mortgage against any consequences arising from any failure—(a) on the part of such company to comply with such covenant to insure, and (b) on the part of such trustee or trustees to take any action in respect thereof. The times and manner of the giving of any such agreement or agreements, and the form and terms thereof and the person who may sign the same on behalf of His Majesty shall be such as the Governor in Council may from time to time approve or direct.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Explain.

Mr. GRAHAM: The object of this resolution is simply this: The Canadian National Railway Board, with the consent of the government, has decided to carry its own insurance. In the mortgages given a covenant was included that insurance should be carried for the protection of—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps we can shorten it a little. The resolution is rather a long one. If the minister says that all the resolution does is to enable the government to carry the insurance, we have no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is all it does.

Mr. HANSON: What about the bond holders? They have some rights.

Mr. SPEAKER: The matter will be fully explained in committee, I presume.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the minister should give the committee some information as to the experience of the company with its insurance. What has been the result of the insurance that has been carried by the Canadian National Railways through these years? I understand they have had one system of insurance applicable to their densely populated or densely trafficked areas, and another system with differing rates for other areas, and I believe some area not insured, in which they carry their own insurance the intention of the insurance, of course, being to provide for cases where, if a loss occurred by fire in the densely trafficked section, the money would be at hand to pay the loss. The property would have to be repaired at once. It could not be allowed to stand, and there would be no money to do it with, if they had no insurance fund. The minister is providing some other way whereby there will be authority to pay the money out of the treasury. I would like if the minister would tell the House what has been the result of that insurance. Has it been a loss to the company? Has the company been recouped by those with whom it insured against these losses, equal to, or nearly equal, to the amount of premiums paid, does that differ in each of the areas, and has the minister any comment to make on the rate of insurance the company was able to obtain, whether it was fair and reasonable, low, or too high?

Mr. GRAHAM: The experience of the company in insuring its property has been that a large profit has accrued to the insurance companies. I forget the exact figures; but I think the amount of insurance all told is three hundred and some odd million dollars, and if we were to include the Intercolonial railway, that has not been insured, the total would approximate $400,000,000. Those in charge of the insurance have taken into account all the valid circumstances, and they have come to the conclusion that with the experience in the various roads during the past ten years and the amount of premiums paid, there could be a saving of about three quarters of a million dollars per annum by carrying our own insurance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What were the companies with whom the insurance was placed?

Mr. GRAHAM: The insurance was placed, I think, with two companies of insurance brokers who distributed it amongst various companies. I cannot bring to mind the names now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They were not brokers; they were companies.

Mr. GRAHAM: These companies do not carry the entire risk for the risks are very large.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They reinsure.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes. As I understood the matter, they were insurance brokers, but I may be wrong about that. They, at least, distribute the insurance. The question was raised if it would not be wise to carry part of the insurance, perhaps in more densely populated areas. If that were done and our insurance were not spread over the lean areas, as well as the better portions, we were informed that the rate would be so much higher. As a matter of fact, the new president of the company procured a gentleman to go into the question of insurance in reference to the Canadian National Railway Board properties, and it was decided and the recommendation made that money could be saved by the government carrying its own insurance. Some years ago on the Intercolonial road, on which there was no insurance, the plan was inaugurated of the government putting aside each year from the returns from the road a certain amount for insurance. Our experience at that time was that that amount, although it was comparatively small, fully carried all the fire risks. The Grand Trunk, and, I think, one of the other lines have large insurance funds on hand now. I think the total of the two amounts is, at the present time, something like cash in hand of $2,000,000, so that the government insurance fund starts out already with a nucleus of about $2,000,000. It is not intended that, in the case of fire, the money should be taken in that particular way; but from the receipts of the system each year a certain amount will be put aside, approximately if not the same amount as would be paid under the ordinary rate of insurance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Can the minister tell us what rates the Canadian National secured and what rates the Grand Trunk secured, the government road as against the privately operated road?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have not that with me at the present moment. I shall have it at the second reading of the bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would ask the minister to get that.

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not expect the bill to come up this afternoon, and I do not have that information with me. I do not intend to go any further than the first reading of the bill this afternoon.

The other day the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) asked me two questions which I had better answer now. When the resolution was first introduced, I think the leader of the Opposition stated, if I remember correctly, that the words "restore or make good" were redundant. The instruments held by the trustees, in which instruments the covenants are made, contain two different forms of covenant. One form says "shall make good." The other form says "shall restore." This resolution is merely to conform in identical terms with the other instruments held by the trustees, and this form of resolution has been agreed upon between the solicitors of the trustees and the solicitors of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I first of all have no objection at all to the new plan of insurance. With the much increased railway mileage and extent of property, it would seem to me the part of wisdom for the company now to carry its own insurance. I wish, however, information to be made official in this House as to the rate which the Canadian National Railways secured as compared with the rate which the Grand Trunk secured, and if the minister sees fit—I would not press for this—the rate which the Canadian Pacific secured. I have made some inquiries myself, and I must say I was astonished at the rate which the Canadian National Railway was able to secure on its insurance. I venture to believe that over an extended period of time, there would be little if any profit in this for the companies. It will be recalled that some year and a half ago, when it was thought fit to attack the management of the National Railways, special emphasis was laid on the horror of having directors there who were directors of companies doing business with the railways. That will be remembered. In my humble judgment, about the only one on the present board who has the right to be there in point of experience and capacity together, is head of the company doing a very large business with the railways. I would be the last to object to him on that ground, and I do not believe he will take the least advantage of this. His name is Mr. Stewart. But direction was especially drawn to the fact that the Canadian National Railway Company had insurance in concerns upon which even the manager, Mr. Hanna, and the treasurer, Mr. Mitchell, were directors. The public were led to believe there was something greatly wrong in that; that these men were favouring those companies with insurance for their own profit. I have gone to the trouble of ascertaining the facts. Those companies were doing insurance work for the Canadian National Railways long before Mr. Hanna or Mr. Mitchell was interested in them at all. Heavy losses, however, occurred in those companies, losses, arising chiefly from the San Francisco fire. Then it became necessary, if they were to get anything like the terms they got before, to reconstitute the directorate and to have some money provided. That was done under Mr. George A. Cox and others, in order that the interest of the railway company might be better looked after, Mr. Hanna and Mr. Mitchell were asked to take directorships on the insurance companies. They did that, and they did it with only nominal stock interest. They had nothing in reality; this was simply a small amount of stock transferred in their names for some years, when the policy was adopted of having only directors with a real interest. Then Mr. Hanna secured $500 worth in one company and $1,500 in another. The $500 worth in the one, he has lately sold at less than 30 cents on the dollar, and what he has in the other, he would be glad to sell at the same rate. This is the result of the interlocking directorships and the advantage to Mr. Hanna. Mr. Mitchell's experience is similar. It is only just to these men that this should be known. They were there in the interests of one of the largest insured parties of the companies, and I would be only too glad if their management of the railways in this regard was compared with the management of any private system anywhere, so that we might know whether or not the very lowest possible rates were secured. Instead of profiting by taking on these extra responsibilities they actually lost, and intended to lose.

[Mr. Graham.]

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Graham thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 116 respecting the Canadian National Railways.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT AMENDMENT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of and concurrence in an amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 7 to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

He said: As will be recalled, the purpose of this bill is to authorise magistrates for the Northwest Territories to try either within or outside the Northwest Territories, persons accused of offences committed therein. A special provision was adopted by this House to the effect that a person shall be qualified to serve as a juror in such trials although he is not a British subject. The Senate has refused to acquiesce in that provision and has therefore struck it out. We are accepting the amendment.

Motion agreed to; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

JUDGES IN ADMIRALTY

Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Admiralty Act, chapter one hundred and forty-one of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, and to provide that the Governor in Council may, from time to time, appoint for any admiralty district one or more deputy local judges, and revoke such appointments; appoint for any district or registry division of any district a deputy registrar; and when the local judge of the Quebec Admiralty District resides in Montreal, the deputy local judge residing in Quebec shall be paid the salary which he would have received if he were the local judge of the district; and when the local judge resides at Quebec, the deputy local judge residing at Montreal shall receive the salary which he would have received if he were the local judge of the district; but not more than one deputy local judge in any district shall receive a salary.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: By this resolution we propose to give to the Governor in Council power to appoint deputy local judges to act as Judges in Admiralty and we provide for a salary to be paid to the deputy local judge, which is not now provided for. We might take, for example, the province of Quebec, where we have two divisions of the Admiralty Court, one in Quebec and one in Montreal. At the present time the Judge in Admiralty is a judge of the Superior Court of Montreal. We have no deputy for the district of Quebec; We have only one registrar, whose office is in the city of Quebec; and we have no deputy registrar. As I have said, we propose by this suggested amendment to give to the Governor in Council power to appoint deputy local judges and, as well, power to revoke such appointments; also authority to appoint registrars. We provide further that when the local judge resides in Montreal and receives the salary which is provided for in the general statute, the deputy local judge residing in Quebec shall receive the same salary; and if the deputy local judge resides in Quebec the deputy local judge residing in Montreal shall also receive the same indemnity.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not very familiar with the provisions of the Admiralty Act. Is there any provision under that act empowering the Governor in Council to revoke the appointment of a judge?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I am speaking only of deputy local judges.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But I refer to any judge. We have local judges in Ontario, for instance, in the Supreme Court, and certainly there is no power in the Governor in Council to revoke their appointments. Is there a power under the Admiralty Act vested in the Governor in Council to revoke the appointment of a deputy local judge?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Chapter 141 of the Revised Statutes of 1906, the Admiralty Act, provides in section 8 that:

The Governor in Council may, from time to time, appoint any judge of a superior or county court, or any barrister of not less than seven years' standing, to be a local judge in admiralty of the exchequer court in and for any admiralty district.

2. Every such local judge shall hold office during good behaviour, but shall be removable by the Governor General on address of the Senate and House of Commons.

3. Such judge shall be designated a local judge in Admiralty of the Exchequer Court.

As to the deputy local judges Section 11 provides:

A local judge in admiralty may, from time to time, with the approval of the Governor in Council, appoint a deputy judge; and such deputy judge shall have and exercise all such jurisdiction, powers and authority as are possessed by the local judge.

2. The appointment of a deputy judge shall not be determined by the occurrence of a vacancy in the office of the judge.

3. A local judge in admiralty may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, at any time revoke the appointment of a deputy judge.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If I may be permitted, I should like to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to a decision lately given by the Court of Appeal of Ontario. I see in the papers this morning is reported the appeal of the case of the Wholesale Grocers and the Attorney General of Ontario. The Court of Appeal has held unanimously that the Dominion criminal legislation, section 498, is ultra vires. The disastrous consequences of such a verdict, if it is to remain undisturbed, are manifest.

The Chief Justice of Ontario bases his judgment upon the late finding of the Privy Council in the Board of Commerce case, and distinctly states that had it not been for that finding, that is to say, had his judgment been given prior to that finding, he would have held that section to be within the competence of the Dominion parliament. I do not presume to comment on the finding of the Privy Council except to say that I think it was most unfortunate. It was unfortunate that there should have been an appeal on that portion of the Board of Commerce and Combines and Fair Prices Acts. It was prosecuted by the province of Ontario, and I think by the province of Quebec as well, but chiefly at the instance of the Attorney General of Ontario.

I am not presuming to give an opinion, only to say that in the judgment of the Privy Council there is no language so decisive and so final as would make an appeal from the judgment of the Ontario Appellate Court a futility. One would think from reading it that the Privy Council never intended to undermine the whole basis upon which section 498 of the criminal code rests. I have it firmly in my mind that the jurisdiction of this parliament to enact such legislation must be upheld, and I earnestly hope the minister is considering taking immediate steps to see that the judgment so given does not become the law of Canada.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I should not like to express an opinion on the judgment referred to, not having yet read it, but I will certainly take under due consideration the remarks of the right hon. leader of the Opposition and do anything that is necessary and possible in the interests of the Dominion and the provinces.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Sir Lomer Gouin thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 117, to amend the Admiralty Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The bill is not printed in the two languages.

Progress reported.

PENNY BANK OF TORONTO ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 104 to change the name of The Penny Bank of Toronto.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1.—Name changed to "The Penny Bank of Ontario".

Mr. FIELDING: Mr. Chairman, the founders of The Penny Bank were Toronto citizens, and when the institution was organized it received the name of The Penny Bank of Toronto. In later years the operations of the bank have extended throughout the province of Ontario, and the desire is that hereafter the institution should be known as The Penny Bank of Ontario. The only purpose of this bill is to change the name accordingly.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: At whose request is the change made?

Mr. FIELDING: At the request of the managers of the institution in Toronto through their solicitor in Ottawa. I noticed recently in the press there was some expression of opinion as to whether or not The Penny Bank was a successful institution. The only criticism of it was that it gives additional work to the school teachers and in some instances perhaps they are not willing to undertake it. However, I believe that is exceptional. The bank is operating quite extensively, and, so far as I know, to the general satisfaction of the public.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

MILITIA PENSION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Acting Minister of National Defence) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Militia Pension Act, chapter forty-two of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, and to provide that pensions of retired officers, who served in the war and are employed in public service, be continued, and that the annual emolument of any such officer shall not exceed the annual rate of pay and allowances upon which the pension was computed; also to provide that pensions which have been paid to such officers shall not be recoverable from them.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. MACDONALD: The purpose of this resolution is to provide for a situation that has arisen out of the late war. Under the provisions of the Militia Pension Act an officer shall not receive any pension while he is in receipt of a salary in the public service. This limitation did not apply to those who served as non-commissioned officers or privates. Since the war a number of members of the permanent force who served overseas and were promoted for service in the field or otherwise for merit, subsequently entered the public service, and by so doing lost their right to the pensions they would otherwise be entitled to on retirement. The Militia Pension Act was revised and brought up to date in 1909, when certain provisions were made in regard to pensions generally. Any officer who retires for any cause other than inefficiency or misconduct is entitled to receive out of the pension fund one-fiftieth, for every year he was in the service, of the amount he received during the last year in which he served. This fund is provided out of payments made by officers during the course of their service, at the rate of five per cent annually of their pay. An anomaly has arisen through the fact that a man who entered the public service was put in a worse position as the result of his being promoted in the field than he would have been had he remained in the ranks as a private. This measure, therefore, is to provide that if such a man goes into the public service he shall not lose the right to pension which he would otherwise receive. It is also provided that if the amount of the pension and of the salary in the public service is such as to exceed the amount he received on the date of his retirement, the payments to him may be reduced so as not to exceed the rate on which the pension was computed. It has been found also in certain cases that pensions to officers who have been retired have been paid as a matter of course and that there has been no record in the Defence department as to what occupations the recipients of the pensions were engaged in. They may have entered the Customs service or the service of, say, the British Columbia government, and there would be no information with regard to their activities in that respect, the cheques issuing automatically. It was not until the Auditor General discovered that payments had been made in certain cases contrary to the provisions of the law of 1919 that the necessity for the present provision became evident. It was 4 p.m. felt, particularly in view of the small amount involved, that it would hardly be fair that the men who had received this money during the last year or so should be compelled to repay it. That, in brief, is the purpose of the proposed legislation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Can the acting minister inform the committee how many officers have been paid in excess of the amount to which they were entitled, as referred to in the last clause of the resolution? How many cases is this provision supposed to cover?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I am informed that the cases are very few, but I can get the information for my hon. friend if he wishes it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Are there only three or four?

Mr. GRAHAM: More than that, but not very many.

Mr. MANION: The minister states, as I understand it, that this is virtually putting these officers on the same basis as are the privates and non-commissioned officers?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Yes.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Macdonald (Pictou) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 118, to amend the Militia Pension Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first and second times, considered in committee and reported.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

EVIDENCE IN MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE PROCEEDINGS

Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 109, (from the Senate), to amend the Criminal Code with respect to publication of evidence in marriage or divorce proceedings.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Reports of proceedings in parliament; exception as to evidence in matters of marriage or divorce.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Section 322 of the Criminal Code explains the amendment which is proposed. It reads:

> No one commits an offence by publishing in good faith for the information of the public, a fair report of the proceedings of the Senate or House of Commons, or any committee thereof, or of any council or assembly aforesaid, or any committee thereof, or of the public proceedings preliminary or final heard before any court exercising judicial authority, nor by publishing in good faith, any fair comment upon any such proceedings. .

Mr. BOYS: While I approve of this legislation I ask the minister does he think very much is going to be gained by it in view of the fact that there are 450 copies of the evidence given before the divorce committee of the Senate which are printed and distributed for the information of members but which fall into the hands of many other people? If there is an earnest desire to stop the publication of this kind of evidence I think the minister should go further and find some way of restricting the method of distribution now in vogue in this House.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: What my hon. friend says is possibly true but I would point out that this bill originated in the Senate. It may be advisable, as the hon. member suggests that no publicity of any kind should be allowed. However, what is proposed here is a beginning and is something better than is in force to-day.

Mr. BOYS: I cannot say that I would go so far as to provide that there should be no publication of evidence at all in relation to these cases. It would be impossible for the members of the private bills committee, who have from time to time to deal with divorce cases, to do so intelligently without the evidence before them; but there might be a provision that the distribution should be restricted to members of the committee, except in case of a division in the House, or something of that kind.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: This bill provides for restriction.

Mr. BOYS: That is publication in the newspapers. As a matter of fact, so far as my knowledge goes I have never seen very much publication in the newspapers. I believe that if any injury is done it occurs through the publication of about 450 copies of the petition, the evidence, and the various proceedings before the divorce committee; it is through the distribution of those proceedings that the damage is done. Therefore I would like the minister to take that into his consideration and see if something cannot be done to lessen the very undesirable publicity that is now given to such matters.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I have no objection to study the question, but I think the House should allow this bill to pass.

Mr. MANION: I would like to say a word regarding this question. There is no doubt that my hon. friend for Simcoe (Mr. Boys) is correct in regard to the distribution of the evidence taken in the Senate. As one who has three young boys growing up I am very much displeased when I read in my evening paper something I do not wish to fall under their eyes at the present time. As one who has that thought in his head, and there must be many others who look at this thing in the same way, I believe this is a move in the right direction. While I am not in favour of "uplift" movements by restriction, at the same time I think the publication in the public press of divorce proceedings, which some papers unfortunately "play up" a bit, is not to the benefit of the people of this country.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

COLD STORAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL

House in committee on Bill No. 9, to amend the Cold Storage Act, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

[Mr. Boys.]

On section 2.—Repealed.

Mr. PARENT: May I ask the minister what the proposed contract in regard to cold storage warehouses consists of?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The form of contract is in the old act, it is rather a long document. As soon as the preliminary arrangements are made this contract is entered into.

Mr. PARENT: Do I understand that this measure is restricted to co-operative societies?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. PARENT: I would like an explanation from the minister.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Subsection 2 of section 1 was amended so as to include municipalities. As amended the bill will read:

The Governor in Council may enter into contracts with properly constituted co-operative societies, or associations, or municipalities.

The words "or municipalities" were inserted in the bill in the committee on Agriculture. The provision in the old act which granted subsidies to municipal cold storages is now extended so as to include co-operative associations and societies.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Will an ordinary business association operating under the Limited Liability Act, be able to avail themselves of this provision?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That will depend in some measure on the object of the association. If the primary purpose is making profits, and it is tantamount to a profit institution, then the bill is not meant to apply to it, because it would then be in the same nature as it was at the outset. The former government changed the act so as to limit its application to municipal cold storages, but we are extending it to co-operative institutions and the vote in the estimates provides accordingly. There is only $50,000 in the estimates for the construction of cold storage plants, and if we opened it to such institutions as described by my hon. friend, one plant would gobble up the whole of the appropriation. For the present our intention is not to make it apply to institutions described by my hon. friend, unless their primary object is to give service rather than to make profits.

Mr. CHAPLIN: If according to the minister's statement he has only provided $50,000 and one private corporation could gobble up the whole of it, it stands to reason that one association such as he speaks of could gobble up the whole of it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, the hon. member is mistaken. These are institutions of a smaller nature. This $50,000 would take care of several of them.

Mr. PARENT: In addition to the questions which have already been asked I would like to know whether the minister has received representations from the Quebec Harbour Commission with regard to the establishment of a cold storage in that city. I understood from the representations made by these gentlemen that they would have liked to have a cold storage plant under the Quebec harbour board, and for reasons which have not been considered convincing up to date, the department has refused to amend the law so as to include a cold storage in Quebec city, under the supervision of the Quebec Harbour Commission. I would like to know if representations have been made to the minister, and the reasons he has to give for the refusal to give them favourable consideration.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Such representations were made to myself and my deputy, and it looked as if the Quebec harbour board desired to put up a cold storage plant. They have a precedent in the case of Montreal, where they went direct to the government and got a vote of several million dollars for the purpose of putting up a cold storage plant in the harbour of Montreal. To take advantage of this little act to construct the cold storage under the auspices of the Quebec harbour board I am afraid would be going beyond the intentions of the act. I do not think, if I remember rightly, that we turned the deputation down flatly. We seldom do that. I did not know but that the government would come down in the supplementary estimates with several million dollars for cold storage and we might be able to accede to this request, but with only $50,000 available, and with the precedent of the Montreal harbour board constructing a cold storage plant, I did not think I was able to hold out any hope to the Quebec harbour board that they could build a cold storage plant out of this vote.

Mr. THOMPSON: Does this resolution apply to the cooling of cheese in cheese factories and cold storages for cheese factories? A great many factories now are equipped with a cheese cooling room. Does this apply to factories where they wish to establish a cheese cooling room?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, that is one of the purposes in mind. I think in the hon. member's locality there are sufficient cold storages to take care of that business. However, if the co-operative institutions think differently, I think the Hon. Manning Doherty has a proposition in mind for the purpose of co-operatively marketing cheese products? If he carries out his scheme, and there is a proposition for constructing cold storage plants under it, this provision will apply. So far as I know the situation at present under the Dairy Produce Act, I think there are sufficient cold storages in these centres to take care of the curing of the cheese which my hon. friend describes. It is quite possible this act may be invoked in other parts of Canada for the purpose he describes, in which case it will apply.

Mr. THOMPSON: There seems to be a disposition on the part of the government to centralize co-operative societies in the large cities. This storage I speak of is in the city of Belleville, and the cheese factories are scattered all over the country. A cold storage operated in the city is of no benefit to the dairymen. What they want is cold storage in connection with their cheese factories. They have managed their own business, and by having the cold storage in connection with the factory they can hold their cheese and sell it at whatever time they think best, and I am very sorry to say that this does not apply, and is of no benefit, to the dairymen of central Ontario. I wish to inform the minister that these people have unanimously turned down the Hon. Manning Doherty's project. They have no use whatever for it. They feel that they want to use their own brains and intelligence in conducting their business affairs, and they would very much prefer to do so. On behalf of the dairymen, I wish to urge that this should apply to cheese factories, not to the central cold storage, which is owned by a private individual, because it would be a great inconvenience and expense to ship the cheese to those central points. In the first place the rate would be a quarter of a cent per pound on the cheese, and it costs the dairymen hundreds of thousands of dollars a year to carry out the ideas expressed by the hon. minister. On behalf of the dairymen of my district I want to protest against it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, Mr. Chairman, if we had abundance of money and the cheese factories were of a reasonable size, which they are not, it would be very nice to have a cold storage plant of some kind, or even a cooling plant, even if it were only by the use of ice, and not mechanical power at all, in each individual factory, but to burden the different cheese factories with a cold storage proposition such as this would ruin them, instead of helping them. The time may come when we will have large creameries such as they have in Australia, but we cannot install a cold storage in a small cheese factory without it being too burdensome to the institution. I think possibly that would be the ideal system, but it is impossible for the reasons I have indicated.

Mr. MARTELL: Will the hon. minister tell us what he intends to do regarding the establishment in the province of Nova Scotia of plants in which to experiment in regard to the cooling of fruit? We have a fruit growing country down there and I think at least we are entitled to something from the government for the encouragement of the fruit growing. The minister should do something in regard to experimentation there, if he does nothing else. I know he wants to do everything possible. I have every faith in the minister as have the fruit growers of the province of Nova Scotia. We have every faith also in the government; but we should like to know what is going to be done towards experimentation in Nova Scotia, where this year fruit was practically thrown out of doors, because we had no market, and the fruit rotted before we got it to the market.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think one of the first public acts that I was privileged to perform after coming down here, was to establish a pre-cooling plant in my hon. friend's constituency. Is it not Annapolis?

Mr. MARTELL: Hants.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, it was somewhere in the apple district. Representations had been made to my department in the direction of a pre-cooling plant, just like the small creameries referred to by the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Thompson). This pre-cooling plant could not stand the expense of a mechanical cold storage. Consequently it was supplied with ice-cooling appliances; but as this was done somewhat late in the year, the ice did not last as well although, as my hon. knows, the plant did excellent service. We have, I think, established the fact that it is good business to pre-cool in such cases, and do not hon. members think the next step would be for individuals concerned to get together and take advantage of the act providing for mechanical storage. We know pre-cooling is all right. The next step for Nova Scotia or any other province would be to organize a co-operative company and to get into touch with the officers of my department to find out the various steps to be taken until they are organized, and then to take advantage of this act. That would be the proper way, and I would be delighted to establish the very first one in Nova Scotia if they get busy before this amount of $50,000 is exhausted.

Mr. MARTELL: I do not want to delay this bill, because I am absolutely in sympathy with the minister in everything he is doing; but I believe not only what he is proposing now should be extended to co-operative people or to government institutions, but there should be some arrangement whereby private individuals could secure the advantage of subsidies, because often the way for co-operative and other work must be paved by private individuals undertaking the matter. People have become sick and tired, in many cases, of their experience in co-operative methods; and if a few private individuals would get together and form a company, say under the Nova Scotia Joint Stock Companies' Act, or in some other way, I believe the minister should be prepared to assist those people. If he does that, eventually we shall have in Nova Scotia the very finest methods of marketing fruit, because the minister knows that Nova Scotia has the finest quality of fruit in the world, and especially is this true of Hants.

Mr. WALLACE: I am not clear whether this applies to a pre-cooling plant operated by a co-operative society in connection with fruit or to a freezing plant in connection with fish.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This act applies to mechanical cold storage only. There is a matter I overlooked. There is in another act provision whereby a small grant of $100 for each factory can be applied for pre-cooling in just such institutions as were referred to by the hon. member for East Hastings. That is being taken advantage of. They obviously cannot put in anything except just straight ice or use what we call the brine system. That is not, however, what we are discussing here. This is mechanical storage; it can be used either for pre-cooling or for freezing.

Mr. MARTELL: Why is it proposed to take away from private individuals the benefit of this system?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We are not doing that. This is taken away now. The act as it is to-day applies only to municipalities. It was the late government that took it away from private institutions, and I think at that time they were correct. I have no criticism to make of them in that regard at all. The larger institutions built by private enterprise had received a great deal of assistance, and a new day has come now when we are introducing the idea of co-operative marketing more than ever. This co-operative marketing is going to be an outstanding feature of to-day. The private institutions have had their assistance. When they were deprived of this subsidy, it was extended for the last four years only to municipalities. We are extending it back again so as to include municipalities and co-operative associations. Therefore, this government is not the party that took the benefits of this act away from private concerns. My hon. friend, I think, knows that.

Mr. MARTELL: I quite appreciate what the minister says; but he has probably noticed in this morning's Journal that the leader of the Conservative party in Nova Scotia has introduced a resolution in the provincial legislature towards secession. Prior to 1896 it was necessary to advocate secession in Nova Scotia, because at that time we were in dire straits, but we undoubtedly have hopes that under this administration, secession talk will soon die out, because we have every faith in the present party in power. Nevertheless the minister has said that the last government took away these rights from private individuals. Cannot the minister see some way clear whereby he can permit private individuals who have foresight enough and sufficient faith in Nova Scotia to establish private cold storage plants, again to take advantage of this act? They were given these benefits by the Hon. Sydney Fisher who, with the exception of the present Minister of Agriculture, was the greatest Minister of Agriculture this country ever had.

Mr. THOMPSON: Has there been any request from any dairy organization such as the Dairymen's Association or the Cheese Board or from dairymen in general for this bill?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I cannot recall them all just now; but representations have certainly been made from many sources that this should not be confined to an activity that does not take advantage of it. The fact that it was confined entirely to municipalities is because none of those subsidies has been used at all during the last four years. This shows pretty conclusively that the act as it now stands is a dead letter, and, therefore, some change must be made or the act repealed altogether.

Mr. THOMPSON: The minister has, I think, evaded the question I asked. I asked if he had received any requests from the Dairymen's Association or from dairy organizations.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not recall being asked to make this change by any dairymen's association; but surely the right is recognized of anybody responsible for a department to initiate something himself without waiting for somebody else to tell him what to do. I know this was asked for in two or three places. If we always waited until somebody asked, that would not show great resourcefulness on our part.

Section agreed to.

On section 2:

Section 4 of the said act is amended by adding thereto as subsection 2 the following:

"(2) provided further that, in consideration of such subsidy, the owners of such cold storage warehouse shall execute in favour of the government of Canada a lien the terms and conditions whereof shall be prescribed by regulation under this act, on the said warehouse, to the full amount of such subsidy, such lien to be held by the Minister of Agriculture in perpetuity as a security that such cold storage warehouse shall continue to be available for general public use and be subject to the supervision provided and regulations prescribed by and under this act."

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have not the original act before me. Is there power under the original act to make regulations?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Just glancing over this proposed amendment, I do not think it is in just the best form; but if it has been drawn by the legal adviser of the House I do not suppose I should take objection to it. It would read much better as follows:

Provided further that, in consideration of such subsidy, the owners of such cold storage warehouse shall execute a lien in favour of the government of Canada upon terms and conditions to be prescribed by regulations under this act.

I do not like the way it is worded now, but a change of language perhaps might not be important.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We wrestled with it a good many times in the committee and I do not think it is exactly in the shape the executive council left it. The Agricultural committee mutilated it and possibly the phraseology is not what it should be. I rather like the amendment suggested by my hon. friend and if he will be good enough to draft it I shall accept it.

Mr. MARTELL: Perhaps the chairman might read the original section.

The CHAIRMAN: The original section is not before the committee; it is not in the bill. The amendment proposed by the hon. member (Mr. Guthrie) is as follows:

Provided further that, in consideration of such subsidy, the owners of such cold storage warehouse shall execute a lien in favour of the government of Canada, represented by the Minister of Agriculture, upon the terms and conditions to be prescribed by regulations under this act, on the said warehouse, to the full amount of such subsidy, such lien to be held by the government in perpetuity as a security, that such cold storage warehouse shall continue to be available for general public use, and be subject to the supervision provided and regulations prescribed by and under this act.

Mr. MARTELL: I would move as a sub-amendment that the words "or incorporated company" be inserted after the word "association" in the third line of section 1 of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 1 has already passed; we are now on section 2.

Mr. MARTELL: I do not like to dispute the word of the Chair, but the proposed amendment is an amendment to section 1

The CHAIRMAN: Section 2 of the bill is before the committee. We have already passed section 1.

Mr. MARTELL: I have the bill before me. Section 2 refers to chapter 8 of the statutes of 1909. Section 1 refers to the sort of contracts that can be entered into.

The CHAIRMAN: I have already said that section 1 is passed. Is the hon. member proposing an amendment to section 2?

Mr. MARTELL: I do not think you called for the proviso to section 1.

The CHAIRMAN: There is no proviso.

Mr. MARTELL: There is a proviso moved by my hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie).

The CHAIRMAN: There is no proviso in section 1. Shall the amendment moved by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) carry?

Mr. MARTELL: But what is it?

The CHAIRMAN: It has been moved by the hon. member (Mr. Guthrie) that section 2 be stricken out and that there be substituted therefor the amendment I have already read, which has been accepted by the minister. Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. MARTELL: No.

The CHAIRMAN: Those in favour of the amendment as moved by the hon. member for Wellington will say, yea.

Mr. MARTELL: I have before me Bill No. 9, the bill we are discussing, but I have not the amendment proposed. Copies of the bill have been supplied hon. members, and the one I have provides in section 1:

Section 2 of the Cold Storage Act, chapter 6, of the statutes of 1907, as amended by chapter 8 of the statutes of 1909, is hereby repealed and the following is substituted therefor:

That substituted section would undoubtedly take the place of the original section 2 in the act. It provides that the Governor in Council may enter into contracts for the construction, equipment and maintenance of public cold storage warehouses equipped with mechanical refrigeration and suitable for preservation of any food product. Surely you do not expect me, as representing an agricultural constituency, to accept from the committee an amendment which has never been submitted to me. I am not finding fault with the amendment the hon. member moved, but in the bill, as I have it, I wanted to insert in section 1 the words "or incorporated company" between the word "association" and the word "for" in the third line.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 1 has already been adopted by the committee; we are now on section 2.

Mr. MARTELL: Well, all I can say is that it is unreasonable to ask members to adopt legislation without the proper data before them.

The CHAIRMAN: This is the practice that has always obtained.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I would suggest that the minister move that we revert to section 1 to afford the hon. member an opportunity to move his amendment.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I distributed sixteen or eighteen typewritten copies of the amendment among hon. members. I scattered them around the chamber as evenly as I could. When we get through the bill I have no objection to reverting to section one at all.

Amendment (Mr. Guthrie) agreed to.

On section 2—Repeal.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Section 2 in the old bill should be No. 3, I presume.

Section agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: The consent of the committee is asked that clause 1 may be referred to again.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MARTELL: I beg to move that there be added the words "or incorporated company" after the word "associations" in the third line subsection 2 of section 1.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman, if those words are inserted we shall have the bill back in the same position as the original act of many years ago.

Mr. MARTELL: That is where it should be.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The late government found after a number of years' experience that the activities of private companies had been pretty well taken care of by the subsidies granted and that if continued far more money was likely to be required than the House was disposed to vote. Consequently the act was changed. True, this was during the war, but I think the change would have been made anyway. The legislation applies to muncipalities and now we have widened it to cover co-operative activities, and these have been provided for in the estimates accordingly. To still further widen the operation of the act will only result in dissipating that vote all over the country so that it will fail to achieve the purpose we have in view. For instance, the cold storage plant at Prince Rupert would require nearly as much assistance as the entire amount voted. This measure is for the purpose, as I have said, of developing co-operative cold storage plants for dairy products, fruit and fish—in a word, for anything that requires cold storage. I would be delighted to accept the hon. gentleman's amendment but the circumstances I have described forbid it.

Mr. WALLACE: The hon. minister refers to co-operative activities. In my own district we have the Norfolk Co-operative Company, which is organized under the Companies Act but is absolutely and strictly a co-operative organization. Would this bill apply to such a company?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes. I have intimated several times that where the organization was under the Companies Act but was co-operative in its nature and particularly if it distributed its profits on the basis of the business supplied, it would certainly be recognized as coming under this legislation. But that would have to be left to the discretion of the department in the administration of the act.

Mr. MARTELL: Mr. Chairman I do not want to press my amendment unduly, but if we have to rely on co-operative and municipal cold storage plants in Nova Scotia we are not going to get any. We are a small province. Occasionally we can get private individuals to build cold storage plants, and these plants must of course rely upon the agricultural and other industries to get business; but we cannot secure co-operative effort in the same way as it operates in the West or in the big province of Ontario. Therefore I think it is a mistake for the minister to take away financial encouragement from those who want to engage in this form of private enterprise. The old act contained the necessary provision to this end, and I believe it should be maintained in the present act. As I see it, the minister is actuated by a desire to get away from the big cold storage plants receiving bonuses. The Agricultural department should certainly assist every small industry that has for its object the advancement of agricultural interests. We in the province of Nova Scotia cannot get co-operative or municipal cold storage plants, and although I have every admiration for the minister, I submit it is a mistake for him to exclude from the operation of the act say, four or five individuals who may associate together for the purpose of securing a charter under the Nova Scotia Joint Stock Companies Act in order to carry on a cold storage plant. The whole tendency appears to be to discourage individual effort directed towards the promotion of agricultural industry in the small provinces. The trouble to-day is that we have democracy running riot. I am just as much a low tariff man as the Minister of Agriculture, and I am just as much interested in some phases of public ownership as he is, but when we get so far away from practical business as to endeavour to encourage co-operative and municipal effort as against the initiative of private individuals, I say we are usurping functions that governments were never intended to assume. I believe that the old act of the Honourable Sydney Fisher was the best possible legislation to encourage the erection of cold storage plants. True, time may have shown that some changes were necessary, but to discourage private initiative is to create chaos and kill industry, and, representing an agricultural constituency, I protest against such a course. I believe an individual should have the right to engage in any sort of industry, and I do not think that it is in the interests of the masses generally that municipal and co-operative bodies should be encouraged at the expense of private enterprise.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: When the bill was first introduced it did not include municipalities, but at the instance of the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) in the Agricultural committee the bill was amended to meet his views and the farming members particularly of the committee were in favour of the amendment. To extend the bill as proposed by the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) would simply defeat its purpose; in fact it now covers companies such as those described by the hon. member provided their primary purpose is service rather than profit.

Mr. MARTELL: Do you expect private individuals to invest money in an undertaking without getting a legitimate dividend upon it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They will get a legitimate dividend.

Mr. MARTELL: You say the test is public service rather than profit.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Otherwise they could not exist. If we have voted moneys sufficient to take care of that sort of activity it would be another matter, but we have not done so and are not likely to. Therefore let us not attempt to spread ourselves all over and accomplish nothing.

Mr. MARTEL: Cut it all out.

Mr. CHAPLIN: When this bill was under consideration before I pointed out the very same feature to the minister and asked him if he would consider an expansion of the clause by including the words "incorporated companies." At that time the minister said the matter would be considered and that the suggestion would likely be adopted. I certainly agree with the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) that with the restrictions laid down in the act there is no reason why incorporated companies should not
5 p.m. be included. I would point out also that the provision is that the Governor in Council "may" enter into a contract; so that the minister cannot say he is not able to prevent people from grabbing, or, to use his own expression, gobbling the whole thing. There is no obligation to enter into a contract; it says the Governor in Council "may" do so.

Amendment (Mr. Martell) negatived.

Bill, as amended, reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. MARTELL: I would ask, Mr. Speaker, that the third reading be delayed.

Mr. SPEAKER: Next sitting of the House.

FOREST RESERVES AND PARKS

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of Bill No. 82, to amend The Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1:

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think we should have some explanation of this bill.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Perhaps I had better give a general explanation of what is embodied in the bill, and then we can deal with the clauses in detail. The statement which I have is as follows:

In the accompanying schedule a new description of each of the thirty-nine reserves in included, although there is no change proposed in the areas comprising many of these reserves. The rewriting of the schedule was approved owing to the fact that the original description in the 1911 act was made by the metes and bounds system, which is a very cumbersone and complicated method, and also in view of the fact that in the numerous amendments to the original act the lands added or withdrawn have been described by section, township and range. The result is that it is a very difficult matter for anyone not familiar with the act and all its amendments to determine the lands which are included in forest reserves. In the accompanying schedule, each reserve has been described by section, township and range, all previous withdrawals or additions having been taken into consideration, and provision having been made for such alterations as are proposed in the present bill.

Manitoba

Eliminations.

It is proposed to withdraw from the Spruce Woods Forest Reserve three-quarters of a section, and from the Porcupine Forest Reserve No. 1 one-quarter of a section. These lands have been examined and found to be of possible agricultural value. It is also proposed to withdraw 38.00 square miles from the Riding Mountain Forest Reserve. All of this area except one section is included in a block isolated from the main reserve by the withdrawal of lands for soldiers settlement when the act was last amended. This isolated block has been jointly examined by representatives of the Soldier Settlement Board and of the Forestry Branch and it has been decided to eliminate it so that it may be used for soldier settlement.

Additions:

It is proposed to add 28.36 square miles to the Riding Mountain Forest Reserve. This area was withdrawn in 1919 for soldier settlement purposes but it has been decided by the Soldier Settlement Board that the lands contained therein are not suitable for soldier settlement, and, located as they are, adjacent to the present reserve boundary and consisting of lands along the south shore of Clear Lake and also of a tract frequented by the elk from the game preserve during the winter months, it is considered that this area would form a valuable addition to the reserve.

One new reserve is poposed, namely, the Sandilands. This proposed reserve is situated in the southeastern part of the province and comprises an area of 187.75 square miles and consists chiefly of sand ridges with intervening muskegs. A soil survey of the area has been made by the Geological Surveys and they classify the land contained therein as being entirely unsuited for agriculture. They recommend that it be reserved for forestry. Our report on the area confirms that of the Geological Surveys.

The total area proposed to be added to the forest reserves in Manitoba is 216.11 square miles.

Saskatchewan

The Steep Creek Forest Reserve which comprises 7.0 square miles has been included in the description of the Nisbet Forest Reserve, as the former reserve is of too small an area to be administered as a unit and is, in fact, now being administered as part of the Nisbet Forest Reserve. The Steep Creek Reserve is an established reserve and no additional area is being placed under permanent reservation by including it in the Nisbet Reserve.

Eliminations:

The withdrawals recommended in Saskatchewan consist of 2.65 square miles from the Moose Mountain Forest Reserve, .50 square miles from the Dundern Reserve, 5.25 square miles from the Fort à la Corne Reserve, .90 square miles from the Nisbet Reserve, 3.51 square miles from the Pines Reserve, 1.54 square miles from the Manito Reserve, 1.44 square miles from the Cypress Hills Reserve No. 2, .50 square miles from the Pasquia Reserve, all of which lands upon re-examination have been found to be of some agricultural value. It is also proposed to withdraw 19.50 square miles from the Keppel Reserve. These lands are either patented to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, or lands for which it is desired to grant patent to the company as a result of exchanges for areas which are now included in the reserve. It is recommended that 31 square miles be withdrawn from the Beaver Hills Forest Reserve as a result of a land classification made by the Topographical Surveys Branch.

The total proposed withdrawals comprise an area of 66.79 square miles of land considered to be of agricultural value.

Additions:

It is proposed to add .25 square miles to the Fort à la Corne Forest Reserve. This land which forms a narrow strip between an Indian Reserve and the Forest Reserve was inadvertently omitted in the original act. It is also proposed to include in the Manito Reserve two islands in Manito Lake, the areas of which amount to 2.12 square miles.

Proposed additions to forest reserves in the province of Saskatchewan amount to 2.37 square miles.

Alberta

All lands included in Dominion Parks have been excluded in the descriptions of the Rocky Mountains and Cooking Lake Forest Reserves, as re-written for the accompanying schedule.

Eliminations:

It is proposed to withdraw one quarter section from the Rocky Mountains Forest Reserve, and .31 square miles from the Cypress Hills Reserve No. 1. These lands are considered to be of sufficient agricultural value to warrant withdrawal.

Additions:

No additions proposed.

British Columbia

Eliminations:

Practically all of the lands recommended for withdrawal from reservation in this province have been applied for by returned soldiers under the soldier settlement scheme. The lands have been carefully re-examined and although found in some cases to be of doubtful agricultural value, it is considered advisable to recommend the elimination of the areas in question, as in many instances the applicants intend to use these lands in conjunction with homesteads already held in the same vicinity, and in other cases a half section is granted to one applicant so that the opportunity for successful settlement should be greater than if only the usual grant of a quarter section were allowed. The area proposed to be withdrawn from the reserves in British Columbia comprises 6.06 square miles.

Additions:

It is proposed to add to the Tranquille Forest Reserve one half section which was erroneously eliminated by the 1919 amendment to the act.

That covers the very large amount of descriptive matter in connection with the bill.

Section agreed to and bill reported.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES INVESTIGATION ACT (1907) AMENDMENT

Hon. James Murdock (Minister of Labour) moved that the House go into committee on Bill No. 84, to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Declaration by officers of trade union:

Mr. GUTHRIE: We want some explanation of this clause?

Mr. MURDOCK: The change proposed here is in order to facilitate the application that may be made for a board of investigation. It has been stated, in certain cases in the past, that committees could not make the necessary application provided for in section 15 of the act for the reason, it was said, that communications which employees committees would address to the employer were unanswered, that negotiations were not held, and that therefore they could not literally make the declaration that negotiations had been held, and that all efforts to effect a settlement as a result of such negotiations had failed. By this section it is proposed to assist in meeting that situation and if the committees can make the necessary declaration that it has been impossible to secure a conference, or enter into negotiation, and that all efforts to obtain a satisfactory settlement have failed that shall be sufficient, in the interest of co-operation as between employer and employee, to warrant the formation of a board.

Section agreed to.

On section 2.—Relation of parties pending proceedings:

Mr. GUTHRIE: We must have some explanation of this clause also.

Mr. MURDOCK: We are undertaking to put in what it has always been held section 57 meant. We are inserting such language as, it is believed, will more clearly convey the original intent. During last summer this particular phase of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act was brought to a head when it was undertaken to reduce wages before a board had sat on the controversy and had filed its award. As the result of some correspondence and negotiation in the matter the employers agreed to await the orderly consideration of the controversy involved by a board of investigation, and the filing of the award, before taking advantage of their right to change the wage schedule. There is another important thing in section 57: It is proposed to place clearly upon one of the parties to the dispute the onus or responsibility of applying for the board of investigation. In many cases in the past the employer and the employee have waited for the other to move, the one expecting that the other was going to ask for a board of investigation, neither party accepting it as their responsibility to make the necessary application. It seems as though—in the general orderly process that, I think, Canada requires in the conduct of relations between employers and workmen—the responsibility for making the application should rest somewhere. We are trying, in section 57, to define where that responsibility shall rest and to indicate to either the employer or the employee, as the case may be, that it is his responsibility under the law to make the necessary application for the board.

Mr. BOYS: Is there any compulsory feature in connection with this proposed amendment? I do not quite see what change is brought about by it. One of the parties must make application under the existing law and will not that be the same under the amendment? Unfortunately, I have not the act itself here, and without it it is very difficult to follow these proceedings.

Mr. MURDOCK: If my hon. friend will look through the bill he will see that the new words, which it is proposed to include, in section 57, are set out in italics. It is placed on the page opposite that in which the text of the proposed Bill No. 84 appears. There is the entire language of the section.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not quite clear as to the meaning of the word "desired." Will the minister explain that fully?

Mr. MURDOCK: I am quite sure my hon. friend for South Wellington will agree that an employer might indicate his intention to change a particular wage rate, either by reducing it or increasing it, as and of a certain date, but an employee can only indicate a desire for an increased wage rate, or changed conditions, as of a certain date, and it seems as though there is a very proper distinction between the intention of the employer to change wage rates and the expressed desire of the employee for changed wage rates, and that is the distinction which we propose to recognize.

Mr. BOYS: I read the bill hurriedly and when I first spoke I did not notice that section 57 was quoted on the opposite page. The language is—

> The application for the appointment of a board shall be made by the employers or the employees proposing the change in wages or hours.

Has that always been done? One party had to make the application, so far as I know the law.

Mr. MURDOCK: I only wish to say that my hon. friend's understanding was right, but unfortunately we have not found it so. I could give many concrete examples to indicate to my hon. friend that both sides have just simply marked time and done nothing, or as some would say glared at each other, and passed the buck, indicating it was the other fellow's turn to move, and nothing was done until there was a strike. That is not right, and both could state with some degree of accuracy under the law, that it was not their turn to move. There was no specific or special obligation placed upon them to take action. In other words, the employees have said that the employer should set the example, and the employer generally said "The employees are the most concerned, and they should make the application for the board." My hon. friend may be interested in knowing that by far the largest number of applications that have been made for boards have been made by employees and not by employers.

Mr. BOYS: I think the minister misunderstood what I meant. All I said was that, so far as the law was concerned at present, the application for a board must be made by one of the affected parties. As far as I can read this amendment, that is so. All the bill says is that:

> The application for the appointment of a board shall be made by the employers or employees proposing the change in wages or hours.

Suppose they do not make it, what will happen?

Mr. MURDOCK: If they do not make it, we will be in very much the same position as we have been in the past.

Mr. BOYS: Exactly.

Mr. MURDOCK: In answer to my hon. friend as to what will happen then, I cannot say. Many things have happened in the past. Strikes have taken place without a board being applied for, which is undesirable, and when these strikes have taken place I do not think there has been one case in which it has not been alleged that it was the other fellow's business to make application for the board. That has been the claim on both sides. We want to place clearly the responsibility for making the applications. We think this will help do that, and I have never before heard the contention that it would not be an additional help if we could place the responsibility for applying for the board.

Mr. BOYS: I do not see that that explanation disposes of the matter. Suppose the application is not made, are we any further ahead than we are at the present time?

Mr. MURDOCK: No, sir.

Mr. BOYS: I would like the hon. member to explain the improvement the proposed amendment will bring about.

Mr. MURDOCK: The improvement would be that we would, at least, know definitely under the proposed change who it was that had failed to exercise the obligation as a citizen of Canada, whether it was the employer or the employee. We want to place the responsibility for failure to do the thing which the public expects shall be done on the part of an employer or on the part of the employee.

Mr. BOYS: If neither responds, I do not know how you will fix responsibility. They are both in default.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I can explain the matter. I remember the question coming up on different occasions when I had to do with the administration of the act. The purpose of the law is to prevent any sudden change of conditions in regard to those utilities to which the act applies. If the employer changes the conditions, where the law provides that there may be no strike or lockout as a consequence of the change, the working man may claim—and I think my hon. friend will see that there is a sense of fairness in it—that it is but right that, inasmuch as the employer has made the change, he should ask for a board, rather than that the employee should be put in the position of appearing to be the party always agitating for a board. It simply puts on the person the onus responsible for the change in conditions of asking for the board, to avoid a strike or lockout. The result is the same, but it does not put the opposing party in a false position. If the workmen ask for a change in wages or hours, the employer need not threaten a lockout before a board is appointed. It is up to the workmen themselves to ask for a board, they being the ones who are responsible for the change in that case. It is a matter simply of trying to place, so far as the public are concerned, the onus of asking for a board on the party who is responsible for the change in conditions.

TRADE MARK AND DESIGNS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill 21, to amend the Trade Mark and Designs Act.

Mr. BOYS: I do not think this bill was mentioned last night as one of the matters which was to have been considered to-day, and I happen to know that the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) has given this subject some attention.

Mr. ROBB: I know the hon. member for South Wellington is particularly interested in the Copyright Act. This is not the Copyright Act.

Mr. BOYS: I understood he had gone into this as well. I do not want to see the business of the House held up; but if some other business could be gone on with, I should be glad.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would Bill No. 20, to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to Patents of Invention be all right?

Mr. BOYS: The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) is devoting himself to that, and he is at present in the Banking and Commerce committee. The great trouble is that all these members are engaged on various committees, and it is difficult to have them in the House. If the Prime Minister particularly wants to take up this bill, I will get the hon. member at once.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will agree to whatever my hon. friend wishes.

Mr. ROBB: The bill to amend the Trade Mark and Design Act is only a minor one, and we could go on with that while the hon. member is getting the hon. member for Vancouver Centre.

Mr. BOYS: The hon. member for South Wellington is gone, and I am told that his papers are at his house; but I am quite willing, if something is taken up for a few moments, to send for the hon. member for Vancouver Centre.

Motion stands.

PATENTS OF INVENTION

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 20, to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to Patents of Invention.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would ask the minister to explain.

Mr. ROBB: This act has not been revised since 1903, about twenty years ago. A bill was introduced in 1920; but at that time owing to other business and the lateness of the session, the bill was not pressed. The bill was again introduced in 1921, and it reached its second reading. I understand the bill had at that time been submitted by the government of the day to the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and different public bodies interested, and that it had met with their approval; but when it had reached its second reading, there was some objection from some individual manufacturers, and the bill was not pressed. Canada now desires to enter the Berne Convention, so that we in Canada shall be on the same basis with all the world. Incidentally I might say that Canada's cost for maintenance of the International Convention at Berne will run about $5,000 to $6,000 per year, and that the revenue from the Patents branch is about $250,000 a year. The experience of the officers in the administration of that department has convinced them that certain amendments to this act are very desirable in the interests of the Canadian public generally. The more important provisions in the bill relate to the manufacture and importation of patent inventions, and they will be found in clauses 40 and 41. It is thought that the proposed improvement to the act will enable Canada to join the International Berne Convention and will improve the position generally of Canadian citizens in trade throughout the world. There are some minor provisions so as to transfer to the Patent office the right to revive lapsed patents, because this now requires an act of parliament and interested parties are put to considerable expense. We propose to modify that in some degree. That is briefly the gist of the bill.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister explain to the House the full benefits of the Berne Convention?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is second reading.

[Mr. Boys.]

Mr. ROBB: We shall have that as we go along in committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 2—Definitions:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are there any changes in this clause?

Mr. ROBB: In paragraph (e) the letter "e" is added. That is the only change.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is in the word "patentee." What did it read before?

Mr. ROBB: I think it read "e" instead of "ee".

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This bill does not show, as does the last bill, what changes are to be made in it. Looking at it, we do not know what the previous law was. Instead of delaying the matter, I am going to rely on the minister. Does the minister say that there is no change in this clause except the correction of the mistake in spelling in the former section 2?

Mr. ROBB: That is my information from the department.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Patent Office.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I put the same question to the minister.

Mr. ROBB: There is no change whatever. This is the same as the old act.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Duties of commissioner.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No change?

Mr. ROBB: No change.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Powers of commissioner.

Mr. ROBB: I have a memorandum from the department in connection with this. I beg to move:

That clause 5 be struck out and the following substituted:

"5. The commissioner shall exercise the powers conferred and perform the duties imposed upon him by this act subject to the minister and in the absence or inability to act of the commissioner any officer or clerk named by the minister to perform the duties of the commissioner may as acting commissioner exercise such powers and shall perform such duties".

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the minister will state the effect of that change. What is sought to be done?

Mr. ROBB: Under the Patent Act as it stood in 1918, the Minister of Agriculture was the Commissioner of Patents and the Deputy Minister of Agriculture was the Deputy Commissioner of Patents.

In that year the Patent Office having been transferred by order in council to the Department of Trade and Commerce, by law the Minister of Trade and Commerce became the Commissioner of Patents and his deputy became the Deputy Commissioner of Patents. This was contrary to the intention of the government which, in making the transfer, intended to leave the administration of the Patent Act in the hands of the former Deputy Minister of Agriculture and Deputy Commissioner of Patents under the Minister of Trade and Commerce as a deputy minister but with the title of Solicitor of Patents.

In July, 1919, to carry out their intention, the government caused an act to be passed, chapter 64, providing for the appointment of the former Deputy Minister of Agriculture as Commissioner of Patents and that he should continue to be a deputy minister. My hon. friend will remember that. By that act the minister ceased to be commissioner and the position of deputy commissioner disappeared.

As all the powers and authority of the act were then by its terms conferred on the commissioner it was enacted by the act of 1919 that the word "minister" should be substituted for the word "commissioner" throughout the act. The powers were all vested in the minister but were to be exercised by the commissioner. As there has been no revision of the statutes since 1919 the substitution of the terms has not been made and according to the text of the Patent Act all the powers are conferred on the commissioner. In 1920, the bill, substantially in the form in which it has been recently introduced, was revised and put into form for parliament by the then Parliamentary Counsel, Mr. Gisborne, who decided that it was preferable to retain the text of the act as it stood without the substitution of the terms, and this accounts for the present form of the bill conferring all its powers on the commissioner instead of the minister. Of course it was understood that the commissioner was to be subject to the minister in the exercise of the powers given him. Having decided to retain the text of the old act, clause 5 should not be in its present form in the bill as the commissioner and not the minister is authorized and empowered by the bill to do the several things therein mentioned.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Trying to put what has been said into short, commonsense language, I suppose that the change is one which throws upon the commissioner, instead of upon the minister, the right to carry out the Patent Act; in other words, to exercise the functions which are given thereunder.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, but always subject to the minister.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So that although the powers are all given to the commissioner absolutely, the minister has the right to tell him whether he shall exercise them or not.

Mr. ROBB: Does not my hon. friend think that is advisable?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am merely trying at the moment to get at the facts. You have a general delegation of powers by parliament given to the commissioner, and then you provide that notwithstanding all this, the minister may take those powers from him at any time he likes, and the commissioner is to act only as the minister directs. Am I right in assuming that this is what the minister is doing?

Mr. ROBB: I think my hon. friend will agree that that is fair legislation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I want the facts.

Mr. ROBB: The minister of the day is the person finally responsible to parliament.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know that that is at all something we can admit. I wanted first of all to find out what the facts were before I started to debate the question. This is not an ordinary matter of administration, for the commissioner is charged with duties which are practically judicial in their character. He passes on matters of tremendous importance, and I wanted to find out whether, instead of having a particular specified officer entrusted by parliament with the discharge of highly technical and difficult duties, the act was going to provide that the minister at any time could interfere with that work and discharge these functions himself.

Mr. ROBB: Does my hon. friend argue that parliament should delegate to an official, a civil servant, if you wish to use that word, all powers of administration, removing them from the purview of parliament?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, I am not going that length at all.

Mr. ROBB: That is the logical inference from what the hon. member has said.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Undoubtedly there is an administrative side of the office, embracing the conduct of ordinary business and so forth. But there is also a judicial phase of the duties of this officer; he has to decide whether Jones shall get a patent or Smith shall be denied one, or whether any patent shall issue at all. Does my hon. friend suggest that under this scheme of legislation, which I may say I have not had the chance of reading, but which I am just following as it comes along, the minister should have the right to interfere in the issuance of a patent here or a patent there.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend knows that the commissioner is a deputy minister and exercises all the powers of a deputy, subject always to his minister. The hon. member was himself a minister and he knows that it is not the custom of ministers to interfere unduly with administration.

Mr. FORKE: The provision here also refers to any clerk; it says "or any clerk."

Mr. ROBB: Of course, there must be some provision for the business to be carried on in the absence of the deputy.

Mr. FORKE: Is it not rather serious for a clerk occupying a junior position to decide whether a patent shall be issued? The provision seems rather wide.

Mr. ROBB: What he does is always subject to the approval of the government. If my hon. friend were a minister and he appointed a clerk he would be finally responsible.

Mr. FORKE: If I were seeking a patent I should hate to have a clerk decide upon it.

Mr. ROBB: I think people do, generally.

Mr. FORKE: I have heard complaints along that line.

Mr. STEVENS: I think I see the minister's point, but this official is in a somewhat different position from the ordinary deputy. All through this act the commissioner exercises exceptionally responsible powers and discharges very onerous duties. The safeguard mentioned by the hon. member for Brandon is an appeal from the decision of the commissioner to the Exchequer Court. That, I think, adequately protects the public from that angle. While I have given the act some consideration I have not studied this particular phase of it, but it would appear that in ordinary matters of departmental routine the minister desires to bring the commissioner under his control as an ordinary deputy. I would point out however, that it would hardly do to make the commissioner subject to the minister in the discharge of his functions under the act as commissioner in the determining of applications for patents. I do not think that this should be subject to the review of the minister, because it is subject to appeal to the Exchequer Court. So that if this amendment is inserted some distinction should be made between these two classes of duties of the commissioner. Perhaps the minister might be able to clear up that point.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend must appreciate this, that we are giving no greater powers to the Commissioner of Patents than we give to the Deputy Minister of Finance or the Deputy Minister of Agriculture.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. ROBB: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, yes.

Mr. ROBB: No, they must be subject to the minister of the day.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Surely my hon. friend is not serious in suggesting that no greater powers are given here than are given to other deputies. What statutory power has the deputy of either of the other offices? We are giving great statutory power here and it is only right that we should do so. We are giving powers under the act to an officer who understands this kind of work, who has special knowledge of it, and has had expert training to enable him properly to discharge his duties. What other deputy has the same powers? You may call him deputy or anything else you like; the designation has nothing to do with this bill. His deputyship refers to his standing in the civil service, with his rights of pension and so forth. But what other deputy is in the position of extinguishing or creating legal rights, involving great sums of money, as is this deputy, if you care to describe him as such. I would suggest to the hon. minister that we proceed with other sections, bearing this point in mind. It may be that after we have gone through the act we will have no difficulty whatever in either consenting on the one hand to the amendment or on the other hand in making a slight alteration to it which while leaving the minister in complete control of the administration of the office, would protect the public from political interference in the granting of patents.

Mr. ROBB: I have no objection to delaying it, but I would point out that, admitting for the moment all my hon. friend has said, is there not all the more reason why some responsible person elected by the people should have the last word in case of dispute?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would not think so at all. I would think that what the people are interested in, in the first instance, is a proper patent law, and, next, an impartial non-political administration of that law. I would not think they would be at all interested in knowing that the person who administered it was concerned in votes in this or that constituency.

Mr. ROBB: They are not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is for the purpose of getting away from just what my hon. friend says the practice has always been, to take to the Exchequer Court the question as to whether a patent ought or ought not to be granted. I fear that under this section the minister can take the place of the Exchequer Court to some extent.

Mr. ROBB: All the powers to-day under the existing act are in the hands of the minister. We are widening them a little, transferring some of the powers to a commissioner.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And under the existing act the minister has absolutely full responsibility, there is no chance of his saying that it is the commissioner who is doing this thing; there is no chance of the hidden hand. If it is done in this way the minister, so far as the public is concerned, has no responsibility at all, for he can say that he has the active commissioner administering the act and cannot interfere.

Mr. ROBB: I am afraid my hon. friend does not understand the section. We will let it stand.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I confess I have not had a chance to go into it.

Section stands.

On section 7—Applications for patents—who may obtain patents:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Any change?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: This is partly a new clause. In line 29 there is a period of two years fixed. In the following clause it will be noted that a period of one year is prescribed. Why should two years be fixed?

Mr. ROBB: Under the old section public use or sale for more than one year in any part of the world prior to application for a patent is a bar. Under the new clause public use or sale is extended to two years. One year has been found in practice to be a very short time in which to allow an inventor to try out his invention on the public in order to ascertain whether or not it is worth patenting. This gives a little more time.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not particularly disputing that, but still I am not at all agreeing that it is a wise change, unless the officials of the department are very sure of their ground based upon extended practice. But the words in line 30, "in this country", I understand are not in the old act, and objection is taken to them on the ground that it is going to hamper inventors. There seems to be no particular reason why they should be inserted there. It is sufficient to control the situation to leave out the words I have referred to.

Mr. ROBB: Those words were put in with a view to protecting Canadian patentees against unscrupulous persons from other countries who might come in and interfere with the patentees' rights.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think, Mr. Chairman, we will get along better if before we do anything with these sections the minister will tell us just what changes are proposed. We now learn from the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) that there are two changes here. Are there any others?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think we should have all the changes of each section stated so we can understand what we are discussing.

Mr. ROBB: In the old section the word "process" does not appear in the list of inventions for which patents may be granted. Patents for processes are very numerous. They were supposed to be included in the term "art" in the old section, but it has been questioned.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So we have those three changes?

Mr. ROBB: Those three minor changes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not see any objection to the extension of the word "process" at all. As to the point raised in connection with the words "in this country," I suppose really what is behind it is this: that you might have a perfectly proper Canadian patent attacked on the ground that it has been for sale or in use for a couple of years, say, in the interior of China, and a Canadian patentee might find it very difficult to meet such a case.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend has stated the point exactly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then it seems to me to be a move in the right direction.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Inventions for which foreign patents have been taken out, etc.

Mr. ROBB: We propose to amend clause 8 by adding at the end of sub-clause 1 the following words:

or from the passing of this act if no patent has been issued on a foreign application for an invention for more than one year.

And after the word "filed" in the eleventh line of sub-clause 2, the following words:

or from the passing of this act.

It has been pointed out that in order to avoid injustice it is necessary to extend the time allowed by this clause for filing an application in Canada for a patent after a foreign application for the invention has been filed.

Under section 8 of the present act, an application may be filed in Canada by the inventor at any time within one year from the date of the earliest foreign patent granted for his invention. Under the clause as it stands the year runs from the date of the foreign application and not from the date of the patent.

Inventors who have relied on the terms of the present law would find that they would be too late to file an application in Canada as in many cases particularly in the United States patent office where the work is in arrears their applications may have been pending two or three years.

Such inventors should be allowed one year after the new act comes into force to file their applications in Canada and consequently this clause should be amended by adding at the end the amendments I have just submitted.

Mr. STEVENS: I confess it is a little difficult to appreciate the significance of these two amendments.

Mr. ROBB: We will let them stand, if my hon. friend so desires.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not press that; but do I understand from the amendment that the suggestion is that a patent might have been issued to a foreigner for one year?

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think the amendment really agrees with the minister's explanation. What I thought he meant was this: that patentees who desired to get their patents might not know about the passing of this act, and therefore if the provision were put back to the time the application for patent was made, the rights of the applicant might expire. It would appear that the minister's desire was to extend the rights of the patentees to this extent, but I do not think the amendment does that. I do not see how the stipulation about one year comes in at all. Why not simply say, "or from the passing of this act?"

Mr. ROBB: It is pointed out that an application may have been made eighteen months ago, and the patent was allowed a year; we are giving him a year from the passing of this act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the significance of these words:

If no patent has been issued on a foreign application for the invention for more than one year.

Suppose it has been issued for two years, what would the minister say then?

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister's object not be attained, as suggested by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), by saying "or from the passing of this act" and letting it end there?

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

PATENTS OF INVENTIONS

House again in committee on Bill No. 20, to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to Patents of Inventions, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the committee that clause 8 as amended carry?

Mr. STEVENS: Is the minister satisfied, after thinking this over that it is necessary to have the amendments as amended?

Mr. ROBB: Yes after discussing it with the commissioner we are satisfied that the clause should go through just as amended.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The Canadian society known as the Society of Chemical Industries have asked that an amendment be made to this section by striking out the words "in Canada" in the sixteenth line of subsection 2. I have not for the moment had time to consider what the effect of the proposed amendment is.

Mr. ROBB: If those words were struck out it would conflict with some clauses that have already been passed. We have had some representatives from the chemical association regarding clause 16, and we are largely meeting their views in that clause.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Has the minister any objection to striking out the words "in Canada"?

Mr. ROBB: It would conflict with clause 7.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I see that the society proposes an amendment to clause 7 but I was not present when that clause was being considered. They ask that the words "in this country" in line thirty of the section be deleted. I was going to ask the minister if he would refer back to that clause when consideration of the bill is finished so that the amendment might be made.

Mr. ROBB: There is a difference of opinion upon the subject. The majority of views coming into the department indicates that the clause is better as it is.

Mr. McMASTER: I may state in connection with subsection 2 that I have had the advantage of receiving a memorandum concerning this bill from one of the foremost patent solicitors in the country. In that memorandum he indicates that subsection 2 is a very desirable one and should remain as it is.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 9—Improvements may be patented:

Mr. ROBB: That is the same clause as before.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Oath of inventor to be made before obtaining patent:

Mr. ROBB: The committee will observe that there are slight changes in subsection 2. The following words have been added, after the word "dead" in this section:

"Or mentally or physically incapable, or after the assignment of his invention, the inventor refuses to make such oath or affirmation, or if his whereabouts cannot be ascertained after diligent inquiry.

Experience has shown that this addition is necessary. In a case reported to the Patent office action was taken to compel the inventor to make an oath after assignment, and it was held that the court did not have the power to make such order.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Refusal to execute assignment:

Mr. ROBB: This is new. My memorandum reads:

At the Imperial War Conference, 1917, certain amendments proposed to be made to the British act were submitted for the consideration of the delegates, with a view to their adoption by their respective governments. In the memorandum prepared by the department in connection with the Imperial War Conference in 1918 it was recommended that certain of the amendments, including the present one, be adopted, experience has shown that this amendment will be useful.

Mr. BOYS: I observe that this clause provides for an appeal. It does not say whether it may be taken in one month or six months or five years. I observe in section 20 that that feature has been considered and an appeal may be taken at any time within six months after notice has been given. I think there should be some time fixed within which the appeal can be taken. A matter of such importance as this should not be disposed of as in the last four lines of this section. It provides that one of the parties, where there are two interested in a patent, may be allowed to prosecute his application. I think that should only be done on definite notice to the other party interested. I daresay the minister will see that that is provided for. The last four lines read:

—so however that all parties interested shall be entitled to be heard before the commissioner, and an appeal shall lie from the decision of the commissioner under this section to the Exchequer Court.

I think there should be a provision requiring certain notice of a definite length of time to be given to one of two applicants who is not proceeding with the application. After that notice the commissioner might well proceed and dispose of the application as he thought best. The remaining two lines should be varied and they should provide that after notice to the applicant who has been successful, say, in ten days or two months or whatever time the minister thinks would be reasonable, the other party could appeal to the Exchequer Court.

Mr. ROBB: I admit there is some force in the argument of my hon. friend. This clause was presented at the Imperial Conference in 1917. I suggest we might let the matter stand and if the hon. member will confer with the deputy—

Mr. BOYS: If the minister thinks the suggestion is worthy of consideration I think the deputy could work it out.

Mr. ROBB: Let it stand.

Section stands.

On section 12—Election of domiciles:

Mr. ROBB: I propose to move, in substitution for clause 12, the following clause:

(a) Every applicant for a patent and patentee who does not reside in Canada shall file at the Patent office a notice in writing designating, and specifying the address of some person resident in Canada to represent and stand in the place and stead of such applicant or patentee for all the purposes of this act including the service of proceedings taken under any provision of this act.

(b) Upon failure to file such notice as above required or in the event of the person designated not being found at the address specified the applicant or the patentee as the case may be shall be deemed to have elected domicile for all purposes aforesaid at the Patent office.

(c) In the case of applications pending or patents issued at the time of the coming into force of this act the applicant or patentee shall not be in default in respect of such notice before the expiration of six months from such time.

(d) Copies of any proceedings under any provision of this act served upon or left for any applicant or patentee at the Patent office shall be forwarded by mail to his last known address.

The object of this clause is: Under the previous clause domicile was given simply in some city, without giving any address therein, and in consequence the section serves no purpose. The draft clause which we now propose is satisfactory to all interested. If the hon. member opposite desires to have this go on Hansard and stand for further consideration, I have no objection.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The first two paragraphs are perfectly plain but I did not get the effect of the last one.

Mr. STEVENS: It struck me, from what the minister read, that what he was substituting for clause 12 is more complicated than the present clause. I will admit the present clause is very brief, but it does provide that the applicant shall elect his domicile in Canada. My own notion is that the more simple we make the legislation the better. Unless there are very strong reasons for changing the section, I think it would be inadvisable to change it, but if there has been experience in the way of extensive litigation or something of that kind, of course it might justify the change.

Mr. ROBB: Experience has been that in many instances they are unable to find the patentee, who has given his address as Montreal, Vancouver, or Toronto, without designating any particular street.

[Mr. Robb.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is the hon. minister quite clear that this will only apply to non-residents?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will note in paragraph (a), it states that every applicant for a patent and patentee who does not reside in Canada shall file at the Canadian office, and so on.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are you quite sure that covers the other clauses?

Mr. STEVENS: The present clause does not refer merely to absentees.

Mr. ROBB: We propose to make it more clear.

Mr. STEVENS: Is it proposed to add this provision to the present clause?

Mr. ROBB: No, it is in substitution. It has had the approval of the law officers.

Mr. McMASTER: Section 11 of the present act provides that:

The applicant for a patent shall, for the purposes of this act, elect his domicile at some known and specified place in Canada, and shall mention the same in his petition for a patent. R.S., c. 69, s. 11.

That would cover both those who live in the country, and those who reside outside of the country. I do not see the necessity for the change which would merely put the obligation of electing domicile on some one who lives outside the country. I do not see the reason for the change.

Mr. ROBB: It is very largely because experience has been that 75 per cent of the patents issued are to non-residents.

Mr. STEVENS: If the minister drops the existing clause, then applicants who are bona fide citizens and residents of Canada would not be provided for at all, because his substitution clause refers to applicants for patents who do not reside in Canada. If the minister intends to add these three, four subclauses to the existing clause, that might be desirable: but I cannot see how we could possibly drop the existing clause altogether.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The difficulty with this clause arises from the legal fiction of the language; that is, that the applicant, although he may live out of Canada, shall elect his domicile in Canada. Any domicile so elected is not the true domicile of the applicant, and I can see reasons why an applicant might decline to elect a domicile in Canada. I think the new clause, while it is lengthy, applies to this case. One who comes from the United States, Europe, the ends of the earth, should give, in a case of this kind, an address in Canada which, if it does not reach him, will reach someone authorized by him, and that is what this amendment provides. A man living in the United States, Europe or the aforesaid end of the earth, is not electing a true domicile if he names Canada as his domicile. I think the clause as it is proposed to amend it is quite proper.

Mr. ROBB: If this will meet the wishes of the committee, there will be no objection to striking out the words "who does not reside in Canada," so that the clause will apply to every person.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It would seem rather absurd if that is done, because the clause will then read that every person who is an applicant in Canada shall specify some person who resides in Canada to do his business for him.

Mr. ROBB: He may elect his own domicile.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: "Of some person." It looks as though the person were someone other than himself. I am in no difficulty about the question of domicile in clause 12 as regards a Canadian; I do not think the clause was ever intended to apply to him in one way or the other. It seems rather absurd to say that a Canadian has to declare a domicile in Canada. This was never done anywhere else as regards a Canadian citizen; it is to cover the case of a foreigner. I think the minister will tell me that that is how the act is being administered. Am I right?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then, if I am right in that, there is one real objection to this. It is too vague and it is much better to have a specific name and address for purposes of business. Would the department use sub-clause (d) for the purpose of serving papers in that way on people in Canada who have not given that address and who have not made that nomination? Sub-clause (d) is limited.

Mr. STEVENS: Is it the intention of the minister to drop clause 12?

Mr. ROBB: No, I think we had better accept the substitution.

Mr. STEVENS: That is what I say. Does the minister intend to drop clause 12?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, the old one.

Mr. STEVENS: I must say that I disagree with my hon. friend who spoke a moment ago regarding this. It certainly is necessary to have the address of an applicant in Canada recorded, as well as that of an applicant from outside of Canada.

Mr. McMASTER: How would the clause read when amended?

Mr. ROBB: It would read:

> Every applciant for a patent and patentee who does not reside in Canada shall file at the Patent Office a notice in writing designating, and specifying the address of, some person resident in Canada to represent and stand in the place of such applicant or patentee for all the purposes of this act including the service of proceedings taken under any provision of this act.

Mr. McMASTER: I can see the advantage of having it stated that an applicant who comes in from outside shall specify someone in Canada on whom papers will be served. I do not, however, see that that is incompatible with the retention of the law as it is, that an applicant living in Canada should indicate his address, should elect a domicile. He can elect domicile at his office; he can elect domicile at his residence; or in the event of his expecting to be out of the country, he can elect domicile at some patent solicitor, or family solicitor, or his business counsel on whom he wishes papers to be served. I think the clause as drafted is a good one; but I do not think it should be substituted for the present law. It should be added to the present law, and the officers in charge of the bill should draft a bill which would cover the situation as I think it should be covered.

Mr. ROBB: If that will meet the wishes of the committee or the legal members of the committee, we can add this sub-clause 2 of clause 12.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It cannot do any harm. I do not know if it will do any good.

Mr. PUTNAM: Would that allow a man to elect a domicile not his true domicile?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think that what the hon. member for Brome is really trying to get at is this, that a man might well want to have another specific address for the purpose of service, which would not be his home address. The word "domicile" is not at all appropriate for that, but it would do no harm leaving it in, I suppose.

Mr. FORTIER: Why not leave the clause as it is and substitute the word "mention" for "elect"?

Mr. ROBB: That is what we have decided to do.

Mr. FORTIER: The clause would then read:

The applicant for a patent shall, for the purposes of this act, mention his domicile.

If he is resident in this country he will give his Canadian address and if he lives outside he can elect his address there for the purposes of the act.

Mr. PUTNAM: I agree with the hon. member. I care not whether the language is new or old, it is an anomaly to say that a man may elect his domicile.

Mr. McMASTER: That may be an anomaly under English practice, but it is not an anomaly under the practice of the civil courts of Quebec, where people constantly elect domicile for the purposes of contracts, or specifying the place at which legal papers may be served upon them.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I wish to make myself clear on this point if I can. I object to the word "domicile" being used to apply to an applicant who is not resident in Canada. "Domicile" is derived in two ways. You have an actual domicile where you live and are well known to reside, in short where you sleep at night; and you can elect another one, so long as you use it as the place where you reside, in other words where you sleep at night. There are questions of taxation that arise, and there are also questions in divorce court proceedings that come up in the United States; and there is many an applicant for a patent from Canada who is unwilling to have himself described as taking the first step towards acquiring domicile by election. He might find out when he had effected domicile that he was held to reside in that place and therefore came within the tax law or the divorce law of that country. Let us consider the case of an applicant for a patent in Canada who elected his domicile, for reasons best known to himself, in the city of Montreal. Suppose divorce proceedings should take place in one of the United States, Nevada, for instance, and he should be on the witness stand. If he were asked to state his domicile, which is a most important matter, he would give the address of the place where he resided, wherever it might be. But someone would confront him with the statement made by him over his own hand that he was domiciled in Canada. The thing is simply inconsistent; the word "domicile" is not strictly applicable in this connection; it is a heritage, a vestige of the past. Let us make it plain that the applicant for a patent in Canada shall give a specific address where he can be reached by any communication that might be addressed to him; and let us provide further that in case he is not reached at that address there will be someone there empowered to receive communications on his behalf.

Mr. MARTELL: I thoroughly agree with what has been said by the last speaker. If you leave the word "domicile" in the section you will simply leave it open to a great deal of legal argument. Anyone who has studied law knows that the law of domicile is one of the most perplexing of legal questions. We are told by the law lecturers and the text books that in order to establish domicile a person must have the animus manendi without the animus revirtendi.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MARTELL: It is all very well for hon. members to say "oh, oh" but if they do not know what the law is I cannot help that. That is the sort of law we got in Nova Scotia, the good old English law.

An hon. MEMBER: They do not understand the Latin.

Mr. MARTELL: Well, I cannot help that. The principle is that the man must have the mind to remain in a certain place and not the mind to return to the place from which he came. That is not the intention in this act. A man may be a United States citizen and may wish to secure a patent in Canada. But it is not necessary in order that he may get it that he should be domiciled in Canada; and it seems to me that the whole intention of the act is to have him designate some place in Canada where all legal documents or anything appertaining to the patent might be served on him. When the minister inserts the word "domicile" he does not realize the trouble he is laying up in store for the courts in the future; it is simply opening the door to endless litigation. I would suggest that the minister strike out the word "domicile" and insert instead the word "residence," or other words indicating some place where legal process could be served upon the applicant.

Mr. ROBB: If we do that we shall be striking out words that have been in the act for fifty years.

Mr. HANSON: That is no reason at all; it is the weakest argument. I agree with the learning exhibited by the hon. member (Mr. Martell). He was brought up in the same legal school as myself—

Mr. MARTELL: A good one, too.

Mr. HANSON: —and he recalls pleasant memories. However, joking aside, he is absolutely right, and I am glad to find myself in agreement with him for once.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I hesitate to say a word when the argument has been amongst gentlemen who are able to refer to one another as "my learned friend." .However, I want to interject a word or two of common sense after so much legal verbiage. The section may be considered from two standpoints, one with regard to Canadians and the other to outsiders. Let the Canadian have his domicile here and let the other man designate some place where papers can be served on him.

Mr. PUTNAM: That is the proposal. Now we are looking to the last hon. gentleman for the language.

Mr. BOYS: While this discussion has been going on I have been trying to draft a clause to cover the proposal. I would offer the following:

Every applicant for a patent shall, for the purposes of this act, state in his application, if resident in Canada, his address in Canada, and if not so resident, the name and address of some person resident in Canada to represent and stand in the place and stead of such applicant or patentee for all the purposes of this act, including the service of proceedings taken under any of the provisions of this act.

Mr. ROBB: We will accept that amendment.

Mr. BOYS: As a matter of fact, I am adopting in the part complained of the language which the minister had in the closing part of paragraph (a) of the proposed amendment. Someone asks me whether I said anything about street address in the clause I have drafted. I should think the word "address" would be sufficient.

Mr. McMASTER: Meaning his postal address.

Mr. BOYS: I do not think it would be necessary to mention anything about street address.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 13—Particulars required on application:

Mr. ROBB: No change.

Section agreed to.

On section 14—Specifications; place and date; drawings; duplicates; copies in place of duplicates:

Mr. McMASTER: What changes are made in this section?

Mr. ROBB: Subclause 2 is changed by striking out the words "and by two witnesses to such signature of the applicant." This is to conform to the practice in Great Britain, the United States and other countries. There are no other changes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is another change in the act; section 15 of the old act has been omitted. That section provided that "on each application for a patent a thorough and reliable examination shall be made by competent examiners to be employed in the patent office for that purpose." Representations have been made to me that the examination before a patent is granted is perhaps the most valuable part of the procedure, for it saves many a contest after the patent is granted. My proposal is that a section be added as section 14-A re-enacting section 15 of the Patent Act and adding thereto as subsection 2 the following:

The Governor in Council may make regulations prescribing the manner in which an invention shall be examined, and such regulations shall be published in the Canada Gazette and shall form part of this act.

I do not see why the clause providing for an examination was eliminated. I am informed that in Washington very special and very strict examinations take place before patents are issued, far more strict than we have ever been in the habit of applying to applications here. I suppose there has been some reason for leaving out clause 15 of the old act. Perhaps the minister would give the committee his reasons.

I have been asked to move that clause 15 of the old act in the form I have read to the committee be restored.

Mr. McMASTER: Subsection 5 of section 14 reads as follows:

The commissioner may, in his discretion, dispense with the duplicate specification and drawing, and in lieu thereof cause copies of the specification and drawing, in print or otherwise, to be attached to the patent, of which they shall form an essential part.

I would suggest that there should be inserted after the word "drawing" these further words:

and the additional or third copy of the claim or claims.

I believe this will make the subsection fit in better with the rest of the section.

Mr. ROBB: The law in its present form has worked very satisfactorily, and if the clause suggested by my hon. friend for Brome were adopted it would involve additional work, which would mean an increase in the number of employees with a consequent and very material increase in the expenses of administration without any very good results accruing.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not press my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: The following is moved in amendment by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) as section 14 (a):

On each application for a patent a thorough and reliable examination shall be made by competent examiners to be employed in the Patent Office for that purpose.

(2) The Governor in Council may make regulations describing the manner in which an invention shall be examined, and such regulations shall be published in the Canada Gazette and shall form part of this act.

The question is on the amendment.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, I am sure no one will see the objection to this amendment quicker than its mover, because no later than last night he criticized the department somewhat severely for taking on additional employees to deal with the business of the country. I am told that in Washington there are over 400 examiners employed, and on the same basis applied to our business it would involve an additional 100 employees and increase the civil government expenses about $250,000 a year to carry out the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: As I understand, section 15 has been in force all these years, and I have been under the impression that the necessary examinations took place under it. I am merely asking to put in the present bill what we have had in force since 1887.

Mr. ROBB: But experience has taught us that it has been honoured mostly in the breach.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is the difficulty. It is complained that Canadian patents do not have the same standing as American, for the reason that there is not that careful and thorough examination made in our Patent office before the patent is issued. I have heard patent solicitors in this country and in the United States make the same observation. United States patents are by no means absolute, but they are very seldom overridden by their courts as compared with the experience in our courts. The reason is that they are more carefully examined and tested before the patent is issued. This clause requiring examination has certainly been in our statutes since the act was passed, and I was under the impression that it was being carried out. If 400 examiners are required in a country like the United States, a country which has 120,000,000 people and the largest patent office in the world, I should think that from half a dozen to a dozen should do the work here. But I had thought that some examination was always made and that men were employed in the department for that purpose. If there is no examination now before a patent is granted I can well understand that the Canadian patent is not looked upon as a very valuable asset, because undoubtedly it could be upset in the courts.

Mr. McMASTER: I would like to support what the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) has said. Perhaps I am wrong, but I cannot imagine what the value of a Canadian patent would be if it is issued without any examination as to its novelty or usefulness. I have heard that the present Patent office is understaffed and that they are not coping with the work in the way we would like to see the work done. At the same time, we are rushing from one extreme to the other if we do away with any examination whatsoever. I have had an opportunity of discussing this matter with a patent solicitor of standing and he tells me that it would be a very grave matter for the people who are engaged in the solicitation of patents, and also for the patentees, if the examination is done away with. I am as strong for economy as the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is, but if we as a civilized people undertake to grant patents it seems to me that should mean that in the opinion of competent officers the process or device or whatever is being patented possesses certain elements of novelty or usefulness; and I should be sorry to see the clause struck out altogether. I quote from the clause as it stands, chapter 69 of the Revised Statutes:

On each application for a patent, a thorough and reliable examination shall be made by competent examiners to be employed in the Patent office for that purpose.

I do not know that the law as it stands might not be modified, but certainly I cannot with equanimity see this provision entirely done away with. What would be the value of a Canadian patent if there is not this investigation? And just let me point out that if the patent has not had a preliminary examination, are we not going to throw an enormous burden on the courts? Are we not going to involve the courts in the trial of patent causes to an extent that they have never been burdened with before? It seems to me that is the result which would follow.

Mr. ROBB: We do not propose to diminsh in any degree the examinations that have been held heretofore; we will have the necessary examination provided by order in council. But may I submit to the committee some references from the experiences of other countries? In France no attempt is made to examine for novelty; their system is simply registration. If it is deemed expedient, the examination may be covered by regulations to be approved by order in council when the new act comes into force. If we were to extend the examination as urged by the member for South Wellington—

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not want it extended.

Mr. ROBB: Let us take the experience of the United States patent office. On their own statement, they have failed to have a proper examination. United States patents are frequently set aside by the courts on the ground of lack of novelty in the invention—quite as frequently as our Canadian patents.

9 p.m.

Mr. PUTNAM: As frequently in proportion to their number?

Mr. ROBB: In proportion, yes. In order to make such examination as the law requires now we would have to make our examining staff at least equal in proportion to the number of patents issued to that of the United States. In the United States, for the year ending December 31, 1922, they issued 38,670 patents; in Canada during the last fiscal year over 12,000 patents were issued. The examining staff in the United States is over 400; in Canada it is about 25. To make the Canadian examining staff proportionately equal to that of the United States, about 100 examiners would have to be added at an annual salary of, say, $2,500 each, making a total of $250,000, and in addition, to provide the material for the examiners, that is to say, copies of all the patents of the world, and publications relating to inventions, including assembling, classification and translation of the same, there would have to be an annual appropriation of $250,000. So that it would mean an increased expenditure of $500,000 to this country.

Mr. McMASTER: How many applications do we have in a year?

Mr. ROBB: We put through 12,000 in the last fiscal year. At present the examination in the Canadian Patent office is confined to our own records, with a view to seeing that a patent for the invention has not already been granted, and that we are consequently in a position to grant one. If it be found that no patent is already granted and the inventor meets the other requirements of the law, the patent is granted. The inventor swears he is the first to make the invention, and his statement is accepted. If it turns out that he has made a misrepresentation and that the invention has already been patented, so much the worse for him, because his patent will be set aside by the courts. The responsibility is upon him, and the country is thus saved a vast sum of money. We have now a net revenue from that department of over $250,000. If we carry out the ideas suggested by my hon. friend, instead of having a surplus of $250,000 we shall have an additional expenditure of $500,000.

Mr. BOYS: Is it the intention of the department to relax activity in the examination of patents?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. BOYS: If it is the intention to maintain the same degree of care in the examination, why not leave the clause as it is? The clause does not give any guarantee to a patentee; it merely provides that there shall be a thorough and reliable examination. It does not say that the examination is final or anything of that kind, but it does guard against the granting of patents where they should not be granted. I have had some little experience in connection with applications for patents, and I know that people in the country have not the facilities to find out whether or not a given article can be patented; they could only do it if they had access to an extensive library. I have sometimes taken the precaution to write to Washington to get what information I could, but that information is not always reliable. Where there is no suggestion to guarantee and where the minister intends to make the same careful examination—and he will require the same number of officials to do it, why not leave the provision as it is? I have in mind two cases where after an examination the patents were refused. Now, if there is any relaxation, patents may be granted when they should not have been granted and the money of the applicants will be thrown away. I certainly want to strongly support what the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), and the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) have said. If the idea was to give a guarantee I certainly would agree with the minister. I do not think that precautions should be done away with entirely. There should be a reasonably careful examination of the patent to see whether or not it should be granted and thereby stop the issue of patents for which there is not justification.

Mr. ROBB: There would be no objection to leaving in the words "reasonable examination". If you adopt the words "thorough and reliable examination" that will not be a reasonable examination.

Mr. BOYS: I appreciate the fact that the words " thorough and reliable " are very strong and it might be inferred from their use that the patentee was practically guaranteed his patent. Supposing we adopted " thorough and careful examination ".

Mr. McMASTER: Would it not be well to go even further along that line and make such changes so that the clause would read:

On each application for a patent an examination shall be made by competent examiners to be employed in the Patent office for that purpose.

As I understand the situation it is this: The patent office is not satisfied that it has the personnel and money at its disposal to enable it to give the examination which it wishes. Well, let us leave out the word "thorough and reliable"—I do not like to see the clause struck out entirely. From the best information that I can get from those who know a great deal more about this kind of law than I do, I am very much of the opinion that it would be a mistake to cut the clause out altogether.

Mr. BOYS: Either have a careful examination, Mr. Chairman, or do not have any.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How would it be if we leave the words " thorough and reliable " out. Then it would read:

On such application for patent a careful examination shall be made.

If the words " thorough and reliable " are too strong and involve something in the nature of a guarantee they might be misleading.

Mr. ROBB: We will accept that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then I will move to strike out the words " thorough and reliable " and put in the word " careful ". This will provide for a careful examination.

Mr. ROBB: Where are you putting that in?

The CHAIRMAN: Inserting it after clause 14 as 14a:

On each application for a patent a careful examination shall be made by Patent examiners employed in the Patent office for that purpose.

Mr. McMASTER: Would it not be an advantage to retain that under the same numbering as it had in the old act?

Mr. ROBB: It would mean renumbering the clauses.

Mr. BOYS: I want to convey to the attention of the minister the same thought that I brought forward in connection with a previous clause. At the close of subsection 2 of section 16 you find these sentences—

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. ROBB: We have not reached section 16 yet.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment moved by Mr. Guthrie is as follows:

On each application for a patent a careful examination shall be made by patent examiners to be employed in the Patent office for that purpose.

The Governor in Council may make regulations prescribing the manner in which an invention shall be examined, and such regulations shall be published in the Canada Gazette and shall form part of this act.

Mr. ROBB: The commissioner points out to me that the latter part of the subsection is absolutely unnecessary as power is given in the bill to make all these regulations.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If there is such a power in the bill then that provision is not necessary.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall paragraph 2 of Mr. Guthrie's amendment be stricken out?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is about the right to make regulations by order in council?

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 15—Models and specimens:

Mr. ROBB: That is the clause in the old act.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—Patents to be for special methods or processes of manufacture:

Mr. ROBB: I wish to move that the section he amended by striking out the word "or" where it appears for the second time in the second line and substituting therefor the word "and".

Mr. STEVENS: In both cases?

Mr. McMASTER: How will the clause read then?

Mr. ROBB: It will read:

In the case of inventions relating to substances prepared or produced by chemical processes and intended for food or medicine—

And so on.

Mr. GUTHRIE: A suggestion made to me in regard to this proposed amendment is that instead of the word "and" the two words "which are" should be substituted. The wording would then be:

—produced by chemical processes which are intended for food.

Mr. ROBB: It is all a question of language whichever my hon. friend prefers.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think, perhaps, that "and" is a better word to use. I would agree to using the word "and" there.

Mr. McMASTER: Will the hon. member for South Wellington read the clause as amended by the addition of those words?

Mr. GUTHRIE (reading):

In the case of inventions relating to substances prepared or produced by chemical processes and intended for food or medicine.

That is the way it will read after the amendment is made. I am quite satisfied if the word "and" is put in instead of the word "or".

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister note that in clause 7 we have made provision for:

Any person who has invented any new and useful art, process, machine, manufacture or composition of matter—

It provides in that clause for the patenting of "composition of matter". Now in clause 16 we have these words:

—the specification shall not include claims for the substance itself.

I understand from those who are intimately acquainted with these matters that in other countries, particularly in the United States, chemists and others are not only allowed to patent a process but they are allowed to patent the substance produced. Illustrations were given to me of such things as this: rubber articles made of some chemical composition such as ink bottles and many other articles that are in daily use. I am not clear in my own mind that this clause prevents what it is claimed to prevent. It prevents the patenting of the substance itself. Unless it can be shown very clearly that there is some reason why that should be, it strikes me that it is a particular injustice to the investigating or experimenting chemist who is constantly experimenting with different processes and substances, and I think he is, perhaps, one of the most useful investigators that we have in industrial life and should be encouraged. Perhaps the minister has before him some explanation of that.

Mr. CALDWELL: I will point out that this particular clause only applies when the article is intended for food or medicine.

Mr. ROBB: It has been pointed out that if a man has a process and gets a patent, he is protected for that particular product made in that way. It does not prevent any other person from obtaining a similar product made in another way. You cannot tie it up in that way.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can the minister tell us if that is the law in any country? For instance, we have the discovery of insulin, which is produced in a particular way. Under the law in any country, could that product be patented so that nobody else could make it, no matter what process he adopted?

Mr. ROBB: No; they could do it in most countries in the world. What does my hon. friend suggest?

Mr. STEVENS: This is really a very important matter indeed. I have before me a memorandum on the subject which was handed to me and I will read a clause or two from it. Perhaps it will give it more clearly than I could describe it in my own language. This memorandum reads:

The patenting of a new substance, apart from the method of producing it, prevents importation of the same article, and it would be practically impossible to demonstrate how that same article is made in foreign countries.

I pause there. There might be some articles, such as I have mentioned, used every day in the office or household which are imported from another country, of a hard rubber type, made by some chemical process. Now, a chemist who discovers that is entitled in equity I think, not only to patent his process, but he is entitled to patent the article itself, because he is the pioneer in the discovery. That is, he discovers that by certain chemicals being combined, a given result will be achieved. He discovers that. Then someone else might vary the process and produce a similar result. The first man loses practically all the value of his research or invention. That is really the point I am trying to make, and I apprehend from the minister's reply that he is not certain in his own mind at all that in other countries this is not the case. If we were definitely assured that in other countries they never had this, I grant you that would be a strong argument, but I understand the minister to say that in other countries they did allow the patenting of the article.

Mr. ROBB: This change is the result of a conference held in 1917, as I pointed out before. This is identically the same as was brought down by the preceding government in 1920 and 1921. My hon. friend made a reference to a patent on inkstands. This section only applies to foods and medicines.

Mr. STEVENS: I really do not think that alters the fact. I had used the illustration because I had in mind these hard rubber products which are very common, and as to the fact that was brought out before, the minister, I am sure will admit that we are not seeking to criticize the bill unfairly.

Mr. ROBB: Oh, no.

Mr. STEVENS: It is a very technical bill and while I have given considerable thought to it, I confess it is most difficult to follow without having expert advice. I do not know much about the conference to which he refers, but in the United States, which is our chief competitor after all in these matters, they do allow patenting the process of an article.

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps my hon. friend is right in that respect. For the information of the committee, I will read the following notation—

At the Imperial War Conference, 1917, certain amendments proposed to be made to the British Act were submitted for the consideration of the delegates, with a view to their adoption by their respective governments. In a memorandum prepared by the department in connection with the Imperial War Conference in 1918 it was recommended that certain of the amendments, including the present one, be adopted; experience has shown that this amendment will be useful.

The following memorandum was submitted to the Imperial War Conference of 1917 by the British Board of Trade in connection with this amendment.

"Patents in respect of inventions relating to drugs or medicines.—Various instances have occurred in which Germans have patented a process for producing a new drug or medicine and have also a separate patent or a separate claim for the substance produced by the patented process. The result is that nobody can, until the expiration of the patent, make the drug or medicine by any other process. In some cases the process only in such cases is allowed to be patented. In the amendment now proposed no patent is to preclude the premanufacture or the free sale or use of any article for human food or medical purposes."

Mr. McMASTER: I appreciate the fact that, with the change to which the minister has consented, substances of food, or medicine cannot be patented, though processes can. I asked myself the question whether that is quite fair. Why should a man who through chemical discovery and experimentation, has arrived at a valuable medicine, be deprived of the privilege which is given to a brother inventor who has found out some mechanical device which has increased the happiness or the safety of humanity? Are we not likely to defeat the very purpose of the law as proposed in the bill? We want people to invent good medicine and good food, but what incentive will there be for them to do so, if, although the process can be patented, the substance cannot be patented? If after the substance has been put on the market it may be possible, by chemical analysis of that substance, to readily arrive at some other manner of making the food or medicine, then the patented process may be of little or no value, because the substance can be made in another way. I do say that the object of the bill as proposed does make available for the public patented medicines, patented food, giving to the patentees merely the right of the patent on the processes by which he made the medicines or the food. But are we not likely just to defeat the object of the bill by taking away the incentive to chemical scientists to develop, along the line of food or medicine, inquiry and invention? It seems to me that the clause in the bill is hardly fair. If we admit the public policy of granting patents, why should we limit them in any way to take away from a man who has invented a good medicine or food, what he would have received had he invented a good rubber tire?

Mr. ROBB: It may interest the committee to know that this clause, with the proposed amendment, has been submitted to and approved by the chemists of Canada.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Hardly approved, according to the instructions I have.

Mr. ROBB: With the amendment as suggested by my hon. friend.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Perhaps I had better read my instructions on that point. This is a letter from the Chemists' Association:

The clause as it stands is of such wide scope that it is unfair to the chemist, depriving him of the right to patent any article the manufacture of which depends on a chemical process. We consider such a position indefensible. As amended—

That is, with this change.

—medicinal and food products become non-patentable. We should like to see certain other chemical products made unpatentable also, but the difficulties of legal definition have been too great to enable us to express our full wish, nor are we confident as to what might be the consequences to the manufacturer of having such wishes embodied in law.

Under those conditions they are willing to accept the amendment proposed by the minister.

Section 16, subsection (1), as amended, agreed to.

On subsection (2)—No patent to preclude free manufacture or free sale or use of article for human food or medical purposes:

Mr. BOYS: This was the clause that I was going to refer to a moment ago. We have the same difficulty here in the last paragraph of the clause:

Any decision of the commissioner under this section shall be subject to appeal to the Exchequer Court.

Again I say that there is no time within which the appeal should be taken. Various appeals are provided under this bill, and it would seem to me that there should be in the bill a general clause providing that all appeals should be taken within a certain time.

Mr. ROBB: Would it suit to insert, towards the end of the bill, a clause covering all this?

Mr. BOYS: Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Do the regulations of the department not provide for that?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. BOYS: That ought to be in the act. When people want to know where they are at, they produce the act.

Mr. ROBB: The commissioner has made a note of that point.

Section 16, subsection (2) agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 17—Withdrawal of application:

Mr. ROBB: This is the old clause.

Section agreed to.

On section 19—Notice to applicant:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is there any change?

Mr. ROBB: No change.

Section agred to.

On section 20—Appeal to Exchequer Court:

Mr. ROBB: This is new. This clause is simply the enactment of 3, 4 George V, chapter 17, amending the Exchequer Court Act, which in effect repealed section 19 of the present act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not follow that. What is new about it? This looks rather as if it was old.

Mr. ROBB: It is new. Section 19 reads:

(1) Every applicant who has failed to obtain a patent by reason of the objection of the commissioner as aforesaid may, at any time within six months after notice thereof has been mailed by registered letter, addressed to him or his agent, appeal from the decision of the commissioner to the Governor in Council.

We propose to substitute this:

(2) The Exchequer Court shall have exclusive jurisdiction to hear and determine any such appeal.

Section agreed to.

On section 21—to be decided by Exchequer Court.

Mr. BOYS: I would like to suggest this. Where there are conflicting applications, is there any reason why the commissioner should not be called upon to give a decision in the first instance? This would probably dispose of the matter in the large majority of cases, and then provision should be made whereby either party could appeal from the decision of the commissioner to the Exchequer Court.

It does not seem to me that any lawyer has been engaged in connection with the framing of this measure. It is all very fine to say that these things are technical; but when one comes to apply the act, one does not know what in the world to do. Procedure should be provided for in these various sections. This section reads:

In case of conflicting applications for any patent, the applicants shall be notified by the commissioner that the question is one for the decision of the Exchequer Court, and no further proceedings shall be had or taken by the commission concerning the applications until a judgment is produced deciding which applicant is entitled to the patent.

Surely some procedure should be provided. How are you going to get to the Exchequer Court? What are you going to do? Where is the provision that anybody picking up the act can find, setting forth what he has to do to go to the Exchequer Court, when he may go, how he may go?

Mr. ROBB: I am informed that the procedure will be found in the Exchequer Court Act.

Mr. BOYS: Then insert in this bill the words "in accordance with the provisions of the Exchequer Court Act," so that there will be some reference to the procedure the applicant must follow.

Mr. McMASTER: I hope the hon. gentleman will not propose that until we discuss whether this clause will remain as it is or not.

Mr. BOYS: All I am doing is to make one or two suggestions that occur to me on a hurried perusal of this measure. I am more insistent on the first point. I cannot see that the power given under this legislation to the commissioner is too great. He must necessarily become familiar with patents, with the law regarding patents, and he could surely be called upon to give a decision in the first instance. In probably nine cases out of ten that would put an end to the matter. I do not wish to make his decision final by any means, and I would suggest that an appeal should be given from his decision to the Exchequer Court in accordance with the practice set out in the Exchequer Court Act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Upon the suggestion of the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys), I am going to move as an amendment—

Mr. ROBB: Before my hon. friend moves his amendment, we propose to amend this clause 21. We propose to strike it out and to substitute the following, really the present law.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The present clause is one to which, I think, great objection has been taken. It is the old arbitration clause. It provides that where there is any conflict between applicants for a patent, three arbitrators shall be appointed. The machinery is very cumbersome and the proceeding is very often long drawn out and expensive. I agree entirely with what the hon. member for South Simcoe says. We have a Commissioner of Patents. In the vast majority of cases, he can decide as between conflicting claims, and I am satisfied that his decision will be accepted in the great majority of cases. But at the same time I believe there should be an appeal from his decision. That is the view of many public bodies in the country and people interested in the question of patents, and an amendment has been prepared along that line. Upon the suggestion of the hon. member for Simcoe, I move:

That section 21 be struck out and the following be substituted therefor:

(1) In case of conflicting applications the commissioner shall determine the right of the applicants to receive a patent or patents for the invention involved.

(2) Any decision of the commissioner under this section shall be subject to appeal to the Exchequer Court.

That simplifies the procedure very much. That will avoid delays consequent upon arbitration and also save the expense of arbitration. As I say, in the vast majority of cases the decision of the commissioner will be the one accepted. In very important cases there will no doubt be appeals.

Mr. ROBB: Before the hon. member presses his amendment, may I point out that the present method which we propose gives an option either of arbitration or of appeal to the Exchequer Court. The proposition my hon. friend makes means additional expense in the administration of the department. It will mean an additional staff in the office and more lawyers, with possibly more delay. What the hon. member is suggesting really is that we set up a court in the patent office. We have the Exchequer Court now which is proving satisfactory; and there is the option either of appeal to that court or of recourse to the board of arbitration.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not the point at all. The minister surely does not mean to suggest that the commissioner has any knowledge of these applications. When applications are made, if there is any conflict they must be submitted to the commissioner before he can notify the parties according to the section, that they must go to the Exchequer Court. So that what he certainly ought to do would be to give his decision, having had the two applications before him, and then there could be an appeal. I cannot for the life of me see how that would involve a larger staff. As to adding to the staff by engaging lawyers and holding court, that is not the idea that either my hon. friend or I have in mind. We simply suggest that the commissioner, with his practical knowledge of patents, and having perhaps a wider knowledge of this business than any other man in Canada, should decide what in his opinion is right as between two conflicting applicants.

Mr. ROBB: But he cannot possibly decide before hearing fairly the evidence from both sides.

Mr. STEVENS: It is not a question of evidence; it is a question as between two applications.

Mr. McMASTER: I rise to support the proposal that the cases should not be flung into the Exchequer Court before the commissioner has given a first decision. I agree with what has been proposed, but I believe that it might be wise to indicate the procedure which should be followed by the commissioner when there are two applications in conflict. I understand that the proper term is that they are in interference; that is to say, the claims made by each applicant conflict. I propose that we should follow the procedure which is observed in the United States in this regard. In view of the close business relationship that exists between the two countries I think it is not unwise to have our procedure in our patent office follow on not dissimilar lines from the procedure in the American office. What they do there is this:

In case of conflicting applications the commissioner shall determine the right of the applicants to receive a patent or patents for the invention involved.

The commissioner has had the thing before him; he is conversant with the matter before the conflict arises. What I want to bring before the committee is the procedure that should be followed to carry out the proposal of the hon. member for Wellington, that there should be a decision from the commissioner in the first case.

(2) The nature of the conflict shall be clearly pointed out to the applicants and each of them shall be required, within a time fixed by the commissioner, to file in the Patent office a preliminary statement under oath setting forth the earliest date on which such applicant conceived the invention involved in the conflict and such other facts as the commissioner may require. Any applicant who fails to file such statement when required shall be deemed to have conceived the invention only on the date of his application for patent in Canada.

What I am told by one who is very much more familiar with these matters than I am is that when two conflicting applications get into interference, the contesting applicants, as a rule, withdraw their weaker claims and finally by agreement reduce the contest between them to quite narrow limits. Then:

(3) Each applicant shall, within a time fixed by the commissioner, file in the Patent office written statement of testimony taken under oath, together with such other matter as he considers necessary to establish his right to a patent; provided that if such testimony or other matter should prove a date of conception earlier than set forth in the preliminary statement of such applicant, the applicant shall be deemed to have proved only the date set forth in his preliminary statement.

(4) The commissioner may summon any applicant or other person to appear at any place and before any person mentioned in the summons and may require him to give evidence on oath orally or in writing (or on solemn affirmation if such applicant or person is entitled to affirm in civil cases) and to produce such documents and things as are requisite to the full investigation of the conflict, and the commissioner shall have the power to enforce the attendance of such applicants and other persons, and to compel them to give evidence, as is vested in any court of justice in civil cases, in the province where such applicant or person is summoned to appear.

(5) A patent may be involved in conflict with an application; provided the date of such patent is not more than two years prior to the date of the application; and in such cases the patentee shall be governed under this section in all respects like as an applicant.

(6) Anything in the Exchequer Court Act and amendments thereof, or in any other Act, to the contrary notwithstanding, the commissioner shall have exclusive primary jurisdiction to determine the grant of a patent in any case of conflict between applications or between an applicant and a patent as in this section provided.

(7) Any applicant or patentee to whom an adverse decision is rendered by the commissioner under this section, shall have the right of appeal.

The committee will see that I follow the main lines of the proposal made by the member for Wellington, namely, first a decision by the commissioner and then an appeal to the Exchequer Court. I have merely indicated in my remarks the procedure which I propose that the commissioner shall follow, which is the same procedure which is followed in the patent office of the United States. Now, answering the minister as to the question of cost If the matter is referred immediately to the Exchequer Court, the patent solicitors, who form really a distinct body of lawyers and who sometimes are not even barristers, will have to employ counsel to appear before the Exchequer Court. On the other hand, if my suggestion is adopted, the conflict will be determined by the commissioner, which determination is likely to be accepted by both parties so that an appeal to the Exchequer Court might be avoided. It does seem to me a great mistake to throw the case into the Exchequer Court before there has been a preliminary investigation by the commissioner and a chance given to the parties to get together and confine the scope of their conflict to the narrowest limits. The Exchequer Court probably has the largest jurisdiction of any of our courts, and if it is to be the tribunal of first instance in this case those concerned may have to travel from Halifax or from Vancouver to Ottawa to appear before the court. The procedure which I indicate gives wide powers to the commissioner to appoint other commissioners for the hearing of evidence and provides a practical and well thought out scheme for the adjudication of the dispute—a scheme which has been followed in a jurisdiction very similar to ours for some years past.

Mr. ROBB: As there appears to be a conflict of opinion I will put in the original motion I made:

That clause 21 of Bill 20 be struck out and the following substituted as clause 21—

Which is really the old act. We will allow the section to stand so that hon. gentlemen may consider it. I would point out again, however, that the experience of the department is that the method employed in Washington is very objectionable compared with ours, and that ours is the most economical and the most satisfactory to all concerned except the patent solicitor. I admit that he would like to get an additional fee from his client.

Mr. McMASTER: He does not get the fee; some lawyer does.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Surely my hon. friend is not serious in suggesting that arbitration is cheap and satisfactory. We have generally found arbitration the most lengthy, expensive and unsatisfactory method of settling differences.

Mr. ROBB: There are two options, arbitration or the Exchequer Court.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They have a right to go to both?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Surely if my hon. friend thinks that arbitration is not satisfactory—and we all agree that it is not—he will admit that some indication should be given to the Exchequer Court as to what the department's views are. That is practcially all that is asked. I hope that my hon. friend will think this over before he comes to a conclusion.

Mr. ROBB: We will let it stand.

Mr. BOYS: Does the act provide for two courses, one by arbitration and the other direct to the Exchequer Court? If so, it must be by amendment, for it is not in this.

Mr. ROBB: It is provided for in the Exchequer Court Act.

Mr. BOYS: Section 20 provides for the disposition of conflicting applications, and they are to be disposed of under that section by arbitration. As the section is to stand over I shall not prolong the discussion, but I do not want the minister to think that in making the suggestion I did I was trying to provide work for lawyers. I had no such thought in my mind; quite the reverse. I was trying to simplify and improve the procedure for those seeking patents. If you want to make it expensive and cause delay and inconvenience, all you need do is go back to section 20 and adopt the cumbrous process of arbitration. which lasts very much longer, costs very much more, and half the time when one of the parties is dissatisfied it is not very difficult for him to upset the award.

Section stands.

On section 22—What patents shall contain and confirm, etc:

Mr. ROBB: No change.

Section agreed to.

On section 23—Patents for inventions by persons in public service, etc.:

Mr. ROBB: This clause has been added to the bill at the request of the Honorary Advisory Council for Scientific and Industrial Research. It refers to patents for inventions made by scientists employed in the public service in the course of their employment. While allowing the inventor to obtain patents for such inventions, it establishes the rights of the public therein and conserves the same.

Mr. BOYS: A moment ago there was an effort apparently to escape from responsibility on the part of the commissioner; in this section we have the converse. Under subsection 2 he is given absolute jurisdiction. It is debatable if there should not be a right of appeal.

Mr. ROBB: We will let that stand for consideration also.

Section stands.

On section 24—Form of issue:

Mr. ROBB: That is the old clause.

Section agreed to.

On section 25—Term limit:

Mr. ROBB: That is the same clause as in the old act.

Section agreed to.

On section 26—Issue of new or amended patents:

Mr. ROBB: There is an amendment to this clause by adding after the word "date" in the eighth line of subclause 1 the words "or within one year from the passage of this act."

Mr. McMASTER: Mr. Chairman, I suggest this with diffidence because I am not sure whether there will be any objection to it, but is there any objection to giving the right to a patentee to ask at any time during the life of his patent for the correction of clerical or typographical or other obvious errors? I have had placed in my hands a memorandum concerning this act, in which the author says:

> In view of the fact that this section limits the period for re-issuing patents to four years, it seems advisable to add a paragraph by means of which minor errors may be corrected any time during the life of the patent. The following is suggested:
> "(5) Any time during the life of a patent a patentee may make petition to the commissioner for the issue of a certificate of correction, and if the commissioner is satisfied that the correction desired to be made relates to a clerical, typographical or obvious error, the correction of which will not alter the scope of the patent, the commissioner shall, upon payment of a fee as hereinafter provided, issue a certificate of correction in duplicate, one copy of which shall be attached to the patent under the seal of the Patent office and become a part thereof, and the other copy of which shall remain of record in the Patent office, and after the issue of such certificate the patent shall be read as corrected by such certificate."

I am not sufficiently familiar with patent practice to say whether a case like this often occurs, but the suggestion seems to be a reasonable one.

Mr. ROBB: On the face of it it sounds reasonable, but in practice it might lead to abuses. It is very hard to determine what is really a clerical error, and the experience of the department is that it is better not to accept the suggestion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Offhand I would certainly agree with the hon. member for Brome that if an error was made it should be corrected. It does not make any difference whether we discover it this year, next year or the year afterwards. What is the principle underlying the idea that a patent, once issued, cannot be corrected?

Mr. ROBB: If it is shown that the mistake occurred in the office, the correction can be made, and in practice that is done. But if you admit a clause such as the one suggested you are opening the door to abuses. It is unnecessary language to add to the provision.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What kind of abuses might be anticipated? Is it feared that under the guise of making a correction some other novelty may be covered by a patent without any additional patent fee?

Mr. ROBB: There is a possibility that the opportunity might be taken to extend the scope of the patent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Surely it would be known whether the man was fairly putting his patent into such shape that he could support it and use it, or whether, on the other hand, he was using the power of amendment for the purpose of extending the patent.

Mr. ROBB: He is enabled to come back within four years; that is a reasonable length of time.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not want to press this unduly, because I cannot give a specific case, but I presume that this has happened in practice, or the matter could not have been placed before me. I can easily understand that a patentee might receive his patent, and, taking it for granted that the work had been accurately done, he would not scrutinize it or make any exact comparisons. Perhaps six or seven years afterwards he gets into a lawsuit concerning the patent. The patent is read over with the greatest care; obviously clerical errors are found, and the patentee feels that before going into the court with the document those errors should be corrected. That is an easily supposed case which is, I think, of the nature of those intended to be covered by the suggestion I have made. I would invite the minister's attention to that phase of it.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 26 as amended carry?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suggest that the minister will probably want to consider the suggestion made by the hon. member for Brome. In the case of a purely technical error, a mere oversight, what bearing has the question of a time limit upon the making of a correction? In other words, if it is justice to correct it, why place anything in the way of doing the right thing simply because a year has expired from the date of the passing of the act?

Mr. ROBB: The experience is that by a change of wording the scope of the patent might be extended, and in the meantime the public has been using it. Four years is a reasonable length of time; there is no hardship to the patentee at all. The hon. member for Brome, I understand does not press his amendment.

Mr. McMASTER: I am not going to divide the committee on it, because I do not feel strongly enough about it. But it seems to me to be a fair suggestion.

Section as amended, agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: There are a few old clauses that we might put through. There are no changes in 27 or 28.

Sections 27 and 28 agreed to.

On section 29—Patents to be assignable:

Mr. ROBB: There is a slight amendment here. At the Imperial War Conference of 1917 certain amendments proposed to be made to the British act were submitted to the consideration of the delegates, and in a memorandum prepared by the department in connection with that conference it was recommended that certain amendments, including the present one, be adopted. Experience has shown that this amendment would be useful. That applies only to subsection 2 of section 29 of the bill which reads as follows:

> No assignment of, or any other instrument affecting the title to, a patent or any interest therein, or a license to use a patent, shall be admitted in evidence in any court unless it has been registered in the Patent Office.

Mr. BOYS: I do not know whether the minister wants to finish by ten o'clock, if he does I would ask him to let this section stand. I certainly want to oppose this suggested change. I can see no reason for it, and I think it would be very unfair in many cases.

Mr. ROBB: Let it stand.

Section stands.

PATENTS OF INVENTION

House again in committee on Bill No. 20, to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to Patents of Invention, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 29—Patents to be assignable:

Mr. BOYS: I wanted to offer some opposition to sub-clause 2 of this clause; but I understood there would be no objection to striking it out. If that is the case there would not be much object in speaking at length in connection with it. I can see no reason why an assignment, even if not registered, should not be given in evidence in a court, just as much as a deed between two parties. It is perfectly true that to protect third parties registration is necessary; but as between the parties themselves if an assignment has been validly completed and executed, I can think of no reason why that assignment should not be produced in any court of justice and given as evidence. I do not want to discuss the matter longer if sub-clause 2 is going to be cut out; but if not, I will do so.

Mr. ROBB: I can see some force in the observations of my hon. friend. This clause was inserted in connection with the Imperial War Conference of 1918; but while it has been found useful, it is not absolutely essential I therefore move that subsection 2 of section 29 be struck out.

Motion agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 30—Assignments in case of joint applications:

Mr. BOYS: What is the intention of this section? There is no reason why there should not be a provision requiring the registration of an assignment in the Patent office, but is it the intention of this section that any assignment not registered shall be invalid? If that is the purpose of the section I think it is a mistake, and my remarks in connection with subsection 2 of section 29 would be equally applicable to this section. I can quite understand that you want to have assignments registered, and it is very proper that they should be registered. It would, therefore, be advisable to provide some penalty if assignments were not registered. I fear, however, that the section as it stands might be constructed to mean that if assignments were not registered they would be void. There is no reason why they should not be perfectly good as between the parties to the assignment, although invalid as against third parties.

Mr. ROBB: The commissioner tells me that this section has been in the act ever since it has been on the statute book.

Mr. BOYS: Even if it has, I do not think that is sufficient reason. Can the minister tell me whether he considers the section to mean what I have indicated, namely, that an assignment is bad in any event if it is not registered?

Mr. ROBB: We might let the section stand for further consideration.

Mr. STEVENS: I might point out to the minister something which I know must impress him, that is, the exceedingly complicated nature of the bill, which is really a complete revision of the Patent Act. I have been trying in my own way to give a reasonable amount of study to it, but the more I see of it, the more I learn about it, the more convinced I am that I know comparatively little about it; and I do not believe that, except for a very very few, others have a much greater knowledge of the bill than I have. If there ever was a piece of legislation that should go to a special committee, where the representatives of the department and, if you like, the representatives of the manufacturing interests, as well as chemists and others who are engaged in the laboratory and other investigatory work, might be invited to give their views upon it, this bill undoubtedly is legislation of that character. It is exceedingly difficult to criticize intelligently the sections of such a bill as this, the contents which have not been carefully studied, because we are met with just such answers as the one the minister has given us, which unquestionably has a good deal of force in it, if one understands it, and that is that the section has been in the act ever since we have had an act. On that account one hesitates to disturb it because it may have some other relations which we should not like to interfere with. But the minister's reply is scarcely satisfactory in view of this fact: as nearly as I can learn, in constructing the new act the draughtsman has lifted out of the British act whole sections and just conveyed them into this legislation. I have no reason whatever to assert that they are not entirely fitting; but certainly the House is not passing intelligent judgment on that fact under the present circumstances. Nor do I know that any of us are able intelligently to criticize the bill. The only way in which we can consider legislation of this kind is to have it go to a committee who can hear the views of the officials of the department and others who are conversant with the subjects it deals with. I am afraid it will be impossible for me to present properly the views I have in mind on several sections in the bill owing to their highly technical nature. One hesitates to speak dogmatically about a technical matter in the way we are forced to speak in the House, where one might by a little questioning get a correct understanding of ordinary subjects. But this is only one instance of the difficulties that are to be encountered in this bill. As we proceed and come to clauses 38, 40, 41 and 42, which are the main sections of the bill, I, at any rate, shall be quite reluctant to give my consent to the bill. I do not suppose that it makes much difference whether I do that or not; but certainly I cannot agree to the bill going through as it stands. I feel we are going to make errors that perhaps will be serious to many of the interests of the country; whereas if the bill went before a special committee it could be studied with some degree of that thoroughness and effect which it deserves.

Mr. HANSON: I agree with a great deal that has been said by my hon. friend. I have studied the bill somewhat and I believe that if it were submitted to a special committee, where there could be free interchange of opinion with the experts of the department, the underlying reasons for certain sections would be more apparent than they are now. I do not know whether it is possible at this stage to have the bill go before a committee. Reverting to this very section, 30, if it means anything it means that assignments must be registered; otherwise they shall not be valid. I do not think there should be any such intention; the assignment should be valid as between the parties. It should be perfectly good whether registered or not, but as against third parties it should be registered. I wish the minister would give some consideration to that view.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is no doubt right in so far as the assignment relates to third parties. As regards the observations of my hon. friend for Vancouver, it is a little late in the session to suggest referring the bill to a special committee, when so many committees are already at work. May I observe again what I pointed out on Friday in introducing the bill, that it is precisely the same as that introduced in 1920 and again in 1921 and which reached a second reading. It therefore seems to me that no good purpose can be served by delaying the measure. Generally speaking it has met with the approval of all interests, with very few exceptions. As a matter of fact there is no opposition before the department. While some requests have been made to me that the bill be referred to a special committee, I rather gather that these requests have come from sources that want to tie up legislation altogether. It is not the policy of the government to introduce such a measure and let it drop again by the wayside. This is the third time the bill has been introduced, the first time before this parliament, and twice before a previous parliament. I think we had better make some progress with it here, because it will have fair consideration in this Chamber and it can be considered fully in the Senate again. We can serve no good purpose by delaying it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think the closing sentence of my hon. friend's remarks really gives the key to the whole situation. This bill is to have proper consideration in the Senate, and because it will have proper consideration there, there is no reason why we should not get rid of it, knowing little if anything abut it.

[Mr. Hanson.]

Mr. ROBB: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would point out to my hon. friend that it is a very good thing when introducing legislation to know why it is being introduced. It is a pretty sound principle that the House should know why changes are being made. I asked my hon. friend the other day, for example, just exactly what the benefits of the Berne convention were to which he was referring, but he left us without any information in regard to it. I think my hon. friend ought to tell us why each change is being made so that the House may assist him in seeing that the purpose desired is being properly carried out

At present we are discussing section 30 dealing with joint assignments. We have already dealt with the ordinary class of assignments. Hon. gentlemen from this side asked the minister as to whether or not rights inter partes are discharged unless there is registration. The minister is going to look into the question. Hon. gentlemen on this side have pointed out that rights inter partes should not be interfered with, and that the only effect of a non-registration penalty should be as against a third party. Section 30 itself looks after it. It provides that assignments shall be registered, and that they shall be null and void in the case of third parties unless so registered and all that section 30 does is to put the joint assignment in the same position as the single assignment. If we could have these sections read out at the time, Mr. Chairman, we would learn what they are. For instance, if section 29 had been read out we would have known where we were at in regard to section 30. I think the least the minister can do is to read out every change that is being made and give the reason for it so we will know something about it.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is quite right, but the clauses under consideration are old clauses and have been in the act since its first enactment. I can quite understand some hon. members opposite who have not had an opportunity of reviewing this bill, finding fault with it, but I can scarcely understand my hon. friend's criticism. He sat around the council table when this bill was considered first in 1920 and again in 1921. He was a member of the government that advanced the bill to second reading and then let it drop by the wayside. Surely he is not in a very good position to reprimand me now for introducing this measure.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not blaming my hon. friend for introducing this bill but for the lack of information he has given us. The bill before never reached second reading, and my hon. friend knows perfectly well that these details are only worked out on the second reading. It is no argument for him to say now that because the former government thought this bill should be brought down and afterwards dropped it before second reading, therefore the measure was a mere matter of form. If his predecessors had considered it in such a light it would not have been dropped.

Mr. BOYS: I quite appreciate the difficulties any minister would have in connection with a bill of this kind. All I am trying to do is to add a clause which anyone reading can understand. Section 30 of this bill was section 28 in the old act; but section 27 of the old act, which provided that if an assignment is not registered it shall be null and void against any subsequent assignee, is not incorporated in the present bill. My own opinion is that section 30 in the absence of a provision similar to that contained in old section 27 would not make an assignment null and void. But why leave the matter in doubt? I would suggest that a word or two be added to clause 30 to show that the assignment is not null and void except against subsequent purchasers or assignees without notice.

Mr. ROBB: What words would my hon. friend suggest?

Mr. BOYS: It should be null and void as against subsequent purchasers or assignees without notice—but should not go any further. I appreciate there is a very decided difference between the ordinary assignment and an assignment in cases of joint applications because when two parties apply for a patent you have to deal with both of them. At the same time if no notice is given to the department of an assignment, the department proceeds as if no assignment had been made, knowing nothing of such. The department is not to blame. The assignee would have to sue the two, and it would then be up to the latter to straighten out the difficulty between themselves by an assignment. If I could only find out what is the intention of the minister I would be in a better position to suggest. Is it the intention under section 30 that an assignment shall be null and void unless registered? If so, I think it is a mistake. My suggestion is that it should be null and void against subsequent purchasers or assignees for value and without notice.

Mr. ROBB: The commissioner tells me that in his 21 years' experience such a case has never arisen. I think we will accept my hon. friend's suggestion, but I would propose that we let this section stand so that the commissioner may have an opportunity to confer with him.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Section 30 says:

> In cases of joint applications or grants, every assignment from one or more of the applicants or patentees to the other or others, or to any other person, shall be registered in like manner as other assignments.

Section 29 shows how they are to be registered in connection with other assignments:

> Every patent issued for an invention shall be assignable in law; either as to the whole interest or as to any part thereof, by any instrument in writing; but such assignment, and every grant and conveyance of any exclusive right to make and use and to grant to others the right to make and use the invention patented within and throughout Canada or any part thereof, shall be registered in the Patent office in the manner from time to time prescribed by the commissioner for such registration.

We are now dealing with the effect of default.

> and every assignment affecting a patent for invention shall be null and void against any subsequent assignee, unless such instrument is registered as hereinbefore prescribed, before the registration of the instrument under which such subsequent assignee claims.

Those positions are applicable to section 30. So when the minister is considering it, he had better consider section 29 as well.

Mr. ROBB: Will my hon. friend let me know what he desires in connection with section 30?

Mr. BOYS: I do not know that I can add anything more. If the commissioner wishes me to devote a few minutes to the consideration of the section I shall be very pleased to meet him at any time.

Mr. ROBB: Stands.

Section stands.

On section 40—Conditions:

Mr. STEVENS: Section 38 of the old act is dropped, is it not?

Mr. ROBB: Yes. Sections 38, 39, 40 and 44 of the old act are repealed.

Mr. STEVENS: Sections 40 and 41 are really the crux of the whole bill. Will the minister advise us whether these two sections are taken from the old British act of 1907?

Mr. ROBB: Partly, with modifications to suit conditions in Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: Is the minister aware that the British act of 1907 was materially amended by the British act of 1919?

Mr. ROBB: That was represented to me this morning by a gentleman who is opposing this measure.

Mr. STEVENS: There are points in connection with sections 38 and 44 of the old act which do not seem to be covered by section 40 of this bill. There ought to be a complete explanation of these two sections and their substitution for 38, 39, 40 and 44.

Mr. ROBB: I cannot do better than present to the committee a memorandum prepared by the commissioner, who has had a very considerable experience, not only in Canada but in other parts of the world, in the administration of patent acts, and who has given a great deal of study and attention to legislation respecting patents. It is true, as my hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) says, that the greatest changes in the bill are found in sections 40 and 41. The memorandum says:

The sections that have been struck out were enacted for the purpose of compelling the patentee to continously manufacture his invention in Canada, supply it to the public at a reasonable price, and to prevent him from importing the invention into Canada. While they have served their purpose in some respects they have failed to do so in others. It is thought that the proposed clauses will better serve the purpose of these sections and will be free from some objectionable features attaching to them. There is no doubt that it is the general desire that the law should, while assuring the inventor an adequate return for his invention, enable the public without difficulty to obtain it at a reasonable price. In the latter respect, the law at present fails. The sections impose on the patentee the obligation of supplying his invention, but they do not give the public the right to compel him to do so. The only right of action that the public have, by reason of the default of the patentee, is for the cancellation of the patent, which is not satisfactory; as in the majority of cases the person requiring the invention is not in a position to manufacture it, the cancellation of the patent is of no benefit to him.

The law requires the patentee to furnish the invention at a reasonable price. Difficulty arises in determining what is a reasonable price. Failing agreement between the patentee and the would be purchaser, if action be taken and the court finds that the price asked is too high, the patent is cancelled, although the patentee might have honestly considered he was entitled to the price which he asked. The law requires the patentee to continuously manufacture the invention and forbids him to import it. There is difficulty in determining what constitues manufacture and importation within the meaning of the act. In a recent case in the Supreme court four of the judges were of the opinion that the facts as established showed that the patentee had failed to manufacture and had imported, and as a consequence the patent was cancelled. A dissenting judge was of the opinion that the patentee had complied with the law in these respects and was in favour of sustaining the patent. Owing to these uncertainties it is frequently difficult to determine whether Canadian patents are in force or not, which reduces their value, as naturally there is hesitancy in investing money in the exploitation of a patent which may turn out to be void through failure of compliance with these requirements of the act. If the proposed amendments be adopted these difficulties and uncertainties will be removed, as in the case of disagreement the court will fix the price at which the invention is to be supplied and the patent will not be forfeited unless the patentee fails to supply the invention at that price within the time also to be fixed by the court.

The amendments will involve modification of the present importation provision, which absolutely prohibits the importation of the invention on pain of nullity of the patent. The amendment, while not expressly prohibiting importation, will expose the patent to forfeiture if the manufacture of the invention is not carried on to an adequate extent in Canada.

The reason that has always been given for retention of section 38 is that over 75 per cent of our patents are granted to United States citizens and it was feared that were it not for the provisions of this section the patented inventions would be imported from the United States plants and Canada would get nothing in return for the patent. It is now thought that the proposed clause will safeguard Canada's interests in this regard. Any loss that might result from the relaxation of the importation provision, it is thought, will be more than compensated by the benefit to be derived from adherence to the international convention for the protection of industrial property, for which the amendment will open the way.

Then this answers the question of my hon. friend:

This convention was constituted in 1883 and is composed of the principal countries of the world.

Its whole spirit is shown in article 2 of the constitution which declares that subjects or citizens of each of the contracting countries shall as regards patents, trademarks, etc., in all other countries of the Union enjoy the advantages that their respective laws grant to their own subjects or citizens.

In some important countries, notably the United States, Japan and Germany, Canadians are at present under certain disabilities as compared with the citizens or subjects of these countries.

In 1900 Canada endeavoured to join the Union, but failed owing to repugnancy between its importation provision and article 5 of the convention which states that introduction of the patented invention made in a Union country into the country where the patent was granted shall not entail forfeiture.

By the proposed amendment this repugnancy will be removed and the way opened for joining the Union for which there is a very general demand. (For further information re the Union see appendix A attached hereto).

In amending the act in 1903, section 44 was enacted to provide for granting licenses in respect of certain patents covering inventions which it would be unreasonable to require the patentee to manufacture in the absence of a special demand. If the proposed amendment be adopted this section will be repealed. The amendment will apply to all patents without regard to the nature of the inventions covered by them.

Under the provisions of the act the commissioner may extend the limited time for manufacture and importation and may place patents under section 44 at his discretion.

The commissioner is moved to exercise this discretion by formal petitions more or less voluminous and supported by affidavit or solemn declaration. These petitions require careful consideration, orders must be made thereon and there is much correspondence therewith. In some years over 5,000 were dealt with in the Patent office. These petitions would be entirely done away with by the amendments as there would be no fixed time to extend and section 44 would be repealed.

Mr. STEVENS: As we proceed with the sections I wish the minister would be good enough to supplement the very excellent presentation he has just made by applying it to these sections and showing exactly how they will work out. May I ask this? Suppose a citizen of the United States has taken out a patent for an article in the United States and has then taken one out in Canada. The present act, as I understand it, by section 38 protects the Canadian in that the patentee from outside must manufacture in Canada and cannot simply take out his patent, or possibly sell it to someone else making a similar article, and then ignore altogether the Canadian market so far as manufacture is concerned. Or he might take out a patent and not use it, manufacture the article at home and sell it in Canada. Or it might be a machine, of which there are many; what comes to my mind is a machine such as the Goodyear welting machine. I do not know that it would be applicable to machines of that general type, for which a patent might be taken out in Canada and the article be manufactured over in the United States. Now as I understand section 38, it was especially designed to protect against such cases as that. If the minister as we proceed with section 40 can show that we have ample protection, then my perplexity will be largely met. I think we ought to read these sections very carefully, not merely the marginal notes.

Mr. ROBB: I think my hon. friend and I understand the law alike. If I understand it aright, under the old act unless the patent was manufactured in Canada it automatically became void, or if the invention were imported and not manufactured in Canada it became void. I will give my hon. friend an illustration of how under the old act a patent might become void in Canada. Suppose a person is manufacturing an article in Canada for which he has obtained a patent, and his property is destroyed by fire. It might take a year and a half to rebuild that property, and if during that period he imported from his United States factory the requirements to keep the business going, his patent in Canada would become void.

Mr. STEVENS: Does the minister argue that that obtains under the existing act, under section 38?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: It seems pretty far-fetched.

Mr. ROBB: That was the explanation given to me by the commissioner and it was the judgment of the courts under the old act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Under the old act?

Mr. ROBB: Under the old act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the existing act?

Mr. ROBB: Yes but under the act as we propose to amend it the commissioner will have discretionary powers to determine whether in the case of such an accident occurring they should be compelled to manufacture in Canada within the period, or he may give them a reasonable time to rebuild. The powers are largely within the discretion of the commissioner, and I am sure hon. gentlemen will appreciate the fact that the commissioner is not going to give a ruling that in his judgment will be detrimental to 4 p.m. manufacturing interests in Canada. At the same time it will afford a little leeway for importation of articles from other countries if there is actual necessity for it.

Mr. STEVENS: Would it not be better to maintain the compulsory provision, that is, make it obligatory on the parties to manufacture in Canada, but in the case of such an accident as the minister has mentioned, fire, deluge, or some act of that kind, the commissioner should have power to extend the period? But the principle is what I am after. I think we ought to retain as far as possible the principle of obligatory manufacture in Canada, making it imperative or obligatory upon the person taking out the patent to manufacture in Canada. If we remove that feature and give to the commissioner discretionary powers such as my hon. friend has just intimated, it is in my estimation altogether, too extensive a power to delegate to an official. Let it be the reverse. I think the principle of the old act is the better. However, if the minister wishes to proceed with the reading of the present section, we can probably bring these points out as we proceed.

Mr. ROBB: I was just going to say that the section really does provide for that, but in different language. If we leave in the old language, it prevents us from entering the Berne convention. If my hon. friends who are legal gentlemen will follow the section closely, I think they will find that though the language is somewhat different, all they desire is provided in this clause.

Mr. BOYS: The minister speaks of discretionary power being given to the commissioner under section 40. Under what subsection is there any discretionary power given to him except to refer the petition to the Exchequer Court?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, that power is given.

Mr. BOYS: I would not call that discretionary power at all. A petition comes before the commissioner; the commissioner considers the petition, and if a prima facie case is made out he does nothing himself but refers it to the Exchequer Court. That involves the matter we were discussing the other night, in an effort to get away from responsibility. It seems to me nobody should be better able to dispose of matters of this kind in the first instance than the commissioner himself, who, with the years of experience behind him, should be well able to do it.

Mr. ROBB: Before my hon. friend presents the amendment will he read section 41?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think we can go on now with section 40. I again want to understand what we are doing it for? From what I understand from the minister, the underlying reason for the changes in the act is that the Canadian patentee does not get equal rights in the United States, Japan and Germany—

Mr. ROBB: And some other countries.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Those are the countries the minister mentioned.

Mr. ROBB: I gave those notably. There are other places such as Brazil, Cuba and so on.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Those are quite important countries. What rights are withheld from us? What do we gain by this? What specific disabilities is the Canadian under in Japan or Germany?

Mr. ROBB: I will give an instance which came under our observation recently. Some fish were shipped down to Brazil; they had trade-mark designs exactly like this, and they refused to register this trade-mark in Brazil. Not only that, but they pirated the trade-mark and threatened to expropriate any Canadian goods that were sent down with that trade-mark. The trade-marks and patents are coupled together there.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the reason for that?

Mr. ROBB: We are not in the convention.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is the Brazilian law the convention law?

Mr. ROBB: They are in the convention.

[Mr. Boys.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is the United States in the convention? Are Germany and Japan in the convention?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Do these sections just follow the American sections?

Mr. ROBB: I could not say as to that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is the sense of the sections the same?

Mr. ROBB: No, this is very different. The commissioner advises me that in the United States there are no conditions attached to the patent as regards manufacture and importation. They do the thing a little differently from the way we do it. We might as well be frank in regard to this. There has been a measure of protection under our Canadian law. In the United States it is wide open, and they give the protection through their custom houses. That is the difference in the law as bewteen Canada and the United States.

Mr. STEVENS: Is the minister right in saying that the United States is a member of that convention? I understood that country was not a member.

Mr. ROBB: Not of the copyright, but of the patents and trade-marks it is.

Mr. BOYS: As suggested by the minister, I have looked at section 41. I cannot see how it can be coupled with section 40. Section 41 has reference to the revocation of the patent on the ground that the patented article is manufactured or the process carried on exclusively or mainly outside of Canada. Section 40 deals with the reasonable requirements of the public, and provides that if the article is being manufactured but is not being supplied at a reasonable price, relief may be afforded the public.

Mr. ROBB: Under section 41, if the reasonable requirements of Canada are not supplied, then the commissioner has the right to revoke the patent.

Mr. BOYS: That is section 40 and not section 41.

Mr. ROBB: No, section 41.

Mr. BOYS: I think possibly the amendment I want to suggest may be acceptable to the minister. I suggest that subsections (c) and (d) be deleted, and the following inserted in their place:

(c) If the parties do not come to an arrangement between themselves, the commissioner shall then consider the petition and shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the matter.

The minister will at once see that there is the main difference. The section as we now have it in the proposed bill gives him no jurisdiction. He simply finds out if there is a prima facie case and if so, he sends it to the Exchequer Court. This provides that he shall have jurisdiction and shall hear and determine the matter. Then the amendment proceeds—

> And if it is proved to his satisfaction that the reasonable requirements of the public with respect to the patented invention have not been satisfied the patentee may be ordered by him to supply the patented article within reasonable limits at such price as may be fixed by him, and in accordance with the custom of the trade to which the invention relates as to the payment and delivery, or to grant licenses for the use of the patented invention, as may be fixed by him in either case within and after such time as may be fixed by him and on pain of forfeiture of the patent.
> (d) Any decision of the commissioner under this section shall be subject to appeal to the Exchequer Court.

Mr. ROBB: In considering the amendment I wish to bring to the attention of the committee the sections that it is proposed to delete, namely (c) and (d). Subsection (c) reads:

> The commissioner shall then consider the petition—

That is when representations are made to him that the goods are not manufactured in Canada—

> The commissioner shall then consider the petition and, if the parties do not come to an arrangement between themselves, the commissioner, if satisfied that a prima facie case has been made out, shall refer the petition to the Exchequer Court and, if the commissioner is not so satisfied, he may dismiss the petition.

It will be observed that in the first instance he takes upon himself the right to dismiss the petition, but if there is any doubt about it he refers the matter to the Exchequer Court, and there the interested parties go before that court and submit evidence for and against. I submit to my hon. friend that if his amendment prevails it means no more and no less than establishing a second court within the Patent office, and adds enormously to the machinery of public service in this country, and, in my judgment, adds quite an unnecessary expense. There might not be more than one or two cases develop during the year, but you would require all the machinery of the court to sit there waiting for such cases to come up. The Exchequer Court is a fair method of arbitration for all parties to go before and to bring their witnesses. There may be many witnesses to be heard; there may be long records to examine, and in the interest of economical government and fair play to all interested parties, as well as in order to do justice to all the people of Canada, I do not think my hon. friend should press his amendment. It seems to me that the present method is a fair one. The commissioner explains to me that in the early nineties they had the machinery which my hon. friend now proposes to reintroduce; but experience proved that it was too cumbersome, and they had to abandon it. That is why at this time they have decided to refer all these cases to the Exchequer Court. That is what the Exchequer Court is for. If there are not enough men on that court, let more be put on, but why establish a court within the Patent office?

Mr. BOYS: I should like to say at once that in proposing this amendment, I had no thought of putting anybody, not even the government, to expense. My thought in suggesting this amendment is the very reverse. I do not think persons interested in patents, where there is room for some little dispute, should at once be drawn into the law courts at great cost and delay. It might be interesting to know just how many cases, such as are involved in the matter we are now discussing, have arisen in the last twenty years. I do not suppose there are many, but surely when a question arises whether or not an article is being supplied at a reasonable cost to the public, the commissioner, without a string of officials, without a great deal of expense, can read the petition, hear the persons interested in the patents, and then and there determine whether or not the public are being supplied with the article at a reasonable cost. If he thinks they are, he dismisses the application; if not, he says so, and he imposes such terms as he thinks proper. For argument, in the case of an article selling at a dollar, he will say: "You have here an article that costs five to ten cents to manufacture; you ought to supply it to the public at fifty or seventy-five cents," whatever he thinks proper. He gives his judgment accordingly, and I venture to say that in most cases his judgment will be accepted by the parties. But in case any injustice may be done, let an appeal to the Exchequer Court be reserved to protect the party who fails. You have then the ordinary machinery of that court to follow. How the minister can think this is going to involve an army of employees or even an extra employee, I cannot see. This will not increase expense; it will diminish it. It is going to keep applicants for patents out of litigation. This may seem a peculiar thing for a lawyer to suggest; but my interest in this matter is as a member of parliament, and not as a lawyer. I am speaking in this case as a member of parliament. I certainly desire, as a representative of the people of Canada, to do all I can to keep them out of law. I am going to read a comment which has reached me in connection with this clause. I do not desire any credit for this amendment. It was handed to me by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) who, being unable to be present, asked me to take charge of it. This is the comment; with which I entirely agree:

> These are framed to reduce the necessity for suit before the Exchequer Court. There is strong feeling against throwing all doubtful cases at once into the law courts and compelling litigation on questions which may well be determined within the Patent office. In fact, there is a strong feeling that without the passage of such amendments the Patent office will be receiving fees without earning them, and as the bill stands at present the Commissioner of Patents is stripped of his proper functions—

With that I absolutely agree.

> —which are handed to the Exchequer Court, while the patentee may at any time find himself forced into legal procedure which might be properly avoided.

The only answer made by the minister to that is the imaginary expense it is going to lead to. Let us see what this clause contemplates. The public think they are being called upon to pay an extravagant price for an article the manufacture of which is patented. They present a petition to the commissioner setting out their grievances, I presume, giving some evidence that the article cannot cost more than 20 to 30 per cent of the selling cost, and stating that there should be a reduction in price. When the commissioner receives the petition, he then decides whether or not it should be granted or dismissed. As the minister says, he can dismiss it under the proposed legislation. I want to go a step further and to meet the case when the commissioner, after consideration, is of opinion that the article is being sold at too high a price. He may then say so, and add what he thinks it should be sold for, to supply the public with the article at a reasonable price. He gives his judgment accordingly. Where is there anything cumbersome, troublesome or expensive in that procedure? The commissioner is given many powers in this legislation. Why not give him an important power in this connection, and keep people out of law, if possible. If they must have law, they can appeal to the Exchequer Court from his decision. I must say the minister has not said anything which makes me think this amendment should be withdrawn. I do not present it for the purpose of embarrassment at all; I present it in the hope that the minister may think it is reasonable; that the provisions of this measure will be improved, and that the cost connected with patents will be lessened. In no other spirit do I offer the amendment to the minister. If he just views the situation which might arise under it, I do not see how he can imagine for a moment that the troubles which he has anticipated will occur. I agree with the comment I have read that if you do not give the commissioner such a power as this, the Patent office will be actually receiving fees without earning them. We do not want a commissioner, a man of experience and ability, to merely receive and file papers, and to tell people, if they are not satisfied, to go to the Exchequer Court. We have a commissioner, as far as I know of considerable capacity. He is paid with that in view. Give him some responsibility in connection with the enforcement of this legislation. Do not strip him of responsibility and send everything of any doubt or trouble to the Exchequer Court, which, I think, is fairly well loaded up with work at the present time.

Mr. ROBB: Probably my hon. friend might be right in many arguments that would come up; but there are some cases where, I think, I could almost convince my hon. friend that it is quite necessary that this should go to the Exchequer Court. The commissioner has recently pointed out a case that came before him in connection with a system of recovering ore at the Cobalt mines, a very complicated matter, where royalties would run into millions of dollars. My hon. friend can understand that if the commissioner undertook to hear cases of that kind, they might extend over quite a long time and tie up the work of the office. My hon. friend has not yet persuaded me that it is best to establish a court within the Patent office. He will not deny that it will be necessary to equip the Patent office further, if they are properly to hear all evidence in connection with appeals that arise from time to time. May I again remind my hon. friend that the system he suggests was in vogue prior to 1890?

Mr. STEVENS: The minister is objecting to the establishment of a court within the Patent office; but he is establishing a court by this clause. He is empowering the commissioner to say, no, but he forbids him to say yes. He empowers the commissioner to dismiss a case; but if the commissioner does not dismiss a case, he must send it on with a sort of "God bless you" to the Exchequer Court. Let me read the clause, and the minister will see where his argument is without foundation at all:

The commissioner shall then consider the petition, and . . . . if satisfied that a prima facie case has been made out,—

But how can he determine that such a case has been made out unless he hears the evidence? How can he determine that a prima facie case has been made out if he has not read the petition and heard or read the evidence and given it his consideration; in other words, unless he has sat upon the case as a court?

Mr. ROBB: He need not necessarily act as a court.

Mr. STEVENS: Follow me a step further. The section goes on:

—and, if the commissioner is not so satisfied, he may dismiss the petition.

You deny the petitioner the right of appeal if the commissioner says no, but you send the case to the Exchequer Court if he says yes. Why, the thing is really preposterous. The minister says in effect that the commissioner cannot try these cases because he has not the equipment nor the time. But a petition comes before him and he is empowered to say, "You have no case;" and there is no right of appeal, no safeguard at all. But has not the commissioner considered the case if he dismisses it? If he has not, then this law is a travesty on justice; it is only an insult to the intelligence of the people. My hon. friend will certainly have to amend the section because I cannot see how he can escape it. Let us read the clause carefully:

The commissioner shall then consider the petition and, ... if satisfied that a prima facie case has been made out, shall refer the petition to the exchequer court—

For purposes which are determined in the next section. But, mark you, he must determine first whether a prima facie case has been made out.

—and, if the commissioner is not so satisfied, he may dismiss the petition.

If the commissioner is not satisfied, after having given due consideration to the matter, he may say to the petitioners, "You have no case, go away," and that ends it. They have no right of appeal. Now, that is a dangerous power to put into the hands of the commissioner. We do not ask that; we say, let the petition go before the commissioner; and we ask him to do what you are asking him to do here, namely, to consider it. We say that if he considers a prima facie case has been made out he shall refer the matter to the Exchequer Court; and if, on the other hand, he considers that no prima facie case has been established, then we ask that, if the petitioners, or either party, are not satisfied, they be given the right to appeal to the court.

Mr. ROBB: That is not what the amendment says.

Mr. STEVENS: Virtually it is; that is exactly what we mean.

Mr. BOYS: It does say that.

Mr. STEVENS: As far as I know it does; that is what we are asking. I think I have made that point perfectly clear, and there can be no possible escape from that reasoning. But let us look for a moment at another phase of the matter. The cost question has come up several times and the minister has expressed the opinion that we are going to add to the cost if we adopt this amendment. It does not matter where the case is decided, whether in the Exchequer Court, in the Patent office, in the Justice department or anywhere else, it must be given consideration and there must be cost. There must be cost in maintaining the Exchequer Court, because there have to be clerks, judges, registrars, etc.; and there must be cost if the matter is to be considered in the Patent office. In short, wherever the case is considered cost is involved. For the commissioner to say that he will just simply unload all his work on the Exchequer Court in so far as decisions are concerned, and thereby effect economies in the administration of the act, is absolutely nonsense, because if the Exchequer Court is in such a condition to-day that case after case can be referred to it without adding to its cost, there must be something wrong somewhere. It may be argued by the minister that the parties appealing to the courts will pay their own costs. That is a point to be considered; but I want to point out that they have already paid their costs to the Patent office. If I remember rightly, and, of course, I am subject to correction, the Patent office now has a revenue of over $200,000. These fees are paid to that office for just such cases as this, where there is a difference, where there is a ruling, where there is a search wanted. All these things are the reasons for the fees that are paid into that office. I would say, if the minister argued on the basis of cost, that he at once reduce the fees to applicants, because the Patent office never was intended as a profit-making institution. I cannot see, therefore, that my hon. friend has made an adequate defence at all in regard to this section. On both these grounds I appeal to him again, supporting my hon. friend who presented the amendment. Let the commissioner have the responsibility of deciding the case and let an appeal be allowed in both cases to the Exchequer Court.

Mr. BOYS: There is one further observation I would make. If I understand the section rightly it is really for the benefit of the public that it is being enacted, and not for the benefit of the patentee. Well, analyze that situation for a moment. If a petition is presented it comes only from the public; it is a petition from the public to have the article supplied to them at a reasonable rate. The commissioner passes upon that, having heard, I presume, the evidence only of the petitioners. In other words, it is a prima facie case that has been made out; he does not hear the defence. Having heard what the petition sets out he is permitted to say to the public, the petitioners, "I do not consider that you have made out a prima facie case," and there is an end of the matter. The public have no chance to go further. Is that desirable? In one breath you say you do not want to give the commissioner the responsibility or the power except to refer a petition to the Exchequer Court, and in the next breath you give him the opportunity of deciding that a prima facie case has not been made out, and then you refuse the public the right of appeal. The proposed amendment provides that the commissioner shall reach a decision, whichever way he thinks right, in the first instance, and either party being dissatisfied may go to the court for relief, and there the matter shall end. If the minister wants to protect the public it seems to me he should accede to the amendment, because it is only in the interests of the public that it is intended. As a matter of fact the section itself is meant to protect the public, and if the commissioner is given in one instance the responsibility I have referred to, I do not see why he should not be given the dual power of both rejecting or admitting the petition and granting relief.

Mr. BRISTOL: Has this section as drawn been copied from any other act? I can see what is in the commissioner's mind as well as what is in the minds of my hon. friends. They want to have the commissioner determine the case one way or the other. As the section is now drawn, all that he determines is whether there is a prima facie case; and I think that is open to this objection. There are tremendously valuable and intricate patents to-day in connection with radio and electrical inventions of one kind or another, and if you are going to ask the Commissioner of Patents to go into the merits of any case he would have to have expert assistance and really set up something like an Exchequer Court. But as I understand the section the idea is that the commissioner would say whether on documents submitted to him there was a prima facie case, and if he said there was, then it would go to the Exchequer Court to decide whether in fact there was a case on the merits. That court is equipped for the purpose and specially intended for the trial of patent cases, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court. It seems to me that everything my hon. friends desire to do could be accomplished if there was the same right of appeal from the commissioner's decision that there was not a prima facie case Otherwise it puts this tremendous power in his possession, that in perfect good faith he might say that in his opinion there was not a prima facie case, and possibly enormous interests might be involved, but there would be no opportunity of proceeding to the Exchequer Court. It seems to me it would be perfectly right and proper if the person presenting a petition for a patent was thrown out of court by the commissioner on the ground that he had not established a prima facie case that there should be a right of appeal from the commissioner to the Exchequer Court. That is the only suggestion I should like to make. If you are going to throw the responsibility of some of these tremendously important cases upon the commissioner, then there will certainly be a very expensive procedure incurred, which is not in the interests of the patentee, who usually has not very much money to spend on securing a patent for his invention. He is usually up against very powerful interests who will go ahead and fight the case through to the Supreme Court. The amount of money collected by patentees for damages in the last ten years is less than a million dollars, while the value of the patents involved is hundreds of millions of dollars. Do not put more expense and difficulty on the poor patentee in protecting his rights. I do think that if his petition is thrown out by the commissioner on the ground that no prima facie case has been made out the patentee should be allowed to appeal to the Exchequer Court.

Mr. McMASTER: I think perhaps there is a way to meet the objections which have been raised by the hon. and learned member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys) and also to prevent too great an accumulation of appeals. I have listened with a great deal of attention to what the hon member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol) has said, and with it I am in almost entire agreement. What I understand is desired by the minister is the avoidance of a multiplication of vexatious appeals. He wishes to prevent this stituation: A man pretends that the patentee has not provided for the reasonable requirements of the public; he brings a petition before the commissioner, who finds he has no prima facie case at all and turns him away. Now the suggestion of the hon. member for South Simcoe is that that man should be put in precisely the same position as is the man in connection with whose application a prima facie case has been held to have been made out by the commissioner and that the applicant who has been turned down by him should have the right to go to the Supreme Court also. That is what I understand is the position taken by my hon. friend.

Mr. BOYS: To the Exchequer Court.

Mr. McMASTER: Yes, I mean the Exchequer Court. Would it not be possible to meet the desires of the member for South Simcoe and the desires of the minister by making this provision? Where the commissioner thinks a prima facie case is made out he refers the matter to the Exchequer Court, which is equipped to deal with it. I see force in the argument that we do not want to establish a court that will go into the whole matter; it might involve the commissioner in months of work and the office might more or less be retarded by the fact that he was tied up on the case just as our courts get tied up with cases lasting weeks; and that where a prima facie case is made out the commissioner transmits the matter to the Exchequer Court immediately. If the commissioner does not believe that a prima facie case is made out, and rejects the application, I would not want to deprive the applicant of any recourse whatsoever. But I would say to him: You have failed to make out a prima facie case; you may go to the Exchequer Court, but you must go on such terms as will assure your opponent that you are not resorting to that court vexatiously. Therefore I would suggest this course to the minister: That where an applicant has had application turned down by the commissioner, and wishes to go to the Exchequer Court, he should put up security for the costs that will be involved in his application. That will meet the views of the hon. member for South Simcoe. It will not put the commissioner in the position where he can arbitrarily turn down an application which perhaps has more merit in it than he thinks, but it will allow the applicant, on giving security, to go to the Exchequer Court. At the same time the fact that the applicant whose application has been turned down has to put up security will discourage people from making frivolous applications before the commissioner and before the Exchequer Court.

Mr. BOYS: I am very slightly convinced perhaps in one connection by the remarks of the member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol). I can conceive that occasionally a case of a highly technical nature might arise which would lead perhaps to a prolonged investigation and would require expert testimony. As a way out of the difficulty would it be improper to make this suggestion: While you put upon the commissioner the responsibility I have already indicated, you might add a proviso that in cases of a highly technical or unusually difficult nature the commissioner could, with the approval of the minister, refer them to the Exchequer Court. The effect of such a proviso would be that in all ordinary cases the commissioner would give a quick decision and, I venture to say, nearly always a satisfactory decision, at very little cost and with very little delay; but when he finds himself involved in some of the highly technical cases suggested, he will have the power to say, "This is a case of a highly technical nature and unusual difficulty and, with the approval of the minister, I shall refer it to the Exchequer Court". This would protect everybody; it would protect the public and it would protect the patentee, and besides this protection the costs in the majority of the cases will be kept down to the minimum, there being no necessity for an extra staff in the department. I think this would meet the objections advanced by the member for Centre Toronto. If I were permitted I could very easily add such a proviso to my amendment. Possibly it is a matter of such importance that the minister will let the section stand and so afford us sufficient time to draft what is necessary by way of amendment. I think this would save time in the end.

Mr. ROBB: Stands.

Mr. BRISTOL: Before this is done I would suggest to my hon. friend who has just sat down (Mr. Boys) consideration of this aspect: Whether instead of doing what he suggests where the commissioner said no prima facie case had been made out, it would not be better to let the applicant appeal to the Exchequer Court provided the Exchequer Court gave leave. He really gets a hearing then before the commissioner, and if he succeeds, then he should; if he does not succeed, then the thing is ended.

Mr. BOYS: That does not meet my main purpose in submitting this amendment, which is, as I have said, to get an inexpensive and a quick decision on the part of the commissioner. I should be losing the entire object that I have in view if I adopted that suggestion.

Mr. FORTIER: I am in favour of the provision as contained in the bill. In the discussion of this matter we should not lose sight of the petition itself, which is a special petition, from, we will say, a third party who contends that the price of a patented article is too high. He represents himself as an interested party, but he is looking after the interests of the public, and he presents his petition to the commissioner. Of course, he comes up against a condition of affairs that has existed for some time, involving certain vested rights. Well, when he goes before the commissioner and asks that a change be made, it is my opinion that the commissioner is in a perfectly good position to say prima facie that the petition should not be entertained. It is wise that the commissioner should have the power to decide whether or not the petition is well founded. If he does not do so, and if he renders a judgment equivalent to the granting of the petition, which asks for a change in the price of an article, that is where the difficulty comes in. Would he be in a position to protect the public by making a change in the price without going into a long enquete, without hearing experts, without having engineers before him, and so on? The holding of such an enquete, is not within the jurisdiction of the commissioner, and therefore it is wise that the matter should be referable to the Exchequer Court. The question of costs is involved; the petitioner will be obliged to incur certain costs if the investigation is held before the commissioner, then, if appeal is taken to the Exchequer Court there is what one might call a double trial.

Mr. STEVENS: He has no appeal if the commissioner says, no.

Mr. FORTIER: So much the better; I am not in favour of an appeal. I say the bill is wise in giving power to the commissioner to have this matter placed before the Exchequer Court at once with a view to their deciding on the merits of the petition. That may involve not merely the granting of the petition itself but the fixing of a price in order to protect the public. It is only after a full trial before a court that the matter can be dealt with satisfactorily to the public.

Mr. ROBB: I was disposed to allow the item to stand but before finally deciding that I would ask my hon. friend (Mr. Boys) if he would accept the clauses as they are, with the addition of these words:

Any decision of the commissioner under this section shall be subject to appeal to the Exchequer Court.

That would give them the right of appeal. I think my hon. friend is almost convinced that the hon. members for Centre Toronto Mr. Bristol), Labelle (Mr. Fortier) and Brome (Mr. McMaster) are right.

Mr. BOYS: The minister evidently thinks that all I am striving for is an appeal, but that is not the case. It is not an appeal I want; it is a quick decision, and the minister's suggested amendment will not help that at all. I do think an appeal is necessary. I do not think it is proper to give the commissioner the power he has under this section without providing for an appeal in case the petition is refused. But the real purpose of my amendment is not that at all; it is to get a quick decision in all cases.

Mr. BRISTOL: Which amendment is the hon. member speaking to, his own or the one the minister has just read?

Mr. BOYS: We are dealing with both.

Mr. BRISTOL: It seems to me that if there is the right of appeal when the commissioner decides that there is no prima facie case, then the public will be protected. I cannot see how you can get a quick decision one way or the other, because each case depends upon a great number of circumstances. Some cases may be extremely simple and some very complicated, and only to be interpreted with the assistance of experts. That is really the gist of this whole situation, as I view it—the right of appeal in either case. That is what I would like to see; any amendment along that line would be fair to everybody.

Mr. ROBB: Does my hon. friend wish the section to stand, or will he accept my amendment?

Mr. BOYS: I am not personally interested, Mr. Chairman, but I have reason to believe that there is a large class of persons who do feel interested in the matter, and this amendment is perhaps the result of their wishes. Apart from that, it makes no difference to me at all. I do not recede from the position I have taken that in the ordinary case the commissioner can easily decide the matter. Let me add one observation, and I am through, whatever happens. Take the ordinary case of litigation in the courts: I venture to say that not more than one case in fifteen goes to appeal; a decision is rendered and the parties, as a rule, accept it Appeal is taken in a limited number of cases, and so it would be in respect to these petitions. It is perfectly proper to protect the public by appeal, but I think that in the other way you would get a decision much quicker, and you would not heap upon the Exchequer Court every case in which there was any doubt at all—and that must be the result here. The commissioner would have no power except to dismiss the petition. I do not imagine he would be inclined to dismiss unless he was very certain about it; therefore, wherever there is any doubt you throw the people interested into litigation in spite of themselves, although they might be willing to lay their views before the commissioner and accept his decision.

Mr. ROBB: In the hope that at six o'clock the commissioner and the legal gentlemen may get together and introduce language that would suit all, I suggest that the clause stand.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 40 and amendment thereto stand.

On section 41—Revocation of patent time limit:

Mr. BOYS: We see at once, right in this section, the very thing we have been striving for in the last. I cannot understand this: in one section you give the commissioner certain power and in another section you run away from it; in another you come back again to it, and then run away from it. In the last section we were trying to give the commissioner the power a man of his ability and experience might properly be vested with, but we were met with the suggestion that it was too great a power. Now, here is subsection 2 of 41:

> The commissioner shall consider the application, and, if after inquiry he is satisfied that the allegations contained therein are correct, then, subject to the provisions of this section, and unless the patentee proves that the patented article or process is manufactured or carried on to an adequate extent in Canada, or gives satisfactory reasons why the article or process is not so manufactured or carried on, the commissioner may—

Not refer it to the Exchequer Court but may do something himself, and to find out whether he is going to do that something or not, the case has to be proved before him. How does he do it? I suppose a court, as the minister suggested, would be required in connection with the last section. Witnesses come before him, are examined pro and con, and when all that is done and satisfactory reasons are given the commissioner then comes to a decision. It is not a case of a prima facie proposition in which he refers it to the Exchequer Court, or dismisses it; he reaches a decision. Now what is the difference between this and my contention in connection with the last section? Absolutely none except with regard to perhaps highly technical cases. They impress me, I admit. In some very difficult cases it might lead to a prolonged investigation. It will lead to that anyway before the Exchequer Court, and I should imagine the commissioner of patents ought to be just about as well able to dispose of matters respecting patent rights as a judge of the Exchequer Court, who may be very able, but is not, at all events, confining his attention to one line all the time as the patent commissioner is. So here in this section we have adopted what was rejected in the last. I can see no reason whatever for its rejection except in technical cases.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister must realize the sanity of my hon. friend's suggestion sanity that is in comparison with the obvious —what shall I say—not insanity, but bordering on it of these two sections when one is compared to the other. Not only is what my hon. friend (Mr. Boys) has said true, but it will be noted that the power given to the commissioner in this section is to revoke a patent, cancel it, to take from a man all rights he has in it. It is the ultimate power, one might say. But not only that, the commissioner must be in a position to understand all the details of all treaties of this country with other countries. This is a power infinitely wider than the power in section 40. Perhaps we had better have the two sections stand until after six o'clock in order to have them harmonized. Let the powers whatever they are be the same in both cases and run in some degree of harmony.

Mr. ROBB: How would it be to pass this section? Then we shall have a precedent for what is suggested by my hon. friend for Simcoe.

Mr. STEVENS: We will have to look at the powers of appeal.

Mr. McMASTER: The section provides for power of appeal.

Mr. STEVENS: That ought to make this section a model for the other.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall subsection 2 carry?

Mr. BOYS: If this carries with a view to amending section 40 to meet it, I can understand it, but surely you do not want one section contradicting the other. I think the committee has to decide whether you are going to have a commissioner in the patent office who is to have responsibility commensurate with the importance of the office, or whether you are going to 5 p.m. have merely a clerical officer there. That is the first thing to decide. If you are going to have a commissioner in the true sense, and that is what I want, then give him these powers—don't empower him under one section and refuse power under another, but give him power throughout, reasonable power subject to appeal. Either do that or abolish all idea of him being a commissioner and get down to a clerical basis and let everything go to the Exchequer Court. I do not think we should pass this section unless the minister is really disposed to adopt the principle involved here in the last section also.

Mr. BRISTOL: What machinery has been provided by the act—I am not familiar with it—for the taking of evidence before the commissioner on such important matters as are dealt with here? Does he take evidence under oath, have counsel the right to appear before him and examine and cross-examine, or does he take it by affidavit and have absolute discretion? As a matter of litigation the question whether an article has been imported or manufactured, and that sort of thing, is very important and you get a great deal of contradictory testimony. If it is all done by affidavit the cleverest man at making affidavits would win. That is a matter that should be considered by the minister. These are very wide powers and very important questions would come up for decision.

Mr. ROBB: The only provision in section 41 is for taking evidence by affidavit. There is no provision for examination of witnesses.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall subsection 2 carry?

Mr. STEVENS: That is with the understanding that section 40 is to be remodelled and harmonize with section 41.

Mr. ROBB: No, I would prefer them both to stand.

Section 41 stands.

On section 43—Tariff of fees:

Mr. ROBB: There are some slight changes made in the present tariff.

An item is added to provide a fee for proceedings in new sections 16, 23, 40 and 41; also an item for the fees on drawings, which were provided for by a repealed section. The fee payable on the patent which the patentee has allowed to lapse has been made the same as the original fee, which is thought to be only reasonable. Since the present tariff came into force there have been several cases of hardship through failure to pay the final fee within the fixed time. It is thought it would be well to provide for relief from forfeiture on payment of the prescribed fee, which is really a penalty.

Mr. BOYS: It is rather hard to digest all this in a hurry. The old fee for a patent good for a term of eighteen years was $60. Now the fee for a patent is to be $15 on filing application for patent—

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend must have the wrong tariff. I will read to him the tariff of fees. The fees are provided by the act of 1921.

Mr. BOYS: What about the tariff of fees provided here in section 43 now under consideration? The list appears there, and what I am trying to find out is whether or not the fees there are correct. This scale provides for $15 on filing an application for patent and a fee of $20 on the grant of patent, which would be $35 altogether, whereas the former fee was $60. Is that correct?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 47, subsection 1—Restoration and revival of patent:

Mr. ROBB: This section is entirely new and gives the commissioner the power to revive lapsed patents, which heretofore had to be done by parliament. The commissioner now has that power.

Mr. STEVENS: In other words this will remove the necessity of passing special private bills for reviving patents?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection 6—Right of appeal:

Mr. STEVENS: There is a point in subsection 6 that requires some attention.

Mr. ROBB: I desire to strike out the words "within six months from the date hereof," in the fourth line of this subsection. That is to meet an objection raised by the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys). We provide for that in another section.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 48—Government may use patented inventions:

Mr. STEVENS: Suppose one of the employees of the government in one of the departmental laboratories should make a discovery—I care not what it may be—is there any provision in the act protecting him?

Mr. ROBB: I think that is provided for in section 23.

Mr. STEVENS: The reason I think we should be very sure of that is because this section provides—

The government of Canada may, at any time, use any patented invention, paying to the patentee such sum as the commissioner reports to be a reasonable compensation for the use thereof.

While I do not wish to dispute this point, I think that in the case of employees of the government, for the sake of encouraging them in their work, there should be some definite allowance made to them. I understand there is some understanding, but whether it is incorporated in the bill or not I do not know.

Mr. ROBB: I think that is provided for in section 23, which says—

Every patent granted in respect of an invention made by a person while employed in the public service of Canada—

And so on. I think it is fully covered by that. My hon. friend for Simcoe had some suggestions to make in regard to that section. We propose to go back to section 23, my hon. friend suggested that the following words be added:

Any decision of the commissioner under this section shall be subject to appeal to the Exchequer Court.

Mr. BRISTOL: It seems to me that provision should apply all through the bill. I think it should be a matter for the Exchequer Court to say what is reasonable. Section 48 says—

The government of Canada may, at any time, use any patented invention, paying the patentee such sum as the commissioner reports to be a reasonable compensation for the use thereof.

Mr. ROBB: What does the hon. member suggest?

Mr. BRISTOL: I think there should be an appeal to the Exchequer Court as to the amount of that compensation. It seems to me that, with all the work the commissioner has, he should not have to render an absolute decision for the government, but that there should be an appeal to the Exchequer Court.

Mr. ROBB: There is no objection to that; it is reasonable. Will the hon. member move the amendment?

Mr. BRISTOL: I will move an amendment to that section, similar to the amendment which is being made to the other section.

Mr. STEVENS: We might enact a general section providing that in all cases where an appeal is not provided for in the act an appeal would be permitted to the Exchequer Court. There should be no objection to a general section.

Mr. ROBB: The commissioner tells me he thinks they were all covered as we went along. There would be no objection to that general section, to cover any omissions. That would probably be the better way.

Mr. STEVENS: A section at the end covering everything.

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved that the following words be added to section 48.

And any decision of the commissioner under this section shall be subject to appeal to the Exchequer Court.

Mr. ROBB: We will accept that.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 52—Inspection by the public:

Mr. BRISTOL: I have not had an opportunity of examining this bill with special care. Is there in it any provision of this character? As soon as an application for a patent is filed, assuming that a patent is granted subsequently, perhaps one year or two years later, is the patentee protected from the date of his original application or from the date of the issue of the patent? For instance, supposing a patent is taken out in the United States as frequently happens, and an application is not made in Canada until some time later. A Canadian or American manufacturer or some other competitor may manufacture in Canada as fast as he likes until the patent is actually issued. Assuming that a patent is issued a year after the application is filed, can the patentee claim damages during that period, or does the patent simply speak from its date?

Mr. ROBB: From the date of issue.

Section agreed to.

On section 57—Register of attorneys:

Mr. ROBB: This is new. For a number of years there has been a desire on the part of patent attorneys, particularly in Canada, for a provision for the registration of patent attorneys. Since this bill has been introduced, further pressure has been brought to bear to insert in the bill a clause of this kind and the Patent office is in favour of this proposal.

Mr. STEVENS: Is there any objection by any person competent to make an objection as representing the public?

Mr. ROBB: The experience of the department is that to protect the public there should be a register, so that the public may know who the attorneys are.

Mr. STEVENS: That has not been the case in Canada before.

Mr. ROBB: No, but it is the case in all other countries.

Mr. BAXTER: I know from a little experience that a register is kept in the United States, and I can well understand the reason for that. There are, however, some difficulties in the way of a Canadian being registered in the United States as a patent attorney. I think it would be well, not because of any desire to promote hostilities between the two countries, but because of the enormous number of persons who are members of the various bars of the United States, that this clause should be limited to patent attorneys resident in Canada. The department could keep a record of them and find out as to their standing. I agree with the minister that the whole point of this clause is that only reputable persons shall have charge of the prosecution of applications for patents. I do not think this is for the protection of the public; I think it is for what is more important, namely for the protection of the applicant for a patent who, if he gets into dishonest hands, may have very important information given out. The idea of the United States Patent office is as far as possible to guard the applicant so that he will be in the hands of a person trustworthy as to moral character and having some reasonable experience in the business in which he engages. There is nothing, as I understand the matter, to require a man to have an attorney at all. If he chooses to sign the papers himself and to forward his application, he can do so; but if he has an attorney, he must have one who is on the register.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is in accord with the commissioner that there should be a register of patent attorneys. I think, however, I can convince him that it is not desirable that we should limit this to Canadians. I am told that our Canadian patent attorneys are very well used at Washington, the capital of the United States, and we do not wish to do in this country anything that might lead to retaliation.

Mr. BAXTER: All right.

Mr. PARENT: I do not know whether I understand this clause properly; but as I read it, it seems that a lawyer would have to register with the department here in order to appear on behalf of somebody who was applying for a patent. If a lawyer has a right to appear before the Exchequer Court, he should have the right to appear before the commissioner for any claim he might put forward. The clause as it reads now requires that the lawyer must register with the department. I do not suppose that is the spirit or the idea of the law.

Mr. ROBB: Any member of the Canadian bar will be put on this list.

Mr. PARENT: If that is the idea, I suppose there will be no harm in inserting an amendment to that effect.

Mr. ROBB: This is governed by the regulations. It will be put in the regulations.

Section agreed to.

On section 58—Patent agent or attorney:

Mr. ROBB: This is new.

Mr. BAXTER: It is quite right, though.

Mr. ROBB: Then no explanation is required.

Section agreed to.

On section 65—Repeal:

Mr. ROBB: This is new. It is simply to provide for cases of impeachment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the section, 5A, reserved?

Mr. ROBB: That is the section establishing the status of the Commissioner of Patents.

Section agreed to.

On section 67—R. S. c 69 not to apply:

Mr. ROBB: I desire to move an amendment to this section for the purpose of adding the following subsection:

(2) Nothing in this act shall affect any suit or proceeding now pending or judgment existing which may be prosecuted, continued, completed, and enforced, as if this act had not been passed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Under section 65 the status of patents already issued stands as established by the laws under which they were issued. They are subject to cancellation, or they may be enforced or upheld by the courts, without regard to this statute but by virtue of previous acts. Section 67, however, provides that on the coming into force of this act patents issued prior thereto shall cease to be subject to the provisions of the Patent Act. Perhaps what my hon. friend has in mind is that so far as the administration of patents already issued is concerned, that is to say, with regard to the payment of fees, or returns, and so forth, these matters shall be subject to the new law, but that the validity of patents already issued under previous legislation shall stand as established by the laws under which they were granted.

Mr. ROBB: That is the idea.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is not expressed clearly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: To meet the wishes of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Boys) I have another amendment to offer:

Whenever an appeal to the Exchequer Court from the decision of the commissioner is allowed under this act, notice of such decision shall be mailed by registered letter addressed to the interested parties or their respective agents, and the appeal shall be taken within six months from the date of the mailing of such notice.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think the use of the word "decision" is unfortunate.

Whenever an appeal to the Exchequer Court from the decision of the commissioner is allowed. . . . notice of such decision shall be mailed.

"Notice of such decision" does not refer to the former "decision", but to the fact that an appeal has been allowed from the decision of the commissioner. That is what the commissioner has in mind, I believe.

Mr. BRISTOL: Is it the intention to give a period of six months within which appeal may be made?

Mr. ROBB: That is the intention.

Mr. BRISTOL: Would that be reasonable? It seems to me that a person is entitled to know, within a reasonable time after the commissioner has decided that the patent is in litigation, that appeal is going to be made. To have it open for six months would be a serious thing for the owner of a patent. Surely appeal can be made within thirty days. No court that I know of gives any such period as six months. Patent rights are not of much use unless they are exercised promptly.

Mr. ROBB: I am told that this is similar to a section prepared by the Justice department.

Mr. BRISTOL: A patent is no good until it is granted, and if an inventor can be held up for six months by an appeal he is going to be seriously handicapped. As a matter of fact, it is a very serious matter now, owing to the congestion that exists in Canada and the United States, to get a patent issued promptly, because new radio inventions are being made from month to month; and if a man cannot get his patent promptly his invention is going to be infringed right away by imitators, so that when he does get his patent, in a year's time perhaps, the invention is no good because it has been copied in the meantime, and he has had to fight the imitators. This is one matter particularly in regard to which the law's delays entail a very serious hardship.

Mr. BAXTER: While we should no doubt expedite the granting of patents, we should not forget on the other hand that many inventions come from people in the community who are not blessed with abundant means, and we ought not to make the act so rigid that a poor man who is the real inventor of any device might be deprived of all right and benefit of his brains because, having to appeal within so short a time, he could not get the necessary money to take action. I quite agree that there should be no unduly long delay in granting a patent, but we should give a man who thinks he has rights a chance to vindicate them; and he may need a reasonable time in which to secure help.

Mr. ROBB: Section 20, already passed, provides:

Every applicant who has failed to obtain a patent by reason of the objection of the commissioner aforesaid may, at any time within six months after notice thereof has been mailed by registered letter, addressed to him or his agent, appeal from the decision of the said commissioner to the Exchequer Court.

This was drawn up especially at the request of the Department of Justice, and the present section follows the same line.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is no objection to the section the minister has just quoted. We are trying, however, to find out just what is meant by the section we are now considering. The reading here is:

Whenever an appeal to the Exchequer Court from the decision of the commissioner is allowed under this act—

Mr. ROBB: Permitted.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is very much better than "allowed," because the allowance of the appeal generally means the appeal is granted. That is one of the things I was going to point out. The section is improved by the change. It now reads:

Whenever an appeal to the Exchequer Court from the decision of the commissioner is permitted under this act, notice of such decision shall be mailed by registered letter.

Is it notice of such decision, or is it notice of the permission that is to be mailed?

Mr. ROBB: The intention is that the notice of the decision of the commissioner is to be mailed. If my hon. friend feels that the language is not clear we are prepared to accept any suggestions from him to remove the obscurity.

Mr. BRISTOL: With reference to the decision of the Department of Justice as to the right of appeal under section 20, I think it is absolutely reasonable. That is a case where a patentee has been refused a patent; therefore he is not being oppressed. He is simply allowed further time in which to get help to go on with his appeal. But this is not the case with 67a. I am quite in accord with the amendment made by the Department of Justice, but I do not think it is reasonable that the man contesting a patent should be allowed six months to proceed with his appeal. I think he should proceed promptly—say, within thirty days. After the applicant has been granted his patent he ought to be allowed to go ahead and get the full benefit from it.

Mr. ROBB: Why not make it three months?

Mr. BRISTOL: I am quite content.

Mr. ROBB: I will substitute three months.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the committee that the word "six" be stricken out and the word "three" substituted?

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Several sections were allowed to stand.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 5 was allowed to stand. It is moved by Mr. Murdock:

That section 5 be stricken out and there be substituted the following:

The commissioner shall exercise the powers conferred and perform the duties imposed upon him by this act subject to the minister and in the absence or inability to act of the commissioner any officer or clerk named by the minister to perform the duties of the commissioner may, as acting commissioner exercise such powers and shall perform such duties.

Clause as amended agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 11 was allowed to stand.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, to meet the desires of the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys) I beg to move:

That clause 11 be amended by adding after the word "commissioner" in the fourteenth line thereof the following words:

After such notice as he may deem requisite and sufficient.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. ROBB: The hon. member for South Simcoe had some objections to section 23, which we proposed to amend in accordance with his views. I beg to move therefore that the following words be added:

Any decision of the commissioner under this section shall be subject to appeal to the Exchequer Court.

Mr. BAXTER: It would be well to insert some limitation of time.

Mr. ROBB: All these appeals are limited by 67a to three months.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is there anything new in this section at all?

Mr. ROBB: The clause is all new. It was put in at the request of the Advisory Council for Scientific and Industrial Research.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is this their clause?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 23 as amended carry?

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 30—Assignments in case of joint applications:

Mr. ROBB: I think my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) made some objection to that. What is his desire?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It was the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Boys).

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend raised the objection, I believe.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I pointed out afterwards what the effect of section 29 was; that is all.

Mr. ROBB: There is no objection, then.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought I was helping the hon. minister.

Mr. ROBB: The commissioner points out that for fifty years the provision has caused no particular trouble. We might as well put it through.

Section agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 40, and the amendment thereto by Mr. Boys.

Mr. ROBB: I would not like to have this passed in the absence of the hon. members for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys) and Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). There was an understanding that they should confer with the commissioner with respect to some minor language in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN: Stand.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

SALE AND INSPECTION OF FRUIT AND FRUIT CONTAINERS

House again in committee on Bill No. 11 to regulate the Sale and Inspection of Fruit and Fruit Containers, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 5.—Regulations, publications, forfeiture and penalties:

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): I wish to propose a small amendment to this section, inasmuch as we have no authority to regulate packages of imported fruit. I propose, after the word "prescribe" in the fourth line of section 5, to add the words "packages and". The purpose is to regulate packages of imported fruit.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 9—Fruit overfaced, fruit below grade, notice to packers:

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Subsection (3) has been amended in committee by adding the words "notice of such action having been taken by the inspector".

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 10—Packages:

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Since this bill went through the Agricultural committee it has been brought to our attention that there is a certain demand for cherry boxes of a smaller size than that provided for in the bill, that is the half size or ten-pound box. I therefore move that after the word "inches" in the last line of paragraph (j) there be added the following words "or three hundred and sixty-four and a half cubic inches." That would be the half box of cherries. That "eight hundred and eighty-two" in paragraph (j) should be "seven hundred and twenty-nine," Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BROWN: I do not remember that change.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That was changed in committee.

Mr. LEWIS: Are all these boxes of the regulation size now in vogue in Canada?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They are almost identical except in the case of plum boxes dealt with in paragraph (i).

Mr. HANSON: Was this bill threshed out before the Agricultural committee?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Oh, yes, it was gone into very carefully by the committee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: While on boxes, did the minister manage to get anything done in the committee recommending that the bottom of a strawberry box should be at the bottom and not half way down?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have not been able to get that far yet.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 14—Prohibition:

Mr. LEWIS: Suppose, for instance, you know a person in British Columbia and ask him to send you two or three boxes. Would he come under this just the same?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Before you report the bill, Mr. Chairman, I might answer a half-jocular question put by the hon. member for West York. The berry packages are larger. They are made in conformity with the American boxes and this indentation is only a sort of camouflage to catch the eye of the purchaser.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not like the indentation.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INSURANCE OF MORTGAGED PREMISES

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Acting Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the second reading of Bill No. 116, respecting the Canadian National Railways.

On section 1—Agreements to restore or make good loss or damage by fire or other casualty to mortgaged premises, and indemnify trustees:

Mr. GRAHAM: This bill provides the machinery for the Canadian National Railways carrying their own insurance, as discussed the other day. When the resolution was before the committee I was asked to furnish information as to the rates of insurance charged by the companies. I have that here.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister might put the statement on Hansard.

NATURALIZATION ACTS AMENDMENT BILL

Hon. A. B. COPP (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 85, to amend the Naturalization Acts, 1914 and 1920.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 2—Definition of Natural-born British Subjects:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Explain.

Mr. COPP: If my hon. friend will refer to the notes on the opposite page of the bill as printed, he will find that this simply describes the status of a British subject in order to make our law uniform with the law that was passed by the Imperial parliament in 1922. At the conference that took place between representatives of the Imperial government in Great Britain and representatives of the various Dominion governments, it was arranged to make entirely uniform the status of a British subject, and this clause is an exact copy of the clause in the Imperial statute passed last year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should like a further explanation from the minister as to the effect of naturalization under this clause and as to the status of a British subject, naturalized or coming within this definition, who comes from a different part of the Empire. What is the effect of the legislation upon his status in Canada?

Mr. COPP: The status would be the same. This is simply bringing into effect the arrangement made between representatives of the Imperial government in Great Britain and representatives of the British dominions, to have a uniform naturalization act. If my hon. friend will read the description of the status of a British subject as given in clause 2, he will find that this corresponds exactly with the Imperial act that was passed last year. This is simply to keep the law uniform as arranged by the different Imperial conferences held fom 1902 down to 1911.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend says that the status will be just the same in Canada as anywhere else. Just the same as what? Take for example naturalization papers given in South Africa under their Naturalization Act. What is the Canadian status that is thereby obtained, or is there any?

Mr. COPP: A person applying for naturalization in Canada has to follow the same procedure and reside here for the same length of time as a person has to do in Great Britain. The first subclause is a description of a British subject. If my hon. friend will refer to the notes on the side of the bill, he will see exactly what the object of the bill is. The side note reads:

> The object of this bill is to provide for the continuance, under certain conditions, of the British nationality of successive generations of British descent born abroad.

This was changed, as my hon. friend knows, in 1914 and 1920. This is to bring again into effect the law as it was prior to that time, and to provide that British subjects, who are naturalized in Canada are British subjects the world over, the same as if they were naturalized in the old country. I do not think I can say any more than that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Has the Minister the Naturalization Act before him? Clause 2 reads:

> Paragraph (b) of subsection 1 of section 1 of chapter 44 of the statutes of 1914, an act respecting British nationality, naturalization and aliens, is repealed, and the following is substituted therefor.

Could the minister inform the committee what paragraph (b) of subsection 1, that is proposed to be repealed, contains?

Mr. COPP: Paragraph (b) of subsection 1 of the present Naturalization Act reads:

> Any person born out of His Majesty's Dominions and whose father was a British subject at the time of that person's birth and either was born within His Majesty's allegiance or was a person to whom a certificate of naturalization had been granted; or had become a British subject by reason of any annexation of territory, or was at the time of that person's birth in the service of the Crown.

That is the whole of paragraph (b) in the original act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Except for the change in subsection 5 which the new paragraph enacts, I do not see that there is much difference. For my part I see no objection to the section.

Mr. BAXTER: One thing puzzles me. I see by the memorandum that in England apparently they have taken a date in 1915 to affect the rights of the second generation. The memorandum states:

> Under the existing law British nationality by descent ends after the first generation (or in the case of persons born before 1915, the second generation) born abroad.

In subclause 5, there must be, the memorandum states, two conditions:

> Any person born out of his Majesty's dominions, whose father was at the time of the person's birth a British subject and who fulfils any of the following conditions—

One of the conditions is:

> His birth registered at a British consulate within one year or in special circumstances, with the consent of the Secretary of State, two years after its occurrence, or, in the case of a person born on or after the first day of January, 1915, who would have been a British subject if born before that date, within twelve months after the first day of August, 1922;

What becomes of those in a similar degree of relationship who were born before the first day of January, 1915? Suppose a Canadian citizen went to the United States and his child was born before 1915, and while the child was still a minor the father took out letters of citizenship in the United States. Does that child's British right still subsist? There is no provision for his registering and he might be at the present time only, say, nine years old. It seems to me that there should be some way for such a child to claim British nationality if he felt that his father had not chosen the better part by becoming an American citizen.

Mr. COPP: Before he comes of age?

Mr. BAXTER: When he comes of age. I am left under the impression that while this subsection is a verbatim copy of the British act there is probably something else in that act which has not been copied into this and which may be needed to make the bill effective. I may be wrong, but the memorandum leaves that impression on my mind.

Mr. COPP: I have the British act before me. My deputy is not here, but I am informed by him that this is an exact copy of the act passed by the British parliament last year.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Repeal:

Mr. NEILL: Apparently this abolishes the system formerly followed of candidates for naturalization going before a county court judge. What is proposed to be substituted now?

Mr. COPP: This is a new section and provides for a different method of application for naturalization. Originally naturalization applications were made to judges of the courts who either issued or refused certificates as they thought fit. But in 1914 a change was made by which persons desiring naturalization were required to go to the clerks of court in the different localities in the various provinces and file with them a petition for naturalization. The clerk posted the application in his office for three months, at the end of which time the applicant would be advised of the date at which the court would meet. The applicant would then present himself personally before a judge who, upon inquiry and investigation, either approved or disapproved of the application, forwarding his report upon the same to the Department of the Secretary of State. The department in the past few years has found in the large majority of cases that after the application had been investigated by the judge a further inquiry was necessary. I may remark here that the applicant pays a fee of $5 when he files his application with the clerk for naturalization. The practice has been for the Department of the Secretary of State to refer the application to the Immigration department to ascertain whether or not the applicant entered the country legally in the first place, and has since spent the required period therein, prior to application. The matter is then referred to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for investigation and report, upon which we act. While I have had personally only one year's experience of this matter, I am informed by my deputy that it has been found almost invariably that these so-called investigations by the judges have been inadequate, and that the department cannot act upon the reports made by the judges without further investigation. We therefore felt that it was in the interests of the applicant as well as of the country that there should be a uniform method of granting naturalization, by providing an opportunity for all those seeking naturalization to make their application direct to the State department. The practice of having judges investigate these applications has proved in the past to be a waste of time. We have found that a great many applicants, particularly in the West, where the bulk of the applications come from, have to drive great distances to the court, and sometimes an applicant fails to receive notice of the day the court is to sit. This method is altogether unsatisfactory and we considered it best to provide that all applications should be made direct to the Department of the Secretary of State, thus obviating the employment of counsel. Under the system now proposed the application form will be filled in and forwarded to the State department and the investigation carried on from that source.

Mr. NEILL: The minister's last words gave me the information I wanted; that is, the man now applies direct to the minister.

Mr. COPP: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: That is what I wanted to know. I heartily agree with the provision to do away with the old system of applying to the county court judge. It resulted in a great deal of hardship to people desiring naturalization. Not only had they to go once before the judge—very often at an extremely inconvenient time because of the short notice given—but they also had to come again and take some oaths before the registrar, which meant sometimes a journey of two hundred miles twice. And I know of cases where owing to the way the boats ran the applicants for naturalization did not arrive until after the judge had concluded the sittings and would not again hold court at that particular place for another three months. I am entirely in accord with doing away with this system, which was expensive and inconvenient to the alien. I am quite in favour of increasing the restrictions surrounding naturalization, if necessary, but there is nothing to be gained by making it personally expensive, and very often it meant a cost as high as $200 before the applicant could become naturalized.

Mr. LUCAS: What is the cost to the applicant?

Mr. COPP: That is a matter of regulation, and has not been decided. Personally I have felt that the present fee of $5 which is paid to the clerk should be paid directly to the Department of State. These fees would provide the carrying charges for the whole Naturalization branch.

Mr. BAXTER: I think the question I asked is partly answered by referring to sub-section 3 of section 1 of the act of 1914, which provides that—

Nothing in this section shall, except as otherwise expressly provided, affect the status of any person born before the commencement of this act.

But if we see fit to adopt clause 5 of section 1 of this bill, which provides for the registration of birth within one year at a British consulate in the case of a person born on or after the 1st January 1915, members will see that it will affect the status of a person born before the commencement of this legislation. The fixing of time is always an arbitrary matter. In England no doubt their Naturalization Act of 1922 is adapted to the times that were fixed in some previous acts which were being consolidated. I would suggest that the date should read the 1st January 1924, computing the seven-year period from that time so that no person born before this bill becomes law would be prejudiced. The only difference it would make between us and the Mother Country would be the adoption of a later date here; and where we have so many people living in the neighbouring republic whose status would be affected, I think we should be rather careful to keep the door open for British citizenship wherever it is possible to do so.

I would make one other suggestion to my hon. friend, the Secretary of State (Mr. Copp). I think it very unwise to have such a complicated measure as the Naturalization Act partly in one volume and partly in another, consisting of references and cross-references. I am fairly well accustomed to comparing statutes, but in the few moments at my disposal I cannot say that I have got hold of everything bearing on the point I have just dealt with. What does this mean? We scarcely ever have to deal with the question of British citizenship except in two cases: one, to advise whether a particular person is qualified to be the owner of a British ship—and that is extremely important—the other, to decide whether a particular person is entitled to the franchise in this Dominion. We know when we get into the heat of an election all sorts of people will put forth all sorts of opinions with regard to the Naturalization Act. Each side wants to get every possible voter, and I am afraid some horribly unsound law is uttered around election times, but I could readily acquit any reasonable practitioner from trying to serve a party purpose in the opinion he might express on the ground that he would be lost in the morass of provisions that have been repealed or partly amended. Would it not be much more simple to consolidate these acts? The law is not likely to be changed again for a good many years I trust. There are provisions here in regard to the status of alien enemies which I do not want to discuss to-night as I have not found their bearings yet. For all I know the provisions may be quite satisfactory. We could have what is proposed to be the whole naturalization law of Canada consolidated, and so greatly simplify reference to this law, which at best is difficult enough when embodied in one well-drawn statute. At present these statutes are in a very awkward condition for the ordinary practitioner to deal with them.

Mr. COPP: I quite agree with my hon. friend that the acts should be consolidated, and I made a suggestion to my Under Secretary the other day to this end. He told me he had the matter in mind and as soon as this bill was accepted by parliament he would make a codification of the whole law and have it published in pamphlet form for distribution to those who cared to apply for copies.

Mr. BAXTER: I appreciate the intention, but I do not like it. I want to be able to go to the statute myself; I do not want someone else's compilation; and that is the general experience of the profession. A very excellent deputy may pass the work over to a very competent official, but the result will not be an act of this parliament, and conceivably errors may creep in. It is just as easy for the official to prepare a consolidated bill for passage now; then we will have every phase of the question before us. I do not raise this point in a spirit of captious criticism, but I want to get this very important legislation put in the very best form possible, and I would strongly urge my hon. friend to take a little more time and adopt my suggestion.

Mr. COPP: I have no objection if the committee feel it important that the consolidation should be done now, but it seems to me—although I do not wish to press my views upon the committee—that as there are only three or four amendments they might be accepted now and the act could be properly consolidated afterwards. The consolidation of the statutes could not very well be done during the present session.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is no doubt a great deal of force in what the minister says about the consolidation of all the Dominion statutes. This consolidation is long overdue. The work was commenced a year and a half or two years ago, but from information I have received I would judge that it is proceeding very, very slowly indeed. The last consolidation of the Dominion statutes was as far back as 1906, and when one has to determine a question under the Naturalization Act, the Criminal Code, the Patents Act, the Copyright Act, or any of the dozen other enactments that might be enumerated, it is necessary to have practically a complete set of the statutes from 1906 down to the present if one is to be sure that no amendment is overlooked. The Naturalization Act is one of the most difficult acts we have to interpret, and there is a great deal of force in the suggestion of the hon. member for St. John City (Mr. Baxter) that a consolidation of the present law be made, to include any amendments the Secretary of State now proposes. I fancy the Under Secretary of State could do it in a day or two; I undertook to do it once as Solicitor General, but that act is not in force now. If that were done we would have an up-to-date act which would embody all the legislation on the subject and obviate the necessity of going into all the enactments as we now have to do when any difficult question has to be determined. Just one other point: the discussion of clause 4 of the bill which we are now considering, will occupy some considerable time. I know that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), who is not in the city to-day, would like to be present when the discussion of this section proceeds. The minister realizes that the present proposal is a subversion of all the past practice in this country in regard to naturalization. I think as far back as our law extends the matter of the naturalization of aliens has been investigated and passed upon before some judicial tribunal. The old system—the oldest I remember—was one under which the applicant made his application to some officer of the court, different officers being named in the various provinces. The application was read in open court on the first day of the court's sitting, and during those sittings any person had the right to offer objections to the naturalization. If no objection was taken during the entire sittings of the court, a formal certificate was granted and a man became a British subject. But it was a judicial proceeding, notwithstanding the informal manner in which it was conducted; it was a matter in which the courts of Canada were called upon to exercise judicial discretion. My hon. friend now proposes to remove from the courts of the country that discretion and practically place it in his own hands. Under section 4 of the bill he proposes to change the whole system of naturalization as we have had it in Canada since confederation and take it into his own department. It is provided that the Secretary of State will be the person to say whether this man or that man shall or shall not be naturalized, shall or shall not have the right to vote for a candidate for election to this House. That is a serious proposal; it would clothe the minister certainly with a great deal of new power. If the present system has proved unsatisfactory in any way; if it has proved costly or expensive or inconvenient, there must be a method of remedying the situation without placing in the hands of a minister of the Crown the sole right to say whether the hundreds of people whom we expect to come to this country shall or shall not have the right to vote. I for one, so far as I understand the matter now, would feel compelled to oppose such a proposal to the very utmost of my power. However, what I would ask the minister at the present time is that he allow us a short time to consider this very radical change in our naturalization law. It may be suggested that we were wrong in the past, but I am not impressed with the conviction that we were nor am I impressed at this time with the propriety of the proposal made in this bill. If my hon. friend will let the matter stand for a couple of days and in the interval consider the question, which is one of great importance, of consolidating the whole law, the bill that we are to pass this session will be one of tremendous advantage to the profession to which I belong as well as to the people generally. I know from a discussion I had with the Under Secretary of State, within a couple of years, anyway, that he could without very much effort, through his intimate knowledge of all these acts, produce a consolidated act which would be of the very greatest advantage to us all.

Mr. COPP: I assure my hon. friend that I do not introduce these proposed changes with any idea of taking into my own hands the jurisdiction respecting naturalization. The clause my hon. friend refers to has been suggested by officials of my department who have had this matter in hand during the last few years and who have, I think dealt with it very successfully indeed. I agree that this is a very radical change from the present system. But I would point out that the Secretary of State has discretionary power to-day either to grant naturalization or to refuse it, and that the Secretary of State under this provision is not taking upon himself any more authority than is provided for in the very act that my hon.

friend himself was responsible for putting through this House a few years ago. The original system of conferring naturalization was, as my hon. friend points out, through application made to the courts and heard in open court, and the notice was there from the first day of the sitting of the court until the last, so that anybody who wished to object to any application for naturalization might have an opportunity to do so. But the system is changed entirely; to-day the application is made to the clerk of the court and the notice is posted, not in any public place, not by publication in any newspaper, but simply in his own office. It may have been with the idea that any who wished to oppose the naturalization of a given applicant would go into the clerk's office to see whether or not the application was being made. The experience of the department is this: while one judge in a particular locality will hold an investigation, write on his report "approved," and pass it on to the State department, another judge, possibly upon exactly the same evidence, will write on a similar application, "disapproved."

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That happens in everything.

Mr. COPP: There is a lack of uniformity; so that the responsibility is placed upon the department of making inquiries for themselves. We have to make that inquiry. The judge's report is practically of no advantage to the department. As to the suggestion of my hon. friend regarding the proposal made in this section, I would not for a moment object to allowing the matter to stand over so that his leader may be here when the discussion proceeds. I am very glad indeed to have had this discussion if only for a few moments, and I would like the members of the committee to think it over whether it is not wise to have this change made; not because I ask the committee to vote confidence in me in regard to naturalizing a man or not, for I hope the department of any government in power in this country would be beyond any suggestion of not acting properly in the matter. I am sure my hon. friend did not mean to suggest that I would use my office to naturalize people who were going to vote in a particular way.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friend forgets that according to rumour he may be succeeded very soon and become a judicial ornament.

Mr. COPP: If that good fortune comes to me more quickly than it did to my hon. friend, I sincerely trust that somebody will be selected to fill the position I now occupy who will endeavour to carry out the duties of his office in the same honest and straightforward way that I have attempted to discharge these duties. I have no objection whatever, if my hon. friend desires it, to having the matter stand over until the leader of the Opposition is here, and I would like hon. members of the committee to think the matter over because I feel that the more they do, the more they will be induced to come to the conclusion to which I have come after a very great deal of thought, that this is the proper method of carrying out our naturalization. In the meantime I might say to my hon. friend for St. John that if we could get a consolidation promptly, without delaying the House, if this matter is allowed to stand over I should be very glad to consider his suggestion.

Mr. BAXTER: I am very glad that the hon. Secretary of State has taken that position. I have been trying to run over the statutes now and I think it would not be a very long job. There would not be many sections.

I would not continue the discussion now if it were not that the Secretary of State wants hon. members to think the matter over. There is one subject to which I would like to call his attention in order that he may think it over before he comes here with his proposals. If I gather the structure of what will be the new bill correctly, all the applications through judicial offices will be eliminated and it will simply be an application to the Department of the Secretary of State. I am in entire accord with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) who says that in some cases men have travelled over a couple of hundred miles and been put to great expense in getting their naturalization. I am sure we would all agree that the test in making a man a British subject ought to be his fitness, and not the distance he travels or the expense he is put to. What I want to call the attention of the Secretary of State to is this: By cutting out all that machinery he leaves apparently section 25 of the act of 1914, which puts practically the whole act in the hands of the Governor in Council by the making of regulations. Now I think there are matters there important enough to be prescribed in whatever Naturalization Act we are to have, that is, the functionaries who are to do things and the people who are to make the examination. The department ought to be able, I think, to suggest in the legislation the particular class of functionaries who are to make the examination, whether it is to be by the Mounted Police or whatever body it may be, rather than leaving it to be done by regulation. In a matter so important to people's rights as this I do not think that order in council legislation, as it is commonly termed, is quite desirable. It was perhaps very necessary during the trying period of our country's history, but now in time of peace it is unnecessary to take emergent powers, and there ought to be some plain line marked out in the statute itself to which any intending applicant can refer, and he ought to feel some certainty that that mode will only be changed by the actual deliberation of parliament. I do not say that, certainly not, with the slightest intention of reflecting on my hon. friend. I do not mean that at all, but I do not think it is a proper power to have in the hands of any Secretary of State or of any government, because governments are all liable to temptation, and my hon. friend who appreciates the strenuousness with which political lists are often fought in the Maritime provinces will realize how in a certain province not unknown to us it has been sometimes impossible to get a justice of the peace appointed of a certain political faith while the other political faith held the keys to power. Both have sinned in precisely the same way, and yet we know that to get a man on the electoral list you have to have an affidavit before a justice of the peace. Now if by regulation made by the Governor in Council you could have some particular functionary, and very few of them, you may have just as much difficulty in getting a man to the proper functionary to swear to a simple fact as in the case described by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni where a man had to travel a couple of hundred miles. I do not say the Secretary of State is going to do anything of the kind. We have too much personal confidence in him to think he would do it, but we have not the same confidence that he will be everlastingly in his position. I do not know whether so good a reward as has been suggested is coming to my hon. friend or not. I should be very glad to see him get it, but we do not know who may come after him; we do not know what government may come after him. It may be that some day this party would be rather unwilling to do anything for those on his side of the House, so he had better be prepared.

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend's idea is that the officials to whom we should refer these naturalization questions should be set out in the statute instead of the matter being left to regulation.

Mr. BAXTER: I would prefer that.

Mr. COPP: I may say that we have always referred these questions to the Mounted Police in the different sections.

Mr. BAXTER: It would be better to put that right into the bill, whoever it be.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I would like a little information from the minister before we leave this question as to whether there could not be co-operation between the Dominion department and the provincial local subdivisions. I understand that the intention is to do away with the present procedure of applying to the district judge for naturalization papers, and that the application is to go direct to the department. I was wondering if it were possible to make use of our provincial clerks or secretary-treasurers. I find that in our western country the applicant for naturalization is usually a foreigner with very little English; he understands very little about writing, or whom to send a letter to, and the initial steps he should take towards getting his naturalization papers. Even though he may have been in the country five years or more he usually goes to the secretary of the municipality, that is the smallest local subdivision, and makes all kinds of inquiries of him as to what he should do and how he should do it. Sometimes he gets this official to do the work for him. Would it not be possible for the Dominion department to co-operate with these provincial units and use the rural secretaries as a medium between the applicant and the department to take the applications and transmit them to the department for consideration?

Mr. COPP: Any official could be referred to. At the present time the work is being done by the clerks of the courts. I do not know that it would be any great advantage to specify that the rural secretaries should take the application. If the applicant wants to get into communication with the department in regard to naturalization and cannot write himself, he must go to somebody. That would be left entirely to himself. The suggestion made in the bill now before the committee is that the application come before the department, and it would not matter whether the application came through a municipal clerk, a lawyer, doctor, clergyman or anyone else whose services were used to make out the application papers. If the suggestion that is now in the bill be carried out, then so far as the department knows the application comes direct from the man himself. He can get anyone he likes to assist in filling out and filing his application.

Progress reported.

NARCOTIC DRUGS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Health) moved the second reading of Bill 72, to amend the Narcotic Drugs Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 2—Definitions, "drug," "opium," "prepared opium" "imports" or "imported":

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Before we go into the sections of the bill, I think it would assist us if the minister told us what is being done by this bill, whether it is a modification of the existing law, or an enlargement, and what the aim of the bill is.

Mr. BELAND: When I introduced the bill I attempted to explain in a few words that this was only a consolidation of the different acts passed by this parliament on four different occasions, I believe. I also mentioned that there would be a slight addition, to which we will come as we proceed with the examination of the bill. The new features are in connection with an appeal in certain cases, and with the identification of those who are detained after a charge has been brought against them, or after they have been convicted. This is provided for at the end of the bill. The other provisions of the bill are mainly a consolidation of the different acts, in an endeavour to make some sections clearer for the interpretation of the courts.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I notice there are some new sections. Does section 2 enlarge the definition?

Mr. BELAND: Subsection (c) gives the definition of "prepared or smoking opium." This provision is designed to carry out a special recommendation of the Opium Conference.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is an enlargement.

Mr. BELAND: This part is new and the remainder is the same.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is an enlargement of the definition of "drug." Are you contracting the definition, or making it broader?

Mr. BELAND: We are making it broader. Paragraphs (b), (e) and (f) are the same. Paragraph (g) is new and gives the definition of "Minister" as follows:

(g) "Minister" means the minister presiding over the Department of Health of the time being.

In the former interpretation section, there was no definition of the word "minister," and all through the act we had to make it read "The minister presiding over the Department of Health".

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And the Dominion analyst?

Mr. BELAND: That is the same, and the provincial analyst is the same.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is marked new here.

Mr. BELAND: (h) and (i) are new.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Minister may issue licenses, make regulations therefor, and prescribe fees:

Mr. MANION: I think the section should be read.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is new.

Mr. BELAND: It is exactly the same section, except the last two lines, which are added to the former section. I have no objection to the section being read.

Mr. MANION: I think these sections should be read. They are important, and it will only take a moment or two.

Mr. BELAND: By all means.

The CHAIRMAN: The new sections?

Mr. MANION: All the sections.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the committee the bill should be read section by section?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MANION: The only new part in section 3 is in regard to "smoking opium," is it not?

Mr. BELAND: Exactly.

Mr. ANDERSON: No change in the license fees.

Mr. BELAND: There is no change at all.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Importing or exporting drug without license, etc.:

Mr. MANION: Paragraph (e), is important. I think this is an additional section. I do not think it was in the act last year. That is in regard to whipping. Whipping at the discretion of the judge. That was put in last year, was it not?

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Is this the section referred to by one or two of the chiefs of police as section 21 of the preceding year? Is it included in this section? It was left out of the bill last year, inadvertently, was it not?

Mr. BELAND: It is further on.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister, I presume, has covered the point in the bill?

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Persons to whom drugs may be sold:

Mr. BELAND: There are added to this clause only two words, the second and third word at the top of page 4: "and dated". The balance is the same.

Mr. MANION: Does this prevent the refilling of any prescription by a physician for any of the drugs in the schedule, without another order by the physician?

Mr. BELAND: Unless the prescription does not contain any larger quantity of drug than can be filled lawfully.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What does that mean?

Mr. BELAND: That means two grains of opium to the ounce, one-fourth of a grain of morphine to the ounce, one-eighth of a grain of heroin to the ounce, or one grain of codeine to the ounce.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How is that defined?

Mr. BELAND: It is defined in this bill in clause 9. When we come to clause 9, my hon. friend will find the exact description of preparations which, although they contain some of the drugs which are forbidden, can be lawfully sold because they contain only small quantities.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Unlawful for physician, veterinary surgeon or dentist to prescribe, give or sell drugs except for medicinal purpose:

Mr. BELAND: No change at all.

Mr. MANION: The question of what is considered proper for medicinal purposes is left entirely in the hands of the physicians, is it not?

Mr. BELAND: It is left altogether to the attending physician.

Mr. MANION: For example, if a doctor considers that a man who has been addicted to one of these drugs is in such a nervous condition that he requires some of the drug, that is left entirely to the physician?

Mr. BELAND: You cannot prescribe smoking.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Not keeping record:

Mr. BELAND: There are only a few words added to this clause. On page 5 in the first, second and third lines these words are added:

or to furnish to the Department of Health any information required by that department.

This is added to make the clause clearer.

Mr. STEVENS: In connection with this clause, there is just one point as regards which I should like to ask the minister his opinion, because I know the point I raise is a very delicate one. If I read the clause aright, it means that physicians, dentists and such like are called upon to furnish information only when required to do so by the minister.

Mr. BELAND: That is right.

Mr. STEVENS: Has the minister considered the advisability of inserting in the bill a provision that they shall give information when asked to do so by the attorney general of a province or the Crown prosecutor or the police authorities? That may seem to be extending the matter too far; but there is no doubt great difficulty in getting proper information for the local authorities to prosecute and to carry out the provisions of the law satisfactorily. I am not prepared to press for this; but I submit it to the minister, and perhaps he can tell the committee whether it has been considered and what his opinion is.

Mr. BELAND: There is in almost every province a provincial law covering this point. For instance, in Quebec, the College of Physicians and Surgeons and the College of Pharmacists have special legislation of their own which would meet exactly the object raised by my hon. friend.

Mr. STEVENS: I am glad the minister makes that statement, because I was not at all clear as to the advisability. If that is the case, then certainly it would be desirable that it should be made perfectly clear in this act that the police have the right to request the information, especially as this act is looked upon as perhaps, the most important piece of legislation, either provincial or Dominion, of its kind dealing with this class of offence. The suggestion is made that the doctor or the druggist can always be subpoenaed. That is not the point so much, nor is it sufficient that they can get this under some provincial act. The minister, I know, will agree with me, and I am sure anyone in this House who has been watching the unfortunate progress of this evil, will also agree that everything possible must be done to suppress this traffic. I have noted in some articles and speeches and, I think, in statements by police authorities that there has been considerable difficulty with irresponsible practitioners, not necessarily physicians, but particularly veterinaries. I have heard on several occasions the opinion expressed, or, indeed, the assertion made positively that they were circumventing the law.

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend refers to practitioners regularly practising.

Mr. STEVENS: What are referred to in this bill as physicians, veterinaries, dentists, druggists, and so forth. My suggestion is that we should enlarge this clause to provide that they shall give the information when requested to do so, not only by the minister, but by recognized police authorities—I am not particular as to the wording—administering the law in any municipality. I submit that to the consideration of the minister.

Mr. MacLAREN: Would the minister explain a little more definitely what is meant by the words "giving information"? Before taking a step such as has been suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens), we should consider very carefully the question of giving up professional secrecy unless the matter is properly safeguarded.

Mr. MANION: I might mention that in Ontario, we are fully covered as regards ordinary medical practitioners, just as the minister explained in connection with Quebec. I cannot answer for the veterinary surgeons or the dentists, but I believe they are covered also in this way. Supposing some medical practitioner or veterinary surgeon or dentist prescribes a large quantity of the drugs in the schedule. Immediately the Department of Public Health writes to him because the druggist makes a report to the department regularly. If a report went in that a large quantity of a drug was prescribed by a certain physician, dentist or veterinary, and from the quantity of the drug prescribed the department were of the opinion that it was not being used for medicinal purposes, then they would write the doctor, veterinary or dentist concerned and ask for an explanation. I believe, therefore, that the act covers the situation so far as Ontario is concerned, and I have no doubt the same thing applies to the other provinces. But suppose a medical practitioner were pulled up by the department and condemned to pay a fine or be otherwise punished for some offence under the act; it would be the duty of the provincial authority mentioned by my hon. friend, the Medical Council, to deal with that practitioner. But so far as reports are concerned, I think the point made by the member for St. John (Mr. MacLaren) is a good one. No doctor would care to hand in to any policeman or police magistrate any information regarding his patients; he would not consent to do anything of the kind unless he were subpoenaed. The department can look into the matter and deal with any practitioner who is prescribing drugs improperly, and can deal with him as they see fit if a satisfactory explanation is not given.

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend has perfectly explained the situation as it exists in practice. Subsection (a) covers the manufacturers as well as the druggists, wholesale and retail. As regards the duly authorized practising physician, it is not deemed advisable that he should be subjected to investigation on the part of a peace officer or a policeman. As my hon. friend has pointed out, it is rather an easy matter for the department to ascertain the quantities of drugs a doctor has been able to procure through the wholesale or the retail druggist, and it is always open to the department to institute an inquiry if they have reason to believe that a doctor is dispensing a large quantity of any forbidden drug. If there is some reason to think that he is using it for other than purely medical purposes we can follow him up, and that has been done in many instances. The hon. member for St. John has brought to the attention of the committee another feature of the subject that should be given consideration and that is that medical men be allowed to exercise professional discretion without being interefered with unduly by the powers that be, and I think that the law has been framed to meet such cases. As my hon. friend for Vancouver Centre has said, the law is important as it is severe, the only difficulty being as to where to draw the line. We have attempted, as our predecessors did, to devise legislation that would suppress the illicit traffic in drugs, but our object is difficult of realization. The law as presented to the House to-day contains very severe and drastic provisions and I do not think it could be made more stringent than it is without indeed unduly interfering with individual liberty. At all events, I believe the section covers the points brought up pretty well.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Liniments, ointments, and other preparations excepted:

Mr. BELAND: There is no change in this section, but my hon. friend for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) wanted to know whether the quantities of a certain drug I referred to in a former explanation were to be found in the act. That matter is dealt with in this section, which states that preparations can be sold lawfully though they contain some of that drug.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Smoking opium:

Mr. BELAND: The penalty under this section is increased from $50 to $100.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—Being in opium resort:

Mr. BELAND: The penalty in this section is increased from one to three months.

Section agreed to.

On section 14—Onus of proof on charge of importing, exporting, manufacturing, selling etc., without license:

Mr. BELAND: This section and section 15 might, I think, be cited in answer to the observations made by my hon. friend for Vancouver.

Mr. MANION: Section 14 provides:

> Where a charge is laid under either paragraphs (a), (d) or (e) of section four of this act, the onus shall be upon the accused to establish that he had lawful authority to commit the act complained of, or that he had a license from the minister authorizing such act. (1921, c. 42, s. 1 (f).)

I am not particularly taking exception to the section but I notice in this country at the present time, and recently too, an increasing tendency to depart from the old British dictum that a man shall be considered innocent until he is proven guilty, and to establish instead the principle that a man shall be considered guilty until he is proven innocent. Now, many of the inspectors, not under this act, perhaps, but under similar legislation, are more or less irresponsible; and any irresponsible inspector can make a charge against a citizen and in this case accuse him of breaking the law, and it will be incumbent upon the citizen to prove that he is innocent of that charge. I believe in a general way that it is a very dangerous thing to put into any law such a provision as that. I think that the good old British dictum of a man being considered innocent until he is proven guilty is better than the opposite principle which is coming increasingly into effect, of considering a man guilty until he is proven innocent. That is the principle in this case. Can the minister tell us how long it has been in force?

Mr. BELAND: It was inserted in 1921 and retained last year. It is now a repetition of two former enactments.

Mr. MANION: Without referring to this clause particularly, I wish to put myself on record in a general way as being absolutely opposed to any change of the old principle. I think that this country and the various provinces of it might well hesitate before changing a rule of law which has been good enough for our forefathers for generations, and which I think is absolutely sound. Let me repeat, a man who is perfectly responsible may be put into a very difficult and expensive position because, with all due respect to my legal friends around me, it costs money to defend one's self against any criminal charge. Therefore I believe it would be well for this and any other department of the government to consider such a clause very seriously before embodying it in any proposed legislation.

Mr. LADNER: I submit from the wording of the clauses it is apparent that the government has considered the point very thoroughly. I think the hon. gentleman would appreciate the necessity of such provisions if he had knowledge of some of the revelations that have been made of late in Montreal, Vancouver, Winnipeg and other of our cities. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that these clauses are absolutely essential, for you cannot catch this class of people unless you enact such provisions. We are not legislating to give such a finesse of protection to the scoundrel who goes about the country creating ruin that is hardly equalled by any other evil-doers. I submit that these clauses should remain exactly as they are. They are quite practical and will serve a good purpose. The general principle here is proved by the exception.

Mr. MANION: I wish to take exception to my hon. friend's remarks because of the implication they contain that some of us are anxious for this "finesse of protection" that he speaks of. I presume there is no member of this House, whatever may be his party affiliations, who is not just as eager as my hon. friend to do away with the illicit use of any of these habit-forming drugs; but I wished to state the principle which should underlie criminal enactments, and I have no reason for retracting any of my words. I believe that any government should hesitate about insisting that a man is guilty until he proves himself innocent; rather the reverse should be the attitude.

Mr. MARTELL: Mr. Chairman, I quite agree with the remarks made by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion). It is quite true, as has been stated by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner), that drastic measures are needed to stamp out the drug habit, but I understood the hon. member for Fort William to be interposing an objection to taking away the onus probandi from the informant or the accuser.

Mr. MANION: Hear, hear.

Mr. MARTELL: It is an old principle of British law that he who alleges must prove. There has been a tendency during the last few years in this House, and also in some of our legislatures, to relieve the accuser or informant of the burden of proof. The old principle of the common law to which I have referred should always be the permanent feature borne in mind in drafting any statute, and should not be departed from except in extraordinary cases. I believe that the protest of my hon. friend for Fort William is well taken. A similar protest was made last year by the hon. member for St. John City (Mr. Baxter) in connection with the Fisheries Act. Everyone is beginning to realize that the sooner we get away from making convictions easy the better it is for the observance of the law, because we have so much paternal and freak legislation today that people are apt to be considered guilty upon the mere allegation of some official who presses for a conviction because he gets a portion of the fine imposed. While in this case it may be necessary for the minister to have the most efficient machinery possible at his command, yet I think he as well as all other ministers should as far as possible refrain from departing from the old legal procedure.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Would the hon. gentleman suggest that this clause should be struck out?

Mr. MARTELL: No, certainly not, because the conditions probably are bad and demand drastic treatment. I only rose in my place to emphasize and support what was said by the hon. member for Fort William whom, I thought, was somewhat misunderstood. I believe he is right in demanding that we adhere to the old British principle. I think the public are becoming sick and tired of paternal legislation.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. BAXTER: There appears to be a slight mistake in the drafting of section 14. Two answers are put in the mouth of the accused by this section. One is that he had lawful authority to commit the act complained of; the other is that he had a license from the minister authorizing such act. The license from the minister would seem to apply to clauses (a) and (e). As to clause (e), I do not think the accused can very well set up that he had "lawful authority to commit the act complained of because the charge is that he unlawfully sells, gives away or distributes any drug to any minor." You cannot have lawful authority to do an unlawful act. I would be very much pleased to see some provision inserted by which a little mercy might be exercised where a man believing he was doing a lawful act sold a drug to apparently a man who turned out to be a minor. But it is unlawful to sell, give away or distribute a drug to a minor. You cannot have the authority of the minister to do that, neither can you lawfully do it. I think there is a mistake in the reference to the subsection.

Mr. BELAND: Looking over paragraph (e) of section 2 I see that "export" or "exporting" means and includes the taking or conveying, or causing to be taken or conveyed, out of Canada of any drug. In order to meet my hon. friend's objection, I think we might very well dispense with the references to (e) in clause 14, and leave the paragraph (a) and (d).

The CHAIRMAN: (a) or (d).

Mr. BAXTER: (a), (b) or (d).

Mr. BELAND: There is no objection to including (b). Section 14 would then read:

Where a charge is laid under either paragraphs (a), (b) or (d) of section 4 of this act,—

And so on.

Mr. LADNER: I would ask the minister to reconsider his decision, for he is eliminating a section that is most important in the interests of our young people—the very one which is taken the greatest advantage of by the drug dealer. If there is a class of men upon whom the strongest penalties should be imposed it is those who deliberately go out and sell drugs to minors. Now the minister is practically giving them a new lease of life, because the chances of proving a case in the event of sale to a minor are very small indeed.

Mr. BELAND: Which subsection does my hon. friend refer to?

Mr. LADNER: Paragraph (e) of section 4. I understand the minister proposes to eliminate paragraph (e) so that people who sell to minors—the worst of all these offences, in my opinion—are not subject to the same extent of penalty as those committing other offences under the act.

Mr. BAXTER: The onus should be on the accused to establish that he is not guilty of the offence, because he might not have lawful authority to commit the act complained of, he might not have license to do it, he might not in point of fact have done it. An innocent man should be given a chance to present his real answer, namely, that he did not do it; but you shut that out.

Mr. LADNER: That suggestion may be valuable, but this is a question of shifting the onus of proof, and as the section is now worded a man is not deprived of the privilege of proving his innocence; in fact, it lays upon him the onus of proving it. That is all that section does.

Mr. BAXTER: No, it does not do that. It puts the onus on him to establish that he had lawful authority to do it or had license to do it. But suppose he actually did not do it?

Mr. LADNER: That would not affect him; that would only be a question of evidence. In any event, I strongly urge the inadvisability of allowing those to be let off above all others, who sell to minors.

Mr. BELAND: I confess that the clause could be made to read more smoothly from a strictly legal point of view, but I do not fear any difficulty at all so far as carrying out the spirit of the act is concerned, with the clause drafted as it is, and with the addition of paragraph (b) so that section 14 will cover paragraphs (a), (b), (d), and (e). The hon. member for Vancouver South is right when he says that the sale to a minor is one of the worst charges that could be levelled under this act.

Mr. BROWN: I hope that the minister will seriously consider before he yields to the suggestion to strike out (e). The offence is one of the worst that could be committed under the act, and to remove that clause would be a great mistake.

Mr. LADNER: Would the addition of the words "or did not commit the offence" cover the point?

Mr. BAXTER: Put them in after the word "establish".

Mr. BELAND: Then I would move that the clause be amended so that it will read as follows:

Where a charge is laid under either paragraphs (a), (b), (d) or (e) of section four of this act, the onus shall be upon the accused to establish that he did not commit the offence, or that he had lawful authority to commit the act complained of, or that he had a license from the minister authorizing such act.

Mr. FORTIER: I think the minister is certainly going too far in this amendment. As the clause stands there is no pre-

10 p.m. sumption of guilt; there is only the obligation upon the accused to prove that he had lawful authority to commit the act complained of or that he had a license from the minister authorizing it. We now completely change the clause and put the presumption of guilt upon the accused. I never saw an instance of that kind in any law. A man who is accused of a crime before a tribunal cannot be presumed guilty until he is proved guilty. I know of no case in any federal law where a person accused before any tribunal is considered as guilty before he has had the privilege of putting in his defence. I am against such an amendment.

Mr. MacLAREN: While we agree with the general principle that a man is presumed innocent until he is proved guilty there are cases where that principle cannot be followed. That is particularly the case in the matter of drugs; there are difficulties in proving violations of the act in many cases unless we approach the subject from the point of view of this proposed provision. The hon. member (Mr. Fortier) has suggested that this position has not been taken in other acts, but if the Minister of Customs (Mr. Bureau) were here I think he would tell us that that is the position taken as regards smuggling: that men who are found in the possession of contrabrand can be and are called upon to explain their position. I have no doubt that there are other instances where it has been necessary to approach the matter from this point of view.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 17—Certificate of Dominion analyst evidence of content of drug:

Mr. MANION: Should not the certificate of the Dominion analyst when put in as evidence be put in under oath? It does not say so. If that certificate is going to be accepted as evidence it should be submitted as an affidavit or given under oath.

Mr. BAXTER: I think it ought to be regarded as prima facie evidence.

Mr. LADNER: I was just about to make the same suggestion as my hon. friend for St. John. It is possible that the Dominion analyst was wrong when he gave the certificate and a man could bring a perfectly good analyst to prove that he was wrong, but according to this section that evidence would not be admissible. I think provision should be made whereby it would be admissible. It says now that the certificate "shall be accepted as evidence." I do not see how you could get around that.

Section agreed to.

On section 18—Power of peace officer to search for drugs:

Mr. BELAND: There is no change here but I would like to move to add the word "vehicle" in the forty-first line after the word "vessel." The word "vehicle" has inadvertently been omitted.

Mr. MANION: Has there always to be a warrant before a search?

Mr. BELAND: Only in the case of a private residence.

Mr. MANION: There must always be in that case?

Mr. BELAND: In that case, but not otherwise.

Section agreed to.

On section 24—Except in cases tried before two justices, no appeals in cases taken under section 4, (a), (d) and (e):

Mr. BAXTER: Why, may I ask, is that provision here? I do not want to throw any safeguards around people engaged in this illegal traffic. On the other hand, I do not want to throw any unnecessary protection around ignorant and prejudiced justices of the peace who sometimes try cases in the courts. No matter what offence a man is charged with, I can scarcely see why an appeal should be allowed to one class of offence and refused to the same man if charged with something different. If he has been wrongly convicted he ought to have some way under the law of getting rid of that erroneous conviction, and if rightly convicted I would not mind if you put a heavier penalty on him through the agency of the court of appeal, whatever it may be. But I do stand for giving a man the right to be heard in a British court of justice against what appears to be error or sometimes intentional wrong-doing, and these small tribunals are not always fit to be trusted with a man's property or a man's liberty. In what I am advocating I do not wish to throw the slightest protection around the drug fiends who are debauching communities, but what I want is to have a little safety for the man convicted in the teeth of the law by ignorant people, by people who seek a victim and believe they have one. Now let us be fair.

Mr. BELAND: Last year there was some debate in this House upon this very clause, but ultimately it passed this House without any division. Unhappily, in my estimation at least, the clause was rejected by the Senate. As I tried to explain last year the presence of this clause in the act is most important. In many, many cases an appeal is taken for the only purpose of extending to some of the most important witnesses a chance to get away out of reach, and it is to meet that very thing that the appeal is denied except on a question of law. An appeal is not permitted on the question of facts if the facts are established before a regular magistrate—

Mr. BAXTER: But this does not make any distinction between matters of law and matters of fact. It does make a distinction between cases tried before two justices and cases tried by a magistrate on the other hand.

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend will admit that a question of law can always be discussed without witnesses being present should an appeal be taken, but as to a question of fact, if the principal witnesses are not at the disposal of the Crown prosecutor my hon. friend will realize that he would be at a great disadvantage in case of an appeal.

Mr. BAXTER: I would suggest this: Leave this clause as you have it, but take out the clause taking away certiorari. Certiorari does not depend upon witnesses, but I do not like that quite as well myself, because I do not want a man to escape by a legal technicality. But I do want him to have some better chance than a magistrate who may err in his decision on the facts.

Mr. BELAND: I hardly think it would be possible to do away with this. I might say that a similar provision exists in the Criminal Code with regard to disorderly houses.

Mr. BAXTER: It exists in too many cases. It exists in every prohibitory act in the country.

Mr. BELAND: I suppose I should not say, thank God I am not a lawyer, but I am not versed very much in the science of the law. However, I know that a provision of this kind is to be found in the legislation of many of the provinces. I think it is to be found in the Ontario Temperance Act; it is to be found in the Quebec law regarding disorderly houses, and in the Criminal Code also. My impression is that if we do not afford to those in charge of this law all possible means of suppressing this traffic we are not doing what we should do. We must afford them all possible means of meeting a situation which is most serious, and I know that my hon. friend agrees with me in that regard. Some of the old principles of English law seem to be denied in this legislation. That is true, but still the case is altogether extraordinary.

Mr. BAXTER: I sympathize with the hon. minister, and I would go further. I would not criticize the section that puts the burden of proving innocence upon the accused, because that is practically necessary in certain classes of offence, but I may say that the tendency of legislation is running a little too far towards taking away an opportunity of correcting an error that may be made by the first tribunal. The minister has spoken of the Ontario Temperance Act. I do not know much about it, but I know something about the prohibitory law in New Brunswick which I introduced and put through the legislature. I have bitterly regretted the fact that I put it through, because instances of undoubted cases of absolute brutal injustice have come to my knowledge, where magistrates convicted innocent men, simply because these magistrates were worse than partisans—they were absolutely blind. No man could come before them who would not be presumed to be guilty and condemned as speedily as possible. That is the spirit in which it has been done, and I have always regretted that I ever allowed my hand to be put to anything that deprived a man of the chance of getting justice. At the same time, I do not want to throw any safeguards around criminals, or permit any loopholes of escape for them in legislation of this character. But I want to see enough in the act to ensure that a really innocent man shall not be punished, and we ought to be able to frame legislation that will affect both of these objects, so that an innocent man shall not be tyrannously punished, and yet that a guilty man shall not have too great an opportunity of escape.

Mr. MANION: I may say, in a general way, that I do not want the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) to accuse me of sympathizing at all with any of the illicit drug peddlers, but I wish to associate myself again, for the reason I gave a moment ago, with my hon. friend for St. John (Mr. Baxter). The minister quoted the Ontario Temperance Act. There are many who think that act has done a great deal of good, but I have certainly seen cases under the Ontario Temperance Act conducted by some magistrates who took exactly the attitude outlined by the hon. member for St John, especially in dealing with foreigners. There has been a tendency amongst some magistrates—I have seen it occur—to too quickly accept the word of some police officer and absolutely ignore the word of a foreigner in this country. I personally have a good deal of sympathy for these foreign people who come to the country and wish to become citizens and have become citizens, when some careless, irresponsible magistrate finds them guilty of an offence, practically without giving them a trial. Let me give an instance to illustrate that. I am not speaking without some reason for what I say. There was an instance—and it had to do with this Dominion government—about a year ago, where an excise officer visited a place, and found a little bit of home-made brew of some kind in the man's house. The man's wife was sick in bed, his children were very young, and they were far from any neighbour; yet the excise officer sent out some Royal Canadian Mounted Police officers and had this man brought into the city. In this case I do not blame the magistrates, but I blame the law that permitted this to occur, because the magistrate claimed he could not come to any other decision than the one he rendered. The magistrate convicted him and sentenced him to pay a fine of $700 which the man could not by any stretch of the imagination pay, and at the same time his wife and children were lying in a shack out in the wilderness. I took up the case with the Minister of Customs (Mr. Bureau) who looked upon the matter in what I considered was the proper light, and ultimately the heavy fine was remitted, and a nominal fine was imposed, because technically the man had committed a crime. We should avoid as far as we can putting on the statute book legislation which, no matter what kind of a crime we are dealing with, too quickly proves the man guilty, and does not give him a chance to prove his innocence in some other court if need be.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Referring to the proposition of placing the onus upon the accused, and of limiting the right of appeal, from a legal standpoint, of course, it is an extraordinary course to pursue. My hon. friend for St. John said, with reference to the temperance law in the province of Nova Scotia, that the right of certiorari has been taken away. I think it has been taken away in probably every province in the Dominion in regard to the Temperance Act, and I quite agree that cases have occurred where the right of certiorari has been taken and an injustice has been done. We all know the circumstances under which legislation of that character is enforced, but no one has seriously questioned that parliament did a wise thing when they took away the right of certiorari in regard to cases of persons keeping disorderly houses. These matters are almost invariably tried by recorders or stipendiary magistrates in the cities, who are well qualified to deal with legal questions when they arise and also determine the facts. In regard to this particular matter, whatever we might say in regard to temperance matters, or any other matters that come within the purview of the criminal law, we are all agreed that this nefarious traffic, which saps the mind and body of the people, can only be dealt with in the strongest possible way. I am instructed that in the city of Montreal, out of 68 appeals that were taken, I think, during the last six months, 40 of the appellants, when the cases came on to be heard in appeal, never turned up, which indicates that the parties who were appealing had put up the necessary security merely for the purpose of gaining time, and evading the penalties which the law had provided and were willing to pay the money in order to escape. It is a well-ascertained fact that the traffic which is going on in regard to these drugs is one which, in the interests of the nation, must be dealt with with the same severity as if we had the application of military law. I think the sense of the House and the sense of the committee would be that in proceedings against a physician, or registered druggist, or a veterinary, full rights should be preserved to the defendant in the case, but we are only doing our duty when we declare that no technical objection, or no ground which might be used by way of certiorari should be permitted to interfere with carrying out in a stern way the law which ought to be enforced in the interest of the nation and of our people.

Mr. LADNER: I fully concur with the viewpoint of the last speaker (Mr. Macdonald). In the course of last year, after careful inquiries from reliable sources, I found that practically all the offences which would come under these subsections (a), (b) and (c) of section 4 were committed in the larger cities. That is in Vancouver, Winnipeg and Montreal, but there were very few cases in the city of Ottawa or Quebec; in fact nearly all the cases were in those large cities and just as one hon. member has stated, they generally have lawyers in those cities who are trained men, acting as police magistrates, and they are quite competent to render justice to people charged with these offences.

[Mr. E. M. Macdonald.]

Mr. MARTELL: It seems to me that the accused under this section 14 is absolutely presumed to be guilty at the beginning. Under that section as it has been amended the presumption of guilt is against the prisoner. In fact, he is said to be guilty. When the prosecutor comes into court, it is simply necessary to have the magistrate read the information; then the prisoner pleads not guilty, and he has to proceed and prove himself not guilty. If that magistrate is, as often happens to be the case, a prejudiced person, the accused person is so to speak convicted before he arrives in court, and the man has no right of appeal. If the party does not establish his innocence, the onus of proof being placed upon him, surely the Crown or the informer does not suffer by giving him the right of appeal. He has to put up a bond of probably double the amount of the fine and sufficient security to pay the costs, and he comes before the court. Then the judge has an opportunity of trying the case de novo; he is judge of both the law and the facts. If you take away this right of appeal, you first declare that the onus is on the man to prove his innocence. Then, if he does not establish that to the satisfaction of a prejudiced magistrate—and magistrates in the country are not the same as the trained lawyers we find in the cities and larger towns—he is denied the right of appeal. If you have the man convicted and you have his bond for double the amount of the fine if he is fined, how does the Crown suffer? Then you take away the right of certiorari. In the Nova Scotia legislature some eight or ten days ago a bill was introduced by the provincial Attorney General, who is probably the best criminal lawyer in that province, to give in an application for a writ of certiorari, power to the judge to look at the depositions to see if a prima facie case is made out. Formerly if a conviction was complete and regular on its face, the judge could not look at the evidence; he had to confirm the conviction. By virtue of this bill, if it becomes law in Nova Scotia, where a provincial act is concerned, the judge before whom the matter comes will look at the evidence in order to see if a prima facie case has been made out, and if not, he has authority to make the rule nisi absolute. That is the experience of Nova Scotia under the Temperance Act and other drastic acts of the province. In this case you are taking away the right of certiorari absolutely. If a conviction happens to be a complete conviction on its face, no matter whether there is evidence enough or not to substantiate the conviction, the judge has no power on certiorari. The man is haled before the court; if he is in the hands of a prejudiced magistrate, he is found guilty and he has no right of appeal. This is most dastardly legislation. It is true that very drastic remedies are required to cope with this drug evil; but they should not go so far as to take away every principle of British justice. While we are all agreed that drastic measures should be adopted in order to stamp out this evil, when you are amply protected, for heaven's sake give the accused a chance for his life.

Mr. SHAW: I remember very well last year when this legislation was before the House, I took the view, as was expressed by several of the other members, that our legislation was becoming rather drastic. It seems to me that the effect of this legislation is to deprive an accused person of a remedy which he might have in law, that is, by reason of the abolition of the certiorari right. We are also depriving him of his right of appeal, so that if he happens to be unjustly convicted, because of a misunderstanding of the facts, he has no remedy, and if there is an error in law, he similarly has no remedy. It seems to me that we should preserve to an accused person some means of satisfying the courts of his innocence, and while I have no sympathy whatever with those who commit offences against this particular act, yet it may be possible, owing to inexperience of justices of the peace, that injustice may be done in which even an innocent man may be foreclosed from securing the right to which otherwise under British law he is entitled. The matter should be seriously considered before even, in this legislation, it is allowed to become part of our criminal law.

Section agreed to on division.

On section 25—Convicted alien subject to deportation:

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Some few days ago while I was in conversation with a party who was very conversant with Chinese matters, he advised me that a convicted alien might be either fined or imprisoned, but that deportation proceedings followed only a term in prison. It looks to me as though clauses 25 and 4 overcome that weakness, if it were a weakness; that by the two clauses 4 and 25, the minimum penalty that a judicial body may impose is both fine and imprisonment, and that deportation is sure to follow on any conviction. Is that the case?

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Mr STEVENS: Why limit deportation to paragraphs (a), (d) and (e) of clause 4?

Mr. BELAND: Those are traffickers.

Mr. STEVENS: Paragraph (b) reads:

Imports into or exports from Canada any drug.

Paragraph (c) reads:

Exports any raw opium or any drug that is not packed and marked in such manner—

And so on. That party would be a trafficker just as much as the other, and it might be possible to catch a very notorious trafficker under paragraph (c) and not be able to catch him under one of the other paragraphs. If he is convicted under paragraphs (b) or (c), I do not see why he should not be deported. Why not say under the whole of clause 4?

Mr. BELAND: It would appear that paragraph (a) would cover all the cases, and (b) is only an explanation of what ports should be named by the minister. When the preparation of the bill was under way, this feature of it was very carefully looked into, and it was the opinion that clause 25, as it is now drafted, would meet all possible emergencies. If my hon. friend thinks the clause should be made broader, I have no objection to adding anything he suggests, but in the opinion of the officials of the department and also of the officials of the Department of Justice, that would cover the cases that we want to reach, that we have in view. I may say further that the administration of a similar clause incorporated in the bill last year did not give entire satisfaction. The principal reason is that under clause 10 (b), I think it is, of the former act, too much discretionary power was left with the magistrate. In many cases where an alien was convicted, deportation could not take place because the magistrate interpreted the law in a different manner from what we thought the intention of parliament was at the time of the passing of the act. Moreover, if I may explain, I think a decision has been handed down by a court in British Columbia. There the court held that a person sentenced to pay a fine and, in default of payment of such fine, to a term of imprisonment, not liable to deportation under the act. I am informed that some 49 cases of deportation have been stopped by that decision of the court. The section which has been prepared is supposed to cover all possible cases, and if the committee will read it carefully with me perhaps my hon. friend will share my opinion:

Notwithstanding any provision of the Immigration Act, or any other statute, any alien, whether domiciled in Canada or not, who at any time after his entry into Canada is convicted of an offence under paragraphs (a), (d) or (e) of section four of this act shall, upon the expiration or sooner determination of the imprisonment imposed on such conviction, be kept in custody and deported in accordance with the provisions of the Immigration Act relating to enquiry, detention and deportation. (1922, c. 36, s. 5, 10B.)

It is thought that this section will meet all cases.

Mr. LADNER: Suppose the accused is only fined?

Mr. BELAND: Under section 4 of this act it is provided that he must not only be fined but also sentenced to imprisonment. My hon. friend will find, in section 4, line 26, that not less than $200 and costs as well as imprisonment is the penalty imposed, and further down it is provided that the court shall have no power to impose less than the minimum penalties "herein prescribed," and shall in all cases of conviction impose both fine and imprisonment. It is assumed therefore that this clause will meet all cases of deportation.

On the schedule:

Mr. BELAND: There is a new drug in the schedule.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

INDIAN AFFAIRS

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Indians—Nova Scotia, $50,140.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much money was spent under this item for the last fiscal year?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil, Minister of the Interior): I am informed that we spent the whole amount last year, $53,140, and we are asking this year, $50,140. The difference is explained in the vote required for the Truro highway which was completed, and a similar amount will not need to be voted this year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought we gave a special vote last year of $3,000 for some dyking.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We have an item for dyking this year. The vote for Nova Scotia is very much the same as last year, with the single exception that on carefully scrutinizing the estimates some changes will be found which I will deal with as we come to them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The vote for Nova Scotia of $50,140 has been continued for some time I think, but last year the minister brought down a supplementary estimate which added $3,000 to that vote. As he says, that was for repairs to roads and for dyking.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): For the last fiscal year $3,000 was voted for the main highway through the Millbrook reserve in Colchester, and as the work is now completed a similar vote is not necessary.

Item agreed to.

New Brunswick, $29,334.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What has been spent on this item?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We have not the complete audited accounts of the expenditure, although the amount is exactly the same as we asked last year. It covers practically identically the same vote as formerly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is there a balance on hand this year?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Under the new act the accounts are closed on the 31st March.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I can assure my hon. friend that so far as the departmental accounting is concerned we have used all the vote.

Item agreed to.

Ontario and Quebec, $196,635.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the expenditure under this head?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There is a very considerable decrease in the expenditure on road building and repairs to roads, bridges and drainage. That is accounted for principally by the fact that last year the good roads' programme in Ontario had passed through a considerable number of reserves. I think that little or no payments had been made for two or three years and it required a very large sum to clear off the account. That has all been paid for and so far as I know there are no commitments. This is arrived at by the estimates made upon the roads which passed through the reserves and payments were made accordingly and certified to by our own engineers. They cut down the expenditure too much, and we will possibly have to ask for an additional sum in the supplementary estimates.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much of this is for roads?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am speaking of the item of $15,900, which last year was $58,180. There is a decrease of $42,280 over last year's appropriation there, and that comes out of the large appropriation for repairs to roads, bridges and drainage. The other items are the same as last year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What are they?

Mr. STEVENS: The minister is not quite correct in stating that the other items are the same. There is an increase of $15,000 for relief, and while speaking on this let me draw his attention to this most extraordinary coincidence right through. The increased relief in Nova Scotia of $14,000 more than doubles the vote; the relief in Ontario and Quebec represents an increase of $15,000; and in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta the increase for supplies and so on is $18,000, and for hospitals, medical attendance, etc., $16,000.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The increased relief in Ontario is made up by a corresponding reduction in the general vote. It is a changing of the allocation.

Mr. STEVENS: As far as Ontario, Manitoba and Saskatchewan are concerned, that is not so.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The increase of $18,962 in Manitoba and Saskatchewan is accounted for by the additional supplies provided to meet treaty obligations with the Indians of the Great Slave and Mackenzie river district numbering 3,000 souls. It is the first time we have issued relief to these Indians who have come in under treaty obligations made by Mr. Conroy some two years ago.

Mr. STEVENS: Why the increase in Ontario?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There is a decrease of $15,000 in the general vote. It is simply a transfer for book-keeping purposes taken from the general vote and applied to Ontario for relief purposes.

Mr. STEVENS: How much was spent last year?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): These transfers are confusing and give rise to difficulty in making explanations, but I am told by the accountant that although the $15,000 has not been voted direct for relief purposes it has been paid out of this fund for years. It appears now directly for relief purposes for Ontario and Quebec rather than in the general item number 278.

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Chairman, in referring to the Indians of Manitoba I do not suppose I am likely to say anything that the hon. minister does not already know, but I think it well to make a statement as to their condition. I live near a reserve, and some twenty miles distant, near Brandon, we have a much larger reserve. The condition of the Indians on these reserves is deplorable; there is no denying that fact. While I was at home at Easter I received a deputation of eight or ten Indians who told me, in a dignified and intelligent manner, the story of the conditions that exist upon the reserves. We hear a great deal about the hard times among the farmers in western Canada, men who have long been acquainted with that sort of work, who come down from generations of farmers, yet are hardly able to make a living. I found Indians on the reserve without stock, without implements, without anything with which they could make a living; yet they have been existing. It seems to me that we are slowly starving these people to death. It is all very well to talk about the Indian and his characteristics, his lack of ability to take care of himself under modern conditions, but that is perhaps a rather hard-hearted way of looking at it. We have come into the country and taken the place of these Indians, people who have been used to a nomadic life, who from generation to generation have lived the life of the hunter, knowing nothing of modern conditions of agriculture. They are put in a reserve and told to make their living.

I remember a statement made to me by the late Glen Campbell, at one time a member of this House. He was commissioner of Indian police with jurisdiction over the Indians from the Great Lakes to the foot of the Rockies. I once had the pleasure of going with him over the Sarcee Indian reserve at Calgary, a splendid reserve, with good grazing facilities, capable of taking care of a great many cattle and stock of all kinds. I remember while admiring the reserve and the desirable place the Indians had there that he made the statement to me that were it not for the red tape at Ottawa he could make all these Indians rich. I wonder if there was any truth in that statement? I do not know, but that was what he said. Perhaps the Indians are ruled a little too much by red tape, without the application of any great knowledge of the conditions that prevail on the reserves. I am satisfied that it is no use to supply the Indians—the ones I know, anyway—with stock and seed and implements and then expect them to take care of their stock and make a good living for themselves. As long as these reserves are managed and operated from an office the business of which is characterized by nothing more than red tape and accurate bookkeeping, we are going to have a continuance of the present conditions.

Remember, I am not finding fault with any of the officials, nor am I directing any special criticism against the system that exists, but it is not the proper system. The agent on a reserve should be something more to the Indians than an official; he should be their adviser and their friend; even more than that, he should almost be a father to them by giving his advice and assistance in all matters pertaining to their work. As those who know them are aware, the Indians have an almost childlike temperament. I do not say they are deficient in intellect; in fact, in intellectual ability they will compare with the white man. But they lack the white man's persistence, his sticktoitiveness, his going about his work day after day and carrying out his agricultural activities. I also know that if the agent on a reserve has the confidence of the Indians they will take his advice and be guided by it, and until the government appoint agents who will be something more than officials, who will do something more than carry out simply what the law requires them to do, so long will the condition respecting the Indians continue as it is in Manitoba.

I think it is a disgrace that Canada should allow its wards to be in the condition that they are in at the present time. It was almost pathetic to listen to the stories of some of these men. They went back many years and told me of the arrangement made whereby they became the wards of the government. They told me of how loyal they had been; that when the war broke out they sent their young men over to the front some of whom laid down their lives for Canada. Those who returned went back on the reserve; they have made a bad mess of it; they are unable to make a living and it is no exaggeration to say that they are starving; the people who live near them know the facts. At my own place we often feed the Indians because we know they are really hungry and need something to help them along. Now, I want the government to get acquainted with the facts; to look into the conditions that exists on the reserve; and when the inspector goes around, let him do a little more than enter the agent's office and see that the books are properly kept. I would like to see him get in contact with the Indians, find out what their complaints are, learn of the actual conditions under which they are living, and see whether something cannot be done to make life a little more pleasant for them. In the harvest time the Indians will go out and work well for a month or six weeks, and get big wages, but when they get a little money they go into the town and buy all the canned goods they can get hold of. They are improvident, there is no use denying that, and that is why they need some looking after, someone to take care of them. I have no doubt that the minister is aware of these facts and is anxious to do something to help the Indians, but I want to make this appeal on behalf of the Indians as I know them: that the country do a little more for them; that something be done to help them to help themselves and get them into the way of making a fairly decent living and not actually starve as they are doing at present on the reserve.

11 p.m.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think we should hear from the minister; it is news to the committee that we have starving Indians.

The CHAIRMAN: The item is for Ontario and Quebec.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There may be some in Ontario and Quebec, though I do not know any.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I had intended to make a statement with respect to the Indian department generally. The matter is a very important one to which I have given some considerable attention, and I am prepared to say some things with respect to the Indian department that I think the House should know. I am asking for a very considerable increase in the appropriation for Indian education. I believe that is necessary, in view of what I discovered last year in visiting a considerable number of the western reserves. I cannot speak with authority as to what has happened in eastern Canada because I have not visited those reserves. But as my statement would take at least half an hour, I might better give it to a fuller House to-morrow.

Mr. FORKE: I am sorry that I anticipated the minister's statement.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, the House adjourned at 11.03 p.m.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURAL CONDITIONS

FOURTH REPORT PRESENTED

Mr. McMASTER presented the fourth report of the special committee appointed to inquire into agricultural conditions, as follows:

Your committee beg to submit the following resolution which they have unanimously adopted, viz:—

Among the various subjects which have been investigated by your committee, they desire to make a report on the question of ocean freights. It is not easy to over-emphasize the importance of cheap ocean transportation to the Canadian farmer.

Whatever advantage may have accrued to the Canadian people by the millions of money spent on the development of our internal transportation system—the building of railways, the digging of canals, the deepening of rivers—such advantage may be in a large measure nullified if freight rates from our ocean ports to foreign countries are fixed at such figures as to absorb the savings which these expenditures have obtained.

Your committee are of the opinion that upon the regular steamship lines trading from Canadian ports the price of transportation service is determined neither by the law of supply and demand, nor on the basis of cost plus a reasonable profit, but that a combine exists among the various shipping companies, which combine is known as the North Atlantic and U.K. Conference Eastward-bound.

The headquarters of this organization are at 8-10 Bridge street, New York, and it includes in its membership a very great number, if not all, of the principal steamship companies operating regular lines out of North Atlantic ports.

According to the witness, Mr. W. H. Chase, Atlantic freight rates are made in New York the first Thursday in every month. (See evidence of Mr. Chase, page 350.) To this North Atlantic Conference belong nearly all, if not all, of the regular steamship lines running from Montreal, including the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. (See evidence of Mr. W. A. Cunningham, Traffic Manager, Page 211). It will be remembered that the Canadian Government Merchant marine, as well as the Canadian National Railways, is operated under the control of a board, and not by a minister of the Crown.

Subsidiary to this conference there exists a smaller association of steamship men connected with steamship lines trading out of Montreal. This association is called sometimes the Canadian Liner Committee, and sometimes the Weekly Liner Committee. They hold meetings as a rule every Tuesday afternoon at the offices of the companies whose representatives act for the association.

The minutes of various meetings of this association, produced before your committee show that the lines or transportation companies constituting the association are as follows:

Cunard, Anchor Donaldson and Thomson Lines; Canadian Pacific Ocean Services, Ltd.; White Star Dominion Line; Intercontinental Transports, Ltd., (with which certain vessels of the Canadian Steamship Lines, Ltd., are associated); Furness Withy Company, McLean, Kennedy & Company; and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited. The object of these meetings was very neatly characterized by Mr. L. A. W. Doherty, the representative of one of these lines, as being "to stabilize or keep uniform the situation of ocean transport."

It was contended by the gentleman who represented the Canadian Government Merchant Marine before the committee that the line merely "sat in" with the rest of the steamship lines at the weekly conferences, and that it was not bound in the same manner as the others were bound to maintain rates.

A careful consideration of the evidence hardly supports this contention. It would appear that during the several years the Canadian Government Merchant Marine has been in existence, it has departed from rates so established on four different occasions—one departure, however, covering more than one shipment.

The manner in which the Liner committee operated was as follows:

The general rates were set at the North Atlantic and U. K. Conference in New York, but for the purpose of united action in regard to these and other matters, a weekly meeting was held, at which representatives of all steamship lines attended. At this meeting, rates were agreed upon, and no member of the line had the right to depart from the rates so established without conferring with and warning his competitors of his intention so to do. An earnestly-worded expostulation would be directed by one member to another if this line of conduct was not followed.

This state of affairs brought about the following extraordinary result. The government of the United States forced the Shipping Board of that country which manages the United States governmentally-owned steamers, to make a very low rate for the transportation of flour to Europe—a rate stated by the shipping companies to be below a commercial rate. This rate applied only to flour ground in the United States. To meet this rate, the North Atlantic Conference Lines established, at a given moment, a rate of 15c. per 100 lbs. on flour ground in the United States, while they maintained a rate of 19c. per 100 lbs. on Canadian flour—a very substantial differential against our Canadian millers. To this agreement, as a member of the North Atlantic Conference, the Canadian Government Merchant Marine was a party.

The committee feel in this regard that the vast sums spent by the Canadian people on the development of a merchant marine were never intended to bring about this result.

The committee desire to bring the facts in this regard to the earnest attention of the House, and would respectfully suggest that the Minister of Railways and Canals should take the matter up with the Canadian National Railway Board for consideration and appropriate action.

It would appear that the shipping combine referred to does not include tramp steamers, which can be chartered from time to time, and among which there exists keen competition. These, however, are only available to those shippers who can load a whole steamer; neither do they take the place of regular lines which are able to effect transportation almost with the regularity of express trains, and which, therefore, offer much greater advantages to those who have to ship perishable articles to a market which wishes to have a regular supply.

The boats of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine are not of such construction as permits of their being used as cattle boats, and to convert them for this purpose would be both costly and impracticable.

Evidence was produced showing that since the commencement of the war, ocean rates on cattle had increased by 300 per cent while the price of beef in the British market had only increased 66 per cent during the same period.

Your committee is of the opinion that the continuance of the rates now charged inevitably must have a detrimental effect upon the export cattle trade.

Your committee were also struck with the fact that many of the witnesses connected with trans-Atlantic steamship lines testified that, as a rule, small cargoes were brought from Great Britain to this country, and that this fact tended to increase freight rates on Canadian-eastward-bound traffic over what would be the case if a fair amount of traffic were coming westward as well as going eastward. Thus any policy which diminishes the volume of trade coming from Europe to Canada, tends to increase the cost of transportation from Canada to Europe. The attention of the House is respectfully invited to this fact, and the attention of the government directed to the situation so created.

The whole is respectfully submitted.

INCOME TAX EXEMPTIONS

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I beg to present several petitions containing about 15,000 names, urging the government to increase the exemption for every child allowed in the Income Tax Act from $300 to $500, to totally exempt the father of five children who has an income less than $5,000, and also urging the government to differentiate between the earned and unearned income. These petitions are signed by members of the Societe St. Jean Baptiste, employees of Dupuis freres, Hudon and Orsali, P. P. Martin and Co., Laporte Martin, Daoust Lalonde & Cie, Hudon Hebert & Co., l'Association Catholique des Voyageurs de Commerce du Canada, the citizens of St. Cesaire, of St. Antoine sur Richelieu, of Waterloo, St. Hyacinthe, Quebec, Montreal, Farnham, Ste, Therese, Longueuil and a number of other places in the province of Quebec.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can the Minister of Finance tell us what day the budget will be delivered?

Mr. FIELDING: I have considered the matter several times but I am sorry to say I cannot make any definite statement at present.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can the minister say whether it will be next week or not?

[Mr. McMaster.]

Mr. FIELDING: I am hopeful but I cannot make any definite statement now. However, I will give my hon. friend reasonable notice.

PENSIONS COMMITTEE—INTERIM REPORT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ARTHURS: Does the government intend printing the interim report of the Pensions committee now sitting?

Mr. BELAND: A motion has already been made to have 1,000 copies printed in English and 1,000 in French.

THE FRENCH TREATY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. FIELDING: It had been arranged, as announced last night, that we would take up to-day the further consideration of the French treaty, but I understand that the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) desires that it be postponed, and we acquiesce in that request. I therefore suggest that we take up Order No. 27.

PATENTS OF INVENTION

House again in committee on Bill No. 20, to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to Patents of Invention, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 40—Powers of commissioner:

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Trade and Commerce): This section was allowed to stand for conference between the commissioner and the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys). I now move, seconded by that hon. member, that section 40 be amended by striking out paragraphs (c) and (d) of subclause 1 thereof, and substituting therefor the following:

The commissioner shall then consider the petition, and if the parties do not come to an arrangement between themselves shall proceed to hear and determine the matter, and if it is proved to his satisfaction that the reasonable requirements of the public with respect to the patented invention have not been satisfied, the patentee may be ordered by him to supply the patented article within reasonable limits at such price as may be fixed by him and in accordance with the custom of the trade to which the invention relates as to payment and delivery, or to grant licenses for the use of the patented invention as may be fixed by him, in either case within and after such time as may be fixed by him and on pain of forfeiture of the patent.

Provided that such an order shall not be made before the expiration of three years from the date of the patent and not less than one year after the passing of this act, or if the patentee gives satisfactory reasons for his default. And provided further, that having regard to the nature of the case, the commissioner may with the approval of the minister, instead of hearing and determining the matter himself, refer the petition to the Exchequer Court, which shall have jurisdiction in the premises and may make such order thereon as the commissioner is authorized to make under this section.

And by adding the following sub-clause to said clause 40:

(2) Any decision of the commissioner under this section shall be subject to appeal to the Exchequer Court.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: Will you refer back, Mr Chairman, to clause No. 5? In view of the extended powers just given under this amendment it is necessary to add to clause 5 another section. Therefore I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys):

That clause 5 be amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

(2) For the purposes of this act the commissioner shall have all the powers that are or may be given by the Inquiries Act to a commissioner appointed under part 2 thereof.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, I desire to refer to section 61 and to move, seconded by the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys):

That there be added to section 61 the following clause:

In all cases where an appeal is provided from the decision of the commissioner to the Exchequer Court under this act, such appeal shall be had and taken pursuant to the provisions of the Exchequer Court Act and the rules and practice of the said court.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That amendment does not seem appropriate to section 61, which deals only with costs; it should be a separate section.

Mr. ROBB: It is an independent section.

Mr. BOYS: It was arranged in the conference I had with the commissioner that there would be a heading to it as well, namely, Appeals.

Mr. ROBB: That is marked on the order before the Chairman. The section will be No. 61a.

Section 61a agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, it appears from the records before the law officers that section 21 was not passed as amended.

The CHAIRMAN: It was allowed to stand.

Mr. ROBB: I beg to move the following amendment:

That section 21 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

20. In case of conflicting applications for any patent, the same shall be submitted to the arbitration of three skilled persons, two of whom shall be chosen by the applicants, one by each, and the third of whom shall be chosen by the commissioner; and the decision or award of such arbitrators, or of any two of them, delivered to the commissioner in writing and subscribed by them or any two of them, shall be final, as far as concerns the granting of the patent.

2. If either of the applicants refuses or fails to choose an arbitrator, when required so to do by the commissioner, and if there are only two such applicants, the patent shall issue to the other applicant.

3. If there are more than two conflicting applications, and if the persons applying do not all unite in appointing three arbitrators, the commissioner may appoint the three arbitrators for the purposes aforesaid.

4. The arbitrators so named shall subscribe and take before a judge of any court of record in Canada, an oath in the form following, that is to say:—

"I, the undersigned (A.B.), being duly appointed an arbitrator under the authority of the Patent Act, do hereby solemnly swear or (affirm, as the case may be), that I will well and truly perform the duty of such arbitrator on the conflicting applications of (C.D. and E.F.) submitted to me."

5. The arbitrators, or any one of them, when so sworn, may summon before them any applicant or other person, and may require him to give evidence on oath, orally or in writing (or on solemn affirmation if such applicant or person is entitled to affirm in civil cases), and to produce such documents and things as such arbitrators deem requisite to the full investigation of the matters into which they are appointed to examine, and they shall have the same power to enforce the attendance of such applicants and other persons, and to compel them to give evidence, as is vested in any court of justice in civil cases, in the province in which the arbitration is held.

6. The fees for the services of such arbitrators shall be a matter of agreement between the arbitrators and the applicants, and shall be paid by the applicants who name them, respectively, except those of the arbitrator or arbitrators named by the commissioner, which shall be paid by the applicants jointly.

Mr. BOYS: The commissioner is now taking more responsibility under the amendments that have been agreed to. So why not let him take this degree of responsibility in connection with conflicting applications? Possibly they would be even more appropriate for his attention in the first instance than some other matters. I really thought that was understood, although I admit it was not discussed this morning between myself and the commissioner. The other day we discussed the arbitration features in the old act and it was generally agreed that they were very cumbersome and led to great delay and unnecessary expense. I would suggest that the section should provide that in cases of conflicting applications for any patent the commissioner should first determine the matter, subject to appeal to the Exchequer Court.

Mr. ROBB: The commissioner assures me that it is proposed to simplify the regulations and provide for this.

Mr. BOYS: In view of the statutory provision here that the commissioner must send the matter to the Exchequer Court, I do not think he could pass regulations defining a totally different practice.

Mr. ROBB: The commissioner assures me that he desires this power with a view to bringing the parties together, but that under the regulations he has in mind he will simplify it very much. With that assurance I think my hon. friend might allow the amendment to go through.

Mr. GUTHRIE: As I understand it, Mr. Chairman, the bill as introduced omitted the arbitration sections that were in the former act. When the matter was up on Friday night I moved an amendment to the effect that in the case of conflicting applications and claims the matter in the first instance should be decided by the Commissioner of Patents, and that his decision should be subject to appeal to the Exchequer Court. The complaint against the old system of arbitration was that it was cumbersome, dilatory and expensive, and all parties interested seemed to have confidence in the judgment of the commissioner to decide the conflicting applications, which amount to about 90 per cent of the cases, I understand. It would simplify and expedite matters very much and save considerable expense if the commissioner would decide these cases as they come up. It is not a final decision, because if the parties are not satisfied they can go to the Exchequer Court. In the original bill as introduced by the minister he left out the arbitration clauses, and I think it is a piece of foolishness to seek to restore them now. If that is what the amendment means I am certainly opposed to it.

Mr. ROBB: It is true that the arbitration clauses were omitted from the bill as introduced, but they were restored at the request of many who have business with the Patent office, and who desire to have this privilege of arbitration available to them. I am not sure that it would be wise for parliament to take away the privilege. Why not retain this feature? It will do no harm.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The minister took it away in the first instance.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, but there have been objections.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil): Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the new clause 21?

Section agreed to.

On section 30—Assignments in case of joint applications:

[Mr. Boys.]

Mr. ROBB: This section is marked, "stand." It is an old clause. The former Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) and the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) offered some objections which they afterwards withdrew, and we understood that the clause had passed.

Mr. BOYS: I think I remember raising a question as to the validity of the assignment. As it stands now, section 30 reads:

> In cases of joint applications or grants, every assignment from one or more of the applicants or patentees to the other or others, or to any other person, shall be registered in like manner as other assignments.

The question arises at once, if it is not registered, is it null and void, or is it only to be null and void as against subsequent purchasers or assignees without notice? The suggestion I made was to draft an amendment which would put it beyond peradventure.

Mr. ROBB: We were leaving this clause in because of its venerable age. The commisioner prefers that it be dropped altogether rather than that it be amended.

Mr. BOYS: I think it would be better to strike it out if it is not amended. It is covered by section 29, anyway.

Mr. ROBB: I move that section 30 be struck out.

Amendment agreed to, and section 30 struck out.

Mr. STEVENS: Before you leave the bill I wish to point out what would appear to be an unintentional error in wording or in arrangement. Section 65 provides for the repeal of the old act, with the exception of 5a, which is not repealed. The object of 5a is to cover the appointment of the commissioner. It says:

> The Governor in Council may appoint a person who has held the office of Deputy Minister of Agriculture to be Commissioner of Patents.

And so on. That means that if the person now holding the position of Commissioner of Patents should leave the office, the Governor in Council could not appoint anyone who had not been a deputy minister of agriculture. I do not suppose we could find anyone who has been a deputy minister of agriculture who would know the first thing about patents, so that that will certainly have to be corrected before section 65 is adopted. The provision is made, quite properly, to cover the case of the present incumbent. There is no objection to that; I am merely pointing out what the effect of the clause will be in regard to future appointments.

Mr. ROBB: The commissioner points out that this clause was put in to meet his particular case, and that if to-morrow we were appointing a commissioner of patents he would not have the standing of a deputy minister.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend has not caught my point. Section 5a is retained, and under it you cannot appoint to the position of Commissioner of Patents anyone who has not been a deputy minister of agriculture. That was all right as applying to the present incumbent in the office; there is no quarrel about that, but for future appointments a different provision must be made.

Mr. ROBB: I think clause 3 of this bill covers that point.

Mr. STEVENS: But you are retaining 5a. I do not advance this as my own opinion only; others who have given consideration to the matter have the same opinion—that this calls for the appointment of someone who has had experience as a deputy minister of agriculture. If we are perfectly sure of it, of course my objection falls, but I think we ought to be very sure before the bill is passed.

Mr. ROBB: The commissioner tells me that this has been worked out by the law officers. If in the future we appoint as Commissioner of Patents a man who has previously been deputy minister of agriculture, he comes under 5a; otherwise clause 3 covers the appointment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: With all due respect to the minister, it seems to me that if he retains clause 5a the inference is very strong that the next Commissioner of Patents must have been a deputy minister of agriculture.

Mr. ROBB: Oh, no.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I cannot see it in any other way. Is there any reason for retaining it? Of course if the minister wants to take the risk, we cannot do any more; we have pointed it out.

Bill, as amended, reported, read the third time and passed.

SALE AND INSPECTION OF FRUIT AND FRUIT CONTAINERS

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved the third reading of Bill No. 11, to regulate the Sale and Inspection of Fruit and Fruit Containers.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT AMENDMENT

House again in committee on Bill No. 115, to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, Mr. Marcil in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The clauses have all been adopted. Shall I report this bill?

Mr. LEADER: Before the bill passes I would like to ask the minister if he thinks a sufficient amount has been provided in the estimates this year to take care of the necessary expenses under this act?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The estimates are based on the assumption that this reduction in compensation will be made. Since the main estimate went through, a supplementary estimate for $100,000 has been brought down for this purpose. I do not think it has yet gone through, but with this supplementary estimate, plus the reduction in compensation, we think we shall have enough to take care of the requirements this year fairly well.

Mr. LEADER: Is it the intention of the minister to withdraw the regulation that calls for at least ten pure-bred cattle before a breeder can participate in the accredited herd plan?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is a matter that has been discussed many times. It is a question of how few cattle we will send a man out to inspect at one time. If we reduce the present number of ten to, say, six, the man with only four cattle would think it should be reduced still further to four, and if that were done somebody else would want it reduced still further. There is a point at which it does not pay to send out an inspector, entailing all the necessary expenses, to examine a herd of cattle. Up to the present we have thought that in view of the expense ten was the minimum number we could send out a man to inspect. That is a matter of opinion. I do not feel very strongly on it, for I should like to meet the wishes of the man with the small herd, because after all the man that is starting right will be apt to stay right. There is a good deal to be said in favour of inspecting these smaller herds, but it is really a question of expense of administration. I should be very glad to discuss this matter with my hon. friend. I might point out that my recollection is that the regulation can be changed without any reference to the bill whatever.

Mr. LEADER: I realize that the minister wishes to do what is right in the matter, but according to the figures he gave the House some time ago there are about 156 applications still on the waiting list for which the government cannot provide inspection. Am I right in that?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think that is the number.

Mr. LEADER: In view of that I do not feel inclined to protest against the passing of this bill. I belong to a fraternity that I think cannot be said to be altogether selfish, and if the maximum compensation is placed at $200, and that is considered too much, as a breeder I can only give my consent to accepting a lower compensation in view of the fact that the government find it necessary to impose this regulation calling upon a breeder to have at least ten pure-bred cattle before he can participate in the benefits under the act. I happen to know something about this business. When I was at home at Easter I attended a farmers' meeting and this question was brought up. One man in that locality said that he had had an application on file since last fall and could not get the government to act. It was the consensus of opinion at that meeting that the farmers in that district, at any rate, were so anxious regarding tuberculosis in cattle that they would be willing to do without any compensation if they could get the government to inspect their cattle for them. I pointed out to them that they could pay a local veterinary and have the work done in that way, but they felt that they would have more confidence in a test made by a regular government inspector. In view of that I shall not protest the right of the government to lower the compensation.

I am sure the minister would be glad to hear the views of the members of this House and especially of the breeders, on this question, and I would like to take this opportunity to make a few remarks. Last year when this bill was up a similar reduction was proposed. Some of us did not believe that that reduction should be made, and I still believe that the minister was well advised when he agreed to make the maximum compensation $200 instead of $150. The minister has said that it is a general practice with inspectors to give the maximum compensation irrespective of whether the animal is entitled to it or not.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think my hon. friend has misunderstood me. That is rather a strange interpretation of what I said.

Mr. LEADER: I think the minister will bear me out that that was the implication of what he said at all events. I wish to state emphatically that as regards Dr. Still and his contingent of inspectors in western Canada, as far as I can find out they have been absolutely fair. I believe they are doing a great work out there, and Dr. Still especially I believe is the right man in the right place. People are becoming greatly interested in this accredited herd plan, and I would be very sorry to see it get a black eye. The minister has indicated that he is going to inaugurate a new system called the free area plan. I am in sympathy with that idea. I believe it is the ideal system, but it is going to cost a lot to clean up these areas and inspect every herd of pure-bred and grade cattle, and I do not think we have come to the point where we can adopt that system on a large scale. There is also a measure of compulsion in regard to it, and some men will always back up against compulsion and will not agree to compulsory measures. I think the best plan for the government in this matter would be the voluntary submission of breeders to the accredited herd plan. I know that it is very popular in the West and has made rapid strides. I would be very sorry for the government to do anything that would give the cattle industry a set back. We in the West and in the portion from which I come especially, have come to the conclusion that we must change our system of farming, change from grain growing exclusively to more diversified farming, and the raising of live stock is the plan we shall have to follow. We are going into that business more and more in the West and are providing facilities to take care of it. In the West already 2,000 silos have been built, and to show the strides this business is making I might mention that 500 silos were built last year. We are trying to supply cattle for the market that is developing in the Old Country and a black eye to the industry at this time would have the effect of discouraging efforts along that particular line. The good health of the Canadian cattle was a very important factor in inducing the Old Country to lift the embargo. In this connection I would quote from a speech made by Major G. Paget, Unionist member for Bosworth, in the British parliament during the debate there on this subject. He said:

> They knew that Canada was extremely free from disease.

I will also quote from the speech of the Right Hon. E. G. Pretyman, Unionist member for Chelmsford, who said:

> That perhaps the strongest plank in the Canadian case was the absolute immunity of Canadian cattle from any form of virulent disease over a long period of years.

In the House of Lords, when the bill was being discussed there, Lord Askwith made this statement:

> On the other hand, it was proved up to the hilt that since the year 1896, and for even a longer period, there had been no really serious disease in Canada, and that the claim for keeping Canadian cattle out was not a good one.

I maintain that if we are going to develop that trade with the Old Country we must not do anything to jeopardize the demand which now exists there for our cattle.

I would like to take a moment or two to deal with another point, because I may not have another opportunity of doing so. The responsibility devolves upon the government of helping the Canadian farmer take advantage of the live stock trade with Great Britain. When we were assured that the embargo would be lifted stock men in this country were advised to feed all the good cattle they possibly could in order to take advantage of the opportunity when the time for making shipments came. The result was that a great many farmers throughout the Dominion devoted themselves to feeding the necessary stock hoping thereby to derive the revenue therefrom that was so badly needed. It was brought out before a parliamentary committee and reported to the House to-day —I do not know whether I am in order in discussing it or not—that a combine exists on the north Atlantic which affects adversely the shipping of Canadian products. The steamship companies, as early as last December, gave out the information that the ocean rate on cattle transported from Canada to the Old Country would be $15 per head. This rate was a considerable reduction from the former charge and was a further encouragement to the farmers to feed cattle for the British market. The fact that the ocean rate for cattle had been reduced to $15 per head was widely distributed and the propaganda carried on by the Dominion authorities, and the steamship companies, was responsible for a great revival of interest in the live stock trade. But what did the producers find when they had their cattle ready for the market? The same old story—big interests in the form of the North Atlantic Steamship combine boosted the rates; shippers of cattle were informed that no space was available for Canadian stock at the $15 rate, but that the rate would be $22.50, then $25, and even $30 has been mentioned as a possible rate. Is it any wonder that the farmers of this country have lost their morale in the face of such unjust discrimination? I think that this government can be fairly charged with negligence in not providing ample space.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What would my hon. friend suggest should be done?

Mr. LEADER: The government should have insisted on reasonable ocean rates being granted in the interest of the primary producers. Indeed we might use a stronger term in the face of the fact that our government-owned merchant marine is a party to the combine that exists, sits in conference in a city in a foreign country and sets the rates that Canadian steamships shall charge to transport Canadian goods. Now the advance of $10 per head in freight rates means a heavy loss for the people of this country. Who will suffer by reason of that extra $10 being squeezed out of the farmer? Every retail store in Canada, every manufacturer in Canada, every bank, every loan company, indeed every man, woman and child is affected by the contraction or restriction of the spending power of the farmer.

I speak for the farmers of western Canada upon whom transportation costs bear most heavily, and I declare that the time has come—indeed it is long overdue—when the government should insist on a fair measure of relief not only for the producers of the West but the producers of the whole of the Dominion. In concluding my remarks I wish to state this: We have a brand new government, with a very capable Minister of Agriculture, and we want a little service. We would expect the late government, who catered to the "big interests," to display inertia in matters of this kind. From the present government, however, we expected better treatment and we are still hoping for an improvement in that regard.

Mr. WALLACE: In the matter of the restriction of the number of cattle tested, it is likely to operate to the disadvantage of the small breeder who will be unable to sell his pure-bred cattle owing to the fact that they are not tested. I myself would not buy pure-bred cattle unless they were tested. If the minister and the department could see their way clear to the removal of this restriction, which limits the number of cattle to be tested to ten, it would be a good thing because it certainly works out in a way that is detrimental to the breeder who has but a small herd.

Mr. CALDWELL: I find no great objection to reducing the amount of indemnity for pure-bred cattle that are slaughtered after being condemned under the tuberculin test. I would like, however, to urge upon the minister that he should not discontinue the policy of testing herds for tuberculosis. It is one of the diseases that menaces not only our dairy herds but also the people as well—possibly being transmitted largely through dairy products and the meat of the beef animal. Although I am a breeder of pure-bred stock myself I see no great objection to reducing the indemnity. In fact, as far as I am personally concerned, I would be willing to forego the indemnity for condemned animals if the testing of herds is carried on—that is, if it is necessary to discontinue the indemnity in order to carry on the testing for tuberculosis, I would rather see that take place than discontinue the testing.

With regard to the limitation as to the number of animals, I would also like to urge upon the minister not to put this restriction on the man with less than ten pure-bred animals. For example, in the province from which I come we are just beginning in the pure-bred stock line of business. A great many men there have less than ten head of pure-bred cattle; we are simply beginning to change our methods of farming there, of going into mixed farming and keeping more cattle. A man who is buying pure-bred cattle to-day will not buy from a herd that is not tested. This handicaps a man who has less than ten cattle while his neighbour who, perhaps, is in a better position to carry on stock breeding, or has been at it longer, has the advantage of having his herd tested. I would urge very strongly on the minister to continue the policy of testing cattle for tuberculosis.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince P.E.I.): I would like to support what the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. has just said, the same thing applies to cattle in the province of Prince Edward Island. We have a number of small breeders there and this restriction, I think, would be very hard on them. The small breeder would be prevented from having his cattle properly tested and thereby, possibly, lose the sale of his stock. I am also thoroughly in favour of good grade cattle being given the benefit of testing the same as pure-bred stock. Has a veterinary inspector employed by the Department of Agriculture the privilege of charging the man who applies to have his cattle tested a fee in addition to the regular salary which is paid to him?

Mr. McBRIDE: Hon. members have spoken in connection with the restriction of the number of cattle entitled to be tested to ten, but no one has given any reason why the owners of four or five head—should not bring their cattle together and have them tested at the same time. Some years ago there was supposed to be scurvy among the cattle in the district in which I lived. The man who was to inspect gave us notice when he would arrive and when he came out we had at least 3,000 head of cattle gathered together for him to inspect. Why should the people not help the government in this respect, get the cattle together, notify the inspector and have them inspected at the same time? I see no reason why they should not.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: A certain amount of co-operation between these people and the government officials is being undertaken. When we get three or four cattle together, we test them; even if there are only two we test them. I am disposed to accept smaller herds than ten. I think we can cut that figure in two, and perhaps economize in some other way, and help to make up for the additional expense, especially if a little preparation is made, as suggested by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. McBride).

Just running over a few memoranda I have taken, I recall that I was reported as almost making the remark attributed to me by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie. What I intended to say, at all events, was that the higher the indemnity, naturally the higher the appraisement would be. There was no question about that. The higher the maximum valuation was permitted in the statutes, the higher the appraisement would be by the veterinarians. That is so logical that it is not necessary to demonstrate it at all. There is another feature about it, and that is that with the natural good-nature and sympathetic attitude of any man who has a heart towards the man who owns the cattle, he will be sufficiently desirous of doing the last thing for the man, without putting up the possible valuation higher than we desire, and I have to thank my hon. friend for taking the moderate view he takes on this occasion. One of the reasons for the shortage of last year's estimate was due to the fact that it was based upon a smaller valuation than finally decided upon in this House. My estimate of the shortage was about $50,000. As a farmer myself, looking at it from the farmer's standpoint, some years ago I naturally would look for as high an appraisement in reason as I could get, but, having to administer the act and being confined to a certain fixed amount of money with which to take care of the work, I can see that if you go beyond a certain point you do not get the maximum results with the minimum amount of money. Furthermore, if you give too high an appraisement there is a temptation on the part of the man to be careless about the re-contracting of the disease. Another reason why we were short—and I am sure my hon. friend will appreciate this—was because we conducted a certain amount of work of an experimental nature in Manitoba, in my hon. friend's own province, covering three municipalities. That has given satisfactory results and we have obtained valuable information, and a certain number of applicants throughout Manitoba have had to wait longer—

Mr. LEADER: Will the minister not admit that that is an expensive way of doing it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, but at the same time before we can discuss that question with other provinces or municipalities, we must have data. The only way to get the data was to try it out. We have found that there is a less amount of disease amongst Manitoba cattle than we anticipated. Slightly more than 5 per cent of those cattle were proved to be re-actors, and that is very satisfactory, considering the complaints in other countries. So that the extra work done in this direction in Manitoba naturally lessens what we are able to do in other directions. At the same time I may say that it is not our intention to go forward at this time with any additional restricted area, particularly when we have so many waiting applicants on the list for individual herds to be tested. We have got the information, and we can discuss this thing now both with provincial and municipal authorities, with the hope in the not distant future of evolving a scheme that will cover the country—I would not say the entire country, but with the view of taking it up in large blocks, not in intermittent spaces, such as we are doing at the present time.

I do not know whether my hon. friend was in order; but if so I presume I would also be in order; however I do not intend to go very much into the question of cattle space. Obviously, a new business requires a certain re-adjustment of space. The business of shipping stockers to the Old Country, after being suspended for thirty years, has been restored. Nobody could expect the ordinary trade would be able to meet the sudden demand all in a minute. It is rather gratifying to me to find the cattle are there demanding the space, and neither now nor at any time previous have we ever been more than 200 head short of the space requirements. I know there have been a number of interviews in the papers about wanting space for 1,000 head, but at no time has there been a space shortage of more than 200 head. I think that is getting pretty close.

As to negligence, I think the Acting Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) should deal with the question of the mercantile marine. But while I am on my feet I might point out that the evidence in the report referred to by my hon. friend this afternoon went to show that the boats comprising the mercantile marine cannot be converted into cattle boats, and that is the only available medium that I know of by which we can increase the space in time to take care of the situation. The cost of changing these vessels from cargo boats into cattle boats would be prohibitive, and in the end we would not have a boat which was suitable for the trade. In the middle of the negotiations and the discussion as to space—just to let my hon. friend and the House know that we were not negligent—if the situation had grown worse, and if we had had demand for space for 1,000 head more than could be supplied, we had the opportunity of negotiating a transaction with a New York firm of vessel owners, who were prepared to put on a fleet of vessels capable of carrying 2,000 head each. That proposition was submitted to us. However, it would have taken some weeks for even that fleet to have got ready, and by that time the ordinary sailings would be able to take care of the shipments.

Mr. MILLAR: Did the minister notice in the press a few days ago a report to the effect that the British people were under the impression that the Canadian government had not adhered strictly to the agreement in shipping cattle? They were objecting that the Canadians were shipping cattle that were finished. They claimed that the agreement called upon the Canadian government to ship store cattle, and they were objecting that the cattle were finished.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think there was room for a little objection on the part of the British authorities there. The shippers of fat cattle were taking advantage of the removal of the embargo and were also shipping stockers, thus giving them two strings to their bow. They could sell them either as stockers, or as cattle ready for the block. The law did not forbid that, and that is the reason the shippers took advantage of the opportunity. It is quite possible there might be some amendment made to the act to remedy that; I do not know about that. But I do not think the public is objecting very much. I do not think there is any violation of the spirit of the act, nor do I think there is any violation of the letter of the act. But that was not what the British dealer had in mind. It was not the fat cattle, but it was the feeders because there is more profit on the feeders to the farmer than on the fat cattle. I think I have shown that this matter has not been neglected at all. We have been in complete touch with the situation from the beginning to the present moment.

When you consider that this is a new business and that after many years we have come within two hundred spaces of meeting the situation there is not much ground for complaint. As regards the suggestion of someone in authority advising the farmers to feed all the cattle they could and then neglecting to provide space for them, there is no ground for that complaint either. I have not the article by me, but I remember that when the embargo removal was announced I wrote on the subject specifically pointing out that farmers and stockmen must not expect too much from this new avenue of disposition, especially for low grade cattle. I stated that low grade cattle could not carry themselves so far and that if farmers wanted to avail themselves of the new trade they must improve their animals, because only high class well-bred cattle were in demand in the new market. One of the agricultural journals of Ontario reprimanded me, rather gently, I admit, for not speaking more pointedly about the new market instead of warning them that only high class animals were of any use or could carry themselves that distance.

The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) seemed to be rather apprehensive that we would discontinue the work of testing. Let me assure him that there is no thought of that; we are going to carry on that work as we have done in the past. The second test has been taken care of all spring and it is a very necessary work, because if you neglect it you simply retrograde to where you were before. I may point out that this market has taken up a considerable number of our veterinarians. As I pointed out when the Main Estimates were under consideration, the amount of money we should require would depend in a measure on how many of the veterinarians were requisitioned when the new work of shipping cattle overseas got under way. Inasmuch as one veterinarian must go over with every shipment of one hundred or more, it will require from forty to fifty of these men to attend to the trade, and therefore I may possibly be under the necessity of asking the Minister of Finance to give me more money for this additional expenditure before the end of the term. An hon. member from Prince Edward Island—I forget his constituency—asked what charges were made by the veterinary for testing cattle. If the veterinary is a member of the staff and is sent out in the usual way there is no charge. If however he is not a member of the staff then of course the charge depends on the man himself; we have no control over that. Let me again assure my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie that I appreciate very much his attitude to this bill. I think we shall get better results for less money by giving this amount of valuation than if we were to allow a higher one.

Mr. CALDWELL: I understood the minister to say that he was not discontinuing the testing of cattle for tuberculosis. Is that right?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: I thought that the minister had told us that he was accepting applications but was not undertaking new work.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We will go ahead; we are preparing to start now.

Mr. CALDWELL: The minister told us that the reason he had discontinued was the fact that he was $50,000 short last year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, that is so.

Mr. CALDWELL: I notice, however, that he has brought down this year an appropriation for $285,000 less than he asked for last year. I see in the supplementaries a sum of $100,000 to carry on with, but still that would leave the minister $185,000 under last year's appropriation.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is another supplementary in prospect.

Mr. CALDWELL: I am only anxious to have an assurance that the minister is not going to discontinue the testing of cattle. If I thought he intended to do that I would oppose strongly the lowering of the indemnity. However, if he purposes to carry on this work, I would want to see it done without too great an expenditure. If he is not going to take on new work, though, I do not see the reason for interfering with the present arrangement, because if you do not test new cattle you are not going to condemn any.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend is suggesting trouble that is never going to arise. No one is proposing to discontinue the testing of cattle at all. The statute provides for certain indemnities, and when the vote in the estimates is exhausted there must be a cessation of work. That is what has happened and I have tried to give the reasons for it. Our intention is to start again, and in fact the work is being organized now. The work of second testing, what we might call the "follow-up" work, has been going on all the time. In Manitoba the work has been occupying the staff to the full all through the winter, and particularly since the traffic has developed as a result of the removal of the embargo. I have nothing more to say, except to remark by the way that I think I have rather proved my inability to make explanations. From the very outset I indicated that we were desirous of continuing the work and that the situation this year was identical with that of last year. Of course, there has always been a certain amount of hang-over accounts from one year which have to run into the next, and the popularity of this work and the desire for cleaning up herds has increased more rapidly than we have money provided to take care of it.

Mr. LEADER: I desire to follow up the discussion in regard to the trade we hope to develop with England.

The CHAIRMAN: I must point out that the bill before the committee is to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. The minister has been asked a question, to which he has replied, with reference to the raising of the embargo. Further debate in that direction would be out of order.

Mr. LEADER: I am prepared to abide by your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but in view of the fact that the health of Canadian cattle is a very important factor in developing trade with Great Britain I thought it might be within the rules to discuss that question a little further.

The CHAIRMAN: The scope of discussion of questions in committee is laid down in the rules, from which I shall quote for the information of the hon. member. Rule 13, subsection 5, states:

> Speeches in Committee of the Whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

Various authorities emphasize the importance of adhering to this rule as closely as possible.

Mr. LEADER: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I would ask the minister what attitude the department takes in regard to cattle from accredited herds which are shown at exhibitions? What provisions are made to segregate accredited cattle from untested animals? Does the department insist on the exhibition boards providing isolated buildings for accredited cattle? I might state that a great deal of infection takes place as a result of exhibitions. I have an extract which I shall not read but which bears upon this point. It is a statement by Dr. Mohler, of the United States Bureau of Animal Industry. He states that the island of Jersey in the Channel islands realized the importance of this matter about three years ago when they discovered the appearance of the disease there. I had always understood that there was no disease on that island but it appears that tuberculosis developed and they traced the disease to show cattle taken to England and passed around the circuit. The authorities since that time have prohibited outside cattle going to English shows. Is the minister making any provision to have accredited cattle isolated from those not tested?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The exhibition managers of the boards are becoming more and more anxious to protect their respective members from contagion of this nature as time goes on. Until recently there has not been as much precaution taken in this direction as might have been; the matter has been left largely to the fair managers and the breeders' associations. The same remarks apply to the various pure-bred cattle sales, as well as bull trains and better farming trains. I am of the opinion that now that we have this new trade developed, which can be very easily destroyed by contagion, greater precautions will have to be taken than have been observed in the past. As a matter of fact the question is now under consideration of enforcing such precautions in connection with bull trains and better farming trains and indeed of any of the live stock trains. Hitherto the department, so far as I know, has not interfered except in an advisory capacity with such institutions as my hon. friend has referred to. I have found in my own experience, however, that fair managers and the executive of the various breeders' associations have been reasonably careful in the past in this respect, but not as careful as I think we shall have to be in the future if we are to retain intact our trade that has just recently been opened up with the United Kingdom.

Mr. MILLAR: Do the figures gathered by the department in relation to tuberculosis indicate to any great extent the conditions under which the disease develops? That is, is there much difference between the health of range cattle and that of stable cattle?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Until recently I thought there was a very marked difference and that range cattle were almost exempt from tuberculosis. There used to be that difference ten or fifteen years ago, possibly because we were not so familiar with the trouble and the necessary precautions were not taken to identify it in the packing plants. But more recently we have found tuberculosis even in our buffalo herds, which are never in the stable at all. Consequently the fact of the animals being always out in the sunshine does not seem to ensure absolute immunity from the disease. It has generally been accepted in the past that T.B. in cattle is a stable disease just as in the human family it is a house disease; but we will have to modify our views in that respect because the disease does attack them to the same extent as it does animals more or less confined to stables. The fact that tuberculosis is more general among dairy cattle, which are kept in the stable more than any other cattle, shows that the spread of T.B. is attributable to stable conditions.

Mr. LOVIE: In the event of a breeder having less than ten pure-bred animals and having enough grade cattle to bring his herd up to the requisite number, would he be entitled to the benefit of government inspection of his herd?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am not sure upon that point. I think he would be, because there would be no use of testing the pure-breds unless the grades were submitted to the same test. Speaking from memory, I think the grades would count as part of the ten.

Mr. LEADER: I know there is great danger of contamination at fairs if the proper precautions are not taken—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is no question about it.

Mr. LEADER: —and I realize that unless all the breeders co-operate with the department in carrying out the provisions of this act we will not get the best results from it. A great many of the fair boards in the United States now are adopting the plan of not allowing any cattle to be exhibited unless they can show a clean bill of health in regard to tuberculosis. I think a similar stipulation is very desirable for this country, and I would suggest where exhibition boards are given grants from the federal treasury that they be notified that within one or two years the grants will be withheld unless they stipulate that all cattle shown at their fairs be subjected to the tuberculosis test.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is worth considering.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

IRRIGATION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of Bill No. 112 to amend the Irrigation Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Water areas may be leased for mining purposes:

Mr. STEVENS: I think we ought to have a pretty complete explanation of the necessity of this amendment. While it looks comparatively harmless, it may have a very far-reaching effect.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No difficulty has arisen to date—I am anticipating perhaps that a question will be asked as to the reason for the retroactive clause at the end of the section—but it has been pointed out by the Justice department that difficulty may arise under the Dominion Lands Act. particularly in relation to mining leases. Under section 7 of the Irrigation Act there is possibility of conflict because that section provides:

> Except in pursuance of some agreement or undertaking existing on the thirteenth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight, no grant shall be made by the Crown of lands or of any estate therein, in such terms as to vest in the grantee any exclusive or other property or interest in or any exclusive right or privilege with respect to any lake, river, stream or other body of water, or in or with respect to the water contained or flowing therein, or the land forming the bed or shore thereof.

We are advised to do this by the Justice department.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not suppose this has anything to do with the famous Hoppe lease controversy?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No.

Mr. STEVENS: Certain orders have been passed that some people have called in question in connection with that famous controversy, and I was wondering whether this might happen to be of the same stamp.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No. Unfortunately nowadays apparently the Hoppe lease figures in any amendments that touch mining regulations.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, it looms up.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): One can scarcely conceive of an area of 1920 acres. which is the area granted for a mining lease, in which there would not be a body of water. and difficulties might arise as to the rights of the lessee to go under that area. This amendment is simply to overcome such difficulties.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is it intended that this amendment shall give the lessee the right to go under the body of water in mining?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, without reference to the Irrigation Act

Mr. STEVENS: Does it affect any other waters besides those under the Irrigation Act? For instance, mining properties frequently go under waters along the shore. Has the proposed legislation any effect in such cases?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Under the Irrigation Act the reference is as follows:

> Any river, stream, watercourse, lake, creek, spring ravine, canyon, lagoon, swamp, marsh or other body of water, or in or with respect to the water contained or flowing therein, or any exclusive or perpetual property, interest or privilege in the land forming the bed or shore thereof.

The amendment has particular reference to section 7 of the old Irrigation Act.

Section agreed to and bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. STEVENS: I would ask that the bill stand for third reading at the next sitting of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: Next sitting of the House.

COPYRIGHT ACT, 1921, AMENDMENT BILL

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 24, to amend The Copyright Act, 1921.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 2—Licenses; importation:

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the minister make some explanation of these clauses that are repealed?

Mr. ROBB: The clauses referred to, 13, 14, 15 and 27 of the Copyright Act of 1921, relate to the importation of copyrighted matter printed in countries other than Canada, particularly in the United States. Although this act was passed in 1921, it was never proclaimed. Certain restrictions were provided by that measure respecting the admission of copyright into Canada, Canadian printers and publishers being given the right, on application to the commissioner and the payment of a license fee, to print the matter so imported, either in serial form or in book form. This, apparently, was contrary to the provisions of the Berne convention. It is contended on the one hand by the authors that the work of the author is the product of his brain and his ingenuity, that it should be his property and that he should have the right to say who should print it, where it should be printed and what sort of book form it should assume. On the other hand the printers of Canada contend that if the work of an author is not printed in Canada they should have the right, upon the work being sold in Canada and upon the payment by them of an adequate royalty, to publish that work either in serial or in book form, without any regard to the method of binding or the style of printing adopted in the book itself. Now, it is the desire of Canada to come in under the Berne convention, but we cannot do that with these clauses in the act; so it is proposed to repeal them.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The minister says we cannot become parties to the Berne convention so long as these clauses remain in our Copyright Act. Will he be so good as to give us his authority for that statement?

Mr. ROBB: We are admitted to the Berne convention through the British authorities, and they have intimated that the act as it now stands will not be acceptable.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My information is that there has been no such intimation on the part of the British authorities, but that a certain individual in the city of Ottawa has undertaken to say that probably there would be objection. This individual has also communicated with certain unofficial papers in Switzerland suggesting that there would be objection. But my information is that no objection has been taken as is suggested. Will the minister inform the committee by whom the objection has been made?

Mr. ROBB: This is the memorandum prepared for me by the commissioners who have the matter in charge, and it seems to me we should accept the statement of our own Canadian officials:

> The authorities of the International Bureau at Berne have definitely stated that the licensing sections referred to are not in harmony with article 4 of the convention, which provides that authors who are subjects or citizens of any of the countries of the union shall enjoy in countries other than the country of origin of the work the rights which the respective laws grant to natives as well as the rights specially granted by the convention. The enjoyment and the exercise of these rights shall not be subject to the performance of any formality.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The memorandum which the minister has just read states that the authorities of the Berne convention have intimated so and so. My instructions are that no intimation has ever been given by the authorities of the Berne convention that this act is not in every way acceptable to them. What official, what functionary of the Berne convention sent this communication and what was the communication?

Mr. ROBB: The intimation was made in the official publication of the Berne convention.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have some information on that, too. The official publication referred to, published an article contributed by a Canadian civil servant, resident here in Ottawa, and that article in what I would call the unofficial organ of the Berne convention is the ground upon which it is now asserted that the act passed by this House in 1921 is not acceptable to the Berne convention. I think the minister should hesitate before accepting an article prepared by a civil servant here in Ottawa as an official communication from the Berne convention that our act is not acceptable.

Mr. ROBB: What evidence has my hon. friend to submit that the information was furnished, as he suggests, by a civil servant in Ottawa?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am merely stating information that has been supplied to me in connection with this matter. I do not know any more complicated piece of legislation which comes before the House than this same copyright question. As far back as I have been a member of the House and long before I came into the House it has proved a very, very troublesome question. Our first attempt to pass a copyright law was in 1888 or 1889, and at that time difficulties at once arose with the Imperial government. The Imperial Copyright Act had been passed many years before and had application throughout the whole British Empire, and the moment Canada in 1888 or 1889 sought to pass an act of its own it was looked upon by the authorities in Great Britain as an infringement upon Imperial rights, and rather strained relations existed between the Imperial government and this country in regard to copyright legislation at that time. Sir John Thompson was then Minister of Justice of Canada, and he entered into a long correspondence with the Imperial authorities on the subject of copyright. They at first were inclined to deny the right of the parliament of Canada to pass any copyright bill at all, having any application, at all events, outside the Dominion of Canada, and it was not until the year 1910, I think, when the late Hon. Sydney Fisher was Minister of Agriculture in Canada that an agreement was come to between the Imperial authorities and Canada and the other self-governing dominions upon the subject of copyright.

In the meantime we had a Copyright Act. The act passed in 1889 had been carried into the Revised Statutes of 1906, as it stands there to-day. The disagreement continued between the Imperial and Canadian authorities, but when the late Mr. Fisher attended the Imperial Conference, in the year 1910 an arrangement was come to whereby the Imperial government agreed that not only Canada but all the self-governing dominions should be entitled to pass copyright legislation of their own, and the Imperial Act passed in the year 1911, the year following the conference, recognized the rights of all the Dominions to pass copyright legislation of their own. In the Imperial Act it was expressly provided that the Imperial law should not apply to Canada or to the other dominions unless the parliaments of those dominions should specially enact the various clauses of the Imperial Act. If we should re-enact the British clauses and bring our law into conformity with Imperial legislation, then the Imperial government undertook to proclaim our legislation in the London Gazette, and that was held to be sufficient to entitle us to become members of the International Copyright Convention known as the Berne Convention.

Well, the act of the parliament of Canada was passed, and there were some clauses in the act which it was said at the time were not strictly in accordance with the Imperial act and might in some way cause objection to be raised to our becoming parties to the Berne convention. The matter came up in this House on two or three occasions in the last eight or ten years, but notably in the year 1921. At that time Canadian authors claimed, as they claim now, and I have very great sympathy with their claims, that they should have absolute ownership in the literary, dramatic or musical works which they produced or composed. I think there is a great deal of force in that contention. These works are the product of their own brains and the ownership should be in them, but when you come to a question of disposing of those rights, this question arises: The United States is our greatest competitor not only in the matter of publications but in many others which could be mentioned. The United States is not a party to the Berne convention. The United States in its copyright law provides that a work must be published in the United States in order to obtain copyright in the United States. The United States printers are entitled to do the work there and earn the wages. The United States book publishers and magazine publishers are entitled to publish their work there, and unless there is publication in the United States copyright cannot be obtained. There are one hundred and twenty million English speaking people in the United States, the greatest book-buying nation probably in the world. Now the Canadian author is in this position: He finds that his best purchaser in the majority of instances is in the United States and the United States publisher says, "I will buy the United States copyright from you, but you must include with it the Canadian copyright too. If you do, I will become a purchaser." So the bargain is struck and then the work is wholly published in the United States.

In the act of 1921 passed by this parliament we inserted clauses to this effect: If a Canadian publisher desires to publish any copyright work in Canada he may apply to the author for permission to do so, but he cannot publish it unless he offers to pay the author the very highest price by way of royalty that the author has received for the American copyright or the right to publish in the United States. We passed another clause which provided that if the author refused to make an agreement on these terms, the publisher then might apply to the Copyright branch of the Department of Agriculture and the minister was given power to grant a license to a publisher in Canada to publish the work in Canada on payment to the author of an amount exactly similar to the amount which he was paid by his American publisher.

On the face of it that seemed to be a pretty fair arrangement, an arrangement which would protect the author from any financial loss, and would at the same time give the Canadian publisher the right to publish, and the Canadian printer, of course, employment consequent upon the publication. These clauses were inserted in the act of 1921, which was not passed by this House until there had been a very long and involved conference between all the parties interested in this question. There was a committee formed and a conference held at which the publishers, the printers and the authors were represented, and my information is—I do not vouch for the accuracy of this—that they came to an agreement at that conference, and that agreement was embodied in the act of 1921 which this parliament passed. So that the clauses which the minister now seeks to strike out from the act of 1921 were all actually agreed upon by the conference of authors, publishers and printers prior to the passage of the act in that session.

There was a suspending clause in the act of 1921 to the effect that the act should not come into force until it was proclaimed by the Governor in Council. Now the act has never been brought into force. There has been no proclamation of that act up to the present time, but in the meantime it is claimed that someone in Ottawa has busied himself to cause friction as between the Canadian authorities and the authorities at Berne, Switzerland, who control the question of international copyright, and a journal of some kind published in Switzerland, called Le Droit D'Auteur, and supposed to have some connection with the International Copyright Bureau at Berne, contains in its issue of July 15, 1921, an article to the effect that the clauses of the Canadian act of 1921 which provide for publication in Canada and the licensing clauses which I have described to the committee are not in accord with the general international convention's principles as they apply to all the nations which belong to that convention. This is an editorial article in a newspaper. It is not signed by anybody. We do not know who wrote it.

Mr. ROBB: Is it dated from Ottawa?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is dated July 15, 1921.

Mr. ROBB: Is it dated from Ottawa?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is not a letter, it appeared in a paper published in Switzerland, but responsible people in Ottawa have given me the name, address and other particulars of the man who is said to have written the article. I do not want the name published, but I will submit it to the minister. I understand the gentleman is still in the Civil Service. He has undertaken to point out that the act passed by this parliament in 1921 is at variance with the principles of the Berne convention. The point I make is that the International Copyright Bureau at Berne has not objected. I have asked the minister, and I ask him now, to lay before the committee any objection that has been taken by the proper authorities at Berne, Switzerland, with reference to this legislation. The British authorities have not objected, so I am informed. If they have I ask the minister to give the committee that information. What is the objection? My information is that this same individual in Ottawa has started a theory that in all probability the British government will object because there are no license clauses in the British act. Now, I think it is within the knowledge of any man who has looked into the copyright question that there are hardly two nations in the world who belong to the Berne convention who have exactly similar copyright legislation. The English act differs from the Spanish act, and from the Holland act, and from the Canadian act: there are innumerable differences in all these acts. However, the nations mentioned are all members of the convention so that a citizen of a country which belongs to the Berne convention obtaining a copyright in one country automatically obtains copyright in all countries that are parties to the convention. Unfortunately the United States does not belong to the Berne convention. Unfortunately for Canadian authors the United States is probably the best market which they have. That is the difficulty. I do not think that we can get to the bottom of this question in a committee of this House sitting as we are here. I would suggest to the minister that a special committee be appointed to consider this bill and let the persons interested—authors, printers, and publishers—state their views before that committee. I have had communications as no doubt the minister has had, and probably every member of the committee, from printers, authors, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and from publishers. There is a great difference of opinion on the question but how are we going to come to a satisfactory agreement. These several parties did agree in 1921 and we carried that agreement into legislation. Now somebody has started the trouble over again and has intimated that the Berne convention will not accept this legislation. I doubt very much if the Berne convention has passed on it at all. If the minister has any formal objection from the officers of the International Copyright Bureau, or if he has any protests from the proper officials of the Imperial government, I would like very much if he would lay such before the committee, because the inference I draw from the information which has reached me is that no formal objection has been taken. If objection has been taken by the Imperial authorities I can only say they have objected before to our copyright legislation. However, their objections were found to have no foundation and subsequently were entirely waived by the Imperial government. It is quite possible that to-day there are publishers in Great Britain who do not like our present legislation. They did not like our copyright law in 1888 and 1889; they did not like it in 1910 when Mr. Fisher went over to London and carried his point before the British government. It is quite possible they may take objection now, but we want to examine into the validity, weight and force of the objections. We must not recede from our position simply because of the fact that the Imperial government object; it is quite possible that we have the constitutional right to pass our legislation notwithstanding the British government's objection. That was a point which was raised in 1889. I have before me Canadian Constitutional Studies in which this very question is dealt with. The point is this: The British parliament certainly has the legal right to pass such legislation as it may deem proper. It has the legal right to change our whole constitution if it wants to but constitutionally it cannot do so. Mr. Keith in referring to this very question as described in the work referred to says:

> His (Sir John Thompson's) constitutional claim could not possibly have been resisted for a moment, if seriously examined. To insist that Canada should conform her copyright legislation to that of the United Kingdom, merely to please the publishers in the latter, was constitutionally a monstrous doctrine, nor can it be wondered that the minister described the state of the law as odious and unjust.

The Imperial parliament has the legal right to do as it pleases; constitutionally it has no right to do so. Therefore, I think if exception has been taken by the Imperial authorities to the act of 1921 the law officers of this government should look very carefully into the question to see if the act which we passed is not constitutionally within our rights. If it is then I think we should uphold it. In the meantime my suggestion to the minister in this matter would be, seeing the bill is going to raise a good deal of controversy upon very difficult points, to refer the measure to a small select committee, representative of the different parties in the House, and ask the authors, the publishers and the printers to state their respective claims before the committee. They did so before and they agreed. If they agree on the present occasion let us go ahead and let us test our constitutional rights in the matter.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend and I are agreed on the first principle that the author has rights in his work. My hon. friend has admitted that. The author, primarily, is the person who should determine what will be done with his or her property. Now, having started there I cannot very well see why my hon. friend should argue against the repealing of these clauses, because he himself admits that these clauses take away certain rights which, as he says, belong to the author. My hon. friend has correctly outlined the position which Canada acquired in 1910 in securing the right to make her own copyright. But may I point out to my hon. friend that having obtained those rights we are morally bound to enact such legislation as will enable Canada to comply with the requirements of the Berne convention, because the memorandum I have shows that there a special protocol was required so as to bring about conditions that would enable Canada to join the Berne convention. The Hon. Sydney Fisher agreed that Canada would, on those conditions, join the Berne convention. The commisisoner assures me that there is in the office a despatch from the Imperial authorities intimating that the act as passed in 1921 does not comply with the requirements of the Berne convention, and we are to-day presenting this amendment in order that we may do so. It has probably escaped my hon. friend's memory, but he must have known that that message had come from the Imperial authorities because this act, which we now propose to amend slightly by withdrawing these few clauses, was assented to in June 1921 when my hon. friend was a member of the government, and he continued to be a member of that same government until December of that year. They did not proclaim the act. Although it was assented to by parliament, it never was proclaimed. I think it is fair to assume the government of the day did not proclaim the act because they were advised that it did not conform to the articles of the Berne convention. The only desire we have is to place Canada in the position where our citizens will enjoy rights in all the other countries and to give to the authors the right which my hon. friend says they are entitled to.

Mr. GUTHRIE: When I say that I think the author has very high rights in the matter, I do not say he has absolutely exclusive rights, and when he asks the privilege of copyright, then we can impose such terms on him as we see fit, but I do not think the terms should be burdensome. I do not think they should be onerous at all. I agree that the author has the first right, but when he seeks parliamentary or government favours in the form of authority to publish his works or to sell exclusive rights, then I think we can impose necessary restrictions upon him. It is true the act was passed in June 1921, and at that time the operation was suspended for this reason: new clauses had been introduced and we were aware of the general law passed in Great Britain in 1911 which provided that if our act were in conformity with the Imperial act the Imperial government would proclaim it in the London Gazette. The London Gazette goes from London to Berne, Switzerland, and is accepted there by the copyright convention. It was natural that we should submit our act to the Imperial authorities before bringing it into force, but I would like to find out definitely what objection the Imperial government has taken to it. The only sections in our act which do not conform to the act of the Imperial government are these license sections. We provide that the author during his lifetime can be compelled to allow publication in Canada on payment to him of the equivalent of what he gets from the American publisher. That is not in the British act, but the British act has another section not approved by the Berne convention. The Imperial act has a provision that if the author dies they can compel his executors to allow publication on payment of royalties, the same as the author received in his lifetime. They have varied the Berne convention, not only in that respect, but in several other respects. The Berne convention deals with copyright where there is simultaneous publication in two countries, and I think every country in the convention, save Great Britain, holds that to be publication on the same day. The British act varies that provision and provides that publication within 12 days shall be considered simultaneous publication in the two countries, and the copyright bureau at Berne has not objected. It is assuming a good deal to suppose that there would be objection to this provision in the Canadian act of 1921. If there is valid objection, I can understand that it is to the interest of Canada to let the clauses go and adhere to the Berne convention. If the objection is merely at the instance of some British publisher, and does not go to the root of the matter, it is not so serious. If it is a vital objection, then it might be proper for us to repeal these clauses and stick to the Berne convention. But I am by no means convinced that these three clauses in question are in conflict at all with the Berne convention. I do not believe they are. I think there is great force in what the publishers and printers say, that this is not a variation of the terms of the Berne convention, and that the Berne convention will accept it; but my suggestion still is that we cannot settle this question in a committee of this kind. Only those who have gone to the bottom of the matter and have made a real study of it can possibly understand it, and, without any disrespect to the committee, I think that for the most part we are seeking to legislate in the dark. I believe the minister would facilitate the passage of his bill very much and get to the root of the matter if he would ask for the appointment of a small committee, have the various interests brought together and see if we could not get to the bottom of the grievance, as we did in 1921. I think it would shorten the matter and would produce a much more satisfactory result than for us as a committee to pass this clause repealing four important sections of another act, without understanding just what the real situation is.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend admits the value to Canada of the Berne convention, and of our joining in that convention. I take it that the only objection he has to the bill is this provision contained in section 2. I would suggest that we pass all the other sections of the bill, and in the meantime, before committing the government, I would like to consult counsel as to the observations of my hon. friend regarding the appointment of a committee. I would point out however, that we are approaching the time now when we cannot delay legislation. If we pass the minor clause we might let this clause stand for further consideration.

Mr. BOYS: Is it a fact that the publishers and their employees are opposed to the provisions of this bill?

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend had asked me if the authors were favourable to it, I would have said yes. I will say that some publishers have offered objections to it, and representatives of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association have objected to it, but the authors are very strongly in favour of it, and the government has on record representations from men very prominent in boards of trade who are favourable to it and who are congratulating the government on their courage in dealing with it.

Mr. BOYS: I understand the publishers are opposed to it. I at once admit that I am not sufficiently familiar with the subject matter to reach a conclusion at this stage as to who is in the right, but that there may be no misunderstanding regarding the position of the publishers I will place on Hansard a letter addressed to the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) which reads as follows:

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Rt. Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN, P.C.,
Leader of the Opposition,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Dear Honourable Sir,—At a regular meeting of the Ottawa Typographical Union held on Saturday evening last, the proposed amendments to the Canadian Copyright Act, introduced in the House of Commons by the Hon. J. A. Robb, Minister of Trade and Commerce, were very carefully considered. We are unanimously of the opinion that the proposed amendments are not in the best interests of the Canadian printers. We most strenuously protest against their enactment and would request you to use your influence to have Bill No. 24 withdrawn.

We also respectfully request that the Canadian Copyright Act of 1921, as it now stands, be immediately carried into full force and effect.

Trusting that you will give this matter your earnest and most sympathetic consideration, and thanking you in anticipation, I am,

Yours very sincerely,
J. A. P. HAYDON,
Secretary.

I am not rising to offer any objection to what the authors think they are entitled to, but it looks as if there was a difference of opinion between these two important classes, and I would like to support the suggestion of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) that a small select committee be at once appointed. I do not think it would take more than four or five days and this matter could be fully investigated. I have been requested to ask a number of questions for the purpose of securing certain information from the minister and I would very much sooner ask these questions before such a committee, but if that cannot be done, I suppose the only course would be to ask them here for the purpose of eliciting the information which is sought.

Mr. ROBB: We will allow this item to stand, and I will not give an answer at the moment as to whether we shall appoint a committee or not, but we will take into consideration the observations of members who have opposed this section. In the meantime may I suggest that, as the only objection apparently is to clause 2, we should pass the other clauses and get them out of the way?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Clause 2 is the whole act.

Mr. ROBB: Referring to the letter which my hon. friend has placed on Hansard, I desire to make this observation. It contains two statements, one that the Typographical Union of Ottawa are opposed to this measure, and the other that they are offering indirectly a rebuke to the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) in that he was Prime Minister from June to December when he had an opportunity of proclaiming this measure.

Mr. BOYS: The leader of the Opposition is well able to answer any rebukes that may be directed to him. I wish he were here to attend to that phase of the matter himself; he could do it better than I can. However, the minister says that he is prepared to let section 2 stand. That section repeals certain sections of the act, and that after all is the vital point.

Mr. FORKE: I am glad that the minister has come to the conclusion to let the section stand, because a good many members do not know what it means, and I should hate to be called upon to vote upon it at the present time.

Section stands.

On section 5—Commencement of act.

Mr. ROBB: This section amends the act by striking out the words "a day to be fixed by proclamation of the Governor in Council" and substituting the words "the first day of July 1923." I think we had better let that section stand.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

INDIAN AFFAIRS

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Indians—Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and N.W.T., $714,223.

Mr. EVANS: The minister might explain the increase of $36,000 odd in this item.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): There is an increase of $36,491 in this item.

Of this increase $18,962.00 is accounted for owing to additional supplies having to be provided for, in order to meet obligations resulting from the negotiations of a treaty with Indians of the Great Slave lake and Mackenzie River districts numbering 3,000 souls. The supplies furnished comprise flour, bacon, tea, blankets, ammunition, twine and tools for which tenders will be invited of the trading companies in those districts and contracts awarded in the regular way. There is also an increase of $16,359.00 in the estimate for hospitals, medical attendance, etc. This increase is due chiefly to the urgent necessity of establishing and maintaining a hosptial on the Sarcee reserve in order to alleviate the condition of these Indians. They are in poor condition physically and unless some very thorough procedure is adopted, it is reported that the band will disappear within a measurable time. To remedy this, vigorous prolonged and radical measures are an absolute necessity. The Church of England has consented to close the Sarcee boarding school, and the department is using the building as a hospital under the supervision of a doctor, who also acts as Indian agent, and a staff of trained nurses. There is also an increase of $1,170 in the estimate for triennial clothing which is unavoidable, as a greater number of chiefs and headmen of treaties Nos. 1, 2 and 5 are entitled to suits next year than those of treaties Nos. 4, 7 and 10 who received suits this year.

I promised a short statement yesterday in dealing with this matter with respect to my personal observations of last year on visiting the Indians of western Canada. I stated that I had no personal knowledge of the conditions in the East, and I may remark with regard to the West that I did not by any means cover anything like all the reserves. I simply got an idea of what might be accomplished amongst the Indians of western Canada, particularly if we were able to carry on different educational methods. I am not criticizing the education of the past; far be it from me to do that. The first desire of the various church organizations who were carrying on work among the Indians was naturally to Christianize them; and that is a laudable purpose. Their next object was to give the Indians an education, which in my opinion is not of a character that would change them from their aboriginal habits to the habits of the white man with whom they must enter into competition if they are to make their livelihood in other ways than they formerly followed, namely, of hunting, fishing, and so forth.

I am asking for a considerable increase for educational purposes believing, after discussing the matter with the Oblate Fathers and those interested in Indian education, that we should give to their education a more technical character and, so far as agriculture is concerned, devote more attention to that aspect of our educational activities than has been the case in the past. Let me give an instance of the splendid results that can be obtained where effort has been put forth to educate the Indian, particularly for agricultural pursuits. I refer now to what I observed in Saskatchewan on the File Hills reserve. For a period of upwards of twenty years there have been carried on there educational methods that are now showing admirable results. This work was done under the supervision of the department here, and more particularly I presume under Mr. Graham, who has been in charge of the Saskatchewan activities for a number of years. There the boys and girls were taken from the schools after having been educated and were placed upon the farms. One of the things I objected to was the fact that there was no provision in the estimates for advancing sums of money to support these young people. I think in most cases, although I will not say in all, success was due to the fact that these people started up as young married couples upon their own particular holdings; in one or two instances I discovered young men who were batching and doing remarkably well. Indeed, from my observation, these young people I found were making as great a success of farming as were their white brothers in the surrounding territory; and one could not expect more than that. But unfortunately this is not the case throughout the other provinces. The work has not been carried on in the same concentrated way. However, what I have described is evidence of what can be done with the aborigine in educating and training him so that you change his mode of life.

It cannot be denied that in northern Ontario, northern Manitoba, and indeed in the northern portions of Alberta and Saskatchewan, the white man is becoming a very strong competitor of the Indian in trapping and in hunting. We are receiving constant complaints from the Indians that they are being driven off their hunting grounds. It is generally conceded that the white man is a much more zealous hunter, covers a greater extent of territory, and takes more fur than the Indian, and is denuding the hunting grounds of the red man to such an extent that it is becoming a serious problem. Indeed, this is true even in the far north where the Eskimos find themselves in a similar plight. Therefore, unless we take definite action to change the mode of life of the plains Indian, and in some degree of the bush Indian, we are within a measurable distance of the time when we will be bound to vote large sums of money for the subsistence of the aboriginal tribes. It is with that thought in mind that I am prompted to ask for increased grants for educational purposes among the Indians.

I am not criticizing my predecessors in office; I need only refer to the remarks of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) last year during the discussion of the Indian estimates, when he said that the preceding government had even gone to the point of being penurious in carrying on educational work among the Indians. I think it is only good business that we should attack this problem from the educational standpoint and try, if possible, to give the younger generation among the Indians such a reasonable amount of education as will enable them to take their place along with their white brothers and sisters, and in some cases, going a little further, give them the necessary technical training to enable them to engage in pursuits other than agriculture. That is all I have in mind.

I have a great admiration for the services performed by the various church organizations among the Indians, especially in the way of education. When I visited the Indian school at Kamloops I found the Father and Sisters in charge working under the most discouraging conditions. Although the building was heated with stoves it was freezing cold, the windows being in a shaky condition and almost falling out, and the school being of wooden construction the fire hazard was very great indeed. Yet he and the Sisters were doing their best to educate the Indian children within a hundred-mile radius of the institution. We are asking you this year to vote a sum of money to build a new institution at Kamloops to serve that whole territory. Similar remarks might be applied to many of these schools. The churches have spent a good deal of money in the construction of school buildings, and many of them are in good shape. It will be remembered that last session we asked for a vote to take over one of the newer buildings in order to relieve the religious organization of the capital charges they had taken upon themselves in connection with this work. I do think, Mr. Chairman, that if the religious organizations are willing to help us to the extent of providing the teaching staff practically free of charge to us, it is our clear duty to provide the buildings for the carrying on of their work. It will be my desire to assist and extend those operations among the 120,000 odd Indians so that no Indian child shall be denied the right to a good, decent public school education at least.

There are many and varied difficulties in the administration of the Indian department. In answer to my hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) I am free to admit that in some cases not enough care has been exercised in selecting our local agents. A great deal depends upon the man who is placed upon a reserve and in whose charge the Indians must be. In many cases not nearly enough consideration has been given to the choice of a suitable man, because after all he needs to possess a good tempered, patient and sympathetic disposition, for he meets with a great deal of disappointment in his failure to at once change the habits of these people. Year by year as subsistence by hunting becomes more and more precarious our Indians must apply themselves to agriculture and other avocations pursued by the white man; otherwise they will be entirely dependent upon grants from the treasury, and capable local agents can help them to accommodate themselves to changing conditions.

Mr. FORKE: I should like to add a word or two, Mr. Chairman, to what I said last night on this subject. I know the minister is very sympathetic towards the Indian and his problem. I think perhaps I would be the last to say anything against teaching the Indian Christianity but I do believe our first duty is to teach him how to make a decent living. We all know how puzzled white people become sometimes in regard to problems of Christianity; well, the Indians get into the same difficulties, only a little deeper sometimes. I remember a good many years ago meeting an old Indian friend, and he immediately informed me that he was now a Christian. He was taking some wood to market that had been cut into stove lengths, and while conversing with him I turned over a few pieces and discovered some dozy lengths underneath. I tried to explain to him that this was not Christian practice. He replied, "Oh yes, the white people all do that." So you see some of the difficulties the poor Indian has to meet in dealing with Christianity. I repeat that I believe the great thing is in the beginning to teach the Indian how to make a decent living.

If we are to have successful Indian agents I endorse what the minister says: they must be of a sympathetic nature and the right stamp of men. An Indian agent must be able to go out among the Indians and settle their little quarrels and encourage them to continue at their work. Until we have such men to look after our Indians I do not care how much money we spend it will only be wasted. At the present time in the little reserve near my home I know there are a great many healthy young men, but they have neither stock nor seed to make their land of any use to them. What are they going to do all summer? There is a problem. The department might provide them with the necessary stock and seed, but unless there is an agent possessing the proper qualifications to look after those Indians and see that everything is done in the right way I think the assistance will be thrown away.

Just a word in connection with the education of the Indian. The Indian is different from the white man in a great many respects. The Indians who live near me sometimes come over to see me about their difficulties. I can talk a little Indian and perhaps I may do so for a time; then I suddenly recollect that it would be better to have them talk English and I tell whoever I am conversing with that unless he speaks English I will not carry on the conversation any longer; and immediately he will commence to talk very good English. But he will not speak English as long as you will talk to him in the Indian tongue. Indians who have been educated at Elkhorn and Brandon will go back to the reserve and in twelve months, unless they are given some attention, you will not be able to tell the difference between them and the Indians who never saw the school, except, perhaps, that they are able to write a letter. I submit again that the Indians, to be properly looked after, must have an agent who takes thoroughly good care of them, who acts as their mediator and their counsellor and friend right along. That is the only way I can see in which we can arrive at a solution of the Indian problem. I really feel sorry for the Indians and their present condition in Manitoba. I would like to see the money devoted to the Indians well spent; I would not be niggardly at all in the matter of an appropriation for this purpose if I only knew that the money was being spent as it should be.

Mr. EVANS: I would like to say a word in support of what the minister has said. I do not think we should be stingy in the matter of voting money for the purposes of the Indians. We owe a debt to these people, and when the money is well spent we are well repaid in the effort. My own experience in connection with the Indians dates back to some thirty years ago, in connection with one of the reserves in Saskatchewan. The Indian agent who went among them at that time found the conditions very unsatisfactory indeed. Since then we have seen that reserve even without an Indian agent, although there are not as many Indians there now as there used to be, and they are in a very fair way. Some of them, I know, have fine herds of cattle, are following the occupation of farming and are living a civilized life in every respect. Their boys and girls are being educated, and they are intensely loyal. Some of them served in the Great War, and one I know particularly has gone out as a missionary to his own people. They are capable of being educated; they are susceptible to uplift, and I think we would make a mistake if we did not do our duty by them.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): What is the policy of the department with regard to some of the Indian reserves where the Indians have nearly all died? In my own constituency there are some very large reserves which used to be occupied by two hundred Indians but on which there are now only about ten. Then, there are small reserves which, after being farmed to some extent, were abandoned, and are now producing a splendid crop of weeds, wild oats and so on. Would the department consider the leasing of such land as that? I would ask also if it is the intention to retain the larger reserves where the numbers of Indians have materially decreased, or will the department dispose of some of them, and if so under what conditions?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If the land is fit for agricultural purposes and is not required by the band, the practice of the department has been to try to secure a surrender from the band and sell the land to white settlers.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I wish to call the attention of the minister to the dissatisfaction which prevails among the Indians on the Blackfoot reserve in Alberta. They have many complaints, the chief of which is that under the terms of surrender agreement they were induced, they say, to consent to a reduction of their rations during the war from seven pounds of meat and seven pounds of flour a week to five pounds of meat and five pounds of flour a week, and a pound of tea, I think, every two months. They were under the impression that when the war was finished they would go back to the old scale, and they are dissatisfied now that many years have elapsed since the conclusion of the war and they are still on the war rations. The minister will realize that adults can hardly be expected to subsist on five pounds of meat and five pounds of flour a week—it seems miserable. If the minister has any explanation to offer I would like to have it.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I had no knowledge, until the matter was brought to my attention by the hon. gentleman some weeks ago, that there was any difficulty about rations on this reserve. My own idea is that we should carry out to the letter our contract with the Indians; that is the first principle we should lay down. On the other hand, the Indians on the Blackfoot reserve should be rapidly brought to a point where they are self-supporting. They are on splendid land; they can raise cattle; they have every opportunity of getting along well. It may be our fault that they are not self-supporting; I am not saying it is theirs. However, as I have said, I am prepared to carry out to the fullest extent any arrangement that was made with the Indians.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The Indians tell me, through their chiefs, that during the winter and spring they actually go out into the reserve and gather up dead horseflesh and eat it, because they cannot get any other food. Of course, that is obviously improper. There are a number of other complaints that I would like the minister to investigate. One of them dates back to the campaign for greater production. The Indians tell me that they were charged $35 a set for harness that could have been purchased from any mail order house for $16 at that time. I would be glad if the minister would investigate that complaint. There is one other complaint, which is more sentimental than anything else. Some of the minor Indian chiefs wish to have the right to delegate to a successor at the time of death the chieftainship or honour which they may themselves possess. A man named Russa, an Indian brave, was bequeathed by a minor chief his chieftainship; this was about two years ago when the chief was dying. The agent informed the Indians that he had communicated with Ottawa but that no reply had been received; and no reply had been received up to last fall when I was there. Little things of this kind are very keenly felt by the Indian mind. Before I pass from that, may I ask the minister whether he has any knowledge of that particular incident?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes. In nearly all the western provinces an Indian chieftainship is not hereditary but elective, so that it would be in direct conflict with the elective sytem to attempt to pass the chieftainship down in hereditary line. We have a great deal of difficulty on the Six Nations reserve about that very thing. They have an hereditary system there and a very strong exception is taken to it by a great many of the Indians on the reserve, and as a result there is conflict going on all the time. With all due deference to the wishes of the chief I might say frankly that I would oppose the hereditary system as against the elective, which I think is much more modern and much more in the interests of the Indian.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The chief did not give me to understand that they desired the hereditary system. I asked the question very pointedly when this matter was brought to my attention: Was the chieftainship delegated to this new man by the will of the tribe? I was informed yes, and that the agent had been so informed. So it would not be the hereditary system.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have no knowledge of that particular case. It would appear that in that case he had been elected by the votes of the band but not confirmed by the agent.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Owing to the delay at Ottawa, according to the agent's reply.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Is there an amount provided in this item for improvements or extensions to the school at St. Albert north of Edmonton?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No. There is an amount of $145,000 for the industrial school at Edmonton, which was formerly the Red Deer school.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is any provision made so that the agent will have power to relieve illness or cases of emergency?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That is always done. If there is not a resident doctor, there is a doctor whose duty it is to go to the reserve on call. That is the case with all the reserves.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Do I understand the minister to say that the agent has power to allocate to a sick Indian additional supplies of food and so forth?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Oh yes. That is his duty. He must not allow the Indians to starve.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am glad to hear the minister say that because these chiefs have reported to me that on complaint to the agent at Gleichen they could receive no relief whatever. The agent replied, and I am giving this complaint as I got it, "I have no power. I must get that power from the commissioner."

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The Indian is pretty much of a white man when it comes to describing his difficulties. He does not minimize them at all. I discovered that last year when I was on a visit westward. When I brought the officials and the chiefs together I found that the stories I had heard were not borne out by the testimony. I would be very glad to do the same in this particular case, bring the officials and the chiefs together, and if they have legitimate complaints we shall be glad to clear them up.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Thank you. May I ask how much capital was used in the original purchase of equipment, lands, stock and so on in connection with the Blackfoot reserve?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have not the figures at hand but will give them to my hon. friend.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): You will let me have them?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. LEWIS: Why are the general expenses under this item for Manitoba and Saskachewan so great, much larger than any of the others?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This, of course, covers the salaries of all the agents in the western provinces and the expenses in connection with their offices. It covers the Northwest Territory, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. I have the figures in detail, but it would take considerable time to give them.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The Indians of the Blackfoot reserve complain of this fact: When their crop is threshed they are compelled by the agent to dispose of all of it except one load, which they are allowed to retain for seed. Some of these Indians have one hundred acres or more ready for crop and one load, of course, will not nearly suffice for seed. The result is, they say, they have to go back to the agent in the spring and purchase at an enhanced price the additional feed required. Would the minister look into that?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I can hardly conceive of an agent being so improvident as to ask the Indian to sell his grain down to a point where he would not have sufficient left to seed his land. I think when we came to investigate that complaint we would find it was not borne out by the facts. However, we will investigate it. One of the things we are endeavouring to teach the Indian is prudence. Improvidence is his great failing; he does not provide, and that is one virtue we are trying to encourage him in. It certainly would be a very foolish procedure to sell beyond the point where his requirements for feed and seed would be fully met.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That was the way in which it struck me. What provision has been made on that reserve for the education of the children? I understand the school has been closed since July. It was alleged to be closed for repairs, but apparently it has not been opened up yet.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The school was closed simply for the purpose of remodelling and repairs. It is now open again and in operation.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): How long has it been in operation?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): About two months.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is there any age at which the children are supposed to leave the school? I am informed, but I rather doubt it myself, that when the children reach the age of from thirteen to fifteen they are discharged from school and told to go to work.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I can scarcely believe that because those I spoke of who are making such a splendid success in Saskatchewan went direct from the school to carrying on farming operations on their own account. They are kept at the school until the age of eighteen. I can hardly believe that any such order as my hon. friend mentions would have been issued in connection with the schools. I am free to admit that perhaps there is some ground for complaint in Alberta. On the Morley reserve Indian education was becoming expensive and in some cases they closed the boarding schools and attempted to educate these children in day schools. The department, however has abandoned that idea altogether because it seems to be a waste of money. The children are not kept in school regularly and during their absence go back as far as they have progressed practically, in their educational instruction. The only effective way is to get them into a boarding school where you can have some control over them and keep them under supervision until they have had an opportunity to get an education.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have seen two crews of Indians at work threshing last fall. I stayed a week in one district where one of these crews was working and they gave immense satisfaction. They were more satisfactoy even than the white man, and I am glad to say that the employer paid them exactly the wages of the white man. They did splendid work. Can the minister give to the committee the terms of the agreement entered into with the Indians in regard to ploughed land, that is the land left when the greater production schemes ceased?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Where the Indian is equipped and ready to farm the land he is charged at the rate of $6 an acre for broken land, land that is broken and brought under cultivation under the greater production scheme. In regard to what my hon. friend has said with respect to selling supplies, harness, implements, etc., I may say that a considerable proportion was turned over to the younger Indians who gave evidence of a desire to go farming. In some cases these things were sold, but in the majority of cases they were given to the Indians as an encouragement. One of the difficulties I found when I took charge of the department was that as soon as the young people graduated and were ready to begin farming operations there was no provision for loaning or giving money to start at farming; and one of the rather vicious things that was happening was that the Indian would go out and get credit from the merchants in the vicinity. This led to considerable difficulty in getting adjustments made. Now we are adopting another method. The department are loaning sufficient funds to these young Indians to start farming in a moderate way, and in that manner we hope to maintain them on the reserve and encourage them in agricultural pursuits.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In the first place, under the greater production scheme, the land was leased for five years. The chiefs endeavoured to make an agreement for $10 a head—that is $10 for each Indian on the reserve. Objection was taken to that sum, and it was cut to $6, which was accepted. However, on the expiry of that lease the department went ahead and re-leased without asking the consent of the Indians.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil) That is released to white men?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I think so. The Indians objected, and subsequently a further agreement was arrived at—with the local agent at any rate, although I think it must have been with the departmental officials—that, in return, the sum of $4 per head would be paid for these second leases. Is that substantially correct?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am afraid not.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Well, what are the facts?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I would like to say to my hon. friend that I cannot speak with authority regarding what has been done in the past, but the policy pursued now is this: The moment an Indian is ready to take this land we are prepared to turn it over to him. What I mean by that is that none of this land will be leased to white men if there are Indians ready and available to farm it. Just as fast as these young men wish to settle down we will place them on this land, not only on the Blackfoot reserve but on all the reserves on which the policy of greater production was carried on, in order to encourage the Indian to work these farm lands. So far we have not been able to get a sufficient number of Indians to farm the area that was under the greater production scheme. Therefore, we have to lease to the white men temporarily year by year.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): But is there an amount of $4 being paid to the Indians?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Not that I know of.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. MANION: No, Mr. Chairman. I want to ask a few questions and if I do so after eight o'clock it will probably be just as well.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

After Recess

SUPPLY

INDIAN AFFAIRS

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. MANION: Has the position of Indian agent at the head of the lakes been filled? I know that the agent was retired a month or so ago but I do not know who has been given the position, if it has been filled.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The position has been filled by the Civil Service Commission, the appointee being Mr. J. Garry Burke.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Burke was never in the Indian service before?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No.

Mr. MANION: Is he a returned soldier?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. MANION: I desire to say a few words in regard to the Indians in this country. Ever since the white man entered Canada his race has been pushing the Indians farther and farther back into the hinterland of this country. I do not say that in any critical spirit because I believe that Canada has been treating her Indians probably a great deal better than the people to the south of us have treated theirs, as is evidenced by the fact that throughout the time we have dealt with our Indians there have been practically no difficulties or troubles in connection with them, whereas in the United States the authorities have undoubtedly met with many difficulties in the way of guerilla warfare and so forth. I believe, however, that it is well for us to bear in mind at all times that after all the Indians were the first Canadians; at least they were here before any of the rest of us, not excepting my good friends in Quebec. It should, therefore, be the wish of the Canadian people to show them every consideration possible; and indeed I believe that it has been the policy of the Department of Indian Affairs under all governments to treat the Indians in a reasonably fair way. At the same time the Indians throughout this country, at least in many bands, have been decreasing in great numbers. At the head of the lakes in the neighbourhood of Fort William and Port Arthur there are a couple of bands as well as one at Nipigon which, from what I have been given to understand, are decreasing to a great extent, this being due mainly to disease of one kind or another. We are all aware that practically every disease to which the white man is subject deals more harshly with the Indian when it attacks him than it does with the white race, probably because the Indian has not become as immune, during a long period of years, as is the white man to such disease. One disease in particular which has been attacking the Indians at the head of the lakes and also in British Columbia, where I understand the Indians are also decreasing in numbers, is tuberculosis. I have watched the progress of these people at the head of the lakes for the last thirty years, and I know that they have been decreasing in numbers to a very large extent from this cause. There are other diseases, of course, which levy a heavy toll on them, even including the comparatively mild disease of measles; and there is another unfortunate evil from which they suffer, which is not perhaps exactly a disease but rather an injurious habit which they have acquired. I refer to the use by the Indians of alcohol. I mention this fact because I fear we have not perhaps been doing enough to protect the Indians against themselves, so far particularly as diseases are concerned. I remember that in conversation once with a Jesuit priest, who lived among the Indians, he told me that they were healthier both physically and morally before they became associated with white people. I believe he was telling the exact truth. The point I wish to make is this. While I understand from the deputy minister that a certain amount of educational propaganda is carried on amongst the Indians to inculcate some of the hygienic laws with a view to preventing tuberculosis or at least the most common forms of consumption, and while through the missionaries of different religious denominations in this country the Indians are being acquainted with the harmful effects of alcohol upon themselves especially—for they are affected to a greater extent by it than are most other races—, at the same time I feel that perhaps we might increase our efforts to educate these people to the importance of protecting themselves, more particularly against tuberculosis. It is important that we should teach them the means to prevent this disease to as great an extent as they possibly can. So far as alcohol is concerned, after all the laws of most provinces, if not of all, protect the Indians, to some extent at least, against the alcoholic evil, so that they can obtain liquor only illegally. As regards tuberculosis, however, while there is a continuous campaign being waged against the disease among the Indians, even in their own dialects, still we might do more for them than is now done. The Indians are really a very inoffensive people in Canada. In the past, it is true, in the early history of the country, they were rather aggressive; but today I think, speaking at least of the Indians whom I have met, and I have grown up in their midst, so to speak, practically in all relations of life they are much less offensive citizens of this country, if they may be so termed, than are the white men. It is for that reason, therefore, that I urge upon the minister the question of considering more active propaganda to be carried on, in whatever ways the deputy minister and the different officials of the department may deem advisable, to educate the Indians to take better care of their health. But there are other reasons besides humanitarian for undertaking work of this kind. For example, there is the point of view of the picturesqueness of Indian life in this country. I believe that the Indian life of Canada is of value to the Canadian people, particularly to those people in this country who have come from lands where Indians, the people we understand that word to designate, have not existed. I wish therefore to impress upon the minister the value that there is in preserving to the people of this country the Indians whom we now have amongst us. They are, as I have said, of an inoffensive character, and from the humanitarian point of view, if, from no other reason, I think we should do more than we are doing at present to take care of them. I think that with a little more money expended in this direction than we are now devoting to the Indians we could protect them against diseases of various kinds; and I should be glad if the minister and the officers of his department would take such steps as would prove in the best interests not only of the Indians themselves but of the people of the country as a whole.

Mr. McBRIDE: I have no complaint to make on behalf of the Indians regarding the minister, but rather I wish to thank him and his deputy for the way in which they have treated the Indians, particularly in the vicinity in which I live. Last year I spoke to the minister and his deputy with reference to the school at Kamloops, which was in a dilapidated condition. That school would have been built years ago had it not been for the war. The minister and his deputy came to the district and visited the reserve last summer. They looked fully into the matter, went through the old school, and were at once convinced that it was no place for children to be educated in. I can assure them that the people in that vicinity, not only the Indians and the reverend gentleman who is in charge of them, but the people generally appreciate very much the action the minister and his deputy have taken to improve the conditions for the children on the reserve.

Mr. CALDWELL: Owing to the fact that I was on a committee this afternoon when the estimates for New Brunswick were under consideration, I would ask the indulgence of the committee for five minutes to refer to certain conditions in that province. I want to refer to the roads in the Indian reserve in Victoria county, New Brunswick. This reserve is in the neighbourhood of a good-sized town and is situate in a populous part of the country. One has to drive through the reserve to get into the market town, and it is quite a hardship, especially in winter, to pass through the reserve because the Indians are not in a position to break the roads along these three or four miles. There is a great deal of snow in New Brunswick in winter and people experience considerable hardship in passing over that road to get into the town. In summer, of course, the condition is not so bad, but in winter it is very difficult to get over it. Part of the road is dug out of a side of a bank, and when the spring freshets come it is invariably in very bad shape. Will the agent there be instructed to see that the road is kept open during the winter?

Mr. BANCROFT: I would bring to the attention of the minister the necessity of an early settlement concerning the hay lands on the St. Peter's reserve. This reserve is on the Red river just north of the town of Selkirk. These hay lands have been the principal source of supply of hay for the local farmers ever since the district was first settled. They enjoyed this convenience until about five years ago when the lands were leased in a block to a party for speculative purposes, thus of course cutting off the other settlers from their hay supply. The district is only about thirty miles from the city of Winnipeg, the train service is excellent and in every way the conditions are highly favourable to dairy farming, but I am told that since these lands were leased five years ago the number of stock in the locality has decreased by about 60 per cent. This indicates how very detrimental to the local farmers has been their exclusion from these hay lands. The lease runs out next month, and I would impress upon the minister the importance of not renewing it. These hay lands should be available to the local settlers in order that they may be able to build up a stock-growing industry. I have already taken this matter up with the department and with the minister, and I again take this opportunity of emphasizing the importance of this hay supply to the local farmers. I think it is the duty of the government to keep these lands out of the hands of speculators and make it possible for the actual settlers to buy them in small lots. If arrangemets cannot be settled in time to make a sale this year before the hay crop is ready, I would suggest that the lands be leased in small lots to the settlers for this year's cut, and that arrangements be completed for a sale on the lines I have indicated so that the actual settlers may benefit instead of being sacrificed in favour of the speculator. This point of view, I may say, is shared not only by all the settlers in the community but by the residents of the town of Selkirk, which is the largest urban centre in the district.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: What is the explanation of the increase under this item?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): In answer to my hon. friend who has spoken of the scourge of tuberculosis among the Indians, while I would not say that we are taking adequate steps to this end, because it would cost a tremendous amount of money to wipe out this plague amongst the Indian tribes, yet we are trying by propaganda and education among the Indians to make them acquainted with the best methods of combatting the disease. Of course, we have the best chance of success among the children who attend the schools. Undeniably our Indian people, in common, I suppose, with those who have lived as they have lived for generations, are in rather a bad way so far as tuberculosis is concerned. We hope by the means I have indicated and by employing nurses to help the Indians save themselves from this scourge.

In reply to my hon. friend for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) I do not think it is the duty of the agent or of the department to keep open a public road, but in so far as we are responsible as a property holder in the vicinity we will be prepared to do our share both in the construction and the maintenance of these highways passing through the various reserves.

In reply to my hon. friend for Selkirk (Mr. Bancroft), we have had the matter he refers to under consideration. As soon as possible these hay lands will be put up for sale by public auction in small lots. We cannot guarantee that they will be sold to the local farmers, but at least they will be given an opportunity of bidding upon the various parcels that constitute this rather large hay meadow. In the meantime as soon as the lease expires we will offer this year these various parcels to parties who may wish to lease them and get the hay, as it will be impossible to arrange for a sale before the hay harvest.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the land be leased by favoritism or by tender?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We will lease the parcels by tender.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What will be the difference between that condition and what has already prevailed? The present lessee got his lease by tender—he was the highest bidder. I understand that what the hon. member complains of is that the lands are not available for farmers in the neighbourhood. They will not be available to them after the minister leases them by tender this year, nor, after he sells them.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not wish to get into a controversy between my right hon. friend and the hon. member for Selkirk—

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no controversy.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): —But I know of no other system by which the department can protect itself.

Mr. BANCROFT: I would suggest that the lands be leased in small lots, not in one whole block as was done before. In the latter case the lands will inevitably pass into the hands of speculators. If these lands are leased under what is known as hay permits every man who has stock can obtain so much of the land according to the number of his stock. This method would help the local stock-raising industry and would keep the lands out of the hands of speculators.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not the tender system; that is the permit system.

Mr. BANCROFT: Well, that is the system the local settlers want.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what the minister says he is not going to do.

Mr. BANCROFT: The people there want the permit system.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Has the minister had any complaints from the residents living near the St. Pie reserve in regard to the fencing of the reserve? A road has been cut through this reserve, and in the fall many of the settlers left their cattle out on the road. Trouble resulted, the cattle straying into the Indian reserve and being impounded by the Indians, which put the settlers to considerable cost and a great deal of inconvenience. I suggest to the minister that some fencing should be done on that reserve. There are very few Indians there, and they have had a great deal of trouble. Has the minister had any complaints?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No.

Mr. HANSON: Shortly after the last election the Indian agent at Perth, New Brunswick, under whose immediate care the Tobique band of Indians came, was dismissed from office without any reason being assigned. I happen to know that he is a man of more than ordinary intelligence and that he was perhaps one of the best Indian agents we ever had in that part of the country. Will the minister inform us why he was dismissed?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The information I have is that the services of this gentleman were not satisfactory.

Mr. HANSON: No such reason was ever assigned. But I can tell the minister the real reason; it was because he did not support the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell). I do not know that he was very active against him, but that was the reason. Were any complaints against Mr. Wootten on file in the department, and if so, were they investigated by the department?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I cannot answer offhand whether or not there were any complaints.

Mr. HANSON: The secretary of the department is right in front of the minister; he knows Mr. Wootten personally.

Mr. CALDWELL: Perhaps I may be able to help the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) a little.

Mr. HANSON: I want the information from the minister.

The CHAIRMAN: I draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that this vote is for Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Northwest Territories. However, if the committee has no objection I suppose a brief explanation might be made.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No objection.

Mr. CALDWELL: I am surprised to learn that this man did not support me. I understood from him that he did.

Mr. JACOBS: The hon. member for York-Sunbury said he was a man of more than ordinary intelligence.

Mr. CALDWELL: Then he should have supported me as a matter of course.

Mr. MARTELL: There was no Liberal candidate, so he was the next best thing.

Mr. CALDWELL: However, the chief of the Indian tribe at Tobique point wrote me something over two years ago stating that green timber was being cut on the reserve without a permit. I reported the matter to the department, and they got in touch with the Indian agent, who reported back that there was no such thing going on. All this will be found, I am sure, on the departmental files. I received a communication to this effect from the deputy minister, a copy of which I sent to the chief, thinking there must have been some mistake. By return mail I received another letter from the chief saying that at least 600 green logs had been cut, as well as a large amount of green pulpwood. I again communicated with the department, and I think they sent an Indian agent from another reserve to look into the matter. They found that it was true that this cutting had been going on, although the agent at that reserve denied it. I am convinced that he did not know anything about it, because I know the man; he is very conscientious and an excellent man in every way—and a very good friend of mine, by the way. As I say, I was surprised to learn that he did not support me in the last election, because a man of his good judgment would naturally, I should think, follow that course. If the minister looks into the files I think he will find that that is the reason Mr. Wootten's services were dispensed with. Mr. Wootten was leaving the locality, I believe; he is up in northern Ontario at present.

Mr. HANSON: He left this month; he was dismissed a year ago. I should like to ask the minister if any complaint was ever made against Mr. Wootten, and if so, whether it was investigated by the department?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am informed that this timber transaction was about the only thing concerning which his occupancy of the position was questioned. I am also informed he did not give his full time to Indian affairs; that he was engaged in other business.

Mr. HANSON: How could you expect him to do so, on the miserable salary you paid him?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We expect to get service, even for miserable salaries.

Mr. HANSON: Not his full time.

Mr. MICHAUD: I know something about this gentleman, and if the hon. member for York-Sunbury wants to know in what respect he did not fulfil his duties, I can enlighten him on the subject. In the first place, the hon. member will know that Mr. Wootten got the position of Indian agent as a reward for his activities as Conservative organizer in the county of Victoria. I know that county very well; I had the honour of representing it for some time. Then, Mr. Wootten was so active as an insurance agent that he had hardly any time to give to the affairs of the Indians on the Perth reserve. As he was not doing his duty in connection with the work on behalf of the Indians, he was, therefore, dismissed for a good cause.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would look as though he had been dismissed by the hon. member for Miramichi instead of by the minister. The minister did not know anything about the reason for the dismissal, but—

Mr. MICHAUD: Who is the member for Miramichi, I would like to know?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Restigouche—they are pretty close together.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The Miramichi is an old boat.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would like to ask the minister what is doing and what he proposes doing in regard to the greater production work in the West.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have not changed my mind with respect to the matter since last year. With the single exception of the farm near Regina, we propose turning those lands over to the young Indians who qualify as farmers. Of course that cannot be done in a moment; we shall have to continue until such time as these young Indians are in a position to take over the lands. Each year will show, I think, a very substantial reduction in our farming operations.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I read in a return brought down in answer to some questions a statement which indicated very gratifying results from the greater production operations. I think it would be well if these were made known to the committee. I do not object to the gradual closing out of the enterprise, but I would not want to see it closed out any more rapidly than suitable Indians were available to utilize the lands that have been brought under cultivation. Otherwise these lands would be worse than wasted; the cultivation would be harmful instead of beneficial, because the land would all go to weeds. If I caught the minister's words aright, the farm he proposes continuing within the scope of the enterprise is the one near Regina. What is the name of the reserve?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Muscowequan.

Mr. MEIGHEN: About 4,000 acres?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It will be some time before they are withdrawn.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We are always having difficulty in connection with Indian farming. What I mean by that is that almost every year there will be reserves upon which seed will be required, and I think a farm of that character might very well be continued by the department in order to provide the necessary seed. It might be said that there is no reason why these reserves should not provide seed for themselves, and that does happen once in a while. With the exception of that one farm, I think we should close out these farms as rapidly as we have Indians qualified to take them on. Of course we must continue to operate until then, otherwise the lands would grow up in weeds.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What are the results so far as they can be known now?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I will give that information, which is in the form of answers to some questions that were asked, I do not know by whom. The quantity of grain grown on the Indian reserves in the three prairie provinces during the last five years was 5,363,339 bushels; the proportion of this grown by individual Indians was 3,532,347 bushels; the proportion grown by white settlers 1,100,000 bushels; the proportion grown by the greater production operations was 730,992 bushels; the quantity of grain grown on these same reserves during the five years previous to this period was 5,586,938 bushels; the area summer fallowed and broken by Indians during the last five years was 112,294 acres; area during the previous five years, records not available for breaking and summer fallowing, but total area under crop 1913-1917 inclusive 184,302 acres; amount of rentals collected during the last five years $440,009.88; amount collected during the previous five years $54,324.66.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the amount still due and collectible?

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have not that here but it will be a fairly considerable amount I imagine.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps I did not get the minister's figures right. If I understand them properly his figures were wrong as to the amount grown in the previous five years. I have it at about three and a half million bushels, not five million odd. The increase is something over 100 per cent.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend is quite correct. The quantity of grain grown on these same reserves during the five years previous was 3,586,938 bushels, not 5,586,938 bushels.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister read 5,000,000. There should be about $130,000 due and collectible still, and if so that amount added to the $440,000 which the minister has just given would make a total of $590,000 of direct cash resulting from an investment of about $360,000. In addition, of course, there would be the buildings. They will be used now by the Indians that are coming on to take possession of the land, the tractors and farm machinery that the greater production enterprise has, and as well there would be some outstandings that would still come in, I mean aside from the rentals. So the whole enterprise would be a very profitable one from every standpoint. Of course, I am quite aware that a large share of the profits come from the leases, but even without the leases there is a very gratifying result from the whole greater production enterprise. I would like to know if the minister's ideas agree with mine on this subject or has he something in his mind that modifies or in any way tempers his enthusiasm with regard to the results attained?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I was not questioning the results at all, but I do not think it would be wise to continue the greater production of grain enterprise now. I do not see any necessity for continuing it. All I am endeavouring to do is to get the Indians to take over this land as fast as they are able to do so and to get down to one reasonably-sized farm close to Regina, where the work can be looked after by Mr. Graham, and a store of grain be left available at that central point for use as required.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the greater production work is good, but I think the Indian on the farm is better, and consequently while there is an Indian who is likely to succeed standing by ready to take the land I agree with the minister that the right thing to do is to let him take it, but save for that, and only as the work is invaded by the Indians, I would say continue the greater production operations. In that way some use is made of otherwise almost abandoned land, the very best waste land in the West. There is need of the greater production operations for the purpose of utilizing that land. Why, the minister could get a very considerable sum towards his Indian estimates by continuing this to the utmost degree consistent only with not shutting out any Indian ready to farm, and at the rate of increase of these estimates I would think that would appeal to the minister as a very advisable thing to do.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I just might say in reply that when farming under the greater production scheme you might have a period of years when you would be very successful, and then you might strike a period of years in which your expenditure would far outbalance your revenue.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You would hardly strike any worse than we have had lately.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Do not make any mistake. That could be done very easily. These bad cycles fortunately did not strike the greater production area very seriously.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They struck it right between the eyes. The big greater production farms were hailed, and drought came and brought down the yield to about seven bushels per acre on the largest farm on the Blood reserve and on the second largest nearby. I think it encountered pretty nearly everything that western farming encounters and still it has succeeded.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It has succeeded largely because they have been very successful in Saskatchewan. They have been very fortunate in getting splendid crops, and this year again there was a magnificent crop in Saskatchewan; I saw it. But on the whole it is rather a precarious undertaking. These lands were broken at a time when stress was being put upon the government to increase production in Canada, and it was a laudable scheme to enter upon at that time, but so far as I am concerned when my hon. friend points out that this is a way in which we might obtain revenue I would say that we are obtaining all the revenue we can from the rentals of these lands. But after all I am fearful whether this is not a doubtful way of obtaining revenue taking one year with another, breaking up these lands and taking chances on leasing them. I am speaking of lands the Indians would not otherwise be able to utilize. Part of the difficulty complained of by my hon. friend from Bow River arises from the fact that these lands during the period of inflation were leased at high rentals, and the leaseholders were unable to pay. The Indian knows what these lands were rented at and he is disappointed and thinks somebody has been retaining what rightfully belongs to him. I have gone pretty thoroughly into all these matters with the chiefs themselves, and I know that that is partly the cause of their complaint, whereas the rancher, and in many cases the renter, has lost all that he put into the enterprise. Take the case of the leases, the very Gleichen reserve that my hon. friend from Bow River is speaking about. The rancher who had that lease is practically bankrupt owing to the severe drop in the price of cattle and the very high rental he was foolish enough to pay for the lease. Yet the Indian expects to get that money.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not so much a matter of what the Indian expects as what is best for him. Suppose the minister does see that he gets the benefit of the money; all well and good. Better do the best that can be done with the land and let the money go to the Indians as far as I am concerned. I would not want to see the land simply given up and the whole enterprise abandoned even if somebody did pay too much. That is always going to happen and, of course, the man who loses has to take his risk. I do not want to see everything simply put aside, the tractors stacked up, and the enterprise left in the lurch, any more rapidly than is necessary to take care of the Indians.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am not sure that my right hon. friend realizes exactly what is being done. I assure him that we are trying to make the best use of every acre of land that cannot be utilized by the Indians. I would like to see the Indians out there encouraged, as far as possible, to utilize their grazing land. There is no use blinking at the fact that they have not nearly the number of cattle they had some years ago and we must get busy and encourage them to own and raise their cattle on these reserves. Not only that but we must encourage the young men to engage in agriculture in order that they may maintain themselves. It can be done. I pointed out this afternoon a very clear evidence of that in Saskatchewan where the Indians are making splendid progress, and I see no reason why the same thing cannot be done on every one of these western reserves.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I agree with the minister in that. I agree with him that the right line of education for the Indian youth—after the three R's are mastered: reading, writing, and arithemetic and no excessive amount of any of them—is to teach him to work, teach him to farm, particularly to teach him to earn a living. I am inclined to agree with the leader of the Progressive party on this subject. I do not think there is any use trying to make a white man of the Indian whether in education or, possibly, in religion; it cannot be done. The thing to do with the Indian is to remember that he is only a few generations from the bush. Keep him in the open as much as possible, children as well as men—that for the purposes of their health—and utilize the funds of the government to teach them to earn their living. I am inclined to think we spend too much money on certain forms of education, and I have doubts whether the additional half million that is asked for in this vote is necessary providing we confine the application of public moneys to the essential educative needs of the Indian. I would be sorry to see any niggardliness in the way of policy as to education, providing it is such education as fits the Indian to help himself. There is no easier way of wasting money than on unnecessary school equipment, teachers, and so forth, and unnecessary curriculum for Indian children. As the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) said there has been a tremendous amount wasted. I do not know what the proportion is but a good large proportion are right under the blanket in a month from the time they get out of the school, and unless some feature of the File Hills work follows the school, the money of the government has gone within a short time after graduation. I think the efforts of the department should be more and more directed to bringing the individual Indian into a responsible working job as he gets out of the Indian school. If such is the policy it is going to bring far better results than to continue him in the school and then abandon him when he gets through. So, while I do not object to the extra grant—providing the officers of the department and the minister have thoroughly thought the subject out—I really, if I had to do it myself, would go over the estimates again and see if the half million could not be struck off, and the moneys already voted—I mean the moneys that have been voted in previous years—applied, perhaps, to curtailment of the academic curriculum to some extent, the balance being used for more practical purposes and for the continuation of the File Hills work.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I would just like to say in reply to my right hon. friend that is eactly what I have been trying to tell the committee this afternoon—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I heard some of it.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): —and I agree most heartily with it. I think the mistake that has been made is, that we have been trying to educate the Indian and then abandoning him the moment he steps outside of the schoolroom door. I do not see how you could expect any different result. I cannot very well see how it could be different. You have only given him an education; you have not equipped him at all to take his place in a different walk of life and you have spoiled him for the avocation carried on by his people. Now, what else could be the result but that in many cases he would be a failure such as has been depicted by the leader of the Progressive party. With these object lessons in front of us we should endeavour to shape our policy accordingly. I am not anxious to give the Indian a very extended education, but I do earnestly desire to give him a sufficient education in order that he may be able to take his place with the white man in the ordinary avocations of life.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But there is an enormous increase.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My right hon. friend must bear in mind the fact that the late government spent no money on educational institutions during the whole period of the war.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, yes. we spent some.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I would like to take my right hon. friend to some institutions in which the Indian youth is being educated; I would like to show him some of the institutions in which the work is being carried on. Surely, in all fairness, if we are to do this work, if we are to even make an attempt to do it, we ought to have reasonable places in which to house these children and that has not been the case. I saw some examples of that. I saw some splendid institutions. I saw an institution at Qu 'Appelle of which the Canadian government, or any other government, can well be proud; a splendid building, well conducted, and the pupils that I saw there demonstrated the advantages of an institution of that kind. It is not my policy to build institutions of that character. At the same time I think that much better work could be done in an institution of that character rather than one in which they cannot keep water from freezing, one in which the floors are worn out and the windows are falling out of the building, and where there ought to be 150 or 175 pupils. That is why I am asking for this money. I am not asking it for the purpose of building elaborate establishments and putting in elaborate equipment. What is proposed is to have a reasonable kind of a building with a very modest 9 p.m. equipment in order that this work may be carried on. If we cannot make any progress in assisting the Indians in Canada through a reasonably educational method, I am afraid that the red man will deteriorate, and that he will be a bigger burden in the way of maintenance upon the people of Canada than he will by trying to make him sustain himself by this method.

Mr. KNOX: In following this subject a little further I would like to say that I have in mind one institution to which I might refer for a few minutes without getting away from the subject. I refer to the boarding school at Duck Lake, where not only educational work is carried on, but agricultural education is given in connection with it. It is under Father Delmas, who is doing exceptionally good work. I was struck by the remarks of the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. McBride) a little while ago when he spoke about the good results that had followed a visit from the minister and his deputy last summer, and I would like to impress on the minister the necessity of paying a visit to the Duck Lake institution. I feel sure if he went there some provision would be made for better buildings in that location. The buildings there are not adequate for the work that is being done. They are out of date and getting out of repair in a great many ways. It was hoped that something would be done this year but I understand it is impossible to give the matter any attention just at present. I would like some assurance from the minister that this point will be kept in view for the future and that we may look forward to something being done there.

Mr. TOLMIE: Can the minister tell the committee what is being done in the way of stimulating the Indians in the production of beef cattle on the plains?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Unfortunately the Indians on the plains have not as many cattle as they had ten or twelve years ago.

Mr. TOLMIE: Does the minister know the reason?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, but they had some very bad seasons, and for some reason or other they do not appear to have as many cattle as they formerly had. I think we should endeavour to change that condition. Instructions are given to the farm instructors and agents on the reserves to encourage as much as possible the production of live stock, because it seems to me we should not have to buy beef to maintain the Indians upon the plains. We should not have to furnish beef particularly to bands located where there is plenty of grass in a good grass country. The Indian can very well be taught to take care of his stock. He is perhaps improvident and all the rest of it, but it is part of the business of the agent and farm instructor located on the reserve to assist him in that respect.

Mr. TOLMIE: Is the government doing anything to improve the quality of cattle? What is the government doing in the way of providing winter feed, hay and so on? Is the pit silo used in that country at all?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, we have not had to resort to a pit silo. The Blood reserves in the West have always had plenty of grass and hay to maintain stock during the winter. Indeed they have sold great quantities of hay during the winter, instead of having the stock consume it. But every year it has been the policy of the department to purchase pure-bred bulls for distribution on these reserves where they are required.

Mr. TOLMIE: What prices has the government to pay in the purchase of these bulls?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We have to buy them in competition at the sales.

Mr. TOLMIE: There is no limit as to price.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We have to pay what the other buyers have to pay.

Mr. FORKE: Will the minister explain that item of $8,145 for the Sioux indians? Nothing is stated except the word "Sioux".

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This is a large number of small items. However I may say in reply to my hon. friend for Prince Albert (Mr. Knox) that we have had many representations made with regard to the Duck Lake school. We know it is in rather a serious condition, but it will probably take ten years to catch up with the construction and improvement of the various schools throughout Canada for Indian education, and we will attend to those just as fast as we can afford to do so.

In reply to my hon. friend for Brandon (Mr. Forke) I would say that the estimate of $8,145 is made up as follows: the Birtle agency got $15 worth of flour, $30 worth of bacon, $10 worth of tea, $1 worth of rice, $1 worth of rolled oats, and medical attendance $75. The Portage la Prairie agency got $30 worth of bacon, $12 worth of flour, $10 worth of tea, $2 worth of rice, medical attendance $200, medicine $150, and $50 was given to relieve unforeseen cases of destitution. The salary of the constable at the Sioux village was $60. Then the Griswold agency item is made up in the same way.

Mr. FORKE: The Sioux Indians are not treaty Indians. They are only getting this as a grant, I think, from the government. I think that grant of $8,000 will probably cover a good deal more than 1,000 Indians. You can figure out how much is coming to an Indian from the government when you consider it in that light. It will be understood that there is no treaty money paid to those Indians, and this is all they get. I think it is therefore plain why the condition of these Indians is such as it is to-day. The government practically does nothing for them. They supply the agent and that is all. The flour and feed that is handed out amounts to nothing. Although they are not treaty Indians, they have lived for 60 years in Manitoba, and I think they are entitled to just about the same treatment as the other Indians in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not know that they get any different treatment from the Indians on the plains.

Mr. FORKE: Do the Saskatchewan Indians not get anything in the way of treaty money?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Five dollars a head.

Mr. FORKE: The Manitoba Indians do not get that.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The Sioux Indians.

Mr. FORKE: No, I do not think so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister read an item for medical services. Is it a fact that the appointment of doctors for the reserves has been taken away from the Civil Service Commission and is once more under patronage?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Not that I know of. There has been no change, so far as I know. If a medical officer is appointed permanently, he is appointed by the Civil Service Commission, but, as formerly, where it is a case only of payment for attendance by the doctor residing in the village, he is paid for the visit.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the case at Portage la Prairie? Which class does he come under?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): He is not a permanent official. He gets $200 and his fees.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So that he is under patronage?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Well, I suppose he is under patronage, if that is the definition of it. But I may tell my hon. friend that that would not be the definition I should place upon it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It very distinctly applies—

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Let me ask my hon. friend this question: If it were necessary to appoint a permanent official he would be appointed by the Civil Service Commission, but if it is not necessary to appoint a permanent official and he is simply paid for his visits, does that indicate that there is patronage?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I was just going to indicate why it was patronage. The minister has fired the incumbent.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): At Portage la Prairie?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I was not aware of that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, and he has appointed another. The incumbent who was there was one of the leading physicians of the town. He was a married man with a family and his two partners were returned soldiers. They had been partners for some time and are still, and the minister has appointed in the place of this man a gentleman who had no connection with the militia or war in his life, so far as I know, nor has he any partner who has had such a connection. In other words, the minister has virtually taken the position from returned soldiers. Of course, he has given it to a leading Liberal, and if such a man could be called eminent the adjective might apply. That is the indication of patronage.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Is the present incumbent not a medical man?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh yes, he is a medical man. I did not dispute the fact of his being a medical man; indeed, I said that he was in a leading position so far as Liberal medical men are concerned.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Then the implication is that a Liberal could not be eminent?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I am not saying that at all. What I am complaining of is that the minister by the exercise of patronage has taken the advantage of the work from men who were entitled to it under what is supposed to be government policy, or at least is alleged to be such, of giving the preference to returned men. That is what I complain of. Does the minister think that is right? If so, on whose recommendation was it done? Perhaps I should apologize for asking any question about Portage la Prairie.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I was going to ask the hon. gentleman if he was speaking on behalf of the people of Portage la Prairie or on behalf of the representative of the district.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am speaking for the public, the great people. Will the minister let me know why that was done and on whose recommendation.

Mr. FORKE: I would suggest that we send for the member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader).

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I cannot answer my hon. friend because apparently any changes of this character must of necessity, in the opinion of hon. gentlemen, be changes brought about by patronage.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It looks like it.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I may say to my hon. friend however that there was good and sufficient reason for the change, although I have no recollection now of its having been made. Undoubtedly I am responsible for it. but I cannot give any information in regard to the matter because I do not now recollect how it came about. It is very evident, of course, that it was not brought about at the request of my hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Perhaps the other representative asked for the change?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Do the minister's officials not know any reason why a medical man who was giving good service was dismissed?

Mr. McBRIDE: I might say a word in connection with a medical man appointed in my district.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We had better get through with this one first.

Mr. McBRIDE: I might inform the committee that one of my strongest opponents, a lifelong Conservative, was appointed and no one had any objection to offer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Can the minister not ascertain any reasons at all for the change that was made in this case? Are we not entitled to know whether or not the public interest was considered in the matter, or whether the change was made from purely party interest? What is the House for if the minister can simply say he does not know and no one else knows? That does not help us very much.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): All I can say is that I have not been in the habit of dismissing people for partisan purposes. I have no recollection of how the change came about, although I assume that I knew all about it at the time. I assume also that the Indians are getting the same kind of service now that they got in the past. I do not think it is incumbent upon me to give further reasons.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What about the returned soldier phase of the question? Does not that appeal to the minister?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Almost in every case, yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why not in this case?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have already told my hon. friend that I have no recollection of the change having been made, but no doubt it was quite in order and proper. If it was not, why, I have no information to give about it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know why the minister qualifies his remarks with the phrase, "no doubt." Has his deputy no recollection of the change at all? I can scarcely think he has not. I think the change was wrong. I do not want to be understood as complaining about the medical qualifications of the new appointee; not at all. But if the government really consider the returned soldier in matters of this kind, they should not have made that change; and in any event, when they made the change they should have made it so that a returned soldier would get the benefit.

Mr. JACOBS: It might be consoling to the leader of the Opposition to know that firing good men seems to have been epidemic in Portage la Prairie.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is right.

Mr. GOULD: Can we ascertain from the figures given by the minister regarding the total productions of reservations during the past year, which reserve showed the best returns? Are the various amounts given separately? I have in mind the White Bear reserve in my own district, and it seems to me that these Indians should be given better school facilities on the principle laid down by the member for Prince Albert (Mr. Knox). Last year I believe the minister did make visits to many reservations throughout the western country, but I find that the White Bear reservation was passed over. He did not honour that reservation with a visit. There are many things there not altogether connected with the Indians that might come under the department. There are three or four questions correlated to the Indian reservations, such as pleasure resorts and so on, which the department might consider. I might state that on that reservation the Indians have, in my opinion, facilities for production which are better than can be found on the average reservation. They have an open area for the growing of cereals as well as a bush which provides pasturage facilities for the raising of cattle, an industry which the Indians go in for extensively in that locality. The public make one complaint particularly in regard to that reservation. There are large sloughs on which there are vast quantities of hay, but outside of that area there is very little. The white people, when the Indians do not show any desire to put the hay up, endeavour to rent these hay areas from them, but in all cases they have been refused, with the result that hundreds of tons of hay are frozen each year in these sloughs. I do not know whether the minister has any jurisdiction in this matter, or whether the agent is wholly responsible. However, I rose merely to say a word for these Indians. I think it would be found, if the various returns were segregated, that per capita the White Bear reserve stands well to the head of the list in the matter of production; and when Indians show such a state of progress I think they should be given greater consideration in the way of school facilities than is evident now in the quality of the buildings that are to be found on that reservation. While I am about it I wish to extend to the minister a hearty invitation to come this summer and pay this reservation a visit.

Mr. KNOX: Is there any expenditure on what is known as the Round Plain band of Sioux Indians north of Prince Albert?

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We have an expenditure in the Carleton agency of $552 in respect of that particular band.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister contemplate any reorganization of his department in the West? Has he in mind any change of status of any of the inspectors out there?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Not at the moment. The inspectors appear to be doing good work. I speak particularly of the two who operate from Regina. I think some change might be made which would be beneficial to the service, but I have not arrived at a definite conclusion about it yet.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would like to say this, and it has to do with what the hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) impressed upon the minister a few moments ago in relation to the improvement and the multiplication of cattle upon the reserves and the general farming success of the Indians. Every thing, or nearly everything, depends upon the efficiency, energy and fidelity of the agent. Our Indian agents are appointed by the Civil Service Commission, and I think, taken all through, the commission are as likely to get efficient agents as the minister would be if the appointments were made in his hands—in fact more so. They are just as liable to make a mistake—no more so; but they are not subject to the same pressure to apponit some one who is not efficient. But unless there is an official of extraordinary competence, and not only a good judge of the success or failure of an agent, but with the backbone to see that the agent does his work or, if not, to recommend to the minister that his services be dispensed with, there will not be any multiplication of Indian stock and there will not be any improvement of Indian farming. I have in mind, of course Mr. Graham. I learned to know something of the actual work of Mr. Graham in that regard, and the minister is very fortunate indeed in having a man who has the mastery over agencies that Mr. Graham has. An agent who fails should be discharged, because a whole lot results from his failure, and consequently there should be no principle of mercy whatever in dealing with him.

An agent ought to succeed or he ought to be discharged. The minister himself cannot, nor can a deputy or anyone else in Ottawa, be a correct judge of the work of an agent. You can tell a lot, I know, from the reports sent here, but it is only by being in constant touch with the reserves themselves that the quality of the agent's work can be gauged. This work is under observation from month to month and from year to year by the inspector, and the agent is aware of this and knows the inspector is going to visit him. Unless that is the case there is likely to be lassitude and lethargy on the part of the agent and poor results will follow. That is the suggestion I make to the minister.

He states there has been a diminution of Indian stock in the last ten years. I believe that is correct. But what I think is also correct is that up to the time the jurisdiction of Mr. Graham was extended, about five or six years ago, the diminution had gone on pretty rapidly. In certain agencies where effective men were in charge, and as the drones were one by one moved away and better men put in their places, there was an improvement in cattle production. I do not know what the result has been this last year or two. I would not think the improvement had continued, because, as everyone knows, there has been a general diminution of stock all over the West, and the Indians may have had the same experience as others; the depression may have operated among them with the same result as it has operated among the white people. But, subject to that consideration, there was an improvement for some little time, and the minister will never be able to continue the improvement or advance upon it unless he succeeds in weeding out poor agents and getting efficient men in their stead.

Item agreed to.

British Columbia, $269,850.

Mr. MacKELVIE: What has been done regarding the appointment of an inspector of agencies in southern British Columbia to succeed the late Major McGraw?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is still before the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MacKELVIE: And Kamloops?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The same.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is the explanation of the increase of $2,730?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Statutory increases of salaries to the officials.

Mr. LADNER: How many Indians are at present in jail on account of pot-latching?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am informed there are not any.

Mr. LADNER: I saw by the press a few days ago that Magistrate Halliday of Alert Bay had sent down some Indians.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil: We have no report.

Item agreed to.

General, $147,500.

Mr. JACOBS: I do not know whether under this item I can ask the minister respecting the sensational reports that appeared in the newspapers a few days ago regarding the expulsion of certain halfbreeds from Caughnawaga reserve near Montreal. It was reported that some of these people who had been living for a considerable time on the reserve were expelled without notice and were becoming public charges on the adjoining municipalities.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have rather a lengthy report on this matter. The purport of it is that a white man married a native woman on the reserve, and an arrangement was made with the Indian father-in-law under which the white man undertook to maintain him in return for a lease of his holding. This arrangement the white man did not carry out to the satisfaction of the father-in-law, who wished to have the agreement cancelled. The outcome was that the council of the Caughnawaga Indians took action by resolution asking for the removal of the white man from the reserve, and in compliance with that request a constable was sent down to remove the man. In the meantime he disappeared across the boundary and unfortunately his wife and children, who by marriage forfeited their right to remain on the reserve, had to be ejected at the request of the council. That is all that happened; there was nothing sensational about it. It was merely carrying out the request of the council itself. There is no intention of going any further with the matter or of removing anybody else.

Mr. JACOBS: The newspaper report was highly sensational; it stated that about 2,000 people were ejected by this expulsion.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): I notice in this item the sum of $50,000, payments to Indians surrendering their lands under certain provisions of the Indian Act. In connection with the St. Regis reservation, certain islands in the river St. Lawrence were held under long-term leases, which in the last few years have expired. What islands are there in the St. Lawrence near the St. Regis reservation the leases of which have expired, and what is the policy of the department in that connection?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This question is before the courts for decision and in the meanwhile we cannot give a very direct reply.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): What islands are involved in the controversy?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We have not that information, but we shall be glad to get it for my hon. friend and send it to him to-morrow.

Item agreed to.

Indians—Indian education, $1,943,702.

Mr. MANION: Would the minister explain the increase of over half a million dollars?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This appropriation is for buildings, and includes the following: new school building at Edmonton, $145,000; Blood reserve, residential school, conducted under the auspices of the Church of England, to be rebuilt at a cost of $125,000. Coqualeetza industrial school, improvements, $115,000. This institution has had a most successful career under the auspices of the Methodist church; it enjoys popularity among the Protestant Indians in British Columbia. Keeseekouse, a Roman Catholic school which has been closed for some years is to be reopened at an expenditure of $40,000. We are spending on St. Mary's mission school, British Columbia, $20,000. Birtle school, at Birtle, Manitoba, new wing, $15,000; Cross Lake, northern Manitoba, addition to main building, $10,000; Portage la Prairie, additions to main building, $5,000. We are also constructing barns at a number of the schools. There are also two items, one of $35,000 and one of $27,000, with which it is proposed to purchase, from the Roman Catholic and Presbyterian churches, two Indian residential schools in Saskatchewan. These buildings are adequately equipped and modern in every respect.

Mr. MANION: The minister spoke of a school being reopened. How did the Indians get along without that school, and why is it that just at the present time it requires to be opened? I am only asking for information.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There have been a number of cases in which day schools have been found to be entirely ineffective because you could not get an attendance. That applies in connection with the reopening of this particular school. The department attempted to carry on the educational work on some of these reserves by day school, but it was found that proper results could not be obtained except by the boarding school method.

Mr. MANION: The teachers are mostly white girls and men, are they not?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes. They are practically all qualified teachers.

Mr. MANION: Some of the Indians have taken teachers' courses and are teaching in the schools?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Some in Ontario, but none in the West.

Mr. MANION: The cost of building materials is now from 60 to 70 per cent in excess of pre-war prices. There is no doubt that within the next two or three years these prices will drop very considerably. In many parts of Canada both private and corporation building is being held up for that very reason, and I was wondering whether, by occupying other buildings temporarily for a time, there could not be a great saving to the country by not proceeding with these building operations just now. I do not suppose the prices will ever come down to a pre-war basis, but they will undoubtedly be reduced by 30 or 40 per cent in the next two or three years. It would be well worth while, I should think, for the minister and his department to consider holding these buildings up for the present, when costs are so very high.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have exactly the same ideas as my hon. friend, but this is an acute situation. I have pointed out to the committee that not since the beginning of the war have any improvements been made to any appreciable extent to any of these buildings. As to the building at Kamloops I am sure my hon. friend would not house his stock in the building there in which they are attempting to carry on educational work, and I think my hon. friend for Calgary will bear me out in that. I examined the building myself. Many of these appropriations that I am asking for so far as buildings are concerned are being asked for because the buildings are absolutely tumbling down. I have no reason to doubt the word received by letter from a good Catholic priest who is doing a splendid work in northern British Columbia when he declares that the building there will not stand for another year, that the work has been put off repeatedly and the school is likely to fall down upon them at any time. I did not see that building myself, but having seen some of the others I am willing to take his word for it. In the case of Edmonton, the Red Deer school has been closed with the promise of a school at Edmonton, and we have to provide the accommodation. All these are cases of the utmost urgency or I would not have asked for these appropriations.

Mr. MANION: I quite understand the minister's position, and I do not doubt his word for a moment. I also quite understand that in some outlying sections, say in northern British Columbia, it may not be possible to get other quarters temporarily, but it would seem to me that in a large city like Edmonton it should not be very difficult to obtain temporary quarters in which to carry on until the prices of materials come down and the buildings could be built more cheaply. I do not intend to raise any further objection, but I would suggest to the minister that in the larger centres such as Edmonton, where no doubt temporary quarters could be obtained in which to carry on this school work, the department should postpone erecting buildings until prices reach something like a normal figure. I do not want to suggest, because a little while ago I was taking the part of the Indians in a general way, depriving them of the necessary education they require. I would be the last to do that, but I believe that under certain circumstances and in certain centres the same education might be given in temporary quarters until such time as prices reach a normal level.

Mr. McBRIDE: I have been engaged in the building supplies trade for twenty-five years and I can see no prospect of building material coming down. When you talk about building material coming down I say that expenses and taxes have got to come down first. In pre-war days my taxes at Vancouver were less than $1,100. Now they are over $12,000, and that has to be added to the cost of the material. That is only one item. Indeed I can see no chance of building material coming down.

Mr. MANION: I admit that what my hon. friend says about building material is true to a certain extent at any rate but wages are being paid to-day which are materially higher than we paid before the war and I hope for the sake of this country that even the cost of materials may come down and that at least wages will come down below one dollar an hour which is being paid to certain trades at the present time. I hope that will happen for the good of the country, and I think it will happen in the next few years. I have had the privilege recently of reading the opinions of men who have given this question life-long study, and it is their opinion and advice in the case of any large buildings involving a considerable expenditure to wait for prices to come down.

Mr. JACOBS: Change your immigration regulations and then I think you can go on with the work.

Mr. MANION: They are not mine.

Mr. WARNER: While I have sympathy with the position taken by my hon. friend for Fort William, I happen to know the conditions at Edmonton. It is almost impossible at the present time to get quarters for the white children in the city, and it would be impossible to get any quarters in the city of Edmonton for an Indian school. I believe that it would be the part of wisdom to postpone expenditure on buildings where temporary quarters could be obtained, but this cannot be done at Edmonton. They have carried on under such difficulties that I believe the department is justified in going ahead and building this school for the Indians who have been moved to Edmonton from the old Red Deer school.

Mr. JACOBS: Would the minister explain why the change is being made from Red Deer to Edmonton?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I cannot give my hon. friend full information because it was done prior to my coming into office, but I am told that the reason was in part that Edmonton was more central, easier of access and better for the children.

Mr. JACOBS: I thought it was perhaps for the same reason that Sam Hughes ordered the arsenal to be brought from Quebec to Lindsay.

Item agreed to.

Indian Affairs—salaries, $149,380; contingencies, $19,000.

Mr. BANCROFT: Will the minister explain the increase in this item?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is made up purely of statutory increases. There is no change in the number of officials.

Item agreed to.

Further Supplementary Estimates, 1923—Department of Indian Affairs—salaries—

To provide for one Accountant, Grade 3, at $2,580 in lieu of one Accountant, Grade 2, at $2,460	$ 120 00
To provide for one Accountant, Grade 1, at $1,620, in lieu of one Senior Clerk-Book-keeper at $1,560	60 00
To provide for one Senior Clerk-Book-keeper at $1,380, in lieu of one Clerk-Book-keeper at $1,110	270 00
To provide for one Senior Law Clerk-Stenographer at $1,365, in lieu of one Law Clerk-Stenographer at $1,320	45 00
Contingencies—further amount required	1,000 00

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): Are these permanent employees?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, they are nearly all temporaries. Increases are being provided by the Civil Service Commission as follows: $120, $60, $270 and $45.

Item agreed to.

SOLDIERS' CIVIL RE-ESTABLISHMENT

Pensions—European War and Active Militia, $32,500,000.

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): I suppose that hon. members would like to have a few statistics placed before them as to the number of pensioners and other matters.

Mr. MANION: May I interrupt the minister for a moment. I do not know whether my point will be well taken or not but this is one of the paramount questions before the country to-day. There is also the fact that a royal commission has been sitting and taking evidence in the matter of pensions, and its interim report has not been altogether favourable. I am just suggesting this to the minister in the interest of his own department, in the interest of publicity and in the interest of making the soldiers throughout the country understand the conditions: I suggest that he might hold this item over and make a statement regarding pensions—giving the statistics he wishes to give and explaining any regulations which may have been changed—before a larger House, and perhaps earlier in the day, when the discussion would receive a certain amount of publicity which it would not get to-night. I say that in the interest of the minister himself and of his department. I suggest that it would be well to hold up this item until we can get a report from the royal commission which is sitting. Would the minister mind telling me if he is expecting to have the final report of the royal commission shortly?

Mr. BELAND: The interim report of the commission was laid on the table some two or three weeks ago, and it deals with pensions and the Returned Soldiers Insurance Act. No feature of the Pension Act will be referred to in the final report whenever it is submitted. It is somewhat doubtful whether the commission will be in a position to submit that report before the session is over. What I consider to be the main portion of the commission's report—that is the part which bears upon pensions and returned soldiers insurance—is dealt with extensively in the report that has been brought down. I have no objection at all to postponing the consideration of this item, but may I point out that in consequence of the recommendations made by the commissioners regarding pensions and insurance, amendments to the Pension Act and to the Returned Soldiers Insurance Act will have to be introduced into this House before the end of the session. Then, of course, full opportunity will be given for hon. gentlemen to discuss the report. The estimate which is now submitted for consideration was prepared under the direction of the Board of Pension Commissioners for the year 1923-24. I hardly think this would be the proper occasion to discuss the Pension Act. The proper time, if I may be permitted to express the view, would be when the amendments to the Pension Act are introduced.

Mr. MANION: May I further interrupt the minister for a moment? I would agree with him to a certain extent except that when the amendments to the Pension Act are introduced it will probably be—so far as one can see now—towards the last of the session. Suppose the session should be over by the end of May; some of us think it may be over by that time.

Mr. GRAHAM: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: I am expressing my personal opinion.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am too.

Mr. MANION: Suppose the session should be over by that time, then the amendments to the Pension Act would be brought in probably in the dying days of the session, as the favorite expression is, and would probably be rushed through in such a manner that there would not be an adequate opportunity for the discussion which may be desired upon this question. If the minister will look around he will see that the vast majority of the members are not present, and I do not suppose there is any member who does not wish to mention perhaps some particular suggestion regarding pensions—I should think at least, that one-half the members of the House may have some remarks to make upon the subject—and I would like to suggest to the minister, while I will not hold the item up otherwise—that it would be wise to delay this matter. After all, this is the item upon which members should discuss pensions in general—not the Pension Act but pensions in general. I would therefore suggest to him that he should hold the item over until there is a fuller attendance of members. I would remind him that there are a number of committees sitting to-night, notably the Banking and Commerce committee which is considering the Bank Act. This committee requires the attendance of a large number of members and will be sitting for some time yet.

Mr. RINFRET: It will probably sit until about the end of the session.

Mr. MANION: Possibly. A better opportunity for bringing this matter up would be earlier in the day when there is a much better attendance of members. I suggest that in all fairness to hon. gentlemen the minister would be well advised to hold this question over and in the meantime go on with some other item.

Mr. HUMPHREY: There has already been one report submitted by the commission appointed to investigate certain charges against the pension commissioners, and as that report has not yet been printed and circulated I would also respectfully urge the minister to hold this estimate over until those of us who desire to do so have had the opportunity of digesting it. Personally I would like to go into the report of the commission thoroughly with a view of bringing out certain suggestions regarding the vote that is before us tonight. I would respectfully urge the minister to defer this item as I am well aware there are many hon. members, some of whom are not now present, who wish to go into the question very fully.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should also like to join in the request which has been addressed to the minister. I have had resolutions forwarded to me by the Great War Veterans' Association in my own constituency relative to this matter and I cannot intelligently present their views until I have the report of the commission before me.

Mr. BELAND: I have not the remotest desire to curtail the discussion on the question of pensions. On the contrary I invite the fullest discussion, the fullest expression of opinion; I think it would be beneficial to the department generally. On the other hand if those hon. members who are now present take this opportunity of expressing their views it would occupy us until pretty late this evening. The only reason, I think, that can be invoked for not proceeding with the estimate at the present time is the fact that hon. members have not been able to peruse the report that has been laid on the Table, owing to its not having been printed and distributed yet. That will be done, I presume, within probably a week. I have no objection at all to holding this item over till later in the session. I am an old member of the House and hon. members may take my word for it that the nearer we get to the end of the session the less time is devoted to the discussion of questions which are of general interest to the members.

10 p.m.

Mr. MANION: The statement the minister has made gives exactly the reason that I desire to adjourn the discussion on this item because his proposition was that we should carry this item and then have the discussion on the amendment to the Pension Act, which will probably not come till later in the session. My suggestion would be—and I have no desire to hold up the item—that at the closing of the House on some particular day, the minister tell us that he will go on with this item the next time we are in Committee of Supply. The members who are attending the Banking and Commerce committee will be aware of the fact that the question of pensions is to come up on the following day, and if they do not choose to come in and discuss anything they wish to discuss, it is their responsibility.

Mr. BELAND: May I ask whether to-morrow would suit the hon. member?

Mr. MANION: It would suit me quite well.

Mr. SHAW: I want to join most heartily with those who are anxious to get the report of this special commission before discussing the pension matters. I have not seen an exact copy of the report, but I have seen little sections here and there. I think it is highly important that we should have that report in our hands and have an opportunity of perusing it before this particular item can be discussed intelligently, and I would, therefore, suggest that the matter be left over until we have an opportunity of perusing that report.

Mr. BELAND: This is a reasonable request after all, and I hope the report will be distributed within ten days or possibly a week. As soon as members have had time to peruse it, we will submit the item for the consideration of this House. I would move that the consideration of this item be postponed.

Motion agreed to.

Item stands.

Marine Hospitals, including grants to institutions assisting sailors—further amount required, $20,000.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister give us an explanation of the item?

Mr. BELAND: This supplementary amount is required for the last fiscal year. The amount voted last year was $95,000. Hon. members will probably remember that, when we passed the main estimates of the Health department this session, we provided for an amount of $115,000 for, I think, marine hospitals. We found that we were short about $20,000. The amount is made up of unpaid accounts, $10,000; salaries of port physicians, $5,200; and estimated amount of account for hospital treatment, etc., that will be used before March 31, $5.172. The reason for the additional amount is the increase in the number of vessels which call at the different ports and consequently the larger number of sick mariners who have had to be attended to, hospitalized and cared for. Referring only to the number of vessels which call at Grosse Isle, below Quebec, during the year 1922, we had 903 vessels calling there from foreign ports or from ports from another province, which means the same under the Shipping Act, and in the year previous only 709 vessels had called at that quarantine station. There is a difference of 200 at Grosse Isle. But all over the country the number of ships has increased, and that is the reason why $20,000 is required for the fiscal year just ended.

Mr. STEVENS: This has to do with the sick mariners dues?

Mr. BELAND: Yes. The amount of course is paid in to the Receiver General.

Item agreed to.

Salaries and contingent expenses of the Board of Pension Commissioners for Canada—additional amount required, $2,000.

Mr. BELAND: This is a small amount required by the Board of Pension Commissioners for contingent expenses during the fiscal year.

Item agreed to.

Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment—Unemployment Relief—further amount required to provide assistance to unemployed Pensioners and to their dependents in the amounts and under the conditions laid down by the Governor in Council in Order in Council P.C. 721, dated March 31, 1922, as amended by Order in Council P.C. 911, dated May 3, 1922, and amendments thereto; and to provide for salaries and other expenses of administering the provisions of said Orders in Council, $400,000.

Mr. MANION: Will the minister explain that item?

Mr. BELAND: This covers the relief that is extended to returned soldiers who come under the supervision of the department. In other words, it is relief extended to pensioners or disabled soldiers entitled to receive a pension. The amount is greatly reduced from the vote of the previous year. In 1921-22, $2,100,000 had been voted for the unemployment relief of disabled soldiers. Out of the appropriation, $1,764,000 in round figures was spent.

[Mr. Beland.]

In the year 1922-23, $500,000 was voted. As in the previous year, the amount was totally inadequate to meet the situation, and at the end of last session $150,000 was voted in the Supplementary Estimates. We find that $400,000 more will be required to cover the expenditure of the year ended 31st March last. In other words the total amount required will be $1,050,000. The amount actually expended is $1,019,000 a reduction over the previous year of about $740,000. I do not know whether the hon. member wants to know by unit the amount expended.

Mr. MANION: Yes, but there is another point. Has the minister any figures regarding the number of soldiers who were unemployed during the past winter as compared with the year before? I know that the number was smaller because there was less unemployment generally.

Mr. BELAND: For the year 1921-22 the total number of times men were granted relief was 132,597; in 1922-23 it was 71,175, a considerable reduction. Giving round numbers, the amount spent in Montreal for 1922-23 was $191,000; Halifax, $57,000; Ottawa, which is a unit, $38,000; Toronto, $427,000; London, Ontario, $20,000; Winnipeg, $73,000; Regina, $18,000; Calgary, $43,000; Vancouver, $101,000; St. John, which is a sub-unit, $25,000.

Mr. MANION: Has the minister any figures in that connection for Port Arthur or Fort William?

Mr. BELAND: I have not those details; they are included in Winnipeg unit, $73,000.

Mr. MANION: As a matter of fact, I do not think there was any expenditure there, but I wanted to find out definitely. I may be wrong, but I do not think there was any expenditure.

Mr. BELAND: I am ready to accept my hon. friend's word.

Mr. MANION: The minister did not give me the number of men who were unemployed during the past winter.

Mr. BELAND: The figures I have would apply only to disabled pensioners. I have given the total original issues of relief.

Mr. MANION: The minister, I take it, has not the figures in reference to the unemployed soldiers who were not disabled.

Mr. BELAND: No, I have not got that.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Did I understand the minister to say that a little over half a million was spent last year for relief?

Mr. BELAND: I said $1,019,000; that was for the year just ended March 31st.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): What proportion of that went for administration?

Mr. BELAND: In round numbers, $55,000. I may point out that all the men employed in the extension of this unemployment relief are returned men, mostly disabled. This is the way in which we extend the relief; we employ the men.

Mr. STEVENS: Does this item include the assistance given to the Red Cross Society? There is a place in Vancouver where provision is made for a number of disabled soldiers. Does this item include a grant to that institution?

Mr. BELAND: The hon. member is referring to the workshops?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. BELAND: No; that matter was provided for in the Main Estimates.

Mr. MANION: Did the item of nearly a million dollars in the Main Estimates carry? This is a supplementary estimate.

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What is being done by the government in the way of securing employment for returned men? I know that in British Columbia during the past winter a large number of disabled returned men were out of employment and some of the newspapers found it necessary to put on a campaign for the purpose of securing work for them. The campaign was fairly successful and it showed what can be done in that direction. In former years under the previous government I believe that the minister's department took active steps in this connection and did endeavour to secure employment for returned men, particularly those who were disabled. Is the present government continuing that work, and if so, what is it doing?

Mr. BELAND: Up to a recent date employment was secured for disabled soldiers through our own offices in every unit in Vancouver, Calgary, Regina, Winnipeg, London, Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal, Halifax, and St. John. We have decided to hand over this section of our work to the government employment bureau in every province. At present in British Columbia, which perhaps interests my hon. friend more than any other province, the provincial employment office has a handicap section whose duties consist in procuring employment exclusively for disabled soldiers who make application there. From that handicap section a man goes out and covers the ground as completely as possible with a view to finding a job that will fit in with the disability of the particular applicant. This we think works more satisfactorily than the previous system because naturally the employers would place their request for labour in the employment office of the province; and each province is willing to have a handicap section in its midst. Every job is first of all offered to disabled soldiers. If a disabled soldier is qualified to take the position, he is of course awarded it. We make it a point to give the preference to returned men. This I think works out quite satisfactorily.

Mr. BOYS: This vote takes care of the situation to the 31st March last?

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Mr. BOYS: Have there been any requests for relief since that date?

Mr. BELAND: Yes. It is covered in the Main Estimates, but there is a decrease of $150,000.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): What do the two orders in council refer to?

Mr. BELAND: These orders in council were passed last year, one to extend the relief in the month of April, and the other in the month of May. The relief ceased during the summer months.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Does the Dominion government contribute to the expense of keeping up the provincial employment offices?

Mr. BELAND: That is mainly a question for the Minister of Labour to answer, but I think I am within the mark when I say that 50 per cent is contributed for the upkeep of these offices. As far as the handicap section is concerned, we as a department pay the whole cost.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What supervision has the Dominion government over the employment officers of the province to see whether they are carrying out their duties satisfactorily?

Mr. BELAND: In every unit we have special officials to attend to this supervision. I am not able to speak for the Labour department, but I presume they have their representatives also in every capital.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What is meant by every unit?

Mr. BELAND: The Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment has a unit in most of our important cities, including Vancouver, Calgary, Regina, Winnipeg, London, Toronto, Montreal and Halifax, and sub units at Victoria and St. John, N.B.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Does the minister get reports from these units?

Mr. BELAND: By all means, and very often, too.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Are these reports available?

Mr. BELAND: Any public document is available for any hon. member. All he has to do is to make a motion for its production. If my hon. friend wants to see these reports, and will go to the department, I am sure he will be afforded every facility for their inspection.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH

Civil Government—Health—salaries, $152,950; contingencies, $70,400.

Mr. MANION: What is the increase in this item?

Mr. BELAND: There is really no increase. It will be seen on referring to page 88 that there is a reduction of $600 in the contingencies. In civil government the increase is $5,642.50, made up as follows: Statutory increases $3,822.50; promotions and adjustments, $1,220; one temporary clerk—heretofore paid out of contingencies—now made permanent and paid from the civil government vote, $600. We have not one more employee in the department than we had last year.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): What particular work is done by the department?

Mr. BELAND: I think my hon. friend must have been out of the House when I passed my main estimates. I then gave in detail the work of the department. We look after the supervision of all the quarantine stations, the medical inspection of immigrants, and the adminstration of the Food and Drugs Act, the Opium and Narcotic Drugs Act, the Housing Act, and we are engaged in other activities as well.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): I notice that some of what the minister describes as statutory increases are increases of $240, $260, and in one case $360. Surely those are not statutory increases?

Mr. BELAND: We could not pay them any other way. I have no authority to grant an increase to any permanent employee in my department; he must be classified by the Civil Service Commission and receive the salary attaching to his position. I am sorry I cannot give my hon. friend the details in each case, but I think the increase varies in proportion to salary. $240 is an ordinary statutory increase for a certain salary.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): I think possibly I am right, Mr. Chairman, in thinking these increases are not statutory. I notice here one principal clerk at $2,400. This must be a promotion?

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): Some of these are promotions?

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): The department is responsible for the promotions, but the Civil Service Commission is responsible for the statutory increases; is that the way it works out?

Mr. BELAND: No promotion can be granted an employee unless the Civil Service Commission vouches for it.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): Exactly; but the department asks for it in the first place?

Mr. BELAND: I think the employee asks for it.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): Does the employee get an increase when he asks for it?

Mr. BELAND: If an employee has been in the service for say, thirteen, fourteen or fifteen years, and at the age of forty, say, has reached his maximum of perhaps $1,600, and he asks to be promoted to a higher class, that is a legitimate ambition for any man in the service. Then if he qualifies to the satisfaction of the Civil Service Commission he is promoted to another class and gets a yearly increase until he reaches his maximum.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): I notice that the statutory increase involves a certain relatively small sum each year, but promotion may involve anywhere from $200 to $300 or even more. I quite understand the minister's explanation, but is there any rule which the department follows under which an employee who has served a certain length of time is entitled to promotion if there is a vacancy in the class above?

Mr. BELAND: I do not know that there is any specific time. The deputy head would in such a case make a recommendation to the minister that a certain employee who had rendered faithful service and had been at his maximum salary for a number of years should be promoted. That is submitted to the commission, and if they approve they classify him accordingly and he gets the higher salary; if not, he remains where he is. I know of cases where civil servants have applied for promotion and the application has been refused.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): Were any of these promotions made by transfer to the higher grades from other departments, that is, other than within the department itself?

Mr. BELAND: No.

Mr. HUMPHREY: Do I understand the minister to say that this department has charge of the Housing Act?

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY: What are the duties of that branch at the present time?

Mr. BELAND: I have not the details before me; that explanation was given when the main estimates were under consideration. It is one of the smaller activities of the department.

Mr. ARTHURS: How many officials administer the Housing Act?

Mr. BELAND: I do not believe we have any outside the accountant.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What proportion of employees in the Health department are returned men?

Mr. BELAND: I am unable to say. The department, of course, comes under the Civil Service Commission. As my hon. friend is aware, under the Civil Service Act preference is given first to returned men, disabled men being given the first consideration. This rule, I think, is applied strictly to my department whenever we have an appointment to make, but very few appointments are being made at this time.

Item agreed to.

TRADE AND COMMERCE

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions—Atlantic ocean—Canada and Newfoundland, steam service or services between, $35,000.

Mr. GARDINER: I suggest that the minister allow this item to stand. Certain members are much interested in these matters and would like to discuss them; they were unaware that the minister's estimates would be brought forward to-night.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Trade and Commerce): It was intimated last evening that these estimates would come up to-day. I would like to make some progress: If there are any special matters that hon. members wish to discuss they can deal with them subsequently on items which we will hold over for the purpose. I imagine we will not get through them all to-night.

Mr. McBRIDE: I do not see why these items should be held over simply because certain members do not feel like attending here regularly. It is the duty of every member to be in the House when estimates come up.

Mr. CALDWELL: I believe the Banking and Commerce committee is sitting this evening, and a large number of members are in attendance. I just came from there myself.

Mr. STEVENS: There are no new items, are there?

Mr. ROBB: If we come to any new items they can stand.

Mr. STEVENS: I have looked over the first page and there do not appear to be any new items. If the minister will make an explanation of these, and, as is the custom, reserve an item so that any points that come up may be discussed later, that seems to me to be a reasonable way of dealing with the matter.

Mr. GARDINER: The committee could very well proceed with items 179 and following, "local services."

Item stands.

Local services—Charlottetown and Pictou, steam service between, $8,000.

Mr. ARTHURS: Steamship rates and all prices along that line have been falling during the last two years, but the government are apparently asking for the same sum this year at last. Is there no reduction in any of these items on this account?

Mr. ROBB: In most cases the amount is the same as last year. As a matter of fact, representations were made that in some cases the amount should be increased. With respect to this particular item, No. 179, I imagine we shall have to give an increase for that service. They lost some money last year, in fact they have been losing money for a number of years, and were going to discontinue the service.

Mr. ARTHURS: Is that true of all these services?

Mr. ROBB: No, very few of them.

Mr. ARTHURS: Are these various services under contract with the steamship companies at a specific sum?

Mr. ROBB: These local services that we have under consideration are under contract renewed from year to year and subject to the amount being voted by parliament.

Mr. ARTHURS: Does that apply to all these items?

Mr. ROBB: No, to some of these local items. These services are largely to provide transportation for Canadian citizens who have no railways to serve them, and it is very much cheaper for the country to provide this service than it would be to build railways for them.

Mr. BROWN: Does this include carrying the mails?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, the mails are carried free.

Mr. ARTHURS: The minister's previous remark would apply only to certain services, not to the Canada-New Zealand service, Prince Rupert and San Francisco, and so on. Are these also under contract from year to year?

Mr. ROBB: Those items are standing for further consideration.

Mr. ARTHURS: They are all under the same heading and I was just asking for information.

Mr. ROBB: Some of these contracts run for a number of years.

Item agreed to.

Grand Manan and the mainland, steam service between, $15,000.

Mr. ARTHURS: What is the population of Grand Manan approximately?

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Are these steamships privately owned?

Mr. ROBB: Privately owned.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Can the government's boats not be used on any of these services?

Mr. ROBB: Not many of the government boats are suitable for these services.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): What were the Canadian Government Merchant Marine boats built for? They do not seem suitable for anything.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is in part correct with regard to some of the smaller vessels. Some of them are hardly suitable for upper lake traffic or for coast traffic.

Answering my hon. friend for Parry Sound, I have not the figures but my recollection is that the population of these islands is about 7,000.

Mr. ARTHURS: My recollection is that it is very much under 4,000, and at that figure it would mean that we are paying $4 a head for this sevice, which to my mind seems excessive.

Mr. ROBB: Even if my hon friend is correct and there are only 4,000 Canadian citizens on these islands producing products, does he think the government should not provide transportation for them?

Mr. ARTHURS: I do not suggest that for a moment, but I think $15,000 is quite a large amount, and we have many places in Canada where there are 4,000 Canadian citizens who do not get as good a mail service.

Mr. GARDINER: The minister remarked just now that there were four or five thousand people in this particular district that required transportation. Does the minister mean to apply that same principle to the outlying parts of northern Ontario, Quebec and the Northwest Territories, where people are living fifty and sixty and one hundred miles from a railway?

Mr. ROBB: Generally speaking it has been the policy of governments in the past to provide transportation so far as possible for its citizens. These people are among the oldest settlers in Canada and are living in probably the oldest part of Canada. They are somewhat differently situated from people on the mainland. They live on islands or along the coast.

Mr. ARTHURS: Does the minister say that this amount is for the purpose of providing transportation facilities for these people? The estimate is for post office and mail service.

Mr. ROBB: These ships carry the mails free.

Mr. ARTHURS: Then this $15,000 is to provide transportation for these people on the island?

Mr. ROBB: For the transportation of their products and carrying the mails.

Mr. ARTHURS: In other words, as the minister says that they carry the mails free, this item is to provide transportation for these people back and forth to the mainland. How does that come under the Post Office Department?

Mr. ROBB: It is part of the contract that in addition to providing transportation for the products of the district the mails and a certain number of government officials shall be carried free.

Mr. ARTHURS: I cannot for the life of me see how an estimate should be required for the post office when the mails are being carried free, and I do not see why this amount should be asked for providing mail service for this particular district when other people in other districts have to go in some cases a hundred miles without any subsidy.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not mean to imply that these people should not be supplied with transportation facilities. I am satisfied that they should have some means of communication provided, but I maintain still that it is just as essential that people who are living, and have been for twenty or twenty-five years, from sixty to eighty miles from a railway should receive equal consideration. That is the point I desire to make.

Mr. ROBB: It is very reasonable.

Item agreed to.

Halifax and Newfoundland, via Cape Breton ports, steam service between, $5,000.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): How long have these services been going on?

Mr. ROBB: Many of them for a number of years. They are all voted from year to to year; that is the local services.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Have they been going on for twenty or thirty years?

Mr. ROBB: I could not say just how long.

Item agreed to.

Halifax and West Coast of Cape Breton, calling at wayports, steam service between, $6,000.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Is there competition in the case of most of these services? Do the vessels belong to separate companies, or are they largely owned by one company?

Mr. ROBB: The service is performed by different companies although they have an interchange of business; it is arranged that that shall be done. Some of the vessels do not run through to the port of Halifax, others do not run through to Cape Breton, and they may have an interchange of trade so that the shipper can ship right through from one port to the other.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Has the minister any control over rates?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, the rates are subject to the approval of the minister.

Item agreed to.

Mainland and islands of Miscou and Shippegan, service between, $3,300.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I presume part of this money is paid for the carriage of mail alone.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Has the minister, or his department, ever made any estimate as to what would have to be paid for the carriage of mails alone, regardless of what is paid in the form of subsidy?

Mr. ROBB: I do not know that any such estimate has been made. In the case of some of the items I have a record of the amount of mail carried. When we come to one of them I will tell my hon. friend what that record is.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Yes that would give us an idea.

Item agreed to.

Mulgrave and Canso, steam service between, $13,500.

Mr. BANCROFT: This seems to be a large amount for a service across the strait between these two points?

Mr. ROBB: This service is from Mulgrave to Canso. There are certain deductions made when the vessel does not make the regular trips specified. Now here is a record in connection with this service. In 1914 they carried 3,724 bags of mail. In 1922 they carried 6,183 bags of mail.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is this a daily service?

Mr. ROBB: A daily service.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The minister's answer, I think, is very satisfactory. It shows that quite an appreciable amount of the subsidy would have been paid for the carriage of mail if paid on that basis.

Item agreed to.

Mulgrave and Guysboro, calling at intermediate ports, steam service between, $9,500.

Mr. ROBB: This service indicates that we have been carrying all along from 1,783 to 3,000 bags of mail.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Who owns the boat?

Mr. ROBB: The Elaine Steamship Company, Limited, of Halifax.

Mr. BOYS: On what basis is the subsidy granted, on a basis of so much per mile per trip?

Mr. ROBB: On a basis of so much a season with a penalty clause. If they do not make the number of trips specified they are penalized.

Mr. BOYS: I mean comparing one service with another. The vote for one service is $9,000, on another $8,000, on another $6,000 and so on.

Mr. ROBB: The services are arranged on a basis of getting the work done as cheaply as we can. The same contractors have been doing this work for a period of years; it is very seldom there is a change. Sometimes the contractor fails and we have to advertise for new tenders, or make the best arrangement possible in order to provide a service.

Mr. BOYS: Are the contracts for a period of years or yearly?

Mr. ROBB: These contracts are all signed each year and are subject to the vote of parliament.

Item agreed to.

Pelee Island and the mainland, steam service between, $11,000.

Mr. BOYS: There ought to be lots of traffic there?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, there is some traffic there.

Mr. BOYS: That is where most of the Ontario native wine comes from, is it not?

Mr. ROBB: I am told it is very good wine.

Mr. BOYS: Oh, excellent.

Item agreed to.

Pictou, New Glasgow and Antigonish county ports schooner service between, $1,500.

Mr. CHURCH: I understand that these vessels which get subsidies from the Dominion are privately owned and that there is no control over the rates which they charge. In view of the evidence which has been brought out before the commis-
11 p.m. sion which was inquiring into matters of shipping on the Great Lakes, is it the intention of the government to have these services and the rates charged by them placed under the control of the Railway Commission?

Mr. ROBB: In view of the subsidy granted by the government the contract provides that the rates charged shall be subject to the approval of the minister and the mails are carried free.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Boys.]

Port Mulgrave, St. Peter's, Irish Cove and Marble Mountain, and other ports on the Bras d'Or lakes, steam service between, $8,000.

Mr. CHURCH: Is it the intention of the government to do anything towards regulating the rates on water-borne traffic in the way of controlling passenger and freight rates on boats that receive a subsidy from the government? I think they should be under the control of some public body, such as the Railway Commission. Of course the boats running from Toronto to Niagara which charge such high rates for freight and passengers do not get a subsidy I admit, but other boats do receive a subsidy and I think there should be some control over boats doing government work, and even over boats not doing government work. There should be some public control over the freight and passenger rates of these ships but at present there is no control. An inquiry has been held recently in regard to the rates on the Great Lakes and it shows that the companies have been getting together and fixing rates and that a huge monopoly exists. I think the boats on the gulf and Atlantic coast that receive a subsidy should be under the control of some public body in regard to their rates; in fact whether they get a subsidy or not, I think their rates should be controlled. The time has come to place them under some control, so that the public shall not be held up by the high rates, both freight and passenger, charged to-day not only by the boats that receive subsidies but by those that do not. It might not be in the department of the minister who is in charge of these estimates but he might let us know what the government intends to do regarding this monopoly.

Mr. ROBB: There is some force in the argument of my hon. friend, but that matter comes under another department. We control the rates on the subsidized lines, and the other lines are not now under consideration.

Item agreed to.

Pictou, Souris and the Magdalen islands, steam service between, $24,000.

Mr. BANCROFT: How many boats are employed on this line?

Mr. ROBB: The contractor for this service is the Magdalen Transport Limited. The contract was entered into in 1921, and runs from the opening of navigation in 1921 to the close of navigation in 1925, but this is one of the services that did not pay, and the contract was cancelled at the end of 1922 as the service did not comply with the tender and specifications. We invited tenders on the 16th March.

Three steamers offered for the service, but the inspector, Mr. Tupper, reported against one of the steamers as unsuitable for the service, and the other steamer was on another route, but we did the best we could for the people on the Magdalen islands. I might say right here that in addition to the subsidy voted by this parliament, these people also receive a subsidy from the province of Quebec. The Magdalen islands are 120 miles out in the gulf, and there are, I think, nine or ten thousand inhabitants, largely fishermen, their product, of course being largely fish. The best we could do for them this year was to make arrangements with the former contractors to carry on for this season. Advertisements are now out inviting tenders for a new service. We are advertising for two services, one from Pictou to Magdalen islands, and one from Magdalen islands up to the port of Quebec, and when the tenders are in the department we will consider which of the services will be the most economical and of the greatest advantage to the people of the Magdalen islands, because, after all, they are the people we want to serve. I might say in passing that I recall one year, I think the year before last, when the government was compelled to send a special boat there to take in supplies to carry the people over the winter; otherwise they would have been out of flour and provisions.

Mr. BANCROFT: It is not the intention of the department to maintain the two services?

Mr. ROBB: No, we will decide which will be the better, after consultation with the people of the Magdalen islands.

Item agreed to.

Quebec, Natashquam and Harrington, and other ports on the north shore of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, steam service between, $85,000.

Mr. BOYS: This item is increasing rapidly. I have been looking at the estimates for the preceding years, and I notice that in 1921-22 the amount was $50,000 and I see now that it is $85,000. What reason is there for that very large increase?

Mr. ROBB: The service was extended down much further, I forget the mileage. I think it went down 80 or 90 miles further, almost to the point.

Mr. BOYS: Quite a different service?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, and the only way we were able to secure this service was by giving them a contract for a period of years. There is a development along there of lumber mills and pulp mills, and the people require provisions. Prior to this service they were served at the lower point from the island of Newfoundland and now the business comes up this way.

Mr. CHURCH: Does the minister intend to extend the subsidy policy for water-borne traffic to the boats on the St. Lawrence and the Great Lakes that might perform similar services for the Trade and Commerce department? I should say that this policy might be extended to the Great Lakes. At the present time there is a monopoly on the Great Lakes. All the small boats are frozen out, with the result that high freight and passenger rates are being charged, particularly for package freight. I think the department should extend the principle of granting subsidies on similar terms to boats on the Great Lakes. There are many people who would take advantage of the work the department is doing along that line. I think the department should do all they can to encourage water-borne traffic and thus obtain cheaper rates for carrying mail and everything else.

At present operating on the lakes is a steamship monopoly and it is working in with the railways. The people on the north shore of lake Ontario, between Toronto and Belleville, used to have water-borne traffic and the advantage of small boats going up and down, and they regulated railway rates for six months of the year. The same condition prevailed at Sarnia, at Owen Sound, at Oakville and in the Niagara district. A steamboat merger froze them all out and left those places at the mercy of the railways.

I think there should be equality of treatment and if the Maritime provinces are going to get the benefit of steamship subsidies, then Ontario and the Great Lakes and the other provinces in central Canada should have the benefit of them also. The people on the Great Lakes should be considered. In the United States to-day the principle of subsidies has been recognized, and has been applied on lakes Erie, Huron and Ontario. There is a boat coming into Toronto belonging to the Kirkwood line; that is run without a subsidy. They are carrying freight cheaply from the Maritime provinces up to Hamilton, Toronto, Cobourg and other places, and are conferring a great boon in regard to package freight on the wholesale and retail merchants who are getting cheaper rates from that Kirkwood liner. They are doing a great deal to benefit trade and commerce. There is a small boat running up to Toronto and these places I mentioned, and the retail man is able to get his goods on time, and is able to get bargain freight rates as a result of dealing with this particular line. Many retail merchants are asking for this privilege and I hope the minister in the recess will look into it, and see if there is not some way of extending this very admirable system of steamship subsidies to many boats on the Great Lakes so as to enable them to regulate and bring down freight and passenger rates. Competition by water traffic is one of the most important factors in the problem of solving transportation in central Canada to-day, and I believe that we can extend this principle to the head of the lakes. It would confer a boon on the public generally.

Item agreed to.

Quebec or Montreal, and Gaspe and ports on the south shore of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, steam service between, $30,000.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): There are cases parallel to this in northern Alberta. There are large sections of the country there served by river steamers in the summer months, one company covering over three thousand miles. Are these companies entitled to the subsidy?

Mr. ROBB: I am aware that there are steamers plying in the North on the Mackenzie, but there is no record in the department of any request for a subsidy. We should have to be satisfied that any such request was reasonable, and if my hon. friend can give us that satisfaction we shall be glad to take the matter into consideration.

Item agreed to.

St. John and Bear river, and other wayports, steam service between, $2,000.

Mr. BOYS: This is a new service.

Mr. ROBB: It was established last year.

Mr. BOYS: There are one or two members who want to speak on this item.

Mr. ROBB: We will let it stand.

Mr. BOYS: I will ask that item 208 be allowed to stand too.

Item stands.

St. John and Digby, steam service between, $15,000.

Mr. GARDINER: There seems to be a duplication between this item and the next.

Mr. ROBB: The two items relate to diferent services. One goes to St. John and Digby and the other runs up to Annapolis and Grenville.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is this the Canadian Pacific line between St. John and Digby?

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. ROBB: Yes, the contractors are the Dominion and Atlantic Railway Company.

Mr. MARTELL: Is this the subsidy for the boat that goes from St. John to Pictou along the Bay of Fundy and into the Minas basin to Windsor, in Hants county

Mr. ROBB: No, that is another item.

Item agreed to.

St. John and ports on the Bay of Fundy and Minas basin, steam service between, $8,000.

Mr. ROBB: The hon. member for Simcoe wishes to have this item stand.

Mr. MARTELL: I understand that this is the item that refers to the service between St. John and intermediate ports to Windsor. If so I should like to have a report from the minister as to how it has been performed. There has been some complaint from the merchants of Windsor and the people of that place that the service is not satisfactory.

Item stands.

St. John, Westport and Yarmouth and other way-basin, steam service between, $8,000.

Mr. CHURCH: Does this item come under the British North America Act? Is it a work for the general advantage of Canada? I think that the provinces should contribute in part to work of this local character. I am glad to see the Maritime provinces get all that they can because they deserve as adequate transportation facilities as can be provided them. At the same time, however, I think that the principle of subsidizing steamboats in the Maritime provinces should be extended throughout the country generally to the head of the lakes. It may be argued that this is work for the general advantage of Canada. If so, is it the intention of the government to extend it to Ontario, where there are many towns along the Great Lakes that have no railway facilities, and many flag stations? A steamboat service on the Great Lakes is one that is badly needed from the standpoint of coal supplies and from the point of view of the farming interests. Owing to the lack of proper transportation facilities the crops in these localities have to lie on the ground and the result is there is under-production, rural depopulation and unemployment, with consequent economic distress. It has been stated by transportation people that the cure for this condition in the central provinces is the extension of the principle of transportation by waterway which is nursed and provided in the Maritime provinces by federal subsidies. I have no objection to the subsidizing of these Maritime province boats because they are necessary, but I think the government should look into the question as to whether the work is really for the general advantage of Canada. I think personally that the provinces should contribute something to it. This service is a necessity; it is not by any means a luxury; and if these subsidies are necessary in some of the provinces then undoubtedly the principle should be extended to Ontario and the Great Lakes as well. There are many towns on the north shore of lake Ontario and in central Ontario on the lakes which are dead simply because of the lack of transportation facilities. A few years ago they had a steamboat service but they were unable to continue. Boats used to cross lake Erie, lake Ontario and the Georgian bay to international ports and as well to various ports on the Great Lakes within our own border. But this service has been cut off, with a result that many towns have declined in population. I am not urging that there be any curtailment in respect of the Maritime provinces, but I think that the whole policy of cash grants to those provinces should be extended to the provinces of central Canada, especially for the benefit of those small towns along the Great Lakes that are now suffering because of the lack of water-borne facilities. Take Picton, in Prince Edward county, for example; this used to be a large steamboat town but this winter not a single ship wintered there. Because of lack of transportation facilities the farmers of Halton—Mr. Drury's own constituency—cannot get their crops to market. I am surprised my hon. friends of the Progressive party from the province of Ontario are not standing up and asking for equality of treatment for their province. No part of the Dominion is suffering so much from rural depopulation to-day as is the province of Ontario. Therefore I am urging on the government the extension of this policy to the other cities and towns on the Great Lakes. In the United States from Buffalo all the way down to Toledo and Detroit every community is served by water transportation, and I think we should adopt the same principle and extend it to the head of the lakes.

Mr. MacLAREN: Do not these services carry mails?

Mr. ROBB: The subsidized services.

Mr. MARTELL: This item is for a subsidy for boats carrying mails and general supplies from New Brunswick to Nova Scotia. Therefore it is in the interests of interprovincial trade, and I cannot see how the remarks of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) are applicable, much as I appreciate him. When my hon. friend asserts that the great province of Ontario is entitled to the same consideration as the Maritime provinces, I have no dispute with him; but if the people of the Maritimes, particularly the people of Nova Scotia, are to carry on trade they must of necessity get federal assistance.

Mr. CHURCH: If my hon. friend thinks I am objecting to this vote he is mistaken.

Mr. MARTELL: I am not saying that my hon. friend is objecting—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MARTELL: I am only making a plea from the standpoint of Nova Scotia, and in spite of all the cries of "carried" I will not be forced to take my seat until the Chairman declares me out of order. The other day an associate of my hon. friend's party in Nova Scotia—and I have no fault to find with that party, except to say that I disagree with its members and think they are usually wrong—moved in the legislature that Nova Scotia should secede from the Dominion. There are many people in the province who hold that view. The premier in moving an amendment said, "We are not anxious to secede, but we do demand lower tariffs, lower freight rates and greater facilities for trade." That is the platform on which I stand, and I want to tell the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Church), whom I regard as a great personal friend, that if that secession feeling is not to grow to an alarming extent we must of necessity get our just demands in Nova Scotia. I believe the object of these subsidies is to encourage interprovincial trade, at least in the Maritime provinces. Nova Scotia suffered by confederation more than any other province, and Ontario profited most; and as far as I am concerned, whether my political life be long or short, I shall raise my voice at all times and on all occasions to demand that proper treatment be accorded to Nova Scotia—that we be given lower tariffs, lower freight rates and the best possible terms that can be secured for any province under confederation.

Mr. STEVENS: I rise to correct my hon. friend for Hants (Mr. Martell) in the statement he made; it would not be right to let it go unchallenged. We had been patiently letting these items pass when he interjected his inaccurate observations. He stated that these were subventions for the promotion of interprovincial trade. Some of them are; most of them are not. My hon. friend built up a very elaborate, picturesque and imaginary argument upon that hypothesis, which was wholly wrong and I merely wish to make this correction.

Item agreed to.

Inspection of subsidized steamship services, $4,500.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the reason for the increase of $500? A similar question was asked in regard to the increase of $6,000 on item 212, but the minister did not give an answer. Perhaps he will now furnish us this information on both items.

Mr. ROBB: The service between Sydney and Whycocomagh—item 212—was temporarily suspended owing to the old boat having foundered during the year, and we had to give an additional subsidy for a new steamer. The increase in item 214 is for the inspector of the steamship services.

Item agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

FOREST DESTRUCTION BY FUNGI AND INSECTS

Mr. LADNER:

1. Has the government any information relative to the amount of damage which is being caused in the forests of Canada and the industries related thereto; (a) by fungi; (b) by insects?
2. Does such information relate to the forests under the jurisdiction of the Dominion Government and separately to the forests under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments?

[Mr. Stevens.]

3. If so, what is the nature of the information whether in reports or otherwise and does such information disclose damages in percentage of trees destroyed or the value of the same?
4. What steps, if any, are being taken to ascertain the extent of the losses due; (a) to fungi; (b) to insects?
5. Has the government any men on the scientific staff or in the departments engaged in the study of the causes and control of damage caused by fungi and insects generally and if so, how many?
6. How many men are engaged in the study of the causes and control of damage caused to forest trees; (a) by fungi; (b) by insects?
7. Does the government consider such a staff sufficient to cope with the loss to such a great natural resource as the forests of Canada?
8. Is it the intention of the government to extend the scientific study of the causes and control of damage and to take practical remedies for the preservation of the forests of Canada?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. (a) and (b). The government has a considerable amount of information with regard to insect injuries and fungi from many parts of the Canadian forest. This information has been collected by the division of Forest Insects of the Entomological branch and by the division of Botany of the experimental farms of the Department of Agriculture in co-operation with the Dominion Forestry branch of the Department of the Interior and the various provincial forest administrations.

2. This information relates to all Canadian forests wherever insects and fungous outbreaks develop and are studied.

3. Information on injury caused by forest insects has been published in several bulletins and circulars by the Entomological branch of the Department of Agriculture and further information will be found in the annual reports of the Dominion Entomologist.

Information on fungous injuries will be found in the reports of the Dominion Botanist for the years 1921 and 1922. Further detailed information concerning both these subjects is available in the files of the Department of Agriculture.

Records are kept of important forest insect and fungous outbreaks and detailed reports upon the injuries are prepared in all cases studied by our officers. These reports give the cause and course of the injury with its details and where possible the extent of the injury is determined, although accurate estimates of this kind are sometimes very difficult to obtain.

4. (a) The division of Botany of the Experimental Farms branch conduct field examinations of forest areas with a view to ascertaining the damage due to fungi and the most feasible means of control. Extensive surveys have been conducted in connection with the white pine blister rust in British Columbia and eastern Canada.

(b) In connection with all important forest insect outbreaks the officers of the division of Forest Insects in the Entomological branch conduct special forest insect surveys, often in co-operation with the dominion and provincial Forestry branches, in order to determine the cause and extent of the injuries. Extensive surveys of this kind have been made during the last two seasons in connection with the pine bark-beetle outbreaks in British Columbia and with the spruce budworm outbreaks in eastern Canada.

5. The Entomological branch has 39 permanent technical officers on the scientific staff and provision is being made for 55 temporary and seasonal assistants this season.

The division of Botany has 14 permanent technical officers and provision is being made for 33 permanent and temporary assistants this season. All these officers are engaged in the study of the causes and control of damage caused by fungi and insects generally.

6. (a) The division of botany employs one technically trained forest pathologist and in adition 6 temporary assistants are to be employed this summer.

(b) The division of forest insects in the Entomological branch employs 7 technically trained officers engaged solely in investigation of forest insects and their injuries and control. Five of these are stationed in eastern Canada and two in British Columbia. In addition these officers are assisted by permanent or seasonal assistants according to their need.

7. The government is fully aware of the fact that as far as forest pathology is concerned, considerably more work should be done, and is ever ready to give careful consideration to the representations made by the industries concerned in order to assist in the solution of these serious causes of losses to our forest resources.

8. The Entomological branch has extended its investigations of the dying balsam and spruce in eastern Canada, with a view to determining the cause and rate of deterioration of the dying and dead timber and the degree to which it can still be salvaged.

A great amount of work in connection with the natural control of spruce budworm by means of parasites bred and distributed from the entomological laboratory at Fredericton, N.B., has already been performed This work has now been placed directly under the charge of the division of forest insects. A report on past work in this connection has been practically completed and will shortly be published. A scheme of co-operation is also contemplated between the owners of some timber limits and the division of Botany whereby the services of trained forest pathologists will be available for the particular study of various diseases affecting balsam and spruce in the eastern forests.

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS

TORONTO SUBURBAN RAILWAY

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all orders in council, letters, agreements, telegrams, and other correspondence relating to the sale of the Toronto Suburban Railway or any part thereof by the government of Canada or the Canadian National Railways to the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario or the city of Toronto.

THE SINGLE TRANSFERABLE VOTE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): In view of the fact that the House, without a division, approved of the principle of transferable votes in single-member constituencies, is it the intention of the government to bring in a bill during the present session to carry that idea into effect?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I spoke of this matter the other day but I am afraid my hon. friend was not in the House at the time. I asked the chief electoral officer of the government to prepare an amendment to the Elections Act to meet what my hon. friend has in mind. I have received his report; I find it will involve the amending of a number of sections of the act as it stands. It is not the simple matter which my hon. friend imagines it is, of a clause or two; it will necessitate amending the existing act in many particulars. The government is not desirous of adding to the legislative programme of the present session by bringing the Elections Act into the House for purposes of amendment if no special immediate need for this appears on the surface. Under the circumstances, our present intention is to allow any amendments to the act to remain over until next session.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. HARRIS: I would call the attention of the government to an article appearing in the Toronto Daily Star of Monday, April the 23rd, under the caption "Eager crowds watch emigrants depart." The article says in part:

Duncan Marshall, Chief of the Colonization department, came to see the party off.

The article declares also that a large number of people who purposed coming to this country changed their minds at the last moment. I might ask the government whether Mr. Duncan Marshall was on business of the department at Stornoway or has he been transferred to the Colonization department? When was such transfer made? Or is this a case where a disappointed politician is receiving just a little joy ride to Stornoway?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is the first intimation I have had of any transfer of the kind.

AGRICULTURAL CONDITIONS REPORT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Does the government intend to have copies of the interim report of the special committee to inquire into Agricultural Conditions printed and placed in the hands of hon. members? This is a very important report and hon. members should have an opportunity of studying it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is printed in the Votes and Proceedings.

PRIVILEGE—MR. GOOD

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. On the 1st of March my veracity was inferentially questioned by the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) who, in reference to myself spoke these words:

He quoted the Hon. Mr. Raney as his main authority, I would say to justify his resolution. I am not sure that I shall surprise the hon. member for Brant, but I may tell him this, that the Hon. Mr. Raney has never asked for any such amendment as the amendment my hon. friend now proposes to this House.

And a little further on:

Mr. Raney never asked that we should repeal section 2 of article 235 as the hon. member for Brant now proposes.

I had not at that time the definite information which would enable me to give a categorical denial of that unfair charge, but I wrote to Mr. Raney immediately afterwards—on the 3rd March. Unfortunately, owing to his illness, I did not secure permission from him to use his letter until a short time ago. I wish to read a paragraph of Mr. Raney's letter to me in reply, in which he says:

You stated the situation very fairly in your speech winding up the debate—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would remind the hon. member that under the rules it is not permissible to read a letter referring to the current debates of this House.

Mr. GOOD: Mr. Speaker, all I have to say is that what I had intended to place on record emphatically and distinctly confirms my statement and proves beyond a shadow of doubt that I was speaking the truth when I stated Mr. Raney's position.

Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I regret I was not in my seat when my hon. friend rose. I simply said that I would perhaps surprise him when I declared that I had received a communication from the Attorney General of Ontario asking for a certain amendment which I would introduce. I never pretended that he was not speaking the truth in what he said to this House.

NATURALIZATION ACTS AMENDMENT

House again in Committee on Bill No. 85 to amend the Naturalization Acts 1914 and 1920, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Has the minister anything to report to the committee since this bill was before us on a former occasion? He was to consider whether he would not have the various naturalization acts consolidated.

Hon. A. B. COPP (Secretary of State): The suggestion made by my hon. friend for St. John City (Mr. Baxter) for the consolidation of our naturalization law was referred to the officials of the department. While many arguments might be advanced in favour of the consolidation of this and other legislation, owing to the fact that a very large number of forms have been already printed under the title of the present act, and would have to be scrapped if we proceeded with consolidation, involving a waste of something like $15,000 or $20,000, I do not think the advantage that would accrue from such consolidation would warrant this heavy loss, especially bearing in mind that the consolidation and revision of our Dominion statutes is under consideration and will be taken in hand within a very short time. Therefore it seems to me that we might very well defer the consolidation of our Naturalization law until the consolidation of our statutes generally is undertaken.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The reason given by my hon. friend for not bringing in a consolidated bill at the present session does not appeal to me as very important. I remember that two or three years ago the same reason was given by the Under Secretary of State in relation to this same act—I think it was in 1919 when we were down in the old Museum building. This very bill was brought up and the question of consolidation of our naturalization law was objected to then on the ground that a lot of forms would have to be scrapped; and I think the Under Secretary of State had had new forms printed on that occasion. That does not seem to me to be a very substantial reason for postponing an absolutely necessary work if we are to understand our naturalization law as we should understand it. My hon. friend says that the work of consolidation has been considered, and I think he says it will be undertaken. I suppose he means in connection with the revision of the Dominion statutes. That work has been going on for some time, and I think we might reasonably expect it to be completed within the present year at all events. Therefore would it not be well for my hon. friend to allow this bill to stand in the meantime? No great injury and no great inconvenience will be suffered in the next few months by allowing this bill to stand until this consolidation takes place. He will agree with me, I am sure, that what he proposes now is a very radical departure from the practice in the past in regard to naturalization. I am satisfied that a good many members will desire to discuss the question, and as the session is fairly well advanced now for a measure of this kind, I would suggest that it stand over until a consolidated bill can be brought in and passed.

Mr. COPP: I should like very much to agree to my hon. friend's suggestion if I thought it would be in the best interests of the country and parliament to do so. He will remember that this bill was introduced last session after strong requests, amounting almost to demands, from different portions of the Dominion that some changes should be made in the act generally as well as in the administration of it. Under the conditions then prevailing I felt that we would be justified in allowing the bill to stand over until this session, but now it has gone forth that these amendments would be re-introduced and considered I think we should proceed with the bill. The amendments are only two or three in number. I agree with my hon. friend that in one particular instance the change is in a way somewhat radical, but I am sure that if he will give his attention to these amendments —and I know his legal knowledge and ability will stand him in good stead in doing so—he will agree with me that they are desirable and will be of great advantage to all portions of the Dominion. After giving this matter my very best consideration, and after conferring with the officials of the department who have had charge of the administration of our Naturalization law long before 1914, I am confident that the suggested changes will be of very great advantage as affecting those who desire to become naturalized citizens of Canada. We open our doors to people from other lands; we give them to understand that our country is ready to receive them and that after residing in Canada a certain length of time they will be entitled to become naturalized Canadian citizens. So that with due inquiry as to their fitness, we should remove all annoying restrictions upon applications for naturalization. The suggestions I have made in this bill are of the simplest character and should, I am sure, meet with the approval of the committee.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Will the minister explain what the changes are?

Mr. COPP: I assume my hon. friend was not in the House the day before yesterday when I explained the proposed changes. I shall be glad, however, briefly to restate them. Prior to 1914 all applications for naturalization were made to the local judges of the courts in the different provinces. The application was presented to the court on the opening day and if no objection was made during the entire sitting of the court and the judge was satisfied that the applicant was a fit and proper person to become a Canadian citizen, the application was granted. In 1914 a change was made; it was provided that naturalization certificates should be issued, not by the judges of our courts, but by the State department. The applicant files his application with the clerk of the court, where it remains on file for three months. It is not published in any way; it may be hung in the clerk's office behind the door or the safe. At the end of three months, notice is supposed to be given to the applicant; he then appears before the court in person and the judge inquires into his qualifications for citizenship. Formerly the judge at this point had the decision in his own hands, but by the act of 1914, amended in 1920, it was provided that the judge should simply report to the Secretary of State whether he approved or disapproved of the application, and if the Secretary of State found the applicant to be a fit and proper subject for naturalization the certificate issued from the State department. My hon. friend, in discussing this matter the other day, suggested that it would be giving any minister very great power to leave wholly to him the decision whether or not applicants for naturalization should be given certificates. But by the present act, irrespective of the report made by the judges, irrespective of whether they approve or disapprove of the application, the Secretary of State has absolute discretion to say whether or not the application should be granted. In other words, I am taking no more power than we have under the present act, but I am asking that we do away with the provision under which a man's application is held up for three months while it is posted, perhaps, behind the door or elsewhere in the office of the clerk. I do not suggest for a moment that the clerk would secrete it purposely, but there is no publication given to it and there can be no advantage in holding the application up in this manner for three or four months. The committee will agree that upon careful inquiry being made into his qualifications, it is our duty to give to an applicant for naturalization a reasonable opportunity of becoming a citizen of Canada without undue delay and that, so long as we provide reasonable safeguards, we should remove as many stumbling blocks as we can from his path.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What investigation does the minister propose to substitute for the investigation that has been made by the county court judges? It is very necessary that someone should have the opportunity of coming in personal contact with the applicant. The minister says that the Secretary of State under the present law can issue a naturalization certificate irrespective of the report made by the county court judge. I suppose the minister would not suggest that the Secretary of State or the Under Secretary of State would completely disregard the report of the county court judge. I believe that we should give naturalization to proper persons, but we should also safeguard the right to become a naturalized British subject because that right carries with it certain privileges which later on may become troublesome. We have had cases of that in British Columbia. We have found that naturalization certificates were issued without proper investigation. That was previous to 1914, and we have found since that time that naturalized British subjects who were improperly naturalized are demanding and insisting on certain rights to which they claim they are entitled because of their citizenship. I say it would be a great mistake to grant naturalization in a purely formal manner, long-distance naturalization, as it were, naturalization granted here in Ottawa perhaps three thousand or more miles away from the person who is applying for naturalization. I think the strictest kind of investigation should be made, and I submit, Mr. Chairman, that that investigation should be made by county court judges; I think they are eminently proper persons to conduct the investigation, and that they perform their duties in a very conscientious manner. I think it would be a great mistake for the Secretary of State at Ottawa, whether the present incumbent of the office or anyone else, to grant naturalization without some kind of personal examination of the applicant by some person who is qualified to make it. I ask the minister what is he going to substitute for the investigation which has been made in the past by the county court judges, or is he going to have it all done here at Ottawa by correspondence? Is he going to take the recommendation of someone who says that the applicant is a fit and proper person to become a naturalized citizen of this country, or is he going to have a proper investigation made to see that the applicant is really entitled and is a proper person to become naturalized?

Mr. GERMAN: All I know about this bill—

Mr. McQUARRIE: I should like an answer to my question.

The CHAIRMAN: Oh, the minister will answer the question.

Mr. GERMAN: I quite agree with the minister that three months is quite too long a time for an application for naturalization to be held up in the office of the clerk of the county court. It really does not give the general public any notice that application is being made because the general public does not visit the office of the clerk of the county court. But I cannot agree at all with the minister when he suggests that the investigation should be taken out of the hands of the county court judge and placed in the hands of an officer of the Mounted Police. If the minister is impeaching the integrity and the wisdom of the judges who are appointed by the Dominion government I would like him to say so, but how any person can imagine that a member of the Mounted Police is more fitted to make an investigation as to the qualifications of a man to become naturalized than a county court judge I cannot possibly understand.

In our Niagara district we have very many foreigners from whom there is a continual stream of applications for naturalization. The notices are posted as the law requires, in the office of the clerk of the county court for three months. I say that is altogether too long, I cannot see the necessity for that length of time at all. What I would suggest is that a person who desires naturalization should go before a judge of the county court and be examined by him. The examination is not made in open court but in the judge's chambers. The applicant should submit himself to examination there, and if the judge of the county court reports to the Secretary of State that the man is entitled to naturalization, then he should become naturalized. That is a simple process, it is an inexpensive process, and it is a speedy process. If on the other hand you have the investigation made by officers of the department, though I am quite sure that an officer of the department would make a very thorough and proper investigation, the investigation would be expensive, and you can see the time that would be lost if notice has to be sent to Ottawa and an officer of the department sent up there at the expense of the country to examine the applicant. Why should that expense be incurred when you have a judge of the county court there who is eminently capable of making the examination, is entirely impartial, and can make the examination at once?

To talk about an examination by an officer of the Mounted Police I submit is absolutely absurd. It is wrong; it should not be allowed. It is not even to be made by the officers; it does not say "officers", it says by a member of the Mounted Police. I know that the Mounted Police is a very good force composed of good men, intelligent men, but they are not by their training or their position fitted to make such an examination as is required in this case. I think it would be a great mistake if the department takes this examination out of the hands of the county court judges, who are appointed by this government. Let them reduce the time, let the investigation be made at once by a judge of the county court. He will make an impartial report, an intelligent report, a report that will have the confidence of the people of this country.

Mr. COPP: In answer to my hon. friend for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) who asked what we proposed to substitute for the investigation that is now held by county court judges, I would say that we do not propose to substitute any investigation for the investigation that is now made by the judges. From the experience we have had since this act has been in operation, the report from the judge is of absolutely no use to the department.

Mr. BOYS: Why does the minister say that?

Mr. COPP: I will tell my hon. friend if he will have patience.

Mr. BOYS: I have seen a good many examinations take place in court, and they are very thorough and reliable.

Mr. COPP: I have too. I do not say that all the reports are not of some use. The act under which we are now working, the act passed in 1914, for which I am not responsible, provides that this investigation is to be held by the judge. Now from the reports we receive, the investigation that is held by the judges is not of such a character that the department which is charged with the responsibility of issuing the certificate can act upon it.

Mr. MARTELL: Why?

Mr. COPP: First, because the judges are only supposed to hold a very cursory examination under the act. Second, during the first years of the operation of this act the judges were paid for doing this work, and at the present time they are not being paid for doing it. That takes away a very great deal of the interest that the judges—for they are only human after all—might otherwise have in making the investigation if the whole responsibility were upon them. The Judges' Act precludes the judges from being paid any remuneration for doing this work, and under the act they realize that their examination and investigation is only intended to be cursory, and the report that is made by the judges contains a few remarks, approved or disapproved.

I would draw the attention of my hon. friend for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys), and my hon. friend for Welland (Mr. German) to this, that irrespective of the judge's report the same investigation has to be carried on by the department under the act. I appreciate the views my hon. friend holds and, to some extent, sympathize with him, because when this matter was first brought to my attention I thought it was a very proper thing to continue the investigation by the judge; but having had fifteen or sixteen months' experience in the administration of the act I find this procedure to be an absolute waste of time and of money. When the report comes from the judge we have to make a specific inquiry into the character and standing of the person who had applied for naturalization. What do we do? We first apply to the Department of Immigration and we find out when the man entered the country, whether he entered legally, whether his name is on record at the port of entry, and whether he has been a resident of Canada long enough to become naturalized.

Mr. MARTELL: The judge should find all that out.

Mr. COPP: He does not do so and the department has to get this information. We have to find out the character and standing or reputation of the applicant during the time he has been a resident of Canada. In addition to making inquiry from the Department of Immigration we may also conduct an investigation through the Mounted Police.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Are they scattered all over?

Mr. COPP: Yes.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): In every province?

Mr. COPP: Yes. We also correspond with the local police, if necessary, in order to learn the required facts. Now, what I say to my hon. friend—and I think any legal gentleman will agree with me—is that in many cases a judge in a certain part of the province of Ontario, for example, after making an inquiry and examination will approve of an application, whereas a judge in another part of the country, with the same evidence before him, will disapprove of it. The department, as I say, makes this examination and inquiry and in many cases, notwithstanding that reports have come in from the judges approving of naturalization, we, after our own inquiry turn down the application and refuse to issue naturalization certificates. In other cases when the judges have sent in a report disapproving of the application of a man to become a British subject we, after careful inquiry, have been convinced that he is a fit and proper person to be naturalized and issue the certificate accordingly. Therefore, I contend that the time occupied in making this inquiry through the judge, under the law as it now stands, is absolutely wasted; the matter comes back to the department in the end. Such, at any rate, has been the experience of the department during the years that elapsed since 1914. The department must take the whole responsibility and it is entirely in its discretion to say whether the naturalization certificate should be issued or not.

In the larger centres the same difficulty does not arise, but it becomes a serious matter in the case of an applicant in the West who may reside from one to two hundred miles away from the place where he has to make application to the court. Under the law as it stands to-day the application has to be made to the clerk of the court and it is hung up in the clerk's office for three long months. The clerk may fail to send the applicant notice of the date when he has to be present to substantiate his application, but whether he notifies him or not the fact remains, that the applicant may have to travel from one to two hundred miles for that purpose because he has to be present in person to be examined by the judge.

Mr. MARTELL: When that application is made at the opening days of the regular session of the court, supported by an affidavit, is it not a fact that the application remains open until shortly before the closing of the court so that it may be open to any person who desires to do so to take objection; and does not the judge make a thorough inquiry into the qualifications of the applicant to become a British subject? Is not that the case and is it not a fair procedure?

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend is labouring under the delusion that we are still acting under the old Naturalization Act prior to 1914.

Mr. MARTELL: That was a good act.

Mr. COPP: But it is not the law to-day.

Mr. MARTELL: The procedure under that act was all right.

Mr. COPP: But the law has been entirely changed. Now, to continue with my statement. The applicant, as I say, may have to travel one or two hundred miles in order to reach the appointed place where he is to be examined by the judge. During my experience of the administration of this act we have had hundreds of complaints from applicants who declared that they had made their application in due and proper form but had heard nothing more about it, and wrote to inquire why the naturalization certificate had not been granted. Now, under the present law, when a clerk refuses, or neglects, to forward the report of the judge to the department matters are held up. Then the department has to undertake its own examination, and that has frequently happened in my experience. But the point is, that upon the applicant the responsibility is very often placed of travelling very long distances in order to appear before the judge and prove his case. So that, to have a proper national Naturalization Act the only thing to do is to bring into force the amendments proposed, and I am convinced, from the experience which I have had that they will prove of great advantage to the country and will be most advantageous in the administration of the act.

Mr. MARTELL: Does the minister not think that a better title for this legislation would be "An Act to abolish lawyers and establish more red tape in Ottawa"?

Mr. HANSON: I have had some considerable experience in dealing with the naturalization acts of 1914 and 1920 and I beg to assure the committee that I have never met with any of the difficulties that have been enumerated by the Secretary of State (Mr. Copp). In addition to the posting of the notice of the application in the office of the clerk of the county court, as I recollect the statute, it is necessary that a copy of the notice should also be posted in the post office in the place where the applicant resides. That provision may have been repealed.

Mr. COPP: It was repealed two years ago.

Mr. HANSON: Very well. It may be questionable as to whether three months is too long. I do not think it is. However, it may be open to debate. Some reasonable notice should be given. The vital thing about the act of 1920, in my judgment, is the investigation made by the county court judge, and if these judges have not done their duty in the past I must express very great surprise. Personally, I believe the county court judges have gone into this matter and have made these investigations, in so far as they have come under my observation, in the province of New Brunswick with the very greatest care, and I do not think for a minute that the question of pay or no pay has ever entered into the matter. If it has, such has not been my experience. Now, what actually happens? At a time appointed the applicant does appear, and it is a most vital thing that he should do so, and is put upon the stand. He may or may not employ a solicitor to act in his behalf. I say, without any reservation, that he should have such legal assistance in order to guide him. The first thing determined by the judge is the applicant's knowledge of either of the two languages of this country and he is in a much better position, than officials sitting behind a mahogany desk in Ottawa, to ascertain a man's knowledge of either the English or the French language. With all due deference, that is one thing the Secretary of State, or his officials, could not nearly so well determine, and it seems to me that an adequate knowledge of one of the official languages should be a sine qua non of citizenship. What I think has been the difficulty with respect to investigations by county court judges has been that the reports have not been elaborate enough. That is a very simple matter to cure. If a letter were sent by the Secretary of State to any one of the county court judges asking him to make a proper report, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred a proper report on the applicant would or should be sent back. In addition to that, the applicant is subject to cross-examination by the county court judge acting as a sort of King's proctor. I have seen that invariably done. I remember on one occasion an applicant was put through a series of questions with respect to what he knew about the method of government and politics in this country. I understand on one occasion an applicant was asked how he would vote at the next election, and he said that he would vote for the party which gave him the most money. In that case naturally the county court judge refused to grant naturalization.

Mr. COPP: The hon. member would be sure of his vote on that occasion.

Mr. HANSON: I was not looking for the vote. I do not have to buy votes. The hon. member himself belongs to a party which has done more to corrupt the electorate in New Brunswick than any other party in the history of this country. He only needs to go back to the records of some of his leaders in regard to that matter.

Mr. MARTELL: The hon. member should discuss the matter on its merits.

Mr. HANSON: I will, but I did not start this; I am not seeking to lower the plane of the discussion, I was citing that only as an illustration of a case in which a county court judge refused to make a favourable report. In addition to the examination and cross-examination of the applicant, county court judges whom I have seen operate under the act, have required that at least two reputable citizens in the community in which the applicant resides, should attend and give evidence corroborative of the character of the applicant and his fitness for British citizenship, which, after all, should not be regarded cheaply. My hon. friend and some hon. members to my left have stated that it is a hardship to ask a man to travel a hundred miles to attend an investigation personally before a county court judge. If British citizenship amounts to anything, if it is a thing of value, it is worth a journey of a hundred miles.

Mr. FORKE: That may not be necessary.

Mr. HANSON: It is worth a journey of a hundred miles to go before a county court judge, where a personal investigation may be made, where the applicant may be seen by a judicial authority who has an open mind and who is prepared to hand out even justice. I would deplore if this measure should carry if it has the effect of abolishing the investigation before a county court judge. I want to say a word for county court judges. I believe the county court judges in my province are men of honour and integrity, and that they will do their full duty as citizens under any statute that may be imposed upon them, without regard to the petty questions of a fee or a mile. My hon. friend says that the examinations are cursory. He produces no proof of that statement. He cannot possibly know that of his personal knowledge. What he probably bases that statement upon is the shortness, the meagreness of the reports sent in. That is probably true; but that is a matter which, as I stated a moment ago, can and should be corrected. There is no reason why a county court judge should not make a full and true report of everything that transpires before him. As a matter of fact, now that there are, in most cases, stenographers in the county courts, there is no reason why the reports should not be accompanied by a transcript of the shorthand records taken of the examination. In New Brunswick, so far as I know, these examinations are never conducted in chambers; they are done in open court, and I believe it would be a distinctly retrograde step if the investigation before a county court judge were done away with, especially in view of the fact that there is nothing to take its place except the ipse dixit of some official in the city of Ottawa.

Mr. FORKE: I think I value the privilege of British citizenship as highly as any one. My hon. friend (Mr. Hanson) has referred to the fact that a man should be willing to travel a hundred miles in order to become a British citizen. I agree with him, but it may not be necessary to travel a hundred miles to do so. Consequently, if you can make this easier, so much the better. I am not very much interested in what happened in the past in regard to naturalization of citizens in this Dominion; I am more interested in what is going to happen in the future. Hon. members on different sides of the House seem to take a great interest in informing those who have newly come here just how iniquitous this matter was in days gone by. Well, we are looking for better times. I have had some little experience as regards naturalization papers, and I cannot subscribe to the idea that the judges have been negligent in their duties. I have always found judges willing and ready to make the necessary examination and to see that an applicant receives his citizenship if he is entitled to it. As regards asking questions to find out whether applicants are fit for citizenship or not, I am just as well pleased that that is not applied to all voters who would vote, because they would sometimes be in a pretty difficult position if they had to answer questions as regards what qualifies a man to vote and his fitness to vote. I do not, however, believe in making the test too easy.

Mr. HANSON: There is no test under this legislation.

Mr. FORKE: I am not saying anything about that; if the hon. member will have patience, I will, maybe, come out all right in the end. I think this puts too much power in the hands of the minister to give naturalization papers. Large blocks

4 p.m. of foreigners might be waiting to be naturalized, and it might be convenient—ministers are only human—to have those men naturalized at a certain time. It would be more advantageous and better for the country if some examination should take place before a county court judge, who, I am satisfied, would do his duty in the matter. I have no doubt that the minister's intention is all right to simplify the matter and to do away with extra trouble; but after all, if an applicant is really anxious for British citizenship, he will take the trouble to get his application in to the clerk of the court, to go through the necessary preliminaries and to come before a county court judge, in order to get his British citizenship. I would certainly be in favour of having something between the applicant and the minister, in order to prevent the applicant from receiving naturalization unless he was thoroughly entitled to it. I have known several cases in which applicants have filed their applications in the county court, gone through all the preliminaries and got their citizenship without any extra trouble. It might be all right to have some method of getting an examination made of a man or woman who wanted to be naturalized and who was living at some distance from the county court, so that the evidence might be submitted to the judge. I do not know whether that would be a feasible plan or not. But, after all, most county court judges hold sittings at not such very great distances from people residing in a county. In the older provinces, like Manitoba—because Manitoba is getting pretty old now—there is no hardship at all as regards any applicant going before a county court judge.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Do I understatnd the minister to say that under the present law, no matter what the judge's opinion may be, the Secretary of State has absolute discretion to grant or refuse naturalization?

Mr. COPP: I will read the clause to my right hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have read it.

Mr. COPP: This is the provision:

> The granting of a certificate of naturalization to any such alien shall be in the absolute discretion of the Secretary of State—

[Mr. Forke.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the minister reading from?

Mr. COPP: I am reading from subsection 3.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of what act?

Mr. COPP: I am quoting from page 58 of the act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of the 1914 act?

Mr. COPP: Yes.

> The granting of a certificate of naturalization to any such alien shall be in the absolute discretion of the Secretary of State and he may, with or without assigning any reason, give or withhold the certificate..... and no appeal shall lie from his decision.

That is the law to-day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the origin of the section my hon. friend is reading? He has read from a pamphlet. From what act does he get that section?

Mr. COPP: The Imperial Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But we are governed by sections 23 and 24 of our own act, which the hon. member wants to repeal.

Mr. COPP: Section 24 reads—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear; that is the one.

Mr. COPP (reading):

> The Secretary of State of Canada may thereupon, in his absolute discretion, issue a certificate of naturalization and send the same to the clerk of the court to whom the application for naturalization was made.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Now I should like to argue the matter with the minister.

Mr. COPP: That section is eliminated by the proposed amendment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What the minister read before was not the law; what he has read now is; and that is the law he wants to repeal. It is not, however, the law that he cited to the House. The Secretary of State under the act to-day has not the discretion to grant or refuse, no matter what may be the judgment of the county court judge. If he receives a recommendation from the county court judge in accordance with section 23, he may act upon that recommendation or he may not, but the recommendation is one for naturalization. If the county court judge after his examination finds that the applicant is a fit and proper person for naturalization he so certifies, under section 23, to the Secretary of State, and then section 24 applies. "The Secretary of State may thereupon, in his absolute discretion, issue a certificate."

Mr. JACOBS: "May."

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, he "may."

Mr. JACOBS: And may not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But, unless he gets a favourable report from the judge he cannot issue it. That is the point. But if these two sections are repealed the Secretary of State is lord of all he surveys in relation to naturalization. Without these sections he could issue certificates by the thousand the week before an election and place them in the hands of candidates in various counties. That could be done; he would not require the endorsation of a judge at all. He would not require recommendation from anyone; he would be simply master of the situation. Surely the minister does not solemnly propose that to the House of Commons.

Mr. COPP: I am doing it now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister is not. I should like him to produce to this House a case in which he has issued a naturalization certificate without the authority of a judge under section 23.

Mr. JACOBS: He can withhold it indefinitely.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, he can decline to issue a certificate, but he cannot issue one without the authority of a judge under section 23. And he wants that barrier removed so that he may be able to do as he pleases and issue certificates here, there and everywhere at his own discretion. Now, surely he does not contend any longer that he can, without the authorization of a judge, issue a certificate of naturalization. Let me read section 23:

> If the court decides that the alien is a fit and proper person to be naturalized and possesses the required qualifications a certified copy of such decision shall be transmitted by the Clerk of the Court to the Secretary of State together with the application, and such other papers, documents and reports as may be required.

Under section 24:

> The Secretary of State of Canada may thereupon, in his absolute discretion, issue a certificate of naturalization.

That is, he may or he may not. But he neither may nor may not unless section 23 has been complied with and a judge has made his report. Surely the minister would not argue anything different from that. I am satisfied his deputy would not, in any court of justice. What is the effect of the word "thereupon?" This word means, upon section 23 being complied with; and section 23 is not complied with until a judge has reported to the effect set out therein—not a negative report but such a report as is described in the section. He places this report in the hands of the Secretary of State, and with that report favourable to the applicant in his possession the Secretary of State may or may not grant the certificate.

Mr. COPP: Suppose it is unfavourable?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then he has no power to grant the certificate at all, because he has not such a report as is referred to in the section. In fact, the judge does not need to make an unfavourable report; if he makes such a report it is wholly something that does not affect the power of the Secretary of State at all. The Secretary of State must have a favourable report in accordance with section 23 before he can exercise any discretion at all. Having that report he may or may not grant the certificate. Now, I really should like to hear the minister's argument if he thinks that I am not correct.

Mr. COPP: My deputy informs me that after the report of the judge has been received, many a time inquiry is made and a certificate is issued irrespective of whether the judge reports for or against the applicant.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Read the authority.

Mr. COPP: I may say to my hon. friend for York (Mr. Hanson) who made a few remarks—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Surely the minister does not want to let this matter go at that and say that the department has been doing as he suggests. If it has done anything of the kind it has done so against the law. Would the minister read the two sections to which I have referred him.

Mr. COPP: My deputy informs me that we are doing it in accordance with the law passed by my hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all.

Mr. BOYS: Does the minister contend that he can issue a certificate without first having a report from the judge? Does he say that he can issue it on his own initiative?

Mr. COPP: No, not without the report. But after the report does come in we can act as we see fit; and that is why I say that the report is of no value.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Even if the report is a negative one?

Mr. COPP: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But how can a negative report comply with section 23? Really, it does not require a lawyer to see the significance of these sections. "If the court decides that the alien is a fit and proper person"—not if the court decides that he is not fit. If the court decides that he is a fit and proper person to be naturalized, and possesses the required qualifications, a certified copy of that decision is transmitted to the Secretary of State, and that being done, the Secretary of State can act. I impress upon the minister again that it is only by compliance with the judge's decision, that the applicant is a fit and proper person, that "thereupon" the Secretary of State may grant the certificate.

Mr. JACOBS: My information is that this practice has been followed ever since the law came into effect under the regime of my right hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the hon. gentleman would likely have some information about that, but it would only date back a limited number of months.

Mr. JACOBS: A year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If any such practice has been followed it has been in direct violation of the law, and what we ought to do is to comply with the law we have instead of seeking to get rid of the safeguards it provides.

Mr. COPP: I am administering the act as it has all along been administered and my deputy informs me that it is the law that has been followed by the department ever since the act was passed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should like the minister to produce a case in support of that assertion.

Mr. COPP: Here is a case before me. Here is a judge of the county court who refused to decide an application as to the qualification of applicants for land patents, challenging the legality of the amendments to the Lands Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who did?

Mr. COPP: A judge of the county court. He has refused to receive applications from fully qualified applicants because of their racial origin. These are the reports we have in our office. One judge refused to recognize section 10. My Under Secretary of State informs me now, in spite of what my right hon. friend says, that the law is and has been administered by the department, that, irrespective of what report the judges may make after their inquiries, we have the sole discretion to say whether or not a certificate shall issue.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not wish to reflect at all on the legal judgment of those under my hon. friend. I do not know what the legal department of the Secretary of State's office is. I know the deputy is a lawyer himself. But I should like the Secretary of State to produce an opinion from the Minister of Justice or from the Deputy Minister of Justice to this House to the effect that under sections 23 and 24 the Secretary of State has any power to issue a certificate unless there is first a favourable report from the judge, or a report complying with section 22.

Mr. COPP: The Under Secretary of State informs me that the section I read is part of our act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of the Imperial act?

Mr. COPP: No, of our act—the act under which we are working to-day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How is that part of our act? It is contained in the Imperial act.

Mr. COPP: It is part of our act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where is it made a part of our act?

Mr. BOYS: What is the number of the section in our act?

Mr. COPP: Subsection 3 of section 2 of our act of 1914.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What section of the act of 1914 embodies the Imperial act?

Mr. EULER: I have here a copy of the act respecting British naturalization of aliens, assented to on 12th June, 1914. This is chapter 44. On page 2, subsection 3 of section 2 is in this form:

> The grant of a certificate of naturalization to any such allien shall be in the absolute discretion of the Secretary of State of Canada, and he may, with or without assigning any reason give or withhold the certificate as he thinks most conducive to the public good, and no appeal shall lie from his decision.

Mr. COPP: That is the same section as I read.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very well, but I have not got the exact connection yet. Certainly it is clear under sections 23 and 24, which the minister seeks to repeal, that he cannot exercise such discretion; but as the act now stands I would say that the general provision of section 2, subsection 3, would have to be complied with and be subordinated to the particular provisions of sections 23 and 24.

Mr. COPP: They must be read together; one does not override the other.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know; but the particular provision prevails over the general when they are read together. I cannot understand section 2 being passed along with sections 23 and 24, because the latter clearly specifies the condition under which the Secretary of State may act.

Mr. COPP: It was passed in 1914 as I read to the committee. My right hon. friend attempted to lead the committee to believe that I was quoting from an act that was not part of our legislation. It is part of our legislation and was passed by the government of which my right hon. friend was a prominent member.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. minister should not say that. I asked him what he was reading from, he said the Imperial act, and I took him at his word.

Mr. COPP: It is taken from the Imperial act. My right hon. friend attempted to tell the committee that I was asking to be given a power that I did not have under the present legislation,

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, that is right.

Mr. COPP: I answered him by saying that I had this same power under an act passed by his own government some years ago. I am not finding fault with that act, it may be all right, but to-day when we are asking for the repeal of the section that I mentioned, we are asking for no greater power for the State department than is conferred upon it by the act passed by my right hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not agree with the minister at all. He read from what he said first was the Imperial act. It turns out now that that is embodied in part 2 of our act of 1914. This seems to be the case, but I have not had time to review the relationship between that section 2 and sections 23 and 24. Under the latter sections the Secretary of State could not naturalize anyone unless he had first the judge's recommendation.

Mr. COPP: I did not say I could.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Without the inquiry which I have not yet had an opportunity to make I would be of opinion that sections 23 and 24, being specific, would be the dominating sections over section 2; and that if the minister has been acting under section 2 alone without relation to sections 23 and 24 he has been acting illegally. Now he says he is not asking for any power which he has not had all along. I say he is; he is asking for power to issue naturalization without the necessary preliminary—a judicial investigation. If for the sake of argument we assume his view of the law is right—I do not think it is—and that after the judicial investigation he could do what he liked even though the judge reported against the applicant, he is asking now for power he never had before. Though he might do as he pleased before, according to his arguments he had at least to precede his action with a judicial investigation and report. That judicial investigation and report was a public document capable of production at any time at the call of this House, a public document by which the public and this House could judge of the rightness or wrongness of his action, a public document of record prepared by a judge of our courts. Now the minister wants to do away with that precaution which parliament imposed, he wants to do away with the necessity of any preliminary investigation and report by a judicial body. Certainly that is asking for a power that he did not have before; it is asking for power to enable him to exercise his duties without the restraints the act imposed before. Even on his own argument that he had an absolute right to give such final decision as he might deem advisable, those restraints were there before. Pass this legislation and those restraints are gone

I repeat that I shall be surprised if I have to come to the conclusion that this is the law. Though it may be the opinion of Mr. Newcombe, that section 2 would prevail even over the conditions stipulated in sections 23 and 24, I submit this is bad legislation. The minister says, "The judges' investigations have been no good and I am going to conduct them after this bill is passed through the Mounted Police." Investigations into the legal qualifications of a resident of Canada to be naturalized as a British subject! Was there ever a matter more fitting for judicial inquiry than this? And he says the reason the judges have been careless is because they have not been paid. I do not think his words will be accepted as a compliment by the bench of Canada. They have been paid for this work just as they have been paid for conducting the courts in Canada, and they are paid to-day for their work as inquirers, investigators, under the Naturalization Act in exactly the same way as they are paid for deciding whether a culprit goes to jail or not. All is embraced within their duties, and to suggest that because there is not some special pay applicable to this is to do no credit to the bench, and, I am afraid, to do none to the minister. I have had something to do with the work of the judges under this act, in the way of watching it at least, and I have observed that the judges exercise just as much care in connection with their duties in this respect as they do in any other—indeed, a lot more care than could possibly be exercised by the minister or by his deputy on questions such as this. The act calls for giving notice to the public in the immediate territory where the applicant resides. It is notice that the public are almost bound to see, because there must be posting, not behind the door of the court house, but conspicuously in the court house. That is the provision of section 20.

Mr. COPP: Will my right hon. friend read that section?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. It says:

> The application shall be delivered at the office of the clerk or other proper officer of the court during office hours, and such application shall be posted by such clerk or other proper officer in a conspicuous place in his office.

Mr. COPP: In his office, not in the court house.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In a conspicuous place, not behind the door. That would not be conspicuous.

Mr. JACOBS: When the door is closed it is conspicuous.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The section continues:

> The applicant shall also post up a copy of such application in a conspicuous place in the post office nearest to his place of residence.

Mr. COPP: That is repealed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Repealed in 1920? Then I would recommend that it be put in again, if it is thoroughness of investigation that the minister wants. At all events, there must be posting in a conspicuous place. In that way everyone gets to know who wants to know, and undoubtedly a great many get to know of these applications for naturalization. Time is allowed within which inquiry may be made and objection may be taken. All this procedure serves as a deterrent against fraudulent naturalization by residents. A man is not going to put in his application knowing that he will have to go before a judge, take his oath and submit to cross-examination—he is not going to do it if it is a fraudulent application. The chance is very slight that anyone will fraudulently set to work to get naturalization for the purposes of the franchise. But remove all this, and simply have a sort of subterranean investigation as to which there will be no report that the public can ever get, some sort of investigation like a detective department would get under way to find out the character of a supposed culprit—substitute such an investigation for this open, public inquiry before a judge, and it merely says to all and sundry: If you want naturalization, depend on the Secretary of State. It simply puts the whole country in the hands of the Secretary of State as to who shall have the franchise. The minister says he has the power anyway. I do not think he has. But if there is any fault with the present legislation it is that the restrictions are too few. Let us not wipe away the restraints that there are.

Mr. COPP: My right hon. friend has, as usual, resorted in his argument to a great deal of special pleading. He first thought that the sections I read were not a part of our act; we now find that they are.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister thought they were not.

Mr. COPP: The provisions were properly passed and have been acted upon for the last eight years, whether rightly or wrongly is a question that is open to discussion. Personally I believe they are proper provisions. Sections 23 and 24 provide that a report must be made by the judges of our county court. But what I was chiefly pointing out was that this report filed by a judge of the county court was of no particular value. My right hon. friend rushes to the support of the county judges, who, it is intimated, I have villainously attacked. Well, I do not think I said anything in derogation of them, but I do say that those judges, realizing that their report has, in the final analysis, no effect on the question on whether or not a naturalization certificate shall be granted, pay no particular attention to the holding of an inquiry. The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) also rushes to the defence of the judges of New Brunswick whom I have, in his opinion, maligned in suggesting that they did not make the investigation as properly and as carefully as they would do if they were responsible for determining whether or not the certificate should be issued. If I understand the argument of the hon. member for York-Sunbury, it is that the law should be left as it is and that the applicant should have a lawyer to go to the court and plead his case for him. I contend it is the duty of this parliament and of the State department to give persons who come to this country every possible facility for acquiring the rights of citizenship.

Mr. FORKE: Does the minister believe that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police would be more reliable than a county court judge in the matter of making a report?

Mr. COPP: The cases do not compare at all; it is not a question between the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the county court judges. The county court judge inquires into the situation in a casual way and makes a report. We may not refer to the Mounted Police; we may not refer to any particular body. But when the application comes to us, marked "approved" or "disapproved" by the judge of the county court before whom the applicant appeared, we make inquiry; we go to the immigration office. If we think it necessary we refer the matter to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in order to ascertain whether the applicant had been concerned in any criminal acts during his residence here, about which the county court judge might know nothing. Suppose a man from a town in Saskatchewan becomes implicated in bootlegging operations, the selling of narcotic drugs, or any other criminal act. He goes to Alberta; he has lived five years in Canada. How would a judge of the county court in Alberta know this man's record in Saskatchewan? So far as I have been able to follow the work of the Mounted Police, I am confident that they can judge pretty well whether a man who makes application for naturalization is a fit and proper person to become a British subject.

Mr. FORKE: I will not interfere again; but the suspicion in my mind would be that this change would place too much power in the hands of the Secretary of State. I do not mean that personally at all; it would be the same no matter what government was in power. But I think it is a dangerous thing to place power in the hands of the Secretary of State under which large sections of the foreign population could, on particular occasions, be practically enfranchised wholesale. That is my idea.

Mr. BOYS: I suggest that there is no conflict between section 2 and section 19. Section 2 says:

> The Secretary of State of Canada may grant a certificate of naturalization to an alien who makes an application for the purpose.

Then, section 19 states what the alien has to do in making his application. It says:

> An alien desiring to be naturalized shall apply—

Not to the Secretary of State.

> —for a decision establishing that he is qualified and fit to be naturalized under the provisions of this act.

Then follow the various paragraphs pointing out the procedure in the different provinces. That read with section 2 is quite consistent. Section 2 says he shall make application for the purpose, and section 19 says he shall make that application for a decision in Ontario to the Court of General Sessions, and in other provinces in other ways. Does the minister contend that there are two distinct powers, one whereby an application can be made to the Court of General Sessions in Ontario, and the other being made quite independently altogether to the Secretary of State?

Mr. COPP: The applications are not that way, but the powers.

Mr. BOYS: That is what I am trying to argue. I would ask the minister's serious consideration of what I am trying to suggest. If that was the intention of section 2,—that independent power should be given to the Secretary of State,—would it not say so? But it does not say any such thing. It says that the Secretary of State may grant the certificate to an alien who makes an application for that purpose. Surely the question that one must ask at once is, how is he going to make that inquiry? And I ask the minister if he can show me any other section of the act but 19 which outlines the manner in which that application is to be made. I do not think he can, and when you return to section 19 you find there that the application in Ontario is to be made to the Court of General Sessions, in Quebec to the Circuit Court, and so on—I need not read all the list. When the judge of the court in Ontario proceeds under that section he has to see that the applicant satisfies him of what is required by subsections (a) (b) and (c) of No. 2. If that is done the judge then certifies that he is a fit and proper person for naturalization; that report goes to the Secretary of State, and on the strength of that information got from the report of the judge the Secretary of State then has his jurisdiction. I do not contend for a moment that he cannot either grant or refuse the application. He can, but what I do contend is that he does not get any jurisdiction of any kind, sort or description to deal with the application of an alien to become naturalized unless there is in the first instance the report of a judge, and if the report of a judge is not made and sent to him he cannot deal with the naturalization of an alien at all. The minister nods his head in assent.

Mr. COPP: Absolutely.

Mr. BOYS: Then if he does, he at once admits—

Mr. COPP: No.

Mr. BOYS: Just hear what I am going to say first. He admits that he has no independent or separate jurisdiction to deal with applications made direct to him.

Mr. COPP: Yes.

Mr. BOYS: If we are together in that, I cannot see how there is any room for doubt, because section 19 provides the procedure and says how it is to be done. There is absolutely nowhere else in Ontario that you can make application except to the Court of General Sessions. Now I want to make one observation regarding the procedure there. I am not going to suggest that the minister was saying anything derogatory of our judges. He may not know how they proceed in Ontario. I know something of the procedure in Ontario and especially in my own county. I have sat many times in the Court of General Sessions when these applications are made, and I want to tell the committee how it is done. The applicants are there in person. They are sworn, examined by the county judge, the evidence is taken in shorthand, and the county judge requires one or two reputable citizens from the neighbourhood in which the applicant resides to be there and certify. If that procedure is taken I cannot see how the minister can find fault with the decision of a judge. Does he suggest that in the province of Ontario the county judges frequently make reports which upon investigation the department disregard and reach a totally different conclusion? I can understand that might be the case in respect to outlying districts perhaps in the Northwest but I very much doubt if it is so in Ontario, and so far as that province is concerned I want to say to the minister I am satisfied from the care that is exercised in working out the provisions of this act that it would be unwise to make a change so far as the older provinces of the Dominion are concerned. I certainly do not think the minister has power under section 2, which as a matter of fact so far as I have been able to see from a quick reading, is a verbatim copy of the provisions of the Imperial act and is of course our law, but it must be read in conjunction with the procedure provided for in section 19.

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend has argued that we have no jurisdiction when the report comes from the judge. That is true; I have never hinted anything else; that is our jurisdiction. But what I say is that under our law when the report comes from the judge to whom the application was made we can use our own discretionary power whether to accept that report or not.

[M. Copp.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: But it must be a report from the judge in accordance with the act, and the only report he can make in accordance with the act is under section 23.

Mr. COPP: But under the other sections we can accept it or not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. BOYS: You can accept it or not, certainly.

Mr. COPP: And act as soon as the report is in from the judge irrespective of whether that report is for or against granting naturalization.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. COPP: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. As soon as the report is received by the department whether it is approved or not, that gives the department jurisdiction to act. We can act one way or the other whichever way we decide.

Mr. BOYS: Under what section is the county court judge required to report if he is not in favour of naturalization? If you read section 23—and there is no other section dealing with it—you will see that you only are apprised of the matter if the judge finds he is a fit and proper person to be naturalized. If he is not a fit and proper person a report does not reach your department.

Mr. COPP: Scores of them reach the department.

Mr. BOYS: I would be glad if the minister would show me under what section a judge is required to make any report if his report is unfavourable. Section 23 is as follows—I need not take the trouble to read the previous sections which provide how the application is to be posted, the opportunity for opposition, proof for qualification, and so on; when that is all done and the investigation has taken place, section 23 provides the next step, and what is it:

> If the court decides that the alien is a fit and proper person to be naturalized and possesses the required qualifications, a certified copy of such decision shall be transmitted by the clerk of the court to the Secretary of State of Canada together with the application—

That is where the application is received.

> —and such other papers, documents and reports as may be required by any regulation made hereunder.

The minister will see at once that the report only reaches his department when it is favourable. I do not say there is no other section, I do not profess to be an expert, but I ask the minister to show me any section which provides for transmitting a report when it is not favourable. If there is no such section he would not hear of the matter unless the report is favourable.

Mr. JACOBS: Suppose the judge goes wrong in his law. That sometimes happens, not often, of course, but it has occurred, and he makes a report to the effect that this man has resided less than six years, when the law only calls for five, is the Secretary of State obliged to accept that report and refuse to issue a certificate?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He is under this act.

Mr. JACOBS: That would be absurd. That would be contrary to the law.

Mr. BOYS: What I said was that a report would only reach the department when it was a favourable report. The judge may go wrong; they are all mortal; I am not saying they are infallible, but the point is the Secretary of State never hears of the application unless it is reported on favourably.

Mr. JACOBS: As I understand it, the report is sent forward.

Mr. BOYS: I have asked the minister to show me the section. I am not saying it is not there; it may be; but let us see it. I have shown the section which provides for naturalization on a favourable report.

Mr. COPP: In the past fifteen months hundreds of applications have come forward from the judges marked "not approved".

Mr. MEIGHEN: But what difference does that make? These are beyond the purview of the act altogether.

Mr. COPP: If my hon. friend will wait just a moment. When that report is received it gives the Secretary of State authority to act under section 23.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where is this section?

Mr. COPP: The Secretary of State acts upon the report. When that report from the judge is received it gives him authority to act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is where the minister is wrong, and I am sure that if he will consult his deputy he will find he is wholly wrong; there can be no question about it at all. The minister mentions that the practice is to get all sorts of reports as provided for by the act. Why, he may get letters from judges—all sorts of things. But only when he gets something which under the act empowers him to exercise his functions does he exercise them. Now the act says—in regard to the application coming through this channel—that the minister's duty arises under the condition, and that one condition only, that under section 23 the judge sends a report that the man is a fit and proper person to become naturalized. The minister has the full discretion to act but he only has the discretion when section 23, and the other sections, are complied with; until section 23 is complied with he has no discretion whatever. Now, once his discretion arises he can say yes or he can say no, but he gets no discretion whatever until the judge sends in his report that the applicant is a fit and proper person. There is no lawyer—not even my hon. friend from George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs)—but would say the same thing; there is no other interpretation possible under this section.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Whatever may be the outcome of the legal discussion it would seem as if this amendment looks in the direction of more highly centralized authority, and very arbitrary authority at that. If I understood the Secretary of State aright the judge's report has no effect whatever in the final decision. If that is so the amendments placed before this House ought to look in the other direction altogether—that is towards very definitely giving the recommendation of the judges a place and weight in the final decision. I think it would be no less than an outrage if we allowed entrance to citizenship in Canada to be placed solely in the hands of one man. I am not reflecting in any way upon the present occupant of the office of Secretary of State—or on the occupant of that office any more than on the occupant of any other office—but it must surely be conceded that the question of whether or not a man should become a citizen of Canada ought not to be left to the absolute discretion of any one individual.

Further, the present legislation would seem not only to give this great power to one individual but it would also give to this same individual the right to disfranchise any citizen—a situation equally serious. According to the act of 1920:

> The Governor in Council shall by order revoke a certificate of naturalization granted by the Secretary of State of Canada under this act, or granted under any Naturalization Act heretofore in force in Canada in any case in which he is, upon the report of the Secretary of State of Canada, satisfied that the person to whom the certificate was granted either—
> (a) has, during any war in which His Majesty is engaged unlawfully traded or communicated with the enemy—and so on. And > (c) was not of good character at the date of the grant of the certificate.

Now it is obvious to anyone that it may be comparatively easy to say with regard to any particular citizen that he was not of good character five years previously. In that case, without any trial whatever, without any court coming to a decision on the matter in any form, the individual who has imagined himself to be a citizen of this country would thereby have withdrawn from him all the rights of citizenship. That, it seems to me, is an arbitrary power that is against all the ideas of British constitutional liberty that we have had in the past. To have made a change in that regard would seem to me to be something that might very well be brought before us at this time. But that provision still exists, and without any change in that particular clause we are being asked here to vote in favour of a further extension of this power to one individual.

But I would like particularly to call the attention of the House to the effect of this kind of provision and of this kind of procedure on the immigrant who comes to this country. We have tens of thousands of aliens scattered throughout the Canadian northwest. Many of them have come from other lands where they had exercised the rights of citizenship. They have been told that they could become free citizens of Canada. But for this they must wait five years—surely long enough. I should like, if I could, to get away from the official atmosphere of this House and ask you what effect it has upon these immigrants if, when they do make application for citizenship, they are treated more or less as though they were criminals, and mounted policemen sent around to investigate their character and their manner of life during the previous five years. There may be, it is quite true, an occasional criminal amongst them. I do not deny that; but I take it that we ought not in any sense whatever to regard prospective citizens as probably criminal. Surely the very essence of the British law is that a man ought to be regarded as innocent until he is proven guilty; he ought to be regarded as a good citizen until some definite charge is laid against him. Coming before the county court is a dignified proceeding. The people in the neighbourhood of the applicant's home have a chance of registering their opinion of his character. The judge is a man who is able, presumably, to give a disinterested opinion upon the evidence presented. There is no imputation whatever, there is no inference, that the applicant is anything but a desirable alien citizen honourably seeking to acquire citizenship in this new land. Any change in the procedure which would make it even possible for the Secretary of State to send in an outsider to make inquiries among the neighbours of the applicant as to whether, possibly, he had done something that was wrong is a distinct lowering of the standard of citizenship which we ought to encourage in this country. For the sake of these tens of thousands of immigrants—many of whom those of us from the West know personally—I would ask that the citizenship of Canada should be placed on a higher plane; if so, I think that coming Canadians would, if necessary, gladly travel a hundred miles rather than submit to the inquisitorial methods proposed by these amendments.

Mr. BAXTER: I do not propose to discuss at all the technical questions which have arisen under the existing act. I am inclined to think that my right hon. leader has correctly interpreted that act. I only want to take the hour and a half or more that has been spent in trying to find out what a single paragraph of this act means as a text upon which to try, if I may, to emphasize to the House what I think was the wisdom of my suggestion the other day when this bill was before us, and that is that the measure should be reprinted and we should have here in one pamphlet exactly what it is intended the naturalization law of Canada shall be after this legislation is put through. We have spent an hour and a half debating as to what the present law may or may not mean, and I think I am not exaggerating when I say that there is not one individual here who is absolutely sure.

Mr. GERMAN: Several are absolutely sure.

Mr. BAXTER: All right, but they do not agree. I think this House will concur in the view that British citizenship is not a thing to be handed out like some cheap decoration, and that we do not want people coming to the shores of this country, with bombs in their pockets or criminal records, and being advanced by every possible sort of misguided sympathy to the status of Canadian citizenship.

Mr. JACOBS: They will have to carry the bombs in their pockets for five years.

Mr. BAXTER: They might find places of concealment. I think my hon. friend might show them places where they could conceal them for a time and then take them, if necessary, if there was an outbreak, for instance, in the city of Winnipeg.

The second point I should like to make is that while citizenship should not be given lightly to any one, the law ought to be so absolutely clear that there could be no room for misunderstanding either as to the conditions requisite for citizenship or the means to attain those conditions. I should like to see that in the bill. The other day I asked the minister if he would put in his bill the tribunal by which men are to be tried. Shall we have a branch of the Soviet, duly qualified to investigate people? Shall we go back to the days of the Terror and have a certain character of citizenship which will investigate the other citizens and demolish those who are unsatisfactory? Shall we have investigation by a secret police or by a judicial body? I look through this bill, and I do not find any clear-cut definition of what tribunal, by what means a man is to be adjusted to the citizenship which he proposes to assume. This is all left in the mind, in the discretion, in the magnanimity of the Secretary of State. That is precisely where I say it ought not to be. Judicial determination under the present system or the system of a few years ago, in my judgment—and I want to be frank and fair about this—was inadequate, because while I do not reflect upon the judges, while I think they did the best they could, there was not a dollar of the money of Canada spent, there was not the effort of a single official in Canada, as a sort of Crown proctor, to bring before them one solitary fact as regards the character of an applicant for citizenship. A man swore to formal affidavits; he presented himself before the court; he could be put through a certain cross-examination by the court, and the whole examination ended there. I think some of those who have gone on the roll of our citizenship might very well have tried to stand an inspection by members of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police or some other body accustomed to dealing with criminals. Many undoubtedly got through who should not have had citizenship. I should like to see that feature of the act strengthened; but I will say on the other hand that it is not consistent with liberty, justice or fair play that the measure of a man's citizenship shall change from day to day and hour to hour according to, perhaps, the political exigencies of the gentleman who may occupy the position of Secretary of State. There is not in Canada a man who, when an election is not on, would do anything other than reprobate the idea of having a vast piece of political machinery that could be made use of at a critical moment. It is not the government that makes 5 p.m. citizens; it is ourselves who make them. We admit them to confraternity with the rest of us. Give the people, through some sort of judicial institution, an opportunity of saying who is to be admitted to the brotherhood and who is to be excluded. But if the principle of this bill, if there be a principle in it, be adopted, we shall have either the knowledge of the law possessed by the gentleman who may be Secretary of State for the time being or his principal adviser, whoever he may be, or we may have the ignorance of the law, if unfortunately either of them should be succeeded by people who do not know the law. But whether it be knowledge or ignorance, what that department pronounces will be law, even though this parliament never enacted it, if we are to depend on government by order in council, by regulations made by the Secretary of State, by any Secretary of State, no matter how good a man he may be. What I am asking is that there should be written plain and large in the statute every condition that is necessary to enable the man to enter upon British citizenship, both the qualifications and the procedure. To find out this to-day, you have to go through four Canadian statutes and three Imperial statutes; it is necessary to refer from one to another. I ask that they be brought into this chamber, written together as they are to be acted upon, so that if an election was coming on A.B. can get the information he wants if he goes to some person interested in elections and says: "Can I vote? I was born under certain conditions, in the United States or a foreign country. My father was a British subject," and so on. "Have I a right to go on the roll? Can I swear that I am a British subject?" Hon. members have heard the discussion that has taken place this afternoon as to the powers of the Secretary of State. I have looked into the statutes to some extent, and I can assure the committee that the rest is as big a jumble with regard to the qualifications of a British subject as the bill is with regard to the powers of the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State will say that his powers are clear; other hon. members will say that they are not clear. Is that the condition of affairs we want to have when a man seeks to know on the eve of an election, simply whether he is or is not a British subject? This can be cleared up if we can get a comprehensive bill embracing all phases of the subject. We could get through a bill of that kind in a few hours, in less time than it has taken us to discuss what may or may not be the law. I asked for that the other day. It has been refused by the government on the ground that some thousands of dollars have been spent for forms. I should like to know this, and perhaps the Secretary of State will tell me: Was the government so sure that this bit of legislation would be adopted by this House; were the views that might be expressed by the rest of us with regard to this legislation so trivial and of so little concern that it was not worth while waiting for us to have a chance to express our opinions, but that a button was pushed, the Printing bureau began to operate and they got out tens of thousands of dollars worth of forms, saying that there would be a merely formal registration in this parliament because the minister was bringing down a bill? If so, do we count for very much here?

Mr. COPP: I think the hon. member has misconstrued the remarks I made.

Mr. BAXTER: Practically everybody seems to have done so.

Mr. COPP: I did not say that the printing was done because of the amendment I was introducing to-day. I said the printing was done because of the acts we have in force and if this was changed—it is not the amendment I referred to—

Mr. BAXTER: I will accept the reason which is the most compelling reason for letting this amendment stand until the forms are used up. Either we are at such an emergency that, in order to save our citizenship, we have to make a new law, and if we have to do that we must waste the forms; or if we have not the emergency, we can wait a while and use up the forms. This legislation would do quite as well next year. I have no personal motive against it; I am quite willing to help as far as I can in devising something that will be workable and fair and that will at the same time be a protection to our citizenship. But I ask that it all be made plain to the people who have to act under it and to the people who have to invoke its assistance. By to-day there could have been a print of all the acts, and put together; we could have had that on every desk, so that we could see what the law will be when the minister gets it through. You cannot tell by these references what it will be.

I am going to point out one simple thing. If hon. members will look at the bill, they will see on the right hand page of the bill what professes to be a summary of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1922. It is said that the sections we are asked to adopt are a reprint. Section 6 of the proposed bill is very nearly a reprint of section 3 of chapter 44 of the act of 1922 of the Imperial parliament. I do not like to have to deal with a technical matter of this sort because it is a little difficult to make it clear to the House. But if the House will have patience I will read one clause which, in copying the Imperial bill, my hon. friend has absolutely omitted. The clause is this:

> A copy of the principal act, with the amendments, whether by way of substitution, addition or omission required by this act, shall be prepared and certified by the clerk of parliament and deposited with the rolls of parliament; and his Majesty's printer shall print, in accordance with the copy so certified, all copies of the principal act which are printed after the commencement of this act.

There was the way they dealt with the matter in Great Britain, so that the people would have in one pamphlet the entire naturalization law. The Secretary of State told me the other day that his department would compile a pamphlet. I said I did not want a pamphlet made up by someone who was interpreting the law; I wanted a pamphlet that would reproduce, word for word, the law as this parliament makes it. Then if I have a view with regard to it and someone else has a different view we can go to a court and get the question straightened out. But if we have to act on the view of the Secretary of State or his deputy or anybody else we are simply bucking against bureaucracy and order in council government. I do not know whether it is one of those figments of the imagination in which we sometimes indulge, but I had thought that it was one of the claims of the Liberal party that they were opposed to order in council and bureaucratic legislation. I thought I had heard it repeated on many platforms that the business of parliament should be done here. I thought I heard my right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen) not only criticized but condemned, damned I might say everlastingly, because he ruled the country by order in council. But I do not find any great abatement of order in council government since the accession to power of my hon. friends opposite, and I find in this bill an absolute determination to put at the will of one man all the rights of citizenship in Canada and to do that by order in council and order in council only, without giving any necessary notice to the people whose rights are to be affected. If the House and the country want that sort of thing all they have to do is to take it; but I urge the members of this House to impress upon the minister that he either allow this legislation to stand over until next session or let it remain in abeyance for forty-eight hours at least until we can make a compilation of the statutes ourselves so that we may know what the legislation will be when the minister gets it into the shape in which he wants it. It has been utterly impossible since the bill was introduced, unless a man devoted his whole time to its consideration—and it would take half a day to go through the seven or eight or nine statutes that are all interlaced—to be able to form any kind of definite opinion as to what the law will be, unless we want to leave it in the pure, sheer ambiguity of order in council and the will of one individual who may be responsible at certain times only to party exigencies. The question for the country is this, I think: Shall naturalization be a matter of judicial determination upon a clear-cut, sane, well-known basis, open for every man to understand, or shall it be a matter of internal administration with the possibility of misuse for political purposes?

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend has made a number of suggestions and I was very sorry I could not see my way clear to accept the one he offered the other day in regard to the consolidation of the acts. He has made another suggestion to-day, asking for forty-eight hours in which to go over the various statutes himself and come to a conclusion as to what the law really is in regard to naturalization. I have a good idea of the law myself so far as I have been associated with its administration, but I would draw my hon. friend's attention to the fact that this parliament has for very many years, and with a great deal of reason and advantage, followed the acts of the Imperial parliament. And this is the exact form which the naturalization law takes in Great Britain; the application is made directly to the Home Secretary who makes an investigation and either grants or refuses the certificate. I am still convinced that the situation as I have outlined it is proper. I can quite understand a number of legal gentlemen at first blush being somewhat apprehensive of taking this matter from the purview of the judges; I was of the same frame of mind myself when the proposal was first made. But when I considered the matter thoroughly I came to see the very great advantage that must and would accrue if the system now proposed were adopted. However, this is not a matter of life and death, and there is no imperious necessity to dispose of it either to-day or to-morrow, or within forty-eight hours. I am quite willing to have hon. gentlemen thoroughly consider it. and indeed I should be glad to have them do so. I am prepared to let it stand over for forty-eight hours as my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. BOYS: Make it six months.

Mr. COPP: Well, that is hardly possible. I will therefore move that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. HANSON: Why not codify the law so that we could understand it?

Mr. BAXTER: My hon. friend is taking me literally in regard to my suggestion as to the length of time we might have to consider the matter; I hardly think that forty-eight hours would be adequate. Could we not have a reprint of the law as it will be in its final form so that we might have it all before us?

Mr. COPP: I will try to get that.

Mr. BAXTER: Thanks very much.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Will the minister be kind enough to see that a return is made to the questions I asked some time ago in regard to the correspondence between the Secretary of State and the county court judges of Vancouver on the question of naturalization? I should like to have that information before me before we resume consideration of this matter.

Mr. COPP: To what is my hon. friend referring?

Mr. McQUARRIE: A motion was passed some weeks ago for a return of correspondence between the Secretary of State and the county court judges of Vancouver with reference to the question of naturalization.

Mr. COPP: I shall be glad to see that the return is brought down.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I desire to have it before this matter is proceeded with.

Mr. McBRIDE: With reference to the question of naturalization certificates being issued on the authority of the judges, I would call the attention of the committee to a statement made by Judge Grant of Vancouver on the subject. He said that, "as long as I sit here as a judge I will always place the responsibility of granting naturalization on the Secretary of State and the government." When a member of the bench, who enjoys the respect that Judge Grant does, declares that he will always place the responsibility for granting naturalization on the government, I think that statement should go a long way to convince us that the Secretary of State is responsible for the citizenship of Canada; and if he is responsible I do not see why we should not leave the matter in his hands.

COLD STORAGE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved the third reading of Bill No. 9 to amend the Cold Storage Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

LIVE STOCK ACTS AMENDMENT

House in committee on Bill No. 10 to amend and consolidate the acts respecting live stock, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 2—Definitions, etc.

The CHAIRMAN: Subsection (f) of section 2 has been amended by the agricultural committee by adding thereto the following:

—or any area of land used for the accommodation of live stock at ocean ports of export which may be declared as stockyards by the minister under the provisions of this act.

Subsection (h) has been amended by adding thereto the words:

either directly or indirectly through a commission merchant.

Is it the pleasure of the committee that clause 2 as amended be carried?

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 3—Live stock exchange at stockyards, etc.

The CHAIRMAN: This section has been amended by striking therefrom all of subsection 3.

The following amendment has been substituted:

Any such person doing business at a stockyard who neglects to comply with the provisions of section fifteen of this act, or who, for cause, is adjudged by the minister to be liable to removal and exclusion therefrom, shall upon the order of the minister, directed to an inspector or other officer of the department, be removed and excluded from the said stockyard and from doing business thereat and shall not be permitted to return thereto until he procure a special permit from the minister.

Subsection 4 has been added as follows:

Any person refusing to comply with the terms of an order issued by the minister under the next preceding subsection shall be deemed a person within the meaning of, and subject to the penalties provided by and under section thirteen of this act.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 4—Bylaws of exchange to be approved:

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman, as to section 4, since this bill came out of the agricultural committee the advisability of adding further provisions to safeguard owners of live stock from being defrauded by commission men in the event of the latter defaulting has been brought to my attention by the hon. member for Calgary and the hon. member for Macleod. It was our intention to frame regulations for this purpose, but a number of hon. members prefer to have suitable provisions inserted in the act itself. I have no particular choice in the matter. The advantage of effecting the purpose by way of regulations is that these can be changed from time to time if they are found not workable, whereas the act itself can be amended only while parliament is in session. This amendment is to be added at the end of subsection 2 of section 4 of the bill, and reads as follows:

All moneys received on account of sales for stock sold by a commission firm on behalf of the owner thereof shall be deposited in an account in a bank, separate from the firm's private or other commercial accounts, and disbursements of such moneys shall be made only in accordance with regulations prescribed by the exchange and approved by the minister.

The object of this amendment is to provide against the recurrence of a number of losses that have been sustained by stockmen as the result of a commission agent having animals consigned to him, selling them on the market, and then placing the money to the credit of his bank account, this money being used by the bank to adjust the commission man's personal account so that it cannot be made available for the owner of the cattle sold. We can either put this provision in the bill or issue it in our regulations according to the wisdom of the committee. In order to bring the matter to a head, Mr. Chairman, I would move that this amendment be inserted at the end of subsection 2 of section 4.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 4 is amended by adding to subsection 3 the words:

in such manner and to such extent as may be required.

An amendment has been proposed to subsection 2 of section 4 in the form moved by the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. SPENCE: Does the word "stock" mean live stock only? If it applies to anything else I would be opposed to the amendment. I do not see why it should be inserted anyhow, because a commission man who is labouring under financial difficulties would not get very many consignments of cattle to sell. It is ridiculous that a man should be expected to keep separate bank accounts, and I can see no necessity for such a requirement.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, it does not apply to anything but live stock.

Mr. SPENCE: That had better be made clear in the bill. The minister says the bank might take this portion of its customers' money and apply it to his indebtedness. It might do that with any account.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Possibly the word "live" should be inserted before "stock" in the first line.

Mr. FORKE: I have known of cases where people lost one carload or two or three carloads of stock in connection with a supposedly reliable firm; they did not know anything was wrong with the firm until the collapse occurred. My own brother lost over $1,000 as a drover, so that I think something should be done in the matter.

Mr. SPENCE: This will not save the situation, I am afraid.

Mr. FORKE: It may not; I do not know whether you can compel them to place that amount in the bank otherwise than to their own credit. But something should be done if possible.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is not a new difficulty; we have been discussing it at our conventions for years. This seems to be the best solution that has been suggested; if it does not work satisfactorily we can easily amend it. I am satisfied to try the provision in the act; it can do no harm and I think it can do a lot of good.

Mr. GOULD: In connection with section 13 as relating to subsection 2 of section 4, I should like to offer a word. Section 13 says:

> Any person violating any provision of this act or of any regulation thereunder, shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding four hundred dollars, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months, or to both fine and imprisonment.

This is the provision for penalty. It is often the case that individuals in the West will send four, five or six carloads of stock from one farm or co-operative shipments may be sent forward and are handled by a commission firm, the sum involved in each case being some $5,000 or $6,000. It seems to me that if an individual wished to transgress the law he could appropriate thousands of dollars and $400 would be a very small penalty indeed. If a man wished to be crooked or deal unfairly, and took five or six or ten thousand dollars, he would willingly pay his $400. I think that penalty might be increased.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This precaution is in addition to the bond that he already has to give.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 12—Regulations:

Mr. MOTHERWELL: When the bill was in committee paragraph (d) was discussed from many angles and the article of wool was in one day and out the next. It is in now and since the bill came from the committee representations have been made to the department by members of this House indicating that in so far as imported wool is concerned it is physically impossible to grade it, and therefore what is the use of including it here? It was pointed out that it was brought in in large bales rendering it impossible to be inspected or graded, and as it was bought by the one intending to use it, it was consequently a matter between him and the shipper. I think, therefore, that the word "wool" should be deleted wherever it occurs in paragraph (d) as being an embarrassment to the importer and of no good to anyone else.

Mr. EULER: I would move, Mr. Chairman, that paragraph (d) be amended by striking out the word "wool" in lines 31 and 35.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I move to amend paragraph (f) to read as follows:

> The manner in which calves are to be subjected to ante-mortem inspection, and the manner in which calves condemned by inspectors shall be disposed of.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. LADNER: Before this section carries, I believe the hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) had something to say in connection with it. He is not here just at the moment. Has the minister considered the conflicting sections between this act and the Animal Contagious Diseases Act with respect to meats and some other things.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Oh yes, we have had that under consideration.

Mr. LADNER: Are the provisions of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act or the operations under that act, wherever they conflict with this act, to prevail?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have taken precautions to see that they do not conflict.

Mr. LADNER: What precautions?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In the drafting.

Mr. LADNER: How do you distinguish between meat under the Animals Contagious Diseases Act and meat under this act?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Which subsection does my hon. friend refer to?

Mr. LADNER: I refer to the paragraph in the interpretation clause:

> "Live Stock" means meat cattle, sheep and swine and poultry.

The CHAIRMAN: I might point out we are on section 13 now. Section 2 was passed a very considerable time ago.

Mr. LADNER: We have not passed section 12 yet, and section 12 purports to give power to the Governor in Council to regulate these things by order in council. It deals with the procedure, which is the vital thing. It may be that an inspector under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act would be carrying on his duties and another inspector under this act would authorize and pass out of the stockyard certain stock, and that when that stock gets one hundred and fifty miles out the inspector under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act suspects it of some disease. Whose authority would prevail in that case?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: These two inspections have an entirely different purpose in view. With regard to the Canned Meats Act the inspection is primarily from a sanitary standpoint The inspection under this act is for the purpose of determining the quality of the meat; not its sanitary character. The two do not conflict in the least degree. I think the hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) was quite satisfied with this when it was in committee.

Mr. LADNER: He was not satisfied last evening when I was discussing the matter with him. I do not think the minister has really answered the question. The point is this. He says that under this act it is a question of quality that the inspector passes on. Now under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act it is a question of disease. In what way are the duties of these inspection departments to be co-ordinated so that they will not both be working on an animal at a certain time, and in order that both can carry on their duties conveniently?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think their duties will conflict. Even under the Canned Meats Act, if I remember rightly, the inspection of the carcase is sufficient. When it has been inspected and approved by the officers of the department after the animal is slaughtered, it is recognized as being all right for canning purposes. It is entirely a question of quality of grade, if you like to call it that as to whether the meat is fit for caning purposes.

Mr. LADNER: Is it not possible to have some system of inspection under which there will not be any confusion between two separate departments?

[Mr. Ladner.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Does my hon. friend mean separate branches of the same department?

Mr. LADNER: Yes, certainly.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There has been some conflict but owing to friendly co-operation there has not been any friction in the past. Sometimes there has been overlapping, to some extent but we generally overcome that by working in as amicable a manner as possible and there has been no particular friction.

Mr. LADNER: I believe there is sometimes lack of co-operation, and there comes a time when the authority of the inspector who has to deal with diseases might conflict with the authority of the inspector under this act. Under those circumstances I submit that the authority of the former should prevail.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think the hon. gentleman is quite right. If there is any conflict of authority the question of sanitation should receive the first consideration. If my hon. friend has any suggestions to make I would be very glad to receive them and see whether they can be incorporated in the act.

Mr. LADNER: I think the minister and myself agree on that point. Now, is there any provision in the act—if not one will be suggested—whereby there can be no difference in interpretation as to who has the authority? If so what is the provision in question?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Do you mean that there should be a provision of that nature in the act?

Mr. LADNER: Certainly.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We will consider the proposition and see whether anything of that nature is required. In the meantime we can leave the bill in committee.

Mr. TOLMIE: In this connection I think that every possible effort should be made to guard against any clashing of authority. The authority as between the two branches—the Live Stock branch and the Health of Animals branch—should be quite clear and well defined. Let me point out the importance of that. In the event of an outbreak, or even a suspected outbreak, of disease in any of the live stock yards throughout the country any clashing of authority might result in very serious loss to Canada. Take for instance the outbreak of foot and mouth disease which occurred in the United States in 1914. Here there was a slowness in diagnosis, a clashing of state and federal authorities with the result that before they got through the disease had extended to some twenty-two states, with a loss of $20,000,000 to the country. It was with a view to avoiding anything of that kind that I think the authority as between the Health of Animals branch and the Live Stock branch should be clearly defined. In the case of disease, or suspected disease, the Health of Animals branch should be able to step in at once and take control and in that way prevent, perhaps, very serious loss to the live stock industry of the country. This is particularly important because we have an understanding with the United States under which we have worked very amicably for a number of years. An outbreak of foot and mouth disease in this country would mean the quarantining of the American ports against our live stock, and, possibly, would also tie up our export overseas. The committee will readily realize how important this work is. I was upstairs preparing an amendment to this bill and had I got down in time should have moved it. I had no idea the bill was coming up quite so soon. However, I will be glad to let the minister have a copy. I will read this amendment which I desire to have added at the end of the bill. It is as follows:

18A. Notwithstanding the provisions in this act or any other act or law pertaining to or relating to live stock or in connection with live stock yards, it is hereby enacted that in every case where in the opinion of a veterinary inspector duly appointed in accordance with the provisions of the Animals' Contagious Diseases Act, a contagious disease or contagious diseases of animals exist, or are suspected to exist, the Animal Contagious Diseases Act and amendments thereto and the provisions therein shall prevail as against this act or all or any other act or acts relating to or pertaining to live stock or live stock yards as defined herein.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That will come in at the end of the bill—is that the idea?

Mr. TOLMIE: That is the idea.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 12 is carried.

On section 20—Repeal:

Mr. GOULD: I wish to make some further reference to the matter of penalties. The minister, in reply to the illustration which I gave, said that commission men were always bonded. That is true but the fact of their being bonded has not prevented them from infringing the act in the past. If a commission man has acted improperly in a case where money has been entrusted to him in the past the imposition of a paltry fine of four or five hundred dollars is not likely to act as a serious deterrent in the future.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What the hon. gentleman says is quite correct but in our commercial relations with each other we have always to take a business risk. Now, this risk has been been reduced to a minimum—first by requiring a bond and second by the precaution of opening a special account. There is also the penalty which has been referred to. If my hon. friend has any suggestions to make looking to further precautions I will be glad to discuss the matter with him. What can we do beyond enacting the provisions set forth here? The man is bonded; he is restricted as to the disposition he will make of the money entrusted to him; if he violates the law he is fined. We might provide a further punishment, we might hang him, but that would not help the man who lost the money any more than would the imposition of a fine. I will talk the matter over with the hon. member for Assiniboia and see if any further provision can be made to secure the owner of the cattle against further losses. There have been losses in the past. There is no question but that very considerable loss has taken place, and we want now to adopt safeguards as adequate as human ingenuity can suggest.

Mr. GOULD: It is not my intention to ask the minister to hold the bill in committee; I think he understands the circumstances of the case thoroughly well. As I have stated, there have been these occurrences in the past; there is a possibility of their being repeated. The tendency of producers in the West is to go more and more into co-operation in the shipment of cattle. Instead of the carloads that formerly were shipped, there will be whole train loads going forward. It is not a question of a shipment valued merely at $1,000; the amount now involved runs into $10,000 or $20,000. I think the penalties in this case should be increased. The fine might remain at $400 but there should be a maximum, say, of $1,000; and the security should be on a graduated scale proportionate to the liability which rests on the commission man.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: As I have already intimated we will leave the bill in committee for the present. My attention has been drawn to the further fact that in addition to the precautions contained in the bill, and the fact that an offender can be fined, there is this further fact that he can be expelled from the exchange, so that the offence cannot be repeated. But that does not meet my hon. friend's representation, nor do I think it can be met if we undertake to increase the bond from $10,000, because this would simply increase the cost to the commission men that much more. I will, however, look into the matter to see whether the bond can be raised to advantage without embarrassing the trade generally.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 136, to amend the Immigration Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the few amendments we are proposing to the act are merely to make it conform to changed conditions. Some sections with respect to alien enemies are being amended, and in the case of section 41 we are reverting to the old section in substitution of the amended section of two years ago. We are also increasing the fines from $10 to $20 where shipmasters are negligent in reporting desertion.

Mr. JACOBS: What is the change in section 41?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We revert to old section 4 of two years ago.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

MONTREAL COLD STORAGE

Mr. THOMPSON:

1. Is the Montreal Cold Storage a national institution?
2. To what extent is it financed by the government and at what rate of interest?
3. What are the net results (profit or loss) on the operating expenses of this storage for its first year's operations?
4. How will deficits be met, and in event of loss will harbour dues be increased to meet same?
5. Are the rates charged by the Montreal commission lower than other public cold storages charged previous to opening the Montreal commission's plant?
6. Is it the intention of the government to subsidize cold storages to be operated by co-operative associations in various parts of the country with the idea of having a chain of storages in the country to supply the Montreal Cold Storage and thus have all under government control?
7. Would there be any discrimination against private individuals or corporations who might desire a subsidy for a cold storage plant, or is it intended to assist only rural communities that are organized?
8. Has any provision been made for the continuance of a subsidized cold storage in case of disorganization of the co-operative societies?
9. In the event of public cold storages being closed as a result of competition is there likely to be any increase in the rates charged by the Montreal commission?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. The Harbour Commissioners of Montreal have at that port a cold storage plant in addition to other cold storage plants at Montreal.

2. The building of this plant was financed to the extent of $2,765,000 out of money loaned by the government under statutory authority and secured by debentures bearing interest at 5 per cent.

3. Operation and maintenance, 7 months, $113,789.62; interest on cost of construction, 7 months, $80,665.60; total receipts for 7 months, $55,416.45.

4. It is confidently expected that the plant will in future be self-sustaining, but any deficit that may occur will be met from general harbour revenues without increasing harbour dues.

5. The rates charged by the harbour commissioners' cold storage plant are the same as those charged by the other cold storage plants in Montreal, with the exception that in the case of the former no charge is made for insurance.

6. No.

7. The Cold Storage Act, as approved by the Committee on Agriculture and Colonization, provides that subsidies be paid only on account of municipal and co-operative cold storages.

8. No provision has been made for the continuance of a subsidized cold storage in case of disorganization of the co-operative societies, but the act will provide that the government shall hold a lien on the cold storage for the full amount of the subsidy.

9. There is no likelihood whatever of the rates in the harbour commissioners cold storage plant being increased if the other cold storages become closed as a result of competition, the intention of the harbour commission being to make the charges for this service as low as they possibly can, having regard to revenue requirements.

CANADIAN VICKERS

1. What investment, if any, has the government in the plant of Canadian Vickers?

3. What has been the net revenue obtained from same?

Hon. Mr. FIELDING:

In accordance with section 4 of the Income War Tax Act payments made under the Business Profits War Tax Act are deducted from the amount of taxes that would otherwise be payable under the Income War Tax Act; also as the administration of both acts is conducted by the same staff the answers hereinafter given relate to the collections and expenses in these provinces under the two acts combined.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT LOANS

Mr. ARTHURS:

Referring to Hansard, page 2029, the Minister of Immigration stated, first column, that the total amount loaned under the Soldier Settlement Act was $94,993,421.38. At the foot of the second column he made the statement that the amount of money expended on loans was:—

Year	Loans
1918-1919	$ 1,383,391 82
1919-1920	42,715,374 34
1920-1921	22,833,186 29
1921-1922	11,501,160 09
	$78,433,112 54

What is the explanation for the difference in the amounts?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The loan disbursements for Fiscal Year 1920-1921 should read $32,833,186.29 and not $22,833,-186.29; also the total loan disbursements quoted in the previous column ($94,933,421.-38) are up to January 31, 1923. Therefore, if the amount disbursed from April 1, 1922, to January 31, 1923, ($6,560,308.84) is added, the statement printed in column 1, Page 2,106 will be found to be correct, viz:

Year	Loans
1918-1919	$ 1,383,391 82
1919-1920	42,715,374 34
1920-1921	32,833,186 29
1921-1922	11,501,160 09
1922 to January 31, 1923	6,560,308 84

THETFORD MINES STRIKE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JACOBS: Is the government able to give us any information in regard to the strike at Thetford Mines?

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the first information received by the government in regard to this strike was this morning in a letter from the correspondent of the department at Thetford Mines. The strike appears to have started on Monday morning, some four hundred men being concerned. The company has closed the mines, and the employees so far have refused to consider returning to work unless and until the manager is removed. The provincial government is looking into the situation. That is all the information we have at the present time. My department has an officer on the spot making further inquiries to see if we can assist in settling the trouble.

SHIRE HORSES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ELLIOTT (South Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I notice in to-day's Citizen a news item to the effect that the horses donated to Canada by the Shire Breeders of Great Britain have arrived at the Experimental Farm and will be kept there for a few days, their ultimate destination being Lacombe, Alberta. I should like to ask the minister (Mr. Motherwell)—unfortunately he is not in his seat at the moment—if it is the intention of his department to send all of these horses out to the West, or will any of them be retained in Ontario for the improvement of the breed in this province?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sorry that the hon. Minister of Agriculture is not in his seat at the moment, but I shall have pleasure in directing his attention to the question which my hon. friend has asked.

VANCOUVER FISHERY PATROL

UNITED STATES SCHOONER SILOAM FIRED ON BY PROTECTION STEAMER MALASPINA

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JACOBS: Can the government give us any information with respect to the killing of two American citizens by the crew of a Canadian patrol boat off Vancouver Island yesterday?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): A preliminary report has been prepared in connection with this incident. Here is what has been supplied to me:

The fishery protection steamer Malaspina, Captain Newcombe in command, sighted the United States schooner Siloam, of Seattle, engaged in fishing within one mile of Solander island. Upon sighting the schooner, the captain blew three whistles, the usual signal for the schooner to stop. No attention having been paid this signal, the Malaspina fired three blank shots across the bow of the schooner. The latter continuing, two solid shots were fired across the bow, but still no attention from the schooner. The captain of the Malaspina at this point hailed the captain of the schooner again, requesting him to stop, but he declined to do so. Two solid shots were then fired but missed, after which the Malaspina demanded that the schooner stop, warning the captain that if these instructions were not obeyed the vessel would be sunk. The schooner persisted in paying no attention to this warning, consequently no alternative was left to the captain of the Malaspina but to fire a rifle volley at the pilot house.

Unfortunately a man was wounded, but the schooner stopped and the schooner's boat brought the wounded man to the Malaspina and then headed for the shore. The report continues.

The Malaspina lowered a boat at once and a line was put on board the schooner, when it was discovered that the crew had scuttled her before leaving. The Malaspina then endeavoured to tow her, although full of water, and obtain medical aid for the wounded man. The Mounted Police and other authorities were notified and tried to arrest the four other men of the schooner's crew who had escaped.

It is the opinion of the officers of the department that these men are not American citizens, though they were on an American schooner; they are probably foreigners. We will have a final and more complete report in a short time.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

Mr. ANDERSON: I placed two questions on the order paper on 5th March. These questions were passed as orders for returns and appear in the votes and proceedings of 7th March. I should like to know when I may expect to receive an answer to these questions?

Mr. FIELDING: The questions were in a form which seemed to us to be incomplete. If the hon. member had in proper course moved his motion I would have asked an amendment which would have covered all the ground he wished to cover, and something more. The matter, of course, can only be brought up in its proper order. If the hon. member attaches importance to it, I would arrange with him as to what the amendment should be and we can bring down the return even yet.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If I caught the minister's remarks, he does not propose, without an amendment, to bring down a return which has been ordered by the House?

Mr. FIELDING: My right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) is wrong; the return has not been ordered by the House?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was the statement of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Anderson).

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. FIELDING: No, I do not think he meant that. The motion was put on the order paper and the hon. member was not here when it was called; at all events it was not moved in its proper order. My recollection is that it is still on the order paper as a notice of motion.

Mr. ANDERSON: They are in the Votes and Proceedings, and one has been passed as an order for return. The statement in the Votes and Proceedings of March 7th is that an order of the House had been issued to the proper officers to prepare the information asked for in the notice of motion.

Mr. FIELDING: Possibly I have the wrong impression in mind; I will look into the matter. Certainly, the order I had in mind stood as a notice of motion. In view of the hon member's statement, however, I will make inquiries.

Mr. ANDERSON: There was also a question in my name which stood as notice of motion for an order for return. Then there was also an order of the House which was the result of a notice of motion.

Mr. FIELDING: Perhaps I have been referring to the wrong one. If so, my remarks have been out of place.

ILLICIT LIQUOR TRAFFIC

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. WOODSWORTH: A number of papers in the United States and Canada are calling attention to the conditions which exist with regard to the rum running traffic. It is claimed that Canada is being used as a base for this illicit traffic from this country to the United States, and further that the new regulations are not at all effective in preventing this evil. I should like to ask whether the government is bringing in any measures with a view to dealing effectively with this matter?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government is exercising every care to see that the existing regulations are carried out. Thus far it has not been possible to devise more effective means than those we already have. It is probable that some of these reports are not well founded. However, I shall have pleasure in directing the attention of the minister to the matter and having it looked into further.

FRENCH TREATY

BILL TO RATIFY—DEBATE ON SECOND READING CONCLUDED

The House resumed from Thursday, April 19, the debate on the motion of Hon. Mr.

Fielding for the second reading of Bill No. 23, respecting a certain Convention of Commerce between His Majesty and the French Republic.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to continue, though I fear my remarks will have to be brief, the discussion of the second reading of the French Treaty Bill. At the last sitting I called attention to the valuable concessions this country had given, concessions that aggregated a loss in revenue unquestionably amounting to between half a million and a million dollars—revenue that was derived from the users of undoubted luxuries and now must be made up by taking more or declining to take less from the pockets of the users of undoubted necessities. The price we pay does not end there. The price we pay involves as well disabilities upon primary producers of this country, producers of wines, producers, or contemplated and quite practical producers, of silks and many commodities in respect of which we now have remaining little more than a nominal duty against the importation. Every single item that appears in the schedules of the treaty affecting goods coming to Canada is a real item; every one is an item of some importance; many of them are items of major importance. The French negotiators did not consider that printer's ink was of particular value in a treaty; they wanted concessions that were concessions, and they got them. They did not think of the wisdom of going back to their parliament with a long list of articles which even their parliament would know nothing about, such as was the course pursued by our representatives.

I want now to dwell on what we obtain which is alleged to be of value in the treaty; and I will not need to be detailed at all. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) has placed upon Hansard figures taken from our export and import returns that bear directly on the value of this treaty on both sides, on the value of every concession or of everything that is supposed to be a concession to us. All that has been said about the treaty, assuming everything the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has uttered to be correct, does not shatter in the least degree the case made by the hon. member for Lincoln. The Minister of Finance says, "Oh, we get concessions here in respect of certain goods asked to be reduced by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association," and he read a list of those goods, undoubtedly articles in respect of which he has already had the duty reduced down to the American level, in some cases down to the minimum tariff, but in all cases to the American level, and he says: Look at that for a triumph! Is not that something worth while? Those articles, he says, are not to be treated with scorn as the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) treated them. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lincoln treated no article that the minister mentioned with scorn, not at all. He admitted they were concessions. But are they of much value? Surely ministers do not come here and say they sat for three, four or five months in Paris trying to get a few spare parts of implements down to the American level of duty.

Take the minister's speech and read the articles to which he attributes so much importance—certain portions of agricultural implements, canvass for binders, magnetos for another implement that we sell to France, that is for automobiles, and other articles of similar kind. Read the list from beginning to end and I venture to say that there is not one article that the French people would not readily have reduced to the American level in their own interests for reasons that are so obvious that we would not need to send anybody to France. These articles are binder canvasses, canvass straps, magnetos, ordinary cast iron spares, straight solid steel shafts, tubular bored straight shafts, spark plugs and certain articles of a similar character in iron and steel. The French people are using the completed products of these goods. They have our binders, our mowers, our automobiles, and they found they could not get these spare parts except over a prohibitive duty. Why, the French people, one would think, would be at the door of their government to have these articles reduced. But it is worth something to Canada. No one disputes that it is of some value to the manufacturers of these goods, and they would ask for it, but it is no triumph for the Canadian negotiators and no real concession on the part of France. Grant the reduced duties on these articles, and everything the Minister of Finance has mentioned, and in sight of that meagre array just let us bring to our minds what the Minister of Finance has given.

I will refer in a moment to the contention of the minister that he could not do any better, that he did the best he could. But it is surely worth while for us to compare the conditions under this treaty with the conditions that existed before. If it is not, then the Minister of Finance simply raises the white flag and he says: We have got to do what every high tariff country in this world tells us; we have to do it; we have to bow down and submit to the exactions which any country wishes to impose. If the treaty we have with them is not good enough for them and they want something more to their advantage, all they have to do is to say so. That on the plea that he could do no better is the position of the Minister of Finance.

No, Mr. Speaker, we must compare the conditions under this treaty with the conditions that existed before, and I say that we would be infinitely better off without this treaty and have the conditions that existed before; and if France wants to get rid of the conditions that existed before, surely we are not going to proclaim that we are absolutely without weapons while France has all the weapons in her hands.

The minister has his schedule A in respect of which he has the French minimum tariff. Well, the French minimum tariff may be of value on certain goods, and may be of no value at all on other goods, and I venture to say that the Minister of Finance has not secured one single reduction in respect of schedule A, his best schedule, that is of any substantial value to the Dominion of Canada. But it is his best schedule. Most of our exports are under that schedule, the body of our exports that go to France to-day are under the general tariff, the general tariff being as regards them the same as the minimum tariff. Surely the minister was not afraid that there would be a penalty duty imposed against Canada. Our wheat, our grain and all these things that we export in tremendous quantities do not go very much into France, it is true, because the duty is so high, but they are our chief exports. The French general tariff is the same on them as their minimum tariff, and on the first page of Schedule A which embraces 65 per cent of the exports of Canada, the minister has secured reductions on five articles not one dollar of which we ever send to France, and the exports of Canada in relation to all of them and the possibilities of exports, well, they are almost negligible. They amount to nothing at all. Relative to the trade of the nation they are merely chicken feed, and the same applies to page 2 and page 3 of schedule A. The minister has nothing for this country on these pages. Go over them one after the other. I think the total number of articles that come after page 1 of schedule A on which the minister has secured reductions is 19, and you can go over them one after another and you will find in nearly all cases, and in all cases of consequence, that we are buyers of the same goods from France or from the world, and in many cases from France herself, buyers in large amounts, and not exporters at all. Where we are exporters it is in trifling sums, and very little or nothing to France. Now what value is such a schedule to this country? Is it worth while paying an annual sum of from five hundred thousand to a million dollars for? Is it so worth while when we must throw down our bars on luxuries to Japan, to Italy, to Switzerland and all of some eleven favoured nations?

Mr. McMASTER: Does the right hon. leader of the Opposition mean to infer that it is an expense to the Canadian people to get goods at a lower cost?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes I do, when we have to pay extra on goods that we need far more. I wonder if the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) was in the Liberal convention in which they solemnly resolved to tax luxuries? He was there. Now he is going to support a bill which reduces the tax on luxuries and consequently imposes a heavier tax on necessaries. That is what I am against.

Now leaving schedule A, which is the best schedule, we have nothing at all that compares with the concessions granted—nothing at all. I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that in respect to schedule B there are at least twenty-five penalties imposed on us the injury to Canada as regards any one of which is greater than all that we get in the whole of schedule A. In schedule B there are thirty articles, our large exports many of them, exports of which we send a substantial quantity to France, in respect of which the minister has gone over and yielded to the demand of France for a far higher duty than existed before. I say again, you can take not all of them upon which the tariff against us is raised by this treaty—there are about three not of very great consequence, but not more than three—there are twenty-five at any rate that are of outstanding consequence, and all of them or nearly all are of consequence to the agricultural producers of Canada. Is this the way to get wider markets? How are hon. gentlemen who are down here on a crusade for wider markets going to go home to their constituencies and say: The first vote I had on any treaty for wider markets I cast to curtail and contract the markets for the agricultural products of our country, but I did it because the Minister of Finance told me that when another country had a higher tariff than we had, we simply had to do it and that if we pursued a low tariff doctrine, the same thing is what we would have to do every time. Such is the answer they will have to make to their constituents as to why they voted for this contraction of the agricultural products markets of this country. The hon.

member for Brome shakes his head. Does he not see in this treaty agricultural products and manufactures of agricultural products one by one to at least twenty with the French duty raised against them, and he cannot point to one agricultural product with the duty lowered? Now he shakes his head; let him speak.

Mr. McMASTER: I point out a well-known economic fact—that if you allow goods to come into your country at a low rate of duty you help the exports from your country to the country from which the exports come.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I see. So by reducing our duty on brandy we help our exports of meat.

Mr. McMASTER: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I see.

Mr. McMASTER: That is a well-known economic law. Of course, I would not say that brandy was a wise example.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would not think so —nor is silk, nor anything else that we reduce.

Mr. McMASTER: But it is correct economics.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the hon. member also explain how, by lowering the duties on embroideries and silks, of which we import millions of dollars worth, we are going to help the farmer to sell his cattle?

Mr. McMASTER: Exactly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We will? With the tariff raised against us on cattle?

Mr. McMASTER: Exactly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We cannot help but bow in admiration before the optimism of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). Yes, in every respect the farmers, through this treaty, have barriers put up against them. They have had to submit to the erection of higher barriers against the sale of the agricultural products of this country; against poultry, against meats, against potatoes, against vegetables, against condensed milk, against stock, against the main agricultural exports of Canada save grain alone. In respect of grain they have the general tariff of France and nothing more. In respect of live animals we have not yet succeeded in selling any to France.

Mr. McMASTER: Any what?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Any live animals. As regards those we have a higher tariff even than we had before. The possibility of widening our markets for stock in France is stopped. If we could not sell any in the face of a tariff of 20 francs, we are not likely to sell any in the face of a tariff of 21½ francs. In other cases we have to face a duty of 100 per cent more than we previously had; and a duty of 50 per cent more is frequently found in this new French tariff. And this is what we are asked to submit to. We are asked to take this because—in the words of the Finance Minister—after five months' work he could not for the life of him get anything better. Now, I want hon. gentlemen to reflect upon our position in that regard. The Canadian ministers had, in order to maintain that this is a low tariff country, in order to save the face of the Minister of Finance—who has been preaching low tariff in opposition and binding himself to general reductions every time he got on his feet—they had to curtail and contract the export market for the agricultural products of Canada. What a fine confession to make to the agricultural producers of this country. I can imagine the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries sitting beside the statesmen of France negotiating this treaty as one by one these articles were produced. Condensed milk was laid before the Minister of Finance and he was told, "You will have to submit to 50 per cent more duty, half as much again, on this; you will have to submit to a higher duty on live stock; you will have to submit to a duty of half as much again, or more, on meats and vegetables of which we export large amounts representing a value of millions". The minister, I fancy, protested, and kept on protesting for five months, but the French negotiators sat there with the Liberal platform in their pockets. They had the Liberal convention report, they had the resolution moved by the minister himself in this House, and they said to him, "What do you propose to do if we increase these duties?"; —and the minister could not say that he would raise the tariff against French luxuries imported into this country. If he did they would laugh at him. He could not even protest against higher duties on articles going into France. The French negotiators would say to him, "You have been arguing in your parliament for years that the putting up of duties by us only hurts ourselves" and so he could not complain; he did not have a word to say for himself. All the French negotiators needed to have was simply the record of the speeches of the Minister of Finance in this parliament, the record of his resolutions, and they would be still better armed with a copy of that precious document the report of the Liberal convention of 1919. Faced with these things the minister was helpless, and that is

Will the minister suggest to me anything, save those things that he gets under Schedule A, that is of value to this country? I do not know of anything that he gets that is of value anyway to the agriculturists of Canada. He does get something that is better in respect to certain manufactured products which I have named; but even in getting them he does not secure any concession from France which could not have been secured with far less trouble and infinitely less sacrifice on the part of the government of Canada.

I want again to inquire why the Minister of Finance comes to this parliament with an illusion, a grotesque pact—a poor, helpless treaty, surrounded and buried in pure padding? "Oh," he says, "We may make some of these things some day." Is that a real excuse for having these articles in the treaty? I turn the minister's attention to a page and a half containing over one hundred articles, page 21 and half of 22, and I take the chance of saying to the minister now that he cannot tell me what one of those articles is. I will go further. I venture to suggest that there is not a member of the government that has the faintest idea what one out of those one hundred articles is at all. I admit that I do not, and I do not know where to find out.

Mr. McMASTER: How could anybody else expect to know if the minister does not?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Maybe the member for Brome would and for the purpose of this inquiry, although not for any other purpose, I will include him as a member of the government—will he give the information to this House? All this was done simply to cover the surrender of our interests that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries made in their negotiations; it was done simply to cover up the surrender of our real interests under this copious pact of page after page of articles the nature of which none of us know and the names of which we cannot even pronounce. I invite any member of this House to take some of these products with names of thirty or forty letters and practise for half a day the pronouncing of them. I conjecture the result would be that nobody could tell what he was saying. This is a feature of the treaty we have entered into.

Mr. McMASTER: The value of a pharmacopœia does not depend upon its pronunciability.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. member tell me the value of even one of these one hundred articles. On the authority of the best chemist we can find—

Mr. McMASTER: Dr. Sheard?

Mr. MEIGHEN: —we are assured that none of them was ever made in this country. In a letter that was read to the House at the last session the best chemist in the country stated that although these products are made in some other land none of them was ever produced in Canada save one and that the ingredients for this one exception all had to be imported. Yet this is supposed to be a treaty. But the matter is serious. In respect of real exports from Canada it is very serious. We are going to suffer a handicap from the day this treaty goes into effect onward because of the surrender of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; and all we have to weigh is, whether the reasons for the surrender were such that we should now accept this treaty as part of the inevitable. That is all we have to weigh. Nobody disputes that we are injured by this treaty. The Minister of Finance himself in his speech says that the French people were not willing to compete with us as favourably as they were back in 1907 when he made his previous treaty.

There was a temporary extension of the 1907 treaty with some alterations in 1921—a very good extension under all the circumstances. This was in effect when the Minister of Finance went over, and he said France was not ready to treat on so favourable a basis as in that, which is another way of admitting that he has brought back worse conditions than he took over. There is no use labouring the matter further, but I venture to say any hon. member of this House who will examine the schedules and our exports will place a far greater value upon what this country loses by the treaty than did the Minister of Finance.

But he says we have secured on some articles the schedules already accorded the United States. Now I do not dispute—and the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) did not dispute—that this was worth something, but is it something for which we should make large—very large—concessions to France? Why, let me ask, should we be penalized by France as between ourselves and the United States of America? I should like hon. members to reflect on that and try to answer. Does any hon. member know why the United States should enjoy, for no concession whatever, for no pretence of a concession, in the face of a policy that definitely denies a concession, something that Canada can only secure by granting heavy concessions? Would it be much of a triumph if the Minister of Finance had come back with equal conditions as between this country and the United States in the tariff of France? I do not think it would. But that he has not obtained—not by a very long way. The United States are not letting silks, embroideries, satins, brandies and champagnes, and all these other products into their country, the way we are doing in Canada. They are not imposing taxes on necessaries in order that they may relieve the consumers of luxuries. They are not doing such things in order to get, as they do get, everything we are getting by this treaty.

I wish to refer to another phase. When we grant to France the right to send her silks to Canada at a certain rate of duty, we grant the same thing to eleven favoured nations, with the result that in case after case we are making far more concessions to the other countries than we are making to France herself.

Mr. McMASTER: Does that hurt France?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Undoubtedly it does—and it hurts us. It merely puts more taxes on the users of necessaries in our country. If it does not hurt Canada, if it helps Canada, why leave any tariff on? That is where the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) is, but not where the Minister of Finance stands. Who is going to argue that it is a benefit to us to maintain our taxes on necessaries and reduce our taxes on luxuries? The supporter of this treaty is bound so to maintain, or to admit, that we make very serious concessions for worse than nothing.

Mr. GOOD: Why could we not collect some of our taxes in some other way than by transferring the duties from luxuries to necessaries?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the Minister of Finance will have to do just that. But the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) must remember that last year the way he increased taxes was chiefly by a 50 per cent increase in the sales tax, which came on everybody. Does the member for Brant hope to reduce the sales tax by relieving the users of luxuries of their taxes? Indeed he does not. He shakes his head honestly in the negative. If we do not get an increased sales tax this year, to make up what we are losing under this, or if we do not get a reduction when we should otherwise get it, it is because of the blunders of the concessions of this treaty, and he who votes for the treaty votes to shut the door on the reduction of our sales tax, and he votes to shut the door against relief on the necessaries of life. Of course the Minister of Finance knows that just to the extent this treaty operates that is what he is doing.

Mr. McMASTER: Not necessarily.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the plan proposed by the hon. member for Brome?

Mr. McMASTER: I think, perhaps, the leader of the Opposition might realize that even in silks the reduction of duty might mean increased imports, and might mean greater revenue raised.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It might, but the Minister of Finance himself estimates that it will be $850,000 less. In any event I am not quite able to understand just how this country is going to get richer or pay debts faster by buying more silks and champagnes or buying more of anything that is embraced in the schedules of the treaty where we make concessions to France.

I want to impress upon the House instances that go to show what we are actually doing when we sign this treaty. I call attention to the main exports of our country to France. Take them one by one from the largest until you get through, fifteen to twenty, and on each one you will find higher duties put up against us by France. Then take the imports of this country which compete with our own productions in some instances, and which in almost every instance are luxuries. Where we take the tariff off for the sake of France on goods she sells us of $100 value we sometimes take the tariff off Switzerland on goods she sells us of $300, $400, and even $1,000. That is a splendid way to make a concession to France, is it not? I have before me a list of the goods so affected, and I would like the House to bear with me while I call attention to some of them. I commence with braids and cords. We are lowering the duty to France, though she only sends us $46,000 worth odd, but we are taking it off similarly to Switzerland, which country sends us $112,407, and Switzerland gives us nothing. It is true she does not pay us by raising the duty against us. I suppose from that point of view really Switzerland is better entitled to it than France. In respect of France, for doing this, we have the duty raised against us on our main imports to that country. In respect to Switzerland we do it for nothing at all. But let us pass on. In the matter of brushes, where France sells us $42,000 worth, Switzerland sells us $114,000 worth or about two and a half or three times as much, and we are making concessions on that article to Switzerland for nothing whatsoever. Going from that to buttons, where we buy $11,000 worth from France we buy from Japan $107,000 worth, or nearly ten times as much, so that where we are making a concession of $1 to the French exporter to Canada, we are making a concession of $10 to the Japanese exporter to Canada. Will any hon. member tell me why we should do that? If we are bound to be making concessions on these lines of goods, we should have done two things first. We should have had a comparable tariff on them or, at least, a tariff from which we could have come down, and secondly we should have got rid of the necessity of making concessions to countries which give us nothing at all.

Mr. FORKE: The hon. member's premises are wrong.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How?

Mr. FORKE: What about the barrier we put up against the Mother Country?

Mr. MEIGHEN: What has that to do with the case?

Mr. FORKE: It has a good deal to do with it. The hon. member is talking about barriers being put up against us. We are putting up barriers and there is no complaint.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know we do, and I do not see any of them reduced here. I would like the hon. member to compare the reductions elsewhere.

Mr. FORKE: We are not lamenting the reductions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not want to treat the hon. member discourteously but I do not see his point. By making these concessions on luxuries and making ten times the concessions to Japan—

Mr. FORKE: Buttons are not luxuries, they are necessities.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN:—but I venture to say the necessities in the way of buttons are manufactured here. I do not think we are getting many from Japan. I think my hon. friend will find that he has not worn very often, nor have I, the kind of buttons we import from those countries.

Mr. EULER: I should like to correct the right hon. gentleman as regards that. The situation is exactly the reverse. The kind of buttons imported from Japan are the kind we wear on our vests.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would be a great deal better for us if we made them in Kitchener—

Mr. EULER: I would grant you that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —or some other town. If this does not hit one way, it hits the other. It injures us every time. Buttons are about the only things that are not luxuries under the schedules.

Mr. McMASTER: Brushes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We make brushes in this country. I venture to say we do not get anything but fancy brushes from so far away as that. Does my hon. friend know about that?

Mr. McMASTER: My interest in brushes is not as great as that of the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will pass on, for I do not want to dwell too long on the infirmities of the hon. member. The next article is clocks and watches. Of these we import $3,829 worth from France, but from Switzerland we import $75,586 worth. For the sake of making a concession to France at our expense, we make virtually twenty-five times that concession to Switzerland.

Mr. McMASTER: Think of the saving of time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We did not save much time in making this treaty. We lost about five months, and we also lost a great deal to this country. The next item is electrical apparatus, telephones and the like. Of these, whereas we bought from France $1,231 worth, we bought from Japan $18,000 odd worth, making about sixteen times the concession to Japan that we make to France, and all at the expense of this country.

The next item is embroideries. We buy $17,700 worth from France, and from Switzerland $100,598 worth. Of handkerchiefs we bought from France $5,000 odd worth, from Japan $77,000 odd worth, and from Switzerland $225,000 odd worth; or hon. members will see that we bought some forty times as much from Switzerland as from France. We open our doors to all these countries with no concessions from them at all, and we also open them to France for the privilege of having the duties on our staple exports raised against us. I could pass from one article to another, silk ribbons, toys, silk fabrics, various other things, some of them somewhat hard to pronounce, and in respect of every one of them we make many times the concession to favoured-nation countries that we have made to France.

Besides all this, we fix specific duties on our goods, duties that we cannot vary. This applies to quite a part of the treaty in relation to the duties of Canada. France does not do so. We bind ourselves besides to maintain the same parity between our minimum tariff, and our general tariff as we have to-day. France makes no such covenant with us at all. Moreover, France has reserved the right—and there is no corresponding reservation for this country—to give to all neighbouring, as well as former enemy countries, all concessions that she gives to us. If she exercises that right, do hon. members know of anything that we can get in there under this treaty that will be of any value at all to Canadian exporters? Let her exercise that right in favour of all those neighbouring states, and she has cancelled or all but cancelled the meagre concessions that we already have. The ministers came back and they did not know the effect of that concession. When the matter was put to them in this House on the reading of the resolution, I think it was the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) who stated that this clause applied, as in previous treaties, just to a certain border zone, bordering on France. It is true that in previous treaties it applied only to such narrow border zone; but in this treaty there is no restriction at all. It applies to all the territory of all nations adjacent to France.

The hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault) has argued—and I admire the ingenuity of the argument; I think he was driven to it—that he does not consider this treaty solely on an economic basis, and as a matter of dollars and cents. He says: "France suffered terriffic losses in the late war; she lost her million or two million men; she lost another two or three or more millions in disabilities. She lost as well tremendous amounts in property destruction. She sacrificed, of the very manhood and wealth of her nation, relatively more than any other nation that went through the war." In all that I concur; but I do not think the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères will say that I have at any time in my life shown anything but sympathy for and a real desire to help France in her struggle. I think I anticipate the character of campaign it is proposed to wage against those who question the desirability of this treaty. It seems to be disclosed in the speech of the hon. member; but they will have to direct it at all events against some hon. members who have in the crucial past done everything in their power and at considerable risk to render practical and needed assistance to France. I do not, however, believe in mixing up trade treaties with international obligations. It will be argued that we are under obligations to France greater than are the obligations of France to us. I do not admit that. This country sacrificed a great deal, and though we made the sacrifice for ourselves, we must remember that the direct peril to France was far greater than the direct peril to us. I do not admit there is a balance in favour of the other nation. I think we did our duty. We did not do any more; we would and should have done more if we could. That is quite true; but if there is an obligation, then I say: Let us in all honesty discharge it; but do not let us, in discharging it, pay a far greater sum to other countries to whom we are under no obligation whatever. If we seek that method of discharging a debt of honour, a debt of devotion to France, we are taking the most uneconomical, the most disastrous method to the interests of Canada and the least beneficial to the interests of France. Far better, if there is an obligation, to discharge it in a direct way, in a way that we shall know just what we are doing, and not in a way that piles on the back of this country burdens far greater than the amount of the concession passing to France. France benefits by this treaty far more than we benefit; but other nations, benefit too, and while we are helping France we are helping other nations, nations to whom no one would argue that this country is under any obligation whatever. I do not yield even to the hon, member for Chambly and Verchères in my admiration of the French character and the French nation, nor in my desire to assist in the rehabilitation of that country, stricken as it is, in the anguish of after-war collapse. But I do not believe that trade treaties are the right method, and I do not believe, if trade treaties are, that this is the character of treaty that we should make. I do not want to have included among our beneficiaries a number of countries to whom we are under no obligation at all, Consequently I think we would be better to reject this treaty.

We are not without resources in this country. Surely hon. members will not argue that we have to sit down and take just what we get from countries that have a higher tariff level from our own. Surely hon. members will not argue that we must continue to do this ad infinitum and that we are utterly without resources to protect ourselves? But they must so argue if they ask us to support this treaty.

There are other courses we can take. France has something to lose by the rejection of this treaty; she stands to lose on exports that for the last fiscal year, of 1922, were far greater than her imports from us. Reject the treaty, adopt the resources that any self-respecting country would adopt and stand up in this battle with other nations. If we do not, we are only going to add to the distresses of our own. Every morning even now our newspapers are full of calamitous tales of our working men emigrating to the United States. As I came in I picked up the Liberal organ of the city of Montreal owned, or at least presided over, by a Liberal member of the Upper House, and I read the heading:

Montreal workmen going in thousands to United States—Present situation threatens serious labour shortage here—

Of course, solving the problem of unemployment triumphantly for the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock).

Hundreds every day now storm offices of United States Immigration eager to cross the border—Recent immigrants join in.

And then proceeds the heartrending tale of what is going on. Is there anything in this treaty that is likely to deter one man from emigrating to the United States? Does not this treaty contain the germs that ultimately will result in more men going to the United States? I make this appeal particularly to the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). Many phases of the concession mean that result, and that result alone.

Therefore I say this is not the course to pursue. Let us stand up and behave as a nation in our commercial as we would in all other negotiations, and not proclaim to the world that we must submit meekly and helplessly to the tariff exactions of any country.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, a very distinguished British statesman once said that to oppose is the business of an official opposition. No doubt this is so, but I cannot see why this treaty should have been singled out for such a violent onslaught on the part of my hon. friends opposite. As to the desirability of having friendly relations with France, commercially and otherwise, I hope everybody is in agreement, and consequently it is a matter of regret that an instrument which has been made to meet the wishes of both nations for friendlier relations should have met such a hostile reception from my hon. friends opposite. There are between France and Canada bonds created by tradition, by history, even by heredity, which makes that friendship desirable and permanent, and I repeat that I am sorry this instrument should be met with what I think I am justified in describing as unfair criticism on the part of those hon. gentlemen. Perhaps it will have a good effect somewhere. In France this criticism will produce a mixed effect and many there will regret that suggestions of unfairness on her part should have been made; on the other hand, it will help the French government to secure the ratification of the treaty by the Chamber of Deputies.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They will ratify it all right.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Because there, I can assure my hon. friends opposite, the concessions given to Canada by France are far from being considered as trivial and useless. I am confident that in this country the treaty will be accepted by the people as a fair one.

My hon. friends opposite have scrutinized schedules A and B, and my hon. friend for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) was selected to launch an attack against those unfortunate schedules. In reading over the debate of 1908, when the treaty that had then been negotiated was under discussion in this House, I see that a similar line of attack was chosen; someone read a list of articles of little importance to this country and made merry of them. Well, the same course is being pursued to-day. My hon. friends are like the Bourbons—they have not learned anything and they have not forgotten anything.

There is this paramount fact to be borne in mind, that every article in which Canada is interested as far as her export trade is concerned is included in this treaty. Now, to use the words of my hon. friend for Lincoln, does it hurt him or anyone else that there are added to the treaty articles in which we have little or no trade at the present time? Twenty-five years ago commodities which to-day are very important to our exporters were not manufactured in this country. Have we reached the limit of our industrial ability? The industries of Canada have progressed by leaps and bounds in the last twenty-five years

I ask again, have we reached the limit of our industrial ability? Is that the confidence of my hon. friends opposite in the ability of our manufacturers? Is that the Conservative confidence in the future of this country?

Take chemical products, for instance; these have been specially selected for gibes and jokes in the course of this debate. Why I am told by men who know that there is a tremendous field for expansion in the manufacture of chemical products. We have the natural resources, the raw material, we have the scientific ability, and in this particular field Canada is bound to accomplish success in the future. This treaty is not made for the past, it is made for the future. It is made for the trade of coming years, not for the industrial development of twenty-five years ago. We are not asking this House to legislate for our ancestors, but for our children and for ourselves.

Now, is it quite certain that we are not exporting the very articles which my hon. friends have criticised us for including in this treaty? Well, I see my hon. friend for Lincoln is still feeling the effects of that bronze powder in which he became involved the other day and from which his leader unsuccessfully tried to extricate him. He said that he had used that article for fourteen years and did not know it was manufactured in this country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the hon. minister at the bronze powder again?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes. and my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) said: Well, it is excusable because the reports of the Trade and Commerce department did not include bronze powder.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As an export.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is that an excuse?

Mr. CHAPLIN: It is an excuse for my not knowing it was exported.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Probably that is the reason the French government reduced the duty; they looked at our trade reports and found that we did not export bronze powder.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend says it is still an excuse. Well, if it is an excuse for my hon. friend not to have bought bronze powder because it was not listed in the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce, I may tell him that in the Canadian Trade Index issue of 1920-21, compiled and published by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, Toronto, Canada, there is an alphabetical list of articles manufactured in Canada with the names of all firms manufacturing them. This is prepared for the use of Canadian manufacturers, and my hon. friend has certainly received a copy of it. Page 274, article No. 896, bronze powder—and here are the names of the firms manufacturing it: Canadian Bronze Powder Works, Limited, Montréal, Quebec; and there is an advertisement of that company on page 84. But more than that, there is a firm in the very province of my hon. friend which is making bronze powder. Its name is Cosmos Chemical Company, Port Hope, Ontario. I hope my hon. friend will purchase his powder there next time, otherwise the "Made in Canada" campaign could hardly apply in the case of those who purchased the articles of the hon. gentleman.

My hon. friend referred to fresh butter. He said that the duty on fresh butter had been reduced from 30 to 22½ per cent, and he asked what was the necessity for that, in view of the fact that Canada was not exporting fresh butter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He said we were not exporting it to France, but that we were exporting salt butter, on which the duty had been raised.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I beg my right hon. friend's pardon. He said Canada does not export fresh butter, but Canada exports salt butter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: To France.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think he qualified it. But even if he did, there is no reason why we should not try to export to France if we export to other countries. At present the demand in the European markets is for fresh butter, not for salt butter. The representative of the province of Quebec in Belgium, Mr. Langlois, told my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) that a representative of the Department of Agriculture of Quebec had entered into a contract in Beigium for the export of large quantities of fresh butter. After my hon. friend's reference to it in his speech I communicated with the Minister of Agriculture of Quebec and he tells me that the province of Quebec is at present exporting fresh butter to Belgium; that they have contracted for 20,000 boxes of 60 pounds each. My friend himself can figure out how many hundreds of thousands of dollars the export of fresh butter means to this country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But is not the Belgian duty only a fraction of what the duty to France still is under this treaty?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Exactly; that is the very reason why we brought about a reduction of the French duty.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is many times the Belgian duty still. Is there any substantial chance of sending any fresh butter to France, even over the reduced duty? And the chance of sending salted butter is nil.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We hope there is a chance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is merely fancy.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But is the objection of my hon. friend a good one? If with a duty of 30 per cent it was impossible to trade with France in fresh butter, is there not a better chance to do so when the duty is reduced to 22½ per cent? Again I say that my hon. friend was speaking of the past when he referred to the export of butter. We have not negotiated a treaty for the Pilgrim Fathers or for the farmers who came with Jacques Cartier and Champlain; we have negotiated it for our farmers of the present.

My hon. friend referred also to item 404, tissues of pure cotton. Well, I wish my hon. friend would consult with his friends the manufacturers of agricultural implements. They will tell him that reapers and binders are exported to France and that the cotton that is used for the wings goes there in a knocked-down state and is adjusted in France. That cotton has had to pay a heavy duty, 1,240 francs per 100 kilograms; under the present arrangement that cotton will pay the same duty as cotton from the United States, 400 francs per 100 kilograms. The manufacturers themselves have asked for that reduction.

My hon. friend referred to bottles. He said we had reduced the duty on bottles but that we were not sending any to France. Let me tell him that we are sending to France articles contained in bottles, and without the reduction these bottles or containers are subject to a duty which is almost prohibitive. But there is this fundamental fact, Mr. Speaker: the manufacturers and producers in this country have frequently complained that they were at a disadvantage compared with their United States competitors on account of the discrimination in the treaty as it was. As the Minister of Finance said the other day, when they came here last year in a strong delegation the gentlemen who presented the case for the necessity of a treaty with France was a gentleman from my own constituency, Mr. Picard, general manager of the Rock City Tobacco Company, a very distinguished citizen of Quebec. The manufacturers there asked the government to have that discrimination removed. They pointed out especially that in respect of the fourteen articles which under the modus vivendi of 1921 were excluded from the operations of the minimum tariff granted by the treaty of 1907, they were at a disadvantage as compared with the United States manufacturers, and they urged that it was the duty of the government to see that that discrimination was done away with. Well, to-day we have no such discrimination. That was the objective of Canada in negotiating the treaty, and we have the guarantee that we shall always have the benefit of at least the same conditions that are granted by France to the United States. I will say more than that: on many articles we have the advantage of our American competitors.

When my hon. friend says that we would be better without a treaty, surely he does not speak for the manufacturers, who have been so pressing in their demands for a new treaty, a new agreement, a new convention. My hon. friend, the former Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), when he spoke in the House a couple of days after the hon. member for Lincoln delivered his speech, admitted that a treaty would be beneficial to the manufacturers. He even eulogized the hon. member for Lincoln as a martyr to unselfishness and devotion, because, notwithstanding the many disadvantages that this treaty was giving to the manufacturers, he was protesting against it on the ground that it was not to the advantage of the farmers. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am almost sure that the farmers of Canada will not trust their interests either to the former Minister of Finance or to the hon. member for Lincoln. I will say this also: that on agricultural articles of production as well as manufactured articles our farmers have the same advantages as, in some instances more advantages than, the United States farmers—and they are their competitors in the markets of the world.

My hon. friends are building upon wrong premises when they compare the duties which will be imposed under this treaty with the conditions that existed under the former treaty and say that we have not the same advantages, and that we would be better off without the treaty. As a matter of fact the treaty of 1908 no longer exists. It has been denounced. France, since the war, has denounced all her commercial agreements on account of the conditions resulting from the war. In our case, it has been replaced by a modus vivendi, the first article of which states:

Pending the conclusion of a new commercial convention with a view to which negotiations will begin immediately, the French and Canadian governments have agreed to the following provisions.

Everybody knew and everybody knows that we could not expect to go on much further, or any further indeed with that modus vivendi of 1921. France would not have agreed to grant to Canada what is the modus vivendi of 1921 any longer because we were obligated to begin negotiations at once after the signing of that agreement of 1921. So, when my hon. friends are making comparisons with the stipulations of that agreement, they are comparing this treaty with something that did not exist or was on the point of disappearance, and they well know that we would have been placed under the general tariff of France, and it is with the general tariff of France that comparison should be made.

Mr. BELAND: That is the point.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The policy of France at the present time is not to grant the minimum tariff to any nation. As I said a few moments ago, she denounced all her treaties after the war. I will say one thing, and I think I can challenge contradiction in this regard. Of all the treaties which have been made and entered into by France since the denunciation of her agreements with all nations, no other nation ever was granted as good conditions as Canada has been under this treaty.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: For information I should like to find out, if possible, what other nations France has entered into agreements with.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will mention two, and there are four or five. I mention Spain and Czecho-Slovakia.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought you were going to mention the United States perhaps. What about the United States?

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is a fine joke, but it has no bearing on the point. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has criticized in his speech to-day and in his first speech when the resolution was before the House the exception contained in Article II of the treaty:

1. The grant of the Minimum tariff for the products enumerated in schedule A means the treatment of the Most Favoured Nation as respects such products, but does not entitle Canada to claim the benefit of any preferential advantage which France may grant to her Protectorates or the benefit of any tariff resulting from economic agreements which France may enter into with border states, or the benefits of any tariff which France may grant for products the importation of which is designed to facilitate financial settlements with those countries that were at war with France during the years 1914-1918.

Now, Mr. Speaker, France has placed the same exception in all her treaties since the war, and they do not intend, as they say, to take advantage of it, but they do not want to be deprived of the right to make special economic agreements with regard to certain industries. The reason is, first, because they would not impose any duties, for instance, on goods which would be given to France in payment of the reparations resulting from the war, and secondly, there are in France and Belgium certain industries of the same character which have suffered from the same causes, both during and since the war, and especially for the purpose of rebuilding the devastated areas it may be necessary for France and Belgium to have special agreements concerning those industries. As I said before, this exception is included in all the treaties that France has signed since the war. Spain herself, which would be a good deal more interested than we are, for she is a border state, has agreed to that stipulation, and every other country has agreed to it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Spain gets the benefit of it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: She does not get the benefit of any special economic agreements France may enter into with Belgium.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This treaty reserves the right for France to give a preference to Spain. It is a border country.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, but for the reason which I have just given. France may enter into a special agreement with Belgium resulting from the war and its consequences, and Spain would not get the benefit of it, and Spain is more likely to be interested in it than than we are.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If those were the reasons that actuated the minister in allowing this concession to France, why were we told on the introduction of the resolution that it only applied to a strip of country along the border, and not to the whole country?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why should my hon. friend ask that question?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I want to know.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am giving the reasons as I know them to be, and my hon. friend is answering by asking why should another reason have been given. I am sure the Minister of Finance will be able to answer my hon. friend when he speaks again on this question.

Let me say, moreover, that our competitors will be placed in the same position as we are in. We cannot suffer because those with whom we are competing in the French market cannot get the benefit of that stipulation in any way whatever.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend say that Belgium is not a competitor of Canada in manufactured articles?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Perhaps in some articles, but not in most articles which Canada exports.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: She can get better treatment under this.

Mr. LAPOINTE: France really does not deserve the suggestion of unfairness which is being made against her in this House. What have we given, to use my hon. friend's own words?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think any one has accused France of unfairness. I think we are charging our ministers with lack of acumen, not France with unfairness.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Thank you very much. We are in fine company because my hon. friend having said what he has just repeated, a very few moments after said that France will not get any benefit out of this treaty; Japan will benefit, Switzerland will benefit, but not France. So, the French negotiators were no good, according to my hon. friend. I will try to show in a few moments that my hon. friend need not be so proud, and contemptuous. He is liable to make some slight mistakes himself.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Very often.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not very often but more often than my hon. friend thinks and supposes. Now, what have we given in return? To use the words of the opposition we have asked France to lower her barriers, and France has asked Canada to lower her barriers against the importation of the articles she makes and exports. Of course the barriers, in the case of Canada, are to be lowered with respect to articles which France makes, not with respect to articles she does not make. My hon. friend said—and he said it with a smile which I admire occasionally—that we should have first raised our tariff. The leader of the Opposition also said that the other day and he repeated it to-day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On luxuries.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not know whether we would have accomplished much by raising our tariff but I will admit that we have yet to start in the business of raising tariffs—

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: They knew that over in France.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Last year we did reduce the tariff in many instances and we were met by a motion on the part of my right hon. friend in which he declared that the House should not have any confidence in the government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not because we raised the tariff but because we did not sufficiently reduce it we were told that we were not true to our pledges.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The resolution did not say that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I know the purpose of the resolution very well; it is a sample of my right hon. friend's statesmanship.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If my hon. friend would only adhere to the facts I would not interrupt him. The resolution condemned the government for abandoning specific pledges on which they had been returned to power.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What would have been the nature of the motion if we had raised the tariff?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would depend on the nature of the increase on the specific article, but in any event—

Mr. FIELDING: There would have been condemnation in either case.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We would have condemned the government's breach of faith just the same.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Exactly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We would condemn the breach of faith notwithstanding the fact that the actual tariff brought down might be in accord with our principles. Does the hon. member not see any difference between acting in accord—

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —between acting in accord with covenants and acting in violation of them even although going in the right direction?

Mr. LAPOINTE: So we are in this awful dilemma; if we raise the tariff we would be met by a motion on the part of my right hon. friend—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: —that we are ruining the country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I do not say that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does my hon. friend not agree to that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member is simply playing with words, and, what is more serious for him playing with the truth. If he raised the tariff he would be met with the motion that he and his colleagues were violating their pledges just as there was a motion of that kind before.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And if we had reduced the tariff?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If hon. gentlemen opposite reduced the tariff it would depend upon the merits of the reduction. I think that is consistent but my hon. friend does not seem to understand.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I understand the purpose of my right hon. friend quite well. He is trying to extricate himself from the position in which he placed himself last year with that famous motion of his. In that motion my right hon. friend was not loyal to his principles; he was loyal to his bitterness and partisanship.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, oh.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am glad that the ex-Minister of Finance does not take matters so seriously as the leader of the Opposition.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I could not.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I see that we still have a friend in the front ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite. We have lowered the tariff on many articles and this is in line with the traditional Liberal policy. My right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) says that the operation of this treaty involves a loss to Canada of $500,000. Loss to whom and by whom? Every cent of this $500,000 would be taken from the pockets of the consumers of Canada and they are the people who gain under this treaty. And if the result of the treaty is to enlarge the facilities for trading with France, if our producers send more goods to France, surely that revenue will come back to the treasury of Canada in some other way. It is not true either that only the duties on luxuries have been reduced as my hon. friends opposite seem to argue. They know full well that they have to select a few articles in order to attempt to show that the duties on luxuries have been reduced. I will not weary the House by reading the famous list we have heard so much about. The ex-Minister of Finance said the other day in reference to item 581 concerning silks, that we had reduced the duty to 20 per cent and that it is a fixed duty. Well, the variety of silk which comes under that reduction to 20 per cent constitutes only 10 per cent of our entire importations of silk; the other 90 per cent enters under the intermediate tariff of 27½ per cent less the discount of 10 per cent under schedule B. My hon. friend was 10 per cent right and 90 per cent wrong, and he maintained that proportion fairly well throughout the whole course of his speech.

My hon. friend also alluded to what he termed our blunder in not taking into account the unfavourable balance of trade between Canada and France when this treaty was negotiated. He said that France had an advantage over Canada last year of $5,000,000 and added I am sure my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries did not know that when he went over to France,—and he looked at me with a smiling look of self-satisfied superiority. Well, I will surprise my hon. friend by saying that I knew that. Perhaps I will remove a little of his superiority when I add that I also knew, although apparently he did not seem to know, that in former years we had the balance of trade in our favour.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When?

Mr. LAPOINTE: In 1922, that was last year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That was during the war and post-war period. Everybody knows it except my hon. friend.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Let us see. I admit that in 1918 we were still in a part of the war period. During that year we exported $201,053,676 worth of products to France and we imported from that country products to the amount of only $5,274,064. In 1919, we exported $96,103,142 worth to France, and we imported only $3,632,900 worth. In 1920, when we were receding a little from the war, we exported $61,108,693 worth to France, and imported $10,630,865 worth. In 1921, a few years after the war, we exported $27,428,308 worth to France and imported $19,138,062 worth leaving a balance in our favour of $8,290,246.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Was not my hon. friend aware that France had been decimated and had run dry of material, and that she had to get a great many articles from outside after the war? Does he not know she had to get credits outside for that purpose? Does he not know that was an abnormal balance?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I know all that, and I will give my hon. friend something more to satisfy him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister give the relative exports and imports prior to the war, say, for the five years, and subsequent to the old French treaty? It would be very interesting.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have already stated that I am not living in the past.

Mr. MEIGHEN: These later years are during abnormal conditions.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The war was not proceeding in 1921; we are not at war now. Surely my hon. friend will agree with me on that point. I have here the report of trade of Canada for the eleven months of the year ending the last of February of this year. We have exported to France during those eleven months $12,663,158, and we have imported from France during those eleven months, ending February last $11,143,948. That is, for the eleven months of this fiscal year just ended, and the reports for the month of March are not yet published, but we have a balance of trade in our favour during that period, with France of over $1,000,000. And we are no longer at war.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the minister not see how very much better we are getting on without that treaty?

Mr. LAPOINTE: We are getting on better since my hon. friends went out of power. I would not like to say that my hon. friends opposite were responsible for the condition, but it is a strange coincidence that during that very year, the only year during the last six years where there was a very large balance of trade against us, my right hon. friend was Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does my hon. friend not know that our increased exports this year are practically wholly wheat, which goes in under the general tariff and which is not in the least affected, whether we make a treaty or not?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am sure my right hon. friend will at least agree that the making of this treaty, which will lower the barrier against our trade, will still increase the volume of trade instead of decreasing it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It increases the barrier.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), said that we must have a treaty with France. He agreed that it was most desirable that there should be a commercial treaty with France. Afterwards he said that the treaty of 1908 was no good and that we lost money under that treaty and that we would have been better without the treaty of 1908. He said that the present treaty was no good either.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And that we would have been very much better without this treaty. Then, in the name of goodness, if a treaty with France is necessary, if the treaty of 1908 was no good, and if this treaty is no good, why did he not do something when he had the power to do it, and make a treaty himself? If the treaty of 1907 was no good why did my hon. friend vote in this House, as Minister of Finance, for a modus vivendi which had the effect of excluding from the treaty of 1908 many articles, and everybody knows that the agreement of 1921 was not so good as the treaty of 1908, and my hon. friend voted for it, though the treaty of 1907 was no good, and this treaty is no good either.

What was the object of the government of Canada in making this treaty? Its objective was to get on the markets of France the same treatment as the United States had. We never concealed that goal or that aim. Everybody knew that was what we had in view, and we got it. What was the objective of France? I do not want to disclose any secrets, but I have in my hand an article signed by Edouard Néron, the member for Haute-Loire, who is a general reporter of the customs board of the chamber of deputies and of commercial agreements. In this article Mr. Néron says that the objective of Canada was to get the same treatment as the United States got. And what was the objective of France, according to him? It was to get on the Canadian market as good treatment as Great Britain got, whom France considered their competitors on the market of Canada. And they did not get that treatment, because the British preference is a Canadian policy of our own. It is a policy of which we are proud which has been created in Canada by the Liberal party. By that policy we stand and by that policy we intend to stand. It has been stated that as to certain articles of the treaty the British preference is lower.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is gone.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If hon. members are afraid of the fate of the British preference, let them not worry, the British preference is safer in the hands of its creator than it would be in the hands of my right hon. friend. I am proud to have been associated with the Minister of Finance in his negotiation of this treaty. Let me tell the House and the country and let me tell my hon. friends opposite and particularly the ex-Minister of Finance who has been admiring France for her business ability, and so on, that I am sure, in spite of the criticism of my hon. friends opposite, the work of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) will commend itself to the House and will receive the support of the people of Canada.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, in beginning the discussion of this question this afternoon I propose to read a few words from an editorial in the Montreal Witness which came into my hand to-day as illustrating how hopelessly the people of Canada, as well as the members of this House, are divided on questions of trade in the way in which we look at treaties and tariffs. The editorial reads:

> What is the use of discussion in parliament between men living in different worlds, who cannot even see each other's point of view, and perhaps don't want to. The French Treaty, the protectionists argue, is all give and no take. On a lot of articles, such as tools, etc., they say Canada is to pay 50 per cent duty when she sends them into France, but it is only to collect 20 to 25 per cent on importing them from France. How would this read if we should put it this way? The French people have to pay 50 per cent duty on what they import as well as on ten times more that they do not import, while Canadians have to pay only 20 to 25 per cent. The trouble is that those on one side of the controversy can only see the protected interests, while those on the other keep the interests of the people who need tools somewhat in view.

It seems to me unfortunate that these treaties between nations are generally made an occasion for a very acrimonious controversy and the position is very frequently taken by the opponents of the government in power, whatever government it may be—and it seems to be the same in every country—that a treaty secured was not as good as it ought to be, and there has been a disposition to object to the treaty for that reason.

I was in the United States three years ago when the controversy was going on there as regards its attitude towards the League of Nations. I was at a meeting in the town of Waterbury, which by the way is a very strong Republican centre, and one man actually made the statement: "Now, that we have shown President Wilson where he gets off at, we want the treaty." They wanted the treaty, but they wanted and took the opportunity that was offered to them to get a slam at President Wilson. I do not think that principle has been entirely wanting in this country when we look over the past few years and consider the situation in relation to the attempt to get trading arrangements with various nations. I would not like to say that it is absent on the present occasion. It seems to me that the most important question to-day is not: Did we get the best treaty possible? We do not know. Possibly those who negotiated the treaty, might, in their inmost souls, think that if they had been a little more firm on certain points they could have secured better terms. You can never tell when you are negotiating with a party just how far you can press him until negotiations come right to the breaking point. The most important question, at least for this parliament, to decide seems to be to-day whether, under this treaty, we are going to be placed in a better position than we would be in without the treaty. Notwithstanding the fact that hon. gentlemen to our right have declared positively that we would be better off without the treaty than we would be under circumstances that would prevail if we had the treaty, they have not made it clear to me that such is the case. When this treaty was first brought before the House, I was disposed to attach to it much the same valuation as I thought the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) attached to it in his speech in introducing it to us. Perhaps I drew inferences that were not altogether warranted on that occasion; but still in looking over the treaty and in giving a cursory glance at the schedules, I fail to find anything that would cause us to wax very enthusiastic. Speaking from the standpoint of those who are engaged in agriculture, I feel that as regards our major products, there does not seem to be in the treaty a great deal over which we could become enthusiastic. If there is in it the poison that the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) would seem to say there is, I would not want it; but on the principle that half a loaf is better than no bread, I for my part would be prepared to accept the treaty for what it is worth.

I will not deal very largely with the schedules in particular, but I should like to make a few comments as regards certain arguments that have been advanced why this treaty should not be accepted. Speaking generally, I think I can say, speaking, not only for myself, but for those with whom I am associated, that we are in favour of any attempt that can be made to break down the barriers which nations have erected amongst themselves in matters of trade. I would hope, therefore, that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), who is not in his place, was not correctly reported, or that he was misrepresented when he was reported to have said during the Moose Jaw campaign, that there was no evidence that the Progressives were not still opposed to reciprocity. If there is one thing that we have made abundantly clear in this House since we have been here, it is that we were strongly in favour of that reciprocity agreement. Perhaps the prominence given to that question in the Moose Jaw campaign ought to convince the country that the question of better trade relations with the United States is not dead; that it is alive, and that it is going to be very much alive. It might be well for those who were responsible for the rejection of that treaty, and those who are the political successors of those who rejected that treaty, to take cognizance of that fact. I know some explanations are given as to why they are in the position in which they are to-day. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) made a speech a short time ago in Winnipeg—and I suppose he repeated the same speech in Ottawa, because I know he said some of the same things here—stating that their party had sacrificed themselves because of the war. He seems to think that that was the reason of their present humiliation. When I read that statement, I wondered whether the sacrifice which they made was in being compelled to sit along with the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) and the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). But seriously, speaking for the West and the prairie provinces only, I wish to say that it was not the war record or the post-war record of the hon. gentlemen that caused them to pass through the valley of humiliation. The people of the western prairies remembered 1911 and the kind of arguments that were foisted upon them at that time. When we remember the arguments that were put forward at that time, we are not disposed to attach too much value to the arguments that are advanced against this treaty to-day.

I said that I was not going to discuss in any great detail the schedules, but rather that I would make some comments upon arguments that have been advanced why we should reject the treaty. No doubt the arguments of hon. gentlemen are sound from their point of view, from the protectionist point of view, and if I belonged to that school, undoubtedly I would accept them as sound and consider it my duty to act in accordance with the sentiments they expressed. But since we have never accepted their point of view, and speak from an entirely different one, I cannot for one see how it is possible to respond to the appeal that they have made. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) advanced some arguments, and I have been somewhat amused at the way in which the shuttlecock has been batted backwards and forwards. I was disposed to think the weight of the argument lay with one side and then with the other; but I think at the present time the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) has the advantage on his side.

The ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) laid a great deal of emphasis upon the question of the balance of trade. There seems to be some conflict in the figures that have been presented to us by the ex-Minister of Finance and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and just at present I am not able to reconcile the two statements, although that may possibly be done. It seems to me, however, that many false conclusions have been based upon this question of an adverse balance of trade. It is by no means conclusive, by no means sure, as applied to trade as a whole, that an injury is necessarily done to a country because for the time being the balance would seem to be against it. But still less is it safe, when we come to consider relations between any two nations, to conclude that trade is necessarily detrimental to the one against which the balance would seem to be for the time being. International trade is not simply a two-sided question; it is not simply a case of A trading with B; it is a case of A trading with B, C, D and E, and B trading with all the rest of them. It is, therefore, absolutely impossible to establish conclusions as sound by considering simply the relations which for the time being exist between any two of those nations.

It has been urged that it would have been better if the government had raised the tariff before proceeding to enter into negotiations. That again is a principle of questionable soundness, even if we consider it in regard to our tariff as a whole, and still more questionable when we consider it in relation to this particular question. The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) has urged that the minister should have definitely increased the tariff against France on luxuries before entering into negotiations. I wonder how it would have been possible in that case for the ministers to have entered into negotiations at all. If it had been definitely stated in this House that in order to negotiate a trade bargain with France we would increase the tax upon luxuries, I can well imagine what response we would have had from the French people. The probability is our ministers would have come back without any treaty at all. On the other hand, had it been definitely stated that luxuries would have to pay a higher tariff, I cannot see how it would have been possible to conclude such a treaty as this.

A great deal has been said about the most favoured nation clause. I again say that it cannot for a moment be contended that our ministers could have taken any other position in the negotiations. I maintain in regard to this treaty that negotiations should be entered upon in a spirit of good will and fairness towards other nations. It would seem to me impossible at this time to contend that we should continue to regard trade treaties in any other light than as arrangements of mutual advantage to the countries concerned. I cannot conceive, Mr. Speaker, that we should approach this question in any other spirit than that of a desire to make fair and equitable arrangements with those nations which are willing to trade with us.

A great deal of emphasis has been laid upon what is called the adverse balance of trade. It would seem to me to be absolutely unsound as between two nations that we should take a position based on this adverse balance of trade; at least it does not prove anything to my mind in this respect. Speaking generally, I would take the position that in all trade arrangements with other nations we must be willing to negotiate in a spirit of give and take; there must be no thought that we can retain all the advantage upon our own side. This treaty has been entered into with a nation that was our ally during the war, and it would ill become us to attempt to impose upon France obligations which, torn as she was by war, she might find it difficult to accept. Matters of trade should not, as in the past, be treated as, potentially, occasions of war, but rather as arrangements of mutual advantage to all concerned. We should always remember that trade is of paramount interest to all concerned, and that peace can only come in this world as we are willing to approach all nations in a spirit of good will.

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend and neighbour for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) presented to this House such a voluminous criticism of this treaty, and as it appears that several of the items affect, to some extent at least, the financial interests of persons residing in the county that I have the honour to represent, I feel it a duty, however much I may dislike its performance, to occupy the attention of the House for a short time while I give the reasons why I intend to vote for the second reading of this bill.

When this matter first came before the House by way of resolution both my hon. friend for Lincoln and myself apparently fell into the same error. He stated that the bringing into force of this convention would very seriously interfere with the grape industry in the Niagara district, and he added that at a convention of grape growers in the county of Lincoln a suggestion was made that the grape vines should be ploughed up and the wine industry abandoned. I am free to say that when the resolution was introduced I fell into the same error and had unnecessary fears that the passing of this bill, in so far as it affected the importation of wines from France, would seriously injure our grape growers and our wine manufacturers in the Niagara district. But, Sir, on looking into the matter further I find that there is absolutely no change made in the duty on French wines from what it has been for the last fifteen years. In 1908 the French Convention of Commerce, which was agreed to in 1907, came into force. This is the item of that agreement so far as wine is concerned:

Wines of fresh grape of all kinds, not sparkling, imported
(a) containing 20 p.c. or less proof spirit, per gallon	15 cents
(b)containing more than 20 p.c. and not more than 23 p.c. proof spirit, per gallon	20 cents
(c) containing more than 23 p.c. and not more than 26 p.c. of proof spirit, per gallon	25 cents
For each degree in excess of 26 p.c. of proof spirit until the strength reaches 40 p.c. of proof spirit	3 cents

The only difference that has been made so far as these items are concerned is that in the present treaty 55 cents per gallon has been added in the case of wines containing more than 26 per cent of proof spirit, and up to 40 per cent. So to that extent at any rate the protection against French wines is much greater now than it was under the convention of 1907. If no injury has resulted to the wine producers and grape growers of the Niagara district under conditions similar to those that will exist under this new treaty, conditions which have prevailed during the last fifteen years, surely we can expect no very serious injury in the future. In that period the price of grapes in the Niagara district has increased from $70 to $80 a ton. Indeed, it went as high as $100 a ton; but last year, under exactly the same tariff, the price fell to $60 or $65 a ton. In view of these facts, therefore it would seem that both the hon. member for Lincoln and myself were unduly alarmed when this matter first came before the House. I am free to say, though, that if it is found that this new treaty does work a disadvantage to the grape growers and the wine producers in that part of the country, I will readily join the hon. member for Lincoln in a conference with the Minister of Finance with a view to securing such modifications of the conditions as will effect a remedy. But in any case I feel that I should support this bill and leave it to the intelligence and fair-mindedness of the Minister of Finance to right any wrong that might be occasioned, rather than vote against a measure which in other respects is, to my mind, of great advantage to the people of Canada.

The hon. member for Lincoln further stated that the treaty worked a great injustice to nursery men. He said:

> I now wish to refer for a moment, but only in a general way, to some of the articles that France is allowed to sell Canada under this treaty. I would ask the Minister of Finance why shrubs, grape vines, gooseberry bushes, and trees of all kinds of which we have good growers in this country and of which we export considerable quantities are allowed to enter Canada at two cents apiece whereas similar provision has not been made for Canadian trees and shrubs on the part of France.

If my hon. friend will look at item 170 of the French tariff he will find that these articles go into France free of duty, so that the duty on nursery stock coming into Canada is to our advantage and not to the advantage of France.

The hon. member referred to a very large number of items, in connection with which he strove to show that the treaty was working a disadvantage. The right hon. leader of the Opposition also says that the existing treaty, which this convention does away with, is far better than the one we are now considering. He said also that the treaty of 1908 was still in force at the time this new convention was entered into and that it could have continued in force, and he read article 6 of the statute, as follows:

> The present arrangement shall remain in force until the conclusion of a new commercial convention, but either of the high contracting parties may denounce it after four months' notice.

I think my right hon. friend was hardly fair in his criticism in regard to that matter, because he endeavoured to leave the impression on the members of this House and on the people throughout the country that the treaty of 1908 could have continued in force practically indefinitely. But the preamble, not of the act of 1920, but of the schedule to the act says:

> Pending the conclusion of a new commercial convention, with a view to which negotiations will begin immediately, the French and Canadian governments have agreed to the following provisions.

So that whether intentionally or not, the right hon. gentleman was rather misleading the House and the people when he suggested that the treaty could have remained in force for any considerable length of time.

Now, Sir, what do we find in regard to this present convention? In looking at schedule A, which has been the subject of considerable discussion, we find that there are 110 articles on which the duty is considerably less than the duty on similar articles going from the United States. First, on horses, from Canada, the duty is 150 francs; from the United States, 225 francs. On meats of certain kinds, from Canada, 40 francs; from the United States, 60 francs—the same difference on various grades of meat. On fish there is a difference in favour of Canada. On linen yarns, from Canada, 80 francs; from the United States, 120 francs. On tools, articles mentioned by the hon. member for Lincoln—spades, scythes, sickles, files, vices, etc., the duty is 140 francs from Canada and 212 from the United States. In another case, 100 francs from Canada; 152 from the United States. And so on through the whole list there are very substantial reductions on behalf of Canada as against similar articles going from the United States—and these are articles made by the hon. member for Lincoln.

The hon. member spoke of buckles; there is a large percentage, as respects the duty, in favour of goods from Canada as against similar goods from the United States. Doors of hardwood or softwood, painted or carved—these are articles made in Canada in large quantities, and the French duty is considerably less on goods coming from Canada than it is on goods from the United States. Asbestos is an article which is bought, particularly in the province of Quebec, in very large quantities. On sheets the duty is 67 francs from Canada and 102 francs from the United States; shaped asbestos, 135 francs from Canada and 202 francs from the United States; asbestos threads, 198 francs from Canada and 297 francs from the United States; asbestos plates, 247 francs from Canada and 346 francs from the United States, and so on through the whole list. I find there are at least 110 articles where the duty in favour of Canada is a very large percentage indeed.

Then take schedule B, which hon. gentlemen say is of no use. The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), and the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) alleged that the treaty of 1908 was far and away preferable to the present treaty, but what do we find in looking at the same articles in the treaty of 1908 and the treaty before us at the present time? We find that there are some 800 articles of commerce mentioned in this treaty affected by the duty on Canadian goods, and on 450 of these the duty is far and away less on Canadian goods going into France by from ten to fifty per cent than it was under the old treaty and on 110 articles from Canada the duty is much lower than on the same articles going from the United States. So that it does appear to me that the argument is all in favour of this treaty as against the treaty which was in force for the last fifteen years.

Now it has been alleged and strongly urged by my hon. friend for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin), also by the right hon. leader of the Opposition as well as the hon. member for West York, that not many of these articles were being exported from Canada to France. I want to tell hon. members of this House that there have been millions of dollars of United States money invested in Canada in manufacturing industries for the sole and only reason that they get the benefit of the Canadian tariff for their export business. I know that because it is happening in the county of Welland, and my hon. friend from Lincoln must know it because the same thing exists in his county. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been invested in these two counties by United States manufacturing industries for the alleged reason, according to them, that they were getting the benefit of the Canadian tariff for their export business. What do we find under this treaty which this House is not asked to confirm? We find that on 110 articles, practically the necessaries of life, the duty is far and away lower on goods going from Canada than on goods going from the United States. Surely, therefore, we shall have a greater influx of United States money into Canada for the purpose of developing our manufacturing industries. That is what we desire in that section of Canada; that is what we desire in the whole of Canada.

The first great commercial industry, to call it that, is the farming industry. That is the industry which should be protected, preserved and encouraged more than any other. Our natural resources should be developed and encouraged; our manufacturing industries should be developed and encouraged, and that can only be done by a sane, sensible tariff policy which exists in my opinion, to the extent to which it goes, in this very treaty that is now before the House. It is the desire of us all to see Canada prosper, to see our natural resources developed and our manufacturing industries progress, and that can only be done by applying to the industries of Canada the intelligent, courageous and progressive principles of Liberalism.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If there is no objection perhaps we might call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FIELDING: Very well.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am going to move an amendment.

Mr. FIELDING: Oh, then you ought to give us time to consider it.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of my hon. friend for Welland (Mr. German), who concluded his address just before the House took recess, and I think I may go so far as to say that the calm, clear, well-reasoned argument which he presented, upon what is really a practical question of trade was in style and tenor very suitable indeed to the occasion and to the question which he sought to argue. While I cannot agree with the conclusion reached by my hon. friend I must say that from his point of view he stated his case with great fairness and with great calmness. He objected, in one instance, to a statement made by my hon. friend for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) in regard to the question of the duties upon imported wines, and he seems to take issue upon that question with the attitude adopted by the hon. member for Lincoln some days ago. As both of these hon. members come from what we know as the grape-growing district in the province of Ontario, I think they will have to settle that question pretty much between themselves; at all events I can offer them no light upon the subject. I did gather from the remarks of the Finance Minister, when he originally introduced this matter to the House, that perhaps there was something in the contention of my hon. friend for Lincoln, but that the proper time to correct the error, if there was one, would be upon the presentation of the budget rather than in connection with the present measure.

Apart from that question, my hon. friend for Welland dwelt in his argument almost exclusively upon the fact that in schedule A of the present treaty, likewise in schedule B, certain goods which on export from Canada to France were formerly at a disanvantage as compared with those of the United States, had now been put upon the same plane as exports from the last-named country; also that in regard to schedule B there will be a large number of reductions from former duties on exports of Canadian goods to France I may tell my hon. friend for Welland that his argument in that respect is not convincing. If the duties to be maintained by France in the future on exports from Canada are yet so high that those goods cannot be profitably exported from this country, the reduction is purely a matter of form and not a matter of substance; it is not a reduction of which we can take any advantage. I tell him also that if he will read over the various items of schedule B to which he referred, he will find instance after instance where the duties which prevail to-day under the treaty of 1908, have been actually increased by the present proposal. I am not persuaded that my hon. friend is right in his conclusion, I take issue with him upon that point; but I must say that he argued the matter very fairly from his point of view.

I think we all realize that the question now before the House is purely a matter of trade and commerce, is purely a business arrangement Whether it be good or whether it be bad for the people of Canada is a question upon which this House will have to pass; but in my view of the matter nothing is gained by seeking to make it a political question, or treating it from the standpoint of party politics.

I think it is to be regretted that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) this afternoon became so warm, became as he evidently did so excited, became so over-emphatic, if I may be allowed to use the term, in many of his statements. I think if he had contented himself with a defence of this proposal upon business and economic grounds, and not sought to arouse a storm of partisan enthusiasm from his own side of the House, he would have displayed greater dignity himself and treated the question with more respect. I think his whole statement this afternoon lacked everything in the nature of sound business argument. I think he absolutely failed to advance sound reasons why this House should adopt this treaty. He referred, of course, to two or three of the minor items which are involved in the present trade proposal. He waxed eloquent upon the question of bronze powders. He waxed eloquent upon the question of fresh or unsalted butter, and had something to say about the statement of my hon. friend for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) in regard to tissues of cotton. I am satisfied, from a re-reading of the speech of my hon. friend for Lincoln upon these three points, that the hon. member was quite correct in the statement which he made to the House. I have Hansard before me. I am not going to refer to it, but any hon. member who desires to verify this statement can find it in the speech of the hon. member for Lincoln a few days ago. But even suppose that on these three points, butter, web cotton and bronze powder, all that the hon. member for Lincoln said was wrong, and all that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) said was right, I think that should weigh very very little with this House or any member of it in coming to a conclusion upon the broad question of this treaty. These are matters of but trifling importance. If we are going to arrive at a correct conclusion in regard to this treaty proposal I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is not altogether out of place to refer very briefly to what one might call the history of the matter. I go back to the year 1894, which is the year during which the first commercial treaty with France was negotiated. Between 1894 and 1908 the trade of this country under the treaty of 1894 did not show any very material gain, either in exports from Canada or in imports into Canada, and I agree with the Finance Minister to-day, who was Finance Minister in 1908, that in the year 1908 the time had arrived for some new arrangement between France and Canada. I was in the House at that time, I supported the treaty, and I am going to give the House a little bit of information on that subject. My right hon. friend and leader (Mr. Meighen) was not in the House in 1908, but in the session of 1909 after he had been elected a member of this House, and when the Finance Minister came before parliament with supplementary legislation to bring into effect the French treaty of 1908, I find in the records of the House, at page 160 of the Votes and Proceedings for the session of 1909-10, the following:

> The House then resumed the debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding "That the Bill No. 12 an Act respecting a certain supplementary convention between His Majesty and the President of the French republic be now read a second time."

The question being put on the motion, the House divided, the names were called, they were recorded by the clerk and among those who supported the present Minister of Finance in his motion on that occasion was the right hon. leader of the Opposition. So far as I can remember, the names on the division list, he was the only member of the Opposition at that time who did support the Finance Minister in regard to the French treaty. It is idle at this distance of time for any one to say that my right hon. friend and leader is opposed on principle to a trade arrangement with France. He proved his faith in the matter during the first session he sat in this House, and it is just as idle to say that any member sitting in the official opposition in this House to-day is opposed to any fair and reasonable trade arrangement between Canada and France. We, one and all of us, are in favour of an equitable arrangement for increased trade. What we condemn about the present proposal is that it is too one-sided, that it is not reciprocal, and that there is no mutuality about it, either in advantage or obligation. These are the criticisms we offer against the present proposal, but we are in favour of any reasonable reciprocal trade arrangement that can be made with France.

The treaty of 1908 negotiated by the present Minister of Finance has not finally expired. I know that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance just a few days ago said that that treaty was as dead as Julius Caesar, but I think he rather overstated the fact on that occasion. The treaty is still in existence, as varied by the act of this parliament in 1921, and to-day, on the importation of goods from France into this country, you are bound by the terms of the treaty of 1908, and on the export of goods from this country to France, you are still bound by the terms of that treaty, varied as it was in 1921 by legislation of this parliament. So that it is an existing tariff arrangement to-day.

There is no doubt that in the month of September 1918, shortly before the end of the war, the government of France adopted a policy of giving notice and denouncing various commercial treaties which France enjoyed throughout the world. France had evidently come to the conclusion that she would make new financial arrangements with the various countries of the world. Notice was given to Canada along with other countries that our treaty would expire within 12 months, which was the time limit required by the treaty. France subsequently gave an intimation, I think by way of withdrawal of the first notice, because for a certain period of time the treaty was carried forward under no very definite arrangement; but in the year 1920, when we in Canada realized that France was reaping no benefit whatever under the treaty of 1908 and that other nations of the world were reaping very substantial benefit under the same treaty, on account of the most favoured nation clause Canada gave notice to France of the termination of the treaty. Then it was that matters were brought to a head, and negotiations took place which resulted in the agreement known as the modus vivendi agreement, which was ratified in this House on the 15th May, 1921. It is well, though, to remember that in the meantime new arrangements had been consummated by France with the United States. Early in the year 1921 the United States made application to France for more favourable treatment in regard to tariff matters. What the arguments used by the United States' authorities were we cannot tell. We know what the result was. The result of the representations of the negotiators on behalf of the United States was this: that a much lower tariff was granted by France for a much larger number of articles than the United States had ever enjoyed before, and in many instances these rates were considerably lower than the rates which Canada enjoyed under the French treaty of 1908. That was the situation, which, to say the least of it, was awkward, and I quite realize that as soon as the new government came into power negotiations were commenced, the Finance Minister says, by a visit from the French Consul General of Montreal. Negotiations were, at all events, opened shortly after the new government came into power, with a view of making a new trade arrangement to bind both Canada and France for a term of years to come. The new government had not been in power more than a few months when emissaries of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association likewise came to Ottawa and presented a memorial to the Finance Minister showing that, in respect of certain articles, the United States did then enjoy advantages over Canada, so far as Canadian trade with France was concerned. There were, therefore, two reasons to fix these matters in the mind of the Finance Minister. There was the visit from the French Consul General and there was the memorial from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. Now, an hon. member of this House with the experience in national financing of the present Minister of Finance had distinct notice that, in the very near future treaty negotiations would again be taken up with France with a view to coming to a new trade arrangement. He knew well what the French treaty of 1908 was. He knew what the French present tariff was. He knew the difficulties which would inevitably face him when he went to France to negotiate for a new treaty. He was warned by the Consul General in Montreal and by the Manufacturers' Association, yet he brought down his budget in 1922 and made no preparation whatever in that budget to enable him to conduct successful negotiations with the government of France. My hon. friend the Finance Minister has informed us that France has a different tariff system from that which we enjoy in Canada. Under the French system he has informed this House that France has adopted a general tariff usually very high, and also a minimum tariff which likewise is pretty high. But there is a large difference between the two tariffs. In many instances one is as much as four times as great as the other, and in some instances five or six times as great. The Finance Minister assured the House that France maintains that particular kind of tariff "as an instrument for commercial negotiation." I think these are his actual words. He was fully aware of this last spring before his budget; he knew it when he was called upon by the French Consul General, and it has been well said that to be fore-warned is to be fore-armed. He should have armed himself in the 1922 budget, yet, so far as we can judge from the budget which he brought down, he did nothing whatever by way of preparation to meet the situation which he knew must face him in the ensuing months when in consultation with the government of France which possessed under its tariff system this peculiar "instrument for the negotiation of commercial treaties," while he had none. What under such circumstances one might expect to happen did actually happen and the result is the one-sided proposal now before the House.

Before I turn to that point, let me just refer to this other one. I think I am not going beyond the fact in saying that, in the opinion of most people in this country, the results obtained under the international trade treaty between France and Canada of 1908 have fallen far below our expectations. I think in 1908, we all expected that there would be a very substantial increase in the trade between France and Canada as a result of the treaty; but year after year the figures were disappointing. The trade was not being done, and even at the expense of repeating some of the figures that have been given to the House in the course of this debate, I wish to include in my remarks the actual trade results that were obtained prior to the war under the treaty of 1908. The figures are as follows:

Fiscal year	Imports from France into Canada	Exports from Canada into France
1909..	$ 8,197,000	$2,341,000
1910..	10,109,000	2,601,000
1911..	11,583,000	2,535,000
1912..	11,744,000	2,048,000
1913..	15,375,000	2,357,000

In 1913, the volume of imports from France into Canada was the greatest.

	Imports from France	Exports from Canada
1914..	$14,276,000	$3,632,000

Whether or not I should include 1914, is a question. The war broke out in the beginning of August, 1914, after only four months of our financial year had elapsed, so that it may be said that eight months of that year were war months. But taking the whole six years from 1909 to 1914, both inclusive, we find that we bought from France under the treaty of 1908, $71,264,000 worth of goods, and France purchased from us only $14,514,000 worth. Therefore, in those six years there was an adverse balance of trade of $57,000,000 against Canada. I am going to omit the war years in the statement that I submit to the House. I come from 1914 down to the year 1922, which is the last year for which I have been able to get complete trade reports. For 1922, I find that we bought from France $13,500,000 worth of goods, and France bought from us $8,208,000 worth. But we had a statement made in the House to-day of the trade returns for the first eleven months of the last complete year, or up to the first March of the present year, and as I recollect the figures given by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) this afternoon, our exports to France had reached a total of about $12,000,000, while our imports from France during the same eleven months had come down to $11,000,000. I think that I have learned the reason for this. We know that there are monthly as well as yearly reports from the Trade and Commerce department. It so happens that last year we had a very heavy crop of wheat in this country, and, I regret to say there was a very low price for wheat. France, on the other hand, was in the market to buy wheat, and I have been informed that wheat comprises three million dollars of the increase in our exports to France during the last eleven months. During the previous year our exports of wheat to France amounted to about $1,250,000, while for 11 months of this year they have increased to $4,000,000 worth or thereabouts. The other notable increase in the present year has been in sugar. During the last eleven months there is an increase of just about $1,000,000 worth of sugar.

I mention these two matters particularly because the treaty does not affect either of them one way or the other. They are both under the French maximum or general tariff, and I suppose you might say also that they are both under the French minimum tariff, because the rate upon them is precisely the same under both the general and the minimum tariffs. Under the general tariff the rate on wheat, is 7 francs per 100 kilograms and under the minimum tariff the rate is precisely the same. Under the general tariff the rate on sugar is 90 francs per 100 kilograms, and under the minimum tariff the rate is precisely the same. Therefore, importations or exportations of both these commodities are unaffected by either the present proposal or by the treaty of 1908, because the rate under the general and the minimum tariff is the same. Whether you have a treaty or not does not matter as regards exports of wheat and sugar to France, because the rates are the same to us and all the rest of the world, no advantage being given to any nation.

There are however certain aspects of the present treaty which call, I think, for more than passing comment, particularly when one seeks to make a comparison between the arrangement contained in the proposal now before the House and the arrangement which the Minister of Finance made in 1908, and which this parliament ratified. I point out in the first instance, that whenever you find a variation between the trade arrangement of 1908 and the present proposal, you find it is in the interest of France and to the disadvantage of Canada. It is significant that every variation that occurs is in the same direction—an enlargement of the liberty of action of France, a contraction or restriction of the rights of Canada. I cannot find a single variation in the terms of the two treaties which is not favourable to France and at the same time a limitation upon Canada. I take for example the goods referred to in schedule A of the present proposal. These are goods which under the proposal are entitled to entry into France at the minimum French tariff. I compare article 1 and article 2 of the present proposal with the same articles in the treaty of 1908, and I find this marked distinction. Under the treaty of 1908 we not only had the right to ship our products into France at minimum tariff rates but also into all the French colonies, protectorates and possessions. That has been altered. The present arrangement permits us to ship goods under schedule A to French colonies, possessions and protectorates "having the same customs tariff as France." These words were not in the former treaty. Consequently if a possession of France has a different tariff—and I assume for reasons that I will state in a moment that many of them have—we have no right to export to that possession or colony upon the same basis as we are entitled to deal with France herself.

In the next place, by article 2 of the present tariff France grants her minimum tariff to Canada as one of the most favoured nations. We are guaranteed most favoured nation treatment, according to article 2. That is not the way the former treaty was settled; the treaty of 1908 expressly provided that if France made a better arrangement with any "foreign country"—not the most favoured nation—Canada should have the benefit of such arrangement. I am fully aware that there are eleven nations in the world at this time who, as respects Canada and France, are entitled to what is called most favoured nation treatment; but there are a good many more than eleven important trading nations in the world. Under the treaty of 1908 we were entitled to the benefit of any tariff that France granted "to any foreign country"; under this proposal we come in only for the treatment accorded to the eleven most favoured nations.

Under the treaty of 1908 France likewise reserved a small zone for tariff administration purposes as between herself and border states. Article II of the old treaty reads:

> The privileges which have been or may be granted to border states for facilitating frontier traffic within a limit not exceeding 15 kilometres on each side of the boundary.

That provision has been very much enlarged under the present proposal, which provides that France may make any tariff arrangement she sees fit with "border states," which means with Spain, with Italy, with Switzerland, with Belgium or with Germany, and Canada cannot claim the benefit of any such arrangement This is an express reservation by France in so many words, so plain that he who runs may read. And likewise France has insisted on another condition for her own benefit over and above anything she asked of Canada in 1908; that is, her right to make special trade treaties with states or countries with which she has been at war, which would of course include Germany, Austria, Turkey and Bulgaria.

Now, I think France has pretty well provided in this treaty that she is to be at liberty to make practically any trade arrangements she likes with pretty much any country in Europe without our being able to take advantage of it. This applies to schedule A.

Well, what is the proposal in regard to schedule B? This schedule represents those goods which, if this treaty be ratified, will be entitled to go into France from Canada at a percentage of reduction as between the general tariff and the minimum tariff of France. Perhaps an example is the best way of illustrating the operation of this provision. Supposing the general tariff in France is 200 francs on an article and the minimum tariff is 100 francs, and the percentage of reduction in favour of Canada is 50 per cent; the difference between the general and the minimum tariff being 100 francs, 50 per cent of that would be 50 francs. Take 50 from the 200 francs, the general tariff, and the net tariff on Canadian goods would be 150 francs.

With such terms in a treaty is it not of vital importance to Canada that the proportion as between the general and the minimum tariff should always remain unchanged? But France has taken special pains to express clearly in this treaty that she is not to be bound by such a provision; on the contrary France has reserved expressly to herself the right to raise her maximum or her minimum tariff, or both, just as she may deem proper, but all Canada will get is the benefit of a percentage of reduction as between the general and minimum tariffs. Suppose in the case I have just put that the day after this treaty is ratified by this parliament France for her own purposes increases her general tariff to 400 francs, what is the result? The difference between this tariff and the minimum would then be 300 francs, and our percentage of reduction would be 50 per cent of the difference, or 150 francs. Deduct this from the 400 francs, which is the general tariff, and the rate on the goods of this country entering France would be 250 francs instead of the rate of 150 francs which I quoted a few minutes ago. And France reserves the right to make such increases as and when she may so desire.

France was quite justified in making the best bargain she could. Nobody can complain of that. In fact this afternoon I was rather surprised when the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) hinted that somebody in this quarter of the House had suggested that the negotiators for France had acted in some respects unfairly in the negotiations. No such suggestion was made from this quarter. We are prepared to pay the negotiators for France in this matter every compliment. They are entitled to it. They certainly were wide-awake when they negotiated this treaty. I do not think they have missed much—indeed, I do not think they have missed anything. The treaty appears to be all in favour of France; every fresh limitation, every new condition has given an additional advantage to France and imposed a corresponding disadvantage upon Canada. The French diplomats have certainly made a splendid bargain for France.

In regard to goods in schedule B the position is simply this: France may alter the rates of duty upon these goods to-morrow and most effectually exclude us from her markets. Does anyone think we are entitled to the most favoured nation treatment with respect to goods mentioned in schedule B? Indeed we are not; France has reserved that point too. In the treaty of 1908 it is provided that we shall have the benefit of the lowest French tariff with any foreign nation; but when we come to schedule B of the present treaty it merely says that we shall get the benefit of the lowest rate accorded to the United States. Other nations may enjoy much lower rates; all we get in regard to goods on schedule B is the lowest rate which is given to the United States.

Then there is another provision just as favourable to France as schedules A and B. In respect of goods that are not in either schedule A or schedule B we simply get the United States rate, and if the agreement between France and the United States shall at any time be terminated, then we get a 25 per cent reduction and the difference between the general and the minimum French rates. But there is a curious provision in repect to the goods not included in schedules A or B, and that provision is contained in article V. It says:

> If at any time France grants to the United States of America for any products other than those enumerated in schedules A and B to this convention more favourable treatment than is granted to Canada, Canada shall be entitled to claim the benefit of the same treatment for any identical or similar products originating in and coming from Canada, on condition that France shall be entitled to ask from Canada a reasonable and equivalent concession.

When France deals with our diplomats; when France deals with the two ministers of this government who went to Paris to negotiate this treaty, France expressly provides that if any concession is granted to Canada, Canada shall grant an identical concession to France. But when the negotiators for the United States went over in 1921 to arrange their trade convention, for aught we know or are able to learn about the matter they gave no concession whatever to France and France gave them freely what they asked. But under the present treaty, even if in the future the United States gets a further concession of which we claim the benefit, we are bound under the treaty to give a similar concession to France.

Now, my summary of the agreement as it is presented to parliament is that it is by no means as satisfactory a treaty as that which is still in force. Every change has been a disadvantage to this country. France has succeeded in securing for herself absolute freedom of action for the future; Canada, on the other hand, is bound under the hard and fast terms of express stipulations. Let me turn for a moment to the provisions in regard to Canada. Canada in respect to schedule D grants to France a fixed rate of duty; if the bill is passed bringing this treaty into force we absolutely fix the rates of duty on all the goods mentioned in schedule D coming from France to Canada and we cannot alter these rates unless we denounce the treaty. We have agreed to it; we have allowed ourselves no liberty of action; we cannot change a single rate under schedule D—that is the express language of the treaty. Then, in regard to schedule E which is a list of goods in respect of which Canada says to France, "We will give you the intermediate tariff of Canada and in addition we will give you a discount of 10 per cent." One would think that was a pretty reasonable offer to France and that as France herself had retained liberty of action in almost every respect she would have granted Canada some liberty of action; that some reciprocal arrangement would have been effected. But no, the negotiators for France say, "You must bind yourselves that you will always maintain the same proportion between the intermediate and the general tariff of Canada." We cannot alter this proportion. We can raise the general tariff, it is true, but if we do we must keep up the same proportion between our general and our intermediate tariffs so that a 10 per cent advantage to France will be sure to result. If there were anything like mutuality in this bargain, anything like reciprocal treatment, surely France would not have insisted on her right to raise her minimum or general tariff, one or the other or both, as she saw fit, and would not have so far bound the hands of the Canadian representatives as to schedule D to say, "These are the figures and you cannot alter them; you shall go no higher or no lower," and as to schedule E to say, "We will have your intermediate tariff with 10 per cent off, but you must bind yourselves to keep up the same proportion between your intermediate and your general tariff as at the present time." So again with schedule F, which deals with goods which France will be entitled to send into Canada at a discount of 15 per cent from the intermediate tariff. The same language is employed in schedule F as in schedule E; we cannot change the proportion of our general and our intermediate tariff in any way.

I have tried to state these things as clearly and as fairly as I can. I have tried to point out to the House the tremendous difference which exists between these two treaties, that of 1908 and the one now offered by the Finance Minister for the ratification of this parliament. If our trade did not succeed very well under the treaty of 1908; if we were disappointed in the trade results under that treaty—and I think we all were—what will happen to us under a treaty so overbalanced in favour of France as the present proposal? Every restriction in favour of France, every variation, every liberty, we are bound to by the treaty, and France is perfectly free to alter it or to nullify it as she sees fit. That is one aspect of the matter which appeals to me. But there is another important phase of the matter and even at the risk of some repetition I am going to refer to it.

My hon. friend the Minister of Finance very candidly states that in his opinion this trade arrangement is of far more consequence to Canada than it is to France. I entirely differ from him in that opinion. He has pointed out the enormous difference between the French general and minimum tariffs and the comparatively small difference between our intermediate and general tariffs. He says that in one case the general tariff of France may be four or five times the minimum tariff while in Canada the difference is not more than perhaps five or seven and a half per cent between our general and intermediate rates and that is true. But I judge of the matter from the actual trade returns. If France sold to Canada last year $13,500,000 worth of goods and Canada sold to France a little over $8,000,000 worth of goods might one not assume that the trade as between the two countries is substantially more valuable and important to France than it is to Canada? What do the trade figures disclose? I will take the figures submitted to-day by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries for the eleven months of the present year—$12,000,000 of exports from Canada to France. I received to-day from the Department of Trade and Commerce a statement of the total exports of Canada for the last year and I find that the domestic merchandise exported ran to the enormous sum of $932,000,000 odd. Of that, $12,000,000 went to France, about one and one-quarter per cent of our exports. Is the export to France, then, such a vital matter to Canada as my hon. friend the Minister of Finance seems to think? I do not regard it as such a vital matter at all; if we had no trade treaty between France and Canada to-day I do not believe it would prove such a calamity that we need fear. It would not even seriously injure us. I do believe it would be a commercial misfortune. I think what we require is a fair treaty. What we require is something in the nature of a reciprocal arrangement where the obligations and burdens on one country are to some extent similar to the obligations and burdens on the other country, and so also with the benefits and advantages. But I do not think the proposal we have before us constitutes such a treaty, and for that reason I do not approve it.

Even at the risk of repeating some of the things that may have been better said by others in the course of this debate I desire to look at this matter from another viewpoint for a few moments, and that is in regard to the question of the preferred nations or the most favoured nation treatment. I saw in a statement issued by the Customs department a list of the most favoured nations as they exist at the present time, they are as follows: the Argentine republic, Colombia, Denmark, France, Japan, Norway, Russia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland and Venezuela. It is to be noted that Belgium is not one of them; it is to be noted also that Holland is not one of them; but there are eleven of them and under this arrangement every one of these nations, without giving us the slightest concession or the slightest advantage in its market is entitled to take the benefit of this proposed treaty as between France and Canada. I have made up a brief statement showing how our international trade operated last year, and if this treaty should come into force I think the figures in this statement will probably be greatly magnified next year. In my view of the matter the proposed treaty is going to prove, not in form, but in reality a treaty for increased trade with Switzerland rather than a treaty for increased trade as between Canada and France. Switzerland will obtain all the advantages which France will obtain in Canada without giving Canada any corresponding advantage in markets of Switzerland. I have only taken two tariff items which represent some of the larger exports as between Canada, France and Switzerland. I take tariff item 575 and tariff item 526 as examples. Tariff item 575 comprises a large number of goods. The item was referred to this afternoon. It comprises braids, cords, fringes and tassels. From France we bought last year $48,847 worth, and from Switzerland $112,207. Under the same item 575 come embroidered handkerchiefs. From France we bought last year $6,039, and from Switzerland $423,000. Under the same item come other handkerchiefs. From France we bought last year $5,629, and from Switzerland $225,823.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Under item 526 comes lace, white and cream colour. From France we bought last year $68,474, and from Switzerland $241,915. For these two items the totals are as follows: From France we purchased a total of $128,989, and from Switzerland $1,002,945. Or we purchased from Switzerland about eight times as much as we did from France. Now we propose to give France a preference in our market on the condition that France does something for us, but are we not in reality giving that preference to Switzerland rather than to France? And Switzerland gives absolutely no concession to us.

It is the same or worse in the case of Japan. Let me give one or two items in respect of Japan because in my view this is perhaps the most important aspect of the whole treaty. We are not, except on the surface, dealing with France. We are in reality dealing with the most favoured nations. Japan is a strong competitor of this country in many lines of manufacture. Let us examine the figures in regard to three or four tariff items? Take item 581, silk fabrics. We brought from France last year $1,006,000 and from Japan $4,093,000 worth. Item 582, silk ribbons. Of these we bought from France last year $248,656, and from Japan $692,408. Item 624, toys and dolls. Of these we bought from France last year $23,173, and from Japan $187,000. Item 653, brushes. Of these we bought from France last year $42,941, and from Japan $114,415. Buttons, in which my hon. friend for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) will be interested, we bought last year from France to the amount of $11,332, and from Japan $107,761 worth. Just in regard to the last item, while there is no button industry in the riding which I have the honour to represent, there is one and a large one in the adjoining riding of North Waterloo at the town of Kitchener. Now what will be the operation of this treaty in regard to buttons? Last year we bought from France $11,332 worth, a negligible quantity, and in the same year we bought from Japan $107,000 worth. The customs tariff on butons at the present moment is 30 per cent. Take 10 per cent off that rate, that is 3 per cent, and the result is a net duty under the proposed treaty of 27 per cent. There will be a reduction from 30 to 27 per cent in regard to the button industry at the city of Kitchener, and the competition in this line of goods is not from France at all but from Japan. The totals of the figures I have just given under these five tariff items show that we bought goods from France last year to the amount of $1,332,000, and from

9 p.m.

Japan to the amount of $5,194,000. This again I submit on the surface is a trade agreement between Canada and France, but in reality it will prove to be a trade agreement between Canada and Japan for the benefit of Japan and for which Japan grants Canada no concession whatever.

Passing from this phase of the question I ask myself, living as I do in the central portion of the province of Ontario, how this proposal will be viewed in the riding which I have the honour to represent. How will it affect the people of that particular locality? It may be said that is a narrow view to take of the question. It may be narrow, but it is very natural, and as I have the honour to represent a riding that is made up of all classes of people pretty well distributed, perhaps the views of the people in that riding would in general be a fair guide in other portions of the Dominion of Canada I look over the whole proposal. I take schedule A and I take schedule B and I ask myself, what effect will this proposed arrangement have in South Wellington? Who is going to benefit if this proposal goes into force? The largest single class of people in my riding, of course, is the agricultural class representing, I think, probably forty or forty-five per cent of the total population of that riding. I look over the schedules, examine schedule A carefully, examine schedule B just as carefully, and I do not find a single article in either schedule concerning which I can appeal to the agricultural classes in my community and say, this will be an advantage to agriculturists in the Dominion of Canada. It cannot be truly said; it is not within the terms of the treaty. There is not a scintilla of advantage to Canadian agriculturists from one end of the treaty to the other. Take the case of horses, ham, lard, eggs, cheese, wheat, oats, barley, rye, buckwheat, apples, peaches and the like; there is no change in the French tariff on these items. We are not in a worse position I grant, nor are we in any better position, under the present proposal than you were under the old treaty—the rates are precisely the same. I will grant this also: There are some items as to which Canada, under the new proposal in regard to the agricultural schedules, is in a little better position than the United States. I do not say for a moment that the whole treaty is bad. I would not argue for a moment that there were not some items in respect of which we may have secured some advantage, because I find in the agricultural schedules that we do have some advantage over the United States. In such items as cheese, eggs, horses, fish (fresh and salted) lobsters. In all these items we have a benefit which the United States has not by reason of a slightly reduced tariff; but the French tariff remains still too high for any business. The tariff has not been sufficiently reduced to enable us to do a profitable trade in respect of these very articles—it is still too high. We are still shut out of France. We have not, in the past, been able to get into the French market, with our cheese, eggs, horses, etc., because of the French tariff, and we will not in the future because the high tariff rates will still prevail.

I notice, however, that all those classes of fish which the Maritime provinces may hope to export to France have been fairly well looked after by the Minister of Finance in the present proposal; but in respect to shipments of fish from the far province of British Columbia, I find, that the rate on canned salmon has been raised from 25 to 35 per cent. So far as the eastern fishing industry is concerned the terms are just as favourable now as they were before, but not so for the fishing industry of British Columbia.

What are the agricultural classes in my riding or in Canada going to gain by this arrangement? One result will be that we will have to raise more revenue in Canada next year than we are doing at present. The Finance Minister when he introduced this treaty into the House said that he estimated that as a result of the operation of the treaty there would be a loss to the revenue of $850,000. I do not think for a moment that he exaggerated the amount, I would not be surprised if the amount was far in excess of that figure, but that money will have to be made up to the treasury from some other source. Surely that fact is too plain for argument. We know the situation in regard to national finance in the Dominion at this moment. We know that we must have revenue from every possible source, we know that there is a very heavy debt upon the people; the interest burden runs into a tremendous amount each year. We cannot carelessly sacrifice a dollar of our revenue. The Minister of Finance estimates that we will lose $850,000 of revenue if this treaty goes into force. How are we going to make it up? That is a fair question. It will be lost through the reduction of duty on the importation into Canada of luxuries. It has been stated by both the ministers who negotiated this treaty that if you are going to negotiate a trade arrangement with France you must arrange to take from that country the goods which France manufactures and desires to export; largely these goods are luxuries. I do not desire to enlarge upon this phase of the matter, but the fact remains that the goods which will come to Canada under the preferential arrangement which we propose to enter into with France will be brandy, champagne and wines, laces (white or cream), embroideries satins, silks, velvets, works of art—classes of goods which no one in this country would hesitate for a moment to class as luxuries. They are luxuries according to our style of living. The people who use these goods in Canada represent but a very small proportion of the population of the Dominion; they are the favoured few. There is probably but 5 or at the most 10 per cent of our people who can buy those articles upon which the rate of taxation is to be lowered under this proposal, and the treasury of Canada is to be deprived of $850,000 of revenue per annum according to the estimate of the Finance Minister. The question is, how shall we make up that amount? Will it be done by further customs taxation? If so you cannot further tax luxuries; the treaty will prevent it. I think it is a well-known principle of taxation, it is a principle of taxation accepted at least in this country, that luxuries should be the most highly taxed and necessaries the most lightly taxed. The adoption of this treaty would be a practical subversion of that principle; this treaty involves a reduction of the present taxes upon luxuries. Then how are you going to make up the loss unless you increase the tax on necessaries? You may do it by means of your customs tariff, or you may do it by means of direct taxation. In one way or the other it must be raised upon necessaries—you will have to do it in order to make up $850,000 lost through reducing the tax upon luxuries. The treasury must have this sum if we are going to meet our obligations and our liabilities.

So far as I can see, the only class in my riding who are going to receive any direct or positive benefit from this treaty if it be put into force is that small percentage of the people who are "clothed in purple and fine linen and fare sumptuously every day." But to the ordinary people of that constituency there will be a positive loss and the infliction of further taxation upon the necessaries of life. I pass from the agriculturist class to the ordinary class of people in the city, the artisans, mechanics and people generally. What advantage is there for them in this treaty? Is there a single suggestion of benefit or advantage of any kind; I ask anyone to point it out. I cannot find it and I have read and re-read the treaty; I have turned it over and examined it from every point of view. For the great midlde class, the ordinary people of this country, while there is no possible advantage there is positive disadvantage.

Then I turn to the manufacturing class and I come to a few cases where I believe there may be possible benefit. I do not find that great benefit can possibly result to the riding of South Wellington where I live; but I can well understand that when this treaty comes into force there may, perhaps, be an opportunity to export to France some farm machinery and parts of farm machinery which we are not able to export now. I grant that. I realize also that if this treaty comes into force the manufacturer of automobiles may secure some trade with France which is not now enjoyed. Last year we sold to France one automobile. With the new proposed rate of 45 per cent on automobiles I doubt if very much business will be done; but it is possible that some export business may be developed by our manufacturers in that line. I think also I can point to an industry in my own riding, as well as in the riding of the hon. member for Welland, which makes iron and steel tubes. The rate of duty on iron and steel tubes entering France is better under this arrangement than under the treaty of 1908. It is possible but I do not think it is probable—because the rates are still very high—it is possible that some additional business may be done in the export to France of iron and steel tubes. I am sure that my hon. friend for Lincoln will be able to do some additional business in France which he is not able to do at present. I think he is entitled to every credit for the position he has taken in regard to this matter. No man knows his own business better than does the member for Lincoln; but notwithstanding the possibility of advantage to himself under this agreement he recognizes the general disadvantage of this proposal to the whole of the Dominion.

Coming back again to my own riding I desire to ask the manufacturers of South Wellington, of the city of Guelph, what their views upon this question are. The Finance Minister has proclaimed more than once in this debate that his chief object in going to France was to secure for the manufacturers of Canada a readjustment of the French tariff which would put the manufacturers of Canada upon the same basis as the manufacturers of the United States in respect of trade with France, and he says that to a reasonable extent he has achieved his end.

Such an achievement might be all right if we did not have too pay too high a price for it. It might be a noble achievement if other conditions were equal or fair. I come to my own riding again, and I ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance what he thinks of this proposal in regard to sewing machines? In the city of Guelph we have a very large industry manufacturing sewing machines known as The White Sewing Machine Company. My hon. friend and his colleague have succeeded in putting sewing machines upon the same plane exactly as machines of American manufacture. But in reality what have they done? Under the treaty in force to-day stands for sewing machines are taxed 32.8 francs per 100 kilograms upon export to France. Now my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has succeeded in putting Canada on the same plane as the United States. In doing so he has raised the French duty from 32.8 to 41 francs per 100 kilograms. The machines proper to-day can be sent into France at a rate of 143½ francs. But now that we are placed on the same plane as the manufacturers in the United States, the duty on machines is raised to 205 francs. We were not able to do much business with France under the present duty, but what can we possibly expect in the way of export trade if this treaty comes into force, which has raised the French tariff on stands from 32.8 to 41 francs, and on machines proper from 143½ to 205 francs? What am I going to say to the manufacturers of sewing machines in my city if I admit that I voted for this new proposal made by the Minister of Finance and his colleague last summer?

Then I take another big industry in the city in which I live, that of pianos and organs. We have the Bell Organ and Piano Company, one of the oldest established concerns in this country, well known from one end of the country to the other. They have been large exporters of their manufactures. The Minister of Finance has succeeded in putting them on the same plane as the American manufacturer. What am I going to say to them when they look over the schedules of the treaty. But before I go into this, I wish to say I believe there is a mistake in the particulars relating to customs tariff rates in France which the government has laid on the table. I want it particularly noted that I think this item in the particulars is wrong, but I am going to use these figures as they are the only ones available and have been supplied by the government. What do I find? Under item, marked x 604 I find "pianos, grand." The rate to-day is 52.5 francs, but again the Finance Minister has put us on the American plane. We are on a level with American piano manufacturers and the French tariff has been raised from 52.5 to 85 francs. The rate on upright pianos is unchanged. Then we come to the humbler instrument, the organ—the cottage organ and not the church organ. Organs under the same item, of 200 kilograms, but less than 300, to-day are exported into France at the rate of 52½ francs, but the minister again has put us on the American level which has raised the tariff to 260 francs. What am I going to say to the manufacturers in my district about pianos and organs? To-day under the old arrangement, you could export pianos to France at 52.5 francs, but if the new treaty comes into effect we will have to pay 85 francs. To-day you can export organs at 52½ francs, but when the new treaty comes into effect you will have to pay 260 francs.

I will take another item. These matters of course all pertain particularly to my own riding, and it may be said that I am taking rather a narrow view of the question, but the same thing applies all over Canada We are also favoured in the constituency which I have the honour to represent with some important rubber manufacturing institutions. We have rubber factories in Guelph where they produce a large assortment of rubber goods. There is the Northern Rubber Company, producing rubber boots and shoes. What am I going to say when I explain this treaty to the Northern Rubber Company? I can say "Well you are on exactly the same plane as the American manufacturer, the finance minister has arranged this for you," but what consolation will that be to the proprietors of the concern when they come to read the present tariff? On rubber boots and shoes with felt the present rate is 260 francs per 100 kilograms, but these have been put on the American rate by the new treaty and raised to 390 francs per 100 kilograms, a raise of 130 francs, which is very substantial. The next item I mention is rubber boots lined with cotton. The present rate is 208 francs. The new rate, which is the American rate, is 312 francs. That is the result of the treaty on another of the largest industries we have in South Wellington. I desire to refer to one more item. We have a tire factory engaged in a large way of business in the manufacture of rubber tires and tubes. I can say to them "Now you ought to be happy, you are put on the same plane as the American manufacturer." But when they come to look up the tariff what will they find? They will find to-day that the rate on inner tubes and pneumatic tires per 100 kilograms is 150 francs, but under the new treaty they have been put on a parity with their American competitors and the tariff has been put up to 225 francs, which they will have to pay when shipping their goods to France. These are the items which especially appeal to me in the matter, and which especially affect the riding which I have the honour to represent in this House. I have tried as well as I can to balance in my own mind and according to my own judgment the advantages —because there are some—and the disadvantages, which in my judgment—

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend is asking again and again what answer he can make to his constituents when they find these advances. Now, in every case he is making a comparison with a dead arrangement, with an instrument which is dead or dying, and any comparison made between the present rates and the new tariff is absolutely unfair. The comparison should be between the rates of the treaty and the general tariff of France.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That may be a very fair remark, but I want to point out to my hon. friend that he has stated in a most emphatic way—and emphasized his statement on two occasions—"My object in going to France was to get the American rates for Canadian goods." Now he has them, and I have given him the results in my riding, and if the manufacturers of my riding are satisfied with the result, I will certainly be very much surprised.

Mr. FIELDING: The hon. member is not doing me justice in this matter. It is true that I stated the object was to get on even terms with the United States, because they will be our chief competitors in the European market, but beyond that the great point is to get something better than we would get by coming under the general tariff of France.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My criticism of the hon. minister's position is this: that what he has got is not such an arrangement as we in Canada are warranted in accepting.

Mr. FIELDING: That is another question.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is what I am trying to argue and that is the point upon which I am submitting these various comparisons. I do not for a moment admit that the treaty which he has brought back is one which this parliament should accept. My argument is entirely the other way. I do want a fair and reasonable commercial arrangement between Canada and France and every one on this side of the House wants it also. We desire any kind of a reciprocal arrangement with France which will confer something like equal benefits upon both countries, but the arrangement which is proposed by the government is so one-sided, so overbalanced, and so unequal in every respect, so far as I have been able to examine it, that in my opinion this House would not be warranted in accepting it as a satisfactory trade agreement between the two countries.

It would be far better for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) to drop this proposal. It would be far better for him and his colleague to go back and try again. They know something of the game of treaty-making now. Let them take a little longer time, if necessary, and let them say to the negotiators of France: "In the bright light of an April day this proposal does not suit the parliament of Canada. It insists upon a better bargain". To whose interest is it most to make a treaty? As I said before, it is certainly to the interest of France, and I have no doubt, if this government should persist, it can procure a less objectionable treaty. The United States certainly secured a better one, and if our negotiators were as persistent, patient and diplomatic as those able statesmen whom France designated to conduct its side of the negotiations, I think we might have secured a much more satisfactory treaty than the one now before us.

I have tried to balance the advantages and disadvantages under this arrangement. I have tried to make some kind of an estimate of what we may reasonably expect in the way of increased trade, although that is very hard to estimate. I have mentioned several lines in which I think it may be possible to increase our exports to France; but after all, what will this amount to? Perhaps a million, two million, think you, three million a year in increased exports? Less than half of that, I feel sure. Suppose our exports should increase by two or three million dollars; last year the total amount was only eight million dollars odd all told, of agricultural products, manufactured products and everything else. Suppose the increase in exports is say three million dollars per annum, are we not paying too much for such an increase in export trade? Are we not tying our hands so completely under this agreement that we will not be able in the future to take advantage of more favourable arrangements which may be offered other countries of the world? Are we not going to pay too highly by loss to our treasury of $850,000 a year for the little bit of benefit which may possibly result? But apart from that altogether, are we not by this very treaty, granting favours, by reduction of taxation, to the people who least require such reductions? What satisfaction is it to the general public of Canada to know that a few of the people in the cities of this country are going to get their luxuries, their silks, their laces and their wines under a duty of $27 a hundred instead of $30 as formerly? We may find it very hard to explain this aspect to the people if this treaty should go through. It will be of no benefit to the people in my constituency. It may be of some little benefit to the rich people of Montreal, Toronto or other large centres of population who purchase luxuries. But perhaps the worst feature of the question is that the loss of revenue must be made up, and as you cannot make up this loss by increased taxation on luxuries, because your treaty forbids it—consequently it must be made up by further taxation of the necessaries of life. These are the reasons why this treaty does not commend itself to me. It is for those reasons that I was prepared to move an amendment upon the second reading of this bill; but during the dinner recess, I may tell the House that I was in consultation with my leader, and he thinks it better that the bill should go into committee and be fully discussed there. I certainly intend, however, to reserve my right on the third reading of the bill to move the amendment which I had proposed to move to-night, but which I am dissuaded from doing by the request of my leader. Perhaps, on the whole, when the bill is discussed in committee, we may be able to demonstrate more clearly than we are able to do now, that the proposal is not to the advantage or benefit of the great mass of the people of this country.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, hon. members of this House who, in 1911, were members of the Canadian parliament, and who then listened to the eloquent and convincing speech of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) in defending the proposals for reciprocity with the United States, must have admired his ability to turn corners quickly as they listened to his speech this evening condemning the present proposed arrangement with the republic of France.

Mr. DUFF: We are used to him now.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is it the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) my hon. friend is referring to?

Mr. ROBB: Wellington.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I thought my hon. friend said the hon. member for Welland.

Mr. ROBB: The hon. member for Wellington and the hon. member for Welland were in this House on the same side defending the party against the attacks of my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) who now leads the opposition. Most of the argument presented in 1911 against the reciprocity pact with the United States was along the same lines as that of my hon. friend to-night; that is, that automatically the proposed arrangement of 1911 affected some twelve to fifteen states, and no one was more eloquent in advancing that idea than the then hon. member for St. Antoine, Sir Herbert Ames, and the present leader of the Opposition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. member mean in the House?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend is drawing on his imagination. If he looks up Hansard, he will find that I never spoke at all.

Mr. ROBB: My right hon. friend had then in mind his resolution for lowering the duties on agricultural implements. Perhaps I have in mind his speech on the hustings. The hon. member for South Wellington, however, has to-night tried to narrow down this proposition to butter and bronze powder, forgetting that in the schedule for the minimum tariff there are some 413 items. True, my hon. friend argues that some of these items are the same in the minimum tariff as in the general tariff; but there may be a day when the republic of France will change that tariff, and Canada will be in that list and will be entitled to all the benefits of whatever reduction may be made.

I recall that soon after this government acquired power last winter, we were approached by the representative of France, who intimated that the treaty that had been extended by the government that preceded us was narrowed down to France alone, and that Canada did not share in the trade between the colonies, protectorates, and possessions of France. When we looked up the records, we discovered that the balance of trade with the colonies, protectorates and possessions of France were very much in favour of Canada. Therefore, at once this government enlarged the scope of the treaty so that it covered those colonies and protectorates. Then I have in mind that a very large manufacturer of agricultural implements came to us and pointed out that under the arrangement with the United States of March, 1921, their well-established business in France was very much in danger, particularly as they were under a disadvantage as regards parts of agricultural implements. I have in mind too a very large industry in Hamilton which approached us through its representatives, and I have under my hand their letter pointing out that the republic of France proposed a considerable electrical development where large quantities of porcelain were required, and stating that if they were placed upon the same basis as the United States, they could secure that business. Therefore, I may remind my hon. friend that having succeeded in placing Canada upon the same basis as the United States, we have succeeded in securing a considerable advantage for the people of Canada, for producers of both agricultural and manufactured products?

I wish just for a moment to draw the attention of my hon. friend to one item in the tariff, and I am not going to pursue this tariff question long or go into details or figures. I think it has been fairly well presented to the House; but may I remind my hon. friend again what was pointed out to him just a minute ago by the Minister of Finance, that had we not secured this arrangement, we would have come under the general tariff of France? What would that mean? I will give my hon. friend just one example. Under the arrangement which is now before us the duty on boots and shoes is 390 francs; under the general tariff, which would be operative had we not been placed upon the same basis as the United States, the duty would be 4,040 francs.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the difference whether it is the one or the other? Does the hon. gentleman think we can put shoes into France against the present tariff?

Mr. ROBB: I would remind my hon. friend that the war has taught Canadians to have a little more confidence in themselves and that to-day we are going into the markets of the world with our products. Canadian manufacturers realize that, given equal terms, they can compete in the markets of the world. I am reminded that boots and shoes from the United States are sold in the French stores.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, and the manufacturers of the United States make enough boots and shoes in one day to supply the whole of Canada for nearly a year.

Mr. ROBB: Canada is commencing to export.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not boots and shoes to France.

Mr. ROBB: Canada will export boots and shoes to France. My hon. friend, for whom I have great admiration, came into this House the same year I did, in 1908, and by his industry and ability rose to a leading place in parliament. He eventually became Prime Minister and in the campaign of 1921 he was the only real, true "defender of the faith" of high tariff and trading only with ourselves.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister should not say that, for his own Finance Minister has confessed to the House that all I was defending was a low tariff.

Mr. LAPOINTE: National-Liberal-Conservative.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend was trying to re-unite a great party along the lines that we can get rich by trading among ourselves —swapping jack-knives. Although the last speaker (Mr. Guthrie) has just admitted his party did not have the courage to move the amendment which was suggested prior to six o'clock, my hon. friend is advocating a policy of trading only with ourselves. I ask him if we can ever grow as a nation in that way?

Mr. MEIGHEN: What does he base that statement on?

Mr. ROBB: On the whole argument of my hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Pshaw, not at all.

Mr. ROBB: I think I can convince my hon. friend that it does not make any difference what treaty is presented to parliament or to the country, if it makes for enlarged trade it i sure to meet with opposition from him. I will prove this.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I am complaining of in this treaty is that it contracts our market in the things we really sell.

Mr. ROBB: In 1911 the Liberal party presented to the country a treaty with the United States, and my hon. friend and his party complained that it gave all to the farmers and paid no regard to the manufacturers. That was the assertion then made.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was not mine.

Mr. ROBB: Well, my hon. friend supported that policy. To-day he argues that this treaty gives everything to the manufacturers and provides nothing for the farmers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It gives everything to France.

Mr. ROBB: In 1911 the policy of my hon. friend was: No truck or trade with the Yankees.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, not at all.

Mr. ROBB: To-day his policy is: No truck or trade with the French. That is the natural conclusion to be drawn from the argument we have had presented against this treaty. Remembering the attitude of my hon. friend in 1911, I am not sure how the farmers of western Canada will regard his solicitude for them in respect of this treaty, but I rather suspect they will have very grave doubts as to the sincerity of his attitude.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What will they think of the hon. minister's?

Mr. ROBB: I believe that in this arrangement Canada has obtained many concessions that will be of value in the future. I have made a study of some of the foreign trade of France and I observe that she has purchased large quantities of goods from the United States and the Argentine. Under the proposed arrangement Canada will be at least upon the same basis as the United States, and as there is no possibility of those two countries coming under the objections advanced by my hon. friend this afternoon with respect to border states, in that regard we start out on an equal footing with our great neighbour to the south and with the Argentine—

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. ROBB: —who supply large quantities of goods to France.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What do those countries give France?

Mr. ROBB: I have the details, but I will not detain the House by reciting them. In addition, we provide for the future, for in article 3 it will be observed that whatever changes France makes as regards the tariffs of her colonies, possessions and protectorates, Canada will be entitled to similar percentages. To quote the article:

> These percentages shall remain the same whatever increase or decrease of tariff duties, surtaxes or coefficients France may establish in the future.

Then I observe that article 5 provides:

> If the United States of America should at any time cease to enjoy the benefit of the French decree of March 28th, 1921, products of Canada other than those enumerated in schedules A and B to this convention shall enjoy a reduction of twenty-five per cent on the difference between the French general tariff and minimum tariff, whatever the rates of these tariffs may be.
> If at any time France grants to the United States of America for any products other than those enumerated in schedule A and B to this Convention more favourable treatment than is granted to Canada, Canada shall be entitled to claim the benefit of the same treatment for any identical or similar products originating in and coming from Canada.

That is a concession which is worth something for the future.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Would the minister be kind enough to read the concluding words of the sentence?

Mr. ROBB: Do you mean:

> On condition that France shall be entitled to ask from Canada a reasonable and equivalent concession.

Is that it?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Yes.

Mr. ROBB: Is there any objection to that? My hon. friend who has just preceded me—and I have it here in Hansard—laid down the policy in 1911 that any trade between countries must be on a fair basis, that you cannot obtain concessions without giving an equivalent in return. I submit that the hon. member for South Wellington was on sound ground then, but in the interval he has wandered far from good company. Now, article 7 is in these terms:

> If under the preceding articles the French minimum tariff does not apply to foodstuffs originating in and coming from Canada these products shall nevertheless enjoy the benefit of the said tariff upon their importation into the French West Indies and French Guiana.

Then there are other provisions that are worth something but that have not yet been pointed out. Customs tariff is not the only imposition that is placed upon the products of a country in these days when all the nations are searching about for methods of raising revenue. We ouselves raise certain revenues through the excise; France has provided for that. In this treaty ample care is taken that no matter whether it is a province, a town or a city that imposes excise, Canada shall be protected. I quote article XVIII.:

> Products of Canadian origin of any kind imported into France, the French colonies, possessions and protectorates shall not be subject to any other or higher duties of excise or town dues than those which are or may be charged upon like products of the most favoured nation. In like manner products of any kind originating in France, the French colonies, possessions or protectorates when imported into Canada shall not be subject to any other or higher duties of excise or town dues than those which are or may be charged upon like products of the most favoured nation.

So that upon that ground we are placed in exactly the same position as any favoured nation desiring to trade with France. I submit that while this arangement with France may not be all that we would desire to get —because any man who goes out to promote trade relations tries to get all he can for his country—France had something to say about the matter, and it is all that France has given to any other nation. What more can we ask from these 36,000,000 customers, industrious people who always pay for what they buy?

If my hon. friend believes that my advice is worth anything to him I suggest that he think it over again before coming to the conclusion that that amendment should be offered. I am satisfied that the people of Canada will not look kindly upon any attempt to stop the expansion of Canadian trade with any country that is able to buy Canadian products.

Mr. J. FRED JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few remarks on this subject it is not my hope that I shall be able to add very much to what has already been said as respects the details of the treaty now under consideration. But I have been struck with some of the remarks made by some of my hon. friends to my right. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) said that under this treaty the farmers of Canada would be no worse or no better off. Well, I submit that if we in this part of the House opposed the treaty on the ground that it did not contain much for the farmers, the hon. member for South Wellington would be one of the first to charge us with selfishness. I believe the manufacturers will derive some benefit from the terms of this treaty. We in this part of the House are glad of that. We think it is a good thing for Canada as a whole that our manufacturers should be prosperous; we are glad to have trade arrangements made with other countries that will give them a market for their products.

This trade arrangement, Mr. Speaker, as all others, should be considered wholly on its merits. I am convinced, though, that the opposition in this House would be hard to satisfy in this respect; as a matter of fact I do not think this government could negotiate a treaty that would be acceptable to the official opposition. Under the bi-party system an opposition, it would appear, is expected to oppose, and I am sure the present opposition are fulfilling that duty to the letter. We in this part of the House stand for something different: we stand for wider markets and freer trade. While this treaty is not all that we could desire, while it is ours to accept or reject, I think it is only natural that Canada should endeavour to secure better trade relations with the republic of France. France was our ally in the late war. It can be fairly stated that trade rivalry very often leads to misunderstanding and war and that friendly intercourse in the matter of trade as between countries lessens the chances of strained relations. It is also a fact that thirty per cent of the people of this country speak the French tongue. I do not believe in mixing sentiment with business, but that is a fact that is worthy of consideration. Thousands of our people visit France annually. The Canadian people are to-day the titled owners of 250 acres of land in that great republic. So there are many things that bind Canada to France, and if we do not make some endeavour to continue our trade relations with that country under the best possible terms, I submit that instead of being drawn closer together we will drift further apart.

Both the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) and the hon. member for South Wellington made much of the point that other nations would derive the same benefit from this treaty as would France. But would it be possible to negotiate a treaty with France and get away from that result? I do not see how it could be done. The right hon. leader of the Opposition stated in this connection some days ago that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) should have increased the duties on luxuries before going over to negotiate this treaty. Speaking to-day, he said the hands of the Minister of Finance were tied on account of his association with a party that stood for lower tariffs, and he also said that France had been well advised as to that position. Well, if the latter is the case, by what sort of reasoning does the right hon. gentleman think that France could have been led into a trade arrangement if the Minister of Finance had followed his advice and raised the duties on luxuries immediately preceding his visit to that country. The negotiators of France would certainly have been advised of that fact and the deal would have been off.

The right hon. gentleman also stated that Canada would lose some $500,000 in revenue from customs duties through the operation of this treaty if it goes into effect. I am forced to think that he based that statement on the old fallacy that high customs means greater revenue.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On what does the hon. member think the Minister of Finance bases his estimate of $850,000?

Mr. JOHNSTON: Just at the moment I am dealing with what my right hon. friend said, and if he will let me pursue that I will probbably come to his question later. Now, he contends that we are going to lose $500,000 on this arrangement. I say I believe he is figuring on the old fallacy that the higher the customs duties the greater the revenue. If we look at the returns from customs duties for the last fiscal year we find that our revenue was increased by some thirteen million dollars. It is a fact that last year the Minister of Finance gave some slight reductions in the customs tariff. I am not here to say that the full amount of this increase in our revenue from customs was due to those reductions: nevertheless, we have that result, our revenue did increase by some thirteen million dollars. Further, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is a delusion that the tariff is the bulwark of our revenue producing machinery in this country. Not more than thirty per cent of our revenue was raised from this source last year, and the United States, the greatest protectionist country in the world, did not raise ten per cent of her revenue from customs duties last year.

I would like to say here if I might be permitted to digress to that extent that we in this part of the House are strong for an increase in the British preference. We are particularly strong for it at this time because our imports from the United States greatly exceed our exports to that country, while our imports from Great Britain are infinitesimal as compared with our exports to that country. So I hope the Minister of Finance is giving very serious consideration to this matter besides making trade arrangements with France and other countries. Further, Mr. Speaker, we in this part of the House, are and I hope always shall be strong for wider markets and lower tariffs. We are behind this treaty because we want better trade relations with France as with other countries. I believe at this particular time wider markets are essential to our growth and national well being, and I am sorry that the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition is not of that mind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say I was not. I would like the hon. member to show how we are going to get wider markets by having duties put up higher on our staple exports to other countries.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I coupled with that statement as you will have noticed, Mr. Speaker, higher tariffs and I had particular reference to that part of my statement. I hold in my hand a press despatch dated St. Catharines April 22nd, which states "Mr. Meighen preached strong protective tariff to improve conditions here." On exactly the same day according to a despatch from Halifax, Nova Scotia, which I have in my hand, the leader of the Conservative party in the legislature of that province moved a resolution asking for a referendum in Nova Scotia on the question of secession of that province from the Canadian confederation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You are wrong again.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I am quoting from this despatch.

Mr. BAXTER: He is not the leader, whatever you are quoting from.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I would ask the hon. member for St. John to say in what respect my quotation is wrong.

Mr. BAXTER: Mr. Corning is not the leader, that is all,

Mr. LOGAN: Mr. Corning is the leader.

Mr. GRAHAM: He is half of the party.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I submit that the hon. member of the Conservative party in the legislature of Nova Scotia, be he leader of the Conservative party or not, did not move his resolution asking for a referendum on the question of secession from confederation because they have good conditions in that province. I think it is only fair to infer that it is not because he wants higher duties as proclaimed by the leader of the Conservative party in federal affairs at St. Catharines. If I know anything about conditions as I learn them through the press and from members of this House it is that the people of the province of Nova Scotia find themselves in somewhat the same position that we in the western provinces are in. We are forced to buy in a protected market and to sell our products in open markets in competition with the whole world. I imagine that the farmers of Nova Scotia would like to be able to buy fertilizer for their soil to produce crops at the same price that their neighbours across the boundary line in the United States are permitted to buy theirs. I think the farmers of Nova Scotia and producers generally in that province would like to buy their implements of production at the same price at which they are procurable in the United States. I think too they would like to have the United States market open to them as we had a chance of having it under the reciprocity pact in the year 1911. Had it not been for the action of my right hon. friend and his party and their friends in the country in that year we might have had a market to-day sufficient unto our needs in the United States, but with the leader of the official Opposition in this House preaching in the town of St. Catharines that what is needed is higher customs duties—

10 p.m.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say that at all. Quote what I said.

Mr. JOHNSTON: "Strong protective tariff." If that does not mean higher duties—

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I said was a strong definite statement of protective tariff.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I do not see why my hon. friend should ask for that. Surely it is definite enough already. It is in force in this country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is in force all right, but there is a very great uncertainty of statement and conflict of statement on the part of the government as the hon. member knows himself.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I cannot understand that because last year we had our neighbours to our right condemning the government because they had not lived up to their platform, and it has been charged in this House and out of it by our friends to my right that hon. gentlemen opposite have a platform to get in on, and then do not live up to it. If they are not living up to their platform they must be keeping pretty close to the platform of hon. gentlemen to my right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. JOHNSTON: At any rate, I think when you have coming from the old province of Nova Scotia, and from a leading gentleman of the Conservative party, which party has always claimed to be the ultra-loyalist party of this country a resolution calling for a referendum on secession, it is time to take some notice of it. I remember that during the election campaign the hon. leader of the Opposition was reported to have stated in this same province of Nova Scotia that the Progressive party had grown up in western Canada during the last twelve years, and had in its trail all the theorists, and many other classes. Now if such a resolution as the one I have referred to had been moved in one of our western legislatures I am sure the people of this country would not have been so much surprised, remembering all we have been charged with, but coming from the staid old province of Nova Scotia it was a great surprise to me, and I am sure to the people of western Canada.

While I am directing my remarks to the right hon. leader of the Opposition I want to say to the government that there is thought and some talk of secession in other parts of Canada as well as Nova Scotia. It is not because the people of this country are tired of our Empire connections. Not at all. The reasons are wholly economic, and there never was a time in the history of this country when we needed wider markets as badly as we need them to-day. I submit further, Mr. Speaker, that the more trade treaties we can negotiate and ratify the better, and if we cannot start by effecting such arrangements with our allies the chances in this direction would seem to me to be pretty poor.

Another thought is this: We should not reject this treaty—and I am sure my hon. friends to my right would hesitate in doing so—particularly at this time when relations between Great Britain and France are somewhat strained over the occupation of the Ruhr. The adoption of the treaty would, I should think, help to restore the relations which formerly existed between the two countries.

Let me say in conclusion that I support this treaty because, to some extent, it tends to meet one of the principles to which I firmly adhere, that is freedom of trade. For the reasons I have outlined, and for the further reason that so long as I have the honour of occupying a seat in this House I intend to stand by those principles and the platform upon which I was elected.

Mr. W. G. RAYMOND (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, it was with a great deal of regret I heard the last speaker state that there was talk in various parts of Canada at the present time of annexation or secession from the British Empire. I am sure that is a matter we all should regret in this House. The hon. member in question expressed his regret for it and I am sure that every hon. gentleman on this side must feel regret that any such state of mind should exist in any part of Canada. In that connection I would like to remind the hon. gentleman, and in doing so bring the fact to the attention of the House, that such a movement was never commenced by the members of the Liberal party at any time in Canada's history, nor was it ever countenanced by the members of the Liberal party at any period in the history of the Dominion. You will find by examining the traditions of that party that they have always favoured legislation that has tended to more strongly cement the bonds beween Canada and Great Britain.

Mr. JOHNSTON: May I interrupt the hon. gentleman in order to set him right. I think he said that he had understood the last speaker to state that there was talk in other parts of Canada as to annexation and secession from the Empire. I am sorry to have to interrupt him but I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. RAYMOND: I understood the hon. member to quote a motion that was made in the Legislative Assembly of the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. JOHNSTON: That was to secede from the Canadian confederation.

Mr. RAYMOND: From the Canadian confederation? I beg your pardon. My remarks however, would equally apply to such a proposition as that. It has never been any part of the tradition of the Liberal party in any province to separate from confederation. Anyone who has made a study of confederation must see that it was based and carried out almost entirely upon the principles of the Liberal party.

Mr. BAXTER: I wonder if my hon. friend has ever heard of the movement for the repeal of the union which was so widespread in Nova Scotia some years ago, and which carried a party into power—the Liberal party?

Mr. RAYMOND: I never heard of it being associated with the Liberal party.

Mr. BAXTER: Oh, yes it was.

Mr. RAYMOND: Perhaps by you but not by others.

Mr. BAXTER: Ask the Finance Minister.

Mr. RAYMOND: I do not know why the hon. gentleman should wish to think that such movements originate only in the province of Nova Scotia. I have a different opinion of that province. I look upon Nova Scotia as one of the most loyal, one of the most steadfast, one of the most stable of our provinces. I am sure that if there is any such movement in that province at the present time it does not originate with Nova Scotians who are members of the Liberal party. Furthermore if there is any such movement in any other province it does not derive its origin from those who owe adherence to the Liberal party or Liberal principles. I merely say this because I think it well, Sir, that the facts should be thoroughly understood. I am sure it is well within the knowledge of those who have read the history of Canada that when any such matters have come up they have originated with the party that was opposed to the Liberal party. Any legislation tending to strengthen the ties between this country and Great Britain—such as Imperial penny postage and the British preference—was entirely originated and created by the Liberal party. I have made this statement because it presented itself to me while the previous speaker was talking. I thought the motion of which he spoke not only referred to secession from Confederation but to annexation with the United States.

Now, with reference to the treaty I shall not take up the matter schedule by schedule, as the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) did, or enter into any enumeration of the individual articles with which the treaty deals. The hon. member at the outset of his remarks spoke of this as a matter of practical commerce. I think we may all, perhaps, regard it in that way and each of us perhaps has some views as to how this treaty affects his individual constituency. At any rate, I think that is the way in which the country will regard it. I do not think the people will be drawn away by remarks made by hon. members in criticism of a treaty of this kind. Hon. gentlemen opposite have declared that they were in favour of the French treaty, that they would like to see a good treaty arranged with France. If so I have only this to say: The two ministers who went to France to make this treaty went with the full approbation, consent and confidence of the people of Canada. The Canadian people felt that they could send to France no two men who were better qualified for the task. They went to France, and they did their very best; they arranged a treaty and they have brought it back. That treaty has received the approbation generally of the country; not the approbation of hon. gentlemen opposite because nothing that could emanate from this side would ever receive their approbation, and the more an arrangement was in the interest of Canada and the more it redounded to the credit of the present government the more strenuous would be the opposition it would receive from my hon. friends across the floor.

I was just a little sorry when I heard the right hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Meighen) deliver the oration he did upon this treaty. It was a very fine oration but I was very sorry that he should find it necessary to go back to an election which took place in North Essex and drag that in for the purpose of making certain party and political allusions. I regret it, because I thought there was something else before the House. We do not need to discuss party politics all the time, and it was a matter of great regret to me that a man of his standing, and I would say of his ability, would do such a thing. I say "ability" advisedly, Mr. Speaker, because we know he has ability. It may be that he has ability to burn, but we regret to see him always burning it on the altar of party politics. We would like to see him devote that ability to the real interest of the country and to look at this treaty in a fair way, to try and consider it as though it were something that was going to benefit this country, instead of trying to make out that it is going to injure the country. I do not think in the long run that anything can be gained by misrepresentation, and I never did.

I must say that the whole basis of the argument that has been made by hon. members on the other side is nothing more or less than misrepresentation. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) stated that 5 per cent of his own constituents were clothed in purple and fine linen and fared sumptuously ever day. If there is a population in his riding of 30,000, that would mean that 1,500 people were clothed in purple and fine lined and fared sumptuously every day. He says those are the only ones who would benefit by this treaty. Why? Because braids, cords, embroidery, silks, satins and so forth, are imported with a little less duty from France under the treaty. That member is too well informed and has been too long in public life not to understand what is meant by these items in the tariff. They are not articles of clothing. They are not imported in the form of silks, satins and so forth that can be worn. The buttons that he introduces also come under the same category. He knows as well as I know, Mr. Speaker, that these articles come over here to what we call the costume makers. He knows there are people in this country whose business it is to make clothes in our cities, and that if they did not make them we should have to import them from foreign countries, the United States, Germany or France. The treaty will help these people in their business. These articles are practically their raw material. The silks, the satins, the embroidery, the cords and the buttons that are used in these articles are the raw material of the costume maker. That is an industry which few people take the trouble to look up, but it is one of the industries which have developed to a great extent in the larger cities such as Toronto and Montreal during the last few years. It is not fair to represent these articles as expensive finished silk or satin dresses, or anything of that kind. They come in as the raw materials for garment making of the costume houses. For all we know some of the satin might be put in the sleeves of a farmer's coat. Would that form part of the clothing of which the hon. member speaks when he refers to his friends who are dressed in purple and fine linen? No, it would not. This is clearly a matter of relieving the duty on these things to which I refer, and not as a benefit to the wealthy class, and it is not taking the duty off luxuries, as represented by many hon. members. I think each alternate speaker on the other side of the House took the ground that it was taking the duties off luxuries and benefiting only the wealthy class. That is not a fair statement. It is taking the duty off the raw material of a very important industry in this country. Lessening the duty on these articles gives an advantage to an industry which enables it to compete with industries of other countries, where otherwise it would have to pay a high rate of duty upon the material which goes into these garments.

There is another respect in which it appeared to me that the arguments of hon. members were not in accordance with what I considered to be the facts or a fair logical consideration of the question. I think the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Meighen) said there was a slight advantage in regard to agricultural implements, and that parts of agricultural implements would be exported to France at a slightly lower rate. He said the owners of agricultural implements would be anxious to get these parts, and after all it did not make very much difference where they got them. I think that is about the way he stated it—that it was not really an important thing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was not the statement.

Mr. RAYMOND: Then what was the statement?

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I said was that inasmuch as the owners and users of these implements in France would require these things themselves, would be wanting them, and could not get them anywhere except here, they would naturally press their government to admit them under low duties, and though it was important to have these duties lowered it was no triumph under those conditions.

Mr. RAYMOND: The right hon. gentleman says it was no triumph to get them under those conditions. I want to show the value of getting those articles at a less rate of duty. It is not the duty on the articles themselves, as I take it, that is the important point. There is another much more important feature. There has been in the past very considerable trade in agricultural implements in France. Canadian agricultural implements have had a very great reputation in France. They stand high there, but they had a rival in the American agricultural implement. When a French farmer was about to buy an implement, if he was canvassed by an American salesman it was always within the power of the American salesman to put the proposition up to him, "Now, if you buy an American implement you get your parts whenever they wear out and you get them at a lower rate of duty than you can if you buy a Canadian implement." That would always be an argument and would help to sell American implements in preference to Canadian implements. It is not the matter of the duty on the parts of these machines; that is a mere bagatelle, a trifle, not worthy of consideration, but the whole business depends upon being able to put an article on the market in such a way that it is to the advantage of the buyer or consumer to take it, and this treaty gives our salesmen a chance to go there and say—this was not the case formerly—"Now, you can import our implements at as low a rate of duty as you import the American implements, and you can get the parts as cheaply as you can get the parts of the American machines."

Mr. LEWIS: If it is possible for the Canadian manufacturer at the present time to put an implement into France as cheaply as the American manufacturer can place it there, what becomes of the hon. member's argument for a tariff against the United States? Why cannot the manufacturer do the same thing in Canada?

Mr. RAYMOND: Just at the present time I am thinking of the French treaty. The question of the hon. member, while it is quite a sensible question, opens up another vista which is a long way to leeward, and I am not thinking of it. I am thinking of the greater advantage that is given to our manufacturers and the greater their output in foreign countries, the cheaper and better they are able to make their implements for home consumption, and by this French treaty they will be enabled to sell implements in France. The difficulties in the way in regard to the tariff will be removed.

Now it was said no advantage is given to the agriculturist under this particular treaty. I do not know. We have had conditions in the years since the war that so displaced trade that I think it is impossible to judge as to what would be our chance of exporting agricultural goods to France. I think it is fairly difficult to judge what would be our chance of exporting any of our principal agricultural products to that country. We have to remember in that connection that the land of France is more evenly divided among the population than the land of any other country in Europe. We have to remember that there is more intensive cultivation in France than there is in any other country in Europe. We have to remember that some of the very finest farmers in all branches of agriculture live in France. Therefore, it is not a country that is importing very much in the way of agricultural products, and I do not think our farmers in the West expect that France will ever be a large market for wheat, because I think they know that, while in some years the position of France as a wheat growing country will vary, in one year before the war commenced, France came to be the third producing country of wheat in the world. France at that time, a little before the war, excelled even Canada in its production of wheat. Therefore, when the French bought from the farmers of the West even that quantity of wheat that was quoted this afternoon of twelve million bushels, I think it was, that was exported to France in the face of a duty, we were told, of 7 francs per 100 kilograms, or something like 50 cents a hundred, or something less than half a cent a pound. They must have needed that wheat; they must have been short for that particular year; but it does not follow that we shall always have a trade in that direction, and, therefore, it is unfair to expect and I do not think sensible farmers would expect to send very much in the way of agricultural products to France, any more than they would expect to send a great deal to the Argentine republic, because by sending them to France, they would be sending them to one of the finest agricultural countries in the world. So it seems to me that there is no basis for the argument that no benefit is given to the agriculturists under this particular treaty.

I do not wish to weary the House, because I understand the desire is to draw this debate to a close and the ground has been fairly well gone over. I thought, however, it would be just as well to point out those few items that occurred to me from the remarks that were made by hon. gentlemen opposite, especially those with regard to the manufacturing interests. Those articles which are imported are, as we know, the raw material for certain of our manufactures, and I know from personal experience that the advantage that has been gained as regards our machinery has benefited my constituency. A year ago the largest implement factory in my constituency was shut up tight; but for months it has been going on with some 900 to 1,000 men employed there, working and taking home their pay envelopes, with the whistles going regularly as they went before. Those men are employed in manufacturing agricultural machinery that is going to France. That, it seems to me, is a benefit. We know it is a benefit in my constituency; we know that we have those men employed that otherwise would not be employed, and I am sure that the recollection of that incident, while I sat and listened to the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite, was more than a contradiction to them. While in South Wellington it may not be the case that there is any benefit under this treaty except to those who are clothed in purple and fine linen and who fare sumptuously every day, those men in my constituency, who are working men, are benefited. They are the men who carry the dinner-pail, who go to the factory and earn their living. For months before this House went into session, some time before the 1st November they were started on an order of agricultural implements from France, largely in prospect of the success of this French treaty that the Minister of Finance has been able to negotiate.

Before resuming my seat, which I intend to do immediately, I would deprecate, as I said at first, with the regret that I sincerely feel, that men of energy and ability in this House should devote their energies and abilities simply to waking up old party feuds, or working overtime on some political faction fighting that exists in their minds and that sometimes, I believe, exists in their minds alone. It seems to exist in some men's minds all the time. I am sorry for them; I think they ought to pluck it out and cast it from them as something that it would be well for them to get rid of. Then they would smile and the world would appear differently to them. I believe they would find then, when they looked out and viewed the world abroad, a pleasanter aspect. They say that if you want to have a friend, you must be one, and I would advise one who wants to see the world look good-natured, to try and be good-natured himself. If he has that party rancour that turns to gall and that turns the milk of human kindness sour, for heaven's sake, let him pluck it from him and cast it away. As long as I have the honour of being a member of this House and indeed, as long as I have the privilege of living in this country and can raise my voice, I always want to be able to feel a sympathetic chord vibrate in my heart when I see a good Canadian, moved by high motives of public duty, leave the comforts of his home and family, go over to another country, and stay there patiently for months working and negotiating to do something for his native land. I want always to be able to applaud that man. That is what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has done, and he should receive the thanks of this House and this country. Sitting in this House as we are, making a treaty with France, we can always make a bargain very easily until we meet the other man with whom we have to deal. Hon. members have sat in this House and made a treaty with France without having any French representatives present. Hon. members have compared duties under the trade agreement which has been denounced, which duties, therefore, do not exist, with the duties which obtain under this treaty. That is manifestly unjust and unfair. I regret that men should depart from the plain path of honesty, rectitude and justice in order to belittle a great work that one of their fellow countrymen has succeeded in accomplishing.

Mr. HAROLD PUTNAM (Colchester): Mr. Speaker, the range of the phases of this question which I shall assume to touch at this stage of the debate and at this hour, I promise shall be very limited. There has been at least some discussion, however entertaining, however instructive, which has not been strictly relevant to the issue, and if I should transgress in the same manner, I know I shall have the same unsought forgiveness which has been accorded to all in this debate.

We have heard a great deal from those hon. members immediately to your left, Mr. Speaker, upon our alleged scorn, our alleged neglect of everything that we represented to the people before the last electoral contest. They have been, in season and out of season, insistent in preaching, by sermons and even by sermonettes, that peculiar charge against ourselves. The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) dropped a few remarks in his speech the other day, before six o'clock, and in his speech this afternoon, which leave me in a state of confusion as to whether he is charging us that it is a sin, our high tariff or our hy-pocrisy. But I was relieved to hear the right hon. leader of the Opposition for the first time this session credit the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) with some little shred of respect for what the right hon. gentleman announced the hon. minister had told the people before the last election. He said that the hon. Minister of Finance sat at the commercial gates of France with his hands tied, that he could not raise the duties against French goods coming to Canada because he had promised so differently during the campaign. But he did not commend the hon. minister for that attitude, Mr. Speaker. He said the minister should have raised those duties in spite of his interpretation of what the minister had promised to the people before the election. Now, as a new member in this House I confess that I have looked to the leader of the Opposition for some definite leadership along the line of political morality which he has made his hobby. I think that if all his preachments and teachings and admonitions on this particular subject were culled from Hansard they would make a volume which he himself would admit was respectably bulky. And as one who desired to be consistent myself I have been watching the consistency of the self-appointed teacher who sits in opposition directly opposite to me. I am very sorry to find—and I say it in all sincerity—that he has departed from his tenets. We were only here a little while after the last election until the right hon. leader of the Opposition supported a solemn vote of want of confidence in the government because his friends around him and he himself urged that we had not given the soldiers a cash bonus according to our pre-election promise. And what was the attitude of the right hon. gentleman? It was this: I do not care if that was a wrong promise, I do not care if it was fiscally unsound, you should carry out that pledge and vote the bonus; you should put the sacredness of your pre-election promise before everything, even though in carrying it out you would have to do something utterly unsound fiscally. But the other day I was surprised that the right hon. gentleman varied his line of admonition—that would be putting it too mildly —really he turned directly back in his own tracks and told the hon. Minister of Finance: You should pay no attention at all to your pre-election promises, you should look strictly and solely to the fiscal soundness of your action and should raise the duties against French goods even in violation of those pre-election promises. In the face of that I have to say to the distinguished leader of the Opposition that on matters of political morality and national honour I must forsake his leadership and look for guidance a little more consistent and, I hope, a little more sincere.

I listened with interest to the speech of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). I am sorry he took such a pessimistic view of the capabilities of Canadians, such an erroneous view of the fact that once trade runs in certain channels it is not easily diverted. He told us that last year our wheat exports to France had jumped up by about three million dollars in value, but he seemed to hold the dismal belief that no such heavy shipments would ever go to France in the future. I think this country in the long pull is only in the infancy of the great business of raising wheat, and I believe that the French people having once got a taste of our wheat—of quality unsurpassed—will have their appetites whetted so that they will be eager to continue further importations. And I see great possibilities in this treaty being the pioneer agency of a far larger volume of Canadian trade with France in wheat and other commodities.

The hon. member for South Wellington spent considerable time in giving us a list of articles whereon the French duty was the same against America as against Canada. He did not tell us that even now the United States is supplying large quantities of those goods to France, thus at once raising the question, either expressly or impliedly: If they can do it why not we? I venture to answer, yes. I recollect that in 1911 no man was more insistent in his speeches than the member for South Wellington that we could meet the Americans on even terms; because we are made of the right stuff to do it. Now, if the Americans are shipping to France boots and shoes and these other commodities which he enumerated, why in the world cannot we compete with them now as well as he so vigorously asserted we could away back in 1911?

The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) is to be commended for his industry, but not for the cogency of the reasoning which he applied to what he had collected with such laboriousness. To him was assigned the duty of launching the attack and his tactics were very simple and very clear: he would pick out an article from the treaty which it was supposed might be exported to France, but as to which he had knowledge or suspicion that it was neither made in Canada nor, if made, exported at the present time. He would carry that same fiery torch to the hilltop of another article similarly treated, and he would multiply these and parade them as instances of the imbecility of the hon. ministers of this government who negotiated the treaty. But there is no doubt at all that the hon. member for Lincoln in 1911 joined his voice to the chorus: Leave well enough alone. And the argument which he uses now is that the variety of what Canada manufactures and exports shall never be enlarged. "Leave well enough alone" was his slogan in 1911, and I am sorry to say it seems to be his slogan still.

I was amused at the airy, easy way in which the member for Lincoln would have us think that all our ministers had to do was to go to Paris and ask and they should receive even to the half of the kingdom of France. The hon. gentleman picked out a certain article—I forget what it was—and he exclaimed: You succeeded in getting that down to 45 per cent: why didn't you get more? He said that in a tone of scorn as though the Minister of Finance was not the solemnly accredited representative of the Canadian people and responsible to them, but rather as though the minister were his own hired man. But, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance did not answer that poser, and I suppose it will stand until there shall be no more sea for Canadian delegates to cross in an endeavour to negotiate trade treaties with any foreign people, whether those delegates be as wise as gods, or whether they have all the simplicity which the hon. member for Lincoln and a few of his associates who have spoken in this debate would evidently relate to the present Canadian negotiators. I must congratulate the hon. member for Lincoln upon the vast amount of work which he undertook in giving item by item the schedules of this treaty. I cannot congratulate him upon the use he made of his very laboriously obtained facts.

Another hon. gentleman who spoke in this debate assumed an easier air, an attitude more offhand, more debonair, more cavalier even than any other debater on that side. I refer to the gay and hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton). He was insistent that these two hon. and distinguished negotiators on behalf of Canada had acted not only like schoolboys, but I think he classed their actions as being those only of idiots or lunatics. He asked, with an air of bravado: "Why did you not hire a good Yankee to negotiate this treaty for you?" Well, Mr. Speaker, he did not suggest any American name, but I was just wondering whether we could not again have hired the Griffenhagens. I will say this: If they were rewarded for their disservice toward Canada we should easily have found them out of a job and very glad to be hired again and to accept a few more hundred thousand dollars of Canadian money.

Then the hon. member reached the climax when he used the word "gullible" as applying to these two ministers.

Mr. Speaker, I have about concluded. It is so late that I shall not go further down the few notes I did take. But seriously I do not think this House is treated with common courtesy when certain members on the opposition side would have it appear that the two distinguished, experienced, able and patriotic delegates who negotiated this treaty were over in France, not to study what they could get, not to see how little France would take in the arrangement of a treaty that would be worth something to us. I think this House will regard it as an axiom that these two hon. gentlemen had the motive of getting as good a bargain as they could for Canada: that having arrived there, their first step would be to make discreet investigation as to what tariff concessions France would make to Canada, and, in turn, what would be the minimum tariff concessions France might exact and expect from Canada. I have no doubt that they proceeded on that basis. I listened to the speeches of those two hon. ministers, and I saw not one symptom that they had betrayed their trust, or that they had not done the best they could and the best that could be done. I was delighted to be confirmed in that elementary opinion by the hon. leader of the Progressives (Mr. Forke) who admitted that while the treaty was not anything like as long a step as he would desire in the right direction, it had merit; that it was good as far as it went, and he did give the hon. gentlemen who negotiated it the credit of having, on the very face of things, done the best they could. But when the question comes to a vote I want hon. members to weigh the utter absurdity of the attitude taken by some hon. members who stand up and either throw out the implication or make the direct statement that these two negotiators could easily have got more for the very asking. That sort of thing is simply a waste of words. They are words not builded into the order of any edifice; they are words, Mr. Speaker, which fall as far short of the goal of proof as though they had been left unsaid.

The House divided on the motion of Mr. Fielding which was carried on the following division:

DUKE AND DUCHESS OF YORK

RESOLUTION OF CONGRATULATION ON WEDDING OF THEIR ROYAL HIGHNESSES

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BAXTER: May I take the liberty of suggesting that the Prime Minister should move and the leader of the Opposition second a resolution expressing the congratulations of this House to the Duke of York and his bride on the very happy event that has occurred to-day. It seems to me that it would be extremely fitting if that were done.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may inform my hon. friend that the government assumed it would be the wish of hon. members that an expression of congratulation should be sent to their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of York on the celebration of their marriage to-day, and earlier in the day His Excellency was requested to convey such a message on behalf of the government and people of Canada. I think notwithstanding it would be wholly appropriate, and indeed it is a great pleasure, to act upon the suggestion of my hon. friend and have a formal expression by this House of what, I am sure, we all sincerely wish, namely that the married life of the Duke and Duchess of York may be a long and happy one. I would therefore move:

Resolved, that this House extends its congratulations to Their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of York on the occasion of their marriage, and that the expression of the best wishes of the Canadian Commons be communicated to Their Royal Highnesses by His Honour the Speaker.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No words of mine are necessary on seconding the motion. This country not only entertains a feeling of profound devotion to the Empire, but has the highest regard personally, and in every way, for the Royal family. The happy event of to-day may well indeed be followed by a message of congratulation from the House.

Mr. FORKE: I would like to say a few words in support of this motion. I have had a rather long experience and am perhaps in a better position to express an opinion on the subject than the Prime Minister or the leader of the Opposition. I wish to congratulate His Royal Highness upon the fact that he has taken a Scotch lassie. Should there be any doubts about his happiness they can in view of that fact be dismissed at once. He will have a happy life, but I cannot prophesy as to the length of it. However, I join with my right hon. friends in wishing their Royal Highnesses long life and much happiness.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Might I add, Mr. Speaker, that the House will look to your Honour to convey its congratulations to their Royal Highnesses in appropriate terms.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

Friday, April 27, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

BANKRUPTCY ACT AMENDMENT

Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 139, to amend the Bankruptcy Act.

He said: This bill provides for amendments to the Bankruptcy Act as follows: (a) To abolish the system of authorized trustees and to accept the English system of administration of estates by trustees selected by the creditors, assignments to be made to the creditors at large and deposited with an official receiver who will be chosen from among local legal officers, such receiver to appoint a custodian with authority to conserve the assets of the estate under the direction of the receiver. The custodian shall call the creditors together, who at their first meeting will choose a trustee, and from that day the custodian's duty will be completed. In cases of petitions—that is to say, compulsory assignments —the appointment of custodian is to be made by the court rather than by the receiver, the latter directing, as in the case of assignments, the conservation of the assets. (b) To provide for sales in the province of Quebec of property subject to hypothec in the same mode as to notices, etc., as in the case of sales made by the tariff. (c) To restore to the landlords the privileges which they were entitled to under the laws of the different provinces on the first of July, 1920. (d) To provide for the examination of the debtor by the official receiver on the causes of his insolvency and the distribution of his assets. This is a very important feature of the English act. It is hoped that the debtor will be deterred from assigning by the prospect of this compulsory examination. (e) To enable a composition between the debtor and creditors only after the assignment. This is to protect the creditors and prevent debtors from defrauding their creditors by disposing of their property. Many requests for such a change have come to our department. (f) To compel trustees in every case to apply to the court for a discharge within fifteen days after the payment of the final dividend and to prohibit appointment of such trustees in any other matter until he has obtained such discharge. It is further proposed to amend the law which refuses the claim of a wife as the creditor of an insolvent and to enable her to rank equally with the ordinary creditors; to extend the section which authorizes the examination of persons connected with the affairs of the debtor so as to enable the examination of relatives or any other persons who may have received gifts or preferences; to provide for the distribution to the creditors of any property acquired by the debtor between the time of his assignment and his composition with his creditors. There is a difference in the present law as to assignment and receiving order, for reasons which we cannot discover. Other amendments are introduced to remove doubts with respect to the meaning or interpretation of the different clauses of the Bankruptcy Act. I shall give to the House a list of the local officers that we intend to choose as receivers. The following officials, or the persons for the time being exercising the functions of such officials, shall be official trustees:

(a) In the province of Quebec, the prothonotaries of the Superior Court;

(b) In the province of Nova Scotia, the prothonotaries of the Supreme Court;

(c) In the province of New Brunswick, the Circuit Court clerks;

(d) In the province of Prince Edward Island, the deputy prothonotaries of the Supreme Court;

(e) In the province of Ontario, the local registrars of the Supreme Court;

(f) In the province of Manitoba, the deputy registrars of the Court of King's Bench;

(g) In the province of Saskatchewan, the local registrars of the Court of King's Bench;

(h) In the province of Alberta, the clerks of the Supreme Court;

(i) In the province of British Columbia, the district registrars of the Supreme Court.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADA HIGHWAYS ACT

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Acting Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House do to-morrow go into committee of the whole to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide that the time within which the various provinces of Canada may earn and be paid the sums allotted to the said provinces under the provisions of "The Canada Highways Act", chapter fifty-four of the statutes of 1919, be extended for a further period of two years.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been apprised of the subject matter of this resolution, has given his assent thereto and commends it to the consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

SHIRE HORSES

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): My attention has been called by the Prime Minister to a question that was asked yesterday by the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Elliott) with respect to the Shire horses that have recently arrived from Great Britain and are now stationed at the Experimental Farm here. The question was asked as to the disposition of these breeding animals throughout Canada. Our natural desire, Mr. Speaker, is to place these animals in conformity with the wishes of the donors, since they have been made a gift by the Shire Breeders' Society of Great Britain. It is equally our natural desire to place them where some attention has already been given to the breeding of Shire horses, and we find on examining our records that the two places that have paid the most attention to the breeding of Shire horses are Lacombe in the province of Alberta and Lennoxville in the province of Quebec. There are very few, however, in the latter place, consequently it was thought that for the best use of these breeding animals and to carry out the wishes of the donors it would be wise to locate them in Alberta, at Lacombe. This, however, is only a tentative arrangement and the final disposition of the horses will not be made until the return of Mr. Archibald, Director of the Dominion Experimental Farms, who will return on Monday or Tuesday next. In the meantime we shall be very glad to have any representations from Ontario or elsewhere as to where these animals could be placed to better advantage than under the arrangement already made.

So far as locating them in Ontario is concerned, there are a few Shire horses scattered here and there throughout the province, but we have had no intimation from any source that they would like to have the Shires mixed with other breeds here.

Mr. BRETHEN: I had the pleasure of examining these horses to-day and they certainly appear to be a typical lot of Shire horses of very high quality. I would like to draw the attention of the minister to the district around Weston, Ontario, near the city of Toronto. I may say I am not a resident of that district, but I know that for a number of years the breeding of Shire horses has been conducted in that district, and I think that at least one of these horses could be used there to very good advantage.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): There was a little misunderstanding between the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Anderson) and myself regarding a delayed return. I was under the impression that it referred to a matter in my own department, but I find that what he had in mind was a return touching another department, and I have called the attention of the proper department to it.

THE BUDGET

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: May I ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) what day next week he expects to bring the budget down? I understood it was to come down next week.

Mr. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): My hon. friend has indicated next week. There was a time when he had a right to fix the date, but not now. I share with my hon. friend the feeling that it is desirable to have the budget down at a very early day, but I really would not care to fix the day at this moment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Could my hon. friend tell the House, because many members are interested in the matter, whether the budget will be brought down before Thursday of next week?

Mr. FIELDING: I think I can assure my hon. friend it will not be before Thursday; possibly on Thursday, but I do not wish to be too precise.

GRAIN COMMISSION INQUIRY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MANION: I would like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce as to a despatch I notice in one of the journals at the head of the lakes wherein the statement is made that the Board of Grain Commissioners are at the head of the lakes to make a thorough investigation into the grain screenings question. Has the department given orders for a thorough investigation of the screenings question? I have not heard of it.

Mr. ROBB: I have not read the despatch to which my hon. friend refers, but that will be one of the subjects submitted to the proposed Royal Grain Commission for investigation.

Mr. MANION: I just mentioned it because it was stated positively that the Grain Commission was there for that purpose. That is why I asked that question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I ask what is the cause of delay in appointing that commission and, when the government expects to be able to surmount the obstacles in the way of its appointment?

Mr. ROBB: We hope to make the appointments and to make an announcement to the House within a very few days.

IMPERIAL SOLDIER DEPORTED

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Saskatoon): I wish to bring to the notice of the government a case of inhuman treatment meted out to a British soldier who came to this country in 1922 but was deported as a common criminal because he contracted tuberculosis last March. The man was so ill with tuberculosis in a hospital at Saskatoon that the army authorities refused to be responsible for his upkeep any longer, and on the recommendation of the two army doctors there, Dr. Creighton and Dr. Walker, as well as the medical health officer of the city, he was advised to go home to die. He was advised to let the army authorities take him back to Wales, his native place. The following is an extract from his letter written to a friend in Saskatoon.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I would point out to the hon. member that while he may draw the attention of a minister of the Crown to some matter of urgent public importance, he is hardly in order in reading a letter from some person with regard to this matter.

Mr. EVANS: I just wish to give a short extract. He says that he received good treatment at Winnipeg, but on arrival at Montreal after an uneventful journey he was taken to the immigration office. In the hallway there, he says, was a table at which was seated a fellow who told him to take off his overcoat.

This he took from him, and conducted him upstairs to a room that was nothing more than a cell, with two single beds in it, one of which was occupied by a Chinaman suffering from tuberculosis as well as a most loathsome skin disease, in all probability leprosy, he says. He determined to spend the night—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must call to the hon. member's attention that he is not in order in the address he is giving to the House on this matter. If he desires to draw the facts briefly to the attention of the minister of the Crown or to ask a question on a matter of urgent public importance he may do so, but an explanation in detail such as he is giving now is not in order.

Mr. EVANS: I would ask the government if they are aware of such inhuman treatment being meted out to a class of men who have done nothing worse than facing death in the trenches for the Empire to which we belong.

Mr. BELAND: I did not catch every word of the statement made by my hon. friend. I do not quite know whether he refers to a Canadian soldier or an ex-Imperial.

Mr. EVANS: An ex-Imperial.

Mr. BELAND: Then it is a question of immigration entirely, not a question of treatment by the soldiers' department, is it? It is a question of deportation?

Mr. EVANS: Deportation.

Mr. BELAND: That does not come within this department.

Hon. Mr. FIELDING: The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) is not here at present, but I will see that his attention is drawn to the hon. gentleman's question.

FRENCH TREATY

BILL TO RATIFY CONVENTION CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

House again in Committee on Bill No. 23, respecting a certain Convention of Commerce between His Majesty and the French Republic, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 2—Convention approved:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend the Finance Minister take the position that if we carry this clause we approve of the whole matter?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I think we should discuss the details before we take up clause 2.

Mr. FIELDING: Clause 2 declares approval of the treaty, and therefore the whole matter comes under review.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was challenged, Mr. Chairman, as to the accuracy of certain figures which were taken from the returns of the government as supplied by the Bureau of Statistics. In view of that fact I want to find out, if I can, what the true figures are. For example, figures which have to do with the amount of silk and manufactures of silk exported from France, from Switzerland and from Japan were challenged. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) told me yesterday that my figures were ten per cent right and ninety per cent wrong. Now, they happen to be official figures supplied by the Bureau of Statistics, and I want to know whether they are wrong or whether the Minister of Marine was merely, when he spoke as he did, using a figure of speech, as he so often does, to embellish his eloquence. If I am wrong in regard to these figures I want to be put right.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not quite understand what my hon. friend is calling in question. At an early stage of the discussion we were asked to produce a lot of information. It was a fair request but it involved a great deal of time and trouble. Nevertheless the department prepared that information and submitted it. I do not understand that my hon. friend is questioning the accuracy of any of those figures, and if not I have some difficulty in understanding what the purpose of his present comment is.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I did not object to the figures; the objection was made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Now I want to find out whether the official figures are right or whether the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is correct in his statement. Let me repeat: In debating this question I dealt with the benefits which accrued to France. I took the item of silk and silk manufactures. I speak from recollection. My recollection is that under the item as to silk and its manufactures, for the year to which the figures applied—and I think it was the year 1922—we imported in round figures $1,000,000 worth of goods from France, $3,000,000 worth from Switzerland, and imported $4,000,000 worth from Japan. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries when replying told me that I was ten per cent right and ninety per cent wrong.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not on that point.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: According to the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault) this treaty had to be entered into having regard to the position of France—in view of the tremendous extent to which France had suffered. Yet it would now appear that, so far as the item to which I have referred is concerned, it is not a treaty for the benefit of France but a treaty for the benefit, in far greater proportion, of Switzerland and Japan. I pointed out to the minister that it is somewhat difficult to say you are helping any one producer in a common market if, at the same time, you help in exactly the same proportion every one of that producer's competitors. As to that I was told that my figures were only ten per cent right. What I am now trying to find out is this: Are the returns of the department correct? Take the item of silks and manufactures of silks—

Mr. FIELDING: To what returns does my hon. friend refer?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was speaking of the returns of the department that has to do with the collection of trade figures.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not know that anybody has contradicted them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I certainly understood the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to say—

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:—that my statement in regard to silk and the manufactures of silk was ten per cent right and ninety per cent wrong.

Mr. LAPOINTE: On a certain item.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It may be that to-day we shall learn that the minister only made that statement for the purpose of turning a corner and that the figures as to exports which I gave are right—that there was an import of only $1,000,000 from France of silks and the manufactures of silks as against $3,000,000 in the case of Switzerland and $4,000,000 in the case of Japan. That was the gravamen of the charge that I made. Perhaps the minister will say to-day "I was not referring to the real business at all. All I was referring to was a quoted rate as to the duty that had nothing to do with it." There would have been something in what the minister said as to specific rates of duty if there was one specific rate for France and another specific rate for Switzerland. But that is not the fact; they all take the same rates. The one matter that I was referring most to was the fact that France's exports to us under that item, were only one-third of Switzerland's and only one-fourth of Japan's.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The trouble arises out of the fact that my hon. friend was speaking of one thing and I was speaking of another. I was not speaking at all of the proportion of silk exported from France as compared with the exports of Japan or Switzerland. My hon. friend has only to take Hansard and read my remarks as to that. I stated that my hon. friend, in discussing item 851 concerning silks, said that we had reduced the duty to a fixed rate of twenty per cent, and I said that he was ten per cent right and ninety per cent wrong, for the reason that only ten per cent of the silks imported into Canada come under that provision for a reduction of twenty per cent, the balance, ninety per cent of silks imported into Canada, remaining at 27½ per cent, less the ten per cent provided for in schedule B. That is where my hon. friend was making a mistake, according to the figures which had been given me by the Finance department. I was not referring to Japan or Switzerland in any way whatever.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: All my hon. friend was doing was putting up a straw man in order to knock him down.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, I was knocking the hon. member down.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There was never any complaint by me or anybody else, having regard to that part of the discussion, as to a particular percentage here or a particular percentage there; the point was this—and my hon. friend knows it perfectly well—that there were reductions made—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Do not talk so loudly; it does not frighten us.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No. The hon. member does not care, I know he does not care.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, I have the habit.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But the point was that reductions were being made in the tariff for the assumed purpose, for the advertised purpose, of helping France, and I pointed out, that similar reductions are made to Switzerland and Japan. Is that true, or not?

Mr. LAPOINTE: What my hon. friend was contending in his main speech, and what I objected to, was that the reduction was only on luxuries; he instanced silk, and said that we had reduced the fixed duty to 10 per cent.

I told him that it was only on ten per cent of the silk imported into Canada that that duty applied, and I still maintain that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister does not answer my question. He comes back to the same matter. I will read what I stated:

> I wonder whether my hon. friends really realize what the treaty does, and what further excuses we are going to have for letting in this large amount of articles which can be described only as luxuries, under such circumstances as indicate that the contention that this treaty is for France is very largely absolutely wrong.

I was pointing out that this was not a treaty for the benefit of France. That was the argument I sought to elaborate. I pointed out the different articles of commerce which other countries ship to us to a greater extent than France, and I said these other countries got the same concessions as were given to France. That is the point I was talking about, and I am going to ask the minister: Is it true that all the countries that were mentioned—take for example, silks in the first instance sent to Switzerland and Japan—got under this treaty exactly the same concessions that France got?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend wanted to clear the ground as to the subject of discussion and difficulty between himself and myself. Here is the point of difficulty. In his speech, at page 2008 of Hansard, my hon. friend said:

> However let us proceed. Let us take item 581, silk fabric. This is something that is pre-eminently in the class of luxuries and there is a fixed duty of 20 per cent against the intermediate tariff of 27½ per cent.

That is what I was telling him. I told him there was only ten per cent of the silk imported into Canada coming under item 581 with a fixed reduction of 20 per cent. That was the point of discussion between us. The other features in regard to Switzerland and Japan I did not touch.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know why the minister referred to it at all, because that is all I was trying to get at.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I wanted to remain at peace with my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It was the minister's turn yesterday and he did well yesterday—splendidly. Will he tell me, does Switzerland, and does Japan, get exactly the same benefit under this treaty as France obtains?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am going to ask him again in regard to my figures: Is it true, as shown by the reports of the statistical department, that in one year Japan sold us in silks and the manufacture of silk $1,006,000 worth of goods?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have no doubt it is true, when the hon. member says so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not want it put in that way.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have not the figures which the hon. member has, but that is not the point of discussion between us.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understand the minister does not dispute the fact. And that of the same article Switzerland sold us $3,970,706? Does he dispute that?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have not the figures here. I am sure that my hon. friend states the real truth.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am only saying what I was told. These are not my figures. Now will my hon. friend tell me what particular benefit he claims from France under this item and under the reductions, when France is selling merely a fraction of what Swizerland and Japan sell in this market under that item? He gives both of them the same reduction.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This is quite another subject of discussion. I understand my hon. friend is leaving the other matter and is turning the corner.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, not at all, I am staying with the same question.

Mr. LAPOINTE No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What benefit is this treaty to France when the same reductions are given to the chief competitors of France in the market?

Mr. LAPOINTE: France knew that, and she asked for it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was asking my hon. friend.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And I am answering my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He tells us that France knew, but I am asking for my hon. friend's answer.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We were looking for the benefit of Canada, rather than for the benefit of France. The hon. member should ask France that question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am very glad to have that statement from my hon. friend.

I hope he will remember that, and that it will not be charged, as has already been hinted, that this is a factious opposition by the party on this side of the House to the interests of France.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I never said that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That being so, will he tell me on what ground he bases his belief that it is a good thing to have a lower rate of taxation on an article of luxury such as silks, and how Canada is helped by it?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will not say that. I have given my argument on that yesterday. He is not asking a fact, but he wants me to discuss the principle now.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Now, Mr. Chairman, what did we have yesterday? We had one of my hon. friend's eloquent orations, very well done, as he was running true to form he got us back to that old joke of his about the Bourbons, and it is a good joke, but he has given us that joke twenty times.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But it still has an application to the question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He also paid compliments, and we were glad to have them. But he said just a moment ago that in connection with the item of silks, he was considering the interest of Canada and not that of France. We have got that far. I ask him: Considering the interest of Canada, on what ground does he think it is a good thing to reduce taxation on luxuries such as silks?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The provision respecting silk is a benefit to Canada on the ground that to obtain concessions, we have to make concessions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Let us see just where we are. This item, as my hon. friend said just a moment ago, was not considered for the benefit of France. Now he says that this item was not considered for the benefit of Canada. How was it considered?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend of course, wants to go into a cross-examining duel between himself and me. I do not think that is of much interest to the other hon. members. I told my hon. friend that this question of silk arose between himself and me because he had stated that the duty on silk had been reduced to 20 per cent, and I said that only ten per cent of the silk imported into this country was reduced to 20 per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think we are entitled to find out what was actuating our ministers and where the real benefit comes in. Here we have a concrete case and where is it left? In the first instance, we learn that it was something done to help France because of those other competitors. In the next instance, it was something done to help Canada. In the third instance, it is a concession wrung from Canada. Are we not to find out why it was done? What difference does it make how big the concession is when the question is one of principle? My hon. friend will agree that, in some instances at least, he reduces the duty on silk to a fixed rate of 20 per cent, in others he takes 10 per cent off the intermediate tariff| I ask my hon. friend again whether, in connection with the negotiations for this treaty, he was proceeding on the idea that it was a good thing for Canada to lower the duties on the luxuries of life; whether that is where he thinks Canada gets the benefit.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We had to lower the duties on the things that were of interest to French trade, and some of those articles, of course, are rather articles of luxury. But my hon. friend knows he is wrong when he says that all the articles reduced are luxuries.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I dare say that is right, and my hon. friend can find a few that are not luxuries. Can my hon. friend say that the great majority are not luxuries?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What will my hon. friend say about silks?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am speaking about the majority; I am not speaking of silks.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We shall endeavour to arrive at the majority. What will my hon. friend say about silks?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I would rather that my hon. friend should make his speech, mentioning all the articles, and I will answer afterwards. I do not think this is of great interest to the members of the House. My hon. friend likes to hear the sound of his voice. I do also; but really we could proceed in some other way.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I rather like to get my hon. friend talking. I always like to hear from him. He is always very effective, and he is making the best he can of a horrible case.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is that so?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But my hon. friend says that the majority of imports from France into Canada—and he will correct me if I am paraphrasing him wrongly—are not luxuries.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The majority of the articles mentioned.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not talking about that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is what I am talking about.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will my hon. friend say this, that in volume of returns—the real thing that counts—the majority are not luxuries?

Mr. LAPOINTE: A question of opinion is involved. My hon. friend knows that some people regard some things as luxuries and others believe they are not—buttons, for instance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It will be pretty hard to make a list of luxuries if you do not include ninety per cent of all the articles reduced by this treaty. I know the minister got through with his speech yesterday. I admire his brain too much to allege that he imagines it was an argument. He is a master of banter and humour, and yesterday's exhibition was one of his best in that regard. But he never got to the meat of the treaty at all; he never got near it. Let us see if we cannot establish two premises, and I should like to get them into the minister's mind, or any other person's mind. The first is that by this treaty we have heavier duties against us for Canadian exports to France than we had before—I do not say heavier than the French general tariff, but heavier than we had before. That is correct. The second is that they are heavier altogether on agricultural exports. A few trivial things in connection with our manufactured products—and they are spare parts at that—are reduced. They are worth while, but relatively they are trifles. Let us have it established in our minds that we have a higher tariff against us for Canadian exports to France than we had before, and that for our agricultural exports to France—and this is very important when we are speaking about wider markets—we are getting by this treaty a narrower market that we had before. Nobody can dispute that in the frankness and serenity of his own mind. He may say, as an hon. member said last night, that is a departure from rectitude to refer to that. I do not so regard it, and I do not regard that remark as worth answering. In the next place, we have a lower tariff than we had before on luxuries imported into Canada. Of that there can be no doubt, and it is not worth while arguing to establish that. I ask another thing to be considered, that if we had been free to increase our tariff on luxuries and the French government knew we were free—I mean on the goods on which they have now a lower tariff—then we would have been on an equality or better than an equality in the negotiations with France; because, aside from war years and the immediately subsequent years, if you look back over all the normal years of our history, French exports to us are about five times ours to France—they average almost five times for the five years preceding the war. Have I made that premise clear, that had we been free to exercise the weapon that was in the hands of France, we would have been on more than an equality in the negotiations? I do not ask that to be conceded, I do ask it to be conceded that we would have been on an equality. These things nobody can dispute at all; First, we have a higher tariff against our exports to France than we had before, chiefly as regards agricultural exports; second, we have a lower tariff against imports of luxuries into Canada; and third, had we been free, aside wholly from the history of our politics, to have used France's weapon on the goods France sent to us, we would have been on at least an equality with the French negotiators. If those are conceded, let me put the matter in this form. Leave out of account the history of the Liberal party and the history of the Conservative party, and assume that bound by nothing and considering the interest of Canada and nothing else, our negotiators went to France. Did they not have to choose between two things: first, a higher tariff against luxuries into Canada and a lower tariff against agricultural products into France, or, on the other hand, a lower tariff against luxuries into Canada and a higher tariff against agricultural products into France? Which would they have chosen, had there been no commitments and no political history to tie their hands? There is not a man at large in this country who would not choose the higher tariff on luxuries coming into Canada and a lower tariff on agricultural products going into France. Then why have we not that? Had there been no political history in this matter, we should have had it; had there been no political commitments that would have been the state of affairs. And we have not got it just because of those commitments. That is all I want hon. gentlemen to admit; and while I do not expect them to admit it aloud, it is nevertheless the truth. If hon. gentlemen opposite think the matter over they cannot help being convinced that this is the fact.

And therein is a lesson. This is one of the products of wrong pre-election commitments and principles. I know there are other products, of course; another product we had last session when there was a violation of those commitments,—a very bad harvest indeed. We have not the same consequences to-day; we have to-day another product of false political commitments, not as bad morally but financially worse; the harvest this time is the sacrifice of Canadian interests. And while you may have it in one form or the other, you are bound to reap a harvest of ill if you make commitments that are false. This is one product of such a policy; as I have stated, last session we had another. And these are not the last. Now, I have stated in very brief form the way I sincerely view the whole history of this French treaty negotiation; and this government in other negotiations must either abandon and prostitute its principles or sacrifice the interests of Canada. Last session it chose the first; this session it chooses the second.

Mr. FIELDING: I much regret that the right hon. gentleman has deemed it necessary to repeat and to adhere to an absolutely unwarranted and unfounded position in comparing the present condition of affairs with the terms of this treaty. Again and again the hon. gentleman has made comparisons between the rates now existing and those set forth in the treaty, and in assuming this position again to-day he is thereby conveying for the hundredth time to the country the impression that the present rates are available to us.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, no.

Mr. FIELDING: The right hon. gentleman's (Mr. Meighen's) position in this matter is most unfair. But he has advanced it, and the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) spent half an hour repeating the same thing. My right hon. friend knows that the existing rates are as dead as Julius Caesar. Why then does he compare the live body of this treaty with the dead corpse of that old arrangement? Does the right hon. gentleman not know that the present condition which he speaks of, and which he compares with the rates as set forth in the French treaty, cannot be taken advantage of now? Again and again we are told that this treaty is not as good as the old one; but my right hon. friend knows that the French government gave definite notice abrogating the old one. He knows also that after certain negotiations, succeeding the termination of the old treaty, an interim arrangement was made—and made by himself and his colleagues—which begins with the statement that pending the conclusion of a new commercial convention, with a view to which negotiations would begin immediately, the French and Canadian governments had agreed to "the following provisions". The leader of the Opposition is also aware that the French government called him to account for this engagement to begin immediately; and for reasons which I have not assailed, and which might have been good, he did not fulfil the terms of that engagement. Well, we have fulfilled the engagement of hon. gentlemen by entering into negotiations; and whether we had entered into such negotiations or not, we had notice that the French government would not continue the old arrangement. What, then, is the good of hon. gentlemen again and again quoting the existing rates as if they were at our disposal? They are not at our disposal. I say, they are dead and gone; and if we did not adopt this treaty, wise or unwise as it may be, fair or unfair, we should have to come under the operations of the French general tariff. A comparison between that tariff and this treaty is a fair matter; a comparison between the existing rates, which are dead and gone, and the treaty before us is not a fair matter. And no one knows that better than my right hon. friend. I am amazed therefore that, in the light of the discussion that has occurred on this subject, he should continue in the stand he has taken. But there is another thing. The right hon. gentleman says, why did we not arm ourselves when going over? He said that we were not in a position to deal with the French government and threaten them with this, that or the other thing. Well, if that is good policy, why did not the right hon. gentleman himself arm the representative of his government, Sir George Foster, when he sent him over only a few months before we went over?

4 p.m.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. FIELDING: That gentleman went to make an arrangement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No; this was made in 1921, and there was no session between the making of the interim treaty and the exit of the late government.

Mr. FIELDING: The treaty was not made in a day. My right hon. friend sent Sir George Foster over to make a treaty.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. FIELDING: Did he go without authority?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He was over on other business. The government cannot raise duties; parliament only can do that; and there had been no session of parliament.

Mr. FIELDING: But before my right hon. friend sent his representative over he should have armed him with power to jack up the rates, and then threaten the French government with a high tariff. Now, I do not think it would have been good policy for the right hon. gentleman to fix exorbitant rates merely for the purpose of threatening the French government. I do not think that would have been wise, and evidently my hon. friend was of that opinion too; because if his government had deemed it good policy to do that they would have armed themselves to that purpose. If they had thought it wise to adopt that course, when they sent over Sir George Foster they would have done what they are now suggesting that we should have done; they would have asked Parliament to jack up the tariff rates and threaten France with them. But they did not do that, and I commend them for having avoided that course, because it would have been folly to do anything of the sort. Yet this is the very thing my right hon. friend is asking us to do.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In so far as the historical account of this matter goes, I do not find much, if any, fault with what the minister says. Not at all. I do not say that, situated as they were, because of what they had done, they could have had the old treaty renewed. I have not argued that. I have argued, however, that if they had not made certain commitments they could have insisted upon as good a treaty as the old one. My hon. friend says, why did we not jack up the duties on luxuries before Sir George Foster went over to negotiate a treaty? In the first place, Sir George Foster did not go there to negotiate a treaty.

Mr. FIELDING: Then he went without authority.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, he was over on other business.

Mr. FIELDING: So were we.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If my hon. friend wants to escape responsibility by a quibble of that kind, he may. But what does that matter? We had a treaty that was satisfactory so far as we were concerned. The old treaty was satisfactory and if it had been renewed we should have been pleased. It might have been better, of course, but it was fairly satisfactory as far as it went. The French government knew that we were not tied to what the hon. gentleman was bound to; they knew that we had not stripped ourselves of every weapon of negotiation as he had done; and they naturally would take that into account in framing a treaty. Now, I have only argued that, and why does the minister continuously misrepresent me? I have never argued that, situated as he was by reason of his past commitments, he could have got as good a treaty as he could have secured otherwise. The minister says it is true we are worse off than we were. He says: It is true that Canada is not in anything like as good and as satisfactory a position as she was before in this matter; but I am not to blame. That is precisely what I dispute in his case. I say that he had no need to sacrifice the interests of Canada and to accept a treaty in any respect worse than the one we had before, had he not been in the situation in which he placed himself, which situation he must have known was economically unsound, and which indeed he has himself declared in the House he does not believe to be a sound one. That is the reason he could not secure a renewal of the old treaty; the simple fact is that Canada was not as strong in the negotiation as was France. Must it always be that we are to get the worst of negotiations? Are we always to take the worst position whenever we make a treaty?

Mr. FORKE: I want to get this matter straight. My right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) continually refers to the fact that the Minister of Finance did not arm himself with a weapon. What is the weapon to which he has reference?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I shall come to that in a moment, but I have stated it three of four times.

Mr. FORKE: You hinted at it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend opposite, I contend, should have been in an untrammelled position in negotiating with France.

Mr. FORKE: What do you mean?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He should have been in a position to put a tariff on the goods that France sends into this country. What in the world is the harm to the country in a high tariff on silks and brandies?

Mr. FIELDING: Or anything?

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend did not think it harmful to put the tariff on sugar, and some other things of that nature, but he seems desperately averse now to having any high rates on brandies and champagnes and silks.

Mr. FIELDING: The hon. gentleman is complaining of brandy; I am not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not complaining about the duty being up. What does the hon. minister mean by that?

Mr. FIELDING: I have not referred to brandy, and my hon. friend has; that is the difference.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman says he is against putting the duty up on it. If he had not been tied by commitments, he would have been known to be in that position by the French negotiators. Had he not been tied by commitments, at the first session of parliament—for parliament alone could act—he would have armed himself and put himself in a position which would have lent additional strength to his side of the negotiations. I do not want the minister to be continually saying that I am telling the country that he could have got the old treaty; he could not have got it. Because the French negotiators knew his history; they knew his cards, they knew that he had stripped himself of every power under it before he left these shores, and that what he had not done his party had done for him. That is why he could not get it. I have no doubt these duties are lower than the general tariff, but we are worse off than we were. Had we had no party or political commitments we might have been at least in as good a postion as we were, if not in a better one, because France had more to lose by the loss of Canadian trade than we had to lose by the loss of French trade. The minister follows that argument just as clearly as I do; there is no clearer mind in the House. But I ask him not to misrepresent my position. I know it was a case of taking this treaty or taking the general tariff—I presume it was; I accept his word in that respect. But that that was the case was the fault of the minister himself.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Is it not a fact that before my right hon. friend's administration went out of power the French consul at Montreal had repeatedly asked them to make a new treaty?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know, but I have assumed it to be correct. If I had been a French statesman and knew the government in power here I should have done the same thing.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The right hon. gentleman should know.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suppose so. But how does that conflict with my position? I know we were under obligations to treat; I admit freely that France called upon us to fulfil those obligations. But is that a reason why an otherwise strong position should be imperilled by the minister's own record and the record of his party? We had to make the negotiations, but the fact that we could not succeed in them and had to take a far worse position than we were in before—

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: What was the reason?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The reason was simply that France knew we dare not raise the duties on her products because of the minister's commitments.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: There were no minister's commitments at that time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was no Liberal convention? There was no resolution two years ago?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: My right hon. friend was in power at the time. France was not treating with the Liberal party then.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: France was treating with the late administration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: She was not treating with us when this treaty was made; if she had been, there would not have been this treaty. We were not tied up by commitments of that sort; we would have stood on an equal footing with the French negotiators.

Mr. FIELDING: Why did you not raise your tariff, then?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We did make a tariff, and I wish it was the tariff still.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: My right hon. friend is trying to get away from the point.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I admit that we had to negotiate—

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Then why did you not negotiate?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because we were out of office.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Why did you not negotiate before you went out of office?

Mr. MEIGHEN: How could we negotiate between the summer of 1921 and the 6th of December?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: What did you negotiate in 1921?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We got an interim treaty. What more could we do?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Is it not a fact that after the interim treaty was passed the French consul repeatedly asked the late administration to make a new treaty?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know whether he did it repeatedly or not. I am informed that there was a request for the negotiation after the interim treaty had been passed.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Why did you not raise the tariff, then?

Mr. MEIGHEN: For one thing, I was at the Imperial conference. Then, there was an election campaign. The hon. gentleman would hardly suggest that we should, with an election pending, go to France to negotiate a treaty. If we had done so, I know what would have been said; I know how eloquent the hon. member would have been, and how justly eloquent, in denouncing us for taking that responsibility.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I would like to ask the Minister of Finance a question respecting an item in the treaty under the head of cobalt products. I asked the question before. What are the present rates of duty into France upon oxides of cobalt, hydrated salts of cobalt and other salts of cobalt, and what were the old rates? The book of particulars that the minister gave us does not include that article.

Mr. FIELDING: I could not at the moment give the hon. gentleman the rates. I I will endeavour before the third reading of the bill comes on to answer his question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the minister remembers, that was specially requested in the speech made by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) a week ago.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not recall it. Another hon. member asked me for some information on that subject, which I gave him, and I rather thought the point was covered.

Mr. CHAPLIN: In his address of yesterday the Minister of Marine (Mr. Lapointe) made reference to item 404, which I had dealt with in my address. I had pointed out that the exports of that item amounted to some $75,000 and that none had been sent to France. The minister says:

> Well, I wish my hon. friend would consult with his friends the manufacturers of agricultural implements. They will tell him that reapers and binders are exported to France and that the cotton that is used for the wings goes there in a knocked-down state and is adjusted in France.

If we are shipping this article under the head of tissues of cotton, where is it in the export returns? I cannot find any indication that one dollar's worth went to France. Is it the case that agricultural implements exported as a whole are virtually taken to pieces when they get on the other side and each article separated so as to make possible the application to it of the French tariff? That does not seem reasonable. The minister could not have meant that; what he must have had in mind was that some of these parts subsequently went over as spare parts and for the purposes of customs taxation were charged separately. But, even if that was the case, where do they appear in the customs or the trade returns? I have been unable to find them.

Mr. FIELDING: We will endeavour to find out, to please my hon. friend, though I do not quite see the importance of the question.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The importance of it is this: When a minister makes a statement of that kind he should be in a position to verify it. I made a certain statement based upon the official returns, and I made it in good faith. I would like the minister to say where he gets his information. It certainly cannot be taken from the returns.

Mr. FIELDING: My point is this: Whether it is in the returns or not has no bearing on the question whether it should be included in the list of things that could be exported to France.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I agree with that statement, especially when these articles are parts of a machine that are required for repairs. The minister may be glad that he has been able to get even that concession. But I would like to know from the Minister of Marine just what he meant by the statement he made.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have received the information from agents of manufacturing companies, who state that these pieces of cotton go through, as I said yesterday, to be adjusted on the wings of binders and reapers. That means that very little went from Canada, because the duty was prohibitive—1,240 francs per 100 kilograms. Most of it was going from the United States, and it was desired that the Canadian manufacturers should be put on the same footing as those of the United States.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Yes, but the minister must realize that while that is absolutely true, and I do not wonder that the manufacturers want such a concession, the thing must be very small when you cannot find it in the return. My objection to this treaty amounts to this. I have been an exporter of goods—I have tried to keep my own goods out of this discussion altogether, but I have exported goods for forty years to all the countries of Europe except the southern ones —and during all that time, during all the time of the previous treaty as well, owing to this high minimum tariff of France I have never been able to export a dollar's worth of goods to France during that whole forty years. It is not because I have not tried. I have tried to do it. My objection to this treaty is that the minimum tariff of France is an adequate protective tariff that prohibits goods from going in.

Mr. FIELDING: Will my hon. friend suffer any harm by having these items put on the list of possible exports for the future? What harm comes to him or any other citizen if we are not exporting them?

Mr. CHAPLIN: No objection except this. One likes to see something on the list that is going to be of some benefit during his lifetime, and not to have to wait for years. You should consider the people in business now as well as those to be in business ten years from now.

Mr. FIELDING: Yes, and we are not forgetting the people in business to-day, but we are also thinking of those coming in the not distant future.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I have tried to be perfectly fair in my criticism. I have said more than once during my address that there may be some things that can now be exported to France. There is nothing in my line so far as I can see. We may be able to export to France; we will try and see what we can do. If the minister will get me the information regarding the present rates of duty on the cobalt items and at the same time include those for nickel I shall be very much obliged.

Mr. FIELDING: I shall be very happy to give the hon. member the information later. I am anxious to give every reasonable information that is asked. We have everything to gain by giving the fullest information.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder if we can get the information now as to the effect of this on the other nations clearly, truthfully. So that no one is going to say that I am making a mistake of ninety per cent or any other per cent, I am going back to the trade figures of 1922. I am going to put the figures as I have them before my friend, the whole of them—the few items that I referred to the other day. Perhaps it will not be necessary to go over all of them. I am going to take first the item of silk and silk manufactures. The expert of the department is here and I am sure he had to have these figures before him before he ever advised the Minister of Finance, and I have no doubt he has the figures absolutely at hand. The first figure I give my hon. friend is the sales of France to Canada. Under that item for the year 1922 the sales amounted to $1,006,141. I ask if that is correct.

Mr. FIELDING: If my hon. friend is reading from any official return I take it for granted the figures are correct.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am sorry to say that all I have got is a copy of the figures. I believe it to be right, but I cannot say that.

Mr. FIELDING: If they are drawn from any official return I take it for granted they are correct.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is merely copied from them. I did not do the typewriting, but I am going to get at the real truth, I am not going to have it said afterwards that I misrepresented facts to this House to the extent of ninety per cent; I am going through these facts, and I think I am entitled to get the information. A charge has been made and I propose to go into these figures and ask the gentlemen that know about this thing if the figure of imports into this country of silk and the manufactures of silk from France for the year 1922 is correctly stated at $1,006,141.

Mr. FIELDING: If it is so stated in any official document, yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we can get on and get the facts? The expert is here. Surely to goodness my friend knew what he was dealing with. Surely to goodness they were old things to him. They must be familiar to him. The only time we can get the facts so that we are not going to have that kind of vague charge made again of insincerity and untruthfulness is here and now. Now I want to know whether that figure is right or not.

Mr. FIELDING: I thought I had made it clear. If the information the hon. gentleman has is drawn from any official document submitted to this House I have no doubt that it is correct.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, Mr. Chairman, I think we are entitled to more than that.

Mr. FIELDING: No, you are not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My friend says, no. Surely I am entitled to know on what information he proceeds in connection with this item. Surely I am entitled to know what he has before him. These figures I think are correct. I think they are; they have been attacked. I think I am entitled at least to get the figures as my hon. friend understands them.

Mr. FIELDING: I understand them as they appear in the official returns.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I would ask my hon. friend what they are.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not carry them in my head.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That may be so. Will my hon. friend say his expert has not got them?

Mr. FIELDING: I will ask him for them now. If the hon. gentleman desires any additional information I will get it for him in the proper way, but I am not going to cross-examine the expert.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not want him to cross-examine the expert. If my hon. friend wants to take the attitude that we cannot get this information while the bill is in committee—

Mr. FIELDING: You cannot get it now

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid it will take a long time to get the bill through.

Mr. FIELDING: I have time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If my hon. friend wants to take it that way we will have to wait till we can get the information. Now I am going to give these figures to my hon. friend. During the same year that those exports were made by France, the figures show an export by Japan under the same item of $3,970,706. I want to ask my hon. friend if he takes issue with that item.

Mr. FIELDING: If it is so stated in the document it is correct.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know what document my hon. friend is referring to.

Mr. FIELDING: The official returns of the trade of Canada. I take it for granted my hon. friend is reading from that. I have no other source of information.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What figures did my hon. friend have before him in considering this matter?

Mr. FIELDING: The documents, the documents.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: "The documents, the documents," says my hon. friend. Let us see, now. We have got Japan at $3,970,706. We have Switzerland at $4,093,045 under the same item. Now what does my hon. friend say as to that? Is that correct or not?

Mr. FIELDING: If it is "so nominated in the bond," it is true.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then, perhaps it is fair to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) this, whether his strictures the other day were intended to apply to these figures.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What figures?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The figures I have just read.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What I said had no application at all to the trade of Japan or Switzerland as compared with France. I did not refer to that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I want to point out to the committee this, Mr. Chairman, reserving for the future that corroboration I am to get: In the year 1922 the exports of France under this item amounted to $1,006,-141 as against $8,063,751 which Japan and Switzerland sent us. I ask my friends if they considered that.

Mr. FIELDING: Oh, we have considered the whole business—yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I say that figure, then, was present to their minds when this treaty was arranged; that, having regard to that item of silk and silk manufactures which our total imports, I think my hon. friend will agree with me, amount to as much as $35,000,000 in some years and perhaps average $30,000,000 or $32,000,000, they had before them and considered the fact that the sales of France to Canada were as 1 to 8 as compared with the combined sales of Switzerland and Japan to Canada. That is what my hon. friend told me. Now I am going to ask him: When he is negotiating a treaty which, in the case of silks from France on one side and from Switzerland and Japan on the other, involves a ratio of 1 to 8, would he entirely disregard the claims of the silk manufacturers of the province of Quebec?

Mr. FIELDING: Not only now, but many times in this discussion, the hon. gentleman has been conveying the impression not only that silks are luxuries but that, under this arrangement, they are being introduced into Canada at a very low rate of duty. If that is so my hon. friend looks at this thing from a different angle when he talks of it as involving some sacrifice. From our point of view when you reduce a duty you are conferring a benefit upon the people of Canada. That point my hon. friend wholly fails to understand. These reductions, be they large or small, properly viewed, are reductions for the masses of the people of Canada.

Now, with regard to silks the idea might easily be drawn from the speech of my hon friend that we are making great reductions in the duty on silks. The fact is that the greater part of the silks imported into Canada, no matter from what foreign country they come, will enter at a duty of 27½ per cent, less 10 per cent discount, which will bring the duty down to nearly 25 per cent. Well, that is a rather respectably sized duty. I am sure my hon. friends sitting angularly opposite, if that is the correct description of their location in this chamber, will feel that 25 per cent is a pretty stiff duty. So that it is not a great sacrifice when we have, as we have here, a duty which is practically 27½ per cent. My hon. friend has striven to create the impression that in making the rate what it is we have made a sacrifice whereas we think what we have done will be very useful to the people of Canada.

Then my hon. friend seemingly has made a discovery. He solemnly asks us a question in reference to the favoured nation treaties. I presume that when he does so he wishes for information; he surely would not ask a question in reference to a matter that he knew all about. He does not know, I suppose, that favoured nation treatment is not a new thing? He does not know, I suppose, that there is nothing in that respect which did not obtain in previous treaties. My hon. friend would imply that by this agreement we were giving something away to Switzerland, Japan, and other nations which we should not have done. I do not think my hon. friend is as lacking in intelligence as his speech would seem to imply. I want to tell him, if he did not know the fact, that these favoured nation treaties have been in force for a great many years. Does not my hon. friend know that the treaty which his own friends made with France in effect provides that any concession given to France must apply to Germany—no not to Germany because she has not now favoured nation treatment—but must apply to Switzerland and to all the other favoured nations. This whole idea that we, by this treaty, are giving something to Japan, something to Switzerland, and something to other countries is a delusion. We are not doing it. These concessions have been given under favoured nation treaties which have existed for many years. When my hon. friend knows that in the treaty with France which his own friends made they had to give concessions to other countries enjoying favoured nation treatment why does he come here and ask do we not know that concessions are going to be granted to Switzerland and Japan.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I congratulate the Minister of Finance. He is always most astute, always very happy, and he is such an old hand at the game that he knows that one of the best things is to belabour the other side when you have not a good answer to make. He does it very well too, very nicely and very pleasantly. I do not object to it at all. I rather think these things show the absolute paucity of anything like good reasons in support of this treaty. Now, let us see what the facts are. My hon. friend says that I do not know anything about—

Mr. FIELDING: No, my hon. friend said he did not know.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We are not in the happy position of having a phalanx of experts and clerks working out everything for us. When we want information we have to do everything as best we can ourselves. My work has been challenged by no less a person than the Minister of Marine nad Fisheries.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Keep within the limits of the challenge.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The Minister of Finance says that I do not know anything about the most favoured nation treaties. Well, my hon. friend is not really doing himself justice. Why, I actually congratulated my hon. friend on the good work he did, on a former occasion in having the most favoured nation provisions abrogated as regards Germany and I am pointing out how very much better it would have been if he had done the same thing in the case of other countries before he entered into this treaty. The minister no doubt realizes that he is in charge of this treaty and that we have some right to be given information as to the principles on which these items have been treated. He tells me that I cannot possibly understand this treaty because I cannot get it into my head that a low duty on luxuries is a good thing for Canada. I will be frank with my hon. friend; I cannot get it into my head that a low duty on luxuries is a good thing for Canada. My hon. friend says that we have certain reductions. He took this very item relating to silk that we are discussing and he says that these reductions will be a benefit. I do not know that he made use of the word "inestimable" but he said they would be a benefit to the great mass of the people of Canada. I am going to ask my hon. friend if he really seriously thinks that the great mass of the people of Canada are benefited.

Mr. FIELDING: I did not use the words "the great mass of people" as applied to silks. My hon. friend has added these words himself, I did not use them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am very glad to hear it. I only want to get the government's viewpoint. It is a fact from the point of view of the minister that it is not in the interest of the great mass of the people of Canada that low rates of duty should apply on silks. Am I right in that?

Mr. FIELDING: No my hon. friend is not right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well then we are in this wonderful position in connection with this wonderful treaty that it is in the interest of the great mass of people to reduce the duties.

Mr. FORKE: I do not think they are very much interested.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is what my hon. friend says. I wonder if the mind of my hon. friend ever goes back to his own platform. I wonder if my hon. friend has ever thought of the platform to which he is pledged. We have heard so much about the scrapping of other platforms that the disease may be communicable. I hope it is not a disease which may be communicated. I have a distinct recollection that in the platform of my hon. friend and his party there was a call for heavy taxes on luxuries.

Mr. FORKE: The ex-Minister of Finance is enjoying himself this afternoon.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am going to ask my hon. friend if he considers silk a luxury.

Mr. FORKE: Silk stockings.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend think they are luxuries? He thinks they are luxuries? Well, then we have it in the first instance that it is not good for the people of Canada to reduce these items.

Mr. FIELDING: I did not say so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What does my hon. friend say?

Mr. FIELDING: All I ask my hon. friend, when he is attributing statements to me is, that he shall not credit me with words that I never uttered.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I certainly do not want to do that. What did my hon. friend say?

Mr. FIELDING: I think a duty like 27½ per cent, less 10 per cent discount, is not a low rate of duty. I do not think the mass of the people of Canada will consider it is a low rate of duty. Many of them will consider it is a pretty stiff rate of duty.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That was not the question. The question was whether it was a good thing to reduce the taxation on luxuries in the interest of the masses—I will not say the great masses.

Mr. FIELDING: Reductions of duties generally are in the interests of the masses.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the minister apply that to silks?

Mr. FIELDING: I do not think the duty on silks has been reduced to a very low figure. On nine-tenths of the imports of silk into Canada to-day the duty will still be 27½ per cent, subject to ten per cent discount. That is not a low rate of duty. It is a luxury duty.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend think he should leave the duties on the necessaries of life higher than the duties on luxuries?

Mr. FIELDING: In some cases they might be. There might be instances.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose the minister will admit that, even before the duties were reduced, the duty on silk was lower than the duty on woollens?

Mr. FIELDING: In same cases, yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And so a further reduction is made in the duty on silk. Will the minister tell me whether silk is manufactured at the present time in the province of Quebec? I am told that it is.

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: By a company at—

Mr. FIELDING: I do not remember where, but silk is manufactured in Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is the minister more interested in getting silk from Japan than he is in having it manufactured in Canada?

Mr. FIELDING: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is an even break, or what? Does he expect silk to be manufactured in Quebec with this treaty in force?

Mr. FIELDING: I think it will be, yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What particular item in silks is it to which the fixed duty applies, and what are the other items?

Mr. FIELDING: They are set forth in the treaty. I can only answer in the words of the document itself. It is item 581 of the treaty.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have not any analysis, of course.

Mr. FIELDING: I have not, either.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But the Minister of Marine must have an analysis.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is item 581.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would the minister give me an analysis of the amounts which apply to the different rates.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I was informed that ninety per cent of the silks imported into Canada come under the duty of 27½ per cent intermediate tariff, and that only 10 per cent come under that reduction to twenty per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister give me the figures? I have the items. I suppose he had something before him when he made that statement or he would not have made it. The item is to be found at page 27 of the treaty.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Schedules D and E.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is it not in D, at page 27 of the treaty?

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: Schedule D gives the fixed rate of 20 per cent on a certain part of item 581, and in schedule E the balance of the item 581 is mentioned, and comes under the intermediate tariff.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can you give me the particulars of the export?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I cannot.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who told my hon. friend there was only 10 per cent in one and 90 per cent in the other?

Mr. LAPOINTE: A gentleman called an expert.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who was he? I got my information from a governmental source, believing it to be true.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think my information is correct.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Who gave my hon. friend that information? I think I am entitled to an answer. He says my statement is 90 per cent wrong.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Do you challenge that?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I only want the authority. That is all I am interested in.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This is information I have received from government officials.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the hon. member give me the figures?

Mr. LAPOINTE. I cannot give more than I have.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It stands in this way—

Mr. LAPOINTE: I may say also to my hon. friend that there is no division in the present report as to the various forms of silk coming under the tariff, but this is the information the officers gathered, and they estimated that about 90 per cent would come under schedule E, and 10 per cent under schedule D.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the minister see where he has put himself?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have pretty fair vision wherever I happen to be.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does he see that he has now admitted that it was impossible for me to deal with that item in any other way than the way in which I dealt with it?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, I certainly do not. My hon. friend made a statement that the silk imported into Canada would be imported at a duty of 20 per cent, and he had in his hand a document showing that part of the silk would come in under a duty of 10 per cent, and the balance would come in under a duty of 27½ per cent. I admit that my hon friend had not in this document the proportion that would come under schedule D, and the proportion that would come under schedule E, but he had enough to know that there were two divisions or portions, one coming under schedule D and another under schedule E, and he made a statement implying that all the silk would come under schedule D.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is the hon. member correct when he says this item is not divided in any of the government returns?

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is what I am told so far, because they had no division in the duty.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It has not been divided.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What basis did the minister use to get at these figures of 90 per cent and 10 per cent?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The basis of men who were supposed to know, who know the imports coming to Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And further deponent saith not. Is that the attitude? The minister will not give me any information further than that somebody told him?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The information has been acquired in that way.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is one thing I will not be ashamed to do every time, and that is to give the source of my information, I will not say somebody told me, I will say who told me.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will say officers of the government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is not telling me what department?

Mr. FIELDING: What difference does it make?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would like to get the truth.

Mr. FIELDING: If my hon. friend wants further information in detail as to this matter, he will be good enough to frame his question and, so far as the information is in the power of any department of the government, he will get it but one can ask fifty questions on an occasion like this which nobody can answer offhand.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I will frame the question immediately. In connection with the statement made by the Minister of Finance that 10 per cent of the figures given the other day were correct and 90 per cent were wrong, I want to know the basis on which that calculation was arrived at, supported by the amounts of the different exports into Canada coming under that head? I only want the facts.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does the hon. member admit he was wrong when he stated that silks imported into Canada would come in at a reduced duty of 20 per cent?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I said they would come in at a reduced duty in any event. I was not caring whether it was 20 per cent or 27½ per cent, but I was addressing myself to this fact; that while my hon. friend is talking about meeting France and what he is doing for her, pretending to help France, he is helping Japan and Switzerland under that item just in the proportion of eight to one.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is another question altogether.

Mr. CHAPLIN: In my address the other day I asked for some information in regard to two articles; one was item 469 in schedule B. Under that head you will notice in the book of particulars that there are no figures at the end of the two last items, but a note of interrogation. I ask to have these figures filled in. In schedule B, under No. 533, sex, there is another item with two more notes of interrogation on the last two columns. I should like to have those filled in.

Mr. FIELDING: If there are any omissions of that kind, I will promise my hon. friend that before the third reading, we shall examine his speech and endeavour to bring before the House the information if it is available.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Another thing which I should like to call the attention of the minister to—and I have already done so in my address—is the necessity for improving the books of information, especially the trade returns. I called the minister's attention to some things in the index, and I complimented his deputy on the way in which his index was written, because it was a great improvement on the index of the Customs department. But I should like to point out that there are items that do not get into the customs returns. I have had three or four members of the House, particularly the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) attack me upon the question of the mistake that was made with reference to bronze powder. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) also said, "Why, for years, these people have been exporting this article." I have looked through the customs returns; I have looked through the returns which the Minister of Trade and Commerce laid on the Table only the other day and which were signed by him, and I cannot find that item of bronze powder. If an article is being exported to any considerable extent, it should get into the returns, and the minister should tell us under what item or where that article appears, because it does not appear in the returns. Somebody in the department should be able to tell us where that item has been lost, because it would be interesting to get that information.

There is just one more thing to which I should like to call the minister's attention. I have looked through the returns of this year to get an idea of the exportation of grapes, but they must be mixed up with some other fruit and very likely are. Where the amount of export of an article gets beyond a certain figure, say $10,000 or $20,000, it should be put in an item by itself, so that we might be able to get some reasonable information in regard to it.

Mr. FIELDING: The point of the discussion at that time was whether or not it was worth while mentioning bronze powder in the list of articles that might possibly be exported. The question of whether it appeared in the customs returns or not did not touch the point at all, and it is not worth while spending much time on that. I have no doubt that the trade and commerce returns are the fruit of long years of experience by capable officers; but there is always room for improvement, and if there is any defect in the forms used in making up the returns, I am sure, as a minister, I am glad to have my attention drawn to the matter by my hon. friend. All these matters will be brought to the notice of the proper department and, as far as possible, the returns will be made complete. The point of importance, however, was not whether articles were in the returns or not, but whether they should be put on the list of articles that might be exported to France. As regards bronze powder, the hon. member argued that it was waste of time ot put it on the list. He was wrong in that.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I admit that I was wrong as regards that, but in regard to many hundreds of other articles, no reply has been made.

Mr. FIELDING: The hon. member's argument was that articles that did not appear in the returns had no business to be in our treaty. Who cares whether an article is mentioned in the returns or not; if it is an article which is being made in Canada, did we not act wisely in putting it in the list of possible exports? My hon. friend is right in his suggestion as to the accuracy of the returns; I am glad to have his suggestion, and I will have it brought to the attention of the proper officers.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I did not refer only to one item. The hon. member was able to find I was mistaken as regards one item, not amongst two or three, but amongst several hundred that I mentioned. What about such an item as borax or cyanide of potassium? They have been on our import list for years, and yet those are listed as articles that we can export to France. There is no use in my going through the same thing again, and I do not propose to take up the time of the committee in making another address. I do not, however, want the minister to say that because I have been corrected on one thing, there are not dozens and dozens of articles that have never been made in Canada and possibly never will be.

Mr. FIELDING: The hon. member may be wrong in that also. He does not know so much about the matter as he thought he did. He makes a mistake like the rest of us. But what harm can come to him or anybody else by putting those on the list of things we can export to France, if they are made in Canada? Will he tell me that?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend knows very well the use that was made of that slip, not of my hon. friend, but in the customs returns. It was made use of for the purpose of showing that the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) did not know what he was talking about. That one little slip was magnified to such an extent that it was made to cover dozens and dozens of cases in which apparently he was perfectly correct. My hon. friend knows the argument on the matter, and there is no good in going into it any further. I think he appreciates just as well as I do that that is not a very good way of fairly meeting an argument.

Mr. FIELDING: I think it is.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: To pick out one little thing in which an error has been made?

If that is true, if everything done by my hon. friend was to turn upon his errors, how did he introduce this treaty? What understanding did he have of the question of border countries and the like? He was absolutely wrong. But because he was absolutely wrong in connection with something about which he should know a great deal more than the hon. member for Lincoln knows about bronze powder, I would not say for one moment that my hon. friend is wrong in everything. He is not. My hon. friend appreciates just as well as I do that his type of argument was very unfair.

I was dealing with these imports into Canada from countries that get the same benefit as France does out of this arrangement. I am going to ask whether item 575, braids, cords, fringes and tassels, has been reduced from 35½ per cent to a fixed rate of 27½ per cent. Is that correct?

Mr. FIELDING: I could not answer the hon. gentleman at the moment. I will apply the same answer as I did a moment ago. As regards any of these questions which I cannot answer at the moment, I will undertake to see that the information, if it is within our power, will be given later.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I assume it will be given when this matter is still in committee, because after it is out of committee, the information will be of no value.

Mr. FIELDING: From 32½ per cent to 27½ per cent intermediate, I am informed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should like that checked. Is the expert quite sure that the rate of 27½ per cent is not a fixed one?

Mr. FIELDING: We think not, but we will look into it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Let us look at the particulars. I think the expert is wrong. At page 27 he will find item 575.

Mr. FIELDING: The rate is 32½ per cent, and the reduced rate 27½ per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is it not a fixed rate?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes, it is in schedule D.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So that the fixed rate is 27½ per cent. The information I have as to imports into Canada under that head shows that France sold us, under the item of braids, cords and fringes, which are covered with other things, $47,847 worth of goods while Switzerland sold us $112,407 worth. Is any objection taken to that statement?

Mr. FIELDING: If it is in the returns it is correct.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should like the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to check my figures where he takes exception to them.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why should I? You must know whether they are right or not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, they come from the government.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They are your own figures; they were quoted in your speech.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, they come from the government returns and have been carefully scrutinized by the ministers. I want to know whether the statement I have just submitted is correct.

Mr. FIELDING: I have no doubt the figures are correct if the hon. gentleman is quoting them from the returns.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We are in this position; sometimes when we quote from the returns we are told we are absolutely wrong, and at other times we are told that the ministers do not know anything about the matter, but that if the figures are in the returns they are right. It is therefore somewhat difficult to know when the figures are right and when they are wrong. We were told, for example, that we were wrong about bronze powders because we relied upon the returns; now, on the other hand, we are told to look at the returns. I wonder if we can take this for granted, that, except for the challenge to the figures submitted in the case of bronze powders and the rates of duty on silks, everything else we have quoted is correct?

Mr. FIELDING: Such figures as are quoted from the official returns are correct. Any comments made upon them in the course of argument may or may not be correct. Concerning them this deponent saith not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister said that the member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) was wrong when he quoted from the returns in regard to bronze powders.

Mr. FIELDING: No, he did not rely on the returns in that case.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister bear with me a moment?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister will remember that the returns showed imports into Canada of $46,000 worth of bronze powders, but no exports. Would he not say that was wrong?

Mr. FIELDING: No, I would not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So that my hon. friend thinks the returns are right. Now, then, I want to know whether I am wrong about brushes. Let us take item 653, brushes. Am I right in saying that the intermediate tariff there was 25½ per cent?

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend has the tariff; no doubt he quotes it correctly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, I have not the tariff.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not dispute his figures.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then there is no dispute concerning that item. For that year France sold us $42,941 worth of brushes while Japan sold us $114,415. Is there any challenge to these figures?

Mr. FIELDING: If they are from the returns they are correct.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I understand that the minister is not challenging the figures in regard to brushes?

Mr. FIELDING: I am not challenging the returns.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am quoting certain figures. I have a pretty shrewd idea that they are right, and it was a rather small thing for the Minister of Marine to hang his hat on. However, I propose to go through with it and see if I can find anything else except a quibble.

Mr. FIELDING: "Quibble" is not parliamentary.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I will withdraw it if my hon. friend can furnish a better description.

Mr. FIELDING: I could.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Let us take next item 651. The intermediate rate there is 30 per cent. Is that right?

Mr. FIELDING: Correct.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Under this item France sold us $11,332 worth of goods and Japan $107,761. Is there any question of the rates there?

5 p.m.

[Mr. Fielding.]

Mr. FIELDING: If they are given in the returns they are correct.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But so far as my hon. friend is advised, are they properly given in the returns?

Mr. FIELDING: I know nothing to the contrary.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Very good. Let us take next item 368. The intermediate tariff I think is the old rate of 27½ per cent. Is that correct?

Mr. FIELDING: Correct.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is ten per cent taken off that, I believe. The sales under this item were, from France, $3,829, and from Switzerland, $75,586. What does my hon. friend say about these figures so far as he is advised? Are they correct?

Mr. FIELDING: I have nothing to the contrary.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then, item 453—

Mr. FIELDING: Suppose we shorten it by agreeing that all the quotations from the returns are correct.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the minister says that all the things I have said here are correct, I am quite content to stop. I thought I was seriously challenged the other day.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not want my hon. friend to stop, but I am serious when I say I take it for granted that all these figures, if quoted from the official returns are correct.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not like that expression "if quoted from the official returns." The statement was made that a very large preponderance of benefit under this treaty went to Switzerland and Japan instead of to France, and the veracity of that statement has been challenged. So long as it is absolutely clear that that is right, I do not propose to delay the minister. But I want to get it perfectly clear that it is right; if there is any doubt about it, I will go on.

Mr. FIELDING: As you please.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the minister says it is clear that I am right, I stop.

Mr. FIELDING: I think my hon. friend is quite right when he gives us the figures from the official returns; I readily agree that they are correct.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not want it suggested that there is any doubt about these figures being from the official returns. There is an "if" each time.

Mr. FIELDING: I will go further and say that when my hon. friend purports to quote from official returns I will assume he is quoting correctly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: All these quotations of quantities of goods are assumed to be from official returns.

Mr. FIELDING: If they are from official returns they are correct.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: An "if" comes in again.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not wish to imply that my hon. friend is misrepresenting the official returns. If he says he is quoting from the official returns I will assume they are correct.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I read in one of our agricultural reports a short time ago the suggestion that Canadian butter manufacturers should reduce to the lowest possible point the amount of salt in their butter in order to suit the European trade. I have communicated with two or three butter factories and I cannot find that any of them have been making anything other than salt butter. I would like to ask the minister if any unsalted butter was shipped out of Canada the last year. There is nothing in the returns to show that there was.

Mr. FIELDING: When I was in Brussels it was represented to me that Belgium was taking orders for fresh butter from Canada. I do not know that any went to France but if it can be sent to Belgium there is a fair chance of its going to France.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister gave us certain economic reasons why, in connection with article II, France is allowed to give, without extending them to Canada, special privileges to Germany in connection with goods for reparation. But why are Spain and the Netherlands also given a position of superiority to Canada?

Mr. FIELDING: When that matter came up before, I was asked for an explanation of article II in regard to border states and I said that at the moment my impression was that it corresponded to a similar article in the old treaty. Thereupon the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) quoted the language of the old treaty and showed me that in that respect I was incorrect. He was right on that point and I was wrong; I was asked the question while on my feet and had no opportunity to reflect upon it. The clause that is put in giving some privileges to France to deal with border states is now inserted in all the French treaties. I have one or two cases here. For instance, the Anglo-French commercial treaty made in 1922 provided as follows:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of the preceding paragraphs, His Britannic Majesty will not be entitled to claim for raw materials or manufactured articles the produce of the territories of his Britannic Majesty the benefit of any special treatment which his Catholic Majesty has conceded or may concede to the products of Portugal or to those originating in and proceeding from the Spanish zone of Morocco.

In several other treaties the French are now inserting that provision. I admit that it is susceptible of the interpretation that my hon. friend suggests, but I am assured and believe that that is not really its main purpose; it is intended to deal chiefly with the matter of reparations. Belgium, for instance, is a neighbouring country; France may wish in connection with accounts between France and Belgium to bring in Belgian goods; and German goods may have to go into France by way of reparation. This arrangement is also contemplated by the Treaty of Versailles —that in the adjustments of commercial relations regard is to be had to the needs of France in the matter of reparations. I do not think there is any danger to be apprehended in that connection. Our real competitor in France is the United States, and if we are assured of the most favoured nation treatment as respects that country I think we may reasonably be content. However, on that point my hon. friend was right; the clause is wider than I thought it was, but I am satisfied that it brings no harm.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I quite appreciate the suggestion regarding what is in the Versailles treaty, but we go beyond that. Did France want to go beyond it, or is it an error in drafting?

Mr. FIELDING: It is not an error of drafting; it is based on what we understood to be French policy. I find that article 23 of the Covenant of the League of Nations provides:

> Subject to and in accordance with the provisions of international conventions existing or hereafter to be agreed upon, the members of the League—

That includes France, and includes Canada.

> —will make provision to secure and maintain freedom of communications and of transit and equitable treatment for the commerce of all members of the league. In this connection, the special necessities of the regions devastated during the war of 1914-1918 shall be borne in mind.

This is part of the Treaty of Versailles, to which we have agreed. The intention there clearly is to provide for the matter of reparations, and that, I am satisfied, is really what France intended.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend does not quite get my point. I quite agree that France was to have the right of getting in these goods on the account of reparations. My hon. friend was quite right in making that exception; I am not objecting to that at all. Then my hon. friend goes on to say that that is really all France wants—at least I think I was right in so understanding him.

Mr. FIELDING: Possibly that is the way it will be applied—yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is rather hard for me to get anywhere in this discussion unless I take what my hon. friend gives me. Was I right in understanding him to say that that was all France wanted—to look after her right of getting these goods in on reparation account and having perhaps some special arrangement in that regard with Belgium as well as with Germany? Was I right in understanding that?

Mr. FIELDING: Hardly. What I meant to say and what I do say is this. France requires and puts into all her treaties that provision. I could show my hon. friend several treaties with that provision. I understand and believe that the intention of France, although it is possible to give the clause another interpretation, the main purpose of France in requiring that provision is not to get a general trade but to deal with reparations and questions between the neighbouring nations. I believe that is the intention of France, although I admit it is possible to interpret that clause in the way my hon. friend says.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Did France put forward any other claim in the demand she made for this clause except to look after her reparations?

Mr. FIELDING: I cannot recall the discussion in detail. The language is there and I admit it is capable of the interpretation my hon. friend suggests, but I believe that is not the main object and that it will not be so applied.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is unfortunate, if that was not the object, that the wording is as we have it. It was a mistake in draftsmanship, was it not?

Mr. FIELDING: Not necessarily

[Mr. Fielding.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It may be in for some other reason; I do not know. But does not my hon. friend think it would have been better just to cover what was intended? Take the very question of these small tools that my hon. friend is providing for. He says our real competitor is the United States. Is my hon. friend quite sure of that? Is he quite sure that before the war Belgium was not making a larger amount of many of these tools and exporting them to France? I think my hon. friend will find that is the fact. I do not like to put it forward as a fact because I have not the same opportunities of finding out that my hon. friend has, but I know it used to be so at one time. I ask my hon. friend if that is not true to-day.

Mr. FIELDING: It is possible.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, then, would it not have been better to have had this confined just to what the hon. gentleman had before him?

Mr. FIELDING: It is possible, again.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It seems not only possible but obvious. Well, I think we understand that, at any rate. We understand that Belgium, the Netherlands and Spain may be put in a position of advantage over Canada.

Mr. FIELDING: I did not catch the question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The position is that, under this treaty, nations that have nothing whatever to do with reparations may be put by France in a position of advantage over Canada. You have Spain, Portugal, and the Netherlands, at any rate, that are adjacent, and you also have Switzerland. Now is it a fact—I am not going to debate it if we have it admitted—that under this treaty those nations are all allowed so far as we are concerned, to get terms more advantageous than Canada gets?

Mr. FIELDING: I admit it is possible, but having regard to the general tenour of the article I am quite sure that is not the intention. I do not know that it adds much to the debate but of course if this treaty seems to be such a horrible thing as hon. gentlemen suggest it can be terminated on six months notice at any time. I cannot imagine any serious trouble likely to arise. If my hon. friend asks me if it is possible—yes, it is.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is possible that these advantages may be given under this treaty. Now I want my friend to contrast the covenants contained in article III with the covenants contained in articles X and XI and give us something which will occur to him as a real reason why these covenants are not interchangeable covenants, for usually we have interchangeable covenants in agreements.

Mr. FIELDING: Would my hon. friend repeat the question? I am sorry to ask him.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What I would like my friend to do would be to give me the reason why, having particular regard for the moment to article III and articles X and XI which provide certain covenants—contrasting in particular article III, our covenant, with the covenants contained in articles X and XI,—why these covenants are not made reciprocal covenants as is usual in agreements.

Mr. FIELDING: Often covenants are not reciprocal. If my hon. friend will point out any error in either covenant I can more readily discuss it with him.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: All right. As we go through it we will see if I understand the matter correctly. I take it that under article III we obtain in France the benefit of the percentages of differences between the general and minimum tariffs and that those percentages are to remain the same. I point out to my hon. friend that the covenant really stops there. There is nothing to provide that there shall be any difference between the general and the minimum tariff. In other words, if everything was lifted up to the general tariff there would be no percentage at all. Or putting a case not so extreme, my hon. friend has a case where he gets a reduction in a tariff where the general tariff, we will say, is 100 and the minimum tariff is 50, and he gets 50 per cent of the difference. He there would get a tariff rate of 75. Now let us assume that the minimum tariff is raised to 90. His percentage of 50 would still remain, but he would pay a rate of 95. Am I right?

Mr. FIELDING: This is a case where we could not get the minimum tariff on all these goods, and so we agreed to have a percentage of reduction. Does my hon. friend think that is unreasonable?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is not what I am addressing myself to.

Mr. FIELDING: Well, I do not quite see the point. If he insists that there must be exactly a corresponding clause in the other part of the treaty, I do not see that it is necessary. I do not think it was important for us to insist that there should be the same difference between the general and minimum tariff. We did not attach importance to it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would not my hon. friend attach importance to the case I gave him, which I think he will agree is perfectly possible under his own contract? Take a general rate of 100 and a minimum rate of 50. We are entitled to 50 per cent of the difference between those rates. The minimum tariff rate is raised to 90. Under the contract rate in each case you would just have this difference, in the one case you would have a duty of 75 per cent, and in the other case a duty of 95 per cent, if I understand my hon. friend's clause. Am I right?

Mr. FIELDING: The words as respects percentage, I am bound to admit, are not ours. They were taken from the treaty of the late government. If article III is read in connection with article IV it will be seen that we are given the assurance—and I am coming back to what was the main object of the treaty—that we shall be granted the same rates that are extended to the United States: It is provided in article IV that:

> If France shall at any time grant to the United States of America as regards any of the products mentioned in schedule B to the present convention percentages more favourable than those mentioned in the said schedule, or the benefit of the minimum tariff the same or similar products originating in and coming from Canada shall immediately and unconditionally enjoy the benefit of the said concessions.

I do not think we could ask anything more than that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has not answered my question, I think he knows exactly what I am asking. Is it or is it not permitted under your contract for France in the case of any item—100 we will say, being the general rate, 50 being the minimum rate —to advance the minimum rate to 90?

Mr. FIELDING: Suppose that was done what great hardship would come? My hon. friend is imagining things. If this treaty proves to be anything like as dreadful as he pictures we can get rid of it after six months' notice. I cannot imagine these things happening.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has now given absolutely the strongest argument in favour of the treaty which has yet been advanced, namely that it can be got rid of in six months. I again ask the Finance Minister if under this contract with France, where the general tariff is 100 and the minimum tariff is 50 the latter could not be advanced to 90. Cannot France do that?

Mr. FIELDING: The essence of these clauses is that we get the same treatment as the United States. If France makes any such changes as my hon. friend describes and gives advantages to the United States she must also give them to Canada. That is the essence of the arrangement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What I want to know is whether France can do what I have suggested?

Mr. FIELDING: France might possibly do it but she would have to give the benefit to Canada as well as to the United States.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is not following me. I will use this illustration: Suppose we have a general rate of 1,000 and a minimum rate of 500. Now then we will assume that the minimum rate is increased by 50 per cent which would bring that rate up to 750. Is there anything to prevent France from bringing that minimum up to 750 or even 900?

Mr. FIELDING: It could not be done while the arrangement with the United States exists. If that arrangement terminates we have the assurance that we shall get the best terms that are going.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: France could do it apart from that arrangement could it not?

Mr. FIELDING: It could.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It could do that? So that that is the result. We would suffer that loss and practically get no advantage at all. I point out to my hon. friend the advantages enjoyed by France under article X and ask my hon. friend why it is that different treatment should be handed out to Canada. In article X it will be observed, France enjoys a discount of 10 per cent in addition to the benefit of the intermediate tariff. France retains any benefit she enjoys under the contract but the benefit which is granted to Canada may be taken from her. Why is that?

Mr. FIELDING: It was something which pleased France and did not hurt us.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It does not hurt Canada to get terms which are unfavourable to her and are favourable to France? Is that right?

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend is arguing the matter. I am not bound to agree with his argument.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If any wrong is done to Canada under this contract I want to understand it. There is an absolute covenant in article X, as I understand it, that the proportionate difference between the intermediate and general tariffs shall at no time be less than it is at present.

Mr. FIELDING: That is correct.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is no provision of the like protecting Canada herself.

Mr. FIELDING: There is no like provision.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend says there is no like provision. Is there any provision which, although not of a like character, does protect Canada? If so I would like to have it.

Mr. FIELDING: I am afraid I will have to let my hon. friend proceed with his argument.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The question at issue here is not the argument I am advancing, that is not what the committee should vote on. They must vote on what the government has to say about its own legislation. This is a government measure. Is there any clause, even if it is not of a like character, which gives any protection to Canada at all? If there is will the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Marine and Fisheries kindly point it out. I do not think there is.

Mr. FIELDING: I have told the hon. gentleman that there is no such covenant. I have told him that the explanation is that the French government attached importance to one thing, we did not attach great importance to it, and in the framing of a treaty you have got to try and please both sides. In this case it was something the French wanted; we did not think it was of any importance.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is no clause granting similar protection to us.

Mr. FIELDING: We shall see how the treaty works out. It must be judged by its results.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is a bit lopsided.

Mr. FIELDING: Possibly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is my hon. friend quite clear that we shall always get the same treatment as the United States? As I read the treaty if France gives greater concessions to the United States in the future than it is now giving to Canada we shall have to pay for those concessions, and the United States will not.

Mr. FIELDING: We have the guarantee that in the case of the goods mentioned in schedules A and B we will get as good treatment as the United States and that is what we think is the main feature. In A and B we think we have covered practically everything that we are likely to export—hon. gentlemen opposite think we have covered a great deal more—but everything we can reasonably expect to export is covered by A and B. As respects other articles, if later on something new arises and the United States gets some favoured privileges and we think we are entitled to get similar privileges in return for some fair concession the two governments have agreed, they will recognize that obligation and by mutual conference will come to an agreement. If France gives the United States some advantage they must give it to us for a fair return. That is only reasonable.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is it reasonable under this contract that we should have to give concessions to France for advantages which are extended to the United States without any obligation on her part? I ask my hon. friend if that is reasonable.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not quite understand my hon. friend's question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Let me read the article in question:

> If at any time France grants to the United States of America for any products other than those enumerated in schedules A and B to this convention more favourable treatment than is granted to Canada, Canada shall be entitled to claim the benefit of the same treatment for any identical or similar products originating in and coming from Canada, on condition that France shall be entitled to ask from Canada a reasonable and equivalent concession. France undertakes to give due consideration to any claim thus put forward by Canada and promptly to make known what concession of a similar nature she wishes to receive in return. The governments of the two countries undertake to examine these questions in a friendly spirit and with a mutual desire to arrive at an equitable agreement.

I point out to my hon. friend that, under that reservation, valuable concessions can be granted to the United States for nothing, and that Canada has a right to get the same concessions, if she is able to make a new arrangement, a new treaty with France in connection with them, at the price of giving concessions of a similar, or some other nature. Perhaps I am wrong in saying of a similar nature. She has to give valuable considerations for further tariff rights or advantages in France which the United States may get for nothing. My hon. friends may think that is right, but I venture to think that it is not right, that in view of the tremendous amount that is already being given, that we ought, as a matter of course, to get the benefit of any further concessions granted to the United States without giving any further concession. We must remember that we have given this long list. While we have surrendered our autonomy having regard to a great many items which are absolutely fixed, while we give this exact percentage of difference as between the intermediate and the general tariff, the United States has given nothing. Surely my hon. friend does not mean that if the United States, on top of all this, gets something further it is reasonable Canada should pay to get the same thing.

Mr. FIELDING: The observations of my hon. friend may be well founded, perhaps, if he has the knowledge which his remarks would imply. In that case, however, I must compliment him on the fact that he possesses superior knowledge to that which I possess, because he tells us the United States are going to get something for nothing. How he knows the terms and conditions the French government are going to give the United States passes my comprehension; I confess I do not know. This agreement does not make any limitations as to the terms of any agreement between France and the United States. They can make their own arrangement. What is most likely to happen, I think, in view of events that are occurring at the present time, is that the present arrangement with the United States will not last long, and I have not any fear that they will get any terms or conditions not extended to Canada. This is not an agreement to determine what the United States and France will do, and the only relation of the United States is this: that if she is our chief competitor, and we take care that whatever France gives the United States in the matter of concessions she must give to us, I do not see anything wrong in that. I think it is reasonable, we have covered in A, and B, everything Canada wants to send to France. If it turns out there is something else, and France makes some arrangement with the United States, then she must give us the same terms, if it is something new. If the United States gets something new, what is unfair in saying that the representatives of France and the representatives of Canada may sit down and deal with it? France may say to us: "Well, we are giving this to the United States, and we will give it to you if you give us some concession in return". What is wrong in that? Nothing.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon friend did not get me. What I was pointing out was that we pay the price for what we are getting. The United States to-day has not paid the price for what she has got.

Mr. FIELDING: The United States did not get that in our day; they got it while other gentlemen were managing public affairs, and we have no responsibility for it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose the hon. minister thinks he assisted the United States in getting the contracts. I suppose he thinks we have something to do with the United States' people getting the contracts.

Mr. FIELDING: No I do not think so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then, why did the minister make the remark?

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend is introducing the United States in the matter; we are not doing so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is really missing the point in this matter altogether. My hon. friends go over there and they find an existing condition of affairs. I am not dragging in the United States, this contract drags it in and my hon. friend drags it in. They say they want as good a deal as the United States. Very good. I point out to my hon. friend—and if I am wrong I want to be corrected, because I am only trying to get the truth in connection with this matter—that considerable trouble has been given by Canada in connection with this treaty. My hon. friend has said that this treaty puts Canada in the position of the United States, her chief competitor. These words were used by my hon. friend more than once during this debate. I point out to him that the United States paid nothing whatever for any of these things. If I am wrong I want to be corrected. I think I am right, and I point out that under this very contract that is the state of affairs which my hon. friend recognizes as proper, not only for the present but for the future. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) is a lawyer; I have no doubt he looked after the drafting of the treaty; one would naturally expect that. Well, under this clause which is drawn here, France may give—I do not say must give—so and so. My hon. friend seemed to know an awful lot about what France would do. I do not pretend to know. All I know is about this contract, which is supposed to look after Canada's interest. I point out to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that France may give further advantages to the United States in her market, and she may give them for nothing—there is nothing said one way or the other as to the terms of agreement between France and the United States. And I further say that the effect of this agreement is that, although the United States may have got those additional things covered by this contract for nothing, Canada is not to get them for nothing as the United States did, but has to pay a consideration for them. I will ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries whether that is not correct.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What is wrong with the clause as it is?

Mr. FIELDING: This clause does not purport to deal with the relations between France and the United States. If I could only get that into my hon. friend's head it would save him a lot of trouble. This is an agreement, whether wise or not, between France and Canada. France and the United States can do anything they like in commercial matters. The only advantage is that in respect of a wide range of articles, if France is going to give certain concessions to the United States—and this list covers nearly everything we need—she must give those concessions to Canada and if something new arises, and she gives it to the United States, we can say to her "This is a new commodity, we have a right to it, let us sit down and arrange what we will give for it." I cannot see anything wrong in that. My hon. friends thought we were making an arrangement with the United States but we are not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I never contended that this was a contract binding the United States. I was speaking simply of sections of this treaty, drafted, I suppose, by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe). I am not bringing into this contract anything that is not there now.

Mr. FIELDING: Yes, the hon. gentleman is telling us that under this contract, the United States can do certain things. I say that this contract has nothing to do with the United States.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is quite in error about that. This contract, as regards this particular matter that we are discussing, says that if France gives the United States further concessions, we are to get the same concessions, if we can make an agreement. Am I right in that?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It says further that we are to give something for those concessions.

Mr. FIELDING: Further concessions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: On both sides.

Mr. FIELDING: No, we are dealing only with the one side.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are we not dealing with France and Canada?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are they not two ?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Two sides?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So, this is dealing with concessions on both sides. France makes concessions to the United States. Canada comes along and says: "I want those concessions from you." France says: "Give me so many more concessions," and that is the way the matter would be worked out. What I am poinitng out to the minister is that a treaty has been negotiated by France with both Canada and the United States, that while concessions are granted to the United States for nothing, a consideration is asked from Canada and that if further concessions are made to the United States we can only get equivalent concessions by paying for them. Am I overstating that?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why?

Mr. FIELDING: We will under this treaty enjoy, not many, but some concessions that the United States do not get. Again I must ask my hon. friend to notice this. This is a contract, not between France and the United States, but between France and Canada. Recognizing, whether rightly or wrongly, the fact that the United States is our greatest competitor, surely we want to claim the best terms that are given to the United States. Therefore we put in that list B, which guarantees the best terms given to the United States, a long list of items which hon. members think are too many. We put in schedules A and B practically all articles that Canada is likely to want included, and we may say that if something more arises, we shall make a special arrangement about it. I cannot see anything wrong in that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Except that again the United States gets something for nothing, and we pay. Apparently, however, we are not gaining anything by further discussion as to that. What is the effect in law, or what is the intended effect of article 17?

Mr. FIELDING: A clause of that kind will be found in every commercial treaty between two nations. It is simply guaranteeing between the two nations that they will have the same privileges as regards interior transit and so forth. I do not think there is anything new in it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The sales tax is something that is new since the old commercial treaty was made. What is the view of the government in connection with the sales tax, considering articles 17 and 18?

Mr. FIELDING: Both France and Canada have at present local taxes which, we think, balance one another, and I do not think there is going to be trouble on that score. It means that, practically speaking, there shall be mutual guarantee of equal treatment in these things. If the cost of applying these things seems to be a large matter, that might be a subject of negotiation. I think, however, there will be no trouble in regard to it. Our sales tax on the one hand and the French local tax on the other will balance one another.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend say that the point is covered or that he does not fear trouble?

Mr. FIELDING: I think it is covered.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Under the contract what is my hon. friend's view as to the sales tax on French goods coming into Canada?

Mr. FIELDING: We will treat the goods of France the same as we treat the goods of any other foreign country.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is that national treatment; is that the way in which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries understood it; or when he was drawing that contract and advising the Minister of Finance in regard to the legal effect of it, is this not what he thought, that he was going to give the goods of France the same treatment as the goods of Canada, once he had exacted his lower duties?

Mr. LAPOINTE: What my hon. friend refers to is the last clause of article 18, which reads:

> Subject to the laws now in force in either country France and Canada grant each other national treatment as regards consumption dues or other duties imposed upon the sale of goods.

The sales tax will apply to French goods in this country.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thank my hon. friend for reading the clause. I was asking what it meant.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend has done nothing this afternoon but read from the treaty.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have been asking the hon. member what he meant by certain sections. What does this section mean?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It means what it says. It is very clear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does it mean that France and Canada agree with each other that the products of France in Caanda and the products of Canada in France shall both be subject to like treatment?

Mr. LAPOINTE: To the laws in force in France and in Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is hardly an answer to my question. Are they both to be subject to like treatment under those laws?

Mr. LAPOINTE: We cannot adjust the laws in France and Canada so as to be the same on everything.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I really credited my hon. friend with more intelligence.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I cannot say that of my hon. friend after some of the remarks he has made.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: On the terms of his considered clause, can the extra sales tax charged on imported articles be charged on articles coming from France?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The extra sales tax over the Canadian—can that be done?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Under what section?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Section 18.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has an opinion been received from the Department of Justice on that question?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely national treatment means that what is charged on Canadian goods shall be charged on French goods. It is so clear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend must know that is not the point. Does he not know—

Mr. LAPOINTE: I know that is what you are talking about all the time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does he not know there is a difference—

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think you do.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend not know that there is a difference in the rate on imported articles and on domestic articles?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the clause carry?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, we want to have this matter cleared up; we want to know what stand the government is going to take. In this contract Canada covenants with France to give France certain treatment in her markets, and we want to know whether, over and above the tariff duties reserved by the contract, the government can also charge a rate of sales tax on the imported goods of France, as of other countries, higher than the rate she levies on her own goods. We want to know what stand the government takes in this matter, and I think we are entitled to the information. In view of the covenant of the treaty, does the government concede that this internal tax of ours, the sales tax, is to apply to goods imported from France?

Mr. FIELDING: Read the concluding words of the article.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But I want the government's position.

Mr. FIELDING: I cannot undertake to explain it more clearly than it is stated in the act; I am not a lawyer. It seems that my hon. friend wishes to continue the discussion and I think we had better call it six o'clock. However, I shall not be able to be here this evening and I ask that the committee report progress.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Before we rise I will ask the minister to get some information in regard to item 214 in schedule B. This item refers to wheels, tires and wheel centres of iron or steel. I want to know what kind of tires this refers to, whether of steel or rubber?

Mr. FIELDING: I shall get the information.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

HURON AND ERIE MORTGAGE CORPORATION

On the motion of Mr. White, amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 34, respecting the Huron and Erie Mortgage Corporation, were read a first and second time and concurred in.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 102, to amend the Criminal Code.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Definition of "opium joint" repealed:

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Clause 1 and clause 2 will have for effect to strike out the criminal code provisions with regard to opium joints as it is considered that this subject is more satisfactorily covered by the provisions of sections 4, 10, 11 and 12 of Bill No. 72, an "Act to prohibit the improper use of opium and other drugs," which passed the House the other day. We have now in the Criminal Code a definition of such houses, and this is to put the definition in line with the act which was passed the other day.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Amendment to penalty clause in respect to advertising, printing, posting or selling intelligence on horse-races:

Mr. TOLMIE: Would the minister give us an explanation of that?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I have already given an explanation to the House. This prohibits advertisements and the printing and publishing, exhibiting and giving of tips, selections and odds on horse-races. Reading the clause, which is very clear, the House will find that we propose that in the future no one shall be permitted to advertise, print, publish, exhibit, post up, sell or supply, or offer to sell or supply:

(i) other than on the premises of an association lawfully conducting race meetings in Canada, and during the actual progress of a race meeting thereon, any tips, selections, odds, winning money prices, pari-mutuel payments, or any similar intelligence with respect to or applicable to any horse-race, whether such race be held within or without the Dominion of Canada, and whether at the time of advertising, printing, publishing, exhibiting, posting up or applying such news or information such race has or has not taken place;

The second part of the section reads as follows:

(ii) any information intended to assist in or intended for use in connection with book-making, pool-selling, betting or wagering upon any fight, game, sport or race, other than a horse-race whether at the time of advertising, printing, publishing, exhibiting, posting up or supplying such news or information, such fight, game, sport or race has or has not taken place.

That is to say that no publicity as to betting, book-making and pool selling on horse-races will be allowed in any other place or at any other time than on the race-track during a race. By the second part of the section this will apply to all cases of betting on games or races of any kind.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think, perhaps, we should have some little further explanation as to why betting should be permitted during the time of a race on the race-track and made illegal at all other times; as to why a monopoly should be given in the matter of betting on horse-races at the time of a race meeting and should not be extended to other kinds of betting in other places. I do not quite see the principle.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: This point was debated and disposed of by the House at a previous sitting. The pari-mutuel system was discussed and the House by a large majority decided that it should be retained. Betting on horse-races was also considered at the same time, and it would seem that the opinion of the House was in favour of its being allowed. The great abuse, as to which we have received complaints, is not the betting on race-tracks but the betting outside, and especially the book-making and the pool-selling not only on races in Canada but on races outside of the Dominion. I am afraid that the prohibition of betting on race-tracks, as it has obtained for years past, would have the result of creating difficulties.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Under this provision is it not impossible for a man to enjoy the practice of betting except on a race-track and during the time of the meeting?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The betting is only allowed on the race-track. It has been so for many years.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does that not give a monopoly of the betting to those who are conducting the horse-races?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Not necessarily. Anyone can bet on a race-track; everyone is free to do so.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In the case of a baseball game does betting become illegal.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes; that is to say the advertising of it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is it illegal to bet on a baseball game while the game is in progress?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: On a private game you can bet any amount you like. What we want to do is to prohibit the book-making and the pool-selling on any games. In the case of horse-races betting is only allowed on the track during the course of the meeting.

Mr. SHAW: I think there was an amendment proposed last year if not to this section perhaps to section 236—a section at least allied to this one, and relating to guessing contests conducted by certain newspapers. I think the minister was asked some time ago if, in view of the decisions which had been recorded in the courts, it was the intention of the government to bring in an amendment.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I will bring it in immediately after this.

Section agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the bill?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: No. One minute. I have other amendments to propose. I beg to move that the following section be added to the bill:

Section 294 of the said act is amended by striking out the word "fourteen" in the second line thereof and substituting therefor the word "sixteen".

This amendment was inserted in the government's bill of last year. It was passed by the House but was defeated in the Senate. Section 294 as it stands provides, that the consent of a child under fourteen is no defence in a charge of indecent assault. The effect of the amendment is to change the age of consent from fourteen to sixteen years.

Amendment agreed to.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I now beg leave to move that the following section be added to the bill:

Subsection 2 of section 301 of the said act, as enacted by chapter 43 of the statutes of 1920, is amended by striking out the words "of previous chaste character" in the third line thereof.

This also was passed last year by the House but rejected by the Senate. Section 301 as it stands provides that Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for five years who carnally knows any girl of previous chaste character under the age of sixteen and above the age of fourteen.

The effect of the amendment is to strike out the words "of previous chaste character".

Amendment agreed to.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I now beg to propose that the following section be added to the bill:

Section 412 of the said act is amended by inserting the word "badge" after the word "ticket" in the second line thereof and also after the word "ticket" in the third line thereof.

The amendment is asked for by the Toronto Transportation Commission, and appears to be unobjectionable. Section 412 provides that everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to six months' imprisonment who by means of any false ticket or order, or of any other ticket or order, fraudulently and unlawfully obtains or attempts to obtain passage on any carriage, tramway or railway, or in any steam or other vessel. The effect of the amendment is to extend these provisions to the fraudulent use of a badge as well as a ticket or order.

Amendment agreed to.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I move that the following section be added to the bill:—

Section 1024A of the said act as enacted by chapter 43 of the statutes of 1920, is amended by inserting after the word "conviction" in the fourth line thereof the words "or acquittal".

This is the case my hon. friend for Calgary (Mr. Shaw) had in mind.

Mr. SHAW: No.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Clause 1024A was adpoted in 1920, Chapter 43 of 10-11 George V and reads:

Either the attorney general of the province, or any person convicted of an indictable offence, may appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada from the judgment of any Court of Appeal setting aside or confirming a conviction for an indictable offence if it conflicts with the judgment of any other Court of Appeal in like case.

I have the following memorandum on the subject:

This amendment is asked for by the Attorney General of Alberta, and appears to me to be unobjectionable. As section 1024A stands at present (1920, chap. 43, sec. 16), it does not cover the case of a person acquitted in the court below, and the purpose of the amendment is to make it extend to such a case. It appears that in the case of Rex. v. Stubbs, 24 Ca. Cr. Cas. page 303, the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Alberta decided that a certain kind of automatic gum vending machine, which paid rewards or premiums of varying amounts upon irregularly occurring times, was not a gambling device under section 228 of the code, whereas it has been held unanimously by the Courts of Appeal of both Ontario and Quebec that the machine in question is a gambling device, and this has also been held by the Court of Appeal of Manitoba. In the case of one MacNeil, subsequent to the Stubbs case, the Appellate Court of Alberta unanimously held that notwithstanding the decision of the Appellate Courts of the other provinces above mentioned they were not prepared to overrule their decision in the Stubbs case. The result is that the law of Alberta on this subject is not the same as that of the other provinces, and as the purpose of section 1024A was to provide a means of obtaining uniformity of interpretation of the Criminal Code throughout all the provinces, I think the section should be amended as above so as to cover cases like the Stubbs case.

That is to say, that under a special section of the Criminal Code the Appellate Courts of Ontario, Quebec and Manitoba have decided that a certain machine was a gambling machine. The Appellate Court of Alberta has decided the contrary. To make sure what the real meaning of any clause of our Criminal Code is it was provided in 1920 that in such cases where decisions were contradictory, an appeal should be provided to the Supreme Court, so that the citizens of Canada might be sure as to the meaning of any of the sections of our Criminal Code. As the section was drafted, it only applied to conviction on appeal to set aside a conviction, and did not apply to the case of acquittal, so that in case of acquittal the attorney general or any other interested party had not the right to appeal. By adding the words "or acquittal" the whole case will be covered.

Amendment agreed to.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I think this was the amendment my hon. friend for Calgary West intended to introduce.

Mr. SHAW: The point I had in mind was in connection with some legislation passed last year. My recollection is that it was an amendment to section 235 or 236 of the code. The legislation introduced dealt with what were commonly known as guessing contests, conducted by newspapers, and based upon the results of football and baseball games and sports of that character. Apparently in most of the western cities, at least, means have been found to get around the provisions of the statutes, and I was simply inquiring from the Minister of Justice as to whether he proposed to amend that section since the act was passed last year.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Does the last part of subsection (f) not cover the case?

(f) Any information intended to assist or intended for use in connection with bookmaking, pool selling, betting upon any track, game, sport or race.

Mr. SHAW: I am afraid that would not cover the case. The minister is probably familiar with the legislation. It apparently originated in the Senate last year. It is a guessing contest depending upon the result of football or baseball games, the newspaper charging a small amount for each guess, and then paying a very large amount, usually dependent upon the number of subscribers, to those who guess most nearly the results of these events. I have not had time to consider this amendment, but I think it only deals with information supplied for a particular purpose and does not deal with the actual contest.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The actual contest is the game. The amendment applies to all games, except horse-races.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It seems to me there should be a protest against this class of legislation. I for one do not want to do anything that will encourage betting or gambling.

But I cannot see why certain exceptions should be made and others should be penalized for carrying on what is precisely the same kind of thing. There are certain men who bet on a horse race on the tracks, and apparently that is perfectly legal. Other men who seem to want to exercise the same right, whether it is good, bad or indifferent, and to do some betting, are immediately performing an illegal act. This thing was brought to my attention last year in connection with some of these papers that were carrying on guessing contests of this character. I am free to admit that personally I do not like this kind of thing; but these people who are doing this kind of thing are perfectly justified in protesting that if it is right for one group in the community to be allowed the privilege of betting, it is right for other groups in the community to be allowed the same privilege, and there ought not to be discriminatory legislation of this kind.

Section agreed to.

Bill, as amended, reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT AMENDMENT

Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 43, to amend the Canada Temperance Act.

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): May I be permitted to ask the Minister of Justice if he will consent to allow this bill to stand over to another date? Certain of the British Columbia members on this side of the House, who intend to take part in the discussion and who are opposed to the passage of this bill, are unable to be present to-night. I believe also the minister is going to move an amendment. That amendment I saw this afternoon; but I think these other hon. gentlemen have not seen it. Under the circumstances and as this is rather an important matter, I would ask the minister if he would be good enough to allow the bill to stand until some time next week when the hon. gentlemen to whom I have referred will be able to be present.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: We might have the second reading now, take the bill into Committee of the Whole and then report progress. Will Monday suit the hon. member?

Mr. McQUARRIE: Tuesday. It is understood, of course, that the whole matter will be open when the bill comes into committee.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Certainly.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I would ask to be allowed to propose an amendment which can remain before the committee for their consideration. I beg to move:

That paragraph (c) of subsection 2 of section 163 be struck out and the following two paragraphs be added as paragraphs, (c) and (d) respectively:

(c) The importation of intoxicating liquor into a province by any person duly licensed by the government of Canada to carry on the business or trade of a distiller where the intoxicating liquor so imported is imported solely for the purpose of being used for blending with or flavouring the products of the business or trade of a distiller carried on by him in the province and while kept by him in the province is kept in a place or warehouse which conforms in all respects to the requirements of the law governing such places or warehouses and is used solely for blending with or flavouring the products of his said business or trade as a distiller; or

(d) The importation of intoxicating liquor into a province by a person engaged in and carrying on the business of exporting intoxicating liquor from that province, where the intoxicating liquor so imported is imported solely for the purpose of his export business and while kept by him in the province, is kept in a liquor warehouse which conforms in all respects to the requirements of the law governing such warehouses, and when sold or disposed of by him is actually exported from that province:

Provided, however, that the exceptions contained in paragraphs (c) and (d) of this subsection, or either of them, shall not be applicable to any province in which this section is declared to be in force, unless in the order of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council mentioned in subsection five of this section or in any subsequent order in council it is specially requested that the said paragraphs, or either of them, be declared in force.

Progress reported.

RADIOTELEGRAPH ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend The Radiotelegraph Act, chapter forty-three of the statutes of 1913, by providing that the Governor in Council may authorize the payment of a portion of the license fees collected in respect of certain prescribed licenses, to a provincial government, private company, or other prescribed party, and notwithstanding anything to the contrary in any act, to any department or employee thereof, for services given in connection with the operation of broadcasting stations and for services performed for the minister in connection with the licensing and inspection of stations.

Motion agreed to and House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Section 10 of the present act gives to the Governor in Council the right to prescribe the tariff of fees to be paid for licenses and for examination for certificates of proficiency held and issued under the provisions of the act. This amendment relates to radiotelephone broadcasting stations. During the past two years considerable progress has been made in the development of radiotelegraphy, and whereas last year there were issued about ten thousand licenses for receiving stations it is estimated that during the present year the number will be increased to about fifty thousand. These receiving stations are served by broadcasting stations that are rather expensive to maintain. Last year there were forty broadcasting stations but only twenty-five have renewed their licenses for this year. The cost of a broadcasting station varies from $7,000 to $20,000 and the maintenance cost from $2,000 to $5,000 or $6,000 a year. At present these broadcasting stations are operated either by the vendors of apparatus or by newspapers and big departmental stores for advertising purposes, and also by a provincial government and private companies. In Ottawa there is a broadcasting station operated by Mr. Booth. As I say, the upkeep is rather expensive and this bill proposes to meet the case of Manitoba, among others. In that province there were two broadcasting stations in Winnipeg operated by the Winnipeg Free Press and the Winnipeg Tribune, both of which have closed down. The Manitoba government however now operates a telephone line in the province and it is quite prepared to establish and maintain a first class broadcasting station; but the authorities want to have some remuneration. It is therefore deemed advisable that part of the license fee should be given to these broadcasting stations which serve the public. After all, they are affording enjoyment to thousands of listeners and it is only fair that they should receive some remuneration for their services. It is also provided that part of the license fee should be given for the services rendered the minister in connection with the licensing and inspection of stations. It is the intention to have the Manitoba government, or any other corporation with which the department may enter into an arrangement for the purpose, issue licenses on behalf of the department, for which they will be paid part of the license fee as remuneration for their services in collecting the fees for this government. The same thing applies to inspection; if they provide inspectors they will be paid part of the license fee for the purpose. I believe this is the best arrangement that could be made, and it is to that end that the bill is proposed.

9 p.m.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose we shall have an opportunity of discussing the matter in detail when the bill is brought down?

Mr. LAPOINTE: As my hon. friend desires; but really there is not much either in the resolution or in the bill.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It would be of interest to the House to know who are operating broadcasting stations at present. The minister might also tell us what proportion of the fee he proposes to give to the stations. Is the act going to define that?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, that will be for the Governor in Council.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The proportion of each fee will be as the minister recommends to council?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It will be fixed by regulation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will that regulation apply to the general principle in regard to the fees or will the regulation vary according to the users?

Mr. LAPOINTE: As regards the last question, there is no change from the present act. The act provides that the Governor in Council shall prescribe the tariff to be paid for the license, and the only change is to make a part of that fee payable to the broadcasting stations for the services they render. Now, as regards the question of my hon. friend as to the broadcasting stations now in operation; there are none in the Maritime provinces. The stations in the other provinces are situate in the following places:

Province of Quebec—
Canadian Wireless & Electric Co., Quebec.
La Cie de L'Evenement, Quebec.
The Northern Electric Company, Montreal.
University of Montreal, Montreal.
Marconi Wireless Telegraph Co. of Canada, Montreal.
La Presse Publishing Company, Montreal.
Province of Ontario—
J. R. Booth, Ottawa.
Star Publishing & Printing Co., Toronto.
Simon, Agnew & Company, Toronto.
T. Eaton Co., Ltd., Toronto.
Canadian Independent Telephone Co., Toronto.
The Evening Telegram, Toronto.
Wentworth Radio Supply Co., Hamilton.
London Free Press Printing Co., Ltd., London.
The Radio Shop, London.
The Abitibi Power & Paper Co., Iroquois Falls.
Province of Manitoba—
Manitoba Telephone System, Winnipeg.
Province of Saskatchewan—
Leader Publishing Company, Ltd., Regina.
Province of Alberta—
W. W. Grant Radio Ltd., Calgary.
The Calgary Herald, Calgary.
The Albertan Publishing Co., Calgary.
The Edmonton Journal Ltd., Edmonton.

The Radio Supply Co., Ltd., Edmonton.
P. W. Shackleton, Olds.
Province of British Columbia—
Western Canada Radio Supply Co. Ltd., Victoria.

Sis HENRY DRAYTON: I think my hon. friend is wrong when he says there is no change from the present act. It is true that under order in council the amount of the fee is fixed, but that must be a flat level; no differentiation can be made. In the present case a portion of the fee is to be paid to the broadcasting station. What I want to know is whether that amount will be at the minister's discretion or whether there is to be a regular rule regarding the matter?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There will be a regular rule. I am of opinion myself that the same proportion of the fee should go for the same services rendered anywhere in Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the minister think that he should help reduce the cost of advertisers by refunds of this kind? I notice from the list he has read that a great many of the people operating these stations are using them really only to advertise their business. Does he propose to help them to carry the cost of that advertising?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am sure their intention is to advertise their business. Still, they are giving concerts, lectures and so on, and thus contributing to the enjoyment of the receivers. There may be something in my hon. friend's suggestion, but my present impression is that it would be hard to differentiate.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Take the case of broadcasting, which is entirely for the purpose of selling radio instruments and parts. Does the minister intend, in effect, to help to carry the cost of selling this equipment by contributing a part of the license fee?

Mr. LAPOINTE: These matters will all have to be considered; all we ask is the power of regulation. There may be a difference between a purely philanthropic company organized only for the purpose of giving enjoyment to the thousands of listeners, and a company which broadcasts chiefly for its own benefit.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Complaints come from the receivers with regard to the tremendous misuse of broadcasting, resulting in conflict of currents, and the like. Has the minister considered that question at all?

Mr. LAPOINTE. Yes. The reason for the collection of the fee is to pay for the services of inspectors to prevent that very thing.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What are the regulations in that respect? I have not noticed anything in the statute that would cover it. How does the minister now police broadcasting?

Mr. LAPOINTE: We have inspectors all over Canada, seven on the permanent staff and twenty-eight on part time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What are the regulations which govern broadcasting?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have not the regulations here; if my hon. friend desires to have them I can furnish them. I do not see, however, that it is necessary to have them for the purposes of this legislation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the general interest is considered, it is that of the receivers rather than that of the transmitters. I have no personal knowledge of the matter, but I am told that the receiver does not interfere with the currents, so that the receiver is not to blame for all these difficulties. It is the sender, the broadcaster who is responsible for that. Am I not right?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The trouble my hon. friend refers to arises in connection with the operations of transmitting stations of which there are 1,900 throughout Canada. It is the duty of the inspectors, among other things, to see that these stations do not get off what they call the wave-length and thus interfere with broadcasting. The transmitting stations are different from the broadcasting stations.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But there is conflict even on the part of the main broadcasting station themselves. Upon whom are the fees placed, upon the broadcaster and the transmitter, or upon those who listen?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The fee payable by the receivers is only one dollar per year. The broadcasting stations have to pay $50 per year. In Great Britain the license fee for the receiving stations is $2.50; and they are proceeding on the same basis as that on which we want to proceed. Of that fee of $2.50, one-half goes to the department and one-half to the broadcasting company. This system has been in operation only since December last. There are over 100,000 licenses for receiving stations in England.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I hope the result will not be the multiplication of broadcasting, because the chief trouble to-day is that there is so much conflict in the waves. Is the service self-supporting?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not yet.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the country is not making anything out of it, why should any of the fee be given away?

Mr. LAPOINTE: For the reason that I have stated. For instance, in Manitoba there will not be any broadcasting if we do not adopt this system. It does not pay the broadcasting stations to operate as under present conditions; the two stations in Manitoba have in fact, ceased operation. The Manitoba government is quite ready to give the service, but I think it is only reasonable that they should receive some compensation, and I do not see any better way of doing it than by giving part of the license fee to the provincial government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When the bill comes down I hope my hon. friend will be in a position to tell us how much of the fee has been asked for by the Manitoba authorities, how much revenue he is now getting from his licenses, and what is the cost of the service to the country, with the resulting deficit.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend will have all these details when the estimates of the department come up. They really have nothing to do with this proposed legislation—unless my hon. friend wants to prevent my going on with the bill.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, no. But this information can appropriately be given in connection with the bill.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Lapointe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 144, to amend The Radiotelegraph Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

COPYRIGHT ACT, 1921, AMENDMENT

House again in committee on Bill No. 24, to amend the Copyright Act, 1921, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 5—Commencement of act:

The CHAIRMAN: Section 5 was to stand the last time this bill was under consideration. Shall the section carry?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have not copies of the bill. While we are waiting for the bill I might say that I have received a telegram—I think many telegrams have been received—to this effect:

Sincerely hope you will resist indignantly—

That is something my friend will agree I never do.

—the attempt to reinstate legalized piracy in copyright law.

I think perhaps we ought to get some explanation from the minister as to this question of reinstating legalized piracy in the copyright law.

Mr. ROBB: What interpretation does my hon. friend put upon that telegram?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The interpretation I put upon it is that the minister's bill is going to steal somebody's writing from him. It would appear that the sender of the telegram looks upon the minister as a burglar, not for his own benefit but for somebody else's.

Mr. ROBB: Is this from the printers or authors?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think it is from an author. It may be from a printer, but I think it is from an author.

Mr. MANION: I had a gentleman call upon me a short time ago who claimed that under this act Canadian song writers, for example, would be deprived of any remuneration for their songs used on discs for phonographs, for instance. I do not know whether that is the case or not, but that was the statement made to me, and I should like to inquire what the minister thinks about it.

Mr. ROBB: It is exactly the opposite. It is to protect the song writers that we are putting through this legislation.

Mr. MANION: Is there another bill on copyright going through the House?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I also have received a copy of the telegram that has been referred to, and I happen to know the gentleman whose signature is appended. The minister asked if it was from a printer. The gentleman in question is an author of some standing, a writer of articles, books, and so forth. I was going to make the same inquiry as my hon. friend for West York as to what legalized piracy was going to be perpetrated under this act.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—licenses, importations:

The CHAIRMAN: This section was allowed to stand with the consent of the committee.

Mr. ROBB: The bill as originally presented met with the entire approval of the authors but met with very much opposition from the printers and publishers. The committee will remember that when this bill was before the House a few days ago, the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), presented considerable opposition to this section that is now under consideration. I have had a conference with my hon. friend and have submitted to him an amendment which we hope will meet with the approval of both the authors and the printers and publishers, but I am bound to confess that to-night I am somewhat confused to find that my hon. friends opposite, who I thought were opposed to our bill as originally presented, now seem to indicate that they might be opposed to the amendment I had in mind to present to satisfy those whom my hon. friend for South Wellington represents. I am bound to say on behalf of the government that if the committee is willing, the government would be quite prepared to allow the bill to go through as originally presented, but my hon. friend for South Wellington presented an argument the other evening which almost convinced me that there were others who had some rights, and I was hoping that the amendment would satisfy all interested.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I must say that I have been taking no stand at all on the bill or the proposed amendment. I was simply asking for information, and I have not been given any information yet as to what the minister thinks of this telegram or as to what is going to be done. Perhaps it would be fair to ask the minister just what is being done by this bill. What rights are being created on the one hand, and what rights are being taken away on the other, either from the publishers or authors?

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps my hon. friend for South Wellington would present his argument again to the House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would think the government would have some idea of what they were about. I would think that the minister ought to be able to tell the House what he thinks should be done. He tells us that there was an argument made against the bill the other day by the hon. member for South Wellington, but it does seem to me that the responsible minister in charge of a highly important bill like this should tell the House just exactly whose rights the bill will interfere with on the one hand, and what rights it will create on the other, and generally what the effect of the legislation is.

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps my hon. friend was not in the House when the bill was presented a few days ago. Had he been here then he would have known that not only the hon. member for South Wellington but the chief whip of the Opposition, the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys) presented considerable opposition to this particular clause. My hon. friend will remember that the government of which he was a member put through a Copyright Act in 1921, which was assented to on the 4th of June, 1921, but after having passed both Houses of Parliament the government for reasons which I am not called upon to explain never proclaimed the act although they were in power all the balance of that year. It was contended that the act passed in 1921 failed to comply with the requirements of the Berne convention, and that consequently Canadian authors were deprived of privileges which they might otherwise enjoy. This amendment now presented to the House is to make the bill of 1921 acceptable to the authorities of the Berne convention and to allow Canada to become a member of that convention.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Has the minister been able to find any correspondence with the Berne convention to show that the convention itself objects to those particular clauses of the act of 1921? I might say that I made the statement when the bill was before the House on a former occasion that information had come to me that the only objection that had been made by the Berne convention was an article which appeared in a newspaper published in Switzerland which is supposed to be the official or unofficial organ of the Copyright convention. I stated that my opinion was that the article had been written by a civil servant in Ottawa, and that that was the only objection which the Swiss authorities had so far taken. Since that time the gentleman whom I have named, the member of the Civil Service, has done me the honour of calling upon me and explaining that the article in question which appeared in the newspaper in Switzerland was not actually written by him. He says he supplied the material and the records to the newspaper, but did not actually write the article. I think in justice to this gentleman named I should make that statement to the committee. While I am on my feet permit to say this: I was satisfied when the bill was up before, and I am just as firmly satisfied now that apart from the minister himself there is not a man in the committee at this present moment who understands this legislation

Mr. ROBB: You might include me.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And the minister himself admits that I may include him. I have tried to get to the bottom of this matter; I have spent a lot of time on it and I confess I do not fully understand it now. My suggestion to the minister, when the bill was last up, was that he appoint a small committee, as was done in 1921, before whom the authors, publishers and printers can appear and state their claims. The committee will have to go to the bottom of the matter and report on this bill. I understood that my suggestion on that occasion agreed with the view of the minister. The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) backed up the proposal very emphatically. He said that he did not understand it, that the committee did not either, and he refused to commit himself to legislation which he did not understand. I do not know anything quite as complicated or quite as involved as the coypright question. I do know this, however: In 1921 a special committee was appointed, the various interested parties were heard, and they agreed on the legislation then passed. The bill was passed but it was not proclaimed because under the peculiar situation which exists, as between Dominion laws and Imperial laws, it was necessary, or at all events it was deemed proper, to submit the legislation before proclamation to the Imperial authorities, because they reserved the right to proclaim our act in the London Gazette which is the official communication between Great Britain and the Berne convention. The bill was not proclaimed.

The minister says that intimation has come from the authorities of the British government that the particular provisions mentioned in section 3 are objectionable, that they are not in conformity with either the letter or the spirit of the Imperial act. Well, that is rather an old complaint in regard to copyright by the Imperial government. In 1910 when the late Sydney Fisher was minister he attended an Imperial conference upon this very question. An agreement was then reached between the Imperial authorities and the authorities of the various dominions represented at that conference, and the Imperial act of 1911 was passed which practically recognized the agreement that was then come to. So far as I can understand the Imperial legislation of 1911 and the act passed by this parliament in 1921, I do not see that we have come in conflict in any way with the Imperial act, nor do I believe that we have in any way come in conflict with the Berne convention. The authors and writers in Canada say we have. I do not see in what respect we have come in contact. The publishers and printers in Canada say we have not. They desire to have the act passed in 1921 put in force. The minister intimated when this bill was last discussed that he would produce a communication the department had received from the British government. I have not had the opportunity of seeing that communication, nor do I know just what the objection of the Imperial government is. It was stated that the copyright convention had made objection. My information is that it has not done so; but objection had been taken at the instance of a certain civil servant who had sent forward the article referred to for publication in Switzerland.

I am now going to renew my request to the minister that he appoint a special committee to consider this bill. I have said all that I can say on that subject. I know there is a great deal more to be learned on the subject than I know; there is a great deal more to be said than I have said. If the government take the responsibility of passing this bill—they have a majority and can do so—they will only do it over my protest. Again I ask that the minister, who admits he does not know the substance of the Copyright Act or what the effect of the amendment will be, let this bill go to a special committee. He has handed me the draft of an amendment which has been prepared since the matter was last before the House. I think it is a decided improvement on the bill which he introduced. I am neither going to consent to it—I have no power to do so—nor am I going to oppose it. But if this bill goes through in the form in which it has been introduced, or in the shape in which the minister wants it, he must take the responsibility. I know the publishers all object to it, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association object to it, and the printing trades throughout Canada object to it. Those in favour of the bill are apparently the authors or writers of the country. Their reason for supporting this legislation is this: If this bill, or if the amendment to the act of 1921 passes, it will not be necessary for writers to have their books published in Canada; they can publish them in the United States and avoid publication in this country. Under the law passed in 1921 where an author publishes his work in the United States provision was made for publication in Canada on payment to the author of the exact royalty or fee which he received from the American publisher. If the author would not agree to that then the publisher had the right to go to the Secretary of State, I think it was, or to the commissioner and get a license for the publication of that work in Canada on payment to the author of the exact amount which he received for his work in the United States. That arrangement seemed to me to be pretty fair. That is the arrangement, I am informed, which was agreed to in 1921 before the bill was passed.

The United States does not belong to the copyright convention. The United States insists that anybody who gets copyright in that country shall publish there, otherwise you will get no copyright. A Canadian author is therefore in this position: There is a market for his literary work in the shape of 120,000,000 of English speaking people, it is the greatest book-buying population in the world. Naturally the Canadian writer wishes to sell his work and to get copyright in that market. He is bound to have publication there and when he sells the American rights he sells the Canadian rights as well. The American publisher then says "I am not going to publish in Canada, I will publish in the United States," and it has been objected that very often there is no publication in this country. Sometimes it is said that there has not been a supply even of the works of the author in this country. Now, the publishers of Canada ask merely the right to republish in this country on payment to the author of the same amount that he receives from the American publisher. It looks fair to me but the authors do not agree to it. They ask that the bill passed in 1921 be amended in that respect by striking out the four clauses in question. On the other hand the publishers and the printers desire the act passed in 1921 to remain as it is, in order that the book publication and printing be done in this country and, they say, without any loss whatever to the author. That is the case as I understand it.

There is this other point: My view is that we should stick to our act passed in 1921. If the Imperial government has objection to make to that act let us know upon what the objection is based, let us understand what the objection is. I am satisfied that we should allow the act of 1921 to stand or to be proclaimed in the form in which it was then enacted. If objection is taken by the Imperial authorities we will know of it at once. The Prime Minister, I believe, is going to the Imperial conference in October next. He would be in a position then to discuss this matter with the Imperial authorities and see what the foundation of this objection is. The Prime Minister himself happens to be one of the authors of this country, and would be a person specially informed and specially qualified to discuss the question with the Imperial authorities.

My suggestion to the minister—and it is only a suggestion—is that he drop his present bill and allow the act passed in 1921, after all parties had agreed to it, to be proclaimed. If the Imperial government objects, and says there is some way we have contravened their jurisdiction, that is a matter for further discussion between the authorities of the Imperial government and the Dominion government. I do not think there is any conflict over the jurisdiction of the Imperial government, or in regard to the rules and regulations of the Berne convention. I think the act passed in 1921 is strictly within our rights. I may be wrong in that, as I do not profess to be any kind of an expert in regard to copyright questions or copyright laws, but I would advise the minister to take one of two courses: either let the bill go to a special committee, and let that committee study the question, or withdraw the bill and let the act of 1921 be proclaimed. It will not take long to have the question settled, because the conference is meeting in October next, and it will probably deal with the matter and settle it. I think it is hopeless to ask the committee of the whole House to consider so intricate and involved a question as this, when I think, on the confession of everybody, including myself, we do not know the real principles at stake. We do not really understand the rules and regulations of the Berne convention or the attitude of the Imperial government, and I think it would be well to have this matter cleared up before the House attempts any further legislation.

Mr. ROBB: In so far as the difference of opinion between the printers, publishers and manufacturers and the authors is concerned, my hon. friend has presented the case fairly. I imagine however that he may not have been in the House that day, or he may have forgotten the arguments when the bill was presented to parliament in 1921. I think I can satisfy him that at that time parliament was not unanimous, and I remember distinctly that the present Prime Minister objected to these particular clauses, along with a number of other members of the committee. If my hon. friend will refer to Hansard of the 25th May, 1921, at page 3846 he will find this reference to the Copyright Act:

> Mr. Rinfret: If sections 13, 14 and 15 do not conform to the Berne convention, I should like the minister to state that the government will rather abandon those sections than fail to adhere to the convention.

Mr. Doherty, who was a colleague of my hon. friend and Minister of Justice, and had charge of the bill in the House, then stated:

If those sections are at variance with the convention, we shall have to come back to the House, because the law of this country would put the government in a position where it could not consistently adhere to the convention, and we should have to decide the question then.

That was the opinion of Mr. Doherty. My hon. friend wanted to know what evidence we have that the bill as passed was not satisfactory to the Berne convention and to the British authorities. We have here the official organ of the Berne convention, Le Droit d'Auteur, to which my hon. friend referred, and the statement of Mr. De Montigny that only an authorized editor is permitted to put articles in that paper. He points out very distinctly that our Canadian act did not conform to the requirements of the Berne convention and his objections are exactly along the line of the communication we have here from Downing Street, signed on behalf of the department over there by Winston Churchill, and I wish to draw the attention of my hon. friend, who was then a member of the government, to the fact, that this was received in Ottawa on the 27th October, 1921. It is pointed out that:

2. The only sections of the new act which appear likely to give rise to any serious difficulties are sections 4, 13, 14, 15 and 27.

3. Section 4 deals with the application of the act to foreign authors and works. It is presumed that the Canadian government are satisfied that they have ample powers under this section to meet any cases which may arise. It must also not be forgotten that any restrictions which may be imposed upon the published works of non-Unionist authors have to be notified to Berne under the additional protocol of 1914.

4. Sections 13, 14 and 15, relate to licenses, and section 27 to the importation of books. In considering these provisions, it will be convenient to discuss their effect upon (a) British authors, (b) Unionist authors, and (c) United States authors.

(a) British Authors. Objections have been raised to the requirements of section 13 as to printing a book in Canada, and to the provisions of section 14 relating to serial rights in a book The British author who does not print in Canada, will, if a license is granted, receive compensation, and whether a license is granted or not, he can still import into Canada. The expenditure incurred in printing an edition of 1,000 copies in Canada will not be lightly undertaken in these circumstances, particularly as the imported copies can probably be sold at a lower price than the copies printed in Canada.

Then it continues:

There remains the question as to what protection is to be given to Canadian authors in this country. As at present advised the board consider that an order in council might properly be issued under section 26 (3) of the Imperial act extending the protection of the act to works, other than books, first published in Canada. So far as books are concerned, the Imperial act does not permit of imposing conditions similar to those to be imposed by the Canadian act upon British works, and unless the whole act is applied unconditionally all that can be done is to leave Canadian books as at present to obtain protection here by first or simultaneous publication in this country under sections 1 and 35 (3) of the act. This is a very mild condition as publication here does not necessitate printing in this country.

Then he goes on and refers to the Unionist authors and concludes:

In the event of Canada not adhering to the revised convention it may possibly be contended that sections 13 and 14 of the act contravene the original Berne convention to which Canada is at the present time a party.

Coming back to the argument of my hon. friend, I am sure no person desires to do injury to the Canadian publishers or Canadian bookbinders or printers, and everybody wants to do, in so far as we are concerned, justice to the Canadian authors. I take it that they will each be put in a much better position if we adopt the amendment I suggested a few moments ago. The government proposes to present that amendment. I am told frankly to-day by the representatives of the manufacturers' association, who called upon me, that this matter has been hung up since June, 1921, and we cannot afford to delay any longer. We propose to present this amendment, and if adopted by the House the measure will go to the Senate, and I have intimated to the conflicting parties that if they wish to have a committee the Senate has very much more time than we have in this House, and they could thresh it out over there. Therefore I beg leave to move:

That clause 2 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

2. Sections thirteen, fourteen, firteen and twenty-seven of The Copyright Act, 1921, shall not apply to any work the author of which is a British subject, other than a Canadian citizen, or the subject or citizen of a country which has adhered to the convention and the additional protocol thereto set out in the second schedule to the said act.

The result of this will be that Canada will be in a position to come in under the Berne convention. Our friends in the Mother Country cannot object to that, and printers and publishers in Canada will have the same reasonable protection as regards the United States that they have been clamouring for until such time as the United States qualify to become members of the Berne convention.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The position of the minister reminds me of the position that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) found himself in last year. Of course, there is a little difference. The Minister of Agriculture—and I think, perhaps, this was the first time any responsible minister in this House ever did such a thing—introduced and carried through a bill which he characterized as a "rotten" bill. It was awful, as the minister said; nevertheless he put it through. I do not, however, think any other 10 p.m. responsible minister in a responsible parliament ever before admitted that he did not know anything about a bill, admitted the statement made on the floor of this House by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), who has had to leave, that the minister himself, who was supposed to know something about the bill, knew nothing about it and yet asked this House, that is supposed to act intelligently, to have some knowledge of the subject, more than that, to be able to get a definite statement from the minister as to the effect of his legislation, to put this legislation through. I canot think my hon. friend is serious in his proposition.

Mr. ROBB: I have told my hon. friend what the effect is.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: All the minister has done in connection with it is to produce a letter that is merely a comment from the British authorities. The minister distinctly told the committee ten minutes or a quarter of an hour ago that he himself did not understand this bill. The hon. member for South Wellington said that he was sure that no one in this House including himself understood it, and if there is now in the House any hon. gentleman who understands this bill, I should like him to stand up and say so. Then the minister himself says that he can be included in that description. Is it not a farce to ask the committee to pass the bill under those circumstances. The responsibility is on the government. There is nothing more that we can say or do.

Amendment agreed to on division.

Bill, as amended, reported.

Mr. ROBB moved that the amendment be concurred in.

LIVE STOCK ACTS AMENDMENT

The House again in committee on Bill No. 10, to amend and consolidate the acts respecting live stock, Mr. Marcil in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil): Mr. Tolmie has moved the insertion of a new section 18A as follows:

18A. Notwithstanding the provisions in this act or any other act or law pertaining to or relating to live stock or in connection with live stock yards, it is hereby enacted that in every case where in the opinion of a veterinary inspector duly appointed in accordance with the provisions of the Animals' Contagious Diseases Act, a contagious disease or contagious diseases of animals exist, or are suspected to exist, the Animal Contagious Diseases Act and amendments thereto and the provisions therein shall prevail as against this act or all or any other act or acts relating to or pertaining to live stock or live stock yards as defined herein.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Since yesterday I have looked into this amendment. I have discussed it with the hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) and I am prepared to recommend that this proposed provision be tried out, at least for a year.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It has been drawn to my attention by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) that there are one or two omissions in subsection 2 of clause 4. I move that the word "chartered" be inserted before the word "bank" in the third line, and that the words "shall be deposited in an account" be changed to read, "shall be deposited in a shippers' trust account."

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I should like the permission of the committee to revert to section 13 of the reprinted bill. That is the section providing a penalty for violation of the act, and it was the subject of some reference the other day by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr Gould). In order to meet his views, in some measure, at least, I would move that the word "four" in line three be changed to "five," so that the penalty will be $500 instead of $400.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to, bill as amended reported, read the third time and passed.

TRADE MARK AND DESIGN ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 21, to amend the Trade Mark and Design Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Marcil in the chair.

On section 1—Act amended so that Part II, Industrial Designs, will apply to designs of non-residents, etc.:

Mr. ROBB: The present act allows only residents of Canada to register industrial designs and trade marks. There is no good reason why that distinction should exist. Indeed that was recognized by the previous government and a bill was first brought in in 1920 to remove this distinction. For some reason or other that bill was dropped, but in 1921 another bill was brought in for the same purpose. From the record it appears that in connection with both the bill of 1920 and the bill of 1921 the Canadian manufacturers were consulted and approved of the proposed changes, but in 1921 when the bill was up for its second reading two sections of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association expressed some doubt to the government as to the regulations, and the bill was withdrawn. We are bringing in this bill at this time to make some corrections, believing that it is in the general interests of Canada. It is really along very similar lines to the Copyright Act which we were dealing with to-night, and the Patent Act which we passed a few days ago. If we are going to keep goods out of Canada the right method of doing it is through the custom house, and we now propose to remove the restrictions that exist in the Trade Mark and Design Act and bring that act into line with the Copyright Act and the Patent Act, so that generally all these goods will come under the Berne convention. The advantages of working under that convention are that Canadians taking out patents in other countries will be protected in those countries. It is also of some material advantage, I submit, to the people of our own country that we should not restrict the registry of trade marks and designs to our own people here. It is an advantage to them to be able to register their trade marks and designs abroad. Let me give my hon. friends an illustration of how it might be of material advantage to Canada. Suppose that a co-operative association dealing in butter establishes as their design a clover leaf or maple leaf. Now unless we so amend our legislation as to enable a Canadian to register that trade mark in other countries, after his business has been built up some person might appropriate that design, as happened recently down in Brazil where a very valuable trade mark on fish was appropriated. Those generally are the reasons for presenting these slight amendments to the bill.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose that the American act is free of these words?

Mr. ROBB: Canadians can now register in the United States.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This does not affect our business in the United States at all?

Mr. ROBB: No. It will affect it in Russia, China, and a number of the South American republics.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was interested in what my hon. friend said. When we were discussing the Patent Act he said that we had an arrangement whereby we kept goods out by the Patent Act while the Americans did it through their high tariff, and he said the same thing in connection with the Copyright Act. I would ask the minister now that these barriers are being taken down, whether he does not think that the customs should be rearranged.

Mr. ROBB: I will go into that with my hon. friend later.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But we are considering the bill now. The book of annual statistics for the United States shows for the last accounting year a per capita purchasing ratio or figure of $131.66 for Canada and $24 for the United States. Apparently the high tariff in the United States is much more effective than the Canadian low tariff plus these patent and copyrights acts to which my hon. friend has referred. Does he think that abnormality should be removed?

Mr. ROBB: That is another question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We are considering now one of the safeguards and I do not know why we should not have a little frankness on the question. Why not? It is desirable, is it not, that we should know exactly what we are doing and I am giving the minister the latest figures and asking him for his view? Surely the point I am urging has something to do with this question.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will observe there is a reciprocal advantage in removing this because of the benefit that our trade marks and designs will enjoy in some other country.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Apparently the minister does not want to discuss the business of his own department.

Mr. ROBB: Not at this late hour.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I can well understand that desire.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Conditions of registration:

Mr. ROBB: This amendment is necessary under the terms of the International convention and to make this legislation conform to the Patent Act in that regard.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Filing of application already filed in another country.

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. ROBB: Copies of this bill when printed and of the Patent Act were sent over to the British authorities. We have not advanced the bill further because some days ago we received a cable from them requesting that certain slight amendments be made so that the bill might very properly conform to the regulations. To meet the British government's requirements I propose to move the following.

That clause 3 of bill No. 21 be amended by adding an "s" to the word "section" in the first line and substituting for the word "is the word "are" in said line and by adding to said clause the following:

50. Any trade mark the proprietor of which is an association the existence of which is not contrary to the law of the country to which such association belongs, even if such association does not possess an industrial or commercial establishment may be registered under this act upon compliance with the requirements thereof and on such particular conditions as may be established by regulations to be made by the minister with the approval of the Governor in Council.

The object is to put co-operative associations on the same basis as incorporated companies or individuals.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Clause 3 as drafted, it seems to me, simply provides for a retroactive right to the extent of four months. Is that right?

The CHAIRMAN: That is what it says.

Mr. ROBB: After filing here at home the applicant would have four months to register in other countries.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The foreigner after registering in his own market has four months in which to make registration in Canada, and when he registers here his registration is retroactive to the same extent?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why is the four months fixed? Is this in conformity with the Berne convention?

Mr. ROBB: The commissioner tells me that this is part of the regulations of the convention.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the Berne convention?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported read the third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

On the motion of Mr. Graham for the adjournment of the House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What will be the business for Monday?

Mr. GRAHAM: We will begin with the French treaty, followed by the Immigration Act, and other resolutions and bills, if reached, that may be on the order paper.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is not going to be any Supply on Monday?

Mr. GRAHAM: No Supply.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My reason for asking that question is that there had been a discussion on the subject between the Minister of Finance and myself.

Mr. GRAHAM: If it is considered wise to have Supply we will notify my hon. friend. At the present I do not think we will reach it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The Minister of Finance told me he would be here. There was a matter I was going to bring up in Supply last Monday, but the minister was not here then and I would not go on with it. He said however, he would be here next Monday. I think, perhaps, we might have a little discussion about it in the interim.

Mr. GRAHAM: We will discuss the matter and let my hon. friend know in the event of our deciding to take up Supply.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

Monday, April 30, 1923.

The House met at three o'clock.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING

On motion of Mr. Gauvreau, the second report of the Joint Committee on Printing was adopted.

MOOSE JAW BY-ELECTION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): I should like to point out to the government that it will be three weeks to-morrow since the by-election in Moose Jaw was held. I made inquiries of the Chief Electoral Officer to-day, and no notification has come to him of what happened at that by-election. In the case of the North Essex by-election the member was in his seat within two weeks of his election. I wonder if the government can give us any information as to why this delay has taken place. The House is now in session but Moose Jaw is not represented, and it seems an injustice to that constituency that the member should be kept so long from his seat.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I agree with my hon. friend that there does seem to be an injustice in the delay, but the government has no information as to the cause of it. I imagine that the returning officer has had some difficulty in getting full returns from the outlying parts and has been a little late in sending in his return. I have no doubt that my hon. friend's question will come to his attention and probably hasten the return.

CABINET APPOINTMENTS

MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS—ACTING MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I might mention, in anticipation of a question by my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) and in confirmation of a report which is in the morning paper, that Hon. Mr. Graham has been appointed Minister of Railways and Canals, and Hon. Mr. Macdonald Acting Minister of National Defence.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I just want to call the government's attention to the fact that Supply is not called to-day. Doubtless the government will be wanting to go into Supply on Thursdays and Fridays, and I desire to point out that the usual practice is that Supply should be called on Mondays and Tuesdays so that members having different matters which they have a right to bring to the attention of the House shall have an opportunity of doing so upon those days. Of course, if Supply is not called they cannot do so. I spoke about this matter in the House on Friday night and I just wish to call the government's attention to it now. I do not suppose that this course is intended to be adopted as a practice.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): I understood that the hon. gentleman and the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) had come to an understanding that Supply was not to be moved to-day, and we desire to confirm that arrangement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, no, it was to the contrary. The position was this: I was intending to bring to the attention of the House the disallowance of certain statutes of the province of Nova Scotia and to discuss a constitutional question of prime importance. The Minister of Justice could not be here last Monday, nor last Tuesday. Therefore I did not take advantage of the motion, I was expecting to go on to-day. As the matter now stands, if Supply is called to-morrow I shall be perfectly satisfied.

Mr. FIELDING: On reading the Hansard containing the proceedings of last Friday night I saw that there was some reference to the business to be taken up to-day and the ex-Minister of Finance referred to an understanding, or conversation, he had with the Minister of Finance.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is a mistake.

Mr. FIELDING: I did not understand what was meant by that so I telephoned to my hon. friend and he said it was the Minister of Justice to whom he referred, that the reference to the Minister of Finance was a mistake. My hon. friend, I understood, had had a conversation with the Minister of Justice with the object of bringing forward his motion to-day but hearing that the Minister of Justice was not likely to be here to-day he decided not to do so. It was in that sense that I spoke of there being an understanding.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is quite fair. There is no real understanding. I certainly would not go on with the matter in the absence of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. GRAHAM: Perhaps my recollection is wrong, but when, on the announcement on Friday night of the business for to-day, this question came up, I understood the suggestion to be that we take Supply on Tuesday but that my hon. friend rather demurred to it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, no. If we take up Supply to-morrow it will be perfectly satisfactory to me.

Mr. GRAHAM: As I understood it the Minister of Justice was prepared to go on on Tuesday but my hon. friend demurred to that and it was then decided to take Supply on Wednesday. There need be no trouble about it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If you take Supply to-morrow it will be perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. FIELDING: Then it will be understood that we take it to-morrow.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ANDREW KNOX (Prince Albert): I would like to draw to the attention of the House a despatch which appeared in the western papers from the Associated Press dealing with the Hudson Bay project. It says that on the 332 miles of steel which have already been completed there has been an expenditure of $30,000,000. I would like to correct that statement because it is generally known and acknowledged that the cost of the railway was roughly speaking only $14,000,000, and the cost of the terminals some $6,000,000.

TARIFF COMMISSION EVIDENCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome): I wish to draw the attention of the government to this fact: In the committee which is examining into agricultural conditions in Canada we have references made from time to time to the tariff, and the year before last an extensive examination into tariff matters was conducted by the former Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) who took evidence in different parts of the country. As far as I am aware the information—valuable no doubt—obtained by that commission has not yet been made available to members of the House. I was wondering whether it would not be possible to have the evidence made available by placing it upon the Table in order that reference might be made to it and duplication of work avoided.

Mr. FIELDING: I am not, perhaps, as well qualified to speak on that question as the ex-Minister of Finance. I know that in the case of former tariff inquiries the evidence was not printed but it was available in the department. If the evidence in the case of the inquiry conducted by the ex-minister is available, I will be happy to place it at the disposal of the committee. I am quite sure that my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance is better informed as to that than I am.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is quite right. I think three copies were made and I suppose one copy is now available in the department. A copy of the evidence was made for each commissioner, but it never was printed.

Mr. FIELDING: If the evidence is available I will see that it is placed at the disposal of the committee.

UNITED STATES LABOUR DELEGATES DETAINED

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): I understand, from a resolution passed yesterday by a mass meeting of the miners in Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, that they are protesting against the detention at the border of Mr. Howat, past president of the Kansas Miners, and a colleague of his, who are on their way to fulfil an engagement in Glace Bay. They believe this to be an infringement of the rights of public speech. I should like to know for what reason these men have been detained and what the government proposes to do in the matter?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization): It is quite true that Mr. Alexander Howat and Mr. Thomas Myerscough have been detained at McAdam Junction. They have sought entrance to Canada and have announced they are coming here for the purpose of speaking to the organization known as the United Mine Workers of America. They admit—at least Mr. Howat admits—that he has served a sentence, in the state of Kansas, I believe, and that he has been deposed as an officer of the United Mine Workers. Further than that we have no information. I am asking for more information before finally dealing with the matter.

GRATUITIES TO GRAND TRUNK DIRECTORS

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I see the government has appointed a commissioner to inquire into those Grand Trunk gratuities and that Mr Congdon, ex-M.P., has been successful in getting this benevolence. Will the government be good enough to bring down the Order in Council, I presume under the Inquiries Act, making the appointment so that the House may know the scope of the commission.

Mr. GRAHAM: Surely.

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

As pointed out by a former Minister of Railways on March 21, 1921, railway accounting methods do not provide for the presentation of receipts, expenses, surplus or deficits by operating divisions.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

VALCARTIER CAMP GROUND

Mr. DESLISLE:

1. Has the government, since peace was signed, ever considered the utilization of Valcartier camp grounds? If so, what was the result of such consideration?

2. Is it a fact that this land, formerly under cultivation, is now a complete loss to agriculture as well as to the municipality of Ste. Catherine, on the outskirts of the city of Quebec?

3. Is it true that the waterworks system on this property will soon be worthless?

4. Is it a fact that the whole property, situated as it is, only a few minutes distant from Valcartier station and lying on both sides of Jacques Cartier river, could be sold advantageously?

5. Has the government received any offer for this property or have any representations been made on this subject?

6. Who is the present caretaker of the said Valcartier camp? Under what circumstances and by whose influence was he appointed? Is his appointment subject to cancellation at the pleasure of the government? What are his duties? Who is his immediate superior? Does the government receive regular reports concerning this camp and this caretaker? Has the caretaker any assistants? If so, what are their names and by whom were they appointed? Is the said camp, as a military property, inspected from time to time? Are reports made to the Department of Militia? Is the government aware that last summer, 1922, there were a large number of people occupying the various camp buildings? In what right and under whose authority were said buildings occupied?

7. Has the Commanding Officer of military district No. 5 any supervision over this property and does he make reports? If so, will the government produce such reports? Is there any correspondence between the Department of Militia and the Department of Agriculture, concerning this property? If so, will the government produce it? What is the salary of this caretaker and of his assistants?

8. Is it a fact that one of the buildings on this camp was destroyed by fire in the month of January last? Was a military inquiry made as to the causes of this fire and to that end were all witnesses sought for or was the department satisfied with a mere report? Are there any correspondence or documents on the subject? If so, will the government produce them?

9. Is it a fact that in 1915 a road was built from the said camp to Quebec and that the Ste. Catherine public road between range IV and St. Michel was then closed by the Military authorities and that since that time the camp road alone is and can be used? Is not this road the property of the government and as such must it be looked affer by the government winter and summer. Were orders given to this effect and is there any control over the execution of the orders given? Is it the caretaker of the camp who is responsible for the maintenance of this road?

FRENCH TREATY

BILL TO RATIFY CONVENTION CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

House again in Committee on Bill No. 23, respecting a certain Convention of Commerce between His Majesty and the French Republic, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): We were on section 2 when this matter was last before the House. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) asked for certain information which I have prepared and will be happy to send to him when he takes his seat.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think that when we adjourned we were discussing the effect of the provisions of the act having regard to equality of treatment, and I asked my hon. friends a question as to what they thought the effect of the contract was in regard to the sales tax. I do not think we have any information on that point.

Mr. FIELDING: There is a slight inequality between the local taxes in France and the sales tax in Canada, and in order to guard against any misunderstanding a clause was put in to provide that the existing condition of affairs should not be prejudiced. The essence of the arrangement is that we shall apply the same rate as sales tax on the French goods as we would on other goods and our own. If any change is made in the sales tax, then the tax would apply on the French goods at the same rate as on our own.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Do I understand that the sales tax of Canada is to apply to the French goods just as it applies to the Canadian goods?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes, if there be any change. It is true to-day, except, as I say, that there is a little inequality, and it was because of that the last part of the sentence was put in. But practically speaking the last statement of my hon. friend is correct. The present sales tax rate will apply to imports from France the same as to Canadian imports from other countries.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend, if I understand him correctly, says that the changes in the present sales tax rate would apply to Canadian goods as to French goods. I was referring to the question of the operation of the sales tax in Canada. Is the same tax to be levied in Canada on the goods of France as on the goods of Canada in Canada?

Mr. FIELDING: There is a difference in our sales tax between manufactured goods and imported goods; but the law will apply to the imported goods from France the same as to imported goods from all other countries. For all practical purposes, in our internal taxation we put France on equal terms with ourselves.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I want to get this clear myself. I know the minister intended anyway to say in his first statement that the sales tax on imported French goods will be the same sales tax as if the goods were imported from any other country?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In his next statement he said that they would be treated the same as Canadian goods.

Mr. FIELDING: As Canadian imports.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is quite clear the minister so intends. I must say I had doubt as to his power to do so after the reading of the clause to which my hon. friend referred last Friday, and whether he was not going to be compelled to reduce his sales tax on imports to the same level as his sales tax on Canadian manufactured goods.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not think that is the spirit or intention.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know what the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) asked for, and I do not see him in his seat as yet. Would it not be possible for the minister to give the information to the committee? I should especially like an answer to the question regarding cobalt.

Mr. FIELDING: I will first hand the statement to my right hon. friend for his perusal.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: While the right hon. member (Mr. Meighen) is reading that, I might go on to another clause. What is meant by the use of the words "prevention of unfair competition?" Does this in any way imperil the bringing down of the Combines Act or anything of that kind? In Article No. XXI we obligate ourselves to prevent unfair competition.

Mr. FIELDING: That means that any laws there might be as regards unfair competition at home would apply to them as well. We would be on equal terms concerning it. They have in France some special provisions—I do not recall the exact terms at the moment—regarding unfair competition; but if anything were to arise under the Combines Act, this would mean simply that we would treat the French as we would ourselves under similar conditions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have just had time to make a hurried perusal of this statement. As I read it, the minister has secured nothing as regards certain oxides of cobalt: zaffre, silicious oxide, vitrified oxides, smalt and azure, impure. That is to say they were always free and they are free now, going into France. But on the pure oxides of cobalt there is, under the treaty, an increase of 100; that is to say, the minimum was 350, but this has been increased to 450, which is an increase of about 30 per cent in the duty on pure cobalt going into France. I do not know whether the hon. member for Lincoln would know what our exports consist of; but from what I know of the treaty, I would be willing to take a guess that what we are selling is the real cobalt; that these other things we do not sell.

Mr. FIELDING: I would have to make a special study of the matter if my right hon. friend thinks it is of importance. I understand him to say that there is an increase as compared with the present rates?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. FIELDING: That brings us back to the old question whether we can compare these with the old rates or not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is an increase of 30 per cent in the duty on cobalt, which is an important product of Canada. I do not know in what form it is exported, but it is one of our chief mineral products, and it is somewhat serious to have so substantial an increase in the tariff. I think this should have been mentioned in the original details. I would presume the information that is given in this statement as to wheels and tires is taken right out of the details.

Mr. FIELDING: Out of the French treaty.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A slip has been pasted in. If it is not out of the details, nobody can tell what it means.

Mr. FIELDING: The words used are those of the French tariff. Sometimes an item in the French tariff is very comprehensive, and you get only a part of it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know what this item No. 214—wheels, tires and so forth—means, because there are no headings to the various columns. If the headings should be the same as in the details, then, of course, I can translate.

Mr. FIELDING: I am sure that is so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am sorry that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) is not present to-day. I have been pursuing him with the question as to the allegations made in his speech, and I thought I had covered everything pretty well. I was going to see now, after his admission that it was impossible for any hon. member to know from the government returns how much of the silk imports took the 20 per cent duty and how much the 27½ per cent duty, if it were possible to get some information of a definite character as to this most important clause. The hon. gentleman told us that somebody had told him that 90 per cent came in under the 27½ per cent rate and that 10 per cent came in under the fixed rate of 20 per cent. I think the committee is entitled to a little more definite information as to that. I want to find out just exactly how that amount is made up. If we had been given even the common courtesy of being told that Mr. So-and-so knows about this; if the minister had said: "Mr. So-and-so supplied me with this information, and he has figures to support it," we would be at least on the track of finding where the truth lies. I can, however, get nothing from the government returns, and that is now admitted by the minister. He has made a statement as to the fact which is, so far, absolutely unsupported.

Mr. FIELDING: I regret the minister is not present to answer that. I can only say that, if there is any information which is available in the government returns and which my hon. friend would desire, I would be happy to get it for him.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend will see that the accuracy of hon. gentlemen was challenged in this House by a responsible minister of the Crown. Afterwards he admits that the public accounts do not give that information. He cannot get it nor can hon. members. But he says it is wrong because someone whose name he will not give declares that it is wrong—somebody in one of the departments, I do not know at the moment which department. Now surely, we are entitled to know who that someone is so that we can get a proper basis of calculation. It is a matter of moment to know just what volume of silk will come in under the 20 per cent and under the 27½ per cent.

Mr. FIELDING: I can only offer such information as the customs returns will give. As to the controversy between my hon. friend and the Minister of Marine, of course I must not cut into that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, the hon. gentleman must surely know where he leaves the matter when he takes that position. He tells me he will give me the information which the public accounts show. But the public accounts show nothing, according to the later admission wrung from the Minister of Marine. The hon. minister has had a conversation, however, with someone whose name apparently he is ashamed to give. I do not know why he does not divulge it, and I think the House is entitled to know whether the statement was just simply a cheap remark made by the minister, entirely unsupported by fact. I should be sorry to think anything of that kind; I do not want to think it. I want to get the truth in connection with the matter, and I have tried to follow up all the items with this end in view. This is a matter in regard to which the Minister of Finance knows a very great deal more than the Minister of Marine. If the figures in regard to this particular item had come from my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) I should have had good reason to suppose that he had got it from his expert and was not simply talking of something about which he knew nothing. And I should have thought the same so far as the Minister of Marine is concerned; I should have supposed that he was in the same position. I must confess however, that I have doubts when I find that I cannot get the information.

Mr. FIELDING: In all frankness, I must say that this particular point has not engaged my attention. I know that there is a controversy between my hon. friend and the Minister of Marine, and if the facts in question were available in the returns I would gladly look them up for the hon. gentleman. As it is, however, I can only leave the matter between him and the Minister of Marine; I have not any special information in regard to the particular point in dispute, nor have I given it any special study. I made the statement rather relying on what the Minister of Marine said, and which I believe is correct, that the greater volume of silks comes under the 27½ per cent; as to what the exact percentage is I have not the information. As a matter of fact I do not know where my hon. friend the Minister of Marine got the information; I think he said he got it from someone in the silk trade, but I am not sure. Personally, however, I say in all frankness, I have made no special study of the point.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought I had exhausted everything else that was in controversy the other day, but the Minister of Marine went on to say that the percentages of ten and twenty just about portrayed the degree of accuracy in the rest of the statements I gave the House. So far the Minister of Marine has been entirely unable to show the slightest inaccuracy anywhere else, and the Minister of Finance has taken for granted that my figures are correct. I am not going to ask him if he knows of any further inaccuracy of statement made by me in connection with this treaty; I am only trying to find out what the truth is, that is all. If my hon. friend has no further allegations of inaccuracy we will know it comes down to the question of this percentage which someone has told the Minister of Marine,—someone whose name he will not give.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not think I made any charge of inaccuracy or misstatement against my hon. friend; I simply stated that from his arguments I thought his inferences were wrong, if I may be allowed to use so strong a word. I did not however challenge any statement of fact made by my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think so.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not recall having done so, because I have no doubt whatever that his statements as to matters of fact were all made with the best intentions. What I was objecting to were his arguments, his inferences and his contentions, and I regretted to say that I did not think that in these respects he was right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not speaking about that, nor am I complaining of anything that my hon. friend has said. He has been kind enough to give me the source of his information; he has been frank in the matter, not desiring to withhold any information from the committee. But the Minister of Marine did. Now, I was asking the hon. gentleman, who knows about the treaty, whether he knows of any inaccuracies or misstatements of fact in reference to it on my part, and I gather from his answer that he does not.

Mr. FIELDING: I think my hon. friend is over-sensitive. Many statements are made in the course of debate which may not strictly be accurate but which, nevertheless, are made with no intent to mislead. I believe I could quote statements made on the other side of the House, statements uttered hurriedly, and which while of no great importance are yet inaccurate. Still I do not think that such statements are made with any intention to deceive, nor do I attach any great importance to them. It was merely the arguments and contentions which I thought were mistaken, but I made no accusation whatever against the hon. gentleman implying any misstatement of fact.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have no issue with my hon. friend; the issue I have is with the Minister of Marine, and it is this, that the House has a right to expect accuracy and facts from a responsible minister of the Crown in support of governmental legislation. I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that the statement made by the hon. gentleman when he carried the remark to the length he did was absolutely untrue, whether he knew it or not.

Mr. FIELDING: That is harsh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It has been drawn to my attention that in addition to the treaty imposing a disability on growers of fruit for purposes of manufacture into homemade wine, who are at a disadvantage of some 15 cents as compared with the importer of the French article, the treaty gives a further substantial advantage to the importer of brandy from France or any of the favoured nations over the producers of Canadian rye whiskey. There are many in Canada who, instead of any favour given the producer of Canadian rye whiskey, would like to see him pushed out of the market and off the earth. But I do not think they would like to see that done by the successful invasion of French brandy. Whether we favour the retention of manufactured liquors or not, all of us must say that we do not favour putting disabilities on the Canadian manufacturer of this class of goods in favour of the imported article, any more than we would favour putting a disability on the Canadian manufacturer of any other class of goods in favour of importations. I think it will be admitted at once that there is a distinct preference here given to French brandy over the present excise duties on Canadian rye whiskey. Does my hon. friend intend to remove that disability or not?

Mr. FIELDING: If, as a consequence of the treaty, any disadvantages be imposed upon any home industry, that is a matter that deserves consideration and will receive it in connection with the budget. It does not follow that because a duty is reduced in the treaty it is not going to be reduced anywhere else. Touching brandy, I may say that the French treaty does not propose a general reduction on brandies. There is a particular French brandy which is likely to come in to a very moderate extent; it requires a certificate of purity, and it is a matter of pride with the French that this is not like any other brandy in the world, and they ask for special consideration for it. If any injustice is done any existing industry in Canada by the operation of the treaty then undoubtedly it will be our duty to consider the matter at the proper time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand that this brandy which it is proposed to reduce in the treaty is very widely used and is a very popular brand—I cannot speak of my own knowledge. But I also know that the government of the province of Quebec affects at least to be engaged in an effort to reduce consumption of these classes of strong liquors —brandies, whiskies and the like—in favour of light wines and beer. I hope the minister realizes that by this treaty he is just doing that much more to balk the wishes of the Quebec government.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend's zeal for the province of Quebec is very encouraging.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is evidently more real though less flamboyant than that of the minister.

Mr. FIELDING: Let us hope so.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Repeal:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister give us the effect of this?

Mr. FIELDING: That is merely the repealing clause.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but what are we doing by repealing these acts?

Mr. FIELDING: The old treaty was in part continued by the modus vivendi. All the old acts are repealed now and this will be the only French Treaty Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no revenue act repealed?

Mr. FIELDING: No, I think not.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Suspension of inconsistent laws:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is rather an omnibus section, is it not?

Mr. FIELDING: I think it is necessary there. It certainly can do no harm. It makes everything absolutely clear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This clause 8 may have been used before, but I never saw it. "The operation of all laws inconsistent with the giving to the provisions of the said convention and of this act their full effect shall from time to time be suspended to the extent of such inconsistency." Really that is a pretty dangerous clause and would, I think, likely make lots of work for lawyers. If the minister has not that clause there at all then the ordinary rules apply—rules that have been interpreted times without number and as to which the law is clear: the specific overrules the general; where there is conflict, and nothing else to weigh on one side or the other, the last legislation overrules the former, and so on. Now, the benefit and effect of all those rules of law obtain to-day and would apply to this bill. Why does the minister want anything further?

Mr. FIELDING: My impression is that it is not an unusual thing to make a general clause suspending the operation of all laws inconsistent with the proposed enactment. It may not be necessary. The most I can say for it is that it makes assurance doubly sure. If my hon. friend thinks it is gravely objectionable I would come back to it on the third reading of the bill and in the meantime have it looked into.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have seen a clause to the effect that anything inconsistent is repealed, but I do not know that that has any real force. This is a new section.

Mr. FIELDING: This particular clause was the work of the legal advisers of the department. In view of what my hon. friend has said, before the third reading of the bill is moved I will have the clause inquired into.

4 p.m.

Mr. MacLAREN: Do I understand correctly that the special tariff applies only to goods that are imported directly through Canadian ports?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes. The provisions of this act as respects French imports are restricted to goods coming directly to Canadian ports. That clause was in our old treaty and is continued in this.

Mr. MacLAREN: And through our own ports only?

Mr. FIELDING: Goods may come through Great Britain, for example, or from France direct. If goods come direct from France or be sent via London, they are entitled to the benefits of the treaty; if sent by way of the United States they would not be so entitled.

Mr. MacLAREN: These goods must be imported through Canadian ports to receive the benefit of the special tariff. That being the case, and this treaty applying to other favoured nations, Japan, Switzerland and so on, will this condition also be required of the other favoured nations?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes, they can only receive the same privileges by accepting the same responsibilities. I may say to my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) that I find in regard to the omnibus clause that in the act respecting the old treaty of 1908, chapter 28, the following clause appears:

> The operation of all laws inconsistent with the giving to the provisions of the said convention and of this act their full effect shall from time to time be suspended to the extent of such inconsistency.

So our legal advisers have merely copied the old clause. I think it can do no harm, it simply makes assurance doubly sure.

Section agreed to.

On schedule D:

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is only one schedule in the bill.

Mr. FIELDING: One schedule covers all in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN: These separate schedules are part of the general schedule.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So they are all carried in the one schedule.

Mr. FIELDING: That is correct.

Schedule agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. FIELDING: Is there any objection to its being read now?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Next sitting.

ITALIAN TREATY

Mr. FIELDING: I have not given notice, but perhaps the House will be prepared to take up the Italian treaty at once. I do not think it contains anything contentious.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As I take it—my hon. friend will tell me if I am wrong—what is done in the Italian treaty is in short to make Italy one of the most favoured nations.

Mr. FIELDING: Yes, to give and receive favoured nation treatment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is free of a lot of objections that can be urged in connection with fixed duties?

Mr. FIELDING: I do not wish to press it. I have not given notice of it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But I do not know what other members think of it.

Mr. FIELDING: Let it stand for another day.

TESTING AND INSPECTION OF SEEDS

House in committee on Bill No. 12 respecting the Testing, Inspection and Sale of Seeds, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 2—Definitions:

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps the minister would explain for the benefit of those of us who are not on the committee on Agriculture what is the effect of the amendments that have been made, prefacing that by a general statement of the purpose of the bill.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I did not expect to go into committee on this bill to-day and I have only a copy of the amended bill here without the new sections underlined, as I generally have them in a case of this kind, so I shall have to ask the chairman to read the amendments made by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 2 was amended in committee by striking out paragraph (h):

"Plants" means any agricultural or horticultural plant.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: "Agricultural plant" means a plant from a hot house or one of a supply of such as cabbage plants or tomato plants. It was thought by the horticulturists that plants should not be included in the Seed Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the general purpose of the legislation? Has the minister done away with the Seed Commission of western Canada and if so why?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This has nothing to do with the Seed Commission. This is the Seed Control Act dating back to 1903, I think, and has to do with the grading and specifying the grades and the qualifications of the various seeds that are placed on the market by our seed merchants. That is the main feature of it. The act has been consolidated twice. It was first consolidated eleven years ago, and this is the second consolidation. It specifies, particularly, the seeds for export and import; also the quality of the seeds sold by our various seed merchants throughout Canada; indicates the quality of those seeds and the name of the grades. The Seed Commission that my hon. friend refers to has to do more with the disposition of what we call commercial seed grain distributed from our different systems, mostly in western Canada. Well, not necessarily all western Canada; it has been distributed all over Canada but mostly from the West as a base of supplies. That has not been dispensed with. The commissioner is employed and paid a per diem allowance when his services are required. There has been very little distribution of seed this year. Owing to the fact that the crop was so generally distributed over the West there has been very little demand for the use of this commission. However, it is in existence yet and can be called into requisition at any moment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is the work that is under Mr. George Clark, is it not?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes. Clause 3 contains provisions as to the sale of clovers, grasses, seed grain and fodder seeds. An addition has been made to clause 2 of the bill a provision to the effect that "grass, clover and alfalfa seeds that may be graded Registered Extra No. 1, or No. 1, shall be free from the seeds of primary noxious weeds." This is for the purpose of designating a standard quality of grass seeds. Formerly it applied to clover seeds and cereals. Now the idea is to extend it to all grass seeds and clover seeds, and also to field and garden seeds, as to the grade and quality that constituted a standard grade. When a seed merchant sells a consignment of seeds of a certain quality, and it proves not to be up to such quality, the purchaser can get redress by calling for a survey, and all the usual procedure involved in the event of seed not coming up to the standard.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): Regarding the term used in the section "primary noxious weeds" I do not find in the act any definition of "noxious weeds" or "primary noxious weeds." I understand—I hope the minister will correct me if I am wrong—that there is in our federal statutes no definition of "noxious weeds," but that dependence is placed on the definition given by the provincial departments of agriculture. Now, this difficulty may arise as a consequence: There may be weeds in Ontario, for example, that are "noxious weeds" or "primary noxious weeds" that in Saskatchewan are not, and vice versa. What protection is there for the purchaser of No. 1 alfalfa, or grass or clover seed if these seeds contain weeds which are classed as "primary noxious weeds" in Ontario but are not so classed in his own province?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We could not very well take the provincial noxious weed list because it varies so much. We would have to have a government standardized list. As to the federal act it has not been before this House since I have had anything to do with legislation of this kind. I am not familiar, I may say, with the entire list of noxious weeds as defined by the federal act. But that is what it refers to here.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): Is it a fact that noxious weeds are defined in a federal act?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): And also "primary noxious weeds?"

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The federal list does not necessarily correspond with the list in provincial acts because there is such a variety of weeds in the various provinces that it would take a list of tremendous length to include them all.

Mr. TOLMIE: There is a list of "noxious weeds" given in the regulations on the back of the old act.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What was the reference, Mr. Chairman, in the old act to "noxious weeds"?

The CHAIRMAN: We do not happen to have the old act here. What I have is simply the bill as it went before the committee.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Certain features of these acts are adjustable by regulation. The hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) has just sent me over a copy of the Seed Control Act of 1911 and on the back of it is given a list of the noxious weeds referred to. I find the reference to it reads:

> The species of farm weeds which shall for the purpose of the above mentioned act be included within the meaning of the term "noxious weeds" shall be as follows:—

It goes on to enumerate:

> Wild oats; twitch or quack grass; docks; Russian thistle; purple cockle.

And so on. That appears in the regulations.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): It does not appear in the statute?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It has the same effect in law. Regulations passed in pursuance of the provisions of any statute have the same effect as law. Of course the act itself grants authority for the enforcement of regulations based upon its provisions. Such regulations must not be inconsistent with the act. In order to afford facilities for a quick adjustment a great many of these provisions are left to regulations rather than embodied in the act itself. That is so that in case any new weeds spring up they can be included by regulation instead of waiting until next session for a parliamentary enactment.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): Is the term "primary" defined, or is it a loose term which may be subject to adjustment from time to time?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is not defined in the statute, so far as I can see. There is a list of about twenty-five weeds enumerated, but I do not see the word "primary" mentioned. If my hon. friend wishes we can allow that sub-section to stand until we realize what the significance of the word "primary" is. I should think myself it would be "of first importance."

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): I think the point is very important. I think the minister will also agree that when large quantities of grass and clover seeds are being imported into the western provinces the purchasers should be protected against the possibility of those seeds containing weeds which, for example, although noxious there, may not be noxious in the place where the seed was grown. I think the term should be thoroughly understood and defined before it is used.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think the list is quite complete. There are certain weeds that are very prevalent. For instance, wild buckwheat is very prevalent but is not considered to be a very noxious weed except in some places where it has proven to be so. If you include the whole list of noxious weeds the lists might be made very burdensome. The word "primary," I presume, has reference to the list given in the act. It is possible that some weeds may have to be added to the list when the new regulations, under the new act, are drafted. I have the list given in the old act if my hon. friend would like it read. It is as follows:

Cow cockle, stinkweed, false flax, ball mustard, wild radish, wild mustard, hare's-ear mustard, tumbling mustard, wild carrot, field bindweed, dodder, blue burr or stickseed, blue weed, ribgrass, ragweed, ox-eye daisy, Canada thistle, perennial sow thistle.

Mr. MARTELL: What is the method to be pursued by farmers in the province of Nova Scotia, particularly in the most important part of the province, the county of Hants, if they wish to get some seeds for new varieties of oats, or other seed, for the purpose of experimentation? From the experiments it carries on, the Department of Agriculture would undoubtedly know the best seeds to be used in certain sections of Nova Scotia. Having ascertained that fact, what would the farmer have to do in order to get some new samples of seed?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It depends whether he wanted to deal with a regular recognized seed merchant—

Mr. MARTELL: He would want to get them for nothing.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think we have any such method, except by getting small samples from the experimental farm.

Mr. MARTELL: I think the minister stated that if certain progressive farmers would apply to the experimental farm they would get samples.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The season is pretty well advanced for distributing samples of seed. A certain distribution is being made yet, although not so prodigal as that of a number of years ago. It was thought there was a good deal of waste in the general distribution of these small five-pound samples of seed. The quantity distributed has been reduced, and distributed early enough so that it will be ready for seeding in the spring. It is rather late now.

Mr. MARTELL: Can the hon. minister tell me how I would get it? The season is not very far advanced in Nova Scotia.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I understand the season is late there this year. They have a supply still on hand at the experimental farm at Ottawa, and if my hon. friend will send an application to the Director of Experimental Farms, Ottawa, I have no doubt they would strain a point for my hon. friend, even if it is a little late.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince, P.E.I.): When this bill was up before the committee on Agriculture, the question regarding the taking over of inspection of seed potatoes for shipment to the American markets was discussed, and we from the Maritime provinces were disappointed that the inspection of seed potatoes was not taken over by the Seed branch. We found it impossible in this committee to have the inspection taken over by the Seed branch. I just wish to ask the minister if he has given further consideration to this matter, and if he has not received numerous communications from the potato growers association in the Maritime provinces asking for this. They believed they could get better inspection and they would have the men right on the spot the whole year round, or on the days the potatoes were shipped out, and it would be a far better method than the present system where the plant pathologists are only there for part of the season. They are very anxious for this to be taken care of by the Seed branch under Mr. Clark, and I hope the minister will still give it favourable consideration.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Officials of the Department of Agriculture have gone into this matter very carefully, and inasmuch as it will require additional plant pathologists to perform these services under the Seed branch, it would be more expensive to carry out my hon. friend's suggestion. At the present time seed potatoes are under the department of the plant pathologists, as it requires the services of a pathologist to identify potato diseases. It does not require such an officer to take care of the Seed branch, because if the potatoes were transferred to the Seed branch we would have to take on a new staff of plant pathologists. The chief reason that it is not advisable at this time to transfer potatoes to the Seed branch is the additional expense involved. I recognize that Mr. Clark's staff is quite competent and quite efficient to deal with that question, but we cannot give the service through the Seed branch without a very heavy additional expense.

Mr. MARTELL: Are any experiments proposed to be carried on in Nova Scotia or in the Maritime provinces to ascertain whether or not certain varieties of apples could be grown so that young farmers of the provinces could conduct experiments on their own farms, with a view to adopting promising new varieties? I make the same inquiry with regard to plum trees and pear trees in Nova Scotia. Could the minister inform me if anything has been done in his department towards getting cheaper rates on nitrate of soda? That is a very valuable product for fruit growers in my part of the country, and in fact for all the fruit growers in the province, and the freights are found to be excessive. Is the department doing anything in the way of negotiating with the various municipalities with a view to taking up with the railways the question of freight rates on nitrate of soda? This matter may not be considered apropos of the question before the committee, but apple growing is somewhat akin to it. If the minister could do something for us in that regard, in order to introduce new classes of fruits in Nova Scotia, I think it would be a good thing.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know how far, Mr. Chairman, you will let me take up these various matters. There is the Fertilizer Act and the Seed Act and other acts, but fruit has been disposed of by the act passed recently. There is a very substantial amount of experimenting with apples being conducted constantly, apart from the experimental farm. At the exhibition last fall I saw a number of very choice boxes of apples which looked very tempting, and I think their cultivation might prove very successful in many parts of Canada. The same experiment is being conducted on the experimental farm, and in the Maritime provinces. I think I have dealt with my hon. friend's question.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Provisions as to use of established variety names and the licensing of new variety names:

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This section has been amended in committee by adding in the third line the words:

Agricultural or garden vegetable seeds or plants.

Mr. MacKELVIE: What does that mean?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is to permit of the registration of new varieties of plants through the Canadian Council of Horticulture, which is making provision for registration of both plants and trees, so that a record may be kept, just in the same way as there is a registration of animals. I think this is the first of its kind, not only in Canada, but on this continent.

Mr. MacKELVIE: What steps have to be taken by an applicant for registration?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I was mistaken in saying that this work was not done in the United States. It has been started there, but the proposal is to make it international. The secretary of the Canadian Council of Horticulture is Mr. Burrows of the Fruit branch, and any communications addressed to him would secure the information desired. I think they are not quite organized yet. In the estimates, there is an item, which I do not think we have yet reached, covering an additional grant to the Canadian Council of Horticulture to carry on this work.

Mr. TOLMIE: Is a regular standard established, or under what conditions will these registrations be accepted? I presume some varieties will be eligible for registration and others not. What will be the line of demarcation?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The idea is to make such a thorough description of a variety that the party who has discovered it cannot be defrauded. A man may have spent years of toil in propagating a new plant, and this is to prevent others who may find out about it from stealing it. Cases where such a new variety has been stolen overnight have been known. This registration applies to apple trees, etc., bulbs and plants of all descriptions.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Provisions as to sale of seeds for export when purported to have been inspected and graded:

Mr. MacKELVIE: Will these seeds, when exported, be marked as Canadian, so as to establish a standard for our home-grown seeds?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Under paragraph (a) the name and address of the seller will be on the package, and under paragraph (e) the package must be marked with the name of the province and country where the seed was grown.

Section agreed to.

On section 15—Time limit complaint may be made against person from whom seed purchased:

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is to give a longer time for prosecution, and there is also a provision under which a purchaser in good faith shall not be liable to prosecution.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—Official samples to be taken in presence of witness:

Mr. MacKELVIE: What process will be necessary to satisfy the terms of this provision?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Simply as outlined, in the presence of a witness, so that it may be certain that the sample was taken correctly, and that the sample is what it purports to be.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil, Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization) moved the second reading of Bill No. 15, respecting Chinese Immigration.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 2—Definitions:

Mr. McQUARRIE: Will the minister make a statement as to how this bill will affect the entry of Chinese into the country?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member might wait until section 5, "Entry and landing", is called.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Powers of Governor in Council:

Mr. STEVENS: There is one question I want the minister fully to elucidate and that is in reference to subsection (b) of section 3 which gives power to the Governor in Council to appoint officers in countries other than Canada for the purposes of endorsing passports or performing other duties under the act. I wish the minister would explain as fully as he can that subsection, having in mind the experience of the department during recent years, particularly I believe in 1920 and 1921, when the British Consul viséd the passports of intending immigrants with the result that there was at that time an increased influx of merchants from China.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am not very clear as to how that occurred, but it would appear that approximately 1,200 Chinese registered as merchants in the year 1920-21. I have a record taken from the reports of the department with regard to this matter, but I may say that our intention is that the officer in China shall be responsible for the carrying out of the provisions of the act; that is to say, before a national of China can leave the country of origin, he will have to have his passport viséd by our officer. That practice obtains to a certain extent now; the passport is viséd by the British consul. But we believe that the British consul's duties are too numerous to allow him to devote the same attention to this matter as could be given by a Canadian officer stationed in China for the particular purpose, and there would be greater probability of the law being rigidly enforced by the appointment of a Canadian officer than would otherwise be the case. That is all we have in mind in connection with the appointment of an officer in China. When the bill was drawn up I assumed that the appointments and the fixing of salaries would come under the Civil Service Commission; and that is as I desire, with the single exception of the chief controller. I propose to amend subsection (a) of section 3 by striking it out and substituting the following:

Appoint any official of the Department of Immigration and Colonization to be chief controller.

That is the only reservation in the bill in regard to which I desire to have control, because this official is more or less in the position of a deputy minister. He will be selected from the Department of Immigration, so that we are not going outside the service that exists to fill the position.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the officers in other countries be appointed by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes. I move that the subsection be amended as I have proposed.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS: Before we leave this section I want to make this observation. I am very sceptical of the success that will attend the appointment of this officer, and I do not say this by way of criticism of the minister; I make the statement simply from past experience and from the known difficulty that attaches to this matter. I think that very great care should be exercised in the choice of the person or persons appointed and in the making of the regulations which will surround their activities on the other side.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend is speaking of the officer who will be in China?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. I can furnish the minister with evidence which is in the possession of the department to show that persons in Canton were in touch with people in this country for the purpose of advising and indeed of helping Chinese to evade the head tax, and this by deliberate design. This happened, too, a year or two ago. So I merely refer this to the minister in order that he may be fully seized of the significance of the move.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How many appointments does the minister contemplate making? I suppose he is going to confine this to very, very narrow limits in China.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There will be only one official in China. I want to strike out subclause (e) dealing with the fixing of remuneration. I want to make this conform to the Civil Service Act.

Mr. McBRIDE: Mr. Chairman, from what took place in this House last session I understood orientals were to be excluded. Why, then, are we arranging to send people over to China to encourage Chinese immigration into this country?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If my hon. friend will look at section 5 he will observe that the class of Chinese to be allowed entry into Canada is very much restricted. There was no promise made last session that there would be total exclusion of orientals.

Mr. McBRIDE: Yes, I see that you are allowing Chinese merchants to come in all right, but from the tone of the debate on the immigration policy of the government which took place recently in this House I understood that we did not want immigrants to throng our cities. Then why let Chinese merchants come in to run our business? In the West we have quite sufficient of them at the present time in our cities.

The CHAIRMAN: I would suggest that section 5, entry and landing, will afford hon. members wide scope for debate on the whole question.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I want to amend subsection (b) by inserting after the word "appoint" the words:

—and fix the salary and remuneration of

Mr. STEVENS: I think the minister must have misunderstood my question. I asked him a moment ago if under subsection (b) these officers would be appointed by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My understanding was, Mr. Chairman, that without special reference at all these appointments would automatically come under the Civil Service Commission. I find that is not the case. Therefore we have to make these changes. The only officer who will come under their control is the chief controller. I have had the section carefully reviewed by Mr. Edwards of the Justice department with that object in view.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the chairman kindly read subclause (b)?

The CHAIRMAN: Subclause (b) as proposed to be amended is as follows:

Appoint and fix the salary and remuneration of officers in countries other than Canada for the purpose of endorsing passports or performing other duties under this act.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am afraid Mr. Edwards has gone wrong there. I would ask that the clause be allowed to stand.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 3 stands.

On section 5—Entry and landing—Immigration confined to certain classes, etc.

Mr. BAXTER: Going back to clause (e) of the interpretation section, I find that a Chinese immigrant is defined as meaning "any person of Chinese origin or descent entering Canada for the purpose of acquiring Canadian domicile." Then follows "a person shall not be deemed to be of Chinese origin or descent merely because his mother or his female ancestors or any of them were of 5 p.m. Chinese origin or descent." That has a bearing of course on section 5 as to persons of Chinese origin or descent. I ask the minister whether it is wise to continue—I suppose it is from an old act—that definition. After all, we do not want any more Chinese here than we can help. Well, do we want half any more than we want full-blooded Chinese?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Is it not generally understood that nationality descends on the father's side?

Mr. BAXTER: So far as national status is concerned it would depend on the father, yes, but—

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There are many cases where Englishmen are married to Chinese women. Their offspring would be barred if there were not such a clause in the bill.

Mr. BAXTER: If whites choose to let down the racial standard to that extent, should not they keep their progeny in the East instead of bringing them in here? Does the minister think the bill is quite definite enough as to the exclusion of Chinese women? Of course they have to fall within the definition of merchants or students, but even as merchants I fancy we do not want them here. Would it not be well to make it absolutely clear that Chinese women cannot come in under any circumstances? I am very glad to see that section 5 begins with a declaration that Chinese origin or descent is to be irrespective of allegiance or citizenship, so that we cannot, as I understand it, have under this section any so-called Hong-Kong Chinese claiming British citizenship. That is a very good provision, but I would suggest that it might be made a little more emphatic as to the exclusion of women. I would also suggest that the minister reconsider the definition clause.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Since the bill was published a great many representations have been made from people in British Columbia—I am bound to say that they have no other motive apparently than that of a desire to be generous—asking particularly that the wives of Chinese merchants be admitted. Such women are not provided for in this bill. There is a fairly wide clause in section 9 of the Immigration Act which gives the minister discretion to admit anyone whom he may think it wise to allow to enter Canada.

Mr. NEILL: Could the minister give us an idea of who these bodies are in British Columbia who are so generous as to want the wives of Chinese merchants admitted?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): They are mostly representatives of religious bodies throughout Canada who are interested in this question. In addition there are a great many legal gentlemen, who no doubt are interested because they have Chinese clients. In fairness I ought to state that to the committee.

Mr. LUCAS: Are these bodies in British Columbia?

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Quite a number of them.

Mr. CLARK: Have any legal bodies in British Columbia made representations? I never heard of them doing so.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. CLARK: What organizations?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not suppose I have this in confidence; I have a letter from Tupper & Tupper, of Vancouver, appealing on behalf of certain clients of theirs. I suppose it is a matter of business with them.

Mr. CLARK: I was not asking for individuals, but for organizations. Have any representations been made by the Law Society, for instance?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Only religious organizations, or representatives of religious organizations.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Has the minister heard anything from Bishop A. U. de Pencier, of Vancouver?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The minister knows that he has publicly stated that in his opinion orientals should be excluded from British Columbia. I think the minister has been furnished with the newspaper reports of the bishop's speech.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I would like the minister to explain what changes will be made effective by reason of the passing of this bill. As I understand it, at the present time Chinese labourers are not admitted to Canada. As a matter of fact, under the regulations as they exist now the only classes admitted are merchants and students. If I am right in that respect, is this bill making any changes at all? Is this bill carrying out in any way the terms of the resolution which was passed last session calling for effective restriction of oriental immigration, and if so in what way?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend is quite right. Under the regulations merchants and students are practically the only people to be admitted. Under the old act, as my hon. friend knows, the admission of Chinese was permitted upon payment of a head tax of $500, and there was no restriction as to numbers; so they came in. By regulation we have been doing this for the past two or three months, but we have no statutory enactment under which we might act. We have simply been acting under the regulations.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What you propose to do now is to abolish the head tax altogether?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, we will not charge a merchant or a student the $500 head tax.

Mr. BAXTER: You do not limit the time a merchant may stay in the country do you?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No.

Mr. BAXTER: Under the section that the minister referred to, authorizing him to grant a permit irrespective of the other provisions of the act, there was a limitation; but after all, what is a merchant? If a man chooses to come to Vancouver for instance, and open a little fruit store he is a "merchant," I suppose. He can get in and stay there as a merchant. Is a laundryman a merchant?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No.

Mr. BAXTER: I would not think so; he does not buy or sell anything. Just what is going to happen to us? Will we be fed on Chinese fruit and go unlaundered, or what is the object?

Mr. STEVENS: I was rather waiting for the reading of the clause to be proceeded with, for as far as I am concerned the main contention will be around sub-clause (c) of section I as to the word "merchant." That is really the crux of this whole bill, or very largely so. There are other points that will arise as we proceed. Unless the minister has some definition to supply in regard to merchants I am afraid the measure will be received with considerable alarm by a large section of the public. I wonder, would the committee be interested if I just gave a few figures—I think they have been given before by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) but it is just as well to refresh our memory—as to the number of Chinese merchants in Vancouver. In Vancouver alone there are the following businesses carried on by Chinese:

5 garages, 40 butchers, 65 barbers, 172 grocers, 144 candy, ice cream and fruit, 63 gents' clothing, 9 hardware, 30 jewellers, 89 restaurants, 38 express and dray, 201 tobacconists, 29 wholesale dealers, 154 hawkers and peddlers, 5 printers and publishers, 50 boot and shoe dealers, 54 stationers, etc. etc.

These are all in the city of Vancouver, and when you consider the number operating in a city like that, it must be clear that there is no necessity for special provision for merchants to be admitted to engage in merchandising in this country. I think what the minister has in mind, and what we all have in mind, is the facilitating of international trade, trade between China and Canada, and I think we are quite prepared for the admission of such business men as are required to carry on that trade. But that is not at all what is in the mind of the Chinese when he suggests that merchants be allowed to enter free. What he means is to build up in Canada a merchandising group in all centres as far as he can. I was down at Kingston near here last year, where there are over 300 Chinese engaged in business in the city, including laundries, which were not included in the list I have just read. These men are running restaurants, fruit and grocery stores particularly, and tailoring shops. The same thing applies to many other eastern cities, and most of this, in fact all of it in the East, has grown up I think in the last ten years, and the impetus will increase as the years go by unless the movement is checked.

I fully appreciate the difficulty of facing this problem with the officials from China, and the same thing applies to Japan. It is difficult, but unfortunately we have got to speak plainly and as far as I am concerned I do so, I think, without passion. It is merely a question of economic necessity to further restrict this class. I think the whole answer to their contention that they have no intention of abusing the privilege is found in the records. I am quoting from memory, but I know I am not more than one or two out. Prior to October or November, 1920, the record shows that about two or three merchants a month were admitted to Canada. During that year we succeeded in stopping the movement whereby they had been bringing in a lot of Chinese students in direct violation of the correct interpretation of that privilege. When that was stopped they found a method of evading the regulation regarding merchants, and they switched to that. Up to that time, as I say, they were coming in at the rate of two or three a month. Suddenly the number rose to 25, 30, 40 and even as high as 400 a month for some months, until one year I think 1,400 came in, or approximately that number. The point I am getting at is this: If during that period only two or three a month came in, if that was the number covered by the normal movement without any undue restriction at all and then suddenly it increased to 300 and 400 a month it would seem that the entrance of such numbers is for some other purpose than merely trade. Now that is a feature we have got to face, and face very frankly in regard to this bill. I have not an amendment to move; I understand there is an amendment to be proposed by the member for New Westminster. I want to say, as far as I am concerned, that I am not offering this opposition in the way of captious criticism or in order to add to the minister's perplexities, but with a genuine desire to try and solve this point—for I think this is really the main point in the whole bill, if we could solve it. Then the bill would probably be a step forward in the handling of this problem. I still maintain together with no doubt many others—I think all the other members from British Columbia—that the position Canada must come to sooner or later—and I believe it is long past due—is the position of exclusion. I cannot see any other way of surmounting this difficulty. But the government is offering this bill with assurances that it is doing its utmost, and we are desirous of meeting them, for the time being, half way without abandoning our principles in the matter. But we do wish to make this a fully effective measure—that is, that the intent in the minister's mind and the intent, I think, in the minds of most members of the House, shall be carried out. Now, unless the minister has something more effective to give us in connection with this subclause C it will be necessary, I think, to find some amendment during the consideration of this bill by the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might take advantage of this moment to say just a word as to the point of view from which the government has introduced this legislation. In dealing with the subject of immigration from the Orient there are two aspects which it seems to me, the committee will do well to keep more or less continuously in mind. First there is the aspect of our international relations with the great countries that lie on the other side of the Pacific. There is the other aspect, which perhaps appeals more immediately to us, of our own economic conditions and the problems in this country that arise therefrom, particularly where certain classes of our labour are brought into competition with labour from countries which have standards different from our own. As long as we keep these two points of view clearly in mind and distinguish between them—as my hon. friend who has just taken his seat has in the main distinguished—I think there should be little difficulty in solving the problem as between the Orient and ourselves. If, however, we lose sight of the international aspect and use expressions—either unguardedly or for other reasons—which are certain to be repugnant to peoples of another part of the world, I am afraid that instead of helping to relieve a very serious situation we shall only be creating—perhaps not for ourselves but for others—a situation which will be infinitely worse.

For years past it has been recognized that it is not in the interest of Canada to admit to this country large numbers of persons from the Orient. Different methods have been attempted to restrict immigration. One method adopted in the case of the Chinese was that of imposing a poll tax, not of a very large amount at the outset, but which has amounted to something like $500 in recent years. That was found to be an ineffective method. So far as that method is concerned I would like to say to the committee it has always seemed to me it was objectionable from a point of view altogether apart from any economic consideration. It was objectionable that a country calling itself a Christian nation, should attempt in such a manner to deal with a problem which immediately affects oriental civilization. I could never see how Canada, from any self respecting point of view, could impose a poll tax on working people coming from another country, and at the same time have its population subscribe to funds for missionary purposes to teach the heathen the most elementary principles of Christianity. The government has shared that view, and has felt that any indiginity of the character of the imposition of a poll tax upon a people in any other part of the world was something to which we, as a Christian community, should not lend our approval. So we have decided to abolish the head tax for that reason if for no other.

However, from the economic point of view, the position we have taken is that the head tax is ineffective as a method of restriction, and that some more effective method should be adopted. The question has mainly to do with industrial problems; with the classes of oriental labour that come into competition with our labour. Hon. members will perhaps recall that when the Chinese Minister resident at Washington recently visited Ottawa, he gave an address in these buildings in which he announced that speaking for China, he was prepared to say, that China would forego the privilege of sending a single coolie or wroking man into Canada rather than sacrifice the friendship of this country, if the sending of any labour whatever into Canada was liable to be at the cost of that friendship. He took the broad view that what the Chinese were anxious for was the good-will of other countries with whom they hoped to have dealings of different kinds. He recognized the immigration problem, and he said quite frankly that the Chinese people would not take offence at a law which was aimed at restricting immigration. He let it be clearly understood, however, that the Chinese would still desire to have the just respect of other countries, or of the peoples of other countries, and would not want to be subjected to the indignity which exclusion from another country would involve. I do not think it is possible to talk of excluding the peoples of any country, of excluding all of the people—regardless altogether of what their standing or standards may be —and not offend the entire nation concerned; I do not think it is in the interest of Canada, or of any part of the British Empire, that any Dominion of the Empire should knowingly pass an act, which is certain to be regarded as an act of offence to an entire nation.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What about the United States?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am speaking of British freedom at the moment. I am speaking of the conception of British freedom as I understand it; I have never known a time when the British flag has stood for inflicting anything in the nature of an indignity upon the people of any country in the world.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What about Australia and New Zealand?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think my hon. friend can point to an act of exclusion of all Chinese from Australia or New Zealand.

Mr. McQUARRIE: No, but that is the effect of the legislation in those countries at the present time, is it not?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not saying what the effect of this legislation may be when it is passed. What I am saying is that no country that I know of, under the British flag, has ever attempted, or in the name of British justice and fair play, and fair dealings with the peoples of other parts of the world would attempt, to enact an exclusion law against another nation, regardless altogether of the status or standing of the classes that may be affected.

So far as labour, so far as the question of economic competition is concerned, the Chinese themselves have stated that they do not object, and will not feel that they are being subjected to any indignity by this parliament taking whatever action it thinks best in the matter of restricting immigration; and we are taking by this bill, a step which will mean the effective restriction of all Chinese immigration, indeed of all classes of Chinese, coming to this country other than such as it is admitted, come to this country in our interest as much as in the interest of the Chinese themselves.

We hope to have trading relations with the Orient. We hope in some way to make our contribution to their civilization along with what other countries may be doing in that regard. We have no desire to exclude from Canada the scholars of China. We have no desire to exclude the young men and the young women of China who may wish to come to our universities and study here with a view to gaining some of the enlightenment of which we boast so much, to carry that enlightenment back to their own country. If in the matter of world competition we are going to hold our own with the Orient eventually, it will be by the standards in the Orient being raised, rather than by any other means, that that great end will be achieved. To the degree that we help the Orient in this particular we will be benefiting ourselves. In the legislation being brought forward, we have made provision that certain of the classes whom it is in our interest as well as in the interest of the Chinese to have come to Canada, may be permitted to come, but permitted to come within such limits as the government at all times thinks wise—and not beyond that. The head tax is repealed by this law. In its place the bill provides that only certain persons are to be allowed to come to Canada. It makes no mention whatever in that connection of the labour class. To that extent the law is a complete exclusion of all labour coming from China. It is as regards Chinese labour in effect an exclusion law. On the other hand it does mention two or three classes which we think should be permitted to come. In regard to those classes, it leaves the control of the situation in the hands of the minister administering the Department of Immigration and the officers of that department. It is proposed to send to the Orient an officer under the control of the Minister of Immigration who will have to visé every passport before it will be accepted on this side. The minister has it in his power and will continue to have it in his power to make regulations under this act, with respect to any particular class that may be permitted to come in. Take the class to which my hon. friend has just referred, that of merchant. I agree with him absolutely that the list he has gone over is a list no government could ever countenance for one moment under the head of "merchants". I do think it is desirable, if we hope to trade with the Orient, that men who are in a position to carry on export and import trade to an extent that is likely to be of service to both countries should come to this country and by so coming promote further trade relations. I think if we permit them to come we ought to permit their wives and children to come with them. I do not think we should take the position that we will allow a merchant, a man of high business standing, to come to our country and start up in business, and subject him to the indignity of not being permitted to bring his wife and children with him. I would stand for a very rigid guarding of that provision, to see that the law was carried out to the letter, but this should always be taken into account as respects the legislation we are now proposing; namely that those who will be permitted to come to Canada from China will be determined, not after their arrival here, but before their departure from China, and will be determined by an officer of the government itself in accordance with the regulations which the minister may think it wise to lay down.

With regard to merchants, I think it should be understood that only those who would come within the category I have mentioned, of persons carrying on business in a large way, the business of import and export as between Canada and China, should come within that definition. I think it would be wiser to leave it to the minister by regulation further precisely to define what comes within that broad definition, than that we should attempt, in the statute, to insert words which might occasion offence to the Chinese. Similarly in regard to students, where we reserve to ourselves the right to visé the passports of those who come, by an officer of our government stationed in China, who has to be statisfied as to the bona fides of the student being admitted. I think we ought to be prepared to allow a certain latitude to the minister as to whom to admit. The United States, Great Britain and other countries have all felt it to their advantage, not merely to admit these students, but to encourage them to come. After the Boxer uprising, the United States' government thought it was a wise thing to turn over for the purpose of encouraging Chinese students to come to the United States, all the money which came to it by way of indemnity. These Chinese students have come, have studied in the universites and have gone back, and they have been missionaries, not merely of the gospel, many of them, but also missionaries of trade, so far as the United States is concerned. I remember having a few years ago the privilege of travelling in China, and seeing something of the country, and how great was my surprise to see the extent to which the supplies in the trains were American merchandise,—the glassware, the cutlery, stoves, clocks, many different kinds of manufacture. Wherever one went in one's travels, in the hotels, and elsewhere one found traces of American manufacture. That applies also to canned fruit, vegetables and the like. Why should Canada not share in that great trade, as well as the American people? We cannot share in it if we are going to shut everybody out and adopt a system of complete exclusion.

Mr. McQUARRIE: How did the Americans get that trade? They exclude Chinese.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member has not listened to what I have just been saying in regard to the American government encouraging the students to come. They have gone by hundreds to the universities in the states. What is the sense of talking of American exclusion? They are being encouraged at this very time to come.

Mr. CLARK: What have the students to do with the trade of the country?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Surely the hon. member has intelligence enough to see the bearing of a matter of that kind.

Mr. CLARK: I asked a question and I thought I might get a courteous answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought I was giving a courteous answer. If the hon. member wants me to explain in A. B. C. fashion I can do so.

Mr. CLARK: I was asking the question without any reflection on the minister's intelligence, and I thought I might get an answer without any reflection on my intelligence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I beg pardon if I have reflected upon the hon. member's intelligence. I did not intend so to do. If the hon. member were to spend three or four years in China as a student, coming in touch with the commercial, industrial and social life of China, when he returned to this country, let us assume as a professor, a teacher of economics or any other subject in one of the universities, he would be the very first to tell his pupils and to tell those with whom he came in contact, of the products, manufactures and other commodities which China was in a position to send to Canada. He would be in a very short time, unless I mistake altogether his character in that regard, a missionary in respect to many of the questions which affect relations between China and ourselves. The extent to which the Chinese students have studied in American universities is vitally affecting the relations between the United States and China to-day. They go back to China educated men, the men who control the press of their country, who find their way into parliament, who become the diplomats of their country. They are the ones who are in the position to control, in a very large way, the whole question of trade relations between the countries. I think we have already suffered a great deal in this country through not having given a like encouragement.

Mr. STEVENS: If I may be allowed to interrupt, I wish to say that we admitted students, but where the hon. gentleman is in error both in regard to students and merchants is this: We are not objecting to the bona fide student as described here, in a Canadian institute of higher education at all, but the Chinese themselves deliberately evaded the regulations and brought in hundreds, indeed thousands, of Chinese who never went to any institute of learning. They were admitted on that understanding; but while they, perhaps, attend one of our public schools for a few days or a short time, they are afterwards found here and there in ordinary labour.

The evasion in the case of merchants is of a similar character, and the difficulty is this: The Chinese put an altogether different interpretation on the prefession of merchant from what we do. For instance, a dozen Chinament will form a little company to run a store, and every one of them individually is a merchant. We would say that there was one merchant there and eleven clerks. They say that there are a dozen merchants, and in this way they evade and have evaded the regulations. I pointed out a moment ago that we used to have only two or three merchants coming in a month, whereas the number suddenly leaped to 400 a month, showing that there was a deliberate conspiracy to evade the regulation. Therefore, if the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) will catch our complaint, it is not against merchants or students, if we can pin down the correct interpretation. In this regard I think students are correctly defined, but merchants are not. That is the point that I tried to raise a moment ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am absolutely at one with the hon. member in what he says about preventing evasions and the like. I would not countenance for a moment any evasion of the law by either student or merchant. I am pointing out to him that this legislation differs from anything in the nature of regulations we have heretofore had, in that under its provisions we contemplate placing in China an officer of our own government who will himself have to visé every passport. He will be under the direction of the minister, and, if so desired he can be in communication with the minister, by cable day by day. If he finds that merchants are making application to him in too large numbers, he can take his time to find out the standing of the men who are coming, and if the minister's regulations are not broad enough to cover what we all understand and what we want to have understood as coming within the provisions of the law, the minister will have an opportunity of amending his regulations accordingly. What I am asking the committee to consider at the moment is the international aspect of the language we use in the statutes. These enactments are read in China as well as in this country. If we can by regulation meet effectively the object that we in Canada are all aiming at, and avoid what is invidious and what makes for international illwill, surely it is to the interest of all classes in this country that we do so. I cannot think of anyone who will take exception to that point of view. The government has adopted an effective method of restriction by undertaking to see that passports are viséd in China before the persons to whom the passports are given leave that country. If we can agree upon the status of the man, for example, who is to be included within the merchant class, we ought to treat him in a generous way, and we ought also to take a broad and liberal attitude as regards students.

When I was interrupted, I was about to say that I know General Sir Arthur Currie of McGill and Sir Robert Falconer of Toronto both feel very strongly on this subject. They have represented to the government that they would be glad to see Chinese students coming to their respective universities. We must go this much further. If we are to expect students to attend our universities, we must give them the privilege of attending some preparatory college for a short time before they are admitted to the universities. All of that need be only a matter of regulation; it need not lend itself to evasion unless a government wished to lend itself to that, and I do not think any government would do so. The point I wish to make at the moment is the wisdom of recognizing the dual aspect of the legislation we are discussing, the economic and the international aspects, the care that must be taken in discussing international questions, while dealing with matters which on this side are primarily of economic concern.

Mr. TOLMIE: British Columbians as a whole are anxious to maintain international relations and also to maintain our high standard as a Christian community; but we do not want to do that at the expense of giving up our country to the Asiatics. I will just read this telegram from the Retail Merchants' Association of Victoria:

> Retail Merchants of Victoria strongly opposed to Bill 45 feeling that the word "merchant" is much too vague. Oriental question in British Columbia has become alarming.
> H. O. KIRKHAM,
> President.

We might glance just for a moment at the result of past legislation. In 1885, we had a head tax passed of $50 a head on Chinese. In 1901, this was increased to $100; in 1904, to $500, and in 1919, an order in council was passed keeping out skilled and unskilled labour. Then certain privileges were extended to students, and as has already been pointed out by one of the representatives from British Columbia, the Chinese abused that privilege. After a "student" came in he would attend a school for a short time, and then he would be found peeling potatoes in some hotel kitchen. He was not a student at all, but simply a labourer. We extended certain privileges to merchants, and in one year, 1921, no less than 1,145 "merchants" came in under that heading. In 1904, the Chinese population of Canada was only 14,000. It is now 58,000 and 38,000 of those are located in British Columbia. This indicates that our past legislation has been totally inadequate to meet the situation. I feel, like some hon. gentlemen who have spoken already, that if we do not have total exclusion, we must have something as close to that as possible, if we are going to get along and attain the ends we desire.

In the present bill before the House, the clause dealing with merchants leaves the question pretty wide open. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the Prime Minister, and I must say that if this inspector whom he is going to send over to the other side is to keep out Chinese merchants or to have them come in only under the proper head, strict regulations will have to be made and carried out to the letter. This is of the utmost importance to us in British Columbia. I have lived in British Columbia all my life, and I can remember when in Victoria there was only one Chinese merchant; now we have thousands of them located there, and there are thousands of them in Vancouver. We have them controlling several lines of agricultural work; we have them controlling practically, or very nearly, the whole of the fishing business and gaining on us every year, and they are becoming more powerful now that they have money as they did not have before. If the white people of British Columbia are going to be able to compete with these Chinese, they must lower their standard of living, live under cheaper conditions and in cheaper houses, wear cheaper clothes and eat less food. The Chinese do not and never will assimilate with our people, as has been proved to be the case in every country in which they have settled. We quite understand that the application of regulations that will be necessary will bring hardship on some people; but we must meet the situation courageously and apply those regulations in an effective manner. The whole aim of our immigration regulations and laws is to keep out the bad and undesirable people, and to let in those that are good.

I might refer for a moment to conditions existing across the Pacific, the tremendous populations there. In China alone there is a population of 400,000,000, many of whom have been kept on the edge of starvation owing to the heavily populated condition of the country, with the result that it has been found in all countries where they have settled, they are able to put up a class of work more cheaply and under rougher conditions than any other labour that is to be found in the world.

Let us consider what might happen in the case of a little laxity in our immigration laws. In the United States at the end of the Civil War, there was a coloured population of only 400,000. This has increased until at the present time there are over 10,000,000. Surely that is enough to make Canadians sit up and take notice of this Asiatic question. We cannot be too particular in allowing immigration to come to this country, for the reason that the very same men whom we are allowing in now, and their offspring, will in the future play an important part in building up the national life of this country, and the standard of our national life should be jealously guarded in every possible way.

I quite agree that we should like to have oriental trade, but if we are going to permit any laxity in connection with Chinese immigration or make too many concessions in order to get this trade, we shall find in all probability that we shall secure this trade at the expense of many of the industries of the country. My experience of Asiatics, and particularly the Chinese, has been in the past that they will buy where they can get goods cheapest. If we have goods to sell at prices that appeal to the Chinese, the 400,000,000 on the other side will not spend much time arguing about the privileges extended to the 50,000 or 60,000 Chinese here. One of our principal troubles in the past has been I think the inability of the people east of the Rocky mountains to grasp the Asiatic situation in its full significance. Many persons in the professions have contended that we should allow more Chinese to come into the country. I can quite understand that, because there are no Chinamen in this country engaged in these professions; and the professional people have taken good care to preclude Chinese competition against themselves, having fenced their professions around with various regulations to render such competition impossible. But the farmers, the labourers, the laundry people, the restaurant people, the tailors, and now even the merchants of the country are feeling this competition. In British Columbia we have passed year after year certain legislation asking the federal government to put into effect a proper exclusion of Asiatics. This matter has been urged principally by the business organizations who have passed resoiutions and forwarded them to Ottawa. The business people have fallen into line behind these resolutions but with no definite results, for we find to-day that the Chinese are still coming in across the Pacific and locating in our country in large numbers, in spite of such regulations as have been enforced; which proves that our laws have been inadequate in the past to meet this situation. The Chinese question has now assumed very serious proportions, so that we have to-day a difficult oriental problem to solve. I think that the people of Canada must wake up to the danger from this Asiatic invasion from across the Pacific. If we hope to preserve this country to the white man, our legislators and the members of this House should realize the great responsibility that rests on their shoulders not only for the protection of those people who are now in this country, but in the interests of the generations to come. I must oppose the bill in its present form and hope the minister will have a suitable amendment to offer.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think it goes without saying that the experience of the past has taught us that regulations and even statutes do not always accomplish what they are intended to do; and in discussing this matter with the law officers who drafted the bill I thought it would be preferable that the definition of the word "merchant" be left to regulation rather than embodied in the statute. I take it that the object to be attained is not to interefere with trade but as far as possible to restrict the permanent immigration of Chinese nationals into Canada. There can be no objection to the student body, nor do I hear anyone voicing any such objection. Rather, there is a feeling that we should encourage Chinese students to come to Canada to take advantage of our educational institutions in order that they might go back and be emissaries to assist in the development of trade. But I can hardly agree with some of the views expressed opposite that if we go practically to the point of total exclusion there will not be a falling off of trade between Canada and China, which is beginning to be an important factor. However, I am not stressing that point; I merely say that we are agreed about one class at all events, namely, the students who will go into the universities.. It has been pointed out to us since the bill was drafted that the qualification of the young men or young women passing out of the high schools of China is not sufficiently high to permit the immediate entry of Chinese students into our universities, and we shall have in some way to provide for their attendance at a school for a period of six months or more to qualify them for the university. This is necessary; but I wish to assure the committee that care will be taken that no students coming to Canada to enter the university shall be allowed, as the hon. member (Mr. Tolmie) pointed out, to alter their purpose as they have done in the past and enter some occupation after five or six months. It is the intention of the department to follow up by registration each national of China resident in Canada. Whether he is a British subject or not, the Chinese resident in Canada will have to register. I have been endeavouring to keep in mind the objection raised, particularly in British Columbia, and indeed it applies to other parts of Canada, that the Chinese are entering into active competition with the citizens of this country in practically every mercantile pursuit. Having that in mind I thought it fair to the committee that I should intimate the kind of regulation which would be forwarded to the official in China whose duty it will be to visé passports before Chinese may be allowed to come to Canada. This regulation is to define as nearly as possible the sort of person we propose to allow to enter this country. The following gives an idea of what we intend to provide in this respect:

It is contemplated making an agreement with China to limit the number per annum of Chinese merchants to be admitted to Canada, and in such an event the government of China would be asked to issue passports to none but bona fide merchants who devote their undivided attention to mercantile pursuits, who have at least $2,500 invested in business in China and are prepared to invest a like amount in Canada in a business dealing exclusively in goods grown, produced or manufactured in China.

Hon. gentlemen will see that a merchant according to this definition would be a man who had been engaged in mercantile pursuits in China previous to making application for passport from the Chinese government; and having that passport visé by the Canadian officer he would require to have been in business in China and had $2,500 invested therein. In addition, when he came to Canada he could engage only in business dealing in goods grown, manufactured or produced in China.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Have you any control over him?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Absolutely. The act provides also that if he fails in any respect in carrying out the provisions under which he entered Canada—and my hon. friend will realize that not very many will qualify under that provision—he shall be subject to deportation.

Mr. McQUARRIE: If he engages in any other occupation?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes. Once he departs from the provisions surrounding his entry into Canada, in other words, if he engages in any other business than that described, the provision of deportation shall apply.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What section has the minister quoted?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): What I have read is not in the bill; I am giving the regulation which we intend putting into effect to define the word "merchant."

Mr. McQUARRIE: But the deportation clause?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend will find it in section 27, if I remember correctly.

Mr. NEILL: I understood the minister to say that he proposes to make an arrangement with the Chinese government to limit the number of immigrants coming in per annum. What is the limit?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I was quoting from the memorandum dealing with the definition of a merchant, namely, an individual engaged in mercantile pursuits. He might be engaged in any mercantile pursuit in China, but whatever line he was engaged in he had to have $2,500 invested in his business.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. NEILL: The minister began by saying; It is proposed to make an arrangement with China to limit the number. Will he look at that memorandum again and tell us what is to be the limited number?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend will have to treat that in the larger sense. Of course, there is a very great limitation of numbers in regard to Chinese immigration bcause it is confined now to merchants, students and members of the diplomatic corps.

Mr. NEILL: Clearly the minister proposes to make an arrangement to limit the number of Chinese merchants that are to come in in any year.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, my hon. friend has taken the wrong interpretation.

Mr. NEILL: Will he read it again?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Certainly; but it does not deal definitely with the word "merchant". There is a definition of the word " merchant " by regulation. This is a restriction all around.

Mr. NEILL: Will the hon. minister read the first few lines of that regulation?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I know perfectly well what my hon. friend has in mind The reference to numbers means numbers of merchants.

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): But that is not our intention.

Mr. McBRIDE: The right hon. Prime Minister stated that he would allow merchants to bring in their wives and families. I understand there are very few Chinese merchants in Canada that have not two or three wives. Would the Prime Minister admit to Canada only the children of the merchant by one wife, or would he let in the whole of them?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would allow him one wife and any children by that wife.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Which wife?

Mr. CLARK: Did I understand the minister to say in introducing this section that this bill is merely intended to enact regulations which are already in existence?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No. The old act provides for the entry of Chinese on payment of head tax; there was no restriction on the number of immigrants so long as they each paid the stipulated head tax. Within recent months we have refused admission of Chinese immigrants under a general regulation. Now we are by this bill naming the individuals who may come to Canada.

Mr. CLARK: The effect of the regulation and the bill is the same?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend does not see that the general regulation can be used the other way at any moment. At the present time the general regulation is taken advantage of to exclude labourers. The government has taken that step within the last three months; but another government might take an entirely opposite line under that general regulation. The purpose of this bill is to do away with the possibility of letting in any number of Chinese labourers regardless of regulations.

Mr. CLARK: This particular section is objectionable in that it gives full power to the minister or a representative of the department to say what class of merchants are to be admitted. The minister has given us a regulation which he proposes to bring into force. It does seem to me that there should be no doubt in the minds of anyone here as to the meaning of the term "Chinese merchant." I think that should be clearly defined. I am not sure whether the minister's definition goes far enough or not, but I think we should define what a Chinese merchant is, and if the definition does not work in practice next year we can amend it. But it will have this result, we will all know what the effect of this measure is. If the minister is allowed to make regulations he may change them from time to time, or another government might disapprove of the spirit of this bill and by changing the regulations change the whole law. It really comes down to order in council government. It savours of autocracy—the very thing my hon. friend has taken exception to in the past.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I listened with much interest to the remarks of the Prime Minister and particularly what he said respecting students. I feel that we are all agreed on the advisability of allowing students to come into this country under proper safeguards, providing they are bona fide students who are attending our universities. Even in the resolution which I had the honour to move last session asking for the exclusion of orientals it was distinctly stipulated, if not in the resolution itself, in the discussion which took place upon it, that we were not at all opposed to the entry of students. But we all know that there has been a great deal of illegal entry under this head in years past, and I am afraid that the same kind of thing has kept up. I have in my hand a telegram from the secretary of the Retail Merchants' Association of New Westminster dated March 24th of this year, reading as follows:

> On Thursday March 22nd Chinese employees at Rainbow Shingle Mills Port Coquitlam struck work owing to a white man having got a job on a saw cutting twenty-four inch shingles, which saw one of their nationality was removed from and put to another machine to cut shingles of smaller size. Mills meantime closed down but expected to resume Monday with white crew working. At United Shingle Mills here as packer Chinese boy who entered country as a student one month ago. Association desire you be acquainted of these facts in view of present bill before parliament.

What does that show? It shows that a Chinese boy admitted as a student was found one month later working in a shingle mill at Port Coquitlam, and not only was he working there, but he was the cause of a strike in that mill because of the fact that his employer had the hardihood to change him from a saw at which orientals had been previously employed and put a white man in his place. That shows that we must be very careful in admitting students. I am sure the minister realizes that to the full and that the proper precautions will be taken. I took occasion to draw this telegram to his attention, and he has I think made some investigation. He has asked me to get him further particulars, for which I have sent, and, I am sure that when this Chinese is located the minister will take steps to have him deported.

As has already been stated, we have a large number of Chinese merchants in British Columbia. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre has told us about conditions in the city of Vancouver. I might add that since the figures which he quoted were compiled it appears that the orientals have been invading still further the business life of Vancouver, and at the present time there are something like two thousand trade licenses issued to orientals in that city alone. The same condition applies to other cities and towns in British Columbia, except, of course, that the other places being smaller have fewer oriental merchants, but the proportion keeps up. I know that in the city of New Westminster we have a great many oriental merchants. They are engaged in various lines of business and in almost every trade, and seem to be acquiring a very strong foothold.

I have tried to approach this subject from a non-political standpoint; I think we have all done that. We are not trying to make political capital out of it. On various occasions I have even gone to the extent of making excuses for the Minister of Immigration by pointing out that he had a very difficult duty to perform. I have also on many occasions stated my belief that he was approaching this question in a conscientious way and was trying to do his very best to keep the orientals out of this country. Perhaps I went too far in that direction. Possibly I have been blamed to a certain extent for the want of initiative on the part of the minister, but I still believe that he is really trying to do something in this important matter.

I have in my hand a telegram from the secretary of the Retail Merchants' association of New Westminster dealing with this particular bill. It is dated April 24 of this year and is addressed to myself:

Being advised from Ottawa that the government will not eliminate or change the word "merchant" in bill No. 45 we the Retail Merchants Association of New Westminster notwithstanding your assurance of the fair-mindedness of the Minister of Immigration—

I would draw the minister's attention to that statement and remind him of my previous remark, that I have always endeavoured to point out that he was fair-minded on this question and was trying to do his best:

—cannot but feel that Department of Immigration in proposing to allow Chinese merchants to enter into this country do so as a direct reproof to the great body of retail merchants of Canada for their concerted action last year on the oriental question, and as free Canadian citizens we resent and protest with all our power this aggression on the part of the government. However we still hope and pray that the government will see fit to change this act so that the menace to the retailer and to the people of Canada of an ever increasing army of Chinese merchants will be eliminated. Feeling very intense here. We feel every effort should be exerted now. Wire us our expense if there is anything further we can do we have also wired Premier and the Minister of Immigration as follows:

"We the Retail Merchants Association of New Westminster with a membership of 102 employing upward of 900 wage earners as a class resent the action of the government in drafting a Chinese immigration bill that will allow Chinese merchants to enter Canada to open up business in direct competition with Canadian merchants and we respectfully implore that the word 'merchant' be changed to the wording submitted by the Retail Merchants Association of Canada".

I have here that proposed amendment and I intend to suggest this amendment to the committee:

That section 5 be amended by striking out subsection (c) (1) and substituting therefor the following:

(c) (1) Trade representatives—

It replaces "merchants" by "trade representatives"—

[Mr. McQuarrie.]

Trade representatives shall include sales agents and purchasing agents while representing bona fide Chinese exporters and importers carrying on international trade between Canada and China, buying from or selling to persons, firms, or corporations in Canada. No trade representative shall conduct any retail, wholesale, or jobbing warehouse or shop in Canada.

I suppose we are all agreed that trade between the countries should be encouraged, but the objection which I have is this: If the bill goes through in its present form we will have a further influx of Chinese merchants. They will not come for the purpose of doing business with their own people because there are enough Chinese merchants in the country now to attend to the wants of the Chinese who are here, and as we are not going to allow any more Chinese to come into Canada we cannot expect that there will be an additional growth of business for Chinese merchants. So that there is really no necessity for that class of merchants in this country. If the Chinese merchants are confined to international trade then, of course, it will be quite in order to allow them to enter Canada.

In this same connection I have a statement which was made by the late Theodore Roosevelt dealing more particularly with the Japanese, because the Chinese have been excluded from the United States for a great many years. To-day they have no Chinese question there. They have a Japanese problem which is very serious, particularly in the Pacific states of Washington, Oregon and California. That situation was brought about by the restriction of Japanese immigration as against the exclusion of the Chinese, and it is a very clear and convincing demonstration of the utility of the two methods. Now, Theodore Roosevelt was a friend of the Japanese. He was a student and was one of the greatest Americans of the present generation. In a letter written on the 11th of February, 1909, he expressed himself in a very fair-minded manner when he declared himself as follows:

Let the arrangement between Japan and the United States be entirely reciprocal. Let the Japanese and Americans visit one another's countries with entire freedom as tourists, scholars, professors, sojourners for study or pleasure, or for puposes of international business—

That is what my amendment suggests, for the purposes of international business.

—but keep out labourers, men who want to take up farms, men who want to go into the small trades—

I call particular attention to that.

—men who want to go into the small trades, or even in professions where the work is of a non-international character; that is, keep out of Japan those Americans who wish to settle and become part of the resident working population, and keep out of America those Japanese who wish to adopt a similar attitude. This is the only wise and proper policy.

It is merely a recognition of the fact that, in the present stages of social advancement of the two peoples, whatever may be the case in the future, it is not only undesirable, but impossible that there should be intermingling on a large scale, and the effort is sure to bring disaster. Let each country also behave with scrupulous courtesy, fairness and consideration to the other.

It seems to me that we can adopt exactly the same attitude in this country without in any way expressing any antagonism towards the Chinese; and I may say that I appreciate the good qualities of the Chinese in many ways, particularly in a business sense. The Chinaman is a good business man, he is a fair business man, and when he sells you an article you get what he represents it to be. He is thoroughly honest and in every way is a good business man. I have every respect for the industry of the Chinaman, and as far as it goes in their own country, the Chinese no doubt are very estimable people. The great difficulty is that in this country they cannot be assimilated and therefore they always exist as a foreign element in our midst. It is a bad thing for us to encourage Chinese merchants to come to this country because they do not help to build up Canada. What money they make here, or a great proportion of the money they make here, goes back to China. The same thing applies to a great extent to the Japanese. If inquiry were made at the post offices in British Columbia cities or towns we would be surprised at the large sums that are sent out weekly and monthly by the Japanese and Chinese. In the case particularly of the latter, the money that they make here goes back in great part to China. As far as the Chinese are concerned their great ambition is to return to their native land after they have made a fortune in this country. They live in an altogether different way to what we do. In a great many cases the Chinese, and the Japanese also, live in their own stores. A Chinaman can make a success of his business on such a small margin of profit that a white man cannot compete with him; that has been demonstrated very clearly out in British Columbia. I would say to the minister "Let us encourage trade with China as far as we can do so, but do not let us sacrifice this country simply for the purpose of endeavouring to pander to the Chinese."

I would say that if this amendment is adopted it will strengthen the hands of the government. It would be better and less embarrassing for the government to have a provision of this kind in the act itself rather than in the regulation. I am opposed to the principle of putting such an important enactment in a regulation rather than in the act itself. It seems to me it would be more satisfactory for the government to be able to point to an act rather than to have to say "Here is a regulation which provides certain things." Because the answer is always ready "Well, a regulation can be changed by order in council. Why not pass an order in council amending your regulation so as to give us the conditions as we desire them?" I would strongly impress upon the minister the advisability of clearing this thing up. I think it would be a great mistake to allow the bill to go through in its present form. It would be embarrassing to him, and I am sure it would bring about a condition of affairs which later on would be very disturbing. We have enough Chinese merchants in the country now, certainly in British Columbia and I think from our experience you should know that the Chinese, and the Japanese for that reason, are not going to be kept out of this eastern country merely because of the climate. I think you will find, if this thing goes on, that later on you will have here a great many Chinese merchants. You are getting them now. You have them in Ottawa, you have them in Toronto, you have them in Montreal. They are getting into all the large cities, and if you allow more of these Chinese merchants to enter the country you are going to be in very bad shape in a few years.

There is another thing that appeals to me and that is, that after a man comes here as a merchant, you have a great deal of difficulty in keeping tab on him. If a man cannot make a success as a merchant, what are you going to do with him? Are you going to send him back to China? I think you will find a great deal of difficulty in doing that. You are finding it very difficult now to deport drug addicts. Objections of all kinds are raised, and, as far as my information goes, you have been unsuccessful in deporting drug addicts. When you get them into the country you have practically no control over them, and if a man is allowed to come into Canada as a merchant you have no guarantee that, in a very few years, or a very few months for that matter, he may not be engaged in some other business. I think the proper thing to do would be to insert some kind of an amendment. If this amendment proposed is not satisfactory to the minister, possibly he can word the amendment in some other way, but the result to be desired is that we shall not allow Chinese to come here as merchants, to compete with our own people. It is too dangerous.

Mr. MacKELVIE: I merely desire to place on record a communication received from the Retail Merchants' Association of my town, similar in purport to that read by other members from British Columbia this afternoon. It reads:

Re Bill 45. We view with alarm government proposal permitting Chinese merchants entry to Canada. Feel confident you will strenuously urge elimination of term "merchants" or request amendment clearly defining status of merchants entering Canada for temporary or permanent residence.

In view of what has been disclosed by the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), and the member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie), regarding the rapidity with which the retail business of Vancouver and the other coast cities has been gobbled by orientals during the past few years, it is not surprising that the retail merchants of British Columbia towns view this bill with a great deal of well-grounded suspicion. Indeed, in my own city of Vernon, they have an added reason for feeling dubious as to the results, because they have an object lesson before their eyes in the manner in which the vegetable productions of the Okanagan country have been practically taken control of during the past few years by the Chinese and Japanese population.

I feel diffident and hesitant about speaking on this subject again this session. I have already spoken on two occasions regarding oriental immigration since this session opened, and I will restrict my remarks to a very small area, indeed. I merely desire to say that all past efforts in the way of restrictive measures have proved almost futile, that the wily oriental has found some means or subterfuge to circumvent any regulations that may have been imposed upon him, and he certainly will find in this word "merchant" in this act a loop-hole which will enable orientals to come, in increasing numbers, to British Columbia, unless his status is more definitely defined than in the statute. We feel that the minister and the members from the East can hardly realize the situation, and while we feel perfectly confident that it is the duty of the minister and of the departments of government to encourage trade and commerce with other nations, we also realize that you can purchase commerce at too dear a price, and the fact remains, and is staring us in the face in British Columbia, that if oriental immigration is to be allowed to continue, with the present spread and growth of the population already there by natural increase in a very short time indeed there will be very few white people in British Columbia with whom any oriental nation can carry on trade.

I do not know exactly whether the amendment proposed by the hon. member for New Westminister is the remedy that should be applied in this case, but I feef certain the minister will discover that, when he sends the administrator of this act to China, he will find that that gentleman, no matter what his qualifications may be, no matter how strong a character he may have, or how he may endeavour to fulfil his obligations, will be subjected to very great pressure indeed and will be offered all kinds of inducements to relax the restrictions. I regard that as altogether an unsafe way to carry on business. I should like very much to see the regulations which the minister proposes, and which seem reasonable in one respect, at least, to be embodied in this bill. I believe it is infinitely preferable to have a large tax imposed rather than to deal with the matter by means of regulations. The public men will know exactly what they have to depend upon, and I have little apprenhension—in fact I have none—as to any danger of offending the pride of any foreign nation by restrictive measures as to immigration. Surely, it is conceded that any country is privileged to impose such restrictive measures as it deems fair to itself, and no exception can be reasonably taken to any method to keep in our own hands the control of immigration into this country.

I am not going to labour the question any further. I merely rose to enter upon and record the protest received from the Retail Merchants' Association of my town, and to say that I am thoroughly of the opinion that it is far better to strain the act to the utmost in the way of restrictions than to leave any loop-hole, such as is permitted in this bill under consideration.

Mr. NEILL: I was under the impression when this bill was introduced that it was one to restrict Chinese immigration, but listening to the speeches this afternoon and evening I was beginning to wonder if, at least in British Columbia, or in some parts of British Columbia, there is not an impression that it is intended to increase Chinese immigration. We were told this afternoon, not from one, but from three or four sources, how the Retail Merchants' Association of this place or that place is all "het up" on this subject. One hon. member's wire said that they were "strongly opposed to the whole of Bill No. 45," and another member tells us they view the bill and its provisions with alarm. The retail merchants associations of British Columbia are to a certain extent, or to a considerable extent, very strongly affiliated with the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and we all know the scope, the policy and the politics of that particular body. I do not think we should give the impression from British Columbia that any strong body of the people there are opposed to this bill. Far from it. There are minor faults or minor flaws in the bill which I hope the government will see their way to remedy. That is what the committee is for. I would suppose, having introduced the bill and admitted the principle of it, the government will be consistent enough to see that it is made workable.

But apart from the minor faults, which I will briefly refer to later, I will say that the only fault I have to find is that the minister did not insert the words "Asiatic origin" instead of the words "Chinese origin" which would make it apply to Japanese. If he had taken that step how he would have immortalized himself in western Canada! We would have been hanging halos around his hallowed brow for all time to come. But apart from that feature, I think it must be admitted that this bill is a sincere attempt to carry out the assurances given last year by the Prime Minister, and it will meet with a certain measure of support in British Columbia so far, at least, as it goes. Just last week I picked up a British Columbia paper. You know they carry a column headed "Twenty Years Ago," and in that column it mentioned that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had moved in the House—this is about three weeks ago now—a motion to increase the Chinese head tax from $100 to $500. Of course the paper at that time applauded the increase. That, so far as I know, has been the only genuine attempt to deal with that question from that day to this, and twenty years have come and gone since then. It is only twenty years after that occasion that we again find a Liberal government taking hold of the situation.

There are one or two clauses that, I wish to point out, could be improved. Paragraph (b) of clause 5 says:

> The children born in Canada of parents of Chinese race or descent, who have left Canada for educational or other purposes, on substantiating their identity to the satisfaction of the controller at the port or place where they seek to enter on their return;

I think that should be made more definite. Only to ask them to substantiate their identity when they return is not sufficient. They ought to substantiate it before they go. Until recently, at all events, if we went home to Great Britain, which might be our native country, we had to have passports and to go through considerable red tape to get them. Surely it is not too much to ask Chinese children, who go to China intending to return to Canada, to substantiate their identity before they go, so that possibility of evasion when they return might be made less easy.

Paragraph (c) of clause 5 is the one that deals with merchants and students. That has been badly printed. By a mistake in the way it is printed, the intention is materially changed. The word "degrees" at the top of page 4 should be the end of a line, and then it should begin "who shall," in such a way that the words "who shall substantiate" would apply to both merchants and students. As it reads now, it gives the impression, which I have heard repeatedly commented upon, that the word "merchant" in subclause (1) has absolutely no restriction on it whatever, and that is the meaning of it as the paragraph is now printed. It goes on to say "students. . who shall substantiate" but for lack of precision in printing and its being printed in the way that I have mentioned, a wrong impression is given—it is really intended to say that both classes, merchants and students, shall substantiate their status. The way the paragraph is printed, it applies only to the one word "student," and this has given rise to the impression that the merchant is going to have a very wide-open door.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said that it was decided to determine who should be considered as merchants or students before they left China, and the drift of his remarks was that their status would be ascertained, if not decided, in China. As regards that clause, I was glad to hear that explanation; but the clause says only that the passports shall be endorsed or vised by a Canadian immigration officer at the place where the Chinamen leave. But it also says that the final decision shall be at the port of entry, because there the Chinamen shall substantiate their status to the satisfaction of the controller, subject to the approval of the minister. We have there a sort of dual control. Certainly it would appear to me that the first officer in China had little or nothing to do except to put his imprimatur on the passport. If it was intended that he should be the deciding official, his powers in that regard should be better defined. As two men are involved, this matter of putting the visé on the passport will drift into a mere formality. He will do what is formally known as visé-ing a passport; he will simply put his name on it. I think the bill could be improved a great deal in that respect.

As regards students the clause says that students coming to Canada properly endorsed, and so on, shall be allowed in free. The provision should be made not only to ensure that they continue to be students while in Canada, but that they leave Canada at the end of their period of education. As the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) pointed out, there was a case quite recently where a student, not long after coming into Canada turned out to be labouring in a mill. Under conditions as outlined, there is no real check.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Under clause 27, the moment a man ceases to belong to any of the exempt classes, he is liable to deportation.

Mr. NEILL: He is liable under clause 27 to be picked up in the street if he is found to be in Canada without any right, so to speak. But who is to find him and who is to pick him up? I would make this suggestion: Supposing 200 students come into Canada and they enter a college for a fixed period. If they are really genuinely going to be educated, the Chinese comptroller in Vancouver should have knowledge of those boys, of where they are and to what schools they are going. He could once a year or so check the records of the school or university in order to find out if they are still students. Let him keep in touch with the schools or universities and if so many graduate say this year, he will expect to see so many educated Chinese boys leave the country. The way the situation is at present, they come in and as my hon. friend for New Westminster says, they drift away, they sneak away, and if they do put in a perfunctory education for a few months, they leave then. There is no possible means under clause 27 of keeping in touch with these students. A Chinaman may get into court for some offence and you can ask him where his papers are and so on; but it would be more satisfactory, easier and cheaper, to check him up in the college from time to time than to chase him all over the province, in the hope of finding him in some odd corner.

The definition of "merchant" should have been in clause 2, amongst the other definitions. I can not say that I altogether agree with the amendment proposed by the hon. member for New Westminster. I think it is desirable that we should encourage our trade with the orient. We all admit that and I do not think the suggestion of the hon. member for New Westminster quite covers that, because he restricts the definition to a man acting practically as a commision agent. There would be no objection to a man acting as a wholesaler of Chinese or oriental imports in Canada, provided that there was no evasion.

I think the regulations mentioned by the Acting Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) this afternoon, although I could not get him to read them the second time and I only heard them read once, seemed to be quite appropriate and sufficient to check fraudulent entry of merchants. He should, however, put that regulation, which he says is in existence, into the bill, and it would meet the whole situation. The worst of a regulation is this: that it is liable to be abrogated at the whim of one man. This minister might be all right; but the next one might not, or his deputy might not and it is not wise to have the whole substance of a piece of legislation depend upon the whim of one man in the department. If the definition is sufficient to effect the purpose aimed at, and it can be put in a regulation, surely it can be put into the bill, and in that case there will be no trouble about the matter. I would also suggest that the number entering in one year should be restricted by joint agreement, so that not more than so many shall be allowed to enter in any one year.

The minister might well consider the idea of holding over this clause until the next time the bill comes down and having printed his amendment and that of the hon. member for New Westminster so that we could study them to better advantage. There are several other small things in this bill that need re-adjustment, but we can deal with them as we come to them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With most of the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Neill), I for one agree. He clearly draws a distinction between an evasion of the law through the endeavour of some Chinese coming into the country to act in a fraudulent manner, and an effort on the part of the administration to permit those who, in the interest of the country, should be allowed to come in, to enter in a way which will be thoroughly honourable and in accordance with recognized procedure. The various communications that have been read have, for the most part, come from Retail Merchants' Associations, and evidently it is the retailers who are afraid of Chinese competition in their trade. If that is the case, might I suggest to my hon. friends from British Columbia that, perhaps, if the word "merchant" were changed to read "merchants engaged in import and export trade," that would remove any of the serious or justifiable alarm which retail merchants have and at the same time permit international trade of a character which it is eminently desirable to foster between the two countries? I would not object to the greater part of the amendment my hon. friend has suggested, were he to couple it with the words I have used, so that the section would read:

Merchants engaged in import and export trade, including sales agents and purchasing agents while representing bona fide Chinese exporters and importers carrying on international trade between Canada and China, buying from or selling to persons, firms or corporations in Canada.

If these two sentences were incorporated in the act they would pretty effectively cover what the committee is aiming at and at the same time they would not be invidious in any way to persons who might be sensitive on matters of this kind. In proposing this I would draw the attention of the committee to the last part of section 3 which has not yet been enacted but which will undoubtedly pass substantially as it is later on. It gives to the Governor in Council, in other words, the minister, power to make regulations providing for the payment of fees for the furnishing of substantial certificates, endorsing passports, "and other administrative work in connection with the carrying out of this act." Under that power the minister, with this definition of merchant before him, would be in a position to supplement the definition by whatever regulations appear to be demanded by the necessities of the case. My hon. friend in referring to the students has mentioned the desirability of keeping track of this class of immigrants as they come into the country. I can hardly imagine a minister who would not make regulations which would contemplate that course being followed. I believe however that it is preferable to leave to the minister the making of such regulations rather than to have the act itself declare that every Chinese student, regardless of who he may be or of the home from which he comes should be kept track of from day to day and year by year, by some system of registration, from the moment he comes to the country to the moment he leaves it. I think that regulation can effect all that is necessary in this regard. If this broader definition would meet the situation, the government would be agreeable to incorporating the words I have cited in the act itself. I hope that this meets with my hon. friend's approval.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Would not the Prime Minister and the Acting Minister of Immigration be willing to leave this matter over as suggested by the member for Comox-Alberni so that we might study the proposed amendment?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I merely wished to present it to the committee with that end in view. I think it would be well to leave it over and proceed to the other sections.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If hon. gentlemen have any suggestions to make regarding students I should be glad to have them now, because if I have any amendments to make I desire to have all the views of hon. members before me.

Mr. STEVENS: I would call the attention of the minister to the last three or four lines of the section which refers to a passport:

Issued in and by the government of China and endorsed by a Canadian immigration officer.

If I am correctly informed, the government of China with headquarters at Peking is not functioning in the Canton district from which practically all immigrants to Canada come. There is a de facto government at Canton, a rebel government one might call it, I suppose, which controls the district, a very large area comprising two or three of the southern provinces; and I understand that the Peking government is not in control of that part of the country at all. Under these circumstances how could you get the endorsation of the Chinese government in respect of matters affecting immigrants from Canton?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Of course, the act is looking more or less to stable government in China. The first provision is that the passport shall be issued by the government; that is the first requirement that the student must comply with. I doubt myself that this would be practicable at the moment, with existing difficulties in China. As a matter of fact there are two governments there at the moment, and I presume that either government issuing a passport would have to be recognized.

Mr. STEVENS: I am afraid my hon. friend would find himself in serious difficulty. How can the Canadian government recognise a government which is at enmity with that government which is represented by the Consul-General from China in this country? The Consul-General with whom my hon. friend has been negotiating is the representative of the government that has its headquarters at Peking; and if my hon. friend were to recognize passports issued by the so-called rebel government of the south, from which district alone practically this immigration comes, I anticipate trouble. Frankly, I really apprehend serious difficulty when my hon. friend comes to place his officer over there. We had a great deal of difficulty in years gone by and I am very sceptical about the success of this movement with an officer of the Canadian government in that country.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not share my hon. friend's apprehension concerning these difficulties. I think he will notice that the final test in this case, as indeed it is with regard to all other nationals entering Canada, is at the port of Vancouver. That is where the final disposition of any national of China will take place; and as a matter of fact the port of landing in this country is the place of final disposition of the national of any other country coming to Canada. At the moment the British government is doing business with China and passports are being issued by that government that are recognised so far as China is concerned. I admit, of course, that there is a serious difficulty, but the act is looking to a settled condition of affairs in China. If conditions do not become settled there the result may be that we shall receive few people from that country, which I suppose would satisfy my hon. friend.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, absolutely. But this act is intended to repeal the present statute which does away with the $500 head tax, and there is a danger that in the hiatus between now and the time when there are settled conditions in China the courts may declare that it is possible for those immigrants to come in. We know from experience that unless legislation is very carefully drawn, applications will be made to the courts and my hon. friend's hands will be tied, as his predecessors' have been time and again. At the present moment the minister finds it impossible to deport some couple of hundreds of people convicted under the Drug Act, and this through no fault of his particularly—

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We had nothing to do with it.

Mr. STEVENS:—but because of the fact that the act has been so interpreted by the courts as to prevent the minister's acting. That is what I am afraid of here. I fear that the minister may find himself faced with a difficulty of that kind, and we might have thousands of Chinese landed here and experience another riot such as occurred in 1908.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The provisions of the act are being very much restricted; they apply practically to two classes of citizens of China.

Mr. STEVENS: I quite understand all that. I am merely calling attention to this matter and if the minister is satisfied I want to tell him that I am not, and we will cry quits so far as I am concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does not my hon. friend know that the existing act is not repealed until this act comes into force? The moment this act comes into force the class of Chinese admitted to come in under the head tax will be excluded. So that the hiatus my hon. friend talks about is a pure figment of the imagination.

Mr. STEVENS: I hope it is, but probably I shall have the pleasure of recalling this conversation to the attention of the government at some future date.

Mr. McBRIDE: Mr. Chairman, I have not very much to add to what has already been said on this subject. A number of telegrams have been read with respect to Chinese immigration; I have four along the same lines, but I shall refrain from putting them on Hansard. Expression has been given here to the opinion that it is quite satisfactory to the people of British Columbia to allow the entry of Chinese students. Well, I cannot see the matter in that light. Why should British Columbia educate the people of the Orient? Why cannot the orientals build schools in their own countries and get European teachers to come out and teach them English and French if they want to learn those languages? These orientals make very strong objections unless their children are allowed to be educated in our schools and colleges with our own boys and girls. I do not think it is right that oriental students should be allowed to mix with our young people. In Victoria last summer the orientals refused pointblank to be segregated from Canadian school children. To give the committee some idea of what the people of the East think on this question I will read a few extracts translated from an article which was published in an oriental paper. It stated:

> There is danger ahead. Discrimination has been shown in the school question and in the fishing question. This question is a life and death struggle to us Japanese, and we should determine our objective.

This is rather strong languege from people who come into our country although they know we do not want them here. The orientals must know that they are not wanted in British Columbia. And what is their object in coming into this country if they are putting up a "life and death struggle" as they call it? In my opinion their object is to get control of the Pacific coast, including all British Columbia.

I do not think orientals should be allowed into this country under any conditions. We do not have to bring people into our own houses simply because we do business with them and there is no reason why these orientals should come here and occupy our country simply because they want to do business with us. I see the South African authorities are talking of giving the orientals there a bonus to return home. I think this government could well afford to give back to every Chinaman here what we got from him—the $500 he paid to enter the Dominion—on condition he would leave, and thus rid the country of a whole lot of Chinamen and do ourselves a good turn.

In South Africa the people are talking of segregating the Chinese; that may have to be done yet in British Columbia, for the two races should not be brought together. It seems to me that if the good Lord had intended orientals and white people to live in the same country he would not have put the Pacific ocean between them. I think the people of the East should remain in their own countries. I do not see why we should admit them here and educate them in our own schools and colleges. I could cite a number of cases where the mingling of oriental children with our children in British Columbia has been a great detriment to the latter. The eastern ideals of morality and citizenship are entirely different to ours, and I do not see why our children's ideals should be lowered by their contact with the children of orientals. In China and Japan the men can have as many wives as they want, and there is no question but that this and similar views are drilled into our children where they are educated with the children of orientals. We do not want such ideas to be propagated here. Therefore I take very strong exception to allowing oriental students to come into this country to be educated.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, I should like to remove a misapprehension under which my hon friend is apparently labouring. He seems to think that it is the intention to have such students educated in British Columbia. As a matter of fact the clause in the bill relating to students has reference to universities conferring degrees. Undoubtedly if any university hesitates to take Chinese students they will not be admitted there. For instance, if the University of British Columbia thinks well not to admit Chinese students, why certainly these students will not go to that university. But Toronto, Kingston and Montreal universities are willing and anxious to take Chinese students. It seems to me it would be a mistake on the part of our people if we prevented educated young men and women from China getting the benefits of higher education here and then returning home to do what they can to acquaint the Orient with what my hon. friend has spoken of as the higher standards of living on this continent. I think we ought to be prepared, if we have it, to spread the light of our civilization in the Orient, and so far as I can see it our universities afford one of the best means to that end.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—At Vancouver and Victoria only, with several exceptions:

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the idea of this?

Mr. HUMPHREY: What is the idea of specifying Vancouver and Victoria?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): They are the principal ports at which most of the nationals of China will make application for entry. It is the intention of the government to keep a staff of officials at these ports to conduct proper examinations. It would be a very expensive proposition, for example, if we had to keep similar staffs at St. John, Halifax, Quebec and other ports.

Mr. STEVENS: We would be delighted if the minister would substitute St. John and Halifax for Vancouver and Victoria—or what might be better still, Montreal and Toronto. If that suggestion is acceptable to the minister I shall be very glad indeed.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think it will be admitted that the two ports mentioned are the natural ports through which most of the nationals of China do enter Canada.

Mr. HUMPHREY: It is my opinion that if the government would incorporate in this bill one or two of the eastern ports the people of British Columbia would take it upon themselves to exclude the Chinese from entering their province from the east.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Prohibited classes:

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the need of such prolixity in this clause? Are not these classes just the same as those prohibited from all countries?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why does not the clause simply read:

Classes prohibited under section so-and-so of the Immigration Act.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Not being a lawyer I cannot answer my hon. friend, except to say that you have within the bounds of the one act all the prohibited classes named without having to refer to the general Immigration Act.

Mr. STEVENS: There are no exemptions from the regular act?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It seems to me the better method of legislation would be to have one immigration act and then have, if there is going to be a distinction between China and other countries, parts applicable to 9 p.m. China or to any other country as to which special legislation applies. It would be a much more compact and comprehensive way of getting legislation on our books.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): To some extent I agree with my hon. friend, but he will notice there are provisions under the Chinese Immigration Act which do not appear in the other act. I can see no other reason for going to the trouble of inserting the prohibited classes of the general act, except that it saves the trouble of consulting the latter act in so far as Chinese immigration is concerned. It will also be noted that practically all the clauses of this bill apply peculiarly to Chinese immigration, and to it alone.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the government contemplate further legislation on Japanese immigration?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not further legislation at present, but I will have an announcement to make later with regard to Japanese immigration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will there be further legislation following that announcement?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might perhaps state to my right hon. friend that as I mentioned here some little time ago, negotiations have been carried on between this government and the Japanese government, and as a result of those negotiations the Japanese government themselves have offered to place a greater restriction on the classes of labour coming to Canada than has hitherto existed. They have expressed the hope that it will not be found necessary for the parliament of Canada to legislate in a manner which might create serious embarrassment to the government of Japan in Japan itself and they would hope that such restriction as they are prepared to place on the classes of labour to which we object will in the eyes of our government prove sufficient to prevent the necessity of introducing any invidious legislation. The government is prepared, at least for a time, to give the Japanese government the opportunity of revealing its intentions and good faith in this matter. If it should appear from the figures themselves, which probably will prove more eloquent than any words, that the restriction which the Japanese government itself is contemplating is not sufficient to meet the needs of the situation, then legislation may be necessary at a later stage.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not very familiar with the legislative history of the matter. Is there special Japanese immigration legislation now?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Japanese just come in under the general Immigration Act?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is an agreement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Subject to the mysterious agreement. Perhaps while I am on my feet I might make a few remarks as to the general principles that I think should underlie this character of legislation—in fact, the one principle; I do not think there is more than one. There has been some discussion as to how far we should go and how far we ought not to go in restricting immigration. It has not been carried on with a view to making any contrast of party history except on the part of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) and there is no need for such contrast at all. There have been progressive restrictions all through the last three score years. The last restrictive enactment on Chinese immigration was in the year 1921, when substantial effective restrictions were put on, not effective enough I know. There were other restrictions in 1917. These were under the late government.

Now I want to lay down this principle which I think is sound, which I think other countries have followed, and which our country must follow; that we should determine our immigration law not out of animosity to any country or to any race, not out of prejudice to any country or to any race, nor on the other hand out of a fear of the sensitiveness of any country or of any race, but solely out of consideration for our own internal domestic necessities. We have done that; we have done it all along, and we ought to continue to do it. Other countries have done it. Other countries have gone much farther than we.

How could it be said, for example, that in the legislation we have here consideration is shown for the sensibilities of China, that we have taken care not to offend the Chinese Empire, that there is no invidious distinction? Why, the whole bill is invidious, if you can have anything invidious in immigration legislation. I do not complain of it on that account. As long as the bill is founded on the just needs of our country from its domestic internal standpoint that is all that is required. But to argue that a bill excluding merchants would offend China but that this bill is all right and will not offend China, because under it merchants are admitted though it keeps out farmers, labourers, clerks, salesmen, professional men, laundrymen, all sorts and conditions of men, seems to me to verge on nonsense.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think that can be said.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, if there is any offence in the world the offence comes from distinctions between China and any other country. But we have to do it, and we have to do it on the basis of our own needs, and if it meets our own needs better to keep merchants out. then we ought to do it, and China would have no just cause of offence. China has an equal right so far as we are concerned to do the same thing. I believe—I will not say I believe, but I would not be very much surprised if in the course of time public opinion which is built upon and which grows out of public necessities, will demand more and more restrictions than any that are called for by hon. gentlemen behind me. It does not so demand to-day. Public opinion to-day is prepared in view of other things to be gained thereby to admit students, to admit trade representatives, not merchants, but trade representatives, for the sake as respects the first of making Canadian learning known throughout the world, for the sake as respects the second of developing the trade of our country. If other considerations later on weigh more heavily than those two, then public opinion will demand the exclusion of both. But the reason we exclude now until we get right up to trade representatives and up to students is simply because we have to do so for our protection in this country. That is the only principle that really governs us, and do not let us pretend that any other does; I do not think any other ever has. Just as soon as you select a country or a race and you place around it barriers and restraints that you do not apply to immigration in general, then as respects that country or race there is something invidious. But because it does exist it does not mean that it arises out of any feeling of unfriendliness, any feeling of international animosity or anything of that kind. It arises out of conditions peculiar to ourselves which we have to take care of in the interests of ourselves and of the world. I hope I have made myself clear.

I would define "merchant" if I were the minister. I am glad the government has consented at last to do so. It is simply foolish to argue that the Chinese are quite satisfied if merchants are defined by regulation, but that they would be offended if they are defined in the bill. We cannot stand on a foundation of that sort. I would define "merchant" if I were the minister, and I would define it most specifically so that there can be no dispute, for I say this to the minister: You are going to find your representative in China clothed with remarkable, extensive and very perilous powers, very perilous powers indeed, and you may find yourself in serious trouble for that reason. Do not have those powers any wider than you can possibly avoid. Let this parliament speak as to what a merchant should be. It really is intended to be defined for according to the statement of the minister himself, according to the proposal the Prime Minister later suggested to the committee, what is really intended is, not a merchant but a trade representative, a merchant, if you may so describe him, in the international sense as between two countries and two alone, China and Canada. Consequently I would define "merchant," and I would have some other definitions that we will arrive at before we reach the end of the bill. It would have been better if we had not passed clause 2 because it is clause 2 that will need to be amended. There must be something left to regulation, I admit, but the minimum should always be left, and if ever there was a bill where the least should be left to regulation it is such a bill as this.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Minister may authorize admission for specified period:

Mr. STEVENS: I think I correctly interpret the minister's intention when I say that the purpose of this clause is to reserve a right to admit persons under special request such as, clergy or the wives of some merchants, and so forth, who may be excluded by the provisions of the bill.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not think it is the intention of clause 9 to permit the permanent admission of any persons.

Mr. STEVENS: I was just coming to that. I would like, however, to draw the attention of the minister to the fact that this clause does permit of the admission of indentured labour. Now it does not so state, and it may not be in his mind to do so, but the clause as it stands would permit the entry of indentured labour. I am looking forward and this clause, perhaps, is one that will not be invoked very frequently and may become, for the time being a dead letter; but at some time, under pressure of some, perhaps by reason of ordinary circumstances, an application may be made to the Minister of Immigration who may be tempted to admit some indentured labour under this clause. To that I am most bitterly opposed; I do not believe in indentured labour under any circumstance. We had the experience many years ago of Chinese indentured labour and we want no repetition of that experience. Does the minister really consider this clause necessary?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I would like to say to my hon. friend that I have steadily stood out against representations made to widen the classes of people who would be admissible under clause 5—that is merchants and students virtually and the diplomatic corps; but there is one contention, and there seems to be good reason for it, that missionaries and teachers of Chinese origin might very well be admitted. Therefore, I think, under clause 9, for a restricted period, the minister might have that authority. Then again there is the case of tourists who wish to come and visit the country; they might be admitted under a permit. If my hon. friend sees an opportunity, at some future time, for some corporation, perhaps, to come to the minister and say "We want 100, or 150, or 200 labourers temporarily" that might be provided for in the bill if it is thought the power is too wide but I do think that clause 9 will be necessary and will be needed for legitimate purposes, although I may say frankly I would not for a moment consider that indentured labour should come in under its provisions.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend will admit that it could; the power is there. I know that it is not in his mind, but we have had the witness to-day of the transfer of one minister, a very excellent gentleman, from one department to another. My hon. friend may be Minister of Agriculture next session; we can never tell.

An hon. MEMBER: Minister of Justice.

Mr. STEVENS: No he would hardly be Minister of Justice because I do not think he has—shall I say?—the technique for that portfolio. But we might have a minister here who was prejudiced against the ideas of this bill; such a thing might possibly happen. So I would like to see that provided against, if it were possible. I am not prepared with an amendment offhand. The clause reads:

> The minister may authorize the admission to Canada of any person of Chinese origin or descent without being subject to the provision of this act—

It is a very broad clause, it ought to be restricted in some manner.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have no notion the power would be used for any other purposes than those I have named; and really the object of the clause is to avoid specifying in the bill any classes of people who might come into the country temporarily. However, it could be used for the purpose which my hon. friend has mentioned.

Mr. STEVENS: We might add the words:

> Provided however that this section shall not apply to the admission of labourers or artisans.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Labourers are excluded as the bill stands.

Mr. STEVENS: No, if the Prime Minister will look at this he will realize my point. Under this clause all other provisions of the act can be ignored. Let me repeat: I am not suggesting that that is the idea in the minister's mind at the present time because I know very well it is not; but the time might come in the future when perhaps some emergency, or imagined emergency, might arise and such an application might be made to bring in 50 or 100 Chinamen, something of that character, and it would just be the opening of the way for the abuse of the very idea that forms the basis of this legislation. I frankly feel that this clause should be restricted very considerably.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is there not in the knowledge of the strong feeling that there is on the part of the country against the admission of any number of orientals a very good guarantee that the minister will not use his powers unduly? I think that constitutes a guarantee that the minister will not go too far in the matter. Cases might come up—unforeseen cases—where it might conceivably be in the interests even of British Columbia that a few Chinese might be permitted to come in for some emergency purpose. I do not assume that the clause will ever be used in that way; there are, however, individual cases which come to the attention of the department —such, for example, as clergymen or tourists coming through on some special mission. I should think some latitude ought to be given to the minister to admit a few persons of that class, and it is better to give the general authority rather than to be too detailed and specific in the classes that are mentioned.

Mr. NEILL: Could not that be done by order in council in specific cases?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It virtually comes to that; the minister has to give his sanction. I do not, however, think we had better add to the number of orders in council which it is necessary to pass.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister will remember, of course, that he cannot deputize this responsibility; he cannot authorize anybody else to act.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We are doing this purposely. We got into trouble under the general act over this matter, and I think this power should be confined to the minister. This particular case is one in which the minister should act.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—Appeal to minister:

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is the Immigration Act section is it not?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is clause 11—no appeal in certain cases—the Immigration Act section also, and if it is not why is there a distinction made?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): (Reading).

> There shall be no appeal from the decision of the controller, as to the rejection or deportation of any immigrant, passenger or other person found to be of Chinese origin or descent seeking to enter or land in Canada when such decision is based upon a certificate of the examining medical officer to the effect that such immigrant, passenger or other person of Chinese origin or descent is afflicted with any loathsome disease—

In that particular case it is concluded that the evidence is sufficient to bar the entry into Canada of the Chinese immigrant. I may say there has been some criticism of this from the Chinese themselves. I think it should stand.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Do you mean that clause 11 should stand?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No; I think the provision should remain.

Section agreed to.

On section 17—Identification and registration of Chinese immigrants.—Certificates to be delivered to immigrants permitted to land:

Mr. BAXTER: Does the minister propose to use the finger print identification system?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No.

Mr. BAXTER: Is anything else trustworthy in the case of Asiatics?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Identification is difficult, I admit, but after considering the matter I came to the conclusion, from representations made, that it was going a bit too far, because, as my hon. friend knows, it is only used in cases of criminals.

Mr. BAXTER: Quite so.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): And we do not want to have the oriental people classed as criminals.

Mr. STEVENS: This clause says—

> And such certificate shall be prima facie evidence that the person presenting it has complied with the requirements of this act.

Now, what the minister will have to face, without question, is the system of transferring those certificates. There is no question in my mind that if a Chinaman dies, or if, as has been going on for years, he is smuggled across into the United States, or into some other country, the certificate will be passed on. We have been passing a steady stream through this country, without the knowledge of the government of Canada. They will get these certificates, will pass them on and they will be held and used, just as sure as we are sitting in this House to-night, for illegal purposes. Experience teaches us that and I think that these Chinese should be compelled to carry the certificates or an identification card on their persons.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): They have to carry their certificates with them.

Mr. STEVENS: And check up occasionally. I had a reference, which for the moment I have lost, which I wished to refer to in connection with this matter. I am very much afraid that there will be a continued evasion of this clause. Has the minister any definnite idea in mind as to how this could be prevented?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend will recognize the difficulty of preventing exchange of certificates, owing to the similarity of the appearance of the Chinese. If a man is in possession of a certificate, it is a most difficult thing, unless you have some other evidence, to detect fraud. We discussed the matter of taking finger prints, but afterwards dropped it. The mere fact of making the Chinaman produce the certificate on demand is not evidence that the individual holding the certificate is the one who entered under it.

Mr. STEVENS: There is no penalty for forgery or transfer?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Oh yes, I think there is a very severe penalty for the transference of a certificate. I quite appreciate the difficulty of proving that the man presenting the certificate is the man who really owns it.

Mr. BAXTER: Section 32 provides the penalty.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): One year after the act goes into force there is to be a general registration, and each individual in Canada will have to show his certificate. If he goes out of Canada, and some one comes in and uses that certificate in place of him, I confess it will be a very difficult thing to prove.

Mr. GRAHAM: What about the photograph?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I know the photographs are there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister does not expect any of them to die. I am told they never die. Those who have British citizenship to-day are endowed with immortality. The certificate always passes to some one else who looks exactly like the original party. I fancy you will meet with that difficulty. There will be no emigration from that part of the country. All the certificates will remain, and those who died will have their counterparts in possession of the certificates.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I cannot see why there should be any objection to the finger print system. The idea in taking the finger print is that we should have some positive means of identification. We have had the experience in British Columbia in regard to naturalization papers. I have a return here, No. 187, which I got the other day, containing certain correspondence in regard to naturalization in Vancouver between the Under Secretary of State and one of the county court judges there, his honour, Judge Grant. It appears from that correspondence that in some cases naturalization certificates had been granted to Japanese who had never left Japan at all. Some friend had got the naturalization papers for them.

In regard to fishing licenses, we had a great deal of trouble, and it was admitted before our British Columbia Fisheries Commission last year that there had been many cases of abuse of this kind. There were many instances of naturalization papers being transferred, for the purpose of enabling the holders for the time being to obtain fishing licenses. A photograph is of no material assistance. The photographs that will be attached to the registration certificates under the section we are considering, will be so similar that it will be almost impossible for any one to determine whether the holder for the time being of the certificate is the person who is legally entitled to that certificate or not. I cannot for the life of me see why there should be any greater indignity to a man by requiring him to allow records to be taken of his finger prints than by requiring his photograph. I think where there is this method of obtaining positive proof of identity, it should be made use of. Certainly the finger print system seems to be one that no person, not even an oriental, can beat.

Mr. NEILL: I would like to endorse the stand taken by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). I think we should provide that the Chinaman should carry his certificate on his person and produce it on demand. The minister says truly enough that the production of it will not be any evidence that he has not obtained it by fraudulent means. That is true, but there is another phase of the matter. It is at least a certificate that he has one license, let him get it where he likes. It has this advantage: If you have a Chinese prisoner, and you ask him where his certificate is and he says it is at home and you let him go and get it, he will be sure to produce a certificate. But if you arrest him, you ask him to produce his certificate and he does not have it on him, that is evidence that he does not have one. If you let him go home where there are a couple of hundred Chinamen, he will certainly get a certificate, and there will be no way of discovering whether he did not simply borrow it. During the war every white man in Canada had to have a registration card and to produce it on request. No injustice was done and there was very little inconvenience. If provision were made in this legislation that a Chinaman must have his certificate on his person—and I certainly think such provision should be made—that would be a means of detecting a great deal of this illicit work of shuffling around certificates, because a Chinaman might lend a man a certificate when he was going to court, but he would not give it to him if he himself had to carry it permanently on his person, as he himself might be caught without it and deported. I think such a provision should be inserted in the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might point out to my hon. friend that if this legislation were admitting any large number of Chinese, probably there would be some force in what he has just said. But the bill contemplates the admission of only the classes mentioned, and they will be very limited classes. They will be either of the student or the merchant class, and in all probability a very complete record will be kept of those individuals. There will, therefore, not be the same need for possession of a certificate on the person of an individual entering Canada under those classes as there would be if the persons being admitted were, for example, coolie labourers.

Section agreed to.

On section 18—Chinese to register within twelve months of date of the act:

Mr. NEILL: I should like in this connection to remind the Acting Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart), or more properly the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that this would be a suitable occasion, when this registration is taking place, to give effect to the recommendation of the Duff Fisheries Commission of British Columbia last year that, as we had found so many cases of fraudulent naturalization papers, an opportunity should be taken to recall all those in British Columbia and revise them. The inference was that where it was found they were patently fraudulently obtained, for instance, if a man who was, say, twenty years old, had a certificate describing him as being fifty-five or sixty years of age, his certificate would be revoked. This would be a good occasion, when the registration by Chinamen is being made general, to have these papers revised as regards both Chinamen and Japanese. The recommendation of the Fisheries Commission in this regard was accepted by the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: All right.

Section agreed to.

On Section 19—Number of immigrants to be carried on each ship limited:

Mr. STEVENS: Is there any need of this clause? What is the idea of retaining it?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is merely one other restriction on the number who can enter Canada..

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is this an old clause?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): In the former act the tonnage was fifty. It is now increased to two hundred and fifty.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is built on the old section. Really, this seems a very absurd way of going at the subject. You might as well say that the number of immigrants must be regulated by the number of hairs on the captain's head.

Section agreed to.

On Section 20—Chinese persons not to leave ship without permit:

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the explanation of this clause?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This clause prohibits officers of any ship carrying Chinese to Canada permitting Chinese to leave the ship before all the formalities of the regulations have been observed. We have had some difficulty in connection with this in the past. This is to prevent Chinese sailors deserting at a Canadian port, and dishonest captains from permitting stowaways and others to leave the ship, and, in this way, obtain surreptitious or illegal entry into Canada.

Section agreed to.

On Section 21—Conductor to furnish list of Chinese persons carried:

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the explanation of this clause?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This is to prevent conductors of railway trains allowing Chinese to obtain surreptitious entry into Canada by such trains.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Are the provisions of clauses 20 and 21 in the general Immigration Act?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Not in such enlarged form. This is a much stiffer provision as regards both captains and railway conductors.

Section agreed to.

On Section 24—Re-entry:

Mr. STEVENS: As I read this clause, it constitutes really a further extension of this permission to return. If the minister will refer to sub-clause (3), there was a period about 1914 when conditions were pretty bad on the Pacific coast and permission was given to a large number of Chinese to return again to Canada within one or two years. That permission was extended by P.C. 697. If I recall the situation corectly, P.C. 697 has virtually expired but by this clause we are permitting return to Canada for the further period of a year from the coming into force of this legislation. I really do not think that should be done, and I will tell the minister once again why. What I have said before very largely applies to this. I doubt whether many who have not yet returned will return but substitutes will come who never were in the country before. I want to assure the minister that we are not overstating the case in constantly referring to this ability on the part of the Chinese to substitute one for another in these various matters. I am certain that this will mean the entry into Canada of a considerable number of Chinese. A man will make a competency and go back without any intention of returning, but he will return in the person of another Chinaman; or he may go back and die, and there is always someone else to fill the gap. These are the things we are so bitterly opposed to. I see no reason whatever for this added permission and I would ask the minister, if it were not inconsistent with the legislation, and I do not think it is, to strike out subsection 3.

Mr. STEWART: Subsection 3 provides for the return of Chinese who registered out between April first, 1914, and March 31st, 1919, and who, under the provisions of an order in council, P.C., 697, passed under the authority of the War Measures Act, were accorded the privilege of prolonging their return to Canada until one year after a proclamation had been published in the Canada Gazette declaring that a state of war no longer existed. No such proclamation has yet appeared in the Canada Gazette and it is possible it may never appear. There were at Vancouver registrations covering 572 Chinese who left during the period I have stated and who are still absent from Canada. The present section is to provide that they shall return within one year from the date of the coming into force of this act. They have under the order in council the extended time of one year after the publication in the Canada Gazette that a state of war no longer exists, but in view of the fact that such a declaration may not be published we are limiting the time of return to one year after the passing of this act.

Mr. STEVENS: What form did the termination of the war take? Our signing of the Peace Treaty ended the war, but I suppose that when this terminology was used in the order in council it was prior to the conclusion of the war. I take it therefore that it was assumed that the publication of a declaration in the Canada Gazette would be the method of declaring the war at an end. Undoubtedly the intention of the order was to end the privilege with the termination of the war. What we are really doing by this legislation is extending the period for another year, and I think we ought to cancel now absolutely the privilege to any that have not returned to Canada because certainly they know perfectly well that they should have returned before now, and they are only taking advantage of a very strained interpretation of the order in council.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We will let this stand so that I may make further inquiry.

Section stands.

On section 25—Chinese sailors on Canadian vessels:

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does this section admit Chinese as sailors?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, it provides for the outward registration of Chinese sailors employed on Canadian vessels operating between Canada and the United States. The Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia have ships operating between Vancouver and Seattle, making a round trip daily, and under the present act a Chinese sailor employed on such a ship must register daily. The cost of registration being a dollar it is proposed to change this and provide for the issuance of a certificate for a period of two years at a fee of $2.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would that apply to Chinese immigrants?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, merely to men sailing between ports.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Could not a Chinese immigrant come in and instead of landing on shore land in a boat and become a sailor and thereby become entitled to registration under this section?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It would not be possible for him to do that because he would of necessity first need to be in possession of a passport before he could make application for the certificate.

Section agreed to.

On section 26—Arrest and deportation of any Chinese who has illegally entered or remained in Canada:

Mr. NEILL: Instead of "officer" in this section I think it should be "police officer". It is no use in the wilds of British Columbia to send two hundred miles to get a Chinese immigration officer; a police constable should be allowed to act under this section. The definition of officer in the interpretation clause is simply an immigration officer and such an officer would be found only in Vancouver, Victoria and possibly Nelson.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Does my hon. friend mean that any police officer might demand the production of a certificate from a Chinese in Canada?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend will have to pardon me for referring to our experiences so often, but we learn by experience. Only a few years ago quite a number of Chinese or Japanese, I forgot which, landed on the west coast near my hon. friend's home. They did not touch a port of entry at all; they landed off the west coast of Vancouver Island, or Queen Charlotte Islands. There are constantly vessels running back and forth on the fishing grounds between different points, and as we are by this act restricting the ports of entry to Vancouver and Victoria, the only possible way of apprehending such people would be for a local officer to have some definite powers. If he were in the Queen Charlotte Islands it would take him in winter from two to three weeks to communicate with Vancouver.

Mr. NEILL: Or Prince Rupert.

Mr. STEVENS: There would be no Chinese immigration agent there. It would be hopeless for any person to apprehend immigrants or control immigration of that kind under this clause.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Would provincial police officers be satisfactory?

Mr. STEVENS: I think so.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I see a difficulty in keeping up a force of immigration officers.

Mr. STEVENS: Either provincial, municipal or Dominion police officers would do. I would suggest to my hon. friend that he keep an immigration officer at Prince Rupert.

Mr. NEILL: This section would not give the policeman any drastic power because he can only arrest. Further down it is provided that the officer may detain an arrested person in custody and bring him before the nearest controller for examination. So that the man's rights are absolutely protected, and if a police constable cannot be trusted to do this much he is not fit for the position.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am not taking exception to the suggestion. I see the impossibility of patrolling a large area like British Columbia with immigration officials whose duty it would be to arrest people who obtain illegal entry.

Mr. STEVENS: I would suggest the words "police officer."

Section stands.

On section 27—Arrest and deportation of Chinese who ceases to belong to exempt or admissible classes:

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Some exception has been taken to this section, and I do think that it is somewhat drastic.

> Any person admitted as exempt from the tax under the provisions of the Chinese Immigration Act or any amendment thereto or under this act,—

It embodies the whole of it.

> —and who at any time after admission ceases to belong to any of the exempt classes as defined by the Chinese Immigration Act or any amendment thereof or by this act,—

It seems to me this goes so far that if a Chinese merchant after being here for twenty years failed in his business and was obliged to become a labourer he would be subject to deportation.

Mr. STEVENS: That would be a very good thing.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I hardly think that is just.

Mr. STEVENS: There are thousands who have been admitted by the officers of this government as merchants, who have deliberately abandoned that calling and are to-day labourers and never intend to be anything else. So there would be no hardship; my hon. friend need not waste any sympathy on them whatever.

Mr. NEILL: I would also point out, Mr. Chairman, that this is the section the hon. minister referred me to early in the afternoon when I asked him what means he had of checking up those who were admitted as students, he said section 27.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This will apply to the person who enters as a student.

Mr. NEILL: It will not apply if you alter it.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I was not thinking of altering it as applying to those entering under the provisions of this act, but I thought some hardship might be imposed upon individuals who had been in Canada for, say, ten years.

Mr. STEVENS: It will not apply, for this reason: you are not going to register these people under the calling upon which they enter the country. I wish it were so, but it is not. They will simply be registered as students. So the fact that they have changed their calling will not penalize them in any sense under this clause. My hon. friend need not lose a particle of sleep over any Chinese that are in the country.

Mr. NEILL: In line 6, page 12, I think the word "the" before "controller" should be changed to "a," or else there is likely to be confusion. I would also point out that the word "officer" occurs there, and if the minister changes the previous section and makes it read "peace officer" the same amendment ought to be made in this section.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the committee that line 6 page 12, section 27, be amended by striking out "the" before controller and substituting "a"?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend (Mr. Neill) suggests "peace officer." I think that ought to be included.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I will look into the amendment suggested by my hon. friend to section 26 as well as to this section. It is usually well to exercise a little care. I have no objection to this standing for the purpose if need be.

Mr. STEVENS: The point may already be covered if the Immigration Act provides for "officer" including peace officer.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That is where it should go.

Mr. STEVENS: There is no objection to its being carried with that understanding.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 27 stands.

On section 30—Liability of transportation companies:

Mr. STEVENS: This is the same as in the old act, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 31—Liability of railway companies:

Mr. STEVENS: Is this the same as in the old act too?

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think the increased penalty is the only change.

Section agreed to.

On section 32—Chinese landing in violation of act, etc.:

Mr. STEVENS: I would suggest that we might strengthen the latter part of subclause (b) "and shall also be liable to deportation when so ordered by the controller," and make it obligatory that the party so offending should be deported. Anyone who deliberately violates the provisions of this act ought to be deported without any consideration.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We might strike out the words, "when so ordered by the controller."

Mr. STEVENS: I have more objection to the qualifying words, "shall be liable." Why not make it read, "and shall be deported." Make it a positive statement—obligatory. If not my hon. friend will find himself deluged with all manner of appeals for clemency. There is no minimum either; it is a fine not exceeding $1,000. The fine might be only $1. The wording of the clause is to lean towards clemency. What we want in these penalties is something drastic and definite, because that is the only way in which we are going to get effective restriction under this act. We invite the odium of the criticism referred to by the Prime Minister, and yet we do not obtain the full effects that we are seeking.

10 p.m.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It does not matter who the national is, if he wilfully misrepresents—

Mr. STEVENS: No. This section begins, "Every person of Chinese origin or descent who—"

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, but I am making reference to the fact that any national who obtains entry under a fraudulent certificate or who wilfully misrepresents himself should be punished. I have no particular desire to shield such an offender.

Mr. STEVENS: I would point out to the minister that the two clauses of this section are inconsistent one with the other on the basis of his own suggestion. For instance, the first clause refers to every person of Chinese origin, and that includes liability to deportation. The second clause refers to persons who aid and abet, having in mind, no doubt, persons who are not of Chinese origin, and there is no question of deportation there. That shows a distinction between the two. Of course, that person might be a citizen of this country or he might be a foreigner, an alien of another race. So to carry out the minister's argument of a moment ago deportation ought to be included in the second clause as well.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): You could not deport a Canadian citizen.

Mr. STEVENS: No, an alien, a Swede, a German or a Frenchman.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): You would have a double-barrelled clause, one for the Canadian citizen who aids and abets and one for the foreigner?

Mr. STEVENS: It is double-barrelled now. You do not deport a Canadian citizen anyway. You only deport an alien.

Mr. BLACK: You might cover it by saying that if of foreign origin he shall be liable to deportation.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Perhaps it would be better to alter that section making deportation obligatory.

Section stands.

On section 35—Organizing, etc. unlawful courts as to offences by Chinese:

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister give us a brief explanation of this clause?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This is in our present act, and is to prevent unlawful organizations of Chinese in Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: This deals with the tong war question, war between the different tongs of Chinese; it is very necessary. I would again draw the minister's attention to the fine. It may be only one dollar. There is no minimum fine provided. I think that in both these sections there should be a minimum and a maximum fine if possible.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This section is hardly in the same category with section 32. I have no compunction about section 32. I am prepared to put the maximum there.

Mr. STEVENS: For instance, you might fine a man one dollar only and he is penalized under this section. There is no minimum as regards either imprisonment or fine. I grant you this section is not as important as the other one, but in redrafting perhaps the minister will keep this point in mind.

Section agreed to.

On section 37—Violation of act, order or regulation:

Mr. STEVENS: We have the same wording again here: "Every person who violates any provision of this act or any order or regulation made thereunder for which no special punishment is herein provided, is guilty of an offence, and liable to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months." There is no minimum in either case. Is there any particular reason for that?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Again I think my hon. friend will admit that this is not in the same category with section 32. There is a vast difference between infractions of these two kinds, and some latitude will have to be allowed the court in this case. That is the way it appeals to me. There might be a case in which ten dollars would be a sufficient punishment, but in a serious case a fine of a thousand dollars or imprisonment might be necessary.

Section agreed to.

On section 38—Jurisdiction of courts in cases of rejection and deportation restricted:

Mr. HANSON: There might be a case where the minister or the controller acted wholly without jurisdiction notwithstanding the provisions of this section. I would submit that the court of record would have the right to have the King's writ run. For instance, habeas corpus might lie. Is it the intention to deprive the accused of the right of habeas corpus. If so, it ought to say so in express language.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): A great deal of difficulty has been experienced in connection with this matter. The minister's decision I think should be final. It perhaps looks like a hardship to say that a man must be bundled out of the country on the order of the minister, but the very same thing applies here as in the case of the head tax. The head tax has been abused and been made the means of a sort of slavery among the Chinese who are in Canada, and the same applies here. It is being repeatedly abused. If my hon. friend was in my office for twenty-four hours he would see just how much it is being abused daily. I am not anxious to have the power conferred here, but I think it would be very much to the advantage of the nationals of China themselves.

Mr. HUMPHREY: In connection with this clause I should like to place on record a resolution I received a few days ago. It may not have a direct bearing on this particular clause but it concerns the bill generally, and shows the very strong feeling of the people of British Columbia upon this question. It is under date of April 7, 1923, and is a resolution that was adopted at a public meeting at Silverton, British Columbia, which was held to discuss the immigration of orientals into Canada. It reads as follows:

Whereas many orientals make an easy living trafficking in drugs, liquors and vice, and,

Whereas such creatures, having no citizenship in this country, no reputation to lose and no position in the community to maintain, easily lend themselves to the profit of a few disreputable citizens who are thus less subject to detection, and,

Whereas such tolerance is demoralizing to the community and the rising generations.

Therefore, be it resolved that we request the Federal authorities to enact such legislation as will permit local magistrates to order the deportation of such orientals as are known to be a menace to the community.

It is signed by the secretary of the meeting.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not like this thought of placing any one official in such a position that the public generally have no opportunity of taking active steps or appealing against his decision. It seems to me that the action of any minister ought to be subject to review by a court, or by some other body in this country. I do not like this kind of legislation that we seem to be passing in one or two instances this year, placing the minister in a position of absolute arbitrary authority.

DUKE AND DUCHESS OF YORK

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT OF RESOLUTION OF CONGRATULATION

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that in conformity with instructions given the Speaker on April 26th, I caused the following cablegram to be sent to the Right Hon. Bonar Law, Prime Minister, London:

The Speaker of the House of Commons of Canada presents his duties to Their Royal Highnesses, the Duke and Duchess of York, and begs to forward the following resolution which has been unanimously adopted by the House of Commons of Canada:

That this House extends its congratulations to Their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of York on the occasion of their marriage, and that the expression of the wishes of the Canadian Commons be communicated to Their Royal Highnesses by His Honour the Speaker."

To-day I received the following answer by cablegram:

[Mr. Humphrey.]

Speaker,

House of Commons, Ottawa,

Please convey to the members of the House of Commons of Canada our warm thanks for the resolution of kind congratulations and good wishes which are greatly appreciated.

ALBERT and ELIZABETH.

CANADA HIGHWAYS ACT

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide that the time within which the various provinces of Canada may earn and be paid the sums allotted to the said provinces under the provisions of The Canada Highways Act, chapter fifty-four of the statutes of 1919 be extended for a further period of two years.

Motion agreed to and House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister kindly give the reasons for this legislation, also a statement as to what has been expended and how much the various provinces have taken up of their respective quotas?

Mr. GRAHAM: In 1919 an act was passed by the federal House providing for the payment to the various provinces of $20,000,000 to aid in the construction of roads. The grant was for a period of five years, which term expires in 1924. It will be necessary, however, for the provinces that are dependent on federal aid to know at this session what aid they can expect in arranging their plans for the years succeeding 1924. Several of the provinces have used up, or will have used up by the end of 1924, the various amounts to which they were entitled under the legislation of 1919. On the other hand, a number of them will not have expended the amounts to which they were entitled. The bill to be based on this resolution will extend the act of 1919 for two years to give those provinces that will not have used up the amount to which they were entitled by the end of 1924 an opportunity, during the next two years, to earn that amount. The amounts practically appropriated for the various provinces under the act of 1919 were as follows:

Province—	Amount
Alberta	$1,477,810
British Columbia	1,251,955
Manitoba	1,602,265
Nova Scotia	1,468,720
New Brunswick	1,163,845
Ontario	5,877,275
Prince Edward Island	603,455
Quebec	4,748,420
Saskatchewan	1,806,255

Mr. MEIGHEN: The total will be $25,000,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: No, $20,000,000. The amount earned by each province up to the end of 1922 stands as follows:

Province—	Amount
Alberta	Nil
British Columbia	$1,116,383 87
Manitoba	525,964 27
Nova Scotia	1,357,633 57
New Brunswick	1,107,479 36
Ontario	5,841,577 88
Prince Edward Island	254,871 53
Quebec	2,452,477 62
Saskatchewan	766,343 79

The amounts paid to the various provinces up to the end of 1922 total $9,788,404.98. The situation in regard to the amounts it is estimated the provinces will not have earned from the apportionment of their grants stands as follows: Alberta has not been able to undertake any great work as yet. Manitoba still needs $500,000 to complete its apportionment. In the case of the other provinces the amounts are:

Prince Edward Island	$125,000
Quebec	800,000
Saskatchewan	700,000

At the end of 1924 British Columbia, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Ontario will have drawn their full apportionment. The object of this act is to allow the provinces which, at the end of 1924, will not have been able to earn their entire appropriation, to have two years in which to earn it.

Mr. HANSON: This seems to be an appropriate occasion to ask the government what decision has been reached with reference to the request of the provinces, made here within the last few weeks, to extend the principle of this legislation. I understand a very large delegation came before the government since the Easter vacation, which delegation asked for the modest sum of $40,000,000. I do not know what encouragement they got from the government, as I was not present, but I think the country should know if the government reached a conclusion, and this would be an appropriate time to make the statement.

Mr. GRAHAM: To put it briefly, this resolution is the answer of the government. After full deliberation considering the vast obligations of the Dominion it was thought advisable, and quite just and fair that this act should not be extended further than to allow those provinces which will not have been able to earn their apportionment by the expiration of 1924 to have ample opportunity to earn that portion of the appropriation. The deputation to which my hon. friend refers, I think, went away without any mistaken view as to what the attitude of the government was. The reply to their request was made by the Prime Minister, who pointed out the fact, as I have stated, that our federal obligations were so great that the government thought it was time the provinces should look after the further development of good roads, and that the federal authorities should devote their attention and their expenditures to those things which necessarily come under federal authority. It was further pointed out that, while the war affected all parts of Canada, directly the expenses of the war fell upon the federal authorities, and the burden of taxation had risen to a point where the government believed it would not be justified at the present time in giving further aid to those things which are essentially provincial. That is the attitude of the government, as I stated before. We thought it would not be just to the provinces who had begun to develop a plan for good roads, believing they would have the entire amount of this appropriation at their disposal, to cut them off before they had their plans developed. This resolution is based on that principle, and it is proposed to extend the time so as to place all the provinces on an equal footing in regard to their ability and time to earn the amount of this appropriation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Whatever may be said for the government's decision, it cannot be said that it contributes to the relief of the tax-payer of this country.

Mr. GRAHAM: It does not add any more to it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There might be economies effected by the government that would, but anything effected by simply reducing what assistance has been given to the provinces merely adds to the tax burdens the provinces have to impose. It is a change in the tax-collecting agency, and that is all. A far better form of curtailment would be in those things that are federal, those things that have to do with the machinery and upkeep of government. This is merely a shifting of the instrument of collection.

Mr. GRAHAM: To the place where it belongs.

Mr. MEIGHEN: From the federal authority to the provincial. Constitutionally the obligation of roadmaking and upkeep of roads is of course provincial, that cannot be disputed, but of course the Dominion has very frequently assisted the provinces in more than one of the functions the provinces carry on. For instance, we are making grants for agricultural education. We are conducting agricultural services. These are fundamentally provincial. But that is not the point I rose to emphasize, which was that this proposition may take a burden off the government, but it does not take any burden off the people. It may make the estimates of this government that much less, but it is not by economizing that the government brings it about. It is merely by shifting to the provinces the load that, for general purposes and in the public interests, the federal government assumed in 1919.

This policy has resulted undoubtedly in a stimulus being given to road building in this country. We were very far behind the United States, and I do not doubt for a moment but that this country is suffering now, in comparison with the United States, in the retention of its population, in the attraction of new population, in business activities, from many reasons, one of which is the superiority of transit on the roads in that country. In Canada we are far behind them indeed, and the object of the legislation was to give such an impetus to them, and to have such a momentum aroused, that the provinces would go on and continue the work of roadmaking on a permanent interprovincial and lasting basis. It has had that effect to a degree. It has had it to a very considerable degree. I apprehend that the breaking of it off will result in the patch-work character of roads in Canada. I knew the time would likely come sooner or later when the matter would be again left to the provinces, but I fear the high cost of roadmaking of recent years—that is the extent to which that high cost was unexpected and was unprovided for—will all be reflected in a broken patch-work system of roads. We shall find the country with pieces of road here and pieces there, but nothing linked up. That will likely be one of the results; but whether or not it is justified, I want only to emphasize that it is not brought about by any economy of administration, it is simply shoving back on the provinces a load that in other days we undertook to carry.

Mr. FORKE: It seems to me, on this question of road building, after all the people pay. It does not matter whether it is the Dominion government or the provincial government, the money comes from the people. In connection with municipal affairs, I have had some little experience in bulding roads, and I do not know that government aid is just the best thing in some circumstances. I believe Manitoba would to-day be in a better position if it had a good many roads yet to build that it has already built, and built at a time when wages were high and expenses of every kind enormous. With the fillip that it got from advances from the Dominion government and advances from the provincial government, the idea was: Go on and build the roads; go after all those grants, and, of course, in that way the province ran into pretty large expenses and debts. I am a believer in good roads. The measure of a country's civilization is known by the way in which it goes about road building. At the same time I want to point out the fact that nearly all the big road building that has been done in the Dominion of Canada has been done at the most expensive time when it could possibly have been done, when help was scarce and when it cost an enormous amount of money to get the work done. In the municipality in which I was interested, we used to get the work done for 20 to 25 cents a yard; whereas during the time the great bulk of the road building was done, this cost 40 to 45 cents a yard. This shows the enormous cost of carrying on road building. The government in this case is neither to be praised nor to be blamed. I think about the right thing to do is to drop this policy in the meantime.

Mr. McMASTER: I think the government is to be congratulated on bringing to an end on fair terms a system whereby one power supplies the money and another power spends it. That system is essentially unwise. The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) seems in a half-hearted sort of way to blame the government for its declared intention of bringing this system to an end. In this country we have more or less gone transportation mad. We have applied to transportation systems, whether railway, canal or otherwise, far more of the public revenue than it was wise to do. I am thoroughly of opinion that we shall put the finances of this country on a sound basis if we adhere, more largely in the future than we have done in the past, to the principle which forces the government that is spending the money to the unpleasant task of raising the money. I cannot help congratulating the government on its declared intention, as I understand it, of bringing this system to an end. This legislation of 1919 may have had a good effect. It may, however, have had the effect of encouraging provinces to embark in schemes of expenditure which they did not want, and which it was unwise for them to embark upon. The question of roads is, in its primary aspect, the question of a good road to market, to church and to the station, and a great deal of our expenditure on great trunk highways which serve largely as pleasure roads for pleasure travel is in my humble opinion, an extravagance of which a country in our financial condition should make the most sparing use.

Mr. BAXTER: How much remains to be drawn for New Brunswick?

Mr. GRAHAM: About $300,000. It is estimated that it will be expended fully by the end of 1924.

Mr. FORTIER: I see by the statement of the minister that in Quebec there is still a balance of about $2,500,000 unexpended. Has the minister approved any plans for the construction of any new highways, especially those highways that have been already mentioned, betwen Montreal and Mont Laurier, and between Hull and Montreal on the north shore of the Ottawa river? I would be glad if special attention be given to those highways, because for the last ten or twelve years the construction of those roads has been advocated by the citizens of the Ottawa valley. They are most important, and I trust the department will assist the provincial government in the construction of those highways. As a matter of principle, I approve this resolution of the government. I think it is in the interest of the rural districts of my province, and I am glad that this policy is continued.

Mr. GRAHAM: The method adopted is for the province to outline its plans for roads for that section, and after that has been done, they either have been or will be approved if they are within the amount yet to be drawn by the province.

Mr. HANSON: Is any discretion exercised by the department as to approving what roads will be called trunk roads?

Mr. GRAHAM: An arrangement is come to between the provincial and the federal authorities; but the province is the real authority to say where the road shall be established, although approval has to be given by the federal authority. It is the standard of road and the amount of expenditure to be made that comes more intimately within the purview of the federal authority.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What is the position of British Columbia?

Mr. GRAHAM: The amount due to British Columbia under the federal agreement was $1,251,955. British Columbia has earned $1,116,383.87. It has been paid $1,116,383.87. It is anticipated that by the expiration of 1924, British Columbia will have earned all its appropriation.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Is it proposed to give Brtiish Columbia any further assistance in road building?

Mr. GRAHAM: The government's proposal as outlined in the resolution is to extend to those provinces that have not earned the amount of their appropriation, a period of two years in which to earn it. No further grant is proposed to provinces which will have earned their proportion of the appropriation of $20,000,000.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I do not agree with the stand taken by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) and other hon. gentlemen, that the Dominion should not do anything further to assist in building good roads. In British Columbia particularly there are reasons why we should receive assistance. The country there is of such a nature that road-building is very difficult and very expensive. I do not know that there have been any allegations as to the misapplication of funds or the throwing away of money in connection with the building of roads in the province. If there has been anything wrong in that connection, then of course the Liberal government must be responsible for it, because we have had a Liberal government there all that time. But I suggest that the money which has been spent, although it may have been spent in an extravagant way, has possibly been spent to advantage; that is to say, we have received benefits from the work which has been done. In British Columbia some very good roads have been built which are not in all respects of a provincial character. For instance, the Pacific highway which connects with a road from Vancouver to San Diego in southern California, a distance of some two thousand miles, is one of such roads. I think the construction of that road is going to be a good thing for British Columbia and consequently for Canada. It is going to bring in a great many motorists who are all going to spend money and some of whom will undoubtedly remain in the country. The construction of that road I believe was a splendid thing for Canada.

Another road is required and that is across British Columbia from the east to the west. In my opinion the rest of Canada is interested in that road to a certain extent. Certainly the mountainous scenery of British Columbia is unsurpassed in the world and is a great asset to Canada as a whole. It seems to me a matter for regret that in order to get from British Columbia to the province of Alberta it is necessary for us to go through the United States if we wish to travel by motor. It would be a good thing if a road could be built across British Columbia, and I think that the Dominion should do something to assist in the construction of such a road. The same principle would apply to other provinces. I am firmly convinced that money spent either by the Dominion or by the provinces in the construction of good roads is as well expended as any money can be. In this country we are not as far advanced in this respect as they are in other places, and this government should consider extending the programme of assistance federally to the provinces for the building of roads.

Mr. GARDINER: Has Alberta taken advantage of the Dominion grant?

Mr. GRAHAM: The province of Alberta has not to any extent earned any of her appropriation. The bill which will be founded on this resolution extends the time for two years within which that province can take advantage of the act of 1919.

Mr. HANSON: In view of the principle which has been laid down by the minister and supported by the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) I would ask what principle is to be adopted with respect to the building of international bridges between the various provinces and adjacent states of the union. For long distances on the border between New Brunswick and the state of Maine the St. John river is the boundary, and at another stage the St. Croix river is the boundary line. In days gone by the Dominion government had paid one-half of the expense of building new bridges across the boundary line where a river divides the two countries. One has just been completed at Edmundston, New Brunswick, and it is a fine bridge indeed. Another one was required across the St. Croix river between McAdam and Vanceboro in the state of Maine. I have been endeavouring to get the Minister of Public Works to include a small appropriation of $17,500 to pay one-half of the cost of that bridge, our neighbours in Maine having already voted their share.

Mr. GRAHAM: The state of Maine?

Mr. HANSON: Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM: And why not New Brunswick?

Mr. HANSON: New Brunswick absolutely refuses to shoulder any part of the burden, I presume because they consider this an international matter and because of the example which they have in precedent of former years. I would press upon the government the necessity of meeting our Maine neighbours halfway.

The CHAIRMAN: This can hardly be considered altogether relevant to the subject matter of the resolution.

Mr. HANSON: I am asking the minister to lay down a principle and if he does not object I do not think the chairman should.

The CHAIRMAN: There are several hon. members who might object.

Mr. HANSON: No one has objected yet.

The CHAIRMAN: I rule that the hon. member is out of order.

Mr. HANSON: Then I would ask the minister a question. Would he lay down a principle to-night so that we may know hereafter whether any federal aid will be extended towards the building of international bridges?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have not been discussing international bridges, but I do not think that any principle I have laid down would prevent any government dealing with a case as it arose.

Mr. MacKELVIE: Has the minister had any communication from the authorities of British Columbia in regard to what is known as the Hope-Princeton highway there asking for an extension?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have no recollection of any such correspondence; possibly it may be in the department.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that the province of Alberta has not taken advantage to any great extent so far of this federal scheme for assisting in the building of highways. We in the province of Alberta have a peculiar situation with regard to the building of roads. No doubt hon. members will realise that in the matter of railway facilities we are perhaps worse off than any of the other two western provinces, and we have found it necessary to use our funds for the building of roads for the purpose of constructing market roads for the farmers. Under these circumstances we have not been able to take advantage of this particular scheme to any great extent. We contend that in our province the farmers, who produce the wealth, should receive first consideration, and we have had to spend money providing them with roads because of the lack of transportation facilities by rail. I would suggest the possibility of extending this federal aid scheme in the western provinces to assist in the building of main market roads so that the farmers can haul their produce to the nearest delivery points. I repeat, we have fewer transportation facilities in that province than there are in other provinces, and consequently have had to spend our money to a large extent in the construction of market roads. Under these conditions therefore some consideration should be given the province of Alberta to assist in the building of roads.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Graham thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 151, to extend the period of the Canada Highways Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

COPYRIGHT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. JAMES A. ROBB (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the third reading of Bill No. 24 to amend The Copyright Act 1921.

Mr. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): Mr. Speaker, before this bill is read a third time perhaps the House will bear with me while I make a short statement in an endeavour to somewhat dissipate a conclusion that seems to have been reached as regards certain features of this bill and the act of 1921 which this measure is supposed to amend. It is not customary to present any remarks on the third reading of a bill, but I may be excused by the fact that I was prevented from being present when this bill was before Committee of the Whole for a reason well known to all hon. members—that at this stage of the session so many committees are sitting concurrently that even with the best will imaginable it is impossible to attend to all one's duties in this House.

I wish to state first that the main desire which, in my humble opinion, should inspire the House in regard to the question of copyright is to adopt and put in force this year a new copyright act. You know that at present our copyright law is the law embodied in the Revised Statutes of 1906, which is nothing but the embodiment of the law in the Revised Statutes of 1886, which in turn merely embody the original law of 1875. I need not stress the point that this indeed constitutes a very antiquated form of copyright which it is imperative for us to renovate and modernize. Efforts have been made session after session to put through this House a new copyright bill, but all these efforts have failed.

I do not propose to repeat the history of this law. It is well known to many members, but I wish to bring back the attention of the House to what took place in 1921, when the Hon. Mr. Doherty, then Minister of Justice, moved for leave to introduce a copyright bill. That bill was referred to a special committee of which I was a member, and we gave it quite a lot of study. Many new features were introduced in that bill, for the very reason that since 1875 so many new forms of reproducing the works of artists had arisen that it was necessary to provide for protection along new lines. For instance, there was nothing in the old copyright law covering the reproduction of musical compositions by talking machines, and so on. Finally we arrived at an agreement on every clause except what are known as the license clauses, Nos. 13, 14, 15 and 27, which are now under discussion.

The other night an hon. member in committee stated that all parties—printers and authors—had been agreed on those clauses, and that it was only later on that someone found out that they were in contravention of the Berne convention and should therefore be dispensed with. I may say that these are not the facts at all. The printers and authors presented their case before the committee, and we could not come to an agreement on the clauses, except to the extent that we decided we would not retain them in the bill if they were in contravention of the Berne convention. That is made very plain by the discussion that took place on that bill on the 25th May last, when, voicing the opinion of myself and the authors, I stated:

> I still think it wrong to pass the bill with the clauses to which we object, and I feel confident that the minister will find out they are in contravention of the Berne convention, and that he will have to do away with them if we wish to adhere to that convention.

To which Mr. Doherty replied:

> If I find I have to do that, I will. In saying it was a compromise I did not mean to suggest that it was a compromise reached by the authors and publishers after a conference. It was a compromise effected by the committee between the respective contentions.

The bill at the time was passed with the very clear understanding that these contentious clauses would be referred to the Berne office for interpretation. That was done in the meanwhile and Friday I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) produced the result of that submission. I have in my hand a copy of Le Droit D'Auteur of the 15th July, 1921, in which the bill of 1921 is studied and analyzed. The other day some suspicion was expressed as to the official character of this paper. I may say that it is the official organ of the International Bureau of Berne on Copyright. As for the bureau itself, there cannot be any discussion as to its official status. It will be found in our bill of 1921 in the second schedule which reproduces the revised Berne convention with Articles 21, 22, 23 and 24, recognizing the official authority of the bureau. I will read Article 21:

> The international office established under the name of the "Office of the International Union for the Protection of Literary and Artistic Works" shall be maintained.
> 11 p.m. That office is placed under the high authority of the government of the Swiss Confederation, which regulates its organization and supervises its working.

Le Droit D'Auteur is the official organ of the International bureau. It has a correspondent in Ottawa. It was stated in committee that this correspondent was a mere civil servant and it was somewhat implied that we did not have to pay too much attention to his opinion. I do not believe that corresponds with the facts at all. The only duty of that correspondent who is the official correspondent of this paper is to supply the office with documents in order to enable them to pass judgment upon them or to express an opinion over them. Anyway I know for a fact that that is what took place, that the Canadian bill was sent to Berne, was analysed there, and this paper expressed its opinion as to these contentious clauses. It does not matter much, Mr. Speaker, who happened to write the article; so long as it was printed in this paper it has the full authority of the International bureau.

The opinion expressed by Le Droit D'Auteur very plainly was that the license clauses as they passed the House in 1921 came in contravention of the Berne convention. Perhaps I might explain in a word if I do not detain the House too long, what the license clauses are. They are for these purposes: If a Canadian writer chooses to publish his work in another country than Canada the Canadian printer may apply to the minister who has the Copyright branch under his jurisdiction to obtain permission through license to print that work in Canada, providing he gives the author due compensation for the work. That seems very fair at first sight, but the contention of the authors is that they are full masters of their work, that they alone must decide whether they publish in Canada or elsewhere, that they alone must keep the control of the work of their brains. The contention of the printers, on the other hand, is this, that by the authors publishing their work in another country than Canada they do not give to the printing business sufficient encouragement, and that a kind of protectionist measure by the government in this way would give a chance to the printers to have their share of the printing of Canadian works.

As far as our connection with the convention of Berne was concerned, we did not have to pass an opinion on the principle of the license clauses. I insist upon that point. All that we have had to do was to obtain an opinion from Berne as to whether we could adhere to the convention and at the same time retain these clauses in the bill of 1921. Last year and again this year I moved a resolution, after taking cognizance of this opinion expressed from Berne, that we should not delay further putting into force the bill of 1921, but that we should drop the license clauses and put the rest of the bill into force. This year a few weeks after that resolution was put on the order paper the Minister of Trade and Commerce brought down a bill to that very same effect, the bill that is now before us for third reading, in which bill there was a clause doing away with the license clauses, and another clause to the effect that the Copyright Bill would be put into force on the 1st day of July. But renewed opposition came from the other side of the House on the ground that no official authority at Berne had expressed an opinion on the matter, and that therefore there was no good reason for the government doing away with the license clauses. I have tried to show previously what the expression by that paper meant, and to what an extent it had an authority which should guide us. I must add that if I am not mistaken, that is the interpretation that has also been given by the Imperial authorities and by the officials of the government at Ottawa. But the minister in order to meet the situation moved an amendment on Friday, which is also in my opinion in full accordance with the requirements of the Berne convention, to the effect that instead of dropping the license clauses they be kept in the bill but should not apply to a British citizen who is not a Canadian or to a citizen of any other country which has adhered to the convention.

A great deal of speculation arose in the House as to the exact meaning of that amendment. As far as I am concerned I must admit myself that it is susceptible of two different interpretations. It may mean that when a Canadian author publishes a book in the United States for instance, that is in a country that has not adhered to the convention, these license clauses may apply; but if he publishes his book in a country which has adhered to the convention the license clauses would not apply. That is one interpretation. But a close scrutiny of the amendment strikes me that it may go much closer and mean this, that we cannot in this country apply for a license to reprint a book published by a British citizen who is not a Canadian or by the subject of a foreign country that has adhered to the convention, but that as far as Canadian authors are concerned no matter where they publish their work the printers in this country may always apply for a license to reprint them. Now I am not to speak for the government, but I do not think they intended to go that far. I am afraid that as far as the Canadian authors are concerned this amendment leaves them exactly where they were in the bill of 1921. At the same time I wish to impress this on the mind of the House, and it is the very crux of the situation. As I have said, we are still under the effect of an old copyright law which goes as far back as 1875. We are all willing to adhere to the convention of Berne, and as far as that is concerned this amendment meets the requirements very fully. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, although I wish to make a strong reservation as to the meaning of this amendment if it can really be interpreted in the last sense I have just given, at the same time for the sake of the fifty clauses of the 1921 bill, for the sake of the rights that were granted by the 1921 bill to the song writers and to the musical publishers who had no protection at all, and who do not enjoy any protection at this moment, and because of a desire not to delay any more this legislation, I would suggest that this House pass this bill on its third reading without division with this in mind, that we must help with all our force to have a copyright bill assented to at the end of the session and put into force this year that shall have nothing in it that would prevent Canada from adhering to the convention of Berne. If I may be permitted to make that reservation, I hope that when the bill reaches the Upper House this amendment will be very carefully scrutinized and redrafted in such a way as to indicate clearly that the license clauses do not apply to the countries which have adhered to the Berne convention and that Canadian writers shall not be prejudicially affected in any way. I do not know whether I have made my meaning clear. What I mean is this: If the amendment merely deals with the relations of the Canadian writers—

Mr. McMASTER: Has the hon. member the terms of this amendment?

Mr. RINFRET: Yes, I have it here.

Mr. McMASTER: Read it.

Mr. RINFRET: It is as follows:

That clause 2 of the bill be struck out—

That clause is the clause which purported to repeal the license clauses—

—and the following substituted therefor:

2. Sections thirteen, fourteen, fifteen and twenty-seven of The Copyright Act, 1921, shall not apply to any work the author of which is a British subject, other than a Canadian citizen, or the subject or citizen of a country which has adhered to the convention and the additional protocol thereto set out in the second schedule to the said act.

I think that the only intended effect of this amendment was to deal with the American situation—to deal with the case of a Canadian writer publishing his book in the United States, and the case of the Canadian printer who is anxious to have that book printed in Canada. But I am afraid that it may mean much more, and that it would apply to the Canadian writer publishing a book in France, or in Belgium, or in England, or in Germany because this amendment says that the license clauses will not apply to any work the author of which is a British subject, other than a Canadian citizen. That, it seems to me, will apply to a Canadian citizen no matter whether he publishes his book in an adhering country or in a non-adhering country. Again I say I do not think it was the intention of the government to go that far. Therefore—and I can only speak for myself—I am so desirous that this bill be put into force, for other considerations that I have mentioned, that as long as this amendment assures our adherence to the Berne convention, and that there is nothing in it to prevent us from doing so, I am perfectly willing to approve of the third reading of the bill but with the reservation that in the Upper House this amendment will be carefully scrutinized and if necessary changed so as to restrict its meaning to what was the original purpose; that is to say, to deal with the case of the Canadian writer in regard to the United States. As soon as the United States adheres to the Berne convention that would do away with the necessity for the amendment, if I might use that term. If the United States do not adhere to the Berne convention then it would be necessary for this country to pass a special agreement with that country. As the amendment now reads it seems to me that there is danger that it may lead to more confusion. Personally, although I fully approve of the bill of 1921, as amended by the present bill, No. 24, yet I desire to make a strong reservation concerning the possible interpretation of the amendment in question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is a subject that I have not had the privilege of following closely through its somewhat long history in this House, and particularly through its recent course of the last few weeks. The hon member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) and the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) have made a study, in some degree, of it. It is unfortunate that owing to other engagements the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) was not able to be present at the last discussion, and that the other two hon. members to whom I referred are not able to be present tonight. It is quite clear that the hon. member who has just sat down has made a detailed study of the subject, and he certainly has made an able presentation of his case to-night. I do not like the idea though of passing a bill in the hope that the Upper House will, if we are wrong, save us from our folly, or in the expectation that later on in the same session another bill of a better character on the same subject will be introduced and adopted. It may be that I have not caught the latter reservation of the hon. gentleman correctly. It would appear to me though that under the circumstances the third reading might wait until to-morrow until the speech of the hon. member can be read by those here who take special interest in the subject of copyright, and that the minister will be well advised to let the third reading stand to that end.

Mr. ROBB: The government have no desire to rush this bill through. I may say for the information of my right hon friend (Mr. Meighen) that the former Minister of Finance, who was leading the House on Friday night was willing that the bill should get its third reading then—that was my understanding. The situation when the bill came before the House on Friday night was that my hon. friend for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) made a strong plea on behalf of the printers while my hon. friend for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) made a plea on behalf of the authors. I have no knowledge whatever of the law on this subject, particularly the international law, but I am assured by the Commissioner of Copyright, who has had twenty-five years' experience in this department, and has made a close study of international copyright law, that the proposed amendment will enable Canada to join the Berne convention, and that the fear just expressed by my hon. friend (Mr. Rinfret) as regards the rights of the Canadian author in countries other than those that adhere to the Berne convention, are unfounded, that as to the United States—we may as well be frank, it is the United States that we are particularly interested in—the authors will not be affected, that they will have their rights in all other countries, and that the license clauses will apply only to such countries as are not members of the Berne convention. As soon as the United States joins the Berne convention—and at the last session of their congress a bill for that purpose was introduced but was not pressed to conclusion because of the amount of legislation that required to be dealt with—then these licensing clauses all disappear. Of course, if my hon. friend insists upon it we will—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who is the Commissioner of Copyright?

Mr. ROBB: Mr. O'Halloran.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the minister had an opinion on the subject from the Department of Justice?

Mr. ROBB: My recollection is that Mr. O'Halloran told me that a copy of the bill had been referred to the Department of Justice and approved of by them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But has this feature, this amendment, been submitted to the Department of Justice for their opinion?

Mr. ROBB: Yes. My recollection is that Mr. O'Halloran assured me that it had been submitted to the Department of Justice and approved of by them, that it was their interpretation of it.

Mr. FORKE: It was a very unsatisfactory vote that was taken on the second reading of this bill. I think scarcely anyone in the House understood it, I know I did not; and listening very carefully to the explanation which has been so very well given by the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) to-night I cannot say that I am very clear on the subject yet I have been interviewed by the printers and by the authors and still I do not understand the question. If an understanding was arrived at between the different parties as to the purpose of the bill, and that it was all right it would not take long to pass. However I think it would be better to let the motion for the third reading stand until the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), who has some knowledge of the subject, is here. Then he and the hon. member for St. James can talk the matter over and if they assure the House that it is all right, and I suppose we can take their word for it, the bill can be passed without any further waste of time. I do not feel like letting it go through now, because I do not understand it.

Motion stands.

GRAND TRUNK GRATUITIES

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend asked me for a copy of the order in council appointing Mr. Congdon a commissioner to inquire into the Grand Trunk gratuities. I now lay a copy of the order in council on the Table.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.25 p.m.

THE BUDGET

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): May I ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance if he has fixed the date for the delivery of the budget?

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): If my hon. friend will permit me, I hope during the week to fix a definite date. I would rather not do it to-day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It will not be this week?

Mr. FIELDING: It will not be this week.

U.S. LABOUR DELEGATES DETAINED

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization): I am awaiting further information. I expect that my decision will be given this afternoon.

FRENCH TREATY

BILL TO RATIFY CONVENTION READ THE THIRD TIME

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 23, respecting a certain Convention of Commerce between His Majesty and the French Republic.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY—DISALLOWANCE OF NOVA SCOTIA STATUTE

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): Intimation was given that, following the third reading of the French treaty we would proceed to consider the Italian treaty to-day. That, however, has been laid aside. I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I desire to avail myself of the opportunity afforded by this motion to move the following amendment:

> That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following be substituted therefor:
> "In the opinion of this House the disallowance of the statute enacted by the legislature of the province of Nova Scotia, being chapter 177 of the statutes enacted in the year 1921, was an abuse of the Dominion's powers of disallowance, such statutes being entirely intra vires of the province and not interfering with any matter the subject of Dominion policy or administration."

The consideration of this motion involves going, at some little length, into the question of the veto power and where we stand in connection with it. The veto power, as all members, I think, are very well aware, came into our constitutional system as part of the gradual process of granting by the sovereign of the right of government of constitutional assemblies. There has been a reservation here, there, and everywhere almost, in connection with this matter of veto and disallowance. In Canada we start the right of veto at the bottom and go on up to the top. We have the right of veto in the Dominion in so far as the provinces are concerned; the right of veto in the British authorities in so far as the Dominion is concerned; and the right of veto in the sovereign in so far as the Imperial parliament is concerned. The history of vetoing is an interesting one. It is very interesting, because, for example, the first two counts in the American Declaration of Independence against his Britannic Majesty were founded upon the use of this power of disallowance or veto. We have had the same thing in Canada ourselves—protests against the exercise of the veto power in regard to matters entirely within the provincial jurisdiction. To this I shall refer later. I might also tell the House that, as a matter of law, the veto still rests in the Crown, as a matter of fact the last exercise of the power of veto by the Crown in England was in the year 1708. Nominally the power still exists, but constitutionally it is absolutely dead. So far as the Dominion is concerned, while there is that right of veto in the home government, in so far as we are concerned, it being recognized that we have sovereign powers in our own parliament, again constitutionally that legal right is also dead as Julius Caesar. The exact provisions as to veto in Canada are to be found in the British North America Act. Section 56 of that act deals with the vetoing of the legislation of this parliament by the Imperial parliament. By section 90 of the same act the provisions of section 56, mutatis mutandis, are made to apply, with changes of course as to the terms and the words, to the provinces. So that the jurisdiction under which the government here acts was as follows:

> Where the Governor General assents to a bill in the Queen's name, he shall by the first convenient opportunity send an authentic copy of the act to one of Her Majesty's principal secretaries of State, and if the Queen in council within two years after receipt thereof by the secretary of state thinks fit to disallow the act, such disallowance with a certificate of the secretary of state of the day on which the act was received by him being signified by the Governor General by speech or message to each of the Houses of parliament or by proclamation, shall annul the act from and after the day of such signification.

We have had a good deal of trouble in working out in Canada our jurisprudence, if we can term it, under this question of the veto. We have had two schools of thought. I am free to admit that at one time the school of thought which was more advanced and democratic was that advanced by my hon. friend's party sitting opposite to us. I suppose the late Sir Oliver Mowat did more than any other man to advance and make clear provincial rights in Canada, and we found him taking a very firm and insistent stand in connection with this question of veto. You had two schools of thought. You had on the one hand the Dominion administrator, whose idea was that he was a sort of wet nurse or judge extraordinary of the morals of the province, and you had on the other hand those who thought the province within the exercise of their own absolute jurisdiction was supreme—just as supreme as the Dominion was in the exercise of its jurisdiction—and that by no stretch of imagination could the Dominion cabinet be erected into a censor of morals of provincial legislation. We have had some disallowances which have gone a long way—much further than they should have. We have had disallowances that have been frankly termed ridiculous—held and shown to be ridiculous, as the result of subsequent litigation. On the other hand, we have had disallowances which were necessary and proper in connection with the functioning of the country as a whole. I think I am fair to my hon. friend when I say that in this case he makes for us a new precedent. I think I am fair when I say that this is the first case where the immorality and the injustice of the legislation is made the sole and only ground for disallowance. We have different cases which dealt with vested rights. I am going to refer to a few of them later on. We have had legislation which has stepped in between litigants and the courts. But to-day we have to consider a case where the injustice of the legislation—I think I am putting it fairly—as passed upon by my hon. friend, is such in his opinion that, irrespective of the constitutional right of the province, he may disallow it. Therefore, I think I am fair in saying that we to-day have a new idea, the idea that, untrammelled by any consideration—by considerations of Dominion policy, considerations of overlapping of different governmental activities, questions of Dominion legislation on the one hand and provincial administration on the other—on the mere question as to the good faith of the legislature, an act may be disallowed. As I say the United States, in their Declaration of Independence, made this the first and second counts in their indictment.

There was a great conference held in Quebec—my hon. friend will remember the year; I think it was in 1889—for the purpose of upholding provincial rights and of preventing encroachments by Dominion authority. At the time that conference was called in the city of Quebec by the then provincial premier, the Hon. Honoré Mercier, the first resolution passed and unanimously passed, was that the right to disallow provincial acts should be transferred from the Dominion to the Imperial government as was the case before confederation. The provinces at that time were impatient at Dominion action. Of course, the particular thing about which they were troubled at that time was the Streams Act, which had been disallowed once and then again. The disallowance was admittedly improper and the act was finally allowed to take its course. But the resentment against this encroachment upon provincial rights was so great that the Quebec conference unanimously passed the resolution to which I have referred. In other words, the provincial idea was and is, as regards legislation which is entirely within the right of the province, that the right of a province to legislate is just as absolute as is the right of the Imperial parliament itself or the Dominion or any other sovereign body. I am free to admit that that right, of recent years, has been absolutely recognized by the Dominion, and I think I am correct in stating that this is the first illustration we have had for many years of any attempt being made to interefere with provincial authority and jurisdiction.

I now turn to the act which is the subject of discussion, and which is an act of the province of Nova Scotia, chapter 177 of the statutes of the year 1921. In the first instance, I want to make this point absolutely clear, I do not conceive myself charged with the duty of here discussing the question whether that act was properly passed or not, or whether it was a proper act or not. It is sufficient to show that it was an act which the local legislature, seized of local conditions, with knowledge of their properties, lands and citizens, thought they ought to pass. It would be just as presumptuous for me on the one hand to say that it was right, as it would be on the other to say that it was wrong. It was their business; it was their act. It is however, necessary to show just why that legislation came about.

Mr. McMASTER: Do I understand the hon. member to propose to lay before this House the idea that no matter how repugnant to sentiments of justice an act passed by a local legislature might be, that question should not be considered by us in a matter of this sort.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would ask my hon. friend—what constituted this House as keeper of the morals of another? What made this House the judge of the representatives chosen by the people of any province? Where is any proper appeal from the acts of any representative except to the sovereign people of the province that elected him? On the one hand you have the democratic idea of government by, for and of the people with responsibility to the people. On the other you have the idea of responsibility not to the people but to the Dominion cabinet. My view is that responsibility is to the people.

An action was brought in the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia for the purpose of setting aside a transaction which arose apparently under the following circumstances. There was a firm or partnership in which a Mr. MacNeil was a partner; he bought a property which he described to be a farm, and as was said, he thought he was buying a farm. He entered into an agreement in November, 1910, for the acquisition of the property. The MacNeils assert that by a family arrangement of many years standing, that property was to go to Miss MacNeil for her care of her brothers, in looking after them when they were young, keeping the house and the like. The purchase price was $2,000. The deed was taken in April, 1911, and was taken as I say, in the name of Miss MacNeil. During the period of time which elapsed between the agreement and the deed, it is said that gypsum was discovered on the property in March, 1911, and that an option to sell this property had been given by the MacNeils for $35,000. The firm goes into liquidation and an action is brought against Miss MacNeil by the assignee of the firm, to have that transferred to her declared to be null and void as against the creditors. The case goes to trial and Miss MacNeil is successful at the trial. The case then goes to the court en banc of Nova Scotia and is heard by three judges. Two of them decide against Miss MacNeil, and one decides in her favour. The case then comes down to Ottawa and is heard by the Supreme Court of Canada, three out of five judges of the Supreme Court finding against her. Therefore, as regards judicial opinion on the subject, we have four judges saying one thing is right and five judges saying that thing is wrong. As I look at the record, one matter which was greatly stressed was the fact that MacNeil had secured, not a farm, but a very valuable property which he intended to exploit. A great deal was said, in the evidence at the trial, as to the value of the property. The point, of course, is made as to the ridiculousness of the consideration, and so on and so forth. It is rather interesting to see what is done by these people for whom my hon. friend takes this extraordinary action, as I conceive it to be. The assignee, upon getting hold of the property, turns around and sells it, for the sum of, not $35,000 or anything like that, but $2,500, to one of the chief witnesses against Miss MacNeil. And then after that the Plaster Quarries is incorporated with $300,000 worth of stock, a bond issue of $150,000, and a prospectus showing a value of property of $2,750,000. Well, matters stand in this shape when Mr. MacNeil, a brother, comes back from overseas, and the question is then taken up by the Great War Veterans Association who hold three separate examinations. Allegations are made that this judgment was got at the expense of truth and justice, that it was got by evidence which did not disclose the fact that numerous witnesses who were called were never subjected to cross-examination, and that an absolute wrong had been done to the MacNeil family. And it is to the question of that alleged wrong that the legislature addressed itself. Now, if this act be so awful, if its immorality be so transparent, one would naturally suppose that a terrible lot of people must have had to do with its passage, which, of course, would be a dreadful thing. Before leading up to the act, however, I will go down the steps with a view to seeing just who had to do with this matter, what is their status, and whether they are gentlemen who have such a standing in that community that one would at least suppose that they would not try to do something which was immoral, wrong and against all public interest. The file shows one thing, first of all. It shows that Mr. Stewart, of the firm of Henry, Rogers, Harrison and Stewart, took this question up in the first instance. I think my hon. friends from Nova Scotia at any rate will agree with me that there is no more reputable practitioner in that province than Mr. Stewart, or a firm of better standing than that to which he belongs. He writes this letter of date May 9, 1921;

Mr. D. S. MacNeil is promoting a bill in the legislature which comes up before the Committee on Private and Local Bills at 10.30 to-morrow. Mr. MacNeil's family were badly done in an action concerning the title to lands at that time believed to be farm lands, but subsequently found to contain large deposits of gypsum. In the main, the circumstances are as follows: Mr. MacNeil's brother had agreed with his sister that if she would devote her time to supporting the younger members of the family he would purchase a farm for her which was ultimately to become the property of Mr. MacNeil, who is promoting the bill.

This is another MacNeil, the returned soldier.

This was done, but subsequently on the firm in which Mr. MacNeil was partner becoming insolvent through what appears to be the collusive action between the assignees in insolvency and MacNeil's partner, a case was made for declaring the property as having been purchased with partnership moneys. The case was very badly conducted, I think. In any event, although winning at the trial, the case was lost on appeal to the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia and in the Supreme Court of Canada by a vote of three to one.

I think that is a mistake; in the report I saw it was three to two.

Since the action was determined sufficient facts have come to light to warrant the conclusion that the decision was a miscarriage of justice. I have gone through the facts very carefully and have satisfied myself that there has been a miscarriage of justice although I was not interested in the case before the courts. Mr. MacNeil asked me in February to look into the matter and to prepare a bill for him to submit to the legislature.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

What gentleman is that letter written to? What is his standing in the community? That letter is written to the gallant son of my hon. friend the Acting Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) who to-day wears his Majesty's decorations for distinguished conduct overseas. Now, Sir, that is the class of gentlemen who had to do with the matter before the legislature. There was another firm that was interested, a firm with which some others of my friends are fairly conversant and for which I make every claim to responsibility and respectability.

Mr. JACOBS: Hear, hear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I refer to the firm of Maclean, Burchell and Ralston. Mr. Ralston is the gentleman whom this government chose to act as chairman of its Commission on Pensions, a man whose probity, as it should be, is beyond question. He was acting in this case.

Mr. MARTELL: I know something of the matter, and I might observe that Colonel Ralston never appeared before any committee of the legislature of Nova Scotia in support of the bill. He was written to. Mr. Burchell did appear before one of the committees of which I was secretary, but Colonel Ralston never appeared before the legislature in behalf of the bill.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I had not finished my story; I was going to come to that in time. Colonel Ralston acted as counsel, not before the legislature, because so far as the committee work was concerned the matter was looked after by Mr. Burchell, the senior member of the firm. Is he not the senior member of that firm?

Mr. MARTELL: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Now, Mr. Speaker, the manner in which this business was conducted, if this case is as it is represented to be, would suggest one of two things: either, on the one hand, it reflects tremendous credit on these gentlemen in their ability to pull the wool over the eyes of a very ignorant body of legislators; or, on the other hand, it shows great merit in the MacNeil case; because this file shows that there was only one person opposing this legislation of all those who were concerned in it.

Mr. MARTELL: Where did the hon. member get that information?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have not the information my hon. friend has; the information I have I gather from the file. There is an extraordinary letter on file in this case.

Mr. MARTELL: If my hon. friend will look up the proceedings in the Legislative Council he will find that three or four members voted against the bill, amongst them Mr. Chisholm, the chairman of the committee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps my hon. friend was there and he may have taken part in the matter; I do not know anything about that. I am simply going by the file, and as I say, there is an extraordinary letter to be found there.

Mr. SHAW: What file is the hon. member referring to?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am referring to the file brought down by the government in its return, and I am looking at the moment at a letter written by Mr. N. H. Meagher, who was a judge, and who has been very active in the work that is being carried on for the purpose of getting this bill disallowed. Whether the judge was right or wrong I do not know. Of course, the MacNeils' case always says he is wrong, but this is what he says:

> To the credit of the Hon. C. P. Chisholm, be it said, he did his best alone and unaided to prevent the passage of this unexampled legislation.

Ex-Judge Meagher may have been wrong; I do not know; but there is the letter. Well, the act then is passed, and what it does is to vest these lands in Mr. MacNeil. But the act does not stop with that vesting order. It does not say, as is said on the floor of this House, that the legislature has the right to take one man's property from him and give it to some other man without compensation or without this House having the slightest right to say a word in the matter, and without recourse to law, as has been said repeatedly and with great emphasis by a former Minister of Justice, Sir Allen Aylesworth. Oh no, not at all. They say here: "Apparently there has been a miscarriage of justice. Evidence that ought to have been given has not been given Wrong conclusions appear to have been come to. Let the parties get at this all over again. Put Miss MacNeil back where she was and at the same time revive all the equities which anybody had against her." So that, in effect, the extent of the hardship which was placed upon these gentlemen who floated the company was that they had to submit their rights again to the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia. Here is the clause:

> The claims, rights and interests of all persons and bodies corporate in respect to the trusts and equities, if any, mentioned in section 1 of this act, shall be forever barred, unless an action, suit or other proceeding is brought in the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia for the purpose of declaring, enforcing or establishing of such claim, right or interest within one year after the date of the coming into force of this act.

And the first section declared that Miss MacNeil held subject to those rights and equities.

The next thing done after that is the application to disallow. That application in the first instance is met by a request from the department here to the local legislature that the act should be repealed. The local government or somebody caused to be introduced a bill for the purpose of repealing the act. The Nova Scotia legislature apparently was still unrepentant and still thought it had done the right thing—the bill did not pass.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Was it discussed in the House?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I will read to my hon. friend everything the file says. My personal information is confined to the file.

> A bill was introduced on the 28th ultimo, and a copy of it is enclosed herewith. The bill passed first and second readings and got before the committee on law amendments, but I regret to say the legislature closed before the bill was reported to the House.

This is what is then said about it:

> I quite appreciate that in an ordinary case disallowance of a provincial act upon the ground of its conflict with the principles of justice would introduce a principle of action with respect to provincial legislation which it might afterwards be found difficult to restrict within due limits, and which no doubt would be resented by the provinces; but in the present case I am directed to state that the government in Nova Scotia will not oppose the disallowance of the act if the case is regarded as an exceptional one and not as a precedent.

What an extraordinary suggestion that is, Mr. Speaker—worse even than my hon. friend's so far as the Nova Scotia authorities are concerned. They say: "As a matter of right there is no Dominion jurisdiction. Once you step into this field who is there to say where you shall stop? Don't do it." On the other hand, the suggestion is: "Well, just do it this once. We don't mind. It is all wrong, but so long as you don't hold it against us, and promise never to do it again, why, do it this once."

Mr. HUGHES: Has Nova Scotia still the right to repeal?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Everything is gone now so far as that act is concerned it has been killed by the Dominion authorities. Now, on the question of right it is significant to notice the following:

> I may add that if the bill had been reported by the committee it is, to say the least, very doubtful that a majority of the House of Assembly or of the Legislative Council would have supported it, as many of the members were imbued with the feeling that a grave injustice had been done to J. E. MacNeil because they thought her case had not been properly presented to the court.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I propose to refer to some authorities to show just what the course of action has been in connection with this right which has been so much disputed and which we thought had been settled in the interests of local autonomy and public rights. I am not going to cite many of these authorities because we have some cases which deal so fully with the matter that I do not think it is necessary to burden the House with very many references. First of all I am going to refer to the report of the Hon. Sir Allen Aylesworth, when Minister of Justice, in the Cobalt Lake and Kerr Lake Mining Case Act. I am quoting from Provincial Legislation, volume 2, at page 81, where the issue is shortly stated as follows:

The case upon which the petitioning company relies is therefore briefly that the company having under the provisions of the general mining law of Ontario acquired the right to this mining property through discovery by Green and the assignment of Green's interest, the Ontario government proceeded to sell the property to the Cobalt Lake Mining Company, disregarding the rights of the petitioning company, and that upon these being asserted in the courts the statute in question was passed, the effect of which really is to transfer the petitioning company's title to the Cobalt Lake Mining Company and to preclude the petitioners from any redress notwithstanding their claim to be the true owners of the property.

There we have a case where the courts are absolutely shut out, where the title is taken away from one and given to the other. That is the issue as stated by Sir Allen Aylesworth in reporting it to this House, that is the issue which he conceives he is considering, and that is the important point to remember in going through his report. The date of his report is April 21, 1908. A little history is given by the writer at page 82, where he states:

The Honourable David Mills, when Minister of Justice, had occasion to report upon an Ontario statute, 1 Edward VII, chapter 21, as to which a petition had been submitted seeking disallowance for the reason, among others, that the act impaired or interfered with an existing contract. The minister stated: "The undersigned conceives that Your Excellency's government is not concerned with the policy of this measure."

Hon. gentlemen will see that that stand was taken as far back as 1897 if my memory is correct.

"It is no doubt intra vires of the legislature, and if it be unfair or unjust or contrary to the principles which ought to govern in dealing with private rights the constitutional recourse is to the legislature, and the acts of the legislature may be ultimately judged by the people."

The undersigned does not consider, therefore, that Your Excellency ought to exercise the power of disallowance in such cases.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) will note that Hon. Mr. David Mills, in precise language, answers the very question he put to me at the opening of this debate. Then again, the same Minister of Justice, in his report of 1901, says:

The undersigned bases his refusal to recommend disallowance upon the fact that the application proceeds upon grounds affecting the substance of the act in regard to matters undoubtedly within the legislative authority of the province and not affecting any matter of dominion policy.

Certainly every word of that applies to this case.

It is alleged that the statute affects pending litigation, and rights existing under previous legislation and grants from the province.

It will be seen that the case here is on all fours with the one mentioned in this report, where the act affected rights existing under previous legislation and grants from the province.

The undersigned considers that such legislation is objectionable in principle, and not justified, unless in very exceptionable circumstances, but Your Excellency's government is not in anywise responsible for the principle of the legislation, and, as has been already stated in this report, with regard to an Ontario statute, the proper remedy in such cases lies with the legislature or its constitutional judges.

Then the next Minister of Justice, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, entirely approves of that course of action. He says:

It appears that litigation was pending between the government and the petitioners at the time of the passing of the act with regard to the petitioners' liability to pay these royalties, and no doubt a very strong case is made out by the petitioners in support of the view that the legislature should have allowed the existing law to operate, and should not have undertaken to legislate so as to diminish or affect existing rights. The undersigned cannot help expressing his disapprobation of measures of this character, but there is a difficulty about Your Excellency in Council giving relief in such cases without affirming a policy which requires Your Excellency's government to put itself to a large extent in the place of the legislature and judge of the propriety of its acts relating to matters committed by the constitution to the exclusive legislative authority of the province.

And the report goes on just in the same way. It shows clearly that no matter how vicious the legislation may be, no matter how wrong it is, the jurisdiction of the province is absolute in connection with the matter which has been placed so entirely in their hands.

There is another case I am going to trouble the House with, and that is the report of Sir Allen Aylesworth in connection with the hydro-electric legislation. In that report, which is dated March 29, 1910, he takes the same stand; in fact, he goes further than he did before; he felt the case was, perhaps, a more extreme one. He refers to two decisions of the Privy Council dealing with the question of the British North America Act, and I just want to read one or two references in that connection. Lord Watson, in the case of the Maritime Bank vs. the Receiver General of New Brunswick, says:

The object of the act was neither to weld the provinces into one nor to subordinate provincial governments to a central authority—

That is what my hon. friend's action here has done.

—but to create a federal government in which they should all be represented, entrusted with the exclusive administration of affairs in which they had a common interest, each province retaining its independence and autonomy. That object was accomplished by distributing between the Dominion and the provinces all powers, executive and legislative, and all public property and revenues which had previously belonged to the provinces, so that the Dominion government should be vested with such of these powers, property and revenues as were necessary for the due performance of its constitutional functions.

And so on. Then he continues:

But, in so far as regards those matters which, by section 92, are specially reserved for provincial legislation—

It is not necessary for me to point out that property and civil rights are by that section specially reserved to the provinces, and that is the only matter that is touched upon at all by this act that has been disallowed.

—the legislation of each province continues to be free from the control of the Dominion and as supreme as it was before the passing of the act.

That is what the House of Lords thinks. Then again, Sir Barnes Peacock, in the case of Hodge vs. The Queen, says:

When the British North America Act enacted that there should be a legislature for Ontario, and that its legislative assembly should have exclusive authority to make laws for the province and for provincial purposes in relation to the matters enumerated in section 92, it conferred powers not in any sense to be exercised by delegation from or as agents of the Imperial parliament, but authority as plenary and as ample within the limits prescribed by Section 92 as the Imperial parliament in the plenitude of its powers possessed and could bestow. Within these limits of subject and area, the local legislature is supreme, and has the same authority as the Imperial parliament or the parliament of the Dominion.

My hon. friend says it is not supreme; that he can at any time interfere and say, "This bill which you have passed dealing with property and civil rights is in my opinion immoral; it is not a far bill and because I do not think it is a fair bill I disallow it." Again, Lord Herschell, in the case of Brophy vs. the Attorney General of Manitoba, says:

In relation to the subjects specified in section 92 of the British North America Act and not falling within those set forth in section 91, the exclusive powers of the provincial legislatures may be said to be absolute.

My hon. friend takes issue with that statement. In the Fisheries case the same learned lord said:

The suggestion that the power might be abused so as to amount to a practical confiscation of property, does not warrant the imposition by the courts of any limit upon the absolute power of legislation conferred. The supreme legislative power in relation to any subject matter is always capable of abuse, but it is not to be assumed that it will be improperly used; if it is, the only remedy is an appeal to those by whom the legislature is elected.

That is a very cogent paragraph, and it shows how dangerous this sort of thing is. Why, Mr. Speaker, if it be right for the Dominion to say to this province or that province, "Your legislation is immoral, therefore we will disallow it," under the same statute and the very same terms you are in effect saying that the British parliament has exactly the same right to oversee, catechise or disallow every thing we do, if they want to. The cases are exactly the same; there is no difference. The terms of the bond are the same; every word and every comma is the same; the only change is in the name. My hon. friend says to Nova Scotia: "It is quite true, you have full and ample jurisdiction to deal with these matters, and you are supposed to do the right thing, but I do not think you are doing the right thing so I am going to disallow this legislation." Well, in doing that my hon. friend is inviting for the government exactly the same oversight on the part of the Imperial authorities.

4 p.m.

There ought to be some finality and the finality ought to be such as to assure the right of the people concerned. Sir Allen points out:

—that it is impossible to suppose that previously to the union of the provinces Her Majesty's government would under the corresponding powers of section 38 of the act on the union of the two provinces of Canada, have disallowed a provincial act for reasons such as those now urged for disallowance of the Ontario Power Commission Amendment Act 1909, and the undersigned is not aware of any reason why the power of disallowance should, in present circumstances be exercised more liberally or upon grounds which would not have previously availed.

This view is not confined to the more recent cases. In the case of Severn vs. the Queen, heard in the Supreme Court in 1878 and reported in volume 2 of the Supreme Court reports, page 96, the judgment of the Chief Justice reads:

Under our system of government the disallowing of statutes passed by a local legislature after due deliberation, asserting a right to exercise powers which they claim to possess under the British North America Act, will always be considered a harsh exercise of power unless in case of a great and manifest necessity and where the act is so clearly beyond the powers of the local legislature that the propriety of interfering would at once be recognized.

In another judgment in the same court, to be found at page 131 of the reports, Mr. Justice Fournier declares with reference to the power of veto:

> No doubt this extraordinary prerogative exists and could even be applied to a law over which the provincial legislature had complete jurisdiction. But it is precisely on account of its extraordinary and exceptional character that the exercise of this prerogative will always be a delicate matter. It will always be very difficult for the federal government to substitute its opinion instead of that of the legislative assemblies, in regard to matters within their province, without exposing themeselves to be reproached with threatening the independence of the province.

Now, Mr. Speaker, of course the Minister of Justice can point to the fact that the right of disallowance has been exercised in other cases, but I do not think that he can do that with respect to one case that is identical in character with the present during the last twenty-five years. We have been growing, we have been changing, the public rights are daily becoming more confirmed, the right of the provincial legislature to enact laws within its own sphere has become more and more recognized; my hon. friend cannot find within the last twenty-five years any disallowance which at all resembles the disallowance in this case; indeed, I do not think he can find any such instance since Confederation. Previous to that there had been disallowances such as brought about the indignant protests which were voiced at the Quebec conference and resulted in the passing of resolutions on the subject. The minister can, however, point to acts which were disallowed because there was a conflict between Dominion policy and provincial policies, between a Dominion administration and a provincial administration; to cases where there was a conflict of Dominion interest as against provincial interest. He can refer to the railroad cases in Manitoba and a good many like cases. Hon. Mr. Doherty, Minister of Justice in the former administration, looked with a little more favouring eye on disallowance and doubtless the present Minister of Justice will refer to some reports on disallowance drawn up by him. He may, perhaps, in the case of the late minister cite dicta suggesting something of the nature of the grounds which are relied upon to justify action in the present case. But he will find only one case at all resembling the present one where an act was disallowed. That was an act of the province of British Columbia, enacted, I think, in 1917, and disallowed in 1918 by the federal authority simply because there was a conflict between a Dominion contract and a provincial statute. It was the case of the Railway belt. Where the rates arising under a Dominion contract, were in dispute and therefore the right of disallowance was exercised.

There is one peculiar thing which goes to show how hard it really is to keep these matters just where they ought to be unless they are left within their proper channels and proper jurisdiction. Why, before the present Minister of Justice was here, and when Mr. Doherty was minister, MacNeil came down to see the minister. And when the Great War Veterans found out how badly this case had gone and how badly MacNeil had been treated they came down and interviewed Mr. Doherty and he told them he could not do anything for them. He refused to interfere; he said it was impossible. He told them to go down to Nova Scotia, that it was a matter in which the local people should act. Well, after all, it does not matter very much what is said by this or that minister; we are dealing with a matter of very much greater importance than anything which can be established by the statement of any hon. gentleman. We are dealing with a question to-day which, if this course of action be proceeded with, can be the most formidable challenge to the proper continuance of our Dominion Confederation. If this practice be followed out we are dealing with a question which would enable the central authority to interfere with the deliberations of provincial legislatures, with a question which if it proceeds along these lines, invades the rights of justice possessed by a province and interferes with its legislation. We are dealing with a question to-day which, as I said in opening, was made the subject of the first two counts by the thirteen American colonies when they rose in rebellion; a question which led to the passage of resolutions at the Quebec conference when the provinces were endeavouring to get away from what they felt were improper attempts at interference, those attempts being far less serious than the attempt we have here. The provinces desired to have this power taken away from the Dominion minister—who might well be interested in politics—if it was to be so used as to encroach upon the jurisdiction of the province, and placed in the hands of the Imperial authorities. I hope my hon. friend on consideration will see that this is a very grave question, and that everyone in the House may take the attitude that the Nova Scotia legislature is a supreme and sovereign body within its own powers, just the same as any other legislature in this country, and has the right to pass its own laws, under the sections of the act establishing the legislative rights of the provinces.

Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice): My hon. friend has asked that the House should declare that the government has been guilty of abuse of the Dominion powers by disallowing chapter 177 of the legislature of the province of Nova Scotia of the year 1921, because such statute is entirely intra vires of the province and does not interfere with the Dominion policy of administration. He declares that this statute, referring to civil rights, was strictly within the jurisdiction of the province, and that there is no power of disallowance in this country which could interfere with such legislation. He has given us the history of the case and has put before the House the facts which gave rise to this statute. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will give my version of the facts, and there may be some little difference between my hon. friend's version and mine.

In 1911 F. W. Sparrow and Francis MacNeil were doing business in Montreal as general contractors. They had been in business for some years. MacNeil was a native of Sydney Mines, Nova Scotia. For some time he had been speaking to his partner, trying to induce him to purchase a certain gypsum property situated in the province of Nova Scotia, for which he had an option. He was urging the purchase of that property for $2,000, stating that they could sell it at a very much increased price and be in a position to meet their liabilities. Sparrow finally accepted the proposition of his partner. They had no money. They went to the Molsons Bank in Montreal and asked for an advance of $2,000. The manager of the Molsons Bank, on their representation, consented to give them $2,000, with the understanding that the money would be used for the purchase of that property.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If these are the facts will he give us his authority for them? Will my hon. friend give us the evidence and tell us whether that evidence was contradicted or uncontradicted on the records?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I will give the judgment of the trial judge, who decided in favour of the MacNeil family. I refer to the 47th volume of the Nova Scotia law report, page 408, where I find the judge said:

> I find on the evidence that the gypsum property was bought with the money of Sparrow & MacNeil and not with the individual money of the defendant, Francis J. MacNeil. On this point I discredit the evidence of the defendant, Francis J. MacNeil, and I may add that his manner and demeanour on the witness stand were unsatisfactory and very far from convincing. The $2,000 cheque with the proceeds of which the gypsum property was purchased was a cheque of the firm signed by Sparrow and counter-signed by MacNeil in accordance with their practice in regard to firm cheques. Speaking of this cheque Mr. Johnson, the Manager of the Molsons Bank at Montreal, says: "That cheque was got to buy a gypsum property on Little Bras d'Or Lake, N.S. MacNeil did not see me on the occasion of this cheque, it was asked for by Sparrow and MacNeil; then the firm asked for an advance of $2,000, to complete the payment on this property on which Mr. MacNeil had an option. I gave the firm that advance understanding that it was to be for the benefit of the firm, and that the property when bought would be the property of Sparrow & MacNeil. MacNeil & Sparrow both asked for the advance for the purpose of buying the gypsum property. I understood from them that this gypsum property was to be the property of the firm; otherwise would not have made the advance." Sparrow's evidence is to the same effect.

This is to show, Mr. Speaker, that the money was advanced to the firm. At that time in April it was perfectly well known that there was some gypsum on that property, and the firm was trying to buy the property because there was gypsum on it. After MacNeil got the $2,000 he went down to Nova Scotia, met the proprietor of that gypsum property, a man named MacLeod. He purchased the property from him, had it conveyed to his sister, Jane MacNeil, and he paid the price agreed upon, $2,000, being the same amount that he had received from the firm of Sparrow and MacNeil. This was on the 18th April 1911. On the 10th May MacNeil gave an option to a man named Fletcher for the sum of $25,000 or $30,000, the option being signed by his partner Sparrow as a witness. This was one month after the conveyance of the same lot to Jane MacNeil. They received on account $1,000, which was forfeited, because Fletcher did not complete his agreement. On the 27th June, a month later, Francis MacNeil deeded to the defendant, Jane MacNeil, certain lands which he had at North Sydney. On the 12th July the firm went into liquidation. On April 12th, at the request of the creditors, the curator Sharpe took action against Francis MacNeil and his sister Jane MacNeil to set aside the two conveyances that I have mentioned. The defendant Jane MacNeil pleaded a general denial. She pretended that she had purchased the property herself, paid for it out of her own money, and that she had acted in good faith. She did not prove any of these lines of defence. At the trial she first tried to establish that she had paid out her own money, but on cross-examination she had to admit that the price was paid by the cheque of Sparrow and MacNeil.

As to the Sydney property, the trial judge declared that that property had been deeded to Jane MacNeil without any consideration; that the transaction was carried out fraudulently by Francis MacNeil; that Jane MacNeil had no title to such property, and the action was maintained as to that property. As to the gypsum lot, the trial judge accepted another plea of Jane MacNeil to the effect that some years before, her brother Francis MacNeil had promised her that, on account of the fact that she had taken care of the younger brothers and sisters of the family, he would give her a farm. In giving her evidence, she contended that she had spent in that connection some $1,500, and the judge declared that, while Francis MacNeil had acted fraudulently towards his partner Sparrow, while he had paid the price of that purchase with the money of the firm, Jane MacNeil was in good faith; she was not a party to the fraudulent dealing of her brother; she did not know anything of his fraudulent conduct, and consequently the judge accepted her contention that she was entitled to the property. Jane MacNeil, who was by that judgment losing the North Sydney land, about which the judge declared that there was fraud, accepted that judgment. As to the gypsum property, the curator brought the case to the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, and the majority of the judges reversed the first judgment. I will cite to hon. members an appreciation by Mr. Justice Meagher of the evidence given by Francis MacNeil. Mr. Justice Meagher, in the name of the Nova Scotia full bentch, said:

I shall for brevity refer to MacNeil as the defendant who in breach of that understanding with him and his co-partner and in fraud of the latter, and of their creditors, misapplied such money paid for the property with it and caused it to be conveyed to his sister Jennie the other defendant.

He further said:

The appropriation of the money in question to pay an individual debt of the defendant (assuming there was a debt) was at best a gift from the firm to him, and it did not reach so high, because Sparrow was no party to it in any sense. It was an act of the defendant alone, and therefore as to him it was perilously near a theft. He came to Nova Scotia with the money practically in his hands to buy the property for his firm and then misappropriated it.

As to Jane MacNeil, this is what the judge says:

It cannot be said, having regard to her, (Jane MacNeil's) story, take whatever side or version of it you please, that she was a purchaser for value in good faith. It was not her money that paid for it, neither was it money to which she was entitled in any sense, nor has she any claim aginst her brother which she could enforce by legal proceedings. It is a fact pregnant with suggestions that she has not said one word in support of the good faith. I mean in regard to the source whence the money was derived, and the solvency in her belief of the firm out of whose pockets it came. She remained discreetly silent. The defendant knew the firm was utterly insolvent, so much so that its suspension could be, in his belief, a matter of a very few weeks at the most. He knew before he came down with this money he would have to turn to something else, and with the formation of plans for the future in his mind, it would be strange indeed if he would not discuss them with his sister and other members of the family and thus disclose the reason for such change. A word of inquiry on her part would have disclosed the situation. She knew the defendant did not owe her any such sum and therefore an inquiry would have been quite natural. She knew her brother's liability with respect to the Mackenzie debt, so called. She knew it was not paid and had been outstanding for years, and therefore she could not have felt assured that the $2,000 came from him or that he was solvent.

Later in the judgement it is said:

The pleaded defence consists of a general denial and averment that she bought this property and paid for it with her own money and in good faith. She did not prove either at the trial, and did not even attempt it. The farm theory and the support theory are kept out of sight in the pleaded defence and in the answers to the interrogatories as well. A false story is set up in the latter.

Appeal was taken by Miss MacNeil to the Supreme Court of Canada, and the judgment of the Supreme Court rendered in 1915 maintained the judgment of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia. Mr. Justice Idington, in rendering the judgment of the majority, declared that the transaction in question was either a gift or simulated to cover fraud. This judgment was duly registered in the registry office of the county of Victoria in August, 1915. The curator in July, 1915, sold that property to Gordon Fletcher for the sum of $2,500. Fletcher in turn sold it to the Plaster Quarries Company, and in June, 1916, that company went to the Eastern Trust Company and secured a bond issue of some $150,000, of which $27,500 worth was sold at par and is still in public hands.

Mr MEIGHEN: Who is Fletcher?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I do not know who he is

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He was one of the witnesses.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: It is no crime to be a witness. The younger brother Stanley MacNeil, had been absent from the country during the war, serving as a soldier at the front. On his return to Canada he pretended that he had discovered that a miscarriage of justice had taken place in the case of Sharp and his sister Jane. He started a campaign and induced a member of the Nova Scotia legislature to introduce in that legislature a bill to vest that gypsum property in his sister. This was done at the end of the session of 1921, without any notice to any of the interested parties.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought two members of the government were directors of the Eastern Trust Company

Sir LOMER GOUIN: That I did not know. It makes no difference. No notice was given to the Plaster Company as I am informed. No notice was given to Fletcher, or to Curator Sharp, or to the creditors of Sparrow and MacNeil in Quebec and Ontario.

Mr. HANSON: Was there not the usual statutory notice given under the rules of the legislature of Nova Scotia?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I am informed that there was no such rule.

Mr. KYTE: The rules of the legislatue of Nova Scotia do not call for notice.

Mr. HANSON: They should.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: On that occasion all sorts of representations were made in order to establish that as a matter of fact there was a miscarriage of justice. Some of the interested parties, some of the petitioners, or some of their friends, went to the extent of declaring that the judges who had decided against them in the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia regretted their action and that if they had to adjudge again the same case they would render a judgment in favour of the MacNeil family. It was on that occasion that one of the judges, Mr. Justice Meagher, wrote an open letter in which he says among other things:

> If the legislature commits itself to the policy it adopted in this instance of reversing decisions reached after hearing both parties to the litigation fully, upon ex parte statements of the defeated party and without notice or inquiry, there is not much use in parties invoking the aid of the courts and incurring heavy expenses to redress a wrong or determine a right, if, after it has been decided by the highest courts of the land the legislature annuls the decisions and destroys all rights acquired by them.

Further on he states what my hon. friend has quoted:

> To the credit of the Hon. C. P. Chisholm be it said he did his best alone and unaided to prevent the passage of this unexampled legislation. I am persuaded it is impossible to produce another instance like it in any British country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did Mr. Justice Meagher write that public letter to the press while still occupying a seat on the bench?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He was retired.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The legislature passed the act six years after the judgment had been rendered, and in the meantime Judge Meagher had retired.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Chief Justice Townshend is represented as favouring that legislation. Here is what he wrote on the 17th of June, 1922:

> I never dreamed that any legislature of a civilised country could be guilty of such an outrage as to pass an act setting aside the solemn judgment of a court, as I learn has been done in this case, and I do sincerely trust that you will succeed in having such a gross violation of constitutional right disallowed by the Dominion government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GAUVREAU: That is right.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The statute declares that the land in question is vested in Miss MacNeil in fee simple nowithstanding any proceedings or judgment, legal or otherwise, in the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, or on appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. In other words, the statute is intended to operate directly and entirely against any judgments rendered by the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia or the Supreme Court of Canada. This statute, at the request of the petitioners, was carefully considered. We heard Stanley MacNeil, the young brother, who now claims that he has a title to the property. We heard the petitioners, I say; and after a full consideration of the whole case we came to the conclusion that it constituted such an extraordinary piece of legislative injustice that it could be regarded as amongst those conceivable cases which, according to all ministers of justice who have occupied the position I now hold in the government, would justify the exercise of the power of disallowance. My hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) has based the whole of his argument on the contention that since the report made by Sir Allen Aylesworth in the Cobalt case, no power of disallowance has existed, or that the power of disallowance was denied by most of the ministers of justice and should not be exercised. He quoted in the last part of his remarks two judgments of the Supreme Court, and in reply to an hon. member who asked whether he did not think that such legislation was so repugnant as to justify the federal government in exercising the power of disallowance, he suggested that there was no such power. Well, in these very same judgments which were read by my hon. friend we find that the judges say that there are such circumstances as to render that power applicable, and all the ministers who have had to consider this legislation have held the same view. The hon. member quoted the report of Sir Allen Aylesworth and also the report of the Hon. Mr. Mills and tried to convince the House that the latter gentleman was of the opinion he had expressed. If we refer to what the Hon. Mr. Mills said in relation to the British Columbia statute, Edward VII, page 45, we shall find the following:

It is alleged that the statute affects pending litigation and rights existing under previous legislation, and grants from the province. The undersigned considers that such legislation is objectionable in principle and not justified unless in very exceptional circumstances.

In other words, the Hon. Mr. Mills admitted that there were cases in which the exercise of the power of disallowance was justifiable.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does not the hon. gentleman see, if he will read the sentence through, that the exceptional circumstances are not because of grossness of injustice but because of the infringing of other lines of policy?

Sir LOMER GOUIN (reading):

It is alleged that the statute affects pending litigation and rights existing under previous legislation and grants from the province. The undersigned considers that such legislation is objectionable in principle and not justified unless in very exceptional circumstances.

This was because the legislation was not of such an extraordinary character as to justify disallowance. Even Sir Oliver Mowat, who worked so heartily in this country as a political man to have the rights of the provinces recognised and respected, declared, as Minister of Justice in this House, that the power of disallowance might under special circumstances be exercised. I would refer the House to the very volume quoted by my hon. friend at page 402. Here is what Sir Oliver Mowat said at page 402:

There can be no doubt that the legislation complained of is exclusively within provincial authority either as matter of property and civil rights or private and local matters within the province, and although the provision is somewhat of an unusual one by which the city is compelled to submit to arbitration a claim of upwards of thirty years' standing upon conditions upon which the arbitrators are to decide apparently not upon legal grounds, but upon grounds of order and conscience, yet the undersigned does not consider the injustice complained of is such or so apparent as would justify Your Excellency in interfering to exercise the power of disallowance with a matter which is otherwise entirely under provincial authority.

We had the same view given by our courts, and I find that Chief Justice Draper in a case of Goodhue decided in Ontario, a decision which will be found in Grant's Chancery 19, page 384, where Judge Draper ruled:

Such bills are still subject to the consideration of the Governor General, who as the representative of the sovereign is entrusted with authority, to which a corresponding duty attaches, to disallow any law contrary to reason or to natural justice and equity.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would not my hon. friend think that was entirely overruled by the later decisions of the House of Lords and also of our own Supreme Court? That would be much nearer in point.

[Sir Lomer Gouin.]

Sir LOMER GOUIN: There is no decision I know of which ever reversed that doctrine. Even my immediate predecessor in office, the Hon. Mr. Doherty, clearly said that the power of disallowance was still in existence. Here are his words:

The undersigned entertains no doubt, however, that the power is constitutionally capable of exercise and may on occasions be properly invoked for the purpose of preventing, not inconsistently with the public interest, irreparable injustice or undue interference with private rights or property through the operation of local statutes intra vires of the legislatures.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What case was that?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The Alberta case, January, 1912.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Was any action taken on it?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: No special action was ever taken, but we have his views on that very important question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Quite right, you have his obiter to the extent it goes.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I should like to give to the House, Mr. Speaker, the opinion of Lord Hobhouse, expressed in the case of the Bank of Toronto vs. Lambe, which we find in Volume 12, Appeal Cases, at page 587. His Lordship said:

An act of parliament which makes an elaborate distribution of the whole field of legislative authority (is to be found in the British North America Act. It gives the authority) between the two legislative bodies, and at the same time provides for the federated provinces a carefully balanced constitution, under which no one of the parts can pass laws for itself except under the control of the whole acting through the Governor General.

Now, my hon. friend was telling us a few moments ago that since confederation we could not cite a case where the power of disallowance had been exercised in matters where the legislation dealt with civil rights exclusively. Well, on referring to the MacLaren case, dealing with rivers and streams, we find that under Sir John A. Macdonald's government, when Mr. James Macdonald—afterwards Chief Justice of Nova Scotia—was acting as Minister of Justice, a statute was disallowed, for the reasons which I find in the report, namely:

I think the power of the local legislature to take away the rights of one man and invest them in another, as is done in this act, is exceedingly doubtful, but assuming that such right does in strictness exist, I think it devolves upon this government to see that such power is not exercised if flagrant violation of private rights and natural justice, especially as in this case, interfere with private rights overrides a decision of a court of competent jurisdiction by declaring retrospectively that the law always was and is different from that laid down by the court.

In that case the judgment was dependent, we might say, on a question of law. In the present case it was the finding of facts which were declared to be fraudulent, and it is because of such fraud that the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia and the Supreme Court of Canada gave their judgments.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is not that citation the case which in the first instance gave rise to the Quebec conference? And is it not also true that while that position was at first taken by the Dominion, the precise bill was again passed and was allowed to become law?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: This was one of the reasons why the conference was called at Quebec. There were many other questions considered at that very important conference.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly, but it was a reason.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I admit that the very same statute was passed three times by the Ontario legislature. Twice it was disallowed, but when the Privy Council reversed that judgment of the Chancery Court of Ontario the government said: "There is no longer any legislative injustice because the Privy Council has decided that the judgment should be reversed." In this case the position is the contrary. We had parties fighting before the courts in Nova Scotia and before the Supreme Court of Canada. Judgment was rendered and five years after, I repeat, Mr. Speaker, without any notice to the interested party, one of the parties goes to the legislature of Nova Scotia and secures the passing of such legislation. My hon. friend was speaking of finality in litigation and legislation. Will there ever be any such finality in this country if we are to say that such a statute as the one now under consideration is to be assented to by this parliament?

There is something else which the hon. member did mention but which he did not insist upon. This legislation is extraordinary in its character; it is extreme to the limit in its injustice. It was so found by the judges who tried the case and by the public generally. When we had to consider the merits of that statute we wrote to the Attorney General of Nova Scotia and the reply was to the effect that the government of that province was satisfied that the statute should be disallowed. My hon. friend has been referring to the dicta of certain ministers of justice, which are not binding on himself, on his party, or on this parliament. But I would like to point out that before the present government was charged with the administration of the affairs of this country the minister of justice of that day had already notified the government of Nova Scotia that that legislation would have to be repealed or that it would be disallowed. My hon. friend will find in the records which he has had in his hands for a long time a letter from Mr. Newcombe, Deputy Minister of Justice, written to the Attorney General of Nova Scotia in November 8, 1921, as follows:

> The minister desires that I should draw your attention to a recent act of the legislature of Nova Scotia, chapter 177, of 1921, an act to vest certain lands in Victoria county in Jane E. MacNeil. It is represented to the department that this statute in effect reverses the judgments of the courts, including the Supreme Court of Canada, in which it was ultimately decided that the defendant, Jane E. MacNeil, had acquired the title fraudulently, held the lands in trust and should convey them to the curator for the benefit of creditors. It would be the duty of the Minister of Justice, as you will perceive, to consider the propriety of recommending disallowance of this statute, and he would be glad, in considering the matter, to have before him any explanation or representation which your government would desire to submit.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister say that committed the previous Minister of Justice to recommending disallowance?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: That is what I infer from that letter. I believe that if the minister of Justice of that day had been in charge of affairs in the month of August, when we did disallow that statute, he would have recommended that disallowance and my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition would have voted for it.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Who was the Minister of Finance at the time?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Mr. Speaker, we found in this statute such gross injustice that we thought it our duty to give to the parties hurt by the legislation a remedy which they could not get in any other way. We disallowed it because, having asked the advice of the government of Nova Scotia, we were told by the attorney general, speaking for the whole executive, that they had no objection to such disallowance. But there is more than that. Reference has been made by my hon. friend to the report of Sir Allen Aylesworth in the Cobalt case, and he pretends that that expression of opinion with regard to the right of disallowance should be accepted by this government for ever, and that in no case should disallowance be exercised when the legislation in question relates strictly to matters within the exclusive jurisdiction of the province. But Sir

Allen Aylesworth qualified his expression of opinion in that respect; he declared that his observations did not apply to cases where the act was of a merely domestic or local character or did not affect any matter of Dominion interest. Another of the ministers of Justice, the predecessor of Sir Allen Aylesworth, Mr. Mills, has already expressed his views on the very same point in a Prince Edward Island case. He declared:

> The power of disallowance has, however, been vested in Your Excellency, not only for maintaining the constitutional lines of legislative authority, but also for preventing the provincial legislatures from interfering with Dominion policy in matters in which it is competent under the constitution to the Dominion government to have a policy. There may be provincial legislation which can have effect until superseded by parliament and as to such the undersigned may be properly exercised if the legislation be, in the opinion of Your Excellency's government, prejudicial to Dominion interests.

What made this legislation most unacceptable to the people of this country was the fact that it was passed five years after a judgment in the matter had been rendered by the Supreme Court of Canada, and that it deprived a subject of his property for the benefit of another subject without compensation of any kind, declaring that the only title which could be claimed by Miss Jane MacNeil was a title which had been declared fraudulent by the highest court of the land.

I have given the main grounds upon which the disallowance of this statute was based. I wish to add this—and I speak, perhaps, more personally than as minister—that if a province can by legislation nullify a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada on the ground that it deals with civil rights which are under the control of the province; if that principle is accepted in one case, why should it not be accepted in respect to all the judgments rendered in the past by the Supreme Court of Canada? Why should it not be accepted for all the cases now pending before the Supreme Court, and why should all the provinces not be permitted to legislate to the effect that in the future no judgment of the Supreme Court affecting civil rights would be accepted in those provinces? Mr. Speaker, when I read that comment of my predecessor, Mr. Mills, that the Governor General in Council may intervene and exercise the right of disallowance when there is matter in the provincial legislation affecting Dominion policy, and when I look at this Supreme Court of ours which was created under the provisions of clause 101 of the British North America Act; when I recall that parliament provided for such a court and, by implied interpretation, provided at the same time that its judgments should not be affected by provincial legislation; when I recall that we have before us a statute, the declared purpose of which is not only to stay the judgment of the supreme court but to say that the law is the contrary of that which was adjudicated by the supreme court of Canada; when I recall these facts I ask—Is the parliament of Canada disposed to declare that in such extraordinary cases as the one we have been discussing this afternoon we should never exercise the power of disallowance. I may have been in error but I did recommend such disallowance because I thought it was as much in the interest of the provinces to do so as it was in the interest of the Dominion.

I have listened with great interest to the remarks made by my hon. friend He has spoken with eloquence of provincial rights. Mr. Speaker, there is no one in this House more decided partisan than myself as to the rights of the provinces. By reason of life-long political affiliations, by tradition and by instinct—I may add, and as a result of having occupied the position of premier of one of the large provinces of Canada for over fifteen years—I have become and I remain a provincial autonomist. But having the experience that I have acquired while administering the affairs of that province, I do realize and understand the importance—in the interest of the provinces and of the country as a whole—of our aiding the provincial governments in certain cases to curb and redress abuses of legislative powers. When we had before us what we considered a request from the government of Nova Scotia, a letter in which it was said that they had tried, that they had introduced a bill for the purpose, to repeal that legislation of 1921 and that the only reason why the bill did not pass, or at any rate one of the reasons, was that the session was closed too soon; and when we had the clear declaration from the Attorney General of the province to the effect that the provincial government offered no opposition, no objection of any kind, to our disallowing such legislation, we understood that this was practically a request to disallow and it was for that reason we did so. Mr. Speaker, we hope that the House will ratify our decision which has been rendered, as I repeat, for the good of the provinces and for the good of the country as a whole.

Mr. JOS. T. SHAW (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, one cannot withhold congratulations to both the mover of the amendment and to the preceding speaker for the very able and very clear way in which not only the facts but also the law governing the matter have been placed before the House. It is an important matter. In my humble judgment it is an essential and vital matter, if the fabric of this Dominion is to be preserved, that we should have a clear definition and a clear understanding of provincial rights and that the Dominion authority should never invade the provincial sphere except for the very gravest and soundest reasons. I suggest, that when one clears away much of the underbrush which surrounds this matter it largely resolves itself into a question of provincial rights. The simple facts in connection with this matter have been amply narrated but let me summarize them in a moment. The Supreme Court of Canada, the highest forum in this land, held that Miss MacNeil held certain lands as a trustee for the curator of an insolvent partnership in which her brother was interested. As a result of that judgment the property, the so-called gypsum property, became vested in the name of this curator. He subsequently sold and disposed of the property. The Nova Scotia legislature, for reasons which we must presume were adequate, passed an act the effect of which was to vest the property once more in the name of Miss MacNeil, passing it, however, subject to the right of any complainants to bring action to establish their rights within a limited time.

The question which appeals to me is this: Can there be any question whatsoever that this legislation of the province of Nova Scotia was intra vires of that legislature? I do not believe it for a single moment. The Minister of Justice would not deny that. The legislature of Nova Scotia can legislate within its own special fields if it does not encroach upon the powers of the Dominion under the British North America Act. That, I think, is clear. Then next we have letters written by the Deputy Minister of Justice—who I am informed was himself professionally interested in the litigation—to the Deputy Attorney General of Nova Scotia suggesting that this was very bad legislation and urging—as he had a perfect right to do and I think he adopted a proper course in so doing—urging the Nova Scotia legislature to repeal the act which it had formerly placed on its statute book. The Nova Scotia legislature, for reasons which to it also must have been sufficient, decided that it would not repeal the legislation in question. The bill introduced for that purpose failed of passage and subsequently the act was disallowed by the Minister of Justice.

Now, the Minister of Justice has stated that he received representations from the government of Nova Scotia urging him to disallow this statute. I have had an opportunity of seeing some of the papers and apparently what the provincial government said was in effect, "We have no objection to your disallowing this act but please remember that it is without prejudice to our rights: also understand that it is not to be taken as a precedent under any circumstance." Nova Scotia closed the door, so far as the action of the Minister of Justice is concerned to ever having that case used against it as a precedent. But I ask the Minister of Justice "What about the position of the province from which I come?" Their rights have not been preserved. The government of Nova Scotia has no right and did not presume to exercise any right to ask the Minister of Justice to consider this case as without precedent so far as Alberta or any other province in the Dominion was concerned. So that as the situation stands to-day, the action of the Minister of Justice constitutes, if I am correct, a precedent which can be invoked at any time against legislation passed by any province in the Dominion of Canada with the exception of the province of Nova Scotia. That seems to be the situation.

Now if we are going to maintain our federation we must see to it that there is no infringement, so far as this government is concerned, of the proper rights of any provincial government, and even if that provincial government abuses its powers. Of course we have the right of disallowance if the provincial government acts in excess of that power. There can be no question about that. If it infringes the field of Dominion legislation, then quite properly the Minister of Justice should intervene, but if it is only an abuse of the powers of that government, then I suggest that the Minister of Justice should never intervene, but he should leave that legislature to the determination by the highest judgment which they have, the judgment of the electors of the province to whom they are responsible. An amusing incident in connection with this debate to my mind is the fact that the hon. mover of the amendment places his case and relies upon the judgment of a former Liberal Minister of Justice, Sir Allen Aylesworth, while the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) on the other hand quotes with approval the view of the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald. It is an indication that, as parties are invested with responsibilities, perhaps their views change on particular matters. Now I have had an opportunity of perusing many of these decisions, and I want to say frankly at the outset that it seems to me that the view entertained by Sir Allen Aylesworth is the only solid foundation on which the security of provincial rights can be maintained. I want to read, in connection with the case already mentioned, the Florence mining case, somewhat more in detail the views which he expressed. In discussing the matter he wrote as follows:

> It is not intended by the British North America Act that the power of disallowance shall be exercised for the purpose of annulling provincial legislation even though your Excellency's ministers consider the legislation unjust or oppressive or in conflict with recognized legal principles, so long as such legislation is within the power of the provincial legislature to enact it.

Subsequently, on March 1, 1909, Sir Allen amplified his views before this parliament, and I commend the attention of the House to the views which he then expressed. He said:

> And in what I have to say upon the subject to-day I want, as far as possible, to discover the point of view which should be taken, I think, by anyone occupying the position I have the honour to hold. The large question of principle which was presented for consideration was simply whether or not the provincial legislature has the power, without control, to take one man's property and give it to another and to take away from the person injured any right or redress in the courts. I entertain in all honesty and sincerity the view that it is of vital consequence to the well-being of this Dominion that the rights of the provinces to legislate within the scope of their authority should not be interefered with, and that every provincial legislature, within the limits prescribed for it by the terms of the British North America Act, is and ought to be supreme. I believe that this is a principle of greater importance to the welfare of this Dominion as a whole than even the sacredness of private rights or of public ownership. I am willing to go thus far in the enunciation of the views I am stating to this House, that a provincial legislature, having, as is given to it by the terms of the British North America Act, full and absolute control over property and civil rights within the province, might, if it saw fit to do so, repeal Magna Charta itself. I know no difference between that most sacred bulwark of liberty and of property to every British subject and any piece of legislation. I take it that no one would dispute the power of a provincial legislature to repeal the Habeas Corpus Act, or any other charter of liberty which Englishmen possess and in precisely the same view I take the ground that rights of property are subject only to the control of provincial legislatures within Canada. Having that view, it seemed to me, in considering this legislation that I was not, as advising His Excellency in Council, called upon to think at all of the injustice, of the outrageous character it might be, of the legislation, but that my one inquiry ought to be whether or not there was anything in the legislation itself which went beyond the power of the provincial legislature to pass a law referring alone to property and civil rights within the province. In that view I had the help of opinions which had been expressed by my immediate predecessors in office, the Hon. David Mills, and Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick.

And after quoting these references, already referred to, he said:

> I share these views. I believed, as I still believe, that this is the true spirit of our constitution. These are considerations entirely for the provincial legislature. It represents the people of the province; its members are elected by the same electors who send us to this House, and I certainly seek to put every provincial legislature, within the scope of its jurisdiction, as laid down in the British North America Act, upon an absolutely level footing with the parliament of Canada itself so far as its legislation is concerned. I know no difference and can sese no distinction to be drawn from the true reading of the language used in the British North America Act."

I think Sir Allen Aylesworth in that statement has indicated the true principles, and if perchance the legislation by the legislature of Nova Scotia is an abuse of its rights—and I am not going to argue that question—then the Nova Scotia legislature should be left to the consideration of the electors of that province. May I conclude by just referring to a statement in one of the letters written by the Deputy Minister of Justice, which I think puts the situation very shortly? He says:

> Disallowance of this sort of statute, which is I suppose intra vires upon the ground of its conflict with the principle of justice, would introduce a principle of action here with respect to provincial legislation which it might afterwards be found difficult to restrict within due limits.

Who will place a restriction upon the Minister of Justice? Who may appeal from the action of the Minister of Justice? Is there any appeal available which one may take, if parliament is to approve of interference in this particular case? I suggest that there is none. I suggest that in a case such as this where there is no appeal against disallowance, that the provinces only, if acting in excess of their powers, should feel the full measure of the disallowing power in the hands of the Minister of Justice, but if only abusing that power, should be left to the proper forum the electors of their own province.

Hon. J. B. M. BAXTER (St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert): There seems to be quite a difference of opinion between the views expressed by the Minister of Justice and those expressed by my hon friend who has just spoken. If we accept the view of the Minister of Justice, I think we must say goodbye to the provincial authority. If we accept the view of the member for Calgary (Mr. Shaw) as he quotes Sir Allen Aylesworth, I think no opportunity whatever would be left for federal interference. The line lies somewhere between the two views which have been expressed to us, and I am still willing to accept Sir Allen Aylesworth as the authority because I think when fully quoted he has provided a solution. In the first place, it seems futile to say that the introduction of the power of disallowance into the British North America Act meant that the federal government was only to disallow legislation that was beyond the power of the provinces to enact. There would be no need of reserving the power of disallowance when the disallowance itself would be absolutely futile because the legislation would be set aside by the courts.

On the other hand, while we recognize that we are governed by a written constitution, we must bear in mind that this written constitution is, at least, supplemented by the preservation of those constitutional principles which we inherit from Great Britain, and that we are developing an unwritten constitution side by side with the written letter. It is that development that we trace in the series of opinions given by ministers of justice which have moved all the way from absolute, arbitrary interference down to the latest standpoint that has been taken, in which Sir Allen Aylesworth declared that we ought not to interfere with the legislative action of any province, provided it was within the ambit of its powers, unless—and here is what I think the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Shaw) omitted—the result of the action of the province is such as practically to imperil the external relations of Canada. It is possible by provincial legislation to hold Canada out as a country repudiating her obligations. For instance, if we had such an extraordinary occurrence as a solemn repudiation by a province of its provincial debt, that would so affect the credit of Canada as a whole that interference would be absolutely necessary. But aside from and clear of all that extraordinary line of cases, which we think can never occur, it must be patent that if we are to preserve provincial autonomy, we must have the right of seeing things differently from the people outside of our own province, of acting differently from the way in which they would act under those circumstances. Unless we preserve that right, the whole scheme of the Canadian constitution falls to the ground; we shall have erected a superior legislature called the federal, and we shall have put the provincial legislature into the position of an inferior, bound to obey the dictates of the superior. That is not the scheme of confederation, nor the interpretation of confederation by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

In a case some years ago of the liquidator of the Maritime Bank against the Receiver General, a case that came from my province and that a gentleman who occupied a very distinguished position in this House at one time—I refer to the late Doctor Stockton—carried to the Privy Council and finally won, a most important constitutional principle was laid down. It is this, that there is neither inferiority nor superiority, but simply a division. The whole executive and legislative field might properly be described by a circle. You do not cut through the circle at a diameter and say half lies on one side and half on the other. But you cut a segment out of that circle, and you say that, within that segment, within that ambit of power, the province is just as sovereign as the Dominion. The Dominion cannot infringe upon the powers of the little sovereignty; the little sovereignty must not cross over the line and interfere with the larger one. But the two are sitting on the same plane, and the lieutenant governor of a province represents his Majesty just as fully, directly and completely within the ambit of provincial power as the Governor General represents the sovereign within the ambit of federal power.

The Minister of Justice says that this was such a case as to call for interference. I should like to examine that for a moment. I sympathize with him in being met as he was by the absolutely pusillanimous attitude of the government of Nova Scotia. I do not think the government of Nova Scotia is entitled to take any credit for standing up for constitutional rights. I do not think the other provinces need thank Nova Scotia, and I do not think Nova Scotia need look upon her letter in this respect with anything but shame. It was a cowardly act. It threw the responsibility upon the Minister of Justice. It meant simply one of two things: Either "we believed that this legislation was right and we abandoned it as a set of cowards;" or "we sat by in the legislature as a government and supinely allowed something to be enacted into law that we knew and believed was wrong and that to-day we abandon." The government of Nova Scotia must take one side or the other, and there is no credit and no pride to them in any possible position they have taken in that letter. But when the Minister of Justice receives it, it is a way out for him. It is the only excuse he has. He has neither tradition nor authority back of him in the action he has taken, and his sounder ground is to rely upon the cowards of the government of Nova Scotia.

My hon. friend has spoken with great respect, as we all do, of the decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada. But it is possible, without fault in the Supreme Court of Canada, without fault in the Privy Council of the Empire, that error may creep into judgment. You cannot stop witnesses from lying; you cannot stop counsel from overlooking points of importance; you cannot prevent evidence failing to be discovered that may be very vital for a decision, according to justice, on any matter. Supposing something of the kind happens. I cannot and I will not discuss the details of this particular matter—other members of the House are more familiar with them than I am —but let me suppose an instance that the legislature of Nova Scotia was convinced that, by a horrible error, injustice had been done, even if that injustice had been perpetrated through the action of the highest court within the realm, the Privy Council itself. Will hon. members tell me that a legislature, that a parliament in any part of the British Empire, has yet ceased to be a court, the high court of the realm, to which any subject may bring his plaint and get the justice given to him by the common sense of his fellow men.

There are in the Empire higher courts than any courts of law. I agree that we should never, except upon the most extraordinary of cases, substitute our will as legislators for the decision of a court; but a case can arise, great enough, important enough, to demand that interference, and the legislature would be cowardly which did not interfere when the proper case arose. That, in regard to property and civil rights in any province, is a matter for the legislature of that province, and it is not a matter for the decision of the Minister of Justice or his colleagues in the cabinet. If you say it is, then I ask you—where are you going to draw the line? What particular bit of legislation will be sacred from federal attack? ,I cannot imagine any. You can say that any particular bit of legislation does injustice to someone. Take the particular case that we are considering. To whom was real injustice done? As I understand this legislation, while the title was vested in a certain person by the legislation, yet litigation could be recommended. This was simply an opportunity to reopen the case, so that with all the facts that had come to light, with all the additional skill that could be brought to bear, there was reasonable hope that justice would, at least, be effected through the agency of a legal tribunal. Is that wrong? The Minister of Justice has to resort to that himself in the supreme question of life and death, because by an amendment to our Criminal Code it has been provided—and I have seen this done—that after the highest court in Canada has decided that a man shall be hanged, the Minister of Justice may step in and say that the case must be tried over again.

Mr. JACOBS: That is a matter of clemency.

[Mr. Baxter.]

Mr. BAXTER: No, that is not clemency; that is justice. That is what this parliament has said that the Minister of Justice can do. It is not reprieving the man; it is not pardoning the man. Pardoning is clemency; reprieving may be clemency; but this is neither the one nor the other. This is simply saying, we have a doubt as to the way in which your courts have functioned and we will give that man a new trial. This high court of parliament changed the law so that it would be possible to do justice in that particular way, and the Minister of Jusice of the present day overrules the legislature of Nova Scotia which has done with regard to civil rights, within the ambit of its jurisdiction, precisely what this high court of parliament did with regard to the criminal law of the realm. I shall not continue the discussion except to refer to what Sir Allen Aylesworth said in one case:

> In the opinion of the undersigned, a suggestion of the abuse of power, even so as to amount to practical confiscation of the property, or that the exercise of power has been unwise or indiscreet, should appeal to Your Excellency's government with no more effect than it does to the ordinary tribunals, and remedy in such case is, in the words of Lord Herschel, an appeal to those by whom the legislature is elected.

I might continue the subject at considerable length, but there is, I think no need to do so. Sir Allen Aylesworth has pointed out a fair, a reasonable and a just limitation upon the text he lays down and that is that when the proper exercise of provincial legislation may, if the legislation seems to be unwise, impinge upon the credit of Canada or the functioning of Canadian legislation, even though there is no direct interference, there we may have a case for interference by way of disallowance.

I would invite the Minister of Justice to base himself solidly upon that doctrine, which alone will preserve for us the autonomy of the provinces, an autonomy which is every day in greater danger of being lost in proportion as the federal government of Canada becomes more powerful and enters into fresh fields of jurisdiction. I do not know that the minister wants any advice from this side of the House, but I would advise him to base his action at best solely on the most conspicuous pusillanimity of the Nova Scotia legislature, and let it go at that.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Though the government seems helplessly at bay, it does appear to me worth while to drive home the lesson of this debate a little further. I am sorry that the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) has fallen into the error which in my humble judgment he has committed; I am also surprised that he has made this error. I do not think he has made a case for his government; and of course the whole government shares responsibility with him. The minister has made the best case he could, but it falls to pieces on anything approaching a close examination. As I commence my remarks I want to dwell for a moment upon the one phase of the subject which, I think, has not yet received justice—at the hands of the House. Inasmuch as we argue that the colour of the legislation, the goodness or the badness of it, the righteousness or the wickedness of it, is not a matter for us to decide and never was a matter for this government to pass upon, we are only too likely to assume that the subject matter that came before the government was something violently and undoubtedly wrong, something which there could be no discussion upon; that the merits were all on one side and the demerits on the other. My investigation of the case leads me to no such conclusion. While I fully agree with what my hon. friend to my right who has just sat down (Mr. Baxter) says about the pusillanimity of the government of Nova Scotia, I would apply no such language to the conduct of the legislature in passing the law in question. It may have been right or it may have been wrong; there is great room for argument either way. I know it was the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice, it may have been the opinion of the Minister of Justice in November, 1921, that it was not right, that it was wrong. I know it was the opinion of the deputy minister that it was very wrong. I did not know so at the time; in fact, I did not hear of the case until some time in the fall of 1922. The matter never came before the late government as a government at all. But what are the merits or the demerits of the legislation? It is quite true that three to two of the Supreme Court of Canada found that Jane MacNeil held certain land in trust and that she had obtained the trusteeship by fraud. I am not quite sure that even those words are not an extreme statement of the case. It is equally true that the other two judges held otherwise. It is true, as well, that two out of three of the judges of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia previously held the opinion subsequently expressed by the three judges of the Supreme Court of Canada; and it is equally true that another judge held otherwise. It is true also that the judge who tried the case, who within very narrow limits of appeal was the final arbiter of the facts, who was the arbiter of the law subject to full appeal, who saw the witnesses, and who got the facts at first hand, held that Jane MacNeil was entitled of her own right, and that her conduct throughout was innocent in every way. Such is the judicial history of the matter. But there is more. The records show as well that the property subsequently was sold by the curator, for whom Jane MacNeil was finally held to be trustee, to one of the witnesses for what was in effect a nominal sum, a witness who was one of the chief of those who secured the verdict, and upon whom the courts relied in reversing the finding of the trial judge. That is not the only fact that subsequently was disclosed; there were many others. But I do not dwell upon them here.

When I read a letter the original of which I feel certain I saw and a copy of which I have before me which was brought down in the return, I am sure that the House will agree that there was subsequent evidence placed before the legislature of Nova Scotia upon the faith of which the legislature in its wisdom felt that greater justice would be done by throwing open again the doors of the courts rather than by holding them fast and closed. The letter I am about to read is signed by Sir Charles Townshend, one of the judges of appeal in Nova Scotia, who reversed the finding of the trial judge favourable to Jane MacNeil, the same judge who subsequently wrote a letter in 1922, quoted by the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin), in which he reprimanded the legislature of Nova Scotia for passing the legislation which it did pass. Now, I may parenthetically remark here that I question very much the wisdom of judges of the bench, whether in the actual exercise of their function as judges, or after retirement, writing letters to the press or to public men commenting upon legislation affecting judgments of their own. It seems to me it is a practice that needs no encouragement at our hands but rather reprobation. One letter has however been read by the Minister of Justice; I will now read another which is infinitely more to the point, as to the merits of the case as between Jane MacNeil and her assailants in title. I refer to a letter written by Sir Charles Townshend to Stanley MacNeil, the returned soldier claimant of the property, dated April 11, 1921.

Dear Sir,—I received to-day your letter, and as I informed you when you called upon me some time ago when the new evidence was presented, it would be highly improper for a judge to infer or comment on a decision of the court after it had passed from his consideration or the bench, and especially by a retired judge. I fully sympathize with you if you have been wronged in the matter, and if it will be of any service to you, I can say without impropriety that if the mass of evidence you showed me had been before the court, and had been received, the result of the case might have been different,—

This is the Judge of Appeal writing.

—but you must understand that courts of justice can only act and decide on the evidence adduced by counsel, and that in this case, as presented to the court, it could not have decided differently from what it did.

A clear intimation from Sir Charles Townshend that if the subsequent evidence had been developed even in appeal he might well have reversed his finding. It is admitted on all hands that these matters were laid before the legislature—allegations supported by such evidence as was at hand, to which undoubtedly weight was given; allegations that there had not been a fair trial of MacNeil's case; allegations of failure of cross-examination; allegations indeed, to put it very frankly, of collusion in connection with the trial of the action.

Now, the legislature of Nova Scotia with all those facts before it, with the very evidence referred to by Sir Charles Townshend in the letter I have read before it too, had to decide between leaving the case just as it was with Jane MacNeil deprived of her rights, with no possible court of appeal to which to go again—because the time had all gone by within which the production of new evidence could have any effect in securing a new trial—the legislature, I say, had to decide between that course and throwing the doors open once more to determination of the rights of either litigant. The legislature decided to take the latter course. It said: "While we declare Jane MacNeil the owner, we declare her the owner subject to any claims which would have been valid against her when she was the owner before, and if this curator, if the assignees, if this company, if any of those interested have any rights, and can establish them, the courts are there and the previous trial has prejudiced their interest not at all; they can go to those courts and all the evidence, the subsequent as well as the original, will be adduced, and justice may be done." Such is the action of the legislature of Nova Scotia—the action that the Minister of Justice describes in the astonishing language he uses this afternoon.

I am informed—I only give it as information; if I am wrong I will be corrected—that the Private Bills committee of the legislature of Nova Scotia before which this legislation went, and by which it would be reviewed in detail, was presided over by one who is now an hon. member of this House (Mr. Finn) sitting at this moment to the left of the Minister of Justice. Surely he was not a party, actively or passively, to the putting through of legislation of the vicious spurious character described by the Minister of Justice this afternoon. But this legislation so passed upon unanimously—I understand there was no vote at all—by the popular assembly, objected to it is true by at least one, possibly two or three in the Upper Chamber, passed upon by an hon. member of this House as Chairman of the Private Bills committee, legislation that went through all the processes of that parliament—this is the legislation that the Minister of Justice describes as so hideous, so iniquitous that his virtuous eyes cannot behold it and he must sweep it by disallowance from his sight.

I have made this review only to show that the case against the legislation is not so one-sided as the Minister of Justice would make out. It must be remembered—and I say it not in the least to his discredit, because he had a perfect right at the time to do so—it must be remembered that the Deputy Minister of Justice conducted the case of the respondent before the Supreme Court of Canada. Had I done the same, or had any one else, it is very likely that our feelings would be somewhat prejudiced and our opinion would scarcely be an opinion arrived at in the clear and open light of unshadowed intelligence in connection with the matter of disallowance.

I come now to the question whether or not on the precedents, whether or not as a matter of constitutional right and practice, whether or not as well whatever be the constitutional right and practice, it was wisdom, that the government of Canada should override and annul that legislation. I do not argue for a moment that there has been absolute consistency as between the opinions expressed by various ministers of justice and by the courts all through the history of our country. If one is to take what we describe in law as obiter dicta, that is to say, expressions of view given in a judgment that are not necessary to the judgment at all but are merely asides by the judge—if we include those, then it seems to me there can be some conflict shown. But I venture to say there has never been a judgment given in the history of confederation that is on all fours with this judgment or goes to anything like the same extent. The history of all the cases shows that the power of disallowance is being more and more curtailed by practice from the early days of confederation until now. There were in earlier years opinins expressed by Sir John Macdonald and others to the effect that the mere ultra vires character of the legislation is not alone the ground upon which disallowance may be based. The judgments read by the hon. Minister of Justice go to establish such conclusions.

Dealing for the moment with ultra vires legislation, I would not even say that in every case of such legislation, disallowance should necessarily follow. There might be many cases of this kind which safely could be left to the determination of our courts. It would be assumed that if the cases were beyond the jurisdiction of the legislatures, and they were certain to come early before the courts, the courts would themselves disallow the legislation, and consequently it would not be good practice in such cases for the government to anticipate the action of the courts. But there might be cases where although the legislation was ultra vires there would not be the probability of an early appeal to the courts at all where individual rights of any important character were not infringed. In such cases the legislation might never come before the courts, but if it was of that character and infringed as well Dominion policy, then it would be the duty of the federal government to disallow. No one in this House would dispute the jurisdiction of the federal government to the extent that I have up to this point defined.

Dealing, however, with intra vires legislation, there are opinions to the effect that occasions occur when the annulment of even intra vires legislation is justified. I am not sure that these opinions can be found in our history between 1896 and 1911; it may be that they can, but I have not been able to find them. Up to 1893, these opinions can be found, but there can be found no decision following such opinions to the effect that merely because the legislation, though intra vires, is against natural justice, that for this reason, and this alone, it should be disallowed.

Now, I repeat what I have said: I do not think a decision can be found—where merely because in the judgment of the minister the principles of natural justice were affronted by intra vires legislation, the legislation was annulled. The opinion of Sir John Macdonald can be given, and the opinion of Mr. Ouimet can be given, but I venture to say in so far as those opinions have ever been followed by action it will be found that they come within this class of cases: that the legislation, though intra vires, has conflicted with Dominion legislation where the Dominion had concurrent power with the province, or conflicted seriously with federal policy or administration. I do not require to amplify that at all. Perhaps I should repeat it. I venture to say the minister will not be able to produce a case where there has been annulment based merely on the fact that intra vires legislation was an affront to natural justice. I can only find annulment of intra vires legislation where it has been claimed by the minister of justice and the government that the legislation conflicted with competent federal legislation where the federal government had concurrent power, or conflicted with federal policy or administration. It might easily conflict with either one.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: If the right hon. gentleman will allow me, I would cite the case of the Hon. Mr. Ouimet, when he was acting minister, in his report of the 19th of May, 1893.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will take up the Ouimet case.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, in the previous part of my remarks I sought first to impress that the merits of the legislation out of which this governmental action arose were at least debatable, if, indeed, the weight of the argument did not rather favour the justice of the legislation itself. I then proceeded to review the history of the operation of disallowance, and I asked to be accepted in this conclusion: That although there had been conflict not of final decision but of obiter dicta—that is expressions not lying in the pathway of the argument by which the minister arrived at his conclusion in the individual case, but lying aside from that pathway, although there might be a conflict there, there had not been conflict in the decisions actually given with certain definite principles, from confederation until the passing of this act. And I ventured to affirm, that there had not been disallowance in any single case merely because of the supposed turpitude, injustice, or unfairness of the legislation, but rather that disallowance had been justified and had actually been practised on the grounds I named a couple of hours ago, and on those only: In the case of ultra vires legislation, that is legislation beyond the powers of the legislating province, where disallowance more met the public convenience i.e. because the legislation interfering with the federal policy, could not fairly be left to the courts because it might never reach the courts. With regard to such cases, of course, I will meet with no dispute at all. As regards ultra vires legislation I do not apprehend there is any difference of opinion.

In the case of intra vires legislation the grounds for disallowance had been these and these only: That the legislation, through intra vires of the province, had conflicted with Dominion statute or Dominion policy in cases, say, where the Dominion had concurrent jurisdiction—such, for example, as in the case of agriculture, or in the case of railways. In these spheres, the Dominion's jurisdiction is concurrent with that of the provinces; each can legislate in agriculture; each has the same powers. A provincial act might interfere with Dominion policy on a subject of concurrent jurisdiction, or the act might be such as to, of its very nature, interfere with established federal policy. An example of the latter might be given: Where the act of the legislature would be in violence of federal policy as established, say, by treaty with another country. A case at least, if not more than one, of that character has arisen.

I stated that we had not had a case of a decision where there had actually been disallowance based only upon the government's opinion that the legislation was unjust and unfair as between the rights of individuals. Now the minister rose to contradict me, or at least to refer me to what he described as the Ouimet case, a case decided by the Acting Minister of Justice, in 1893, the acting minister being the Hon. J. Alderic Ouimet. I stated that I would refer to this case after recess. I venture to say the minister has looked into it since, and if he had looked into it before he spoke, he would not have ventured the contradiction. In the Ouimet case there was no disallowance at all.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I did not say there was.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then it was not a contradiction of my assertion. I had stated there had never been actual disallowance on that ground and there has not been.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Referring to that case, the Acting Minister of Justice, in his report of the 19th May, 1893, reported to his colleagues as follows:

> Assuming the statute to have the effect which the railway company attributes to it the case would appear to be that of a statute which interferes with vested rights of property and the obligation of contract without providing for compensation, and would, therefore, in the opinion of the undersigned furnish sufficient reason for the exercise of the power of disallowance.

And the report concluded as follows:

> In the view of the undersigned all these provisions are infringements upon the exclusive power of the federal parliament to legislate on the subject of sea coast and inland fisheries. An arrangement has, however, been reached between the undersigned and the attorney general of the province of Ontario by which the constitutionality of these provisions, as well as all other contentions respecting the fishery laws generally, are to be referred to the courts for adjudication, and as it does not appear that any public inconvenience will otherwise accrue, he respectfully recommends that the act in question be left to its operation.

But the minister was very clear in the expression of his opinion that there were vested rights, and that the power of disallowance should be exercised. On that there was an arrangement between the two governments.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I had the very quotation the then minister read before me. It is true the minister expressed that opinion in the early part of the recommendation, but the minister went on to state that though such was the case, inasmuch as the public inconvenience was not in any way affected, he would leave the statutes to their own operation. He refused to interfere. I had not denied at all that prior to 1893 anyway there had been statements of opinion, obiter dicta, that would conflict with the principles which I have laid down. I did state that responsibility of disallowance had never been taken by any government based merely upon the fact alone that there had been in the judgment of the government disallowing, a miscarriage of justice.

Mr. JACOBS: Was there ever a similar case?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There have been cases, I almost said unnumbered, a great many cases. There was the Florence Mining case. The nearest case was the MacLaren case, and in that case, which is known as the Streams case, disallowance did follow. In that case though there is also an assertion of Dominion jurisdiction, of Dominion right in the streams, and this consideration undoubtedly affected the decision to disallow. But in the MacLaren case, although it was affected by this consideration, the legislation was re-enacted. It was re-enacted again and although disallowed, re-enacted again, and allowed to stay, and no case comes so close to this case. If the hon. member will review the cases as found in Keith he will find the nearest approach to the present is that very case, and by the action of the legislature and the justification of time in each case the disallowance was reversed.

But all this is pretty old. When we get down to 1893, from that date onward the practice seems a great deal more settled. Hon. members have read opinions expressed, yes, and more, the decisions on those opinions given by Ministers of Justice from 1893 to 1908. No amount of argument in the world will ever square the decision in this case with the judgment of Sir Allen Aylesworth in the cases that came before him. Sir Allen Aylesworth in 1909 laid down the doctrine quoted, and very aptly quoted by my hon. friend for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw) and he did it in terms so definite, in terms, I almost said, so sweeping, that it would be utterly beyond the pale of reason to suggest that this action could be suffered within the ambit of the reasoning of Sir Allen Aylesworth. Not at all. Indeed, Sir Allen Aylesworth said that even though the legislature, without any warrant whatever, as indeed he described it in the Ontario case, changed the property in that province from one man to another, or from one company to another, did so without any reason, without providing any consideration or any means of compensation, and in doing so shut, barred and bolted the door against access to the courts in every way—even though the legislature went so far as that, the federal government would not be justified in interfering. In his review of the constitutional practice—Sir Allen Aylesworth on the 1st of March 1909 in this House said that a federal government would not be justifiable to interfere with intra vires legislation on any ground at all. Sir Allen Aylesworth went further than has ever been gone from confederation until the present time, and there has never during that time been a case of disallowance based only on the judgment of the government that there had been an assault on the principles of primary justice in the provincial legislation.

Very well; in the cases that came before Sir Allen Aylesworth and which he decided there were none, so far as I have been able to find, in which, although the legislation was intra vires, it interfered with the Dominion policy. Consequently, I believe that the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter) is correct, that if the legislation, though intra vires, had interfered with the federal policy where the Dominion had a right to have a policy, Sir Allen might have been free to disallow. There is a case I am told just now where he did. But the dicta he lays down—and mind you his dicta are followed by action consistent with them—he bases the responsibility of his decision upon the doctrine which he expounds—go to show that if it is merely a case of what we may consider not right on the part of the legislature, we have no justification whatever in giving any weight to such consideration. To do so is interference with provincial rights.

Now I come to argue, how far do these doctrines, accepted, so far as decisions go, never interfered with, in fact I think I may say never questioned since 1893, justify interference in this case. Well, the matter scarcely admits of contention. This case differs wholly from that under review by Sir Allen Aylesworth on the 1st March, 1909. In the case that was before Sir Allen Aylesworth where he declined to interfere, the Minister of Justice at that time held that there had not only been diversion of the title of property from one to another, but there had been a denial of access to the courts to determine ultimate rights, or to decide the equities or trusteeships that might be in question. He knew that when he refused disallowance there was no possibility of any parties affected having their rights established in the courts of the land. The case before us to-day is wholly different. In the case before us to-day the action of the legislature, instead of closing the doors of the courts to the interested parties had really the effect of re-opening the doors of the court to the interested parties. It was really, in effect, no more and no less than to grant a new trial and upon grounds upon which courts very often grant new trials when they have power to do so. They had no power to do so in this case, because the time had gone by when one could apply. But courts grant new trials when new evidence is found, evidence that it was not reasonable to expect would be under the hands of the litigants at the initial trial. Upon such grounds as that and upon evidence of collusion, to which apparently they gave some weight, some members giving weight to one ground and some no doubt to another, the legislature decided that a new trial should be given to the parties; they placed them back in their initial position, Jane MacNeil being owner of the land, and they said to all who assailed her title: "There are the courts of our country; go to those courts and establish your claim." That is the kind of legislation against which the minister hurls his thunderbolt in this case; legislation very different in its finality, very different in anything that one could criticise as a usurpation of provincial power, from the legislation which was reviewed by Sir Allen Aylesworth.

This is somewhat aside. The minister seems to emphasize the consideration that a good deal of time had intervened between the litigation, indeed between the final decision of the Supreme Court and the act of the provincial legislature. I cannot see that the point is material; but the minister should remember that the actual owner, the man most interested, the heir in title to Jane MacNeil was, between 1914, when the decision was given, and a date shortly prior to the action of the Nova Scotia legislature, absent at the front. Upon his return, he who was interested, set to work to try to restore what he believed were his rights. This explains the intervention of those years.

Is it of any importance that this House endeavour to reassert the correct principle in matters of this kind? I think it is of vast importance. What position are we in if the judgment of the minister and of the government in this case is to be permanent? I know there is a measure of permanency to their decision, no matter what we do. I am not sure whether the government has any power to reverse the decision which it has given; but at all events we have power to say what we believe to be right, and it seems to me that it is proper for this House, at least for those members who believe that in the interest of our Dominion, another course should have been chosen to make the record speak our views. It is in our power and it is our duty to exercise that right.

Where are we—let me repeat the question—if the minister's opinion is to be followed in the future? Other governments, other legislatures of this country may exercise their functions, and when they do, they will never know whether they are to be left in possession of the fruits and answerable for the consequences or not. They may be quite within their powers and rights; they may be legislating for their own citizens and no others; they may be legislating about matters that affect exclusively their own people and property; but they cannot for a minute feel secure. The sword of the minister hangs above them, and it may fall the moment the legislation passes. It is important surely that the responsibility of governments in provinces to the legislatures and the responsibility of legislatures to their people should remain intact. If the minister's advice to his colleagues and the decision of his colleagues—are in the MacNeil case to be followed in the future, that responsibility is gone.

A great deal of what the minister has said, if it is based on fact, is very sound argument; but it is argument that should be addressed to the legislature of Nova Scotia, not argument that should be addressed to this House, nor that he should have addressed to his colleagues when he advised them to take this course. It is for the legislature of Nova Scotia to decide whether or not they should repeal legislation which they have passed, whether, when they came to pass it in the first place, it was doing justice between the parties or whether it was not. They must decide whether by any cajolery, by any imposition, for it may be alleged that there was imposition upon the members, they were misled and took the wrong course. If they decide such to be established then it is for the legislature of Nova Scotia to reverse itself. It has power to repeal its own acts and it has often done so. We have repealed our acts, and the argument of the minister, if it were based on facts, would have been very powerful before that legislature, to persuade it to take that course. But they were not arguments which he was justified in addressing to his colleagues in advising them to annul this legislation.

In this connection, let me have a word to say of the minister's last contention that disallowance was made with the privity, or, as he put it, with the consent or even upon the request of the government of Nova Scotia. When did the power of annulment, the power of disallowance, rest before on the desire of the government responsible to the legislature which enacted the legislation? Who ever heard of the government of Canada being the agent, the instrument, of a provincial government to defeat the ends of a provincial legislature? Is that not exactly what the minister's contention means? Is the government of Nova Scotia, which takes the responsibility of permitting to pass, while it remains in power, legislation that it afterwards thinks it should not have allowed to pass, to get out of its responsibility and to defeat the ends of its own legislature, merely by coming to the government of Canada and saying: "Annul this legislation; disallow it, and there is an end of our responsibility and yours."

This is not the first case, indeed, where disallowance has been a matter, I will not say of collusion, but let me say of agreement, between the government of a province and the government of the Dominion. From what I have learned, the disallowance of legislation changing the rule of the road was also a matter of agreement between the government of Nova Scotia and the government of Canada. In that case the action of this government may have saved the government of Nova Scotia from very serious difficulty, and it may have saved the people of Nova Scotia from very serious inconvenience into which the precipitancy of their legislature and the negligence of their government had driven them. But surely such a service is no function of His Majesty in Council of the Dominion. The Governor General in Council does not exist to rescue legislatures or provinces from the inevitable, legitimate consequences of their own recklessness, or even of their own wrong doing.

Let me emphasize in this connection one more feature. In no respect whatever does the legislation in the MacNeil case affect any other province in Canada. The land is in Nova Scotia; all parties to the dispute are, I understand, in Nova Scotia; anyway every material thing connected with the case is Nova Scotian. It does not in the remotest way affect Dominion policy. It does not even in the most attenuated way affect Dominion rights. It is a local matter only, a matter not only of civil rights, but so distinctly local that above all other matters it should have been left to the final determination of the legislature of that province.

Let us remember as well that the government, after the character of the legislation—in the mind of the Deputy Minister of Justice—had been drawn to its atention, had ample oportunity to repeal it. The minister says it did not repeal the legislation although a bill was brought before it for the purpose. He says the bill got its first reading, if it did not go further; but the minister says it was not actually repealed because the legislature closed before the House adopted the bill. Well, that is usually the reason why most legislation is not passed—the House closes before its adoption. But who closed the legislature? Did the legislature close without the will of the government? Did someone go and lock the door behind the government's back? The government closed the legislature of the province of Nova Scotia, the government that was in power when this legislation was passed, the government that had a large majority, and which if it had the will to do so, could have repealed this legislation. No, Mr. Speaker, the minister has acted not only against the first judgment of the legislature of Nova Scotia but against the re-considered judgment of that body. After the legislature had had ample opportunity to redress its action if it had felt that its action was wrong, it declined to do so; and then the government, without the consent of the legislature, comes to the minister who yields to its importunity and annuls the legislation.

The hon. minister, in order if he can to make it appear that the hands of the opposition in this matter are tied, irrespective of what the merits of the case may be, reads a letter from the Deputy Minister of Justice, or rather a part of it, addressed to the Deputy Attorney General of the province of Nova Scotia, in which the Deputy Minister of Justice expresses, as no doubt was his honest belief, his opinion of the legislation. Having done so the Deputy Minister of Justice in this letter says this to the Deputy Attorney General of Nova Scotia:

> Therefore I think you must agree that it is impossible to justify, or even to describe in terms of toleration,—

I am reading what the minister read, am I not? I am not sure it is the same letter but it is signed by the deputy minister.

> —the conduct which is sanctioned by the act in question, revesting the title in Miss MacNeil by legislative act. I can only imagine that it must have been through some oversight on the part of the government that the act was allowed to pass. In these circumstances it would seem that the wrong done by this legislation should be rectified by the legislature. It seems to be a case in which, if I may venture to say so, for the good name of the province as well as in simple justice to the petitioners, the act should not be allowed to remain, and the more proper remedy is by way of repeal. I observe that your legislature is now in session. I have discussed this matter with the Minister of Justice and he desires me to suggest that your government should give earnest consideration to the propriety of putting through a repealing act at the present session.

That was the suggestion of the then Minister of Justice, the Hon. Mr. R. B. Bennett. That matter, I may say, never came before the late government at all; the time never arrived when it should. According to this letter, the Minister of Justice suggested that the government of Nova Scotia should give earnest consideration to putting through a repealing act "at the present session". He goes on:

> Otherwise it will be difficult to resist the application to disallow. The disallowance of this sort of statute—

I think the minister failed to read this part of the letter; if he did, I did not hear it.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The hon. gentleman is not quoting the letter I read; I read a letter dated November 21.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is dated April 7, 1922. Evidently this states the opinion of the present Minister of Justice.

Mr. JACOBS: You are reading Mr. Bennett's letter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I am reading a letter written by the Deputy Minister of Justice.

Mr. JACOBS: Advised by Mr. Bennett.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, Mr. Bennett was not in office then.

Mr. JACOBS: I heard his name mentioned by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I thought this was the letter of November 21 which the minister referred to. I had not looked at the date. This letter was actually written, it appears, since my hon. friend (Sir Lomer Gouin) assumed office.

> The disallowance of this sort of statute which is, I suppose, intra vires upon the ground of its conflict with the principles of justice, would introduce a principle of action here with respect to provincial legislation which it might afterwards be found difficult to restrict within due limits and, therefore upon constitutional grounds, and from motives of expediency, it is suggested that the necessity of further consideration by this government should be avoided by local action.

That was the view of the Deputy Minister of Justice, and apparently the view of the minister at that time; and in the previous letter which the minister read the opinion was expressed that the matter of disallowance would have to be "considered" if it should be that the legislature would decline to repeal the act. That is very different from taking the responsibility of actual disallowance. Language of that kind has been used very often through the years, but the federal government has not until now actually gone the length of disallowance upon that ground and that ground alone. Review by the entire government in this as in every case was necessary before a decision could be reached and I can assure the minister there would have been no disallowance by the late government.

All through this time the jurisdiction of the federal government as a matter of constitutional practice has been becoming narrower and ever narrower, and the autonomy of local legislatures has been growing stronger and ever stronger; and right it is that it should be so. Why should it be that a government —not parliament, let hon. gentlemen remember, for parliament has really no say in the matter at all save to express its opinion, it has no authority whatever—why should it be that a government not responsible initially to the electors of the particular province, because a federal government is just as responsible to the electors of a province three thousand miles away, why is it I say that a government sitting here, can act as a sort of moral censor of the conduct of legislatures in this country, legislatures which are themselves responsible to the people who elect them and to whom they must answer for their acts? If the federal government, merely by virtue of its own opinion as to the moral quality of legislation passed by a province, has the right to reverse that legislation and wipe it out, does not the government by that course assume the functions of the people of the province? Does not the government in that way relieve the provincial administration of the logical consequences of its own conduct and thereby defeat the ends of responsible government? Thus it is that all through these years the right of annulment has been restricted rather than amplified, and in no case has it been exercised save in so far as intra vires legislation is concerned when it interposed upon territory rightly occupied by the federal authority, or upon federal policy, where the federal government had a right to have a policy. No one would contend for a moment that this case comes within either category. Therefore I ask the House to declare that the minister was not right, and that the government was not justified in following his advice and in disallowing the legislation of a province, passed admittedly wholly within its power, and admittedly affecting only the interests of the province, affecting no property right and no individual right of any kind beyond the confines of the province, and interfering in no way in the least degree with federal policy of any kind, nor invading in the slightest measure any sphere in which the Dominion has concurrent jurisdiction. I ask the House to declare that the government in arrogating to itself an authority to reverse and defeat such legislation acted contrary to sound constitutional standards and practice.

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou, Acting Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, a very peculiar situation presents itself for the consideration of the House to-night. My right hon. friend who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Meighen) was the leader of the government down to the 1st January, 1922. On November 8, 1921, his Minister of Justice, the Hon. R. B. Bennett, instructed his deputy minister to write the Attorney General of Nova Scotia in the following terms:—

> Sir,—The minister desires that I should draw your attention to a recent act of the legislature of Nova Scotia, chapter 177, of 1921, "An Act to Vest Certain Lands in Victoria County in Jane E. MacNeil". It is represented to the department that this statute in effect reverses the judgments of the courts including the Supreme Court of Canada in which it was ultimately decided that the defendant Jane E. MacNeil had acquired the title fraudulently, held the lands in trust and should convey them to the curator for the benefit of creditors.
> It would be the duty of the Minister of Justice, as you will perceive, to consider the propriety of recommending disallowance of this statute, and he would be glad, in considering the matter, to have before him any explanation or representation which your government would desire to submit.

My right hon. friend's government therefore raised the issue as to whether or not this statute should be disallowed; they were the first people to raise any question about it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon gentleman knows better than that. There is correspondence on the file before that.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I am speaking of those constitutionally and politically responsible to this House. My right hon. friend had the temerity this afternoon to move a vote of want of confidence in this government because we did the very thing which his Minister of Justice said should be done in 1921. The motion before the House for consideration to-night is not purely a question as to whether or not certain action taken by the Governor in Council in 1922 was right within the constitution, my right hon. friend is asking the House to turn this government out because of that action—an action which he and his government were responsible for initiating. That is the situation.

Now, do not let us have any misgivings as to where we stand in this matter. Argument as to the relative constitutional powers of the provinces and the Dominion may be made at great length and with great elaboration, but after all when we come to consider what is the issue before the House the primary points for us to consider are: First—Has the government the right of disallowance? Secondly—Was the right properly exercised in this particular matter? What is the situation as to whether the right of disallowance exists? In the British North America Act will be found an express provision that there rests in the federal Governor in Council the right to disallow the legislation of a province. There are no limits defined within which this right may be exercised there are no judicial decisions which in any way define how it should be exercised. From time to time since 1867 successive ministers of Justice have reviewed the legislation of the provinces, some holding one view at one time and others holding one view at another time. In order therefore to ascertain just where we stand in regard to this question perhaps it will be well to look at some authorities. Take, for instance, Todd on Parliamentary Government in the Colonies, a standard authority about which there can be no question. Speaking of this power of dissolution he says:

> Two possible grounds of objection to provincial enactments are noticed in the preceding report, namely: (1) Where exception might be urged to "the law" itself, as being in excess of the constitutional powers of the local legislature, or at variance with dominion legislation; (2) Where it might appear that proposed enactments were contrary to the policy which, in the opinion of the Governor General in Council, ought to prevail throughout the dominion, in view of the general interests thereof.

There we have recognition of the principle involved in the very inception of confederation—not merely that legislation which was ultra vires of the provincial government might be dealt with by the federal authority under this veto power, but also that an inherent right existed in the federal executive to deal with matters which might be within the jurisdiction of the legislatures. So we have that to start with. Has there been any change of opinion on the principle there laid down other than the varying opinions of the successive Ministers of Justice from time to time? Let us see what the practice has been.

At first legislation which was clearly ultra vires was disallowed; then as time went on different courses were adopted. The policy adopted was first, to ask the legislature to repeal or amend the objectionable legislation; secondly, to leave the question to be decided by the courts; or, thirdly, to absolutely disallow the legislation. The reason why disallowance was resorted to was because grave difficulties might arise and awkward problems be involved if legislation of doubtful validity was allowed to be operative.

Now, my right hon. friend has alleged that we can find no cases in which the power of veto was exercised in regard to matters which might be intra vires of the legislature.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, no.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say that at all. The hon. member surely never thought I said so?

Mr. MACDONALD: Then does my hon. friend concede it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know there are cases of intra vires legislation where the power of disallowance has been exercised, and justly so; but I said there has been no case of disallowance merely on the ground of the injustice of the legislation itself.

Mr. MACDONALD: I shall be glad to show my hon. friend that his Minister of Justice, the Hon. Mr. Doherty, laid down authority directly to the contrary.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am speaking of cases and decisions.

Mr. MACDONALD: I will come to those later on. I understand my hon. friend now to agree with my proposition that the right of the federal authority to interfere with legislation which is ultra vires of the province might be exercised in certain cases. The former great leader of the Conservative party laid that down very explicitly. It was also laid down by the late Mr. Ouimet when Acting Minister of Justice. Then we come to 1909 on the occasion of the refusal to disallow the legislation of the Ontario government in regard to the Florence mining case, when Sir Allen Aylesworth gave an opinion which has been frequently quoted. I was in the House on that occasion and remember the discussion very well. For the information of the House I want to cite the opinion of a gentleman who took part in the debate, in fact at whose instance it arose. I refer to Mr. Justice

Clarke of the Court of Appeals of Alberta, who was then a member of this House. He said:

> Certainly we have the power to interfere. Certainly I think His Excellency has the prerogative right to disallow, whether it is because an act is beyond the jurisdiction of the province or whether, in the interest of the whole country and as a matter of political expediency, it ought to be disallowed.

There is another recognition that the right exists. Now let me cite my right hon. friend's Minister of Justice, Hon. Mr. Doherty. Speaking in 1912 he laid down in the Alberta case:

> The undersigned entertains no doubt, however, that the power is constitutionally capable of exercise and may on occasions be properly invoked for the purpose of preventing, not inconsistently with the public interest, irreparable injustice or undue interference with private rights or property through the operation of local statutes intra vires of the legislature.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was the decision in the case?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I do not know whether my right hon. friend sat in council, but his former colleague did, when Right Hon. Mr. Doherty, dealing with the legislation passed by the province of Alberta in connection with the Alberta waterways case, declined, though he indicated that he thought it was ultra vires, to disallow it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear,

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Yes, but the courts disallowed it. The minister of that day laid down the unquestionable doctrine that I have just cited, a doctrine that my right hon. friend disputes to-night, that in cases of irreparable injustice or undue interference with private rights or property through the operation of local statutes intra vires of the legislature, disallowance might be had.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was no disallowance, though.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My right hon. friend is quibbling, and he knows he is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all; I admitted when I spoke that there were conflicts of obiter dicta. That is an obiter dictum, and the hon. member knows it. What is more, the minister there referred to irreparable cases; none would suggest that cases are irreparable where the courts are opened to both parties. I admit I do not agree with the obiter dicta, but there was no dicision based on the one the hon. gentlemen cites.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The Minister of Justice under the administration of my right hon friend was referring to irreparable injustice or undue interference with private rights.

Mr. MEIGHEN: "And."

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): No, not "and"— "or." That was the doctrine of the government with which my hon. friend was connected. In regard to his assertion that there had been no interference since confederation with regard to these matters, I may say that he will find in Lefroy on page 46 a statement made by that distinguished lawyer, Mr. Lafleur, of Montreal, whose ability is recognized everywhere throughout Canada Speaking of Mr. Lafleur's argument, this authority says:

> Summing up, Mr. Lafleur informed the Privy Council of Canada that the number of acts actually disallowed on grounds of injustice under what he calls the old regime, from confederation to 1898, were five in number.

Five; my hon. friend said, none.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Injustice was not the only ground.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Excuse me, now, I quote further.

> But that in numbers of other cases the recommendations made by the Ministers of Justice led to a change in the law either by repeal or by amendment, and consequently the necessity for disallowance was obviated.

So that Mr. Lafleur distinctly says that my hon. friend was wrong; that not only was the attention of the legislature called to the necessity for disallowance or amendment, but that in five specific cases the power was exercised.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Can the hon. gentleman find the cases?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I have not the law library right at hand, but 9 p.m. I would find them if my right hon. friend desires it. But surely he will not question Mr. Lafleur's statement in that respect.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know that Keith reviews all the cases, and there is not one that rests on that ground and that alone.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): All I can say is that I am quoting from a reputable authority, Lefroy, and I am giving the statement of Mr. Eugene Lafleur. I venture to say that my hon. friend will not question what Mr. Lafleur says in that regard. Let me quote again from Todd. At page 521, speaking of the power of disallowance, he says:

> It has been sometimes invoked in respect to acts or bills which contained provisions that were deemed to be contrary to sound principles of legislation, and therefore likely to prove injurious to the interests or welfare of the Dominion.

Then he says that in extreme cases the Governor General in Council has assumed the responsibility of disallowing provincial enactments upon the ground that they included unsound or objectionable principles of legislation. I hope that I have made it clear that unquestionably the power exists with reference to legislation which is ultra vires, and that also, in the matter of legislation which is intra vires, under certain conditions within the lines laid down by Mr. Doherty, that power has been exercised repeatedly by Governors General since confederation in the cases mentioned by Mr. Lafleur.

Let me refer the House to some statements that have been made in this connection and that ought not, in my opinion, to be disregarded. Lord Herschell, speaking in the Attorney General for Canada and the Provinces in 1898, and referring to the powers of the legislatures and their right to exercise them, said:

> If however, the legislature purports to confer upon others proprietary rights where it possesses none itself, that in their lordships' opinion is not an exercise of the legislative jurisdiction conferred by section 91.

The Alberta Waterways case had to do with the investment by the Alberta government of a large amount of money in the construction of a railway. The money was being diverted by the company, and the province proceeded to urge for the impounding of the money in the bank. There the government were directly interested in the project. Take the Florence gold mining case in Ontario: there the government were the owners of the mine for which the lease had been granted, and it was a dispute between the lessees. Take the case in which application for disallowance was made with reference to the Ontario Power Commission. The Ontario government created the commission and undertook to protect it. In the Florence mining case, in which Sir Allen Aylesworth gave the dictum, it was held by the courts of Ontario that notwithstanding alleged objectionable clauses in the act, the legislation of itself was absolutely constitutional. But in this case the province of Nova Scotia had years ago divested itself of any possible interest in that farm in Cape Breton, and it came down from the clear skies, as it were, with this legislation and undertook to interfere with the rights and privileges of the owners.

Now, what is the situation here? Within the last two years the hon. gentleman who was Minister of Justice of this Dominion was twice called upon to deal with bills of the legislature of the province of Nova Scotia on the question of disallowance. In the one case it was suggested by the government directly that they desired the bill to be disallowed; it related to a matter that was purely intra vires of the province, a matter that was absolutely within their rights. No other authority could have interfered with it in any way; yet they asked the Minister of Justice to disallow it. If there was no power to interfere with legislation that might be intra vires of the province, upon what ground, upon what right, could the Premier of Nova Scotia ask the Minister of Justice to disallow it? Then, here is the case of men who had vested interests; who had gone on on the faith of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada and invested their money, sold their bonds, and so on. They go to the Minister of Justice and point out that this case, as had been laid down by the previous Minister of Justice, Mr. Doherty, should be dealt with by the federal authority. My right hon. friend's Minister of Justice initiates the matter; the present minister was only its inheritor—the proceedings were started by Hon. R. B. Bennett. When the question is put up to the government of Nova Scotia, they say, "We have no objections to the act being disallowed."

Now, who is complaining here? Why is my hon. friend moving a vote of want of confidence? In view of these facts why is he attempting to indicate that provincial rights throughout this country are imperilled? My hon. friend is playing politics; he is more interested in the raising of an issue of this kind, with some ulterior object in view, than he is in settling any constitutional question, because on that point there is not very much doubt.

Well, what are the facts? The Minister of Justice this afternoon related some of them. The House is familiar with the first part of the proceedings. The allegation was that a man by the name of Francis MacNeil, who had received $2,000 from his partner through Molson's Bank, Montreal, to go down and buy a piece of property for the partnership, proceeded when he got in Cape Breton to take the deed for the property in his sister's name. Then the curator or assignee of the firm when it went into insolvency—

Mr. HANSON: Is the hon. gentleman aware that the witnesses on behalf of the curator were never examined at the trial, that the trial took place at an adjourned hearing and finally went by default?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): All I have to say is this: I understand some imputation has been made against the gentleman who was identified with this case first. That was Mr. Gunn. He is a reputable man, his standing at the bar of Nova Scotia is very high. Why did not some one interested in this matter, if it was considered there was ground for complaint, make representations to the Barristers Society of Nova Scotia in regard to Mr. Gunn? But no one did that, the case went right on, and finally was heard by the Supreme Court of Canada. After it had been dealt with there the parties who had lost turned around and made complaints. Mr. Gunn acted in the first instance, as I find from the record and when the case went to appeal he was assisted by Mr. Ralston. It is not until ten years afterwards that these imputations are made. Is it likely that Mr. Ralston whom we all know on account of his position and standing at the bar would have been associated with Mr. Gunn in arguing a case in Nova Scotia if the circumstances were such as have been suggested? Mr. Ralston argued this case in the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia and he also argued it before the Supreme Court in Ottawa, and I will make the statement, without having communicated with that gentleman in any way—that he would not come here and ask this House to condemn the government because it disallowed this legislation. My hon. friend is a lawyer. He knows that, time and time again in the history of our profession, after a suit is over you will find some interested party going around and making complaints, we will say, either that my hon. friend (Mr. Hanson) was no good or that I was no good, as the case may be.

Mr. GRAHAM: They might both be right.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Yes that may be true. To-day we are told the trouble was that the lawyers went back on them. I do not take much stock in the allegations that have been made. The case was tried in Nova Scotia by Mr. Justice Ritchie, whom I know very well. It then went to the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia and Mr. Justice Ritchie expressed a very strong opinion of Mr. Francis MacNeil who took the $2,000 from Montreal. Mr. Justice Ritchie not only said what was attributed to him by the Minister of Justice, but at a later date expressed himself as follows:

> At the trial, the defendant Francis J. MacNeil said that, with the exception of $100, the proceeds of the $2,000 note went to pay for the gypsum property as no doubt it did. In his answer to one of the interrogatories he said it did not. I regard him as a man whose evidence is not entitled to credit.

That is what a learned judge of the province of Nova Scotia said in regard to the gentleman who took this money from Montreal. The case was decided in Nova Scotia and an appeal taken to the Supreme Court of Canada. Now let us see what Mr. Justice Idington said about it. It would seem from what we have been told that everybody is prejudiced in this case. The lawyers were prejudiced and now, I suppose, we will be told that the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada were prejudiced. What does Mr. Justice Idington say with regard to Francis MacNeil:

> When we find that her brother, who was one of the said firm of Sparrow and MacNeil in question, managed personally and through his solicitor, and agent, the whole transaction relative to getting the deed executed and paid the money got as above mentioned, I submit that these statements under oath can hardly be properly described as counsel suggested as being merely "uncandid".
> It rather shocks one to be asked in face of such a perversion under oath, of the truth by the appellant, to treat her as a credible witness when testifying relatively to the same transaction.

Now, I want to say—and I leave it to any gentleman in this House who is connected with the bar—that rarely you find judges in an appellant tribunal undertaking to condemn a witness in such clear and explicit terms; rarely do they express themselves in such unqualified terms with respect to witnesses; it is only in extreme cases that they do it. Well, that was away back in 1912 and 1913. The decision was accepted. There were lots of MacNeils in Nova Scotia who were friendly to Fletcher but nothing was said about the matter. They accepted the decision. The Supreme Court of Canada had decided that this property did not belong to Francis MacNeil and for six years that situation was accepted.

All of a sudden an energetic young fellow who had done good service overseas goes and visits former Chief Justice Townshend. This gentleman had retired from the bench for quite a number of years; he had become very aged and was living in Wolfville: he is one of the most highly regarded gentlemen in our province. The young man who started this went to former Chief Justice Townshend and got some kind of a letter from him which was read by my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) this afternoon. Then he goes to some of his friends in the legislature and prevails upon them to start the passing of legislation through the provincial legislature. The Premier of the province was away. No notice of this contemplated legislation was given to the people in Montreal who were the owners of the property and, as sometimes occurs in this parliament, the legislation slipped through without very much attention being paid to it. My hon. friend read a letter from former Chief Justice Townshend on this matter. The Minister of Justice read a portion of another letter. Now let me read a letter which indicates what Sir Charles Townshend's view of the situation was when he found what use the young man in question had been making of the first letter referred to.

WOLFVILLE, N.S., June 30, 1922.

R. B. BLAUVELDT, ESQ.,
Barrister,
Wolfville, N.S.

Dear Sir,—In reply to your letter of June 29 inst. containing an extract of an alleged letter from a Mr. Francis MacNeil as to what I said to him respecting a case from Cape Breton in which he was interested, I beg to state that the alleged statements made by MacNeil are a tissue of deliberate falsehoods in which there is not a word of truth.

I said nothing more to him or rather different from that contained in the letter I gave him. You, as a barrister, can readily understand that it would be inconceivable that I should make any such statements concerning a judgment to which I was a party. I tried to impress upon him that there was no possible way in which the final judgment of the court could be disturbed.

I never dreamt that any legislature could be guilty of such an outrageous act as to pass a law reversing the decision of the final court of appeal. I do not know why I should have given him the letter I did except that I felt at the time some sympathy for a returned soldier who alleged his loss was a consequence of his being absent from the country and that perhaps some of his friends or comrades if they believed his story might give him some assistance.

I should not have given him the letter at all, but certainly would never have done so for the use that has been made of it.—Yours truly,

(Signed) CHARLES TOWNSHEND.

Now let me quote from another letter written in June, 1917 after this legislation had been passed.

WOLFVILLE, June 17, 1922.

Dear Sir,—I feel much shocked as well as indignant to learn from you that a most unjustifiable use has been or is intended to be made of a short letter of mine in a Cape Breton case—Plaster Quarries vs MacNeil. It is some years since I as one of the Nova Scotia Supreme Court heard this case on appeal, and I never had nor have I now the slightest doubt as to the correctness of the decision the court rendered afterwards confirmed by the Supreme Court of Canada. A year or more afterwards, a young man named MacNeil called at my residence asking me to make some order to have the case reheard, and produced a solemn written statement to convince me that the court had erred and that gross injustice had been done to him. I told him very emphatically that I as Chief Justice and other members of the court could do nothing for him, that the matter was now out of our hand, and finally settled for all time.

He pressed me to send the statement which to gratify him I did, and at his urgent request wrote a note to say that if all the statements had been proved satisfactory to the court, there might have been a different result, but I either asked or told him that as matters stood, the judgment was right and nothing could disturb it.

I felt some sympathy for the man if his statements were true, especially as he stated that he was absent in France as a soldier when the case was tried.

I never dreamed that any legislation of a civilized country could be guilty of such an outrage as to pass an act setting aside the solemn judgment of the court as I learn has been done in this case, and I do sincerely trust you will succeed in having such a gross violation of constitutional right disallowed by the Dominion government if for no other reason a notice to the local legislature that they will not be permitted to interfere with the courts of justice.—Yours sincerely,

(Signed) CHARLES TOWNSHEND.

Now so much for the opinion of Sir Charles Townshend and so much for the letter which was read this afternoon. Under the circumstances, the position of Sir Charles Townshend was somewhat difficult in this matter. Here was a kindly old gentleman who had been pressed by a young man who had been overseas, and in order to get rid of the young man he wrote this letter. It was an unwise proceeding, but immediately he had done so, he realized the enormity of the manner in which his letter had been used and he took steps to put himself right. Let us look at the act. I submit to the judgment of the House that if it was intended by the legislature to deal with this case upon any reasonable ground, they would never have placed such an act as we find upon the statute book. If ever there was an occasion on which a bill was being presented to parliament, or an act passed, where there should be embodied in the preamble of the bill the reasons why the decisions of the highest federal court in the country, delivered six years previously, should be interfered with, it was this bill. I leave it to the judgment and fairness of hon. members. If such a proposition came to us for consideration—and I question whether it ever could come here—there is not an hon. member in this House who would not ask the promoters at once, "Where in the preamble of the bill have you set out the reasons or justification? Why this haste? Why are we asked to over-ride a decision of the court which has been in effect for six years?" But they adopted the other course, without rhyme or reason, and without a suggestion of the why or wherefore. Here is an act which undertakes to say that a certain lot of land known as the gypsum property in Nova Scotia, describing it by metes and bounds,—

> Is hereby vested in Jane E. MacNeil, in fee simple subject to the same trusts and equities in favour of any other person, persons or body corporate, if any, under which she held the said lot of land on the tenth day of July, 1911, or any prior time, notwithstanding any proceedings or judgment, legal or otherwise, in the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, or an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada therefrom, had or taken, and notwithstanding the operation of any statute of limitation in force in this or any other province of the Dominion of Canada,

This act undertakes to nullify the operation of any statutes of any province of the Dominion of Canada which undertakes to stand in the way of this act. The act further states—and notwithstanding laches, if any, on the part of any person, persons or body corporate, if any, claiming a beneficial interest in the said land.

Then it goes on to state:

The claims, rights and interests of all persons and bodies corporate in respect to the trusts and equities, if any, mentioned in section 1 of this act, shall be forever barred, unless an action, suit or other proceeding is brought in the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia for the purpose of declaring, enforcing or establishing of such claim, right or interest within one year after the date of the coming into force of this act.

The plea is made that that is a very wonderful section. It is said this is only putting things back to where they were in 1911. Is it? Let us see what the situation was. What did the Supreme Court of Canada decide in this matter? Did they decide anything about the trustees? Here is the decision of the court in a head note:

Held, affirming the judgment of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, that the curator was entitled to have the transaction set aside and the lands purchased treated as part of the insolvent's estate.

Let us see what would happen supposing the assignee or the curators started an action in Nova Scotia under that act. Suppose they got through the courts of Nova Scotia, and declared MacNeil to be holding the property as trustee. Before the Supreme Court, what do we find? Six or seven years ago that court held, not that Miss MacNeil could or could not be a trustee, but that the land was actually the property of a curator. What a farce in judicial procedure to ask the Supreme Court to turn around, and, basing the decision upon the fact that the legislature had enacted that this property was vested in Miss MacNeil as trustee for somebody, hold that she was a trustee, and that some imaginary cestui qui trust had a right under it. That is the situation. I venture to say there is not a lawyer in this House who will risk his reputation on the proposition that such a thing would be possible in a civilized country. The act is a farce, as far as the second clause goes. It is adroitly drawn to mislead the public. It was said by the legislature of Nova Scotia "We do not want to reverse the judgment of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, but just to fix it up so that the case can be tried all over again," and when they come to do it they put it in such a way that it is absolutely impossible for the case to be treated on the basis on which they want the Supreme Court to treat it.

Is it any wonder that when the application is made to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice he at once instructed his deputy to take steps to have this act disallowed. In the first place, he saw that the act itself was a ridiculous absurdity, intended to mislead the public into the belief that they were providing for a new trial, in which the thing was dead open and shut before they ever started. There was confiscation without compensation in the act, and it was intrusion by the legislature into a matter of absolute private right in which the province as a whole had no right to interfere, and in which the whole matter had long been settled. Suppose, for instance, one of our friends opposite from the West had the misfortune to have his title to his section of land or to two or three sections of land questioned by some person, who alleged that he was entitled to the property, and the Supreme Court of Canada, or the Supreme Court of Saskatchewan, as the case might be, decided this year that there was not anything in the claim, that the property belonged to the hon. member opposite, and, that—which I hope would never occur—seven or eight years after this, when he had gone to his fathers, and his wife and family were left alone, all of a sudden the gentleman who litigated this year might have become powerful or become interested in a wealthy corporation, might influence the legislature in the province in which he lived to pass an act to declare that, notwithstanding what had been decided by the court of Manitoba or Saskatchewan in the year of grace 1923, it was of no value whatever, that the property was to be vested in this man who had been the former litigant, and that he would have the property for evermore. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is what was done in Nova Scotia. That is what is to be done by this legislation.

Mr. LUCAS: I understood the hon. member to say that that act possibly might have been passed in Nova Scotia without mature consideration. In case that was a fact, would it not have been possible for the legislature of Nova Scotia after mature consideration, to repeal that at a later session?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): That is a fair question. All I can say in regard to that is that I see in the record the statement of the Attorney General of Nova Scotia that a bill was introduced and that it passed its second reading. If the hon. member had lived in Nova Scotia as long as I have and seen how fast the legislature closes up in the spring when the members want to go home, he would understand that a great deal of legislation goes by the board, just as is the case in this parliament when the weather gets hot. This was legislation not introduced by the government, and that is the situation.

In view of all this situation, in view of the fact that my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) the desk mate of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) has moved a vote of want of confidence in this government, in the light of the facts I have given and the acknowledged authorities as regards the question of veto, in view of the fact that my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) sat with the then Minister of Justice through all the period when he was in the government, when that gentleman went on record in exactly such a case, asserting that it was a proper case for disallowance, and in view of the fact that his own Minister of Justice initiated these proceedings and asked his deputy to take them, this House would be stultifying itself, would be an object of ridicule throughout the country, were we to entertain for a moment the motion of my hon. friend.

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a few observations in connection with this amendment. We have just listened to a very interesting address by the new fo'castl member of the government. It reminds me of some eight, ten or twelve years ago when the hon. gentleman was the leader of that celebrated coterie in this House known as the "Dark Lantern Brigade"—much sound and fury, signifying nothing. I must congratulate the hon. member on having lived up to his reputation. I hardly think, however, that his colleague the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) will take a great deal of comfort from the remarks that have been made by his colleague the fo'castl minister, because I believe he has added nothing to the arguments adduced in opposition to this amendment.

Some hon. members have endeavoured tonight to make some point by reason of a letter which was written by the Deputy Minister of Justice on the 8th day of November, 1921, to the Attorney General of Nova Scotia. I venture to suggest that my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) has misconstrued the effect of that letter. First of all, if I understood him correctly, he stated that the Minister of Justice of the day himself brought forward the matter of disallowance of the act in question. I rather challenge that point of view. I am of opinion, reading between the lines of this letter, that the question of the propriety of the legislation in this case was brought forward by the Deputy Minister of Justice of the day in view of his personal connection with the subject matter of this legislation and of the suit in question.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): He says that the minister instructed him.

Mr. HANSON: I know he says that the minister instructed him to draw his attention to the matter. He says also that:

> It would be the duty of the Minister of Justice, as you will perceive, to consider the propriety of recommending disallowance of this statute.

That is as far as he goes. In the light of authorities and especially in the light of the authority of Sir Allen Aylesworth in the Florence mining case, I venture to say that any Minister of Justice at that time would have paused and considered very fully before he would have recommended disallowance in connection with this particular measure. I pause here for a moment to say this, that we all recognize that Mr. Newcombe, the deputy minister, is a leading counsel in this country, and that he is an outstanding counsel before the Supreme Court of Canada. But I question very seriously the propriety of the Deputy Minister of Justice of this country acting as counsel in private litigation in cases and questions which may ultimately come in some other form before him in his official capacity. I doubt very much, if Mr. Newcombe had known or realized for a moment that the subject matter of the case of Sparrow and MacNeil would have come before him in its constitutional aspect, as it did five years later, if he would ever have accepted any retainer to argue the case before the Supreme Court of Canada.

Let me pass from that for a moment. A good deal of doubt has been thrown upon the bona fides of Stanley MacNeil in his effort to rectify what to him at all events has seemed a glaring miscarriage of justice. I desire to put upon the record and to read to the members of this House a letter in which he details the situation as it presents itself to him. Hon. members will recall that in the letter of the 8th November, the Deputy Minister of Justice called upon the Attorney General of Nova Scotia to justify the passing of the legislation in question. What happened was this, that the Deputy Attorney General of Nova Scotia passed the inquiry along to the gentleman who had introduced the bill in the Nova Scotia legislature, and he in turn passed it along to Stanley MacNeil. On the 1st December, 1921, Stanley MacNeil replied to that letter by writing to the Deputy Attorney General of Nova Scotia this letter, which I shall read:

Dear Sir,—I am in receipt of your communication of the 14th ultimo addressed to Mr. A. C. Buchanan, M.P.P., re a bill entitled an act to vest certain lands in Victoria county in J. E. MacNeil. This bill was passed at the last session of the Nova Scotia government. Your communication stated that the Department of Justice desired an explanation of this act, as it sets aside decisions given by the courts, including the Supreme Court of Canada.

I will endeavour to give sufficient reasons at this writing to satisfy the Department of Justice, that said act should not be disallowed. If, however, the Department of Justice should deem the facts set forth in this letter insufficient to justify the act referred to, I trust they will do me the honour of permitting me to present my case before them, together with the evidence I have to support various statements in connection with same.

I might say that the court decisions referred to, were gained through fraud and as a result of a conspiracy engineered by various parties in Montreal, including Mr. W. F. Sparrow, a business partner of my brother.

That is a pretty strong statement.

But notwithstanding this fact, nor the fact that I can produce absolute evidence to show that the evidence of each of the six witnesses—on whose evidence the courts had to decide—can be placed in various categories ranging from perjury to concealment of facts—

Then in parenthesis he says:

The witnesses were not cross-examined, nor was evidence filed in rebuttal—their evidence was given at a defaulted hearing, and the true facts were never presented before the courts. Yet, notwithstanding this, nor a volume of like facts, which I can produce in connection with the decisions obtained against my interests, I have no intention of defending the legislation passed (Bill No. 124) on these grounds.

The main facts to be considered in connection with the legislation passed which I will refer to as Bill No. 124, are: That if this bill is disallowed, the courts of our country cannot deal with my claim for justice.

I never owned nor had interest in the firm of Sparrow and MacNeil of Montreal, yet through the supposed insolvency of this firm myself and family have been deprived of a property, in which the firm of Sparrow and MacNeil had absolutely no interest, although the false evidence before referred to led the courts to believe differently.

After four years and nine months' enlistment, I returned to Canada to learn that through misrepresentation practised upon them, the courts had awarded the property referred to in Bill 124, to F. W. Sharp, as curator of the firm of Sparrow and MacNeil. Mr. Sharp, with the approval of two inspectors of the supposed defunct firm of Sparrow and MacNeil, under circumstances—too lengthy to deal with at this writing—disposed of same to Mr. G. C. Fletcher for the sum of $2,500 (Mr. Fletcher was a witness at the defaulted hearing, and filed before the court a document in which he is supposed to have undertaken to pay $35,000 plus $9,000 royalty for the same property he now obtains for $2,500). Mr. Sharp, Mr. Fletcher, and the two inspectors referred to, are four of the six witnesses who gave evidence at the defaulted hearing. All our efforts to have them cross-examined failed.

Mr. Fletcher in turn disposed of the property—the fifth witness represents the supposed owners of the property at the time Bill 124 was passed—the sixth witness was W. F. Sparrow, whose fraudulent conduct made possible the whole conspiracy. Since Bill 124 has been passed, I have declined a suggestion that I compromise with the parties who claim title.

It was only after efforts were made unsuccessfully with the Department of Justice, the Supreme Court of Canada, etc., to have my claim considered, that Bill 124 was introduced and favourably acted upon by the government of Nova Scotia, as the only means by which the courts could function in their duty of administering justice in the case referred to.

The disallowing of this act, Bill 124, would infer that the Department of Justice condoned the practice of parties courageous enough to resort to misrepresentation on our courts, as a means of obtaining their unholy ends.

Bill 124 provides ample opportunity to anyone having a just claim to enforce same. If the parties who through misrepresentation obtained the court's decision, decline to avail themselves of the opportunity afforded them in Bill 124 to show whether their claim was a true one or not, and the Department of Justice has any desire to investigate the matter, I will be pleased to place at their disposal all evidence in my possession.

That the evidence I have may be deemed concrete and conclusive can be judged from the fact that it has been under the inspection of some thirteen law firms, officials of the G. W. V. A., the government of Nova Scotia, and an ex-Chief Justice (who had decided against my interests, owing to the fraudulent evidence on which he had to give his decision) and has not been found wanting.

Trusting this will sufficiently explain the matter, I am, very respectfully yours, (Signed) D. STANLEY MACNEIL.

I have read that somewhat lengthy letter in order to show that this young man was smarting under a sense of injustice, because he believed that there had been an absolute miscarriage of justice in the courts of Nova Scotia. Naturally enough the Appellate Court went only upon the material placed before them; but the man having discovered the manner in which the trial had been carried on and the verdict based upon it, having discovered what he alleges to be new and sufficient evidence, I do submit that there was no other way in which he could again bring the matter before the courts of the country save by such legislation as was passed by the legislature of Nova Scotia.

Let us consider that legislation for a moment. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Macdonald) has attempted to throw ridicule upon the provisions of section 2 of that act. I submit that the sole purpose of the act was to put the parties in the position which they occupied previously to the beginning of the first litigation, and that it was open to Plaster Quarries, Limited, or any other persons having an equity, or claiming to have an equity in the property, to begin that litigation, de novo and have the case tried and concluded on the strength of the evidence that might then be presented. By reason of the action of the Minister of Justice that privilege has been denied and the miscarriage of justice, if it may so be termed, has been made complete. That legislation was drawn up by one of the best lawyers in Nova Scotia, Mr. Stewart, who wrote the letter to my hon. friend's son, who was instrumental in having the bill passed. He appeared before the committee, as I understand, and other counsel were present—I refer to the private bills committee in the legislature of Nova Scotia in the year 1921, presided over then by the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Finn) who, in addition to being chairman of the committee was a member of the government of Nova Scotia, and who, no doubt, was chairman of the committee because he was a member of that government. I wonder what that hon. gentleman's feelings were this afternon and evening when he heard the language with which his legislation was characterized. I can imagine some of his feelings; perhaps he will be able to give vocal utterance to them after I have taken my seat. I do not think that the legislature of Nova Scotia is so bad, bad as I believe it to be, as to have railroaded legislation of this character without having given it some consideration. Let me say this further. This is not the first time that legislation of this character has been put through the legislature of Nova Scotia, and I venture the assertion that it will not be the last. This is not the first time that such legislation affecting the title to real property in the province of Nova Scotia has been put through that legislature. I recall to mind an act passed in 1915 by the legislature of Nova Scotia validating and placing at rest title to a tract of timber land that sold afterwards for nearly one million dollars, and the transfer of which took place on the strength of the act in question. The legislature of Nova Scotia has adopted a policy of validating titles by legislation. It is the only legislature in the Dominion that I am aware of which has adopted that policy; but it has adopted it in numerous cases and I have no doubt it will do so again. So that this was no new piece of legislation in that province. You may not be able to justify the policy, but it exists nevertheless; and I suppose the whole question might have been under review years ago if any vested interests had been interfered with or had taken the trouble to bring the matter before the Justice department. Certainly the Justice department never undertook to disallow the act of 1915 validating the title of the Halifax Lumber Company, or title of the Davidson Lumber Company or the numerous other lumber companies in the province, whose titles have been made good in the way I have indicated. I submit therefore that the legislature of Nova Scotia acted in perfect good faith. The members of the private bills committee of that legislature who heard the evidence on both sides as well as the arguments acted in perfect good faith. If not, with what term shall we characterize that legislature and the members thereof? I prefer to leave that to the hon. member for Pictou who himself has described what kind of legislation we are considering in this particular case.

Mr. PUTNAM: Does the hon. member wish to imply that the legislature of Nova Scotia ever validated a title which was doubtful and which was worth anything in the vicinity of a million and a half dollars?

Mr. HANSON: The hon. gentleman's question is really double-barrelled. I would answer the first part by saying that the legislature of Nova Scotia has validated titles which were really doubtful, and no one knows it better than my hon. friend for Colchester (Mr. Putnam), because he must remember the experience he and I had over that very act this year when he tried to get another private bill put through the legislature of Nova Scotia in the interests of one of his own clients exempting a certain lot which was affected by the earlier legislation.

Now, to resume. I have stated that this class of legislation is nothing new in Nova Scotia.

Mr. PUTNAM: Will the hon. gentleman answer the other part of my question?

Mr. HANSON: I have really forgotten what it was.

Mr. PUTNAM: Is the hon. gentleman seriously claiming that the validation affected property to anything like a value of $1,000,000?

Mr. HANSON: In this case or the case I cited?

Mr. PUTNAM: The Fraser Lumber Company.

Mr. HANSON: I do say that on the strength of the validating act passed by the legislature of Nova Scotia in 1915 my clients invested in the neighbourhood of $1,000,000, and that that act validated titles many of which were objectionable—just what proportion I am not prepared to state.

Mr. PUTNAM: Would you allow me to give my opinion on that?

Mr. HANSON: You can speak when I am through; there will be lots of room and lots of time.

Mr. PUTNAM: Thank you.

Mr. HANSON: I do not want to be discourteous to the hon. gentleman but I do not think he ought to make a speech in the middle of the few remarks I am addressing to the House. In respect to the act in question, the hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Macdonald) made some very scathing references to section 2. With all due deference to himself and other legal lights in this House and to the opinion of those who may differ from me, I submit that this section did adequately preserve the equities of the present owners. Unquestionably that was the intent and meaning of the statute, and if the legislature of Nova Scotia—I have confidence enough in them to say this—had understood and believed, or if the law officers of the Crown in that province under whose scrutiny this act must have passed had believed for one moment that the interest of the Plaster Quarries, Limited and the bondholders, would have been prejudicially affected in promoting new litigation, they would never have passed the bill in question. Therefore I say that the legislation was undoubtedly well considered in the local legislature, and I do submit that it gave nothing more and nothing less than the right of a new trial, which could not have been obtained in any other way.

Reference has been made to the extraordinary powers given to the Minister of Justice under the Criminal Code in capital cases to order a new trial without the interposition of judicial proceedings. But that power is exercised very sparingly. However, there have been cases, and I had intimate experience with one such case where the exercise of the power was absolutely justified. Of course, in civil matters there is no such power given to anyone, except the sovereign power in the legislature of Nova Scotia, and I submit that that sovereign power was not abused in this case.

A great deal of time has been taken in arguing the constitutional aspect of this matter. I do not propose to follow along the paths that have already been well trodden in that connection, except to say that I venture the assertion that the opinion expressed by Sir Allen Aylesworth in the Florence mining case correctly sets forth what is the constitutional practice in the cases and decisions.

Mr. HAROLD PUTNAM (Colchester): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) dropped a remark by which, whether intentionally on his part or inadvertently, the opinion would naturally be formed by this House that it was not unusual for the legislature of Nova Scotia to settle titles by legislation. Having watched legislation there for a long term of years, and being a native and a lawyer of that province, I say the practice is utterly unusual and that the valuation placed by the hon. member upon the land which happened to come under a validating bill would lead to a wholly wrong inference. It is true that in a validating bill property was included which according to my hon. friend—and I do not doubt his word—may have sold for something like a million and a half. But as to 99 per cent of that property there was no possible question about the validity of the title. There was some doubt as to about $800 or $900 worth of property included in the tract, and it was for the purpose of settling title to that small portion that the blanket bill was put through covering all the lands that the Fraser Pulp and Paper Company required. And even in respect of the title which was doubtful, my hon. friend and I had a friendly contest this winter and the Lower House of Nova Scotia put through a bill undoing the injustice which they did to the man in regard to the $800 or $900 worth of property which was taken from him, and before it reached our House of Lords —our Legislative Council—the parties arrived at a settlement. But it is absolutely erroneous to suppose that the government of the province of Nova Scotia have any policy of validating titles of substantial value. There is, however, in some counties an optional Lands Title Act in effect where after an extensive system of newspaper and poster advertising a person may by motion have a title declared, but the most ample notice must be given to every abutter and to every person who can possibly be considered as having any interest or claim in or to the land in question. Exceedingly infrequent are the occasions when the legislature of Nova Scotia purports to settle a title which is in any degree doubtful.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that owing to absence from the chamber I did not hear the earlier portion of this debate, nor am I able to say that I am in any way familiar with the merits of the controversy which has taken place in the courts and in the legislature of Nova Scotia. My knowledge in regard to the matter has been gathered solely from what I have heard of the debate this evening, and I think I may safely say that anyone who has listened carefully to the proceedings this evening must be forced to the conclusion that the question now before the House does touch one of the most important and one of the most vital interests which the provincial governments and the Dominion government have, under our great constitutional charter known as the British North America Act. The subject now under discussion involves in a most pointed way the respective jurisdictions of our provincial legislatures on the one hand and of the Dominion executive on the other.

For the purpose of the brief remarks which I propose to make to the House the merits of the controversy really need not be considered. The address delivered to-night by my hon. friend the Acting Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) was largely a discussion of the rights and claims and counter-claims of the individuals in Nova Scotia who sought either to enforce or to repel some alleged claim. In the view I take of the matter we need not concern ourselves with the claims of the various interested parties in the province of Nova Scotia. In coming to a determination upon this matter, it is of no moment whether the claims of the MacNeils are well founded or ill founded. The point and the single point which we are called upon to decide is the constitutional question, should this parliament or should the government of the Dominion exercise jurisdiction to annul or to disallow an act of the legislature of the province of Nova Scotia, passed by that legislature while acting strictly within its legislative rights as laid down by the British North America Act? That is the simple question we have to decide, and I doubt if any more important question or any more far reaching question can be raised in this parliament than this: Should this parliament, should the government of this country in any case, undertake to disallow or to annul an act of a provincial legislature when that act has been passed within the legislative jurisdiction of that province.

I assume we are all agreed upon certain points in regard to this case. All the parties interested are residents of Nova Scotia. The property over which the conflict has taken place is situated within the province of Nova Scotia. The transaction itself does not affect the rights of any other province or the rights of the Dominion. The whole matter lies within the province itself. The property is there; the parties are there, and the legislature is there, and the question concerns—

Sir LOMER GOUIN: If my hon. friend will permit me, I think he is in error. All the parties are not in the province of Nova Scotia. Sparrow and MacNeil were doing business in Montreal. They went into liquidation in Montreal and the curator was appointed in Montreal. They had creditors in Montreal, who are still creditors, unpaid. The Plaster Quarries Company is not, that I know of, a company having interests only in the province of Nova Scotia. The bonds were sold and distributed all over Canada.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am glad my hon. friend has put me right on that point. But after all, it is the property itself, and where that property is located with which we are more particularly concerned. Where is the corpus? Where are the assets? It is in regard to the assets that this particular legislation imposes rights or obligations or seeks to change title of ownership. I do not think that anyone would controvert the statement that the whole question under discussion is within the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of Nova Scotia. If we can come to that conclusion, as I think we must, then I think the next step is a very simple one. The constitutional practice which has grown up in the course of over fifty years in this country is simply this, that in regard to questions over which provincial legislatures have within themselves legislative jurisdiction, this House, this government, shall not interfere. I agree that the constitutional development in the Dominion of Canada has not been a matter of a few months or even a matter of a few years. Our constitutional rights were settled, it is true, in a written constitution in the year 1867. But there has been a slow but steady development of constitutional practice; and views which were entertained in the seventies and the eighties and the nineties do not prevail to-day and are not considered good parliamentary usage or good constitutional practice. One has only to glance over the works of the various constitutional authors who have written upon the subject to follow step by step the constitutional development which has taken place in Canada since 1867. The case cited this evening by my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Defence (Mr. Macdonald), including the argument of Mr. Lafleur, K.C., of Montreal, puts the matter more conclusively than any argument of mine could do. The citation made by the hon. gentleman was from Lefroy's work on Canada's Federal System, page 46, and I am going to repeat the quotation, because it is very appropriate to the discussion which is now proceeding:

> Mr. Lafleur informed the Privy Council of Canada that the number of acts actually disallowed on grounds of injustice under what he calls the old regime, i.e., from confederation to 1898, were five in number; but that in numbers of other cases the recommendations made by the ministers of justice led to a change in the law either by repeal or by amendment, and consequently the necessity for disallowance was obviated. As to the five cases thus referred to by Mr. Lafleur where disallowance actually followed, Mr. Masten, arguing on the other side, remarks as to them: "I find that in two of these cases, one principal ground of objection was that the rights of Dominion companies were prejudicially affected, which always is a recognized ground for disallowance, and therefore, it takes away from the strength of the remarks which are obiter on the other question."

Mr. Lafleur makes it clear in the first place that under "the old regime" five cases have arisen in Canada where the Dominion government saw fit to interfere and disallow provincial acts. "Under the old regime," mark you, but the development from 1896 down to the present time has been entirely the other way. I appeal to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin), and I refer him to the language of the late Edward Blake, who was probably the most outstanding legal mind that ever adorned this House. The late Hon. Edward Blake, speaking in this House, declared that a provincial legislature might do wrong if it liked so long as it acted within its strict constitutional rights under the British North America Act; it could do wrong if it liked in regard to property and civil rights and there was no right in this government or this parliament to correct it. Let me mention another authority. Another minister of justice, who was in that office when I first entered parliament, the late Hon. David Mills, held the same view. He stated on more than one occasion in this House that there should be no interference by federal authority in cases very similar to the present one. Following him, Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick, when Minister of Justice, afterwards Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, took identically the same view. Following him again, Sir Allen Aylesworth, now a member of the Upper House, when minister of justice, stated his view of the question in a speech which actually became famous in Canada. In fact, that speech, which was connected with the Florence mining case, was reported in full in Great Britain, and Sir Allen Aylesworth himself told me that Right Hon Mr. Asquith, at that time Prime Minister of Great Britain, had spoken to him in regard to it, had expressed his approval of the constitutional practice which Sir Allen Aylesworth had so forcibly expressed in this House.

10 p.m.

In the face of such outstanding authority can anyone for a moment argue that the actual constitutional practice in Canada to-day is otherwise than Sir Allen Aylesworth stated it to be? I grant we have the right to disallow provincial legislation—that is one thing. It is declared in the British North America Act that we have such a right; but is it good constitutional practice to exercise that right? To have a strict legal right to do an act is one thing and to have a constitutional right to do it is another thing. After having had experience of over fifty years in this country, in constitutional government under the operation of the British North America Act, I submit that we are turning back precedent after precedent and page after page of constitutional development if in a case of this kind we attempt to interfere with the legislative jurisdiction of the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is my hon. friend aware whether any objection has been raised by either the government or the legislature of Nova Scotia to this act of disallowance, and if not, wherein has there been any invasion of provincial rights?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I speak purely from the standpoint of the province of Ontario. I do not know that any objection has been taken by anybody in Nova Scotia; but if it is going to be recognized in this country that the government of Canada can disallow provincial acts passed by the legislatures of the various provinces when acting strictly within their provincial rights and jurisdictions I think every province of Canada is vitally interested in the question; and it is only from that point of view that I thought proper to interject a few remarks upon this question to-night. I am satisfied that as I make the statement which I have made to-night that the Minister of Justice and the Acting Minister of National Defence--

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): What does my hon. friend say to the opinion of Hon. Mr. Doherty?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I cannot say that I am wholly in accord with the opinion given in this House by Mr. Doherty as read by the Minister of Justice and the Acting Minister of National Defence to-night; I would like to consider more carefully that opinion and inquire into the special facts of that particular case. But I do know this in respect to it, that no action was taken towards disallowance of that particular act.

I have this remark to make in regard to the letter sent by the Deputy Minister of Justice to the Attorney General of Nova Scotia on 8th November, 1921, which has been quoted in this debate. I think it was the duty of the law officers of the Dominion government to call directly to the attention of the law officers of the province of Nova Scotia what, in the opinion of the law officers here, was an apparent wrong or injustice. That is the reason, I fancy, why the letter of 8th

November, 1921, was sent by the Deputy Minister of Justice to the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, and the intimation in that letter is very plain that in the opinion of the law officers in Ottawa injustice is likely to be done by this particular act of Nova Scotia. The attention of the authorities in Nova Scotia was called to the fact that the legislature of that province should remedy the difficulty itself and a hint was certainly thrown out—probably we should call it a threat—that if no action were taken in the matter by the government of Nova Scotia the federal government might see fit to act in the matter. Let me quote the concluding statement made by the deputy minister in this letter,

> It would be the duty of the Minister of Justice, as you will perceive, to consider the propriety of recommending disallowance of this statute, and he would be glad, in considering the matter, to have before him any explanation or representation which your government would desire to submit.

Then followed the notification of the 22nd March, 1922, when my hon. friend, the present Minister (Sir Lomer Gouin) was the incumbent of the office of Minister of Justice. Note particularly the language of the letter of the 22nd March, 1922, which also is from the Deputy Minister of Justice:

> I observe that your legislature is now in session, I have discussed this matter with the Minister of Justice—

That is the present incumbent—

> —and he desires me to suggest that your government should give earnest consideration to the propriety of putting through a repealing act at the present session—

Here is the same threat, here is the same hint.

> —otherwise it will be difficult to resist the application to disallow, but disallowance of this sort of statute, which is I suppose intra vires, upon the ground of its conflict with the principles of justice, would introduce a principle of action here with respect to provincial legislation which it might afterwards be found difficult to restrict within due limits, and therefore, upon constitutional grounds and for motives of expediency it is suggested that the necessity of further consideration by this government should be avoided by local action.

That is precisely the point which I desire to make. If we disallow this act where is the practice to stop? To-morrow it may be the case of Alberta; the next day it may be the case of Saskatchewan; the next day it may be the province of Ontario. The right to disallow provincial legislation is expressly conferred by the British North America Act upon the federal government. Our constitutional practice established for many years says no, we should not act. What are we going to do? Will the minister, because of this present act of disallowance not be tempted to act in a similar manner on subsequent occasions, or may another Minister of Justice, at some time in the future history of the country, not justify some further act of disallowance by citing what the present government did with respect to the present statute of Nova Scotia? What are we really doing in regard to that statute? The government is assuming here that it is the legislature of the province of Nova Scotia. It is doing what the legislature of Nova Scotia has not seen fit to do. That is the point so forcibly argued by Sir Allen Aylesworth in the debate on the Florence mining case: The government will have to put itself into the position of the legislators of Nova Scotia in order to repeal an act which the legislature of that province has not seen fit to repeal. Is this House going to approve such a course? Do we know sufficient about the matter? Even if we do should we take such action? I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we should not.

The Acting Minister of National Defence rallies his supporters to the support of himself and the government by stating that this amendment will mean a vote of want of confidence. Well, it is about the only way we can bring this matter directly to the attention of the government. I have not the permission of my colleagues on this side of the House to make any statement upon the subject but if the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice will assure the House that this particular act of disallowance was an extraordinary proceeding on their part, and that the government will not under any circumstances repeat the operation in the future, I am quite satisfied that no one on this side of the chamber would desire to press this motion. But when the government take the other ground, when they say we did what we did because it was right constitutionally, then people in other parts of Canada have to be aroused to the situation because we believe that where a province legislates strictly within its own jurisdiction this government has no right to disallow such legislation under the constitutional practice and usage of this country. That is the broad ground we take, and upon this ground I have not yet heard any serious defence urged on the part of the government. There is a tendency to argue the merits of the case and to argue very ably—as did my hon. friend the Acting Minister of National Defence—the rights of the various parties affected by the legislation and he may be absolutely right in his facts and in his argument of the merits of the case. Even if he is right in all that he contends the only tribunal to right the wrong, if there be a wrong, is the legislature of the province of Nova Scotia. If the government overlooks that fact and assumes to itself the functions of the legislature of Nova Scotia, while it may say that the strict language of a section of the British North America Act permits it to do so, the correct constitutional practice in this country recognized from 1896 down to the present time practically by every government and every Minister of Justice distinctly affirms that a government should not do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would ask my hon. friend one other question before he concludes his remarks. Do not all the opinions that have been cited to-day have reference to cases where the provinces have protested against the act of disallowance?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I really cannot answer that question. I do not know, I was not here when the discussion took place this afternoon but I would doubt it. I cannot see what difference it makes whether the provincial government protests against or agrees to disallowance. I have heard it said that the government of Nova Scotia actually requested that this act be disallowed by the federal government. I think the provincial government assumed a great responsibility in so doing and is guilty of a great impropriety. The government of Nova Scotia is not the legislature of Nova Scotia, and when the legislature of Nova Scotia passes an act, I think it is highly improper that the government of Nova Scotia, without consulting the legislature, should ask that an act of the Legislative Assembly be annulled by any outside authority. If the act is wrong in any particular what more simple than to have it repealed by the legislature of Nova Scotia. The government of Nova Scotia is in power in the province by a large majority. Were the legislature to repeal the act it would obviate all this difficulty, clear up this constitutional tangle, and relieve the federal government from doing an act which in my humble opinion is a grave constitutional injustice. I am satisfied that from year to year, hereafter, as parliament and the government continue in this country the disallowance in the present case of this legislation of Nova Scotia will be cited and referred to as a precedent for disallowance in the western provinces, the eastern provinces or in the central provinces of the Dominion, and I, for one, protest with all my might against such a practice.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): I propose to say a few words on the subject at the present time. I notice that most of the members who have taken part in this debate to-night have been of the legal fraternity. The debate has taken on largely the aspect of the legal right of the Dominion and provincial parliaments. Dealing with the case in its primary aspect—that is in relation to MacNeil—I am inclined to think, from all the information I have been able to gather, that there was nothing very reputable about the whole transaction from beginning to end. However, I do not suppose that really affects the question at issue at the present time. Dealing with the action of the legislature of Nova Scotia, it does seem a little dangerous that the legislature should interfere with any decision that has been reached by the courts of the province or by the Supreme Court of Canada. It might have a tendency to lessen the dignity and the standing of those courts. On the other hand, I am struck with the supreme importance of coming to a correct decision in a matter of this kind. I hope that it has not been made a political football at any time and that the question is being discussed entirely upon its merits, because I believe it is one of very great importance. I have come reluctantly to the decision I have reached, simply because the question is involved, and it has many aspects, and many different angles from which it can be viewed. Nevertheless, I cannot but think it would be a dangerous precedent for the Minister of Justice to have the power, or to make a practice, of disallowing acts of the provincial legislature when it is acknowledged that they are intra vires of the province. That is the situation as I see it. I have come to that decision reluctantly because perhaps with the knowledge and experience I have, I may not be competent to form a correct judgment, but I have come to a conclusion, it is my honest opinion, and I will have to stand by it.

Mr. O. R. GOULD (Assiniboia): The debate which has been carried on this afternoon has been very interesting and we have listened with great attention from this corner to the deliberations of the various legal lights in the chamber. I am forced to the conclusion that, as is generally the case, when lawyers debate a case, no conclusion is arrived at in their own minds; that is, neither the one nor the other proves his case. But to the lay mind it seems that we who have followed the arguments must come to the conclusion that there is some individual in the fore part of the story who has not been dealt with adequately. I am minded to say that the governing body of Nova Scotia comprises two bodies; that is a legislative council and a governing council, and it seems to me that with the evidence submitted to them, the evidence upon which they passed the statute under debate, and which has been disallowed, those two legislative bodies of Nova Scotia were in a better position to judge the merits of the case than those who followed can possibly be. I do not claim to interpret this question from a legal point of view, but if I have had any concern in life, it has been to try to find out what is the status of the other fellow, the under dog, and if I can say a word I would like to speak to-night on behalf of the other fellow. I refer to the primary individual who is very much interested in the case. I understood the Minister of Justice to state that he took the position that MacNeil, the individual in question, had perpetrated a fraud. According to the evidence which I read—and I may say that I looked into the evidence for a considerable length of time—it seems to me that is not the first premise we have. If it be substantiated that MacNeil perpetrated a fraud, the fact seems to be that others prior to that time had perpetrated a fraud. I refer to statements that have been made that notes had been given by MacNeil's partner to the partner's parent, and no value received, that a bogus contract, I think, alleged to have been made in Calgary, was the cause of sending MacNeil out to Calgary. As I stated, that was a bogus contract. All these things were submitted, and submitted, I believe, to the Nova Scotia legislature and after a full discussion by the two legislative bodies, they came to the conclusion that an injustice had been done MacNeil, and the consequence was that the statute was passed.

Then we come to the appeal of the legislative bodies in Nova Scotia. The two legislative bodies had the opportunity again of reviewing the newer evidence that had been brought out. The appeal being brought before the Nova Scotia legislature, and not being allowed, seems to me to support the statement or attitude they had taken in their first case. It is also said that, on the first hearing that was given before the Minister of Justice, it must have been only the evidence of Quarries Limited, that could be taken into consideration, because I understand that the defendant in the case had not submitted evidence at that time. Again I find the order for disallowance was dated October 17th, while it is a fact that the Great War Veterans' Association asked for a second hearing on October 18th. Now if that is the case there seems to be something wrong here. There is a conflict of dates. In that case, it does go to prove—and I believe we are right in assuming —that evidence that might have been submitted the second time could not have had the reasonable consideration of the Department of Justice here.

Whether that be right or wrong, the fact remains that such things as those have been published throughout the length and breadth of the country. Listening to the speeches this afternoon, one must come to the conclusion that there has been discussed upon the floor of this House, evidence pertaining to the case, evidence that was submitted to the Nova Scotia legislature, before the courts, and so forth. As I have endeavoured to explain, I have taken it upon myself to present the case of MacNeil on its merits, and I have in my hand a statement which, although it is quite lengthy, I should like to place upon Hansard, because it presents the other side of the case, and, perhaps, the ultimate decision in this case will rest upon the judgment put upon this statement. I do this, not because I wish to take responsibility; I am not taking responsibility at all for the statement. But this has been handed to me, and looking upon it as a disinterested spectator, I feel that there has been an omission of evidence in rebuttal of that which has been given to-day. I think I am justified in stating that the individual from whom I have received this statement says that he is prepared to prove all this evidence in any place in the Dominion of Canada. If that be the case, there are some very strong statements in this. The statement reads:

> That I am prepared to prove that certain parties in Montreal in 1911 did conspire to obtain possession of the personal assets of F. J. MacNeil.

That is F. J. MacNeil, a partner of the firm of Sparrow and MacNeil. That is the allusion I made to the fact that there was a primary premise to the statement made that the MacNeils themselves had not acted on purely legal grounds.

> That there were grounds for warranting a belief amongst those parties that the gypsum property would be one of F. J. MacNeil's assets.
> That the value of the property was surmised by these parties in 1911 as much as it is surmised to-day.
>
> That F. J. McNeil and W. F. Sparrow were equal parties in an unlimited contracting firm in Montreal, known as Sparrow and MacNeil, and that W. F. Sparrow used this business connection to further the conspiracy against F. J. MacNeil. The steps taken by Sparrow to further this end were as follows
>
> F. J. MacNeil was lured to Calgary—

I made reference to that statement before.

—in the latter part of June, 1911, in connection with a contract from which tremendous profits were expected. Later, he was advised that the firm was in difficulties, and that failure to act on a certain suggestion would result in the loss of this large contract to the firm. On July 6, 1911, F. W. Sharp notified the creditors of Sparrow and MacNeil that the liabilities of this firm were in the vicinty of $50,000, and assets about $20,000; that firm had a large contract in the West, and that if partner MacNeil would make over his assets to him (Sharp) as trustee for creditors, the firm would be allowed to continue business; that on partner MacNeil refusing to do this, an assignment would be made.

For various reasons MacNeil refused to do as desired. On July 12, 1911, Mr. Sparrow made a judicial abandonment of the firm's affairs, listing both movable and immovable property belonging to the firm. He swore the firm owned no immovable property. Creditors were informed by Mr. Sharp that Mr. Sparrow (a supposed millionaire's son) did not have a cent for them. Mr. MacNeil was considered wealthy and Mr. Sharp, who following the abandonment was appointed curator, informed creditors that he was taking steps to secure MacNeil's assets.

MacNeil's assets were levied upon, presumably for the benefit of creditors. (Registrar's records in New Jersey in 1921 show MacNeil's land in that state held as a personal asset of F. W. Sharp.) But the creditors of the firm have not been paid. The firm's notes for thousands of dollars were given to parties by Mr. Sparrow without MacNeil's knowledge. Private debts were charged to the firm's accounts by Sparrow.

MacNeil learned that the Calgary contract was with a company that did not even exist. The supposed president of this company had been given the firm's notes by Sparrow unknown to MacNeil, to the amount of $15,000.

It was learned that the gypsum property was not a personal asset of F. J. MacNeil's that he never held title, same being in the name of Jane E. MacNeil.

That the subsequent action taken by F. W. Sharp to deprive Miss MacNeil of her property was founded on fraud which it served as a cloak to cover.

That the expense entailed in prosecuting this action against Miss MacNeil's title was borne by innocent parties whose interests the courts were falsely led to believe would be benefited by Mr. Sharp receiving a favourable decision, while an adverse decision would deprive them of their just claims against an insolvent firm.

That a statement which led to action being taken against Miss MacNeil's title is not entitled to credit inasmuch as it appears in the firm's books, the care of which Mr. Sparrow would be responsible for, and was alleged as follows "Investment account, gypsum property—Island point, Cape Breton, $2,000."

That the evidence given in Mr. Sharp's behalf and on which the courts of Canada gave decision was not subjected to cross-examination, was given at a hearing granted under writ of commission at Montreal, which hearing took place without knowledge of the MacNeils. They learned of it after it was over.

That the witnesses who gave evidence in Mr. Sharp's behalf were parties who played a part more or less in the affairs of Sparrow and MacNeil and subsequent insolvency, or previously been interested in the gypsum property.

That when the case came to trial in Sydney, evidence in rebuttal to plaintiff's evidence was entrusted to Miss MacNeil's lawyer, but was not filed.

It seems to me that some very important points are being brought out here.

That according to records, nine judges in Canada gave decision on the case, five against and four in favour of Miss MacNeil.

[Mr. Gould.]

That evidence has been brought out before and I do not need to repeat it. The statement continues:

That a document representing F. J. MacNeil as owner of the gypsum property was filed by G. C. Fletcher, witness for plaintiff Sharp, for the purpose of misleading the courts. That said document also led courts to believe that G. C. Fletcher had paid F. J. MacNeil $1,000 to bind a certain agreement re gypsum property. This agreement required that G. C. Fletcher pay $35,000 plus $9,000 a year royalty for the right to mine and ship gypsum from the said property.

That when courts awarded property to Mr. Sharp for benefit of firm's creditors, Mr. Sharp disposed of it through G. C. Fletcher for the sum of $2,500.

That two of Mr. Sharp's witnesses were also inspectors with duties to assist Mr. Sharp in disposing of firm's assets to the best interest of firm's creditors.

That without any new discoveries being made, the property was subsequently represented in a statement issued through Bradstreet's as being worth more than $2,750,000.

That aside from local branches, two provincial commands and the Dominion command of the Great War Veterans' Association of Canada who investigated Miss MacNeil's claims, following return of J. Stanley MacNeil from overseas active service, came to the conclusion that the courts had not been given an opportunity of fully weighing the respective claims. They joined him in appealing to the Supreme Court of Canada, the Department of Justice, and finally the government of Nova Scotia to have the case reopened, in order that all the evidence could be fully considered and an equitable decision reached.

After hearing the full statement of Miss MacNeil's claims the Nova Scotia legislature at its 1921 session passed an act vesting the property in her right. That legislature took this step with the object of placing the case in the position where the courts could deal with it, and set a period of one year in which action could be taken to test Miss MacNeil's title. The title was subsequently transferred by Miss MacNeil to her brother, D. Stanley MacNeil, in return for consideration and in fulfilment of an arrangement made at the time the property was originally purchased as a family home, at which time Stanley MacNeil was a minor. On September 5th, 1922, Stanley MacNeil received in Ottawa the information that notice of writ obtained on May 20, 1922, had been served on his sister on August 31, that action against the property was pending and that if appearance was not filed in Nova Scotia he would lose by default. He then proceeded to Halifax, had appearance entered and was awaiting action. On the evening of October 4, he received a telegram from Mr. E. L. Newcombe, Deputy Minister of Justice, which informed him that the parties who were bringing action against his right to the gypsum property had also petitioned the federal authorities for disallowance of the statute on which his title rested, and that the minister would hold a hearing at Montreal on Monday morning, October 9.

The point is brought out that Stanley MacNeil had only five days, one of them Sunday, in which to consult legal counsel, to prepare his case and to travel from Nova Scotia to Montreal, and he maintains that this was absolutely inadequate time for him to take the necessary steps.

Mr. MacNeil claims that he had no opportunity to have counsel prepare argument for him and at the hearing at Montreal he refused to file evidence or present an unprepared case and requested that hearing be postponed. To meet the convenience of counsel for petitioning parties the minister proceeded with the hearing, inferring that there would be a further hearing later. Counsel for petitioning parties made no statement that they could support which would be of sufficient importance as an argument in support of their petition, to be worthy of consideration or criticism.

On October 13 it was thought advisable by the Great War Veterans Association of Canada to present argument in defence of Mr. MacNeil's interests, and the minister was requested to grant a further hearing for this purpose. The minister complied and named October 18 for the purpose. Mr. MacNeil further contends that it would require weeks for counsel to get acquainted thoroughly with the case and the moves made by the parties connected with it to regain possession of the property without appearing in court. He placed a written presentation of the facts, covering fifteen pages, before the minister and filed some fifty extracts of evidence to support them. No witnesses were called, nor were any records kept of the hearing, but a few days later he was informed that the statute was disallowed on recommendation of the Minister of Justice to the Governor in Council.

I have already called the attention of the House to the fact that the disallowance was made on October 18 and the letter he received bore date October 17. Another statement is to the effect that upon the request of Stanley MacNeil a hearing of the parties was had "before the undersigned", but no hearing was held at his request previous to October 18th. The statement continues:

The undersigned is not aware of any circumstance whatever, moral, equitable or legal, which can be pointed to in justification of the legislation under review. In addition to the Great War Veterans of Canada, and the legislature of Nova Scotia, eminent legal authority throughout Canada and the ex-Chief Justice of Nova Scotia, who gave an adverse decision in the case of Sharp versus MacNeil, rendered assistance in having the statute passed. The record of Sharp versus MacNeil is founded on the un-cross examined evidence of witnesses, including W. F. Sparrow and the gentleman who acted as counsel for disallowance of statute on October 18. It would be impossible for the minister to give careful consideration on October 17 to material filed and representations made to Stanley MacNeil on October 18. It would be impossible to give full and complete consideration to the statement and evidence submitted by Mr. MacNeil to the Minister of Justice in the short period of time from the actual date of submission to the actual date upon which the statute was disallowed. No reference was made in the recommendation to the fact that a court action was pending, and no reference was made to D. Stanley MacNeil as owner of the property; nor was any reference made to the fact that Plaster Quarries, Limited, who brought the petition was formed for the purpose of acquiring the property. Witness in the case of Sharp versus MacNeil held fifty per cent of the stock of the company.

There are other points, Mr. Speaker, but I think the salient features of the matter have been outlined in the memorandum I have read to the House. I desire to make it clear again that I am not acting from any prejudiced point of view at all; but as a layman listening to the discussion that has taken place this afternoon and evening, and reading much of the evidence that has been submitted in various quarters, in the press, in the House and throughout the country, I have come to the conclusion that the under dog should have his case presented in some way in this House. I cannot present it from the legal point of view. This memorandum was supplied me and I consider I am only doing my duty in bringing it to the attention of the House. There is one thing I wish to comment slightly upon and that is the peculiar circumstances which surround this property the initial payment of $2,000 and the statement made that there was a knowledge that gypsum was on the property, and yet immediately after the statute was disallowed, or when the litigation was taking place, Bradstreets estimated the value of the property at no less than $2,750,000. There are many thoughts that occur to the mind of an ordinary man when he considers these figures, many thoughts that perhaps are not justified; and I only stand here and say a few words in the hope that justice will be done; for justice is due each and every one of us.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): It has been suggested to-night that this is simply a matter of politics, but I want to say that for some of us at least politics do not enter into the matter at all. There obviously is room for a very careful investigation into the merits of a difficult case. Apparently, as has been brought out, there has been an injustice; at least there are some very suspicious circumstances attendant upon this transaction. I do not believe that we have the machinery here to deal with this case, but I take it that the matter must have been reviewed very carefully in the provincial legislature. If I understand rightly, the argument was advanced in defence of the government that the decision of the courts ought to be regarded as final, and that the action of the government at this time was a vindication of the courts. It seems to me that that is not solid ground to take. Rather I think the courts ought to be subservient to the legislative act, and if for any reason whatever it is felt that the judgment is not in harmony with justice, it seems to me it should be reviewed as apparently it was by the provincial legislature.

Then we have the other matter coming up as to the action of this government. As I listened to the arguments which have been advanced it struck me that we have no other course to take than to stand out decidedly for provincial rights. Some weeks earlier in the session my colleague (Mr. Irvine) introduced a motion proposing that an adverse vote should not be taken as indicative of a want of confidence in the government. We still believe that if there were a change of procedure in this House some of us would not be driven to the awkward position in which, by voting on the principle involved, we have to vote want of confidence in the government. But since the government rejected the motion I have referred to, and since there has been no revision of the procedure, and since it is increasingly difficult for a private member to bring a motion or a bill before the House with any hope of its acceptance, there is no alternative left us than to simply vote on the principle involved, even though our action may not indicate our attitude towards the government. I think it is only fair to make this explanation because it is not a matter of politics, it is a matter of principle, and possibly by voting often enough along these lines we may ultimately bring about a change of procedure.

Mr. WALTER G. MITCHELL (St. Antoine): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the debate, and although I am not very familiar with the facts of the case, yet one feature has struck me most forcibly. The question of the right of MacNeil or the corporation that now owns the property in dispute is not one that I intend to deal with at any length, because to my mind what we have to decide is not whether the courts of Nova Scotia decided rightly or wrongly upon this issue, but whether, when the Supreme Court of Canada has rendered judgment on a question of this magnitude, the local legislature can ten years later interfere and say that, notwithstanding any rights created between the time the judgment was rendered and the act of the legislature was passed, the Governor in Council has no right to interfere.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the hon. gentleman think the statute of limitations or any other statute which we might consider for the purpose of this question ought to run against the soldier while he was fighting for his country overseas?

Mr. MITCHELL: I said a few minutes ago that I was not familiar with the facts of the case, but that one feature of it struck me, namely, whether the rights of third parties created between the time that the Supreme Court of Canada rendered its judgment and the local legislature passed its enactment should be interfered with by such legislation.

Let me make myself clear. Some ten years ago this judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada was rendered. In virtue of it title was given to a company, and that company issued bonds which were sold not only in Nova Scotia but in Quebec and Ontario, and I do not know but what they may also have been sold in some of the western provinces. If I am not misinformed, under the terms of the trust deed the bonds so issued were made payable in the city of Montreal. Let us assume, for the sake of argument, that ten million dollars' worth of bonds had been issued upon the property in question and were in the hands of third parties all over the Dominion as well as in Great Britain and the United States, would it be right that ten years afterwards the legislature of Nova Scotia should be allowed to say: "We do not care what the rights of third parties may be, we do not care for the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, we do not care for the trust deed under which the bonds of this company were issued. We decide that because this property is situated in Nova Scotia we will wipe out all other rights and treat these bonds as nothing but scraps of paper, that the act which gave title to the company is no good, and we are going to hand the property back to someone who says that he has been prejudiced by an act of fraud, notwithstanding that three courts, including the Supreme Court of Canada, have held that the title of the company is valid."

Mr. MEIGHEN: If all this is so, was it not something for the consideration of the legislature of Nova Scotia?

Mr. MITCHELL: I admit that the legislature of Nova Scotia should have intervened. I may say that I think it should not have passed the act when it did pass. But the fact remains that the legislature took this course ten years subsequent to the title which was created in virtue of the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh no.

Mr. MITCHELL: Certainly, the Supreme Court of Canada decided that the title belonged to the company eight years ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In 1915.

Mr. MITCHELL: In 1915 the Supreme Court of Canada decided that the title was vested in the company in question. Are we to say that ten years after the legislature of Nova Scotia can declare this title to be no good and pass legislation nullifying the act by which the company obtained title to the property?

We have heard a lot this afternoon about civil rights. There is no man in this House who believes more in provincial autonomy than I do, but we have got to remember that when confederation was brought about a right of appeal was given to the Supreme Court in such cases. Therefore in my judgment it is a grave question whether we should allow the provincial legislature to interfere in this case because by passing such legislation they are going beyond the confines of their own province and affecting rights created in virtue of a judgment of our highest federal court.

In order to explain my point a little further, let us assume that the title of the British Empire Steel Corporation is questioned by someone who happened to be overseas at the time that the title was given. Since the incorporation of the company millions of dollars worth of bonds have been sold in Canada, the United States and Great Britain. Let us assume that the legislature of the province of Nova Scotia is asked to set aside the company's title. While it might be within the jurisdiction of the legislature to pass such an act, surely no hon. member would contend, in view of the obligations created since the incorporation and in view of the rights of third parties all over the country, that the government or the parliament of Canada should not disallow any act of that nature.

I do not intend to argue the question further, but it does seem to me that it is not only a question of the rights of individuals, created at the time this act was passed; we must consider seriously all that has happened between 1914 and 1923. We must consider the rights of all parties who have bought the bonds or debentures of this company, in other words, the rights of third parties—rights which were bought and paid for in cash and have perhaps since been transferred time and again. Are we going to say here to-night that the government was wrong when they disallowed an act of a provincial legislature which declared that a title granted in virtue of a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada was nothing more than a scrap of paper?

SUPPLY

SECRETARY OF STATE

Motion agreed to and the House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Civil government, Secretary of State—salaries, $127,837; contingencies, $29,620.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I find no fault with the government getting into supply and taking up an item so that it will be possible to take supply in the case of the estimates of the Secretary of State on Thursday and Friday, but it is hardly fair to ask the committee to start passing any estimates now.

Mr. DUFF: Go ahead and get the work done. You have talked all day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You did, we did not.

Mr. DUFF: You are the worst offenders.

Mr. FORKE: You will not get any items through if you sit all night.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. COPP: I should like to pass a few items that are uncontested. If my hon. friend objects to that we will not insist.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know of anything that is non-contested or anything special that is contested; there will be a general discussion.

Mr. COPP: I would like to pass the salaries of the deputy heads and a few items of that kind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are all in the one vote. We cannot pass the deputies' salaries and not pass the whole vote.

Mr. COPP: Very well. If my hon. friend insists I will move that the committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the adjournment of the House.

The House met at three o'clock.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

EXPRESS BUSINESS AND SALE OF ELECTRIC LINES

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 152, respecting the Canadian National Railways.

He said: The object of section 1 of this bill is to enable the Canadian National Railway Company to carry on the express business as a department of the railway, taking over the business of the Canadian National Express Company and the Canadian Express Company. Section 2 provides that the Canadian National Railway Company may, if it so decides, sell certain parts of electric lines within the corporation of the municipality of the city of Toronto. Under the wording of the act these lines could be sold to a company. This section amends the act to make it possible to sell to a municipality or to a company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

MONTREAL AND NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY

Mr. MERCIER:

1. Does the government intend to connect, by a branch line, Montreal with the National Transcontinental railway?
2. If so, at what date do they expect to begin the necessary work?
3. If not, would the government be disposed to grant subsidies to any person or company willing to undertake said work?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

Parliament voted a subsidy in 1908 "for a line of railway from Montreal to a point on the National Transcontinental railway not exceeding 200 miles", and re-voted same in 1910. Any application for subsidy which may now be made would be dealt with on its merits, final decision resting with parliament.

SALE OF PRE-EMPTIONS

Mr. EVANS:

1. Were not the proceeds from the sale of pre-emptions thrown open in 1908 in what is known as the dry area in western Canada to be used for the purpose of constructing the Hudson Bay railway?
2. How much money has been realized from that source to date?
3. Was any other trust fund created for the purpose of constructing the Hudson Bay railway?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. There was no specific authority under the Dominion Lands Act 1908 for the sale of land for the purpose of Hudson Bay Railway construction, but pre-emptions were sold under the provisions of the said act.

2. Sale of pre-emptions $15,649,674.83 to 31 March, 1923.

3. No, so far as the Interior department is aware.

What is the total amount collected under the excise taxes, commonly called luxury taxes, imposed under section 19BB of the Special War Revenue Act?

Hon. Mr. BUREAU:

4. For what reasons was it approved?
5. Why was she dismissed?
6. What part, if any, had a man named Byrne in the dismissal?

Hon. Mr. STEWART:

U.S. LABOUR DELEGATES DETAINED

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Has the Acting Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart, Argenteuil) any further word in regard to Alexander Howat?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We are still in communication about the admission of Mr. Howat.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I wish to draw attention to the fact that an unopposed motion for a return was passed by this House on the 18th of last month, giving the names of newspaper companies and printing companies receiving money from the government, and the return has not been brought down.

Mr. MURDOCK: We have that particular information ready, but another order was passed asking for the same information for five years, which we are preparing, and we will bring down within the next day or two the information for the five years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why is the information asked for delayed pending the other matter?

Mr. FIELDING: The greater includes the lesser.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The House has given the order.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am not sure that the first order was completely ready to bring down, before the other question was asked, and we decided that it would be advisable to bring the five years down together.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not an answer at all. The hon. minister stated that it was ready. If it is ready there is no reason for delay. That is an order of the House and the return should be brought down when ready. The minister is simply trifling with the orders of the House.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON PENSIONS

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. HUMPHREY: I believe that last year a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into certain charges laid by the Great War Veterans against the Board of Pension Commissioners. That report has now been submitted to parliament, and printed and distributed to members. What is the intention of the government in regard to putting into effect immediately the conclusions of that Royal Commission?

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers Civil Re-establishment): Some legislation will be introduced later in the session to give effect to most of the recommendations in the report to which my hon. friend has referred.

Mr. CALDWELL: Will an opportunity be given to discuss this report in the House?

Mr. BELAND: I understand that an item for pensions was held over some days ago with the intention of affording members an opportunity to discuss that feature of the report itself. I expect this item will be under consideration within a week.

ITALIAN TREATY

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide that a certain convention of commerce dated the fourth day of January, in the year one thousand nine hundred and twenty-three, entered into at London by the Plenipotentiaries appointed by His Majesty and by His Majesty the King of Italy be approved, and to give effect to the provisions of the said convention.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister please explain?

Mr. FIELDING: I think that would be more convenient in committee, if my hon. friend is content.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am quite content. I do not want to delay this at all, if we have a clear understanding that by letting it go into committee, questions of principle will then be open for discussion.

Mr. FIELDING: I have no objection to going into the matter now. As regards the French treaty, for reasons explained, it became necessary to deal with details to a considerable extent, and, therefore, schedules were attached to the bill. In this case we are relieved of the necessity of dealing with schedules because the Italian fiscal policy permits treatment of the question in a general way. Therefore, all we need to do is to adopt the few clauses in order to establish what we call the most favoured nation treatment.

Some years ago, in 1910, we came to an agreement with Italy, not in the form and shape of a treaty. A good understanding was reached, and for years our commercial relations have been very pleasant, although by the words of the agreement they have been rather limited. We agreed at the time to which I refer that certain mentioned products of Canada should be admitted into Italy under most favoured terms and reciprocally that certain mentioned products of Italy should be admitted into Canada similarly on the most favoured terms. The chief products of Canada, perhaps the products that most concern us were included in that list, and I presume that our Italian friends mentioned the things that most concerned them. The trade that has been carried on between Canada and Italy has been, on the whole, of a most satisfactory nature. I suppose the question of imports and exports has been disturbed somewhat by war conditions. The figures as they stand for a few years are as follows:

Year	Imports	Exports
1914..	$2,090,000	$ 514,000
1918..	771,000	3,336,000
1919..	555,000	13,181,000
1920..	1,745,000	57,758,000
1922..	1,387,000	15,335,000

Evidently 1920 was quite an exceptional year. Thus, as regards comparison, the trade is quite favourable to Canada. The existing arrangement is satisfactory as far as it goes, but it gives us no guarantee as to what may happen with other countries. It will be quite possible, under our present arrangement, for Italy to give more favourable terms to somebody else. Therefore, although no particular case has arisen demanding a treaty and business is satisfactory as far as it goes, we thought it well to guard against any misapprehension of that sort, and so we have agreed as regards, not only the limited list already mentioned in our existing agreement, but the products of Canada and the products of Italy generally, that we shall give and receive the most favoured-nation terms. No details are required. Whatever we grant to any foreign country we must grant to Italy. Whatever Italy grants to any foreign country she must grant to us. That is the whole story of the treaty.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think, perhaps, we could make greater headway if, instead of discussing the matter now, we were to reserve whatever observations we have until the House is in committee, as long as it is understood that we can raise questions concerning the principles without being debarred from that point.

Mr. FIELDING: Surely.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Fielding thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 153, respecting a certain trade convention between His Majesty and the King of Italy.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 153, respecting a certain trade convention between His Majesty and the King of Italy.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My suggestion to my hon. friend now becomes operative. Under my suggestion we would have no discussion on the second reading, reserving our remarks to the committee stage.

Mr. FIELDING: Surely.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 2—Convention approved:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have not a copy of the bill, but I presume this clause is merely putting into effect the treaty?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Therefore, under this clause we can properly discuss the whole treaty. I was going to ask my hon. friend whether his view is, as mine is, that the effect of the treaty with France and this treaty with Italy is to extend, for example to Italy, the right of giving more favoured terms to all its border states than it gives to Canada. In the case of Italy, if I am right, that would give Italy the right to prefer in her markets. France, Switzerland, Austria and Jugo-Slavia. I do not think there are any more,

Mr. FIELDING: I would not like to say that. Canada gives to Italy all that the French treaty gives to France. We discussed that in connection with the French treaty My hon. friend's interpretation of that I admit is possible, but I do not think it is of practical importance. Whatever we give to France we certainly give to Italy. That is plain enough.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the hon. member not think the committee ought to know this? The explanation given to us in connection with the French treaty was that while the treaty might well carry that construction, and, indeed, it seems impossible that it could carry any other construction: all that France wanted was to be able to look after reparations and to give more favoured treatment under the reparations clauses. Of course, the obvious answer there was: if that be the fact, if that is all that France wants, why was not the treaty so drawn? The trouble is that we must take the treaty as we have it, and we should understand what we are doing. As drawn, it provides that France can give to her neighbours, Spain, Switzerland and Belgium, more favoured treatment than she may give to Canada. Surely we should know where we are. If my hon. friend is in doubt about it, should not the point be cleared up before we go on? I thought it was conceded in the discussion of the French treaty that whatever the reasons might have been, whatever the argument of France was, the neighbours of the French republic might be given better treatment than Canada.

Mr. FIELDING: Whatever rates we give France we are certainly bound to give to Italy. There is no dispute about that; that is the meaning of the favoured nation principle.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly. Then when I came to find out what was given to France I thought my hon. friend acknowledged that under the terms of the treaty the bordering states might receive benefits over and above the benefits guaranteed Canada. If I am wrong my hon. friend will set me right.

Mr. FIELDING: I told the hon. member that such was a possible interpretation of the treaty. I think the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) called attention earlier to that phase of the question and I said that the treaty was open to that interpretation but that I was satisfied that this was not what the French government had in mind. And that is what I say now.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend admits that the treaty is open to this interpretation, and that being the case, Spain, Switzerland and Belgium, for example, are entitled, if France chooses to give it, to more favoured treatment than Canada may receive under the treaty. Following up just exactly what my hon. friend has stated, that Italy is entitled to everything France has got,—the selfsame covenant—it is obvious that Italy may give to France, Switzerland, Austria or Jugo-Slavia a preference in her markets against Canada. Surely that is the case. But if my hon. friend disputes it I suppose we shall have to debate the question. I think, however, it must be apparent that this follows necessarily from what he says.

Mr. FIELDING: I am not very much concerned about the neighbouring countries coming into conflict with Canada. I have said that whatever we give to France we give to Italy and all the other favoured nations, but I do not seriously look upon Jugo-Slavia as a competitor of Canada. The main object of the treaty with France is to see that we get even terms with the United States. I say now that in this case our chief competitor will probably be the United States and if we get even terms with that country I do not think we need be very much disturbed about all the others.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder if my hon. friend realizes the situation; I am sure he does. He says that Jugo-Slavia cannot be looked upon as a competitor with Canada.

Mr. FIELDING: In Europe

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In Europe, yes. I would point out to my hon. friend, though, that the vast amount of the exports of this country to Italy consists of wheat, and I am going to ask the Minister of Finance whether once upon a time central Europe was not a great wheat producer and whether there are not wheat fields to-day on that continent which, if not perhaps actively under cultivation in Jugo-Slavia at least—and my information is that they are—are at any rate potential competitors of the Canadian wheat producers in the Italian wheat market. I should have thought that wheat raised in any quantities in central Europe and sold in the Italian market would be an important competitor against this country.

Mr. FIELDING: Wheat is free in Italy, and all countries are treated alike. I do not think therefore that there is anything to be alarmed about in that regard. All I can say is that if at any time Italy granted preferential treatment to any other country competing with us in wheat it would be good ground for us to give Italy notice to terminate the agreement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is getting back to the chief argument he used in reference to the French treaty, which was that he could get rid of it in six months.

Mr. FIELDING: Surely.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But he cannot get rid of this treaty in six months; this is for four years, subject, if I remember rightly, to cancellation on a year's notice. So that the argument about being able to get rid of the agreement if it is not satisfactory does not apply here. I want to impress upon my hon. friend that the result of the treaty as negotiated is this, that if Italy chooses to put a duty on our wheat and flour she may do so and at the same time give a preference to Jugo-Slavia. She may give free entry to Jugo-Slavia and hold her tariff as against Canada. If I am wrong will my hon. friend put me right?

Mr. FIELDING: There may be a possibility of such a thing, but I must say that it is so utterly unlikely that I cannot treat it with as much gravity as my hon. friend does.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But we have here a solemn document which is supposed to cover these things. If we have not reserved to us in connection with our chief export to Italy, namely wheat, that which my hon. friend declared to be the real reason for making the treaty, that is, the assurance that Italy will not give someone else better treatment, what is the use of having the treaty? After all, wheat is our chief export to Italy and if my hon. friend can rely on Italy not to give a preference in respect of this commodity to other countries as against ourselves then there is really no use for the treaty. The effect of the treaty is to enlarge the scope of the most favoured nation compact, as pointed out by my hon. friend; it is a recognition of the principle. But it further complicates the situation to this extent, that so far as Italy is concerned the favoured nation treatment is to apply for four years subject to termination at the end of one year's notice. I do not know whether my hon. friend thinks or does not think that the most-favoured nation arrangement is a good thing for Canada; he has not told us yet his view on that question. But we did the best we could to point out to him in connection with the French treaty just exactly how that most favoured nation provision works as regards Canada on the one side and France on the other. I notice that the matter has been discussed in the other House, and I see that Hon. Senator Beaubien is reported in the Senate Hansard at page 350 as follows:

> In our exchange of commodities with Spain, from 1912 to 1922, both inclusive, ten times out of eleven our imports have surpassed our exports. In the nine months ending December 31, 1922, our imports have exceeded by 200 per cent our exports to that country.
> In the same period of 11 years—from 1912 to 1922, both inclusive—we imported from Switzerland over 60 million dollars' worth, exported to that country less than 4½ million dollars. Whenever Switzerland bought $1 worth of goods from us, we purchased $15 worth of merchandise from her. During practically all this time Switzerland was a free-trade country and we could hope for no valuable tariff concessions from her. Lately Switzerland has adopted a policy of moderate protection, and we might perchance obtain from her useful tariff privileges. She imports yearly 250 million dollars' worth of products which we can furnish, amongst them, cereals, prepared foodstuffs, live stock, leather, furs, asbestos, mica, iron and steel sheets and tubes, agricultural implements and machinery, small hardware and tools, stationary and portable engines, varnishes, lumber, wood-pulp, paper, boots and shoes, cotton goods and tobacco.
> On the other hand, our clientele, which is of great value to Switzerland could be easily shifted by tariff rearrangements to France. In 1921 we imported from Switzerland a total of $8,671,608, out of which textiles and fibres amounted together to $7,266,353, all of which textiles and fibres could have been purchased in France.

Hon. gentlemen will observe, Mr. Chairman, that the senator takes the position which we took in connection with the French treaty; that the French treaty, as the result of the facts which he points out, could be much better described as a treaty, not with France for the benefit of France, but a treaty with France for the benefit of the most favoured nations. It was in that connection that I particularly pointed out to the hon. minister the position of the silk industry which France was so much interested in, that in connection with a tariff which was supposed to be for the benefit of France, she sent us $1,000,000 worth of silk products, while Japan and Switzerland sent us $8,000,000 worth; and that while there was some assistance given to France, at the same time the effect is to help France's competitors in our own market absolutely to the same extent as we help France. So that France is not helped very much after all.

The hon. gentleman will also recognize this fact in connection with that very item of silk goods—and it comes in here again because the basis is the same—that we have a silk industry in Canada. I am going to point out to my hon. friend what has been done in a country where the manufacture of silk is just as foreign to it as it could be said to be foreign to Canada, where they are not entangled with the most favoured nation treaty clauses in connection with their tariff. The statistics of the United States show that their silk industry—which industry was entirely formed in that country as a result of a protective tariff, and which has resulted in silk to-day being cheaper in the United States. even with a high tariff, than it is in Canada —those statistics show the silk industry to be in this condition: In 1919—I am sorry I have not the later figures; I think they are better—there were 1,369 establishments; their employees numbered 126,782; they had an invested capital of $532,732,163; they paid in wages $108,226,330, and the value of the product was $688,000,000. So there is a country which grows just as much silk as Canada does and no more—that imports every single bit of silk, whose people to-day are enjoying silk at a lower price in their common markets then we enjoy in Canada. Under a protective tariff—and it was a high one—they have worked up this industry, and at the same time besides having cheaper silk they distribute $108,000,000 among their wage-earners and produce manufactured articles to the value of $688,000,000. Is it any wonder that the ministry has to report an exodus from Canada to the United States? I merely point out these facts to my hon. friend.

If any further evidence is required as to the effect of the treaty, having regard to the activities of other most favoured nations, I have a list of the different countries supplying Canada with goods similar to those received from France for the years 1914, 1920, 1921 and 1922. If my hon. friend desires the information I will read it, or if he likes the figures can be placed on Hansard.

Mr. FIELDING: The hon. gentleman's remarks have touched some really important questions and some questions that I think are not so important. First, let me again remind him that he may talk of these silks coming in, whether they come in from France or from Italy, Switzerland or Japan, the greater proportion—I will not raise the question of 90 per cent and 10 per cent—but certainly the greater proportion of these silks have got to pay a duty of 27½ per cent, less 10 per cent discount. It is necessary to keep that in mind. The whole tendency of my hon. friend's observations is that we are bringing in these silks for nothing. If these enormous quantities of silk are paying this duty it is a good thing for the revenue. And I think 27½ per cent, less 10 per cent discount, take it all in all, is not lacking in a fair measure of encouragement to the silk industry of Canada. I think it will be held by many in this House that 27½ per cent less 10 per cent, or a net duty of 25 per cent, is a pretty stiff rate and a fair measure of encouragement to our domestic industry. Wiser people than myself will say that any industry which cannot live in Canada under a 25 per cent protection is of questionable value to the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FIELDING: But I want to say this. My hon. friend in referring to the United States tariff on silks says that silk is cheaper in the United States than here. If he has made inquiries and finds that to be the case I will take his word for it, but offhand I think he is mistaken; I do not think that as a rule goods that are paying high duties are cheaper in the United States than here. However, no industry ought to complain if it is allowed 25 per cent protection in Canada. I think the silk industry is not going to suffer under these circumstances. But if my hon. friend thought a high protective system was so valuable, why in heaven's name did he not put it in force when he had a chance? Again and again he talks of this high protection as if it were something very good. We have a moderate system of protection now. Some people do not like to call it protection. But if my hon. friend thinks that cheap silk and general prosperity could be created by raising the tariff, why in heaven's name did he perambulate this country from Dan to Beersheba and end by doing nothing? Why did he say in the Speech from the Throne that he was going to revise the tariff and then not revise it at all? I do not think my hon. friend has so much faith in his own high tariff ideas. If he really believed so much in its merits he would have given us a high tariff long ago. On the contrary he gave us a tariff not very much different from what we have to-day, and yet my hon. friend—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FIELDING: What is the fun? We took something off last year, and we are going to take off—possibly we could take off something this year if we wanted to.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FIELDING: At all events the point of my remarks is this: My hon. friend is trying to establish that you can bring about prosperity by increasing the tariff; I think I am not misstating his position. Well, I ask him in all seriousness, why did he not do it? He went all over the country; he travelled from ocean to ocean, as I have said; he accumulated a vast amount of information, and the result was that he made up his mind to do nothing. Well, I do not think he ought to complain of what we do under similar conditions.

My hon. friend talks of the favoured nation provision as if it were something created by these treaties. Again I must direct his attention to the fact that there is nothing in this treaty, there was nothing in the French treaty which says a single word about what rates should be given to Switzerland or Japan or any other foreign country. The privilege of importing from Switzerland, from Japan and all those other countries arises from treaties made not by this government, but by governments of long ago, treaties which the hon. gentleman respected and recognized when he was in office. If they were the wrong thing; if favoured nation treatment is wrong, then why did my Conservative friends, in all the years they were in power, allow these treaties to stand? The Swiss treaty to which my hon. friend refers was in force during all the years that he and his associates were in office, and they did not seem to find anything wrong with it. How is it that it is only now discovered to be wrong? I cannot understand that. Again I say that if there is anything arising out of this so-called favoured nation treatment, it has been there for years, and that when my hon. friends had to deal with it they accepted it as something good and stood by it. Only now that they are sitting on the other side do they suddenly discover a very great evil in it.

The main question is this: Is favoured nation treatment a sound policy or not? Many hon. members will think it is not. For myself I would say that it might not be well to apply it universally. There might be conditions under which the favoured nation treatment would not do you much good. I would not value an agreement with the United States now on the favoured nation principle because the best they can give us under present conditions would not be anything favourable or satisfactory. But where a country has a low or moderate tariff, what more can we ask from them? Take the case of Switzerland; my hon. friend says their tariff is a low one. Well, can we expect them to do more? If they give us all they are giving to the wide world, and if their tariff is low, what more can we ask? We have had that question debated many times, and I suppose it will be debated again. But if you have no favoured nation treatment you must be forever on the watch to gain access to the markets of another country.

Let me illustrate by an incident from my own experience. In the early days of the Liberal government I remember the late Mr Barker, of Hamilton, a very able member of this House, getting up one day and saying that some of the manufacturers from his city had gone to Japan and that on the same vessel that carried them there were some American manufacturers of similar goods. He went on to say with indignation, "You will wonder when I tell you that what actually happened was this: the United States goods were allowed entry into Japan at a low rate while we in Canada had to pay a high rate for the very same article." Well, the fact was that a few years before, a treaty had been entered into between Great Britain and Japan with the privilege that Canada might or might not adhere to it. The Canadian government of that day—I am not sure at the moment who were in power—thought it would not be wise to adhere to the treaty, the consequence was that Canada was not included in the favoured nation arrangement, and when cotton goods from Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, and similar goods from New York arrived in Japan, the United States goods were admitted at a low rate and the Canadian goods were taxed at a high rate. There was an illustration of what resulted from our not having come in under the favoured nation provision. Well, the Canadian government very soon got busy and adhered to the treaty, and from that day to this United States goods and Canadian goods have gone into Japan on the same terms. That shows how some other nations may get ahead of us where there is no favoured nation treaty as applying to our own country.

I am not laying down the doctrine that in all cases we should adopt the favoured nation principle, but in the main, especially in the case of a country which has a low tariff, I think the principle is a good one. No country will give to Canada, or to any other country, exclusive commercial privileges; but the best it gives to any country it may hold itself free to give to any other country. It would be preposterous for us to go to Switzerland and say: You must give us a lower rate than you give a certain other country. No country would do it; we would not do it. We would not give exclusively to any one country any special commercial privilege. We might give what we thought would suit them, but we would retain the right to extend the same privilege to any other country. And I repeat, if a country has a low tariff and is giving us the best it is giving to anybody else, what more can we ask? That, in brief, is the argument for the favoured nation principle. There may be cases in which its application might not be wise if, for instance, we discovered that we were suffering any great injury through the admission of Swiss silks at 27½ per cent less the discount, why, we could get rid of it, I suppose. But it was there all the time my hon. friend was in power; he did not want to get rid of it then, and I am not sure he wants to get rid of it now.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is always a great pleasure to hear from my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), even though the subject may be old and threadbare and pretty well washed out. Now, he says, why did we not increase the tariff? I would ask him to turn up any of his own speeches or the speeches of his leader when we were in power and to answer his own question from the arguments then advanced. Why, the whole time that hon. gentlemen opposite were over here they were declaiming to the House that we had no mandate and could not do business of any kind at all.

Mr. FIELDING: Did you believe that?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That was the claim then made. No, we did not believe it. We believed we had the right to try to keep things going on in Canada and to put the country in proper shape after the war. And we were right in our belief; we were successful in our work, because when my hon. friends attained power they were able to say that no country in the world was in better shape than Canada was. That is what we did.

Mr. JACOBS: In spite of a Tory government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend asked, why did we not do it? Why did not my hon. friend himself do what he said he was going to do—reduce the rates of duty? What was his answer? Why, his answer was that the great American republic was doing something. What did we say? We said that until the policy of that country was absolutely fixed; that until they were really committed to a course of action, Canada would do nothing to give them the slightest excuse for their action in the premises. That is the stand we took, and twelve months later that is the stand my hon. friend takes; yet he turns round now and says, why did we not do it? That is the kind of argument we get when we try to talk business.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the sort of argument, and one or two laughs—that is all. During the last session, although my hon. friends were insistent in their argument that we had no mandate, no right to do anything, the demand was nevertheless repeatedly made that a redistribution bill be brought down. But last session, a year afterward, hon. gentlemen opposite said that it was impossible to bring down a redistribution measure—although one of the claims previously made was that there should be a special session of parliament to deal with that question. Well, two years afterwards we still have not a redistribution measure, although I understand there is a committee somewhere, waiting and hoping and struggling to get something like a settled declaration of government policy. That is how we stand on the question of what we have done. But what difference does it make whether we did the right thing or the wrong thing? The question now is what ought to be done to-day for Canada, regardless of old history, regardless of efforts to draw herrings across the trail. Is my hon. friend content with the exodus from Canada? Is he content with the conditions in his own province to-day—idle factories; 15,000 people moved out of Halifax since he came into office? Does he like that? And if he does not like it, should we not discuss it instead of simply saying nothing is to be done for Canada because I happened to be in office, I think it was two and a half years, and did not do then what is now the right thing to do, not being met with the same necessities for action that this government is met with? The exodus came with this government, the exodus was not with us.

My hon. friend says that if I have made an investigation of the silk price business he is quite ready to take my word. I will tell him frankly that I have not, but I am going to ask my hon. friend to ask the ladies of his own family whether they cannot buy their silks in the United States cheaper than they can in Canada. I need not go any further. Ask them if they cannot get their silk stockings when they are across the line cheaper than they can buy them here. I know that is what my women folk tell me, and they wonder why it is. The answer is not to be found in the tariff, as my hon. friend understands it, it is to be found in connection with the silk industry just exactly as it was shown in the tin plate industry in the United States and practically every other industry in that country. Why, the time was when there was not a single tin plate mill in the United States. The United States imposed a very high duty on tin plate, 75 per cent if my recollection is correct. The price of tin plate went up, and although previously Welsh tin plate had been sold altogether in the United States and not a bit of tin plate had been produced in that country, within a comparatively short space of time the United States was not only producing all her own tin plate but exporting as well to the Mother Country. I do not know how it is to-day, but I know that at the time I made the investigation my hon. friend speaks about, tin plate was selling lower in the United States than it was in the Mother Country. That is what they did with the tariff, and what they did there for tin plate they have done for silks here. Would it not be a good thing if we had that $108,000,000 of wages spent in Canada to-day? Would it not be a good thing if there was just a little movement from the south to the north instead of an uninterrupted stream from the north to the south? I ask my friend seriously to consider the position in which he finds this country getting to-day, and seriously considering it I think he will come to the conclusion, if he does not find himself so tied down by pledges here and pledges there—and I have to congratulate him on the ease with which he can get rid of these things—that we need a little more industry at home and a change in the direction of that stream, turning it from the south to the north.

My hon. friend is probably right in what he says about the favoured nation treaty. It is an old treaty, and we did not do anything to hurt it. He did a very good thing—I have given him credit for it before and I have to give him credit for it again—when he got rid of the favoured nation treatment

4 p.m. of Germany. He did a good thing for Canada then, but that is a long time ago, and the necessity for action to-day is more insistent that it was in the past. Our condition is more serious; our need for employment at home is greater now. If it was right for the hon. gentleman to do that with respect to Germany, will he not be good enough to look into the question to-day and see if something cannot be done in that connection? As I say, I have all the figures. They are all worked out, but I do not want to take up the time of the committee in reading them. I shall be pleased to send a copy of them to my hon. friend or to hand them to Hansard for the information of the members. My hon. friend will find that these figures substantiate just what I have been saying.

What my hon. friend says is perfectly true about the first start of that most favoured nation clause. It can be got rid of so easily. If my hon. friend will refer again to the speech of Senator Beaubien in the Senate he will find that he can get rid of that clause just as easily to-day as he got rid of it when he was dealing with Germany.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I would like to inquire from the minister what the Italian rate is, whether the tariff generally speaking is ad valorem or specific duties.

Mr. FIELDING: I think it is mostly specific duties. It is a moderate tariff on the whole, to the extent that I am acquainted with it. It is not an excessive tariff.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Would the minister consider giving the committee a list similar to the French list of the principal exports, so that we can get a general view? I think it would be a good thing for the trade of the country. I would like to see what the duties are on the different things we have for export.

Mr. FIELDING: In the case of the French treaty there was a long list of items many of which my hon. friend thought were not important, but in order that the committee may know the extent of our exports in the principal articles I am quite willing, before the third reading of the bill, to bring down a list.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I would like to see a list of our exports in the principal articles. Our exports to Italy are very limited, leaving out some of the articles in the French treaty that the minister refers to in the French treaty. I am not interested in those, and I think very few others are, but I would like to see what the Italian list is in the articles of importance to this country.

Mr. FIELDING: I shall be very glad before the third reading to bring down a statement showing what our principal exports to Italy are.

Mr. MacLAREN: May I ask the minister if Italian goods in order to receive the benefits under this treaty, are required to be imported through Canadian ports?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes. The French treaty requires that, and in order to get the benefit of the French treaty they would have to accept the same conditions.

Mr. MacLAREN: I am referring to Italy.

Mr. FIELDING: Italy would have to come under the same conditions.

Mr. MacLAREN: Is it so stated in the treaty?

Mr. FIELDING: Not expressly so. It is a favoured nation treaty. Whatever the best terms we give to any other foreign nation Italy can claim, and the best terms that were given to France contain the condition the hon. gentleman mentions. They can get the benefits only by accepting the responsibilities.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it not a fact that it is only to France that the Canadian port clause applies? These duties we are giving to other countries too, and as a consequence any goods that another country sends to us at a certain rate Italy can get at the same rate, and does not have to send them through Canadian ports.

Mr. FIELDING: My impression is that they will be subject to the same restrictions that France is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not see the reasoning at all. It is only France that has the Canadian port clause. Any other nation to which we are giving these rates has no Canadian port clause. Italy is entitled not only to as good treatment as France but as good treatment as any other country. Consequently the goods that another country can send in by American ports, Italy can send in too.

Mr. FIELDING: But I do not think any other country could. The privilege was especially given to France, and the other nations who get the benefit of the French treaty must comply with the same terms.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps we will have to await events. I would ask the hon. minister this: Outside of one or two clauses reserving certain rights to France in respect of border states and the like, is the French treaty itself aything more than a favoured nation treaty?

Mr. FIELDING: No, I do not think it is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I agree with the minister there. He stated in his speech that he would not consider a favoured nation treaty with a higher tariff country any good.

Mr. FIELDING: The United States for example.

Mr. MEIGHEN: France is a far higher tariff country than the United States. Then does it not follow that his French treaty is no good?

Mr. FIELDING: That is a far-fetched statement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not see it. That is about as short a piece of reasoning as I have ever seen, and I do not see any escape from it. The minister says the French treaty is a favoured nation treaty and nothing more. He says that a favoured nation treaty with a high tariff country is no good. France is the highest tariff country in the world.

Mr. FIELDING: I said a favoured nation treaty with the United States would be no good, because she is a high tariff country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister illustrated it by the United States, and I think he is right, but it follows that his French treaty would be no good. I am sorry that reasoning did not appear to him.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I for one would not be inclined to offer any adverse criticism to this proposal. In my judgment, it is a far superior agreement, so far as Canada is concerned, to the French treaty. Many of the objectionable features of the French treaty are eliminated when we come to the Italian treaty, notably those provisions which appear in respect of the right of France to make such treaties as she may see fit with bordering nations, also the reservation on the part of France in respect of her colonies and protectorates, and also the reservation on the part of France in respect of enemy countries. Those features are all eliminated when we come to the agreement with Italy. This apparently is a most favoured nation agreement, out and out, and as I read it, I am inclined to differ from the opinion expressed by my hon. friend the member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) in regard to border states. I would doubt if Italy were entitled to any reservation in respect of border states, although France is undoubtedly entitled to such reservation. I think I would be inclined to take issue with the opinion expressed by the Finance Minister in regard to shipment to Canadian ports. As I read the agreement with Italy, there is nothing to bind Italy in respect to shipments to Canadian ports from Italian ports, but there is in the treaty with France. There is express provision in the treaty with France, in article 11, in regard to natural and manufactured products originating in and coming from France, when imported into Canada. I would doubt very much if that provision in the French treaty has any application to the goods of Italy coming to this country. Therefore, I submit it is at least doubtful whether there is anything in the Italian treaty which would compel shipment of goods to Canadian ports, in order that they might obtain the benefit of the most favoured nation treatment. The Italian agreement is very straightforward and very simple, as compared with the arrangement made with France. Article 1 merely provides for the imports of the two countries at the lowest rates of tariff granted to any foreign country. Article 2 applies to the exports of both countries at lowest rates granted to any foreign country. Article 4 provides that each country shall receive the most favoured nation treatment. Article 5 expressly provides that the convention shall apply to the colonies and possessions of Italy, and then provides for the termination of the treaty. If the principle of making agreements with other countries in the world, upon what we know as the basis of most favoured nation treatment, be a good one, then I think, in respect of Italy, we probably have a model convention, and I do not anticipate that any particular ills will flow from it. I would be inclined to think that, in respect of the trade of Italy there might possibly be some advantage to this country, as well as to Italy, and I would doubt very much if the provision in the French treaty in respect of border states would apply at all in regard to the treaty now made with Italy. Certainly, it would not apply in regard to the case of Jugo-Slavia, which was cited by my hon. friend, because that is not one of the border states of Italy. The border states of France would be Spain, Italy, Switzerland and Belgium.

Mr. FIELDING: And Germany.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And Germany. There is in respect of these countries a special reservation in the French treaty which is omitted in the Italian treaty. I do not think Italy could take advantage of that reservation, but I may be wrong in that respect. However, I think that in the question asked by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. MacLaren) there is a suggestion which we should clear up before the matter is finally settled. I am inclined to think there is nothing in the present arrangement with Italy to compel shipment to a Canadian port at all. A shipment may be made from an Italian port to an American port, and the provisions of the treaty still apply to the imports of this country in the matter of duties, whereas in the French treaty it expressely provides for the shipment of goods from France to Canada. That cannot apply to Italian goods, because they would necessarily be shipped from Italy to Canada. If goods originating in Italy were shipped from France to Canada, they might be entitled to the same treatment as French goods under that treaty. But I doubt very much if any would come that way. It would requre a special provision with respect to goods shipped from an Italian port to a Canadian port—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister state whether there are any of our actual exports to France that secure at the hands of Italy favoured nationed treatment under this agreement that did not secure it before?

Mr. FIELDING: I think not. I think they already had our principal exports under the agreement made some years ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is there any real permanency to this agreement that did not attach to the other? What were the terms for cancellation in the other treaty?

Mr. FIELDING: It was not a treaty in fact at all before. It had not the form of a treaty, but it was an understanding come to here in Ottawa with the Italian consul. My recollection is that it required four months' notice, but substantially it covered our main exports. As I said a while ago, there is not much extension of business in this treaty, but it is a benefit to have it in a permanent form. That is all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It really is a matter of form. I have not been able to find what form the last agreement took. Was it not ratified by parliament?

Mr. FIELDING: No. I think it was done by order in council, and did not require ratification by parliament. It was not done by form of treaty. The Tariff Act authorized the Governor in Council to extend the benefit of the intermediate tariff, and my recollection is that it was done under that provision.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was done under statute.

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It really was a statutory enactment.

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The only difference was that it had a four months' notice of cancellation, whereas this has one year. The rest is a difference of form.

Mr. FIELDING: This is more comprehensive. It includes all things.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The other included all that we sold.

Mr. FIELDING: Perhaps it did.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suppose this would apply to the list of mysterious drugs that appear in the French treaty?

Mr. FIELDING: It would include them.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Why was the term four years fixed as the length of the treaty? Four is an unusual number; the usual term is five or ten years.

Mr. FIELDING: The idea was that the term should not be made too long. We thought it well to withhold the right of parliament to revise its judgment upon the matter.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It had no connection with other expiring treaties?

Mr. FIELDING: No.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This term was fixed just arbitrarily at four years?

Mr. FIELDING: I think the Italians talked of a longer period, and we thought it wise not to make a longer period.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I notice the name of Lord Curzon of Kedleston in connection with this treaty. If we are to judge from the pronouncements of the government and the statement of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe), this government would consider it a great indignity that a British plenipotentiary should sign, along with Canadian plenipotentiaries, a treaty in which Canada alone is affected and interested. Why did the minister submit to it in this case?

Mr. FIELDING: Whatever others may have said, it appeared to me that the name of the distinguished Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Lord Curzon of Kedleston, rather added to the weight of this document, and I was glad to have it there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thoroughly agree with the minister and I congratulate him. I am sorry that his counsel as well as his sentiments did not prevail later.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT AMENDMENT

House again in committee on Bill No. 43, to amend the Canada Temperance Act, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Importation of intoxicating liquor prohibited.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Would the minister explain the necessity for this legislation?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The purpose of this legislation is to limit the importation of intoxicating liquor into provinces like British Columbia and Quebec, where the sale of intoxicating liquor is under the control of the provincial government. The scheme of the bill is that whenever the federal government is in receipt of an order in council of a province where the sale of intoxicating liquor is controlled by the provincial government or by a commission of the provincial government, such order in council asking that the prohibition decreed by these sections shall be put into force by a proclamation of the Governor in Council, the Governor in Council may declare these prohibitions in force in that province. If hon. members will look at the bill, they will find that a general prohibition of importation of intoxicating liquor is provided. Exceptions are made for the government, for the manufacturer, for the blending of their products, and for the exporters. These are three exceptions. Exception is also made for the carrying of such liquor in the province and outside. This, I might say, was asked for by the government of British Columbia. In the other provinces, as hon. members know, where they have prohibition, no importation is possible. Last year the then Solicitor General, the Hon. D. D. McKenzie, introduced a bill providing for prohibition of exportation and prohibition of importation of intoxicating liquor. The measure passed this House; it went to the Senate where it was amended. The prohibition of exportation was accepted by the Senate, but the prohibition of importation was rejected. It is for that reason that we come this year with this amendment, which is about the same as that introduced last year.

[Mr. Fielding.]

Mr. CLARK: Under section 163, subsection (2), paragraph (c), as it appears in the printed bill, is it not a fact that power is retained by British Columbia and Quebec to continue the existing bonded warehouses?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Under paragraph (d), as amended, warehouses would be allowed. Paragraph (c) covers the manufacturers. I will ask to have this amended by the addition of the word "brewers". I was told that there might be some doubt as to that.

Mr. CLARK: It was paragraph (d) I meant.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Paragraph (d) is in regard to exporters, and we made this exception at the request of the British Columbia government.

Mr. CLARK: That is the exceptions may be continued by order in council of the government of British Columbia?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: That is to say, with the proviso that is to be found at the end of the amendments, that whenever such order in council of the provincial government is passed and sent to the federal government, in such order in council the provincial government may say: "We wish to have prohibition of importation for everybody in the province, except manufacturers, brewers and exporters", or the order in council may limit the exception to manufacturers and brewers and refuse the exception to the exporters.

Mr. CLARK: If they pass an order in council providing for the continuance of bonded warehouses, I suppose they may go ahead and give assent to the establishment of new bonded warehouses?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes.

Mr. CLARK: It is a fact that to-day the Department of Customs and Excise requires the unqualified request and consent of the attorneys general of such provinces before they will grant licenses to such bonded warehouses. Is that correct?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes.

Mr. CLARK: And it is also a fact that the attorney general of at least the province of British Columbia has requested the granting of such licenses in recent years as well as in the present year.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: That I do not know. There is nothing in my department that I know of to show that.

Mr. CLARK: In the provinces which now have total prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors, before the importation into such provinces of such liquors can be prohibited it is necessary to submit to the people a plebiscite for their judgment. Is that correct?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes.

Mr. CLARK: And in the case of Quebec and British Columbia it is proposed to legislate without submitting such a plebiscite to the people—

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Exactly.

Mr. CLARK: —and altogether prohibit the importation either privately or by means of bonded warehouses.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes. According to the statute passed in 1919, after a referendum to the people has been voted upon the importation of liquors is prohibited by legislation. In the province of Quebec the sale of liquors is under the control of the government as also is the case in British Columbia. There is no prohibition of importation provided for, and unless we legislate, as we propose to do, there is nothing to prevent importation in these particular provinces, except possibly the provincial law which is in existence in the case of Quebec. The province of British Columbia is not satisfied with such a law and now asks that we legislate to prohibit importation. By this legislation we simply add to the regulations controlling the sale of liquor the prohibition of importation. Last year we legislated to provide that there should be no exportation of liquors from those provinces in which the prohibition of such exportation has been voted upon. We say nothing of prohibiting exportation in this bill; we are providing only for the prohibition of importation. I understand that it is the wish of the province of British Columbia that such an amendment be adopted. It was adopted last year in the House without much objection and we hope it will pass this year not only in this House but in the Senate as well.

Mr. CLARK: Is the object in the case of British Columbia, in short, to control bootlegging?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: That is the purpose, I understand.

Mr. CLARK: I have a few remarks to offer on this subject and I may as well say now what I have to say. I desire just as much as any other citizen of British Columbia to see the bootlegging traffic controlled. It is a curse in that province as it is in many other provinces in the Dominion to-day, and anything that will assist to curb it I am only too anxious to do my best to support. But this legislation is in my opinion bad, and if it can be put in such a form as to be effective I would concur in it. At present in British Columbia private individuals are permitted by law to import liquor into the province, but the provincial government imposes a tax which makes it practically prohibitive for anybody to import liquor to-day. For instance, if I wish to import any liquor into British Columbia I must pay, in addition to the price charged by the vendor in the Old Country, the tax levied by the government, and that would bring the price up to what I would pay the liquor vendor of British Columbia. So that there is no advantage for a private individual to import liquor, and I may say that private persons are not importing, unless it be wealthy people who can afford to do so. So far as the prohibition of private importation is concerned, therefore, there is in my opinion no necessity for the bill, because there is no such importation to-day. Liquor can be imported privately but it is not practicable.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Except on the part of wealthy people.

Mr. CLARK: Yes, and they would import in such small quantities that I do not think it would be desirable in any case to pass a law to prohibit that importation. Everyone has the right to buy liquor to-day; he can go to the vendor and get it, and if he has to pay the vendor the same price as he would pay for the imported article, and the government gets the profit in any case, it makes no difference whether anyone buys from the vendor or from the Old Country—the province gets the same profit either way.

Mr. JACOBS: Except that people might want special brands.

Mr. CLARK: If they want special brands they can import them and pay the tax which goes to the province. So far as the private individual is concerned I can see no necessity whatever for legislation. There has been litigation in regard to the tax imposed by the province. It was held by the Supreme Court of British Columbia that the tax was legal, and that decision was confirmed by the Court of Appeal of the province. The appeal was taken no further, so that the province is within its rights in imposing the tax; it may collect it, and as a matter of fact is doing so to-day. That is the position with regard to private persons. The other phase of the question relates to bonded warehouses. We have in British Columbia to-day twenty-five customs warehouses for storage of intoxicating liquors in bond. All the licenses for such warehouses were issued since 1920. I think I am correct in saying, all; if not all, practically the whole lot have been issued since that time, there may be one or two exceptions, but I feel almost sure that they have all been issued since 1920, that is to say, since the present law came into effect. In other words, the warehouse business has grown up since the coming into force of that law, and it is very interesting to know that many of these customs warehouses are located in places like Fernie, Cranbrook and Grand Forks, down in the interior of the province, two or three hundred miles from the sea coast. If the purpose is export, why keep them in that part of the country? Surely the intention is obvious. If any man intends to export liquor in a bona fide way he will certainly have his bonded warehouse on the coast; he will not handle the liquor four or five times.

The effect of this bill is to enable the province of British Columbia and the province of Quebec to continue these bonded warehouses by passing an order in council providing that clause (d) of subsection 2 shall be enforced, which simply means that these provinces by order in council can make whatever law they choose. That is not sound legislation. That is enabling the province of British Columbia, for instance, to make laws by order in council. I should be perfectly satisfied if the minister would revise this bill so that we will know what we are going to get—either that prohibition is to be complete, or that we are to submit the question to the people, as is done in all the other provinces which have this prohibitory law. Let the people decide by plebiscite whether they want liquor to be imported privately or not. That question has been voted on in those provinces which have prohibitory laws, but it has not been voted on in British Columbia. In those provinces which have prohibitory laws the Canada Temperance Act provides that before private importation of liquor can be prohibited the question must be submitted to a plebiscite vote of the people. A fortiori, I would submit that provinces which have authorized the selling of liquor should be entitled to such a plebiscite. I cannot see why there should be any objection to inserting in this bill a provision similar to that given to the other provinces, namely, that the question should be submitted to the people; otherwise make this measure specific, make it mean something. As it stands the Lieutenant Governor in Council in British Columbia or Quebec can make whatever law they choose. That is what we object to.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: We cannot order a plebiscite, Mr. Chairman, it has to be asked for by the legislature. My hon. friend objects to this clause providing for the prohibition of importation by private individuals and says that as a matter of fact there is no such importation except by a few people. But if so why not accept the request which comes to us from the government of the province of British Columbia by whom we are told there is a great abuse of private importation? The hon. member says this importation is only done by wealthy people. Well, I am not so sure that he is correctly informed on the point, because the Attorney General writes us that there is a great abuse of private importation.

The second objection is that by the exceptions we make, especially by exception (d) of subsection 2, we maintain the warehouses. This exception does not mean that the government will license such warehouses; it is inserted because in British Columbia the people have not pronounced on the question of prohibition, and consequently the authorities of the province do not want to raise too much objection to their legislation. The exception in favour of manufacturers and brewers does not mean that warehouses will be licensed; the provincial authorities may license them or they may refuse. My hon. friend asks: Why leave it to the provincial authorities to decide by themselves alone what the law shall be, with liberty to change it whenever they like by order in council? Well, Mr. Chairman, the province of British Columbia as well as the province of Quebec think the best system for the sale of intoxicating liquor is to take control of it themselves directly or through a commission. The system, I understand, is favourably looked upon by the people of the two provinces. They now wish to make that system more complete, if possible, and they tell us that to repress the abuses of importation and bootlegging generally it will be for the good of the people of those provinces that we should legislate prohibiting the importation of liquor by private individuals or by corporations, and only permit it by manufacturers, brewers and exporters. If the hon. members for British Columbia are of opinion that the principle itself is right, that is to say, that importation should be prohibited, with the exception in favour of the manufacturers, brewers and exporters, I may say that we have no objection to discuss the point raised in regard to subsection (d). But as to the main principle, that is, the prohibition of importation, I think it is the wish of all the people of British Columbia to have such prohibition accepted, while desiring to maintain their system regulating the sale of intoxicating liquor.

Mr. STEVENS: I want to make my position clear on this question. Last year similar legislation was introduced. I supported it, for one reason only, which was this. The Attorney General of British Columbia claimed that he was unable to efficiently administer the liquor laws of his province because this parliament was preventing him from controlling importation by export houses as set forth in these amendments. He sheltered himself behind that excuse. I may say that last year I had very little sympathy with the measure as a measure, but rather than allow the Attorney General to succeed with the excuse he was making I supported the measure, I may say it did not result in any attitude of appreciation on his part, because he declared publicly on several occasions that I was the cause of the defeat of his measure in the Senate. As a matter of fact I think the Minister of Justice will recall, as the Prime Minister would if he were in his seat that on the last day of the session I was a medium for bringing about a conference between the members of the Senate and the members of the House to see if some common ground could not be reached; but unfortunately it could not. I wish, however, to say a few words on the merits of this bill and to state certain facts that I think the committee should be aware of.

I again say that my hands are more or less tied by the contention of the attorney general that he needs this legislation in order properly to administer the law. Frankly I do not think he is sincere in that contention. We meet at this moment in the shadow of the closing scene in that tragedy of the Crowsnest pass, where to-day two human lives went out in connection with the murder of the policeman Lawson. I have nothing whatever to say regarding the guilt of these two wretches who have paid the final penalty; in fact, I think they simply met the just deserts of their evil lives and of the crime that they committed. About that there can be no question whatever. But let the committee get a few facts squarely before it. The export business of British Columbia was largely concentrated on the Pacific coast, the only place from which that business can be properly carried on. Where can we export legally and in honour from British Columbia except overseas, to Mexico, China, or other foreign countries? There is a strong prohibitory law in our neighboring country to the south; there is a prohibitory law in Alberta, so that our export business, as I say, was largely concentrated on the Pacific coast. Certain houses, however, asked for and received from the Attorney General of British Columbia and the government permission to transfer their business to the Crowsnest pass, five or six hundred miles from the point of export, and there they established export houses. Everybody in British Columbia knew that the export business carried on from these houses was a bootlegging business, deliberately violating the laws of the United States and deliberately contravening the laws of Alberta. And those wretches to whom I have referred, who were hanged this morning, committed their heinous crime in the carrying out of that business in the Crowsnest pass, based upon the consent of the Attorney General to establish the business in that section. Let me put it in another way—and I told the Attorney General this from the public platform on three different occasions last winter. I want the committee to understand these points, because they very materially affect this bill. When export is contemplated a permit is granted by the Attorney General's officers, and the only legal export is out of the province by water, we will say to Mexico, which is usually the destination. A large fleet is maintained on the Pacific coast for the purposes of this so-called export business, which is not export at all. I wish the Minister of Customs and Excise (Mr. Bureau) were in his seat, because I have a few words to say to him on this subject. They do not export to Mexico at all; they ship to Seattle, Portland and San Francisco, and in the case of these houses which were moved six hundred miles from the sea coast, the export is directly across the line southward or into Alberta. The traffic is known to be in contravention of the law, and yet not in one single case has the Attorney General of British Columbia during the past year seriously attempted to stop it. How could he stop it? In two ways. Upon the application being made to this government for warehouse license he could have refused his consent to the application, but he has never done that except perhaps in a few cases where his prejudice may have been aroused. In every case where an export license was granted the Attorney General had to give his consent before this government issued the license—and I am speaking of the government as it has been during the last several years. So that the Attorney General had that control in his hands and has it to-day, but he has never exercised it. What other control did he have? Upon the issuance of a permit for the movement of this liquor from the export warehouses, supposedly to Mexico, it would be a very simple matter for him to have one of his numerous inspectors see that the goods were actually exported, but as a matter of fact no serious effort has ever been made in that direction. So that we have had this crime to which I have referred and numerous others, some of them resulting fatally. Now, let me read what the legislature of British Columbia asked. They requested this House—I quote:

—to enact legislation providing for the prohibition of the importation of intoxicating liquor into British Columbia for use therein except by the provincial government, such legislation to be for the purpose of supplementing and giving effect to the aforementioned Government Liquor Act, and to be contingent upon and to exist only during its continuance.

Now, what does this bill call for?—and this is what I want to bring to the attention of the committee as an evidence of the insincerity of the Attorney General in this matter. The bill provides for what the resolution of the provincial legislature calls for, with certain exceptions. The first exception is subclause (a), government sale; the second (b), deals with transport in bond; I shall not debate these. The next exception is in subclauses (c) and (d). In the former provision is made for exceptions in the case of manufacturers and distillers—to that I make no objection, and subclause (d) extends the exception to export houses. But if this House determines that an exception should be extended to the distillers for blending purposes to bona fide exporters, then let us say so in the act. What does the act say? The act merely provides for it, but this further condition is added:

Provided, hovewer, that the exceptions contained in paragraph (c)—

Namely, for blending purposes.

—and in paragraph (d)—

Namely, for export purposes.

—or either of them, shall not be applicable to any province in which this section is declared to be in force, unless in the order of the Lieutenant Governor in Council mentioned in subsection 5.

And so on. In other words, this parliament is asked to make these exceptions, but to make them subject to the whim of the provincial governments. What does that mean? I know what it means in regard to British Columbia, and I am going to state it; I am not referring to Quebec, because I have no knowledge of the administration of the law there. Having in mind that for the last year and nine months during the term of the present act in British Columbia and its administration no effort has been made to control these export houses, it simply means that so far as distilleries and export houses are concerned the Attorney General wishes to hold control over them for the purposes of political expediency and for no other reason.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. JACOBS: Why does my hon. friend make that assertion?

Mr. STEVENS: If my hon. friend wants me to bring some evidence, I will do so, as other hon. members can. I assert again that it is for political expediency that the Attorney General is asking for that power. If the Attorney General is sincere, why does he ask for the proviso at all?

Mr. JACOBS: This does not apply to British Columbia alone. It also applies to Quebec.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not talking about Quebec. I am discussing something of which I have some understanding. I have no personal knowledge of the conditions in Quebec.

Mr. NEILL: Will the hon. member tell me where he finds subsection (d)? It does not appear here in the bill.

Mr. STEVENS: It is in the amendment of which the minister gave notice, which will be found at page 2284 of Hansard.

Another point I wish to make is this. This legislation was first asked for two years ago, in 1921. I have under my hand the opinion of the then Minister of Justice, Mr. Doherty, who declared that in his opinion the law as it stood was sufficient and that there was no need of this legislation. I have also the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice, Mr. Newcombe, which reads as follows:

OTTAWA, March 24, 1921.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge your letter of 21st instant enclosing copy of a minute of the Lieutenant Governor in Council of British Columbia, which sets forth a resolution of the Legislative Assembly of 9th instant, whereby it was resolved that the Federal parliament should be requested to enact legislation to prohibit the importation of intoxicating liquor into British Columbia for use therein, except by the provincial government, and I think it would be advisable in reply to direct the attention of the Lieutenant Governor to the existing Dominion legislation which is embodied in chapter 19 of 1916, as amended by chapter 30 of 1917, and chapter 21 of the second session of 1919. These statutes, so far as I can perceive, contain provisions substantially in accord with those which the Legislative Assembly considers desirable. It will be observed that by the first section the importation of intoxicating liquor into the province with the knowledge or intention that it will thereafter be dealt with in violation of the law of the province is prohibited and made an offence punishable by fine or imprisonment. The extent of the prohibition which is thus enacted is therefore dependent upon the legislation of the province in which it is to be applied, and in so far as British Columbia has legislated to make the possession of intoxicating liquor in the province unlawful the importation is already prohibited by force of these Dominion provisions.

Your obedient servant,

E. L. NEWCOMBE,
Deputy Minister of Justice.

The Under-Secretary of State,
Ottawa.

The opinion of Mr. Doherty is similar to that of Mr. Newcombe. The Minister of Justice—I know that he has been given a great deal of concern in regard to this legislation, it is of rather extreme type—mentioned a moment ago that there was a general demand for this legislation. There has been no general demand for it except from the attorney general's department of the provincial government. I have in my hand a letter from the British Columbia Prohibition Association, dated February 1 of this year, and I want to read it for the purpose of showing the attitude of mind of a large section of the public in regard to this legislation and in justification of my position to-day. He goes on to say:

At the approaching session—

That is, this session.

—of the Dominion parliament there will come up again the application of the government of British Columbia for an act to prohibit the importation of liquor except through the Liquor Control Board, into British Columbia.

This act was introduced under government auspices last year, and in the House of Commons encountered no serious opposition, being represented as calculated to improve moral conditions, and as being in line with provisions already incorporated in the Canada Temperance Act.

It would have had a similar safe passage through the Senate except for the intervention of the veteran prohibitionist of parliament, Sir George Foster, who called attention to the character of the British Columbia Liquor law and showed that it was not a measure for the suppression of the drink evil, but only one for the transfer of the whiskey trade with its profits and its possibilities of political advantage, to the government.

It is to be hoped that the bill will not get through parliament this time, without some one, preferably one of the members of the House of Commons for British Columbia, raising the question as to whether it is desirable that the Dominion parliament should lend endorsation or recognition or reinforcement in any shape or form to the policy of liquor selling by the governments.

Already the debauching influence of the profits reported by Quebec and British Columbia has done something to undermine the moral defences of the other provinces.

And so forth. It is true that the Prohibition Association are not now taking any formal stand in this matter. This letter was received a month or so ago, but all through this controversy, such as it is, the inference on the Attorney General's part is that he requires this legislation in order to enforce the law, when those of us who have studied the enforcement of the law in British Columbia know perfectly well that he has not attempted to exhaust the powers that he now possesses, that he has not in any sense exhausted the rights he possesses regarding export liquor warehouses, for instance, or to properly enforce the law. I do not wish to go into further detail as to his enforcement of the law than I have done up to the present.

Let me turn to the bill again for a moment in connection with these two clauses (c) and (d) to which I have already referred. I object to this legislation as it is drawn because it transfers power to the Attorney General of British Columbia to decide whether or not these exemptions shall be applicable. I contend that this parliament, being the parliament entrusted with the power of determining that, should absolutely determine it, and not determine it with a proviso of that kind. If we decide that this should pass, let us pass it, and let these exemptions be part of the bill and not subject them to the whim of the Attorney General. For instance, suppose the provincial government should decide to harrass the distillers. They can go to the distillers and say: Now unless you do thus and so to suit us we will pass an order in council asking the Dominion government to put you all out of business. And the minute that order in council was passed, without any review or discussion by the legislature or the public the proclamation is effective. Or they might go to the exporter in the same way. Now, if the exporting and the other business is bad, it should not be in here. If on the other hand, it should be allowed—and we say by this act that it should—then let us make it the law absolutely by this statute.

5 p.m.

Those are the main points I desire to make in connection with this bill. The legislation as regards these last two sections is more or less frivolous. It is not the type of legislation this parliament should pass. I do not think we should hand over absolute rights and powers in a matter of this kind to the province unless we do it in a constitutional manner by an amendment to the British North America Act, and forego any rights that we might have in that regard. Furthermore, I again assert that the contention of the Attorney General that there is need of this legislation is not based upon any established facts. It is an effort on his part to get further control of the liquor business. Let me give an illustration of the point. Under his present powers as the supreme purchaser, through the liquor board, of liquor sold in the liquor stores in British Columbia, what does he do? What has he done, as the records of the last session of the legislature will show? He has picked out certain firms from which he buys his liquor. These are firms that are suitable to the agents of the government, and many other brands of liquor, some of them the very finest I am told, not knowing by experience, are not sold at all, or very little if at all. Now, under this law we are giving him still further power to restrict firms and prevent, say, Johnny Walker, Black and White, Haig and Haig and other brands, from being sold if the Attorney General decides that it is not in the political interest of hon. gentlemen opposite to allow it.

Furthermore, in support of what I am saying, I will give a practical illustration to my hon. friend who interjected a remark a moment ago. The liquor board in Vancouver imported $400,000 worth of these recognized brands into their warehouse, and still went out and bought cheap unknown brands and sold them in their liquor stores, and actually advertised and pushed the sale of them. Let me say something to my hon. friend who is interested in the matter—

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Is it not a fact that the purchases of liquor made by the British Columbia government are made through the purchasing commission of that government?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, and there has never been a more hideous orgy of corruption in connection with any purchasing agency in Canada than in the case of this agency in British Columbia.

Mr. JACOBS: Is the hon. member going to introduce British Columbia politics into this question?

Mr. STEVENS: If the hon. member wants to attach politics to what I have said he can do so. I am stating facts.

Mr. JACOBS: We are not interested in the politics of British Columbia.

Mr. STEVENS: I am making statements in answer to what has been said by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King), and I know these statements to be correct.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The statements that were made were investigated by the public accounts committee of the British Columbia legislature last session, and if the hon. member will take the report of that committee he will not speak as he has spoken this afternoon.

Mr. STEVENS: I know the report of that committee and I know how it was arrived at. I am not anxious to introduce it here, but I think hon. members have it under their hand, and, perhaps, would like to do so. I do not intend to introduce it. When I was interrupted I was going to say something, but it has escaped my mind and perhaps it is just as well for my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works and his friends in British Columbia that I have forgotten it. While I am desirous of removing from the Attorney General any excuse for the maladministration of the liquor laws of British Columbia—which excuse he is now making, and charging this parliament with responsibility—at the same time I do not for one moment lend my endorsation to this legislation in itself and on its own merit. I do not think it is necessary. I think they have the powers to-day, and, furthermore, I do not think that either the province of Quebec or the province of British Columbia should be in any different position from the other provinces: that is that such powers should be exercised by a plebiscite of the people, and not by the whim of the Attorney General or of the Lieutenant Governor in council who would be advised by the Attorney General. That is my chief objection, but rather than allow my friend the Attorney General to continue this excuse, which perhaps many people accept, in ignorance of the fact, as being sound, I am not going to personally force my opposition to the bill to the extent of voting against it.

Mr. WOODS: I am not sure that I know very much about the conditions in British Columbia or in Quebec, any further than that there is control by the government which I believe to be the case. I do not know what bearing this bill may have on the province of Ontario, but to my mind any bill that will prohibit importation of intoxicating liquors into a province will certainly be a benefit to the province of Ontario. In Ontario we have the Ontario Temperance Act, and I believe they are trying honestly to enforce that act, yet in spite of that fact they have a great many complaints of breaches of the law, bootlegging, and liquor going through the province into the country to the south of us. If the bill that is before this House to-day has any effect whatever in cutting off the importation of liquor, and in any way confining it to the transportation entirely from the province of Ontario to some other place, I think it will be a benefit. The only regret I have in connection with temperance legislation is that the government is not going far enough along those lines. I believe the temperance forces of the province of Ontario would gladly hail any law that would not only prohibit the importation of intoxicating liquor, but also the manufacture for beverage purposes in a province where they have prohibitory law. I believe that is one of the things that the temperance forces of the province of Ontario are aiming at, and I do not think they will rest satisfied until that is accomplished. They have been on the warpath for temperance legislation for a great number of years, since the Canada Temperance Act, or what we remember as the old Scott Act, was in force and from that time up to the present the temperance forces of the province of Ontario have been fighting earnestly and faithfully for the prohibition of the liquor traffic for beverage purposes. That has been accomplished to a great extent, though not to the extent we possibly would like to see, on account of the little breaches of the law, and we did not accomplish our purpose until the terrible war, which brought the temperance forces more unitedly together, and resulted in the introduction of the Ontario Temperance Act. As I understand this bill before the House, it is a measure that will prove beneficial along temperance lines. It is going to help the province of Ontario, I believe, as well as other provinces, in curtailing the consumption of alcoholic liquor.

Mr. PARENT: Would the hon. member include the prohibition of the manufacture of native wine in Ontario?

Mr. WOODS: As far as I am personally concerned, I would. I cannot speak for Ontario, nor for the masses of the people, but from my own standpoint I would go to that extent. I have a few figures here that have been compiled by the Sons of Temperance in connection with the convictions for drunkenness in the province of Ontario under prohibition and before prohibition. The convictions for drunkenness were as follows:

	1914	1921
Toronto	14,247	4,727
Ottawa	991	411
Kingston	482	168
Port Arthur	1,376	541
Hamilton	1,425	383
Fort William	716	359

Therefore hon. members will see that under the Ontario Temperance Act the number of convictions for drinking has been cut down to a great extent in Ontario, and that would certainly show that there was a decrease in the consumption of liquor. I want to conclude by saying that I am in favour of the measure before the House, because I believe it is in the interest of temperance generally.

Mr. TOLMIE: As regards the bill now before the committee, certain power for the selling of liquor was given to the British Columbia government after a plebiscite had been taken. I rather agree with what has been said already by the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) that before any such drastic legislation as this should pass, another plebiscite should be taken, so as to afford the people of British Columbia an opportunity to say whether or not they are willing to extend further privileges to the government of that province in that connection. When this power to control the liquor business was given to the British Columbia government, it was hoped that good administration would follow. But we find, as a result of an investigation made by the public accounts committee during the last session of the legislature, that this has not been entirely satisfactory. In purchasing the liquor, we find that much bigger prices have been paid for liquor than the same goods or goods of the same quality could have been purchased at nearer home. It has been peculiar too that many of these men who have done the buying have been friends of the provincial government. That may be just a coincidence, but hon. members can judge for themselves. We often found them handling a cheap quality of goods and building up these goods by the addition of "prune juice" and other adulterants of that nature, and then selling this liquor for a price that should have purchased a liquor of good quality. We find that, in other liquors, they have used water to break down the liquor and make a cheaper product. This is in contravention of the pure food laws of this country. There has been established a factory for the manufacture of port wine at False Creek, Vancouver. Anybody who has ever been there will recognize the fact that it does not look like a vineyard down there, and certainly it does not smell like one. This port wine is being purchased by the provincial government at $10 a case, when first-class Spanish and Portuguese port can be secured at $7.80 a case.

I have had some communications from prohibitionists in British Columbia objecting to further powers being extended to the provincial government. We are paying very high prices for this liquor in British Columbia, and we have no guarantee that if this legislation is passed, the government will not take advantage of it and we shall suffer from further abuses and also a further monopoly in this connection. I feel that after the way in which the act has been administered in British Columbia, for us to support this move at the present time and give them further power, would be an endorsation of what they have done in the past. I can assure the committee that when the people voted on that plebiscite in British Columbia, they expected that the government would give good administration and handle the liquor question in a proper and businesslike manner. They certainly did not vote for the "prune juice" administration we are getting at the present time.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I am in a position similar to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), in that, although last session I did not take any part in endeavouring to secure the passage of this legislation, I did not take any objection to it. I remained silent as it were, and I did so for the same reason which induced the hon member for Vancouver Centre to support the legislation, namely I wanted to see the attorney general of the province given the opportunity, which he was asking for, to enforce the law. The attorney general was a new man, having lately been appointed, and having made certain statements to the effect that he was going to see that the liquor law was administered to the very letter; that no influence could be brought to bear upon him which would induce him to relax the enforcement of that law, and that he for one was going to be able to step out of the position of Attorney General of British Columbia without anyone saying that he had in any respect neglected to enforce the liquor law of that province to the fullest extent. I was also informed—I think the statement was made publicly—that the Attorney General of British Columbia proposed so to reduce the price of liquor that there would be no chance for a bootlegger to make any money, and consequently that he would in that way put out of business this illicit trade.

Without desiring in any way to reflect upon the Attorney General of British Columbia, I must say that the general consensus of opinion, irrespective of party politics to a large extent, is that the administration of the liquor law in British Columbia has not been satisfactory, and also that prosecutions for breaches of that law have not been impartial. I take very violent exception to editorials such as one which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of April 20, of this year. I am going to take the time of this committee to read this editorial, because I think it is a matter which this committee should take some notice of. The editorial reads:

> Federal prohibition agents in Los Angeles recently arrested a group of illicit liquor traders including one from Canada who gave the name of Joe Morris. According to the Vancouver Sun, this person was later identified as Jack Miller, secretary of the Independent Exporters Limited, a wholesale liquor firm of Vancouver, British Columbia. The shareholders of the Independent Exporters Limited are recorded as Albert Loftus McLennan, Maurice De Leon, Jack Miller and Samuel Diamond. Miller's record, according to the statement of Mr. Bowser, opposition leader in the British Columbia legislature, is well-known to the police. Among other offences it includes a sentence of five years for forgery.

The CHAIRMAN: I doubt very much whether the editorial that the hon. member is reading has anything to do with the subject matter of this bill. Unless there is something further in it that does touch on the general question it surely cannot be relevant to the debate.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I am sure you will see that it is relevant.

The CHAIRMAN: It is not so far.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I have not reached that yet, but you will see it is very relevant. If you will permit me, I will continue reading the editorial and I think you will agree with me that it is perfectly relevant. I will hand it to you first, if you like:

> It must surely be humiliating to the Liberal party to have the same Jack Miller figuring as a leading party worker. Perhaps the Attorney General of British Columbia, Mr. A. M. Manson, had such persons in mind when he said, a few weeks ago, in an address in Victoria:

Mr. McBRIDE: Surely we do not have to come here to listen to people reading newspapers.

Mr. McQUARRIE: My hon. friend can go outside if he does not like to hear what I have to say; that is his privilege. The editorial continued:

> Speaking generally, we value our friends, but in politics we sometimes curse our friends.

The CHAIRMAN: I must rule the hon. member's reading of this editorial out of order. It is not relevant to the subject matter under debate, which has reference to the importation of intoxicating liquors to be prohibited in two provinces. The subject matter is definite and the hon. member who has had long years of legal training, knows exactly what the position is.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I certainly do, and I submit with all due respect that you are absolutely wrong.

The CHAIRMAN: I rule the reading of the editorial out of order.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Of course, Mr. Chairman, I have to accept your ruling; but if there is any hon. gentleman in this House who can read the editorial and say it is out of order to quote it I certainly will question his intelligence.

The CHAIRMAN: I would call the hon. member's attention to the fact that he is again out of order in criticizing the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I am very sorry to have done that, and I apologize to the Chair. The substance of what I was going to read is that charges have been made that objection will be taken to the particular bill by reason of money which is being contributed for the corruption of the legislature by liquor interests. That is what the editorial says. I want to say that charges of that kind should not be made without investigation, and I for one take exception to the charge that any money has been distributed to members of this parliament for the purpose of procuring the defeat of this particular bill. Personally I have received none of that money; I have not heard of any money being distributed for any such purpose; and I think that the writer of the editorial is undoubtedly a very fair sample of the Ananias brood. So far as I am concerned I did, as I said last year, remain silent when the matter came up before the House. But when I got home I was told that I should not have remained silent, but should have opposed the bill. The consensus of opinion in my constituency, as intimated to me, was that the bill should have been opposed, and I was so informed not only by men interested in the use of liquor, but also by prohibitionists. I got it from both sides; I was told on all hands that the Senate of Canada had justified its usefulness in having defeated that measure. Now I come here to-day and join with the members from this side of the House who think that this measure should not be passed. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) has said something about an investigation which was held before the public accounts committee of the Legislature of British Columbia during the last session. I think possibly it would be illuminating for the committee to know something in regard to the results which were brought out in that investigation. I might say that the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) in his statement to-day was very mild indeed. In October of last year he made a public statement under circumstances which would not entitle him to any privilege if he said anything incorrect that might be regarded as slanderous. He launched a series of charges against the administration, and very serious charges they were. Included in his statement was a charge in respect to a man named Dawson, of Prince Rupert. I am not going to say who Mr. Dawson is, or anything about him, unless I am required to do so. The member for Vancouver Centre on that occasion did say something about him, and he declared that the Attorney General of British Columbia was not enforcing the liquor act in his own city of Prince Rupert. In that connection I should like to read a synopsis of a part of the evidence which was submitted to the public accounts committee of British Columbia referred to by the Minister of Public Works:

George Miller, Inspector of Enforcement, gave evidence before the Public Accounts committee.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Who is the author of the document my hon. friend is reading from? Is that an official record?

Mr. JACOBS: I rise to a point of order. It is not proper for the hon. member to discuss this matter on the question now before the Chair.

Mr. STEVENS: Was it proper for the Minister of Public Works to raise it? No one else did.

The CHAIRMAN: He asked a question.

Mr. STEVENS: I suppose the minister has a special privilege.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I merely asked a question of the hon. member, as to who the author of the document was. If he does not think fit to reply, it does not matter.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The heading is this:

The following is but a brief statement of a few matters brought out by the probing of the Conservative members of the Public Accounts committee in the session of 1922, dealing with the liquor administration of the government.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Who is the author?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The document, as I understand, is unsigned, has been distributed throughout the province, and is not an official report of the public accounts committee of the legislature.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Possibly not.

Mr. STEVENS: May I say a word in regard to the point of order raised by the hon. member (Mr. Jacobs). As a matter of fact the Minister of Public Works raised the question a moment ago when I was speaking. I declined to be drawn into a controversy on the subject and I told him at the time that if he desired to dispute a question not perhaps directly germane to the discussion I was engaged in, I was willing to meet him.

Mr. JACOBS: Where?

Mr. STEVENS: Here or anywhere.

Mr. JACOBS: Not here; they won't permit it.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) is dealing with the same subject and is prepared to offer some observations upon it. I submit that if the Minister of Public Works was in order in raising the question as to the probe before the public accounts committee of the Legislature of British Columbia, then my hon. friend (Mr. McQuarrie) is quite in order in giving such light as he may have on the subject. That is merely my observation on the point of order raised.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The Minister of Public Works did not raise a point of order. He simply asked who was the author of the document.

Mr. STEVENS: I am referring to something that preceded that.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend for New Westminster is free to answer the question or not as he thinks fit.

The CHAIRMAN: I rule that any discussion is relevant if it has regard to the question of importing intoxicating liquors and the effects which will attend any legislation to prevent law-breaking under the bill. It is not, however, pertinent to the subject matter before the Chair to detail instances illustrating individual cases of law-breaking. Hon. members may submit information bearing on the question under discussion that will tend to prove any increase or decrease in the illicit use or sale of intoxicating liquors.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What I intended to discuss was this point, whether in view of the record of the provincial government in the administration of the liquor law in the province of British Columbia, this parliament was justified in extending to that government additional powers such as are contemplated by this bill.

Mr. CAHILL: What did you vote on last night?

Mr. McQUARRIE: That is what I was getting at. I intended to quote facts, which cannot be disputed, tending to show that the administration of the act is not at all satisfactory, that instead of sending bootleggers to gaol, as could have been done on the evidence adduced, the attorney general allowed the accused to escape punishment by fining the companies for which they were working or which they controlled. I was also going to show that these men included one or two very prominent workers in the Liberal party out there who were delegates to the Liberal convention from the attorney general's town.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. member mean to suggest that it is relevant to the particular clause under discussion whether those men escaped punishment or not?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. McQUARRIE: I think so.

The CHAIRMAN: And that this clause may or may not cure the trouble?

Mr. McQUARRIE: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: Then I rule the discussion out of order.

Mr. McQUARRIE: If I may say so Mr. Chairman, the point is this, whether the personnel of the provincial government is of such a calibre that we should further extend the powers that it already has in this connection. Of course, if you rule this out I must accept your ruling.

Now, something has been said by other hon. gentlemen as to the unfairness of passing this legislation and forcing upon the people of British Columbia something which they may not want and which they have never had the opportunity of saying whether they wanted or not. In a prohibition province if it is desired to prevent the importation of liquor it is necessary that a plebiscite should be taken to afford the people an opportunity of voting on the question. Well, how much more is that necessary in a province where there is not prohibition? Take the province of British Columbia. Previous to the question being voted upon by the electors they were told that if the bill passed they would still have the right individually to import all the liquor they might require for their own purposes. The bill itself contained a similar provision. I venture to say that a great many voted in favour of government control because of that stipulation, and the knowledge that they would not be required to accept liquor which was mixed for them by any provincial government.

Mr. GRAHAM: Say "blended."

Mr. McQUARRIE: Well, blended. I have the greatest respect for some of these mixers in British Columbia. In the old days we used to get some very good cocktails, but I am afraid we never had a bartender with enough courage to mix prune juice with inferior whiskey and hand it over the bar as a drink which he expected to get credit for.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Is this propaganda for the people of the province of Manitoba in the forthcoming referendum next June?

Mr. McQUARRIE: I do not know what the hon. gentleman is referring to, whether to this bill or to the reports of the public accounts committee in British Columbia. But following along the lines of the argument in regard to the people of British Columbia having the right to say whether they want this kind of legislation or not, I have to suggest the following amendment to the minister for his consideration, and I think he should embody it in his bill. It is as follows:

Strike out subsection 5 and insert in lieu thereof:

5a. Upon receipt by the Secretary of State of Canada of a duly certified copy of an order of the Lieutenant Governor in Council of any province in which there is at any time in force a law vesting in His Majesty or the executive government of the province authority for the control and sale of intoxicating liquor in the province or in any board, commission, officer, or other governmental agency, the right of selling intoxicating liquor in the province requesting that the votes of the electors may be taken for or against the following prohibition, that is to say:

"That the importation and the bringing of intoxicating liquors into such province may be forbidden."

The Governor in Council shall proceed to take a vote on such question in the manner provided in section 152, and the provisions of sections 152 and 152A and 153 shall as far as applicable mutatis mutandis apply to the taking of such vote.

5b. If the prohibition is declared to be in force, the Governor in Council may by proclamation published in the Canada Gazette declare the prohibitions of subsection 1 of this section in that province, and the same shall thereupon be and continue in force therein.

In order that this amendment may be before the committee, Mr. Chairman, I take great pleasure in moving it.

Now, one hon. member has stated that he thinks this bill should be supported because it is legislation along temperance lines. I fail to see how that is so, Mr. Chairman, because the government of British Columbia is not operating its liquor department for the sake of temperance; rather it is operating that department for the purpose of making money. I do not think there is any doubt about that.

Mr. McBRIDE: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Is it not a fact that the government of British Columbia is operating the liquor business when the people of that province gave it a majority of over 30,000 to do so?

Mr. McQUARRIE: That is something we discussed a moment or so ago—how that favourable majority was obtained. I have already referred to that. I say that the government of the province of British Columbia is not selling liquor for the purpose of advancing temperance but to make money. We have out there what is known as the Pacific highway, a road leading to Washington, Oregon and California. That road will be paved all through British Columbia from the border to Vancouver, and will be completed this year. Hundreds of motorists come across from the other side of the line every week, particularly during the summer time. The first things that greet those motorists are large signs, some advertising the virtues of certain brands of whiskey, and others performing the same service for certain brands of beer. The first idea that a motorist from the other side of the line gets is, naturally, that he can buy whiskey, beer and other liquors in British Columbia; and he does not have to go very far before he finds a liquor store, a vendor's establishment. We had one at New Westminster, but that was about eighteen miles from the border; it was not near enough. Although New Westmister is the first place of any consequence on the road from the border to Vancouver, the government, in order to help the poor individuals from the other side who might feel the necessity for liquor, put in another vendor's place on the south side of the New Westminster bridge, where there is no population at all. There are perhaps three or four houses in that neighhourhood; practically nobody lives there, and the only object of establishing a vendor's place at that point is to assist the government to sell liquor. The same applies all over the province. They have even put in vendor's places for the benefit of the Japanese and the Chinese; they have put in Japanese and Chinese wines and that kind of thing. They are doing business there for the purpose of making money, and they do not make any bones about it. They will sell to anyone any quantity of booze that he wants. I use the word "booze" advisedly, because I understand it is a good old English word which has been in use for many centuries. So far as I know, there is not in British Columbia, as there is in Quebec, any restriction upon the quantity of liquor that a person may buy. But I do know that out there, through the vendors, they sell liquor to individuals in such large quantities that the vendor, and the government through the vendor, must know that that liquor could not be consumed by the individual himself. After the poor man buys the liquor and disposes of it—because a great part of the liquor that is bootlegged in British Columbia is sold to the bootleggers by the government itself—after the poor man gets rid of some of this liquor in an effort to get his money back, he is summoned before the court and sent to gaol, unless he has a pull with somebody. I know of one case in my constituency where a poor fisherman was given, out of the liquor vendor's store in New Westminster, 120 dozen bottles of beer in a very few weeks. It was not sent to the man's residence, because his wife would not have allowed it to be there.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I do not like to interrupt my hon. friend, but really this has no bearing on the bill that we are now considering.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I submit it has a bearing.

Mr. GRAHAM: Was the amendment put, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN: No; the amendment moved by the hon. gentleman is in reference to clause 5. At present we have reached paragraph (c) of subsection 2. An amendment has been moved by Mr. Stewart (Argenteuil), and that amendment is now before the committee. The point has not been reached where the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) could submit his amendment.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The passing of this legislation cannot by any possible stretch of imagination be said to be assisting the cause of temperance. This poor man to whom I referred had the liquor sent to a place in the business section of the town, where he was running an alleged club.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member must know that he has been out of order regularly and continuously this afternoon in going into individual cases in very great detail. Where he discusses the general principle of the importation or the restriction of importation, he is quite in order, but he must know that he is not in order in going into minute details of individual cases.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I have always understood that details are what are required; when you deal in generalities you are open to censure. However, if details are ruled out, I have to bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman. But I would say this: So far as temperance is concerned, you can forget it when you go to British Columbia. I do not know how it is in Quebec, but I see that they do sell liquor in places like Hull, and it does not seem very hard to get it over here in Ontario no matter where you go. But when you think about temperance, do not think about British Columbia. Some of the Liberal papers have called British Columbia the "bootleggers' paradise", but I do not see why it should be a bootleggers' paradise when you can buy all you want in the government stores—wine, beer or anything else. All you need is a permit, which you can get on the payment of a small fee; then you can buy what you like.

What good is this bill going to do? If the Attorney General of British Columbia wanted to stop the business of the liquor warehouses, all he had to do was to proceed as was done in Alberta and refuse to consent to the issue of licenses to those warehouses. Did the Attorney General of British Columbia do that? The minister knows that he did not. The return brought down shows that he consented not only to the renewal of old licenses, but to the issue of new ones. The minister knows also that a great many of these export licenses were issued to places where legitimate export could not have been carried on and could not have been expected to be carried on. There is no doubt about that.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Is my hon. friend in favour of export licenses?

Mr. McQUARRIE: I submit, Mr. Chairman, that my own opinion has nothing to do with it. I am trying to reflect the views of my constituents as I find them, namely, that the administration of the liquor law in British Columbia is rotten, and we do not want to give to that government—

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Do my hon. friend's constituents desire the continuance of these liquor warehouses in British Columbia?

Mr. McQUARRIE: My constituents are in favour of the importation of liquor by individuals rather than the confining of importation to the government under the present circumstances. They do not feel that this government should be given any further chance to debauch the public. That is about the size of it. The question of whether there shall be liquor warehouses or not would be disposed of if this bill were for the purpose of making it impossible for liquor warehouse licenses to be issued. Then I think I would be in favour of it.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: You are not sure?

Mr. McQUARRIE: Absolutely in favour of it. But the question is not whether they shall be done away with or not, but whether the provincial government shall be given authority to say whether they shall be done away with, and whether they shall have the right to issue liquor licenses to their friends and keep others from getting them. I submit that this is a serious matter and one that should be very carefully considered. The liberty of the subject should not be unduly interfered with without giving the people a chance to say whether they desire such legislation or not. The amendment which I have suggested is simply to the effect that there shall be a referendum, and if the province really wants to get rid of these liquor warehouses, all it will have to do will be to ask for a referendum, when the people of British Columbia will have the right to say whether or not importation into the province shall be prohibited. Personally, this does not make any difference to me. I am not here representing any liquor concern; I am not interested in any liquor or beer concern either directly or indirectly. I do not use liquor at all, and have not done so for many years.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Chief Electoral Officer certificate of the election and return of Edward Nicholas Hopkins, Esquire, for the Electoral District of Moose Jaw.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

CHANGE IN MEMBERSHIP OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. J. FRED JOHNSTON (Last Mountain) moved:

That the name of Mr. A. M. Carmichael be taken from the list of members comprising the special committee appointed to inquire into the operation of the Civil Service Act, and that the name of Mr. A. J. Lewis be inserted in lieu thereof.

Mr. SPEAKER: The custom is that such motions are generally made by the leader of the House. I do not, however, see that there is any objection to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no objection.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SALES TAX

Mr. SPENCER:

1. What is the amount of revenue collected from the sales tax and other war taxes in the province of Alberta for the past three years?
2. What is the cost of collecting same for each of the three years?

Hon. Mr. COPP:

Department of Customs and Excise—Revenue collected from Sales tax and "other excise taxes" in the province of Alberta during the fiscal years ended March 31, 1921, 1922 and 1923.

1.

Fiscal Year	Sales Tax	Other Excise Taxes
1921	$ 778,841.08	$1,216,370.08
1922	1,275,984.48	201,271.62
1923	1,814,623.91	409,550.73

2. Information not available as collections are made by customs excise officers who collect customs and excise duties and perform other work.

Department of Finance—

1. The special war taxes on trust and loan company income, insurance premiums (other than life) and bank note circulation, are paid to the Department of Finance and Insurance from the head offices of the corporations concerned, and no compilation is made of the amount of taxes paid from different provinces, nor is information returned upon which the amount of taxes paid in respect of income derived from the several provinces could be established.

2. The administration of the taxes does not involve the maintenance of special staff for the purpose. The cost is not separable, therefore, from the general expenses of the departments.

VERMILION, ALBERTA

Mr. SPENCER:

1. What sum does the lessee pay the Dominion government for the use of lots 31 and 32, block 8, town of Vermilion, Alberta?

CANADA SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the House do to-morrow go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend section 487 of the Canada Shipping Act, chapter 113 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, by providing that a master or mate upon application as therein provided may, if his application be approved by the pilotage authority, be thereupon examined, and if found competent, a pilotage certificate may be granted to him.

He said: The subject matter of this resolution having been communicated to His Excellency the Governor General, he has been pleased to give his assent thereto.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN AIR FORCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. LUCAS: Has the government any information that there have been three desertions from the Canadian Air Force at Camp Borden within the last few weeks and that eight of the best technical men have, made urgent demands for their discharge? Is this true and if so, what does the government intend to do in regard to the situation?

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Acting Minister of National Defence): I am obliged to the hon. gentleman for calling our attention to this matter. I will make inquiry as to the report to which he refers and will give a reply later.

U.S. LABOUR DELEGATES DETAINED

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil: I have no answer from our port officer at McAdam Junction.

CUSTOMS OFFICER AT NEW YORK

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. LADNER: May I ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) whether or not he has come to a decision in respect to the question of the customs officer at New York? In the Vancouver Sun of April 27, there appears an interview in which he is reported as saying:

It is sheer nonsense to collect duty on steel shipped from Nova Scotia to British Columbia via Panama canal.

Then the Prime Minister continues:

I am in favour of some system being devised by the Customs department to provide for bonding through Canadian goods which are carried by an all-water route.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that as the Order of the Day has already provided for an answer to a question put by himself, his speech now is out of order. Besides, if my memory serves me right, a categorical answer was given by the Minister of Customs a few days ago on this very same subject.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT AMENDMENT

House again in committee on Bill No. 43, to amend the Canada Temperance Act, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Importation of intoxicating liquor prohibited:

The CHAIRMAN: An amendment has been moved that paragraphs (c) and (d) of subsection 2 of section 1 be struck out and the following two paragraphs be added as paragraphs (c) and (d) respectively:

(c) The importation of intoxicating liquor into a province by any person duly licensed by the government of Canada to carry on the business or trade of a distiller, where the intoxicating liquor so imported is imported solely for the purpose of being used for blending with or flavouring the products of the business or trade of a distiller carried on by him in the province and while kept by him in the province is kept in a place or warehouse which conforms in all respects to the requirements of the law governing such places or warehouses and is used solely for blending with or flavouring the products of his said business or trade as a distiller; or

(d) The importation of intoxicating liquor into a province by a person engaged in and carrying on the business of exporting intoxicating liquor from that province, where the intoxicating liquor so imported is imported solely for the purpose of his export business and while kept by him in the province, is kept in a liquor warehouse which conforms in all respects to the requirements of the law governing such warehouses, and when sold or disposed of by him is actually exported from that province:

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The bill before the committee consists of a single section the adoption of which carries the bill; and the amendment that has been moved will in effect put into force in British Columbia what is known as the Doherty Act without consulting the electors of the province. The provisions of that act will affect everybody in British Columbia except the liquor commission, or as that body is more properly described, in British Columbia the Liquor Control Board—control is the main object out there. Subsection (1) of section 1 is a "bone-dry" section except so far as the Liquor Control Board is concerned, and as a resident of British Columbia I protest against this legislation, as I am sure the great majority of the people of that province would protest against it if the question were submitted to them. Public opinion in British Columbia is decidedly against this legislation; I believe it is as totally averse to depriving individuals of the right to import for their own use, as it is to allowing private individuals to sell liquor in the province. And that opinion against any attempt to deprive private persons of the right to import liquor into the province is all the stronger after the people have observed the administration of the act under the Liquor Control Board during the past few years. I think that right of private individuals should be more jealously guarded. The Liquor Control Board is virtually the Attorney General of the province. The members of the board are mere figureheads; the Attorney General pulls the strings and they dance to his music. This legislation, is an infringement of public and private rights, rights which the people have never voted to have taken from them. It is not necessary in the interests of temperance, it is not necessary in the interests of moderation, to deprive the individual in British Columbia of the right to import liquor; nor is it needed to prevent that illicit sale, known as "bootlegging." This legislation is absolutely unnecessary for that purpose. To pretend that it is needed is merely to say what cannot be substantiated; any assertion of the kind is sheer pretence, a sham, a camouflage. I say, therefore, that if it is wise or fair or good legislation to allow the Attorney General of British Columbia by order in council to abolish the existing subsections (c) and (d), which constitute an exception to the bone-dry section 1, and to do so without consulting the wishes of the people of British Columbia, it is just as fair and wise to allow him to nullify the two other exceptions which allow the distillers to import for purposes of their business, and common carriers to convey liquor through the province. This legislation does not allow the Attorney General to nullify these two provisions, but it gives him power by order in council to do away with the provisions of paragraphs (c) and (d). It is just as reasonable to clothe the Attorney General with the same power in regard to all four exceptions as it is to allow him to exercise the power with reference to two of them without consulting the wishes of the people. To be consistent, why not give him power to alter the whole liquor system of the province of British Columbia by order in council? Why not allow him to nullify provisions (a) and (b), one of which allows importation into the province by the provincial government, while the other provides for the carriage of liquor through the province by common carriers? Why not give him the right to abolish these provisions at his will? It is manifestly unfair to let him interfere with either set of these provisions by order in council. This parliament has no mandate to confer any such power on the Attorney General of British Columbia. The provincial government and the Attorney General of the province have no mandate from the electors of the province to legislate them out of their present rights. Why therefore should this parliament at this time infringe upon those rights? What is the excuse, what is the necessity for it? Why clothe the attorney general with this extraordinary power?

In a prohibition province there must be a plebiscite before the Dominion government will apply the provisions of the Doherty Act. So why not a plebiscite for British Columbia, where there is much less likelihood of the people desiring what is virtually the Doherty Act than there is in the bone dry provinces. The Prohibition Act of British Columbia, which was administered most unsatisfactorily for a number of years, recognized the right of the private individual to import for export under license and for personal use. The Liquor Control Act under which we are now operating in British Columbia recognizes that right. The provincial government has never gone to the country either by plebiscite or referendum seeking the powers proposed to be conferred on them by this bill In effect the Minister of Justice is asking parliament to take away from the people of British Columbia rights which they did not give up and which there is no good reason why they should be deprived of at this time. Why not consult the people of British Columbia on this proposal, as was done when the plebiscite was taken in 1920, before depriving them of their undoubted constitutional rights?

To illustrate what I have said, in the 1920 plebiscite the questions put to the electors were two, and I do not think anyone can read into those questions and the answers to them any excuse for this legislation. The first question was: Are you in favour of continuing the present prohibition act? The second question was: Are you in favour of government control and sale of liquor in sealed packages? The answer to the first question was overwhelmingly "no", they did not want to continue the prohibition act; the answer to the second question was overwhelmingly "yes"; and the legislature legislated accordingly. There is absolutely nothing in these questions and answers authorizing the enactment of the legislation which the Minister of Justice now asks this House to pass.

I think it is an admitted fact that in a great measure the dissatisfaction prevailing in the United States to-day with regard to prohibition is because of the unfair way in which prohibition was put upon the people. They were not consulted, their rights were legislated away from them. And that is what we are trying to do to-day—to take away from the people of Britsh Columbia rights which they have never asked to be divested of. I cannot bring myself to believe that the Minister of Justice understood the conditions in British Columbia when he introduced this legislation or he would not seek to treat the people there so unfairly. There is no intimation from the people of British Columbia that they want this legislation. Why not be fair to them, why not give them a chance to say whether or not they want it? Are the people of British Columbia not to be trusted in regard to this question? Is their wish to be thrust aside to suit the whim of the Attorney General of that province to enhance his power? For that is all it amounts to. The Attorney General of British Columbia in asking for this legislation does not want moderation, he does not want prohibition; he simply wants power—power which the electorate of that province have never signified they wish him to be clothed with, and he has come to this parliament in this roundabout way to get this power over the heads of the people.

Hon. members opposite, particularly the right hon. Prime Minister, not so very long ago were prone to declaim against what they termed "government by order in council". When they were in opposition, less than two years ago, we heard a great deal against so-called government by order in council. Was there ever a more flagrant case of government by order in council than that sought to be created by this bill? The situation is this: There is legislation in operation in British Columbia regulating the liquor traffic, legislation passed and put in operation at the instance of the people of that province. Now, without consulting the people of the province, it is sought by this bill to empower the Attorney General of British Columbia by order in council, to completely change the effect of the liquor legislation now in operation in that province. If that is not government by order in council, then there never was an instance of it. It is government by order in council not only of the province but of the federal government; it is distinctly order in council government. I say we should not do it. I say the Minister of Justice should not ask the House to do it. I go further, I say it is the duty of the Minister of Justice to oppose the passage of legislation of this character. It is his duty to prevent it. It is not democratic, it is not fair to the people affected.

Now, what is the excuse for this extraordinary act on the part of the government? The ordinary excuse for government by order in council of recent times has been that there was a war on, or that the government was under the stress of re-establishment. Why this extraordinary measure now with no extraordinary circumstances to excuse it? It may be said there is a war on —a war against the bootleggers of British Columbia. But I tell this House that it is only a sham fight; there is no real war on there; and it is not necessary to enforce the present liquor law of British Columbia that this bill should be enacted.

Is the Attorney General of British Columbia, is the Liquor Control Board of that province, encouraging moderation in the use of liquor? I say, no—notoriously no. As the member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) said yesterday, so far as temperance goes in British Columbia "There is nothing doing in that quarter;" that is, in the vicinity of the Liquor Control Board and the Attorney General's office. What is happening? The Attorney General and the Liquor Control Board of British Columbia are actually booming the liquor trade, they are urging people to buy liquor and to drink it. Then they talk about wanting to enforce the liquor law! It was expected when this act was put in force in British Columbia that the government there would encourage moderation in the consumption of liquor. The old crusade against the bar had its merits and had its success in the fact that the bars tempted people to drink. The idea of the true moderationists in dealing with the bar was to remove this temptation, and they expected that by the government taking over the control and sale of liquor good liquor would be made available to the people in moderate quantities at moderate prices. They never contemplated that the Lipuor Control Board should by a campaign of liquor advertising flaunt their favoured brands in flaring advertisements before the public throughout that province as they are doing to-day. Why, you would think there was a Victory bond sale going on out there, from the way the Liquor Control Board are advertising different brands of liquor. Every billboard in the country is filled up with that kind of advertising, to say nothing of newspapers—and yet they talk about moderation. The moderationists of British Columbia never supposed that there would be competition between Government liquor shops as there actually is to-day. Can you imagine competition for trade between vendors in the respective government liquor shops? Can you imagine them persuading people to buy at their particular shop so that they would make records for big sales and in that way curry favour with their employers? Is that moderation? That is the sort of liquor board that this House is asked to encourage and give more power to. I say they are not fit to be entrusted with that power, but apart altogether from that, I say the people of British Columbia do not want it. The people never expected this when they voted for what was called the moderation act in British Columbia. They never expected that when reputable, old, established distilling concerns from the Old Country offered their goods for sale to the British Columbia Control Board they would find it necessary, in order to make a sale, to appoint as their agents ward officers of city Liberal associations, thereby greatly increasing the price to the public. The moderationists of British Columbia, I say, did not expect that, but that is what has been done and is being done to-day, and that is one reason why this House should not force the people of British Columbia to buy liquor from such vendors exclusively.

Now, let me say a word about the price of liquor in British Columbia. The Whiskey Association of Great Britain comprises practically all the largest and best distillers in the United Kingdom. They have a minimum price for export of 55 shillings per case. They will not ship for less; anything cheaper is green whiskey and not fit for use. Fifty-five shillings at 23 cents would amount to 12.65 f.o.b. United Kingdom. Freight, insurance and charges to Vancouver would amount to $1; duty on whiskey, $10 per proof gallon, 2 gallons per case at 25 under proof; duty on whiskey; duty on glass, and Dominion sales tax adds $21 per case, which makes the landed cost of the whiskey in Vancouver $34.65 a case. What does the government charge the public for that whiskey? They charge $54 a case, making a profit of $19.35 a case. Is it any wonder that the bootlegger can do business successfully in competition with prices like that? I ask the government and I ask this committee, is it fair to prevent individuals from importing for their own use when they can bring the goods in at $34.65 a case and the government charges $54? That is another sample of the way the liquor business is handled in British Columbia. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) yesterday, and the hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie), referred to a local wine company there, known as the California Wine Company. There is a fine old port, product of Spain, called Convido port, black label, white letters. This local wine company copied the label and called it "Bonvido Fine Old Port." They sold it over the counter in the government shops as fine old port, and it was proved that the material in these bottles was nothing but loganberry juice and some truck brought up in mats and casks from California. In one instance an order went in to the wine company for 55 cases and the answer was, "We have not any on hand, but we will make some up for the morning,"—"fine old port" made overnight! These are the people that this House would force the consumers of British Columbia to deal with. But that is not all. Let me tell the committee something about the method employed by the Liquor Control Board in handling whiskey in British Columbia. The board purchased 1,690 cases of Roderick Dhu whiskey, 1,350 cases of Royal Stuart Scotch, 1,900 cases of Balmoral Scotch and 2,000 cases of Milburn Scotch—all cheap, inferior whiskey—and other odds and ends, amounting to something over 7,000 cases. What was done with that stuff? It was so bad that they did not dare to put it on the government shelves for sale; nobody would buy it. Well, the corks were drawn and the whole was mixed with prune juice and other ingredients in a big vat. A high voltage electrical device was employed and the stuff "aged" on the spot, was rebottled and sold at $3.50 a quart, at the government shops labelled, "L. C. B."—Liquor Control Board. That is the sort of stuff this legislation would compel the people of British Columbia to buy. I am sure the Minister of Justice did not realize what he was doing when he introduced this legislation. These facts were brought out before the public accounts committee of the Legislature of British Columbia. The stuff the Liquor Control Board of British Columbia sells reminds me of a story told of a certain saloon in Dawson City in the old days. It had a sawdust floor; many of them had, but in this saloon when they sold a man a glass of whiskey they handed him a whisk broom—that was to brush the sawdust off himself when he came to. Well, the Liquor Control Board of British Columbia does not even supply a whisk broom. If the Liquor Control Board handles wine and whiskey like that while people who know enough or have money enough to do so import for their own use, what will they not do when you give them the monopoly this legislation creates and force people to buy from them exclusively?

Under the law as it is at present in British Columbia the individual who imports for his own use is taxed by the British Columbia government the amount of profit the government would have made had the government sold him the liquor, so the government loses nothing on the transaction. It is not in competition with the government, but by importing it personally the importer is sure of the quality and does not take the fearful risk of having the liquor doctored up as I have described. Do you think it is fair to prevent him from importing his own liquor when he would otherwise have to buy stuff like that? There is no bootlegging in British Columbia by private importers. Any bootlegging that is done there can easily be controlled by the Attorney General of the province with the legal machinery he already has. I leave it to the Minister of Justice or to any member of the committee: would he want to buy liquor from a dealer who does as I have described? Would he feel safe? The Minister of Justice said yesterday that the reason for this legislation was a desire to stop bootlegging. I can tell him and tell the House that this legislation is not needed to stop bootlegging in British Columbia; bootlegging can be stopped by the bona fide prosecution of the bootlegger and lawbreaker and by discontinuing the present practice of playing politics with the liquor business. Just as soon as they stop that they can stop bootlegging, but you cannot mix up politics and the selling of liquor and have good law or good liquor. Bootlegging could be stopped by the government in this way, by importing and selling only good liquors at a fair price. What bootlegger could successfully compete with the government, buying on the wholesale scale that the government does and with the facilities it has for handling the goods? You might find an odd tramp walking about the streets with a flask in his hip pocket and selling a drink here and there for twenty-five cents, but that is a mere drop in the bucket. The Attorney General could stop the real bootlegging if he wanted to.

As I said at the outset, the design of this legislation is not to stop bootlegging or to further moderation or temperance in the consumption of liquor. It is merely designed to give the Attorney General of British Columbia more power. The export warehouses are absolutely under the control of the government and can be checked up for every quart of liquor they handle. They can easily be put out of business by prosecution if they violate the law. It is alleged, I understand, by the Attorney General of British Columbia that these export and import warehouses are the cause of bootlegging. Well, he has them right under his hand at the present time and does not need this legislation to control them. The object of this legislation, I repeat, is to give the Control Board more power to force their spurious liquors upon the people of British Columbia. I must oppose this bill and I ask the government and the House not to force this legislation on the people of British Columbia without first consulting their wishes in the regular and constitutional way. Surely it is not too much to ask them whether they want it or not. The House has nothing to indicate that they want it except the word of the Attorney General who gives a reason that is not sound at all. If the bill had the sanction of the people of British Columbia or of the majority I would not question it for one moment; but it has not; it is unfair to them, and in my opinion should not go through.

I would like the House to observe that the effect of this bill when it is passed is to leave things just exactly as they are so far as the state of law and the administration of the law is concerned, but it does this; it gives the Attorney General of British Columbia the power to change it at his will. He need not necessarily change it, but he has the power there for control. If the bill came out-and-out in a manly way and said, this will be the law or that will be the law, the House might very well pass judgment upon it, but why give the Attorney General of British Columbia this discretionary power to squeeze these people or not as he sees fit. I say that it is not wise legislation, and I hope that the government will not force it through.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I have gathered from the remarks of the hon. members who spoke yesterday and the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Black) that there is opposition to the licenses granted to exporters in British Columbia,—they all seem to agree on that point; and further that there is really some bootlegging going on in British Columbia, and they all seem to be of opinion that a stop should be put to that traffic. The objection was offered yesterday by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) that the bill as we have introduced it was not in conformity with the resolution adopted by the legislature of British Columbia, and he added that it was not necessary to legislate to prohibit the importation of intoxicating liquors because already the province had the right to do so. He cited the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice to that effect. Hon members will remember that yesterday in closing my remarks I said that if it was the wish of the hon. members for British Columbia that we should drop subsection (d), that is to say, make no exception in favour of the exporters, I was disposed to discuss that point. I would like to make my position in this matter as clear as possible. My predecessor, that is to say the hon. ex-Solicitor General, Mr. McKenzie, who drafted this bill and introduced it, had in his hands at the time a resolution which was adopted by the legislature of British Columbia in the month of December, 1922. That resolution reads as follows:

> Whereas a plebiscite was taken in the province of British Columbia in October, 1920, on the following question:—
> Which do you Prefer?
> (1) The present "Prohibition Act", or
> (2) An Act to provide for government control and sale in sealed packages of spirituous and malt liquors?
>
> And whereas the vote was strongly in favour of government control and sale:
>
> And whereas as a result of the said plebiscite there was passed by the legislature of this province the "Government Liquor Act";
>
> And whereas eighteen months of administration under that act has demonstrated the necessity for the prohibition of the importation of liquor into this province by other than the provincial government in order to accomplish the effective working of the said Act;
> And whereas federal legislation to that end was sought at the meeting of the federal parliament in the spring of 1922, and the said proposed legislation met with the unanimous approval of the House of Commons, but was defeated in the Senate at the close of its session when many Senators were not present;

And whereas it is desirable that this province again seek the enactment of the proposed legislation;

Therefore be it resolved, that the federal parliament be requested at its next sittings to enact legislation providing for the prohibition of the importation of intoxicating liquor into British Columbia for use therein except by the provincial government; such legislation to be for the purpose of supplementing and giving effect to the aforementioned "Government Liquor Act" and to be contingent upon and to exist only during its continuance;

And be it further resolved, that an humble address be presented to His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, praying that he will cause a copy of the preamble and resolution hereinbefore set out to be transmitted to the Hon. the Secretary of State at Ottawa.

So, there was a plebiscite held in the province of British Columbia through which the electors by a very large majority declared themselves in favour of the sale of liquor by the government. Last year the government of British Columbia came to this parliament and asked that we should legislate to prohibit the importation of liquor. This bill of ours was passed unanimously by this House, but defeated by the Senate. It is after that refusal of the Senate to accept such legislation that the legislature of British Columbia unanimously, I understand, by a large majority anyhow—

Mr. STEVENS: By a majority.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: —requested the government to legislate so that in the future importation of liquor into British Columbia should not be allowed except by the government of the province. The hon. Solicitor General has introduced the bill that you have before you, Mr. Chairman. By that bill it is provided that in principle the importation of intoxicating liquors is prohibited. An exception is made for the government. Another exception was made for the exporters for their trade. They were allowed to import only for their trade of exportation. Since the second reading of the bill was adopted by this House I proposed myself that an addition should be made to the exception, to the effect that this should not apply to distillers in the province of British Columbia. Now, I gather from this debate that the hon. members for British Columbia object to exporters being allowed to continue their trade. Hon. members are very much opposed and rightly so, to the bootlegging that is going on in that province. There is a proviso by virtue of which the government would have power to permit such exporters to continue their trade, or to refuse such authorization, and the great objection is that we should not give to a province such a right to legislate, as they say, by order in council.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister permit me to interrupt him. To make complete the objections he is reciting, we object and we claim that the Attorney General in conjunction with the proper officer of this government has that power now just as completely as this bill gives it to him. Secondly we claim that by this bill this parliament is foregoing its rights, transferring its rights into the hands of the Attorney General, without definitely stating that the importation will cease.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I was going to say to the hon. member that we do not intend to transfer that right to the Attorney General. The hon. member concluded his remarks yesterday by saying: "Well, I will not oppose the legislation" I understood that he was disposed to vote in its favour; but even with that declaration of his I want to try and satisfy all my hon. friends opposite and the people of British Columbia in this matter. I come here in all sincerity and I want to make the legislation I offer workable. There was a plebiscite in the province of British Columbia when the people, by a large majority, declared that they favoured a system of control by the government. This was supplemented by a resolution in the legislature of that province by which it is asked that we should now proceed to prohibit the importation of liquors and allow it only in favour of the government. The legislation which is before you, Mr. Chairman, is to that effect but I want to try to make its purpose as clear as possible. My hon. friends opposite object to the proviso that they found in the first, and second draughts. I am prepared to drop it. My hon. friends object also to licenses to exporters. Well, I am prepared to drop that. Now, my hon. friends cannot refuse to vote in support of the prohibition of importation except in favour of the government, because the people have already voted on the plebiscite and the legislature has requested this government to legislate in that direction. We make an exception for the manufacturers—that is to say the distillers and the brewers—and this exception is nothing but the general law for the provinces where you have prohibition. As all will remember, in the provinces where prohibition was adopted by the people and ratified by the executive, there is an exception in favour of manufacturers and brewers. The exception that you will find in the amendment that you have to consider is about what you find in that proviso of the law of 1919. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, with your permission and the permission of hon. members, I would ask to be permitted to strike out from the amendment that I have suggested the last part of that amendment. My amendment would read as follows:

That paragraph (c) of subsection 2 of section 163 be struck out and replaced by the following:

(c) The importation of intoxicating liquor into the province by any person duly licensed by the government of Canada to carry on the business or trade of a distiller or brewer where the intoxicating liquor so imported is imported solely for the purpose of blending with or flavouring the products of the business or trade of a distiller or brewer carried on by him in the province and while kept by him in the province is kept in a place or warehouse which conforms in all respects to the requirements of the law governing such places or warehouses and is used solely for blending with or flavouring the products of his said business or trade as a distiller or brewer.

That will be the only exception and without any discretion to the Attorney General or to the executive. With this amendment it seems to me that the measure should be accepted by hon. members.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand from the minister that it is the proviso he is dropping?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The proviso in the second paragraph of page 2, but still sub-section 5 applies.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: And when it is applied there will be two exceptions, one in favour of the government and one in favour of the distillers. As long as it is applied under the disposition of subsection 5 it is the law of the day, and under such law the distillers and brewers have this right. So that whenever you apply this bill you can do it only by preserving the exception in favour of the distillers and brewers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But the whole act goes into effect by the will of the Lieutenant Governor in Council. In that regard I would like to impress an argument on the minister and see whether it has any effect upon him or not. I approach it this way: Constitutionally there are certain important powers that are exclusively the possession of the provinces. There are other important powers exclusively the possession of the Dominion. It is admitted that the sovereign jurisdiction of the provinces in respect of theirs is on a level with the sovereign jurisdiction of the Dominion in respect of ours. It is also admitted that there can be no assignment from one to the other; from the Dominion to a province, or from the province to a Dominion, of any powers. That either must act, not only in spirit but in letter, up to those requirements, those constitutional requirements. The Doherty Act provided another method, if I may so describe it, of giving what are Dominion powers to a province. It gives the Dominion powers to a province in this way and subject to these precautions: The Doherty Act says that in every province which has a law living up to certain definite requirements of prohibition there shall be certain provisions of a federal act applied, the provisions being the prevention of importation with certain exceptions. The precautions are these: That first of all a majority of the legislature shall petition to have the federal act applied thereby bringing into effect within the province alone a federal law arising out of exclusively federal jurisdiction. That is the first precaution that the Doherty Act provides. Now, it provides a second precaution of very great importance: That notwithstanding the fact that a majority of the legislature petitions—what the legislature petitions for, indeed, is the plebiscite indicating the will first of the legislature — notwithstanding that, and in addition to that, the people of the province themselves shall vote and, by a majority, shall declare their will that such federal law arising out of federal jurisdiction shall apply. Those precautions are very great safeguards. Undoubtedly it would never be sound and never be for the public good that the Dominion parliament should consent to bestow upon a province the right to call into effect federal law, except with such safeguards. The minister goes much further than that in this bill, and it seems to me, though he may argue that it is not of vital or sweeping consequences, that he establishes a precedent that may be dangerous. He seeks now to bring into effect in a province a federal measure with none of these precautions, none of those safeguards at all. This is a federal measure, and its provisions may be called into effect in a province by the mere fiat of a lieutenant governor in council. I ask hon. members to remember that this bill is general and applies everywhere. The minister speaks of British Columbia; but whenever another province comes into the position of British Columbia, the bill will apply in that province. The minister says that in British Columbia the legislature has voted a resolution asking for such a bill. Very good. Another legislature may not do so; but the lieutenant governor in council at that time may nevertheless call this bill into effect or call it out of effect. Therefore, while the minister can plead the resolution of a legislature in this case, he can plead it only as applicable to the individual instance, and it in no way justifies the generality of his bill.

4 p.m.

Next, he has not the safeguard that the majority of the people in that province must want this legislation. The legislature need take no responsibility as it has to in the case of legislation within its powers. It is not necessary, as a safeguard to this legislation going into effect, that the people must want this measure. A mere lieutenant governor in council may call this bill in effect in any province which has given to it government control over the sale of liquor, a power to sell liquor in that province. Surely the minister is going a very grave length from the constitutional standpoint, and a length that, it seems to me, is going to get this parliament into difficulties later on. Even in the present case he cannot plead the plebiscite in British Columbia. But if he could plead it, that would not answer to the charge I make against his bill, because his bill is general and it will apply in the future just as well as now, when possibly British Columbia will not want at all what it voted for two or three years ago. It may not want now what it voted for two or three years ago; but it will have to take it, if the Lieutenant Governor in Council says so, and the legislature will have no power to veto it.

I started out a moment ago to say that even in this case, the minister cannot plead the plebiscite of British Columbia. British Columbia never by any vote voted for such legislation to be in effect, as the Lieutenant Governor in Council can put it into effect if this bill passes. What did the people of British Columbia vote for? Presumably knowing the jurisdiction of their legislature, the limits of that jurisdiction, they voted to endow that legislature with control of the sale of liquor, that is, with power to sell liquor through a government institution. When they voted for that, they knew that if the legislature followed the vote of the majority, nevertheless there would be the right to import for private use. They knew that, so presumably they voted that the power of the legislature and its exercise should be concurrent with the right of importation. The minister could not say nay to that contention.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: What about the resolution of the legislature?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am dealing with the people now. The minister should have interrupted me when I was dealing with the resolution. I will come to the resolution later if the minister wants me to refer to it again.

[Mr. Meighen.]

He cannot plead the vote of the people. The people voted just the other way; they voted that the legislature might establish, and they willed that it should establish, a board for the sale of liquor within the province. They voted, knowing that such institution and the operation of that institution would be concurrent with the right of private importation for private use. The minister is putting it within the power of their government, without recourse to the people at all, to impose upon the people something which they did not vote for, and which presumably they voted against.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I cannot accept the "presumably," because the question was only whether they were in favour of prohibition or in favour of control by the government. There was no question of importation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was the question of importation, for this reason. They voted for control by the government, for the government having the right itself to sell liquor in sealed packages; that is to say, government control, government monopoly within the province over the sale of liquor in sealed packages. But they voted, presumably knowing—and that is why I used the word "presumably"—that while such legislation was going into effect, they would have the right, not to sell, but to import for private use. Consequently the people must be presumed to have voted against the prevention of importation for private use. The minister is putting it within the power of the government of that province to put precisely the opposite into effect, that precisely opposite law being a law that can derive force only from enactment by the parliament of Canada.

I have covered both phases of the argument. The minister sweeps aside the safeguards that all along have been provided, where what is exclusively federal power is put into the hands of a province, and he passes a general law which will enable the lieutenant governor of any province, under certain conditions, to put into effect in that province legislation which is federal legislation, irrespective wholly of the will of the people of that province. The minister says that he is justified because of the resolution. I answer him again that he can plead that for the present the Legislature of British Columbia wants this bill. I may be making too sweeping a statement in his favour, because I have not heard the whole of the debate; but so far as I have heard it, he can plead for the present that the legislature of British Columbia wants this bill. He cannot plead that the people do; he has not the slightest ground to argue that the people do. Every circumstance, every fact we know argues that the people do not want it. He can, however, argue that the legislature at the present time wants this bill, or it did last December. But I tell the minister again that he is passing a law that will enable the provincial government, no matter what the people may want, to bring into effect a federal law wholly against the will of the legislature and of the people.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: They have the power to change it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But is it right, sound, or for the public good, that a federal law, a law that derives force wholly from enactment by this parliament, should be allowed to be put into effect by order in council in a province irrespective altogether of the will of the people or of the legislature, and to say in effect, for four years or until some other lieutenant governor, notwithstanding any vote of the people, may choose to wipe it away? I am presenting the case from the constitutional standpoint to the minister, and I venture to say, if the minister had taken it into his own hands and reviewed this phase of it, then, as a result of conditions that I have presented to him now, and that would have arisen to his mind he would have never made himself the party chiefly responsible for legislation of this character.

Mr. McBRIDE: In rising to say a few words on the question before the committee, I should like to assure the Minister of Justice that British Columbia is not entirely represented in the section of the House, to my right. We members here do not want to occupy the time of the House for hours talking politics, nor to influence the vote that will be taken in Manitoba this summer. The right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) has been referring to British Columbia and telling the House what the people want out there. I want that hon. gentleman to understand that I represent over one-third of British Columbia, and was sent here by a majority of over 3,200 in excess of the man who ran to support the hon. leader of the Opposition, and I say that the people of the province of British Columbia do want the act that is proposed, and say it without hesitation. It has been repeatedly stated here that the whiskey in British Columbia is no good, and hon. gentlemen refer to it as "prune juice". Two hon. members yesterday afternoon said that they had not known the taste of whiskey for quite a long time. Well, I do know the taste of whiskey, and I am here to say that since the act passed in British Columbia I have got no bad whiskey from the Liquor Control Board of the province. I have never had a drink of poor whiskey from that source yet, and I have taken enough of it to know the difference between good and bad. I can assure the committee that the government in British Columbia is asking for the act; the government desires to get this control. A plebiscite was voted upon by the people of the province and was carried by a majority of nearly 35,000. The people of that province requested the present government to take control of the liquor of British Columbia, and that same government is in power yet. The government feel that they cannot control the liquor situation properly under the present act and they come to this parliament and ask to be given further power. Is that unreasonable? I think that the government of British Columbia are entitled to it.

A great deal of insinuation has been cast at the Attorney General of the province of British Columbia, as well as other members of the local government. I think it should be beneath any member of this House to say a word or cast any insinuation against any member of another legislative body, nor do I think that it becomes any of us to speak disparagingly of those persons who represent the people of the province of British Columbia.

Mr. GAUVREAU: That is a good lesson.

Mr. McBRIDE: Those gentlemen are not here to defend themselves, and hon. gentlemen in this chamber should bear in mind that if they are to carry the dignity of members of parliament it behooves them to let others alone. Let hon. gentlemen here look after their own affairs. Now, a great deal has been said about the influence that government control is having in British Columbia. One hon. gentleman yesterday wanted to read a whole front page of a newspaper in regard to the matter. I am not going to do that, but I desire to make a few statements in reference to the effect that prohibition has had and is having on some people; it may be interesting for us to know the facts. There is one district in the United States, not a very large district either, where in twelve months 9,401 illicit stills were seized. To carry the whiskey from these stills to the consumers there were in use 309 automobiles, 60 rigs and 93 horses, all of which were seized. These conveyances were carrying the product of these stills around the country. With what effect? In twelve days 103 persons lost their lives through this moonshine that came from these stills, and there were 37 cold-blooded murders in one city on the other side of the international line.

One prominent public man, speaking in reference to prohibition had this to say:

It is making law-breakers of a large portion of the population, and is helping to create a nation of liars, sneaks and hypocrites.

I think the government is to be congratulated on bringing this bill forward, and I, as one member representing British Columbia here, trust that the Minister of Justice will see that it is carried out as he has submitted it.

Mr. McQUARRIE: We have been dealing with bootlegging in British Columbia. As I understand it, the decapitated bill will be directed against bootleggers there. I would ask the Minister of Justice whether there is any bootlegging in the province of Quebec?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I do not think the question is relevant.

Mr. GAUVREAU: What has Quebec to do with you? Stick to your own province; we have had enough of you.

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: It has been moved by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQparrie) that subsection 5 be struck out and the following be inserted in lieu thereof:

5a. Upon receipt by the Secretary of State of Canada of a duly certified copy of an order of the Lieutenant Governor in Council of any province in which there is at any time in force a law vesting in His Majesty or the executive government of the province authority for the control and sale of intoxicating liquor in the province or in any board, commission, officer, or other governmental agency, the right of selling intoxicating liquor in the province requesting that the votes of the electors may be taken for or against the following prohibition, that is to say:

"That the importation and the bringing of intoxicating liquors into such province may be forbidden."

The Governor in Council shall proceed to take a vote on such question in the manner provided in section 152, and the provisions of sections 152 and 152A and 153 shall as far as applicable mutatis mutandis apply to the taking of such vote.

5b. If the prohibition is declared to be in force, the Governor in Council may by proclamation published in the Canada Gazette declare the prohibitions of subsection 1 of this section in that province, and the same shall thereupon be and continue in force therein.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Chairman, before the bill is reported I would call the minister's attention to the wording of clause (b) of subsection 2:

The carriage or transportation of intoxicating liquor into and through a province by means only of a common carrier by water or by railway, if, during the time the intoxicating liquor is being so carried or transported, the package or vessel containing the intoxicating liquor is not opened or broken or any of the intoxicating liquor drunk or used therefrom; or,

Why cut out the motor truck? Is it intended?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: It is intended.

Bill as amended, reported, read the third time and passed.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil, Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization) moved the second reading of Bill No. 136, to amend the Immigration Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 1—Enemy aliens:

Mr. JACOBS: Will the minister give us an explanation of this clause?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is simply to conform with our regulations.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Deported conspirators:

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister explain the significance of this clause?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is simply striking out the addition that was made to the act during the war period. It seems superfluous to retain the addition now.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Certain persons to be deemed to belong to the prohibited or undesirable classes:

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Old section 41 was amended in 1919 by adding a new clause embodying numerous reasons why people could be apprehended and sent out of the country by the Minister of Immigration. It has been taken exception to by a great many people and I thought it well to revert to the old section. Therefore section 3 follows the wording of section 41 prior to amendment at that time.

Mr. CARROLL: Has any outside influence been brought to bear upon the minister to have this amendment made?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, I would not say that; but it does seem to give rather drastic power to the minister, a power that I think in most cases could very well be exercised by the courts. Of course, it may be said that an individual who has not established his domicile in Canada should be absolutely under the control of the Department of Immigration by reason of anything he may have done prior to his entry here, but the department still has very considerable power over such an individual and it was felt that perhaps the courts could deal with cases of this kind.

Mr. ARTHURS: In view of the fact that section 2 is repealed, which dealt with persons who were or might be regarded as dangerous or hostile to the Allied cause during the war, why should section 3 be continued? For instance, if a soap box orator is arrested he may be deported next day.

Mr. McMURRAY: Apparently section 3 is a mere repetition of the provisions contained in the old section, which enumerates in detail those who are deemed to belong to the prohibited classes. Why does the minister re-enact this section?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend will notice that some of the more rigid clauses of section 41 of chapter 26 are not contained in the section as it stood before the amendment of 1919. For example:

> Every person who by word or act in Canada seeks to overthrow by force or violence the government of or constituted law and authority in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or Canada, or any of the provinces of Canada, or the government of any other of His Majesty's dominions, colonies, possessions or dependencies, or advocates the assassination of any official of any of the said governments or of any foreign government, or who in Canada defends or suggests the unlawful destruction of property or by word or act creates or attempts to create any riot or public disorder in Canada, or who without lawful authority assumes any powers of government in Canada or in any part thereof, or who by common repute belongs to or is suspected of belonging to any secret society or organization.

That comes out; it is not in section 41 of the amended act. Then, coming down to the last part of the old section, these words are omitted:

> Provided that this section shall not apply to any person who is a British subject, either by reason of birth in Canada, or by reason of naturalization in Canada.

Otherwise the new section 41 is practically the same as the old one. It looked like rather a wide power to put in the hands of any individual, to deport a man on the ground of common repute. I think all the power that any minister requires is contained in the new section 41.

Mr. ARTHURS: Why are the words "Canadian citizen" used in this bill? According to the Naturalization Act we are all British citizens, are we not?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I presume my hon. friend is right, but I simply copied section 41 as it stood prior to the amendment.

Mr. ARTHURS: Why copy it.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Because I think it covers every contingency that might arise in connection with which the minister would desire to have authority for the purposes of deportation.

Mr. JACOBS: I can foresee a case, if it were made wider, where a British citizen from India might advocate the overthrow of the Empire, and so on, and we would not be able to have him deported.

Mr. McMURRAY: I cannot let this clause pass without challenging at least a portion of it. Sections 40 and 41 set forth those who are not desirable as Canadian citizens and who can be deported on account of their misdemeanors, and so on. Section 41 as set out in the bill distinctly provides that—

> Any person. . . . who shall by word or act create or attempt to create riot or public disorder in Canada—shall be classed as undesirable. In the enforcement of this act, therefore, a British citizen who has been in Canada for less than five years can be deported by an immigration official. The definition of "Canadian citizen" as set forth in the act is as follows:

> "Canadian citizen" means—
> I. A person born in Canada who has not become an alien;
> II. A British subject who has Canadian domicile.

In order to get Canadian domicile he must be here five years.

Mr. JACOBS: Oh, no.

Mr. McMURRAY: That is what the act says:

> Canadian domicile can only be acquired, for the purposes of this act, by a person having his domicile for at least five years in Canada after having been landed therein within the meaning of this act.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That applies to persons from foreign countries, not to British subjects.

Mr. McMURRAY: It says, "having been landed therein within the meaning of this act." If I am right in my contention, and I think I am, this simply provides that a British citizen who has lived four years in Canada and who becomes mixed up in some way with a riot is deprived of his ordinary right of trial by jury and can be deported by a mere immigration agent. I think that is putting too great a power in the hands of the immigration official. There is a provision in the act dealing with cases where deportation may be had on the ground of moral turpitude, but here is a case where a man gets mixed up, intentionally or unintentionally, in a riot, and for that he can be deported without trial. I really think that is going too far.

Mr. ARTHURS: I wish to ask the Minister of Justice whether a British citizen is required to be in Canada five years before he acquires Canadian citizenship or British citizenship within Canada?

Sr LOMER GOUIN: No.

Mr. BAXTER: The only reason why we confine it to Canadian citizenship is that we cannot turn a Canadian citizen out of his own country; there is no place to which he can be deported. But if a man has come here and got the benefit of naturalization and then misbehaved himself along the lines prohibited by this act, I think his naturalization should be forfeited and he should be turned out of the country.

Mr. JACOBS: He would then be a citizen without a country, because, when he becomes a British citizen, he abjures the citizenship of the country from which he came.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So far as I understand the section, I favour it. It merely declares that anyone not a British subject resident in Canada—that is really what "Canadian citizen" means—may be classed as an undesirable citizen. What, then, is he subject to? I understand, it is deportation within three years after arrival. And what else?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Does my right hon. friend refer to a British citizen in Canada?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I refer to an undesirable citizen.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If he were an alien we could deport him during any period up to five years, or until he became naturalized. Of course, the question of domicile, and domicile can be obtained in five years, would have some bearing on the matter. It is very doubtful whether under section 41 as we are amending it we could deport a British subject.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I assume that the old act goes, and I favour that, as we are now some distance from the extraordinary circumstances that justified its enactment. But what is the use of declaring that a man is an undesirable citizen unless some consequence is to follow? The minister says that if that undesirable citizen happens to be an alien he may be deported up to—well, really up to the time he becomes naturalized.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No. After five years' residence he becomes domiciled. That has some bearing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then he cannot be deported.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is doubtful if he could.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what I understood. We will assume that is correct. If he is not a British subject, then within five years of his arrival he may be deported, providing he is undesirable. Consequently, it is worth while declaring what will make him an undesirable citizen; I admit that, but that refers only to the alien. What is the use of declaring that some other person, not an alien, is an undesirable citizen if no result can possibly follow from that declaration? What I am getting at is this: The minister is confining it to Canadian citizens. Supposing a British citizen, not a Canadian citzen, arrives here. What is the use of declaring how he may become an undesirable citizen? —there would be no power to visit anything upon him.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We could deport him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Oh, certainly. He may make false representations on entering Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That would not be covered by this bill.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Of course not, but my hon. friend asks what is the use of declaring what makes him undesirable. Pardon me, I get my hon. friend's point—why put him in the undesirable class as covered by section 41?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have doubts about that. Even in the clause as it stands to-day, which was enacted during the troublous times, it is provided that:

> It shall be the duty of any officer becoming cognizant thereof and of the clerk, secretary or other official of any municipality in Canada wherein any such person may be, forthwith to send a written complaint to the minister, giving full particulars: Provided, that this section shall not apply to any person who is a British subject—

So that even in the most strenuous times it did not apply to the British subject.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, yes.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil) (Reading):

—either by reason of birth in Canada or by reason of naturalization in Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It applied to the British subject.

Mr. McMURRAY: That was the only one it did apply to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was the reason of the great roar against it. The alien may now be deported if undesirable, and it is worth while declaring what makes him undesirable. But what is the use of declaring what makes this other man undesirable? He may not be a Canadian citizen within the meaning of our law, but the minister is defining what makes him undesirable, and after he is through with that we are where we began because he can visit nothing on him.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend has just argued that the minister may deport him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. You could under the old law.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Under this act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You cannot deport him under this act.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The provision of section 41 applies. I am limited between the argument of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) and the argument of my hon. friend for North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray).

Mr. MEIGHEN: We will take the three classes. There is first of all the Canadian citizen, secondly there is the alien, thirdly there is the British subject who is not a Canadian citizen;—now we have everybody. Coming to the alien, it is worth while declaring what makes him undesirable because he may be deported after this passes. Coming, though, to the British subject who is not a Canadian citizen, what is the use of declaring what makes him undesirable, because after this passes he cannot be deported—he might have been under the old law. What I mean is, this should only apply to aliens.

Mr. McMURRAY: He could not be deported under the old act, I submit, unless section 42 in the old act is struck out.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. McMURRAY: Section 42 refers back to section 41 specifically and gives power to a board of inquiry, or any officer acting as such, to deport the particular persons named therein, who are British subjects.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the old law.

Mr. McMURRAY: Yes. And section 42 is not repealed, it still stands.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, I thought it was the minister's intention to repeal every phase of that law.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, only section 41.

Mr. McMURRAY: So that stands now and the provisions in section 3 here apply only to those who are not Canadian citizens, that is, it applies to British subjects and aliens, and under section 42, which is still in the Act, a British subject can be deported from this country upon a mere inquiry by an immigration agent, which I say is an exceedingly dangerous thing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister does not intend to repeal that? I understood that was his intention and the main purpose of this legislation.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have not had representations made to me except in regard to the provisions contained in section 41.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is not the hon. member for North Winnipeg right?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The really objectionable feature brought to my attention was the apprehension, on report, of some person belonging to a secret society. I therefore just took the provisions of section 1 as it existed and inserted the amendment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I want the minister and the House to understand is this, that if the minister is going to leave section 42 in effect he leaves the whole substance of the previous legislation there. It is not, perhaps, very becoming of me to argue against it because I was responsible for its passing.

Mr. McMURRAY: And you have repented since.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all, not at all.

Mr. McMURRAY: I am sorry to hear it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Sections 41 and 42 were passed unanimously by this House, so that if there is anything meet for repentance on my part it will be meet for repentance on the part of every hon. member who was in the House at that time.

Mr. JACOBS: Was it unanimous?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. It was unanimously passed by the House, and rightly passed by the House. I was one of those who, having supported it stood by it and defended it, did not seek to get votes by pretended opposition to it after I had supported it.

Mr. JACOBS: See where it landed you.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I know; and many another good thing we did lost us votes as well—things the present government is doing now after securing all the votes they could get by opposing them. And apparently this is in the same category as the rest. But when that period passed—and no one should know better than the hon. member for North Winnipeg that the period existed and it did pass; every hon. member of this House knows that we had very serious times in this country for a short time after the war, as they had in every country in the world—but when that time passed the government of the day itself introduced legislation repealing sections 41 and 42, introduced it by a member of the government.

Mr. McMURRAY: Then there was repentance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No repentance at all. What does the hon. member want to put that word in for all the time? Because we passed legislation for a particular time, and stated it to be so, and the period passing we come and move the House to repeal it, we are only acting in accordance with the dictates of common sense. But the Senate voted it down. I feel safe in saying that a majority of those against it were of the Liberal party.

Mr. JACOBS: I think not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do, and I think I am correct. Of those for the legislation naturally a majority adhered to the government's view. Not all, I know many were opposed to it; but the majority, I think, of those opposed were of the Liberal party. Consequently, the legislation failed to pass. I speak now subject to correction but I think this government introduced legislation repealing it, or was it the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg, (Mr. Woodsworth)?

Mr. JACOBS: It did not get through the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Apparently under the government supported by my hon. friend.

Mr. JACOBS: The committee reported against it.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: The committee reported against it? Very well, that is the situation. And the government appointed the committee. So, apparently, there was no very great sincerity in all the roar there was against the legislation. Let me put that before the mind of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray). Apparently the essential part, the heart, of that legislation is still to remain. I am making no particular complaint. Personally I would rather have it go; I do not think there is reason for it now. I am thoroughly convinced that there was necessity for it, thoroughly convinced that it rendered good service, that it helped to tide over a very serious situation, and that under it no specific injustice was done. I do not know whether there was one deported under it or not but it served as a deterrent. If there was any there was none save one whose deportation was recommended by an investigator, a member of the bench of Manitoba. But there was no abuse of the legislation whatever. The antagonism to it was purely political, antagonism for votes. That is now demonstrated by the subsequent repeal of the section.

Mr. McMURRAY: My right hon. friend is in error.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In what?

Mr. McMURRAY: That this section applied only to one man. Under my right hon. friend's government it was applied solely to British subjects.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes?

Mr. McMURRAY: To Englishmen, Irishmen and Scotchmen.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then I was right in my statement.

Mr. McMURRAY: My right hon. friend approved, and still approves, of the passing of an act that would deport British subjects from this country without trial by a jury.

Mr. JACOBS: Why not deport British subjects, if undesirable, from this country just as much as aliens? I would be in favour of deporting any person who was undesirable.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I stated was that I did not think there was any deportation under it but that if there was a deportation there was only one recommended by an investigator, a member of the bench of Manitoba. The hon. member says there was none at all deported.

Mr. McMURRAY: Not then.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is exactly what I said.

Mr. McMURRAY: I think the real ground for not doing it was the protest made by the people of Winnipeg. What absolutely prohibited it from being done was the feeling aroused in that city. I ask my right hon. friend if there were not strong representations from all over Canada to change that policy.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And very strong recommendations not to make any change.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I can hardly understand what the minister means when he says there were no representations made to him with regard to the further amendment of this act. Last year I introduced a bill which was pretty thoroughly discussed in committee and came before this House looking not merely at the emendation of section 41 but to the radical reconstruction of the act. The recommendation of the committee was that the entire act should be redrafted at the coming session. That recommendation to the House last year is not in any sense carried out by the present amendments, but simply a slight modification of one or two clauses. Again this year I had the privilege of spending some time with the acting minister over some of these clauses, and urged as strongly as I could—and I had a considerable body of opinion be-5 p.m. hind me—that there should be changes not merely in respect of one or two clauses but of the whole principle of the bill.

It does seem to me that we are here faced very clearly with a large issue, the issue, as to whether citizens or residents of this country shall have the right to a fair trial. I was very much interested to hear the leader of the Opposition say that the time had gone by when this kind of legislation is necessary. We would differ as to whether it was ever necessary, as I take it that the time when we most need the safeguards of the law is when there is some extraordinary excitement. There was a time of hysteria several years ago and it was during that time we needed the law to safeguard men from those who were caught up by the hysteria. It was at that time this law was passed—a law which took away all safeguards and deprived men who had been in this country for years, whether of British or of foreign birth, of the right to a trial by jury. I think it was little less than a plot which was organized at that time that placed on the statute book legislation by which men were to be deported from Canada without trial by jury. However, that is past and if there is a reflection on the Conservative government—the government in power in 1919—for having passed legislation of that kind at that time I would say that the leader of the Opposition is right when he says that the reflection is even greater on the present government when two or three years after that trouble, they refuse to repeal an obnoxious act of this nature. It ought to be known to every British subject of this country born outside Canada that today he has absolutely no right to trial by jury. That has not seemed to enter the consciousness of a good many men who were born outside of Canada. I say "British born" because, speaking frankly, that is a good basis on which to appeal. I do not want to stress that unduly. I think the hon. member across the way is right when he says that everyone —whether British born or alien born—ought to have the protection of the laws in this country. But it does seem to me that the British born should be stirred up a little bit when they reflect that when they crossed the ocean to this country they forfeited this right which we have all been told has belonged to Britishers ever since the time of the Magna Charta and the Bill of Rights.

Now coming to particular clauses I would say that the key to the whole situation lies in the definitions. According to sub-section (i) of section 2—this is chapter 25 "An Act to amend the Immigration Act":

> (i) Canadian domicile can only be acquired, for the purposes of this act, by a person having his domicile for at least five years in Canada after having been landed therein within the meaning of this act.

That would seem to show that any immigrant to this country, whether an alien or a British born person, may acquire Canadian domicile in five years and that having acquired Canadian domicile he is protected. But that is not so because a little further down we find this clause:

> —and provided further that no person who belongs to the prohibited or undesirable classes within the meaning of section forty-one of this act shall be capable of acquiring Canadian domicile.

There is where the difficulty lies. It is all very well to say that a man who has been five years in this country acquired Canadian domicile; but if for reasons thereinafter enumerated he is considered to be undesirable within the meaning of the act he becomes incapable of acquiring Canadian domicile whether he has been here five years or twenty years. The safeguards which he ought to have are taken away.

Now if we turn to the other sections, we find that there are a variety of reasons under which people may be considered as being undesirable. It is quite true that slight modifications are being proposed in section 41; but the other sections are not being modified, and they will still leave anybody born outside of this country liable to deportation. For instance, there are these three clauses:

(n) Persons who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the government of Canada or of constituted law and authority, or who disbelieve in or are opposed to organized government, or who advocate the assassination of public officials, or who advocate or teach the unlawful destruction of property.

I do not think any one in this House is going to advocate the things which this section seeks to prohibit. But that is not the point. The point is that a man may be accused of doing these things, and if he is accused of doing these things, he may be deported without opportunity of being heard by a court. What we are arguing for is that he should have a fair trial and be judged as to whether he is guilty of these things or not. I know the attitude of some of us has been absolutely misrepresented in this regard, and that because we were trying to safeguard the individual, it has been said that we are advocating all these things that are being prohibited in this legislation. That is not the case. We are advocating the safeguarding of every man, by insisting that he shall be given the right of trial by jury. The next paragraph reads:

(o) Persons who are members of or affiliated with any organization entertaining or teaching disbelief in or opposition to organized government, or advocating or teaching the duty, necessity or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers, either of specific individuals or of officers generally, of the government of Canada or of any other organized government, because of his or their official character, or advocating or teaching the unlawful destruction of property;

Here again, these things that are mentioned are doubtless unsocial in their character; but the question is one of interpretation. For example, the first clause reads:

Persons who are members of or affilated with any organization entertaining or teaching disbelief in or opposition to organized government.

That may easily be interpreted as applying to anyone who criticizes the government. As regards the last clause:

Or advocating or teaching the unlawful destruction of property.

Supposing a strike occurred, as, for instance, was the case last year in the Cape Breton district, and the men who were in charge of the property or working on the property quit work. It might be said that there was danger of flooding of the mines, and that possibly destruction of property might be caused thereby.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

This clause might be interpreted to mean that any man who advocated that the men should quit work under such circumstances, and possibly bring about a loss of property, would thereby under this clause be regarded as undesirable and liable to deportation without trial. I am not advocating the destruction of property; I am not here defending the man who seeks to destroy property. That is not the point. I urge that a man accused of such things ought to be tried before his peers, given a fair chance to present his case, and not shuffled out of the country without a trial. There is a similar objection to paragraph (p), the next following:

(p) Enemy aliens or persons who have been alien enemies and who were or may be interned on or after the 11th day of November, 1918, in any part of His Majesty's dominions or by any of His Majesty's allies.

I think that is one of the clauses that, it is suggested, should be changed, and I am very glad that change is being made, because here again certain men, many thousands of them in western Canada who are technically alien enemies feel very bitterly the injustice of being brought under this act. An Austrian friend of mine said to me during the war: "Austria was an enemy of ours"—he was a Galician, a Ukrainian—"long before she was an enemy of Great Britain's. We came to this country in order to get away from Austrian control." This man was technically an alien enemy and, coming under this clause, he was liable to deportation as an undesirable. It became absolutely impossible for him ever to acquire Canadian citizenship, though he might have been five years or twenty-five years in Canada. This question of domicile is to me the most serious part of the act, and one that is not being touched by the amendments which the minister has introduced. It seems to me that we ought to have such a thorough-going revision of this act that it would not be possible for any man who has been resident five years in Canada to be deported without trial. I think that is clear, and a great responsibility is put on the Liberal government of this country if they will allow it to be said, when there is no trouble in Canada at all, that they refuse to repeal legislation under which it is quite possible to deport British-born subjects without trial.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I desire to have this clause stand, because I was not aware that we were not doing just exactly what my hon. friend is referring to. I have no desire to deport a British subject, even if he could come under the operation of this clause. I will take it back and redraft it.

As regards foreigners coming to Canada, I do not agree with my hon. friend. I do not see why Canada should not decide for herself who shall become citizens of this country. I do not see that the mere fact that a foreigner may have been in Canada for five years, or whatever the period may be until he becomes naturalized and domiciled, should prevent him from being subject to deportation by order of the minister. I see no hardship in that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Even after five years?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Not after five years, because it is his privilege then to become a citizen of Canada if he can qualify. But if he cannot qualify, he must remain in the same position.

Section 3 stands.

On section 7—Discharging crew without examination:

Mr. BAXTER: What is the change in this clause?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is increasing the fine.

Mr. BAXTER: He pays it into the department really.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Deposit as security for return of deserters:

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have noticed a number of telegrams in the hands of hon. members, and I have one myself from the Shipping Federation of Montreal protesting against section 8 which provides for fines to be imposed. But inasmuch as the bill is to remain in committee I am prepared to hear representations which, if they are reasonable, I shall be glad to consider. I would point out, however, that we experience considerable difficulty in connection with this very matter. Ship-masters come into a port and are careless about the care of their crew some of whom perhaps desert, and we have great trouble apprehending them at times. The worst feature of this is that very frequently a man who gets into the country in this way is a person who would not be able to pass the immigration officer. We know of a case in point at the moment. A seaman deserted and afterwards became ill; he is now a public charge of Canada and has been for the past year. I am convinced therefore that we need this section, and I do not think it will create any hardship on shipowners. It will, of course, create a hardship if they allow seamen to desert without duly presenting them to the immigration officer for inspection before entering.

Mr. JACOBS: I have received the following telegram from the secretary of the Shipping Federation; he says:

> Seventy-two thousand seamen passed through this port last season and accounted for under the shipping acts controlled by the Department of Marine and Fisheries. Immigration Act gradually usurping control from proper officers under shipping acts causing duplication of work. Each seaman is provided with continuous discharge book with his record as to conduct and ability which is checked up by proper officers at this port at beginning and end of voyage Seamen are regarded as specially privileged class and any intereference with them liable cause retaliation by other nations. Respectfully ask before any action taken that the Shipping Federation of Canada be given opportunity being heard before committee of House.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There is absolutely no attempt on the part of the department to interfere with the Shipping Federation, but we do desire to protect ourselves and I think we are right in doing so. Why should the people of Canada through the negligence of a shipmaster be called upon to pay for the care of a mariner who deserts and becomes a public charge? We are simply taking steps to protect ourselves, and if that is an injury to shipping, then I am afraid we shall have to insist on its being done.

Mr. JACOBS: I understand that the bill is to remain in committee until a delegation waits upon the minister?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. BAXTER: The position of the master of a vessel is a very difficult one. It is rather hard to tell whether any particular member of a crew intends to desert. During the very short experience I had with the Customs department I know that there were cases that came before the department that were quite painful, where vessels were liable for a fine because of the improper acts of some members of the crew—acts that could scarcely be detected even by the greatest vigilance on the part of the officers. When you find seamen practically conspiring to leave a vessel, it seems to me you are putting a very heavy burden upon the master or the shipowner if you impose penalties for the acts of members of the crew. Generally they are in a state of antagonism, and certainly the master is not at all likely to be in the confidence of the seamen. That is one point

I would stress. I know that the minister wants his law to be fair above all things. While I do not ordinarily take the position, yet I feel that the stress of the war period having passed, it might not be out of place to consider with regard to deportation whether, if not a jury, which is not always the best way of determining questions, at least some form of tribunal of the department, if not a judicial body, could not be instituted to hear both sides of the case before a man is deported. It is usually very easy for an official getting information from one side only to form a prejudice against a particular individual. I admit that he is not likely to be prejudiced; I admit that in all probability, if there is a complaint, the person complained against will be found to deserve deportation. But still there is always the chance that a false story may be given credence and a man may be unjustly used. I think we all agree, irrespective of any shade of party in the House, that the best recommendation for our Canadian institutions is the ability and the willingness to do clear and full justice in every instance. I should like to see an opportunity given every man to be heard in his own behalf before sentence of deportation is pronounced against him.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The fullest opportunity is given the individual.

Mr. BAXTER: That may be, but not under the act.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That opportunity is always given even in cases where we reject people who endeavour to enter the country. There is no hasty taking hold of an individual and bundling him out of the country. I agree with much that my hon. friend has said. So far I have not had to deal with a single case of the kind, so that I have no personal experience in regard to seamen. But I am dealing daily with cases of entry into Canada, where the individual has no claim on earth upon the country but is simply seeking to get into Canada. In every such case we give the fullest opportunity for him to present his case. Not only that; he is kept for a period in which he may substantiate any claims he makes in order that he may establish his fitness to enter the country. It is not likely therefore that we shall be harsh on any person who has any sort of claim upon us. My hon. friends from British Columbia, I might say here will protest most strenuously against any latitude in this matter. They will say that this is one of the methods employed by shipping people to get orientals into the country without the knowledge of the Department of Immigration. It is obvious that we must be fairly drastic with shipping coming into the ports of the country. What is the incentive for the mariner to avoid the immigration officer? He would be admitted into the country the same as any other individual if he passed through the proper channel, and it is quite evident therefore, in nine cases out of ten, that he avoids the immigration officer simply because he anticipates trouble in being passed. So that the only recourse we have is to be fairly drastic with the shipmaster.

Mr. BAXTER: The minister will find, I think, that he has power enough under what we might call the Chinese exclusion act—because that is practically what it is—to deal with Chinese; and by similar means he will be able to cope with Japanese. But the general Immigration Act must deal with people who are not within the prescribed Asiatic classes. I am not finding the least fault with anything the department deems it best to do; I have no criticism to offer because I have no particular knowledge of the subject. One likes, however, to see the law always provide an opportunity for the under dog to be heard, and I think that is only fair. The minister, I am sure, agrees with the sentiment; the only question is as to how far we go respectively in practice.

Mr. LEWIS: I would make a suggestion to the minister when he is reconsidering section 3. There seems to be some doubt and difference of opinion as to when a British subject becomes a Canadian citizen. It is fully understood that the alien has the advantage in knowing the specific time when he becomes a Canadian citizen by reason of his being naturalized. The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray) says it requires five years' domicile for a British subject to become a Canadian citizen; other members on the government side do not agree with him. It seems to me that a clause might well be inserted whereby a British subject living in this country would know definitely when he becomes a Canadian citizen.

Progress reported.

COPYRIGHT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. JAMES A. ROBB (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the third reading of Bill No. 24 to amend the Copyright Act 1921.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

ITALIAN TREATY

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has my hon. friend any objection to the Italian treaty being given third reading?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was to give the member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) some information on the third reading. The hon. member is not in the chamber. I have no objection to the third reading, myself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then No. 25 on the order paper.

NATURALIZATION ACTS AMENDMENT

House again in committee on Bill No. 85 to amend the Naturalization Acts, 1914 and 1920, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 4—Repeals:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How does this matter now stand? I rather understood that the minister was making inquiries regarding certain suggestions as to consolidation of the law.

Mr. COPP: Consideration of this bill stood over last week on the application of my hon. friend for St. John (Mr. Baxter) that a memorandum be made with regard to consolidating these acts. Such a memorandum was prepared and forwarded to him.

Mr. BAXTER: I do not know whether it will be effectual or not, but the substance of this memorandum in itself constitutes, I think, the very strongest argument in favour of the position which I took that it would be well to consolidate the law. I have gone over the pamphlet with great care and find there are what I might call detached portions of legislation that really have no relation to anything and I think can do no possible good. Then again I find in this pamphlet, which I might call the Red Book, a most absolute misinterpretation of the law. It is really astonishing to me that reputable officers of the Civil Service should send out a document so misleading. I have gone very carefully into the question debated by my right hon. leader and I am satisfied that the statement in the red pamphlet that the Secretary of State can grant naturalization even against an adverse report is absolutely untenable from a legal standpoint. Those who have contended that it was necessary first that there should be a favourable report, and that then the minister might refuse, are absolutely right. No lawyer could possibly give a different opinion.

Now, I should like to call the minister's attention to this white pamphlet. If he compared it with the Dominion act he would find that the words at about line 23, "Provided that the child of a British subject" should go up after line 4. The whole thing here as reprinted is a jumble and does not reflect any credit whatever on those who compiled it. I have gone through the pamphlet section by section and must say that the whole is a very fair almost a literal, reproduction of the Imperial legislation. Some slight alterations are made, as for instance in section 7, where in England they have a committee instead of a commission to investigate the standing of an alien, and the Secretary of State acts directly, while here it is done by the Governor in Council. I cannot see any objection to this; it is pretty much a matter of formality.

The really substantial objection to the bill, however, is in the repeal of pactically sections 19 to 24 and allowing section 25 to stand as the vital part. This committee, I think, will have to pass upon the question of whether naturalization should be the sole prerogative of the Secretary of State working through any agencies which he may prescribe by regulations, which will be unknown to the people to be affected and to the rest of the public until those regulations are promulgated; or whether we shall have some system, not necessarily a county court judge, but some tribunal which will be local in its character causing as little expense and labour to the person seeking to be naturalized as well may be, and yet providing some efficient inquiry into his standing and character. The bill would be better if the Secretary of State would insert in it that a prerequisite for naturalization should be a favourable report by the secret police of Canada—if such a body exists, and I think there is something answering to that description—or by the mounted police, or if he would prescribe something other than the mere unrestrained will of an officer of the government. As the office is occupied at present I would not be doing any honour to my own province and I would not be doing justice to the personal friendship which has always existed between the hon. Secretary of State and myself if I made any reflections upon what he might do in his official capacity. I am quite willing to trust him individually, but if I contracted to trust him as Secretary of State I do not know to what that might commit me in the line of succession.

Mr. PUTNAM: You might come into power.

Mr. BAXTER: And then things might be a thousand times worse than my hon. friend imagines, because I fancy he has spent the greater part of his life in painting pictures of what one might call imaginary Toryism. As the witches in Macbeth put into their caldron everything nauseous and noxious, so he in his picture has imagined everything evil and labelled it "Toryism". But he has painted it conversely from a reflection in his memory of the virtues as he considers them, of the party with which he is associated.

Mr. PUTNAM: The picture I was not painting, and one it would be useless to try to paint, was my hon. friend's imagination.

Mr. BAXTER: Do not attempt to gild refined gold, or paint the lily, or commit any of these other excesses. But really, apart from all politics—because this question of the right of citizenship is deserving of a higher type of discussion than the ordinary hustings style—do we not need some tribunal that will be known to the people, that will be readily accessible, and that will pass upon a man's qualifications for citizenship? I do not think that the county courts were bad so far as their dealings with this matter were concerned. I agree that the reports very often were not worth much, but that was due not to any want of care on the part of the judges but to the fact that they had no officer and no money that they could employ for the making of investigations. They have had to deal simply with affidavits or with the persons who were presented to them or came before them. They had to make the best investigation they could under the circumstances, and naturally it fell far short of completeness. I know cases where county court judges have been assiduous in shutting out the class of people whom they looked upon as undesirable, and I give them credit for doing the best they could. The mounted police, however, do not extend to all parts of Canada, and I do not know how you could get a report in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island—that is the part of the universe I know most about. You might get it from a member of parliament, but perhaps he would not know anything more about a man than whether or not he was likely to be a friendly voter, and that is not what we want. The mounted police do not go down there unless they are sent for in a case of emergency. There is a branch of the Dominion police—I do not know what you call it—which assists the Department of Customs and Inland Revenue in the enforcement of the narcotic drug law and that sort of thing, and it is possible that an investigation under this act might be made by that branch. But that would be a matter of regulation under this act. Why not make it possible to read the statute through and be informed by it what particular officer would investigate a man's character? I should be willing if the minister would provide that what I would call unofficially the secret police of Canada should make a report upon each case and submit it to the county court judge. There you have effective machinery; you are sure of an investigation. These police know pretty well the malefactors throughout the Dominion, and their work would not be partisan or political. I admit frankly that the section that the Secretary of State desires to preserve is practically an exact reproduction of the British section, and it may be said that if it is good enough for Great Britain it should be good enough here. Well, there is all the difference in the world between the settled, steady and orderly administration of the British official departments and the political interference which has so often occurred in this country.

Mr. JACOBS: Does my hon. friend suggest that there are no politics in Great Britain?

Mr. BAXTER: Great Britain is rampant with politics, but there is not very much immigration into Great Britain.

Mr. JACOBS: Not much immigration?

Mr. BAXTER: If there is much immigration into Great Britain, the failure of this regulative system is demonstrated by the millions of pounds that Great Britain had to pay in order to extirpate in time of war the German spies who had got in in time of peace under this very set of regulations, without proper inquiry into their characters. And that is the system that my hon. friend, by inference, supports and wants to have introduced into this country.

Mr. JACOBS: Does my hon. friend not think that these Germans could have got into England notwithstanding any such system?

Mr. BAXTER: If Great Britain had realized how dangerous these people were and had determined to exclude them, I am confident they would not have got in. My hon. friend will agree that immigration laws can be enforced.

Mr. JACOBS: Now that Great Britain is legislating in the light of her experience in the late war, why is it that no change has been made with respect to the naturalization of Germans and their entry into the country?

Mr. BAXTER: My hon. friend will have to ask the statesmen of Great Britain for an answer to that question. If I may again, at my own peril, exercise my imagination, I presume the reason is that Great Britain is to-day, as she always has been in the past, too magnanimous to traitors. I only repeat that in point of form it would be much better to bring down a consolidated measure, even if that necessitated a delay until next year. I would like the Secretary of State to consider the re-establishment or the continuance of some form of local tribunal such as we are accustomed to, aiding it in any way he likes by reports from any investigators, police or others who can give that assistance. But let us have the investigation in the community where the proposed British subject lives and moves and has his being, where a fair inquiry can be made. Do not let us test the fitness of a man simply by long range correspondence with Ottawa.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This bill as introduced is a rather innocent looking bill, but it deals wth one of the most important matters that can possibly come before this parliament, namely, our citizenship. The two questions involved are, first, as to the procedure in connection with naturalization, and, secondly,—this is the more important one, it seems to me—whether we are to cheapen or depreciate the value of British citizenship. Some confusion existed in the minds of many hon. members when this bill was introduced because of the contention then made by the Secretary of State (Mr. Copp) to the effect that under section 2 there rested in him an absolute discretion as to the granting of a certificate of naturalization and that this provision was entirely apart from and independent of the provisions contained in sections 19 to 24 inclusive. I submit that a careful reading of the statute would convince the minister that the application referred to in section 2 is really the application that is referred to in sections 19 to 24. Whatever doubt there may be as to the law as it has heretofore existed, there can be no doubt as to the effect of this amendment, which is to place entirely in the discretion of the minister the granting in any and every case of a certificate of naturalization.

If this amendment is accepted by the House then there will be no provision in the statute for investigation. There will be no publicity in connection with the application. There will be no lapse of time necessary, as now exists, between the filing of the application and the granting of the certificate. The minister pointed out that in some cases the notice of the application might be posted inconspicuously or might not be seen. I submit that if the notice of application is posted in the office of the Clerk of the Peace and remains there for three months, and the application is then brought to the court and is there dealt with with all the regularity, with all the solemnity and with all the publicity that undoubtedly attends these applications, being read at the opening of the court in the presence of the jurors, the witnesses and the whole attendance at the court, there is a large measure of publicity involved in that. What does the minister propose to substitute for that publicity? Absolutely nothing is provided in this bill. What safeguards are provided? None do we find in this bill.

Why are these changes proposed? Who is asking for them? And what is the reason that they are brought forward at this time? It seems to me that the possibilities of the manipulation of naturalization certificates are very dangerous indeed if this bill goes through. If it is passed, what will be its effect and what will be the procedure? We can easily imagine some ambitious political candidate ascertaining the names of all those who are available for naturalization in his constituency, getting a set of forms filled out and coming down to the minister and urging speed and haste in determining these applications, and then going back with a bunch of naturalization certificates and passing them out to these people. I do not suggest that the minister has anything of that kind in mind, but I submit that it is all possible under the provisions of this bill. I do not think the minister ought to allow himself to be led into any such temptation as that.

Mr. COPP: I am safe.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): He may be able to resist it but "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall."

Mr. COPP: I would not be tempted even if my hon. friend came and asked me to do this thing for him.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I would not expect to be troubled with it because there are not many aliens in the part of the province from which I come. The minister's successor may not be as capable of resistance to temptation as the minister imagines himself to be in this particular respect. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is possible that these certificates might be peddled for political party purposes, and I do not think the House should pass any legislation that would make that possible. We should safeguard our citizenship, which we appreciate very highly. Our neighbours to the south have had a rather sorrowful experience I think in connection with matters of this kind. Their citizenship has been depreciated and treated as of little value. We do not desire that in Canada. The alien who comes to reside with us should be impressed with the importance and value of British citizenship, and the responsibility which it imposes. The procedure provided by this bill is not calculated to bring that result.

The minister in the course of his address when the bill was introduced made some reflections upon the way in which the judges conduct these investigations. Speaking from my own knowledge in the province of Ontario I do not think there is any ground for any such complaint. These applications are dealt with in the same manner as any other item of court business, and the judges give the matter the careful and proper attention which it deserves.

I am opposed therefore to this bill in its present form because it is calculated, I think, to increase the expense in connection with the naturalization of aliens. It leaves the matter entirely at the discretion of the Secretary of State or other minister to whom the matter may be referred, and really creates him an autocrat in this matter. It leads to centralization. It removes the safeguards that at present exist in connection with the granting of these certificates, and does not provide for any reasonable or proper investigation before certificates are granted. It is capable of manipulation for political party purposes, and worse than all the most serious objection to the bill is that it tends to cheapen and depreciate the value of British citizenship.

Mr. MEIGHEN: At the last sitting the minister argued that he had power no matter what may have been the report of the judge, under section 23, to grant naturalization, that his power in this respect was absolute, that he did not need any favourable report. I contended at the time, he will remember, that he did under the law as it stands to-day require first a favourable report from the judge before he could exercise his discretion at all, and I suggested that he procure the opinion of the Justice department on the point. May I ask the minister if he has procured it.

Mr. COPP: I may say to my hon. friend that I did not understand him to ask me to get an opinion from the Justice department.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suggested it and expressed considerable confidence as to what it would be.

[Mr. H. A Stewart.]

Mr. COPP: It has not been referred to the Justice department particularly, but it has been looked into very carefully by the legal officers of my department, and they are very strongly of the opinion that the statement I made is correct and that the administration as carried out is correctly in line with the act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I really cannot hedp but say that the contention in my judgment is absurd. It is so manifest it is absurd, and I suggested at the last sitting that the opinion of the Justice department be procured. There must be some other clause or some other section that has not been drawn to my attention, that the minister has not referred to at all, if that can be the law. I do not think the minister should ask to go on with this legislation till he has produced the opinion of the Justice department on this point. Why, it is the whole point before the House. The minister would surely hardly dare to come to this House and ask that it confer on himself the whole jurisdiction in naturalization without any restraint whatever. Surely he would not. He says that has been the case before. I dispute it. It has not been the case before. Now then if he says I am wrong in that, I would like him to get the opinion of the Justice department of this government. Surely I am not asking for anything unreasonable. Even if the Justice department so rules, while it would be very strong in his support, I take the other view. But he should not come to this House unarmed with the opinion of that department and say to the House that the law as it stood before gave him unrestrained jurisdiction, that he is not asking now for any more unless he has the opinion of the Justice department at least to back him up.

I think this bill is audacious. It is an arrogant request to be brought forward particularly by those who have been ranting against autocracy and order in council government to seek to place in the hands of one of their own number the sole, unqualified control of the citizenship of Canada from this day on, naturalize whom they like and not naturalize whom they do not like, inquire where they like and not inquire where they do not like, ask whom they like and refuse to ask whom they do not like, get information if they want to or do without it if they so prefer—all that put into the power of the minister in connection with naturalization in a country like Canada.

Canada is a country into which, in the past, we have had large waves of immigration. Our citizenship to-day is a citizenship that has come from immigration, in very large measure from the naturalization of aliens, and to place that vast power in the hands of a minister without any restraint or without any necessary preparation at all, is, I say, an audacious and arrogant request and I do not think it should be done. It never was intended before, I do not think it ever was the law before; in fact I feel entirely convinced it was not. I must say that I have observed with pleasure very considerable hesitancy on the part of lawyers sitting around my hon. friend against staking their professional reputations on asserting that under the law as it stood the minister could naturalize without first having received the favourable report of the investigating judge; there seems to be no possible reading of the legislation that will bring that result. So if the minister argues for this at all he should not do so on the authority of the law officers. I do not know who the law officer of his department is, but the law officer upon whom ministers should rely is the Department of Justice. Let the minister bring an opinion from the Department of Justice at least before he asks to go on with this legislation.

Mr. COPP: When my right hon. friend asks for information respecting any legislation emanating from the government it is only fair that it should be given to him; but when he suggests that in proposing the present bill I am acting arrogantly I do not think he is treating me with fairness. When this bill was up before I stated that the matter was one which had given the department a great deal of concern, and that I was bringing the measure forward for the sole purpose of improving the Naturalization Act which was placed upon the statute book by my right hon. friend. If the proposed legislation is not right I am perfectly willing that any defect should be remedied. If it is wrong to leave discretion in this matter entirely in the hands of the Secretary of State I, for one, am quite prepared to have that wrong righted. But I do say this to my right hon. friend: During the time I have had the administration of this act, I have found that the inquiry provided for under the statute, from the reports of the county court judges that have come to me, has been of no avail or value. Now I am quite willing to accept the suggestion—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister make that as a general assertion? He may have cases where the reports do not appear to be of value, but surely he does not ask us to believe that the statement is true generally? I have seen the judges in action—

Mr. COPP: So have I.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very well. The fact that what my hon. friend says is true in certain cases would not justify the sweeping assertion he has made. I have not seen any cases except those where the duties were carefully discharged.

Mr. COPP: If my right hon. friend will refer to the debates which took place during the passage of the acts of 1914 and of 1919, as well as the act of 1920, he will find that the Minister of Justice of that day and the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) took exactly the opposite view and that the investigation, in regard to naturalization, was regarded as a huge joke.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister read the observations which establish that?

Mr. COPP: I shall be glad to do so after dinner.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BROWN: I should like to say a few words on this question of Canadian citizenship. To my mind this is one of the most important things we have discussed in this House, and it is time now we were beginning to correct some of the mistakes we made in the past. The mistake we made in the past seems to be that we regarded Canadian citizenship too lightly. Canadian citizenship, and the privileges that go with it, is something that is not to be lightly given or lightly taken away once it has been given. These are two mistakes that were made in the past. Canadian citizenship ought to be a privilege valued very highly by the Canadians, just as Roman citizenship was highly valued. I remember reading of one who said: "With a great price I obtained this freedom." But the man to whom he was speaking was able to retort: "But I was free born." We who are free born are very proud of the fact; but we ought to urge upon those who acquire Canadian citizenship by a price, that they should also be proud of it. Therefore, it is something that ought not to be too easy of attainment. While I would not like to put any unnecessary obstacles in the way of those who have fulfilled the conditions of Canadian citizenship, neither would I like to make it so easy of attainment that they would consider it as of but little value. Unfortunately, in the past the method by which large bunches of foreigners have been given Canadian citizenship has not reflected credit upon us, nor has this been done in such a manner as to make those people esteem the privilege very highly.

I would sincerely regret if the bestowal of or the refusal to bestow Canadian citizenship should rest entirely in the hands of one man, no matter how good a man he might be. It would be presumptuous for a layman to undertake to express an opinion as to the interpretation of the law as it stands, although I have an opinion of what that interpretation should be, and I certainly have a clear idea as to what I think the law ought to be. I do not know whether the courts have functioned satisfactorily in the past. That is a matter with which I have had very little, indeed practically nothing to do; but if the courts have not functioned satisfactorily in the past, would it not be better to try to secure such amendments and arrangements as would assure that they do function satisfactorily, and thus make it perfectly certain that the proper inquiry should be made, that the proper steps should be taken, not necessarily with the absolute holding up of the proceedings, but so to delay them as to ensure that everything was done, calmly, deliberately and judiciously? Thus when the time comes for one of these foreigners who have come amongst us, to make his home here and to be naturalized, it should be impressed upon him that it is no small privilege that is being bestowed upon him; that it is something he might look forward to. In this we have again failed in our duty. We might have made it a great part of our educational system to instil into the minds of the children of these people, that it was a day to be looked forward to when their parents and they, through their parents, might enter into the privileges of Canadian citizenship. We sometimes think our friends across the line have gone too far in the matter of flag-waving; but they have laid a great deal of emphasis upon the privilege of American citizenship, whereas we have failed in some degree in the past in not laying sufficient emphasis upon Canadian citizenship and the privileges that go with it. I would wish that this parliament at this time would take such steps in such deliberate manner as would ensure that the next act that appears upon our statute books shall be such as to fulfil all the conditions of fairness and justice to those that come amongst us to make their homes in Canada, and at the same time such as to ensure that those whom we take into our family, shall be fully impressed with our ideals and institutions, and with the desire to help us to make Canada what we would like it to be.

[Mr. Brown.]

Mr. NEILL: I presume this is the proper place for me to move an amendment which would take the place of section 4. I would move to insert after section 3 a new section to be known as section 4, reading as follows:

> Subsection (e) of subsection (2) of section 7 of the Naturalization Acts, 1914 and 1920, is hereby amended by striking out the first two lines and substituting therefor the following:
> (e) Remains, according to the law of any foreign state, a subject of that state.

The original clause reads as follows. This is amongst the list of people whom the minister can de-naturalize, if I may use such a word. I am putting in the words "those who":

> Those who remain, according to the law of a state at war with His Majesty, a subject of that state.

In other words, I am applying to peace time conditions that were formerly inserted in case of war. The object of my amendment is to prevent a man from being a citizen of more than one country at the same time. While my remarks apply more particularly to those of the Japanese race in British Columbia, I wish to emphasize the point that I do not want to draw the debate along the lines of the necessity, or advisability, or lack of advisability of oriental immigration, because that has nothing whatever to do with the matter. Neither do I wish to make a plea for or against naturalization of orientals. I may have views on that subject but that is not the point at issue. I wish to confine this debate on the amendment purely to this point: Is it desirable that a man shall be a citizen of two countries at the same time? I might also say that it is about as feasible and reasonable to expect a man to be loyal to two countries at the same time, as it is to suggest that a woman should be faithful to two men at the same time. The propositions are somewhat allied.

We know when a man is naturalized, especially if he is of mature age before being naturalized, he will always retain a certain sympathy for the country of his origin. We expect that even under most favourable conditions. All we ask of him is that he dissociate himself from his country of origin, and show a genuine desire to affiliate himself with the country of his adoption. I propose to show that in the case of this particular race, the Japanese, the Japanese government maintains the closest jurisdiction, —for that is the proper word—control and, I think I can say, practically government over its nationals in a case like this. They do not pretend to expatriate them or allow them to be expatriated. I maintain therefore that under these conditions this supposed naturalization of Japanese as British subjects is more or less, and a good deal more than less, a farce.

It is a well-known fact throughout the civilized world that the British Crown stands behind British subjects, and no trouble or expense is too great to right the wrongs of those subjects or to vindicate their wrongful death. But once a citizen of the British Empire has forfeited his rights under the British Crown, once he has alienated himself by adopting the nationality of another country, the British government has nothing more to do with him; it takes no more interest in him, but regards him entirely as an alien; which is an absolutely proper course to pursue. I am subject to correction, of course, but I do not believe there is another country in the world which to-day allows a man to be a citizen of two countries at the same time. It may be said that the United States does that, but the case is not parallel. The United States does not naturalize orientals at all, therefore the question cannot arise in that regard. In the United States they have a problem which is somewhat allied inasmuch as there are in that country a large number of Japanese born in America who claim the right to vote there, and are still Japanese subjects; and there is a strong agitation going on now to deal with the matter. But the case is not exactly parallel to this.

Now, I am going to be very brief and I shall not go into any long quotations from pamphlets or other documents I want to quote however three sentences of the evidence given before the Fisheries Commission in British Columbia last year. There appeared before the commission a naturalized Japanese named Hoyuma Yonemura, who had been naturalized ten years, and these questions were asked him:

Q. Have you ever become expatriated from Japan?—A. No.

Q. And you never made application for expatriation?—A. I did, but could not succeed. That expatriation is in question now in the House of Commons in Japan.

Q. Are all naturalized Japanese in this country still citizens of Japan according to the law of Japan?—A. Yes.

That is the sworn evidence of a Japanese naturalized British subject. Let me now quote from a book called "Facts," the pamphlet alluded to by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) who described it as propaganda. It is got out by the Japanese Consul General in Canada and I shall not express any opinion as to the merits of it or its good taste, or as to whether or not it is propaganda. I want to quote it, being assured that what I quote is at least as favourable to Japan as it possibly can be made. I cannot be charged with exaggeration in order to prove my case when I quote from this source. I am quoting now from page 34:

The Japanese law concerning nationality. Article 20. In the case of a Japanese subject who has acquired foreign nationality by reason of birth in a foreign country and domicile in that country, he or she may be expatriated with the permission of the Minister of State for Home Affairs.

That is, they can be expatriated from Japan with the consent of the Japanese government. That seems reasonable; all they have to do is to ask permission. Well, there are two objections to that, and the first is that they do not do it. It is never, or hardly ever, done, and that is a fairly good reason for objecting to it. In the United States, which has always been a good example to take in this matter, because they are further along the line in the Japanese question than we are, there are some 90,000 American-born Japanese in Hawaii and continental America entitled to all the rights of American citizenship, and according to a statement made by the Foreign Office—that is to say, the United States Foreign Office, at Tokyo, in September, 1920, there had been only 73 applications from these 90,000 American-born Japanese for expatriation, and permission had been granted by the Japanese government in 64 cases. So that out of 90,000 men claiming to be citizens of the United States with the right to vote there at that time, two and a half years ago, only 73 applications had been made for permission to be expatriated, and of these only 64 had been granted. Does that fact not back up the evidence given by the Japanese during the Fisheries Commission which I have already quoted? I said there were two reasons. That is one of them. As regards the second, I will quote again from this pamphlet "Facts." Article 24 says:

Notwithstanding the provisions of the preceding five articles—

One of which I have already read.

A male person of the age of 17 and upwards can lose Japanese nationality only if he has already performed his service in the army or navy or if he is not bound to perform such service.

And there are very few of them who come under the category of not being bound to perform such service. As a matter of fact, they are so strict in that regard that any Japanese going home to Japan who stays there more than 30 days is likely to be corralled and made do his service. There is one exception. If he goes to get a wife for importation into the United States he is allowed 90 days. But if they did expatriate any of their nationals these Japanese would in all these cases be trained soldiers or sailors. Everyone would be a man who had gone through their course of training with all that it implies, not only military training but the essential Japanese education with all the high ideals they inculcate in their people about devotion to the emperor, who is their god, and to their nation.

Mr. PUTNAM: Does that regulation with regard to military training apply even to Japanese born in the United States?

Mr. NEILL: Certainly it applies. Article 20 provides that a Japanese subject who has acquired nationality in a foreign country by reason of his birth and domicile there may be expatriated with the permission of the Minister of State. But if he is over 17 he must undergo the military training of the Japanese, which is not the very best preparation for citizenship as a British or an American subject. In case that is not enough to prevent the Japanese being expatriated, there is another clause:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of the preceding six articles, a person who actually holds a civil or military position can lose his Japanese nationality only after he has lost his position.

That might be considered to apply only to diplomatic positions; but it can also very readily be applied to military positions, in this sense. Those of us who come from the Old Country know that there was a system under the militia there under which a man trained for a certain length of time. After he had put in so many years of service he was placed on the permanent reserve of the country. I do not know, but it is likely that some such system exists in Japan, because every nation that has compulsory military training invariably place its soldiers, after their term of service, on the reserve force. A man in Japan will be registered when in military service as No. so-and-so in such-and-such a regiment of infantry, and after he has completed his training it is very reasonable to suppose that he still remains on the books of the corps and therefore occupies a military position. Whether that is so or not, however, it certainly lends itself to such suggestion and is borne out by the fact I have already cited, that out of 90,000 Japanese born in America only 74 have applied for expatriation, of which number 64 were allowed to be expatriated.

So much for that phase of the question. I might also refer to the evidence prepared by the American Legion, which is a reliable and reputable body in the United States, which evidence was collected to be placed before congress. I won't quote it; I will merely give a summary of it. It appears from the evidence that there practically exists in the United States to-day, more particularly in California, government of the Japanese nation over their nationals in that state of the American union, which is above and superior or at least, extra to the laws of the United States. They have something practically corresponding to a state legislature which meets annually. The work is done by means of organizations. There is a big organization, and there are smaller ones that are tributary or subject to it in various districts, and certain elected members of these bodies meet once a year and pass regulations and so on. Then there is a higher body, something like the state Senate, which also meets annually in the same way. Under this system they levy a form of taxation upon their nationals. They do not call it by that term; they describe the tax as fees; but they have a regular system of taxing their nationals, who by means of membership fees are obliged to pay a certain sum to this Japanese government—for it cannot otherwise be described—which controls the Japanese nationals in the state of California. The nationals are also compelled by the laws which this governing body enacts to register all births, deaths and marriages, and even the movements of individual Japanese. If they move from one section of the state of California to another they are required to record the fact, not with the American authorities but with their own authorities in the state. They also have a precise system of education. The Japanese may go to all the white schools they choose, and as a matter of fact they do. But after hours they must attend their own Japanese school, where they are drilled in the very highest ideals of Japanese nationalism, certainly an excellent education for Japanese in Japan, but by no means a good preparation for either an American or a Canadian citizen.

Now, Sir, I should like to sum up this matter in two questions. Is it possible for a man to be loyal to two countries at once? And, secondly, is it right that he should be given an opportunity even to pretend to do so? It comes back to the old saying in the Bible, "Ye cannot serve two masters". It has been tried often enough, but it has never been successful.

Mr. EULER: I think the hon. member's amendment calls for the prohibition of dual nationality. Would he make that dependent on the desire and choice of the individual himself, or upon the laws of the country of his origin? For example, take a Japanese? Say he comes to Canada and applies for naturalization. In the course of his application he forswears or disavows entirely any allegiance he formerly held to the government of Japan. Would the hon. member accept that profession as sufficient? Would he accept the individual's desire and choice or would he be guided by the law of the country from which the national came, and over which he has not and never had any control?

Mr. NEILL: I certainly would not accept the statement of the Japanese that he was forswearing his country because I do not believe he would be doing so. And another thing, our naturalization law does not require that. All our naturalization law requires is that the person becoming naturalized shall adhere to the country in which he is seeking adoption.

Mr. EULER: My question was this: If our law were such, would the hon. member accept the desire of the national rather than be bound by the laws of the country from which he came. If that were in our Naturalization Act, would he not think we should accept it? Over the other he has absolutely no control whatever.

Mr. NEILL: Of course, this particular amendment does not deal with the naturalization of the Jap. It deals with cases where the minister can say, "Here is a man who is a subject of two nations at once. We will de-naturalize him." That question would have to be raised in the section of the act which naturalizes such a man, and it would be rather difficult to do because the position mentioned by the hon. gentleman would crop up. A Japanese would say "Yes, I have de-naturalized myself," and you would have no way of proving whether he had or had not. But this amendment only deals with those cases where a Jap, as an example, has pledged himself to be a subject true to Canada, and it is afterwards found that he is still adhering to the laws and jurisdiction of Japan. If he wishes under this to get out of that position, all he has to do is to apply to the government of his native country for a certificate of expatriation, which is the form required by the Japanese government. They call it a "declaration of losing nationality" or something of that kind. Let him produce that form showing his government had expatriated him, and then he would—

Mr. EULER: Is it not conceivable that the Japanese government might refuse him that certificate despite his earnest desire to de-naturalize himself so far as his country of origin is concerned?

Mr. NEILL: Yes, the Japanese government have been denying it at the rate of 60 to 90,000; but I never yet met a Jap who would want to quarrel with his country over such denial—he would still be a Japanese. I would not worry myself as to his relations or his conscience all I would ask is: "Your government says; 'You cannot be a Canadian citizen unless you are expatriated by permission from us. Very well go and get that permission from your government, else you cannot remain a Canadian subject.'" That is the position I would take.

Going back to my original argument, which I had about completed, when it comes to a showdown under these conditions which I have outlined, where they are absolutely under the jurisdiction of their native country apparently of their own free will, I would say: There can be only one question as to which country they will adhere to; they will adhere to their own country, and naturalization, so far as Canada is concerned, will be a farce, and it is highly undesirable to perpetuate such a condition of things.

Mr. PUTNAM: I may have misunderstood the hon. member, but I think he dropped the remark that we would not know whether the Jap had forsworn Japan or not. Of course, that forswearing could take place on Canadian soil.

Mr. NEILL: If he forswore himself until he was black in the face he would still be a subject of Japan because he had not taken the only means of becoming expatriated and obtained a certificate of such expatriation from his native country. He might not be willing to remain a Japanese subject, but he would remain one nevertheless.

Mr. PUTNAM: I understand that, but two courses were put forward by my hon. friend: whether we would exact a certificate of expatriation from the Jap's native government, or whether we would be satisfied by his swearing away his allegiance to Japan in Canada. I understood the hon. member to say that we would not know whether the Jap had forsworn his allegiance to his country of origin or not. Of course we would know.

Mr. COPP: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before the minister rises to reply I should like to refer him to what he said before six o'clock. He will recall that I challenged his right to make the statement that the work of the judges under the legislation now in effect—

Mr. COPP: I did not say that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not said anything yet.

Mr. COPP: In effect, that is not what I said.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What! The minister has argued in two sessions of this House that the work of the judges under the legislation now in effect is not of any value. The minister cannot possibly disavow those words. He said, "The work of the judges is not of any value," and I stated that he should not say it in such general terms, that while there might be individual instances of failure to do the work rightly and carefully, I know myself, and many hon. members know, of judges who have done their work most faithfully and usefully. The minister rose then to state that he could quote the Minister of Justice, speaking in 1914, in support of what he says, as stating "that the work of the judges was a joke." I asked him to be good enough after eight o'clock to make that assertion good.

Mr. COPP: Mr. Chairman, I want to put my right hon. friend right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am right, all right.

Mr. COPP: If my hon. friend will wait a moment. In the first place I did not say that the Minister of Justice said a single word about the work of the judges being a joke.

Mr. McMASTER: May I rise to a point of order? I do not know whether it is because we have so many distinguished physicians in this House, but more and more the leaders of the opposition and members of the government are adopting the gentle bedside manner of speaking, and those of us in the more remote corners of the chamber are quite unable to hear what is going on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did the hon. gentleman hear me?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. McMASTER: No. We generally hear the right hon. leader of the Opposition, especially when he is directing his acid criticism, but to-night, although the criticism is somewhat of that nature, it has not been altogether as audible as it usually is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought I spoke pretty clearly. I stated that the minister before six o'clock had referred to the work of the judges under the existing law as having not been of any value. I had challenged his right to make that general assertion. Admitting that there might be instances of inefficient or careless work, there were also instances, and very many—probably in general—of the careful work that judges usually do. The minister replied to me that he could quote the former Minister of Justice, Mr. Doherty, in 1914, in support of his assertion. I challenged him to do so, and I ask him now to make that assertion good.

Mr. COPP: I want to put my right hon. friend right in regard to the statement I made before dinner. I did not say that the Minister of Justice, in connection with the passage of the act of 1914, made any reference to the judges or their work. I did say, however, that the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) who was Acting Minister of Justice in 1919—I think I am right in saying that he was Acting Minister of Justice—in connection with the passing of the Naturalization Act in that year made reference to the judges along the lines that I have mentioned. I shall be very glad to cite his remarks in that connection, as my right hon. friend has asked me to do.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think the minister said that. If he said it—

Mr. COPP: I leave it to the judgment of the committee as to what I said.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If he said it, it is not what I heard him say.

Mr. COPP: I said the member for South Wellington.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The member for South Wellington and the Minister of Justice in 1914.

Mr. COPP: I beg my right hon. friend's pardon; I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And I remarked at the time that the member for South Wellington was in opposition in 1914; he was not in 1919. I am not saying the minister did not say it, but certainly if that is what he said—

Mr. COPP: The right hon. gentleman misunderstood me, that is all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —that was not the sound that came across the Table to me. Now, will he tell us what was said in 1919?

Mr. COPP: I will, and I will give what was said in 1914.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have all of that.

Mr. COPP: My right hon. friend asked me to state what was said, and I propose to do so. I realize that my right hon. friend has had a wide experience in putting legislation through this House and has occupied honourable and responsible positions. If he has any suggestions to make, suggestions that are offered with the object of bettering any legislation that comes before this House, I shall be only too glad to consider them. But the question is whether his criticisms have been constructive in their character or whether he is trying to sow the seed of discord by intimating that I am trying to surround myself with more power and authority than I or any other member of the government should have. I think it is the latter course that my right hon. friend is taking, and in that respect he is not doing justice to himself or to the other members of this committee. I could understand it if a private member who had had no experience as a minister of the Crown was suspicious that some minister might be trying to clothe himself with power with the idea of bringing advantage to his own party, but I cannot understand any suspicion of that kind on the part of hon. members who have occupied cabinet positions. Surely it is not because they had the same thing in their minds when they sat on the treasury benches? I hope not. I am desirous of hearing the suggestions that any hon. members wish to offer in connection with this bill.

I say again that the only reason that I have asked for these amendments is to make the Naturalization Act passed by the government of my right hon. friend as workable as possible, to clothe it with as many safeguards as possible, and to facilitate the issue, without confusion or delay, of naturalization certificates to those entitled to them. I was not at all surprised when the suggestion was made that this is a very large power to place in one individual's hands; I grant it. The Naturalization Act and measures relating to immigration are always the subject of a great deal of controversy in this House. The matter of citizenship is a very important one, not only to those who apply for naturalization, but to those of us who are natural-born or naturalized British subjects. It is a question that should be very carefully studied, and it is my desire that the fullest consideration be given to the proposed amendments. This is not the first time that amendments to the Naturalization Act have been asked in this parliament. At the Imperial conferences of 1902, 1908 and 1911 the question was considered of adopting a uniform system of naturalization so that a man naturalized as a British subject in Canada or in the Old Country would be a British subject in any part of the Empire, and finally that was arranged. I was not a member of this House in 1914, but I was a member here in 1919 when amendments were brought down to the Naturalization Act, and I remember that a great deal of discussion took place on that occasion. In 1914, as will be seen by referring to Hansard, there was also a very long discussion of this question. At that time the Right Hon. C. J. Doherty was Minister of Justice and my right hon. friend the present leader of the Opposition was a colleague of his. I am bound to say that in this case as well as in a great many others you will find upon consulting Hansard that the attitude hon. gentlemen may take on any particular question depends very largely upon which side of the House they happen to be occupying. A number of those who are now my friends occupied seats in this Chamber in 1914 and opposed the legislation that was then brought down by Mr. Doherty for his daring to put into the statutes the very clause that is there now giving entire and absolute discretion to the Secretary of State in deciding whether a man shall be naturalized in this country or not. The legislation had a rough and stormy passage and occupied many days and nights before it finally became law. The House divided frequently, I understand, on the different sections of the bill.

On the question whether it is right or wrong, proper or improper, dangerous or otherwise to place absolute discretion in the hands of a responsible minister of the Crown in deciding whether or not a man shall become naturalized I want to read to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, as I promised I would do, a few extracts from the debate that took place on that occasion. I do so with some degree of hesitancy because I do not want to take up too much of the time of this committee, but inasmuch as the then Minister of Justice, the Right Hon. Mr. Doherty, stood high not only in the opinion of members of this parliament when he was here but in his native province and in the mind of the public generally, and is also a distinguished lawyer of very high standing and recognized as such throughout the whole Dominion, I should like to present his attitude when the question was before the House as to whether or not it was a proper thing to place this discretion in the hands of any one particular minister. In reply to some criticism that had been made by the leader of the Opposition of that day Mr. Doherty said at page 4146 of Hansard, of 1914:

> I do not question that this power might be liable to abuse. Almost any power may be liable to abuse. It may be said that discretionary powers are particularly liable to abuse, but you cannot enumerate all the things that may be good reasons why a man should not become a British subject. If we were legislating in order to create a right in somebody's favour it would be proper that a judge should determine it and that the matter should be ended. But we are not. We do not contemplate that a man, because he does certain things, is to have the right to be a British subject. After all, it is a matter of grant by the state. We must either allow somebody to have discretion or we must undertake to specify here and now, and put in the statute, every reason conceivable why it is desirable that a man should not be a British subject. Then our legislation will assume such a shape that we will have created conditions under which a man shall have the right to say: I must have a certificate of naturalization; I have a right to it—no matter what strong reasons may be in existence at the time, which were not known before, why he should not be a British subject. It is true that we will do our best under the section to see that he shall be of good character, and to make him prove it, but it is obvious that in a country of this size a man who may not be of good character, is not going to the centre, to the place where people are likely to have information concerning his past life, to apply for a certificate of naturalization. The character of this man has been built up and acquired outside of this country very possibly. He is not going to go where people know all about him and his character. That is the kind of men we do not want. He may be a refugee and he may go to some remote corner of the country and because there are no witnesses in that remote corner of the country he may be able to convince the judge that he is a man of good character. The Secretary of State may have information that that man is an anarchist or that for any other good reason he is an undesirable. Shall we compel the Secretary of State to say: This man went to the remotest corner of the Yukon and applied for naturalization; there was no evidence brought before the judge to show that he was of bad character, therefore, I, the Secretary of State, have no alternative but to grant him a certificate. If we want to create that sort of a situation there is nothing more to be said. But in the drafting of this act we did not conceive that that would be desired. In the United Kingdom the Secretary of State has exercised this discretionary power from the outset.

That was the statement made by Mr. Doherty when this matter was before the House in 1914.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A very excellent statement too.

Mr. COPP: It was a very excellent statement defending his action in placing discretionary power in the hands of the Secretary of State.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The discretionary power that he placed there.

Mr. COPP: And he placed full power there. The debate was continued later on, and speaking of the application to the court Mr. Doherty said at page 4829 of Hansard, of 1914:

But the court cannot go any further and declare that the party has a right to be naturalized. It still rests with the country, through its responsible government —after all, the Secretary of State is only one of a government that is responsible for what he does—to determine whether or not it will grant to that individual his naturalization. If you take that clause out, then you create a situation where each one of the dominions will be absolutely bound, because a man meets certain requirements which are agreed to be essential, to give him naturalization, even though, for reasons outside of the possession of these particular qualifications, the government of that particular dominion or possession might consider that it was not in the public interest for that man or that class of men to be naturalized. In reality the idea was, as far as the dominions are concerned, to reserve to them freedom of action, even when a man met those requirements which the mother country and the dominions generally agreed were essential—but not necessarily sufficient—to fit a man for naturalization. The purpose is to keep within the hands of each of the dominions control ever over people who may meet these requirements, to place these dominions in a position where they may be enabled, for reasons that they may consider sufficient, to declare that a person, though meeting these requirements, is not a desirable subject, in their judgment, and to exclude him. While it is true that the Secretary of State is not called upon to give reasons why he takes a certain course under this provision, it should be remembered that he always acts as a member of a responsible government. and the circumstances under which he acts, if he does act in the exercise of that power, will always be before the public either for condemnation or for approval. He will act upon his own responsibility and the responsibility of the government behind him, and I think that that is sufficient protection against arbitrary action on his part. As I look at it, this is a power that will seldom, if ever, be exercised; but it is a power held in reserve which may prove most invaluable to this country.

And he continues along the same line to the end, defending the legislation that he brought down placing in the Secretary of State absolute discretion to withhold or grant naturalization. That is a part of the act today. It is that part on which we are acting at the present time, administering the law under the Department of the Secretary of State. But that is not all. In 1919 amendments were brought down to the Naturalization Act, and if I remember correctly, my hon. friend for South Wellington was then Acting Minister of Justice and had charge of the bill in committee. The question came up as to how far we should continue to leave discretion in the hands of the Secretary of State to grant naturalization or to refuse it and my hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie) made this statement which is to be found at page 4267 of Hansard of 1919. Criticisms were then being offered from the opposite side of the House as they are being offered now and the hon. member for South Wellington said:

In answer to my hon. friend's criticism, all I have to say is that nationality and citizenship are questions which should come within the authority of the parliament and the government of the country, and if they have at any time in the past been delegated to the judges, that in my judgment was an improper delegation of the rights of parliament. Parliament should control the nationality of citizens and the question of their franchise. It is just as able to do so as the judges, if indeed it is not better able. It is true that this section vests in the Secretary of State an absolute discretion. The language is absolute in form, but in reality it is just a judicial discretion to be exercised as that of a judge would be because it must be exercised in accordance with the plain meaning and intent of the act. Those of us who happen to be members of the bar well know that wills, trusts, settlements, etc., where trustees are appointed, case after case comes up in which absolute discretion to do this, that, and the other thing, is granted to the trustee. "Absolute and unfettered discretion" is a commonly used expression, which the courts interpret to be discretion that must be reasonably exercised in accordance with the clear meaning of the document. So it is with an act of parliament. Under this section, the Secretary of State cannot act upon any mere whim, fancy or caprice of his own—

Apparently my hon. friend has changed his mind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all.

Mr. COPP (reading):

—he is bound to act in accordance with the meaning of the act. He is not by any means unaccountable or irresponsible. As a matter of fact, he is far more accountable and responsible than is any judge in the Dominion—

The Secretary of State, he said, is far more accountable and responsible than is any judge in the Dominion.

—because, if he does not act reasonably—if his action in granting or refusing a certificate is at variance with plain reason, or if he acts without good faith or goes beyond the letter of the law, he will be amenable to this parliament at the very first session after his action is called into question.

Going on further he says:

I do not know of any greater safeguard that can be employed. My hon. friend suggested that the reply could be made that this had been the custom for the last five years.

He is referring to the old system.

It has been the law of the land for the last five years, and I will say that for twenty or twenty-five years preceding that, these certificates were granted by the judges. I want to impress this upon the committee that, knowing as I do the method which was adopted in Ontario during those twenty-five or thirty years in the granting of these certificates, the whole practice became a joke and a by-word.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was prior to 1914.

Mr. COPP: I say to my right hon. friend, just as I said before that it was prior to 1914.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. COPP: My right hon. friend says "hear, hear." I would ask him now by what method can he argue—fertile though his imagination may be—that the investigations held by the judge now are any better than they were prior to 1914? The same judges were acting then in the province of Ontario that are acting now, or a number of them. For that reason I say that it does not lie in the mouth of my hon. friend for South Wellington, or in the mouth of the leader of the Opposition, to criticize the legislation I have brought down to this House and ask them to consider. I trust I have satisfied my right hon. friend in giving him the information for which he asked just before the House rose for recess.

Now with reference to the act—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. COPP: My right hon. friend says "hear, hear," and indulges in a laugh. I have seen that old trick played before; it does not affect me.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the hon. gentleman through with his argument?

Mr. COPP: If my right hon. friend will wait I will give him—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought the minister was going to refer to something else.

Mr. COPP: In reference to the amendment before the committee I want to say, that personally I am not particularly wedded to the system which has been proposed to the committee. I have given the matter the very best consideration I could. I have conferred with my officials who had charge of this branch of the public business under the control of my right hon. friend and his colleagues. I am told and I am assured by those officials that the system is carried on now in exactly the same way as before. My right hon. friend well knows that the minister knows nothing about these naturalization cases unless some particular question arises and is referred to him. I am informed that has been the practice ever since this Naturalization Act has been in force in Canada. I have tried to follow in the same course, taking the recommendations from my officials in regard to naturalization just as other ministers take recommendations from the officials in their departments. I do not care whether the committee places this responsibility on me, or on some other public official, but I do say this—and I am as certain of its accuracy as I am that I am standing here to-night—that if any other hon. gentleman within the sound of my voice had charge of the administration of the act as it is to-day he would find that it is not being carried out in the best manner possible. I have no fault to find with the judges; I have no quarrel with them. My right hon. friend says that he has been in court and heard the judges in these cases. So have I, and I want to say to him that in the eastern section of Canada, where we have not a great number of applications for naturalization, the procedure is not so cumbersome or so unwieldy as in some other places. Is it the desire of my hon. friends that persons who come to Canada, and remain here for the length of time prescribed by the act, should be given the opportunity to become British subjects? If so, I say that their applications should be given the very best consideration, and it should be made as easy as possible for such persons, if qualified, to obtain naturalization.

During this debate a number of hon. gentlemen have declared that a man should prize British citizenship very highly. So he should, but I do not see that we should put any unnecessary stumbling blocks in the way of his acquiring that citizenship. I grant that an application for naturalization should be surrounded by every safeguard, and if any hon. member can suggest a greater safeguard than is provided in this bill I shall be glad to give that suggestion consideration, and if possible accept it. But I maintain that if it is the desire of the people of Canada to grant naturalization certificates to those who, after careful inquiry and examination, are found to be entitled to them, you must have some other arrangement than exists at 9 p.m. the present time. At present a man who has lived for ten years in Canada—under the bill the period of residence is five years—and is a law-abiding citizen who wants to become naturalized has to make application at the county clerk's office at some central point in a province. That application has to be posted for three months in the office of the clerk. Now, that system may be a proper one but so far as I can study and understand the question, I do not think the notice is worth the paper it is written upon. No one goes into the clerk's office and examines it. In the act of 1919, I think, provision is made that, besides being posted in the office of the clerk of the county court in the respective sections throughout the country, it should be posted in the post office. When people go down to the post office, how many read the notices posted up? Nobody reads them, so that this is an absolute waste of time. When the time arrives that a man is entitled to naturalization, he should be given that naturalization with the least possible trouble to himself, although he should value and, I have no doubt, values the citizenship very highly.

Only the other day the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) rushed to the defence of the judges whom, according to him, I had so maligned, because I said their investigation was not of a very definite character. He said: "Well, I have sat in court and listened to judges interrogating witnesses and they are very careful in making the inquiries. One judge asked a man whom he had voted for at the last election and how he would vote at the next election." Of what interest would it be to a judge making an inquiry in regard to naturalization to ask a man how we would vote. That is just a sample. I have practised law myself at times, and I have a very fraternal feeling for my brother barrister; but I know this is true in my section of the country and I am informed that it is true in the West, that a man applying for naturalization, besides going to the clerk of the court and paying $5 on his application, must also employ a lawyer to plead his case before the judge. If that is so, then that is one of many reasons why applicants for naturalization should not be compelled to employ legal assistance and counsel to present their case before the judge. At the present time there are in this country, and particularly in the West, many cases where people have to travel 50, 100 and in some cases 200 miles to get to the courts. If that investigation were of any advantage, it might be continued; but I may tell the committee in all sincerity that in nine cases out of ten the investigation is of no particular advantage to the department, and the department makes its own inquiry and decides the question on the inquiry which it makes. I am not here to say that every judge before whom an applicant goes to present his case for naturalization, does not give the matter some inquiry and attention. Many returns and reports that come from judges are fairly full and acceptable; but in many instances that is not the case, and the department has to carry on its private investigation in regard to the qualifications of an applicant for naturalization. The department is responsible for the naturalization, and for that reason it takes great care to see that every applicant is properly qualified before a naturalization certificate is granted to him.

I am not very particular in regard to this matter; it is of no special concern to me, or, indeed, to any person in the East, because in the East the country is pretty well settled and the courts are handy. The situation in the East is different from that of the far western country where the facilities are not so good. In the second place, we have few applications made for naturalization in the East and, therefore, I have no personal interest in the matter. As regards the insinuations made concerning this power being vested in the Secretary of State who, at the moment, happens to be myself, I am sure no hon. member on either side of the House thinks that one of us would stoop to any such conduct as to try to bring in hundreds of naturalization papers, as the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) said this afternoon, and have those people naturalized just before an election for the sake of getting their votes. My hon. friend, I am sure, does not practise that in the model province of Ontario from which he comes, and we do not practise it in New Brunswick, as the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter) will bear me out. That is not how elections are won. If hon. members who are more particularly interested in this subject, are not satisfied to vest that power in the Secretary of State who, for the moment is myself, I ask them to consider whether or not it should be vested in some responsible head, who should be given power to grant certificates of naturalization as soon as by sufficient inquiry he is satisfied that applicants are entitled to naturalization.

Before I sit down, I want to refer for a moment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). As my hon. friend well knows, the whole question of naturalization is interwoven with the Imperial statutes, and agreements made with the intention of getting our naturalization laws as uniform as possible in the Old Country as well as in the colonies. I have a number of other matters to consider, and before this amendment is finally dealt with, I should like to consider it according to the agreements and laws regarding naturalization throughout the British Empire. I shall be glad to consider the amendment; but before accepting it I would have to consider it a little more fully, and, therefore, if no other member wants to address the committee on the subject, I am prepared to move that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister, after such a triumphant demolition of all his enemies wants to cut short the discussion—

Mr. COPP: No. If my right hon. friend wishes to speak, he can go ahead.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know he considers it a matter of considerable temerity on my part to dare to reply—

Mr. COPP: I would not be sarcastic if I were the right hon. member. That does not get him anywhere.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We will try to get somewhere. The only thing I despair of is to get the minister to admit it after I do get somewhere. I have not the least doubt where the intellects of hon. members will stand on the points at issue. I do not expect for a moment that I will convince them that they should vote against the minister's bill; but I will convince them that the minister has made no case whatever in executing the pledge which he gave before six o'clock. He stated before six o'clock that he would be able to show out of the mouths of the former Minister of Justice and the former Acting Minister of Justice, that the work of the judges under the present law—

Mr. COPP: I said no such thing about "out of the mouth of the former Minister of Justice."

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. member did not, his remarks at the time had not the slightest reference to what I had said just before, to which he offered them in answer.

I am going to deal with the minister's remarks. He directed them, instead of to the point at issue, to an endeavour to show out of the mouths of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) and the former Minister of Justice that his view of the law is correct and that my view of the law is wrong.

Now, I ask the House to understand first of all what the two views are. I think the minister understands what they are, but he did not seek to make it clear to the House at all, because had he done so the quotations that he made from both hon. gentlemen would have shown him clearly to everybody's mind to be wrong. The two views are these. I state that the law is and has been this since 1914, that to secure naturalization a man must apply, under section 20, through the court; and he must under sections 21, 22 and 23 make good before a judge his right to naturalization. He must secure from the judge a certificate favourable to his naturalization, which certificate must be transmitted to the Secretary of State. All these requirements must first be complied with as matters of procedure; and when he has secured that favourable certificate from the judge and it has been forwarded to the Secretary of State, then the Secretary of State has absolute discretion to say yes or no on the question of naturalization; but until he does secure that favourable certificate the Secretary of State has no discretion whatsoever. I hope that is quite clear.

The Minister, on the other hand, says that this is not the law at all. Under the law, he states, as it has stood since 1914, the Secretary of State, no matter whether that man has gone to a court and got a favourable certificate or not, can grant naturalization or refuse it. The House sees the difference. The old law provided that a favourable certificate should be given by a judge, and from that moment the minister's discretion was absolute; the act declares the matter to be in his absolute discretion from that point on. But until that point is reached the moment for the exercise of discretion on the part of the Secretary of State never arises.

To show the appropriateness of the two quotations the minister submitted, a little history of our law is necessary. Up until 1914, with the passing of the act of that year, the consolidation, which is our present law, the way a man secured naturalization was to make an affidavit of his qualifications and file it with the clerk of the court, where it remained for a time, I think three weeks,—a definite period at any rate. At the expiration of that three weeks, without the man going to the judge at all or even to the clerk of the court, somebody for him, an agent even, could go and secure from the judge, and I think from the clerk of the court—at least from the judge,—a certificate of naturalization. I have briefly stated the law that prevailed up to that time. In a word, there was no necessity for personal appearance at all, and the judge could grant the certificate to an agent of the person seeking naturalization. The Secretary of State had nothing to do with it at all; and all that the judge needed to have under the act was simply an affidavit filed by the man. In 1914, the statute was passed which, in all its essentials, is the law to-day. It provided that the applicant should file with the clerk of the court—he did not need to go there to do it, he could send it by an agent—an application requesting naturalization. That application, with whatever is required to accompany it, is posted up for three months in the court-room. At the end of three months that man must appear before a judge, and he must appear in person, unless for one reason and one reason only, which I shall read just as it is in the statute:

> Unless it is established to the satisfaction of the court that he is prevented from so appearing by some good and sufficient cause.

So that in general the applicant must appear himself, and if he does not appear it can only be for some cogent reason. On the evidence given before the judge his fate as to naturalization is decided. If the judge is satisfied he forwards a favourable report. But he does not grant naturalization at all; he simply forwards a favourable report to the Secretary of State, and it is for the Secretary of State to say yes or no. He can further investigate if he wishes, and he is absolutely empowered to grant application or refuse it once he has received that report. Such has been the law since 1914.

Now we come to the quotations the hon. member made. He could not have read better or more apt expressions of opinion than those which he read from the former Minister of Justice. The former Minister of Justice clearly showed that all that the Secretary of State could do, everything that came within his power to do, was only by virtue of the report from the judge; and the only thing that the Secretary of State was in a position to do as against the recommendation of the judge was to refuse the application. But if the judge was opposed to the application the Secretary of State had no power at all to grant naturalization; and as a matter of fact the matter never came before him in the absence of a report from the judge. The language used by the former Minister of Justice, let me repeat,—and I should like the hon. member to read it again—

Mr. COPP: I have read it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But read it to the House so that its meaning will be clear. I say, he could not have used language which made it more apparent that the Secretary of State is wholly in the wrong and has no power under the present law, in the absence of a report from the judge, to grant naturalization. The language of the acting Minister of Justice of 1919 was just the same; he did not deal with the point at which absolute discretion arose. It is true he used the words "absolute discretion." Why? Because it is in the act. The procedure sections are there; the absolute discretion arises when the procedure sections are complied with; then and not till then. This surely must be clear to every hon. member.

Now, I ask hon. members to consider this point: It is one thing to give the Secretary of State power, if he has the information Judge Doherty referred to in that very language quoted, information from the land from which the immigrant came against the character of the immigrant, and which information could not have come to the knowledge of the judge, to deny the applicant his naturalization. It is another thing to allow the minister, no matter what the judge's report may say against the man, though it may clearly advise that he be not granted naturalization, to naturalize notwithstanding, and thus get rid of the judge altogether. In a word, the discretion on the part of the Secretary of State to refuse naturalization even in the face of a favourable report is one thing; that guards the gates to naturalization. But to give the Secretary of State, without any report at all, without a judge having anything to do with the matter whatever, power to naturalize an applicant is simply to permit the minister to go around the country with the oil of naturalization anointing whomsoever he likes into the citizenship of Canada. That is what the minister is asking us to allow him to do. He says he is absolutely innocent in doing so. I am not charging him with any criminal guilt at all, and I never did. But the thing is wholly unsound. No one on the government side, no member of the government ever suggested to the House that the minister should have power to grant naturalization save only when the right to naturalization was certified to by a judge of the land. I know it was opposed by the Secretary of State. Whether he spoke personally or not I do not know; I have not the least doubt he voted against it, because he says there was a vote on the question.

Mr. COPP: I was not here in 1914.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well then, a certain embarrassment that otherwise would likely have been his he has escaped. It was opposed by hon. gentlemen opposite—I thought unreasonably opposed—but the same hon. gentlemen now are asking not only to let that discretion be in the hands of the minister but to give him a positive right to make citizens at his will.

Now, the two cases are clear before the House. I do ask this House to affirm that we never ought to place in the unrestrained hands of any minister of any government the right to make citizens in a country like this where we have waves of immigrants coming from all parts of the earth and where the right to citizenship involves the franchise. It is a right that no minister should ask to exercise, and I think no House should grant. But I am quite prepared to leave with the minister the power that has been his all along to say, even after a judge reports in favour of an applicant, "We have information which probably was not before the judge, and although he reports in the applicant's favour, we deny him the franchise for the present at least or for good." I am quite prepared that the minister shall have that power, but not more than that, because I think that is the utmost discretion he should enjoy.

Mr. COPP: Is my right hon. friend aware that this procedure is followed in the Old Country and also in Australia and Newfoundland?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know what is done in Australia and I am not certain of what is done in Newfoundland. I do know the system was sometimes followed in the government of the Old Country, with what results I am not aware. But the Old Land is different from our country. How many immigrants have they over there in relation to their population?

Mr. COPP: They have a large number of immigrants entering Australia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They have a lot more than we have and they will probably change their law. I do not know what the law in Australia is. I would not like to take the minister's word for it because I do not think he can be accepted as an authority on Australian law before he is a better authority on the law of his own country.

Mr. COPP: I am not quoting the Australian law from my own personal knowledge, but I have had it looked into and I think I am safe in saying that that is the law there.

Mr. McMASTER: Mr. Chairman, I have the feeling that the right hon. leader of the Opposition should be the last one in this country to offer the language of reproach in regard to naturalization. He accuses the minister of a desire to obtain the right and power of going around with the oil of anointment to anoint people into British citizenship. When the right hon leader of the Opposition was instrumental in taking away the right of naturalization, of voting, from people, did he hold any preliminary inquiries in regard to those from whom it should be taken away? I do not think so. My recollection is that vast numbers of respectable Canadian citizens were a very few years ago bereft of their right to vote in a very drastic and summary manner. However, if there is one thing I dislike in the world it is the tu quoque argument—the pot applying to the kettle the term black.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not ask for power to decide who should vote. Parliament enacted general legislation determining who should have the franchise. There was no discretion in the hands of anybody.

Mr. McMASTER: That is an example of the method in which the learned and honourable gentleman excels—fendre un cheveu en quatre; he cuts a hair into quarters—because of course the right of being a British subject was the fundamental essential for having the right to vote. But I did not rise especially to make this remark; rather to express, I trust, a quite disinterested opinion on the subject. I have not examined it carefully and I am not sure that we have the best method now, but I do not like the idea of placing all the powers of naturalization in a central office. I do not like it. It does not appear to me to be consistent or consonant with our mentality, with our procedure in the past, nor with our traditions. I am not going to bring forward any new plan, I have not examined the question sufficiently, but I have absolute faith in the fair-mindedness of the minister, in his desire to look at things in a broad, generous, fair and proper fashion, and if the present system imposes hardships on those who desire naturalization, if it is not functioning properly, I would ask him to look into it; but I would also ask him not to press the method of having all the naturalization come out of one central office.

How is this central office to make investigations? It must make investigations with a personnel that is wholly dependent on that office or on the government. It seems to me that the fitness for naturalization, if it is to be the subject of inquiry—and it has to be—should be the subject of judicial inquiry, of inquiry which is unconnected with the executive. I think it is a sound principle that the executive and the judicial functions should be separate. I rise in the hope that what I have said may have some influence on the minister. I do not like the scheme. I am quite prepared to say that the present method may not be functioning properly in certain parts of the country. Well, if that is so, let us set to work and amend it; but it seems to me to be rushing from one extreme to another to centralize our naturalization work and place power in the hands of one office.

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Chairman, listening to this debate I cannot help thinking that it is an advantage sometimes to have no past, and it is also an advantage because you can at least approach the subject without any preconceived ideas or prejudices. I have listened to the rather lengthy explanation of the Secretary of State to-night respecting this matter. I had not the privilege before dinner of hearing the debate. However, so far I see no reason to change my ideas. I recognize that there are members in the House whose constituencies cover a very extensive territory and they may see difficulties in the way of getting applicants before a judge to be naturalized. At the same time I still believe that British citizenship is something so valuable, so much to be prized, that anyone who wants it ought to go to the trouble of getting it in the right way. I do not know that there is any such particular hurry to naturalize those who come to our shores from foreign countries, more especially when they are unable to speak or read English.

Mr. COPP: You cannot naturalize them unless they can speak or read English.

Mr. GUTHRIE: English or French.

Mr. COPP: They must speak one language or the other.

Mr. FORKE: The minister referred to the incident of a judge asking an applicant how he voted at the last election. I do not know that that was such a ridiculous question after all because he would probably find that the applicant did not know which side he was voting for. I am not saying this in a derogatory sense of our foreign-born citizens because they are just as intelligent perhaps as our native-born in many ways. At the same time our politics are sometimes so difficult to understand even by native-born Canadians that I do not wonder at some of our immigrants experiencing a great deal of difficulty in understanding the political situation.

The hon. Secretary of State read a long extract from Hansard, and following his example I am going to read a short extract from the Manitoba Free Press, which has perhaps as large a circulation as any newspaper in western Canada and whose editorial staff should be in a position to understand the condions in that western country where the great bulk of our naturalization takes place. With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I will read this extract:

> Hon. A. B. Copp, Secretary of State, says that at present the judicial investigations are often so perfunctory and unsatisfactory that the department is obliged to make another investigation on its own account. If that is the case the remedy is not to abolish the investigation before a judge but to take steps to see that an adequate investigation is made and all the necessary evidence produced so that the judge's recommendation will always have real value. Mr. Copp also says the government has no desire to gain the right to say who shall be admitted to the franchise, but that it should be made easy to secure naturalization and that annoying restrictions should be removed. The minister can hardly be so innocent, however, as not to recognize that the public hearing before a judge is a safeguard for those who have qualified for naturalization and that the abolition of the judicial investigation would leave an opening for serious political abuses. Under the proposed plan the investigation would be made, presumably, by an official of the department. In theory it would be a strictly impartial investigation and the minister would decide each case on its merits alone. But past political experience has shown that it is not wise to depend too much on theories. In those parts of the country where the majority of the electors were friendly to the party in office there would be a very great temptation to the more zealous party supporters of the party —particularly if an election were in prospect—to endeavour to influence the investigation or the action of the minister so as to deny, or postpone, the naturalization of persons who were believed to be not in favour of the government. Without the safeguard of a public, judicial investigation it would be possible for such corrupt efforts to meet with a considerable measure of success.

It is not necessary to suspect the motives of the government in making the proposal in question, but it is obviously ill-advised. Canadians just now are too desirous of getting rid of some of the old political abuses to welcome the opening of opportunities for new ones.

That expresses my views more concisely and in better language than I am able to express them. I do not object to this proposal of the Secretary of State merely in a spirit of opposition; I do so because I honestly believe that it will be dangerous and not in accordance with what is right to place the power of naturalizing foreign-born subjects in the hands of any one minister, either now or at any future time.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Secretary of State (Mr. Copp) suggested a little time ago that it was very largely in the West that this matter had any considerable application. I think we ought to get away from the merely legal or technical side of the measure and consider the effect of the proposal on the large number of immigrants who are already in this country and others whom the government is seeking to bring here. There has been a tendency in the course of this discussion to regard the immigrants as being of a lower type intellectually than we are and as having lesser attainments along political lines than we have.

Mr. FORKE: I do not think I heard that statement made in the House, this afternoon, anyway.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Further than that, there has been, at least on the part of some, a feeling that some of these immigrants may be possible criminals and that a very careful investigation ought to be made before they are granted citizenship. I would remind hon. members that a large number of our immigrants come to us from northern Europe and from the United States; that they are self-respecting, intelligent citizens, accustomed to a high standing of political life in their own country, and that they come here expecting to be granted similar rights and privileges in the country which they hope to make the land of their adoption. Under our existing law we ask them to wait for five years before they can be granted the full privileges of citizenship. I think that in regard to a very considerable number of immigrants that provision works a good deal of hardship. Five years is a long time in our young and rapidly developing country for a man to be engaged in agriculture or in any other industry without having the privilege of a voice in the affairs of the country and in the making of its laws through the sending of their representatives to parliament. I would not say that those people who are more backward, who have no knowledge of our parliamentary institutions and perhaps but a slight knowledge of our language, should not be required to wait that length of time, but I would emphasize that five years is a long time to keep a great many prospective citizens waiting. Then, when they reach the end of that five years they find it extremely difficult, in some instances at least, to obtain their citizenship. I think of one particular case of a gentleman in whose history I have been a little bit interested—and I am sure the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray) will bear me out; we were discussing this matter not very long ago—a gentleman who is a graduate of a Canadian university, who is spoken of in the very highest terms by the professors in that institution, and yet who is unable to obtain his papers, because of the arbitrary decision of the Secretary of State. The gentleman to whom I refer occupies a position of responsibility with a reputable organization, yet, after a good many years in this country, after qualifying himself for a first class position by attendance at a university, he is unable to obtain the citizenship which Canada ought to grant to him. The Secretary of State suggests that he is responsible to this House in regard to his action, yet I take it that in practice it is extremely difficult for those of us who want to see that justice is done to these immigrants to have the decision changed when it comes to a particular case of this kind.

I would further like to call the attention of the committee to the relationship of this naturalization law to other laws on our statute books. For instance, we have an Immigration Act; and we are told that we do not need to worry very much about men who are liable to deportation, because if they stay in this country for five years they may become naturalized. They may; but on the other hand, if they are naturalized under present regulations which have existed for a considerable number of years, they may be denaturalized at the will of the Secretary of State. We talk about British citizenship being held in high repute, and I think we all in this House hope that that may be case. But the alien who is coming in here and is anxious to obtain Canadian citizenship cannot hold it as a very valuable thing when at the instance of one man he may be denaturalized and thereby lose all the rights and privileges which ought to come through the obtaining of Canadian citizenship. That is one of the points that comes up in connection with the Immigration Act; these two acts dovetail one into the other. So I would emphasize that the non-Canadian-born immigrant who comes in here not only has no rights during the first five years of his residence, but may, even after he has been naturalized, have his rights taken away from him by arbitrary action.

Up to the present the arbitrary powers of the Secretary of State have been largely confined to the taking away of naturalization, but by this proposed amendment he will have it in his power to refuse naturalization. Surely if we are really living in a democracy the friends and neighbours of the immigrants, those people of the same community ought to have the right to decide whether or not a man should obtain citizenship. In some debates on the floor of this House we have had the rights of the provinces very jealously guarded. I would like to think that the communities ought to be guarded so that people out in my own province, for instance, would have a perfect right to take into their fellowship those whom they think suitable for that citizenship. It might very readily be that the ideas of the people in my own city of Winnipeg or in my own province of Manitoba might differ from those of the people in Ottawa. I think then that we in Manitoba ought to decide who are the right and proper persons to be taken into the citizenship of Manitoba. I think it can be readily seen that some of the opinions at least of the residents of the province of British Columbia differ from those of the peoples in eastern Canada. Although I cannot agree with all the positions of the people of British Columbia I would say that to a very large extent the people of British Columbia ought to decide who are the right and proper persons to be taken into their citizenship. The whole thing ought not to be left to the arbitrary power of the Secretary of State.

We have had a good deal said there with regard to the necessity of keeping out undesirables, of being very careful to safeguard the rights of citizenship. I agree with a good deal of that. On the other hand I would like to point out to you that we ought to be eager to admit to citizenship every worthy resident of Canada. We have had a good deal of talk in recent years about the necessity of bringing about reforms through constitutional means. I would suggest that if you do not enfranchise the people they have no opportunity of bringing about the reforms which they desire through constitutional means. I have been trying as best I can to represent one considerable section of this community, the Labour people, and I have found as I have gone in and out of a good many camps in northern Ontario, in Nova Scotia and away out in British Columbia that a very considerable proportion of the people who are engaged in the work of this country are without the opportunity of really doing anything through what we term constitutional means. The same thing is true of a very considerable number of people in the agricultural districts of the three prairie provinces. We say to them: Use the parliamentary machine; elect your members to parliament. I have been trying to say that to them, and they retort: We are without the vote; we do not find it possible for us to obtain the vote. Thus we are rapidly coming to the position where if this political franchise is not given men will be driven to take action along other lines. I would submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that whilst we try to safeguard the franchise, whilst we try to exercise reasonable precautions in admitting people to the citizenship of this country, there is another danger, and that is that we make a very considerable number of the people of this country feel that it is hardly worth while. By making it too difficult we almost compel them to attempt to bring about what they desire in this country through means other than those which we call parliamentary.

I am not going to speak at length with regard to the centralization of the whole of this authority. I would join with others who have spoken on that and ask that the Secretary of State reconsider this whole matter. I think it is for him to work out a scheme whereby people in the local districts would have a right to admit or reject people to their citizenship: We have the responsibility here of protesting against the centralization of all authority in the hands of one man. In Canada we are a great people of between eight and nine millions. We are throwing open our doors and saying that we hope to have hundreds of thousands of people take up their residence among us and ultimately become citizens of Canada. It seems absolutely absurd that we should say that one man out of the eight or nine millions of people in Canada is to have the absolute decision as to how many people and what people shall come in through the gate of citizenship and whether or not when they do come in they may be ejected at his will.

Mr. PUTNAM: Is the hon. gentleman aware that the proposed change does not enlarge the power of the Secretary of State to deny naturalization?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As I understand it, he has the power to denaturalize.

Mr. PUTNAM: The hon. member dropped some remarks which would imply that the power of the Secretary of State to deny naturalization was enlarged by this act. That of course is not so.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As a matter of procedure, is he not seeking to secure more power?

Mr. PUTNAM: To refuse naturalization?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Not to refuse, but to say whether a man shall be admitted to naturalization.

Mr. PUTNAM: It is the same thing. There is no proposal here to enlarge that power of denial.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My point was that he already has the power. At least upon his recommendation a man may be denaturalized. Here is the clause to which I referred:

> Without prejudice to the foregoing provisions the Governor in Council shall by order revoke a certificate of naturalization granted by the Secretary of State of Canada under this act, or granted under any Naturalization Act heretofore in force in Canada in any case in which he is, upon the report of the Secretary of State of Canada, satisfied that the person to whom the certificate was granted, was Among a number of other things, > not of good character at the date of the grant of the certificate.

There is nothing specific as to what is intended by good character. It simply means that if any man is obnoxious to the Secretary of State or indeed to the party in power at any particular time he may be declared to have been not of good character at the date of the granting of the certificate, and without any trial whatever the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the Secretary of State may cancel his certificate of naturalization.

Mr. PUTNAM: I rather took it that the major burden of the hon. gentleman's remarks was a complaint about the ungenerosity of our naturalization laws, and, perhaps inadvertently, he dropped remarks which could only mean that the power of the Secretary of State of denying naturalization had been enlarged by this change. If there is no misunderstanding it is entirely all right.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I did not intend to say that the power technically or legally had been enlarged, but I do insist that by granting the Secretary of State such absolute arbitrary power the situation is materially affected. If he chooses so to do he can without any reference to the people of the community deny to large numbers of people the right to become citizens.

Mr. MILLAR: I had not intended to take any part in this discussion, but some remarks dropped by the Secretary of State cause me to do so. I think he is under a little misapprehension in regard to the difficulties of the process of securing citizenship. I have the honour to represent a constituency where there are a goodly number of foreigners and I would just like to point out this: Each one does not have to travel fifty or one hundred miles to lay his case before a district court judge. What is usually done is that an application is made by a number of foreigners. They usually live in groups in the country and they make application to the district court judge to hold a sitting in their midst. I am not so closely in touch with the working out of this plan that I am prepared to say that in no case has the judge refused, but I know of many cases where the judge has acceded to the request and has held the sitting in their midst. That enables them to reach the judge by travelling a distance of ten, twelve or fifteen miles or perhaps less. Such a procedure is comparatively easy. I was glad to hear the minister state that he did not think it wise to place unnecessary obstacles in the way of applicants for naturalization. I cannot conceive of the reasoning which seeks to prove that a man is likely to become a better citizen if he is made to drive one hundred miles rather than ten or fifteen miles. I cannot see that an applicant is likely to experience a change of heart in the right direction by having to drive a longer distance. To have to drive a distance of one hundred miles and probably remain a couple of days from home is a handicap that should not be placed in the way of those endeavouring to obtain citizenship. I thoroughly approve of an examination to see that applicants are properly qualified, that they are inspired by high ideals, and that they are anxious to become good citizens.

The remarks of the minister touching the present system did not impress themselves strongly upon me. I have heard no objection to the present plan. It seems to me that an inquiry by a competent official comparatively near to the home of the applicant is a proper thing. The Canadian neighbours of applicants who have known them day in and day out perhaps for five years, perhaps for a longer period, are the proper persons to give information to the judge as to the kind of citizens they are likely to make.

I cannot agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Woodsworth) when he speaks of all these foreigners as coming to Canada with very high ideals of citizenship. From my experience—and I have come into contact with many of them—they have been imbued in their homeland with a fixed hatred of government control and of government institutions. They are ready to oppose anything in the form of government, and it takes some little time for their minds to be disabused of that idea; it takes some little time for them to realize that they are living in a country where they can enjoy greater freedom than they did in the countries from which they came. I do not think that a residence of five years in Canada is too long to insist upon. I would be very sorry to see the present arrangement changed because I fear there might be abuses just before election time. I would cast no reflection whatever upon the motives of the minister. I do not for a moment think that he would take advantage of the change that is proposed in the law in order to naturalize a goodly number of foreigners on the eve of an election. Nevertheless, I submit that at a time like this, when people are worked up to a white heat of excitement, there are persons, anxious to roll up as big a vote as possible, who would not hesitate at any means in order to get these foreigners naturalized. That might be done possibly without the minister's knowledge. I think that to require applications to be posted in the office of the clerk of the court for three months is a splendid safeguard and would prevent a great number of foreigners being naturalized just in time to cast their votes. I think we are far more likely to get a good class of citizens naturalized, and far more likely to weed out undesirables, when the naturalization proceedings take place some months before an election.

I have listened carefully to the discussion and I must say that I am in sympathy with the present system with, perhaps, some little modification. Personally I have not been able readily to see the difficulties complained of, but if there are such I would be willing to agree to some slight modification to bring about an improvement; but the idea of centralizing these proceedings and giving so much power to one man does not meet with my sympathy.

[Mr. Millar.]

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I think the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) has about the right idea with regard to the Naturalization Act. I say that as one having had considerable experience under the old Naturalization Act, and under the present Naturalization Act passed in 1914. I was very glad indeed to hear the Secretary of State say that he was open to receive suggestions and to consider them. Such an attitude on the part of a minister leads to that serious consideration which a bill of this character merits, and I feel quite sure that he meant what he said in that respect. In view of the minister's statement I will try to add something to the suggestions already advanced. It is true that in 1914, when the present Naturalization Act was introduced members sitting on the same side of the House as the Secretary of State strongly opposed giving the minister the discretionary powers which he exercises under the act. Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself doubted the wisdom of giving so much discretion to the Secretary of State. In reply to his remarks Mr. Doherty, then Minister of Justice, said:

> Of course if our position is that in Canada we can never produce any man to fill any position to whom discretion can be confined, then this is too wide a power to give to the Secretary of State, but, if it is a useful thing to this country that there should be a discretionary power, I would have to admit that we could not do it, because we never can get a Secretary of State who can be trusted to exercise his discretion about a matter of this sort.

I think Mr. Doherty was quite correct in his view. As I understand it, what is objected to now is not that the present discretionary power of the Secretary of State should be continued but that the discretionary power vested in the judges should be wiped out. I think that the provision of the act of 1914 requiring the applicant to appear personally before a judge for examination is a very necessary precaution. As was pointed out by the leader of the Opposition it does not follow, that because the judge gives a favourable certificate of recommendation the Secretary of State must of necessity grant the applicant naturalization; he does not have to do anything of the kind. There must, however, be a favourable report from the judge before the applicant can be naturalized. I think it would be a mistake to wipe out the necessity of an examination before a judge. I may be mistaken, but I venture to say that the desire on the part of the department to make this change at the present time has arisen out of a course pursued by a certain judge in the province of British Columbia who in his wisdom—and very properly I think; I entirely commend him for what he did in the matter—in almost every instance refused to give a certificate of recommendation to Japanese applying to be naturalized as British subjects. The judge in question saw through their subterfuges, and notwithstanding the strong pressure which was brought to bear on him absolutely declined to recommend that Japanese be naturalized as British subjects. I do not think that altogether suited the officials of the Department of the Secretary of State. Consequently it may be for that reason they wish to obviate the necessity for the judicial examination. I think in most cases where the judges refuse to recommend naturalization they are acting on reasonable grounds and according to their best judgment.

I do not think that the delay of three months prescribed by the act is undesirable. A person must live in Canada for a considerable number of years before he is eligible to be naturalized. It is better that there should be a delay of three months in these naturalization cases rather than that naturalization proceedings should be rushed through on the eve of an election. They should not want this citizenship merely to vote at a particular election. Citizenship carries with it a great deal more than that. They have been considering the matter and qualifying themselves for some years, so I do not think a period of three months is too long for the procedure.

I was struck with the remark made by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown), when he said that he regretted seeing large bunches of naturalization certificates go through. Perhaps he has had the same experience as I have had in seeing large bunches of naturalization certificates go through. I have seen them go through by the hundreds up in the very territory that the Secretary of State (Mr. Copp) referred to, the Yukon territory. In 1902, on the eve of an election, I have seen them go through by the hundreds, go through so fast that they did not take time to register them. I have seen them go through on the same date as the notices of application, whereas three weeks' notice was required. It was just a case of one, two, three, and out. I say in the light of experience that the necessity for centralization of this power to naturalize is great, and that you should not distribute it over the country at large. If that centralization had been required in those days, that abuse could never have been perpetrated. At that time people were naturalized or allegedly naturalized, who, as a matter of fact, never became British subjects, and for years they did not find out that they had been duped. That was due to a slipshod Naturalization Act, taken advantage of by officials who knew better.

The Secretary of State would be well advised to consider the matter carefully before he wipes out the provision requiring that an applicant shall get a favourable recommendation from a county judge before he can have a certificate of naturalization. I for one do not object to having the final discretion vested in the Secretary of State; I think that is the proper official to exercise that discretion and to give final judgment; but great care should be taken in bringing the application up for his final decision. It would be a mistake to do away with the present necessity for a favourable certificate by a judge.

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): I do not wish to reiterate arguments that have been advanced; but I want to state to the minister that I am one of those ordinary members to whom he refers, and whom he could excuse for having suspicions of his bill. The reasons I have suspicions of the power which this bill would confer on the Secretary of State are the same as those enunciated by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black). He referred to the year 1902. A little later than that, similar cases came under my observation in a district that I know very well, where naturalization certificates were issued, I am sure, by the score, and I think I would be safe in using the same expression the hon. member did in his case, that hundreds were issued. I am not stating that the people who so secured their naturalization papers, were not, in the majority of cases, entitled to them. Probably they were; but I know in that rush a goodly number were not entitled to them, and the whole effect of that procedure was to cheapen, to lessen the intrinsic value of the citizenship so acquired.

I am in favour of some action being taken towards the end which, I think, the Secretary of State had in view when he prepared this bill, that is, to place this valuable acquirement of citizenship within the reach of those to whom it is due. It has been pointed out—and I think it should be emphasized—that a goodly number, probably the majority of those who will be applying for citizenship in this country in the next few years, will be those immigrants who have come to our shores, and who in the years prior to their application for citizenship, have been pioneers in our frontier settlements. The conditions which surround them should be taken into consideration, because the majority that this legislation will provide for will be such as those. If the conditions, the regulations, which are to surround our immigration policy are properly carried out, those who come to our country in the next few years will be placed in what may be termed our frontier settlements; they will be pursuing agriculture. I have in mind at the present time a settlement within my constituency where there are, or were last fall, many people living who are entitled to citizenship so far as I understand the matter; that is, they have performed the necessary residence duties and other requirements. But because this would take at least four days, and that, providing that the court was prepared to receive and consider their applications immediately on their arrival at the court, and because it would cost them a very considerable sum of money, they were unable to secure their citizenship papers. They had made application to have an officer or the judge himself come to them. I was glad to hear my colleague the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) state that he knew of cases where judges, by coming to settlements like that, had made it possible for such people to secure their citizenship papers. I do not know of any such case, and it was stated to me by a judge of my province that he had no authority to hold sittings outside of those places appointed in the calendar, and that he could not come to those who so requested. The people in the settlement to which I refer were willing to pay all the expenses of the judge or any deputy or officer he would appoint to come to them. That would be a small thing compared with the combined expenses of the whole settlement in going for their naturalization papers. That is only one instance in many, and in a case like that some action is necessary along the line which the minister, I think, had in mind when he drafted this bill.

But I am afraid in the terms of the bill as he has presented it to us, he did not properly safeguard the giving of citizenship rights. I feel that that should be safeguarded, and there are ways of doing so. The Secretary of State, in making his remarks to-night, rather discredited or discounted the value of posting in post offices notices of application for citizenship. I can fully understand, in the example he gave and similar examples, where that is of little value. In a post office in a city or a large town, that probably would not be a good way of giving publicity to the fact that individuals were applying for citizenship rights. But, perhaps, the minister and many hon. members can understand that in rural post offices these notices do receive attention, for the very reason that I argued just a moment ago that that is where most of these would and should be posted under the cases that this legislation would be providing for in the next few years, I want to give a concrete instance of this. Just a few years ago, a short time ago, in a rural post office, notices of application for citizenship were posted by a number of persons who, under the law which at present exists, were not entitled to apply for citizenship. They were of enemy alien extraction in nationality; but by giving a wrong birthplace on their application to the clerk of the court, they thought to overcome that difficulty and to secure the right of citizenship. Their applications were posted in the rural post office, and because they came from a settlement where many others knew them intimately, having come from the old country with them, this point received attention; notice was given to the clerk of the court, and those persons who so made application did not wrongfully receive their citizenship rights at that time.

In all cases where rural conditions exist, those who know best the qualifications of applicants for citizenship are the people of the district and those who are or have been neighbours of the persons applying. I would suggest then that this provision should not be done away with. Whether it should go to the judge of the court or whether the Secretary of State should have the privileges and judicial rights of the judge in that respect, I am not at all particular.

But I do say that at least sufficient notice should be given in the district or the municipality in which the application is made, so that those who know intimately the history and the immediate past of the persons so applying may have an opportunity, just as is provided in the old act, of filing in the court opposition to the application, stating the ground on which they base that opposition. If that provision had been embodied in the bill I think I would have supported the minister and favoured the bill as he brought it down. But because I feel he has not placed sufficient safeguards around the granting of naturalization I am opposed to the measure. I believe that if this bill were to be made law and to be put into force the conditions would be very similar to those that existed previous to 1914, and I am sure that a number of hon. members in this House know what those conditions were in certain districts at that time, at least in the West.

Mr. STORK: I want to say a few words in support of the minister and I shall do so for the reason that as I have observed the process of our naturalization law in the province of British Columbia, it has not functioned properly. I do not agree with the suggestion that has been made that the minister is seeking to have this bill passed in order to use it in any arbitrary or partisan way. I disagree entirely with the remarks of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black) in which he suggests that the minister is more or less anxious to have the bill passed so that he may be able to facilitate the granting of naturalization to orientals. It is in regard to the naturalization of orientals that I desire to speak briefly. I have found, in my experience in British Columbia, that there has never yet been any objection to any application for naturalization. What is everybody's business is apparently nobody's business. The application forms are posted up at the usual place, but no one takes any notice of them. They go through a certain process and are finally approved of; but I never yet knew of anyone protesting their acceptance. Some time ago in British Columbia in connection with the fishing regulations legislation was passed providing that no fishing licenses should be issued to any man who was not a British subject either by birth or by naturalization. That was believed to be the proper means of preventing orientals from taking part in the fishing industry. But we found almost instantly that orientals were being naturalized wholesale. I am thoroughly in sympathy with the minister's bill, for this reason, that we shall be able to fix the responsibility in this matter. Up to the present time we have never been able to determine just who was responsible for the wholsale granting of naturalization papers to orientals. I was present at a meeting in the city of Prince Rupert at which a man directly interested in the fishing industry made a significant remark. He said, "You expect to prohibit, from fishing, people, who are not British subjects. Let me tell you that all the fishermen on the Skeena river are British subjects; and I will tell you more than that. There were 75 of them naturalized in your own town last summer and no one knew anything about it". The member for Yukon makes the suggestion that the minister is endeavouring to override the expressed opinion of one of the judges in the city of Vancouver. Well, I am supporting the minister in this bill because I want to determine just who is responsible for the issuing of papers, and I shall be able under this legislation to know who is responsible for granting naturalization to people who should not be naturalized. There is one other point. I find that when any man desires to become naturalized the usual method is to appear before a lawyer, at least in British Columbia; and the standard fee in the section of the country from which I come is $25 for the legal work in connection therewith.

I do not regard this bill as an autocratic move on the part of the government or an attempt to secure autocratic powers by the minister. Rather, I consider it to be the embodiment of the principle of responsible government. Someone has to be responsible for the granting of naturalization papers, and if you are going to have responsible government you must make the proper minister answerable for his actions. If we do that we shall be able to determine just exactly where the fault lies when papers are issued to persons who are not entitled to them.

Mr. JACOBS: I have to approach this question rather cautiously—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. JACOBS: —because it is not so very long ago that I sat with my party in the cold shade of opposition; and I find on referring to Hansard that my argument addressed to the committee at that time was identically the same as the argument made to-day by the present opposition.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You were wrong.

Mr. JACOBS: I do not know whether I was wrong, but certain changes have taken place in the complexion of the House which incline me to take another view, because when I was then talking against the same question now before the House the Secretary of State was an entirely different person from the Secretary of State to-day. So that conditions are not quite the same. I remember trying to wax eloquent when I pointed out the danger to which the public might be exposed were we to put into the hands of the Secretary of State this power of granting or withholding certificates of naturalization, involving as it did the franchise, particularly on the eve of a general election. But it was stated at the time, I think by the member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), who was in charge of the bill on that occasion, that the Secretary of State or some person representing the government would have to be a party to the granting of naturalization certificates, inasmuch as the bill came to us from England. The bill had to be fashioned on the English act, and it was indicated that the administration had to be a party to legislation of this kind, and to the granting of certificates of imperial naturalization. We were therefore limited to the discussion of the entire question. The government said at the time, "Unless you take this you cannot have Imperial naturalization."

I do not know whether it is generally known to this committee that previous to 1914 we had a naturalization law which conferred upon the applicant merely a limited form of naturalization, or one that declared that the applicant was to be a British subject within the Dominion of Canada and not elsewhere. By the new act of 1914 and its amendments, Imperial naturalization was granted to applicants and we abolished the restricted or purely Canadian form of naturalization. Consequently we had to conform to the rules insisted upon by the British government. I understand that under the British system it is not necessary that the judicial authorities should in any way be parties to the granting of certificates of naturalization. It is purely a matter of state, for the administration. Involving citizenship and franchise, it was declared to be a matter not within the purview of the judicial authorities but merely one for the Secretary of State or some other member of the administration.

At present we have dual systems working together; we have the judicial and we have the executive. As was very well pointed out to-day, the Secretary of State has some responsibility; if any abuses arise under his department in regard to granting naturalization they can be brought before the House and before the country, they can be made the subject of discussion on the hustings, and consequently the Secretary of State, no matter how favourable he may be to his own party would have to go rather gingerly and refrain from doing anything which the law declared he should not do. The Under Secretary of State, who has charge of these matters reports that the present system is altogether unworkable, that it is cumbersome and useless, and he asks for a change. Now, the Secretary of State himself says he is not particularly wedded to this proposed section.

Mr. CARROLL: Is it not absolutely necessary in order to carry out the convention between the Imperial government and the colonies—

Mr. LAPOINTE: The dominions.

Mr. CARROLL: —and the dominions, yes, that we follow the lead given us in the Imperial legislation which takes away the power of granting naturalization from the judiciary and gives it to the executive?

Mr. JACOBS: That, I understand, is the rule in England. But we have attempted to be more careful and surrounded naturalization with more safeguards. Consequently we introduced the judiciary into the question. It seems to me that the Department of State can make exactly the same investigations as the judge does under the present system. I know something about how these petitions for naturalization are granted. Application is made by an attorney on behalf of the person desiring naturalization. Before decision is given by the judge an investigation is conducted—in the city of Montreal it is conducted by the Mounted Police, why I do not know, except that I suppose being a federal police force it is their duty to do that class of work. After the Mounted Police have investigated and reported that the applicant is a fit and proper person to be granted a certificate of naturalization, the judge in turn reports to the Department of State. Now, the Mounted Police might just as well report to the Department of State direct without the intervention of the court at all, and inasmuch as it is stated that the system at present is, as I said before, cumbersome and unworkable I would agree to the change suggested by the Secretary of State. Of course, if any other easier and more workable system can be suggested I am prepared to consider it and perhaps to vote for it. The Secretary of State has said that he is open to suggestions.

Mr. BAXTER: In the hon. member's opinion, whatever procedure is to be followed, whether a judicial, a police or any other sort of investigation, ought it not be set out in the act instead of being a matter of regulation?

Mr. JACOBS: I fancy the proposed bill is based pretty much upon the English practice.

Mr. BAXTER: It is an exact copy in section 25.

Mr. JACOBS: If it works well in England why should it not work equally well here? My hon. friend should be the very last person to oppose any English system, because he insists that nothing good can come out of any place except England.

Mr. BAXTER: Who?

Mr. JACOBS: And perhaps I ought to add New Brunswick.

Mr. BAXTER: I do not take that view. Very many good things come out of Quebec, you know, including my hon. friend.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. JACOBS: And very many good things go in from Quebec. I would point out to the committee that we must be careful in making changes in this law because we may find ourselves outside the privilege given us by the British government on Imperial naturalization. We have to follow certain well defined rules to secure such naturalization.

Mr. BAXTER: Then at that rate we must have been outside for some years.
