Immigration, too, must receive attention. I believe in bringing in immigrants of the right kind, but I would close the door against Asiatics. As I come from British Columbia no one will want me to give reasons for their exclusion. It is sufficient to say that the Asiatic cannot assimilate with us and has a standard of living which makes it impossible for us to compete with him. But in bringing in immigrants we must secure those who will give promise of making good in this country. And when they get here we should not leave them alone, we should give them every assistance and through various institutions see that they derive full benefit from our assistance. I am not one of those who believe in bringing in immigrants indiscriminately and dumping them on the land. I believe in a vigorous immigration policy, but before we attempt to place any large number of immigrants on the land we should begin to put our own house in order. We can hardly expect the immigrant to remain with us if his neighbours tell him they are not making a dollar out of their farming; such a doleful tale will make him anxious to cross the line into the United States. I think the farmer in many instances has just cause of complaint in large sections of our country owing to conditions that have prevailed during recent years. Therefore I think we should improve conditions and particularly develop his market, because there is no better method of helping a farmer than the assurance that after he has his goods produced he can sell them at a profit.

I think there is much to be done by the farmer and the city man getting closer together and having a better understanding of each other. We do not know enough of each other. We should join each other's organizations. The city man should take an interest in the local fairs and in whatever is being done by the farmers in his particular neighbourhood; on the other hand, the farmer should take a reciprocal interest in the city man's activities. It is only in this way that they can render a great deal of assistance to each other.

I feel that this is no time for pessimism. I was born out on the Pacific coast and never saw a railroad train or a street car until I was over fifteen years of age, and then I had to go to Oregon to see them. In those days we had to journey to San Francisco—800 miles south—to get a train for Toronto or Ottawa. We depended on saddle horses and teams to travel about the country. But it is all humbug to get pessimistic in a country like this, a country greater in area than the United States, possessing vast resources, and with only nine million people. Probably we have the greatest wealth per capita of any country in the world. And certainly no country that went through the whole war is in a better position to-day than Canada.

Some of our settlers in coming here should not expect all the comforts that they enjoyed in the beautiful old lands of England or Scotland—I do not include Ireland because it is not restful enough over there. The splendid markets close at hand, the beautifully paved roads, the nice hedges, the blooming pubs at every crossroads—these conveniences cannot be expected in Canada; this country is too new. We are bound to rough it. This generation and even the next are pioneers compared with the people of Great Britain, and it will take several generations before we get our farms in the same first-class shape as the farmers are used to in the Old Land—properly under-drained, with good buildings and every convenience. But while we have to endure hardships they are as nothing in comparison with the hardships of the old pioneers, who had to carry on their farms a long way from a railroad with bad roads, no telephones, no telegraphs, no rural mail delivery—in fact they only got a mail at their village once in a while—and with implements of the crudest kind. For instance, they had to mow their grass and cut their grain with a scythe around the stumps and bind it with straw. And not one of them ever thought of mounting any of those stumps and making a speech, simply because there was no one to listen to him. The markets, too, were in very bad shape at that particular time. Let me give you an illustration. When I determined to make these few remarks I wrote to a friend of mine out on the Pacific coast. I knew he had been brought up in Bruce county and therefore I expected a good deal from him. I was not disappointed. Here is what he has to say of his early life on the farm:

> Of one thing I can assure you, these pioneers were not spoiled by too much paternalism on the part of the government. One of the principal reasons that new settlers fail to make good now is that they expect too much of the government and rely on their own efforts too little.
> There surely should be no poor or hungry people in Canada with its millions of acres of vacant land waiting to be cultivated. Our great problem is to get people on the land and keep them there.
>
> We were a family of 13, including my parents, on an average Ontario bush farm. We had plenty of food and clothing, which we produced ourselves, but no money. I have helped my father butcher a dozen fine pea fed hogs and when he hauled them frozen to market, was only offered 2½c. per pound for them and part of that to be taken out in trade. I have carried a heavy basket of geese to town with my dear mother, who carried a heavier one, and was glad to get 9c. per pound in trade for them. All our neighbors had similar experiences. With the exception of money, most of the things we needed were produced at home. There was very little discontent. It was fashionable to marry early, have large families and depend on ourselves.
> I venture to think that these conditions produced a better citizenship than are produced to-day by all the spoon feeding done by federal, provincial and municipal governments.

In comparison with those conditions—and I know that description is from a man who is telling the absolute truth—I feel that some of those who are complaining so bitterly and so loudly to-day are merely a sort of ginger pop edition of those old pioneers—plenty of gas and no kick.

It may be said, Mr. Speaker, that our prospects for development are practically unlimited, and in submitting the following summary to the House for the benefit of our agriculturists I am not presuming to advise them; these are merely a few comments Anyway those to whom we offer advice always enjoy this advantage: They do not have to take it if they do not want it. This is my summary. We should:

1. Facilitate and encourage production and better methods of farming by the medium of education, demonstration and illustration.

2. Encourage a system of mixed farming with live stock as a basis.

3. Increase and encourage better feeding, finishing and marketing of live stock.

4. Develop our export trade.

5. Expand our marketing policy in every possible way and place our goods on the market of such quailty and in such condition as to enable us to meet successfully any competition that might offer and to secure the best prices.

6. Improve and extend our facilities for handling perishable products.

7. Carefully conserve the health of our live stock and maintain the high reputation we now enjoy in this connection.

8. Assist in the development of special lines of production which have not yet thoroughly become established.

9. Encourage co-operation and co-operative selling.

10. Improve transportation facilities for handling our products.

11. Investigate the possibility of securing cheaper money for our farmers so as to enable them to increase their products.

12. Encourage the manufacture of home products and in that way encourage the farmer.

A policy of this kind, I feel, is absolutely safe and should bring nothing but good results. We cannot hope to meet our present obligations by economy alone; although the practice of economy should be carefully followed—intelligent expenditure where good and prompt results are assured should be indulged in. I am a firm believer in Canada and Canada's future. After visiting many parts of the English speaking world I have been even more strongly impressed with our wonderful opportunities, there should be no pessimism, in my opinion, in the bosoms of true Canadians. With an intelligent handling of the situation, with the splendid Canadian spirit behind us, there can be only one result, Mr. Speaker, if we work together, and that is, success.

Mr. W. J. LOVIE (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer my congratulations to our worthy Finance Minister (Mr Fielding) on the occasion of his bringing down his seventeenth budget. The occasion is a very unusual one; and I would also congratulate the government on the fact that they have with them a gentleman whose parliamentary career has been so long and so distinguished. The Finance Minister is the "grand old man" of Canadian politics, and we all wish that he may long be spared to give the government of this country the benefit of his advice and assistance. We may well say of him, as was said of one of old, "As thy days, so shall thy strength be."

I would like also to offer congratulations to the government upon the fact that the British embargo upon Canadian cattle has been removed. That is something that those of us who have been engaged in agriculture in Canada have been looking forward to for a number of years. It is now over thirty years since the embargo was placed upon Canadian cattle by Great Britain. I know from personal experience, having been in Scotland twenty-one years ago, that the farmers in that country were looking anxiously for the removal of the embargo because they wished to be able to get stockers from Canada. As to who was instrumental in bringing about the removal of the embargo, we do not know. Whether it was Mr. Duncan Marshall, the Hon. Manning Doherty, the late government or the present government, we do not know, and we do not care; we will give any of them credit for it if they were responsible for it. The one thing that we are glad of is that we now have this market in Great Britain for our cattle. Particularly during the last two or three years Canada has needed that market very badly. There was a good market for Canadian cattle during the time of the war when we had free access to the markets to the south of us, but since the Fordney tariff took effect it seems as if a cyclone had struck the western Canadian cattle raisers. Although we have a market now in Great Britain, we must realize that the United States market would be of much greater value to us because it is much nearer and the freight rates involved would be much less. There is considerable difference between the prices in the United States market and in the Winnipeg market for instance; it would be of great advantage to us if we could get the price obtained by the farmer to the south of us. I have taken two prices for the purposes of comparison. On the first of March, 1923—and I take this date because I obtained the prices when the debate on immigration was in progress; I thought I might use the figures then, but it was not necessary—the Breeders' Gazette of Chicago and the Manitoba Free Press, Winnipeg, showed that choice steers were on that day quoted in Chicago at from $10.00 to $10.50, and in Winnipeg at $5.75, so that the price in the United States was almost double the price in Canada. We have not access to that market, but we have access to the British market. I have here a recent press clipping concerning a shipment of Canadian cattle that landed in Dundee. These cattle were sold on the British market at an average of £32 5s. each, or $13.80 per hundredweight. Now, that is a very good price, as we look for prices in this country. One of the steers in this shipment weighed 1,850 pounds, something that is very unusual.

The hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie), in his able address, mentioned the fact that the cattle in the Canadian West were not heavy enough to secure a good price. I believe he is absolutely right as regards the British market; for that market we can grow cattle to any size we like. But it has been my personal experience during the last two years that heavy cattle were at a discount in the local market in Manitoba. We were not able to keep steers until they were three years old; if we did there would be a cut of a cent a pound on them. In other words, the local market would not pay full price for anything over twelve hundred pounds, and you cannot raise steers up to three years old and stall-feed them without having them go up to fourteen or fifteen hundred pounds. But as I say, the Old Country market should be able to absorb our cattle no matter what their weight might be.

A good many of the Old Country men are kicking, not about the quality of the Canadian cattle that are going over, but about the fact that they are not stockers although they are shipped as such. Really finished cattle are being shipped as stockers, whereas these men wish to take stockers from two-and-a-half to three years old, finish them over there, and sell them as British beef. There is an unlimited amount of cattle in this western country and any number of them could be raised if there was an assurance of an available market. I have under my hand an editorial from the Winnipeg Free Press of a recent date which states that there are in Alberta to-day 1,653,000 head of cattle, in Manitoba, 740,740; in Saskatchewan, 1,602.000, and that hundreds, yes, thousands more could be raised, because pasture is good, cheap and plentiful; and that the British buyer could take an unlimited quantity of them. The western provinces have been hampered because of an insufficient market during the last couple of years for their live stock, but we are happy to say that there seems to be some sign of a better market for the future.

Now, I am not going to say very much about the budget; I am going to deal more particularly with agricultural conditions. The hon. member for Victoria City is opposed to oriental immigration because he comes from British Columbia, and one would naturally expect that. Well, I come from the prairie provinces, and naturally I am opposed to protection. Protection means that the farmer is working under a double standard, one standard to sell his goods by and another to purchase by. If the prairie provinces were not blessed with such fertile soil, such abundant sunshine and such favourable weather conditions, if it were not naturally a good country, the farmers could not possibly succeed under that condition of a double standard. We sell in competition with the world, our market is on the other side of the Atlantic. We grow the finest wheat grown anywhere in the world except in part of the United States and part of Russia. On the other hand, we purchase in what is known as the dearest country to live in. But an end must come to all things, and the farmers of the West are getting very hard up simply because they are not able to make a living under what is known as the double standard. So naturally a protectionist budget such as is now brought down is not going to get much support from the Progressive members. There is in Saskatchewan a Liberal government, and I have here a clipping from the Winnipeg Free Press giving what Premier Dunning of Saskatchewan says about the present tariff brought down in this parliament by the Minister of Finance. He says:

> The 1919 national platform indicates the basis of tariff stability, which is the goal of Liberalism and no finance minister has the right to change at will the tariff policy enunciated by the most representative gathering of Liberals ever held in Canada. The previous budget and the present one, while not fulfilling our hopes of tariff reduction might, nevertheless, be acceptable under present conditions as a moderate step in the direction laid down by the National Convention, but I do not know a western Liberal who will consent to the government discarding for the future the tariff chart placed in the hands of the Liberal leader in 1919.

Mr. Dunning is very much opposed to this budget because it is not in line with the tariff plank of the Liberal platform of 1919. I have here an extract from a speech delivered by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, that great old Liberal chieftain, in Winnipeg just after the Liberal Convention of 1893. That is going back quite a little bit, but here is something that I can absolutely subscribe to. Speaking of the Liberal party he declared that he stood for freedom. He said:

> I denounce the policy of protection as bondage, yea, bondage. I refer to bondage in the same manner as American slavery was bondage, not in the same degree perhaps, but in the same manner. In the same manner the people of Canada, the inhabitants of Winnipeg particularly are toiling for a master who takes away not every cent of profit but a very large proportion of your earnings for which you sweat and toil.

That is Sir Wilfrid Laurier on protection.

We hear a good deal about a revenue tariff. A question was asked about it in this House this afternoon. Well, a revenue tariff seems very easy to explain. It is said that you cannot have a tariff without the protective feature in it. If you have a tariff on goods that are manufactured in the country, and there is also an excise duty on these goods collected by the Dominion government, there is no protection at all in such a tariff. A definition of a tariff for revenue will be found at page 2361 of the 1922 Hansard. This was given by the hon. member for Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Kyte), and is in my opinion about as good a definition of a tariff for revenue as it is possible to find. I am happy to say that we in the western provinces are not alone in asking for a tariff for revenue, for we find members from the lower provinces who know the disadvantages of protection just as much as we do willing to assist us, I believe, in having the protective feature of the tariff wiped out. Of course, we know that the revenue has to be raised. We do not object to paying taxes; we do not object to paying heavy taxes; but we wish to see them go into the Dominion treasury. We do not want to pay taxes to any protected manufacturer. We want the manufacturer to stand absolutely on his own feet.

We heard a good deal during the immigration debate about the condition of agriculture in western Canada. We heard from Alberta and from Saskatchewan. I am going to tell you now what Mr. Samuel Larcombe said at the convention of the Agricultural societies held in Winnipeg in January, 1922. If you do not know who Mr. Larcombe is I may say that he is an Englishman who has been farming in Birtle, Manitoba, a good many years. He has brought fame and renown to himself and Canada through the prizes he has taken for first-class grain of all kinds and garden products not only in Canada but in the United States. He is known wherever good grain is raised in America. He was president of the convention of Agricultural societies, and this is what he had to say of the wheat crop of 1921:

> There were a few men made money in 1921 if they got their wheat on the market very early in the season, but if the crop of 1921 had been sold and the receipts pooled it would not have paid more than fifty per cent of the cost of production.

The depression was not felt that particular fall because you will remember that was following the year when the wheat board was in existence and there was about fifty cents on every bushel of the 1920 crop coming in in 1921, which helped make up for the deficiency. But what did we find in the fall of 1922? We had one of the biggest crops there had been in western Canada for a long time. Canada looks for a market for her wheat in the Old Country, and I have here an extract from the Financial Post giving figures for the different countries to which Canada has been in the habit of shipping wheat, showing the per capita consumption of wheat for the years 1909 to 1913 and from 1914 to 1918:

Country—	Per Capita 1909-13	1914-18
Austria-Hungary	4.41	....
Belgium	8.53	....
France	9.12	7.81
Germany	3.35	....
India (British)	1.23	1.21
Italy	6.82	6.65
Japan	.57	.53
Netherlands	4.47	3.54
United Kingdom	6.14	6.08
United States	5.68	5.93

You will see that the United Kingdom and the United States have stayed very much on the same consumption level, but these other countries have fallen off very much in the amount of wheat they are taking, and consequently there is no market there.

I have here an account from the Financial Post of how the farmer's profits have decreased on the products he has to sell. In 1914 what the farmer had to sell represented an amount of 140.9. There was an increase of 30.6 in the price of what he sells; animals and meats, 18; dairy products an increase of 52.4. In groceries we find an increase of 70.1; boots and shoes an increase of 52, and in implements an increase of 123.5. On the whole the farmer receives an average of only 10.5 more for his products than in 1914 and he has to pay for his essential commodities 112 per cent more, so you will see that what he is selling now is down to a pre-war basis and that what he has to buy is on an average 112.3 per cent higher. That is the reason why he is so very hard up at the present time. Here is a short extract from the Financial Post on the farmer's profits:

> Anyone in close touch with western farmers knows they feel they have been unjustly treated over this year's crop.

That is the crop of 1922.

> It was the largest in volume ever harvested in western Canada and every one who touched it secured his usual profit, from the railway which hauled it from the country elevator, to the merchant who sold the flour—every one but the man who produced it. The most pressing need in this country is a method of making agriculture profitable. The vacant land can be settled, but it will be of little national value if it cannot be made to stay settled, and while the problem of the rural depletion is not entirely an economic one, it is partly that, perhaps very largely that, At least, rural life will not be satisfactory until it is profitable.

Farmer members have been trying to drive home that doctrine in this House, but it needs emphasis elsewhere, that the great necessity to-day is some method whereby agriculture can be made profitable. We are advised a good deal to go into mixed farming. That may be all right, but many hon. gentlemen who talk that way do not know what conditions are in the West. Hard wheat is a crop that can be raised in very few countries; it is native to western Canada. I have seen white fife brought from England and in two seasons if not in one it will become as hard as either marquis or red fife. You cannot grow any other variety of wheat in that part of this country; the grain becomes hard, and being hard it is very valuable. It is wanted in Great Britain for blending with other wheats, but of course the Britisher will not pay any more for his wheat than he has to, and consequently the question of keeping down the cost of production is what we have to study.

I would read another extract, taken from the Presbyterian Witness of May 10, 1923:

> The economic factor is dividing East and West. The soil of the prairies this year yielded crops half a billion of dollars in value, a little more than the value of the field crops of the rest of Canada. The yield of the forests, the fisheries and the mines of all Canada is about 50 millions less than that of the soil of western Canada. And yet of this enormous wealth—an almost incredibly large percentage—has gone East to discharge obligations to railways, banks, loan companies, manufacturers and wholesalers of farm machinery and other commodities. Very little remains with the farmers of the West. They see this enormous stream of wheat and stock pouring to the East and they wonder why their own comfort and well-being are so little improved.

The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) speaking two days ago said in the course of his able address that the farmers must work and save; they must practise economy. The hon. member did not say, but it is very often said, and the statement was made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) himself and has been repeated this evening, that the farmers must go into mixed farming. That point is stressed considerably. Well, I want to tell this House that in my district mixed farming has been practised for the last forty years, and last fall men were shipping all their cattle away because they considered it was no use keeping them any longer, for they made nothing out of them. If I might do so I might read a letter that appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of April 17, signed by one J. Scott. He says:

> What you say agrees with my experience of eleven years on a western farm, which I left because it was not a business proposition during the whole of that time. I put about $9,000 in it, and never made any interest on my investment or wages for myself, wife or three eldest children, who all worked. I had to compete with the local contractors for help during the brief periods I required it, and paid, including board, from $70 to $120 per month, which is more than the eastern manufacturer pays; and he does not have to be crowded out and eaten out of his house by his factory hands. I never bought a car and I sacrificed in shelter, food and clothing; I lived down to it like a peasant, in a determined effort to make it go, working 10 hours in winter and 12 to 17 hours a day at other times. I found it all to no purpose. I merely did better than 90 per cent of my neighbors, who have been on the verge of bankruptcy for the last two years. All I earned was being taken, and for the last five years $500 each year more. I raised wheat, cattle, hogs and cream, the finest products for human consumption, and they were all being supplied to the world at large for less than I could raise them, without interest and without pay for myself and family.
> I have a good farm, good soil. I like the life and can stand the climate in winter. I made strenuous efforts to stay, but owing to man-made conditions, I had to sell out and came to this city to compete with the unemployed, and I do not fancy city life for myself or my children.

[Mr. Lovie.]

In a speech on the immigration problem delivered a month ago by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray), that hon. gentleman, as lawyers are well able to do, criticized the farmers to a considerable extent in regard to the number of cars owned by them throughout Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta. Judging by the way the hon. member spoke one would come to the conclusion that a car was something that a farmer absolutely should not own. While the hon. gentleman was speaking on this subject a certain circumstance came to my mind. A farmer and his wife who live not more than five miles from my farm were among the first in the district to get a car. Needless to say, it was a Ford; it was not a sedan such as we see running about in Ottawa. The reason this man got this car was simply that he could not afford to do without it. He and his wife, besides working the farm, milked ten cows, and they shipped a can of cream twice a week. They were ten miles from the station, and this man said that if he had to go to town with a horse and rig it would take him half a day twice a week, which would mean a whole day every week. His wife and he could go in at five o'clock, catch the train and get back in time for supper, thus saving a half day each trip. Now, a car was an absolute necessity to this man in his business; I do not think anyone would deny this. Farmers have been criticized also for having gone into debt for cars. Possibly it was not the wisest thing for them to do, and I am not going to defend them; nor am I going to say that they were always without justification. When you sow a crop you do not know whether you are going to have a bountiful harvest, or whether your crop will be struck by drouth, hail, frost, grasshoppers, or something else. You have no guarantee of anything.

But it is interesting, in reference to this question about automobiles, to consider the way in which a car can be purchased in Ottawa. We know that Ottawa is largely kept up by the Civil Service. Civil servants are paid by the government; therefore their money is absolutely sure notwithstanding hail, rust or anything else which is liable to strike the farmer's crop. A high-class car can be purchased in Ottawa and if citizens can buy expensive cars, I cannot see why farmers should be criticized for purchasing a cheaper car in the same way. A $50 cash payment will secure a first class car, with $250 in promissory note or notes, the balance by way of mortgage on the car and also on the home if the purchaser has a home. The mortgage is handled by companies who specialize in this business, and fire insurance premiums, in some instances up to $125 per annum on the car, must be paid by the purchaser. Now, if a farmer went into a deal like that he would be considered crazy, and I do not think he would be able to throw off such a burden. Yet we are criticized for doing in a very moderate way what other people are doing in this regard.

I desire to refer to a certain question raised by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), and if I am out of order the Speaker will so inform me. The other day that hon. gentleman asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) why he had not brought down a bill dealing with the question of mill feeds, which the minister had promised earlier in the session. I am sorry the minister is not in his seat to-night, but he will see this reference in Hansard. Now, this bill is very important. The minister, speaking from his place this session, said that the milling companies claimed the absolute right to put into mill feeds, that is bran and shorts, any seeds that were in the wheat when they purchased it and that such a thing as pure bran and shorts could not be got anyway, unless you paid a very high price. The bran and shorts from the milling companies have rather a bad name. Last fall, in conjunction with one or two others, I endeavoured to get a carload of bran from a milling company. We could have obtained it from the Ogilvie Milling Company —any milling company handles the same class of goods—but because we could not get bran that was anything like the bran we get from the country mills, the deal did not go through, and we did not make the purchase. We had an idea that the Pure Food Acts would prevent the adulteration of bran and shorts, and we wanted this particular carload for horse feed. The minister said the milling companies claimed the right to put back into the bran any rubbish that was in the wheat, but they should have no such right. They do not pay for rubbish because wherever grain is sold it is subject to dockage, and the farmer pays freight on the dockage to the head of the lakes. The milling companies have no right to put that rubbish into mill feeds. I would be very glad if the minister would bring down a bill which would compel these milling companies to handle pure mill feeds, because the shorts they handle are pretty nearly poison for young pigs and the young pigs do not care to eat them.

I am going to touch on freight rates. Do hon. members know that last year we had quite a reduction in freight rates, occasioned by the bringing into effect of the Crowsnest pass agreement as regards grain and flour? One hon. member to-day mentioned the fact of a furniture dealer who, when the Crowsnest pass committee was sitting, took the side of the Progressives so strongly that he, being a furniture dealer in Ontario, voted for the Crowsnest pass agreement going into effect. I did not belong to that committee, but I can well remember being told that when this particular furniture dealer looked at the proposition he said: "My sales of furniture are in western Canada, and unless the western farmer has money left after paying expenses he has no money to pay me for my furniture." Consequently, he would naturally take the stand that the Crowsnest pass agreement should be made effective. We know that the freight on all western products has been very high. It is one of the handicaps of the prairie provinces that there are 1,000 miles of rock and no man's land between Winnipeg and eastern Canada, and a long distance to the eastern seaboard. Sir William Van Horne, when he was president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, enunciated a proposition. I do not know whether he carried it into effect, but I am going to pass it on to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) because he is really the head of the National Railways. Sir William Van Horne's proposition was this: Carry the lumber for settlers' houses and stables, also fuel at cost, and the grain settlers produced at a little over cost. Then the people could expect in that case that a good freight figure could be placed upon merchandise.

In the West, both as regards settling on farms and stock raising, one of the greatest handicaps is the very high price of lumber. It is a long way to bring lumber from British Columbia, and certainly lumber and coal should be carried at about cost. The trouble is that the policy for the last two years has been to charge all the traffic will bear, and in fact last year, before the reduction in the rates, it was more than the traffic would bear, because instances were put before the people where the railway company had refused to bill out carloads of Alberta oats unless the freight was prepaid, for fear there would not be enough money from the sale of the oats in Fort William to pay the freight on the carload.

The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) said that farmers, instead of stressing the tariff, should look after freight rates. There is something else besides freight rates to be considered. They should look after the classification of freight rates. To show hon. members how it works out, I am going to take them a little bit from home, and cite an instance which took place, not 100 miles from Los Angeles. There was a little village in which the only products were cattle, firewood and charcoal. Now on cattle the freight per carload for less than 100 miles was $8. This was explained in this way: The cattle could be driven into the city, consequently if the freight was put up too high, or higher than the amount which it cost them to drive in, the railway would not get the traffic. But upon firewood, for the same distance the rate was $24 per car. There was a man working there cutting firewood and loading it, and he figured that if he would make the wood into charcoal instead of shipping the wood he would be ahead, and so he tried to make it into charcoal and ship it. But while he had been planning that he would put it into charcoal the railway company were planning as well and they immediately advanced the rate to $42 for the charcoal. He made $1.60 a day cutting firewood and he could make $1.60 a day making charcoal. Now the freight is a matter which it is worth while looking after. I hope the minister will do something to relieve us from the difficulties in regard to transfer of cars of freight from one company to another. It is not many years ago you could ship freight on the Canadian National railway, and send it right through, whether it was going on the Canadian National or Canadian Pacific, by paying a transfer fee of $5 and getting a through rate. But since the freight rates have been advanced that privilege has been cut off. If you bill the freight on the Canadian National and ship it part way on that road and part way on the Canadian Pacific or vice versa, you have to pay two local freights, and it makes it absolutely prohibitive. This is something the Minister of Railways should certainly give his attention to, because if one railway will right this matter the other will have to follow suit and considering that the people of Canada own one of the large railways, it is right they should give the people a square deal.

Then express rates need looking after as well. I am sorry that I have to give you a personal experience, but I want to explain to you what I mean when I speak of these express companies taking the money out of the people's pocket when carrying their goods. Last fall I had occasion to get a 2-inch coupling weighing about a pound. It was worth 30 cents in Winnipeg. However, I asked the merchant to send it C.O.D. because he would be sure to get his money. It had to be carried 85 miles on the railway, the express rate was 45 cents, and the C.O.D. for sending back the money was 25 cents. That made 70 cents for the carriage of this article worth 30 cents. Express rates are absolutely prohibitive.

Then labour costs are handicapping the western farmer very badly, not exactly the wages of the men engaged in agriculture, because they are not paid any too much, but the wages of the men engaged in manufacturing and the wages of the skilled artisans who are doing the work for the farmer. They are out of line absolutely with the price the farmer can get for his produce. If any one of us who are farming wanted to engage the services of a man with only a trowel, to pile up one brick on top of another, we would have to pay $10 a day and board. But take the other case. Suppose we went with a plough and four horses to work for him. He would allow us $3 a day for the man, $1 per day for each horse, and nothing for the plough, and consequently the labourer or artisan would receive $10 a day and the farmer would simply get $7 which is the rate of pay for man and team work.

This is taking away too much of the farmer's profits altogether. I will give an example of how this works out. I take this from the Breeders' Gazette, a paper that stands absolutely for the rights of the farmer in the United States. This matter was taken up only about six months ago by the editor of the Breeders' Gazette, Mr. Alvin Sanders. He mentioned the case of a brakeman who was working on a short run about 25 miles out of Chicago and back again, one train a day. This coloured brakeman was getting $250 a month. Close to this short line of railway were men working on the farms at $25 a month. Why the difference? These men who were furnishing the freight to keep that railway alive were working for $25 a month, whereas the brakeman on the railway was drawing $250 a month. Such wages are absolutely out of line and they will have to be cut.

Another matter that we must take into consideration is that the labourer cannot work for small wages because the cost of living is so high, and the reason for that high cost is the protective tariff. The tariff must be reduced in order to give the labouring man an opportunity to purchase the necessaries of life at something like the price at which the farmer sells his product, not the price which the workingman has to pay at present. The distribution system in this country is absolutely out of line somehow or another, and the men and women who are selling their labour have to pay absolutely too high prices for the necessaries of life. Last fall the price for choice beef on the hoof in southern Manitoba was something like 4 cents per pound. I sold steers for something like that price. If I had kept my steers over winter, I would have been docked in price because they would have weighed nearly 1,500 pounds apiece, so I sold them in the fall. That beef was worth on the hoof 8 cents per pound, and the hide and the offal would pay for the killing. That beef should have been sold at about 10 cents per pound, but I am quite prepared to say that the labouring man in Winnipeg paid nearly 30 cents per pound for it and for other things accordingly. Such prices are altogether out of line. Let me cite a short quotation from the Breeders' Gazette, because that is a paper that stands up for the rights of the farmer in the United States. The article states:

> We have kicked with all the power at our command against the freight rates that have eaten up farmers and stockmen of various communities. We have kicked time and again at the unwillingness of labour to accept its due share in the great deflation. We have kicked against the price the farmer has had to pay for nearly everything he has to buy, and at the low prices he has been forced to accept for many of his products. We have kicked against the price we have to pay for a baked potato in Chicago restaurants when the Idaho beauties are rotting by the acre in the ground in which they were grown. We have kicked against the Jew clothier being permitted to sell at profiteering prices half-cotton and shoddy goods as virgin wool, and we are not through kicking yet, by any manner of means—whenever and wherever we can see an opening to accomplish something for the common good.

That is what the Progressive party are trying to do in this House.

I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) a matter in connection with the stamp tax on cheques. We know a tax of 2 cents was put on cheques as a war measure a few years ago; but last year when the budget was first brought down, that tax was raised so that it was 2 cents for every $50, or 4 cents per $100, without any limit. Before the budget debate was over, the Minister of Finance announced that he was going to allow the stamp tax to be 2 cents for every $50 up to $5,000, but that then it was going to stop. That looked to everyone very much as if the Minister of Finance were catering to the big interests, to those who do big business and pay money in large amounts. This year the stamp tax has been reduced. It is still 2 cents for every $50, but it stops at $2,500, and $1 is the maximum tax. That means simply that the tax on cheques is costing the common people .8 per cent. As a rule cheques issued by ordinary, common, everyday people would average about $25, so that they are paying .8 per cent for the privilege of issuing a cheque. On the other hand, cheques of corporations would average about $5,000, and in that case they are going to pay about .2 per cent. Thus in the one case, in the case of the wealthy corporation, .2 per cent is being paid, whereas in the case of the ordinary, everyday people, they are paying .8 per cent for the privilege of stamping their cheques. In other words, the business people are paying less than the working people. This stamp tax is rather a hardship from the fact that it was found by those who were dealing with large corporations in the city of Winnipeg last year, for instance, farmers selling cars of grain, that they always had to pay the price of that tax on cheques. This was brought to my notice even before the grain began to move, from the fact that live stock shippers ran up against that proposition in Winnipeg. One man especially who drew out $15,000 of his own money and went out to Alberta to buy cattle, found that he had to stamp his cheques before he drew out that $15,000 in Winnipeg. As he could not carry that money throughout Alberta around the different ranches, he had to put it into a bank in Alberta, and he issued cheques on that in payment of the stock he bought. That was twice he had to stamp his cheques. When he took his cattle to Winnipeg he was again charged for the stamps on the cheques by those to whom he sold the cattle. There was great dissatisfaction on account of this proposition, and I for one wrote to the Department of Finance to see if that could not be remedied. The Minister of Finance at that time was in Europe and the answer did not come from him; the answer from the department was to the effect that the law was fixed that all cheques had to be stamped, but the Finance Department did not care who stamped the cheques.

Protection has been in force for over forty years, and it is generally said that if you disturb protection, you are going to disturb existing conditions. I have no doubt that those who have benefited by protection are going to fight against the withdrawal of that privilege, because it certainly is a privilege. I can well remember a gentleman who came from Scotland a few years ago. He was a chartered accountant, and when he came to Canada and went into business, he found to his great surprise that such a thing as cost auditing was not known in Canada. Certainly it was not known. If you have a protective tariff, you do not need to care what the cost is. You cannot help getting sufficient money for your produce when you are behind a protective tariff, and those men who are assisted by the protective tariff are certainly going to fight to keep that in force. This reminds me of a gentleman I know who was giving an address in a schoolhouse, where you hear a good deal about economics, and gentlemen in schoolhouses throughout the prairies can talk just as good economics as one hears in this House at any time. This gentleman had been in the live stock industry quite a long time, and he said about protection what he had found from his experience, namely, that the bigger a calf got, the more cows he could suck and the harder he was to wean, and that is the way protection works out.

About two nights ago when the hon. member for Lennox and Addington (Mr. Sexsmith) was speaking, a question came across the floor of the House. I do not know who put it; I think it was the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan); but it was a question about the Hudson Bay railway. I do not know whether this question was put in a sneering way or not. That, however, does not matter. I am going to say something about the Hudson Bay railway. If anyone looks at the map of Canada and views that great big inland sea that comes right into the heart of the continent of North America, if he can conscientiously say that that great ocean highway was placed there by the Creator for no reason at all, I differ with him entirely. The great Liberal chieftain, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, used to say that the nineteenth century was the United States' growing time, but the twentieth century was going to be the growing time for Canada. It is reasonable to imagine that the population of the United States is going to grow during the next fifty years as much as it has grown during the past half a century, and therefore she will be looking for an outlet for her surplus population long before the expiration of another fifty years. Fifty years is quite a long time in the life of an individual, but it is very short in the life of a nation. If the United States has to find more room for her surplus population where is she going to turn her eyes but to Canada? I have vision enought to realize that before fifty years have elapsed not only will there be twenty million people in Canada but fifty million, and every seaport, including Vancouver, Prince Rupert, Port Nelson, Montreal, Quebec, Halifax and St. John, will be used to their full capacity.

To those who doubt whether the Hudson Bay railway is going to be profitable—and I know there are a good many doubters, more especially from eastern Canada—I should like to put up this proposition: If you are doubtful about the Hudson Bay railway and the route through the Straits being a workable proposition, just get behind us in our efforts to have the British preference increased to 100 per cent of the general tariff, and so bring all commodities which would then come from England duty free into the western country through the Hudson Bay route. I venture to say that if you do that the route will be in use six months in every year as soon as the railway is completed. The ships engaged on this route would then be able to carry cargoes both ways. One of the objections now urged against the feasibility of this route is that ships cannot get return cargoes. But if the British preference was extended to 100 per cent, every ship would be loaded to capacity both ways.

Now, how can we improve world conditions? I have already mentioned, Mr. Speaker, that the nations of Europe on account of their poverty arising from after-war conditions were not able to purchase the products which we have to sell. There is no gainsaying this statement; it is a fact. I should like to put up a proposition in this connection. The government cannot deal with it, but I am going to put it before the country. It is something which those interested will have to take in hand. I refer to an all-round cancellation of war debts, beginning with the United States. Now, whether we are agreeable to this proposition or not, I honestly believe that time will come when it will have to be taken in hand. The United States has nearly all the money of the world to-day, and consequently the other nations cannot purchase her commodities from lack of money, and she as a nation does not want to take goods from other nations in exchange for fear of causing unemployment at home. Consequently she is handicapped. If the other nations of the world had more money and the United States had less, why, certainly trade would be in a better condition all round. Failing the realization of that proposition, Mr. Speaker, there is still another proposition that I should like to put forward. It is not nearly as complicated and may therefore appeal to this House. In pursuance of my intention I shall place before the House an extract from The Times of February 23, 1923, being part of an address delivered by Sir George Lawson Johnston in the city of London on the preceding day. I am not going to quote his address in full, but in order that hon. members may get the sense of what I am about to quote I shall have to read a greater portion of the address than I would otherwise do. Dealing with the burden of the American debt as it affects Great Britain he said:

> Apparently the repayment of the war debt to America was to be an important factor in their taxation for the next sixty years.
>
> When he saw them last February he had just returned from the States, and he mentioned to them how seriously our debt position had been worsened owing to Congress having by law fixed the period of repayment and the interest. Unfortunately, bankers, financiers, and others had talked so much about the capital and interest aspect of this debt, as if it were purely a business transaction, that a business atmosphere, instead of that associated with a debt of honour—on which nobody expects interest—had been created. As the business mind predominates on the other side of the Atlantic, once the matter had been fixed in the American mind as a business deal, it became impossible for our negotiators, no matter how capable, to save the position. The most serious factor in the matter as now arranged is that we must pay capital and interest in United States dollars. It was generally admitted that the improvement in exchange from the British sovereign point of view during the last year was not so much on account of an improved trade balance as on account of American purchases of British securities. Such securities, if interest bearing, must eventually mean still further sums going from this country to the United States. There could be little doubt that efforts to pay America by direct remittance would turn exchange against us and seriously increase the number of pounds we should have to pay per annum, and, unfortunately, it would be just during our worst period of depression and bad trade that we should have to pay most pounds to buy the dollars.
>
> A Dollar Reserve in Canada
>
> He would like to put forward a suggestion which might assist in this matter. It was that we should build up in Canada a reserve towards the payment of the American debt. The Canadian and United States dollars were not likely to vary seriously in value, therefore any fund we could build up in the Dominion would be comparatively free from exchange fluctuations. Canada was capable of being developed at a much more rapid pace than the present capital and man power at its disposal could develop it. Our government could now borrow at a lower rate than it had been able to do for a good many years. If it could obtain grants of land from Canada, it could utilize, say, one hundred million pounds in developing wheat areas, and probably certain industries in that Dominion; and this work, in conjunction with some considerable emigration scheme of selected unemployed, should develop in Canada a reproductive asset that would, after a while, annually supply dollars towards the payment to the States. Furthermore, every bushel of wheat bought from Canada instead of from the States would help to keep our exchange better with the latter.
>
> We might thus accelerate the pace at which Canada was growing strong, and, at the same time, build up an asset that would much reduce the burden of the American debt, and probably, in the process, some of the money we provided would purchase from our manufacturers agricultural implements and other machinery, etc.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that the British nation always keeps in mind that it must sell as well as purchase. We need also to keep that in mind.

> His own experience in Canada convinced him that any such scheme to be successful would have to be planned and brought forward by Canadians to meet their own views as regards the directions in which development should take place. If it was put forward at present they could feel, at any rate, that Canadian conditions would be understood by a British Premier who was born in Canada, and a Colonial Secretary who had recently served as Governor-General.

I am putting forward that proposition because I think there is a great deal in it. Canada certainly needs more capital and more people to develop her natural resources. And, Sir, although I am going to vote against the budget because it is a protectionist budget, at the same time I may say that, although I was not born in Canada, I am a Canadian at heart and wish the country well, for it has done well by me.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, I rise for only one purpose. I do not intend to discuss the budget because I am afraid that if I were to advance some arguments in its favour they would probably be merely a repetition of those that have already been brought forward during this debate, and, besides, I shall have an opportunity of discussing the different aspects of the budget itself when the resolutions are dealt with in committee. My purpose in rising—and I shall crave the indulgence of the House for but a few moments—is to deal with the income tax. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I feel I am perfectly in order in discussing this matter at this stage. The income tax is an important item of the budget bill because the state derives from it a part of its revenue, and it is a part of the burden of taxation asked by the Sovereign from the Commons.

The second reason why I believe I am in order is because the Minister of Finance in his speech made the following remark:

> In the observations I have made to-day it will be noticed that I am not touching the income tax. If there be necessary changes in this respect, they will be dealt with later in a separate bill.

It is therefore with the intention of making suggestions in this regard that I am on my feet. The income tax is a levy on profits arising from property, investments, professions, trades and offices. The cardinal principle of the income tax is that a man should be taxed only on the basis of his net income, but none should escape the tax, because if he does it is to the detriment of the other taxpayers. Having this principle in mind, may I be permitted to direct the attention of the House and of the minister to certain changes which I believe would be fair, just and equitable to all?

I have several times brought before the House the suggestion that a change be made in the matter of the exemption on account of children. When I spoke on this matter on the 21st of March last it was my intention to develop three points; first, the raising of the exemption on account of children; second, the unfairness of the ruling of the taxation department regarding those who had been married under the regime of community of property, and, third, the desirability of making a differentiation between earned and unearned income in the matter of taxation. The short time at my disposal when I presented my resolution permitted me to discuss only the first point, namely, the increasing of the exemption on account of each child from $300 to $500 and the providing of total exemption for the father of five children. The rules of the House permitted me only to ask the government to consider the advisability of making the change. The resolution was well received by the Minister of Finance and was carried unanimously. I had hoped, I may say, that these changes would have been embodied in the budget. I admit that I was disappointed, but not at all discouraged, because last year when I spoke on the same matter the change was not incorporated in the budget but at the close of the session the Minister of Finance brought in a bill under which he raised the exemption from $200 to $300 for each child. Therefore, I still have hope that a similar agreeable surprise is in store this session for the father of large families. Such an amendment, I am sure, would only be fair and wise.

I am not going to weary the House, Mr. Speaker, with the arguments that I brought forward on the 21st of March and in previous sessions regarding this matter. Let me simply summarize them. I am advocating this change, first, because large families should be encouraged, because it is the most natural, the most efficient and the sanest way of increasing the population. My second reason is that the sum of $300 is ridiculously low when one has in mind the amount required for the upkeep of a child. My third reason is that the high cost of the upkeep of children is the principal cause of voluntary sterility and race suicide in this country. My fourth reason is that they have similar legislation in France, in England and in the United States, where in each case, the exemptions and allowances in respect of large families are greater than they are in Canada. I gave all these figures when I proposed my resolution on the 21st of March. I may also add that since presenting the resolution I have been flooded with petitions endorsing it. I have laid on the table of the House petitions containing over 15,000 names asking for this change.

An Hon. MEMBER: How many families?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Fifteen thousand families, probably 75,000 children at least. The signatures were only those of fathers of families. The only argument I have heard against that proposal is that such a change would result in a decrease of revenue. I will take care of that argument later in the course of my remarks.

The second point I wish to discuss is the unjust enactment or ruling of the taxation department regarding those who are married under the regime of community of property. This regime, I believe, exists only in the province of Quebec. Under our civil code persons can be married under the regime of community of property or under the regime of separation of property. If they are married without contract they fall under the regime of community of property. Now, subsection 3 of section 4 of the Income Tax Act passed in 1917, reads as follows:

> Any persons carrying on business in partnership shall be liable for the income tax only in their individual capacity.

Discussion arose as to whether this section covered the case of a husband and wife married under the regime of community of property and whether they could separate their incomes for taxation purposes. Most of the legal authorities admitted that this was the right point of view, namely, that they could separate their incomes for taxation purposes. But in 1919 an amendment was passed and the law now reads as follows:

> Subsection 3 of section 4 of the said act is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:
> Any persons carrying on business in partnership shall be liable for the income tax only in their individual capacity; provided, however, that a husband and wife carrying on business together shall be deemed to be partners for any purpose under this Act.

The result is that a couple married under the regime of separation as to property pay much less than a couple married under the regime of community of property. Let me illustrate by an example. We will take two couples without children whose income is $6,000. The first couple, we will say, are married under the regime of community of property; the husband has a salary of $3,000 and the wife has an income of $3,000. They are exempted up to only $2,000, leaving $4,000 on which they pay 4 per cent, or $160. The second couple are married under the regime of separation as to property; the husband earns a salary of $3,000, and his wife has an income of $3,000 the same as the first couple. The husband has an exemption of $2,000, and the wife also has an exemption of $2,000. Therefore they only pay a tax on $2,000, or only the sum of $80, while the other couple married under the regime of community of property pay the sum of $160. I say, Mr. Speaker, that that ruling is absolutely unjust and unfair, and I hope that the Minister of Finance on consideration will make a change in the law in order to put these two couples, whether married under the regime of community of property or separation, on the same plane for taxation purposes.

The third question which I desire to bring before the House is the differentiation between earned and unearned income for the purpose of taxation. I have had a resolution on the order paper regarding this matter for some time, but unfortunately it was not reached, and I therefore take this opportunity of discussing it now.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that this differentiation exists in England and in order that this distinction may be thoroughly understood I will give the definition in the English law regarding earned and unearned income:

> The expression "earned income" means—
>
> Profits of office.—Any income arising in respect of any office or employment of profit held by the individual.
>
> Pensions.—Income in respect of any pension, superannuation, or other allowance, deferred pay, or compensation for loss of office given in respect of the past services of the individual or of the husband or parent of the individual in any office or employment of profit, whether the individual or husband or parent of the individual shall have contributed to such pension, superannuation allowance, or deferred pay or not.
>
> Property emoluments of office.—Any income from any property which is attached to or forms part of the emoluments of any office or employment of profit held by the individual.
>
> Any income derived from farms.
> Any income derived from a profession or trade.

There are some further particulars which are not so important. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this legislation is very commendable. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the man who derives his income from his own work, from his trade or profession, should not be asked to pay as high an income tax as the one who derives it from money that he has invested or from money that he has inherited from his family.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: When the individual who works and earns his salary spends that salary, he spends his own capital, and when he dies, if he has made just enough during his lifetime to enable him to support his wife and children, they are left without a cent, while in the case of the other man who has a large income from an inheritance or from money that he has succeeded in putting aside, when he dies his wife and children are left with both capital and income. If the man who works and earns his income suddenly becomes sick and cannot work, in many instances he cannot draw any income. In many cases he has no money and it means privation and hardship for his wife and children. Suppose, for instance, that a man earns by his work $3,000, representing a capital of $50,000. He spends that for the maintenance of his family. As I said before, he would leave nothing when he dies. But if he has an income of $3,000 derived from an inheritance or accumulated capital and spends that income during his lifetime, when he dies his family is left with both the income and capital. Hon. gentlemen can easily visualize the difference.

I would suggest three rates of taxation: First, the highest rate on incomes derived from inheritance; second, a higher rate than the third but not as high as the first one, on incomes derived from accumulated capital; and thirdly, the lowest rate on incomes derived from the labour of the people.

Reverting to my first point and the objection brought forward that increasing the exemption for children would mean a great decrease in revenue, I meet this objection first in a general way by asserting that the beneficial results of the enactment in encouraging large families would amply compensate for the loss of revenue. Then I also suggest a means of getting more revenue from another source and at the same time removing what is in my opinion, at least, an injustice which exists under the present law. As the law now stands, an individual does not pay any income tax on dividends received from companies or persons taxable under the act, even if those dividends should be as high as ten, fifteen or twenty per cent. The reason alleged for such exemption is that the tax should not be paid twice, and that as the company has already paid the tax the stockholder should not be called upon to pay it again. That may be true, but I contend, Mr. Speaker, that if the company has made enough profits to pay a tax and on top of that declare a dividend of 15 or 20 per cent the stockholder who receives that dividend, which is a personal revenue like a salary or income, should also be taxed. Why on earth should he not be taxed?

Do hon. members realize how many wealthy individuals with incomes ranging from $10,000 to $100,000 do not pay any tax on these incomes if they are derived from dividends from corporations? Allow me to give another example to illustrate the point. Let us suppose a person, whom we will call John, earns a salary of $5,000 by his daily work. He is married and has three children. He is first exempted up to $2,000, and then he is allowed an exemption of $900 for the three children, leaving a balance of $2,100 on which he has to pay a tax of 4 per cent, or $84. As I said before, when he dies his wife and children are probably left without any money because he had to spend all his salary during his life time to support them. Now we will suppose a second man, whom we will call James. He has $100,000 of capital invested in companies paying dividends from which he derives an income of $7,000. He does not pay one cent of income tax. When he dies his wife inherits that capital of $100,000 and continues to receive that income upon it of $7,000.

Mr. MARLER: How does my hon. friend work that out?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: If a person has $100,000 invested in corporations, which pay the income tax and then distribute a dividend of 7 per cent; the individual who gets the income of $7,000 from this investment does not pay a single cent of income tax upon it.

Mr. MARLER: In other words, no normal tax is collected from him.

Mr. McMASTER: The normal tax is collected at the source?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Yes, but if the company has made enough profit to pay that normal tax and, besides that, to pay 10 or 15 per cent of a dividend I do not see why a tax should not be collected from the individual. I may say that I am not particularly fond of the tax on corporations. In very many cases it is collected from persons who would not have to pay if they had invested their money in property instead. Take a small shareholder who has invested, say, $15,000 or $20,000. Out of this he does not make an income of $2,000. If he is unmarried he is exempted only $1,000, if married $2,000, and he must pay an income tax to the government; because the company takes from the profits of the invested money of that person a certain share to pay the tax. If he had invested that money in mortgages or in property he would not have to pay income tax. However, I believe that it would be advisable for the Minister of Finance to consider this matter very thoroughly because I am of the opinion that some change could be made. As matters stand now the clerk, the medium salaried man, the professional man, the small merchant, cannot escape the law; but those who are best able to pay are provided with all kinds of means to obtain exemption for the whole or the greater part of their incomes.

Mr. BOYS: I should be glad if the hon. gentleman would allow me a question. Let us assume that a man has worked hard, whether on the farm or in business, and reaches the age of 65 or 70. Let us take a farmer who has got a couple of hundred acres, with buildings and everything up-to-date and all clear; he sells his property for $20,000 and moves into town, retired. On the other hand consider the case of a bank manager or a railway president with a salary of $50,000. Would you exempt the latter and tax the former?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: If the income of the farmer is high enough to come within the provisions of the law then it should be taxed. But what I say is that the man who earns his salary should pay less than the one who derives his income first of all from inheritance and in the second place from even accumulated capital.

Mr. BOYS: Would you show special consideration to the bank manager or the railway president who gets $50,000.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: My hon. friend is stating extreme cases.

Mr. BOYS: No.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I am dealing with common every day cases. I believe that the farmer who has accumulated $20,000—

Mr. GOULD: There is not any such.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: —is scarce in this country; and furthermore he would not get an income of $2,000 out of such a farm and he would not have to pay any income tax.

Mr. BOYS: I was dealing with the principle. If the principle is right in one case it should be right in all cases. There are a great many farmers, I am glad to know, and I am sure my hon. friend agrees with me, who have estates worth $20,000.

Mr. LAPOINTE: With a $2,000 income?

Mr. MARLER: I think the hon. member (Mr. Archambault) is differentiating between class A income and class B income. He is pointing out that class A income is earned and should be taxed less than B income which is inherited or accumulated.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Yes.

Mr. MARLER: I think the point is exceedingly well taken.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I am very glad indeed to have the approval of my hon. friend. Now, I do not wish the House to misunderstand my suggestion; I do not want to have the minister impose a penalty on thrift or on successful business achievement. My contention is not that capital should be attacked in any sense, because I believe that where there is no capital and no big business there is no work and consequently there are hard times. But I also believe on the other hand that a fair re-apportionment and re-adjustment of the income tax would bring about a friendlier spirit between the wealthy, who are willing to be fair, and the less fortunate who would then realize that they are not victimized or overburdened. As I said in rising, my only purpose was to discuss some aspects of the income tax. I believe I have put my case as well as I can before the House and the minister, and I hope that he will take into consideration the few principles that I have dealt with and embody them into the bill which he will bring before the House later on the income tax.

Mr. J. W. FINDLAY (South Bruce): The hour is late, and I have to catch a train in about two minutes, but as I look at the clock I realize that we are under what we call daylight saving, and I still have a few minutes to spare. I am not so sure, Mr. Speaker, but that the situation in which I am placed at the present moment might be made use of by the whips of the different groups in this House on certain occasions. For instance, the next time the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) is going to address this House, it might be well for the chief whip of the government party to see that he is situated somewhat as I am at the present time. It might be well for the Conservative whip to see to it that when the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), and the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) are billed to speak, they too have a pressing engagement somewhere shortly after they start. The shepherd of our own flock might, perhaps, work out this idea on the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. Warner) or, perhaps, better still the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould).

I listened with a great deal of interest and pleasure the day before yesterday to the address given by the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) and I always enjoy listening to him. His genial, humorous manner appeals to me, but I had some small degree of sympathy for him. I felt he was in somewhat of an awkward situation. He told the House this budget under discussion was satisfactory to him because of the fact that the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) could not find much fault with it. It appeared strange to me that almost the only argument which the Liberals presented in support of this budget was the fact that the chief critic of the Conservative party could not find very much fault with it. It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, that the days of the millennium must have arrived, and the lion and the lamb have surely lain down together.

Mr. PUTNAM: Which is the lamb?

Mr. FINDLAY: I rather think the lion is inside the lamb. I listened with very much interest and pleasure to the speech of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart). I have a great deal of admiration for the hon. member, but he also aroused my sympathy. He has not altogether fallen from grace, as he said yseterday:

> I do not believe and I have had nothing to convince me that so heavy a rate of protection is required as is given to the industries existent in this country to-day.
> I for one want to know definitely why such high protection is needed for some of these industries.

With both of these statements I can respond with a hearty "Amen." A peculiar situation exists at the present time. I claim, Sir, that I am a Liberal. That statement may perhaps cost me some votes if I ever find it necessary to look for votes again.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It surely will.

Mr. FINDLAY: What I want to tell this House—and I hope my voice will go further than this House—is that as I understand Liberalism I still am a Liberal. Up to the present moment I cannot find myself guilty of having ever gone back upon what I was brought up to believe were true Liberal principles, but if I were to support this budget I am afraid my sleep would be disturbed for a good many nights to come. I was very much pleased with the speech which we listened to a few minutes ago by the hon. member who just sat down (Mr. Archambault). I have not the slightest doubt that he was more pleasantly and more genially employed in delivering a speech of that kind than he would be in attempting to defend this budget. His speech was along Liberal lines,—fairly good Liberalism. I regret very much that I did not have an opportunity this afternoon of hearing all of the address of the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). I was very much impressed with the part I did hear. It was delivered in a fair and genial manner, but he too appeared to be in a peculiar situation. He made a speedy attempt to defend the tariff proposals but I could not help thinking of the days gone by when he and many more members sitting on the government benches to-day used to attack and condemn these very same tariff proposals, and I wondered why it was that to-day we find men who, a few years ago, were very emphatic and very energetic in their condemnation of the system of protectiton, to-day defending a budget which they cannot but admit is a protective budget.

Mr. EULER: The hon. member says that I used to attack and condemn proposals such as are in the budget. Will he quote statements of mine to that effect?

Mr. FINDLAY: I do not know that I can recall any particular instance, but I think I am not out of the way in saying that the hon. member as a Liberal has in the past opposed the protective tariff? Is that not correct?

I want for a few moments to refer to the amendment proposed by my honoured leader (Mr. Forke). It is charged that this amendment was carefully worded in order that it might not get the government into trouble. The duty of the group sitting in this section of the House is neither to get the government into trouble, nor to get the government out of trouble. As I understand our business, it is to endeavour to get good legislation, and personally I have never yet been prompted by any desire to get this government out of trouble. I must confess that I had some hopes; I was buoyed up with a good deal of hope that we might be able, by some means or another, to get something in the way of tariff reduction, relief from taxation, from this so-called Liberal government. You know it is said that "hope deferred maketh the heart sick." Sometimes it also makes it rebellious, and the time may come when we may be prompted, perhaps from a spirit of revenge, to join our forces even with the Conservative group from which we have no hopes of getting anything. We may, however, be tempted, from a motive of revenge, to join our forces with the gentlemen who sit to our right.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

[Mr. Findlay.]

Mr. FINDLAY: You are driving us to that. That may be the only course that is left open to us, and we may some time in the near future be compelled to take that course.

I was on the verge of saying that I could not help, the evening before last, drawing a comparison between some of the speeches that were made in this chamber. It is an unfortunate circumstance that it sometimes happens that a really good speech is postponed until the late hours of the night.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FINDLAY: I am not saying that that has happened to-night by any means, but it did happen the night before last. During the afternoon and the early hours of the evening, a fairly well-filled chamber and a crowded gallery listened to a sort of burlesque on parliamentary procedure. Late in the night, when most people had gone home, a well thought-out, careful and sensible speech was delivered and almost lost on an empty house. That was an unfortunate occurrence. I only wish that I could bring before this House at least one of the thoughts that were presented to this Chamber by the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) the other evening. He was endeavouring to show how this movement in which we are engaged was a movement which was permanent, a movement which had come to stay, a movement which could not be injured because of ridicule hurled at the party in this House who are representing and supporting it. He said that the movement was greater than we are; that it would live after we were all gone; that even those who had been with it temporarily and who had gone back to the fleshpots could not but feel for a long time afterwards the exhilaration which they had received while amongst us. That thought I want to convey particularly to the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. Hammell). When I use the prefix "honourable", I would like the Press Gallery and the Official Reporters to understand that an interrogation mark should come after that prefix, or my real meaning may not be conveyed to the country.

I am very much disappointed in the budget which has been presented to the House by a Liberal government. I have been a Liberal all my life. I supported Liberal principles because I believed in them, and I had hopes of this government which was elected on a platform containing planks in regard to their trade policy which I approved, which I believe a large number of the people of Canada approved, and which were largely responsible for putting this government into power. There is not the slightest doubt that many people, especially in Ontario, were deceived by the trade planks of the Liberal platform of 1919, which planks this government since coming into power have repudiated. The time will come when the people will again have an opportunity to express themselves at the polls. As was said this evening, when this government have cut themselves loose, openly and above board from their platform of 1919, the people of Ontario and, indeed, the people of the whole of Canada from one end to the other will know exactly where the government stand. The next time they will appeal to the people, the people will understand perfectly that they can expect nothing in the way of tariff reduction or in the way of Liberal principles from the government which occupy the treasury benches at the present time.

On motion of Mr. Grimmer the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

REPORT

Report of the Royal Commission on Lake Grain Rates.—Hon. Mr. Robb.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION

PETITION NOT IN REGULAR FORM—MOTION FOR ITS RETURN

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of Petitions reports that he has examined the petition of W. J. Bartlett and others, of Vancouver and other places in British Columbia. The attention of the House is directed to the fact that the said petition is irregular in that it is addressed to the Right Honourable William Lyon Mackenzie King and the members of the government of Canada, and not to the House of Commons in Parliament assembled, and as it does not contain three signatures on the sheet containing the prayer of the petition, as required by rule 75, it should not be received.

Mr. McQUARRIE: May I ask that the petition be returned to me so that I can send it to the petitioners?

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member will make a motion to that effect at a subsequent sitting—or, by unanimous consent at this sitting—the petition will be returned to him.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I will move that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

LAKE OF THE WOODS REGULATION

Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 175, to repeal The Lake of the Woods Regulation Act, 1921.

He said: This is a similar bill to one which was introduced at the last session by the then Solicitor General. It is in regard to the control of the Lake of the Woods, the Winnipeg and English rivers and Lac Seul. As hon. gentlemen will remember, some time before the session of 1921 an agreement was arrived at between the federal government and the government of Ontario to the effect that the control of these lakes and rivers should be given to a board composed of four members, two appointed by the federal government and two by the Ontario government. This arrangement was put into force by orders in council passed by the two governments, which in turn with the agreement, were to be confirmed and ratified by this parliament and by the legislature of Ontario. In accordance with that agreement a bill was introduced and passed in this House, and it is now on the statute book as chapter 10 of the acts of 1921. The government of Ontario introduced a similar bill but the House prorogued before there was time to pass the measure. In these circumstances the government of Canada thought it wise that federal legislation in the matter should be enacted without delay, so chapter 38 of the statutes of 1921 was passed, giving the Canadian government control of the Lake of the Woods, the Winnipeg and English rivers and Lac Seul. It was also provided by that statute that whenever the province of Ontario should legislate in accordance with the arrangement made, the Governor in Council should repeal chapter 38 of the statutes of 1921. We now propose by this bill as it was last year to repeal purely and simply chapter 38 and for this reason: In addition to what I have said, there was a clause in that chapter to the effect that while the Governor in Council would have a right to repeal the statute, this would not affect a certain clause in virtue of which it was declared that all these works around the Lake of the Woods and the different rivers mentioned were for the general advantage of Canada. It has been represented to us that this was not the agreement, and that the two parties, the government of Canada and the province of Ontario, should be put in exactly the same position as they were when the arrangement was agreed upon and signed. That is the reason why we now repeat this same legislation. I may say that the bill last year, while it passed this House, was not assented to by the Senate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I ask, what is the attitude of the present government of Manitoba toward this bill?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I think that the government of Manitoba will be satisfied with the bill if it passes as introduced.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend says he "thinks" so. Has he had word from the government of Manitoba to that effect?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I may say that there is an agreement among the three parties, that is, the Canadian government, the province of Ontario, and the province of Manitoba, that when certain conditions have been fulfilled by the province of Ontario the province of Manitoba will be willing and will consent to the passing of this legislation.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

LABOUR AND ORGANIZATION

REPORTED ACTION OF THE POWELL RIVER PAPER COMPANY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, may I ask leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the notification by the management of the Powell River Paper Company to the members of the local union of paper makers in their employ that unless they surrender their charter by Sunday the 20th instant all members of the union in their employ will be discharged, this action in the absence of any strike, threatened strike or labour trouble constituting an attack on the right of any Canadian worker to join a legitimate trade union if he so desires.

Mr. SPEAKER: I may say that the motion comes under Rule 39. It is certainly a definite matter of urgent public importance. However, subsection (4) of Rule 39 says:

> He (the mover) then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to the Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the House.

Has the hon. member the leave of the House to introduce said motion?

Some hon. members: Aye.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule goes on:

> If objection is taken, the Speaker requests those members who support the motion to rise in their places and, if more than twenty members rise accordingly, the Speaker calls upon the member who has asked for leave.

I take it that more than twenty members said "Aye." The hon. gentleman may proceed.

Mr. NEILL: This matter has been brought up so hurriedly that I have not had time to provide full data on the subject, but the facts are so outstanding that they almost speak for themselves.

The Powell River Company is a large paper manufacturing company on the coast, about one hundred miles north of Vancouver. It is one of those places called a company townsite, that is, the company obtained a townsite, put up their works, and are the exclusive owners of the townsite with the exception of one small block which is owned by a Chinaman. The effect of this is that the company practically controls everyone who lives and speaks or even thinks in that town. I wish to give full credit where credit is due. The town is very well run from the point of view of labour conditions, that is, the living conditions are satisfactory, the houses are quite properly built, the sanitary conditions excellent, and the light and water satisfactory. The houses are furnished to the company's workers at a very reasonable rental. There is nothing to complain of in that respect at all. I wish to give credit where credit is due, but unfortunately the company have the idea—it is an American company, under alien management and with alien capital—which is prevalent in some sections of the States that the workingman is practically a chattel, and they not only have the people in that town working for them but they wish to think for them. I am not exaggerating because I know the circumstances. I know a case where a man went as a delegate to a political convention and was promptly discharged for that reason. I know another case where a minister of the gospel was accused of being too democratic in the views of Christian democracy that he preached, and that man—he was not fired for they do not fire parsons, but he was notified that his house was required for some other purpose. The parson was willing to stay, and his congregation were willing to keep him, but that man had to sever his connection with that church because the views of Christian democracy that he preached there were not acceptable to the management of the town. I am only saying this by way of illustration to give the House an idea of the attitude of the management towards the people of that town. The company, of course, is largely employed in making paper, and there is a paper makers' union, a trades union, in that town, and the union has been languishing a great deal because since labour conditions got hard, the union was frowned upon by the management, and the only place they could hold their meetings was in this Chinese block that I mentioned before. The company was unable to get this Chinaman to move. He had bought the block before the company acquired their property. The officials of this organization were notified about a month ago that their services would be dispensed with. Every official of that union was discharged and their places were taken by somebody else. Now the members of this trade union have been notified that unless they surrender—that is the word used—before next Sunday their charter, that is—go out of business entirely—that is what it amounts to exactly—all the members of the union there will be discharged. I wish to state that my information further says that there is no strike or threatened strike, and there is no labour trouble of any description. It is simply that the employers and the organization of employers take the stand that they will prevent, so far as they are able, labour from organizing in their particular way.

Now, I thought the time had long gone past in this day and generation, when it would be necessary for me or anybody else in this House to rise and defend the rights of ordinary labour to organize for their own protection and in a thoroughly legitimate way. But it appears that there is a reactionary sentiment which always crops up in this country and which is very much alert. Not only is it unjust but it is a very bad policy to treat trade unionism in this way because trade unionism is the bulwark of society against Bolshevism. Certain people may not think that, but it is the case. Wherever there is a genuine trade union you will always find it opposed to any suggestion of Bolshevism. There is some kind of an international union which is affiliated with the Bolshevists of Moscow, but that is not supported or endorsed by the genuine trade union—in fact the most bitter conflicts take place between the genuine trade unions and the Bolshevist. Therefore, I am justified in saying that when these organizations of genuine working men get together for their own improvement or benefit they should be encouraged rather than frowned upon. They are the future bulwark, as I have said, against Bolshevism. And what do you suppose these men will become if they are compelled to surrender their charter on this occasion, or if they are thrown out of their homes and employment in consequence of this action on the part of the employers? What will be the next step in the political affiliations of these men? They will become Bolshevists and I would not blame them if they did.

I would like to point out that as far back as 1918 the late government passed an order in council, No. 7,143, on the 11th July, in which there is what is called a declaration of a war labour policy. I grant you it says a war labour policy. Conditions were very unsettled then. Indeed we did not know from day to day what steps or what attitude labour might take. It was very urgent that labour should, in plain language, be conciliated, and the Dominion government very properly stepped in and pronounced, so to speak, or declared, what they considered was a proper war labour policy to be followed not only by the Dominion but by the employers on the one hand and the employees on the other. They formulated practically a policy for better mutual relations which they endeavoured to induce the two parties to adopt voluntarily as between labour and their employers. The second condition reads as follows:

> That all employees have the right to organize in trade unions, and this right shall not be denied or interfered with in any manner whatsoever, and through their chosen representatives shall be permitted and encouraged to negotiate with employers concerning working conditions, rates of pay, and other grievances.

I do not believe there is one per cent of the employers of Canada who do not subscribe to that declaration, and who do not prefer to see trade unions in their neighbourhood so that they can deal with their representatives in all matters of dispute. If that was good law or sound policy for the government to adopt in 1918 it cannot be very far off what is just and fair to-day, and there is the whole question in a nutshell. I simply ask protection for these men in their legitimate rights to organize—not for strikes, or anything of that kind, there is no strike, but simply the right to organize.

I may say that this industry is not without obligations to the Dominion government. They get very substantial protection—my hon. friends to the left of me will be glad to know—ranging from 15 per cent to 35 per cent; and I may say that my information is that during the war the production of their paper was costing them $32 a ton and it was selling in the neighbourhood of from $90 to $160 a ton. To-day conditions are different. The price of paper now will probably run—under the present conditions of manufacture because they have got modern appliances—about $25 a ton and the selling price of paper is somewhere from $60 to $65. So that the protection this industry is getting from the Dominion government affords these manufacturers at least a very adequate measure of protection, being the difference between $25, or say $27, and $65 a ton. Therefore they could well afford to lend some ear to the government if they interfere on behalf of these working men. In the present case I feel like adopting the remarks of the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) the other day when he suggested that the way to solve the question of the enhanced price of sugar was to give the refiners twenty-four hours to come down in their rates or they would see the effect in the budget. Perhaps it is not too late to insert an amendment in the budget which would solve this situation also.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Calgary East): I do not think it is necessary for anyone to make a speech at any great length on the question. It seems to me that it is a simple question and the issue very clear. I wish to say, in the first place, that the labour men concerned in this difficulty, as well as the whole labour movement in Canada, are indebted to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni for having brought this matter to the attention of the government and the House. I think that from his presentation of the case it is an attempt being made by the employers concerned to prevent labour from organizing. They have given an ultimatum to the men that before next Sunday they must surrender their charter or leave the job. The men concerned are not very likely to give up without a struggle. Not only so, but the principle underlying this ultimatum involves the whole labour movement in Canada, and I do not suppose that organized labour as a whole would be willing to quietly sit by and see the principle upon which they are organized challenged in this way, knowing that if it is surrendered in the one instance it may be surrendered in other instances, and that ultimately there will be no labour organization at all. So that, in the interests of the country at large as well as in the interests of labour, I hope the government will take whatever steps may be in its power to put this matter right. There is no doubt that if this thing is allowed to go on—and the government, I presume, has the power to do something to prevent it—unrest will follow. I do not, of course, anticipate that the government will take any attitude that will be detrimental to the interests of labour in this case. On the contrary, I quite assume that it will do the fair thing. I am not clear as to what exactly the government has it in its power to do in this connection. However, I have no doubt the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) will make that clear to us. I would conclude by urging that in the interests of the general public and in the interests of the labour movement as a whole—seeing that their right to organize has been threatened in this high-handed manner—the government will take whatever steps are in its power to prevent this thing being put through.

Mr. FRED STORK (Skeena): I wish to endorse what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has said. This is the natural outcome, as I see it, of the "closed town" system as we know it in British Columbia. It is what might be expected from the system that has prevailed there of recent years. There are in my constituency several towns which are entirely manufacturing centres, but they are owned and controlled absolutely by the company which operates the industry. These companies have prevented anyone else from coming in; they have a complete air-tight monopoly. The system has been imported from some of the American states. Some years ago it was in vogue in Montana and other states where they had industrial centres that were owned and controlled entirely by the mining corporation. To the people of the United States it proved to be a very irksome system and they wiped it out there. Apparently the American manufacturer coming over to Canada has brought this system with him, and we find to-day in British Columbia quite a number of centres, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has mentioned, where the industrial corporation completely controls the whole situation. The men who are on their payroll are entirely under the jurisdiction of the company. In my estimation, Mr. Speaker, that does not make for good citizenship. A situation in which a man labouring for a corporation in which he has no voice of his own, in which to a very great extent he is precluded from taking part in public discussion, where he is prevented from exercising his own free will as a citizen, and prevented from joining anything he wants to join, cannot make for the wellbeing and prosperity of the Dominion. I am of the opinion that we have the power to very much curtail this system. This is a matter which has received some attention from former provincial governments, but up to the present time no action has been taken. When a company policeman can meet the incoming boat, and tell any man who steps off the boat that his presence is not required there, that is a condition which should not obtain in any British free country. We find that these corporations enjoy the benefit of police, they enjoy the benefit of post office and custom houses. I agree that some attention should be given to this matter. In accordance with the suggestion of the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean, in regard to sugar, it might be well to serve notice that if people are going to endeavour to carry on the feudal system in Canada they should not expect to make use of governmental services and all our modern public utilities.

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): The Labour department has received no official advice in regard to the particular question referred to by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), although this morning he mentioned the advice that had been received by him from British Columbia, and this afternoon he sent across the floor of the House for my perusal the telegram which he had received. As indicated by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Irvine), it is rather uncertain what this government or this parliament or the Labour department might do in regard to the situation referred to. Many hon. members in this House, I think—and I know very many people outside of parliament—are of the opinion that the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act is intended to maintain some timely supervision and authoritative control over such a matter as the one we are discussing. But that is hardly the case, as the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act only assumes to maintain some reasonable timely supervision over certain possible industrial controversies in what might be regarded as public utilities, chiefly railroads, mining and certain municipal undertakings, and even in regard to the latter it has been found necessary to secure the concurrence of the civic authorities and the workmen before the Labour department undertakes to give assistance in ironing out the disputes.

I hope no hon. member of this House would have any doubt as to where I, as Minister of Labour, stand on a matter of this kind. I belong to a labour organization, and have belonged to that organization for more than thirty years. I officially represented a labour organization for more than twenty years and have been confronted, not once but many times in the years gone by, when acting on behalf of the employees with the statement, "We recognize no organization and do not propose to deal with anyone representing an organization". Therefore, the particular question that we have under consideration to-day is not by any means a new thought to me. However, during the past few years I believed that times had materially changed, both immediately prior to the war, and especially during and immediately after the war, and I believed that the general world sentiment conceded to labour certain inalienable rights that had been in the ages gone by conceded to the employer, to industrial captains, or others, throughout Canada—yea and throughout the world. I am not going to rely on, or to press, my personal judgment in regard to the position that I think should obtain in a matter of this kind, but I am going to refer to some decisions that have been made by higher authorities and I think it would not be improper to refer to the position taken at Versailles when the general principles were enunciated as the labour features of the Treaty of Peace. It is not necessary to read them in their entirety, but to read those principles as enunciated which bear particularly upon this question that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has brought before the House. It is stated—

> Among these methods and principles the following seem to the High Contracting Parties to be of special and urgent importance:
> First, the guiding principle above enunciated that labour should not be regarded merely as a commodity or article of commerce.
> Second, the right of association for all lawful purposes by the employed as well as by the employers.

That is the view on this particular question before the House that was taken at Versailles when the Treaty of Peace was being dealt with. But to come more closely to home, might I suggest that in 1919 the government then in office appointed a royal commission on industrial relations, and that royal commission travelled throughout the length and breadth of Canada from Vancouver, British Columbia to Sydney, Nova Scotia, and interviewed employers and workmen and representatives of the great public interests on the question of maintaining harmony and co-operation between employer and employee. That royal commission made a report, and I want to quote a portion of that report as bearing directly upon the particular question that we are considering. I might say that what I am going to read deals with some other phases that we are not at the moment considering; but I think it is necessary to read it in this way so as to give the complete text and to couple up the portion that has a direct bearing upon the matter under consideration:

The chief causes of unrest may be enumerated as follows:

1. Unemployment and the fear of unemployment.
2. High cost of living in relation to wages and the desire of the worker for a larger share of the product of his labour.
3. Desire for shorter hours of labour.
4. Denial of the right to organize and refusal to recognize Unions.
5. Denial of collective bargaining.
6. Lack of confidence in constituted government.
7. Insufficient and poor housing.
8. Restrictions upon the freedom of speech and press.
9. Ostentatious display of wealth.
10. Lack of equal educational opportunities.

Paragraph 54 reads:

Employers may be divided into three classes: (1) Those who deny the right of their employees to organize and who actively take steps to prevent such organizations; (2) those who, while not denying that right of their employees to organize, refuse to recognize organization among their employees, and persist in dealing with them as individuals, or as committees of employees, without regard to their affiliation with the organization; and (3) those who not only admit the right to their employees to organize, but recognize and bargain with the organization on behalf of their employees.

Paragraph 55 reads:

There are not many employers in Canada who belong to the first class, but there are a very large number who belong to the second class. The employers who openly object to their employees organizing are not many, but, rightly or wrongly, the workers believe that numbers of employers who openly declare their willingness that their employees should organize, covertly interpose obstacles in the way of their doing so, and that employees who are active in organizing their fellows into trade unions are got rid of, or penalized in some other way. To the third class belong the great railway, telegraph and mining companies and many building trades. Outside of these, the employers of labour who recognize and deal with organized labour as such are in the minority.

Paragraph 56 reads:

The government of Canada, by order in council passed in July, 1918, make a declaration of policy with respect to organizing. One clause of this order in council provided that "all employees have a right to organize in trade unions, and this right shall not be denied or interfered with in any manner whatsoever, and through their chosen representatives they should be permitted and encouraged to negotiate with employers concerning working conditions, rates of pay, and other grievances."

There is a great deal more of this report of the Royal Commission on Industrial Relations that might be read, but I think that is sufficient to indicate the position that was taken by that commission after having investigated the underlying causes of unrest, and of the dissension and disputes occurring between Capital and Labour, between employer and employee, throughout the length and breadth of Canada. As a result of that report a conference was held at Ottawa in the fall of 1919, that conference being known as the National Industrial Conference. It was made up of representatives of important employing interests and important labour organizations throughout the Dominion of Canada, and remained in session for several days. That conference appointed certain committees of employees and like committees of employers to deal with certain questions, amongst them item No. 4 of the agenda respecting the right to organize, recognition of labour unions and the right of collective bargaining. It is only proper to say that these committees of workers and of employers did not reach a mutually satisfactory settlement of their differences of opinion. In other words, the conference adopted no general declaration as the result of those two committees' meeting. But it is at least fair to read what the employers' committee reported to that conference, because, if the position taken by that employers' committee had been recognized by the paper company at Powell river, we would not at this moment be considering the particular question that is before the House. The employers' report reads:

Your committee recommend that:

(a) Employers admit the right of employees to join any lawful organization.

(b) Employers should not be required to recognize unions or to establish "closed shops".

Employers insist on the right, when so desired, to maintain their plants as "open shops", by which they mean that no employer should discriminate against any employee because of the latter's membership or non-membership in any organization, and no employee should interfere with any other employee, because of the latter's membership or non-membership in any organization.

(c) Employers should not be required to negotiate except directly, with their own employees or groups of their own employees.

This is signed for the employers' section by the three representatives of the employers who were appointed on that committee.

I do not want it to be understood in any way that I am subscribing to just what has been written, but the position I take is that even the employers at that National Industrial Conference conceded the right of employees to organize, and it is indeed passing strange that we find, at various points in Canada to-day, some four or five years after the war, employers who still take the pre-war position that employees have not the right to organize for their mutual protection. The Criminal Code of Canada has, I think, conceded that right for a number of years, as have also various combines' measures that have been before parliament on many occasions in years gone by. Might I say to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) that the Powell River Paper Company is not the only employer of labour in Canada that, maintains the position that is indicated by the reference that has been made to the Powell river situation? There are in the Dominion other employers, some of them large employers of labour, that, the Labour department has from time to time learned, have no regard for the right of labour to organize. By various methods, either openly antagonistic or otherwise they undertake to dictate to their employees what they shall or shall not do if they hope to hold their jobs. So I think that it is rather a fortunate thing, in a way, that this particular matter has come up in order that parliament might have an opportunity of learning some of the facts that are to-day existent in Canada. In July, 1918, when the Great War was possibly at its most critical stage, it was no doubt properly regarded as the right thing to concede to labour the privilege of organizing, presumably for the purpose of maintaining that degree of satisfactory harmony and co-operation between employer and employee which was necessary to carry on the affairs of Canada and assist in winning the war. It seems to me that if that was the proper condition at that time, under the stress and strain of war, it is equally necessary that the same condition should prevail now and should be recognized as applicable to after-war conditions, when it is just as incumbent upon us to carry on the affairs of Canada with the greatest degree of satisfaction and harmony so that we may promote that agricultural, industrial and general prosperity which the Canadian people have a right to expect. I have no words sufficiently strong to express my personal view of operating officers of any particular employing company who, at this particular stage in Canada's history, yes, at this stage in the history of the world, and in view of labour organization elsewhere, take the position that they will dismiss a large number of men and turn them adrift to look for occupation in other places, unless these men turn in the charter of a presumably reputable labour organization, before Sunday next. But having said that, we have a great deal more to consider. We have come to this question: What is this House going to do in the matter? And we find ourselves in the position of being unable as a federal government, or if you like as a federal labour department, to adopt any measure, so far as I know, that would dictate to any particular employer just what he should or should not do in a matter of this kind. In other words, this is a question that has reference to provincial rights conceded under the British North America Act, it is one of the property and civil right prerogatives of the province of British Columbia, in this particular case, and of the other provinces of the Dominion where a similar situation might develop. The provincial remedy, I should think, ought to be available to employers of labour throughout the length and breadth of Canada, who I am sure desire a return to normal conditions in this country and that resumption of business activity which Canada is capable of. But it seems to me that these business concerns, whether at Powell river, British Columbia, or at the farthest eastern end of Canada, should realize as soon as possible that this particular method of denying red-blooded workingmen the same rights that they demand for themselves is regarded, or at least it ought to be regarded, in this country, as ancient history. Employers would complain very bitterly and make endless representations to this parliament and to the governing bodies in the provinces, if they were denied the right to organize. I think if the circumstances in regard to the situation at Powell river are as indicated by the telegram read by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), that this House is justified in feeling at least keen regret that any employer of labour in this day and age should have taken or should maintain the position that has apparently existed in connection with these workingmen.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): There are a few points which I should like to introduce by way of supplement to what has been said by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) and the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork). Very few people who live in the East or in the central portion of the East recognize the evils that are connected with these company or closed towns. There are a few such towns I believe in the province of Ontario, but there are a number on the west coast, remote from the centres of civilization, where the employers have absolute control over the lives of their employees. Not only does the company control everything that goes on in the pany house; the only store at which anyone can deal is a company store; the only church which anyone can attend is a church maintained by the company. A clergyman who was officiating in one of these churches told me that he was practically dictated to as to what he should say in that church. The only schools to which the employees can send their children are those that are more or less dominated by company officials, and the only places of recreation to which the people can go are those provided by the company. An Englishman who was about to lecture in one of these company towns informed me that before he could obtain any place in which to lecture, the church building being the only available one, the superintendent of the company had to be consulted; and before he was allowed to stay overnight in the town he had to report to the superintendent. That is the situation that prevails in these towns; there is practically no civil liberty whatever. In some instances, even the government post office, is located in the company's store, which brings all the mail under the survey of the company's officials. If a man were suspected of receiving a letter from some labour agency he would be liable to be dismissed. I was told by an old classmate of mine, who happened to be at one time in the employ of one of these companies, that even the labour newspapers which passed through the government mails, were refused delivery to the employees. And in this case the employers were American companies. I submit that with such a condition of affairs in existence in this country we have a right to know who is going to be supreme, the government of Canada, which ought to embody the best ideals of British liberty, or some of these firms which come in from the other side of the line and attempt to administer their affairs on this side in the way in which they have done in the western states. The member for Comox-Alberni, I think, was quite right when he pointed out that perhaps there is nothing that will bring about a spirit of unrest so much as this denial to the ordinary workingman of the very first principles of liberty. The member for Comox-Alberni himself suggests that he does not very much wonder that people labouring under these conditions become restless—to use his own words, become Bolshevists. As a matter of fact, it is where these principles are denied that you find the greatest unrest to-day, and it is for the government of this country, if it would avoid these evils, to devise constructive measures which will safeguard the interests of the humblest subject in Canada. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) ought to go a great deal further than he seems prepared to do at this time. He has told us of the decisions of the peace conference at Versailles and of the conference on industrial relations which took place some years ago. He has said that no words of his can be too strong to express his personal view in regard to this matter. But it is not his personal view that we want to hear; what we want to know is what the government is going to do under the circumstances. He says it is very strange that these things should take place anywhere in Canada, yet in the same breath he says it is too true that they do take place. We submit that under these conditions it is for the government to say what they shall do.

The Minister of Labour denounces those who deny to red-blooded workingmen the right to organize. But what is he going to do for those same red-blooded workingmen? Curiously enough, the Minister of Labour again presents us with the idea that we must not come in conflict with provincial jurisdiction. It is a very strange thing that when we ask for some provision for unemployment insurance we are told that it is a question of provincial jurisdiction. When we ask for some provision for old-age pensions, we are told that for the Dominion government to act in that manner would constitute an interference with provincial jurisdiction, and so on with measure after measure. Surely here is one case in which there can be no conflict of authority; here is one instance in which the federal government can act. If the federal government is not in a position to assure civil rights to its people, I want to know for what we exist? A few months ago, when there was some trouble down in Nova Scotia, troops were immediately rushed to the eastern coast to protect property. If it is within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament to protect property, if they can find the means so to do, surely it is within their jurisdiction to find some means to protect personal rights. It is not for members in opposition to say how this can be done. Early last session I introduced a measure to amend the civil code in such a way as to protect the workingman in his right to speak freely, That measure received its first reading, was sent to a special committee, and was reported by that committee, but we had not the opportunity to give it its second reading. Within the first two or three weeks of the present session I introduced a measure similar to that which had been favourably reported by the special committee last year, but we have not had an opportunity of getting it before the House. It is next to impossible, on account of the way the busi ness of this House is conducted, for any private member to introduce a bill with any hope of its going through the House or even of its being discussed by the House. In these circumstances it is useless for anyone on this side to introduce legislation to meet this case. It is, however, quite within the power of the government—indeed it is their responsibility—to introduce such measures as will safeguard the rights of individuals. I am not suggesting what might be done. One member has thrown out the idea that we might very well—

Mr. MURDOCK: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Is it not a fact that the British North America Act gives the provinces the exclusive jurisdiction over property and civil rights?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not know that it does, Mr Chairman.

Mr. VIEN: You ought to know the British North America Act.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I take it that the Dominion government has certain rights, and also certain responsibilities, in the way of protecting its citizens against unjust treatment. If it has not, then I repeat that I do not see why we are here. If the government were really interested in the matter it would be possible in various ways to accomplish this purpose. I know that the threat of the tariff would accomplish it, but I would like to see some better method adopted. I say that the threat of the tariff would do it if the government chose to use it—and they would use it under certain circumstances. After all, without going into a discussion of the matter, does it not seem absurd that the beneficiaries of this protective tariff on the west coast should for the most part be made up of firms financed by American capital? In other words, we are protecting the Americans, who are largely the beneficiaries. But I care very little about that part of it. I am pleading in the interests of large numbers of workers on the west coast and elsewhere throughout this country. I am asking that the government should not pass this matter by, but that it should devise ways and means of protecting the undoubted liberties of the people. I am not going to offer any threat; I do not believe in making threats. But I should like to offer a little bit of advice, if I may, to the country and to the government. Some of us have been trying to urge that the labour people act through what are termed constitutional methods. Some of us have been trying to urge that they adopt political means of bringing about desired results. But how can wo do so with any hope of success if the government admits that under the present circumstances it is helpless to protect the men? In that case sooner or later—I do not know about the circumstances of this particular case—undoubtedly the men will attempt to protect themselves. I think such action is recognized by British law as being the right of every man. According to the older philosophers and lawmakers that was one of men's inalienable "natural rights;" it was looked upon as deeper even than any political or government rights. Sooner or later if political institutions fail to function, men will take that view.

Somebody has just suggested to me that I make one point clear so before I sit down I should like to reiterate it, although I have already emphasized it. If this matter of civil rights and property rights is entirely within the jurisdiction of the provincial governments, why, as I asked a little while ago, did the federal government last year send troops down to Nova Scotia?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (King's P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, coming from the far eastern part of Canada, as a citizen of this country and a member of this House, I want to say a word or two.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) intimated in the course of his remarks that the federal government and the parliament of Canada had no power in a matter of this kind, and later he stated what is undoubtedly true, that the question of property and civil rights pertained exclusively to the provinces. Then it strikes me as a layman, not as a lawyer, why was that order in council passed in July, 1918 if it had no power to interfere in such matters?

Mr. MURDOCK: Under the War Measures Act.

Mr. HUGHES: I was just going to ask whether the government at that time was exercising the power it had received from parliament under the War Measures Act. If that was the case, I will reason this way: If parliament had the power to give the government of that day authority to act in that way, has parliament not that power at the present time? Perhaps the reply may be that we were then under war conditions. Well, Sir, if matters of this kind can go on I would almost say that we are at war now. We are under a measure of war, because this is a very serious matter. It involves not only the rights of property—and I take second place to no man in protecting the rights of property—but the rights of man are also in jeopardy. So far as my voice and my vote will go, I will support this government, the provincial government, or any power in Canada, that will exercise every power it possesses to protect the rights of property whenever and wherever they are threatened, but I will say the same and go a little bit further perhaps in protecting the rights of man. I think this is a matter that should receive the serious consideration of parliament. We should let the labouring man and every man in this country know that he will be protected in his civil rights so far as we have the power, and if parliament has not the power it should obtain the power by some means or other. If an occasion should arise when the provincial government would refuse to interfere, what would be done then? I repeat, this matter should receive very serious consideration, and these men who are doing no wrong but against whom a great wrong appears to be contemplated, should know that they have the sympathy of this House and the sympathy of the people of Canada behind them.

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Lotbinière): My hon. friend from King's (Mr. Hughes) has said that he has spoken as a layman. There are questions with which this parliament cannot deal unless we amend the British North America Act. When a workingman leases his labour to his employer he passes his civil contract to his employer, and that contract is subject to all the conditions that the parties thereto have agreed upon. When an employer who leases the services of the employee puts in the contract a condition that the employee shall not belong to a union or inserts some other condition, I fail to see how this parliament would have jurisdiction to interfere in the matter of the civil rights and the civil contracts of the two parties. It is all very well to talk about sympathy for the labouring man and of protecting property, but it is talking outside of our jurisdiction, outside of our province, if the British North America Act reserves that to the provincial authorities. I beg to submit, Mr. Speaker, that the question is absolutely without our province and that the provincial authorities concerned should take the necessary steps to redress the grievance.

Mr. IRVINE: Does the British North America Act override the British constitution?

Mr. VIEN: Yes. The British constitution has nothing to do with Canadian affairs. We have clamoured time and again that we are a nation governed by the British North America Act, and the principles that are not sanctioned by the British North America Act and that may be in force under the British constitution have nothing to do with us.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Has the common law of Great Britain nothing whatever to do with us in Canada?

Mr. VIEN: Nothing at all. The common law of Great Britain has nothing to do with us in Canada except in those provinces that have said that their civil rights shall be governed by the common law of England. In this country the common law is left to the provinces, and if the provincial authorities, acting within the powers that are given to them by the British North America Act, declare that their civil rights shall be governed by the common law of England, then the common law of England applies, not on account of its power and authority, but on account of the fact that the provincial authority has accepted the common law of England as governing its civil rights.

Mr. MARTELL: Is it not a fact that in all the English-speaking provinces of Canada the English common law is in force save in so far as it has been altered by statute and where it has been found inapplicable to our situation as a colony? I think my hon. friend will find that is a correct statement of the case. I think that is the principle established by the case of Uniacke vs. Dickson.

Mr. VIEN: My hon. friend will find that the principle I have enunciated is exactly in conformity with his own opinion. The common law of England applies in provinces that have sanctioned it in their provincial law Civil rights are left to the provinces and if in the exercise of their jurisdiction the provincial authorities find that they should apply the common law of England as their civil law, they are absolutely free to do so. I grant that outside of the province of Quebec all the other provinces have done so, but this does not change the principle that I was discussing; that is to say, whether it is the common law of England or a provincial statute that governs civil rights in any province, any question arising out of civil rights is left to the jurisdiction of the provinces, and we are simply wasting our time discussing a matter which should have been raised in the legislative assembly of the province interested or taken up with the provincial government interested. For that reason I quite agree with the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock), and I am ready to support the stand he has taken.

Mr. T. G. McBRIDE (Cariboo): In rising to say a word on this question I might state that I have known the Powell River Company for many years, and I did not think they would lower themselves to take the stand they are taking at the present time. Surely, when the people of Canada can organize and pool their wealth in companies and corporations, the workingmen of Canada should have the right to pool their labour and organizations to deal collectively. I think that this government, if it is possible to do it, should take some steps to bring this company or any other company to time that tries to take advantage of the workingman of this country.

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): I listened patiently during the eloquent address of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) for some suggestions as to what might be done, but I was exceedingly disappointed when he sat down without having suggested anything but his inability to make any recommendation whatsoever. I think we ought to have some suggestion from the government, or from the Department of Labour, as to what positive powers the province would have, and as to how this matter can be dealt with either by the present government or by the provincial authorities. To simply sit helpless and hopeless in the face of such a situation as this seems to me to be, to say the least, most regrettable.

I have just two other very short observations to make on the situation. One is in answer to the hon. member for Lothbinière (Mr. Vien), that we were a nation governed by the British North America Act. Well, we are scarcely a nation if we have no control over our own constitution. If such is the case, I hope the time will soon come when we shall have control in this matter. The other remark I should like to make is that the situation which has been presented to us is the natural and inevitable result of the capitalistic system in industry. We cannot help it developing, and so far as I can see we have got to face even instability, inefficiency, sabotage and bloodshed until this system is replaced by something of the co-operative nature. I hope the government will, in spite of the confessed inability of the Minister of Labour, take this matter in hand and in consultation with the province of British Columbia, do something to avoid and avert what may be a very serious thing.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I wish to draw the attention of the House to the circumstance that all we have before us in the present discussion is a communication which my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has read. We do not know the particular organization to which reference is made; indeed, we do not know any of the facts other than as represented in this message. It is somewhat difficult for the government to make a pronouncement that will cover what may be a hypothetical situation. I do not hesitate for one moment to say that if the facts are as represented in this message, and I have no reason to believe that they are other than as represented, it should be intimated to the company, and it will be intimated to them, that this parliament in the name of Canada has given its adherence to the articles of the Treaty of Versailles and the labour convention attached to it, and that one of the terms of the latter is the right of association for all lawful purposes—by the employee as well as the employer—to preserve this right is something to which we are committed and bound by that treaty. I think it will be sufficient if the attention of the company is drawn to that particular article, and to the debate which has taken place here, to focus public opinion and public sentiment upon any course of behaviour on the part of this company which may be counter to that particular article of the treaty. If that is not sufficient I shall be very much surprised if the parliament of Canada cannot find some means of satisfactorily dealing further with the situation.

Mr. L. W. HUMPHREY (West Kootenay): Notwithstanding the remarks made by the hon. member for Lotbiniere (Mr Vien) I feel that he does not wish to have a wrong impression created in this House. He seemed to be of the opinion that an agreement had been entered into in this case between the employees and the employer stating that the former would not become members of a trade union. I feel that such is the case because my knowledge and my experience lead me to believe that the employers of labour throughout the Dominion welcome the idea of labour organizing into trade unions. During the last twenty years I have not met any employer of labour who did not welcome the principles held in mind by labour men in organizing and becoming members of these unions. The principle involved in the case to which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has drawn attention was decided many years ago. To-day the majority of the largest employers of labour throughout the Dominion not only recognize that principle but they welcome discussions by representatives of labour bodies on industrial matters of mutual interest and even, at times, invite discussion on the management of their particular industry. In the majority of cases this policy ensures better service, a greater degree of efficiency, and on the part of the employee a feeling of contentment. The principle involved here is so important that I was disappointed the Minister of Labour could not make a more definite statement as to what action he was prepared to take. Because failure to take the right course might precipitate a very serious situation. It might involve a strike on the part of the employees of the Powell River Company, to say the least of it. So that any action on the part of the Department of Labour or of the Government in opposition to the drastic and extreme course apparently pursued by this corporation would be welcomed by the trades unions as well as by the general public throughout Canada. In my opinion the government would be well advised in taking such steps as will re-assure the employees of this industrial concern as to their rights in this matter.

Upon Mr. Neill rising to reply.

Mr. SPEAKER: Under sub-section 2 of Rule 21 the right of reply is allowed to an hon. member who has moved a substantive motion. In this case the motion was to adjourn the House, and therefore there is no such right. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) may, however, be granted the privilege with the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. NEILL: I only wish to speak for a few moments.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member have leave to reply?

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. NEILL: I thank the House for permission to reply. I hope the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Vien), was not sincere or not correct, when he made the statement that when a labouring man leased his labour to his employer it was possible and proper for the employer to include in that contract a provision that he should not join any particular body. In that case, the contract necessarily carries with it the converse; that the employer has the right to compel the employee to join a particular body. If the principle applies to a trade union, it would apply to every other organization. It might for instance, be a religious body. It might be a condition of the employment that the employee should forswear the religion he had followed and adhere to that of his employer. The proposition lends itself to no end of possibilities, or impossibilities. It might also go to the extent that his employer would include in the lease or contract of labour the disposition of his vote. That might happen quite easily and it is a legitimate deduction. We would then be going back to the pocket burroughs of the feudal ages, where we had a man buying a certain seat with two or three representatives in it who had to vote the way their purchaser or employer dictated. I thought the feudal system had been done away with some hundreds of years ago, but I am sorry to see it is still lingering in certain corners. I am not a lawyer, and I cannot follow the intricacies of the debate as regards common law as against any other law, but I do know that there is a law of common sense and it is against common sense to say that when a working man sells his labour to his employer he also sells his soul to the employer. If the argument were carried out to a logical conclusion, that would be the situation.

The remarks which have been made here today, and especially the remarks of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) show that there is a real necessity for legislation dealing with this matter. If the minister cannot deal with it—and he has shown fairly plainly that he cannot deal with it formally—I might say, at this moment then it shows there is need for legislation. With reference to the question as to where the jurisdiction lies I think the power that passed the order in council, even though it was not entirely obligatory, yet was almost mandatory at any rate—has also power to deal along those lines, even in times of peace. At any rate we are aware that this parliament has passed legislation such as the Industrial Disputes and Investigation Act and provided for boards of conciliation, and so on, dealing with relations between capital and labour, and certainly those relations can well be deemed a national issue rather than a provincial one. For the rest of my remarks I might merely echo the statement of the Prime Minister. While there may be no legal way to deal with the situation, we know what Shakespeare says—"Conscience doth make cowards of us all," and there is no greater pressure on some people than the pressure of sentiment and public opinion. If the Minister of Labour were to advise this particular company of the provisions of the order in council which I have quoted, and tell them that, while it is not obligatory, as there is no penal clause attached to it, if it were not adhered to by labour on the one hand and employers on the other ,it might be necessary in the opinion of the Minister of Labour to crystallize that order in council into legislation, it would have a very salutary effect. He might also summarize the debate in the House, and say that the House has expressed strong disapproval of any company so heavily protected as they are, refusing the right of their employees to join a trades union. I think that would be more effective than putting the legal machinery at work. If he would act along the lines suggested, I am satisfied the situation would be adequately met.

Motion withdrawn.

CANADIAN NAVAL RESERVE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Lunenburg): Before the orders of the day are called I would like to ask the Acting Minister of Defence (Mr. Macdonald) a question, based on a despatch which appeared in the morning Chronicle of Halifax a few days ago which reads as follows:

> Ottawa, May 14—(By Canadian Press)—An official announcement to-night states that five companies of the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve have been formed and others are almost up to strength.
>
> The companies already formed are Quebec, Ottawa, Hamilton, Saskatoon and Calgary. Edmonton and Winnipeg will be ready to form their companies within a few days.
> "The progress which has been made in recruiting for the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve has been satisfactory. This reserve is composed entirely of young Canadians between eighteen and twenty-two years of age. They are already showing fine interest in the work and promise to build up a highly efficient reserve force," adds the announcement.

I desire to know from the minister if this is true; and if the despatch is true, why is it necessary to recruit members for a Royal Voluntary Naval Reserve in the inland cities of Saskatoon, Calgary, Edmonton, Winnipeg and Ottawa? I desire to know why, instead of recruiting Royal Voluntary Naval Reserve in these places, they do not go to such ports as Pictou, Sydney, Canso, Lunenburg and Yarmouth on the Atlantic coast, and Vancouver, Victoria, Prince Rupert and Alberni on the Pacific coast? Why go to the expense of recruiting these men in the inland cities, and taking them to the seaboard at a very great expense? I wish to know also if, when the naval reserve volunteers are recruited, every volunteer will be supplied with a package of Mothersill's seasick remedy?

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Acting Minister of National Defence): I rise to make clear exactly the position of matters in regard to the naval reserves. There are two reserves, the Royal Naval Reserve, and the Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve. The Royal Naval Reserve is made up entirely of men who are accustomed to the seafaring profession, and whose duties upon ships would be those which would be usually performed by men who have been engaged in seafaring life. During the last year preparations have been proceeding, and it is expected, in regard to this branch of the service, that after the first of July, in the maritime ports both on the Pacific and the Atlantic, volunteers will be asked, and careful provision is being made for the inauguration of this part of the service. There is a Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve, which is made up of another branch of the service. On naval vessels there are to be found men who have been engaged in almost every kind of occupation, from sailors to mechanics. Organizations for training recruits are being formed in the inland cities very largely through the influence of the Naval League.

Mr. DUFF: Are there no sailors on the Atlantic coast?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): We will look into that when the preparations are all made, which we expect will be after the 1st of July. In the various parts of Canada, in the interest of those who are devoting themselves to naval matters, organizations of this kind are being formed, but there are men who happen to be born inland who would be able to serve at sea, in the occupations they had been engaged in, and I think it is of interest to state that during the late war a very great proportion of the recruits obtained for the United States' naval force were drafted from the inland cities. These naval companies are made up from men of this class, who had been engaged in occupations which would fit them to go on board vessels in some capacity, and these men are trained and drilled at their own homes. Arrangements are being perfected as the force is being developed, to provide for a certain short period of training at the seaports, either on the Atlantic or on the Pacific. The difference between the two classes of people who are being recruited for the services is simply the difference between these two services.

Mr. DUFF: How are they going to train them? Will they use prairie schooners?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend is very keen and the acumen which he has been accustomed to display in the House in a good natured way, causes him to take a great interest in this matter. I have been in the department four weeks and have been devoting myself with a good deal of interest to this line of service, and I can assure my hon. friend that I will welcome his co-operation in this matter, so that we may have a service on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. SPEAKER: I might remind hon. gentlemen that such questions must not degenerate into a debate; otherwise we shall find ourselves at sea.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before the question drops, would the minister tell us which of these forces it is—or is it both?—the training of which consists in learning to fish? We were told by the hon. member in the debate on the estimates, that that was the training that was to be given to one of them.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): That is a phase of the subject I have not yet considered.

Mr. DUFF: Evidently they have not given it much consideration.

BUDGET STATEMENTS

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Yesterday I asked for the elements, the items constituting the revenue of the country for the preceding year. Those I have received. I wish to ask further for particulars of the appropriation credited against the National Railways this year and last year—some $92,000,000 and $97,000,000—in the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). I think we should have the items that make that up, and the purpose to which each has been devoted. Some of it, of course, was in the recoupment of deficits, but a very large amount must have been in the way of advances. I think the House should have been informed of this in the budget speech itself.

I also call attention to the fact that the budget statement gives no account of our present debt. Not only should we have a statement of the present debt, but a historical account; but if the items are given, that is all I will ask for at the moment.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think I have in mind what my right hon. friend wants; but if he would give me a written memorandum of it, I will give him the information as far as possible.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Thursday, May 17, the debate on the motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance), that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into Committee on Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Robert Forke.

Mr. R. W. GRIMMER (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, in the budget presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) I note that the proposed change in the British preferential tariff will apply a further discount of 10 per cent in customs duties on goods coming directly to Canada by way of Canadian ports. The object no doubt is to encourage the use of Canadian ports and incidentally the use of the Canadian National Railways. I believe in the principle of giving every encouragement to imports coming directly to our ports. At the same time we should not lose sight of the fact that Canada is an exporting country, and that we should encourage, perhaps I might say, educate our people to the fact that to build up our country, our railways and our ports, it is absolutely necessary that our exports should be sent by Canadian roads through Canadian ports to the markets of the world.

I am sure we must all admit that one of the greatest problems that Canada is facing to-day is that of our railways and transportation. We are all familiar with the situation as it now stands. Our railways are not hauling the traffic that legitimately belongs to them, and the United States is receiving that traffic, which is assisting to build up the port of Portland and other foreign ports, this being detrimental to our own in Canada. The greatest difficulty in solving the problem is the argument that as yet we have no port that is absolutely adapted as an all-the-year-round outlet to our railway system in our own country, in spite of the fact that large sums of money have been spent in the development of our ports throughout Canada. I believe it to be in the interests of the people of Canada to make these expenditures, and I would urge upon the government the necessity of the earliest possible development of all our ports. Even then, however, it is not possible to obtain results that will entirely remedy the present system of transportation. When the people of Canada fully realize that Canadian products shall be carried by Canadian rails through Canadian ports to the markets of the world, then and then only will Canada become the nation that she is destined to be, and our ports will naturally come into their own. We may very well take a lesson from the great republic to the south of us, whose people have built up a wonderful commercial country by the development of the ports along their coast line, taking care of their own business, reaching out as handlers of the export trade of Canada, thereby receiving every year millions of our good Canadian dollars that we should be spending in the development of the industrial life of this country, patronizing their own railroads, spending their own money in the industrial life of their country, giving employment to their people and making them happy and contented. Here in Canada with a larger extent of area, with the unbounded, undeveloped natural resources of a great country, linked together as we are from ocean to ocean by railways owned by our people, with branch lines running into every important centre, we should patronize our own railways by carrying our exports to our own ports, spending our own money in Canada in developing the industrial life of the country, giving employment to our own people and keeping our young men at home, because this is the best immigration policy that any government could adopt.

Realizing as we do that 70 to 80 per cent of the export trade of this country is going through American ports, why should we permit a condition like this to continue to exist, when we have an all-the-year-round outlet to our railway system in Canada situated at our door in Charlotte county in the greatest natural harbour on the Atlantic coast of North America? This harbour is pronounced by experts to be one of the great world ports created by the hand of nature with a 60-foot depth of water for four miles of harbour, 60 feet to 150 feet deep all the way from the Atlantic ocean into the port where the largest vessel that has ever been or ever will be built can come in under her own steam and dock without the assistance of tugs. There are no shoals or ledges to contend with. There is a splendid opportunity for anchorage for ships in Passamaquoddy bay in event of storm. There is ample accommodation for the fleets of Europe, and the harbour is free from fog and ice and open all the year. No dredging is required; nature has done it all. We would advocate connecting by rail with the Transcontinental at Quebec, making St. Croix the nearest possible point on the Atlantic coast to Winnipeg.

A report was made by a special committee of the Senate of Canada, consisting of fourteen members, assembled at Ottawa, April 20, 1921, "to inquire into" conditions responsible for the routing of a large portion of "Canadian export trade via American instead of Canadian ports," this committee having power to call for persons and papers in connection with the subject to be investigated. The committee, after many sittings, made its final report June 9, 1922, and so satisfied must it have been with the evidence submitted that it concludes its exhaustive findings, in part, in the following words:

> After careful consideration of all the evidence submitted, your committee is of opinion that there exists a most serious condition of affairs with regard to the diversion of the western grain trade to New York and other United States seaports for export.
> There seems to be no doubt that two-thirds and problably four-fifths of that trade takes that route and that we are paying many millions annually to United States railways, lake carriers and elevators that would be earned by our own railways and trainmen if it were possible to export this grain at Canadian seaports.

Since this evidence was taken government statistics show that the diversion still continues and that of the bountiful crop of 1921 no less than 99 million bushels of wheat went from Fort William to Buffalo.

Evidence was produced before this committee to show beyond any question that wheat could be hauled profitably from Winnipeg to Quebec over the National Transcontinental Railway for 18 cents per bushel. This fact being established it could be continued 260 miles further to St. Croix harbour for 22 cents per bushel. The rate to New York is 32 cents per bushel. Thus a saving of 10 cents per bushel on even 200 million bushels would mean 20 million dollars saved to the farmers of the prairie provinces yearly.

What does this mean? It means that $20,000,000 distributed annually to the farmers of the prairie provinces would so improve conditions that it would not be necessary for them to ask the banks to advance loans to enable them to carry on their industry, and would place them in the very near future in that position in which they would be able to ask the banks whether they could not pay more than 3½ per cent on the deposits of farmers. In the year 1837, Admiral Sir W. F. W. Owen in a report to the Imperial government on this harbour had this to say in part:

> There is no point within my knowledge better adapted by nature than St. Andrews for being made a mercantile port with extensive advantages and facilties, the outports,—so to call them,—or ports adjacent to this port, are in themselves very commodious ports and furnish shelter of easy access to any number of ships of any magnitude, even for all the navies of Europe and, in short, what Liverpool has been made as a mercantile port, at an incrediable expense, this port of our colonies has every advantage to adapt it for and which might be made fully available at trifling cost.

Commander Campbell, of the Beaver line fleet, says:

There can be no doubt that St. Andrews, both from its geographical position and from the natural advantages of a fine, commodious, landlocked harbor, is certainly equal, if not superior, to any other port in the Dominion as the natural winter port. It is nearer England by over sixty miles than Portland, Maine, and as a harbor is infinitely its superior, being shut in from heavy seas from all quarters. It is also free from any serious difficulties in the way of ice and carries a depth of water in the outer harbor sufficient for the largest steamers afloat. It would, if properly conducted, be a cheaper port for discharging and loading vessels when accommodations are made and ought to compare favourably with any port in Canada. I have often wondered that, possessing so many natural and geographical advantages as it does, it has not long ago become the most important winter port of the Dominion.

Captain Henry Mowat, for many years port superintendent for the Canadian Pacific Steamship line at Liverpool, England, in a report on this harbour in 1913, says:

The approach to the port of St. Croix via Head harbour is equal to the approach of any other port in the world, and in many instances excels the best for depth of water. There are no great ports which have such great depths of water from the sea clear into port as that of the St. Croix; it is such that the largest ships now in existence and with the greatest draft of water can enter the port at the lowest possible tides.

The channels from Head harbour into Passamaquoddy bay are that the largest vessel that ever will be built can be navigated with ease at top speed with perfect safety. They are free from shoals and rock and have ample width for turning a ship in the narrowest part. The tidal currents are nothing in comparison to the river Mersey, England, and other ports I have navigated, etc.

After careful investigation, I consider St. Croix river and Passamaquoddy bay, equal to any in the world for a great national port.

In the year 1913, the Hon. Robert Rogers, Minister of Public Works in the federal government of that time, and himself a western man, seeing the possibilities of the development of St. Croix harbour, engaged Mr. E. C. Swan, a harbour expert, and a gentleman of recognized ability in his profession, together with the engineers of the Department of Public Works, and also three master mariners, to visit the harbour, make investigations, take soundings, boring, and so forth, submit specifications for the equipment necessary for the development of the port, and to draw up a report for consideration by the Public Works department. All that information secured at that time is at present in the possession of the department and no doubt would be available to any hon. gentlemen who might care to learn the facts in connection with this matter. This investigation was made shortly after the outbreak of the war when, as we are all aware, all public works were cancelled and every energy was put forth in the prosecution of the war. Mr. Swan in his report goes into the matter very thoroughly. He deals with conditions at the port, and so forth, but I shall read only his concluding remarks.

[Mr. Grimmer.]

In considering the St. Croix river for shipping purposes and as a possible auxiliary to St. John, more particularly for the extensive traffic during the winter months, it seems to have many attractions such as—it is some 50 miles nearer the mouth of the bay of Fundy than is St. John. The distance from Montreal to St. John by Canadian Pacific railway is 483 miles. The distance from Montreal to Oak bay St. Stephen, by the Canadian Pacific railway, is 438 miles or thereby, and if in the future a branch line is constructed from Mattawamkeag to Oak bay, this would shorten the total distance from Montreal to Oak bay to 410 miles. The river St. Croix and Passamaquoddy bay is comparatively well sheltered water, never closed by ice and protected from the swell of the bay of Fundy by numerous islands near the mouth, and as there is deep water right close in shore to the sides of the river and bay, practically no dredging whatever would be necessary to form a shipping channel. Leading lights for the guidance of shipping at night would of course have to be provided; probably some joint agreement regarding cost of same could be made with the United States. . . . I therefore recommend with great confidence that wharf areas, railway terminals, roads and freight handling facilities in general, should be designed on a comprehensive, practicable scale, and constructed by degrees at Oak bay as may be necessary.

Mr. F. C. Goodspeed, an engineer of the federal department, with whom probably hon. gentlemen in the House are acquainted, in his report as to the cost of soundings, borings, the construction of quay walls, docks, and so forth, gives an exhaustive survey of the whole matter. I quote the following:

Throughout this whole distance of eight miles, port development along the shore is possible, using quay walls along the narrower sections and where the deep water approaches close to shore; while piers or jetties would be provided at Joe's Point and Oak Point and near the mouth of the Waweig river. . . . Any sized yard room required could be developed at the head of Pagan's Cover for storage purposes, while further yards would be available at the docks. These docks would be 438 miles from Montreal by rail, via the Canadian Pacific railway, compared with 483 miles to St. John. Oak Point would also be about 50 miles nearer to the mouth of the bay of Fundy than St. John is.

This means fifty miles shorter water route to Liverpool. Mr. Goodspeed is further reported as follows:

Mr. Goodspeed also gives estimates for development of Joe's Point and at the mouth of the Waweig river, both of them being a part of the possible extension of the harbour for eight miles along the eastern bank of the river.

The three master mariners who accompanied these gentlemen on their survey and investigation submitted a report in respect to the approaches and entrance to the harbour. They had this to say:

Bold and steep, suitable for safe navigation of vessels of any size provided proper aids to navigation were established for navigation at night or in foggy weather. Channel between Indian island, Campobello and Eastport (turning point St. Croix river) of ample width to handle with safety any size of vessel. Good anchorage in event of fog.

St. Croix river and Oak Point: Safe and well sheltered entrance and approach, suitable for safe navigation of any size of steamer.

M. N. Fillies, master mariner, Supt. Donaldson Line, Ltd.

D. L. Kenney, master mariner, Supt. Head Line steamers.

G. O. R. Elliot, master mariner, Asst Marine Supt. C.P.R. and C.S.S. Lines.

This, Mr. Speaker, should be sufficient evidence to establish the suitability of St. Croix harbour, when properly developed, as a great shipping port for our grain products. The part of St. Croix river which constitutes this harbour extends from the town of St. Andrews up to what is known as the ledge. I may say in this connection that when lumbering was the chief industry on the St. Croix, as many as twenty-five of the largest vessels then in the ocean trade were frequently seen at one time in the harbour known as the ledge, situated between St. Croix harbour and the town of St. Stephen. These vessels were engaged in the transport of timber across the Atlantic, and it was owing to the heavier class of timber in this immediate vicinity having become exhausted that the traffic gradually disappeared. This harbour is within four miles of the town of St. Stephen.

It may be interesting to know that the town of St. Stephen is an important industrial centre, some of the largest industries of their kind in the Dominion of Canada being located there. I may mention two of the articles that are manufactured there, Ganong's chocolates and Surprise soap, both known in every household from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Among other industries that we have may be mentioned the following: The Dominion Fertilizer Company which has an output of 25,000 tons of fertilizer annually; the Mann Axe and Tool Company, with an output of 4,000 tons annually; Ganong Brothers, sweet manufacturers, output 5,000 tons annually; Haley & Sons, handling about 5,000,000 feet of lumber anually; Canadian Cotton factory, 1,000 tons anually. We have a pulp mill with an output of over 100 tons daily, and there is the Eastern Pulp Company, handling from 50 to 75 cords of pulpwood. Coal to the extent of 50,000 to 75,000 tons a year is imported. The St. Croix Soap Company does a very large business, and there is also a shoe factory in St. Stephen whose operations are very extensive. We have also sardine factories, granite quarries and many other industries in the adjacent parishes. Recently an American company have purchased land and water powers in anticipation of erecting another large pulp and paper mill in the near future. Another of our chief industries is the fishing industry, the market value of its products last year being over $1,420,000. We do not claim to be an agricultural county—that is, to the extent of making any considerable exports—but we have in the past exported 40,000 tons of potatoes annually. So that the moment accommodations are provided, a considerable amount of traffic would be available the whole year round for St. Croix harbour.

Where can we look for an outlet for our railway system, through which our grain products, running into hundreds of millions of bushels and increasing each year, may be continually shipped all the year round to the markets of the world? There is but one answer to that question, the port of Quebec in summer and St. Croix harbour in winter. The building of the National Transcontinental railway has made the port of Quebec the logical outlet in the St. Lawrence for the grain products of the northwest during the open season of navigation. The city of Winnipeg is situated at the very eastern threshold of the vast grain trade, and at that point must be assembled some time during the year the great bulk of all the grain raised in the districts to the west. Three great railway systems converge there from the west, and they again converge at Quebec bridge. The shortest route between these points is the National Transcontinental; on that road a distance of 1,350 miles brings Winnipeg nearer to an ocean port on the Atlantic seaboard than is possible by any other route. Mr. D. F. Maxwell, former railway engineer in the provincial government, a man of outstanding ability in his profession who has devoted many years of study to this great question, does much to solve the problem in an article he has written, and from which I will now quote:

From an engineering standpoint, the arbitrary points, both physical and commercial, which would influence the location of a railway between this harbor and the great bridge over the St. Lawrence at Quebec, come so near the air line that it is safe to conclude that a railway can be located that would not exceed the air line distance by more than fifteen per cent, thus making the total distance 260 miles on the whole and thus making the total distance from Winnipeg to St. Croix harbor 1,610 miles, or more than 100 miles shorter than from Winnipeg to Portland, Maine, via Canadian Pacific and Grand Trunk railways, (shortest route) and more than 200 miles shorter than from Winnipeg to St. John, via the Canadian National Railway, (shortest route), and about 370 miles shorter than from Winnipeg to Halifax via Canadian National railway, (shortest route).

When this route is completed and properly put into commission, and when the necessary grain exchange, elevators and so on are established at Quebec, the great question of the transport of our grain will have been settled so far as the St. Lawrence route goes and our problems in that connection will at least have been partly solved.

The next question is, will St. Croix harbour serve as a winter port? The St. Croix harbour is in the St. Croix river, which forms the boundary line between New Brunswick and the state of Maine. The air line distance from Quebec bridge to St. Croix is 226 miles. St. Croix harbour is without doubt the greatest natural harbour on the Atlantic coast of North America. A distinctive feature is its geographical position, which will naturally have a favourable effect upon insurance rates as compared with the rates to United States ports. Then, St. Croix harbour is nearer the great coast cities of the United States, the West India Islands, Cuba, Mexico and South America than is any other port in Canada. It is nearer Europe than any port in either the United States or Canada that could be considered, except Halifax. A very important feature in connection with the harbour is the small cost of development. But the most unique feature is that the St. Croix river, being the boundary line, it may be both Canadian and American, a condition that could not be possible anywhere else.

Halifax, as you are well aware, has never shipped any quantity of grain on account of the long rail haul which made it impossible for it to compete profitably with American ports. St. John will always continue to ship annually, and Montreal will always continue to be as it is now the summer port, as it is the summer terminal of the lake water route as well as of the Canadian Pacific and Grand Trunk railways. What we want, Mr. Speaker, is to haul over our own railways and to ship through our own ports practically seventy-five or eighty per cent of the grain that now finds its way out through Portland, Boston and Baltimore. If we were taking care of this traffic ourselves our railway deficits would soon begin to disappear. If this harbour were developed to even one-half its present capacity and railway connection were made with the Quebec bridge the transportation problem would be fully and completely solved. Again, it will be physically impossible to transport in winter grain from Winnipeg to any other Atlantic port as cheaply and as expeditiously as it can be carried by this proposed route to St. Croix harbour for the reason that gradient and the ton-mile haulage must continue to be the governing factors in the cost of railway transportation.

The building of the National Transcontinental railway, and particularly the part between Winnipeg and Quebec, and the bridging of the great river at this point, changed the westward objective of all Maritime province railways and brought the prairie provinces nearer by some three hundred miles to the Maritime province ports than was the case before, as well as giving the port of Quebec its commanding position as the logical outlet in the St. Lawrence. This is a great national project. It was intended by nature as the greatest highway possible between the world's greatest granary and the nearest and cheapest possible points of shipment during the whole year for its products for the world's markets.

Then, of course, would come up the question, how can this proposed railway across Maine be built? That is a pertinent question to the inquiry. The answer should not be difficult If the parliament of Canada was justifiec thirty-five years ago when its revenues were under 40 million dollars a year, in granting financial aid to the Canadian Pacific railway, across Maine to the extent of five million dollars for a maritime winter outlet for that railway, why should it not be justified in granting financial aid now to a similar undertaking when its revenues are more than ten times what they were then and grant aid commensurate with the cost of building a railway to-day and in consideration of the character of a road necessary to be built to-day, with a standard grade of 21.4 feet per mile, against a grade of 52.8 feet per mile at that time, and particularly in view of the fact that the government owns two transcontinental railways now resting their noses on Quebec bridge and looking for a maritime port of which the nearest and best possible one to be had is this splendid undeveloped St. Croix harbour, which can be reached by building about 200 to 210 miles of railway at the most.

This is made possible by utilizing that portion of the National Railways east of Quebec as far as St. Malachie and for which distance it is pointing directly for this harbour and where it then turns north around the state of Maine on its way to Moncton, New Brunswick.

How can this project be successfully carried out? The Canadian National Railway Board cannot build a railway across Maine.

The answer to that is that if the Dominion government will grant a suitable subsidy each year for twenty years for the purpose of constructing a railway from Quebec bridge to St. Croix harbour by the shortest and most practicable route, a private corporation could, no doubt, be formed that would guarantee its construction and hand it over to the Canadian National Board, who no doubt could operate it.

When this is done, all that remains necessary to be done is to equip Quebec and St. Croix harbour with the necessary docks and elevators and which may be accomplished, covering the period of, say, ten years by spending a certain amount every year on each, by the end of which time we would be shipping all of our own grain over our own railways, through our own ports.

This is no visionary scheme, but a plain, business proposition, and one quite within our financial ability to carry out, and the carrying out of which will settle for a long period of years our most vexed problem.

This is not only a practical solution; it is the only solution.

Reliable data at hand show another physical feature that distinguishes this route. That there is only one summit between the St. Lawrence and this harbour to overcome and that only 1,200 feet above the sea level, compared to 1,854 feet on the Canadian Pacific between Montreal and St. John, and 1,800 feet on the Canadian National. Reliable surveys already made show that it may be overcome with a four-tenths per cent grade.

I wish to point out that the people of the Maritime provinces are solidly behind any project that would remedy the present condition of affairs under which our traffic is being diverted to the United States. This traffic which now goes to Portland and other United States ports should go through Canadian ports. We should keep our own railways busy carrying our own products. That would be in the interests of the whole of this country.

St. John, as you know, is the only winter port on the Atlantic at the present time for the shipment of grain. It is an important and valuable port but unfortunately the port is limited in the degree to which it can be extended. Both Halifax and St. John are doing a great public service. Both have magnificent harbours and should be developed to their utmost capacity, but even if they were developed to their utmost capacity it would not be possible for them to handle all the traffic that might be diverted from United States ports. Therefore, I think it is necessary to develop St. Croix harbour. We in Charlotte county do not look upon this development as a great boom for the county or the province of New Brunswick. We feel that it is a work of a national character for the benefit of the whole Canadian people, because at the present time we could not take care of the traffic if it were diverted from the ports of the United States. I should like to quote from an editorial published in the St. John Journal of January 23, 1923, which I hope will convince hon. gentlemen that the people of St. John are in sympathy with the development of any of our ports along the Atlantic coast:

> There is no doubt that St. Croix is a great natural harbor and experts have testified that it and Sydney, Australia, are the two greatest harbors in the world. The development of St. Croix should not necessarily injure St. John. Canada is exporting this year in the vicinity of 350,000,000 bushels of grain and of that amount St. John gets about 20,000,000 bushels. A mere bagatelle! Where does the rest go? Montreal gets a large proportion of it in the summer months but about 200,000,000 bushels of this grain go through American ports and are transported over American railroads. Mr. Maxwell estimates that if this vast amount could be routed over Canadian roads by the short rail-haul he suggests, through the building of 200 miles of railway to connect with the Transcontinental at Quebec bridge, that the saving to Canadian farmers alone would be $20,000,000 yearly and the revenue to our national lines would be almost sufficient to pay off their deficits.
> Statements such as these if backed by facts—and the people of St. Stephen are anxious for investigation—transform the development of St. Croix harbor into a great national project. There are about twelve miles of harbor, sufficient according to expert testimony to shelter the navies of the world, and this great port has a natural breakwater in the island of Grand Manan. It is stated that there is a sixty-foot depth throughout this expanse of water and that practically no dredging would be needed.
>
> The suggested construction of 200 miles of railroad in order to connect this port with the Transcontinental at Quebec would probably be frowned upon at the present time, when Canada is already over-burdened with railroads. But when it is considered that the construction of 200 miles of railway will make this port the nearest point on the Atlantic seaboard to Winnipeg, cutting below the present rail-haul to Portland by over 100 miles, and when it is realized that the port is open all the year and that it could be developed to look after the whole winter grain trade of Canada, it will be seen that the project deserves very serious thought. It is not merely the dream of a visionary. The people of St. Stephen and of the whole of Charlotte county are solidly behind the scheme. They believe they have the door which Canada needs for they feel there is no other port which provides the unique advantages and is so perfectly situated geographically to handle the fast growing volume of Canadian trade during the winter months.
> The development of St. Croix would not mean that St. John would no longer be a grain port. The construction of the railway would also place St. John sixty miles nearer Winnipeg than is Portland and St. John could be developed to its capacity. There would be plenty of business for both. St. Croix at least deserves the very serious consideration of the federal government, and of the railways.

That comment coming from a paper published in St. John is very agreeable to those who are making exertions for the development of St. Croix harbour. The policy pursued in Canada in the past has been such that we have been adding enormously to our railway mileage without enlarging our ports to any appreciable extent. Is it not a recognized fact that in any country where facilities ahead of the actual requirements have been provided an enormous development has taken place with a resultant increase of trade and of population? It is an unchanging law in economics that exports, in the end, have to be paid for by imports. We should encourage shipping in both directions—from our ports in Canada to European ports, and from the ports of Europe directly to Canada. Such a policy would not only help to find a market for Canadian manufactured goods, but would also assist the Canadian consumer by enabling him to receive goods from the European markets not obtainable in Canada as cheaply and as directly as possible.

We believe in Canada. We have great faith in the future of the Dominion. Still, are we as Canadians doing our best to bui'd up our own country rather than the United States? If we are, may we not ask ourselves the question why we should be giving even one-half our export grain trade to a United States seaport? What we need are such grain rates on our railways as will develop trade through Quebec, Montreal, Halifax, St. John, St. Croix, Vancouver, or any other Canadian ports in preference to ports in the United States. But if we develop St. Croix harbour we can take care of all our export trade. Is it not a matter of interest to every Canadian that every possible bushel of grain should be shipped out of Canada through a Canadian port; and is it not of just as much interest that every ton of goods imported into Canada should enter through a Canadian port? If that hope were realized our railway deficit would soon be lessened and there would be fewer empty cars going west along our railways. The utilization of St. Croix harbour does not concern the people of Charlotte county alone. It will not only be a benefit locally but it will result in national benefit, it will be profitable to Canadians as a whole. If this port is made use of the development of trade as a result will be such as to dispel, to some extent, the dark cloud of gloom which seems to have settled upon the farmers of the West, judging from the speeches of some of our Progressive friends, with respect to the future.

[Mr. Grimmer.]

In summarizing the situation which exists in connection with the harbour of St. Croix we have these advantages to offer: The port will be a terminus of a Canadian railway system running entirely through Canada. We have the greatest natural harbour on the Atlantic coast of North America. The harbour is well sheltered and there is a straight run from the Atlantic ocean into the port with a good depth of water the entire distance. There is ample accommodation for the fleets of Europe, and no dredging is required. The port is fifty miles nearer Liverpool than any port on the Atlantic coast except Halifax. It is 100 miles nearer Winnipeg than Portland, Maine, by the proposed route. It is 200 miles nearer Winnipeg than St. John by the proposed route. It is 370 miles nearer Winnipeg than Halifax by the proposed route. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say that the project I have placed before the House is feasible, is advisable, and is not only in the interest of our railways but will be advantageous to Canada, and the Canadian people as a whole.

Mr. L. H. MARTELL (Hants): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say at the outset that it is not my intention to occupy any undue amount of the time of this House, and that in the course of the few remarks which I intend to offer I shall not discuss the tariff in a scientific way, nor follow some of my Progressive friends through the mazy labyrinths of political economy which they have outlined.

Before getting down to my speech I wish to discuss briefly the remarks of the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Findlay) who spoke yesterday. He was very profuse in his expressions of regret with respect to the policy of the Liberal party, and seemed to be very much put out because that party had not put into force the so-called tariff platform of 1919, which necessitated his leaving the Liberal fold. My hon. friend should have been surer of his facts, because he forsook the Liberal party and opposed the Liberal idea prior to any time during which that party would have had an opportunity of putting the so-called platform into effect. However, I am glad to know, and many gentlemen on this side, I believe, are glad to know, that the hon. member has still a spark of Liberalism within his breast, because I believe if that were not so, good and honourable as he may be, he would "be as Sodom and like unto Gomorrah.'

I am not going to take up the budget from a scientific standpoint. In the course of my remarks I am going to be somewhat local, and am going to endeavour to place before this House some of the matters as I see them, that are of interest to the Maritime provinces. I am not going to discuss tariffs. I do not know very much about scientifically making them, however, I am opposed to any tariff which has for its object protection for protection's sake. I have not changed my idea one iota in that respect. I am a low-tariff man. I was elected on a tariff-for-revenue platform, and I believe, in the light of all the conditions obtaining in Canada at present, the tariff policy which has been brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr Fielding) cannot be characterized as other than a tariff for revenue. People in this country are clamouring for government ownership of railways. I am not going to give to any extent my reasons why I may be, in some respects opposed to government ownership, but if the railways of Canada last year had a deficit, we are not going to get the money for the purpose of paying that deficit unless it is by some sort of a tariff, or by direct taxation upon the people of the country, and I believe the people of Canada are so pressed down by taxation, municipal, provincial and federal, that they are not prepared to accept any more direct taxation at the present time. I believe that if my hon. friends would, at least, meet this question in a spirit of compromise, and say that they would be prepared to give up government ownership of railways, in order that they might get low tariff, then, with the result we have to-day, the fifty millions of money spent to meet deficits on the railways might go towards the lessening of the tariff. So long as the country is advocating government ownership, just so long will it be necessary for the people of Canada to get their revenue from tariff sources, and the sooner we come to a realization of the fact that there is no royal way for the country to secure money, and that there is no other method than by taxation, the better for all concerned. I believe I can say of the hon. Minister of Finance, in so far as the tariff is concerned, the words of Goethe, "All I have done, I have done in a kingly way, and let tongues wag, what I saw to be the right thing, that I did." That I believe is the attitude and state of mind that animated the Minister of Finance in the budget policy.

He has divided his budget into various heads, and I am going to deal with one of the most important from my point of view, or more properly I should say, from the standpoint of the constituency which I have the honour to represent, namely, in regard to our relations with the United States. Some of my hon. friends will say, "Your constituency in 1911, when it had the opportunity of securing reciprocity, defeated that issue at the polls". I can say that also to my hon. friends from the province of Manitoba, but I do not say it in a bitter way, as I believe it is to the everlasting disgrace to the people of Manitoba and of Nova Scotia that they defeated reciprocity. But the people probably did not have the matter properly placed before them at that time. Matters of reciprocity were not discussed on their merits. People on the other hand were carried away from the issue by flag-flapping and all sorts of special pleadings. The government to-day has placed in the budget an offer of reciprocity to the United States. It is true it has not so far met with a great deal of favour in the United States. It is probably not receiving very much favourable comment from certain sections of that country. The government has gone further; they are asking parliament to give them the right of negotiating with the President of the United States, if at any time they feel the occasion is ripe. These are, I say, outstanding characteristics of the Liberal party's policy and they show that they are always prepared, on all occasions when the time is ripe, to fulfil all the pledges they gave to the people of the country. I am for reciprocity. I do not apologize from any standpoint for my tariff views, and I am supporting the budget, not on account of the element of protection in it,—though I know that a budget which has for its object a tariff for revenue, must incidentally give some protection—but on account of it being a tariff for revenue, and irrespective of the incidental protection that results therefrom.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MARTELL: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was dealing with the offer of reciprocity as contained in the budget. I need not dilate upon the benefits that would accrue to the people of the Maritime provinces were we in a position to secure reciprocity with the United States. The government has done everything possible to that end. With a view to showing how reciprocity would affect one of the chief industries of Nova Scotia, I crave your indulgence while I place upon Hansard a brief statement with respect to the fishing industry in that province.

Some time prior to the coming into force of the Fordney tariff the people of Nova Scotia as well as of the other Maritime provinces could get their fish into the United States, which was their chief market, but the Fordney tariff now makes it almost impossible for them to do that. The injury that is done to the fishing industry of my province as a result of the Fordney tariff will be realized from the following comparison of the duties under the Fordney tariff and the Underwood tariff respectively on fish and fish products which constitute one of our main exports:

Article	Underwood Tariff	Fordney Tariff
Fresh or frozen halibut mackerel or salmon.. ..	Free	2 cents per pound
All other fresh or frozen fish, except shellfish ..	Free	1 cent per pound
Dried fish..	Free	1½ cents per pound
Pickled herring and Mackerel..	Free	1 cent per pound
Finnan Haddie ..	Free	25 per cent ad valorem
Smoked herring ..	¾ cents per pound	2½ cents per pound
Green salted cod, etc..	Free	1¼ cents per pound
Cod oil..	3 cents per gallon	5 cents per gallon

As I have already stated, the United States had always been our chief market, having usually taken over 40 per cent of our total exports of fish. Of course, some of the fish imported into that country were for re-export. The following is an estimate, based on the business done in 1920, which was a normal year in the industry, of the duty collected on Canadian shipments of fish and fish products to the United States, and what that duty would have been under the present tariff. From the whole of Canada the total value of the fish exported to the United States was $15,541,517 and the estimated duty collected was $72,558. Under the Fordney tariff the duty would have been $1,710,055. From the Maritime provinces we shipped to the United States fish valued at $9,075,457. Under the Underwood tariff the estimated duty was $15,842; under the Fordney tariff it would have been $933,887. You will thus see that the United States market and low American tariffs or reciprocity is necessary to our fishermen if we are to survive in the fishing industry. Is it, therefore, any wonder that we in the Maritime provinces are looking for the markets of the New England states for our fish? The only way in which we can get that market is through reciprocity. If we had in force a reciprocal arrangement such as was made by Mr. Fielding and Mr. Paterson in 1911, we could put our fish on that market free of duty. To-day our people are still looking forward to the day when they will once again have the opportunity of carrying out a reciprocal agreement with the United States; because I believe, Sir, that if the question were placed before the people of the country to-day they would not repeat the mistake which was made in 1911.

Now, there are several phases of the question that might be dealt with, but I want to refer more particularly to the effort which has been made to get this measure of reciprocity. I stated before recess that the government of the day had gone a long way in this direction; they have not only placed a declaration for reciprocity in the budget, but they have asked parliament to give the Governor in Council authority to appoint one of the ministers of the Crown to carry on negotiations to that end with the President of the United States if at any time the conditions seem favourable. But to-day I think we have a weapon in our hands whereby we could to some extent force recognition from the United States authorities. I am not one of those who believe that because the United States people have set a high tariff wall against us we should retaliate by setting up an exceedingly high tariff wall against them. I do not believe, Sir, that that is good Liberalism. There is something of the milk of human kindness in the breast of the Liberal party; we are more inclined to follow the Biblical injunction to turn the other side of the face.

However, we have a weapon, I believe, in our hands. Every person here knows that as a result of the treaty of 1818 the United States authorities renounced forever the right to come within three maritime miles of the coast waters of His Britannic Majesty save for the four humanitarian purposes of wood, water and shelter and effecting repairs. An act, however, was passed by the Canadian parliament, Chapter 47 of the Revised Statutes of 1906, under section 2 of which act the Governor in Council was and is empowered to grant to the United States fishing vessels the right to come into our ports for every other purpose whatsoever. That is done by means of a license, and a fee is charged. For a time the fee was something like $1 50 per ton, though I believe of late years it has been reduced to the sum of $1 per ton. These vessels are coming in and using our ports. At the outset we would not grant any licenses to United States vessels if they were propelled by motor power or by any power other than sail, but as a result of the war when people were coming very much closer together the people of the United States were given the same rights to obtain licenses for motor craft as they were for sail craft. The result is that the United States vessels being a great deal further from the fishing banks are enabled by means of this licensing system to come into Canadian ports, and use our ports to tranship their catch, take bait, buy their nets, twine and all their other supplies and outfit, and ship their goods through to the United States in bond. As a result of these licenses enabling the United States vessels to make use of our Canadian ports, they can ship their fish through in bond and they go in as American fish, and thus evade the United States duty, whereas when our own fishermen come in from the banks, if they wish to sell to the United States, which in days gone by took forty per cent of their catch, they are obliged to pay two cents a pound duty on fresh fish, which is practically a prohibitive rate. The United States vessels I believe would not be able to successfully prosecute the catching of fresh fish if they were not allowed the use of our Canadian ports, and while to prohibit them from using those ports might affect certain sections of the province of Nova Scotia to-day, particularly the merchant class who sell them supplies, I think it would be good business and in the interests not only of the province but of the country as a whole no longer to permit United States vessels to use the ports of Nova Scotia or any other ports of Canada for fishing purposes. If they were denied that privilege I really believe that it would be conducive to the United States authorities negotiating with the Dominion government for reciprocity at least in fish. I think I have stated fairly succinctly what the benefits to be derived from reciprocity with the United States would be and if I have not made myself intelligible to most members of the House they will simply have to pardon me in that regard. I have simply taken one great industry and I believe, Sir, and I say it without fear of contradiction, that I have demonstrated beyond all peradventure that reciprocity in fish is in the best interests of the fishermen of Canada.

Now I pass on to the question of bounties as noted by the hon. Minister of Finance. As I said before, I am not going to deal with the tariff in a scientific way. I am not capable of doing that. I have often heard it said, and I believe it has been said by many political economists, that bounties are the most vicious form of protection. If that is so, then God knows I do not want them, but I do not believe they are the most vicious form of protection. I believe they are best suited to encouraging industry. It is true that of bounties we might say in the words which Addison puts into the mouth of that fictitious character Sir Roger de Coverley "Much might be said on both sides." I have at least to my own satisfaction convinced myself that the Minister of Finance did the right thing by not increasing the tariff and giving instead bounties in order to encourage these particular industries.

I said at the outset that I was going to be brief. I believe it was St. Paul who said that a man should always be ready to give a reason for the faith that is in him, and that was my only purpose in rising to say a few words in regard to this budget. I know I shall be told by some of my Progressive friends, many of whom I admire, that I have developed into a protectionist since coming into the House of Commons. I would hurl that back at them and say that I am as much a low tariff man as ever. As I said this afternoon, I am supporting this budget because Canada needs revenue, and the primary object of this budget is to raise revenue.

I have one or two other reasons for supporting this budget. First, because I say it is a tariff for revenue, and that is the policy of the Liberal party. Secondly, because the changes in duties are made downward. Thirdly, because it increases the British preference. There are about eighty-two classes of goods on which that preference has been increased. I have not the list here although I have read it, and if any hon. member wishes to see it I will secure it for him. Fourthly, because it adopts reciprocity as a permanent plank in the platform of the Liberal party. Fifthly, because I was elected as a Liberal. I was opposed both by a Progressive and a Conservative. I stood on the straight Liberal platform and the understanding of the people of my constituency was that if my hon. leader were returned to power the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) would be Finance Minister. That is to say, he would have charge of the tariff. He has had charge of the tariff, and I believe I am only doing my duty by supporting that government whose Finance Minister has the confidence of my constituency and who has framed the tariff which I am supporting to-day. If I took any other attitude than that I would deem it my duty, Sir, to go back to my constituents and to hand them back my mandate. They knew, as I have already said, when I was coming here that I was coming here to support the Liberal party not the Progressive party, not the Conservative party because I got no support in my constituency from either. I got support from what are always known down there as straight Laurier Liberals.

I have also another reason. If we are going to prevent the railways which have been handed over to us from going on the junk pile it is necessary for us to raise a revenue, and the people of Canada to-day with the demands that are made upon them for municipal taxation, provincial taxation, and direct forms of federal taxation are not prepared at all times to have moneys to pay to the Dominion government when such are demanded of them. But when we have a tariff for revenue such as this, they can buy the articles upon which a tariff is imposed to suit their convenience, and they are thus enabled to stretch that taxation over a period. I am one of those from the maritimes, probably the youngest man from the maritimes, but I want to say this: I have faith in my party, I have faith in my country. I believe this is not a time for pessimism. There is already a bright star breaking over the horizon, and if we in this House, particularly the men from the West, will not be pessimistic but look towards the future and not go around crying, "Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me?" and rather give our attention to the stream of prosperity and drink of the brook of optimism by the way so that we will lift up our heads, then in this Canada of ours, which is a young country, with a Finance Minister still young, we will sing in concert:

> Grow old along with me!
> The best is yet to be,
> The last of life, for which the first was made:
> Our times are in His hand
> Who saith, "A whole I planned, > Youth shows but half; trust God: see all, nor be afraid!"

In other words, have faith in Canada, have faith in the Liberal party, have faith in the Minister of Finance, have faith in a tariff for revenue, and you will soon see Canada back to the golden era of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's day.

Mr. J. W. KING (North Huron): Mr. Speaker, I desire to unite with other hon. members in the felicitations which they have extended to the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). I have been a great admirer of that hon. gentleman for years, and I hope that he will long live to deliver budget speeches although not exactly of the nature of his recent deliverance.

I do not agree with the tariff as embodied in the budget speech we are now considering. Take for example the duty on automobiles. How does it operate? Why, sir, Henry Ford is probably one of the greatest customs collectors we have in Canada. Henry Ford collects somewhere in the neighbourhood of three or four million dollars per annum. And where does that money go? Into the pocket of Henry Ford and it will doubtless be used to defray his expenses in the next Presidential election in the United States instead of going into the exchequer of Canada.

The hon. member for Hants who has just resumed his seat said when he began his remarks that he was not a tariff expert, that he did not know very much about the tariff. Yet, almost in the very same breath he went on to state that the present tariff is a tariff for revenue only. How can the hon. gentleman advance such a contention as that when I have shown the enormous sum of money that the people of this country pay in duties on automobiles alone? Does not that one instance prove that the present tariff is a protective tariff purely and simply? Sir, it is because the Liberal party did not live up to its promises in regard to the tariff that the Progressive party is in existence to-day. In 1896 the Liberal party had a good platform and I helped to support it. Sir Wilfried Laurier was probably one of the greatest statesmen ever produced in Canada, and I heard him declare on one occasion in the neighbouring town of Listowel that if he were returned to power he would positively reduce the tariff. Not only that but that he would either abolish the Senate or place it on an elective basis. How did the Liberal party carry out their promises when they were returned to power in 1896? They acted in just the same way as they are doing to-day. I do not impugn Sir Wilfrid Laurier's motives in not putting into operation the platform of his party, neither do I blame altogether the present Prime Minister for not carrying out the pledges of his party. In the case of the former statesman we find that he and his party were deserted by eighteen Liberal magnates in the city of Toronto headed by Sir Thomas White. They were the men who kept Sir Wilfrid Laurier from bringing the platform of his party into effect and, Sir, if our suspicions are correct the same influences are at work to-day, the same influences are keeping the present government from carrying out their pledges. These are some of the reasons why the Progressive party has sprung into existence. Now, although we may differ politically there is no reason why we should differ socially; there is no reason for not entertaining a kindly spirit towards each other. But when it comes to politics there is serious ground for difference and we must differ and we must fight. Some of my good Liberal friends—and I have many yet—and some of my good Conservative friends, say "Scratch a Progressive and you will find a Grit or a Tory." Well, they have been scratching for the last eighteen months and what have they found. The Liberal party found two members of the Progressive party that were not true Progressives, and the Tory party have found in the provincial arena in Toronto two others who were not real Progressives.

An hon. MEMBER: Horse and horse.

Mr. KING (Huron): I may say to the two old-time parties that those still in our ranks are genuine Progressives. I am reminded in this connection of the story told of the teacher and the pupil. The teacher offered the pupil an apple and asked him whether he would prefer the whole apple or two halves. The boy replied that he would sooner have the two halves. The teacher curious to learn the boy's reason inquired "Why would you sooner have the two halves?" And received the reply "I would then see what the centre is like, whether it is rotten or not."

I was sorry to hear the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) raise the question of a capital levy. It should be understood that there are men in the Progressive ranks who are just as cautious as those of any other party, and I for one am thoroughly opposed to any such thing as a capital levy. Introduce such a thing into any country and the result will be disastrous. The very moment you impose a capital levy, capital will desert the country and will not return while that condition exists.

I do not notice many gems in the budget speech but if there is one it consists in the offer of reciprocity with the United States. I certainly believe in reciprocity between Canada and the United States, and in my opinion the time is not very far distant when the two countries will come to terms on this matter. It is true that under the Fordney-McCumber tariff there are high duties against the natural products of Canada, but do you for one moment believe that the 72 per cent of the people of the United States who are consumers will long consent to have their necessaries of life so taxed? They certainly will not.

I asked the House to bear with me for a few minutes while I suggest certain sources of revenue in this country which have not yet been availed of. I do not think, Sir, that we have been sufficiently severe in the matter of luxuries, nor do I think we have gone to the extent we might have with respect to income tax. Furthermore I do not see any reason why the federal government might not institute a succession duties tax even in addition to the provincial tax of that character. I hold in my hand the official year book of the Commonwealth of Australia, and I find that the Australian government is getting excellent results from a federal inheritance tax. I remember quite well when the province of Ontario first instituted the provincial succession duties tax. There was at that time living in Toronto a Mr. B. B. Osler, one of the cleverest men probably that ever adorned the Canadian bar. On being told about the imposition of the duty he said: "It is a grand law that makes the dead pay the taxes." We find that in Australia they put an additional tax on the absentee landlords, and I would do the same here. The federal government for the first time introduced succession duties on the estates of deceased persons in addition to those taxes already imposed by the state governments. They imposed a scale of succession duties. I am not asking our government to copy their scale. They can work it out for themselves, but I would make the tax a good deal steeper than it is at the present time in Canada. The commonwealth scale of succession duty, exempting all estates of less than a £1,000 net value, ranges from a minimum of 1 per cent to a maximum of 15 per cent. On estates of a higher taxable value than £71,000 the rate of duty goes up one-fifth per cent for every increase of a thousand pounds in the taxable estate.

There is nothing in the world to hinder the federal government of Canada from imposing an inheritance tax. Any person knows perfectly well that in connection with large estates particularly the beneficiaries give no value for what they receive. If a man dies and leaves an estate of $25,000,000 the provincial government steps in and takes a couple of million dollars which leaves $23,000,000. I say the federal government could step in and take $2,000,000 and leave the beneficiary $21,000,000, which the beneficiary certainly never gave value for and probably it would be better for him if he had never received it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the hon. member object to the federal government taking that $2,000,000 extra before the man died?

Mr. KING (Huron): Yes, I would object, for the reason I stated a moment ago, that any country on this earth, I do not care what country it may be, has to be very careful of its capital. If you take capital out of any country, what have you? You place the country in a state similar to that of Russia at the present time, you drive capitalists out of the country and you prevent capital from coming in.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would it not have the same effect if the $2,000,000 were taken after the man is dead? Would not the capital of the country be affected in that case?

Mr. KING (Huron): After the man is dead he would not have any kick coming. I was particularly well pleased, Mr. Speaker, to see that an offer was made of reciprocity with the United States, the offer to remain on the statute books of Canada. I wish to follow up that proposition for a few moments. One of the first arguments against reciprocity between Canada and the United States, by the opponents of that scheme, was that there is a similarity of a sameness in the products of the two countries. Granting that—and I do not grant it altogether—there is not one particle more similarity between the products of Ontario and the products of the state of Michigan than there is between the products of Ontario and of Quebec. There is no more similarity between, we will say, the products of Manitoba and the products of Alberta than there is between the products of Alberta and of one of the northern states. For instance, there might be a failure in the line of production in one section while another section might have an abundance in that same line, and by a system of fair exchange the balance is retained all the year round. Plums are produced in the province of Quebec six months after they are produced in California, and I could name any amount of other products which are in the same position. Therefore you would have a more uniform exchange for that reason.

There is also a diversity of products between the United States and Canada. Cotton and semi-tropical fruits are produced in the United States, whereas in Canada we can grow the best wheat in the world. In regard to the area from which certain products are produced, what have we in the Maritime provinces? We have coal and fish in abundance, and we have the New England states lying side by side with the Maritime provinces, and a water haul all the way, if we only had free trade. Then sir, what have we in Pennsylvania and Pittsburg? We have coal. But when Ontario gets her white coal, she will not need the black coal from Pennsylvania and Pittsburg. At the present time we in Ontario and Quebec have coal to the south of us. In the provinces of British Columbia and Alberta we have illimitable beds of coal, while in the states immediately to the south they have not this coal. What could be better than a treaty of exchange? Under the old reciprocity treaty which was in effect from 1854 to 1866 exports to the United States increased from $10,000,000 in 1854 to $87,000,000 in 1865. Our exports quadrupled in twelve years of reciprocity and the opponents of reciprocity will say that it was the Americans who got sick first. I do not know whether that is correct or not. I think it was on account of the favouritism—I might call it favouritism—shown by Canada and Great Britain towards the South in the Civil War more than anything else. When real restriction began with the McKinley tariff, the effect was more injurious and was felt with especial force by the agricultural industry of Canada. The first relief came in 1897, when the late Hon. Sydney Fisher removed the quarantine restriction. The real boom came, however, in 1913, when some agricultural products were placed on the United States free list. As a result our exports of cattle alone to the United States during the seven years from 1914 to 1920, both inclusive, was 260,000 head per annum as against only 28,000 head in 1913. Our exports of all animals and the products of animals jumped from less than $13,000,000 worth in 1913 to $113,000,000 in 1920. What better proof can any person get, or what better proof do we want of the advantages of a reciprocal treaty with the United States? If any stronger argument is required as to the value of the American market for the Canadian producer, it is found in what has occurred since the Fordney-McCumber tariff went into force. Our exports of potatoes alone were $447,000 worth in the first six months under the new tariff as compared with $2,000,000 worth in 1920.

When the question of freer trade relations between Canada and the Uuited States is under consideration, the discussion is generally limited to natural products; but I am going to say that I do not see why the manufacturer cannot live and do well also. I do not see any reason why the discussion should be so limited. In my opinion, reciprocal free trade with the United States in all lines would be more beneficial than a reciprocal arrangement limited to natural products. In no other part of the world are there greater facilities for manufacturing than in Ontario and Quebec. In both provinces raw material is to be found in abundance. It is true you do not find iron; but we have the iron if we only had the capital to develop it. That is where capital comes in. If you do not have the capita' you cannot make a country; you cannot make a nation. Both provinces have power in unlimited quantities, and when we get the St. Lawrence deepened, we shall have power galore. There is just one thing lacking—a market. With all of North America open to our manufacturers, that want will be supplied, and in a few years no two states in the union will surpass Quebec and Ontario in the manufacturing industry.

I know that the late president of the Massey-Harris Company said to myself: "I am ready for free trade right now." Why not? I do not see that any government, I do not care what it is, need be afraid if ever we get an opportunity of concluding a reciprocal treaty with the United States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Were the duties under the proposed reciprocal pact of 1911 not higher on agricultural implements than they are under the present tariff?

Mr. KING (Huron): I do not know that I can just answer my hon. friend, but I do not think they were.

Mr. STEVENS: A good deal higher.

Mr. KING (Huron): I will continue. At the present time there is between Canada and the United States a better feeling than ever existed in the past. In the Canadian parliament there are 119 followers of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who have been elected with reciprocity as one of the planks in the party platform. I do not know whether they are all going to stand up to it or not. Behind my own leader there are 63 followers who have even more strongly declared for reciprocity.

Mr. GRAHAM: They will not dare to vote against it.

Mr. KING (Huron): I do not know but the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) will support it unless he has radically changed since 1910. Therefore, there cannot be quite 50 members of this House of Commons who are opposed to reciprocity with the United States.

Again the United States have at the present time a president who has done more than any other man living or dead to promote world peace by the Washington Disarmament Conference. President Harding realizes that next to the piling up of armaments by nation against nation, the greatest cause of war during the last two centuries has been found in commercial rivalry and restrictions of trade brought about by such rivalry. He also realizes that nothing will do more to ensure the peace of the world to-day than the complete removal of tariffs and restrictions now interfering with international commerce. Examined from every angle, there never was a more opportune time for the beginning of negotiations towards the making of a trade agreement with the United States. It seemed in the past that when Canada was ready for a treaty, the United States was not ready, and vice versa. We went around with a chip on our shoulder at one time, and at another the Americans went around with a chip on their shoulder. Any boy who goes to school knows that the boy who goes around with a chip on his shoulder will eventually get some one to knock it off.

We have a great country to live in, and what we want in Canada is citizenship. It is estimated at the present time there are five million Canadians in the United States. Chicago has the largest Canadian population of any city in the United States and New York is a close second. Everywhere one goes in the United States, one finds Canadians in positions of eminence. That is the kind of people the Canadians are; no matter what country they go to, they secure positions of eminence. Have we the best possible people to take their places to-day? We have brought over shiploads of riff-raff and remnants of Europe, and we have planted them on the land. What are we going to do with them? We should have taken hold of this problem as our neighbours to the south of us have done. There they have told the foreigners to become good Americans or get out, and we ought to do the same in Canada. We ought to tell the foreigner when he comes to Canada that he must become a good Canadian or get out. That is where we have fallen down. We should at once put up the bars against all those whose children we would not like to see marry our children. We should not admit anyone who would not become as good as ourselves, and we should keep out those whose traits are dishonest and whose morals and mode of living are low.

In old times citizenship was valued; but even the Roman Empire went to pieces from two causes. One cause was the depopulation of the land, and I warn Canadians in this House of Commons that we are in danger from the same cause at the present time. The other cause was that they let anything and everything become a citizen of Rome. Let us start right away to teach every boy and girl in Canada citizenship, to take an interest in Canada. We have everything in Canada worth while. Canada is a white man's country, and I hope to see it remain a white man's country.

Mr. E. B. RYCKMAN (East Toronto): I hope the Minister of Finance will not think I am lacking in that profound admiration and respect which I certainly have for him if I frankly criticize this budget. I think the budget is a disappointing one; I believe that the minister has told us in it that he has not quite done his best. He has said that it is a budget of compromise, for a government which consists of sections is possible only through compromise. If a man is compromised he has suffered somewhat; if a woman is compromised she has suffered more; and if a country is compromised its position is still worse.

This budget has not met the challenge which every worthy, and, may I say, self-respecting budget must meet, namely, that of striking the balance. It has been announced to the world that Canada cannot meet her bills, that Canada has an unbalanced budget. Canada is in the same category as Brazil, though not to the same extent, of course—a wealthy country with large resources which cannot meet its budget and with a currency that is depreciated. That is the state of affairs, and I believe it has already had its effect. It may not be that the relationship of the New York exchange market to our budget is perfectly distinct, but New York exchange has risen since this budget was announced. When a household is unable to balance its budget that household is on the wrong road; and it is the same with a country. The budget could have been balanced, it seems to me there is no question about that. However, that is something to which I shall refer later on. The failure to face the situation squarely means that this country will suffer from the bare fact that there is a discrepancy, which has to be taken into consideration although it is not a very large one; and we shall find that throughout this year Canada will be subject to a disability that will come from the reputation of an unbalanced budget.

The fact is that the budget has tried to satisfy too many factions. So to speak, there is a little blood let here, a small poultice applied there, a hot bath given and a cold douche administered; and we are expected to be satisfied with this. From the reports that have appeared in the newspapers, it is abundantly clear that the Canadian people do not feel that in the budget which has been brought down by the minister the requirements of the country, its necessities as they exist to-day, have been met. There are many matters to which I should like to refer, but in the time at my disposal I do not think I shall be able to deal with them all.

There is one small item I would take up first of all, and that is that the incidence of some taxes on certain businesses that might be described as summer trades has been changed, but the change does not come into effect until the first of August. I do not know whether the reason is that the Finance Minister is in league with the weather prophets or whether he knows for a certainty that we are not going to have summer until the first of August. It is to me quite manifest at any rate that since the Minister of Finance has said that the change was desirable and since these particular businesses are summer trades, the change in this respect should be put into effect now. I offer that suggestion respectfully for the consideration of the government. There is one feature of great merit in this budget and that is the assurance that we shall have stability in this country. Canada needs stability, for there cannot be any sustained effort in industry, no matter in what branch, unless the people engaged therein can feel assured that there will be some certainty in conditions. That assurance has been given by the Minister of Finance and I believe it will be lived up to. But we have it from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), who comes upon the scene, that this stability does not and will not exist, that there is no finality, and that we may expect changes to continue until we have that condition which the Liberal party has declared in the past that it would endeavour to bring about. However, I prefer to take the express statement of the Minister of Finance. There has therefore been given to the manufacturers and their workmen this assurance of stability; but so far as I can see nothing of a similar character has been offered to the farmers.

First of all, let us consider this sales tax. I consider that the imposition of this tax and the method provided for its collection are, if I may use the word, cowardly, in this respect in that there are a couple of thousand manufacturers and importers in this country and hundreds of thousands of jobbers and merchants. What this tariff proposes to do is to call upon the manufacturers and the merchants to do the collecting of this revenue and to account for it to the government. What happens? The manufacturer levies the 6 per cent; the jobber then levies his profit on the manufacturer's price plus the 6 per cent. Jobber No. 2 then comes along and exacts his profit on all that has gone before; and, as we were told at the last session of parliament, there were in some cases seven intermediaries, jobber No. 3 and those who follow him secure their profits in a similar way, with the result that when the farmer or the housewife or the labourer gets these goods, with all these profits added to the price, the tax really is not only 6 per cent, but has increased by as many times as a profit has been added. The farmers therefore get no benefit from the tax, and it will be found that less revenue will be collected, while there will be more expense involved in the collection of the tax.

Let me say a word with reference to the income tax, which has been dealt with by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. King). But before I speak of that tax I want to refer to an incident that occurred in this House last year. The House will find a reference to it at page 3241 of Hansard of that year. The occasion was the discussion of the duty upon cigarettes which this year has been taken off. I rose in the House then and told the Minister of Finance that while I did not desire to be considered a champion of the cigarette trade, at the same time representations had been made to me from which it was obvious that there must of necessity be a loss of revenue if the tax which he proposed then was put on cigarettes. I declared at that time that so obvious was this to me that I desired to go on record in the matter. The minister replied that representations had been made to him also, that he had considered them, and that the matter was doubtful. But he was determined to impose the tax for the then current year, and if it was found, as represented, that there was a loss of revenue the tax would be taken off.

The Finance Minister was as good as his word; the tax was taken off, and there was an immense loss of revenue. The loss, as was stated during the course of this debate, was $5,000,000 in connection with the tobacco trade and $1,200,000 on the item of cigarettes alone. How this should have been allowed to occur I cannot understand. I do not think the Finance Minister gave the matter his personal attention; he probably relegated it to his adviser in the department. I think that that gentleman, or whoever was responsible for the decision which meant a loss of revenue to this country of $1,200,000 should lose his position. It was plain that that result would follow, and there should be no chance of such a thing occurring again.

With regard to the income tax, with its surtax and its supersurtax, I am of the distinct opinion that this country is losing money every day by its imposition. It is lessening production and I believe it is lessening revenue. It is deliberately cutting off the limb upon which sits any chance for the growth of industry in this country. I feel very strongly on this point, and I hope I may be able to convince the government that that is the view to be accepted. Let me develop the point a little; the argument is not mine originally, but every reasoning fibre of my being is responsive to it. One of the chief fallacies in taxation is that if you levy the tax at the top, the bottom will escape; in other words, that if you levy the tax on the rich you will avoid imposing it on the poor. That is an absolute fallacy. In the next place the income tax is altogether unfair; it means the imposition of a levy on those who have worked and saved, for the benefit of those who will not work and will not save. That is the doctrine entertained by some of my friends to my left, and when you get to the extreme left you have the doctrine which would go to the extent of taking away all capital from the rich in order that the poor might benefit. The idea would be fine if it worked, but it does not work, it never has worked and in the nature of things it never will. In this connection I want to adopt the argument of Mr. Otto H. Kahn, a distinguished banker and publicist of New York, a German by extraction whose conduct during the war was admirable, and I have great pleasure in quoting his views. He says:

> The usual advocate of the income tax says: "Supposing the rich man is made to pay two-thirds or more of this income in taxes. He still has plenty left." The user of this argument can see no farther than his nose. He forgets that the income tax drives capital out of constructive use in the first place.
> In the second place, it reduces the incentive to venturing to the vanishing point, so that capital will not undertake new work.
>
> In the third place, money that ought to be used in the expansion of the country's business and the prosperity of the whole people is drained into the coffers of the government.
>
> Again, it amounts to a campaign against thrift. Why save when the government will rob you of your savings? The income tax is half brother to the inflated currency of Germany and the confiscation policy of Russia. It promotes extravagance and discourages industry among the rich.
>
> The one point that is overlooked is, as Mr. Kahn points out, that the income tax and surtax defeat their own purposes. Greed, envy, and injustice always overreach themselves. The result of these excessive taxes is not only that capital turns to tax-exempt securities for investment, but it takes every legally permissible dodge to escape intolerable taxation, while a reasonable tax would willingly be paid.
> That this is not theory but actual fact is proved by statistics, which show an enormous reduction in the revenue derived by the government from large incomes.

The government referred to is, of course, the government of the United States. They have reduced their income tax. The United Kingdom has reduced its income tax by one-third since the war began. Canada is the only nation I know of that has increased its income tax since the end of the war. All this means that the levying of income tax brings about increased cost, reduced purchasing power, curtailed production, and lessened employment.

Further than that, there is an indirect loss and a very distinct one. Let me first say that the evidence that the income tax has this effect is seen in the budget itself. The Finance Minister has told us that this is just what does happen. And how is this evidence given? The Finance Minister says, "We have to borrow a few odd millions for temporary needs. I am paying on that borrowing 5½ per cent, which I think is a good rate in the circumstances." Well, find out what tax free bonds are quoted at in Montreal or Toronto, and you will see that the 5½ per cent bonds can be bought only at a price that will yield 4¾ per cent or less. In other words, this country has to pay for money by reason of that policy, one-half of one per cent more than the bonds that have been issued tax free command in the markets of this country. If you gave an order to a broker to buy $100,000 of these bonds in either Montreal or Toronto, you could not get them without a rise of perhaps two points in the price—and why? Because of what I have stated: the people of this country, knowing that these bonds are tax free and knowing that if they put their money into industry they will be taxed on anything their money earns, put their money into the tax-free bonds. Thus the money is taken out of circulation, taken out of use, and the country is prevented from using what funds would otherwise be available to meet the needs of its development.

There is also an indirect loss. On account of Canada's reputation for having a much higher income tax than the United States, a tax which is higher in many respects than the similar levy in Great Britain, people will not come to this country. I saw a short time ago a statement of the amount of money that wealthy people in Great Britain, who left that country for reasons associated with post war conditions, had taken to other lands, money which constituted a distinct addition to the wealth of the lands thus sought out by these capitalists—because they were no other than that. I have forgotten exactly what the amount was, but it ran into hundreds of thousands of pounds. And what about the young emigrant? Is he going to a country which hangs out a "Don't Come" sign? for that is what is involved in our having the highest income tax of any country to which he could go. You may say that the immigrant who contemplates coming to Canada has not much money. But potentially he has; in his dreams he looks forward to the day when he will be rich, so the very fact that our taxation is so high causes us to suffer in the matter of immigration.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there should be substituted for the income tax which we have now a graduated income tax. Tax every man fairly, and so that he knows what he will have to pay, so that if his income is a certain amount he will know the tax applicable to that amount. But what is the situation to-day? If a man has any income at all and there are any complicated calculations he has to employ an accountant to make out the tax bill that this government requires him to return. That is an expense, but apart altogether from the expense it is an intolerable nuisance. It could be easily overcome by establishing a graduated income tax, which I submit would be in the interests of fairness and for what it would mean in dollars and cents alone to the government it should be adopted. I say therefore, substitute a graduated income tax for the grotesque tax we have now which is higher I believe than that of any other country in the world, with the exception of Great Britain in some divisions of the tax.

Another chief objection that I have to this budget is that not being a balanced budget, there being this discrepancy of $49,000,000, as the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) says, or $57,000,000, as the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) says, we have to do one of two things: Either the one that was in the mind of the Minister of Finance and which he indicated to us, the levying of new methods of taxation, or we must practise new methods of economy. Now I maintain as emphatically as I can that the people of this country do not want any new methods of taxation. They are sick of the taxation that we have now. What the people of this country do want is not new methods of taxation, but new methods of real economy practised so far as the treasury of this country is concerned. I submit to hon. gentlemen of this House that the reason why Canada has an unbalanced budget to-day is because this House of Commons has declined to practise what is real economy. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there is no meaning to that word either in the French or English language as we practise economy in this House. Economy is a plank in the platform of every party. It is especially emphasized by my friends to my left, but during all this session up to this budget debate there was nothing that meant economy either said or done by the party to my left until the speech of its leader in this debate. I am excluding the twenty minutes of vaudeville performance, I was going to call it, which took place when the resolution of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) was before the House. That resolution was to reduce the salary of the Prime Minister and of ministers and members by 12½ per cent. I wonder how the demand of the Progressive party for economy was going to be satisfied by a reduction of 12½ per cent in the salaries of ministers and members. Only a short time after that by some chance a paper published in North Battleford, represented by a Progressive member in this House, fell into my hands, and that paper said that it was a mistake to think the Progressives did not earn $4,000 a session, that that was not the way to practise economy; let the indemnity stand and attack something else. I will add my voice to that request that there should be some other efforts made—make that particular effort too, if you like—to bring about economy in the administration of the affairs of this country.

I feel this very keenly. I have in my desk copies of the estimates running back three or four years, and I find that when an amount once gets into the estimates it is indented there and you cannot get it out. It stays in there during the years; a little may be subtracted, but the chances are that in the majority of cases much more is added to it. Really, Mr. Speaker, this thing got upon my mind. I did not wish to pose in any sense as the champion of economy. It would be an altogether new role for me, but I investigated the matter somewhat and as nearly as I could learn I found there was almost an aristocracy of spending here; that certain departments presided over, of course, by deputy ministers were supposed to grade a shade higher than others by reason of having a larger amount to disburse, and that once a sum had been voted to a department it was felt that there was a certain diminution of prestige if that amount were not carried along from year to year. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that anyone who has followed the votes in this House, anyone who knows what is the practice of business in this country, anyone who has had forced upon him the necessity in these times of making economies such as it was thought never could be made, must come to the conclusion that the business of this country is carried on now, and has been carried on, without a proper regard for the amount available to the government of Canada for expenditure

I took this matter up with a Liberal friend of mine who has been honoured by his party and sits in this House. I mentioned to him what I have already said and something more, and asked, "How is it that we cannot lay hold of this hand of debt and take care of the Civil Service, the Civil Service which has grown so enormously, and which now costs more than the expenditure of all Canada a few short years ago? Why is it that when a man dies his position cannot be filled by some one of the thousands in the Civil Service? How is it if there is a new appointment to be made, that someone in the service who is adapted to the work cannot be got and the position he formerly held be taken over by someone else in the service?" He replied, "My dear fellow, government is not like business. Any government that ever attempted that would go out of power." I submit, Mr. Speaker, that what this country demands at this time is that the national budget be balanced, and not only that, but that the government of this country shall be carried on with the economies that are now being practised in the business world.. That is the chief criticism I level at the budget. It falls far short of a true understanding of those economies which the people of this country are demanding and, I feel satisfied, are determined to get.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the finances of Canada should be kept in a way the people can understand. Our system of finances is so complicated that the plain people do not know what amount is being paid for the administration of government or how it is being paid. They want to know also what the railways are costing and the true facts of the war expenditure. We are now raising a revenue enormously larger than before the war. That is most disappointing. Still these war expenditures were willingly incurred, the people were determined that the war should be vigorously prosecuted, and the money that was expended was cheerfully contributed. But having done that, and the war being long over, the people now wish to know what the ordinary government of the country costs, what is required for war expenditure, the amount required to pay the interest on the debt, the cost of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, pensions and the like. They want to know what the expenditure is in each particular case, and then what the railways are costing Canada.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the ordinary expenses of government should be met by the customs and excise revenue as was the case before the war. I also submit that the expenses attendant upon the war should be met in a special way. The Finance Minister has said—has said it several times in my hearing—"Oh, it is difficult to raise money for the war debt. It was incurred while the war was on and there was a patriotic and most commendable feeling in the public mind. Bonds could be sold and money was cheerfully contributed by the people because it was for the carrying on of the war. But that is all past and the money cannot be raised now." I contend, Mr. Speaker, that the very same spirit could be depended upon to raise revenue—perhaps not to as great an extent but still to a very considerable amount—in this country to-day if the government would only adopt the right method. What method would I propose? Well, I would take the sales tax which is so objectionable to some and I would scrap it. I would then introduce what is known as the "turn-over" tax. That is well understood by all the members of this House but in short it is this: There should be a tax levied upon all processed goods, and upon all annual services in the case of doctors, dentists, and other professional men. Speaking of processed goods I would say the tax should be in turnover to the extent of $10,000 annually, using that figure only for the purposes of illustration; in the case of professional men it should be applied to incomes of $5,000 annually. The turn-over tax should be one per cent and whatever that tax yielded should be applied to war expenses, interest on the debt, pensions, and so on; but that not one cent of revenue from that tax should be paid for any other purpose than war expenditure. Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied the amount such a tax would yield would take care of the necessary war expenditure that we have and, together with a properly graduated income tax, would provide even for the railway deficits. This tax has been tried in Switzerland and has worked well; but we would be satisfied with knowing that this tax of one per cent, which I have mentioned for the sake of example, would not be objected to. Who would object to paying one per cent on $10,000 a year? Who would object to paying ten cents on any $10 article he purchased? No one at all, especially if it were known that the revenue from it would be devoted to meeting war expenditure exclusively. Mr. Speaker, it has been said that after the Battle of Waterloo in 1815 the lament of the next generation of young English boys was that they had not been of an age which would have permitted them to have taken part in the wars in which Great Britain triumphed so magnificently. I want to say that if opportunity were given our people to contribute of their means to war expenditure they would gladly subscribe if they knew the money would be solely devoted to meeting war expenditure. The spirit which was so splendidly exhibited during the war is still alive. The young men who will succeed us, if the tax is still in existence, will know that in bearing it they were upholding the sentiment that the Canadian nation upheld and fought for during the Great War. I say, Mr. Speaker, the Finance Minister does not know the immense amount of money that would be willingly given by the nation for this purpose. No one would default in payment of this tax, few would try to do so. But consisting in the main in small amounts the total revenue to be derived from this source would largely meet the burden that now rests upon the shoulders of the people and which, owing to our confused system of finances, is of such a character that no one really knows how much money is taken or how it is expended. If, after the imposition of such a tax the budget failed to balance I am quite sure that by practising the real economies I have spoken of the ill would be cured.

We are told that the farmers are still suffering and that they have a strong antipathy to a protective tariff. Really I have been much amused during the progress of this debate to observe some of the statements which have been made. For example, the leader of the Progressive party during his speech said that he lived close to the international boundary line, and that he could buy more cheaply on the other side of that line and that he could obtain a higher price for his products. I could not help but think that the hon. member should have paused for a moment to consider where that kind of argument led him, because if there is any country in the world that has a tariff "as high as Haman's gallows" it is the United States. There is where you have a real high tariff protectionist country. Yet the leader of the Progressives tells us that we ought to have free trade in Canada, and that if he crosses the boundary line into that highly protected country which is so near to him he can buy—he did not say everything—but he can buy many articles much more cheaply and if he went to sell his farm products he could get a much higher price. A short time ago I had the pleasure of reading a biography of William Henry Seward, a very distinguished man, an Olympian, who was overtopped only by Abraham Lincoln. He was the Secretary of State in Lincoln's cabinet

He was an orator, a patriot and a public man of the highest integrity, and in making a political speech seventy-five years ago, before any of the Progressives were born he said:

> Industry falls into three classes in this country, agriculture, manufacture and trade.

He said also:

> Some say that agriculture is a basic industry. It is but they are all basic industries. The three of them are so associated and dovetailed together that it is impossible to benefit one without benefiting the others. It is impossible to do an injury to one without hurting the others and equally it is impossible to in any way do anything which will displace one either up or down without affecting the other two.

He said further:

> There are some who argue in favour of a lower tariff. I will admit that if this world were composed of a number of Utopias, theoretically the argument is correct, but I have lived in this country, and I have seen that every time the tariff was advanced this country prospered and every time the tariff was lowered this country suffered. With that experienc I can do nothing else than say that I am for a higher tariff.

And he concluded by saying that the prosperity that the United States had up to that time—and it was borne out by the history of the United States—had been brought about by the high tariff imposed. It is the same thing to-day, Mr. Speaker. We are told the United States is prosperous. We are not prosperous to the extent the United States is, and I submit the reason is that we have not enough tariff protection. Only a short time ago, through the kindness of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) there was distributed to us a memorandum showing that there had been imported into this country during the last twelve months $208,000,000 worth of farm products, brought in to compete with the products of our Canadian farmers. I can only say, Mr. Speaker, that if I had the opportunity I would make it perfectly certain that any taxes which the United States imposed upon farm products going into the United States from Canada would be imposed by Canada upon that $208,000,000 worth of products that came into this country, and I would make it abundantly plain that any man who wanted grapefruit for breakfast would know he was paying for it, and that he could get a Northern Spy apple at much less cost than he could obtain grape fruit or foreign fruit from the southern parts of the United States. I do not see why that argument is not sound, and I believe the course I suggest is in keeping with our self-respect. Why should we as a people admit produce from the United States amounting to more than one-fourth of our total imports and not tax as freely as we are taxed? That is the self-respecting course in dealings between man and man. You are not going to allow one man "to put it all over you," as the saying is, and so I say that much of these ills that we have suffered, much of the deficits that we have to meet by taxes levied upon ourselves, could be taken care of by a proper tax upon the $208,000,000 worth of the products of the farm, because it includes food and all products as well.

Mr. PUTNAM: Does that include all fruits?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I would think so. I have no doubt the hon. member received the same memorandum, and the item will be found in the first two lines of the memorandum. We have $208,000,000 of farm products, one-fourth of all our imports, brought into Canada from the United States. I submit if we provided for an item of that kind by adequate taxation, and if we met the difficulties of the western provinces with regard to transportation—and I believe there is a difficulty there—we could without trouble, without great sacrifice, with the money derived from such a source, pay something like $20,000,000, which would mean 5 cents a bushel to the farmers, when they transport 400,000,000 bushels of grain. If there were a national policy inaugurated for the farmers at this time, founded upon the necessities of the farmers, and in order to meet their difficulties, there would be great sympathy in this House and in the country. But at the present time, when our friends to my left are railing against a protective tariff, and when, as I say, it seems that the opportunity will not come to them very soon of converting anybody they ought to cease worrying us with attacks on the tariff, if they think otherwise, I would advise them to commence operations on the two members who recently left them, and have now joined the party which stands for a high tariff as some people put it. But let us forget about that and struggle to alleviate the conditions which are certainly oppressing our western farmers.

In regard to the reciprocity resolution I take an altogether different view from the one propounded by the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. King). I think these resolutions do not comport with the dignity of this country. I think they are also unseemly. It is something like the lady proposing and when the lady proposes the person to whom she proposes generally cools off a little bit anyway. It often results in a very distinct and lasting coolness. There was a failure in 1911 to obtain reciprocity, and I have heard our respected and honoured friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) speak of this on three or four different occasions. On two occasions he has said—

> There is a tide in the affairs of men which taken at the flood leads on to fortune.

The day before yesterday the Finance Minister, before the Banking committee, described as a crime the fact that the reciprocity pact of 1911 did not become law. I think that it never should have become law in 1911, and it did not, and that it should not become law in 1923, and it will not. I know that the Finance Minister is absolutely sincere about that; there is no doubt about it.

Mr. PUTNAM: Should it have become law in 1854?

Mr. RYCKMAN: That was before I was born, and I cannot answer the question.

Mr. PUTNAM: It is a short time in the history of a nation. I asked if the hon. member thought reciprocity should have become law in 1854.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I feel satisfied that I could not answer that question to my hon. friend's satisfaction, because I am not familiar with the facts. My first connection with political life was when this country suffered by reason of the United States doing as it could do in 1911 and afterwards, and as it could do n 1923, namely, disrupt the pact and throw his country upon its own resources absolutely, when it had been accustomed to deal with the United States. It would be all very well if proper safeguards were provided which would properly care for trade relations in reciprocity agreements with the United States. But that is the point I was coming to. I have had a large experience with the United States. I have been interested in business there. I have spent a good deal of my time in the United States. I think I have been in the capital city of the United States as much as any member of the House. I have sat in clubs of the United States for twenty years and have heard these questions discussed. I have come to the conclusion—and I say this with all seriousness; do not let anyone think that I am girding at the United States—that the United States, as regards their patriotic view, are the real Sein Feiners of the world —for themselves alone. The United States would enter into a reciprocal pact with Canada at any time that this was to the advantage of the United States. The United States would crash through any reciprocity pact with Canada at any time that this was for the advantage of the United States. Do hon. members not think that is so? What is the lesson of the late war? Remember I am not in any way saying that the United States has done one thing that, as a nation, it was not entitled to do. Nations as individuals must take care of themselves, and the United States certainly does so. What did they do in the late war? We were in that war, Great Britain was in that war for two years and eight months before the United States came in. The United States came into the war, and they say they won the war. It was, therefore, their war, and from the beginning during the two years and eight months, they took, as they had every right to take, this gold which is in their coffers to-day. Then the question arose of settling up the debts of the war, the war which they will tell you frankly they have won. I have heard a general in the army, officers in the executive offices at Washington, and army officers argue with me to a demonstration, as they thought, that the United States won the war. When the war was over, Great Britain offered to forego the debts which the Allies owed to her. When the proposition was made to the United States, the United States declined. The United States had a perfect right to ask Great Britain to pay her debt. Great Britain is not complaining; Great Britain will pay it. But there is nothing that I am surer of on earth than that if the reciprocity pact or any other international agreement were made with the United States, and it became of interest to the United States, of vital national interest for the prosperity of its people, to crash through that agreement, the United States would do so. That being my view, I certainly cannot feel that this country suffered anything by not accepting the reciprocity pact of 1911, and I think this country as a self-respecting contracting nation has lowered its standing as such by putting before the face of the whole world that it is offering to deal with the United States, the United States having taken the stand that it has taken with regard to the late war and back again, as more closely related to ourselves, when it closed out the trade agreement that we had in years gone by, which action put this country on its back, so that for a long time it could not recover until the National Policy of Sir John A. Macdonald gave this country an opportunity to breathe and live again.

Mr. PUTNAM: Would the hon. gentleman cite any agreement that the United States ever crashed through? He used that harsh term twice.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I want to be absolutely fair in my statement to the House. By the term, "crashed through," I do not want my hon. friend to understand that I was speaking of a breach of agreement. A more felicitous expression would be to say that they would put an end to it whenever it suited their purpose to do so. To my mind it is a great pity that this country has not the same opinion of itself that the United States has of itself; that this country does not determine that what it shall do shall be for the benefit of Canada first, because that is the duty, I submit, of this parliament. We are walking around, making overtures to the United States, and the wire comes back hot from Washington on the 16th May that a proposal of this kind will not be entertained now. What would have happened supposing we had had reciprocity in 1911 and that this farmer bloc, which is the reason that the Fordney-McCumber bill is law in the United States to-day, came into existence; supposing that reciprocity had existed and it was contrary to the interests of those farmers in the United States that Canadian farmers should have a benefit, do you mean to say for one moment that they would not have insisted on their rights? Certainly they would; they would have asked that this reciprocity agreement inaugurated in 1911 should be cancelled. The United States will be very glad to deal with us as long as we can offer her a consideration and as long as everything is flowing freely her way. But just the moment that boot is on the other foot, there is a distinct change of attitude on the part of the United States. They want to retire from any obligations that would in any way mean loss to them.

In conclusion, I was put in mind by the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. King) referring to ancient Rome and what was going to happen to us, of what we all used to read in our history books of the days of ancient Rome in the time of Marcus Cato; Cato, the censor. Whenever Cato addressed the Roman senate, no matter what the topic was, he concluded every speech, without regard to the relevancy of the remark, with "Delenda est Carthago"—"Carthage must be destroyed." Scipio Nasica his rival on the opposite side of the senate then got the habit of concluding his speech with the statement: "In my opinion I think that Carthage should be left standing." I would that I could conclude this speech with an injunction that would have the success that Cato's had, because his advocacy won the destruction of Carthage; the Romans finally determined upon that, and Carthage was destroyed. If I could lay an injunction upon this House, it would be this, that we must practise economy; and if ever the day comes—and I believe it will come because I think the people of this country will insist upon it—when that injunction will be met and satisfaction given to the people of Canada by economy, real and earnest, put into practice, I for one will feel that I have not spoken altogether in vain in urging in an imperfect way that the expense of this country could, if a determined effort were made, be cut down to a figure that would surprise even the members of the House themselves.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (King's, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, some years ago, in fact a good many years ago, when I was learning to write in a country school, the teacher in those days set headlines for the pupils who were learning that craft, and our teacher rather prided himself upon the number of aphorisms that he could use on such occasions. One of them that came under the letter "M" ran as follows:

> Many men of many minds,
> Many birds of various kinds.

As I have listened to the speeches in this debate, in fact as I have listened to all the speeches in parliament, I have been driven to the conclusion that there was a good deal of truth in the first part of that aphorism, because there is certainly great divergence of opinion as regards the budget and nearly everything discussed under it. I read somewhere that in a multiplicity of counsel there is wisdom and I thought that was a very wise saying. But I have changed my mind in that respect. I have also read that much speaking darkeneth wisdom, and I think there is something like that in the book of Job. Well, I have come to the conclusion that there is a good deal of wisdom in that statement. But notwithstanding that fact I may be a sinner to some extent to-night. I trust however that what I say will not have the effect of darkening the vision of parliament because I would not fall into the same error that some others have fallen into.

Unfortunately, I did not hear the budget as delivered by the Minister of Finance, but I had the privilege of listening to the speech of the chief critic of the opposition, the hon. member for West York and ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), and I read it afterwards besides. If I were to judge from that mild criticism that he indulged in, a criticism in fractions of fractions, I would conclude that the budget was unanswerable, because he made no real attack upon it. And that hon. gentleman is the chief critic of the opposition. I might almost say the same thing of the speech delivered by the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke).

There is an assumption running through the speeches of the Conservatives in this House that some one is responsible for the tremendous taxation and the enormous public debt under which the people of this country are staggering at the present time, and the assumption seems to come from our friends opposite that they are not responsible, that they are the men who can wash their hands of this condition and place upon some other party in the House the necessity of providing the funds to meet these enormous obligations. I totally dissent from that assumption. I see the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) in his seat; he is an intelligent man and he knows that there is no foundation for it. He knows that when the party of which he is now leader came into power there was hardly any public debt and practically speaking we did not know what taxation was. Immediately after his party assumed office the expenditure under the consolidated fund began to go up by $10,000,000 and $15,000,000 a year. But when the war started, then the floodgates were opened wide; all restrictions were removed. I know quite well, and I am willing to admit, that under war conditions enormous expenditures will be incurred, because prices will be two or three times the worth of the article, and everything will be expensive under such circumstances.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman appeals to me; perhaps he would like to have my opinion of his statement. It is absolutely wrong.

Mr. HUGHES: What part of it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The first two years of the government of Sir Robert Borden there was an enormous diminution of the national debt, the first year by almost a million dollars and the second year nearly $26,000,000.

Mr. HUGHES: I spoke of the expenditure under the consolidated fund. The condition of the country was so good after fifteen years of Liberal administration, the revenues were so buoyant, that the expenditure could go on mounting up by $10,000,000 and $15,000,000 a year, and yet the public debt had not yet greatly increased.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was an item of $15,000,000, but it was a loan to that precious creation of my hon. friend's party, the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. HUGHES: Since my hon. friend and I have come into conflict on this point, I can give him a few items in regard to which the government could have exercised control. I heard my hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. Ryckman) speak of economy a few moments ago. Well, the Conservative party were hardly in office before some 12,000 civil servants—I am giving the round numbers,—were dismissed from office and upwards of 25,000 were appointed to take their places.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not right.

Mr. HUGHES: The public records will prove it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Get them now.

Mr. HUGHES: The returns were brought down to the House at the time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Produce them now; the statement is utterly untrue.

Mr. HUGHES: Utterly?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, utterly.

Mr. HUGHES: I am surprised—

Mr. MEIGHEN: So am I.

Mr. HUGHES: —that the leader of the Opposition should make that statement. The returns brought down by the government of which he was a member will prove the truth of the statement. I made the statement a few moments ago that when the war came the floodgates were opened, but I have already stated that under these conditions very high prices would be paid for everything the government needed to purchase at that time to prosecute the war. What I complain of however, and the leader of the Opposition knows it, is that much of this expenditure was due to premeditated arrangement whereby enormous prices would be paid, much higher than were necessary for the goods that were required. I do not want to go into this matter at this late hour of the evening, after some years have passed since these events, but my hon. friend knows that what I have said is true. He knows that in many instances no effort whatever was made by the government of which he was a member, at all events by the ministers of the Crown in some of the departments, to curtail some of these expenditures or to see that anything like value was obtained for the money expended. I am quite conservative when I say that for every dollar expended in the war at least 50 cents was either wasted or stolen, and this could have been prevented. The result is that the public debt to-day might have been a billion less than it is and taxation nearly cut in two. I do not want my hon. friends opposite to assume therefore that there is any political party in this country responsible for the enormous debt which is now resting upon us, and for the heavy taxation which we have to meet, except the official opposition of to-day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did that enormous waste apply during the years the hon. gentleman's friends were associated with us?

Mr. HUGHES: My friends?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. HUGHES: There were none of my friends associated with you.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Are there certain hon. gentlemen on the opposite side who are not the hon. gentleman's friends?

Mr. HUGHES: The circumstances to which I have referred existed in the early days of the war before my so-called friends were associated with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is pretty hard on the Minister of Finance.

Mr. HUGHES: No, the Minister of Finance was a defeated candidate. He was not in parliament at the time to which I refer, so that he could not have been associated with it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will get down a little finer still, then. Would he tell us what the articles were and where it was so shown?

Mr. HUGHES: Who?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, I do not know who—whoever he likes.

Mr. HUGHES: What question did the right hon. gentleman ask me?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought perhaps the hon. gentleman might be specific say, as to a dollar or a dollar and a half.

Mr. HUGHES: Parliament is not a kindergarten. If the right hon. gentleman wishes to attend a school of that kind there are opportunities, I believe, in Ottawa. He should not descend to these little quibblings.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was asking you to.

Mr. HUGHES: You were asking me? You should have the information yourself without asking me.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have.

Mr. HUGHES: You should have had it before you became a member of parliament, and you should have more since you are the leader of a political party.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member just intends to stay up in the air and not give us any concrete cases at all.

Mr. HUGHES: Do you wish a concrete case?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, if you have the evidence.

Mr. HUGHES: Well, I will give you one.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind hon. members that they must address themselves to the Chair, and that one hon. member in referring to another should use the third person.

Mr. HUGHES: Very good, Mr. Speaker. We are both sinning in that respect. Now, I will give a concrete case. When the war broke out, an agent of the largest manufacturing drug concern in the world—in America at all events—came to Ottawa for the purpose of obtaining an order for medical supplies for the house he represented. He went to the department and stated his business—and this was sworn to under oath. He was told that the department would not do business with him—that he had to do it through a middleman. It was brought out in sworn testimony that the person who really gave that order for medical supplies for the army was a boy fourteen years of age who had had one year's experience in a drug store. That boy stated under oath that he did not know what he was doing, that he put down the figures just as he was told by other people. The agent of Bauer and Black came before the Public Accounts committee and swore that his house was quite willing to furnish these medical supplies to the department at the price at which they supplied them to this boy, but when the supplies reached the department the prices were three or four hundred per cent higher. That was premeditated; that was done by arrangement; that was not an accident. And there are many others.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is altogether a wrong recital.

Mr. HUGHES: There were others. We can give a number of these things if my right hon. friend wishes.

The hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ryckman) said this evening that the government should practise economy; that failure to practise economy was one respect in which the government was derelict in its duty. Well, during the last session of parliament—that is not long ago—when an effort was made to reduce the expenditure where such reduction would work no injury to the country—the reduction proposed was a reasonable one, in connection with the Militia department—the hon member for East Toronto and nearly every other hon. gentleman sitting in that corner of the House objected. Our Progressive friends, or many of them, spoke in favour of the reduction; they showed their sincerity in that regard. I have yet to find where one member of the Conservative party has put his finger upon a concrete saving that could be made by the government. They invariably oppose our efforts to practise economy, while in a general way they preach it.

The hon. member for East Toronto also found fault with the offer the Finance Minister is making to the United States in the matter of reciprocal trade arrangements. He said it was a case of the lady proposing and that generally when the lady proposed the offer was turned down. I would ask my hon. friend, did the lady propose when Sir John A. Macdonald brought in the so-called National Policy and put that very invitation in it and kept it there for forty years? It was only when reciprocity was actually obtained, only when a better arrangement was entered into than anybody in Canada could have expected, that my hon. friends discovered that they were opposed to reciprocity.

Mr. CHAPLIN: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? How could Sir John A. Macdonald leave such a proposal in the tariff for forty years?

Mr. HUGHES: All parties were in favour of it.

Mr. CHAPLIN: For forty years?

Mr. HUGHES: From 1878 to 1911; you can figure it out for yourself. I suppose if it were thirty-nine and a half, hon. gentlemen opposite would object.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman surely does not know what he is talking about. Does he mean to say that was in the act up to 1911?

Mr. HUGHES: It was a standing offer to the United States. In 1891 Sir John A. Macdonald dissolved parliament a year before its term expired, on the plea that he had an invitation from Washington to send representatives there to negotiate a reciprocity treaty, and that he wanted to get a mandate from the people to strengthen his hands in those negotiations. He got a mandate from the people; his party were returned to power, and it turned out that the statement was incorrect. Mr. Blaine, then Secretary of State in the United States, said that no such invitation had ever been sent, so that the statement made to the people in that general election was untrue. But that was the way the Conservative party were acting in those days. Then when a real reciprocity arrangement was actually entered into, they discovered that they were opposed to it. As has been well stated, the defeat of reciprocity was the greatest crime ever committed in this country.

With regard to the respective merits of protection and free trade, I wish to put before the House two or three propositions which I think are sound and upon which I wish to build an argument. It is generally held that when the exports of a country exceed the imports, that country is doing business profitably; that is generally held up to be a good condition of affairs. What is known as the balance of trade has not been the subject of very much reference in this debate. I think that general proposition is a fallacy. It may be correct under certain conditions, but generally speaking, trade is profitably carried on when the imports exceeds the exports. As I have said, I will lay down two or three propositions in that connection and I will give one or two concrete instances by way of proof. I make this statement: If the exports are greater than the imports and if the exports are only paying for the imports, then we are trading at a loss, and the measure of our loss is the difference between our exports and our imports.

Further, if our exports are greater than our imports and if our exports are not even paying for our imports, then our loss is even greater than the difference between our exports and our imports.

Again, if our imports exceed our exports and if our exports are paying for our imports, we are trading at a profit, and the measure of our profit is the difference between our imports and our exports.

Further, in such a case if our exports are more than paying for our imports, then the measure of our profit is even greater than the difference between our imports and exports.

Again, if our exports exceed our imports and if our exports are not only paying for our imports but are enabling us to pay off our foreign obligations or make foreign investments, then we are trading at a profit, and the measure of our profit is the reduction in our foreign obligations or our investments or both together.

Further, if our imports exceed our exports and if our exports are not paying for our imports and if we have to borrow money to pay the difference, then manifestly we are trading at a loss, and the measure of our loss is the amount of our borrowing for this purpose.

Now then let me give one or two concrete examples to prove these propositions.

I will say that I am an exporter and that I am exporting wheat. I will take 100,000 bushels and for easy computation say that it costs $1 a bushel. I send that to Liverpool or London. The export entry is $100,000. I sell that cargo at a profit say, for easy computation, of 50 cents a bushel, realizing $150,000. I invest that in merchandise in Great Britain which I bring back to Canada. The import entry is $150,000. I have made a very profitable transaction. The import is 50 per cent in excess of the export. What is profitable to me is profitable to my country.

Supposing I am not an importer at all and I bring back a bill of exchange. That enables some other man who is an importer to bring in $150,000 worth of goods and to pay for them, because we have that bill of exchange. That, of course, will apply to every other article of commerce in which the country can be engaged.

The reverse is also true. Supposing I sell my wheat at a loss. For easy computation say I sell it at 50 cents a bushel. The export entry is $100,000 and the import entry $50,000. Our exports are twice as great as our imports in that case, and yet we are trading at a tremendous loss. So the balance of trade theory will only hold providing you take all the circumstances and all the conditions into account, but generally speaking when the imports exceed the exports the country is trading at a profit because all profit in trade, in foreign trade at all events, and I think in all trade, is made by taking things from where they are comparatively cheap to where they are comparatively dear. Therefore it follows that the imports of all the countries in the world could be greater than the exports at the same time and all countries be doing business at a profit. That international trade of itself would be one of the greatest industries that the world could be engaged in. There cannot be any question or doubt about it. There is no question in my mind that when the Creator made this world, with all its varying climates and varied production, it was His wish that the people who inhabited this world might trade with one another. The greatest good of mankind would be produced by free international trade. To my mind it would be just as reasonable to put up toll gates between Canada and the United States or between the different provinces of this country as to prevent trade from flowing north and south or between the provinces. We erect artificial barriers to prevent the natural flow of trade. It seems to me a paradoxical thing for governments to send trade commissioners abroad, and to subsidize steamers and make treaties to promote trade, and then by tariffs to fine the people who engage in that trade.

Mr. KELLNER: Would the hon. gentleman mind handing a copy of that article which he has been reading to the Minister of Immigration?

Mr. HUGHES: I really do not know what the hon. gentleman means.

Mr. KELLNER: I mean that article the hon. member is reading from in regard to trade balances.

Mr. HUGHES: I read from no article.

Mr. KELLNER: Well, the paper you quoted the figures from then.

Mr. HUGHES: I have no objection to showing it to my hon. friend or anyone who wishes to see it. The figures will all be on Hansard to-morrow and be available to everybody.

Mr. KELLNER: The hon. gentleman's views are entirely in accord with my own, but I thought it would be well for him to hand the statement to some of his colleagues.

Mr. HUGHES: When two nations go to war and one wishes to injure the other, and injure it very effectively, if they are maritime nations particularly, the one blockades the other. That blockade is established, not for the purpose of preventing exports, but for the purpose of preventing imports, it being instinctively realized that you can injure an enemy nation far more quickly and effectively by preventing its imports than by preventing its exports.

The leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) said a good thing the other day, though I suppose he was not the first to say it, when he said: You cannot sell unless you are prepared to buy. The greatest fallacy that it is possible for any man to hold has been enunciated this session and in all previous sessions in which I have held a seat in this House by the Conservative party in regard to trade matters. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and other gentlemen in his party say that they never change their views. Well, Mr. Speaker, there was a line of kings in France a few years ago of whom it was said they never learned and they never forgot—and they did not go down in history as being very intelligent men.

If what I have said is true, and I think it will bear critical examination, there is nothing that we could do that would so promote the interest of the world or of two nations lying alongside each other like Canada and the United States as to have free trade or as large a measure of free trade as we can have between the two nations. I have not lost faith in the intelligence of our neighbours to the south, and some day or other they may repeat the offer they made to us. They are quite justified now in being indifferent in meeting our offers because they made an arrangement with us that was certainly to our benefit—was to their own benefit and to ours to a very much greater extent than we ever expected to receive from them—and we turned it down. I do not know whether reciprocity got a fair hearing in the country at that time or not, I do not think it did. It was the former member for West Peterborough, Mr. Burnham, who told us in this House that he never heard reciprocity mentioned in his part of the country but that other issues entirely were raised by the Conservative party, and issues that were not very creditable to any party. In the province of Quebec also reciprocity was hardly mentioned. There was at that time in that province a political school headed by a man named Bourassa, called the Nationalist party, and our good friends the Conservatives who wanted to defeat reciprocity joined in an alliance with the Nationalists. That alliance was afterwards called "The unholy alliance" but I am afraid the Conservative party would join in any alliance to defeat a Liberal government no matter what the consequences might be to the country.

We cannot expect world-wide free trade. Perhaps we cannot even expect free trade between Canada and the United States. The question naturally arises, if we cannot get that and if other countries maintain high tariff walls against us, would it be in our own interest to raise high tariff walls against those countries that are not willing to trade with us. Would it be in our interest? I do not think so. I have often heard the argument made that if we reduced our customs duties other countries would flood us with their cheap goods, let us examine that argument and see what is in it. For the sake of argument let us take an extreme case. Supposing other countries could send us their goods for nothing. That would be flooding us surely but would that injure us? If we could get the things we require to import for nothing, if we had to give nothing for them, manifestly that would not injure us. Supposing we got those imports very cheap at 25 per cent of their value? That would not injure us either, could not possibly injure us, and to the extent they took something in return would not injure our industries. Supposing we got those imports for half their value the same thing would apply. Supposing we got them for 75 per cent of their value the same thing would apply. Nations do not trade with one another but the individuals that compose nations do. No two men will carry on a trade unless it is beneficial to both of them, and if it is beneficial to the people that are carrying on that trade then it must necessarily be beneficial to the respective countries; there is no getting away from that fact.

The other day in the committee on Banking and Commerce I heard the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ryckman), speaking in regard to a motion that was made there, say that we should not legislate to protect grown up red-blooded men from doing that which they wanted to do themselves. That was good sound doctrine. To-night he proposes to raise tariff walls, to impose high customs duties, to prevent men living in Canada from trading with their neighbours in the United States if they want to do so and if they find such trading to be to their advantage. The two positions do not agree. Either the hon. member was wrong in his statement before the Banking and Commerce committee or he was wrong in his argument to-night.

However, we are not living in an ideal world and some $400,000,000, or nearly that amount, have to be raised in Canada to meet our obligations. The Minister of Finance has to raise that money in some way or another. Under the circumstances would he be justified in reducing the customs duty, in lessening the amount he expects to receive from that source? I question it very much and, free trader in principle as I am, I will tell you why. Any government must be guided by the people from whom it is legislating. In the case of the government that was in power from 1896 down to 1911 every change it made in the tariff was in the direction of reducing the duty. Many people in Canada thought the Laurier government was not going fast enough and far enough. A large delegation came to Ottawa in 1910 or 1911, very largely composed of farmers from the province of Ontario and aggregating some seven or eight hundred in number. They asked for lower duties and particularly that efforts should be made to bring about reciprocal trade relations with the United States. A number of men in that delegation represented the fruit growing industry. The government heard the representations of the deputation and a few months later was in a position to carry out their wishes. Did these men respond? No, they took the earliest opportunity presented to them to turn the Laurier government out of power, they were not ready to receive the legislation for which they asked. The province of Manitoba also turned down the reciprocity agreement, and I am sorry to say the province from which I come sent half of its members to parliament to vote against reciprocity, although there is not a province in Canada that would have benefited to a greater extent from it than Prince Edward Island. Therefore, no matter how convinced you are of the soundness of certain legislation, no government can proceed faster than the sentiment of the people warrants. I think it was Solon who said that his laws were not the best possible, they were not even the best he could write, but they were the best the Athenian people were capable of receiving. Take the constituency of the present Minister of Finance who negotiated that reciprocity agreement. The province of Nova Scotia, including the county of Shelburne and Queens, which is largely engaged in the fishing industry would certainly have benefited largely by reciprocity, yet that constituency voted against the government. Even if it were not necessary to raise the large amount of money which is now required, would any government be justified in going faster than the present government is doing in the direction of freer trade or of making efforts to obtain reciprocal trade agreement with the United States.

That is a question which our Progressive friends will have to ask themselves. I want to say this to them: Did they show their sincerity to the extent of 100 per cent in regard to this matter? They blame the present government for not adhering more strictly to the platform of 1919. That platform surely appealed to the Progressive party in western Canada, but was the appeal sufficiently strong to attract their support? No, in every constituency in western Canada, or in most of them at all events, a candidate was put up to try to defeat the Liberal candidate and to defeat the party that framed that platform, and that had given the proof years before that they were in favour of such trade conditions.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The hon. member was endowed with his spirit of prophecy then.

Mr. HUGHES: I did not catch the observation of the hon. member. I will mention an instance which comes nearer home. Since I have had a vote I have always voted for freer trade, because I was convinced it was sound policy. I voted for reciprocity. I was elected on that issue, and I came to parliament and advocated reciprocity to the best of my ability. Every vote that I ever gave was in favour of it. What did my Progressive friends do in the last election? The leader in the Progressive party came down to Prince Edward Island and assisted his nominee against me. The gentleman who opposed me had voted against reciprocity, had stumped the country against it, and had voted against the Liberal government on every free trade measure that they introduced. Did that show 100 per cent sincerity?

Mr. GOULD: He got what was coming to him.

Mr. HUGHES: He got what was coming to him. He was licked because he was insincere, but he had the full support of the Progressive party and had the endorsement of the leader of that party.

Now our Progressive friends should not expect so much. They should not expect any more than they have got, and they should be sincere in this matter. If this question is fundamental with them, if they are convinced that it is one of the best things Canada could obtain, then they should support the men who have proved by their work that they are sincere in this matter, and if our friends have made a mistake in the past, let them try to rectify it in the future

These are my views on these questions, and if our Conservative friends would come to us and acknowledge that they are largely responsible for the debt and taxation of the country at this time, if they would strike their breasts and acknowledge their guilt, we would feel like forgiving them to a large extent, and forgetting their record in the matters to which I have referred and in many other matters to which I might refer. Now actions speak louder than words, and under all the circumstances I do not think our Progressive friends are justified in moving an amendment to the budget. However they are the best judges of their own conduct. I belong to that party which has consistently worked for those measures which have been dear to us all for so many years. I am convinced of the sincerity of the members of our party, and am convinced that they are doing the best they can under the circumstances in which they find themselves placed. Therefore, I am going to vote against the amendment and for the budget, believing that I am working and voting in the best interests of the principles which I have placed before the House this evening.

On motion of Mr. Morrison the debate was adjourned.

Monday, May 21, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORTS

Fifth report of the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce presented.—Hon. Mr. Maclean.

First interim report on the second part of investigation by the Royal Commission on Pensions and Re-establishment.—Hon. Mr. Beland.

COMMITTEES—CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): I beg to move that the name of Mr. Garland (Bow River) be substituted for that of Mr. Reed on the standing committee on Banking and Commerce and that the name of Mr. Reed be substituted for that of Mr. Garland (Bow River) on the standing committee on Agriculture.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

THE PUBLIC DEBT—RAILWAY APPROPRIATIONS

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): The leader of the Opposition asked the other evening for certain additional information concerning the public debt and railway appropriations. The debt statement is brief, and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will read it:

Net debt, 31st March, 1922, as shown in the Public Accounts laid on the table of the House during present session..	$2,422,135,801 73
Estimated amount to be added to the net debt in the year just closed as given by the minister in his budget speech..	49,293,086 00
Estimated Net debt March 31, 1923..	$2,471,428,887 73

The statement regarding railway appropriations is more elaborate, and I will send it over to my hon. friend rather than read it.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION AND RETIREMENT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 180, to amend the Civil Service Superannuation and Retirement Act.

Mr. MARTELL: Is this simply to extend the so-called Calder Act?

Mr. FIELDING: No. That will come up at another time. There is a clause in the old Superannuation Act which authorizes the Treasury Board to grant additional years in fixing a retiring allowance. We think that some embarrassment may arise from that, and we propose to repeal that clause so that if in any case it is deemed necessary to make any addition to the amount granted it can be done by special appropriation by the House, instead of by act of the Treasury Board.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 176 (from the Senate), respecting The Northern Trusts Company.—Mr. Hudson.

Bill No. 177 (from the Senate), respecting The Subsidiary Court of the Ancient Order of Foresters in the Dominion of Canada.—Mr. Euler.

Bill No. 178 (from the Senate), for the relief of Winifred Scatcherd.—Mr. Church.

OLEOMARGARINE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): I should like to ask the government whether it is the intention to introduce this session legislation to further extend the period during which oleomargarine may be manufactured and sold in this country, and imported. The act of last session only extended until 31st August, the right to manufacture and import oleomargarine, and until 1st March next the right to have that article in possession.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): I promise my hon. friend that the government will give serious consideration to his representation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In that connection may I state that I got a similar answer some two or three weeks ago. How long is this state of giving the matter consideration going to last?

Mr. FIELDING: The subject is very serious.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it not possible to get an answer without this evasion?

Mr. FIELDING: I do not think that is nice.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps it is not, but does the government deserve anything better?

Mr. FIELDING: I am afraid, to use the Asquithian phrase, my right hon. friend will have to wait and see.

COMMISSION ON LAKE RATES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): I wish to inquire when the report tabled the other day from the Royal Commission on Lake Rates will be printed and made available for the use of members.

Mr. FIELDING: I presume that the printing of this report is for the printing committee to decide. I think that is the usual course followed. I do not think these reports are printed unless so ordered by the printing committee. However, I will make inquiry for my hon. friend. I do not think any special instruction has been given about it one way or the other.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): It is very important that this report should be printed and in the hands of members at an early date.

Mr. FIELDING: The printing committee can direct the printing of the report at once.

PUBLICITY AGENT IN LONDON

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is reported from Great Britain in the morning press that the government has appointed a publicity agent or publicity representative in London, and that the appointee is one Mr. W. T. Cranfield, of Great Britain. May I ask if the report is correct, and when the process of appointing other than Canadians is to cease?

Mr. FIELDING: I must confess that personally I am not aware of the matter, but I will have inquiry made. Speaking for myself I am not aware of such an appointment; it may have been made in some one of the departments.

WHEAT BOARD

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have another question to ask. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb), in whose department the matter lies, is not in his seat, and I was withholding the question in the hope that he would come in. Probably some other member of the government will be able to answer. The question is this: Have the government had a request from either the government of Alberta or the government of Saskatchewan, or a joint request from both, to extend the wheat board legislation by order in council as provided by the act of last year? Further, have any names been suggested to this government to handle the proposal for the present year?

Mr. FIELDING: This matter comes under the direction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce who, unfortunately, is not present. I will see that the inquiry is brought to his notice and that the information is given to my hon. friend as early as possible.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Friday, May 18, the debate on the motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance), that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into Committee on Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Robert Forke.

Mr. JOHN MORRISON (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the Minister of Finance on this the occasion of his seventeenth budget. I am only sorry that it contains so little encouragement for agriculture and for the working classes in general.

It has been frequently stated here, Sir, that Canada is passing through a very precarious era; and some speakers have been roundly denounced for attempting to relate just how bad the conditions are in their particular districts. Well, Sir, the conditions over some very large areas are fully as bad as have been described. Climatic causes have contributed very largely to these conditions. Adverse weather for four and sometimes fives successive years, together with high operating costs —some of which were controllable and others uncontrollable—have contributed to place matters in very bad shape. Other causes were —the non-appreciation of the real facts by the government, and that combinations of different kinds, who thought the country could stand it, have kept increasing their charges for their respective services, whether it was, lending money, carrying freight, or supplying coal, farm implements, or manufactured goods. When deflation struck the country, farming was the first industry to feel it, as the prices of farm products were fixed by world conditions plus the ability to buy and pay for those goods. Our income fell to one-third of previous years, but costs stood pat, they remained away up. The result is that the greatest basic industry in Canada to-day has a very low purchasing power. Our inability to buy means that the manufacturing establishments are only running from 25 to 75 per cent capacity, and their overhead costs are very high. According to Mr. Bradshaw, General Manager of the Massey-Harris Company, giving evidence before a committee of this House the other day their overhead was up about 400 per cent as compared with that of pre-war days. Surely then protection has failed to fulfil its purpose in keeping our manufacturers busy. That grand old policy of protection, which the Conservatives boldly proclaimed in office and out of office, that policy which the Liberals denounced when in opposition and practised when they got into office, has failed to fulfil the expectations of its friends.

It is claimed, Sir, that the outcry of hard times in the West has injured Canada. Not very much I think. It has been my observation, Sir, that if there is anything wrong doers dislike, it is publicity in regard to their evil practices. We have tried other methods and we have failed to get any response, and yet when we tell the facts in order to try and bring about a remedy we are called calamity howlers. I do not think that the government could supply a remedy for every difficulty which exists, but there are measures which could be applied if this government was fearless and determined to give a square deal all round, if service was the big idea and fear was not so prevalent.

I think the British Preference should be increased to at least 50 per cent all round. That is a very desirable course in order that the prices paid for goods that we need shall be reduced to a reasonable rate. It will also make it hard for our oppressors to combine, and will render easy the enforcement of the Anti-Combines Act. If that is done, combines will find it very hard to operate in Canada. Another reason for increasing the British preference is to be found in connection with the shipping conditions. Referring to the annual report of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, I find on page 5 a paragraph which reads as follows:

> It is admitted by the best authorities that the past year was the worst in recent shipping annals. While tonnage offering increased to some extent the commodities were of lower value than in preceding years, and, as a consequence, the earnings fell off considerably. Outward tonnage was fairly well maintained, but on the other hand the inward business, more especially from the United Kingdom, Oriental and Australasian ports fell away to such extent that it was exceedingly difficult—and at times impossible—to obtain, and, on this account, a great proportion of the voyages during the year resulted in losses. The Merchant Marine had a deficit of $9,649,478. Our exports to Great Britain for the four years ending 31st March 1923 amounted to $1,480,427,628. Our imports from Great Britain were only $597,759,207, a balance in favour of Canada of $882,668,421, and average balance per year of $220,667,105.

Now sir, this one-way-load transportation is a very expensive business. That is another serious loss caused to us from over protection. When people stray from sound business principles their difficulties are always cumulative. One wrong leads to another, and one difficulty causes another difficulty. The way of the transgressor is hard in public business, the same as in private life. Surely our friends who are so long on loyalty and on patriotism should be willing to give the Motherland a chance. Great Britain is putting up a great fight to-day. She is a manufacturing nation as well as a good trader, but she has still 1,200,000 men in enforced idleness, because world conditions are bad. We must buy her manufactured products if we expect her to buy our wheat, flour, cattle, bacon, and dairy products. Nobody can continue buying if he cannot sell. Neither can a nation buy, if she does not sell. Britain has been our second best customer, the United States being first. For four years ending 31st March last our imports from the United States amounted to $2,714,149,766. Our exports were $1,668,-020,011, a balance in favour of the United States of $1,046,129,755. Taking the United Kingdom and the United States there was a trade balance against Canada of $163,461,334. Now there is something wrong when we find ourselves in that position. We must have such high duties that they are interfering with trade. Last year the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) brought down his budget and increased the duties on cigarettes and thought he would obtain increased revenue from that source, but he found he was $1,200,-000 in the hole. I think that shows that when they overdid it in a little thing like cigarettes, many other lines of business were materially injured. Instead of getting more business, the customs tariff was so high that it killed business. We need more British commodities from that country, and one commodity which I would suggest to import more heavily would be British people, but as they come here we have to see that they are well looked after, and not exploited, as many of them have been in the past, not brought out and dumped on the prairies and on the newer lands, left to shift for themselves, and exploited by people who make a business of that game. The newer parts of Canada are deserving of more careful consideration of her various problems. We need extensions of branch lines of railway where there are large settlements of thrifty farmers who have been holding down the job since before the war, some of them hauling their wheat thirty or forty miles to the nearest railway. Many of our people in such circumstances are becoming discouraged and are going across the International boundary line. I think it is well worth while for the government to make an intelligent careful survey of all frontier problems and meet those people half way. If we do that we will find that we can hold them. I think it is poor business to spend a lot of money in bringing in new people and not providing for those who are discouraged. We have thousands of settlers to-day who are "broke." There are men who have not any money going across the International boundary line to-day with their families, and I am told that when a man goes broke he cannot get a clearance and make an assignment for less than $500. Those men could not find $500 to save their souls. Something should be done to save those people for this country. It is folly—it is worse than folly—to let those people drift. It is not justice to them. They have suffered this loss, not so much through their own fault as the general aftermath of the war, and I think some compromise should be effected which would save those people to Canada.

Now the problem of adequate credits is a live one from coast to coast to-day. Business men as well as farmers are demanding a better system. It is a difficult problem and worthy the attention of Canada's best men. Members of the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce will, I am sure, submit proposals to this House for much needed amendments to the Bank Act. I think we should have a commission on banking and credits similar to the railway commission or the grain commission. I do not know why any small bunch of men should have such arbitrary powers over the business of this country. These men have not been reasonable in the past, and we have no assurance that they ever experienced a change of heart. Now when banks want a renewal of their charter, they try to get it put through, and if they succeed the public will be at their mercy for ten years. The bank presidents and general managers who have been down here giving evidence before this banking committee have a lot to say about the stability of our financial institutions, but, Sir, there is nothing as unstable as the line of credit that the most people have been obliged to use, or to be satisfied with, during the last ten years. I know a farmer who was doing business with a bank for over twenty years before he ever asked to borrow a dollar. He had a first class farm, well improved, everything paid for and he had other investments. He went into the bank and asked for a loan of $200, and the manager told him he was very sorry but they were not lending money that day. That money was wanted to pay for some cattle the farmer had just bought, and the man went out and got the money elsewhere. I recall another instance where a neighbour of mine had a half section, well improved, and he had horses and implements. He had borrowed some money from the bank, and when in December his note became due he wanted a renewal. He told the banker that he had paid up everything in the stores, paid his threshing bill, wages and taxes. He had paid all he said, but one lien note of $300 on a team of horses which he purchased for $600. He was at that time owing to the bank $300, and the manager said "That is all right, you just pay your note now, and you will be in good standing when your note for the horses becomes due on the 1st of March, and we will take care of you." The farmer took him at his word and paid the note in the bank. But when 1st March came around the bank refused to give him a loan of $300. The vendor of the horses had the team in town to re-sell them, when a neighbour came forward and loaned the farmer the money. I do not think the banks are doing justice to their customers in such cases as that to which I have referred. I could quote much worse instances than that of uncalled-for ill-treatment.

The banks tell us that money is tight. People who are tight when we want to do business with them are no good; we should have some way of keeping them in working order. We want continuity of service. Personally I have no complaint to make; but I have seen some gross injustices handed out to the people, and I do not see any reason why one group of men should be in a position where they can dictate the whole game right through. I do not think any man in the world is good enough to have an absolute say over his fellow man; there should be some check on him. Lack of continuity of service has been the chief cause of many people of this country getting into trouble. I have seen men canvassed to get them to use more credit, and later on the same bank manager who so canvassed them, came around and compelled them, when they did not have a crop, to give him a mortgage to protect their loan.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. gentleman not to mention in the debate, mattters which are under consideration before a standing committee, the report of which is not yet before the House. That is one of the essential rules of debate.

[Mr. Morrison.]

Mr. MORRISON: I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker. The United States is to-day providing for farmers a service which land mortgage companies and banks cannot give. Banks require their money out on short-term loans, because they have big deposits of money that are due on demand. They are, therefore, obliged to keep their assets as liquid as possible, and they are not in a position to lend money on live stock for one or two years until the stock grows to maturity. Our land mortgage companies also cannot touch that business. There are many farmers who have plenty of feed, but who cannot use it on this account, and there is no margin for waste to-day in agriculture in Canada. Our country requires a system of intermediate credit, similar to the United States' system, to suit the requirements of our live stock men. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), in speaking the other day, scoffed at the idea of farmers consolidating their debts on the amortization plan. Why would that not be good business for farmers as well as for the British government? The British Government had their debts to the United States spread over a term of sixty years recently, and they are recognized as the best financiers in the world. What is our own government doing? It is not trying to pay off its debts in five years. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company, in fact all big companies, borrow money over a long term of years, and there is no possibility to-day of farmers being able to pay their debts off in a short term of years. Recently the Canadian Pacific set an example which shows some real appreciation of actual conditions in western Canada. They announced that they were calling in some 30,000 contracts outstanding with western farmers to whom they had sold land on a short term payment plan at 8 per cent interest. They are re-writing the contracts to extend over a period of thirty-four years on the amortization plan, where the interest and principle combined will not exceed 7 per cent. This is a lead for other big companies like the Hudson's Bay Company and many others that have made colossal fortunes out of Canada. Land mortgage companies and financial institutions that have big reserves, having put many people into a position out of which it is impossible for them to get, should compromise with them and make it possible for them to stay on their land. Most of this trouble has been caused by the aftermath of war, by uncontrollable conditions, and in war time we compromised with some of these companies and readjusted their bargains. Take the case of the Crowsnest pass agreement which was cancelled for a term.

The railways found out that they were up against uncontrollable, unexpected costs, and the position was compromised and rightly so. I do not know why the small man should not receive as fair treatment as the big corporation receives. I suggest that the government should take cognizance of the advice given recently by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean), and put the fear of God into some of these companies, if they will not voluntarily compromise with these men, if, rather than compromise, they will drive men out of the country. The Shylocks have had their day, and workmen and ordinary business men have had impossible conditions exacted of them. I hope the government will deal fairly and courageously with all sections and not permit these big corporations to jump on the farmers and reap the benefits of the compromise which the Canadian Pacific has made.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) told us the other day that he had faith in the intelligence and industry of our people; that he had faith in the people and faith in the resources of this Dominion. I would remind him that another authority said that "faith without works is dead." It is all right to have faith, but there has to be a little more than faith in order to get this mess cleaned up and things in working order again.

The Minister of Finance proposes to give bounties to companies manufacturing hemp and artifical silk, and also to the mining of copper. Non-resident capitalists can come into this country, get the ear of the government and secure big bounties. On the other hand, men who are resident in Canada and who have got into hard positions, cannot secure the ear of the government to receive any redress. These companies come into Canada, and without showing parliament that it is necessary for them to receive financial assistance in order that they may gain a footing, and make a success of their industry, they can secure a gift from the public treasury; they can get help. But we come here and present an irrefutable case, and yet we are not listened to. It is outrageous that this pernicious habit of doles to companies without their proving a good case before a committee of this House should continue. If an industry looks good to capital, capital will come and develop it. If it does not, capital will not come by bounties alone. This government proposes to put a bounty on copper of 9 per cent of the output. That would be equal to a bounty to of about 11 cents a bushel on wheat. Supposing we clamoured for a bounty of 11 cents a bushel on wheat, what would our Conservative and Liberal friends think? They would think that we were unsound, and they would be right. We do not want a bounty for ourselves, and we do not want it for the other fellow. What right has the government, when parliament is in session, to grant such a favour to any company? A matter of that kind should be considered in this House. The hemp industry proposes to establish a factory somewhere near Winnipeg and it is to get a bounty of $200,000 a year, extending over five years, on an investment of $5,000,000. Take a $5,000,000 investment by settlers coming on to the land: they will not get a $200,000 bounty; they have a penalty of more than $200,000 imposed upon the necessaries of life which they have to purchase before they can start. This penalty is not sliding down; it is climbing up for five years, and there should be a reversal of this business. The bounty should be given to the actual men on the land. When we went out West and got free homesteads, we had to live on the land. A non-resident could not get a free homestead. Therefore, the actual settlers in this country, the actual citizens of Canada, should receive preference, if any preference is to be given. I do not ask for preference, but I do not want the other fellow to get it.

We Progressives have received lately from different quarters of the House a great deal of advice about how to manage our business. When men propose to give advice, they will surely be sporty enough to take a little. I wish to advise the hon gentlemen on the treasury benches that their stock has gone down greatly in our estimation. Last year a plea was made for a little patience; we were asked to give the government a little time because they had undertaken a very intricate task, and new men were on the job who were faced with many difficulties. Last year's budget was claimed to be a step in the right direction, the inference being, of course, that when this budget was brought down we could reasonably expect a further step along the same line. Alas, however, it has been a step backwards. To-day we are convinced that the grand old Liberal party is simply a replica of the party as it was constituted in 1911, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier, that grand old statesman attempted to give us a fair and generous reciprocity measure. At that time Sir Wilfrid and the country found that there were wolves in sheep's clothing in that party,—high protectionists, camouflaged Tories masquerading under false colours. The mask was torn off, and all the protectionists lined up in their own ranks, and defeated that measure, which would have been of inestimable value to this country, to the banks, the railways, the manufacturers, the labourers, the farmers and the professional men. The interests of the citizens of this country are all bound up together. To-day we have hard times, and hon. gentlemen to my right are charged by the people with a fair share of responsibility for this condition. The only difference I see between the two parties is that the Conservative party is true to false principles while the Liberal party is false to true principles. The people are tired of public men who make fair promises at election time and then do as little as possible to carry out those promises, through fear of some powerful interest. Canada is looking to-day for men like Mr. E. C. Drury, who will fight public evils in and out of office, and who dares to do right, refusing to compromise with wrong. Many good Liberals believe that their platform of 1919 is treated by this government merely as a scrap of paper, and respect for public men and members of parliament has not been enhanced in the public mind by this last budget. In conclusion, I want to tell my hon. friends across the Floor that I believe their term of office will be brief, because of their failure to implement their pledges.

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston): Knowing that there are quite a number of speakers to follow me and that this debate must terminate at a certain time, I shall make my remarks as short as possible and shall refer only to the budget. Following our principles as a party, we cannot support the amendment; therefore any remarks I have to offer will be confined to the budget. I have the same opinion as the last hon. member (Mr. Morrison) in regard to this statement of the Minister of Finance; I think it is altogether unsatisfactory and is not in keeping with the promises that his party has made. To me it seems to be nothing more than a political cenotaph of the party platform of 1919. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin), the Liberal member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) and the Liberal member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) have sealed the tomb of this old platform which is dead so far as the party is concerned. It is quite true that there is a voice, but it is only one lonely voice in the wilderness, preaching this old platform of 1919, and that comes from the distant land of Prince Edward Island. It is to be regretted that the budget has created a great gap, leaving I.O.U.'s for the future; we regret that we cannot settle our own accounts but are leaving a large amount of these promissory documents for the future generations to meet. The reasons given for this state of affairs have been general. It is perfectly true that conditions in Europe are largely responsible for business conditions throughout the world to-day. It is a matter for regret that peace does not exist between France and Germany and that the old struggle is still going on, so that the old spite will be aggravated and the dispute prolonged. In addition to this, Europe is to-day divided up into a large number of small states, and this policy can but protract the unrest and dissatisfaction that now exist. To my mind, we as a British race made a mistake in the peace that has been arrived at, for I think that we should have stuck to our policy of the supremacy of the British navy. I believe that the supremacy of the British navy is the best guarantee of peace that the world has ever had or will ever have, and we can only regret that to-day on the Pacific coast we have no authoritative voice. Chinese bandits may seize our citizens, detain them, and murder them, and we are speechless and even helpless, because, as a matter of fact, the British navy has no strength on the Pacific coast. Years ago, if such a thing had happened, Britain could have spoken with some authority, and a matter of this kind would have been settled very soon.

There is another matter of complaint which has been spoken of by many hon. members, and that is the present exodus of our citizens. We have passed through the Book of Genesis, built up the country, and made a confederation, and now it seems that we have reached the Book of Exodus. There is only one suggestion which appears to me to be practicable in this matter, and that is that the government should at once institute a bureau of information so that every settler going from Canada to the United States might be questioned as to his reasons for leaving the country. We should then know whether men were leaving on account of the lack of work or were going to the United States to secure higher wages. We might also secure information as to why men were coming to Canada from the United States. Our trade commissioners in other parts of the British Empire should be able to give us information as to why settlers from Great Britain and Ireland are going to Australia and New Zealand in preference to Canada. Knowing that these people are loyal to the Empire, and would not, except for some good reason, prefer one part of it to another, we naturally ask ourselves this question; is the practice which now prevails of moving motions in this House of Commons for the purposes of disbanding the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, of doing away with military training, and of curtailing our naval activities, having some effect on those people who would likely settle in this country? This question naturally suggests itself to our minds: Are we doing any good to the people who would like to come to Canada from the great heart of the Empire, by moving such motions in this House and having them appear on our order paper?

There is another cause of complaint which perhaps will have little weight with the government, and that is the matter of party pledges and promises to the people of this country. During the last election the workingman and the poor man were promised that they would have cheaper food. What has been the fact? Last year a reduction was made on cocoa and liquid medicines. This year, according to the member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) the government have gone one step further; they have reduced sugar somewhat, knowing that the price of sugar would jump away up beyond all expectation; but they have added to the liquid medicines. They have also given the workingmen and the poor people of the country an opportunity of buying brandy and sparkling wines at reduced prices. These fulfilments of the promises to the poor man are causing a great deal of complaint. There is no question that the prices of food to-day are not going down. In confirmation of this I may quote the prices of meats for 1921 and 1922 contained in tenders called for by a certain institution. In 1921 best breakfast bacon cost 30 cents; in 1922, 32 cents. In 1921 the best beef cost 16 cents; in 1922, 18 cents. In 1921 sausage cost 15 cents, and the same price prevailed in 1922. Smoked ham in 1921 cost 23 cents and in 1922, 28 cents. These prices are per pound, of course. These are merely a few instances; but if one goes through these lists it will be found that in nearly every case the price is up rather than down. So that the workingman has very little to be thankful for in last year's budget and in this.

There is another cause of complaint. We do not usually grumble about the cost if a suitable service is given in return; but unfortunately the money taken from the pockets of the people is not being returned in the shape of suitable service. The first complaint I shall refer to is in regard to agriculture—the expense of the tuberculin test. Nobody seems to get any benefit from this expenditure. No encouragement is given to the farmer who has his herds regularly tested in order to keep them free of tuberculosis, for he gets no better price for his milk than the farmer who does not trouble to have his cows tested. Money should be spent to ensure that every man who wishes to have his herd tested should get the benefit of this service.

Another source of complaint has already been referred to by a member from the government side, and that is the cost of special delivery of letters. I have many complaints in regard to this service. We pay heavy charges for the service and get very poor returns. When a man affixes a special delivery stamp on his letter he expects delivery will be made immediately the letter reaches the post office at the other end; but frequently delivery is not made for several hours afterwards, in many cases not much ahead of the regular delivery. These complaints are very general, and this service should be speeded up and be made what it purports to be—a special delivery service.

Complaint is also made regarding the large amount of money expended for military training. If we had adequate military training in return for this expenditure, well and good; but unfortunately we do not get anything like the proper equivalent, and I am surprised that the departmental officials informed the minister that last year's training was satisfactory. I know for a fact that it was not, and I may add that under present conditions it never will be satisfactory. Military training, to be of any use, should have two objects in view: first, to train the rank and file, and, second, to train a staff. Now, there is only one way in which you can train a staff, and that is by having training camps where all branches of the service are assembled. A properly trained staff is indispensable and during the late war we had to have British staff officers attached to our brigades and divisions to supply our deficiency in this branch. I am not advocating an increased expenditure, but I do not think we gain very much from our present local system of military training—a squadron of cavalry here and a battalion of infantry there. We should have in certain parts of the Dominion central training camps where all branches of the service would be brought together and where those of our officers who wish to go on staff service could get the necessary training. An efficient staff officer must have experience in every branch of the service, otherwise his training i incomplete and he cannot possibly measure up to the duties of his profession. We are certainly not getting an adequate return for the money we are spending to-day on military training, and I throw the suggestion out to the government that they should as soon as possible establish large camps where all branches of the service may be assembled and where officers may be properly trained for staff service.

I think the country is waking up to the fact that if we can do without cabinet ministers for three or four months while parliament is sitting, we can get along very well without them for the rest of the year. During the session cabinet ministers are required if at any time at all, and if we can go through a whole session without three or four cabinet ministers, surely the question must arise in the minds of the people: Are all these cabinet ministers required?

Changes in our income tax law have been suggested from time to time, and I propose to refer to one particular change which was suggested last session, but so far nothing has been done in the direction indicated. Under the income tax regulations a widow is granted exemption of $1,000 and a married woman $2,000. Why should such a difference exist? In many cases widows are continuing their homes and their household expenses are a heavy burden upon them, and there seems to be no reason why they should be discriminated against to the extent of $1,000. This matter was brought to the attention of the government last year, and I hope it will now be taken into consideration and both classes be placed on an equal basis.

Now, coming to reciprocity—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Hear, hear.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The hon. gentleman may not say "hear, hear" when he hears what I have to say, and that is that I am not at all in favour of reciprocity. I will tell you why. Reciprocity brings us into association with the United States in many ways, and I am going to point out how we have come under the influence of our neighbours to the south, and not always to our benefit. In our school system we have been dominated by the influence of the United States, and to-day the boy of poor parents is practically cut out from the technical courses. In my time a boy could take four years in medicine and graduate. In the past we have had some very, very successful physicians as the result of that four years' training. During the four years the boy was able to go out and earn money to put him through his course. Personally that was my experience. I had to put myself through college and earn the necessary money to do so. To-day the course takes six or seven years. This is altogether due to the influence of the United States, to our trying to imitate their system. With the lengthened course the term has also been extended so that the boy has very little opportunity of earning his expenses, and consequently the boys of poor parents are practically excluded from these branches of study—all because of the influence of the United States over our school system.

Then, too, we have come under the influence of the United States in the standardization of our hospitals. And what has it cost us? We have followed their advice under the Rockefeller Foundation and have built up hospitals according to their standardization. This has resulted in a very expensive system of hospitals, a system not at all intended for our use, a system where the poor man has to attend the public wards and take the doctors in those wards, and all simply to fulfil American ideas of standardization in hospitals.

In addition to that, our political and our social system have altogether been dominated by the United States, and to-day people are doing nothing else in towns but weighing and measuring babies to see if they come up to certain standards. This is a social service that is altogether due to the influence of the United States, and it is dominated by them. Lastly, I do not think that this country of ours is to be at all benefited by the moral influence which would come from the United States.

If you take eastern Ontario, for instance, they have had a great loss in their cheese and butter trade through the influence of the United States, and the high price which they at one time got for their cream has lately been cut down and the farmers are left drifting. In all these ways the United States has had an influence over us which has not been at all beneficial to us. I believe that we can go on by ourselves and build up our own trade without throwing our doors open to these people. Our position is not so bad as some people are crying it to be. The position of Canada to-day as a whole is not one that we need regret. If you look over the list of our products—I have taken only a few of them—in wheat, Canada is third in acreage, being headed by the United States and India only, and in production it takes the same place. In oats Canada is second in production, and the second in acreage. In potatoes we fall down a bit to seventh in acreage, and fifth in production. In live stock there are only three or four countries ahead of us in the number of horses raised, and the same with cattle. We have a field crop valued at over $1,400,000,000. Our manufactures amount each year to over $3,000,000,000. We have live stock amounting to over $1,000,000,000.

That is a condition that we need not cry about. It is a very successful condition, and I do not know if our friends to my left—I am not offering any criticism of the group system; I do not go that far; if the group system will benefit us, well and good, let it come—but this is a general condition of the country that I do not think our friends to my left could improve on if they were in power. All told we have a condition that is very favourable, and I have confidence in the future. Like the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond), my confidence is largely in the people that we have. We must have confidence in our people. The people who are building up this country have never failed in any crisis, neither has the stock they sprang from ever failed in the past. Even when almost hopelessly beaten, with their faces to the foe and their backs to the wall they determined never to give up but to go on. The blood stream of this people is coming, and has come, from the centre of the great Empire to which we belong. Their hopes in that Empire are ours; their ideals are ours, and the hope of the future lies in a strong connection with that same blood stream, no matter whether it is found in Great Britain or Ireland, in Australia or New Zealand, in India, Africa or the isles of the sea. We need no other reciprocity than a strong confidence in that race and a strong connection in the future with that race.

I have confidence also in that other great race in this country, the French-Canadian. I have just as strong a confidence in the courage and the bravery of that race. History has never shown them to be thoroughly beaten. They proved their patriotism at Chateauguay and other scenes of struggle. In the Great War it was my experience to have about fifty or sixty of these French-Canadians in my unit, and I well remember that Sunday night in the middle of the gas attack when these men who belonged to the transport column of my unit and had no reason whatever to place themselves in the front rank, came to me and said, "Here, all our stretcher bearers are about finished. Will you give us a chance?" Fifteen or sixteen of them went up to the front as stretcher bearers and before morning five of them were dead, two of them died within twelve hours, and the rest were shot to pieces. With an experience of that kind one can well have confidence in these two great races making a country of which we shall all some day be very proud.

Mr. J. G. ROBICHAUD (Gloucester): In rising, Mr. Speaker, to continue this debate it is not my intention to add very extensively to what has already been said. I am rather inclined to express the wish that we should end this long debate and get down to the real business of the country with all possible speed. For the past four months apart from looking after the best interests of my constituents, a task which in itself was not such an easy one, I have endeavoured to follow the debates of this House in detail. I have thus been more of a looker-on than a participant in our deliberations, and at times, Mr. Speaker, I was inclined to believe that from some sections of this House there was more talk than real action. It is for this reason that I shall refrain from any lengthy discussion at this stage.

I am very sorry that the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is not in his seat for I wanted to avail myself of this opportunity to congratulate him on the great wisdom he has shown in the preparation of this budget. Few men in this country can command in the same degree the admiration and confidence of the nation. He is a man with long years of experience. He has had a long life which he has devoted to the best interests of this country, and I can only wish him a still long and happy career filled with all the joys and contentment that could be wished for him.

In sizing up the political situation in this country there is one movement which gives rise to a great deal of speculation, and that is the political movement of our friends directly opposite—the Progressives. As a new member of this House I feel, Mr. Speaker, that I should be open to conviction in so far as the best interests of our country are concerned. To a young man brought up in the democratic atmosphere of Liberalism the prima facie evidence adduced by our highly educated friends has been somewhat seductive But, Sir, the more I study the political policies enunciated by our friends the more I become convinced of the futility of their efforts. I am ready to recognize the high and noble aspirations that prompt the efforts of our friends of the Progressive party. They certainly mean well; but unfortunately for themselves, and for the vast interests which they represent, it would appear to me that their actions are ill-advised and the manner in which they propose to carry out their object is somewhat inconsistent with the end in view. They have repeatedly told us of the conditions which prevail in the western provinces. Well, to a large extent we are ready to admit the truth of what they say, but the remedy does not lie in adopting the programme which they propose, but rather in adhering to sound national policies, policies thought out by the men who have seen the growth of this nation in all its phases. Sir, we want in this country of ours that spirit of nationhood which is so essential in the building up of a new country. We cannot permit class legislation. Whatever course we may pursue in our deliberations it must be one that is in the best interests of the nation as a whole. It is all very well to express an opinion on the present economic difficulties in Canada, but surely there is no reason for shouting from the housetops that blue ruin is at our door. Pessimists and quitters have been too free in their gloomy expressions. If I wanted to draw an exaggerated picture of the conditions in the Maritime provinces I would have no difficulty whatever in out-rivalling some of my extreme friends opposite. But, Sir, were I to do that I should be paying scant justice to the courage and the energy of the people of that part of Canada. The population of those provinces is endowed with more courage and more resourcefulness than any other people that I know of. Descending as they do from the pioneers who have experienced the hardships of primitive conditions in this country, that sturdy Scotch blood of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, the industrious loyalists of New Brunswick, as well as that nucleus of the French race, the Acadians, of the Maritime provinces, would not flinch from the difficulties of the hour. We have confidence in the future of our country, we believe that its prosperity is sure. We may be mistaken but we feel that the time is not ripe for any drastic change in our national policy.

Our friends directly opposite have suggested a great many reforms in order to relieve our national troubles which, if put into practice, would inevitably kill the very object they have in view. In other words, it seems to me that the remedy they propose would be worse than the disease. It is not the first time in our history that conditions have been admittedly unsatisfactory. Prior to the year 1896 there existed in Canada a condition of affairs which was none too good. There was a distinct period of depression. The ship of state was grounded and its crew, many of whom were in the state of mutiny, were leisurely awaiting the rising tide to refloat it. Happily the people realized the seriousness of the situation and handed over the administration of national affairs to the Liberal party under the direction of the late lamented Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The change of government was soon followed by a change for the better throughout the country. Throughout the length and breadth of Canada a revival of business took place and such an expansion of trade, such a growth of population and settlement that before long two new provinces had to be created. Soon after the late war conditions again changed for the worse. In 1921 Canada again experienced conditions similar to those which existed in 1896. Once more the ship of state was found to be badly equipped and its boatswain sleeping at the rudder. But to-day we are once more feeling the benefits of a change of government and under the Liberal regime we are proceeding again on the road to prosperity.

Sir, if the trade of the nation is in any way indicative of prosperity may I be permitted to quote a few figures showing that we are regaining our former prosperous position as a country. In the fiscal year ending March 31, 1922, largely in consequence of policies pursued by the Conservatives, our imports amounted to $747,804,300. For the fiscal year ending March 31, 1923, however, those imports had increased to $802,465,000, an increase over the year 1922 of $54,660,700. For the year 1922 our exports amounted to $740,240,700 as against a total of $931,451,400 for 1923, an increase for the latter year of $191,210,700, or a total increase in the business of the country for 1923 as compared with 1922 of some $245,871,400. In other words our trade has increased during the last year by almost twenty per cent as compared with the previous twelve months. The expansion of trade for the year 1923, over that of 1922, was larger than the total business of Canada for the year 1896-7 by some $15,000,000. Furthermore, taking the first month of the present fiscal year we find that our imports for that month, the month of April, reached the figure of $68,181,300, as against $47,695,400 for the same month of 1922, an increase of over $20,000,000. Our exports have increased in the same proportion. For the month of April 1922, our exports amounted to $31,917,500, and our exports for April last amounted to $53,642,250, or an increase for April 1923 over April 1922 of $21,724,750. Thus we see that the increase in Canada's external trade for the last month over the corresponding month of the previous year was some $42,210,650 or an increase of over fifty per cent. Furthermore it will be seen by these figures that in 1921 there was a balance of trade against us of sixty million dollars. In 1922 the balance of trade against us was reduced to seven million dollars, and in 1923, our last fiscal year, the balance of trade was converted into a balance in our favour of some $131,000,000.

Mr. Speaker, these figures of Canada's trade do not show any sign of hardship. There is no reason to be alarmed when we can present such a prospectus of the business of this country, when you can show that for the first month of our fiscal year the business of the country had increased by some 50 per cent. Now I want to show there is no reason for alarm and that, perhaps, we have been subjected to a little too much pessimism on the part of our friends. I wish to read a portion of an article from the Ottawa Journal of 4th May last. This article deals with the Banking and Commerce committee. As the report of this committee has not yet been presented, I shall refrain from dealing with it, but if the House will permit me, I will read a portion of this article. It says:

> No good comes from ignoring facts. But what is the sense of magnifying evils, of arguing from the exceptional, of refusing to see things as a whole? It is true that we are passing through a depression. It is true that agriculture is being hit. But will anybody hold that we are not better off than most of the rest of the world, that labor and industry and agriculture in Canada are not as prosperous, as in most other countries? In Europe, nations are dogged by shadows; turbulence, economic dislocation, debt and impoverishment are their lot. In Canada we know little of such hardships. We have social and industrial tranquility our trade is reviving; our reconstruction problems diminish; there is a minimum of unemployment. Why, then, should we permit a few individuals, whom fortuitous circumstances have brought into Parliament, to keep shouting "wolf," or the summoning of witnesses before special committees to tell the world that our economic structure is trembling?

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this is only a fair statement to make on the present situation. I am not quite in love with the long deliberations of the committee on Banking and Commerce, I believe the generosity of the government in this respect has been abused by those of my hon. friends opposite who have been instrumental in all these long deliberations. I think after all we should trust to the wisdom and sagacity of the party of whom I am a supporter.

It affords a great deal of satisfaction, Mr. Speaker, to hear the announcement made in the budget speech of the reduction of the British preferential tariff, especially when we consider that, from this reduction, special preferment has been given to Canadian ports. This is a case of obtaining something for what we give. This was one of the fundamental principles underlying the reciprocity pact of 1911, and in my humble judgment this principle should form the very basis of our national policy. The announcement that negotiations were already on foot with a view to another reciprocity treaty with the United States has been received with a great deal of satisfaction. Our friends opposite would like to have us tear down our tariff walls without getting anything in return. While it is true that by that policy some immediate relief would result in some sections of the country, we must not lose sight of the fact that Canada must have access to the markets of the world. This is the one essential point that must be borne in mind in the revision of our fiscal policy. Trade negotiations have become a factor of the greatest importance, and I sincerely express the hope that they will be adhered to for generations to come. Suppose, for instance, that one of our western farmers, or a farmer in this province, for example, woke up one morning to find the fences dividing his farm from that of his neighbour so constructed as to allow the neighbour's herds to pass to his farm and pasture, so that they could graze in his pasture with the farmer's own herd, and that there would be no possibility of the herds passing to the other farm and, of course, no chance of the farmer receiving reciprocal advantages; would not the farmer who was placed in that position consider it a very unjust state of affairs? I do not believe he would tolerate it. With this Canada of ours, with the large imaginary boundary between our country and the large country to the south of us. I believe that we must establish some sort of a treaty, or business arrangement, by which we can have access to the markets of the immense population of that country. Our geographical situation is a unique one. We cannot compare our situation, as has been done by my hon. friends at the other end of the room, with that of the British Empire. Others have tried to compare our situation with that of Australia. While our industries may resemble one another, yet there is this one inevitable reason why we should establish a different national policy; there is our geographical situation. It has been known that the trade of a country can hardly move from east to west, but there is a natural tendency for traffic and immigration to move from north to south. Therefore, all those circumstances have to be overcome and we must adhere to the national policy of the country, a policy such as has been established in Canada.

I desire to crave the indulgence of this House in expressing my view in regard to Canadian sea ports on which I have already made some remarks in connection with the British preference. The hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Kellner) the other day had a dream. He undoubtedly was dreaming about an era of prosperity in Canada, and in his dream he inquired of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) as to the possibility of opening up new ports in eastern Canada in view of the announcement made in the budget speech. There are times when dreams come true, and if there was the realization of one dream which would be for the benefit of the Canadian nation as a whole, it would be the realization of that part of my hon. friend's dream which conveyed his mind to the Atlantic seaboard of Canada. We have on the Atlantic coast several natural ports awaiting development. We have at the entrance of the Bay of Fundy several ports which are still undeveloped. I was going to dwell quite extensively on those ports; but I was glad when I came to my seat the other day, to find that the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Grimmer) had discussed the very point which I had intended to bring before the House. I can assure my hon. friend that I heartily concur in everything he said. The development of ports on both the eastern and the western coasts of Canada should constitute a part of our national policy. There is in my constituency, the constituency of Gloucester one of the finest seaports on the Atlantic, situated as it is at the entrance to the Baie des Chaleurs and at the terminus of the Caraquet railway, a line that is now owned and operated by the state, the harbour of Shippigan offers splendid facilities for development.

Many hon. members have said that the Hudson Bay scheme should be adhered to. While I admit that the accomplishment of this scheme would be to the great benefit of the western farmer, provided always that this scheme could be made feasible, yet I must impress upon this government the importance of giving this matter all due consideration. In view of the fact that it would involve navigation in the icy waters of Hudson bay, I am of opinion that this scheme is too dangerous for our nation to indulge in. If the farmers of the West consider the disadvantages of the Hudson Bay scheme, they will soon find that they have nothing to gain, In the first place I am told that the expenditure of vast sums of money would be required to construct that part of the road which is not yet completed. If we consider the great amount of money which this country would have to invest in the building of such a road; if we reckon the interest on that amount; if we add to this the cost of equipment and maintenance, the cost of improving the harbours in Hudson bay, the extra cost of vessels specially built to navigate the icy waters of Hudson bay, the extra ocean freight rates and—this is a most important item for our friends of the West—the extra insurance which they would have to pay on their shipments; if all these extra costs to be borne by our farmers and the extra expenditure of money which would be necessary on the part of the government are put together and given to the western farmer in the shape of a reduction in freight rates as against the high rates; if the farmers were to consider the expenses of the other route. I believe that, after all, it would be seen that it would pay the wheat grower of western Canada to ship by way of eastern harbours.

Someone may tell us that our harbours cannot handle the western wheat; that the equipment in eastern harbours will be inadequate to handle such immense quantities of wheat. As I have already said, we have on the Atlantic coast numerous harbours which are still undeveloped. Montreal and Quebec already have up-to-date equipment, and during the summer time they can handle a great deal of freight. Halifax and St. John also have splendid facilities for shipment. Why should we plunge into such a scheme as the establishment of a Hudson bay route?—a route, which, after all, could be used for only five or six weeks, possibly two months at the utmost with convenience, and perhaps, in the face of exceedingly uncontrollable difficulties, for three or four months of the year? As against this project, if our eastern harbours are inadequate, we can use some of our undeveloped harbours, and while I am speaking of these harbours, I want to put before this government the advantages offered by the port of Shippigan. In the first place, there would be very little if any construction of new railways; these would only consist of spur lines to deep water terminus. The road is already built and it is operated by the state. Little or no dredging is required. There will be found in that locality plenty of labour at a low rate; the insurance is not high, and this harbour offers the shortest possible route to the European coast.

To show this House that this scheme has been long thought of, I want to read an extract from the report of our famous national engineer Sir Sandford Fleming, a report which dates as far back as 1865 or two years prior to confederation. This report is a fairly lengthy one, and it deals very extensively with the different proposed routes to the European market. As regards the port of Shippigan, Sir Sandford Fleming says in part:

Under these circumstances, it is too apparent that the Intercolonial railway may find in the United States route a formidable rival for Canadian passenger traffic to and from Europe, by way of Halifax.

It will be noted here that at that particular time the question of passenger transportation was one which was receiving the most careful attention of our statesmen, and there was speculation as to whether the port of Halifax would be used, or whether American ports would be resorted to. The report continues:

Fortunately, with a view to counteract this difficulty, a line by the Bay Chaleurs would offer special advantages, which may here be noticed. The chart which accompanies this will show that the entrance to the Bay Chaleurs is so situated, geographically, that while it is about as near Europe as the entrance to Halifax Harbour, it is, at the same time, several hundred miles nearer Montreal and all points west of that city.

Some of the projected lines of railway touch the Bay Chaleurs at Dalhousie and at Bathurst; the latter place is not admitted to be suitable for the purposes of steam navigation, and the former, although in possession of a fine sheet of water, well sheltered and accessible at all conditions of the tide, is, nevertheless, from its position at the extreme westerly end of the Bay, farther inland than might be wished. In order to reduce the steamship passage to a minimum, it is desirable to have the point of embarkation as far easterly as possible, and, therefore, the existence of a commodious harbor near the entrance of the Bay is of no little importance. A place named Shippigan—

It will be recalled that in those days Shippigan was hardly on the map; to-day it is a fishing port with a population of some 5,300 persons.

A place named Shippigan, on the southerly side of the entrance of the Bay Chaleurs, appears to have many of the requisites of a good harbor. It is thus spoken of in the reports on the Sea and River Fisheries of New Brunswick, published under the authority of the legislature of that province.

Great Shippigan Harbor

This spacious harbor is formed between Shippigan and Pooksoudie Island and the mainland. It comprises three large and commodious harbors; first, the great inlet of Lameque, in Shippigan Island, the depth of water into which is from four to six fathoms; second, the extensive and well-sheltered sheet of water called St. Simon's Inlet, the channel leading to which, between Pookshoudie Island and the main is one mile in width, with seven fathoms water from side to side. The principal entrance from the Bay Chaleur has not less than five fathoms on the bar—

I may point out here that this is the only bar at the entrance of Shippigan harbour, at which at low tide there is five fathoms of water. To continue:

The principal entrance from the Bay Chaleurs has not less than five fathoms on the bar, inside which, within the harbor, there are six and seven fathoms, up to the usual loading place in front of Messrs Moore and Harding's steam saw mill at the village; from thence to the gully, there is about three fathoms of water only.

This is a small entrance to the eastern side of Shippigan harbour and it is used only by our fishermen with their small craft. The main entrance is on the western side, leading into the entrance of the Bay of Chaleur.

Vessels within the harbor of Shippigan have good anchorage, are quite safe with every wind, and can load in the strongest gale. The rise and fall of the tide is about seven feet.

"The noble haven called St. Simon's Inlet, the shores of which are almost wholly unsettled and in a wilderness state, runs several miles into the land, maintaining a good depth of water almost to its western extremity.

Duncan McNeil, an old pilot, frequently employed on the government steamers, when calling at New Brunswick ports, describes Shippigan as a good harbor, with plenty of water, regular soundings and tough blue clay holding ground, indeed where vessels would be perfectly secure in any storm. He says that he could take a ship of heavy draught into it in any weather, by night or by day; that in dirty or dark weather, he would go entirely by the lead.

Of course, these are the views of an oldtime mariner and it is not likely that the lead would be used nowadays; they follow gas buoys and other modern signals.

Others describe Shippigan Harbor as unobjectionable. The Admiralty Chart seems to agree in the main with the descriptions above given; it shows that the area of the basin, embracing only the water over the three-fathom line at low tide, is about two and a half square miles; a sheet about double the size of Halifax Harbor between St. George Island and the narrows to Bedford Basin. The only objectionable feature seems to be the channel at the entrance, which is about three miles long, to the basin, a little crooked, and at present without leading marks.

As I have pointed out, the engineers make mention of the eastern entrance, but that is used only by our fishermen.

It is, however, about half a mile in width, free from all obstructions, the depth varying from five to nine fathoms at low water. There is good warning by the lead in the channel and the approaches to it.

It would appear from the above, therefore, that Shippigan Sound presents a favourable opportunity for forming a traffic connection between the Intercolonial Railway and Ocean Steamers.

As to the geographical situation of the harbour, I have already stated that it is situated at the terminus of the Caraquet and Gulf Shore railway, which now forms a part of the Intercolonial. The distance from Shippigan to Liverpool via Belle Isle is 2,318 miles, whereas the distance from Halifax to the same point by Cape Race is 2,466 miles, or a difference in favour of Shippigan by the Strait of Belle Isle, of more than 148 miles; and via Cape Race from Shippigan, the distance being 2,493 miles, there is a difference of 27 miles in favour of Halifax. As against these ocean distances we find that Shippigan harbour is situated 419 miles from Quebec whereas Halifax is 685 miles from that point, or a difference of 266 miles. The report then goes on to show the distance between Halifax and points west via Bangor, Maine, but I do not believe that these routes are utilized at the present time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have adopted a national railway policy and I believe that we should observe its real intent and purpose. Our railways cannot be made to pay if they are used to divert traffic to other roads and to foreign ports.

This question of seaports suggests to my mind something else. It has been said that the Fordney-McCumber tariff has rendered the market of some 110,000,000 people inaccessible to our fishermen in regard to many varieties of fish. Furthermore, consequent upon the removal of certain war-time measures, our American friends have closed their ports tight to our fishing vessels, also as a direct result of the Fordney-McCumber tariff our dried fish are excluded from the Porto Rico market. We in the Maritime provinces have some $20,000,000 invested in the fishing industry, and many thousand families depend upon the industry for a livelihood. Our situation is somewhat abnormal at the present time, but if we are to outlive these difficulties we must guard our industries against protected competition. I have no desire to call for drastic measures against our American friends, but I feel that the time is now opportune for the revocation of the modus vivendi which was established in 1880.

Conditions in the Maritime provinces are not perhaps just as we would like them to be to-day. Of course we deprecate irresponsible talk of secession, but, after all, this talk is caused by unrest, and I believe we should adhere, in so far as the status of the Maritime provinces is concerned, to the provisions of the British North America Act; in other words, I believe the terms of confederation should be held sacred in the shrine of this nation. It is only in this way that we can hope to maintain the firmness of our aspirations, the integrity of our manners and customs, and joy and felicity of our social life.

Mr. L. W. HUMPHREY (West Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I feel it is my duty to contribute a few remarks to this debate. First, because otherwise I would be remiss in my duty to my constituents; secondly, on account of several questions that have been disposed of by this House and to which I might be considered as tacitly assenting; and thirdly, on account of the geographical position of my constituency, I think a better understanding will result by my bringing to the notice of the House some of the local conditions, and thereby I shall be doing a duty not only to my constituency but to the Dominion at large.

[Mr. Robichaud.]

I wish to associate myself with all the complimentary remarks that have been extended to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). As a young member of this House I can say that he commands the highest esteem and respect of every member, and I trust that he may be long spared to enjoy the comforts and pleasures of this life which he has so well earned and is so abundantly entitled to.

Since becoming a member of this House I have felt that there is perhaps a lack of knowledge in the eastern and central provinces regarding the westerly provinces. I am strongly of opinion that every member should have as intimate a knowledge as possible of the whole Dominion, but particularly of the far westerly provinces, because many times in 5 p.m. the course of debate in this House I have been struck by the fact that some members did not fully understand the conditions that exist in the far West. Perhaps this is because a good many people in the East have not had the opportunity of visiting the West; on the other hand, a large percentage of the population of British Columbia, for instance, is made up of those who originally lived in the East, and through business and holiday trips to their old homes they are fairly conversant with conditions in the other provinces. Therefore, I feel that it is the duty of every representative in this parliament to give the closest personal study to conditions throughout the whole Dominion.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps a few of the remarks I am about to make may be in a somewhat different tone from those of my good friends with whom I am associated, but in what I am going to say I believe I shall express the sentiments of my constituents. I shall speak in a somewhat optimistic vein, but this optimism I hope to demonstrate is well-founded and I trust my remarks will not be considered as in any way too provincial or too sectional. In reviewing for a moment a few of the assets and resources of British Columbia I wish to emphasize their diversity. It has been many times expressed in this corner of the House that the West is entirely a wheat-growing country. This, of course, applies in great measure to the prairie provinces, and while we all recognize the vast importance of the wheat production of the West, we must also realize that the province of British Columbia contributes its share of the national wealth in other forms. We in British Columbia are fully aware of the unsatisfactory conditions existing in Canada to-day, particularly in respect to agriculture, and believing that the producer and the consumer have very much in common, it is the wish of the people in my constituency to co-operate as far as we possibly can to bring about legislation that will be beneficial to both, and at the same time develop our national resources for the benefit of the Dominion as a whole.

Let me review very briefly some of the assets of the province of British Columbia. We have a wonderful climate, fertile land, minerals, timber and fishing resources, water powers and many other assets that go to make up not only a farming but an industrial province—not forgetting the seaport of Vancouver that is available for shipping the year round. Although the per capita debt is very high I feel sure that 99 per cent of our population are looking forward to the future with every confidence and a spirit of hope, and they are ready and willing to co-operate with the other provinces of the Dominion with a view to making Canada more prosperous and a better country in every way.

I would like to touch on a few features of national legislation. The statement has been made in this House that the British Columbia members are a unit on all questions that arise here pertaining to British Columbia. That is quite true in some cases, but not in all. The one topic on which the members for British Columbia are unanimous is the question of Asiatic immigration, or the exclusion of orientals. This is a question that has already been passed upon by this House, which has given assent to a bill affecting the immigration of Asiatics, and I know that that action will meet with the approval of the people of British Columbia. I believe as do all other British Columbians that it is a step in the right direction, one that will lead eventually to the exclusion of Asiatics.

Before going on to discuss the budget, I should like to refer very briefly to some of the questions that pertain particularly to the province of British Columbia. There have been quite a number of questions discussed in this House and bills passed, and at times it has been impossible for the members from the different provinces to be present in the House and take part in all the discussions. In that way one may perhaps be taken as having given silent assent to the legislation that has been passed and to the disposal of these questions, whereas if one had been in the House he would have been able to explain the position he takes on any question on behalf of the district he represents. British Columbia, particularly the district I represent, is a mountainous country, and our towns and cities and villages are situated at varying altitudes, some as high as five and six thousand feet, others at an altitude of one thousand or twelve hundred feet; but being situated in the heart of the Rockies we are labouring under difficulties that differ from those of other parts of the Dominion, particularly the prairie provinces. For the past few years the federal government have seen fit to give aid to the provinces in the building of highways, the aid being given in proportion to the population of the province. The aid that has been given in that respect has been welcomed by the province of British Columbia. It has been a means of opening up and developing the province, providing better communication perhaps than could be had by railways. It has enabled the province to build highways that will eventually connect up with our national highway. It has been of great advantage to the farming community, and particularly to those settled in the outlying districts. This federal aid has now been eliminated, and I wish to urge upon the government that every consideration possible should be given to assisting the province of British Columbia in this regard. I understand that some provinces have not used up their quota of money provided for this purpose, but British Columbia's quota was used up some time ago, and the federal aid that has been given has proved of great assistance particularly in opening up a southern international road extending to the boundary line and the state of Washington. This was referred to, I believe, last year by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie). In respect to the action taken by the electors in that district I can only say that although the plans and specifications for that particular highway were not sent on to Ottawa in time to receive the federal assistance, nevertheless the province has taken upon itself to go ahead and complete that highway. It is expected to be opened up this year and will connect up with many other roads in that district and provide communication into other parts of the province. While on this point I should like to refer to the remarks made by the hon. member for New Westminster in this connection last year. I am sorry he is not in his seat. In his remarks in the budget debate the hon. member for New Westminster referred to certain action taken by the electors of Revelstoke and Nelson and went on to say in Hansard, 1922, p. 2238:

> They absolutely bribed the electors of that country. I do not like to go too far. There are a lot of other things I could say in this connection but I will let things go just as they are as to this particular matter.

I resent those words of the hon. member for New Westminster. As the representative of that district I feel that the electors in the vicinity of Nelson and in the vicinity of Revelstoke have not at any time been bribed upon any question. I believe they are perfectly capable of judging on the merits of each question as it arises, and that they are competent to judge for themselves. I resent the suggestion of the hon. member that they are capable of being bribed.

I would like to refer for a moment to Bill No. 43, an act to amend the Canada Temperance Act. I wish to dissociate myself from the views expressed upon that question by my hon. friends to my right. I was unable to be present when the discussion on this bill took place, a measure which affects the entire province of British Columbia, but speaking for my own particular district, I believe the people there will commend the action of this House in passing that measure. The people of British Columbia have already decided to place the handling of the liquor question in the hands of the provincial authorities; and the residents of my district, particularly the farmers and labouring classes, feel that any legislation that will assist in curtailing the illegitimate sale of intoxicating liquors will be a step in the right direction.

British Columbia is a young province and its population is, as yet, very small. Therefore I think public sentiment in that province favours a policy of immigration. I can only speak for my own district and public opinion there is in favour of immigration, because in that part of the province there is a great deal of fertile land available for settlement. In that connection I may be asked whether the present condition of the fruit growers of British Columbia is satisfactory. As far as my knowledge goes that condition is not as good as it might be but I believe that matters will right themselves shortly and that the fruit growers will work out a system that will be beneficial to themselves and to the consumers in other parts of the Dominion. In the district which I represent there is an abundance of good land available for settlement, and there are many openings and opportunities for settlers. I should explain that the fruit growers do not confine themselves exclusively to farming or fruit growing but extend their activities in other directions. They will, I think, before long be working under more settled conditions, and a sagacious policy of immigration will be welcomed by them as likely to promote the settlement of the vacant lands and aid in the further development of the province. The machinery necessary is already in existence in the Kootenay district. Railway communication has been provided, there are good opportunities for settlers, and a sane and sound policy of immigration will undoutedly be productive of the best results.

It is unfortunate that in the discussions that have so far taken place here this session no reference, or very little, has been made to questions affecting our returned men. Last session a special committee was appointed by the House to deal with these matters, and I believe such action met with the approval of the country as a whole. During the recess a royal commission was appointed to investigate and report upon many complaints in regard to the treatment of the ex-service men. That commission has reported on certain phases of the inquiry, and has made a number of recommendations. Nevertheless a feeling of dissatisfaction exists throughout the country. I believe the case of the ex-service men should be seriously considered by this House and such action taken as the facts call for. In view of the prevailing discontent in the country, not only on the part of the ex-service men but in the mind of the public as a whole, I deem it desirable to place on record one or two resolutions. I deem this to be only an act of justice to the organizations that have forwarded them. For example I have here a resolution forwarded by The Canadian Legion, Victoria Post, No. 1, Victoria, B. C. which reads as follows:

> Whereas since the sittings of the Royal Commission on Pensions, the Pension Board has, if possible, acted in a more arbitrary and unfair manner than ever before, and whereas many deserving cases have been refused pensions or other relief asked for:
> And whereas it is creditably reported that it is the avowed intention of the Pension Board to challenge the report of the Royal Commission;
>
> And whereas such an attitude shows a total failure to appreciate the extent of the wrongs being committed against ex-service men and further is contrary to the spirit and intention of the Pension Act;
>
> Resolved that this meeting of the ex-service men do most strongly resent and protest against the attitude of the Pension Board generally, and more particularly in regard to its avowed intention to challenge the report of the Royal Commission.
>
> Resolved that the protest entered by the secretary of the Dominion Alliance at Ottawa against the present actions of the Pension Board be and is hereby fully endorsed.
>
> Resolved further that in the opinion of this meeting the chairman and members of the Pension Board should resign and persons capable and willing to administer the act fairly and justly be appointed in their place subject to some proper control.
> Resolved further that copies of this resolution be sent to the members of parliament for British Columbia at Ottawa, and to all federal cabinet ministers.

The foregoing resolution is dated Victoria, B. C., May 10, 1923. I believe it has been the desire of the people of Canada as a whole that the Pension Commissioners should consider honestly and fairly the cases of ex-service men presented to them and that they should administer the Pension Act in a fair and equitable manner. From my own observations I conclude the returned men are justified in the protests they are making.

Speaking of those returned men from my own district, they want nothing but what is right and fair; they wish to be re-established under the provisions of the act passed by this parliament and to be given a fair show. But, on the other hand, if we find upon investigation that we have a board of pension commissioners who are not administering that act according to the intention of the members of this House and the members of the different committees that amended the act, I feel that it is the duty of the House to make thorough investigation and take whatever action is necessary to provide a board of pension commissioners that will administer the act honestly, fearlessly and according to the intentions of those who were instrumental in framing that act. I do not bring out that point with the intention of prejudicing the Board of Pension Commissioners, but in a spirit of absolute honesty and sincerity. I bring this point to the notice of the House with the view of impressing it upon the members in such a way that, after the results of this commission are brought to the attention of hon. members, they may understand the seriousness of the question and give it every consideration.

Passing on for a moment to a particular question that appertains to the district I represent, I ask, Mr. Speaker, the privilege of again referring to a sectional point. I wish to commend the government on the action taken in the district I represent in regard to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. In the past few months the government has seen fit to withdraw the mounted police from my district, and I believe I am voicing the sentiments of 95 per cent of the people of that district in expressing myself as I do. There have been one or two protests—one particular protest—entered against the action of the government in that connection, and I take this opportunity of explaining the position of the people I represent in that connection. It has only been in the last few years that it has seemed necessary to maintain a force of mounted police in that district. For many years, in fact since confederation, the point of having mounted police in the interior districts was not considered, and it was only within the last few years that they have been established at those points. The people of those districts have always considered, in common with many others throughout the Dominion, that it was an unnecessary expense and an overlapping of service, and that they were absolutely unnecessary. I am glad to see that this government has seen fit to recognize that contention. In that connection I would like to explain my own position and to voice the opinion of those whom I represent in this House. A telegram which was sent by the Board of Trade of Nelson, British Columbia, and was published in the press and otherwise, reads as follows:

> Advised orders have been given to close immediately Nelson office Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and that office now stationed here will be removed. Members of this board strogly protest against proposed action being taken. The Dominion police have rendered excellent service throughout this district. Opening of the international thoroughfare south, increased mining activities and presence of professional agitators make it of great importance that local force be maintained. Trust orders will be rescinded and police retained.

I think it is my duty as the representative of that district to explain to this House and to the government some points in regard to that telegram which was sent to the press. I wish to resent the wording of it, and to state that I am thoroughly in accord with the increased mining activity and the opening of the international thoroughfare south, but I cannot agree—and I think the parties sending the telegram are wrongly advised in so stating—that there are present in the district any professional agitators. I do not know whether the parties sending this telegram were referring to labour or not, but I can honestly say, from my knowledge of that district, being thoroughly acquainted with the conditions as they exist at the present time, that I know of no professional agitators there. As far as the labourers are concerned, there is no better regulated body of men in the Dominion than in that district. We have no labour troubles, and I can sincerely say that I think the country is entirely free from any professional agitators. Being a representative of labour I feel that it is my duty to explain the position.

I would like to refer for a moment to one item in the budget before making my position clear. That is in connection with the action taken by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in regard to providing a cent and a half per pound bounty for copper products. As the minister said in his speech, this bounty will only apply to products of Canadian copper, produced and manufactured in Canada, and to be used in Canada, and is not to apply to copper for export purposes. Having the honour and privilege of representing the district to which this bounty applies, I can say that the residents of the West Kootenay district practically depend to a great extent upon their mining. A great deal of the copper that is obtained from the province of British Columbia is refined and turned out from a smelter situated in the district I represent. At the location of this smelter, which is a very large institution employing very close to 2,000 men at the present time, outside of their employees in connection with their different mines and property, there is a small city of nearly 5,000 inhabitants, which is kept up by this concern. I do not wish to go into the principle of providing this bounty, but I wish to point out the facts that have occurred through the action of providing a bounty of one cent and a half upon copper products. In the past few years nearly all of the copper that has been used for the producing of copper rods and wire has been obtained from the United States. The providing of the bounty of one and a half cents a pound on copper products will be the means of opening up, according to reports that I have received since the delivery of this budget, a copper rod mill that has been built in that district at a cost of very close to one half million dollars. It will create employment for from three to five hundred men, and instead of $3,500,000 yearly going to the United States, as it has in the past—and I believe those figures are correct that the Dominion of Canada has sent $3,500,000 to the United States for their copper—the providing of this bounty will keep this money within the Dominion and particularly within British Columbia. The information I have is that within thirty days this rod mill will be operating with the number of men increased to from three to five hundred.

In expressing the views of the constituency which I represent, I can state them only in a spirit of optimism. There exists among the people a willingness to meet the conditions of the future in a spirit of confidence and good will, believing that there is a future for British Columbia. I am well aware that this does not quite meet with the views of the friends on this side with whom I have the privilege of associating, and the people of British Columbia are cognizant that conditions throughout the prairie provinces are not as they should be and not as they would like to see them.

It is only right and fair that I should make my position clear respecting the action taken on this budget. Since becoming a member of this House, I have followed with a great deal of interest the remarks made by the different leaders of our parties and the remarks made by the different individual members as regards platforms. Some have spoken about the platforms that they were elected upon; others have spoken about the platforms that they are standing on. I feel that I would perhaps be slighted or slighting the House if I did not place my platform before hon. members. In that respect, I might say that I was elected a member of this House, not supporting the platform of the Liberal party, not supporting the platform of the Conservative party. I was not elected a member of this House to support the platform of our Progressive friends so far as it pertained to tariff questions. I believe it is only fair to the hon. leader of this party (Mr. Forke) that my position should be made clear. I realized in the past and I realize now very fully the situation which has arisen. The people of my district feel that they have a great deal in common with the members of this party on many questions, but as a member who was elected on a platform which was drawn up as an Independent platform by a joint conference of farmers and labour representatives, a platform which had in it the recall, I believe, together with a plank stating that I could not commit myself to low tariff proposals, under those conditions, and with all respect to the leader of this party, to members of this group and to the House generally, I feel that I can point out the platform on which I was elected and confine myself to it in respect to supporting this budget. As one of the planks of that platform stated that I could not support the hon. leader of this party as respects tariff questions, I cannot support him in respect to this amendment. I feel that this explanation is due to the leader of this party and to the members of this House, and I consequently must govern myself accordingly. As long as I am a member, I shall consider it my duty to follow out the pledges made in that platform as it is practically a platform pertaining to my own election.

Mr. L. J. LOVETT (Digby-Annapolis): Mr. Speaker, representing as I do a constituency in the province of Nova Scotia, adds to my pleasure in associating myself with those who have already taken part in this debate in offering congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) on this, his seventeenth budget, and also personally to express the hope that he may be spared to bring down many more budgets in this House.

I think it is a recognized fact that no matter how fair or moderate a budget may be, it will not always meet the wishes or be wholly acceptable to the many diversified interests in this country, nor will it satisfy each and every province in this Dominion. But speaking generally, I think the people of this country, taking into consideration our present financial condition and the need of revenue, will look upon this budget as one admirably suited to the needs and aspirations of the Canadian people. True it is that Canada for the past few years has been labouring under a period of depression and things are not as we would like to have them. But if we, as loyal Canadian citizens, realizing as we should, the great heritage which is ours, with a country unsurpassed for its great natural resources, with an industrious and, in the main, a frugal people, maintaining and standing steadfast by that spirit of optimism which, I believe, is inherent in the people of Canada, we cannot help but emerge from these trying days of depression into the brighter days of renewed prosperity. If our trade returns are an index—and they certainly are—they indicate that we are again on the eve of more prosperous times. Perhaps prosperity will not blossom forth in a day; and better not, for if it comes gradually, we can congratulate ourselves that we are on solid ground, that we are not building on an artificial foundation which would destroy stability, but that we are laying the stable foundation for enduring national prosperity.

As I have already said, I believe this budget will be generally acceptable to the people of this country. If I had any criticism to offer, it would be a desire for further downward revision; but taking into consideraion the present financial condition of this country and the need of revenue, I fear such a step at this time would be attended by very grave consequences. I believe, Sir, one should consider all matters from the broadest possible viewpoint, not seeking to force his individual opinion in direct conflict to those whose wisdom, experience and legislative ability have made Canada what she is, but more in the spirit of suggestion, with a mind open to conviction, to the opinions of those who have had wider experience in guiding our national affairs. I do not wish it to be understood that one should sink his own individual opinions on any great national question; not at all I am only trying to convey the thought that our individual beliefs and opinions should not be adamant, but should be amenable to the arguments of those who, as I have said before, have had wider experience.

The member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) during the course of his remarks a few days ago, suggested the reduction of the postage rate as it affected British mails, and with that suggestion I am heartily in accord. But I would go further. I believe that a return to the old 2 cent postage rate under the Laurier regime would find favour with the mass of the Canadian people. It may be thought that this reduction would seriously interfere with the revenue of the Post Office Department. But when we take into consideration the surpluses under the 2 cent rate of the Laurier administration and contrast them with the deficits of the 3 cent rate under Conservative rule we are bound to conclude that the reduction in the rate would not lessen the revenue but would on the contrary augment it through an increased volume of business. Let me illustrate. Many business concerns in this country, and in fact the people generally, would use the mails to a greater extent if the rates were reduced. A prominent business man who was in the habit of sending 40,000 letters to his customers annually informs me that he had abandoned the practice and was now reaching his patrons through other channels than the mails. I imagine that there are many other large business concerns that are doing the same thing. Can we not logically conclude that the reduction of the postage rate to 2 cents would at least not impair the revenue, while it would relieve the people of this country of a tax that bears equally on poor and rich? I would submit this matter to the government for their careful consideration.

Mr. Speaker, let me speak for a few moments in reference to the fisheries of the Maritime provinces, more particularly as they affect my constituency. At the same time I would take this opportunity of paying a tribute to the fishermen of that part of our Dominion who have proved themselves heroes in contributing a large share to the wealth of this country. We whose activities are confined to the land do not stop to realize what the fisherman endures in his hazardous and perilous calling. Day and night alike he has to venture forth to earn his bread, a prey to sudden storms which threaten life and property. But even all these difficulties and obstacles which he encounters cannot daunt that splendid courage and pluck which these people possess. Therefore, if there is any class of the people in Canada that deserves consideration and concessions of a government, it is the fishermen of the Maritime provinces. Never during forty years Mr. Speaker have the fishermen of the Maritime provinces encountered such extreme weather and ice conditions as they have done in the past year. Loss of gear and lack of fishing opportunities have put these men deep in debt; as they often buy their outfits on credit and this handicaps them for the following season. Impaired credit and loss of gear is a deadly combination, and it has placed the fishermen of the Maritime provinces in serious financial straits. Surely some relief must be afforded these men. I therefore strongly urge upon the government not only the desirability but the necessity of granting the fishermen of the Maritime provinces a reduced freight rate in order that they may place their products in the markets of central Canada at a fair and reasonable profit. Why should the farmers of the West be granted reduced freight rates on wheat, which is not a perishable product, and the farmers and fishermen of the Maritime provinces be refused the same privilege, when their products are in the main of a perishable nature? Fuel, we find, has been granted a reduced freight rate, and with this I have no fault to find. But why should not the fishermen and the farmers of the Maritime provinces receive a like privilege? Surely whatever loss might be incurred by the reduction of their freight rates would be more than compensated for by an increased volume of business. Then again as has been alluded to before in the debate, the fishermen of the Maritime provinces are denied through the Fordney tariff the privilege of the United States market, which is their natural market. This increases the necessity of access to the central markets of Canada, and if they are not available these men will have to find a different means of livelihood, and the industry, one of Canada's greatest assets, will languish. I am trying to place before the government the facts as they actually exist. I do not want to leave the impression that the fishermen and farmers of the Maritime provinces are a lot of professional mourners like the farmers of the prairies. They recognize adverse conditions and ask for amelioration, but they go their way with courage and with an abiding faith in the future prosperity of this Dominion.

I want at this point to commend the provisions of the budget which permit free entry into Canada of machinery for the manufacture of fish waste into fertilizer and other products. This opens up a new avenue of profit to the fishermen; it provides for the establishment of new industries and the employment of more men—much desired results. I also strongly commend the reciprocity offer to the United States as embodied in the budget.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. LOVETT: Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned at six o'clock, I had finished presenting the claims of the fishermen of the Maritime provinces for amelioration of their financial difficulties, and I urged upon the government reduced freight rates for their products in the central markets of Canada.

We people of the Maritime provinces are still optimistic concerning Canada's future and have no use for a pessimist—he is a blot on the landscape. I believe the spirit of pessimism that has been poured forth by the farmers of the prairies during this session has had the effect of seriously discounting Canada's resources in the eyes of the world, and defeating the objective which is of paramount importance to this Dominion—the attraction of desirable settlers. I am afraid, Sir, that Canada's enemies are as much within as without, none the less harmful because the damage done is not intentional. What is the use of our immigration department embarking on an immigration policy which holds out strong inducements to prospective settlers if those now living in that section of the Dominion most widely recommended to these settlers, the great Canadian West, is described by those already in possession of the land of promise as "the unhappy dwelling-place of the impoverished farmers" who "refuse to see the sunshine because it does not shine down in every way and every day on every blessed one of them." I fear it will take a long and expensive advertising campaign to reassure prospective settlers and offset the complaints that have been voiced in this House.

A number of criticisms of the budget have been voiced in the press. I shall refer to only two, one credited to the leader of the Progressive party in this House (Mr. Forke) and the other to Mr. H. W. Wood, president of the United Farmers of Alberta. The Ottawa Citizen of May 12 last contains the following:

> Robert Forke, Progressive leader, questioned by a Canadian Press representative last night, declared that Progressives did not consider the budget satisfactory. "I do not think," he said, "that the tariff changes in the budget will be of any benefit to western farmers. Furthermore, the finality of the reductions as announced in the budget speech was extremely disappointing."

In the Ottawa Journal of the same date the following appeared:

> Head of Alberta Farmers thinks Budget good one. Pleased With the Reference Made by Mr. Fielding to Reciprocity
>
> Says removal of tariff would be great boon.
>
> United States the logical market for cattle from Canada. Canadian Press by direct wire
>
> Calgary, Alta., May 12.—General satisfaction with the 1923 budget brought down in the House of Commons yesterday by W. S. Fielding, Minister of Finance, was expressed by H. W. Wood, president of the United Farmers of Alberta, in an interview here last night.

Looks pretty good to him

"It looks pretty good on the face of it, although I have not studied it carefully," Mr. Wood said. "I don't see anything the matter with it and, speaking generally, I am satisfied with the budget; it appears reasonable.

"I am pleased to note the first step towards reciprocity with the United States, which was mentioned by Mr. Fielding in his budget speech," the Alberta farmer leader said. "The removal of the tariff would be the greatest thing that ever happened to Canada, in my opinion, and I wish heartily to commend Mr. Fielding on this step that has been taken.

The logical market

"I believe it would be more important and would have better results on the prosperity of the west as a whole to have the tariff on cattle removed rather than the tariff on wheat, for instance. The United States is our logical market; she is in a position to import our product.

"The United States grows wheat for export. On the other hand, I observe that there is a decided movement among farmers of the United States to obtain the removal of the tariff on cattle, for this would be of mutual benefit to both countries.

"However, it will come ultimately," Mr. Wood concluded.

Mr. Speaker, I have given you the views of the hon. leader of the Progressive party as outlined in the press, declaring his and also his followers dissatisfaction with the present budget; and this dissatisfaction has been further emphasized in the amendment which he has placed before this House. I have also quoted the views of Mr. H. W. Wood, president of the United Farmers of Alberta, which are exactly opposite to those expressed by the hon. leader of the Progressive party. Their respective views clearly indicate the divergency of opinion in western Canada regarding the budget.

I would ask my Progressive friends, particularly those from the province of Alberta, how they can support the amendment of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) against the opinion of their constituents as voiced by Mr. Wood, who presumably voices the opinion of one wing at least of the western Progressive party. If by supporting the amendment of the leader of the Progressive party they condemn the budget which has been declared by Mr. Wood as generally satisfactory, will they not incur the danger of a sharp reprimand from their constituents?—a reprimand which may focus its force in defeat when next they face the electorate? Is it not well to remember that we as elected representatives of the people are not here to voice our own personal views, but to present and urge the viewpoint of our constituents? For we should always consider ourselves servants, and not in any sense masters. It will be extremely interesting indeed to watch which horn of the dilemma our Alberta friends will take, whether they will follow the Progressive leader of this House, who expects the millennium at once, or the saner opinion of Mr. Wood, a man who recognizes that changes must come gradually and appreciates all efforts in that direction. Mr. Speaker, I maintain that the present government is doing everything possible in the interest of agriculture, particularly as it affects western Canada, without discriminating against other business interests, and yet in spite of the concessions made the attitude of our Progressive friends in this House is one of rank ingratitude, an ingratitude crueller than a serpent's tooth.

As to the criticisms made of the budget by the official opposition, they are undoubtedly within their rights as are all others, but as yet they have not made much headway. Fair and honest criticism is always appreciated, but when they undertake to play politics and descend to carping criticism and insinuations they will not find favour with the people of this country, who have an abiding faith in the masterly ability of the present Minister of Finance, and feel assured that he is the man who will eventually place Canada on her feet financially and restore the prosperity of days gone by.

There is one matter that I hoped the government would treat in a more comprehensive and direct way than is indicated in the budget. I allude to forest conservation. To realize as we must from the exhaustive and conclusive data placed before the government and every member of this House that the great wealth of our forests is fast being dissipated through fire, insect pests, destructive lumbering and the exportation of large quantities of raw forest products, and that the time has arrived when positive steps must be taken or this great source of our wealth and national credit will be a thing of the past. True it is that both the Dominion and provincial governments are doing a wonderful work in extensive and improved methods of forest fire prevention and protection, but in spite of this thousands and thousands of acres of our best timber are being destroyed annually until we have reached the stage when it is incumbent upon the Canadian government, for they are the custodians of Canadian interests to realize that a further depletion of our forests from these causes I have already named will leave us barren of what was a great national inheritance. No matter what precautions are taken in regard to forest fire prevention and protection we can never entirely eliminate this great menace, and it is a drain on our forest areas that will have to be reckoned with for all time to come, and must be recognized as a constant factor in forest depletion.

It is a well-known fact that the United States has reached the stage where she has no longer sufficient pulpwood to supply her own demands An American forestry expert states as a positive fact that in ten years or less the great American pulp and paper plants will have to remove to Canada or else go out of business. Canada's forests are being robbed of thirty-five million trees annually in the export pulp trade, fifty per cent of which goes to the United States. American operators are already buying up our timber limits, corralling our supplies of pulp, and shipping them to their own mills there to be manufactured into the finished product, giving employment to their own workmen, and thus conserving their forest reserves. In proportion our Canadian workmen are deprived of employment. Our existing mills are feeling keenly the pinch of market competition in buying wood, and culminating disaster of all, our forest reserves are being rapidly depleted. I ask you, is this good business?

Mr. Speaker, it is a well known fact that you cannot build up a country if you allow her raw material to be shipped to a foreign country there to be manufactured into the finished products. It is not a narrow or selfish policy to restrict and conserve the use of our raw products to the upbuilding of our own industries and the employment of our own workmen, and I would earnestly urge the government to apply this policy of restricted export of pulpwood before our sources of supplies are further depleted. I know of no greater work that can be done to sustain the future financial credit of Canada than that which Mr. F. J. D. Barnjum, the apostle of forest conservation, is doing to-day. He is unsparingly devoting his wealth, his energy and his great business ability to the task of arousing the Canadian people to a recognition of the great forest wealth which is theirs—but which, alas, they are allowing to slip from their grasp. He is a prophet whose warning voice should be heeded, or Canadians unborn, and even those of this generation, will have to mourn the loss of one great source of wealth—the forests of Canada. It has been truly said, Mr. Speaker, "that every square mile of forest in the Dominion is an incubator of new industries, and new population. To kill the forest is to strike a death blow at our future development." I would earnestly and respectfully urge the government to take a more direct and quicker method for immediate conservation than that foreshadowed in the budget by the proposed commission.

I am concluding my remarks, Mr. Speaker, without specially referring to many outstanding economically beneficial provisions of the budget such as the reduction of the stamp tax, the bounties to encourage struggling industries and the admission of free machinery to encourage the establishment of new ones, the reduction in sugar duty, the improved form of collecting the sales tax, increasing the British preference and the effort to divert more trade to Canadian ports, and the holding out of the open hand for reciprocity with the United States. I do not do so because these things have already been discussed before the House. The budget, I believe, is a credit to the financial genius who produced it, who was evidently guided in its framing by a stern sense of justice to all classes and conditions of Canadians and to Canada's present financial requirements.

Mr. MURRAY MacLAREN (St. John City and Counties of St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I desire to take the opportunity of discussing some of the subjects that have been raised during the debate on the budget, and first I will refer to the subject of the British preference. The Minister of Finance proposes that there be a 10 per cent discount allowed on duty payable under the preference. There are two important qualifications of this reduction, one being that it shall not apply in the case of articles when the duty is not above 15 per cent and the other that the discount shall only apply when goods are brought to Canadian ports. To effect this change it is proposed that the customs tariff of 1907 be amended by repealing section 5. What is section 5 of the customs tariff? It reads in this way:

Preference to Canadian ports

On and after a date to be named by the Governor in Council, in a proclamation published in the Canada Gazette, the British preferential tariff shall apply only to goods brought into Canada by ship direct to a Canadian seaport.

The customs tariff was introduced by the present Minister of Finance in 1907, and section 5 was placed therein to enable the preference to apply only to Canadian seaports by order in council at any subsequent date. Section 5 has remained in the customs tariff for sixteen years without action having been taken upon it by any government until the past few days. The subject has frequently been discussed in parliament and out of parliament. Much public opinion has been expressed in its favour, and only last year a resolution was brought forward by the hon. member for

Cumberland (Mr. Logan) urging that the provisions as contained in the section be brought into effect. What has happened? The proposed resolution restricts materially the powers made available under the present section. The British preference will still apply to goods brought through all ports but when they are passed directly through Canadian seaports they will have a 10 per cent discount if the duty exceeds 15 per cent. The essence of section 5 was the preference to Canadian ports, and the British preference would apply only when trade is through these ports. The proposed resolution, therefore, is a shadow of the ideal as presented in the customs tariff of 1907. But the minister has done something. No doubt he did the best he could. He has given vitality to the principle. Credit is cheerfully given him for what should be regarded as a very important step. And the consequences will be very considerable. No loss will be sustained by the country. Indeed, the increase to trade through our ports and over our railways will be found to be a gain. One looks forward to the time when the British preference will apply only when Canadian ports are used, and then the whole country will obtain the full benefit. It is more than a party matter; the principle which is involved is a national one. So far as the principle of preferential trade, as contained in the resolution to be brought down, is concerned it will receive my support. It is fair to recognize that the severely criticized French treaty has a bright spot, in that it shall only apply when Canadian ports are used, and that will also include all favoured nations availing themselves of its provisions. The minister has stated that it will also apply to the Italian treaty, and while I trust it is a correct interpretation I do not feel fully convinced of this. The Chairman of the National Railway Board recently said:

> The truth is that we have too much mileage and not enough traffic, and that is what is wrong with the C.N.R.

Very well, the mileage may not be easily diminished, but the traffic can and should be increased. The British preference amendments will help to give it; the treaties which were just referred to will help to give it; the bringing of coal from east and west to central Canada would help to give it; the shipping of grain and goods over Canadian railways and through Canadian ports will give it. For the seven months ending March 31, of this year there were over 130,000,000 bushels of Canadian grain shipped overseas via United States seaports while 38,000,000 bushels of American grain went through Canadian ports. Whether or not the government puts forward a general policy regarding transportation there will still remain the obligations regarding Canadian transportation taken over with the railways and they will need to be observed.

On the entrance to this building the words are carved:

> The wholesome sea is at her gates.
> Her gates both East and West.

Gates which are wide open and ready to pass trade in increasing amounts outwards and inwards to the enormous advantage of our transportation service and our country. One may well exclaim "Wake up, Canada!".

In reference to the subject of petroleum bounties it is proposed to amend the Petroleum Bounty Act of 1909 by providing that the bounty shall be payable only on crude petroleum now produced in Canada and that it shall apply at the present rate for one year. The next year it will be reduced one-half, and the following year cease. I have a telegram from the manager of the New Brunswick Gas and Oil Fields which says:—

> With reference to Finance Minister's proposal pay present bounties crude oil during this year, only cutting it in half next year, and thereafter discontinuing altogether urge you oppose this measure to the utmost as calculated to strangle the industry in Canada unless an equal or heavier tariff is imposed on all importation.

It may be wise to make provision in the event of large developments of oil wells as is proposed by the minister, so that enormous bounties would not be entailed. But this large development of oil wells has not yet happened, and in the meantime the prosperity of the oil industries now being operated will be seriously affected, and I urge upon the minister the propriety of extending this bounty as now proposed over a considerably longer period.

The subject of immigration has already been fully discussed during the present session, but I would again wish to emphasize that the immigration policy should be more comprehensive and more fully organized. The important officials in Great Britain should certainly be representative of different parts of the Dominion. I have an article which recently appeared in the public press calling attention to a report in the Isle of Man Weekly Times of an address on Canada delivered by Mr. F. W. Kerr, immigration official of the Dominion government. The article says:

> The chairman of the meeting, which was very largely attended, was the Governor General of the island and the most important part of the whole address, so far as the Maritime provinces are concerned because of the effect which it would have on the audience among which were many prospective immigrants, is that the lecturer started at Quebec and went westward. So far as he was concerned, the Maritime provinces did not exist, and he left with that audience a wrong impression of Canada. At the conclusion of the address a show of hands was called of all those that had relations in Canada and the result shows that fully one-third of the large audience had relatives in this country. Yet there is one Manxman in New Brunswick, and little wonder when the immigration agents of our country, whose salaries we help to pay, not only ignore our province, but described Canada as a place in which New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island have no existence.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): What is the name of the person who made that statement?

Mr. MacLAREN: I am quoting from the Daily Journal of St. John. The name of the official is Mr. F. W. Kerr. The article goes on to say in reference to these Manxmen:

But they are told nothing of these provinces. Most of these prospective immigrants, who are just the kind of stock these provinces need, are hustled off to the West. The Maritime provinces should demand some explanation when a federal immigration official describes Canada by beginning at Quebec, as the report says he does.

Then the report goes on to describe a series of pictures which were shown of Niagara Falls and the Rocky Mountains and other thrilling scenery of the Dominion. Would it not be well to get down to some commonsense treatment of the subject and give information suitable for immigrants?

Mr. COOTE: I did not catch the title of the article. I wondered whether the literature was designed to attract tourists or immigrants.

Mr. MacLAREN: I am referring to an account of a large meeting held in the Isle of Man, at which meeting the Governor of that island presided, and the paragraph that I have partly read gives an account of the meeting. He describes Canada by beginning at Quebec and going west, and he gives beautiful pictures of Niagara Falls and the Rocky mountains as well as a description of the prairies and the West. The comment is that he has made no reference to the Maritime section of the country which was regarded as particularly important, in view of the class of immigrants which we might obtain from the isle of Man, such as men who are accustomed to small farming and fishing. My question was: Would it not be as well to come down to some commonsense treatment of such a subject and give to the immigrants information bearing on the occupation of suitable portions of the Dominion?

Recently a considerable number of people from the Hebrides have been brought to Ontario and one of the prairie provinces. They are a most suitable class of immigrants and will no doubt be successful wherever their lot falls. They are a sturdy, frugal and industrious people who have been engaged in mixed farming and sea fishing. The salt air is the breath of their life and the roar of the sea is music to their souls, a class preeminently suited by their heredity and environment for settlement on the sea coast. A familiar poem speaks of the Hebrideans who previously came to Canada in this way:

From the lone shieling of the misty island
Mountains divide us, and the waste of seas—
Yet still the blood is strong, the heart is Highland,
And we in dreams behold the Hebrides:
Fair these broad meads—these hoary woods are grand;
But we are exiles from our fathers' land.

Those who might dwell at the sea coast would not only behold the Hebrides in their dreams but might see something like them in their daily life.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): There are plenty of them in this House. I am one of them.

Mr. MacLAREN: While it may not be possible in some cases to place immigrants in Canada in surroundings similar to those they have lived in, it is submitted that this should be kept in view in determining our immigration policy.

The proposal to organize certain naval units throughout the interior of the country, however novel and weird it may be, I trust will not be regarded as a precedent in our reversing the order of nature, but let us have the people placed, as far as practicable, in surroundings suitable for them.

With reference to forest conservation, it is noted that it is proposed that a commission shall investigate the subject of the exportation of pulp-wood. Let me urge that the matter be dealt with promptly, for, whether an embargo be placed upon pulp-wood or an export tax, the government has a powerful instrument in its hands to benefit the country, and I trust will exercise it. Forest conservation is now becoming of increased importance, and as it largely lies within provincial management, there is difficulty in obtaining general or concerted action regarding the many forestry problems. I would think that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) might well constitute himself convener on the subject of forest conservation, and so facilitate general conference and co-operation amongst provincial authorities.

A favourite subject of exhortation, but an unpopular one, is economy. We shall all agree that a very large sum is required to be spent to meet our obligations; but it is not agreed that so much money should be spent as is now being done. I do not think the general opinion of the House is that economy is being practised in a way that our present position demands. There is no evidence of a firm grasp being taken by the government to exercise economy. I do not mean economy that would interfere with or retard trade and the vital needs of the country; but surely non-essentials might be controlled or delayed. The civil government is so top-heavy that it needs revision and curtailment. Works of doubtful or problematical character, such as the Hudson Bay railway, might be deferred for an indefinite period. I do not suggest that the budget should have been balanced this year, but I do say that it should have been more nearly balanced than it is. I believe the feeling of the country is that economy should receive at the hands of the government greater attention than is now the case. Let the government put as much effort in controlling expenditure as is now exerted in raising revenue, and then a substantial improvement in the finances of the country will be obtained.

Mr. O. R. GOULD (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish with other members who have preceded me, to tender my hearty congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) who has brought his seventeenth budget into the House. I am minded to say that I believe just as great congratulation would be tendered to the hon. gentleman if he were now bringing in his fifteenth budget, for to me, and I believe to the majority of the members in this corner of the House, the last two budgets were a disappointment. I sincerely believe that, and I also sincerely believe that ninety per cent of the people in the country consider this budget and the last budget to have been disappointing, more particularly when they have in mind the great promises given to them in 1919 as laid down in the Liberal platform. I have been somewhat amused when my mind has gone back to the old House, that is, the House at the time of Union government, when our worthy friends who now occupy the treasury benches sat in opposition, and I have recollected the words of fire which emanated from them in denunciation of all and sundry things that the Union government did at that time, the promises, tentative and otherwise, that were held out and the predictions as to the benefits that would come to the people of Canada if they would only again repose power in the Liberal party.

We have now had for two years an opportunity of reviewing what these hon. gentlemen have done for the country since the people reposed confidence in them in 1921. Whether or not we are justified in looking back over history, back as far as 1896, perhaps, when my first recollection of political things in this country took form, I recollect very well the campaign that was carried on prior to 1896, the victory that was achieved by the Liberal party at that time, and the promises by which they achieved that victory. There is a great similarity between the tariff proposals then and the tariff proposals placed in the tariff platform of 1919. Very positive is it in the minds of the people who remember those incidents, that the tariff proposals of the Liberal party in 1896 were not carried into effect as was promised by the politicians of that date. According to the record of the last two budgets and according to the speeches that were delivered last year and those that have been delivered this year by hon. members opposite, which speeches, I must say, appear to me to be only apologies for their not putting into practice the policies which they presented to the country, we are right in assuming that it is their purpose to go back all the time on their pledges as regards the tariff planks in their platform.

I recall the elections of 1904 and 1908 when our western country was being opened up and the railway policies were dangled before the people of Canada, so that they in a measure might forget the action of the party after the election in 1896. Then we had the platform of 1911 containing what was known as the offer of reciprocity with the United States, and the Liberal party at that time had hopes that the people of Canada had forgotten. Evidently—and I point this out—although it has been said a thousand times in this House that the people of Canada repudiated reciprocity at that time, what happened is not, to my mind, any proof that reciprocity was the real cause of the defeat of the Liberal party in 1911; but most people who remembered that the Liberal party had gone back on their promises of 1896, took that opportunity of telling that party that they did not believe in the pledges they were making. The only recourse that the people of Canada had then was to place in power the Conservative party, which had been defeated in 1896 upon its tariff policy. In 1914, the war broke out, and for some years political conditions were disturbed. But again, in 1921, the people were appealed to upon practically the old platform of 1896, and by a very slender majority they said: "Yes, we will endorse the Liberal party in regard to that platform." In the meantime, however, a large faction had been created in Canada who really believed that the Liberal party was not constituted so that it could carry out the pledges of the platform laid down in 1919. Again I say that the last two budgets and the apologetic speeches made by the members of the government prove conclusively that those who believed the Liberal party would not carry the pledges of 1919 into execution, were justified, and I cite that as a reason why there are to be found at the present time sixty-four or sixty-five members in this part of the House.

Reciprocity is again held out in the budget speech of to-day as a reason why the Liberal party should be perpetuated in power. To me, reciprocity is a fetish. I supported reciprocity in 1911, and if the day ever should arrive when I have again an opportunity of supporting reciprocity, I promise now that I shall be quite prepared to do so. But in the meantime there is no excuse for the government to hide behind the fetish of reciprocity, and to let the things which pertain to-day go unchallenged and unwarranted. Every government speaker in this debate has been telling the people who live in the West and, indeed, people throughout Canada who have been proclaiming the truth with regard to agriculture, that we should hide the truth; that we are pessimists and so on. I maintain that if we are ever going to have a Canada worthy of the name, we must tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, and let the people judge for themselves. When we tell the truth, we wish to be heard, and to have remedies applied to the evils of which we complain.

I have often thought, as I have sat in my place in this House and listened to the speeches made by hon. gentlemen opposite, whether any of those speeches were in evidence when their platform was made in August, 1919. That was the year after the close of the war, and surely at that time hon. gentlemen opposite must have been perfectly aware of the fact that we were overburdened with a debt. They knew very well that if they were returned to power they would have to find the ways and means of meeting that debt. And in the face of that certain knowledge, what did they do? They gave us to understand that they would eliminate the tariff upon the implements of production immediately. That was one of the first things that they promised to do; they preached it incessantly throughout the West, and during the campaign of 1921 they emphasized the pledge that by this means they were going to bring relief to those who were suffering from an unjust burden. All hon. gentlemen opposite who campaigned in the West were very positive in this regard, but we had particularly a strenuous champion in that part of the country. The people of the West desired the reduction on these implements, because it was their belief then, as it is now, that the tariff in this respect weighs heavily upon every individual who lives in that part of the Dominion. So that when the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) made great promises of what his party would do in this matter, the people naturally listened with great attention to what he had to say.

I have many extracts from the hon. gentleman's utterances in the West; we all listened to the speeches he made in western Canada, in which he told us of what would be done when he came to Ottawa. Why, Mr. Speaker, we were led to believe, from the hon. minister's statements, that the tariff would disappear practically overnight. Yes, Sir, the Hon. Frank Carvell's scalp was to be put into his belt in a very short time. But we have not seen any results since the hon. gentleman came here. The other night, however, speaking in this debate he took the opportunity to give the Progressives in this part of the House a severe lecture, the while admitting that in 1901 he was going up and down the province of Saskatchewan, protesting against the enormities that were being practised to the detriment of agriculture. The hon. gentleman would have the House and the country believe, I suppose, that all those evils of which he complained so strenuously in those days are now utterly eliminated. He deplored the fact also that while he had entered the field of politics the present member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Hopkins), whom he mentioned as one of his colleagues in the early days, had no right to do likewise nor refer to the difficulties under which the western agriculturist labours. I wish to tell the hon. gentleman that while I was not working exactly in his company at that time, I likewise was working in the interests of agriculture, while thousands of others were doing their utmost, in their own small way, to try to bring to the powers of the day the disadvantages against which we were protesting. Those disadvantages to-day are as acute as they were at that time and I think it would be very much better for the Minister of Agriculture to stand up in his place to-day and endeavour, with us, to fight those evils against which he spoke in those days, and try to have adequate remedies provided, rather than get up and give curtain lectures to the Progressives who are honestly trying to remove the evils that are complained of.

I would ask the Minister of Agriculture, in all seriousness, this question: Would the farmers, in the province of Saskatchewan, say, complain of the conditions to which reference has so frequently been made if those conditions did not in fact exist? The Minister of Agriculture of Saskatchewan has stated that 261 municipalities, according to the returns for the year 1922, showed an average tax deficit of $33 per quarter section. I stated the other night that it was $37; it should be $33. The same gentleman in giving evidence before the Agricultural committee last year stated that $90 was the average tax on a half section of land, which would be $45 per quarter section. This year he states that the sum of $33 out of that $45 is in arrears. I ask all hon. members, therefore, would any agriculturists in Canada, either in the West or in the East, desire to have a tax record against them such as that if the conditions did not warrant it? In the past, when we had the means of preventing such a thing, it never occurred. But these conditions are forced upon us, and when hon. gentlemen get up in this House and presume to lecture the representatives in parliament of the people of the West on account of circumstances such as these, they are, to say the least, speaking without any knowledge of the facts.

We are told to work a little harder and to go more into the raising of stock; hon. gentlemen kindly advise us to take up mixed farming and to do various other things. Well, Mr. Speaker, this is very kind of them indeed; but really, a man does not need to be told this sort of thing. I listened the other day to a lecture of this kind from the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) who comes from a province where the rainfall is 112 inches per annum. If he came to Saskatchewan and visited the district in which I live, I think he would have reason to modify his remarks somewhat, for in the past ten years we have not had much greater precipitation than 10 inches per annum. We have not had enough water to water our cattle, and I have been in such straits many a time; on two occa-

9 p.m. sions I was obliged to sell the whole herd of cattle because I could not find water to water them; and I had to sell at a sacrifice at that. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen to tell us these things, but I think that we know best, who live in that part of the country, just the conditions that prevail there. We do not need to be told, either, what it is best for us to do. Under the conditions that we have to cope with, wheat growing must be the bulwark of our activities until such time as we can find enough water to ensure the profitable raising of cattle.

I have figures compiled by a statistician which show that there is nothing the matter with the West so far as the producing of wealth is concerned. A comparison of the exports of the various countries of the world for the year 1922 will reveal the fact that Canada exceeded by a considerable sum any other exporting nation. The nearest to the Canadian exporters were those of the United States; the figures in relation to that country showed a per capita export of $65, while it was $98 in the case of Great Britain, and $150 in the case of this country. Why do hon. gentlemen stand up and tell us to work harder and save more? What possible ground have they for abusing us and concluding offhand that we have been indulging in extravagant expenditures? Let me emphatically assure this House that this is absolutely not so. I may tell hon. gentlemen here that I know a man in my district who some years ago had thousands of dollars in the bank, but who last year was compelled to borrow money from the banks, although his land and everything was clear. These conditions have been getting worse and worse gradually, and if matters do not improve in the very near future I am not prepared to predict what the outcome will be. Certain it is that when hon. gentlemen stand up and undertake to lecture us, notwithstanding that we tell the positive, the plain and the simple truth, their attitude is not likely to appease our minds or to produce that manner in us which gentlemen would like to display.

Mr. PUTNAM: The hon. gentleman gave certain per capita exports; were they the total per capita?

Mr. GOULD: Yes. The Minister of Agriculture informed the House that he had kept certain notes of some of the remarks that he had made at Regina . I want to tell the hon. gentleman that some one else has been keeping track of his remarks as well, and I wish to give two citations to prove this. I regret that the minister is not in his place to-night, although I am quite sure that he knows that I would say the same things in his presence. I have done so before and possibly may have occasion to do so again. In Prince Albert on November 2, 1921, the hon. gentleman stated:

It is contended by the Farmers' party that the eastern Liberals will make it impossible to carry out their tariff platform.

Well, who was right? Why, the Farmers, absolutely. Has it not been proven by the past two budget speeches that the Farmers are absolutely right. But here is another extract from the hon. gentleman's remarks. The Regina Leader of December 2, 1921, quotes the minister as follows:

There is one outstanding question upon which I feel I should insist, and that is a substantial removal of the burdens and iniquities of the present protective fiscal policy that has been crushing the life out of western agriculture and conditions generally for so many years.

All this is very nice, you know, and it goes well on the platform; but hon. gentlemen who heard the minister the other night, as he stood in his place and lectured the Progressives, noted very well that his remarks then did not accord with what he said out in the West in 1921, and there was absolutely no fight in him to uphold the convictions he then expressed. Oh no; instead of fighting for western agriculture he rather undertook to give us of the West a curtain lecture, notwithstanding that we are proclaiming in this House the very same things that the hon. gentleman so fervently put forward himself out in the West.

The hon. gentleman has achieved the position which he sought, that of Minister of Agriculture, and it is my opinion that since receiving his portfolio he has forgotten the people back home, he is not fighting their battles as we know he was capable of fighting them in the past twenty-five years in western Canada. I was going to make further references to the hon. minister about a certain by-election in 1919, of a personal acquaintance I had with him on that occasion, but I do not wish to go into it now.

But we know what is the matter with agriculture—there are too many combines, which are a law unto themselves in taking whatever toll they choose. A report was laid on the Table a few days ago as a result of the investigation of our charges that a huge combine existed to keep up lake freights. I do not wish to discuss that report, but I am sure hon. gentlemen who have read their newspapers lately will agree with me that we in this corner of the House were justified in making those charges. Those unduly high lake freights were taken out of the western farmers. And yet when we protest against this and similar injustice we are called alarmists and pessimists.

From 1912 to 1917 we had a somewhat similar condition in regard to our terminal elevators. The matter was investigated by Price, Waterhouse & Company and reported upon. Why that report was not published I do not know. In this connection I was very pleased this afternoon that the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston) urged that the report laid on the table with respect to the lake shipping combine should be printed and published. The people who have been filched of their hard-earned coin by this and other heartless combines should be given an opportunity to study such reports. Then I am sure the efforts that have been made by us in this corner of the House to portray the actual conditions will be supplemented a hundredfold by the public. I have been studying the Price Waterhouse report and from the computations I have already made—and these are not final—I find twelve terminal companies showed a profit of $15,003,265. Remember, this was over and above the huge salaries paid their executives and over and above all expenses except the business profits tax which was then in force. At the present time we have twenty-five terminal companies, and so far as I have studied the figures they disclose a profit of $7,217,503.20. We have protested against these huge profits and have received a promise from the government to appoint a commission to look into this and cognate matters. It is the exactions of these combines which have caused the western members to stand in their places here and protest. As I have said before on many occasions, these combines are a law unto themselves to extract for their own benefit whatever proportion of the wealth of the country is created by the farmers and other producers, and yet our governments, both past and present, sit idly by and will not take these exorbitant profits from their hands.

There is another point which occurs to me in connection with the Price Waterhouse report, but I want to refer particularly in passing to an address made the other night by the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault), when he discussed very lucidly and effectively means of getting further revenue: that is, by taxing unearned income. I might say, Mr. Speaker, that in 1920, when I first had the honour of addressing this House, I referred to this source of revenue. Again I say that from a study of the Price Waterhouse report I have received a fresh stimulus along this line, and with your permission, Sir, I should like to supplement the remarks made by the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères and demonstrate to the Minister of Finance and to the government the fact that there are further means of raising revenue apart from the tariff. When I am told that the tariff is the only means of raising revenue, I reply that there is no justification for such a statement until all other possible fields of revenue have been explored.

I think in 1920 I tried to draw the attention of the House to our harbour facilities, and I cited more specifically those at Fort William. I find that the Price Waterhouse report corroborates the statement I then made, namely, that certain companies had acquired sites along this waterfront free of cost. What is the result? Away back in the country the people—the state—creates wealth, and those companies, perhaps with more discernment than the people generally, or even the government, having possessed themselves of this waterfront are placed in a peculiarly advantageous position. The Price Waterhouse report distinctly states that many of these institutions in Fort William received their sites free of charge, and they include the capitalized value of these sites among their assets. And do not forget also that our government dredges the harbour, as occasion demands, and every time this is done an additional value is given to these sites. Therefore it amounts to this, these companies expect to earn dividends upon the capitalized value of something which cost them practically nothing. And this feature relates also to vast areas of land, particularly in western Canada, because there we find a large amount of real estate held out of use by speculators who oftentimes live in foreign countries. These land holdings the people residing in the locality make valuable by their enterprise. Therefore after our people have created this wealth, that is, after they have settled the country and their labour and enterprise have caused land values to rise, the holders of these vacant lands are able to sell their property at greatly enhanced prices and take this unearned wealth out of the country. I maintain and insist that the government should take a substantial portion of such unearned wealth by way of taxation. That is something that I would recommend to the government and to the Minister of Finance as worthy of their attention, and after they have investigated this source I do not think they will continue to tell us that our only source of revenue is the tariff.

Speaking of the tariff reminds me of the speech of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) a few days ago when he complimented the Minister of Finance upon having reduced the duty on stumping machines. Now, the hon. member being a Conservative is according to all precedent, a strong protectionist, and yet we find him complimenting the Minister of Finance for this reduction of duty, and therefore we may conclue that he realizes how necessary it is to have the cost of the implements of production brought down to a minimum. I for one, Mr. Speaker, would be too proud to stand in my place and thank the minister for something that would benefit my own district only while the rest of the Dominion continues to suffer under burdens similar to those of which we, as agriculturists, complain. I recommend that thought to the hon. member for Fort William in his solicitude for stumping machines. By a tariff tax the implements of production are made more expensive to the individual, and such a tax is a dead weight on production. All the people of Canada require woollen garments, shoes, in fact all the necessaries of life in common, and on these we are taxed in like proportion. As an agriculturist the first thing I must have is a capitalization of approximately $2,000 to work a half-section of land. What do I find? That the average tariff tax of 14 per cent on my agricultural implements, plus 6 per cent sales tax, represents a 20 per cent handicap on my capitalization, or $400 before I can start in to produce a commodity which I have to sell in competition in a free trade world. It is absolutely unfair. We are quite justified in my humble opinion in keeping up this fight for a square deal.

In the amendment that has been presented reference is made to a special committee of the House to look into tariff matters, It is my humble opinion that a special committee of this House is not sufficient. In reading over the evidence given before the special Agricultural committee it is very difficult for me to believe some of the evidence given. I do not wish to make reference to any specific case, but it does seem to me that a commission should be appointed with power to enter into these institutions, to ascertain the value of their plant and all the necessary facts. The government at the present time, if they question the veracity of any individual or corporation in making out an income tax return, despatch a man who goes into the office of that company or individual, makes an inquiry and tells the individual or corporation just how much his income tax amounts to. Then why not have a man or a commission armed with the same power and authority to go into the organized industries in this country and say: We want to see your books, we want to find out your overhead; we want to know how much watered stock you have, and exactly what it costs you to produce your product.

What has been the procedure in the past? Regardless of what government was in power we have simply had the say-so of the beneficiaries of the protective system. They come to this government or some other government and say: We must have a tariff; we cannot live without it; organized industry in the United States will put us out of business if we are not protected. And the government will say: Yes. We will give you protection. How much do you want? The answer may be 25, 30 or 35 per cent All right, says the government, we will give you that protection. But that is not the policy we want. When an institution will come to any government and give positive proof of just what amount of protection is required for any legitimate industry, I do not think the Progressive party would refuse to give it to them, but we are not prepared to accept their say-so. We have good reasons to doubt, we know the huge amount of watered capital on which we are being asked to pay dividends, and that is the ruination of Canada. I am shortening my remarks somewhat, but I might state that I have in my office upstairs one page of a newspaper which shows twenty-three companies, some paying quarterly dividends and some annual, and on the same page appears a letter from a certain farmer in the West who subscribed to this paper but was not able to continue his subscription, but the paper was going to continue him as a subscriber just the same—and on the same page, I say, there were twenty-three companies listed that were all paying dividends. That is what is the matter with Canada. These companies are a law unto themselves, and we cannot get away from that patent fact.

We also receive lectures on other things. Hon. gentlemen say: Why the per capita debt of Canada is not nearly as great as that of the United States or Great Britain. Or the Saskatchewan per capita debt is not as great as Ontario's. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is there any reason why it should be? Saskatchewan was not formed a province until 1905, and we had not one solitary cent of debt at that time; we had money to the good. Yet to-day hon. members and ministers will come along and say that our per capita debt is less than Ontario's—Ontario, which is years and years, yea, almost a century older than Saskatchewan.

Take the Dominion itself. We are a comparatively young country. Yet hon. gentlemen will say: Our per capita debt is not as great as that of Great Britain. It has no reason to be. Accumulations of centuries of wars and everything else hang over the taxpayers of Great Britain. We have not that, thank God, and that is one reason why hon. gentlemen should not compare our per capita debt with that of Great Britain, although, Mr. Speaker, if we continue at the rate we are going, before we are one-tenth the age of Great Britain we are going to have four times as much debt, and it is time we called a halt right now.

It seems to me that the present government and governments of the past have always been afraid to tread new paths in taxation. Yet when we look over the history of the past twelve or fifteen years we find that they have gone into new paths, but not until they have been forced to do so. It is the same thing with our railways. I can recollect fifteen years before the nationalization of railways became a fact in this country, we people in the West said we knew that it had to come the way things were going. We predicted it, and it came about. Again, when we called attention some years ago to the possibilities of direct taxation, we were called dreamers. Oh yes, but we have direct taxation to-day. We were told by the politicians of that day that it was an impossibility, yet to-day we are collecting the greater part of our revenue through direct taxation. We were told the same thing about government ownership. We were called socialists for advocating it. Hon. gentlemen will remember the day when we in the West advocated government ownership of interior terminal storage elevators, and the word hurled at us more often than anything else was socialists. But to-day we have government ownership of elevators all over the country; we have government ownership of railways; we have government ownership of steamships. I might mention, too, that the Conservative party were the ones who most loudly denounced the principle of public ownership in those days, yet to-day they stand as the champions of government ownership, showing that they are capable of learning something; and there, Mr. Speaker, the Progressive party stand side by side with them on the principle of government ownership.

It was also a very dangerous thing some years ago to advocate the taxation of unearned increment, yet the other night we had the hon. member for Chambly and Vercheres (Mr. Archambault) standing in his place in this House, four years after the member for Assiniboia had advocated the theory, and urging it upon this government.

Bonuses—that is something that sounds very much like tariffs. If it be that the bonus to be granted to the flax industry in the West is intended as a sop to the Progressives, and hon. members have spoken of concessions given to the agriculturists of the West, they need not count on the member for Assiniboia, because in my opinion that is not any concession at all. I do not believe in any sops whatever, for capital will always be found for any legitimate industry. I do not anticipate that the individuals who will grow the flax or hemp will receive any benefit from this bonus. No, the capitalists will absorb all that themselves; I question very much whether the grower of the hemp will benefit. I also question very much whether at the expiration of the supposed term of the bonus these same people will not be back again to the government asking that the subsidy be renewed. We have had that happen before. It reminds me of the Crowsnest pass agreement and the license to manufacture oleomargarine in this country. That was a privilege given during the war period because of the high price of dairy products, but what happened after the war? Selfish interests came along and said: We want the privilege continued, and it was continued. I predict that the same thing will happen in the matter of these bonuses. These young industries will only treat this understanding as a scrap of paper, I am afraid.

The Minister of the Interior speaking in this debate made the statement that he did not know why protected industries in Canada required so much protection. That is the only note that has come from the Liberal party so far which has a ring at all similar to what we might anticipate took place when the Liberal platform was framed in 1919. This is the only note of the kind that has come from the whole of the Liberal party up to the present time, and yet the minister concluded with a remark that he wished the Progressives to have the opportunity of taking charge of the affairs of the nation. I want to tell the hon. gentleman that if we did not feel like taking that responsibility when the election occurred in 1921 we are quite prepared to assume it to-day. I feel sure also that the people of Canada will have more faith in a Progressive policy formulated by the men who come here and back up the things they have advocated outside of parliament, who are prepared to go ahead and take a chance at it. I question whether the Minister of the Interior was very sincere in that remark.

Mr. GAUVREAU: You will never see that.

Mr. GOULD: That is mere conjecture on my hon. friend's part; I venture to assert nobody will be prepared to bet any money on his statement. However I wish to state that if the people of Canada would only take a serious view of the offence—I was going to say —committed against them by this last budget speech they would rise in their might and turn the offenders out when the roll is called the next time.

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): I wish to speak very briefly to-night upon a few aspects of the budget as delivered by the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) and to discuss some phases of the announcements contained therein which are of direct interest to my own constituency. I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gould) who just preceded me. In spite of his denunciation of the principle of protection I am not yet convinced that it is wrong. The party to which I have the honour to belong have always believed in adequate protection. They have always maintained that our industries should be protected from undue competition with the highly organized industries of other countries, and that they should be protected against the product of the cheap labour of those countries. In so far as the budget affords this protection to our industries and to our business interests, whether they are commercial or agricultural, it is to be commended; but in my judgment there are many respects in which it does not go far enough, nor is it the revenue producing factor that it should be if foreign goods continue to come into our country at the rate they are doing.

The Progressive group who sit to my left were no doubt led to hope for a more material reduction in the tariff than has been granted, and I do not wonder that they cannot reconcile the present tariff with the platform of the Liberal party in 1919 and with the pre-election pledges of that party. It seems to me that one of the needs in all lines of production at the present time is a profitable market: Production in many lines is exceeding the demand and all countries are looking around for markets that will afford a constant and consistent demand for their products.

The British preferential tariff has been again increased, although many of our factories at the present time are not running to full capacity because of lack of orders. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that everyone in this House is in favour of British connection. We are proud of our place in the Empire, and we are fully aware of the benefits which we derive from our British connection. But even so, it is surely a mistaken policy to penalize any Canadian industry to satisfy our obligations in that respect. If we have a duty to perform for the Empire by all means let us discharge that duty; but each and every citizen of the country should bear a fair share of the burden without imposing too heavy a load upon a few. The increase in the preference will bear very heavily upon the woollen industry and unfortunately many of our factories engaged in that industry are not running to their full capacity owing to lack of orders. Their operators are not being employed, and they are leaving Canada to get employment in other countries where there is more work to be had. Orders for woollen goods are being taken by British and French manufacturers at prices which labour costs in this country make it impossible for us to compete with. The small margin of safety which these companies had under the old British preference has been removed by the present increase. This will create even keener competition, and may possibly force some factories to close entirely. I do not think that the Minister of Finance contemplated anything so disastrous to the welfare of such an important industry in this country.

Every time we purchase from outside we send our money to build up industries in other countries, and to encourage them to compete with our industries more keenly than ever. If we are to prosper as a nation we must stop this flow of wealth out of our country. I think we should, as far as possible, become self-sustaining. As it is, we are building up industries in other countries which are enticing our young men and women out of Canada by reason of the opportunities which they offer.

A duty of 15 per cent has been placed on artificial silk. The principle of protection is being applied in this instance with a vengeance. If I may use a contradictory expression protection is being afforded to an industry which does not exist. In the meantime the users of artificial silk in this country are being penalized to the extent of $15 on every $100 to encourage the establishment of this artificial silk industry. If I might I could give the House a concrete example of how our industries are suffering. I could tell of one order for ladies' knitted sweaters, principally of artificial silk, amounting to $40,000, which was placed in France just the other day, and owing to the depreciated currency of that country they are able to land these goods at Toronto cheaper than they can be produced in Canada. If our knitting factories in addition to this have to labour under an extra duty of 15 per cent for their materials they can see nothing ahead but absolute ruin.

I have here, Mr. Speaker, 300 names which have been appended to a petition protesting against the increase in the British preference and the alteration in the sales tax. The prayer of that petition reads as follows:

> We are your constitutents and are engaged in working in the woollen and knit goods mills. We have seen with great alarm that the British preference has been increased 10 per cent and that the sales tax has been altered. Some of us can remember, and those who do not have been told, of the hard times in our mills which followed the increase of the British preference in 1900.
>
> We know that the wages paid in British mills are about one-half that are paid in ours, and we fear that the present reduction in the duty will bring disaster to our industry in Canada.
> Our wages go towards buying food from the farmers, to storekeepers who buy food from the farmers, and to trades which buy food from the farmer. We therefore submit that you thoroughly investigate conditions and use your best endeavours to have the 10 per cent increase removed from woollen and knit goods.

I wish to urge as strongly as possible upon the Minister of Finance that this extra duty of 15 per cent should not be applied until the Canadian product is on the market. The copper and hemp industries are being encouraged by a system of bounties, and it would seem to be the better way to adopt that system in this case.

The minister has renewed his offer of reciprocity with the country to the south of us. If I understand the term reciprocity as applied to trade, it means equality in trade relations. It means that if an article of Canadian origin is admitted free of duty into another country, we make similar concessions with regard to goods from that country. It is surely only reasonable that if duties are imposed on Canadian products that a corresponding duty should be placed on goods coming into the country. The Candian customs tariff in reality is much lower in many instances than the American tariff. This is particularly apparent when we consider farm produce. I have taken the trouble to compare the duties imposed upon a few of our farm products going into the United States with our own customs tariff, and I find the duties are as follows:

Canadian tariff—	American tariff.
Butter, 4c.	8c.
Cheese 3c.	5c.
Eggs 3c. per doz.	9c. per doz.
Hay, $2 per ton.	$4 per ton.
Clover seed 10 per cent. (70c to $1.50 per bushel).	$2.40 per bushel.
Potatoes 20c. per bushel.	30c. per bushel.

Imports for 1922, of these artitcles amounted to—

Butter	6,078,882 lbs.
Cheese	1,883,013 lbs.
Eggs	9,377,769 dozens
Hay	29,008 tons
Clover seed	3,547,080 lbs.
Potatoes	429,543 bush.

The total imports of farm products amounted to $66,890,766 for the year 1922. In the case of potatoes the minister has seen fit to add to the duty. There has been an increase of 15 cents per bushel in the duty on potatoes. If the principle is sound for potatoes why not follow it in all other lines of farm produce? By the imposition of that extra duty the minister has admitted the principle as well as the necessity of protection for our farm produce. There is no reason why a country such as Canada, with a surplus of butter which must be sold in the markets of the world, should import a quantity equal to that surplus. We imported last year nearly $6,000,000 worth of fresh meat when we have a surplus which must be cured and sold abroad. We also imported nearly $4,000,000 of cured meats. Last year we exported $24,000,000 worth of cured meats to find a market abroad. The weakness of the present budget lies in the fact that no further attempt is being made to retain our home markets for our own produce, either manufactured or from the farm. I contend very strongly that if we are to provide adequate protection of our own products there can be no justification for any increase in the British preference. There can be no good reason why a duty should not be imposed high enough to ensure our markets to the Canadian producer.

Mr. PUTNAM: Will the hon. member permit me to ask a question?

Mr. SENN: Certainly.

Mr. PUTNAM: As the matter stands, are we to understand that the hon. member opposes the present increase in the British preference?

Mr. SENN: In certain lines, Mr. Speaker, the increase is not justifiable. I was looking at some of the items and giving my reasons for taking the stand I have taken.

Mr. PUTNAM: I would take it from the hon. member's remarks that he considers that none of it is justified.

Mr. SENN: I would not like to go that far, but I think that in the instances I have mentioned it is not justified.

The announcement of the Finance Minister that it is impossible to balance the present budget and that he did not hope to be able to do so for some time to come is cause for alarm. The fact that Great Britain and the United States have both been able to do so should lead us to consider carefully if the attempt should not be made by the government at all costs. There is urgent need for economy not only by the government but in every walk of life. If we are to prosper we must ultimately get back to the old system of working and saving. We must keep our expenditure within our income. During the war our standards of living gradually became higher because money was plentiful. The great difficulty to-day is in the fact that these new standards and new conditions are making such demands upon our earning power that we find ourselves unable to meet them. It is peculiarly disturbing when the Finance Minister states frankly that he could not keep our expenditure within our income, and that the national debt must go on increasing. It is high time that our governments, our institutions, our business concerns and our private citizens realized the necessity of living within their income and acting accordingly, and only when that time comes will our national prosperity be assured.

Mr. W. J. WARD (Dauphin): It is with a great deal of, shall I say reluctance, that I rise at this late period to take part in this annual family squabble, the budget debate. I feel that practically everything has been said that can be said, but as I have listened with a great deal of interest to the various arguments that have been put forward both for and against protection, which seems to be the hub of the debate, the argument has taken a somewhat zigzag course. My hon. friends to my right argue that the tariff is not high enough. We in this corner of the House argue that it is too high, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has told us that he has taken the middle course. I am not going to worry the House to-night with very much in the way of argument on the tariff. I think there are other matters of greater importance than the tariff, great and all as it may seem.

There is a matter that has been little referred to, yet possibly it took a greater toll from the western producers last year than any other single economic wrong that has been perpetrated on the farmers in the last few years. I refer to the high freight rates that were charged on the Great Lakes last year. I accepted the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) in the early part of the session that it was not within the jurisdiction of the government or of his department to suspend the coasting laws last October when the congestion took place. In looking up the orders in council I find that in 1912 the Minister of Trade and Commerce of that day did suspend the coasting laws without calling the cabinet council together, and that action has never been questioned up to the present time. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce simply remained inactive last October and quietly looked on while the shipping barons of the Great Lakes took from the western grain producers something in the neighbourhood of $20,000,000—at least that statement has been made. I doubt very much if even the excessive tariff rates that have been applied to food and clothing and implements of production in this country for the last 12 months took $20,000,000 of a direct toll from the pockets of the western grain producers.

The explanation given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) is not a sufficient explanation why the coasting laws on the Great Lakes were not suspended last October. I have under my hand the figures of the normal rates, and the rates at which boats were carrying grain in the early part of last summer from Fort William and Port Arthur to the eastern ports. The rate was 2 cents per bushel; yet in the congested period, that is during October and November, a rate of 8 cents a bushel was charged between Fort William and Port Colborne. There was also colected an excess tariff of 15 cents between Port Colborne and Kingston so that it seems to me that there is still due to this House and to the people of Canada an explanation from the Minister of Trade and Commerce why he did not take some action at that time. It appears to me that the shipping barons of this country are running the government, because we find that the government did attempt to take some action in this matter, and immediately the shipping barons of the Great Lakes notified the government that they would contest the ruling of the department. Evidently they frightened the Minister of Trade and Commerce; he conceded their demands, and the coasting laws were not suspended.

I should like to draw the attention of the House to a side of this question that I have not heard mentioned so far in this debate, and that is that Canadian boats were carrying wheat from Fort William to Buffalo for 2 cents a bushel—

Mr. ROBICHAUD: Is my hon. friend not aware that a minister of the Crown cancelled the coastal regulations in 1912 without an order in council?

[Mr. Ward.]

Mr. WARD: Any western member will remember that in the fall of 1912 we had a late harvest, very late threshing, and that very little grain came forward until late in the season, this necessitating a great deal of grain being stored at the head of the lakes. On application being made to the then Minister of Trade and Commerce, the coasting laws were suspended in October of 1912, and they remained suspended until the following June. If my hon. friend will look up the orders in council of that date, he will find that those statements are correct.

As I was saying, while our Canadian boats were carrying grain to Buffalo for 2 cents a bushel, they were charging 3¾ cents a bushel to Canadian ports. Last year 120,000,000 bushels of our Canadian wheat were milled in bond in the United States; going on through the United States; and were exported to the European markets, and there competed with our Canadian-milled flour, thereby placing our Canadian millers at a disadvantage of from 1½ to 1¾ cents a bushel on the grain they milled as against their American competitors.

There is still another side of this question. It has been estimated that the advantage which the American railways received from transporting this flour from Buffalo to New York amounted to $12,700,000. That would have paid a great deal of wages to our Canadian railway men, and it would have considerably relieved the deficit on our Canadian National Railways. In adition to that, it is estimated that $20,000,000 was, may I say, bled from the western grain producers. The Canadian ship owners have stated that they paid the excess freight, which statement, of course, any sane man knows to be pure buncombe; they simply charged it back to the grain shipper, who was naturally the grain producer. Therefore, this $20,000,000 of excess freight that was paid to the shipping barons of the Great Lakes was a direct loss to the wholesalers, retailers and general manufacturing people throughout Canada. Had that amount been returned to the pockets of the producers, it would have been $20,000,000 more money to have been spent, which would have helped a great deal towards keeping our factories open and our workingmen on the job.

This is the point that my hon. friend (Mr. Robichaud) raised a minute ago. Expert legal opinion decided that the cabinet had not the power under the act to make this suspension. However, from reliable sources it is understood that the cabinet, in view of the emergency, determined to take the risk of suspending the coasting laws. This was last October.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: Therefore those regulations were cancelled without an order in council, just by order of the minister himself.

Mr. WARD: I am now referring to October, 1922. Let us see what happened. The shipping barons of Canada promptly notified the cabinet that if the coasting laws were suspended they would get out an injunction to prevent American vessels from trading from one Canadian port to another Canadian port. They, of course, graciously intimated that they would not, however, oppose American ships coming into Fort William and Port Arthur ports to load grain for storage last fall. That, however, had very little effect, because that order came through so late that only some four or five vessels were loaded. This, of course, was not permitted until some 75,000,000 bushels of our grain had been handled from Fort William to eastern ports at this excessive freight rate. In view of what has taken place during the past season, it is up to the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the government to see to it that, if the laws of Canada are not such as will permit this government to control shipping on the Great Lakes and if the shipping barons of Canada are running this government, laws are enacted that will permit the government and not the shipping barons to run the affairs of this country. I bring this matter to the attention of the government in the hope that they will see to it that this cannot occur again. We went home from here a year ago with high hopes that we had again restored the Crowsnest pass agreement as regards grain and grain products, and we had thought that this would go a long way towards saving the situation in western Canada. We see, however, that practically every dollar that was saved through the application of the Crowsnest pass rates, was taken from us through the excess freight rates charged on the Great Lakes.

Statements have been made in this House without very mature consideration by hon. gentlemen opposite and also by some hon. members to my right, that western agriculture has been most selfish in its demands, and so on. Perhaps we are, but I think it would be a good idea if hon. members would come West and study western conditions. Since I have come to Ottawa I have taken advantage of every opportunity to visit eastern Canada and I have gone to nearly every city in this part of the country in the last two years. I was born in Ontario and moved to the West when still a boy; I was one of those emigrants who went out to the West and hewed out a home in the bush. But I have tried to educate myself to eastern conditions, and I think that if hon. gentlemen living in eastern Canada would reciprocate and come West and study conditions out there it would tend to bring about a better mutual understanding. I have often asked myself whether it is going to be possible for this country to be governed by a spirit of compromise long enough to enable us to come to a realization of the situation and be able to keep Canada in one confederation. I notice that hon. gentlemen, from both the East and the West, while conversing in privacy, speak a great deal about secession from the union. I do not know why they should refrain from mentioning these matters on the floor of this House, because this is the place where all such questions should be raised. I, for one, stand absolutely for one solid Canada, for I think that we have the prospects of making this the greatest country in the universe; and I should be very sorry indeed to see anything happen to disrupt the confederation of Canada. But we must take cognizance of the facts, and one of the facts is that there are whole sections of western Canada made up absolutely of English-speaking people and British-born who are talking secession. Why is this? It is because we do not understand one another. It is because eastern Canada does not understand western Canada, nor does the West appreciate the conditions and the circumstances of the East.

It is high time that the governments of the country, and the responsible men in this Dominion, should study the situation as it really does exist with a view to offering some solution of the problem. I believe that the good people of this Dominion will unite and will surmount the difficulties that face them to-day, and that with the help of Providence this great Canada of ours will go forward and be the greatest country in the world. I do think that the people of Canada will yet unite into one great harmonious family so that this shall be the happiest country in the world to live in. When this is the fact then we shall not need any Minister of Immigration or any immigration agents; people will come in without any invitation. But, I repeat, we must take cognizance of the situation.

I have here a paper—I did not send for it, it came to me the other day incidentally—from which it will be seen that over 200 quarter sections in one municipality in Manitoba are to be sold for taxes. It is not one of the best municipalities of the province, nor is it by any means one of the poorest, for they get a fair rainfall; and one would suppose that people ought to be able to make a fair living there. The fact remains, however, that over 200 quarter sections are to be sold in the month of June for taxes. I am sorry that the Minister of Agriculture is not in his place; I was going to say the misrepresentative of agriculture. I listened with some astonishment to that hon. gentleman's speech the other night as he referred to conditions in Saskatchewan, and I challenge him to prove many of the assertions he made then. Conditions in Manitoba are no worse than then they are in Saskatchewan. I am not very familiar with conditions in Saskatchewan but I do know that the freight rate on wheat is 4 cents less in Manitoba than it is in Saskatchewan while the freight rate on cattle is very much less, as well as on other natural products from Manitoba. So that in turn they must pay higher freight on manufactured goods shipped into Saskatchewan. I am quite sure, Sir, that conditions are very similar in Saskatchewan to what they are in Manitoba. We have the greatest country in the world in western Canada; no part of the universe produces so much wealth per capita as that portion of the Dominion. But what is the matter? I was speaking a few months ago to a business man and I asked him whether he was aware that 85 per cent of all the farms of western Canada were operated under mortgage, and he replied that he knew that 90 per cent of them were mortgaged. Now, if 90 per cent of all the farms in the West are being worked under this handicap, and we are paying 10 per cent interest on our money, can any hon. gentleman not appreciate the position that we are in? Sir Henry Thornton on his first visit to western Canada, speaking in the city of Brandon, said: "In spite of my very short visit and my limited opportunity of studying conditions, I appreciate this fact, that the people of western Canada will never successfully compete with the more fortunately situated peoples of the world so long as they are hemmed in 1,500 miles from tidewater." That is only one of our problems. The problem of carrying on agriculture and paying 10 per cent interest is the greatest one that we have facing us to-day; and while the institutions of the country, the manufacturers, the banks, the mortgage companies, the insurance companies, in fact all big corporations, all tell us that they cannot operate and pay more than 6 per cent on working capital, although they are highly profitable, how in the world is agriculture, which is much less profitable, going to survive and pay 10 per cent interest on the money it owes or on its working capital.

If we make agriculture prosperous, it will follow that the other industries will take their places; make agriculture prosperous and you cannot keep prosperity away from the doors of the other industries of Canada. Personally I would be loath to say anything that was not respectful and that did not 10 p.m. show a regard for our Canadian industries. But I do think that agriculture and the other industries must go hand in hand. They are like a four or six horse team in front of a plough. If one of the horses is unable to keep up his end, the whole works go wrong, and that is what is wrong with agriculture in Canada to-day. Agriculture is one of the team that must take the country forward to prosperity. I think that all we need is equity and concerted action and prosperity is assured.

There is another matter I want to refer to of which I have heard very little. Possibly I was responsible for bringing it to the attention of parliament in the first place. I refer to the gratuities that were paid to the officials of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern directors and officials. I did not think that the explanation given by the hon. gentleman who was then acting Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) was all that parliament had a right to expect. He made the statement, in reply to a question by one of the Progressive members, that the information had been forced upon parliament. The facts were they were forced to give the statement to parliament. Five months had elapsed between the time the gratuities were paid and the time the information was submitted to parliament and no action had been taken; and I have no hesitation in saying that no action would have been taken had the matter not been brought to the attention of parliament. I noticed that while the Minister of Railways took to himself, or rather to the government, the credit for bringing the information before the House, a little pamphlet which I read with a great deal of interest, entitled "The Mirror", also claimed the credit for having brought the matter to the attention of the country. It might be of interest to the minister to know that I could have given to the House all the information that we did get long before I asked the question. I think that a government which was elected pledged to economy should have shown a greater interest in the affairs of the country than to allow nearly $400,000 to be paid out to men who may have thought that they had earned it, but who certainly were not entitled to it. However, I see the government has decided to appoint a commission, and I hope its personnel will be such as to ensure a real investigation and bring the guilty to task.

A week ago I visited Montreal and had the pleasure of seeing a ship loaded with cattle. In fact I saw the super-structure built on the ship for the accommodation of these cattle. It will be recollected that immediately cattle were offered for shipment to the British Isles the freight rate went up $7.50 per head. On my return from Montreal I went to the trouble of figuring out the cost of building the super-structure and in conversation with the agent I ascertained the operating costs. I shall not weary the House with detailed figures, but in my judgment cattle could be transported from Montreal to Liverpool at a profit at $12 per head; and yet we are paying $22.50. I was informed that this particular boat was expected to make six trips during the season. Of course, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) told us that he did not carry shipping space in his vest pocket, and perhaps that is all the interest he has in the matter, but I think this is something that might well be looked into. Of course, if $22.50 a head is the lowest possible rate we should not kick very much, but, in my judgment we are paying $10.50 too much.

Turning to another subject, it seems to me that we have a right to expect something more from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) than that he should throw up his hands and say that he is hopelessly stuck, that nothing more can be done. For that is precisely the attitude he has taken in saying that Canada must expect to go on for a number of years getting deeper and deeper into debt. I think the government should accept full responsibility for bringing about drastic economies. It is not possible for the average member to intelligently criticize the estimates. The government brings them down and must be responsible for their reduction to the lowest possible point. I think that we had every right to expect the government to bring down a balanced budget this session in view of the enormous taxation we are burdened with to-day. The total debt upon which we are paying interest is something over ten billion dollars. It is a tremendous sum. The interest charge alone last year amounted to something over $800,000,000. In addition to this heavy burden, the taxes of all kinds paid by this little handful of people in 1922 amounted to practically one billion dollars. I ask the serious thinking business men of this country, do they think it possible for us to continue doing business on this basis? At the present rate of increasing, our national debt in twenty-five years will have reached the staggering total of twenty-five billion dollars. I am sure that few of us can really comprehend such enormous sums, we speak in terms of billions without really understanding their serious import; but at the same time I do think the Minister of Finance should change his attitude of despair, take the bull by the horns and bring about such economies in administration as will at least balance the budget.

I would like to refer to the loan floated in New York last April. My suggestion may seem somewhat radical, but I make it for what it is worth. Many schemes have been put before the Banking and Commerce committee, most of which have been scouted as ridiculous and impracticable. But all the same, certain facts are basic, and I should like the Minister of Finance and the business men of this country to give me their opinion on this suggestion: What would have been the effect if instead of floating that loan a year ago and pledging the real credit of Canada—that is, the ability of the people to produce—to foreign money-lenders in order to get a United States certificate with ten figures on it, and upon which at the expiration of the term of the loan we will have paid $157,500,000 in interest,—I ask, instead of doing that what would have happened had we issued a Canadian certificate to ourselves and saved that interest charge? I direct that question more particularly to the Minister of Finance, and I hope at some later date he will give the House his explanation, because to me there is only one hope for the country, and that is to utilize our own wealth for our own development. We must stop borrowing money by the hundreds of millions of dollars or we can never expect to get out of our present financial difficulties. Failure to produce the bare necessities of life for the last two or three years is not the problem that is facing Canada to-day. The spectre that haunts us by day and disturbs us by night is Debt. We have all acquired the pernicious habit of doing business with borrowed money—governments, municipalities and individuals are alike guilty; they have all gone astray in that regard. Not long ago I read an article written by Douglas Terstoile in which the writer pictured the effect of debt upon individuals, "How it carves the open countenance into a wrinkled face, what meanness what deception, and how like a knife it stabs the dishonest heart!" I know many men who two or three years ago you could not have persuaded to lie or be guilty of double dealing or any other meanness, but who to-day will lie to their bankers and their merchants and be guilty of double dealing with their neighbours. If that is the deplorable situation that is developing in this country, again I ask every thinking man and woman: Do you not think it requires the most serious consideration on the part of our business men and especially of the governement? In the face of this deplorable condition of affairs I should like to see a more serious attitude taken towards the solution of these grave problems, I should like to see the government attack them with vigour instead of throwing up their hands and saying, "We are hopelessly stuck in the mud."

Mr. J. F. WHITE (London): In continuing the debate I do not wish to cover all the points in connection with the budget. I shall touch on only a few which I consider of particular interest.

I think the budget is a source of disappointment to the country in general in that it does not come more nearly to being a balanced estimate. Last year the Minister of Finance in his budget speech referred to the situation as a very serious one indeed, and said he would soon have to make plans for the reduction of our debt. Now the taxation which we are bearing at the present time is as much as our people can stand, as much as they are willing to stand. It is as high as international competition will allow it to go. There therefore remains the alternative of reducing expenses.

At this date, four and a half years after the armistice, we are not reducing our debt. We are feeling the disappointment of adding this year from fifty to sixty million dollars to our debt, while other countries are improving their condition. The United States is reducing its debt somewhat, and Great Britain in spite of all her woes has reduced her debt considerably. A year ago the estimated expenditure out of consolidated revenue was decreased in round figures by about $128,000,000, while this year the decrease is not quite $47,000,000. It is some reduction, I admit, but not much considering the circumstances. I would also point out that last year there was an estimated increase in civil government of $51,000, and this year it is further increased by $266,000. There is also the item of superannuation, which increased last year by $68,000 and this year by the further sum of $225,000. I am not objecting to the principle of superannuation, but I fear that many public servants are being superannuated while they are still capable of rendering many years of good and faithful public service. These conditions do not indicate the drastic retrenchment which the times demand. The items quoted, of course, may be small, but the trend is in the wrong direction, and the organization of all government departments might well be scrutinized so that further retrenchment could be made in our expenses.

I notice that the minister proposes an increase in the duty on raisins and dried currants. That increased duty on the basis of our importations for the year ending March 31, 1922, will mean an additional cost to the Canadian consumer of $813,000 per year, while the change will probably mean quite a decrease in the customs revenue. I understand that this change in duty is proposed on account of Australia making efforts to establish a market for her goods within the Empire. I believe we should make every effort to foster trade within the Empire, not only with the Mother Country but with the other dominions comprising the Empire; but it will take considerable trade development with Australia to offset this addition to the Canadian cost of living occasioned by this duty, and we look to the government to secure conditions, either after the session or during the Economic Conference in October, which will be of benefit to Canadian trade with Australia. No doubt, if these conditions are secured, it will be along the line of an extension of the sale of our manufactured goods. May I express the hope that the arrangement with Australia will be of greater advantage to Canada than the French treaty is likely to be.

It is interesting to note that despite the famous Liberal platform, the minister is proposing to encourage the establishment of industries by means of imposing a tariff. It is also interesting to note that the minister, in his endeavour to establish the artificial silk industry, levies a customs duty, while to encourage the hemp industry a bounty is the means adopted. He has not explained why a bounty will not serve the silk industry development as well as that of hemp; neither has he explained to the House to whom this bounty on hemp is to be paid, whether to the farmer who grows the hemp or to the manufacturing firm which makes the yarn or twine. I would judge, from reading clause 3 of the resolution, that the cordage firm is to receive the bounty.

The minister has expressed the opinion that binder twine and other products will be ready for the market by July, 1925. It would seem that he is desirous of retracing the steps taken by the Liberal government in abolishing the duties levied on binder twine. If the manufacturer of hemp or binder twine is to receive a bounty, in what position will the present manufacturer of twine be placed? Given an equal output of hemp per year for the five years in which the bounty is to be paid, the manufacturer will receive an average of one cent per pound for his output. This will put the present manufacturer, who has neither bounty nor customs protection, at a disadvantage of about 10 per cent.

I have been wondering if the member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) will rise in his place in committee and protest against this unjust discrimination against a manufacturing firm in his own constituency. It is to be noted that the limit suggested by the minister to be paid in any one year on account of this bounty is $200,000, which on an average will provide for a bounty on 20,000,000 pounds of twine.

Last year Canada imported 50,000,000 pounds of binder twine. Why is it limited? Is this provision for the benefit of one firm only, or otherwise? What guarantee has the minister that this industry will be self-supporting in five years, or is it the hope of those who are interested in its establishment that the bounty will be extended?

The manufacture of binder twine in Canada has a tragic history. This article prior to 1897 bore a duty of 12½ per cent; that duty was reduced in 1898 to 10 per cent and in 1899 wiped out altogether by the Liberal party then in power. At that time Canada had twenty-four or twenty-five factories making twine but as a result of the free entry all went out of business but three. Two of these are branches of American industries, I understand, and have other lines and the binder twine business is a very small part of their turnover. Those factories which disappeared did not sell out to a larger company or a trust; eleven went into liquidation; eight dismantled their plants and went out of business, and two or three were destroyed by fire. In spite of the abolition of the duty, prices did not decline, but advanced instead.

I have figures furnished me by a hardware merchant in central Ontario, who deals in twine in a large way, which show that the average retail price of binder twine for the seven years prior to the removal of the duty, that is from 1892 to 1898 inclusive, was 8½ cents per pound, while for the next sixteen years, between the abolition of the duty and the war, the average price was 12¼ cents per pound.

It may be argued that all commodities increased in value to the same extent, but that is not the case. Take for example, iron and steel, which being one of the basic materials is generally recognized as a pretty safe trade barometer to follow. Bar iron and steel was quoted in Ontario in the seven year period, previously referred to, at an average of $1.71 per 100 pounds, while in the sixteen year period referred to the average price was $1.93 per 100 pounds. These prices show an increased price on iron and steel of 11·4 per cent, while binder twine, when competition was largely eliminated, rose 45 per cent in price. I believe similar destruction of competition in any line of manufacture will produce price inflation.

In conversation with a friend who came from the Philippine Islands last summer, he told me that the raw material for twine was last year a drug on the market, and the price paid for it was extremely low, yet the price of twine is still high. Now it may be asked by some how it is that the one concern which makes most of the twine manufactured in Canada is able to continue in business. In almost every line of business there is some one firm which is more efficient, perhaps, as to buying and selling, and in the management of its plant, than any other, and is thus able to produce at lower costs than its competitors. This may be the case in connection with the firm in question. The only other reason I know of is that there may be some understanding between the manufacturers in the United States and the Canadian manufacturers as to division of the market and the price charged for twine, which enables the Canadian firm to continue business and, at the same time, by that very action to allay any criticism or fear on the part of the consumer that he is not getting the lowest price at which the commodity can be sold. If that is the case evidently the scheme has been very successful, because I have not noticed any mention made of binder twine at any of the deliberations of the special committee appointed to inquire into agricultural conditions.

On inquiring into this matter of binder twine, I secured some figures from the Bureau of Statistics which may be interesting. In the year ending March 31, 1923, Canada manufactured 31,864,000 pounds of twine, valued at $3,483,000, or 10.9 cents per pound. We imported from the United States 46,927,000 pounds to a value of $4,820,000, or 10.3 cents per pound; from the United Kingdom, chiefly from Ireland, over 3,000,000 pounds, valued at $379,000, or 12.4 cents per pound. We exported 7,520,000 pounds which figures, when worked out, show that Canada produced 43 per cent only of the binder twine used during the year. In previous years the percentage has gone as low as 26 or 27.

I have heard hon. members of this House grow eloquent on more than one occasion when discussing our export business, particularly with reference to agricultural implements, claiming that the Canadian manufacturers sold their goods for export much cheaper than they did for home consumption, the argument being that the tariff protection under which they operated was excessive and enabled them to overcharge the Canadian consumer. I have figures from the Bureau of Statistics which show that the same price conditions existed in the case of binder twine on which there is no duty whatever. The Canadian production of binder twine in 1922-23 was valued at 10.9 cents per pound. The United States imports were valued at 10.3 cents per pound, and imports from the United Kingdom at 12.4 cents per pound. Canadian exports of twine to Argentine in the same time were one million pounds sold at $90,000, which is 9 cents per pound. Canadian exports to Denmark amounted to 251,000 pounds, also valued at 9 cents per pound. There were some exports to the United Kingdom at less than 9 cents per pound. Evidently the critics of the customs tariff will have to look elsewhere for the cause of this difference between the price for home consumption and the export price as far as binder twine is concerned, and, I think, other commodities as well.

Now, the Minister of Finance in the budget speech has declared for tariff stability. He says that "broadly speaking it is possible to have reasonable assurance of stability of tariff. That this assurance is desirable as business men do not care to embark on enterprises which may be imperilled by frequent changes of tariff." This statement is a correct one, but as I listened to the speeches of the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of the Interior, I came to the conclusion that there were various grades of stability. These two gentlemen seem to think that stability for this year only was all that was desired, and I suppose that if we were to hear a number of speeches from the government side of the House on this question there would be as many definitions of stability as there were interpretations of the Liberal code of ethics in the campaign of 1921. In this connection I would like to quote from a speech delivered by Sir Wilfrid Laurier at a meeting in Toronto in 1906. That statesman said:

> It is absolutely essential to the capitalist, to the working man, to the business man, and the industrialist that he should know exactly the conditions under which he invests his capital, that he should know that it will be invested under a condition that will not likely be overturned, but I am able to say that in our regime the manufacturers all sleep soundly, and never fear interference with the tariff. We have made very few changes in the duties.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I can hardly believe that the manufacturers of this country will be lulled to very sound sleep by the assurance of the Finance Minister that the tariff is now stable, particularly when so many members of the present government are not of his opinion. The Minister of Finance proposes to insert two clauses in the tariff resolutions dealing with the prospect of reciprocal trade with the United States. Ever since the United States abrogated the original Reciprocity treaty in 1866—although after eleven years of the treaty Canada had an adverse trade balance of over nine millions—it has been impossible, for one reason or another to make such an arrangement with the United States. Time after time Canadian ministers went to Washington with this end in view, but returned empty handed, till on one occasion Sir Wilfred Laurier stated there would be no more pilgrimages to Washington. He did sanction one more pilgrimage, and out of that came the proposed reciprocity agreement of 1911. That agreement, however, did not receive the endorsation of the Canadian people. Even last year, I believe in February 1922, the Minister of Finance himself visited Washington and made another attempt at an inter-trade agreement with the United States, but he did not receive any encouragement. The Fordney-McCumber tariff was passed by the United States government last year without any consideration whatever for the interests of Canada. It was passed largely at the behest of the American agricultural interests, and this measure practically ended the possibility of any large amounts of Canadian produce going to the American market. The United States government, of course, had the right to establish their tariff at any elevation they saw fit. If the Minister of Finance would word his resolution to the effect "that if the United States will reduce the tariff against Canada, particularly on food stuffs, to something approximating the Canadian tariff, we will take it as an indication that the United States are willing to do business with us on a fairly equitable basis," then the resolution would be much more deserving of support. It is time the Canadian should give up passing pious wishes, give up the idea of dependence on the United States, and act as though he could take care of his own affairs. That course of action, will, in my judgment, have the desired result—the securing of better trade relations—and get it by the shortest route.

As to the amendment moved by the member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) I cannot support it as I consider the principle involved is detrimental to Canada's interests. I fear, too, that the one who draughted the clauses with reference to providing the revenue that would be lost in the event of the policy embodied in the amendment coming into force, did not give very serious consideration to the situation in regard to the income tax. Canada's present tax on incomes is about the same on the smaller incomes as the United States tax. It is much higher on the larger incomes, however, and there is no surer way to drive capital to the United States than to tax the Canadian income at a higher rate than obtains in the country to the south.

As to "unearned incomes," that is a new phrase to me. I have heard of "unearned increment," but I will have to get a better definition of "unearned incomes" than I have at present before I shall be able to understand it, unless it means the indemnity paid to members of parliament. It would appear that there are at least two members of the Progressive party who are quite willing to have their indemnity reduced, but only to the extent of 12½ per cent.

The House has been treated from time to time to certain Socialistic utterances which I consider do not make for solidity and progress of business enterprises or business conditions in this country, and to those who have made these speeches, and particularly to the member for Centre Winnipeg, I would commend the words of Abraham Lincoln on questions of this kind:

> Capital has its rights which are as worthy of protection as any other rights. Nor is it denied that there is and probably will be a relation between labor and capital producing mutual benefits.
> "The strongest bond of human sympathy outside of the family relation should be the one uniting all working people of all nations, and tongues and kindreds. Nor should this lead to a war upon property or the owners of property. Property is the fruit of labor, property is desirable, property is a positive good in the world. That some should be rich shows that others may become rich, and hence is just encouragement to industry and enterprise.
> "Let not him who is houseless pull down the house of another, but let him work diligently and build one for himself, thus by example assuring that his own sholl he safe from violence when built.

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince, P.E.I.): In common with other hon. members who have spoken on this subject, I wish to convey to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) my congratulations on the presentation of his seventeenth budget. We may differ in regard to some features of the budget presented by the hon. minister, but I think we will all give him credit for sincerity of purpose in his long political career and on this as on former occasions all will concede that he has done his very best, or what he believes to be his best, in the interests of Canada as a whole. We have heard considerable criticism of the budget along different lines. To my mind a great deal of this criticism has been more for political purposes than with the idea of presenting something really constructive. We have heard the financial aspect of the budget attacked, and we have been told on different occasions by members on the other side of the House that we have no war burdens at the present time, and that the statement of the Finance Minister that the deficit of this country had been reduced from some $674,000,000 in 1920 to $47,000,000 at the present time did not indicate a good showing. We were told that the budget should balance and the great argument was that we had no war burden.

I want to take exception to that statement, and to place on Hansard figures which I think will convince the House and the country at large that the greatest burden we are carrying to-day is the result of the war debt. In the matter of interest charges alone, we find that in 1914 our total interest charges were $12,893,000. At the present time we find our total interest charges are $138,000,000. I got the information direct from the Finance department to-day that over $100,000,000 of that interest is due directly to our war debt. How hon. members on the other side can say we have no war burden at the present time is more than I can imagine. Our total war indebtedness is the staggering sum of $1,688,000,000 due directly to the war, and there are interest charges going on yearly, and will go on till this generation passes away, no doubt, and still we are asked to-day by an amendment to wipe out a source of revenue which is yielding us now the round sum of $135,000,000 or practically enough money to take care of these interest charges on the war debt. The situation is a very serious one and, I think before we cast our votes on this budget we should give it very careful consideration.

Apart from the large amount of interest that we are called upon to pay on that tremendous debt we have the soldiers' civil reestablishment to take care of and we find that, including the care of patients, treatment, pay and allowances, vocational pay and allowances, salaries, unemployment relief and cost of living bonuses, we have a yearly expenditure of $12,463,081. We find that we pay out in pensions $32,612,243, or a total of $45,168,029, which is paid yearly directly in pensions to our soldiers and in the running expenses of the offices, and so forth. This $45,168,000 added to the $100,000,000 of interest makes a total war expenditure from these items alone of $145,168,000 yearly. Those are staggering figures, and it is a debt that it is impossible for us to get away from. Nobody is complaining, Mr. Speaker, of the pensions to the soldiers or the soldiers' re-establishment, in taking care of our men who served overseas. We are only too glad to pay to those heroes this amount of money and I am sure we would be willing to increase it if we possibly could.

When, Mr. Speaker, hon. members on the other side of the House tell us that to-day we have no war burden, I wish to contradict the statement, and I think I have successfully refuted it in the figures I have placed before the House. In view of those facts, and under present conditions, I consider the budget in its financial aspect makes a mighty good showing, and I believe, as I said at the outset, that the Finance Minister, in presenting the budget, has done the very best he can, taking into consideration the diversified interests of our country and the obligations we are called upon to meet. The budget may not meet the views of a lot of Liberal members on this side, and, speaking personally, there is possibly no one in this chamber who would wish to see a greater reduction in the tariff, if it were possible, or to see a greater measure of reciprocal trade with the United States, than myself. But those things, to my mind, are not possible under present conditions. Still we must admit that since the present Finance Minister assumed his responsible position the tendency has been for a continuous lowering of the tariff, with a strong desire for reciprocal trade arrangements with the United States. Now, while some hon. members may make light of this move, it is a move in the right direction, and we do not know what good may come of it. It is a standing offer, made in good faith, and the New York Times speaks of it as follows:

> New York, May 15.—The Times, in an editorial on the reciprocity proposal made by Hon. W. S. Fielding, Canadian Minister of Finance, endorses reciprocity between Canada and the United States and says "there is every reason why it would be absurd for Canada and the United States to embark upon a tariff war."
> "There is no geographical barrier between the United States and Canada," the paper continues, "and the facility of intercommunication is such that the free and uninterrupted interchange of products between these two nations is to the advantage of both. America needs Canada and Canada needs the United States. During the year 1922 nearly 40 per cent of Canada's exports went to the United States and more than 65 per cent of her imports came from this country. Canada can well absorb more American goods and the United States can offer Canada a much greater market for certain of her products.

This coming from such an important newspaper as the New York Times must not be passed over lightly, and no doubt it conveys the impression which is prevalent to a large extent in the United States. As I said at the outset, we do not know what good may come from this standing offer which has been put into the budget, and which we are to vote on in the course of a day or two. What more could a Liberal or a Progressive ask than the offer that has been made to the United States in the hope they will before long see as we do, that it would be to the benefit of both countries for us to have reciprocal trade? We might go on and discuss the question at some length, and some might contend that immediately upon the opening of the doors, our country would be flooded with the farm products of the Uinted States. I could never see the matter in that light. We cannot ship products into a country where there is no demand for them, and the very fact that we grow largely our own foodstuffs, I think answers that question, and proves that there would be really no market in Canada for American farm products. Another feature that has possibly been overlooked is that a large amount of the profits of the Canadian farmers is used up in the long haul over our railroads, whereas with reciprocal trade arrangements north and south, both eastern and western Canada could have an interchange of trade with a very low cost of transportation charges. Therefore. from every angle, I think this standing offer that has been made is to our advantage, and why our friends have moved an amendment along the same lines when this offer is made in the budget, is really more than I can understand.

Some splendid points have been brought out by different speakers. One thing in the budget that has been emphasized by members from the Maritime provinces is the benefit that will accrue to maritime ports through the ten per cent increase in the British preference on goods coming into Canadian ports, when the duty is over fifteen per cent. This should mean greatly increased business for our maritime ports, and it should greatly enhance our railway earnings in transporting these goods to the different centres throughout the Dominion.

The reduction in the tariff on sugar has been reflected very quickly in the sugar market, and we find to-day that sugar is being sold at from 40 to 50 cents a hundred pounds less than it was before the budget speech was brought down the other day As was pointed out by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), this will mean a saving of over $2,500,000 to the consumers of this country.

A great deal has been said with regard to the expenditure of our country, and very little has been said regarding economy, although some speakers have referred to it. There is room for economy all along the line in the different departments of our civil government. I am not criticizing this government; every government is guilty of the same mistake; but we are trying to develop too many activities that, in my humble opinion, are not needed, and we are doing work years before it is needed and possibly work that will not be needed in our generation. Let the departments get down to actual needs and not do work in useless experiments. In this way we shall save the country millions of dollars. No man would think of running his business in the way in which every government runs the business of the country, and we as elected representatives of the people should be just as careful as if it was our own business, and even more so, when we have to tax the other fellow to pay the bill. We should have a regular stocktaking in all the departments, and see if a tremendous saving could not be effected for our country. At the time when these activities were started, the revenues of our country were, perhaps, able to stand the expenditure; but now that we are in a different position and until our finances are greatly improved, every effort should be made to curb expenditures on every side.

I trust I may be pardoned if I refer to a few expenditures on which I believe a saving could be made. My viewpoint may not be correct; but in the Maritime provinces we look with some suspicion at the large expenditures that are made in the different departments in connection with some provinces of western Canada. In passing the estimates, we were asked to pass an item of $261,475 for irrigation purposes. This is a very large sum of money. In the eastern provinces we wonder why the government is called upon to expend such a large sum of money. Why should the provincial governments not do this work themselves? I am not in a position to say whether, under some prior arrangement with the western provinces, this government is bound to carry out schemes of irrigation for the different provinces; but I just wish to point out that apart from the small subsidy that we received for Prince Edward Island, we get very little assistance along any of the lines that are indicated in the Auditor General's report. Take, for instance, the surveys for water powers alone. On measuring streams and rivers in this country, streams and rivers which, I venture to say, will never be developed, we spent last year $319,885. If the streams and water powers of this country are to be developed, why not let the organizations or business concerns that are going to use this power make these investigations themselves? I do not believe any good business man would think of promoting any large business without making a thorough investigation of the water-power himself. He would not take any government report. Those are items which, to my mind, might be pared down, especially during those years when we are called upon to pay the huge expenditures which I have just mentioned in connection with our war burdens.

I am also informed that on those large water-powers that have been developed to some extent by this government, not one dollar has yet been collected by way of revenue. There is under way, I believe, a proposition whereby some fifty cents per horse-power is to be charged, or some other similar small charge is to be made, but as yet no revenue has accrued to this government from the development of those water-powers.

As regards the question of immigration, I do not believe forced immigration is or ever will be of any value to any country, and still the Auditor General's report of last year shows an expenditure of $251,896 for immigration purposes. Are we justified under present conditions in spending such a large sum of money in that department?

The sum of $194,189 has been spent in connection with reclamation of land. I am not well enough posted to discuss this question of reclamation of land; but I understand that no practical results have accrued from it. A number of the men employed in these departments, the moment they are appointed by the Civil Service Commission, immediately surround themselves with a staff of officers and engage a large number of officials to do work whether it is necessary or not. In my opinion the time is coming when a real stocktaking of these departments will have to be made in order to see that not one dollar is spent that is not absolutely needed.

With regard to the question of immigration, I have already stated that I do not believe in the principle of forced immigration; I do not think that such immigration is of any use to a country. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, we spent last year $932,000 to take care of the unemployed in this country, and in the face of that expenditure we are asked to vote large sums for immigration purposes. I venture to say that nearly every dollar of that $932,000 has been spent west of this city; I am sure that not 5 cents of it was spent in Prince Edward Island. Yet, in view of these facts, we are asked again to go into a large immigration scheme.

Mr. MARTELL: Who got the benefit of it?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I believe that in the Maritime provinces there are people who, owing to the almost depleted condition of the fisheries, would be willing to try their fortunes in western Canada if they were given some assistance by our Immigration department; but as matters stand to-day no native of this country who wishes to emigrate to the West can receive any such assistance. I think that provision should be made in connection with our immigration regulations that a man in eastern Canada who desires to try his fortunes in the West might be afforded some assistance in this direction. We have as good a class of people in the Maritime provinces as can be found anywhere, and I know they would make good. I know that a large number of our men in eastern Canada are going to the United States just because they have not the wherewithal to make a start in western Canada.

Another matter we look upon with suspicion is the Air Force. Is it really necessary for this country to spend $1,660,822 in experimenting with flying machines which have not yet proven of commercial value to the country? In the event of war, I venture to say that the experiments carried on in the United States and Great Britain will have provided means that will be ample to give us any information that we may stand in need of. We all hope that the day is far distant when flying machines for war purposes will be needed, and I submit that in the meantime such a heavy expenditure as this is not justifiable. I do not wish to be misunderstood; but we have heard a great deal about economy, and I have endeavoured in a brief way to indicate some instances in connection with which I believe that some measure of economy might well be practised. In a return brought down in this House this year there appears some valuable information. This return is dated February 12, 1923, and gives the total number of employees in the inside Civil Service up to March 31, in each year from 1900 to 1922. The Civil Service Commission, I believe, is an institution that is growing away and beyond the dimensions ever dreamed of by its founders. I have no quarrel with the Civil Service, and I believe that the Civil Service Commission is a body that is needed; but I do not believe that it can be defended in its present status. Do we realize that whereas in 1908 there were only five employees in the commission, to-day there are 220, and that in the former year while there was an expenditure of $4,329 to-day it is $342,000? I do not think it was ever the intention of any government of this country that this organization should attain such proportions. As I said before, immediately upon any branch of work being taken up, the commission as well as other branches of the government service begin to organize a staff and fortify themselves with officials; they entrench themselves in a position in which they think they will be secure. Now, in the evidence submitted to the committee inquiring into the Civil Service, Sir Joseph Pope, Under-Secretary of State, said—

The Acting SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil): I must draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that the rules of the House do not permit of reference to the evidence taken before any special committee before such committee's report has been submitted.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I regret the transgression, Mr. Speaker; I will refrain from quoting the evidence. However, we know that a great deal of information has been gleaned which will be at the disposal of the House and of the public in a short time. Now, the different departments of government have greatly increased in cost, within recent years. The Department of Labour in 1910 had some 24 employees; in 1921 there were 105; and the increase in dollars and cents has been from $34,000 to $256,000. All along the line it is practically the same. I am glad to know, however, that since the present government has taken office there has been not only a reduction in the staff, but a large reduction in the expenditure of each department. In the Department of Justice there were 42 employees in 1900; to-day there are 208; and the cost was $36,000 then as compared with $270,000 now; and as I pointed out before, the number of employees in connection with the Civil Service Commission has increased from 5 in 1908 to 220 at the present time. The Department of External Affairs shows the same results. In the Department of the Interior, the Mines Branch, the number of employees has increased from 51 to 250, and the expenditure from $65,000 to $605,000. My object in submitting these figures is to show the tremendous cost of the expense of government in the different departments, which to the ordinary layman appears to be beyond all the necessities of these departments. I firmly believe that a reduction in the staff and in the cost of operation could be made in every direction. We have a great many committees in parliament, but I believe that we want an economy committee in this House to look carefully into the different departments and to submit a report, with a view to ascertaining whether some saving cannot be effected in the directions I have suggested.

With regard to the Canadian National Railways, we believe in eastern Canada that there is already a decided improvement in the situation. The railway situation to which we took great exception regarding the management for the past few years has been greatly remedied in the past year. We in the Maritime provinces were united in our request that we should have more control and the eastern division placed back at Moncton. We are pleased that this has been done, and that Mr. L. S. Brown, one of the most competent railway officials in the entire service, has been placed in charge, with the result that already a great measure of relief has been given and a confidence restored that argues well for the future of the road.

Now in passing, just let me say that if our officials will realize the responsibility of their positions and that the success of our railway lies largely in their hands, we may hope for a fair measure of success. I remember reading a motto that the owner of a railway had posted up in all his cars--"Courtesy costs nothing." It might be well for the officials of the Canadian National Railways to place a similar notice all over our system, as we are competing with a company that has given a great deal of attention to this phase of the operation of its lines.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Does the hon. gentleman say that the officials of the Canadian National Railways are not courteous?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince, P.E.I.): No. I said at the outset—

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Then I do not think the hon. gentleman should have expressed the opinion we have just listened to, because the experience of this House and of the people generally is that there is just as much courtesy on the Canadian National Railway as on any other line.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince, P.E.I.): I quite agree with my hon. friend, but I do not think that a suggestion for even more courtesy will hurt. I think the success of our National Railways lies largely in the hands of the officials, and I have every confidence that they will not be lacking in courtesy; but, as I have said, courtesy costs nothing, and undoubtedly the travelling public demands it more and more.

I may be pardoned here if I make reference to a remark that appeared in the papers, attributed to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) to the effect that any concession that was obtained by the Crowsnest pass agreement was forced on the government by the Progressive party. I wish to take exception to this remark. No one knows better than the hon. gentleman himself, who was a member of that committee, the true situation. He knows that it was due to the vote of the Liberals on that committee that they were enabled to obtain the relief that was given on the rates, not because they were forced by the hon. members of the Progressive party, but because they believed it was only fair and just that some relief should be given. I think if the hon. member made the remark attributed to him he owes this side of the House an apology, and I would be glad to give him the opportunity now of doing justice to the Liberals who assisted him and his colleagues on that occasion.

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Speaker, I understand that this matter was brought to the attention of the House on a former occasion, and therefore I may be allowed now to offer a few words of explanation. During a sitting in camera of the Transportation Costs committee last session, after a Conservative member had spoken for some time explaining the change of ideas in regard to the Crowsnest pass arrangement, I whispered to him when he sat down—I was close beside him—"We forced you to it". I said this in a jocular tone, but unfortunately his temper got the better of him, for he jumped to his feet and immediately announced what I had said. I think the member for Prince Edward Island was present, but he did not hear me make the remark, which was intended only for the ear of one gentleman. I hope there will be no further misunderstanding. It was an unfortunate remark and I admit I should not have made it, but it was made as an aside and never meant to go any further than that particular gentleman and would not have gone further if he had not lost his temper for the moment and spluttered it out to the whole gathering. That is the explanation I have to make of the incident referred to. In regard to giving credit to the Liberal members who assisted the Progressive members from the West on that occasion, I am prepared to make this statement on the floor of the House: During the recess at no time and in no place did I ever speak in connection with the Crowsnest pass agreement and what took place in committee and in this House without giving credit to the members of the Liberal party who stood by us at that time. Not only so, but I think I mentioned specifically three Liberal members—I cannot remember their constituencies for the moment—who stood with us all through and assisted in getting the matter brought before the members in such a way that they were inclined to support our motion.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince, P.E.I.): I think the hon. gentleman is willing to admit that so far as I am concerned my stand on that committee was fair and above board.

Mr FORKE: Undoubtedly.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince, P.E.I.): I thank the hon. gentleman for his explanation and I accept it in all good faith.

Last year in making a few observations on the budget I referred to the natural resources of the western provinces. We are still of the same mind in eastern Canada. We believe that we have an equity in the natural resources in the West, and we believe that when this matter is finally adjusted we shall receive just treatment. I could go into this matter more fully but I think sufficient has been placed on Hansard in the last few years to show that we have claims along these lines, and I have no doubt that the matter will be satisfactorily adjusted when the time comes.

As representing a farming community I wish to say that the farmers of our province have passed through just as trying a period possibly as the farmers of western Canada. We have been forced to take very low prices for our products, and transportation has been so high that it has been almost impossible to place our products on the market at a profit. However, we have a very industrious people and our farmers who take up diversified farming pay a great deal of attention to dairying, to the production of pork, eggs and different products of the farm that will find the best market we have, and in that way they are able to tide over a period of depression such as we have experienced for the past few years. They are also endeavouring to put on the market the very best products that can possibly be produced, and I think it is up to the farmers of all Canada at this time to use their best endeavours along that line. The lower your market goes the better the product required and too much attention cannot be given by the farmers of this Dominion for putting our finished products on the market in the very best possible condition.

The matter of our fisheries has been taken up at greater length by other speakers than I propose to deal with it at the present time, although I am greatly interested in that industry. This year will be an exceedingly hard one for the fishermen on account of the late spring, which has made it impossible for them to begin operations with the opening of the season, and unless some consideration is shown to them by extending the season this year there will be serious losses among them. I sincerely trust that when this matter comes before the cabinet later on in the season, the fishermen of eastern Canada will be given every consideration.

We talk about reciprocity with the United States, but I believe there is a reciprocity along other lines which we should try to develop. I believe we want great reciprocal or freer trade within our boundaries. If there is one thing needed more than another it is the reduction of the cost of distribution from the factory to the farm, and from the farm to the factory. The city people need the products of the farm, and it is to the advantage of the farmer that he use his best endeavours to see that the man in the city gets the very best articles he can procure anywhere, and gets them at as low a cost as possible: that is, that the price be not doubled by the middleman.

Then again it is up to the manufacturer to see that his goods go to the farmer and labourer at the very lowest possible price. Cut out the middleman as much as possible, and let there be a freer trade between the consumer on the farm and the consumer in the city.

Let us get away from this idea of one trying to do the other for all he can, and let us get down to the essential truth that the more we can help one another the better it will be for all. Let us establish confidence in one another: get away from suspicion: do not try to set town against country, and country against town. One cannot exist without the other. Let us co-operate along the lines indicated, and I will venture the assertion that we have gone a long way to reduce the cost to each other, and at the same time give as much or more in return to the producers. Let us forget our differences and take each other into mutual confidence, and we have gone a long way towards a better understanding of each other's difficulties.

I think the evidence brought out in the special committee on agriculture will be very beneficial, and will give to the public more confidence in the business man and producer on the farm and in the factory.

I think that a great deal can be done along those lines to reduce the cost not only of manufactured articles to the man on the farm but also of farm products to the man in the city. I do not think any farmer will object to the city man getting his food products at the lowest possible price providing that the man on the farm gets the highest market price that is going for his products.

Any criticism I have offered is offered with the best intention. I believe that a substantial saving can be made, and although personally I would have preferred very much to see a greater reduction in our customs tariff, still I feel that for the past two years we have accomplished something in tariff reduction, and I predict that notwithstanding what construction may be placed on the word "stability" in the Finance Minister's remarks, still the people of this country, especially the Liberal party, will demand a constant downward revision from year to year.

I am going to support the budget because the government showing is good. The deficits have been reduced from 674 million in 1920 to 47 million in 1923, and if it were not for the war burden left us, a surplus would have been shown—to say nothing of the railways.

I am going to support the budget because there has been an honest effort to reduce the tariff duties in the past two years, especially on the most important items, and to assist any industry that may start in Canada that all believe would be a benefit to us. I am going to support the budget because I believe the standing offer of reciprocal trade with the United States is a move in the right direction, and will yet be accepted by that country. You might as well try to keep the tide from coming in as to stop trade flowing in its natural courses. I am going to support the budget because I believe that out of his large parliamentary experience in dealing with the fiscal policy of this country, the Finance Minister believes that the budget as presented is the best in the interest of our people, having regard to our diversified industries and callings, and to our financial obligations.

I am going to support the budget in preference to the amendment because it contains now nearly all that is asked for in the amendment and proves conclusively that our Progressive friends are fast becoming adepts at playing politics. I am going to support the budget because the greatest era of prosperity in Canada was under Liberal rule and it will come again if we give Canada's Grand Old Man, the Minister of Finance, a fair trial in this critical period of our country's history.

In closing, I would say: Let us have faith in this great country of ours. We have the best laws of any country in the world. Our people observe those laws better than any people in the world. The observance of the seventh day as a day of rest, which is the bulwark of any nation, is better observed by Canada than any other country in the world. We have the richest country in the world in natural resources in comparison with our population. We have open ports on the Atlantic and Pacific all the year. We have the most diversified occupations; we have everything that makes for a great country. Let us give our best to this country in the way of legislation, not for selfish or political reasons, not for one section as against the other, not for one calling as against the other, but for Canada—Canada, the fairest of the dominions that form the British Empire, that Empire to which we as loyal Canadians are proud to belong.

Mr. J. D. F. DRUMMOND (West Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few remarks on the budget mainly because it has been said during the past two sessions that the Progressive members from Ontario seem to be very little interested in the tariff matters which are brought up in this House. But before saying anything about the budget, or other questions I want to refer, briefly to a resolution which it was my privilege to move this session regarding the marking of woollen goods. The resolution was opposed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce who, referring to me said "What he is asking for is in the last analysis the highest degree of protection." Now, I have been of the opinion that it was beyond the dignity of any minister of the Crown to impute to any member of this House motives which were not contained in the resolution moved by me and which were not implied by one single word that I had uttered. If it is necessary for me—for the information of the House or for the information of the country, to state my position on protection I am ready to do so. It is my firm and honest belief that any system of protection which saps the very life blood from one basic industry for the purpose of building any other is economically and fundamentally wrong.

Members of all parties in this House join together in congratulating the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) upon presenting his seventeenth budget. But there are some of us who are not so anxious to compliment him upon what that budget contains. During the last session, and also during the present one, I have been much amused at the taunt which has been flung across the House first from one side and then from the other —I must admit not so much from the government side as from the Conservative side—of repeated violation and breaking of promises made to the electors before the election. If my recollection serves me right, and I can go back a good many years, this peculiarity, if peculiarity you call it, is not confined to one political sect. It may be that one party have been greater sinners than the other; but I think we can safely say that both, at one time or another in their career, have committed the same sin.

It has been said here during the present session that the measure of prosperity which the country enjoyed in 1896 and for some years after was due to the policy which had been adopted—I cannot say inaugurated—by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his government. Looking back in our history we find that the Liberal party fought every election on the issue of protection from 1878 to 1896. That fact is very vividly imprinted upon my mind. I well remember some of those elections and the issue that was before the electors on those occasions. At one election the issue was free trade as they have it in England. At another it was unrestricted reciprocity. Again it was a tariff for revenue only; until we come to the time when the change of government occurred in 1896. I well remember that the tariff question was not an issue in that election. That contest was fought entirely uopn the Manitoba School question, and after the Liberal party got into power they were blamed—I think rightly blamed—for robbing the Conservative party of their much loved protection policy.

I now wish to refer for a moment to a part of a speech that was made by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). You will find it on page 2852 of Hansard of the present session. In that speech the hon. member made the following statement:

> Perhaps it may shock some members on this side of the House—

I was greatly surprised to hear any hon. gentleman on that side of the House make the statement—

> —when I say that I have very little confidence in the making of platforms, anyway. I do not believe that a government or members elected to the responsibility of a seat in this House should necessarily be asked to accept what may be ill-digested planks in any platform imposed upon them by people who come from various parts of the country and whose suggestions probably are as much dictated by political expediency as anything else; I do not believe that men who represent the public should be expected to carry out such ill-considered behests on the floor of this House. So that speaking for myself, Sir, I would say frankly that in the public interest the platform of 1919 should not be permitted to shackle the government responsible to all the people, whether it be a matter of tariff or anything else.

I want to ask, as briefly as I possibly can, that if the sentiment expressed in the foregoing extract from the hon. gentleman's speech is going to prevail in the public life of this country what is going to become of political honour? If there is one thing more than another upon which the people of this country depend at the time of an election it is upon the principles that are advocated, upon the policy that is laid down by a political party, and which they say they intend to follow if put into power. It seems to me that the statement I have quoted is one that would drag the honour of any political party in the mire.

I now wish to make reference to an utterance by the Prime Minister before the last election. Speaking at Bolton on the 29th October, 1921, as reported in the Toronto Globe, he said:

> I believe in doing all possible to further the legitimate interests of agriculture, as such a policy was going to help all industries in Canada. The Liberals did not propose to continue to help a few men to become multi-millionaires.

He went on further to say that he was in favour of the most drastic measures of economy, and retrenchment in every direction. No voice rang out with louder denunciations throughout the land, no voice gave a greater promise of economy, than that of the present Prime Minister. No statesman before the last election made, with greater emphasis, promises of retrenchment than the leader of the government to-day; and when declared successful at the polls he boastingly heralded the dawn of a new era that would speedily put the country upon its feet financially and cure all the ills that are in every case the aftermath of war. But two years have gone by, and notwithstanding the repeated protests of the Farmers' party for economy and some legislation that would be of assistance in remedying the grievances which they complained of, and which were undoubtedly real, the same need for economy exists to-day and their grievances remain unredressed.

I do not want to be partisan, because that is one of the greatest crimes any Progressive could be guilty of, but I wish to refer for a moment to something that took place in the Conservative party which I hope will prove the assertions I have made that pledges and promises have been violated by both parties in the past. In the year 1911 the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), speaking in favour of a reduction of the duty upon agricultural implements said, Hanasard page 1917:

> But the charge I have to make, and which I hope to bring home to the government this afternoon, is not that one though it is the most serious,—

That is the one that they have made false pretences.

—but it is this that in their attempts to continue the National Policy which had obtained for years before, they have overlooked, they have neglected one essential feature of that policy, they have quite forgotten its guiding principle, namely the principle that as our industrial institutions advanced in strength, as they were able with every advance to acquire a hold of the home market, the import duties were to be diminished and adjusted in order to meet the evolving and changing conditions.

Then follows the wonderful statement made in that speech that the government then in power had helped themselves into power by maintaining themselves behind ramparts of gold.

Also in the same Hansard and at page 1919 the present leader of the Opposition stated:

As everybody knows in 1896, and for two years previously, the duty on agricultural implements of all kinds stood at 20 per cent and the same rate of duty was maintained by this government for eleven years subsequently, or until 1907. In the meantime the insidious work of the officials of this government in increasing the valuation for duty had got into play, and while the nominal duty was maintained at 20 per cent, the actual duty was very seriously increased. . . Other regulations were made by the government which afforded the manufacturer a greater protection than the 20 per cent set out in the Customs Act would indicate.

Now to prove the assertion that the Conservatives after having obtained power in 1911 did the very same thing they charged the Liberals with doing, I quote the following figures obtained from the Bureau of Statistics regarding the duty on agricultural implements from 1912 to 1915, and the duty on the same implements in the year 1921, the last year in which they held office. It is not necessary to go through the whole list of agricultural implements, and for briefness I will take binders. The duty on binders in 1915 under the 17½ per cent tariff was $18.96. I may say just here that this is to some extent at least an answer to the question that was asked the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. King) by the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sinclair) on Friday, I think. The duty in 1915, under the 17½ per cent tariff was $18.96, according to the information furnished by the Bureau of Statistics for the year 1919. The valuation for duty purposes of that binder was $108.35. In the year 1921 the valuation on the binder for duty purposes was $182.60 and under the reduction which they boasted of from 17½ to 12½ per cent the agriculturist who bought the binder was obliged to pay in protective tariff the sum of $22.82.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Could the hon. member give us the tariff under the reciprocity arrangement of 1911?

Mr. DRUMMOND: Twenty per cent reduced to 17½ per cent, and in 1915 or 1916 it was reduced to 12½ per cent. Now again let me make reference to the home markets that have been boasted of by some of those who are in favour of a protective tariff. Those who stand committed to a protective tariff as being in the best interests of the people of Canada are fond of boasting that the home market is provided by the industries which are brought into existence or kept in existence by that protective tariff.

In that connection I want to quote a few figures which are also obtained from a report of the Bureau of Statistics issued in 1920, and giving the statistics for the year 1919:

Number of implement manufacturers in Canada in 1919, 86.

Total capital invested in implement manufacturing industries, $83,276,450.

Total value of products of said implements manufactured in Canada during that year, $37,715,331.

According to this report there was exported from Canada in 1919, $8,831,803 worth of manufactures, leaving a balance which was either purchased by the agricultural people of Canada, or retained in stock to the value of $28,883,528. That was the amount of goods left over after $8,000,000 worth had been exported. While the average duty at that time was 12½ per cent, under the tariff introduced by the government last session, the protective duty upon agricultural implements was reduced by 2½ per cent, which was boastingly held up as something that the Progressives should be eternally thankful for, we will therefore strike 10 per cent as the average duty. Ten per cent upon the sum of $28,882,528 means that the Canadian agriculturists who bought those implements paid in duty to the manufactured industries of the Dominion of Canada the sum of $2,888,352.80.

Now the number of men employed in the agricultural implement factories of Canada in that year was 10,808 and the wages paid to those employees was $11,715,331, or an average salary per employee of $1,084. If you will divide the number of employees, 10,808, into the total amount that the users of agricultural implements in Canada were required to pay in duty, you get the sum of $265.80, which is the amount that it cost the purchasers of agricultural implements for each employee who was engaged in the manufacture of these implements, or in other words, the Canadian agriculturist who purchases implements is charged $265.80 for each employee for the home market which such employee provides.

I will leave hon. members to draw their own conclusions as to whether every employee in the implement manufacturing companies is worth $265 to the agricultural people of this Dominion.

I wish to say a word or two about the Canadian National Railways. While I am one of those who would wish to see the Canadian National Railways placed upon a basis that would avoid a deficit, I cannot understand how such a thing is going to happen when we have such instances as the Chateau Laurier, one of the Canadian National's own hotels here in the city of Ottawa showing an annual deficit of $351,000. If that is the basis upon which our National Railways are going to pay, it will be a long time before we ever reach the desired end. From the report that was given, the hotels in the other parts of the system also show large deficits.

Mr. STANSELL: What is the deficit in connection with the Chateau Laurier? I did not catch the figure?

Mr. DRUMMOND: The figure given to me was $351,000 for the Chateau Laurier, and I am led to believe that that is correct.

Some members in the two old political parties have lovingly spoken of the Progressive party, but they have not chosen just the right words to give expression to their love. As nearly as I can remember, this was started by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) before the last election. The leader of the Opposition in his manifesto published before the election of 1921,—and you will find this in all the papers of that period—after referring to the policy of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), used these words:

> But a stronger and more menacing enemy has arisen. For some years past there has been growing up, first on the prairies of the West, and later through selected parts of eastern Canada, a party backed by a costly and persistent propaganda, the purpose of which is to reverse the tariff policy of this country.

I should like to ask my right hon. friend, who, I am sorry to see, is not in his seat to-night: Whom is the Progressive party menacing? Whom are they the enemy of? If there is any degree of citizenship, those at present engged in the pursuit of agriculture are the most distinguished of any. They are the men and the women on whom the hope of the future of Canada depends. They are the men and the women who must be depended upon to fill cars for their precious railways and precious merchant marine which are standing monuments of the want of foresight of both the old political parties. They are the people above all others who, if they moved away, would leave Canada bankrupt.

Looking at the matter from the standpoint of what has been attained or what has been received by the occupation of agriculture from any government that has ever sat on the treasury benches of this House, I do not think there should be any doubt in anyone's mind as to the reasons why sixty-five Progressive members were elected at the last election. Perhaps I should correct myself a little as regards those sixty-five, because by a natural process of elimination known as the survival of the fittest, we have been reduced to sixty-three. But I think I am safe in saying, as regards those sixty-three, that notwithstanding the fact that we have not received very much yet, we who form the Progressive party will still continue to go forward and onward, firm in the belief and strong in the hope that there is somewhere in the distance, be it far or near, a hill top radiant with the sunshine of something for the agricultural people, a hill top radiant with the glory of equal opportunity to all and special privileges to none.

Mr. DAVID SPENCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, talking seems to be catching; my hon. friends all around have been talking; but I do not intend to cover the whole country from Vancouver to Halifax, nor to make any lengthy speech. While representing one of the largest ridings in Canada, I may say the second or third largest, unlike my hon. friends to my left, I have no complaints to make; I am at peace with all the world. My riding is asking for nothing; it expects nothing, and it will get nothing. Anything the government can pass over to my hon. friends from the prairie provinces, let them hand it over to them to appease their hunger.

I hesitate in rising to-night to say very much after what has been said so ably by hon. gentlemen who have preceded me. I must confess that I am not an orator, and I have never developed my oratorical powers. My life has been a busy one in the business world, and I am trying my best to give service to the people who entrust their business to me, so that speaking has not been my forte. When I entered Parliament I expected to meet big men discussing big things; instead, I find one-half of our time wasted discussing erratic resolutions and economic questions which are of no account whatever.

I want to make some observations, from a business man's standpoint, with reference to certain things in connection with this parliament, and if I err or get out of order, I hope you will pardon me, Mr. Speaker. I do not intend to discuss the budget at any length other than to say that I cannot support the amendment to the budget, because it means a lowering of the tariff and possibly, free trade. I do not intend to support the budget itself, because reference has been made in it to reciprocity. In my humble opinion, the producers of the soil in this country cannot compete with our friends to the south of us, particularly as regards fruit and vegetables—and I have a long experience in those lines—on account of climatic conditions and the extensive markets to the south as compared with climatic conditions in this country, which are much colder, so that more energy and everything else are required in order to produce our stuff. Are hon. members aware that from Florida to North and South Carolina, truck gardeners can raise from two to three crops a year? That cannot be done in Canada. Take the eastern shore of Virginia alone, the greatest producing country on this continent, particularly in potatoes, where they have thousands of acres of potatoes raised by a co-operative organization that supplies the greatest part of the United States and this country during the latter part of May, June and July. After that, we have invariably sold them our old Ontario potatoes, and they replant another crop for their home market in the winter months with great success. Can that be done in Canada? I say, no. I am in favour of more protection for the tiller of the soil, apart altogether from any question of the manufacturing industries of the country. Why should the ingredients that go to the manufacture of oleomargarine, or why should oleomargarine itself, come into this country without paying a duty? I do not know whether or not there is a slight duty on oleomargarine, but at any rate I would put a tariff on these products equal to the Fordney tariff on similar Canadian products.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: One hundred per cent.

Mr. SPENCE: I beg your pardon? I did not hear what the hon. member said. However, I want to assure my hon. friends to my left that they have my sincere sympathy in their difficulties. But they cannot expect to bring about an improvement in their conditions without some sacrifice on their part, such as the business men have had to make in the past few years since the close of the Great War. I would suggest to those hon. gentlemen that they stick more closely to their business. I would advise them to remain on their farms and exercise a continuous supervision over them just as the business men of this country have to do in connection with their various enterprises. That after all is the only way in which any business can succeed; and if that is done in connection with the farms of the West I think that my good friends will make a great success of their farming. In any event, we wish them luck and prosperity.

It gives me much pleasure to compliment the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) on the optimism he displayed in the course of his speech the other day in his discussion of matters in the West. I think that speeches of that kind go to inspire confidence in the people and help to build up the country; it is that kind of speech that we need, which is very different from the calamity howling that we have been hearing from our hon. friends to the left, who have been talking of secession and things of that sort that cannot but be detrimental to the interests of the country. Those hon. gentlemen seem to me to be troubled with "imaginitis." They seem to think that the members in this parliament from the East are not sympathetically disposed to them. Let me assure my hon. friends that that is not so; I want them to believe that they have our deepest sympathy and that we are willing to make any sacrifice that we possibly can to improve things so far as they are concerned. One hon. gentleman the other evening in his speech, after complaining of everything conceivable, made this statement: "If we cannot get along together, let us part good friends." I do not take that view of things at all; I say that we must get along together not only in the interests of Canada, but because I am sure we all have the welfare of the Empire at heart. Let us determine that there shall be no secession. Another hon. gentleman to my left, after threatening parliament with every imaginable ill, said that if we did not listen to his groans and cries we might have reason to regret it. This is what he said, and it is something that in my opinion should not be tolerated in this House of Commons:

> Hon. members may not believe this;—

I may say, we had not the impression before, but what I am about to read would, if possible, confirm it if it did exist:

> —some hon. members are inclined to laugh and say: "Oh, the agriculturists are always whining," but if hon. members keep on saying that, I assure them that they are taking a dangerous course. We may not always whine. We have in this country a strong foreign element, and sometimes it is necessary to keep them in curb. If the House and the country continue to take that attitude, an attitude of, as I said before, cold-blooded insolence, we may come to a time when there will be more unrest and more real trouble than we have had in the past. I would just give hon. members fair warning. Hon. members may laugh at this if they like; but that will be the effect.

Now, speeches of that kind are positively detrimental to this fair country and should be discouraged, at least on the floor of the House. Let me tell my good friends to my left that they know nothing to-day about hard times. Let them go back to the days between 1892 and 1897 when pork sold at 3½ cents to 4 cents per pound, eggs from 8 to 10 cents, butter from 10 to 12 cents, and beef at any old price; when geese sold at from 3 to 5 cents a pound, turkey from 7 to 8 cents a pound, and when there was scarcely any demand for chickens, these being from 15 to 20 cents per pair, with potatoes at 10 cents a bag. I can substantiate every statement I make in this connection, because I bought all these commodities in those days.

Mr. KNOX: And I sold them.

Mr. SPENCE: Yes, and I sympathize with you; and if you keep on talking in the strain in which you are talking to-day you will soon bring back the conditions that existed then.

Mr. KNOX: But sympathy is not worth much; what would you do?

Mr. SPENCE: We have been doing everything for you. I know conditions in the West just as well as my hon. friends do, for I have covered the prairie provinces. I have travelled all over this country from Halifax to Vancouver and Victoria, and I can say that the conditions in the country from which my hon. friends come were no worse in those days than were the conditions in our part of the country, nor indeed, were they half as bad. I remember that at the same time bread sold at 4 to 5 cents a large loaf retail; I sold tons of it myself.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): A loaf of bread and quart of whiskey would be a cheap meal.

Mr. SPENCE: What would wheat and oats be worth at that time?

Mr. KNOX: We ought to know; we were selling wheat in those days you speak of.

Mr. SPENCE: Then why do you forget those bad times so soon? The life of the farmer, I think, has improved a lot since those days with a few exceptions, and this is due to the activities of the Department of Agriculture under different governments, that department having improved dairying and farming generally. The Agricultural department under every government has done a great deal for hon. gentlemen. It has established cold storages, while private interests have also built similar institutions, enabling the speculator to pay these gentlemen and those whom they represent a reasonable price for their butter, their eggs, their poultry and hogs during the summer season, when the amount of these products coming in could not possibly be consumed. And yet hon. gentlemen growl about not having accommodation, and so forth.

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPENCE: Pardon me; I am talking now. When I get through with this sentence you may interrupt me.

Mr. FORKE: I will not bother you any more, I am sure.

Mr. SPENCE: Butter especially has been improved to the greatest extent. I remember well having seen dozens upon dozens, nay, hundreds of barrels, come into our market, some of which was absolutely unfit for food; and when we segregated the good from the bad and got all we could for the best, we had to sell the rest at from 4 to 5 cents a pound. To-day, through the good offices of the departments of agriculture of the provinces there is no excuse for there being any bad butter in the country, and the lady who cannot make good butter nowadays can sell her milk to the creamery or take it to the cheese factory. What else do hon. gentlemen want to have done for them? To-day, I am glad to say, there is a big demand for the woman who can make her own butter. In the fall of the year when the farmers decide to get rid of their stock before the winter season sets in, for one reason or another, generally to obviate feeding during the winter, very heavy shipments come in and the cold storage is again brought into use to save the situation. These gentlemen bitterly complain because they cannot get the prices they want for their stock. But how would it be possible to consume trainloads of half-fed cattle, the scrubs that come into the cities and large centres? How would it be possible at all to make any use of them without cold storages? Again, my good friends are protected by the provision that has been made for them in the different provinces.

There are too many people to-day who know everybody else's business but their own. Before entering public life men should have a broad knowledge of their country's needs as a whole and not think their own little part of the country alone needs attention. Thank goodness I have never been that way. All my life I have tried to give the other fellow the best of the deal. When in 1909 I first offered myself as a candidate for the city council of Toronto my wide experience on the waterfront made me realize the necessity and importance of water-borne transportation, and I advocated then, as I do now, the deepening of the waterway between Montreal and Toronto and also the deepening of the Welland canal. I pictured ocean boats leaving Toronto loaded with apples and other merchandise for the Liverpool and Glasgow markets and bringing back return cargoes for delivery clear to the head of the lakes. Can any hon. gentleman tell me that such a water-borne traffic would not build up the central and western provinces? And yet I have heard some hon. members from the West ridiculing the idea of a deep waterway to Montreal. The day is not far distant I think when we shall see the realization of this idea which will mean so much to Canada and the Empire.

The Ontario cabinet has been accused of irresponsible government—government by commission. As I see this administration it is a case of government by committee. The government has refused to accept responsibility for any important legislation introduced this session. The government is run like a six-ring circus—committees sitting in every quarter at a cost to the country in the neighborhood of $500,000, with little prospect of any return commensurate with this outlay. We have been told by the Prime Minister that we are to have a fair and equitable redistribution. Well, on the committee to which the redistribution bill has been assigned we have ten members of the Liberal party, five of the Progressive party and four of the Conservative party. Do you expect to get a fair and equitable redistribution from such a committee? I say. no.

I am not going to criticize the budget too severely. I am glad to see that the tax has been changed on soft drinks and that the cigarette duty has been reduced to its old figure. I wrote a letter last year to the Minister of Finance pointing out just what would happen in respect to the increased duties he then placed on these two articles. I received a very nice answer from him in which he said he would take my suggestions into his very serious consideration—that is what Sir Oliver Mowat used to say—but I do not think he did. However, he has taken my advice at last. Speaking of the income tax, I think the penalties are entirely too high. A friend of mine who was executor of a small Toronto estate forgot to make his return within the specified time, but he did so three days later and paid the tax. In the meantime the income tax department saw fit to fine him $50. Now, could he take that out of the widow's mite? No, he had to take it out of his own pocket. That is penalizing a good, respectable citizen and I say the law should be changed to prevent the repetition of such an injustice.

We should know to-day whether the Post Office Department is being run at a profit or a loss. The sale of postage stamps to-day is enormous. Many of these stamps are placed on cheques and receipts and go to the credit of the Post Office Department. Altogether it is a very badly managed affair. Then the reduction of the maximum stamp on cheques is no help to the ordinary man of business. A wholesale man like myself has occasion to draw many cheques from $100 up to $2,000 or $3,000, and consequently the reduction only benefits bankers, brokers and millionaires. The rate of duty on cheques is extremely high and eats up our profits. There is not a dollar you make that somebody is not trying to get it.

If the hon. Minister of Finance were in his seat I would ask him why was the sales tax taken off newsprint. To my mind it was not taken off in the interests of the Progressive party or of the consuming public; it was bribery pure and simple to get the support of the newspapers of the country. Furthermore, there is no class of business to-day that can afford to pay a 6 per cent sales tax. To my mind some commodities to-day that are free from duty could well afford to stand a tax, and it would be a good way of getting revenue. Take bananas alone, for some reason or other the banana trust, composed of the foreign element of this country and the United States, control our politicians and consequently not a cent of duty has ever been placed on bananas. Bananas to the value of $5,210,000 were imported last year. There is absolutely no reason in the world why a moderate duty should not be imposed on bananas, especially as there is nothing so detrimental to our fruit growers as the importation and sale of bananas in the months of June, July, August and September when our own strawberries, plums, peaches and other fruits come on the market. Oranges and pineapples are free of duty. I am not advocating that they should be made dutiable, I merely mention that they enter free. Grape fruit for some reason or other is taxed too high, one cent a pound being equivalent to seventy or eighty cents a box. Ten times the amount of money would come into the Treasury if grape fruit, oranges, lemons, and pineapples were taxed 25 cents a box, and this tax would never be noticed in the resale price.

If there is any commission in this world that should be appointed—I do not advocate commissions because I believe the men who are elected to this House should bear the responsibility of legislating for this country—but if there is any commission that should be appointed it is a tariff commission, composed of men who know something about trade conditions in this country, instead of this parliament tampering with the tariff from time to time. The day after the Minister of Finance delievered his budget I read in a Toronto morning paper—I was not able to be here on that day—that the tariff on potatoes had been increased from twenty cents to thirty-five cents per hundred. The public thought that was an awful increase. I do not think it meant from twenty to thirty-five cents a hundred, because the duty was 20 cents per bushel. It was only increasing the duty one and two-thirds cents per hundred pounds, and I do not think the tariff should be interfered with to make a little change like that. Again, we have established the principle of a certain sized barrel, two and a half bushels, or two and three-quarters, or three bushels. To-day we are fighting with the customs officials all the time over the weight of the barrel, and I say it is not worth disturbing trade for such a small amount. I think it is easier collecting duty than anything else, and that would be my system of raising money and having less taxation, but I would recommend strongly to any government that is in power in this country not to make these small changes in the tariff, but appoint a tariff commission composed of men who know the business needs of the country.

Mr. E. N. HOPKINS (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I feel that I have the sympathy of every hon. gentleman in this House because on some occasion, whether it was last year, five years, ten years ago, thirty or even forty years ago every hon. gentleman has been in the position in which I find myself at this moment. It is a wonderful thing for a man to have the record of forty years in the House of Commons which I believe two hon. members of this House enjoy, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and the Minister or Railways (Mr. Graham). But it is a more wonderful thing to be forty years in the Canadian House of Commons and have the respect and love of the entire House.

Mr. Speaker, when a member comes to the House of Commons for the first time, he comes here as you know with just the vision of his own little constituency. He does not just at first get the vision of the Dominion of Canada, or, as I suppose he will later on, the vision of Canada as a nation, the world's vision, for we all believe that Canada is a nation in the building. We believe the day will come when we shall have countless thousands of people in this country to develop the resources that have been bestowed upon us with such a bounteous hand, but just at first all we can do in our maiden effort is to talk about the things back home. All governments say, if they are asked to do anything out of the ordinary: We must first feel the pulse of the people, so I would like for a few minutes to present the pulse of my constituency.

I represent a constituency in the centre of Saskatchewan, in that great granary that is called the bread basket of the Empire. Every year the milling companies of the West just after threshing time send out and get samples of all grains in the different parts of the West and submit it to the baking and milling tests, and when they find the grain that is best adapted for milling they send to that particular district and get that wheat for their mills. The wheat in the northern part of my constituency—it is an old settled district for forty years—has been selected as the wheat the millers want to grind in their own mill. Now we do not get any premium on that.

I say it is an old-settled district, and one of the best. The southern part of the riding is a newer district where some of my people are forty miles from a railroad, but it is a good district, and I was glad to note from the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) the other day that we are going to have a railroad there. Half of my constituents are rural and half of them are urban, and I make no apologies to my urban constituents for discussing the problems of the rural people, for in the West, in the farming district on the prairie, the interest of the city is so connected with that of the farmer that they cannot be divided. We have only two classes of people in that country, the people who can make a living on the farm and make a fair living, and the people who are enabled to live in the city because the farmer makes a fair living. In the early days the farmers were fairly successful before the war and we got a city, but now that the farmers are not doing well their condition is reflected in the city, and I want to say to you that these are strenuous days in western Canada, and I fancy there are going to be strenuous days all over Canada because when the buying power of the farmer is diminished it is reflected in the business of the whole country. Canada was started by a little colony of farmers, and though our commerce has expanded it still remains true that the great industry of this country is agriculture. We in the West have always believed that a high tariff bore unduly heavily on the West.

Let me put it in another way. We will suppose, if you can imagine it, that in place of having the great Dominion of Canada we had an eastern Canada and a western Canada, that these were both British possessions but divided into two separate provinces, and that the people of eastern Canada came to the people of western Canada and said: Let us form a great confederation and have one great Canada. If you will form that confederation we will make this proposition to you. Remember that we have the great bulk of the population east of the great lakes, and consequently we will have the voting power and will make the laws. But we will make this proposition to you: If you will join us in the East we will put a high tariff on all the things you consume. You will be allowed to take all your products of the farm and sell them in the markets of the world in competition with the whole world, but we will put a heavy duty on everything you buy, on your implements, on your clothing, on your boots and shoes. Yes, we will do more than that. We will take your lands, your mines, and administer them for you.

Do you think that would have a tendency to make the West join with the East? I do not think it would. A good many gentlemen here seem to think that we are on the up grade, that we have crossed the Rubicon and are going to climb up. I hope that is the case but I do not think so. Some of the brightest minds in the world to-day believe that the best way to have a reconstruction would be for the different nations to cancel their debts and commence again. The war has been over for a good many years and in my opinion we have not started re-construction yet. Re-construction means to commence at the bottom and build up from the foundation. The only way you will build a permanent structure in Canada is to take a re-capitalization of your debts and then adjust those debts. There are thousands of people in western Canada to-day who are adjusting their debts—the debtor and the creditor—and starting anew. We will never accomplish what we want in this country, in my humble opinion, until we adjust our debts as between the debtor and the creditor. This Canada of ours has lost millions of money during the war, and the trouble is that to-day some people want to make others bear more than their share of that loss. When our people bear their proportionate share of the burden then we will be able to build afresh; and it is a duty of parliament, I think, to do for the people what they are unable to do for themselves. That is to make every Canadian, as far as is possible, bear his share of the burden. When every Canadian realizes his responsibility and is willing to do his part then we shall really commence to build up the country.

Mr. HUGH C. McKILLOP (West Elgin): I am sure the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) must be tired of the congratulations which have been showered upon him from every corner of the chamber and therefore I will content myself with wishing him for the future many years of good health and happiness and freedom from parliamentary duties.

The budget as brought down this year does not display very many changes as compared with the previous budget. True there are a number of small changes. For example, the tariff is reduced on sugar but at the same time it is increased on clothing, so that in the end it works out very much the same. It is just about the same old tariff. Some items are higher, some are lower, but on the whole it is just about the same. This is the second budget that has been brought down by the present government, and it makes one wonder whether they have forgotten altogether the platform they adopted in 1919, which was broadcasted in blazing colours all over this country. Take even their more recent pre-election promises which they made throughout this country in 1921. So far there have not been such changes in the tariff as to give very much encouragement to those who supported them in the last election. It is no wonder, therefore, that the present government have not achieved greater success in the by-elections that have taken place since they came into power. Mr. Speaker, the handwriting is on the wall, warning the present government that unless they change their ways and endeavour to carry out some of their promises their time in office is going to be very short.

Now, I want to direct attention for a few moments to a matter that concerns the bean producers of this country, and in dealing with this subject I will present the facts as briefly as possible. For a number of years past the duty on beans imported into Canada has been 25 cents a bushel while beans entering the United States from Canada have to meet a duty of $1.20 a bushel. I claim that this is not right, and that it constitutes a hardship on the farmers of Canada who have been engaged in the production of beans. Since this condition has prevailed many farmers have been driven out of the industry, while others have so curtailed their production that not over 40 per cent of the quantity of beans that used to be grown in Canada is now produced in this country. Take in the period from 1892 to 1901 the production of beans in Canada amounted to 875,597 bushels. In the latter year the import of beans amounted to 11,003 bushels. Since that time imports of beans have grown by leaps and bounds and at the same time the home production has steadily declined. To such an extent has that been the case that in the year 1920—the last period for which I have figures—the Canadian bean production reached a total of only 388,499 bushels, whereas in the same time the imports had grown to the extent of 444,698 bushels. In 1920 we find the production of beans in Canada was only a little over one-third as much as it was during the ten years that I have mentioned. What is the cause of this? Simply that owing to the low tariff maintained by Canada this country has been made a dumping ground by the nation to the south of us. This is not as it should be, and no self-respecting government should allow such a condition to continue any longer. Then there are other countries. For instance, Austria and Japan send a lot of beans into this country. I do not think it is fair, equitable or just that the farmers of Canada should be called upon to compete with countries where the standard of living is so much lower and where labour is so much cheaper. I have it on good authority that a labourer in Japan does not receive as much in the fields for two weeks' work as the labourer does in this country for one day's work. Now, Mr. Speaker, I claim that if this duty on beans coming into this country were put where it should be, and the bean producers given to understand that the home market was available to them, it would only be a matter of a short time when the production of beans in Canada would far exceed any production of the past. It is suggested that the reason the tariff is kept down is to favour the consumer. As to that I will only say that, with all the importations of beans in the past, the consumer is not buying the bean a particle cheaper than he did two years ago, as it is a well known fact that for years the price of beans in small quantities has been ten cents per pound. I am convinced that if the tariff on this commodity is raised the consumer will not have to pay any more than at present, as the production of beans would so increase as to keep the price to the consumer where it is at present or even lower. I hope the government will give this matter their earnest attention and see that the farmers and bean producers have a fair show.

I should like to draw the attention of the House for a few moments to the conditions of the workingmen in this country. We have at present on our statutes, under the Department of Labour, what is known as fair wage officers, and I understand that one of these officers is stationed in Montreal, another in Ottawa, another in Toronto, another in Winnipeg and another in Vancouver. I would have these officers inquire in their respective districts as to the condition under which the workingman is labouring, first as to wages, and secondly, as to the cost of living in his community. It is a well-known fact you may have a labouring man in one place who is doing a certain kind of work and receiving what is termed a living wage, and at the same time you may have, a thousand miles from him, a man engaged in similar work, receiving the same wage, and yet, on account of the high cost of living, hardly able to make ends meet. I claim it should be the duty of the fair wage officer to inquire into the workingman's conditions and to see that he is satisfied and contented, for after all, a satisfied and contented workingman is one of Canada's greatest assets.

Further, Mr. Speaker, I claim that if the workingmen are contented, a great obstacle is placed in the way of the entrance into Canada of Bolshevism. For my part, I have no use for Bolshevists, or Bolshevism, or of any other kind of "ism" except good, sound, strong, loyal Canadianism. I am satisfied that 90 per cent of our working men belong to that class. I do not wish to be misunderstood in this matter. I do not hold any brief for any radical element. The class I am speaking for is the honest, sincere and loyal workingman, the man who wants to give an honest day's work for an honest day's pay. I want to be placed on record as being ready, at any time while a member of this House, to suport any sane legislation that has for its object the bettering of the workingman's conditions.

In conclusion, I may say that since coming to this House I have heard a good deal of talk about low tariff, and a great deal of talk about free trade, but I am convinced that neither one of these will ever cure the ills Canada is suffering from. On the other hand, I am just as strongly convinced that what this country needs is a strong national policy, if she is ever going to take the place that she originally intended to take, as one of the leading nations of the world.

On motion of Mr. Stewart (Leeds) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Graham the House adjourned at 12.40 a.m. (Tuesday).

FISHERIES—ATLANTIC PROVINCES

MARINE AND FISHERIES COMMITTEE RECOMMEND INVESTIGATION

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Lunenburg): I beg to present the third report of the select standing committee on Marine and Fisheries as follows:

Your committee having considered and adopted the following resolution, herewith present the same for the information of the House:

Whereas a number of urgent requests have been made to the Honourable the Minister of Marine and Fisheries from time to time during the last few years for extensions of the lobster fishing season existing through the Maritime provinces, and as it would appear from representations made to the minister that such changes in the existing regulations are desirable;

And whereas it further appears that much difference of opinion exists among the lobster fishermen, and others engaged in the industry, regarding said regulations;

And whereas it appears to be the unanimous opinion of this committee than an enquiry should be held which shall also include the principal fisheries of the Atlantic provinces;

Be it therefore resolved,—That in the opinion of this committee an enquiry should be held during the ensuing summer into the entire situation with a view if possible of changing the existing general regulations concerning the said principal fisheries to meet present requirements;

And be it further resolved.—That said enquiry should be conducted by seven members of the Standing Committee on Marine and Fisheries of the House of Commons, to be appointed by the minister under the Enquiries Act.

EMPIRE DAY ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Graham:

That when this House adjourns on Wednesday, the 23rd instant, it stand adjourned until Friday, the 25th instant.

Motion agreed to.

PENSIONS AND RE-ESTABLISHMENT

PRINTING COMMISSION'S REPORT

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment) moved:

That five hundred copies in the English language, and one hundred and fifty copies in the French language, of the first report of the second part of the investigation of the Royal Commission on Pensions and Re-establishment, laid on the Table on the 21st day of May, 1923, be printed forthwith and that rule 74 in relation thereto be suspended.

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion can only be adopted by unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

PENSION ACT AMENDMENTS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. LADNER: I desire to ask if it is the intention of the government to bring down amendments to the Pension Act, to give effect to the recommendations of the Ralston report with reference to matters requiring legislation.

Mr. BELAND: I have given an answer to a similar question twice before—yes.

SIR HENRY THORNTON

On the Orders or the Day:

Mr. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): I desire to call the attention of the government to a despatch appearing in the Toronto Mail and Empire of the 19th, instant, which reads as follows:

Sir Henry W. Thornton is Steamship Director

At a meeting of the board of directors of Canada Steamship Lines, Limited, held to-day, Sir Henry W. Thornton, K.B.E., was elected a director of the company.

I should like to ask if the government has any information on this matter? If not, will it ascertain the facts and inform the House? Also, does the government approve of the president of the Canadian National Railways acting as a director of a corporation which competes with the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Mercantile Marine?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways): The government has no information excepting what it has seen in the newspaper despatch. I will endeavour to get the information asked for. Regarding my hon. friend's second question, I may tell him that the Canadian National railways, as now constituted, has an exchange of traffic arrangement with the Canada Steamship Lines.

Mr. STEVENS: It must be in the combine.

Mr. GRAHAM: So are you, so are we all.

PUBLICITY REPRESENTATIVE IN LONDON

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Is the government in a position to advise the House in regard to the reported appointment of a publicity representative in London?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have made inquiries of the different departments of the government and have been unable to find any one who knows anything of the matter. The government has no information as to any such appointment having been made.

PRIVATE BILL—FIRST READING

Bill No. 179 (from the Senate), for the relief of Grace Lees Smiley.—Mr. Boys.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Monday, May 21, the debate on the motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Robert Forke.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has been treated in this debate to general expressions of good will. To these his wealth of years and his long public service undoubtedly entitle him, and in them I am only too happy to join. My comment this afternoon on his course in recent times will, I hope, not lack in courtesy, but I am equally anxious that it do not lack in frankness. I was disappointed in his budget. I say so entirely irrespective of the policies he abandoned and of the policies he adopted. I do not think the budget presentation was a real budget presentation at all. I think the country is entitled to more in a statement on the occasion of a budget speech, than the Finance Minister saw fit to give us as the text of our discussion. What the budget speech contains is a skilful but elusive commentary on the history of tariff discussions, on the unpopularity of taxes, on the undesirability of debt and on various ideas, some accepted and some rejected, which passed through the minister's mind in preparation of his case. A budget presentation should be a great deal more than that, and in the history of this country it usually has contained a great deal more. A budget presentation, I think, should include a close examination of the whole financial position of our country with some retrospection into past years and as well some prospect into the future. By examination I do not merely mean a chronicle of the ascending steps of our debt. I mean an analysis of our financial position. I mean an investigation of the value of our assets, of their revenue bearing properties and of the nature and maturity of our liabilities. It should contain as well a synopsis of our trade, of those vital factors of our commercial life that keep us living and moving, an examination into the sources, the basis and the currents of our trade, and into the policies that best can be applied for its pursuit. It should contain as well an analysis of our means of revenue and of the merits of each, and some comparison between our position in all these respects and the position of other countries comparable to our own. These things are given in the budget addresses of the statesmen of other lands. I commend the Finance Minister to read the speech on a similar occasion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer of England presented this year, or, better still, the speech presented last year, and, because a better example cannot be found, I commend all hon. members to read the budget presentation of the present Prime Minister of Australia when as treasurer of the Commonwealth a year ago he gave to its parliament an exhibition and an exposè of the whole financial and industrial situation of his country. I venture to make this remark: that after reading both, —the Australian budget and our own—though unacquainted with Australia and its history to any degree and though having followed the finances, the trade, and all the affairs of this Dominion, and having witnessed its development for fifteen years, after reading both, I knew more of the position of Australia than I did of the position of Canada. This is the purpose of a budget address, and a mere homily on various popular subjects is not justice to the occasion and not justice to the House. We owe to our people a thorough examination of all these elements, and we did not get the text for this examination from the budget presentation of the Finance Minister.

He gave us the figures of our ascending debt since 1914, told us how much it had increased year by year, and seemed to take some credit, or at least some comfort in the fact that we were not increasing our debt so rapidly now in the days of peace as we did in the days of war. His idea was to show that under other regimes we went rapidly into debt, but that now, though we are going further into debt, we are not going at quite so accelerated a pace. This is very true. He was not altogether fair even in that statement. Starting with 1914, when we did add $21,000,000 to our debt, the whole addition and far more due to commitments for the Transcontinental and Grand Trunk Pacific, and the loans we had to make to have them completed, though we did that year add $21,000,000 to our debt for those purposes, we remember as well that the year before, notwithstanding corresponding obligations, we reduced the debt by $25,600,000. We effected a greater reduction in one year than all the aggregate reductions the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) had been able to make in the fifteen years antecedent during which he reigned as Minister of Finance. Yes, our debt additions are, I suppose, diminishing. The debt addition in the fiscal year ending in 1920 was some $674,000,000. That was the year when we paid for demobilization and took care of the cash responsibilities which we thought this country owed to the men who returned from the war. The elements that make up that sum are largely composed of cash gratuities to those men, and of outlay for other policies then laid down, which policies hon. gentlemen opposite have dutifully followed by way of helping to establish the returned soldiers. Though we went into debt huge millions for that purpose, we were met by castigation on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, including the Minister of Finance, and by the declaration that, if returned to power, they would adopt a better method and distribute further cash grants to those men. This declaration they promptly repudiated on attaining power.

The next year, when we had passed from those days of great and uncommon responsibilities, the addition to the debt was some $92,000,000, and in 1922 for which the present government is partly responsible, $81,000,000. This year the addition to debt is $57,000,000, not a very great reduction from the year before. The minister gives it to us as $49,000,000; but he gets that figure by crediting $8,000,000, which was just as much our property five years ago as it is our property to-day, $8,000,000 of exchange which was owed to us by the British government then, but which now is credited merely for the reason that now it is ascertained. These are huge additions to our debt.

In case I might overlook this, let me say that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), in attributing our obligations for revenue to the late administration and to the great war debt which was piled up during its tenure of office, reflected upon us because, he stated, we had not gathered from the pockets of our people during the war and applied on our war obligations, as large a proportion as we should have. He contrasted us unfavourably with Great Britain. This has been a practice of hon. gentlemen opposite and of some hon. gentlemen who are not wholly opposite. I have never heard figures given by any of our critics; but if members of the House will look at the figures given in the budget presentation of 1919 when the war was over, there will be found a statement of the revenues collected during the war, of the war debt, of the whole war outlay, of the capital debt as well, If hon. gentlemen will look at a corresponding statement by the British Chancellor of the Exchequer, they will find the British Chancellor of the Exchequer claiming that they succeeded, during the currency of the year, in paying 28 per cent of the war debt, of the war obligations, and having to borrow only the balance, 72 per cent. I went into his figures to ascertain how they were arrived at, and the only method by which they could have been arrived at was this, by taking the total outlay for the war, including interest thereon and resultant pensions, then ascertaining how far their excess of revenue during the war exceeded their other expenses, and applying that excess upon war obligations. If we take the very same method in Canada, we find our war obligations as presented in that budget running to $1,327,000. Add to this, interest thereon and our pensions; then set off against it the excess revenue over the other obligations, revenue over expenditure, which excess was $425,000,000, and it will be found our application against the whole war responsibility was not 28 per cent, but 29 per cent. Nor do I not know that we could have been expected to have reached the percentage of Great Britain. Great Britain was an older and a wealthier country. She had greater resources upon which to draw. Of course her responsibilities were greater; but we were much more comparable with Australia. I have gone into the figures for Australia, and I find that Australia was able to apply, not 29 per cent on her war obligations, but less than 15 per cent throughout the entire war period. Such is the record of Canada.

We gathered those funds from war profits, from a higher scale of income tax; we gathered those funds as well from a well directed additional tariff taxation to the extent in one year alone of $44,000,000, during which period not only industry, but agriculture and every occupation of our people flourished as never before. We gathered them by a higher income taxation than Britain imposed, because Britain's minimum was actually higher than ours, and her maximum was not more. We carried our profits taxation in its full extent throughout the year 1919, after Great Britain had reduced hers by almost one-half. Our profits taxation throughout, higher on certain industries than on others, because certain industries profited more than others, was higher than that of our great competitor the United States, indeed it was the highest tax of its kind in the world. Beyond that our income taxation, though fixed on a scale lower than that of Great Britain until something over $150,000 per annum of income was reached, was on a scale higher even than Great Britain's and higher than Australia's for incomes beyond that amount. It was higher than the level of the United States on all classes of incomes, large and small. We must measure our power to tax in a very great degree, by corresponding taxation across the line. The government then in office went to the full extent it could go in levying from the people during the war period a large share of their earnings to pay the cost of the war. Very well. We got to the end; and though no one claims perfection or anything approaching perfection, nor claims there was not waste, for no war can be fought without waste, I venture to assert this as one conclusion, that we got more war results for the money we spent on the war than did any other country, save possibly Australia or Great Britain. Undoubtedly we got the equal of any country for the money we were able to expend. Let us not, then, bewail the debt of Canada. We are in a better position to discharge it than is any other nation which went through the entire course of the war. It has been shown in previous budget addresses that our debt, though heavy, is less than a third of the per capita tax of New Zealand and little more than half the per capita debt of Australia; and, of course, our debt is very much less per capita than is the debt of Great Britain.

Years ago, even as early as 1919, but more strenuously in 1920, we were prayed by hon. gentlemen opposite, nay, we were demanded by them, to balance the budgets of that time. We were told that the war was past and the period for balancing budgets had come, and hon. gentlemen in 1920 pointed to Great Britain, which that year had virtually balanced hers. In 1921 more vociferously than ever they compared us unfavourably with Great Britain because we had an addition to our debt of some $80,000,000, while Great Britain's had actually been reduced. Those charges were true. But Great Britain had added to her war debt all the cost of her war material and so she was able to reduce her war debt thus enhanced, by the sale of war material to the extent, not of millions or hundreds of millions, but actually of billions of dollars. We on the other hand, though we were possessed of a share of war material, had relatively almost a trifling share. We had equipped our men on a per capita basis from the British government; therefore a large share of war material was not ours. Our debt was never enhanced by that increment, and consequently we could not sell war material to reduce. But with the passage of those years, conditions became comparable. Great Britain's war material has been sold, and for the past two years she has been virtually in the same position as we; but she continues to diminish her debt while we, with a new government in office, continue to increase ours. And this new government consists of the men who inveighed against us in earlier times because, under totally incomparable circumstances, we were not able to reduce. Now I think the time has come when a better showing should be made, and I certainly think the time has come when we ought not to be under the necessity, I had almost said the humiliation, of proclaiming to the world that we are budgeting for a deficit of some $70,000,000 for the year just ahead.

There are ways of balancing budgets. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), in his address, thought of only one; the only possibility that seemed to be before his eye was the raising of taxes, as he described it, from new fields. Well, there are other ways of increasing taxes besides entering new fields, namely, the multiplying of taxes in the old fields. But the minister, although he has done that, did not emphasize the fact; the fact he emphasized was that he did not like to venture into new fields in order to balance his budget. It is not very long since he saw another and far better way than either of those plans to balance a budget, and that way was by reducing the expenditure of this country as we receded from the years of the war. Hon. gentlemen will remember that in the Estimates of 1922 it was proclaimed to the people of Canada that a saving of, I think, $137,000,000 was being effected by this economical government for the year just now passed in the way of appropriations for our railways. One would have expected it is true, that concurrently with the completion of two events or tasks, namely, the receding of the war—and necessarily the reduction of after-war services—and secondly, the rehabilitation of our railway systems that we had to take over;—one would naturally have expected I say, that concurrently with these two circumstances, it would be quite easy to reduce our expenditure. So no one was surprised when the government was able to present appropriations to this House less, as to our railways, by $137,000,000. It simply meant that the Grand Trunk, having been put into shape for service, the Canadian National having been built also into shape for service, those obligations being discharged did not have to be discharged again. But notwithstanding this fact, and notwithstanding the other facts to which I have alluded, what do we actually find the result of last year? What do we actually find in the way of diminution of expenditure as between 1922, nine months of which were ours, and 1923, no months of which were ours? The reduction is not $137,000,000; it is not $37,000,000; the reduction is nine million and a few thousand dollars. The actual expenditure last year as given by the minister in his budget statement, though he did not tabulate and add the figures—why, I leave hon. gentlemen to conjecture—the actual total expenditure, taking into account that charged to the consolidated revenue, the capital charge, the special war and railways expenditures amounted in 1921-22 to $463,305,000. The actual expenditure for this year, an expenditure composed of the same elements, is $454,280,000, or a diminution of $9,000,000. Why has 137 contracted to nine? How is the nine arrived at? Our Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment department is nearly $4,000,000 less. I am not criticizing the reduction; the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment has frankly and publicly stated that, having examined into the services we had established, he had made up his mind that he could not improve upon them and so simply carried them on. This reduction is due to the fact that the necessity for the money has contracted; we are getting further from the war. There is a reduction also of $3,000,000 or more in our pensions. I have the exact figures before me from the Department of Finance; the reduction in pensions is $3,300,000. There is a reduction as well in our Soldiers' Settlement appropriations. In those soldier services the government was able, quite properly, I presume, to save this country some $7,500,000. This makes up virtually all of the total sum of reductions from 1921 to 1922; there is only a million and a half to account for besides. But they had nothing at all this year in the way of loans to the provinces for housing; they had nothing at all for unemployment—they let the unemployed take care of themselves. This may be an evidence of selfishness, but it could scarcely be said to be an evidence of economy. Then they did not have the same appropriations for railways. But in all the services where it took real strength of character and will to make contractions, instead of contractions they have made additions, and at the rate they are going they will very soon overtake all they are able to reduce because of diminishing soldier services. At the present rate of additions to civil government, at the rate of additions to many other of the services mentioned in the tabulated statements obtainable from the Department of Finance they will very soon overtake and pass the appropriations of the near-war years.

Such is the financial record of the government. And yet although standing under a deficit for this past year of $57,000,000 the Minister of Finance gives us figures of contemplated expenditures for the current year aggregating $434,000,000, and budgets only for $372,000,000: What is going to be the effect of all this on the name of Canada throughout the world? What is going to be the effect on the operations of business and the securing of money everywhere for the purposes of our industrial expansion? What is to be the effect now on this Dominion which ended the war in strength and virility, which was admitted by this government to have been in the best position of any land when peace was declared, if we have to acknowledge financial defeat, haul down our flag and say "For the life of us though we don't expand we cannot pay our debts"?

The minister proposes some increases and some reductions of taxation. Everybody rejoices in reductions. But what does reduction of taxation mean when it is accomplished by an increase of our national debt? It is all right to talk about taking $2,500,000 off sugar —and, mark you, it is not off the sugar refiner; the protection stands as it was. I am not complaining of that—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I am not complaining, and I did not complain three years ago. Hon. gentlemen will hear me on this subject, and one thing they will not be able to find fault with—they will not find me guilty of apostacy. There is a reduction of $2,500,000, the minister estimates, in sugar taxes—we had a duty of 2·39 cents a pound on refined sugar and 1·69 cents a pound on raw sugar; he takes 50 cents per hundred pounds off refined and a corresponding duty off the raw, thus leaving the refiner just where he was, a reduction on the whole to the consumer of half a cent a pound, and thereby he says he saves the country $2,500,000. Well, is this more creditable than the course of Great Britain? Great Britain has a five cent per pound duty on sugar. She maintains this duty, but she is reducing her debt by one hundred million pounds. We are cutting down a two cent duty and we are adding to our debt by $72,000,000. Let the government balance its budget and we will all welcome any reduction of taxation; but let no government boast of tax reductions when they are made at the expense of our credit and add to our national debt.

I have a word to say about last year's alterations in the budget. Hon. gentlemen will remember that though in the tariff there was rigid, definite adherence to the principle of protection—accompanied as usual by aspersions on its name—although there was almost an exact adherence to the very schedules of our tariff, the minister made certain proclamations of "reforms" which he said he was effecting. Every proclamation being a change from what had been our policy was received with acclaims of joy by hon. gentlemen of the House in two of its departments. The first I believe was an announcement of a great "reform" in the abandonment of what was called our depreciated currency clause. This clause it was said was merely disguised protection. It raised our protection 1,000 per cent, and if we wanted such protection the manly thing, the minister said, was to put 1,000 per cent protection on and call it 1,000 per cent; But he had looked into the subject of depreciated currency and had determined to sweep the whole mockery of protection away. Well, when the applause had died down there was a little consideration given to the question, there was some debate, and the minister later came down with a substitutive depreciated currency clause which did in another and less efficient way what the old depreciated currency clause which he had denounced had done. His new clause put the duty anywhere from 100 to 1,000 per cent at the will of the minister but disguised its operation. He has operated that depreciated currency clause ever since.

Then he announced that there was a marking clause which had been scorned by many as an abhorrence. As disguised protection it had been claimed we had provided that goods from foreign countries should be marked with the country of origin. He said this would not do, especially as we had not put it in into operation. Neither had we. There had been difficulty in putting it into operation. It was a matter which required regulations difficult to work out. He was going to wipe this plan away as well. But the minister took this precaution; while he wiped the general clause off the statute book he retained full power to his government to put the same clause back or any part of it, and all by that abhorrent instrument—order in council. I told him that he was simply taking to his government power to favour any industry which favoured him, and to penalize any industry which did not meet with the smile of his good will. Well, what has been the result? I asked some time ago, for a statement of the orders in council passed, and I found that two industries, and only two, had got the favour of this law,—one of them was an industry which helped to elect the Prime Minister in his own county of York. Lead pencils now have to be marked with the country of origin; lithographic work has to be similarly marked. These are supposed to be in a class by themselves, these alone have received the favour of the government. It would be interesting to know upon what principle these favours have been bestowed.

Then there was another; the dumping clause, particularly as it was applicable to fruit, did not suit the government, and the minister came to parliament with a considerable flourish of trumpets and announced that this dumping clause had to go. But before the debate was through, the Minister of Customs rose—prompted no doubt by the Minister of Finance—and proposed a dumping clause which for autocratic audacity has never been equalled in this or any parliament. Hon. gentlemen have said that I supported it. I did support it; I had no alternative. We had either to support it or do without a dumping clause altogether. I wanted and want still the dumping clause that was there before. It was fair and right; let any hon. gentleman vote to restore it and I will vote with him and against the autocratic dumping clause which exists to-day. But I am not willing to imperil the industries of Canada, especially the primary industries, because of exception to the character of any dumping clause.

The minister had some other proposals last year which he seemed to think were great reforms—a change from the policy of his predecessors. He announced a new duty on tobacco, an increase of $3 per thousand on cigarettes, and an increase from 28 cents to 40 cents on raw leaf tobacco; and he believed that he would sceure thereby an additional revenue of $5,000,000. Well, again the force of argument was brought to bear; the minister was warned, and warned in all seriousness, that the limit of the cigarette excise had been reached and that if he went beyond he would do harm. He yielded to the extent of 50 per cent; he fixed the excise at $7.50 instead of $9, as he had proposed. Now, what has been the result of this "reform," this variation from the tariff which he found in effect? In one year he has reduced the tobacco business of Canadian producers by 22 per cent; in one year as well he has lost to the treasury of Canada $1,327,000. Well, have these twin misfortunes been obtained with an accompanying boon of reduced tobacco consumption?—if such is called a boon. Not at all. The minister admits the fact himself—just as much tobacco used, just as many cigarettes smoked as before, but the Canadian business is impaired, the Canadian treasury is depleted to the extent of $1,327,000—and the only people to benefit have been United States tobacco dealers and producers, and the bootlegger, who has thus been given a return cargo to this country. I venture to suggest that, laying aside the injury to Canadian business for the profit of the United States, the loss to the treasury of over a million dollars is something of a serious price to pay for the privilege of having the present government in power. Such is the penalty of another of the Liberal "reforms" which we were treated to last year.

Then there was one more. There was to be a duty on beet sugar production. It was fixed first of all at a very considerable figure, 48 cents per hundred. In the course of argument this figure was reduced and at the reduced figure, 24 cents per hundred, it went into effect. Did I say it went into effect? The Finance Minister tells us that they never collected anything under it. Do hon gentlemen know why they did not? For the simple reason that the government took it upon itself to postpone its application. They never let it go into effect, although it had been passed by this House; and now after a year goes by, during which the reduction was postponed by the government, they come to parliament and say "this was another blunder; the whole thing has to be repealed."

What is left, then, of the "reforms" of the 1922 budget? Do hon. gentlemen know? Economy is gone. The sugar duty reform is gone. The cigarette reform is gone. The depreciated currency reform is gone. The dumping reform is gone. The marking reform is gone, or almost gone; the old system re-appears to help along the lead pencils of North York. All these things have gone. What is left—let me repeat—of the budget "reforms" of 1922? I venture to suggest that by the time a year goes by, even by the time three weeks go by, there will be just as little left of the alterations the minister brings down in the budget of 1923.

I come to a discussion of the new proposals of this year. The minister announces a scaling of one tenth of the British preferential duties. I do not know upon what principle the minister does so. It is not in order to avoid protection; he tells us so himself. Perhaps it is in order to strike a blow at those horrid combines, monopolies and trusts which were the particular object of the diatribes of hon. gentlemen opposite two and three years ago. I wonder what are the "combines, monopolies and trusts," struck or staggered, by this peeling of the British preferential tariff to the extent on an average, of 1.9 per cent. What combine or monopoly is now the object of the vengeance of the government? Does anyone know? Hon. gentlemen who examine the industrial fabric of our country will find this out: that the one class of industry seriously affected is the woollen industry. The others upon whose goods the diminished duty operates are those whose main and determining competitors

4 p.m. are in the United States of America.

In the woollen industry our great competitor is Great Britain. Is the woollen industry a combine, monopoly or trust? Now. let me inquire. There may be such monsters in Canada, but if they deserve anything in the way of penalty at the hands of this government, they certainly do not get it in this budget. But the woollen industry in this country is not a combine. It is composed of small mills separately owned, scattered over the length and breadth of eastern Canada, mainly in eastern Ontario. Not one of them is a mill of great proportions; nothing in the nature of a combine was ever alleged against any of them; all of them are struggling to keep their heads above water, and have been so for years. Such is the industry against which this government has the courage to strike its blow. Tender and delicate the assault is, but they were just as careful in selecting the enemy as they were in tempering the force of the blow.

Then the budget goes on; the American tariff is to be left just where it is. Did I say, the American tariff? I should have said, the tariff against the world. Outside of this 1.9 per cent change in British preference there are more increases than decreases in the budget. There is a new duty on currants and raisins, four times beyond what it was before Why this increased duty upon currants and raisins? Here we have an echo of the French treaty debate. Do hon. gentlemen recall that we told the government in that debate that they had sacrificed this country, and had been utterly worsted in their negotiations with France; that they had put our own tariff out of line—put our luxuries away below our necessities, let off the rich and burdened the poor; that while they had reduced luxuries and thus made a big concession to France, they had come back from France with a far higher French tariff against our actual exports than we had before? We told them as well the reason. The reason they did so was this: They had not armed themselves with any weapon before they started to negotiate with France; that they should have raised our duties on luxuries before they went over to that country, and thereby have been in a position to offer something to France in return for concessions by France to us; that instead they went over there bound hand and foot by the state of our own tariff and by their own commitments —the sincerity of which hon. gentlemen can now judge—by their own commitments uttered over and over again in this country. There was the reason why this Dominion was penalized and worsted in the French treaty negotiations. Our ministers took thought; they saw the force of our argument, though they were not frank enough to admit it; and now, having to negotiate with Australia they are advised by the Minister of Trade and Commerce—who has been over there—that unless they put our duties up on goods which Australia wants to sell to us they will have no chance in the negotiations at all. They come to parliament and they say: Australia wants to sell us raisins and currants. If we are to make a deal with Australia, and not capitulate the way we did with France, we will have to have a duty that is worth while on raisins and currants. So they lift the tax on these goods to three cents a pound in order that they may negotiate with Australia. Now, will anybody answer me this question: How is it this is a good plan to employ in the case of our sister dominion of Australia and a bad plan to employ in the case of France? I will be interested in the answer to that question. I hope the Prime Minister, if he speaks, will venture to essay the task.

There is also a new duty upon artificial silk. Artificial silk under this budget has a whole range of duties up to 37½ per cent. The minister did not dilate very long on the reasons for that move. I am not complaining of the duty. I do not know any way to get industries in this country, any way to keep our country strong and prosperous, a real country where people can get work, except by having duties on articles that we can make in this Dominion. But here is a government, which has been denouncing protection through all its opposition life, which has members supporting it, some of them even within the fold and rapture of office, who still tell us that protection is all wrong, a Government which to-day is trying to pretend to this country that the only reason it is maintaining a protective tariff is because it finds such tariff here and because it will disturb industries erected on that basis if it dares to shatter their foundation; here is a government, I say, giving such as the only reason for maintaining a protective tariff and then undertaking to establish a new industry on the same foundation. Thus they make it increasingly impossible for those who may ever wish to do so to get any relief from protection. Well, if inconsistency was a charge to level against this government no more concrete, glaring, brazen instance could be found. This government has been open to charges of inconsistency ever since it got into power. Why I almost smile at the resolution of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) in which he alleges inconsistency against the present Prime Minister of Canada. We take that indictment as proven in this Dominion now.

There are other increases but in the main the tariff is left practically where it was. The whole principle of a protective tariff is there intact. Indeed, it is reinforced by this very legislation, the new legislation, which is brought down in this budget. In respect of the shaving in the duties on woollens affecting a lot of small mills through this country I call attention to a further fact: that a similar shaving last year was followed by an increase of British importations of almost 50 per cent, by a contraction of Canadian production of 33 per cent and necessarily by a contraction of Canadian labour and Canadian prosperity. Was it followed however by any contraction of the price? Does anybody know of woollens being cheaper this year than last? Are you buying them cheaper in your stores? Not at all. The consumers got nothing, but our industries have been, in a measure, sacrificed to their larger competitors in the older land.

There was another effect of the tariff of last year. The government did venture then into the realm of reduction in the general tariff but only as to one class of goods—one that is worth mentioning. I refer to the reduction of the duty on farm implements. Here a 2½ per cent lowering in the general tariff took place on the part of a government which had solemnly promised to sweep those duties all away. Now, I want to put this question in the hearing of the House: What has been the effect of this reduction? Has there been any increase of labour employed in the farm implement industry of Canada? Has there been any increase in the consumption of Canadian goods? Has there been more work given to one man in this Dominion? On the contrary, the reduction has operated exactly the other way. There has been less production, there has been a contraction of our towns, there has been an exodus of our mechanics, there has been a decline of our population, there has been a drying-up of sources of our revenue, there has been a lessening of our markets. Well, who has received the benefit? Are we told that the western Canadian farmer, or the farmer in any other part of Canada, has received the benefit? If so what has it been? Are farm implements cheaper to-day than they were a year ago? I have not heard of it. But I have read an advertisement which I think I brought with me, an advertisement published in a western paper which is interesting enough to give to the House. The advertisement in question is published in the Yorkton Enterprise and reads as follows:

> We are still in business carrying a full line of International Harvester Agricultural Implements, but regret at this time to have to inform the public that prices on agricultural implements have been slightly advanced since last season, for which we are not responsible.
> Advances on some of the more important lines are as follows:
>
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | Binders | $ 8 00 |
> | Seeders | 12 00 |
> | Mower and Rake | 3 50 |
> | Gang Plow | 6 00 |
> | Cultivator | 7 50 |
> and other smaller lines about the same proportion.

Then follows this interesting paragraph which I hope the Prime Minister will remember and ponder the rest of his life:

> This advance has been made notwithstanding the fact that we have a Liberal government at Ottawa, with sixty-five Progressives on the job and a Canadian Council of Agriculture in the background, all supposedly working overtime in the interests of agriculture.

I want to say a few words on the general question covered by this advertisement. I do not need to make any statement merely in order that members of the House may know where I stand. There has been misrepresentation of my attitude, there is contsant misrepresentation; it is all for a purpose. I have stood all my life for a policy of moderate protection for this country. Under the conditions of the last few years I have felt that the tariff in effect was on a general scale that could justly be described as moderate protection. In that stand I was attacked by hon. gentlemen across the way; attacked as following a false principle, as following a principle that bore down on producer and consumer and that favoured the monopoly and the trust; attacked as favouring a high protective tariff, by the very hon. gentlemen who come in this debate and declare that this same tariff—raised in some respects and slightly, almost microscopically diminished in others—is not now high protection but moderate protection and even a low tariff. I believe it is of no avail to argue the principle before many hon. members. But it is no longer a waste of time to argue it before hon. members opposite. It used to be. Those who fondly hoped in the years and the months that have gone by that the progress free trade principles were making was rapid, that the day of their triumph was dawning, have received a rude awakening since they have entered the parliament of Canada. Is it not plain, I ask of them, that your adherents in this House do not number more than half of what they did in the last parliament? Instead of getting converts you are only finding apostates. You cannot rally half the number to your flag that you could two years ago. Such "progress" is very slow. Why, the speeches hon. members made, particularly the speech of the hon. leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke), the speeches as well of other hon. members behind him—those speeches would have been received with pæans of joy and admiration by hon. members across the way if their authors had only made them two years ago. No, there does not seem to have been very rapid progress. And why? Do hon. members really think it is because the great part of the people of Canada elect representatives who are slaves to fetishes, who are instruments of great potentates or the victims of plutocratic corruption? I hope hon. members do not believe such things. The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) gave the lie to these assertions on behalf of the two older parties in very firm language Thursday night. I paid him the compliment of saying that I had never heard him hurl these aspersions upon others, but that I knew a party which had got into power by this very process. No; such absurd humbug is not the reason. The simple reason is that lying along side of a great republic, living in a world every country but one, yes every country of which to-day is protected, we, particularly, a young undeveloped Dominion, beside a tremendous nation the biggest industrially the world has ever known, cannot lay our markets open freely to them. We cannot lay our manufacturers and producers under competition at the hands of those who have their own market guarded for their advantage and an equal show with us in the outside world, while the producer in this Dominion has not access to their markets, has no preference in other countries and has not even a priority in his own. These things were known to hon. members opposite two years ago just as well as they are known to them to-day. But they had a purpose to serve. The glory of office was in front of them, and they sought to delude a great population of this country into their support by professing principles and policies in which they had no belief at all. No. Protection will be the law of Canada for many years. There will be a different world before protection can be abandoned. We cannot get on under any principle other than that of protection. I remember it is only two years, indeed, since the then leader of the Progressive party, (Mr. Crerar) seconded in most eloquent and wonderfully emphatic language by the then hon. member for Red Deer, Mr. Michael Clark, declared that a change was coming over the commercial world, tariffs were coming down, the day of protection was nearly over, and they pointed in particular to the United States of America. In the words of the then member for Red Deer, the United States of America was "comparatively a free trade country," and in his opinion was soon to open its doors and the light of free trade was to shine. Well, what has taken place? There is not an hon. member to-day, even to my left, who so far deludes himself as even to profess that the world is moving to free trade. And this country of all countries, with its resources undeveloped, in whose neighbourhood we have the great developed, advanced, protected republic—this of all other countries would be playing the part of madness to march ahead of the others in the direction of free trade.

While on this point, I may deal with another phase of the budget presentation. I refer to a reciprocity offer to the United States. As respects the subject of reciprocity, do not let any hon. member think that there has been a change of opinion in this country. Oh, we have heard a lot about these changes of opinion. We heard about them away back in the eighties and in 1891; we heard about them in 1911. But always when the challenge came and the issue was disclosed there was found to be no change of opinion in Canada. Why is it I am asked that though we like to have treaties of reciprocity, favourable trade arrangements if we can get them with other countries in the world, and particularly with those of our own empire, we do not think it the part of wisdom to enter into an extensive reciprocity convention with the United States? Why is it? The United States I am told lies beside us, a tremendous population, and therefore a potential market, with less transport costs than to other lands; why not make, I am asked an extensive trade arrangement with them? Well, the reason lies in the very geography of this continent. The reason lies still more in the very fact of our separate nationhood. Let me explain. With any other country we are on terms of parity. Other countries are natural consumers of our goods, and we consumers of the goods of other countries. With different geographical conditions, different industrial occupations, other countries would have just as much to lose by cancellation of such an agreement as we would. With the United States the position is different. We are only 9,000,000 people and they are 112,000,000. They have a production twenty times our production. They have the biggest factories, the biggest industrial concerns and the biggest commercial organizations in the civilized world. They are as well our greatest competitors in all our lines of production. If we enter into a commercial arrangement with them there would be something at least, to say for it, if conditions were such that we knew there would be permanency to such arrangement. Now, mark you, I said there would be something to say for it. There would at the same time be much to say against it. In my judgment it would result in conditions in Canada very comparable with what to-day exist in the northeastern and the northwestern states. In these states their industries have been drawn by the magnetism of the great huge plants and populations of the central states, and the northwestern and northeastern districts are a little more than feeders for the great industrial centres of that nation. Tariffs the world over, though you can argue against them, have a tendency to distribute over the surface of the world varieties of occupations, instead of concentrating in particular localities all those engaged in single occupations. But I said before, there would be something to say for such a treaty if there was any guarantee or hope of permanency. In that case we would know what to do, investors would know what to do; agriculturists, would know what to do; ranchers, would know what to do; men thinking of going into any line of trade or production would know just what to expect. They would make their investments, and they would order their lives accordingly.

But is there any guarantee of permanency, or can there be any guarantee of permanency, under any conceivable circumstances in a reciprocity arrangement with the United States? I ask that question and I ask it seriously, because in my judgment it is at the root and the heart of the whole problem. There was no permanency inherent in the 1911 treaty. Each country reserved the right to depart from it at its will. That the United States insisted on; that the United States will always insist on; and such insistence no government of the United States dare neglect at the price of its life as a government. No, the right to annul will always be theirs, and that right they have never failed, in the whole course of their existence, to exercise. They exercised it back in 1866, when our industries, having set themselves in those channels, our East trading with East, West with West, centre with centre, were rendered all but helpless by the annulment of the agreement and the consequent stoppage of trade. We do not need to go back to the 50's and the 60's; let us go back just two or three years. We entered into a reciprocity agreement, not an extensive one, a very simple one, a comparatively negligible one, as lately as four or five years ago. They proposed in their tariff that they would give this country free entry for our wheat, our flour and our other wheat products into the United States, conditional on our country doing the same for theirs—precisely the arrangement as respects wheat and wheat products that the reciprocity agreement of 1911 made as to a far wider range of articles. The government of the day accepted that proposal, and we placed wheat and wheat products on the free list. Their proposal extended to potatoes and we accepted that as well. For a few weeks this operated, and then came a period of suspension because of the two governments controlling their crops. The suspension ended, and within four months of the close of the suspension, the United States put a high duty on wheat and potatoes, and ended our reciprocity agreement. I urge this fact only to show that the possibility of any permanency to such an arrangement is nil. Not only is there no likelihood, there is utterly no possibility,—the exigencies of American politics demand that there be no possibility,—of permanence. This country is one country; the United States is another. We have our government; they have theirs. We are a British country; they are an American country. Their parliament, their legislatures, have the right to act. The longer an extensive reciprocity agreement operates with the United States, the more this country depends upon the continuance of that reciprocity agreement. Does anyone dispute my assertion? Did we not depend upon it more in 1866 than we did in 1854? Were we not injured more by its collapse in 1866 than we should have been had it collapsed in 1855? Did we ever get on in our lives as well as after we set our faces the other way, to develop east and west channels of trade which no other government could interfere with or destroy? The longer such a reciprocity arrangement operates, the more dependent we become. You say then that it must have proved to be good. For the sake of argument and only for the sake of argument, let me grant that. The fact is that the power to annul is a tremendous weapon in the hands of the United States. Annulment would mean very little to that country. Their trade, their production, is twenty times our own. Our trade with them is fractional as compared with their whole trade. Their trade with us would be tremendous compared with our whole trade. Our West would trade with their West, our East with their East, our centre with their centre. Those channels being established and other channels being to the same extent abandoned, the power to annul the treaty means a vital power over the legislature of this country. Hon gentlemen say: "They are a friendly people." Yes, but they are the American republic. We have things we have to take care of in competition with the United States. I could name them one by one. As matters stand now, when we are in no alliance, we are on a parity. They have no such extraordinary power, I am not afraid as matters stand to-day of any reprisal in the power of the United States, to wield. There is no reprisal they can exercise over us to-day that need put fear into the heart of any citizen of this Dominion. Whatever we may desire to do, in the interest of our country, let us do. There is no reprisal they can exercise that will not do them as much injury as it will do ourselves. But put us ten years under a reciprocity agreement; give those channels ten years to become established and then tell me what chance we would have in any negotiation with the United States. I ask hon. gentlemen in all seriousness to put themselves in that position. Where would we be then if we sought to make terms—say as to the draining of our lakes and our St. Lawrence through the Chicago canal? Where would we be then if we sought to make terms on half a dozen things of vital consequence to this country, which lie between us and them at this hour as matters of contention? No nation that respects itself will get into such a position. We are so geographically situated that there is a peril which, if we have not the manliness to guard against, we will afterwards be the victims of. Whether those words sink in or not, I ask at least that they be remembered, I ask that they be reflected upon, and, if the time ever comes, as it may, when by the turn of the political wheel the United States government may look to us again for a reciprocal agreement, I ask hon. gentlemen before they commit themselves—when this is a real question, for now it is only a gesture—to think those thoughts over and to determine whether they are content lightheartedly to travel along that road.

I pass from reciprocity and I come to a discussion of other proposals of this budget. I purpose to discuss them in the light of their wisdom and in the light as well of the political honour of this Dominion. Hon. gentlemen opposite are not very fond of such discussion. Indeed, there is a tendency in more quarters than among the government members, but animated, I think, solely from there, to say: "Oh, we will let the past bury the past; political platforms anyway are not very serious matters; we cannot erect a future by decrying the past; the Liberal convention is four years old now or nearly so, and there is nothing to be gained by bringing its unwelcome ghost before this House." Such is the constant importuning of hon. gentlemen of the government side. I venture to say this—and I do so without any assumption of superior virtue at all—that if political platforms are to mean nothing, if they are only constructed to be discarded, if the carrying of them into effect, when power is gained, is not a matter of honour and of right, then responsible government is a mockery, public life is a sham and representative institutions are no better than a fiasco. Hon. gentlemen do not like to be reminded of their commitments of years ago. I have not seen one of them produce that brown-covered edition of the chronicles of the Liberal party at convention in 1919. I have not heard one of them read from it in this House or seen them show it to his fellows. The hon. member for North Waterloo, bolder than the rest, comes forward and says: "I do not think a government should be bound by the ill-digested conclusions of a convention." And the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), while affecting a certain academic loyalty to the resolutions of that convention says to hon. members to my left: "Oh, it is all right for you to talk; you are in opposition; but it is altogether different when you get into power." I have listened during the debate to this sort of contention from the hon. member for North Waterloo in the clear language that he uses so well; I have listened to dozens more of apologetic imprecations from the perspiring periods of the Minister of the Interior, all the way through to the massive and majestic eloquence of the Minister of Agriculture. But let hon. gentlemen reflect: What is to be the result on the young men, on all the people of our country, if honour and fidelity to political pledges are to be openly flouted in the parliament of Canada? Hon. gentlemen tried it in 1896. They made a show of allegiance then which at least had the merit of a certain plausibility. Now, not from one without authority, not through a mere backbencher, but through the mouth of the Minister of Finance, who is in charge of fiscal policy, they flout all allegiance to their commitments of only four years ago. The Minister of Finance openly tells this House that he is not bound by those covenants that his government is not bound by them, that his party is not bound by them. Why? Because at that convention he did not vote for them himself!

I said I would speak frankly in the presence of the Minister of Finance. He is not here, but I cannot be deterred on that account. The Minister of Finance has done no credit to the politics of Canada when he made that assertion; nor has he done any credit to his own record in our public life. The Minister of Finance was a party to, was present at, and took an active share in the framing of the very resolutions he now repudiates; and after they were adopted he contested on the basis of those pledges the leadership of the Liberal party which had adopted them and which had pledged itself to put them into effect. The hon. gentleman, for months after went through this country as a leading Liberal and as the prospective Minister of Finance and never for one moment gave in public a soul in Canada to believe that he himself differed in the least degree from the pledges and commitments of his party. Then he got into power and said, "I am bound no more." His Prime Minister, (Mr. Mackenzie King), too, stood up and declared last year that all he was bound by was a certain obligation to regard these specific, definite, concrete tariff covenants printed in his platform as a chart and compass to guide him in the sea of politics; and he the same Prime Minister listens now to his Minister of Finance declare openly to parliament that he has flung chart and compass away after the platform, and that all are gone and guide him and his party no more And this is called honourable politics! But more. The Prime Minister of this country declared in this House, only a little over a year before he came into power, that he intended to put into effect the very articles of the Liberal platform adopted at that convention. I read from Hansard of the year 1920, 1st June, at page 2993:

I would not be worthy of the trust reposed in me by members of the party with which it is my privilege to be associated in the position that at the moment I hold, were I to be one thing at one time and another thing at another time. Sir, I was chosen, for the responsible duties that I am seeking to discharge, at the Liberal Convention at which the platform of the Liberal party was laid down, and by that platform I intend to stand or fall. The resolution on the tariff was as follows:

Then he read the resolution verbatim—all about free farm implements, all about free cement, all about free foodstuffs, all about free fertilizers, all about free oils, and all these other long lists of classes of articles which his convention bound him to put on the free list "when returned to power." And he added.

Let me further point out that there is not a line in the resolution adopted by the Liberal convention which has not appeared in resolutions proposed in parliament from this side prior to the time that the convention was held.

The assertion he thus made was true; it was all true. The authority, the solemnity of the Liberal convention, all was added to by the resolutions of the whole Liberal party in this House time and again, year after year. Then the Prime Minister went on to attach another article of sanctity to the Liberal platform. He declared that "the last public address by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, only two or three weeks before his death, was, in the main, one approving of a resolution passed by the eastern Ontario Liberals, in words almost identical with the resolution which was adopted at the Liberal convention." Did he tell us then that this same resolution was not approved by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) whom he intended to make Minister of Finance, and consequently that his party was not to be bound? Was there any language used in the whole speech of the Prime Minister which was not diametrically flagrantly, violently opposed to any suggestion of that sort? On the preceding page the Prime Minister made this statement, and I ask that it be brought to the ears of the Minister of Finance, for the Minister of Finance was present when the Prime Minister uttered these words, and he heard them without protest:

You had there exactly what you have here,—some taking extreme views in one direction, others taking extreme views in another direction. But, Sir, you had the splendid spectacle of that vast assemblage of men and women standing up as one and approving the platform of the Liberal party.

No absolution there, no exception of the Minister of Finance, no exception of the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), no exception of anyone; everything the Prime Minister said on that occasion was said in the hearing of these two hon. gentlemen. The Prime Minister emphatically stated then that at the convention the whole "vast assemblage" stood up and voted for the Liberal platform as one.

Mr. EULER: I beg my right hon. friend's pardon; I was not present when the resolution was carried.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say so; I said that the declaration of the Prime Minister in parliament, that all who were present at the convention had voted for the Liberal platform, was made in the hearing of the hon. gentleman and of the present Minister of Finance.

Mr. EULER: I was wrong, evidently; I assumed that the hon. member was referring to the convention.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No; I take the hon. member's word for it that he was not present at the vote; he was evidently conveniently absent. But this is not all. The very same year the Liberal party of the province of Alberta, headed then by the present Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), met also in convention in the city of Calgary. This convention mark you was headed by the Minister who now tells us how different it is when you get into power. At this convention they adopted all the things adopted at the Liberal convention of 1919; but they did a lot more. Why, they said, there is no difference that anyone can see between the platform of the Liberal party, as professed and voted for in parliament, and the platform of the Farmers' party of Canada. And as it was necessary for them all to unite against the Tories, they voted for a resolution in which they quoted the whole Farmer platform and swallowed it line for line, declaring it to constitute the policy of the Liberal party of Alberta, headed by the present Minister of the Interior. But more. Their appetites were not satisfied even with the Farmers' platform. After quoting and adopting the whole Agrarian programme they added the following clause:

But this convention further asserts that free trade with Great Britain and the United States should be the ideal of the Liberal party, and that it is and shall continue to be the duty of Liberalism to earnestly strive to so regulate and direct the fiscal policy of Canada as to ultimately attain free trade with Great Britain and the United States.

Again I emphasize the observation of the Minister of the Interior—it is very different when you get into power.

Yes, these western ministers say they struggle, they still believe, they still hope. Evidently there is to be the very same plan of campaign in the country in respect of this tariff and the new policy of the government, the same double dealing, the same two-edged sword as there was when they were in opposition. In opposition the plan was to fly to the four winds of heaven the Farmer platform—the convention platform—to proclaim it in all the issues of their party literature, but at the same time through the mouth of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler), through the mouth of the present Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) and through the mouth of the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) to quietly assure all those interested the other way that they need not fear the Liberal party, that no matter what the platform said everything would be all right with them. Such was the method pursued, such seems to be the method still. The Minister of Finance stands up and says, "Here is the tariff of the Liberal party. Last year we shaved a little here and a little there, this year we shave a little here and we raise a little there, but now it is stable save only for exceptional cases." He told the whole business world of this Dominion that except in very exceptional cases, which he described, they could regard this as the permanent tariff of this country for some years to come. But the Minister of Agriculture says, "Oh, he did not mean that at all." He tells us that parliament can change the tariff next year. Well who does not know that? What we are discussing though, what the Finance Minister was pronouncing was the policy of this government. It has been proclaimed by the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Agriculture will be encouraged to carry on his pillow fight and to dangle hopes before the western farmer, but from our experience of the past I do not think we will put the influence of the Minister of Agriculture against the influence of the Minister of Finance. In the cabinet combats last year and this the Minister of Agriculture had all the cards, and all the records, he had everything on his side. He could have said to the Minister of Finance and to every other member of this government who was in the House of Commons in 1919, "Why, gentlemen, you voted for these very things I am arguing for, you voted in 1919 for the resolution of the hon. member for Brome which called upon the late government to free the food of the people and to free as well all the instruments of production and all the spare parts entering into the same. You voted for this motion of the hon. member for Brome, you voted for free food when there was not one man hungry in this Dominion for five that are hungry now." He could have said as well, "Why, the Prime Minister in 1920 quoted with approval and affirmed his fidelity to the statement of Sir Wilfrid Laurier at Hamilton in 1913 that the unalterable policy of the Liberal party was to have food free from customs duty for all the people." Yes, and he could have called forth the convention platform, that beautiful pamphlet, and said, "here is the book of the chronicles of the Liberal party, read it and behold our faith." All these arguments he had on his side. Then he could have come to the New Testament issued just before the election, with the photograph of the Prime Minister on the back and his signature inside, wherein it was declared that all those commitments of 1919 constituted the policy of the Liberal party still. All these weapons were in the grip of the Minister of Agriculture and in the grip of the Minister of the Interior. But how did they use them? What was the result of the contest? They lost all along the line. They did not win a single skirmish. So what is the hope for the future? Why, the Minister of Agriculture only makes a laughing stock of his friends. The Minister of Agriculture is an apostate to everything he has declared for in western Canada. The Minister of the Interior is the same.

Let me emphasize here that hon. members do not escape behind the "indigestibility," as described by the hon. member for Waterloo, of a convention platform. They voted for the same thing in this very parliament in 1919 —save the member for North Waterloo— he was honest enough to escape—and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea); they were the only two who had the courage of their convictions then; the rest, including the Minister of Finance including the Minister of Marine, including the Minister of Trade and Commerce, including the Secretary of State, including the Minister without portfolio (Mr. Sinclair) who sits in the seats of the mighty though I am afraid he does not exercise much of the power of the mighty—all these, indeed over half of the present government, voted in this House for the resolution in 1919 of the hon. member for Brome.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is wrong?

Mr. DUFF: That is not a fair reference to the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Sinclair).

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would be willing to say the same of the hon. member for Lunenburg.

Mr. DUFF: You are fit to say anything, but the people do not listen to you.

Mr. MEIGHEN: These hon. gentlemen voted for that resolution, declared it to mark their course, declared for free food—let me repeat, at a time when there was more prosperity in this Dominion, less men out of work—indeed, scarcely any out of work at all—less need of it than there is to-day many times over. They declared for free instruments of production at a time when there was a prosperity throughout the farming community of Canada, which we know nothing of to-day, at a time when wheat was over $2.00 a bushel and oats over $1.00 a bushel, whereas to-day wheat is half of its former price and oats you can hardly sell at all. But this was the policy of the Liberal party then. If there was an arguable case for it at that time, the conditions demand it ten times as strongly now. I stood against it then I stand against it to-day. I did not believe the policy they then advocated would result in the conditions they professed to desire; I do not believe so now.

But I want to come to some other features of this budget. Increases in taxation constitute an addition to the burdens of the people. New taxation is all right if accompanied by economy; unaccompanied by economy new taxation is all wrong. This government has added again to the sales tax. If there is one tax that comes upon the back of everyone almost equally, the poor and the rich alike, it is the sales tax of this Dominion. We imposed the sales tax first. I am aware of this fact, because I remember the reprimands and the castigations we endured at the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite—and at the hands of none more determinedly than the Prime Minister of this country—when we put on 1½ and 2½ per cent as sales tax. He declared in the debate of 1921 that instead of getting more from income tax, instead of taxing luxuries, we were piling a "visible" tariff on top of the "invisible" tariff we had then by putting a sales tax on the backs of the common people. He denounced us for doing so, because he said, the reason we had not reduced the tariff and had not as he said taxed luxuries, the reason we had taxed the common people by a sales tax, was that we were the tools and minions of wealthy corporations; that we were the servants of organized interrelated business, or, as he was fond of describing it, of an industrial plutocracy. How would he like to hear with its application on himself that same argument to-day? To-day instead of taxing luxuries more he taxes them less; instead of taking the sales tax off he adds to it until it is twice the burden it was at that time. How would he like it if I urged against him now the allegation which filled almost every line of his speech in 1921? How would he feel if I told him that the reason he is doing what he is doing is because he is the meek and humble instrument of wealthy corporations, because he has not the courage to do right by the common people? How would he like that class of demagogism in parliament to-day?

Perhaps I should read a few words from what the Prime Minister said two years ago. He was first of all denouncing us for not revising the tariff. He said:

> To say that the changes being made in the American tariff are responsible for the abortive professions, the frustrated intention, of the government, is to assume an unlimited degree of gullibility on the part of the Canadian people.

The fact that an American tariff, temporary but about to be made permanent or probably to be made permanent, was in actual course of progress through the American congress—to urge that fact, he said, as a reason for referring revision was to assume gullibility on the part of the Canadian people. Here was what he declared to have been the real reason:

5 p.m.

> The failure of the government, at this time of high-living costs, and much needed increase of production, to give any relief from burdensome taxation to either consumers or producers, is not due to any circumstances so much a matter of chance as the present emergency legislation of the United States; it is due to a deliberate and determined effort to thwart trade and to restrict competition in every direction, with the Mother Country and our sister dominions even more than with the United States, in order that a few wealthy men and their immediate friends and associates may reap still larger fortunes through obtaining, not a much-needed home market, as they would have us believe, but a monopoly of the Canadian market.

And a few pages later he used this language:

> Do you see also, Mr. Speaker, why it is, in the budget which has just been presented by the Finance Minister (Sir Henry Drayton)—that this year, as in former years no account whatever has been taken of profiteering; why another year has been allowed to pass without any effort whatever having been made by the government to recover any of the war-time wealth; why, instead of the removal of any of the taxation that bears immediately upon the masses of the people, the duties upon the necessaries of life, it is the business profits taxes and the luxury taxes that have been abolished?

And he goes on to say:

> The protection for which we stand is the protection of the consumer against the exactions of combines, monopolies, and the super-organization of associated business.

Such was the whole tenor of his speech in 1921. Because we had abolished certain taxes on expensive goods by which we had sought to get—with some success, though not with the success we expected—considerable addition to our revenue, and from which we did get quite a substantial sum; because we had abolished the business profits tax, these were the opprobrious epithets he applied to us; these he said were the motives which animated us. Is he restoring now the business profits tax? Is he restoring the luxury taxes? No, he is doing nothing of the kind. The business profits tax was abolished with the approval, expressed in this House, of the leader of the Progressive party; abolished, indeed, with the approval of many hon. gentlemen opposite, but abolished, the Prime Minister told us, because we were the tools and minions of the rich and powerful. The special luxury taxes were abolished, but hon. gentlemen know that they were abolished because of difficulty of operation. The only sales tax we put on was a small tax of 1½ and 2½ per cent, later increased by us to 3 and 4 per cent, applicable to home productions and to imports respectively. This was the sales tax that we imposed on the consumers of goods in this Dominion. At the same time we collected from our income tax some $93,000,000. We collected from our income and business profits taxes in our last year $101,000,000. This year the Minister of Finance is collecting through the same taxes just $72,000,000. But he put in 1922 an added tax on the whole people—a new sales tax—to make up the difference; a tax that has brought him last year an increased revenue of over $31,000,000. In a word, the tax that we collected from income, the tax that we collected from profits, even in our last year, after the business profits tax had been abolished and only arrears thereon were taken in, amounted in the aggregate to about $30,000,000 more than hon. gentlemen opposite are collecting by those means to-day. But to make up the deficiency the Minister of Finance swooped down on everybody—on the common people of this country, and took $31,000,000 more in an increased sales tax. He collected last year 4½ and 6 per cent and he is not satisfied with that; he comes along this year and lifts up the sales tax on Canadian goods, raising the rate upon them this time from 4½ to 6 per cent. This is an additional charge on all the goods covered by the sales tax, goods which comprise the clothing of the people, comprise what keeps the people warm—clothes, shelter, stoves and the like; which include hardware used by the people, and which include farm implements used on the land. All these things come under our sales tax, and the amount that has been added during these two years is more in every case than any customs levy the minister has taken off. To the sales tax as he proposes to collect it now a profit will be added by the manufacturer; to that another profit will be superadded by the wholesaler, and still another by the retailer. These profits taken together will make an addition to the cost of living in this country of not less than 10 per cent. Hon. gentlemen to my left frequently complain of the higher cost of living in Canada, the higher cost of articles which they have to purchase compared with prices across the line. But do you expect anything else when you have a 6 per cent sales tax at the source, on which two or three profits are bound to be levied? You have right there a 10 per cent addition to the cost of necessaries. In this fact we see the main reason why this government has brought about an enhancement of the cost of living during every month that it has been in effective power.

Mr. McMASTER: Will the right hon. gentleman permit a question? Does not the customs duty pyramid in precisely the same fashion?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Custom duties on commodities when imported by manufacturers, undoubtedly have these profits added. But that is not a reason why we should change the method of collecting a sales tax when it is now being collected in a way which involves less burden upon the consumer. The fundamental reason why this change has been urged—and all hon. gentlemen have to do to see the truth of what I say is to read the literature of the organization which urged it—was to enable the manufacturer, the wholesaler, the jobber, the retailer, to pass on not part, but the whole of the tax to the consumer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my right hon. friend, just in order to be fair to the House, give a list of the commodities that are exempt from the sales tax?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have the list here. The right hon. gentleman will find it on page 10—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my right hon. friend read it? He has it there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is a page and a half long.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And every detail is mentioned, even to the medals of soldiers.

Mr. GRAHAM: Even up to the medals of soldiers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not propose to make my speech as discussive and aimless as those of some hon. gentlemen opposite by answering the demands of the Prime Minister. But I will give the important items. They are the following: bread, flour, including self-raising flour, oatmeal, rolled oats, corn meal, rolled wheat, buckwheat, milk, condensed milk, buttermilk, cream, butter, cheese, and so on; oleomargarine, eggs, vegetable oils, bran, shorts, and the like. In the main these articles were all exempted before.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why the laughter from hon. gentlemen opposite? Many of those hon. gentlemen were not in the House at the time these things were done and therefore possibly they do not know the facts. Primary products were always free from the sales tax. If hon. gentlemen opposite get any delight in appropriating to themselves the credit of exemptions established by the preceding government we, in the generosity of our hearts, should not deny them because they have not much source left to get any delight from now. Primary products such as food products, primary forest products, logs and the like were always free from the sales tax. Ah! Let us come again to these exemptions. Hon. gentlemen opposite have added to them. Now, here is a chance to cheer. They come along this year and they put "newsprint" in the list.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And raw wool.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And raw wool, another primary product. Is that in a class to be compared with newsprint? I venture to say that this government in exempting newsprint has probably lost to the treasury of Canada one million dollars a year. Why is this done? Does any hon. gentleman know why we should go to the big newspapers of this country—many of which are very prosperous; the larger they are the more prosperous they are—and say to them "Oh we will take newsprint and we will relieve it of the sales tax" and then go to the farmers of this country and say "We have relieved the big newspapers of this tax but we will put a little more on your harrows, a little more on your lumber, a little more on your clothes, on everything you work with and wear." That is precisely the course hon. gentlemen opposite have taken. It may not be popular to say anything against the source of supply of a newspaper, but some things become a duty even though they are not popular; and I know of no reason on earth why newsprint should be put on the list of articles exempt from the sales tax and why working men should be told "We have to tax the clothing of your children, the smock that you wear, the pail that you carry. These we burden with our sales tax; we tax also what you put on your feet, the things as well that shelter you and keep you warm; but we have to relieve the big newspapers of this country of a million dollars on newsprint." Such is the way this government comes to the rescue of the common people, those common people for whom its heart bled when its ministers were in opposition. Such is the way they show to this country that these masses, these poor people who were ground down by the old autocratic government are now cared for and tenderly helped.

Let me review what the present administration has done. This government set out, or pledged itself to set out to reduce the necessities of life, to relieve food stuffs, to relieve the instruments of production of all duties and to put more taxes on luxuries and on the rich. Tell me of one dollar it has put upon the rich. Not one dollar, not one farthing. But it has relieved the rich of duties upon luxuries. The only things that are substantially reduced—that are reduced so that the reduction will reach the consumer—are luxuries imported into this country under the French treaty. This government has reduced the duties on luxuries purchased by the rich and has added to the taxes on necessities consumed by the poor. Our ministers can say: "We have brought the duty down on embroideries but we have pushed up the sales tax on boots and shoes." True the Finance Minister has made a slight reduction in the duty on boots and shoes from Great Britain knowing as he does that only a fraction, and that a fraction of superior and expensive quality worn by the well-to-do comes from Great Britain. In the case of boots and shoes from the United States it left the duty as it was but the sales tax has been increased to 6 per cent. This government relaxed the duty on brandy, it reduced the duty on champagne; and then it now has recourse to the sales tax and requires all the people of this country to make good reductions brought into effect under the French treaty. These things our ministers have done for the users of luxuries; but they have added to taxation on the necessities of life in direct and brazen violation of the pledge they made to the people of this country. "Oh," they cried in 1921—no one so often as the Prime Minister—"the main issue in this country is the cost of living. The cost of living must come down and it cannot come down under a combination of industrial plutocracy and political autocracy which is in power at Ottawa. So let me come into office, he pleaded, and I will do this thing." The cost of living curve was descending at the very time he uttered those sentences; it went on descending almost perpendicularly until he and his ministers came into power. It kept on descending until their sales tax and their other new taxes came into effect—at which time the cost of living started to rise again and has been rising ever since. The cost of living is rising now and more rapidly than in other countries. The government of the day is responsible for the ascending curve of the cost of living at this hour. "Oh," they said "more retrenchment and economy must be the order of the day. You cannot get that from a government with a war mind. The Meighen government has had the war mind, and it cannot retrench." Well, this new government is now in power and beyond what it is saving by aiding the soldiers and by what it denies to the provincial treasuries and municipalities of the country what does its economy amount to? It amounts to less than nothing. Hon. gentlemen opposite also said: "Put us in power and we will get by direct taxation what the Meighen government gets by an invisible tariff." Who does not remember the speeches of 1921? I am sure the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) does not forget them. I am sure many other hon. gentlemen—some to my left—who were here then do not forget them: We were told that while Great Britain was collecting 80 per cent of her revenue by direct taxation and less than 20 per cent from customs, while the United States was doing the same thing, we were very far from such a millennium. Ah, yes, those words are in the Liberal platform, that whole recital is in the convention platform. It denounced the government of the day for collecting so little by direct taxation and so much by indirect taxation—what the Prime Minister called an invisible tariff. What is he doing now? The present government collected last year nearly fourteen millions more by the invisible tariff, by indirect taxation. They collected twenty-eight millions less by direct taxation than we did the year before. Whereas we collected according to the administration's own figures, up to the end of our last calendar year of government, for a period of eight months, 32 per cent by direct taxation his government collected in the corresponding eight months of 1922 just 24 per cent. What he fails to collect by direct taxation, what he fails to get by the increased revenue from customs, he piles on the back of the people of this country in the way of added sales tax.

Such is the record of this administration. I think the time is surely coming if it is not here when the people of Canada shall know very clearly just what political shilly-shally has been palmed off upon them during the last two years. I do not intend to indulge in prophecy—it is not one of my gifts, I never venture to indulge—but speaking of the present government I am safe in saying that no administration ever slipped back so far in seventeen months of power as this government has done since December, 1921. Indications are not a few that the time has come when something strong, something sound, possibly something heroic in the way of large policy has to be undertaken in this Dominion. The West is struggling against intolerable conditions. The Atlantic provinces are struggling against conditions just as full of despair—of these truths there is no doubt. Where is the government in the crisis? What is the government's proposal? Without a question there must be something done to bring the Maritime provinces of our country nearer to the centre of confederation and to the advantages they have a right to enjoy. Something must be done to give renewed courage and confidence over our western plains. If it is not done, where are we drifting? Has any one the smallest hope that within the spirit and the capacity of this government there resides the ambition, the will, or the strength to resolve the situation that is upon us? I do not think the people of this country have such hope. There must be strong, there must be sound, well-digested, plans evolved and there must be brave, true, and perhaps heroic, measures taken; and the people of Canada will increasingly long for men in office who can devise and execute those things which meet the exigencies of the hour. I think they will demand that the situation which confronts us to-day shall be met in something of the spirit and by something of the resource out of which the many crises of a great war through four years were surmounted, and by which the tremendous obstacles of the after war period were overcome.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): I unexpectedly intervened in the debate this afternoon, and I am not sure that I can contribute anything new or fresh to it, or that I can interest the members of this House in my remarks. If it is not too late, I should like to join with hon. members who have already extended their kind congratulations to the hon. Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) on his very successful budget and also to join in their congratulations to him upon enjoying the distinction of having delivered in this country his seventeenth budget speech. Hon. members on this side of the House appreciate very much, indeed, I am sure, the kind remarks of the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) and the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) in reference to the Minister of Finance. The hon. Minister of Finance has given forty-five years to the service of this country, and that alone is a matter of distinction. In that long period of service he has sincerely endeavoured to serve his country and has always been a true public servant. I believe to-day that in this country people regard him as the guardian of the treasury of Canada, and they have faith in his integrity and ability to render public service.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) started off this afternoon by saying he was very much disappointed in the budget. He said it was not a budget at all. Well, it took him a very long time to say what he required to say about it. I do not know what the hon. member requires or what he would suggest as being the proper form of budget. I remember in the early days of my parliamentary experience it was the practice for the Minister of Finance to deliver a three or four hour address, and at the end of it the minister looked like a contestant passing the winning post in a long distance race. Fortunately for Canada and the House, and in the interest of the discharge of public business, these long speeches usually delivered in the past by finance ministers have been abandoned, and very properly so. What should a budget contain? Very few matters after all interest the public or should interest the public in a budget. They require to know the financial position of the country at the end of the last fiscal year. They would like to know, and should know, what revenue the Minister of Finance proposes to collect for the next ensuing financial year, and how he proposes to spend it, and whether he anticipates a deficit or a surplus. These are important matters which should be contained in the budget. The leader of the Opposition referred to the fact that some Lords Chancellor of the Exchequer in Great Britain had some time ago delivered very model addresses upon the financial affairs of the nation. I really do not know to what he refers, but I do know that in recent years, and upon many occasions the Chancellor of the Exchequer of England delivered his budget within half an hour. It may be that I misconstrued the purpose of the remarks of the leader of the Opposition. Perhaps I did, but if he seriously endeavoured to criticize the budget speech as to its form, I think he was wrong, because I do submit that it contained all the essential facts which a budget statement should contain. I think probably the leader of the Opposition felt that the budget of the Minister of Finance was not open to very serious criticism. I think that from his standpoint that was the weakness of the budget. Somebody said many years ago that it was the function of an opposition to oppose, and, of course, it is hard to discharge that duty if a budget is such that it cannot well be criticized.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the budget speech was delivered by the minister some two weeks ago, and the country has had considerable opportunity of discussing it and expressing its views, and I do submit that it has been well received by the country and the Minister's political opponents outside of parliament. I think it is one that should receive the commendation of members of parlimaent, regardless of the side of the House on which they sit.

The budget statement disclosed facts which, of course, the country was very well acquainted with, namely: that our expenditures in this country are stupendous; that we must raise a very very substantial revenue by taxation and the re-statement of these facts in the budget only goes to show what a serious task confronts the government, parliament, and the people, of Canada. I do not think any Canadian could well be criticized for self-glorification of the manner in which this country, large in area but small in population, is able to carry the tremendous burden that rests upon it. I think it is a matter of which every Canadian might feel proud. We are carrying on a very expensive national establishment here, perhaps too expensive when we consider the extent of the country and the fact that the population numbers only eight or nine millions. It is a marvellous thing that so small a population is able to bear the burdens that rest upon them as taxpayers. We must, of course, in order to meet this gigantic burden, have faith in our country. Without that our task would be almost hopeless. We have however, to assist us in contemplating the future, the fact that we have the capacity to grow and expand.

If Canada were situated as Great Britain and some of the older European countries, where they find themselves fully developed and where it is impossible to increase in population, Canadians might well be discouraged. Our hearts must go out to the people of Great Britain and to the people of some continental European countries in their efforts to discharge the tremendous financial obligations to-day resting upon them by reason of the war. Our future in that respect is not at all dark. As I said before, this country is capable of expansion; it is capable of maintaining millions and millions of people who yet can be added to our population. The province of Alberta, concerning which we hear so much to-day, is alone capable of sustaining a population equal to that of the whole of Canada. The province of Ontario, again, is capable of sustaining a population double that which we find in Canada. So, when we have these possibilities in mind, the future should not seem so dark and hopeless as some Canadians would have us believe it to be to-day. Rather we should look to the future with courage, and with the abiding faith that in the early years yet to come, we shall have escaped from many of the oppressive burdens which we have to face to-day.

I should like to say a few words upon another subject which has been referred to time and time again during this session, so that I feel in doing so I should almost apologize to hon. gentlemen. We have heard a great deal concerning the fact—and it is a fact—that business conditions are depressed in this country. We have heard, time and time again, remarks regarding agriculture, particularly in the western provinces. Every Canadian who has come to years of understanding and who possesses powers of observation knows what are the agricultural conditions in the West just about as well as the man living in the West to-day. We have many ways by which we can acquire that knowledge. Those conditions have the sympathy of the people of the East; they would very much prefer that their fellow-countrymen in these new sections of the West were living under more favourable conditions and that trade was more favourable. Agricultural depression exists in the East just as much as it does in the West. Perhaps, in connection with agricultural pursuits in the East, this period of depression is not so effective by reason of the diversity of the farm productions of our eastern agriculturists. Those are regrettable conditions; but they are to be found in the East as well as in the West. We shall never solve this problem by accentuating conditions existing in the western section of the country without recognizing as well that they prevail in the extreme east, and without recognizing the fact, to which I shall refer later, that those conditions, after all, are world-wide conditions.

I might refer to the fact that in the great fishing industry of the Maritime provinces, they have suffered very much by reason of the fact that they have been unable to secure a market for their fish production. No tariff legislation, no efforts of governments or parliaments could have assisted them. They found that, through one condition or another, they were unable to sell their products in the markets in South America, in the West Indies, in the Mediterranean ports—places beyond the power of the arm of this parliament to reach. The same is true to some extent of the lumber industry, and of the fruit industry. It is true in Canada of the manufacturing industry as well. I know many industries in this country to-day which are being operated at a loss which loss the management deliberately assume; but they prefer to carry on at a loss, or at least, without a profit, in order to maintain their organization and in order that unemployment shall not be increased. There is not in this country to-day a human activity that is not in a depressed condition. Nobody glories in that fact; we all suffer from it. The same conditions prevail in almost every other country in the world, and my only purpose in referring to this is to impress upon hon. gentlemen this fact, that we live in troublous days; that we are suffering from the effects of the greatest war known to human history which disturbed the whole world; and that to attempt to solve our national, local and individual problems without fully recognizing these facts is altogether futile and almost a waste of time. After all, we who are here should be leaders in forming public opinion and in assisting our electorate to understand the causes of present-day conditions. At least we should deliberately avoid any misrepresentation or evasion in presenting the facts to the people lest we render ourselves unable to carry to them a sound understanding of the problem and render them unable to assist us, who represent them, in discharging our public duties.

We must face our problems in a national spirit and with courage, and we should avoid a discussion of these matters from a sectional or a provincial viewpoint. We should stress the national viewpoint. I know this is a difficult country to govern. The leader of the Opposition almost in his closing words, wanted to know what the government was going to do for the Maritime provinces, who feel themselves economically isolated from the rest of Canada. That is an economic fact, and I doubt if it ever can be changed. This, as I say, is a very difficult country to govern. But these provinces were bound together deliberately for the purpose of building here a nation and welding the people who were here, and the people who were to come, into a prosperous and progressive nation. I do not know that any talk or suggestion about a violation of the confederation of the provinces, or any veiled intimation of a cessation from that political agreement, will help us to solve our problems. but this incessant accentuation of provincial and local problems, without due and proper recognition of the fact that they are also national, tends to the introduction of a restless political spirit which does not bode well for the future of this country. We have had in Canada in the last two or three years a new political doctrine which preaches the economic organization of groups.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I do not know what it is called, but I hear some voice of approval of that idea, and it sounds like a voice crying in the wilderness. I do not suppose it will have any effect on the movement, but I want to say that I disapprove of it, and so I hope, will everyone in Canada, It is economically nonsensical; it is absolutely devoid of any advantage to the country; and it can only prove to be mischievous. I believe that a great deal of the trouble in one of the provinces of Canada is due to the fact that there is an element always preaching this fallacy of economic group organization. No man who believes in the doctrine of free trade, or a moderate tariff, or who understands the fundamental principles of economics can believe in this new economic doctrine. Nevertheless I find that this doctrine of economic group organization is being promulgated in parts of western Canada. I have in my hand the Grain Growers' Guide, a publication known to hon. gentlemen, and in this particular issue there appears a resolution passed at the Alberta Farmers' parliament, I think in January last. This is the resolution:

> That we hereby reaffirm our adherence to the principle of economic group organisation and co-operation between economic groups and demand that our representatives stand firm in adherence to this principle, and that they oppose any steps looking to either amalgamation or affiliation with any political party, or to the forming of a new political party by any broadening out policy.

I do not deny the right of any aggregation of men to adopt that policy and promulgate it with all the energy they may see fit; but it is my right and the right of any other hon. gentleman if he desires, to express his disapproval of it. That is all I wish to say. I am not saying that all of the Progressive party sitting directly opposite me favour that; I do not think that very many of them do—at least, I should hope not. I might read a very effective statement, if I had time, made by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) not very long ago in which he very strongly denounced the principle behind that movement, and I think that in doing so he rendered a great service to the country. I hope that his statement will be well considered by the people to whom he addressed his remarks. One effect of political doctrines of that kind, is the development of economic phantasies of such a character to-day as would, a few years ago pretty nearly send a man to some institution; and in the course of a few years, when matters have adjusted themselves, I am sure that those men who are promulgating these ideas at the present time will come to see the folly of it all.

I made a remark a moment ago to which I wish to return. I said that our conditions had not their origin in Canada, but in Europe, and I say that Europe must recover its economic processes before this country can do the same. If that fact were realized, many of the utterances which are made from time to time in this country would receive their proper weight. I am astounded at the many prominent Canadians who sometimes come out in the public press or in company meetings and speak in what they call the optimistic strain; they regard it as a bit of wisdom to be optimistic, as they say. Personally, I have no use for the words "optimism" and "pessimism;" I never use them if I can avoid them; I am not sure that they express anything worth expressing. I think it is better to try to recognize truth as being true and falsity as being false.

Mr. SPENCER: Is the hon. member referring to the Liberal platform of 1919?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I am not referring to that at all, and I should like to know what put that thought in the hon. gentleman's head. It would interest me to know that.

Mr. SPENCER: The hon. member suggested it was well to know what was true and what was false. We have heard a great deal about the Liberal platform to-day and I thought he was referring to it.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): My hon. friend must have known that was not in my mind. I was trying to impress upon the House the fact that our commercial conditions in Canada had their origin in Europe.

Mr. IRVINE: And in Russia and Germany?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Yes; conditions in Russia have left a tremendous influence on all the countries of the world. Now, my hon. friends opposite are very much interested in wheat and the prices of wheat. That is the large and important production in the western provinces, and naturally they are interested in receiving a fair price that will afford them a substantial profit over cost of production. And we are all interested in that matter too. We are told that the production of wheat in the last year or two has not been profitable, and that fact we all regret. If there were any means by which we in parliament could correct that position and turn it into one that was favourable, we would do so. Under ordinary circumstances wheat ought to carry a very high price in the European markets to-day. Judged by the price of other commodities, it should be somewhere between $1 and $2 a bushel, perhaps more. But what produces the present condition? Europe desires wheat —Canadian wheat—but she is not in a position to pay for it. France and Italy are back to war-time milling regulations; in some countries the law requires that potato flour be mixed with grain flour; while in other countries the use of grain is prohibited for the making of beer. These facts are well-known to hon. gentlemen, and my only reason for referring to them is that Europe's economic condition is such that she cannot buy her normal requirements of grain, and this immediately reacts upon the wheat producer in Canada—he does not obtain the price which the world's market would fairly secure for him under ordinary conditions. Let me repeat, my only purpose in referring to this is to accentuate the fact, I have stated, and I think it is worthy of repetition, because men should not forget that our adverse economic condition is due to the economic condition of Europe to-day; and for that very reason we must be interested in international affairs.

Now, Mr Speaker, it is nearly six o'clock, and before I venture to approach another subject I wonder if it would be agreeable to hon. members to call it six o'clock.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, resuming my remarks of this afternoon I wish to allude very briefly to a matter which has been referred to frequently during this debate and, in fact, very frequently during the session. I have reference to the matter of the emigration from Canada to the United States, which has been going on in very substantial numbers during the past year or more. The fact itself is not in controversy, because it is well known that many Canadians, during the past year or year and a half, have gone to the United States. The statement, however, I thought frequently carried the implication of government responsibility, and that something should have been done, or might have been done, by this country which would have avoided that emigration. Now, Mr. Speaker, of course, the fact is very regrettable indeed, but I know of nothing which the government of the country at the moment can do to prevent it. The conditions of the United States are most peculiar, or have been during the past year or more, particularly if one has in mind the conditions prevailing in the other nations of the world. The United States has a very large population, large and well-established industries, and her natural growth is very considerable. The labour market was supplied very largely from year to year from European countries. That, however, has been prevented in recent years by their immigration laws. The result was that there was a shortage of labour, accompanied by an inflation in wages and an inflation in some lines of production and materials, particularly building materials. That brought about a condition of prosperity in the United States, and Canadians very naturally ask one another in these days how it is that in a country not very dissimilar to ours, lying side by side, we should find in the one an apparent prosperity, and in the other a depression in trade. While it is regrettable that so many Canadians are obliged to leave their country, I am not so sure but that the judgment of Canada in the course of a year or a little more will be that it was better that we should pass through the conditions we are now passing through than to have the inflation which the United States now has, and which in the course of a few months must collapse and be accompanied with the inevitable depression and dislocation of trade. Everybody who understands or cares to observe the conditions in the United States knows that that apparent prosperity is due to an increase in the building trade. It is also well known, and remarked by everybody in the United States who knows anything about the matter, that prices of building material and wages have recently reached such a stage that they can proceed no further, and from day to day we notice in the press evidence of threatened strikes, and we may soon expect strikes in the building trade which will react upon this country and must end the inflation in the United States. It will not be an undesirable thing for the United States if that should happen. The reaction will affect us adversely, I admit, but looking to the future, taking a long view of things as we should in these days, it is perhaps better it should come, because the sooner will we and the United States and the other countries of the world reach something approaching normal conditions. Until that period arrives, whatever men may propose, deplorable conditions will prevail throughout the world. Therefore, I wish to say upon this point that I deny any government responsibility in this matter, and I doubt whether there is anything that we in this country could do to prevent that particular condition of affairs.

The leader of the Opposition referred this afternoon to the matter of expenditure and the balancing of our budget. I concede that this is, perhaps, the most important question in Canadian politics to-day, and of infinitely more importance perhaps than tariff or any other question which anybody might suggest. It is a question upon which we should not divide on party lines. It is a matter which affects every man in this country, the rich and the poor, the high and the humble, the weak and the strong. We, as representatives of the people, charged with certain responsibilities to whom the people of the country naturally look for some leadership, should give to the government of the day, whatever that government be, our best judgment in connection with the matter of public expenditure. I am not so apprehensive as to what should be the judgment of the government upon the question of expenditure. I am more concerned with the views of members of parliament and of the people we represent. If the government were led by the right hon. member who leads the Opposition, or if the Progressive party were on the ministerial benches, I would say of them, as I now say of the government, that I would have the greatest confidence in their desire to restrict unprofitable and unproductive public expenditure. I would also concede to them the sincere desire to balance our budget. But, as I said, I am not alarmed about the government not desiring to practise such a policy. I am more alarmed as to whether the public view is right and whether the view of members of parliament is quite proper in that respect. Some time ago we had a discussion in this House upon the question of the Hudson Bay railway. I had intended to take part in that, but for one reason and another I did not. The views expressed by the House, or by a great number of the members, left upon me the impression and conviction that we were not properly seized of the great importance of being right upon the matter of public expenditure. There is no political or party issue in this question. The Liberal party and the Conservative party were committed years ago to this expenditure. But it does not follow that either party is bound by this promise made in the past. It is true that gentlemen directly opposite me and their supporters in their respective sections of the country were always strongly in favour of this railway project, but it does not follow that to-day they should support it.

During the debate many speeches were made, some of them occupying fully an hour, trying to demonstrate that ships could navigate the Hudson bay and the Hudson strait, just as if it were a major factor in the case. In an argument, or discussion, or controversy of that kind, any person might well admit that a ship could navigate the Hudson bay and the Hudson strait. It has been done, but that, after all, is not important. The real question is, is the Hudson bay a commercial route? Can ships be put on that route and operate profitably? Can they carry grain through by that route at a price lower than the prices which are available to-day by the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence route, or by the rail and water routes? These are questions that should be settled before anybody in this country should commit himself to-day to any further expenditure in this connection other than outlined by the Acting Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) when the matter was up for discussion.

I wish to tender this bit of advice to the government, that before this country seriously entertains the idea of completing that project, a commission be appointed to inquire into what are really important and salient facts, but which have never yet, so far as I know, been inquired into at all. As I said before, the question of navigability of the Hudson bay is not a very important factor. Of course, there must be water there; conditions must be such as to permit of a ship leaving the Hudson bay port and proceeding thence to Europe. I will concede that now as being possible; but I would not concede it to be a commercially feasible route or one worth spending any more of the public money upon, unless it is demonstrated in a more ample way than it has been up to the present moment that it is a sound, commercial, transportation route.

Mr. BIRD: Does the hon. member not think that, in the case of a port that is one thousand miles nearer to Liverpool than Montreal, the onus of proving the commercial feasibility lies upon himself?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I should not think so, to be fair to my hon. friend. I should say that, prima facie, every man who wishes to reflect upon the question at all, would conclude that the other route was the cheaper of the two, because there must be, in the first place, a large capital investment to provide shipping, and this must be done by the government because no private company will ever go into this enterprise. Everything indicates, on the surface at least, that you could not carry freight as cheaply by that route as by existing routes. I may be wrong; I merely say that it is sound to suggest that before the project is proceeded with further, there should be a closer examination of all the facts relative thereto.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Would the hon. member extend that suggestion to the Welland canal?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): The Welland canal is in a somewhat different position, as I am sure my hon. friend will concede. I am not going to engage in an extended discussion with regard to that. There are in the western provinces instances where railway projects might very well be carried out, which would be in the interests of the country. I have heard the story of the need of railways in the Peace river country from some gentlemen who were in Ottawa recently, and I was very much impressed. When I heard the story, I could not but inquire of myself why it was that in this House amongst 235 members, there could be found men who could justify the expenditure of $25,000,000 on the Hudson Bay railway, and, perhaps, hesitate to urge an expenditure to construct in the western provinces some short pieces of railway which would do very much for those particular localities and for the interest of the country generally.

Talking about expenditure, I should like to make to the Minister of Finance a suggestion wherein he might save some money, and I am sure if he would carry out my suggestion, he will find that it is a sound one. According to the evidence before the House, it would appear that the operations of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine last year netted a deficit of six, seven or eight million dollars.

Mr. DUFF: Nine million dollars.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Nine million dollars. That is a very substantial sum of money. I am opposed to the continued operation of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. In the first place, it is costing us nine million dollars a year, and the people of this country have to be taxed that much to meet that deficit. It renders no service to Canada, for the reason that ships could be found elsewhere, owned by private persons and companies, which would perform the services just as well and as cheaply as the Canadian Government Merchant Marine is doing. I am not criticizing the policy of the government that inaugurated the programme of the construction of ships; in fact, I was a member of that government, and in that respect I am not in a different position from that of anybody who was in parliament at that time. Everyone who was in parliament at that time supported that policy.

An hon. MEMBER: At the beginning.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): At the beginning, it was deemed sound national policy. Almost every country in the world embarked upon a similar policy. I do not intend, however, to engage in any lengthy argument upon the merits or demerits of that scheme. I wish merely to point out to the Minister of Finance a method by which he may save eight or nine million dollars a year and do no injury to any public service or public interest.

The leader of the Opposition this afternoon criticized adversely the fact that the Minister of Finance predicted a deficit in the financial operations of the government for the present fiscal year. The Minister of Finance anticipates quite a substantial surplus of revenue over all ordinary, capital and special expenditures; but he anticipates again that the railway deficits will more than consume that surplus. The leader of the Opposition says that this country should be taxed to meet that deficit caused by the railway operations, so that the budget would balance. I admit there is something in that. The Minister of Finance was very frank about the matter when delivering his budget. All reflecting people will acknowledge the desirability of balancing budgets. That is one of the troubles of Europe to-day: Their expenditures are greater than their revenues, and they meet the situation by printing paper money, ruining themselves, ruining other countries, impeding the restoration of trade processes as between countries and countries. I think our record in Canada up to date in this respect has been a very creditable one; in this respect, as in most other respects, Canadians have held their heads well during the trying period from the armistice down to the present day. We have done nothing in this country to impede the restoration of trade channels between this country and all other countries. In this respect we are quite unique; we are almost the only country in the world that has not enacted legislation specifically designed to impede trading between countries.

No other country is in quite the same position as we are in respect of our transportation system, and it is a serious matter to tax the people of Canada these days for railway deficits. This might be a good way of informing the Canadian people in a few, short years whether government ownership and operation is a good thing or not. It is, however, the judgment of the country that the government-owned system should be given a fair trial. I would look upon the advances made to the road as a loan, or advance, and not, strictly speaking, as a part of our budget ordinary. That view may be open to some criticism. I hope the day is not very far off when this country will commence to grow and its business expand, when our population will be such that our debt will be practically cut in two, while the railway business will have grown to such an extent as not only to pay its operating expenses but to repay to the government some of the advances that have been made to it, or it will be able to finance itself by the sale of bonds and through the proceeds of such bonds restore those advances to the government. Therefore, I am not inclined to agree with the criticism of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) that the railway advances must necessarily, at the present time at least, be met by taxation. It is quite true that policy could not long be continued; neither can we long continue owning and operating a government system if it entails such a huge deficit as we have had during the past few years, because we should soon reach the limit of our capacity for taxation for that or any other purpose, and some other solution would then have to be discovered.

The leader of the Opposition this afternoon inveighed strongly against the government on its tariff policy and its failure to live up to the party platform drawn up in 1919. This matter was discussed very thoroughly at the last session and I do not know that I can add anything to what has already been said, either by myself or by any other hon. member. I think that altogether too much importance is attached to it. Many good and distinguished men in the past have reversed their positions in respect of public policy, and in that reversal have received the applause of the country which they were serving. Hon. gentlemen will remember that Sir Robert Peel, an eminent British statesman, at a certain period in British history was opposed to the repeal of the Corn Laws.

Mr. FORKE: Does the hon. member admit that the government has reversed its policy?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): No, I had not reached that point.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I do not see any necessity for this laughter and I hope there is more behind it than appears to me at the moment. No; I did not say that the government had reversed its policy, but I did observe that very frequently eminent gifted public men have reversed almost in a moment their position on certain public questions and have not been maligned for so doing. In their lifetime perhaps they were charged with inconsistency and with having abandoned their position for purely political gain, and it required the passage of days, perhaps years, to have justice accorded them. I mention this merely to suggest in very general terms that the public should not require an inflexible stand by public men on any question. Surely there should be some room for variation in their opinions on such questions if the changes, the conditions and the circumstances of the times justify or warrant it. That was the point I wished to make, and I am sure that hon. gentlemen opposite, who were laughing a few moments ago, will not disagree with it.

Now, Sir, I was not at the Liberal Convention of 1919.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You were in different company then.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I was in England at the time and if I had been in Canada I should hardly have been a welcome guest at that convention.

Mr. McMASTER: Yes, you would.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Therefore perhaps I can speak with a little more freedom in this regard than can some of the hon members who were present at the convention.

The tariff policy enunciated at that convention is not before me at the moment, but in general terms it declared in favour of an increase in the British preference and for substantial reductions on specified articles. I do not hesitate to say that it is unwise for any party convention to write a tariff schedule. It is not their business and they cannot do it; and I should say very frankly and emphatically of the Liberals who were gathered together at that time—I know them, and I do not want to say anything that is not inspired by kindness so far as they are concerned—that they could not possibly have been in a position to write a tariff schedule then. It was their duty to declare themselves upon matters of policy and nothing else. I say the same thing, too, about the policy, the platform, of hon. gentlemen opposite; they were equally foolish. If those hon. gentlemen came into office to-morrow they could not carry out their programme; and if I were to lead them through that door yonder, one by one, I am sure they would agree with me in that statement. I should hardly expect them to do so collectively before the public, however. I have not the slightest doubt that in regard to their policy pretty nearly every hon. gentleman opposite me disagrees emphatically with one or more of the planks of their platform; I have too high an opinion of them individually and collectively to believe otherwise. At the same time I am not criticizing the main principle running through their platform, and I repeat that political parties are perfectly within their rights and are only performing their duty by the public in a proper manner when they declare themselves on certain principles in relation to public policy. But they have no right to deal with details, and if they do so they are bound to find themselves in serious trouble later on.

I might say more about hon. gentlemen of the opposition. There is not much use in their declaring before the public that they have been always consistent either as regards their general programme or in respect of its details. Take the tariff declarations of the Liberal-Conservative party, called the National Liberal and Conservative party; you could put anything into it or take anything out of it, and probably it was designed to facilitate operations of that kind. At the same time, however, it is only fair to say that the Conservative party have been consistently strong protectionists. Now, is it not easy to discern a distinction between the tariff policy of the Liberal party, say, and that of the Conservative party in Canada?

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I know that my hon. friends who say, "no", do not mean it, but they cannot provoke me away from my argument by such an interruption. The Conservative party have been consistently protectionists, except for slight variations and departures at certain times when it appeared politically advantageous to them to make a detour. They use very old-fashioned arguments in support of protection and if I were supporting a tariff policy I would find a better ground on which to advocate it. Last evening an hon. gentleman in the Conservative ranks spoke somewhat in this way: "If we buy goods in a foreign country we send our money away to help build up that country." Well, that is the idea of an antediluvian; I could make a better protectionist speech myself, or at least I could give more convincing arguments in favour of protection. That is absurd, because we do not send money away. If we send goods away we have to get goods back; the imports and exports must in the main balance. We must have trade; and a lot of this loose thinking is perhaps due to the fact that it is not countries who buy and sell; it is only people who do so. Why, the leader of the Opposition during the general election in 1921 had prominently exposed upon his political literature a statement attributed to Abraham Lincoln, that if you buy from abroad you have the goods, but you have lost your money; but if you buy at home you have your goods and you have your money too. As a matter of fact, Lincoln never said so, because he was always too wise and too well informed upon economics. I only refer to this to show that the Conservative party are— I was going to say poor thinkers. But they are pronounced protectionists now, and if their statements are to be believed they expect to remain so, because they do not think it is wise for us to trade with the people of other countries, or perhaps, speaking more accurately, they do not believe in the people of Canada doing business with anybody else; for that is what it gets down to.

What is the position of the Liberal party? It may be quite true to say that while Liberal ministries have been in power we have had an element of protection in our tariff. Hon. gentlemen opposite say if they came into office there would still be an element of protection in the tariff. They have said that time and again. It is in their platform. Even in their amendment to the budget they recognize the probability of that element being continued; but they say protection should not be granted unless the applicant comes before a parliamentary committee and makes good his request for protection. That is simply the tariff board idea. They have it in the United States, and it is, I think, a pretty good way of perpetuating protection. I would hardly agree to it myself. At the same time, I think I am well within the mark when I say that Liberal governments have from time to time reduced the tariff, that they have always expressed the view that the principle of protection is wrong and that it should be the aim and purpose of the people of every country to some day reach a free trade basis. It is a mental outlook if it is nothing else.

Mr MACLEAN (Halifax): A man may believe in the efficacy and soundness of free trade or low tariffs and yet find it impossible of accomplishment by reason of the past economic policy of his country, or by reason of conditions of one kind and another which are beyond his control. There is no occasion for my hon. friend opposite to laugh. I am not propounding any new philosophy; they themselves believe in it. For instance, during the past few weeks I was surprised to find so many hon. gentlemen among the Progressive group urging that we should carry coal from Alberta to Ontario. I have not much faith in the proposal myself, although I think it is well that it should be studied so that in the event of a recurrence of conditions such as prevailed last year in relation to our coal supply the government would be ready to meet the situation. The average member from Alberta to-day, I suppose, would support the policy of taking coal from Alberta to Ontario, but at the same time he and his colleagues know it can only be done by adding to the railway deficit and taxing the people.

Mr. FORKE: The hon. gentleman makes the statement that members from Alberta know coal could not be transported to Ontario without adding to the railway deficit. How do they know? The question is open for discussion. The hon. gentleman is assuming that members in this quarter of the House are willing to grant a bonus to the railways for the carriage of such coal; but he has no information to that effect.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I would think that pretty nearly every hon. gentleman opposite knows—

Mr. FORKE: You do not know what they know.

Mr MACLEAN (Halifax): I hope my hon. friend will not take offence at my remarks, they are not intended to offend him. I am ascribing to him a measure of intelligence which I hope he will not refuse to acknowledge. I want to say it must be common knowledge that it is not possible to carry coal from Alberta to Ontario except at a rate which would be unprofitable to the railways, and that this loss would have to be made up in some way or another by the people of Canada generally. I regret that such is the fact. I am not criticizing my hon. friends opposite I am only attempting to show that they are only human and think much like the rest of us do.

Mr. WARNER: Have you read diligently the evidence given before the coal committee?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I have not read it diligently, I have not read it at all, and I do not expect ever to do so; but I have read some of it and have discussed the matter with men who hold very practical views in regard to it, and their views were of much greater assistance to me than would be a perusal of all the evidence.

Mr. WARNER: Do you think it would be a good idea to withhold criticism until after the conference at Winnipeg and until the committee have made a report?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I think after that conference and everything else is closed my hon. friend will agree with me that I am a pretty accurate prophet in respect to this particular matter.

Now, taking the record of the Liberal party and going back to the year 1896, I submit to this House and particularly to hon. gentlemen opposite me, that it supports the view I was expressing a few moments ago, namely, that very important reductions of the tariff generally have been made while the Liberal party were in office. In 1897 the preferential tariff was brought into effect. That 9 p.m. was a tremendous change in the tariff policy of the country. The opponents of the Liberal party of that day said this preferential tariff would have a disastrous effect upon our industries. This important and substantial reduction would never have originated from the Conservative party. It still continues, and I think it should be regarded as evidence of the desire of those who believe in the greatest possible freedom of trade to bring it about as time, conditions and circumstances permit. Then came 1911 when the Liberal party of that day committed themselves to a policy of a trade treaty with the United States. Surely that was evidence of a desire on the part of the leaders and parliamentary supporters of the Liberal party to encourage the greatest freedom of trade possible between Canada and the United States. Some hon. gentlemen sitting directly opposite me opposed that move on the part of the Liberal party. I understand that the new member who came to us recently from Moose Jaw (Mr. Hopkins) —who spoke last night and whom we were all glad to hear—was one of those who in 1911 opposed the trade agreement with the United States.

Mr. HOEY: That is one of the inaccurate statements that were widely spread over the constituency during the recent campaign. I want to say, on the personal authority of the hon. member, that he did not vote against reciprocity.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I am bound to accept the word of the hon. gentleman. Of course, if the hon. member in question says he did not support the Conservative party of that day that ends the incident. I have no desire to misrepresent his position. Then since 1911 there have been reductions of the tariff, made by Liberal ministries. Reductions were made last year. True, they were not very heavy reductions, but it indicates the tendency on the part of the Liberal party to reduce the tariff, at least, in some degree, and at certain times, according as circumstances may in their judgment justify such a course. The tariff announcements made by the Minister of Finance a few days ago contain, I think, quite substantial reductions, when we consider the effect of the 10 per cent reduction in the duties under the British preferential tariff. With that record, known to the public and particularly known to hon. gentlemen opposite—known, in fact, to the world—I fail to see the justification for their open and declared opposition to it. They themselves admit that if they were given the confidence of the electorate and were sitting on the ministerial benches, they could not at once introduce free trade.

There are one or two reasons why it is difficult to put into effect at this time, or will be in the early years to come, a tariff on a free trade basis. In the first place, we must have revenue, and how are we going to get it unless, in part, by the imposition of tariff taxes upon imports? Where is it to come from? In his amendment the leader of the Progressive party states that further revenue might be obtained by an increase of the excise tax. I think the Minister of Finance has explored every avenue that he could think of to augment his revenue by excise, and he has failed. Having found that some of the excise taxes imposed last year were too high and did not accomplish the object he had in view, he was obliged to come before this House a few days ago and frankly concede that his judgment was wrong in that respect, and he seeks a reduction of these particular taxes.

Then the suggestion is commonly made, "If you lose some revenue by dropping tariff taxation, why, you can increase the income tax." Well, it is very easy to say that, but it is very much more difficult to get revenue in that way. I fancy that income taxation in this country is just as high as it should be; I am not so sure that its reduction at a very early day would not be better from the point of view of revenue, better for the national interest as well as for the individual good. We cannot long proceed to take all the difference between the costs involved in production and the price paid by the consumer, and put it in the treasury in the form of taxation. We must have some capital with which to develop the country, with which to expand our present businesses and establish new ones, and those funds will not be available if we take too much taxation from the people. Therefore I say that we must derive a very considerable portion of our necessary revenue from customs taxation; it is impossible for us to get away from it. For that reason I suggest that it is not fair to charge the Liberal party with a deliberate and malicious abandonment of its traditional policy in respect to tariff and trade matters, because the necessities of the hour demand that we obtain some revenue in this way.

Last year, speaking on the budget, I very frankly said—and I have always held the idea; I wish to be candid in the matter—that in view of our proximity to the United States, a highly protected country, a country which is increasing its tariff against us, frequently doing so deliberately—in view of these circumstances we cannot entirely abandon our tariff. I do not think it bad business to have some instrument in your hands with which to bargain with your neighbours. I was very glad to hear during this session the suggestion from two or three hon. members of the Progressive group that it would be unwise to abandon our tariff altogether, in view of the attitude of the United States toward Canada on this question. I cannot recall who the hon. gentlemen were, but I remember distinctly that three of them made remarks of this import. Hon. gentlemen opposite, I am sure, were not pleased with the attitude of the American people in respect of the Fordney tariff. I cannot see how our friends of the western provinces could support a policy which involved our giving the United States, while they were taking this attitude, free entry into our markets. That to my mind, is unthinkable; it would not be sound national policy, no matter whether a particular view on the question of tariff is, in principle, sound or unsound.

One of the things in connection with this budget upon which I would like to congratulate the Minister of Finance is the offer it contains for reciprocal trade arrangements with the United States. I believe that will have a good effect. I believe in the freest trade relations possible with the country to the south of us. We sell to them probably the same amount that we sell to Great Britain; we buy from them, however, about five times as much as we buy from Great Britain. That disparity is natural and inevitable, in some degree at least. But when the Liberal party declares itself in favour of the establishment of closer trade relations with the United States, it should not be condemned by our friends opposite or by anyone else. Such a declaration is evidence of a desire to bring about the end which our friends of the Progressive party seem to be more anxious to attain than do the people of any other part of Canada—and I can quite understand their position in that respect. The United States only recently, under what is termed the flexible powers given to the President, increased the duties on some seven or eight articles being exported from Canada which happened to be either on the free list or subject to a very low tariff rate. Now, the people of this country cannot very well submit to that, and it is only natural that Canadians should like to keep themselves in the position of having an instrument to bargain with the country to the south of us. I fail to understand how hon. gentlemen representing western districts could entertain any other view; indeed, I do not believe they do.

The fact that the Minister of Finance referred to the desirability of stability in tariff matters has been considerably criticized. I think the statement has been much exaggerated. It seems to me, however, that if that fact was not made the subject of criticism it would be something else; I am not sure but that the criticism has that colour. Suppose we read again the remarks of the minister so that we shall be sure what he did say and give to it a proper interpretation. The Minister of Finance said:

> Business men do not like to be always threatened with changes in the tariff.

I do not know that there is any objection to that. Whatever a man's views on economics, or trade matters, or tariff matters may be, I do not see that he can object to the principle involved in that statement. In our municipal or provincial affairs, we like to have some finality to our taxation schemes. However that statement is qualified. Let me read further:

> There is no finality in legislation either as respects that tariff or as respects anything else. That which parliament can do to-day it can undo to-morrow. Everybody knows that. Everybody must conduct his business in the light of that fact. Nevertheless it is desirable that something like an assurance of tariff stability should be given to business men. Exceptions will occur. There will be cases where, in the interest of the consumer, reductions in the tariff ought to be made.

The Progressive platform contains a suggestion pretty well along these lines. The Progressives did suggest that the duties on British imports be cut down immediately 50 per cent and that in the course of five years they be abandoned. I do not think they imagine that that is a practical suggestion, or that they could put it into effect even if they were on the treasury benches. In the amendment there is the declaration that violent changes cannot be made in the tariff, and that business must be given an opportunity to adjust itself to new tariff conditions. Well, one system is perhaps a little more extreme than the other, but each is an acknowledgement of what is a practical fact, known to everybody of mature years and who has any experience in business affairs at all. I think the minister's statement is a fair one. It would be unjust to the country to be making tariff changes every year. Furthermore, I doubt if there is any Minister of Finance who, speaking from a physical point of view, could go through one parliament of four years and undertake to give a tariff revision each year to the degree made in this budget we are discussing. I appeal to hon. gentlemen in this House, and to hon. gentlemen opposite, upon this criticism which is made of the tariff, and I ask if there is anything really and substantially objectionable in the position taken by the Minister of Finance. Would they themselves not do the same, or say the same, if they were charged with the responsibility of the administration of the public affairs or of the financial affairs of this country?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have spoken much longer than I intended when I first rose this afternoon, and as I stated at the beginning of my remarks I hardly hoped to enlighten the House upon the matters before us, or to contribute anything to the discussion that was new or fresh. The problems before us to-day in this country are great, they are almost oppressive, and to face them and deal with them in the proper fashion we must have stout hearts and exhibit a great deal of courage. We must deal with them in a broad, national way, although I do not ask any members from the different sections of Canada to be unmindful of their own sectional interest. We cannot avoid that, and unfortunately there is such a lack of community of interest in the three great sections of this country that sectional views and interests must frequently project themselves into our political issues. We must also exercise patience in the restoration of a condition of normal trade and business in this country as in the case of the peoples of most other countries of the world. As I said this afternoon the restoration of Canadian trade, the reconstruction of the world, cannot be accomplished by the efforts of any one country or of any two countries. Trade to-day is a matter which concerns the whole world. Finance, taxation, expenditures, trade, tariffs, affect every country of the world, and as they affect one they react immediately upon the other. We must exercise or display wisdom and economy in our public expenditures. We should support the government in their efforts to control expenditure and make only wise, profitable and productive outlays. The budget delivered by the Minister of Finance, I submit, in view of the conditions prevailing in this country and throughout the world generally, is a fair one and is worthy of the support of the public, and I think will meet with favourable consideration from the hon. members of this House.

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome): Mr. Speaker, before I enter upon the remarks which I have prepared to address to this House this evening there are some matters which have cropped up during the debate to which I would like to devote a very short period of time.

I am sorry the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) is not in his place, because I propose to direct a few observations in his direction. He has always treated me, since I have been a member of this House, with distinguished courtesy, and I would desire to return courtesy with courtesy; and the criticism I offer to a few of the remarks he made this afternoon is criticism directed in that temper. But I was sorry for something the right hon. gentleman dropped this afternoon. It was his remark concerning the highly esteemed and regarded member for Queen's (Mr. Sinclair), the minister without portfolio. It is true that that hon. gentleman's voice is not often heard in the debates in this chamber, but those who have sat by him day after day in the no less exacting and, perhaps, important work of committees know how sound is his intelligence, how wise his discretion, how limitless his industry.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In the absence of the leader of the Opposition I think I should say that my hon. friend is entirely mistaken.

Mr. DUFF: Oh no, he is not. We all heard him this afternoon.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) will reserve his comment until I have concluded my explanation. He is entirely mistaken. What the leader of the Opposition was referring to was the imputed position in which the free trade members of the government, those gentlemen that believe in a low tariff, found themselves—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: —and he said he was even content to include the member for Lunenburg in that description.

Mr. McMASTER: I am not unaware of the tone in which the remark was proffered. I am ready to believe, however, it slipped unwittingly from the lips of the leader of the Opposition, and I would merely say to him that it is good to have the strength of the giant, but tyrannous to use it as such.

I would like to make a few other remarks concerning his address. When the right hon. member spoke with considerable enthusiasm of Great Britain having reduced her debt by £100,000,000, I could not help remembering that a few short months ago, when sitting on this side of the House, he told us how Great Britain had been ruined by free trade. Apparently the country that has been able to reduce its debt and to balance its budget, is that country which the right hon. leader of the Opposition characterized as having been ruined by adopting and continuing a policy of free trade. Not only has it followed for many years the policy of free trade, but it has repented of any changes from that policy, and I would like to read to the House what Mr. Lloyd George said at a meeting held the other night in Manchester, England. He said:

There are three dangers to liberty. The first is protection. I will tell you what I will do. If there is going to be a fight about Free Trade,—and I believe it,—let us get rid of all three, the McKenna tariff, the Paris Resolutions, and the safeguarding of Industries Act. Let us clear the decks, and if there is a fight for free trade let us go forward as a united party.

I would like to draw the attention of the House to a remark made by the right hon. member concerning the United States. He pointed out what was quite true, that the Americans had raised their duties quite recently, but he did not tell us that since the Americans raised their duties they have had a congressional election in that country, and that the Republican party lost very heavily in the contest. He forgot to tell us—after all it was hardly his business as a protectionist statesman to inform us on this point—that the organization in the United States corresponding to our Council of Agriculture in this country has had its eyes opened, and has placed itself on record as favouring the reduction of the present tariff in the United States and the admission of some of our cattle free into that country. Then the right hon. and learned gentleman talked to us about reciprocity. He said that reciprocity was undesirable from two points of view; first from an economic point of view, and secondly from a national point of view. As I understood his argument it was this: Grant for the sake of argument that it is going to help the country, and that it is going to increase your trade with the United States, you have no assurance that that market will always be yours. You may organize your trade in order to take advantage of that market, and then, perhaps in ten years, the doors will be closed and your trade will be disorganized to your great loss. I think the natural producers of Canada are prepared to take that risk. If the doors be opened in a reciprocal trade relation with the United States, there will not be one dollar's worth of goods go from Canada to the United States unless there is a better price to be realized for those goods. There will not be one dollar's worh of goods come from the United States unless you get a better value for the money. Reciprocity gives a better opportunity for advantageous exchange. That is all it does. Suppose the doors were opened, and also suppose that they were closed in ten years, would Canada not be just so much better for that ten years of increased prosperity?

What gave the agriculturist in eastern Canada a great help between 1854 and 1866? It was the reciprocity arrangements that were made with the United States. It is too bad they were lost, but let me remind hon. members that the United States of to-day is a very different place from the United States of 1866. They have become a very highly industrialized nation during the years that have elapsed since then, and I cherish the notion that if the doors were open and reciprocal trade allowed to flow in natural channels north and south, it would be found so much to the advantage of both parties that the doors would never be closed. It is well worth taking the risk. Of course, there are those who wish to think that in some way or other free trade relations would hurt our national spirit, and that we would be less loyal to throne and flag if such a thing were adopted. Just think of the United States itself. New York has been trading freely with Vermont for hundreds of years. Are Vermonters any the less Vermonters? Or are New Yorkers any the less New Yorkers to-day than they were in former times? Of course not. The proposition is ridiculous. It was a herring drawn across the trail on the last election on this question in 1911, and it is to be hoped, for the good name of Canada, that childish arguments of that sort will not be used again.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition says that conditions are bad in Canada among the farmers, not only in the West but in the Maritime provinces. Unfortunately, I believe that what he says is true, but what is his remedy? He tongued-lashed the government for two hours this afternoon, but when he is called upon for a remedy, what is the remedy that he proposes? A continuation of the principle of protection, which is in other words a continuation of high taxes. The friends who sit behind him, small in number, though loyal in disposition, enthusiastically applaud this remark. Let me say that the country requires something more than a reiterated demand for the maintenance of taxation to get itself out of its present economic difficulties.

I have little to say in connection with the observations made by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean). He said this country was a difficult one to govern. I think that is true. He said we needed courage. I think that is true. He said we needed patience. I believe that is true. I will not call him an apostle of the obvious, but I will say that he is a St. Paul of the obvious—the greatest among the apostles. He dwells upon the Liberal mentality towards reduction of duties. He said the Liberals have a mind working towards lower duties and freer trade. I agree with him. I have that mind myself, but I wish to see that mind control matter, and to see a movement made in the right direction I was glancing at the life of John Bright the other night, and I found that he entered parliament in 1841, and by 1846 the Corn Laws had ben repealed. I do not know whether I expect quite such prompt action on the part of the people of this country. I do not know whether the need for freedom is quite as great as it was in the Great Britain of that time when people, through protection, were reduced to starvation. But I do say that I believe the people of this country are not going to be satisfied with a mere attitude of mind concerning the trade question, but that action and reasonably prompt action will be required. That leads me to what I have to say in this matter.

I purpose, Mr. Speaker, to vote for the amendment moved by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke), and I purpose to vote against the budget. When I next resume a seat in this House I purpose to sit where is the nearest approach that we have to the cross benches. My observations to-night will be directed not to an apology for, but in justification of, the action which I purpose to follow. I crave your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, in advance for the use which I shall be obliged to make of the first personal pronoun. Perhaps as I am dealing with my own conduct, that may be an excuse.

First of all, I wish to say that I am a Liberal and was never more a Liberal than I am to-night. I believe in the necessity of Liberalism. I believe the ills of this world can be healed, and healed only by the application of Liberal principles, but I want to see those Liberal principles applied with courage and with promptness. Just as we may find religion summed up in a few words, so we shall find the essence of Liberalism in those watchwords of the past, the watchwords of the Whigs of days gone by, the watchwords of the Liberals of days gone by—"Peace, Retrenchment and Reform," "Free Trade, Peace, Goodwill amongst the Nations," "Trust in the people, qualified by prudence; in opposition to distrust of the people, mingled with fear." We find the necessity for the application of what Mr. Lloyd George has recently characterized as a good definition of Liberalism: "Fair play for the under dog." That is what we need in this country. I have no apologies to make in this House or elsewhere for my conduct as a Liberal and a Liberal party man.

As a schoolboy, I became possessed of the illogical absurdities of the protectionist principle and protectionist practice, and I joined myself to the party which at that time stood for lower tariffs, which had denounced in eloquent terms the very principle of protection and which had said that protection was legalized robbery. I do not use the language of extremeness at this time, but that was the language used at that time by Liberal statesmen. As a college youth, I took an active part in the election of 1896 in the county which I now have the honour to represent in this House. As a result of the efforts of the Liberals in that county, there was returned to this House, after an absence of some five years, that good, sound public servant, the late Hon. Sydney Fisher. I rejoiced when the Minister of Finance made the cuts that he did in his Tariff Act of 1897. I supported his British preference and his various extensions thereof. I hoped, as all other Liberals in the country hoped, for the success of the reciprocity negotiations that went on in 1897, and I was sorry and disappointed when they failed.

Mr. DUFF: In 1911.

Mr. McMASTER: No, in 1897 there was a commission which sat at Washington with Lord Herschell as its chairman, which endeavoured to get reciprocal relations with the United States. That failed at that time through no fault of the Liberal government. I frankly admit that I was never perfectly satisfied with the advances which were made after about 1900, when the British preference came into its full effect. After that we made little, if any, advance in the low tariff direction. I admit frankly that the government was always face to face with the pressure from the vested interests of this country who, in the elections of 1900, 1904, 1908, were clamouring for what they were pleased to call adequate protection. The party, I suppose, is entitled to some credit for not having given way to that, though some way was given, and the schedule on some textiles was raised in 1904 or 1907, I forget just which.

When the reciprocity campaign of 1911 took place, I practically closed my law office in Montreal and threw myself into the fight with every atom of enthusiasm and power which I possessed. I believed that we were making a great forward step for Canada in that reciprocity election. I do not know just how much credit must be given to those who beat us in that election by their opposition to reciprocity. Other matters came in; sectarian cries were raised; racial cries were raised, and in the province of Quebec anti-Imperial cries were raised. As a result, we lost the election. But in my humble opinion, one of the reasons why we lost that election was because, from about 1900 to 1911, we failed to preach our Liberal doctrine on trade matters. Prior to 1896, every election in Canada was a course in political economy conducted by such men as Cartwright, Mulock, Fisher, and Liberals of the old school. When we got into power, the government was busy with other matters; the country was developing at a great rate; railway questions employed the energy and the mind of the government to a large extent; but we failed to preach our gospel, and the Nemesis which overtakes any church, or any body of men, or any political party that fails to preach its gospel, overtook us. There had come to the polls, there had reached maturity, thousands, if not tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of young men who, when 1911 came, had never heard the trade question discussed, who did not know the difference between the principle of protection and the principle of free trade, who never understood that trade in itself was a good thing, and who, therefore, were ready victims to the flag-flapping campaign that went on and the appeal to anti-American sentiment which, unfortunately, was raised by many Conservatives of that day with the slogan of "No truck or trade with the Yankees."

After that happened, I came into close personal touch with the leaders of the Liberal party of that day, especially with the Hon. Sydney Fisher and with that great Liberal statesman, the revered and deeply beloved chief of the Liberal party, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I remember in May, 1912, he came to Montreal to a great meeting. We had been beaten a few months previously, in September 1911. On that occasion there were not found wanting protectionist Liberals of Montreal who begged the old chieftain to forget all about reciprocity and to put it among the disused things back upon the shelf and say nothing about it. And what was his reply to their entreaty? I remember, as if it were yesternight, there stood the white plumed knight who said that reciprocity was a good thing, that the people of Canada had made a grave mistake in rejecting it and that they would some time wake up to the conclusion that they had erred; and then with a gesture he said: "My orders not to win or lose; my orders are to fight." It was imbued with that spirit that I went on doing all that I could for Liberal principles and the Liberal party, believing that the Liberal party was an instrument for the putting into action of those principles; and it was not very long until my principles, and my adhesion to my chief and to the Liberal party, were put to a very severe test in the election of 1917. Now, I have no criticism to offer of those men whose mind and conscience led them to leave Sir Wilfrid Laurier on the conscription issue. My mind and conscience led me to a different conclusion, and while some left him, I was among those who stood fast by the old chieftain; and when the storms, nay, the tornadoes of sectarian hatred and racial antagonism descended upon the head of him who had always stood for broad toleration and a deep and pure Canadianism,—descended upon him because he was French-speaking and a Roman Catholic,—I considered that only an additional reason why I, an English-speaking man and a Protestant, should stand firm by his side.

Why do I vote against this budget? I vote against it because I believe after a careful consideration that it is not a Liberal budget. It is a protectionist budget with a strong Maritime province flavour.

Mr. DUFF: Not strong enough for me.

Mr. McMASTER: When I say "Maritime flavour" I mean that it proposes the unwise provision that goods which in the natural course of events would come by sea-carriage, which is much cheaper than land-carriage, to Portland, Maine, and thence over our own railway to Montreal, a distance of less than 300 miles, shall be discharged at Halifax and come by land carriage, a much more expensive way of transportation, over 841 miles. That is what I refer to. If it were the mentality of the Nova Scotians that I was thinking of, then gladly would I say that it was not only tinctured but saturated with a Maritime flavour. I am just wondering whether this is a party budget at all; I am wondering whether it is a budget brought forward by a party. What is a party? A party is a group of men who have decided to advance the public interest along certain lines which they hold in common. I have studied the budget carefully but for the life of me I cannot see the common principle that animates it. I never was a good man at physics, but if I remember one principle of physics it is that any body of matter, operated on by equal powers of attraction in diametrically opposite directions, just about stays where it is. And that is true of this budget. Let us examine it. Before I deal with the budget, however, permit me to speak for a moment concerning the resolution, which I am going to vote for, and in respect of which I shall make some remarks of a somewhat critical nature. The senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), with the legal acumen which is the distinguishing characteristic of the profession he adorns, has already pointed out a clause which I had noticed as one liable to give considerable embarrassment in the future. After saying that while recognizing that changes in fiscal policy should be made in such a way as to give industries affected a reasonable opportunity for readjustment, it goes on to say:

> This House is of the opinion that the principle of protection as a basis for fiscal policy in Canada is unsound, and that every claim for protection should be heard publicly before a special committee of parliament.

I do not like that. There is an undesirable inference to be drawn from it which I do not think was in the minds of those who drafted the resolution; I am sure it was not. If a protectionist manufacturer were represented by a lawyer as able as the senior member for Halifax, then that inference is undoubtedly the one that he would draw from that clause of the resolution. I wish it to be distinctly understood that when voting for the resolution I do not bind myself to give any consideration to claims for protection. I think we have got far too much protection, and I want to get rid of protection, not add to it, no matter how many public inquiries are held.

I am not at all sure that it was wise to have drafted the clause in the way in which it is drafted in which reference is made to reciprocity in trade with the United States as outlined in the proposed Reciprocity agreement of 1911. I am quite in favour of reciprocity, and I would have the Reciprocity agreement of 1911 if we could not get a better one. But that clause of the resolution looks as though it merely depended upon us whether reciprocity would go into effect or not. I think it would have been better to say that every effort should be made to obta'n such a reciprocity agreement.

I do not know that all the methods for raising the revenue, if such a resolution as this were adopted, have been explored. I think we should carefully consider the possibilities of a tax on unearned increment of land. We should carefully consider whether there should not be a federal succession duty tax on very large estates. These however are questions of detail, and the principle of the resolution is one which I can enthusiastically approve. It denounces protection and gives a reasonable opportunity for readjustment; it looks to what I believe is the only way in this country in which we can get out of our political and economic difficulties. We have been trying for fifty years to make ourselves wealthy by restriction; it is about time that we changed the plan and freed the energies of the people in order that they might be enabled to secure that wealth which the natural resources of the country, and their own enterprise and intelligence, should place within their grasp. As regards the proposals for reciprocity, I approve of them, but I do not know that they are necessary. Section 8B of the minister's resolutions provides:

> The Governor in Council may authorize any minister of the Crown to enter into negotiations with any authorized representative of the government of the United States with a view to the making of a commercial agreement between the two countries on terms that may be deemed mutually beneficial. Any agreement so made shall be subject to the approval of the parliament of Canada.

I have just one or two observations to make upon this resolution. I am in hearty sympathy with the idea, but I wonder whether it is necessary to have it declared that it is within the power of the Governor in Council to authorize any minister to negotiate a reciprocity arrangement or treaty. Surely it is always within the powers of the government to delegate one of its members for such a purpose. I note that this arrangement would be subject to the approval of the parliament of Canada. I would like to say this: If the protectionist mind continues to be developed as is likely by the present budget, what is there to prevent a repetition of what happened in 1911, when we got the Reciprocity agreement from the United States and found that the Canadian people had forgotten what was good for them and voted it down?

It is quite true that we have had offers of this sort before. If I mistake not, Macdonald put an offer of this sort upon the statute books of Canada, and it remained there until it was withdrawn in about 1898. Then, strange to say, the Americans in 1911 passed legisiation, which remained in force for about ten years, in fact until a few months ago, in which they made an offer to us. Unfortunately the wills of the parties never met, as we lawyers say. What was required was a national broker to bring the parties together. And what we require in Washington to-day is an ambassador to represent Canadian interests there all the time, to drop the word in due season as to the advisability of close commercial relationship between the two great nations which occupy such a large part of the North American continent.

Now, we have had some sort of reciprocity with the United States, as the right hon. leader of the Opposition said in his remarks this afternoon. But while we are offering reciprocity, I would draw the attention of the House to the fact that there is reciprocity in certain lines now within our grasp. Boots and shoes and leather go free into the United States. Why therefore should they not come free into Canada? In connection with this matter the member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), whose remarks I always listen to with the greatest of pleasure and attention, said there were manufacturers in his riding who were prepared to have reciprocal trade relations with the United States if we could guarantee them permanence. I may say parenthetically that I visited his home town some months ago and I never was in a more beautiful town of its size, surrounded by fields so well cultivated that they gladdened the heart, and with every indication of hard work, thrift and brains among its people. Well, if it was possible for those manufacturers to open up lines of business with a few customers who might drop off in three or four years I wonder whether they would say, "We do not think we will bother going after their business; it lacks permanence." Would they say that? I do not think they would. And let me contrast their attitude—which I have no doubt is correctly described by their distinguished representative—with the attitude of the stock-raisers of the West who had a cargo of stockers landed on the dock at Bristol, I think it was, almost as soon as the British cattle embargo was lifted. Why was it, Mr. Speaker, that this provision of the American tariff allowing boots and shoes and leather to enter the United States free has been on their statute books since the 3rd October, 1913, if I mistake not, without its being availed of to any great extent by our manufacturers, while the cattle embargo was not off a day before a cargo of stockers was landed at Bristol? What is the difference? Were these stockraisers better business men than the manufacturers of North Waterloo? No, I do not believe so. But they were driven on by the urge of economic necessity to avail themselves of the very first chance to get into another market. They had no home market which would under ordinary circumstances absorb their product, and therefore as gallant adventurers and capable business men they had to look abroad in order to find customers.

The same thing affects agricultural implements; these can go free into the United States. Then there is in the American tariff provision whereby certain materials, for which at the present time there is a tremendous demand in the United States, may enter the American market free or at such rates of duty as will be imposed on similar goods coming into Canada from the United States. I refer to building brick, calcium carbide and its by-products, and cement. Now, there is no question about the building boom in the United States. I notice in the papers that bricklayers in that country are not satisfied with twelve dollars a day; they have struck for more. Why should not our brick and cement manufacturers who are situated in positions where they can readily ship their products into the United States market take advantage of their opportunities? The movement of brick and cement is largely controlled by the freight rate, and where the Canadian manufacturers of these commodities can have them carried by water, or where they can have the advantage of a cheap freight rate, surely it should be the business of government to let them get the advantage of trading across the line.

Now, let me deal for a short time with the budget itself. I would hate to be unfair. The government deserves great credit for reducing the duty on both raw and refined sugar. That reduction should be of some advantage to the Canadian consumers of sugar. But the budget reminds me of the vicissitudes of human life—there are so many ups and downs in it. Hemp for agricultural purposes goes on the free list; licorice paste not sweetened goes down to 10 per cent, 15 per cent and 17½ per cent, as against 15 per cent, 20 per cent and 20 per cent under the old tariff. Raisins and dried currants go up in the scale, and so do potatoes.

Now, although I live in Montreal I represent an Eastern Townships riding. There one of the national dishes is raisin pie, and why the wives of the farmers whom I represent should be obliged to pay more for the raisins that go into their pies in order that Australian raisins may come from—I do not know how many thousand miles, but I suppose at least six thousand; it took the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) a considerable time to go there and come back—why raisins that come from California should be excluded by a tariff which has been increased by about 300 per cent in order that raisins from the other side of the world may be brought in is, I suppose, part of that mania for interfering with the free play of commerce, which I expect will be sweetened and blessed by the slogan of "Imperial Solidarity" or something of that sort.

I do not need to talk about the duties on artificial silk. Artificial silk has become a protected article, on the old protectionist theory that every process through which material goes should add something to the duties. I am not going to read all the different processes and all the different rates of duty; the duty starts at one end at 10 per cent and ends at the other at 37½ per cent. I will not delay the House long with any remarks on the bounty on hemp or remarks on the bounty on copper: I am of the opinion that every rope should hang by its own strength and that every copper tub, as well as every other tub, should stand on its own bottom.

Why am I opposed to this budget? Because as far as I can see any governing principle in it, it is the principle of protection. I could not quite see the force of all the bitterness in the remarks of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) this afternoon. He should be rather pleased; this administration has come to agree to his fiscal views—there does not seem to be much difference between them on this budget. That is a matter, I should think, for congratulation, if the right hon. gentleman is really sincere in his protectionist views. But I sometimes wonder when I listen to his splendid eloquence and observe the operation of his analytic mind, whether he really is protectionist; it would seem strange if he were.

What is the problem that faces the Canadian people to-day? Half our people live on the land; a great deal more than half the people, probably three-quarters of them, either live on the land or directly depend upon those who do. And what is the situation in regard to our farmers? Of course, they can improve their methods. I understand the view of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) is that if only we could all go in for mixed farming, all would be well. I am quite willing to admit that farmers could improve their methods, that they may be able to get better prices for their products without getting more from the consumer, by following out proper methods of co-operative selling. And perhaps if the rings and combines will allow them—and there are such, although the right hon. leader of the Opposition scoffs at the idea—they may get some things cheaper through co-operative buying. But that will not affect to any very great extent this great difficulty: that the farmer sells his products at prices which are somewhat under wholesale prices, and has to buy the commodities which he needs in retail quantities at prices enhanced by a protective tariff in many cases and by the rings and the selling agreements which exist, to a greater extent than they otherwise would, under the tariff. That is the great problem of the farmer. I do not propose to enter into any long disquisition about the theory of free trade and protection, for I would weary you; you have listened to long speeches and interesting speeches to-day. I am opposed to the principle of protection. I do not propose to wipe it all out over night; I do not propose to do anything extreme, but I propose, if I possibly can through my feeble efforts, to get action. I am opposed to the principle of protection because it has proved itself in this country a most dismal failure. I do not think anybody will deny that we have an honest, a thrifty, a hard-working people. We have good men and good women in Canada. We have good soil, second to none for certain purposes. We have certain disadvantages: we are spread too sparsely over the country. We have a hard winter, but not an unhealthy one. But we have not kept our natural increase, and we have not kept the immigration which we have brought in at great expense during the last thirty years. That is the situation; that is the proof of the failure of this policy.

Then, the policy is anti-national. It was called the National Policy; it is not a national policy; it is a policy which makes the trade question and the taxation question of this country nothing more than a local issue. The eloquent member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) last year stated with interesting frankness that if he lived on the prairies he would no doubt be a free trader, but as he lived in British Columbia he was a protectionist. It is not only anti-national, but it is anti-social, it gives certain people a direct interest in the incidence of taxation and makes it profitable for some people that a high debt should be maintained in this country in order that there may be a high rate of taxation. It is anti-national in that sense. The consequence is that whenever a trade question is under discussion in this House we have hon. members presenting, not a national view, but a sectional view; it is hardly possible for them to do otherwise. It makes of this House directly an antithesis of what Edmund Burke said parliament should be. May I, Mr. Speaker, quote his words:

> Parliament is not a congress of ambassadors from different and hostile interests; which interests each must maintain, as an agent and advocate, against other agents and advocates; but parliament is a deliberative assembly of one nation with one interest, that of the whole, where, not local purposes—

It will be recalled that an hon. member of this House, speaking the other night on the copper bounty, did not attempt to express what he thought was the national interest; he expressed rather the view of his constituents. Let him as well as others listen to these words:

> —where not local purposes, not local prejudices ought to guide, but the general good, resulting from the general reason of the whole. You choose a member, indeed, but when you have chosen him, he is not member of Bristol but he is a member of parliament. If the local constituent should have an interest, or should form a hasty opinion, evidently opposed to the real good of the rest of the community, the member for that place ought to be as far, as any other, from any endeavour to give it effect.

But there is a deeper reason, Mr. Speaker, why I should oppose this budget, a reason deeper than any economic reason. I cannot regard this budget as anything else but a distinct repudiation of the representations made by the Liberal party at and since the convention of 1919, and, indeed, a falling away from the true historic principles of the Liberal party. I do not pretend that our practice has always been consistent with our profession, but I do say that as between the two great political parties of this country, the Conservative party stood for the principle of protection and the Liberal party stood for the principle of free trade, or, if not free trade, low tariff. If any one tries to represent the Liberal party as a protectionist party he is endeavouring, I think, not to justly interpret the history of this country.

Now, what was the Liberal party platform? The distinguished member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) says that those who gathered at the Liberal convention were very foolish because we laid down this platform. The member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) says that he does not think that the Liberal party should be shackled or fettered by any pronouncement on the trade question made at that convention. The member for Halifax was not at the convention, but I believe the member for North Waterloo was, and if he disagreed with the idea of laying down a platform which was one of the avowed objects of the convention, I ask him, in all sincerity and with all courtesy as one old friend to another, why he came? The Liberal platform was laid down at the Liberal convention which met in the early days of August, 1919. One reason why the Liberals called a convention in 1919 was this—and here I beg to remark that they are the only one of the two great parties which so far have held national conventions. Others have held provincial conventions, but of the great parties in the country the Liberals only have held a national convention. We held a national convention because the Liberal party had been rent in twain by the conscription issue. We wanted to all get together to draw up a policy we could all subscribe to. In general terms—I am no doctrinaire who believes in being shackled to the crossing of every T and the dotting of every I in a pronouncement of this sort—that it should be a chart and a compass, and that chart and compass should be kept in use. That is the claim I make. We gathered together from all over Canada to name our leader and to lay down our platform. I do not think it was a foolish proceeding. May I note this: That in 1893 we did the same thing. We had a convention and laid down a platform, and we won the election of 1896 and went back into power after being out of office for eighteen years. In 1919 we laid down our platform, elected our leader and went back into power in 1921. The Liberal platform read as follows:—and I am not ashamed of this platform.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Hear, hear.

Mr. McMASTER: It was not drawn up by myself alone; it was decided upon by others as well as myself. As it was drawn first of all in a private meeting I have no right and I will not attempt to say whose hand wrote it. I was called from the General Resolutions Committee, of which I was chairman at the convention, to defend this platform from the stand on which the speakers stood. I spoke on that occasion against the Premier of British Columbia who, for some reason or another, was against, not the spirit of the platform, but certain provisions therein. A distinguished lady from Hamilton spoke against it, and a very dear friend of mine from Montreal did the same thing. Well, I spoke, it was put to a vote, and was carried by about nine votes to one as far as I could see. There was no question as to the unanimity, the substantial unanimity, of the delegates gathered there, that it was the proper platform for us to lay down. How does it read? I am sorry the right hon. leader of the Opposition is not in his seat to-night. This has not got a brown cover but it is the same platform and he would have the pleasure of hearing it read in a certainly distinct and audible voice. It reads as follows:

That the best interests of Canada demand that substantial reductions of the burdens of customs taxation be made with a view to the accomplshing of two purposes of the highest importance; First, diminishing the very high cost of living which presses so severely on the masses of the people; second, reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion, the vigorous development of which is essential to the progress and prosperity of our country.

That, to these ends, wheat, wheat flour and all products of wheat the principal articles of food, farm implements and machinery, farm tractors, mining, flour and saw-mill machinery and repair parts thereof, rough and partly dressed lumber, gasoline, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils, nets, net-twines and fishermen's equipments, cements and fertilizers, should be free from customs duties, as well as the raw material entering into the same.

That a revision downwards of the tariff should be made whereby substantial reductions should be effected in the duties on wearing apparel and footwear, and on other articles of general consumption (other than luxuries), as well as on the raw material entering into the manufacture of the same.

That the British preference be increased to 50 per cent of the general tariff.

And the Liberal party hereby pledges itself to implement by legislation the provisions of this resolution when returned to power.

I am reminded that when free trade was placed upon the statute books of the Old Country in 1846 there had been for years before deficits in the budget, and widespread unemployment and distress among the people. We are told that we cannot have reductions of tariff because times are not good. That is one reason that is given to us why we cannot have relief. No doubt that same argument was used against the efforts of Cobden and Bright, but what happened in Great Britain was this: They took their courage in their two hands for they wiped off the duties on food stuffs —they had in the earlier years removed most of the duties on manufactured articles—and prosperity returned. And I say that in Canada prosperity will return with liberty given to people to carry on their business in the way they think best and given the right to interchange what they produce more freely for what they need.

Now, the Finance Minister has suggested that he does not regard himself as bound by this programme. I do not pretend that a responsible minister is bound to take a programme of this sort and to implement it into legislation in identically the manner in which the programme sets matters forth. I hope I am no mere doctrinaire, but what I do say is, that it is the bounden duty of public men who would consider themselves bound by such a programme to put its main features substantially into effect. The Finance Minister says he is not bound by this programme. Well, I will not permit myself the freedom of language which the hon. leader of the Opposition permitted himself this afternoon. I am a very much younger man than the Finance Minister. I have been associated with him for a great many years, he as a leader of a party with myself as a humble follower, but I say this: That he attended the convention, that he was appointed to—although I do not remember whether he attended or not—the General Resolutions Committee of the convention, and—what is perhaps the most important of all—that after we had passed this resolution by an overwhelming majority he accepted nomination as the leader of the Liberal party the day after. I do not suggest for one instant that he, by that act, undertook to carry out to the letter this programme; but I say that his acceptance of nomination as a possible leader of the party could be reasonably interpreted as an acceptance in its general outline and general principle of the resolution which had been passed. But I think I can convince this House by further evidence that the Finance Minister is bound substantially to carry out the programme laid down by the convention. Speaking in the House of Commons on the 18th May, 1920, page 2510 of third volume of Hansard, the present Minister of Finance concluded his remarks with these words:

I therefore conclude my remarks by moving, seconded by Mr. King:

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be omitted, and the following inserted therefor:

"The Minister of Finance in the budget speech, in the session of 1919, gave assurance to the House that during the ensuing parliamentary recess there would be a public inquiry by the minister and one or more of his colleagues into the operation of the customs tariff, with a view to a general revision of the tariff at the following session."

I have by the courtesy of the Finance Minister copies of the evidence that was taken by that commission in my office at the present moment. If the typewritten pages were placed one on top of another they would reach to about my chest. But apparently nothing further was done in that connection. The quotation continues:

That the promised public inquiry has not taken place, and the expected proposals for tariff revision at this session have not been submitted to the House.

That in view of the continued increase in the high cost of living, of the greatly increased burden of taxation, of the hardship which many of the people suffer from these causes, and the unrest naturally arising therefrom; and in view of the desirability of adopting measures to increase production and effect such relief to consumers and producers as may be within the power of parliament, the House is of opinion that, pending a wider revision of the tariff, substantial reductions of the burdens of customs taxation should be made with a view to the accomplishing of two purposes of the highest importance; first, diminishing the very high cost of living which presses so severely on the masses of the people; second, reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion, the vigorous development of which is essential to the progress and prosperity of our country."

That was followed the next year, on the 10th May, 1921, by another statement. The same hon. gentleman, as reported in Hansard in the session of 1921, concluded his remarks to be found in Volume IV, page 3155, of Hansard, as follows:

"That all the words after the word 'that' to the end of the question, be omitted, and the following inserted instead thereof:

The House regrets that, after repeated assurances by the government of an intention to have a revision of the Customs tariff, and after a protracted inquiry extending from ocean to ocean by a committee of cabinet ministers, the government have made no proposals for any reduction of the tariff;

That, while recognizing that existing financial requirements of the Dominion demand the maintenance of a customs tariff, the House is unable to concur in the declarations by the government that the tariff should be based on the principle of protection; the tariff is a tax, and the aim of legislation should be to make taxation as light as circumstances will permit;

That the aim of the fiscal policy of Canada should be the encouragement of industries based on the natural resources of the country, the development of which may reasonably be expected to create healthy enterprises, giving promise of enduring success;

That such changes should be made in the Customs duties as may be expected to reduce the cost of living, and to reduce also the cost of implements of production required for the efficient development of the natural resources of the Dominion;

That, while keeping this aim clearly in mind, the House recognizes that in any readjustment of the tariff that may take place, regard must be had to existing conditions of trade, and changes made in such a manner as will cause the least possible disturbance of business."

Without anger or discourtesy, but in all seriousness, I state that the present budget proposals, based in many instances on the principle of protection, are a repudiation of the words of the Finance Minister in 1920 and 1921. I say that it may be possible for public men to obtain office by laying certain programmes before the people, and it may be possible after they get into office to depart from those programmes and still remain in office, but I say that it is wrong. I submit the harm done to the country is not merely the economic harm that flows from the adoption of a false economic theory, but the harm that results to the public life of the country. The world is in an unsettled state to-day. Men are questioning the value of institutions which have come down to them from the past. I am a Liberal, but, like Gladstone in the days gone by, I am anxious to preserve what is of value in our present social structure, and parliamentary institutions are one of the most precious institutions we have. But we can only have parliamentary institutions if we have representation, and representation becomes a farce if men do not advocate and endeavour to bring into force in power what they advocated while they were in opposition. It may be asked why I take upon myself the unpleasant task of dealing with this situation as I am dealing with it to-night. Well, one reason is that there does not seem to be anybody on this side of the House at least anxious to assume the job, and, therefore, it falls to my lot to do it. But, perhaps, I have a certain right, perhaps a greater right, and therefor a greater obligation, than many of my fellow members. When I came into the House in 1918, we met in March of that year, shortly after the House convened I had the great honour—an honour that I will cherish all the days of my life—of being chosen by my leader, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, as financial critic of the opposition. I considered it a high honour. I was a new member of the House. I had never belonged to a local legislature. I had not even belonged to a town or municipal council. I did what I could to criticize. The first budget I had to criticize was one presented by the senior member for Halifax and the next was one presented by Sir Thomas White, then Minister of Finance. I frankly admit that the low tariff view was not under-emphasized in any remarks which the member for Brome addressed to the House and to the country. But I say that the resolutions which I moved—and I moved two resolutions one going into supply, asking for reductions in the tariff, and one on the budget in 1919, in the same strain—were supported, not by all the members of the party, but by practically the whole of the Liberal deputation at the time, and, therefore, it seems to me that I have a certain right to protest against what I believe is a repudiation and a reversal of the Liberal policy upon the trade question. Then, when the country was being prepared for the great victory of 1921, I played a very modest part in that preparation. I had the honour to accompany the Prime Minister into western Ontario in 1920 and to the "Garden of the Gulf in 1921," and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, in the "Garden of the Gulf," in that beautiful Prince Edward Island, I gave them the pure milk of the Cobdenite word. The people of that province, few in number, but I think, inferior to none in intelligence and patriotism, heard that gospel very gladly, and we found that at the next election there were elected from that province four members as Liberals to support a Liberal government. I believe they thought that the Liberal government, when returned to power, intended to make substantial reductions in the tariff. I am far from considering myself a Samson; but I do not propose to grind corn in the mills of the Philistines, nor do I propose to be dragged at the chariot wheels of the triumphant protectionists.

Just another word, and I have done. There are those in this House who may say: "You were elected as a Liberal to support a Liberal administration; you have no right to act against them; you have no right to vote against them; you have no right to speak against them; you have no right to take another seat in the chamber without consulting your electors."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMASTER: I hear some people saying, "hear, hear" to that statement. Let me read to those who say "hear, hear" the words of that great English Whig statesman, Edmund Burke, who possibly laid down as correctly as was ever laid down, the relationship which should exist between member and constituents. Edmund Burke said, in addressing his electors at Bristol:

> Certainly, gentlemen, it ought to be the happiness and glory of a representative to live in the strictest union, the closest correspondence, and the most unreserved communication with his constituents.

I break off my quotation to state to you, Mr. Speaker, and to my fellow members, that I have followed that plan. Since I have been a member of this House, every session I have gone back to my people and held meetings with them. After one session I had one meeting when I had the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) with me, and we had such a large meeting on that occasion that I did not think it necessary to hold another during that recess. But after each session I have held meetings, from that one meeting to other times when I have held as many as thirteen in a small riding, the smallest riding in Quebec. I maintained a close co-operation and correspondence with my electorate, and anything I did in this House I reported to them. I think, on the whole, I generally obtained, without any formal resolution or anything of that sort, their approval of what I had done. I may say that in this case I had no time to go and consult my electorate to any extent, even though the obligation had been upon me. I saw the chairman of the organization in my riding; and while I had not time to talk to a number of my electorate, I talked with a few of them. Though they may regret that I find it incumbent upon me to take a seat which will be an outward and visible sign that I am not in sympathy with the administration on their budget, on the whole I believe they are willing that I should do as my mind and my conscience dictate I should do. Edmund Burke continued:

> Their wishes ought to have great weight with him; their opinion high respect; their business unremitted attention. It is his duty to sacrifice his repose, his pleasures, his satisfactions, to theirs; and above all, ever, and in all cases, to prefer their interests to his own. But, his unbiassed opinion, his mature judgment, his enlightened conscience, he ought not to sacrifice to you; to any man, or to any set of men living. These he does not derive from your pleasure; no, nor from the law and the constitution. They are a trust from Providence, for the abuse of which he is deeply answerable. Your representive owes you, not his industry only, but his judgment; and he betrays, instead of serving you, if he sacrifices it to your opinion...

[Mr. McMaster.]

> To deliver an opinion is the right of all men; that of constituents is a weighty and respectable opinion, which a representative ought always to rejoice to hear; and which he ought always most seriously to consider. But authoritative instructions; mandates issued, which the member is bound blindly and implicity to obey, to vote, and to argue for, though contrary to the clearest conviction of his judgment and conscience,—these are things utterly unknown to the laws of this land, and which arise from a fundamental mistake of the whole order and tenor of our constitution.

It is on that ground that I take my stand. I do not propose to push a doctrine, no matter how sound, to extremes. An occasion will present itself very shortly in my riding, where I can place my whole case before my electors. If they approve what I have done, then will I gladly continue to serve them. But if they do not approve what I have done, if they wish to have in this House a Liberal who thinks more of the label on the bottle than what is in it, who will sacrifice his opinion arrived at after careful consideration and in the light of his conscience, to the desire of the whips, then I will resign my seat and allow them to elect such a one if they so desire. Then, somewhat disappointed, but neither downhearted nor disconsolate, I can go back and devote to my clients, my office and my law books some part of the energy which I have, as far as in me has lain, devoted to what I considered to be the interests of my country. I have enjoyed public service in this House and out of it; but I enjoy public service only on terms which, I believe, are consonant with the dignity of a public man, and I do not believe a public man helps himself, or his party, or his country by voting in a manner in which he does not believe. I repeat, I am not leaving the Liberal party; but I am refusing to support the present administration in a budget which I do not believe to be a Liberal budget. I take my seat in the corner of the chamber. I join no other party. There, when liberal legislation is brought before this House, I will support it by my vote and, if necessary, by my voice; but I shall be in a position, if legislation which I do not think is liberal, is brought before the House, to criticize it with a greater freedom, though I trust with no lack of courtesy, than I possess when I sit amongst those who are responsible more or less for the legislation.

In closing, let me quote again that great English statesman Edmund Burke. I say it in all humility, but I believe it to be true:

> My principles enable me to form my judgment upon men and actions. . . . . The principles of true politics are those of morality enlarged; and I neither now do, nor ever will admit of any other.

Mr. HERBERT MARLER (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, before I begin to discuss the budget I desire to join with those hon. members who have preceded me in congratulating the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) upon having completed his seventeenth financial statement. I will go even further and say that the minister deserves to be described as a faithful public servant. It is quite true that in his budget speech he did not perhaps include certain matters which some of his supporters would like to see taken into consideration, but it is possible that the minister may consider them when his proposals are being discussed in detail. I had not the pleasure this afternoon of listening to the whole of the speech of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), but that part of it which I did hear impressed me as being full of ability, although I fear it lacked any generosity whatever towards the government of the day. Possibly that is not the part of the leader of the Opposition, nor indeed of the party which he leads; I do not suppose it is to be expected that they should show any generosity of feeling towards this government. I was therefore in a measure surprised when my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) in the course of his remarks, exhibited the great magnanimity which he did on that occasion. He said in discussing the budget that he had no amendment to offer but would leave the Progressives to put forward one on this occasion. Why did he make that observation? I wondered whether a ray of light had come into the old Tory party, or whether this was a piece of generous behaviour. I do not think it was generosity, in the least degree. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for West York seemed to me to feel great regret that he could not criticize the budget more severely than he did, so that his not moving any amendment was due to no generous impulse on his part. Our friends the Progressive party have taken a very decided view of the budget; they are very firm in their attitude towards it. They say that the policy of the present administration is in no regard distinguishable from that of its predecessors, and by way of rider to this, they say that the system of protection is wrong in theory and in fact. They go on to say that the tariff should be lowered, tending, of course, towards free trade, or failing that, a tariff as near free trade as it can be, until free trade can be secured in this country.

I think that anyone would admit that this is about the most difficult country in the world to govern. We have a very small population sparsely spread over a tremendous area, a ribbon of land stretching from ocean to ocean. There are certain ideas in the Maritime provinces, other ideas in Ontario and Quebec, then going over that great bridge of stone into the prairies we find entirely new ideas, and so on over the mountains to British Columbia. I do not wonder that my Progressive friends opposite should have certain views of their own in regard to questions of the tariff. I do not blame them in the least. But my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Forke) in his speech, which I thought was a very able one and which was full of sincerity, as the hon. member's speeches always are, made a remark which appealed to me very much; he said that the West, the manufacturers in the East, should try to get together. Well, that is precisely the policy which I think we should endeavour to bring about in Canada. It is absolutely impossible in a country of this character for the people to live apart; it is impossible to have one principle in the West and another in the East. After all, why should it be impossible to strike some common ground? What reason is there why the farmers of the prairies should not trust the East as the East trusts them? They say, "We cannot agree to that because the men of the East are manufacturers and they therefore want a tariff." They do want a tariff, it is quite true. But, on the other hand, do not the people of the West want certain policies as well? Surely it would be possible in due course of time for the parties to get together and arrive at one common policy which would be good for the whole of Canada. Why should one policy be advocated for one part of the country and another for some other part? How is it going to be possible for Canada to proceed under such circumstances? How would it be possible for any business in this country, whether farming or manufacturing, to prosper if we are divided as regards the desires of the country as a whole? Obviously it is quite impossible.

My friends of the Progressive party tell us that times are very hard in the West and that they are finding it very difficult to get along. That is quite true. But in reply to that it can be very truthfully said that not every business in the East is prosperous; the business men of the East are experiencing their own difficulties also. An hon. member stated in his speech that the farms are not paying, but he admitted, I believe, that certain returns showed that in the case of each of 240 farmers there was a surplus of some $600. I can assure the hon. gentleman that there are many inhabitants of the province of Quebec from which I come who can barely make a living, to say nothing at all of $600 to boot

The difficulties are not alone on the prairies; they are not alone in the West. Difficulties are common throughout Canada to-day; but my good friends the Progressives will not consider this fact at all. Hon. gentlemen do not seem to consider the great fundamental difficulties that exist throughout the country at this time. They say they want certain policies put into effect; they want certain economic facts realized. Well, I know, and we all know very well that they do. What are those facts to which I refer? They say that one thing they want is lower freight rates. Of course the West needs lower freight rates; but the East needs lower freight rates too. But how can we have lower freight rates at this time, if at the same time we are to pay any operating charges at all on the railways? If we increase the deficits of the National Railways it simply means that they must be made up in taxation in some other form. The next thing, they say, which bears heavily upon them is the loss of the purchasing power of the dollar. That also is perfectly true; I know full well that the prices of farm products have been deflated while a great many other commodities have been inflated. But is that the fault of the government? Can this government remedy the condition quickly? They certainly cannot.

They also ask for rural credits. Well, I am certainly very much disposed to give the West rural credits if this is feasible. But, after all, is not this a subject for provincial action? Unfortunately our western friends do not take these factors into consideration. We in the East would like to see the economic evils under which the people of the West are suffering remedied where possible, but they cannot be remedied in a day—in fact some of them are beyond the power of governments to remedy. That being the case, what do my hon. friends, the Progressives, do? They bring in an amendment to the budget condemning the government because it does not introduce lower tariffs.

Now, I should like to address myself particularly to my hon. friends of the Progressive party. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) gave us in great detail his ideas of free trade. He said it is a splendid theory. I agree with him, but so far as I can see it is a theory and nothing more. He did not for a moment suggest, neither did a single speaker among my friends opposite suggest, how the revenue loss from reduced tariff duties can be made up. Our tariff to-day is not a high tariff; it is on an average 17½ per cent collected on imported goods. I do not call it a protectionist tariff; on the contrary, I have always termed it a development tariff. I believe that we need such a tariff to encourage our industries and permit of their fullest development. What would happen if we had not a tariff of that description? Our industries in the East could not survive, they would go out of existence. My hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Forke) says, "All right, if they cannot survive let them go out of existence." Well, that is what is staring us in the face in the East. There is not the slightest question of a doubt that if the tariff is lowered at once, or if it is to be lowered from time to time to any appreciable extent, our industries will simply have to cease.

But supposing these industries do close up, what will happen to the people employed in them? Will they not have to leave Canada to gain a livelihood elsewhere? Will there not be unprecedented unemployment and tremendous loss? And will not the number of people as a consequence who can be taxed be gradually diminished, and the burden of taxation become all the heavier for the rest of us to bear? These results are bound to happen.

But supposing, for example we did do away with our comparatively moderate tariff, how are we going to obtain our revenue? I have no doubt that the gentleman who drew this resolution sat down with pencil and paper and figured out very carefully how he was going to obtain his revenue, because I assume that if my hon. friends of the Progressive party succeed to office they will put this resolution into effect. I am positive that my hon. friend from Brandon will never go back on anything he says, and it follows that he and his party will implement their resolution whenever the opportunity presents itself. Well, have the hon. member and his friends sitting around him studied how they will get their revenue if their resolution is put into effect? I doubt if they have. I doubt very much if they have considered how the revenue of the country is to be maintained. What was secured from the tariff last year? I am speaking now of the tariff purely from the view of revenue. I am assuming that we have closed up our factories and created unemployment.

Mr. FORKE: The hon. gentleman has got past it, but it is only an assumption on his part that all the factories will be closed; he does not know for certain.

Mr. MARLER: I was waiting for an interruption from the hon. member because I want to ask him a question in reply. Does he or does he not admit that this country can stand free trade?

Mr. FORKE: While we stand for free trade in principle, I do not think the hon.

gentleman has heard any member of the Progressive party state that we are going to put free trade into effect immediately. Hon. gentlemen supporting the tariff always ask the question: How would you get your revenue without the tariff? Well, you could have a very much lower tariff to begin with and yet have a very much higher revenue. A protective tariff is not a revenue tariff. Twenty-two and a half per cent or twenty-five per cent straight protection does not produce very much revenue as a rule; consequently you may have a very much larger revenue with a very much lower tariff.

Mr. MARLER: I am very much obliged to my hon. friend for his reply. It is precisely what I wanted to get. My hon. friends the Progressives, then, do not believe in free trade.

Mr. FORKE: No, I did not say that.

Mr. MARLER: So far so good.

Mr. FORKE: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, I did not say so. I believe free trade is the proper principle to be put into practice; but we are sensible people and realize existing conditions, and therefore we simply say: It is for the manufacturers to get prepared for free trade, and they should be given time to adjust their business accordingly. I have more faith in the Canadian people than the protectionists have. I believe our people have sufficient energy and ability to make their business successful without any protection whatever.

Mr. MARLER: Very well. Then when my hon. friend's party come into power they would serve notice on the manufacturers of Quebec and Ontario and the rest of the Dominion: We are going to lower the tariff year by year, and you must arrange your business accordingly. Am I correct in taking that to be the policy of the Progressive party?

Mr. FORKE: Broadly speaking.

Mr. MARLER: I am sorry to put these questions to my hon. friend, but I would not have him misunderstand me and I should not like to misunderstand him. I can assure my hon. friends opposite that I have the fullest sympathy and the very greatest admiration for the West. I say that with perfect sincerity. All I ask in so far as the East is concerned—and although I am not speaking to a very full House to-night I know full well that my words will be heard outside—is some reasonable tariff which will permit our industries to develop, and until our population is very much increased we cannot do with any lower tariff than we have now. Let me add that the East has every sympathy with the West and wishes it the fullest prosperity, and would welcome any reasonable policy on which both East and West can stand together. Later on, I shall speak—possibly with the approval of my hon. friend from Brandon—on a suggestion which I have to make to the government. But I can say in all sincerity that the present tariff, in so far as can be ascertained without investigation, is needed in order that we may retain our industries and ensure their development in harmony with the growth of the country. We cannot compare the industries in our little country of less than nine million people with the industries in the States which my hon. friends of the Progressive party are so fond of referring to for comparison. Do my hon. friends know that the mills in the province of Quebec have to run on very many lines of goods so that each product consequently costs much more to manufacture, whereas in the United States a single mill is run year and year out on one line of goods alone?

One hon. gentleman opposite some days ago compared the prices in the United States with the prices here. I know that the prices in the United States are lower than they are in Canada; they are bound to be. We cannot manufacture things at the prices at which they are manufactured in that country. Take down your tariff and you will close up your factories, drive all capital out of Canada, keep people away—that is what you are facing if you cut your tariff down too low. The hon. member for Brandon will say, "Oh, we are not going to do it all at once." Perhaps not; I would not accuse hon. gentlemen opposite of doing any rash thing; they are not that type of men. I believe they are all sincere and honest men, but they would serve notice on businesses that the tariff was coming down, and that would create an unsettled state of mind among those carrying on business in the province of Quebec, in the East generally with the result that those businesses could not progress.

Let me come back to the question of how we are to obtain the revenue. There was collected last year in tariff duties $133,000,000. I was going on to say when I digressed a few moments ago that I assumed whoever drafted this resolution, whoever is to be minister of finance when the Progressive party gets into power, carefully studied out how that $133,000,000 should be made up. It is suggested in this resolution that in order to provide for revenue to take the place of the tariff, there should be an extension of the income tax which would bear more heavily on unearned incomes. Now I am quite positive—and I trust I do not overstate the case—when I say it is utterly and absolutely impossible to make up $133,000,000 in income tax at all. It is next to impossible to make up half that amount from income tax. I will tell you why, because I figured it out myself with the very greatest of care in order to see if I could read into this resolution any possibility of taxing what are commonly called unearned incomes. The term "unearned income" is used very loosely—sometimes to designate the accumulations which a man has gathered together after years of labour. I do not call that unearned income. I look upon unearned income as income derived from inheritance, and receipts of that description. I do not see any serious objection, as I stated in the House a few nights ago, to slightly increasing the tax on income which is accumulated but which is not being actively earned. I see no particular objection to a slight additional tax there, and I see no objection to a considerably heavier tax on inherited income, because that is not being earned as class A income is. The total income tax collected in 1922 was $40,000,000. The amount collected on incomes up to $20,000 was roughly, $20,000,000. Now, I know that whoever drew this resolution was not trying to get after the little fellows; he was trying to get after the big fellows, the men who had large incomes; he wanted to tax them more heavily in order to replace the loss occasioned by the change in respect to the tariff. Well, I have said that in respect of incomes of over $20,000 the amount paid by way of income tax was $20,000,000. If you wish to make up only half the $133,000,000, or $70,000,000, out of these larger incomes, you have to impose a tax three times as heavy as the present tax. Now, I have made a calculation in order to show hon. gentlemen opposite the fallacy of this resolution. So far as getting your revenue is concerned it is absolutely fallacious; you would go broke in one year if its suggestions were carried out. What would happen? Let us tax these larger incomes, starting with an income of $30,000. You would have to continue the present tax of 14 per cent and have in addition another tax of 42 per cent; in other words, you would tax that income 64 per cent in order to gain one-half the amount collected last year in customs duties. On an income of $50,000 you would have to place a tax of 80 per cent; on an income of $60,000, 82 per cent, and in the case of an income of $70,000, in order to get your revenue you would have to take it all—every cent the man had by way of income. That is how increasing the income tax would work out according to the most careful calculations that I have been able to make—and I may say that I am not unused to figuring out income taxes in many ways. I suggest to hon. members that that is a matter worthy of consideration.

The resolution goes on to suggest also an increase in excise duties. Well, the amount of excise duties collected in 1923 was $35,000,000. You have to make up your $133,000,000; in other words, you are going to reduce your tariff gradually until it gets to the vanishing point and you put into practice the free trade theories that the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) propounded so ably to-night. I say that he pronounced the theories very well indeed, but he did not give you one single practical idea as to how free trade as applied to Canada would affect the people of this country or affect anybody else. In this resolution you pick on the poor old tariff, which has been made the football of politics from time immemorial. You say, "If the tariff is lowered, if the tariff is taken off, notwithstanding the fact that industries will be ruined, our lives will be saved." But what did one of your own members say the other night? He made a statement which to me was exceedingly significant. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. Pritchard) said that the amount of taxes paid by every person in Canada owing to the tariff was $14.68, or, for a family of five, $73.40. Now, Mr. Speaker, is the West as badly off as all that? Are your difficulties worth only $73.40 to each family? There is the statement of your own member—are you going to ruin the businesses in Quebec and Ontario for this amount? That is what you will do by this resolution if it is carried, as the hon. member for Brandon assures me in due course of time it will be. That is what is going to happen.

However, let me leave the acrimonious part of this resolution. I do not think members of the Progressive party have seriously studied the effect of the proposed amendment. They did not sit down and study and figure out as to how that resolution could be given effect to, and they run the danger by leaving it on the pages of Hansard of having it quoted against them some time in the future just as the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) to-night—somewhat unkindly I thought—flung into the face of the government the resolutions which had been placed on Hansard by the Liberal party. My recommendation to hon gentlemen opposite is to withdraw that resolution.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): Do not flatter yourself.

Mr. MARLER: I am not flattering myself; I am trying to do you a distinct service.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): We will look after ourselves.

Mr. MARLER: Look after yourselves? I absolutely challenge my hon friend from Last Mountain to make up any budget on that resolution. I challenge him to do so. I would like to see him come before the House, and with pencil and paper figure out any budget that will make up for the custom revenue that will be lost under that resolution. The resolution as drawn is directly opposite to the interests of the Progressive party. They talk about the primary industries of the country. Here it is in black and white—the primary industries of the country. And they talk about the natural resources, those great natural resources we have all heard so much about. Why every man who has spoken in this House from time immemorial has informed us that we have the greatest natural resources of any country in the world, which I believe is true. But those natural resources, Mr. Speaker, are worthless until they are taken from the ground. The only way that can be done is by the employment of capital. Capital and people are the two essential things to this country. I think even the hon. member for Last Mountain will agree to that.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): You mentioned capital twice. I wonder if you are forgetting labour?

Mr. MARLER: I spoke of capital and people. Perhaps my hon. friend does not think that people will labour; I know many of them will not at the present time. But capital and people are what we want in this country now. Very well, you destroy the industries in the province of Quebec by lowering the tariff gradually, by not keeping those industries stable, by letting them gradually go down. If you do that how much capital do you think would come into Canada? You will not get a single dollar of the capital which is coming into this country at the present time. Place your income tax as proposed under this amendment and see how much it will help you in the way of securing capital. Why, Mr. Speaker, the income tax in this country should be reduced—there is no question about that at all. It is far too heavy a tax to put on the shoulders of the people. If it was reduced I venture to say you would find a far greater amount of capital flowing into Canada.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): Where would you get your revenue?

Mr. MARLER: I would get the revenue from the development tariff of which I spoke. The system of indirect taxation which is in force at the present time is the fairest way of getting a revenue. It bears equally on most people, but the direct taxation which this amendment suggests be carried out involves too heavy a load.

Mr. SPENCER: Do you not agree that indirect taxation involves a heavy load?

Mr. MARLER: Taxation of all kinds is a heavy load. Let my hon. friends opposite understand it quite clearly I am in favour of lightening taxation of every possible form, but how can taxation be lightened at the present time with deficit after deficit in our annual budget? Indirect taxation is not pleasant, there is no question about that at all, but nevertheless there has to be taxation in order to obtain the money for running the country.

Now, I am going to depart from my Progressive friends and direct my remarks to the government itself. With a great many things my hon. friend for Brandon (Mr. Forke) has said in his speech I am in accord. I think he sized up many a situation which is well worth the most serious consideration of the government at the present time. He spoke, for example, about the question of economy. Mr. Speaker, I might be quite wrong but I think we are spending far too much money in this country. That, I think, is an undoubted fact. The hon. member also spoke about the cost of civil government. In my opinion he was absolutely right in his remarks in that respect. Civil government in this country is costing an outstanding, a ridiculous amount, a sum that it never should cost a little nation like ourselves. Civil government never should cost us what it costs us in Canada. Some of the figures I am about to read were taken from the speech of the hon. member for Brandon but they have been supplemented by figures of my own. In 1912 we had a population of 7,300,000, we had 8,371 employees, and the Civil Service cost $7,805,373. In 1922, ten years later, we had a population of 8,788,000, we had 11,878 employees, and the Civil Service cost $19,271,985. So that in these ten years, although our population only increased 1,488,000, the number of employees increased 3,507 and the cost increased $12,466,612. I say that expenditure for civil government in a little country like this is next to absurd, and there should be a thorough inquiry as to whether or not civil government in Canada cannot be carried on at a very much less figure. Any business would go out of existence with a lack of economy of that description.

There is another matter I intend to speak about and I apologize for keeping hon. members at this late hour. It is that we should only spend in this country what we have to spend, and cease piling up deficits year after year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hear, hear.

Mr. MARLER: Of late years we have had a deficit each year. In 1921, $92,000,000; in 1922, $81,000,000; in 1923, $50,000,000, and possibly next year we will witness another deficit. I am not criticizing the Minister of Finance; I am not even criticizing my genial friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) as regards his administration; I am criticizing every member of the House of Commons.

An hon. MEMBER: You are wrong.

Mr. MARLER: I do not think the people of the country will say I am wrong. They will say that this government, and any government is wrong unless we have greater economy and make our budget meet. We have got to do that. We have got to cease spending money, and the only way we shall ever be able to lighten taxation, lighten the load which is at present on the backs of the Canadian people, is to cut down our expenditure and only spend what we have got to spend.

In addition to that I have this to say: We have two classes of taxes in this country at the present time. We have our war taxes and our ordinary taxes. Our war taxes should be devoted to meeting war expenditure entirely. We have got to pay for the war and the people will cheerfully pay the taxes that are needed for that purpose. But the ordinary taxes that are levied should meet the ordinary expenditure, and the country should be run within the limits of that taxation.

Now, Sir, I pass on to another subject and I shall not detain the House very much longer. In the budget speech there was a declaration by the Minister of Finance of tariff stability. That declaration has been read in a variety of ways. I, myself, thought well of that declaration. I thought well of the intent of the minister in telling that to the manufacturers and the various other interests in the country in order that business might be stable. I thought well of that declaration at the time, and I think well of it yet, because it means stability, and we do need stability without a question of doubt. But the question of tariff stability does not mean that there shall never be tariff revision in this country. We must have tariff revision in Canada. The country does not stand still. It is in the interests of the consumer and in the interests of the producer that the tariff shall be revised from time to time. Now I am going to deal once more with the word "protection" which is in this resolution which is before us. It says:

> That any claim for protection should be heard publicly before a special committee of parliament.

I do not want to cast any suspicion on the committees. I do not want to deprive the members of any committee of this House of any knowledge or intelligence they should have, but I say a committee of parliament would be just about as well equipped to pass on the question of making up the tariff as it would be on the question of making up railway rates. The question of making up the tariff is one of the most complicated matters which is ever brought before parliament, and has to be dealt with by the Finance Minister. How has the tariff been made up in the past? It has been made up by a committee of ministers from the cabinet going all over the country and getting information on various questions. They no doubt did their work well. I think my hon. friend from West York headed the last commission. He no doubt did his work well. He always does his work well, the only work he does not do well is criticizing this budget, and the reason he could not criticize the budget was because he agreed almost entirely with it, and it nearly broke his heart to have to criticize it at all. That is the reason he did not do it well. I am quite certain that in the revision of the tariff he did his work very well indeed. How can even a committee of the cabinet make up a tariff?

What we need is an advisory tariff commission, which will be a permanent body, which will look into the question of the tariff, collate the necessary information and bring it forward to the Minister of Finance. I do not say that the tariff can be taken out of politics entirely. I know that it cannot be taken out of politics altogether. I am fully aware of that fact. I know that when the tariff is made up by the advisory commission of which I speak the government of the day must have the last say as to whether or not a certain tariff shall be raised or a certain tariff shall be lowered, but I do say a body of experts can bring before the government the information which is necessary for them to make a fair and equitable tariff and although hon. members opposite may not agree with me on the question of whether we should have what I call a development tariff or not, although they are unalterably opposed to the principle of protection, they at least would know whether the manufacturer who came forward was not getting an unreasonable protection, but that he was getting a fair protection, consistent with other interests.

Why? What has to be considered in the tariff? There is not only the question of the original cost of goods and the question of transportation, but the great question of distribution. The expense of distribution, I believe, from the manufacturer to the producer is far too much at the present time. There is a tremendous spread between what the manufacturer gets for his products and what you hon. members from the West have to pay for yours. There is no question about that. I have gone into that point time and time again with the manufacturers of Montreal. In 1912 the question of an advisory tariff commission was brought before the House of Commons; it went through the House but was defeated in the Senate. I do not think I am sufficiently narrow-minded not to accept from the Conservative party, or from the Progressive party, whatever policy is for the good of the country, because that is what we are all working for and the country is in too serious a position to put party before country. I will say on the floor of the House now that I will take advice from any party which will bring forward what is a fair and proper proposal. Therefore, recognizing the necessity of tariff revision, and speaking on the necessity of a tariff advisory commission to-night, I am glad to have the benefit of the advice which was brought before the House at the time to which I refer. The Conservatives brought this matter up in 1912, but if some hon. members on this side of the House have any objection to take advice from the Conservative party, let me say that the tariff has changed very much since 1912. In those days there was $73,000,000 collected from the tariff and now $133,000,000 is collected. Since 1912 we have had a great war and tremendous taxes have been put on our shoulders. Since 1912 we have had the pleasure of seeing that dilapidated annex of the Liberal party, namely the Progressive party, expand to the number of sixty-five. Well, sir, all these facts are true. I say the tariff should be framed with the assistance of an advisory board for the purpose of advising the Finance Minister on matters of that description, so that a fair and reasonable tariff for the development of our industries and the protection of the consumer will be prepared. I regret that my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Forke) and the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston) will not withdraw the resolution. I think they will be sorry when they get into power, which we hope will not be for a long time. When they get into power and read this resolution in Hansard I think they will have great difficulty in reconciling themselves with their action on this matter.

Let me turn to the hon. member for Brome who made a speech this evening, and stated he was absolutely against the principle and practice of protection. No doubt hon. members opposite agree with all he said. They have heard his remarks with reference to his defection. I do not intend, Mr. Speaker, to say very much about the defection of the hon. member for Brome beyond stating it was very regrettable to me that he should have adopted such an attitude towards the party he has followed for so many years. What did the hon. member say? He said he was a Liberal and he was the only man who understood the Liberal doctrine. Well, why does the hon. member for Brome pose as the arbiter of the Liberal party? Can no other hon. members in this House understand what the Liberal doctrine or the Liberal policy is? Why did he say that he, and he alone, is the only man in the House that understands the Liberal doctrine?

The hon. member for Brome is advancing his own personal ideas and views instead of sinking those personal views as many of us have to do for the general good of the country. He will not merge those views with the views of others, but he stands out for a fad and fancy and he is chasing a rainbow. That is all he is chasing when he talks about free trade. It is nothing else. It is a regrettable incident that he should take the attitude he has taken to-night. It is an impossibility to have free trade and have the country prosperous. Let me ask the hon. members opposite who applauded him so vigorously to-night, did he give you any solution of the problem as to how you were going to meet the financial obligations of the country? Did he explain to you how he was going to assist you in your policies? He did nothing at all. He did nothing at all except propound the idea that free trade was the best policy for the country, and that under the system of protection we had not been successful. I do not agree with his statement. I think we have been remarkably successful. I think our trade is certainly something to be exceedingly proud of in a country of this description. I think we have a splendid set of people in this country to be proud of. The effort of the West has been one of the most magnificent efforts that have ever been put forth in history. Those are all matters that we may be proud of, and they have all taken place under the system which has been in vogue for a number of years.

The hon. member for Brome went on again to speak of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He said that he knew him; that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had made him financial critic; yet he absolutely turns around on the tariff policy which Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself put into force with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), when he came into power in 1896. As a matter of fact, the Laurier-Fielding tariff is less than it was in 1896, and the hon. member for Brome says, "I revered Sir Wilfrid Laurier," yet he turns around on his follower who made the self-same tariff at that time. That is the attitude which the hon. member for Brome has taken towards the Liberal party to-night. There is no consistency in his attitude. I see the hon. member for Last Mountain shaking his head. Why does he shake his head? Will he tell me?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): Yes I will—because the hon. member who has the floor has been misstating the position of the hon. member for Brome. That is why I am shaking my head.

Mr. MARLER: I can assure my hon. friend that the last person I would like to make a misstatement about is the hon. member for Brome.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The hon. member has been doing so.

Mr. MARLER: In what way? I have not been making any misstatement to my knowledge. I am stating simply what he himself has stated. His one ambition and object, his whole speech, centered around the word "protection;" that we had to get rid of protection; that we had to get on to free trade.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MARLER: Some hon. gentlemen say, "hear,hear." I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to make up any budget on the basis of free trade. I will challenge any hon. gentleman opposite, if free trade ever does come in —and it never will—to be any better off under it than under the present tariff. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould), I suppose, after voting to-morrow night, he will be sitting beside the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark). Perhaps they will come to an agreement to-morrow and do their best to defeat the government. I warn them that supposing they do defeat the government, they will not go back to their constituents with any feathers in their caps. Their constituents will not thank them for defeating the Liberal government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: Forget it.

Mr. MARLER: Hon. members laugh. I take it that they mean their constituents will thank them for defeating the Liberal government. Is that what they mean?

Mr. GOULD: I think so.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I think the trouble is that the hon. member does not understand the Progressives at all.

Mr. MARLER: I think I understand the Progressives very well. I have said nothing about the Progressive party to-night except words of encouragement. I can say much more than words of encouragement; I can say much more about the Progressive party if I wanted to say anything about them; but I will say that they are the greatest protectionists we have in Canada to-day.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Of our country.

Mr. MARLER: Of themselves. They do not think of their country; they think of themselves.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Not at all. Shame.

Mr. MARLER: What about the wheat board? Is that not a protective measure?

An hon. MEMBER: Not at all.

Mr. MARLER: I suppose the Hudson Bay Railway is an investment?

Mr. JOHNSTON: Where does the hon. member get protection?

Mr. MARLER: That is purely a Progressive attitude.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Where is the protection in the Hudson Bay Railway?

Mr. MARLER: It is not protection; it is selfishness. I have spoken about protection. The Progressive party come out now about free trade. We understand that party.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The Progressive party have not done that.

Mr. MARLER: What have they come out for? For this resolution?

Mr. JOHNSTON: Not for free trade.

Mr. MARLER: We will accept the resolution on its face as being the policy of the Progressive party. We in the East know precisely what the Progressive party in the West means, on the basis of that resolution, and that being the case, we can act accordingly.

Mr. T. G. McBRIDE (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, after what has been said in this House, I do not think there is very much left at the present time for any member to say. I do not think I will take up the time of the House in complimenting the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) on his budget, and then start to tear it to pieces and wind up by saying that, if it carries, it will ruin this country. I cannot understand how any one living in Canada and knowing Canada as every member of parliament should know it, can be such a pessimist. It seems to me that if the members of this House would quit playing so much politics and would get down to business and work in the interests of the people, as that is what they are sent here for, it would be better for everyone concerned. What the members of this House ought to have is courage and confidence in their country, and then work in the interests of the people who have sent them here.

A good deal has been said about this budget, but from this side of the House, at least, very little has been said in its favour. There are one or two items to which I should like to draw the attention of the House, and the first is in connection with the sales tax. It has been stated a great number of times that that tax is going to work a hardship on the people, and that it is not fair that the sales tax should be increased. In my opinion, the sales tax as it was before, worked a very great hardship on the people; but taking into consideration the number of items that are left out and free from the sales tax under the amendment proposed in this budget, I do not see how any hardship will be caused. I would like to cite one instance of the way in which the sales tax, as it was before, worked. In Victoria, if a person bought a thousand bricks at $20 the sales tax was 2¼ per cent which came to 45 cents. Those bricks would be brought up to Vancouver and it would cost $2.50 to bring them up. Handling and other items would bring the cost up to $24 a thousand. Two and a quarter per cent on $24 would amount to 55 cents. Then those same thousand bricks would be sold again and possibly hauled out to South Vancouver. This hauling out would cost $5 more, which would bring the cost up to $29. Two and a quarter per cent is charged again on that amount, and this would add another 65¼ cents. And the result was that the people who used those bricks in South Vancouver would finally have to pay the bill, and the sales tax on those thousand bricks would be $1.65¼. In this way the man who sold the thousand bricks in the first place in Victoria would have to pay only 45 cents, while the man who used them in South Vancouver would pay $1.65¼. Why should the labouring man in South Vancouver who is building a home for himself pay $1.65¼ sales tax, when the man in Victoria has to pay only 45 cents? The amendment makes this sales tax so that any person who uses one thousand bricks, if we take them at the prices at which they have been, will pay $1.20 at Victoria, $1.20 at Vancouver or $1.20 in South Vancouver. This will equalize the matter all around. It is a fair proposition, and many people out West will appreciate it very much. I for one compliment the Minister of Finance on bringing in this amendment.

A good deal has been said about the bounty on copper. I think the Minister of Finance used good judgment in giving a little bonus in connection with copper. This will put the smelters of British Columbia, at least, on such a footing that in a few years they will be able to compete in the markets of the world. Not only that; but it will give employment within a few months to from 500 to 1,000 people. That means a great deal to us out West as a floating surplus of labour is always drifting towards the Pacific, more particularly in the fall of the year when the climate counts so much with them.

As regards hemp, I am more than pleased that the Minister of Finance has seen his way to offer a small bonus to this industry, but I hardly think he has gone far enough. I think that the time limit of the bonus should have been extended to at least ten years. I may say at this point that the firm which is at the back of this prospectus in Belfast is one that I knew for a number of years before coming to Canada. It is second to none there, and when I recalled the days when I saw hundreds, indeed, thousands of people, in that factory earning a good living, and when I heard of the proposal to start a factory in Canada I certainly was more than pleased to learn that the government was likely to give some encouragement in the way of bonus. It will take nearly three years to get the factory started in Canada. In the first place, they will have to select the hemp seed for the farmers. Then they will have to educate the farmers in the methods of raising that hemp. Not only that; they will be obliged to put up buildings and obtain the necessary machinery that is used in the manufacture of the hemp. They will have to make that machinery particularly for this purpose, because it is not like ordinary machinery that is kept in stock; it will have to be especially made. After that it will be necessary to instruct those who are going to use the machinery. So that I cannot see how this firm will be able to get down to business inside of three years. This is quite a large proposition, it would mean a great deal to the people of the prairies and I certainly think that the government would be fully justified in extending the period to ten years. It would mean retaining millions of dollars of Canadian money in Canada and would give work to thousands of our young people; and what Canada wants as much as anything else is industries that will absorb our young population and give them employment. No country can long remain in the forefront of nations whose people are not workers. I think one great necessity in Canada to-day is to provide work for the young people. Surely with a country such as we have in Canada, covering an area of 111,000 square miles, greater than the United States and Alaska combined, we should be able to find employment for Canadians. I cannot help thinking—and I am speaking in this regard from years of experience in this country—that one good Canadian born man or woman brought up in Canada is worth two who have been brought into the country. The Canadian-born man is accustomed to Canadian ways and can help develop the country; he falls into line naturally and does his work much better than people brought from the Old Country.

There is one thing I should have liked to see in the budget and that is a little more British preference, not on goods as a whole but on clothing. When we take into consideration the amount of wheat, and cattle and other products that we sell to the Mother Country, I do think that we should give a little more preference to British-made clothing. Canada is a cold country in the winter time, and it is very necessary to the health of the people that they should have warm clothing; and the working people as a general rule can ill afford to pay the prices that are demanded nowadays for articles of apparel. I should have liked to see a greater reduction in that respect than there is.

There was one question which I intended to bring up in connection with the budget, and that is the question of old age pensions. But I have been engaged to such a great extent on committees that I really have had no time to give the matter any consideration, and therefore I think I had better refrain from saying anything in reference to it. Some time ago the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) made the statement, that he did not see that this government was under any obligation to consider any further help for the unemployed. It would seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that it would be well for the hon. minister to re-consider that assertion. We in the West are in a rather peculiar position. There is generally a large floating population on the prairies that come out West in the fall of the year, and to me it hardly seems right that Vancouver—because that is the place that is most affected—should have to provide for these people in the winter time. I do not think that city should have to provide either work or food for them. Indeed, I have been always of the opinion that the Dominion government should give to the province of British Columbia special consideration in this respect. The floating population comes out West in the fall and, as I have said, as soon as the spring opens up, they drift back to the prairies and other places. We often ask ourselves this question out there, why should we provide for these people in the winter season? Yet we have got to do it. Now, I think that if the Dominion government would go ahead and construct a highway or a portion of a highway, and continue this work for a few years, as I think they would be justified in doing, it would go a long way towards relieving the situation. When British Columbia entered confederation it was agreed that the province should get a railway. Before that railway was built we had a highway as far east as Hope; it was known as the old Cariboo road. When the railway was built it practically did away with that highway, and then the Canadian Northern was constructed and it put out of use the remainder of the highway. Generally it has been the custom when a railway is built that the railway company replaces any highways it put out of commission in the section of the country through which it passes, and I think that this government would be fully justified in replacing that portion of the highway which they were the means of destroying when these railways were built. If the government did this it would, as I have said, go a long way in the direction of relieving unemployment for a number of years.

Another question which I wish to touch upon briefly has reference to a statement made by Sir James Lougheed and Senator Fowler. Sir James Lougheed is reported as having said:

> A change is now made, at the instance of a very small and irresponsible group in the House of Commons.

I may say that he was speaking in connection with the Immigration bill.

> I am satisfied that this bill does not represent the sentiments of the House, and it certainly does not represent the parliament of Canada. The small and irresponsible group in the Commons would engraft upon the statutes. . . .

He then goes on to say:

> Yes, there is in the House of Commons a Labour party of one or two, I think it numbers two.

Mr. Fowler then stated:

> The government showed that it had some sense in the beginning, but then they gave way to the improper gang. We get out the worst and most dangerous agitators from the British Isles.

Sir James Lougheed interjected:

> No doubt about that.

Mr. Fowler continued:

> The English are a peculiar people, and if a man is attacked by the public he will be protected by the police. Then they say, "Oh, he is an Englishman," and that makes him all the more dangerous.

Now, I would like to know what right has Sir James Lougheed to make such statements about members of this House? I come from the British Isles and I have no doubt that I am one of the people referred to. If I had not at least as good a record as Sir James Lougheed or Mr. Fowler I do not think I would want to sit in the House of Commons. It seems to me that no man is a true Canadian who does not want to build up in Canada a great white civilization with brotherly friendship as its guiding star. I go further and say that I think such statements as those which I have quoted show a lack of principle that one might not expect to find in a gentleman; nor do I think a gentleman would make such statements about any member of this House, and I for one resent it.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): Before discussing the budget, Mr. Speaker, I desire to add my congratulations to those already tendered the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) upon the introduction of his eighteenth budget. I think other members have referred to it as the seventeenth, but if my memory serves me last session the hon. gentleman introduced practically two budgets, so one may say that this is his eighteenth.

An hon. MEMBER: The seventeenth.

Mr. ARTHURS: The eighteenth I think. I have listened with a great deal of interest to five or six, as the case may be, of those budgets. I have also listened to the hon. gentleman in opposition when he was the chief financial critic for his party, and I can assure him that he makes a better critic than he does a minister of finance so far as his budgets are concerned. I only hope he may long continue to be active in one of those two capacities,—preferably as financial critic of the opposition.

When the budget of 1922 was brought down the country awaited it with great interest. Almost everybody in Canada was anxious to hear the budget debate of that year, for they were eager to know whether the government would fulfil the promises contained in their 1919 platform and supplemented by various speeches from members of the government. But the friends of the government were disappointed. They found that this "immediate and general reduction of duties" as promised in the platform of 1919 did not materialize. They found that farm implements were not placed upon the free list, and that mill machinery and other implements of production were still on the old tariff basis. In a word, they found that none of the articles specifically mentioned in the platform of 1919 were put on the free list—not even cement. My right hon. friend, the Prime Minister, did me the honour to invade my constituency, and while the Minister of Finance says he did not subscribe to the platform of 1919, I can assure him quite confidently that his leader while in my county did subscribe to every plank of that platform in so many words.

It is quite true that in order to please our friends from the West there was a reduction made of 2½ per cent in the duty on certain farm implements, but every cent of this was accounted for by an increase in the sales tax, so that to-day the farmer of the West has not benefited one cent by the reduction in duty. During the election of 1921 in my county, and I think in every other county in Ontario, our friends opposite held up the duty on boots and shoes as a horrible example of what a tariff might amount to. They took the duty of 30 per cent and pyramided it in various ways until they had it over 100 per cent; but we do not find that since our friends succeeded to office they have made any attempt to reduce this duty.

They also took various other ways of implementing their promises. For instance, they made a reduction of 5 per cent on milk bottles and also upon their paper covers, and they made porcelains for pumps absolutely free. That was the total extent of tariff reductions during 1922. But to offset this they increased our taxation in various ways. As I have already intimated they increased the sales tax of 50 per cent and allowed it to pyramid in exactly the same way as before, with the result that for the last fiscal year they have collected approximately $31,000,000 more than they would have under the old rate. They also placed an additional tax upon cheques and upon receipts. The latter, Mr Speaker, is a very grievous and annoying burden upon the people of this country. If a drover comes along to a farmer and makes him a payment of $10 or $15 upon a purchase of cattle, the farmer is supposed to be able to immediately produce a two-cent stamp and place it upon his receipt.

I notice that the minister has seen fit to reduce the tax upon cheques. Last session after considerable discussion he agreed that the tax should not be greater than two dollars; in other words, that cheques for $5,000 should go through for two dollars apiece. This year he has reduced that to $1 maximum. But the poor man who issues small cheques is still taxed in exactly the same way.

Mr. PUTNAM: I suppose the rich man gives many a small cheque?

Mr. ARTHURS: And he pays the tax; but if he gives a big cheque he gets off at half price.

Mr. PUTNAM: If he gives a small cheque he helps the poor man to pay the tax.

Mr. ARTHURS: Why not let him pay the whole tax? It is just as reasonable that he should pay the same proportion of tax on cheques that he does on his income.

Mr. PUTNAM: That is quite another matter. My hon. friend wanted to make the poor man out as being the only issuer of small cheques, which is absurd.

Mr. ARTHURS: What I say is that the tax is infinitely more on the poor man who issues small cheques than on the rich man who issues big cheques. The net result of the tariff of 1922 was to increase duties by three-quarters of one per cent on dutiable goods in another way, the net result was to increase the duty on all goods entering Canada, whether free or dutiable, by one-third of one per cent. But the friends of our friends opposite said, "This government has only been in power a few months. They cannot do everything in a day; the best solution is to leave them alone for a year and wait until they bring down the budget of 1923." Well, we are here to-day to discuss the tariff of 1923. I am quite satisfied that our free trade friends, if we have any, outside of one hon. member who spoke this evening—I am quite satisfied that our Progressive friends, too, are disappointed, and that they find very little comfort in this budget of 1923. It is quite true there are certain small reductions. The minister has reduced the duty upon goods entering Canada from Great Britain by an average of 1½ to 2½ per cent, and outside of certain specific articles, I do not know that I quarrel with him in that respect; I think his intention was a good one. His idea seems to be to promote trade through Canadian ports, and so far as that is concerned I hold up both hands in favour of the minister's position. However, there are certain articles—the woollen trade has already been brought to the attention of the minister—in connection with which the proposed change will entail great hardship. I am not going to take up the time of the House on that point; the minister knows the situation just as well as I do; he knows the difficulty that may ensue in that connection.

The minister has also reduced the duty on sugar by 50 cents a hundred. The average householder purchases in a year less than 200 pounds of sugar. The minister stated that the reduction in duty would amount to $1,250,000. I think I am correct in that figure.

Mr. FIELDING: Two and a half millions.

Mr. ARTHURS: Well, any figure you like. This reduction is principally to manufacturers of candies and various lines of that kind. I have said that the average householder consumes less than 200 pounds of sugar annually; that would mean a reduction to him of one dollar per year. The minister in the next line of his tariff is adding to the duty on currants and raisins—multiplying it, in fact, by 4½. He has increased it by 450 per cent—from two-thirds of a cent to 3 cents a pound. The housewife, therefore, will pay in the increased duty on currants and raisins every cent of the reduction on sugar.

The minister has also made a small reduction on scrap iron. I do not know whether or not that affects our friends from the West, but these are the only reductions of any moment in the tariff proposals of the minister. He is very careful to see that nothing but what is really scrap comes into the country. under the conditions of the amended tariff.

But the minister has also increased the duty in many ways, particularly on the ingredients that go into the manufacture of paint. In spite of the hon. minister's declaration of some years ago that he was not in favour of establishing any new industries in Canada at the expense of the taxpayer; that if a man undertook to establish a new industry and expected to have protection for it, his advice to him was, "Don't,"—I am not quoting his exact words, but I am giving the tenor of his remarks—in spite of that he has introduced duties which have been so far unheard of in Canada, though I am not saying that they are wrong. The first on the list is a duty of 35 cents per hundred pounds on potatoes. I think the hon. minister is right in doing that; he would be right if he followed the whole line of the Fordney tariff and gave our American friends some of the medicine they are trying to give us. But the minister did not enunciate that principle in years gone by; this procedure is contrary to his former declarations in this House.

Mr. MARTELL: He has enunciated it now.

Mr. ARTHURS: He has had a change of heart. If he really feels that change of heart he should be on the other side of the House.

Mr. FINN: How would you like him over there?

Mr. ARTHURS: We should be glad to have him—better than we would some hon. members who sit around him.

The minister has also placed a duty on crude petroleum of .3, .4 and .6 cents per gallon. This duty has never been heard of in Canada before. He has also placed a duty on fire brick. I may say just here in passing that the platform of 1919 purported to allow free entry into Canada of machinery necessary for the manufacture of necessities. There is no mill in Canada using steam that does not use fire brick in the construction of its plant. The minister has taken the other plan in this instance and has placed a duty of 5 per cent British preferential, 7½ per cent intermediate and 10 per cent general tariff on fire brick. He has also placed a duty on artificial silk and silk yarns running from 10 per cent up to 30 per cent.

The minister has been in times past an opponent of bounties. In fact, he said on different occasions that a duty was bad but a bounty was worse. He has repeated that expression in my hearing many times in this House. But we find to-day that his tariff is largely made up of bounties. The member for Cariboo (Mr. McBride) has commended him in that respect so far as the copper bounty is concerned. I have no fault to find with the building up of industries in Canada; I am only pointing out to this House and to the country the minister is swallowing everything he has said in past years in regard to this bounty question.

Since this government has been in power it has repudiated through its finance minister and otherwise every pledge that it gave to the country.

Mr. MARTELL: What pledges?

Mr. ARTHURS: Tariff pledges. Perhaps there was an exception in the case of the province of Quebec, but hon. gentlemen went all over the country from the boundaries of the province of Quebec to Vancouver preaching lower duties, proclaiming that their tariff was exactly the same as that of our Progressive friends, and they were elected on that stand. They have repudiated that; to-day, as I have said, they have a tariff which is higher than the tariff they found in effect when they came into power.

Mr. PUTNAM: Can the hon. gentleman name one authoritative Liberal who preached that during the campaign?

Mr. ARTHURS: The Prime Minister preached it in my riding.

Mr. PUTNAM: As I heard it from all the leaders—

Mr. ARTHURS: I am making this speech. The hon. gentleman has got my answer. There is one thing I overlooked to mention. The government did make an attempt to lower the cost of living, and they did it in this way: They arranged and presented to this House a treaty with France, whereby they give important concessions to that country—especially low duties on wines, silks, laces, handkerchiefs, ribbons, millinery, etc. The farmer and the workingman will be pleased to know that the duty on silk has been reduced to 20 per cent, while the duty on printed and dyed cotton fabrics remains at 25, 30 and 32½ per cent in respect to all other countries. They have reduced the duty on velvets from 32½ to 20 per cent; on French laces from 27½ per cent to 15 per cent; on perfumery from 32 per cent to 25 per cent; on feathers and ornaments for hats, from 27½ to 22½ per cent. And in respect to all these items the reductions apply not only to France but to Switzerland, Japan and various other countries under the favoured nation clause. I may point out that it is a good way to lose revenue but a very poor way to reduce the cost of living. Every dollar of revenue that is lost owing to the negotiation of this treaty —and it will amount to upwards of a million dollars—must be paid in some way, and it will be made up by the man who is subject to direct taxation; there is no question about that. I am sure that our prohibition friends —they have not any in Quebec, I presume, but elsewhere there are some—will be pleased to know that the minister has reduced the excise duty on native wines from 30 cents to 7½ cents per gallon, or from 5 cents to 1½ cents a bottle. I am quite sure that Mr. Raney will agree with the minister in that particular.

Mr. GRAHAM: Mr. Raney approves of it.

Mr. ARTHURS: Are you sure of that?

Mr. GRAHAM: Native wine is provided for in his act.

Mr. ARTHURS: I want to say a word in regard to the 6 per cent sales tax. The minister has claimed that the new tax will not be pyramided. Well, as a matter of straight business, the tax of 6 per cent upon the manufacturer will, before it reaches the retailer, be upwards of 10 per cent. We will take it that the average rate of profit from the manufacturer to the jobber or wholesaler is 20 per cent upon the original cost of the goods. That will increase this sales tax from $6 to $7.20. The usual profit to the retailer is 33 1/3 per cent or upwards. If we take it at an average of 33 1/3 per cent we find that the tax when it reaches the consumer amounts to $9.60 instead of $6. Or in other words for every $6 of money that the government receives the consumer pays $9.60.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words upon an entirely different matter. The government have not stated to parliament what their attitude will be regarding the Crowsnest pass agreement in the future. We have a provisional arrangement putting the Crowsnest pass agreement into operation. It has been in effect for one year during which time the railway companies claim they have suffered a loss in receipts of $20,000,000. Now I contend that every dollar of that is at the expense of the eastern shipper. Before the Crowsnest pass agreement was put into force last year the railway companies approached parliament, and the country, and offered a reduction of approximately 7½ per cent on all basic articles. This would give a fairer rate upon lumber, brick, cement, and all kinds of farm products both in the East and in the West. Northern Ontario, from which I come depends largely upon the production of lumber, pulpwood, ties, etc., the production of which furnishes employment for thousands of men. The hon. member who spoke immediately before me commended the minister for placing a bounty upon copper, on the ground that it would employ from 500 to 1,000 men. I can safely say that the tie and pulp industries in northern Ontario employ ten times that number of men every year, and in many years twice that number. During the war, and since, the rates upon these various articles have been increased by 100 per cent. To-day we find in northern Ontario that where the men previously received $80 to $90 a month with board—and I am speaking of northern Quebec just as much as northern Ontario—they now receive from $26 to $35 per month and board. We find that the farmer up there, who is the principal producer of pulpwood, is faced with a condition that leaves him in very poor shape financially. We all know that the price of lumber, ties, pulpwood, and other materials of this nature is fixed at the point of delivery. Well, the farmer receives that price but it is a fact that in many cases in northern Ontario he pays more for freight rates upon this lumber than he receives for the timber, for his work upon that timber upon his piling, loading and everything else included. These are absolute facts, and I believe that in the interest of this country, something should be done to relieve these men from the present condition which is almost intolerable.

Now I want to say a few words upon the immigration question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ARTHURS: I am away from the tariff question now. I want to point out that in 1914, before the war, our immigration amounted to 403,000. In 1920, soon after the war finished, it amounted to 117,000, in 1921 it was 148,000, and last year, 89,000, steadily dropping as hon. members will notice.

The Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Stewart), when he explained his policy the other day, brought forward no solution of the immigration question. His main effort, apparently, was to hand over—I was going to say to some private individuals but it is not necessarily so—to some company $100,000 provided they induced 200 families to settle upon land in western Canada; or in other words to give them a bonus of $500 per family. I can assure him that if he hands that money over to even the Drury government we will get better results than that in Ontario alone. I listened with a great deal of interest to the debate on immigration. I did not speak, but I found there were as many opinions expressed as there were members speaking, and they were not all confined to one side of the House. On the government side there were—I will not say renegades—but some men who at least were not in favour of the policy as announced by the government.

Mr. CANNON: Who were they?

Mr. ARTHURS: The hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill), the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler), the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs). These were the notable and upstanding figures on the government side.

Mr. CANNON: Who said that?

Mr. ARTHURS: The hon. members referred to said it themselves. They said they were opposed to the policy of the government. The difference of opinion among the members of the Progressive party was even worse than among the members on the government side. We found the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) saying that we should have all the immigrants we could and he would not confine them to agriculturists, he wanted mechanics and artisans. The hon. members behind him entered into what I might almost call a Marathon to see who could make the darkest and worst picture of the conditions in their own particular county. I am quite certain that I never heard before in this House—even in the old days when the Liberals were in opposition and used to use some strong expressions about the conditions of the country—I never heard a more depressing speech, or one of such a blue ruin character, than that made by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) wherein he said that there were already in his province 20,000 bankrupt and the rest were going through as fast as they could. The only hon. member, in my opinion, who beat him as a blue ruin artist was the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good). He said that if we wanted men to go on the farm we ought to import Asiatics, that they were the only men who would stay there at the present time, and he commended that policy to the government apparently in all earnestness. Our friends in Toronto have a different policy. They are going through the country to-day claiming that they have a policy which will put men on the farm only. As a matter of fact I read in a newspaper, either to-day or yesterday, that some men imported from Stornoway under this policy had gone into some other employment—I will not say what it was—and the provincial government were going to deport them because they did not stay on the farm. It was a brewery.

I was glad to hear the statement of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) that he was at the present time paying attention to the northern parts of Ontario and Quebec. I come from northern Ontario, and I may tell hon. members of this House that there are millions of acres of land there available at the present time, which will make the finest homesteads in Canada. Some of this land is timbered and some is burnt over. Preferably the best land is the timbered land. That will probably seem strange to our western friends, but the timber on the land provides work for the men during the winter and gives them an income, so they can go ahead and clean up the soil. The best residents of Canada are the men in these northern districts. While the agricultural population of Ontario has been decreasing in most parts, the agricultural population of northern Ontario has been increasing each and every census, and will continue to increase, and I think it would be wise if the minister would make an effort to populate that part of the country. I commend the minister for his consideration in the matter. We do not grow wheat up there, but the man who grows the most wheat is the poorest man, according to the theories of my hon. friends to the left of me. No part of Ontario is better adapted for cattle raising or ordinary mixed farming than this district. It is quite true that some of these men have suffered misfortunes on account of fires, but we find them going ahead and rebuilding their homes, and a year from now they will be in better position than before the fire, because the land will have been burnt over and cleaned.

I remember thirty years ago we had a slump in the lumber market in northern Ontario, and many of the men from my county left their farms in the Parry Sound district and went west, most of them going to Alberta. To-day there is not one of those farms that is not in better condition than when these men left it. Our farmers are succeeding. Many men have come in, have occupied the farms for a while, have turned the farms over to their sons and have retired to small villages having made enough to keep them according to their ideas. I think this matter should be brought more prominently to the attention of those incoming settlers whom we hope to receive in Canada. The hon. leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) said that he quite agreed with the minister in certain particulars, but he thought they required a different class of settlers. He said if we had to populate northern Ontario or northern Quebec we should have the men who would lead the simple life. I do not know whether in the West they lead a double life or not; if they do, perhaps that will account for some of their troubles. But I can assure him that conditions in northern Ontario are just as good in every way as in other parts of the country. We have roads, schools and everything that the West can offer the settler—even Ford cars.

As I said before, I am in favour of an immigration policy of this kind.

Mr. ARTHUR DENIS (Saint Denis) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, since this debate has begun, many speeches have been made, many views have been expressed, but I think this discussion, which is not lacking in importance, would have been better appreciated by the country, if the speakers had restricted themselves to the subject matter of the budget. Unfortunately, such was not the case. The interests at large were sacrificed, or rather relegated to the back ground, for the benefit of a certain group, a certain class, or a portion of the country to the detriment of the public's interests. Are these, Sir, the duties incumbent on a loyal representative of the people? I do not think so, and if a number of members are guided by such ideas they have a wrong conception of their responsibilities. I was much impressed by the eloquent speech delivered by the hon. Minister of Finance. His excellent work calls for my most sincere congratulations. He is truly the man of the hour—the best man in the right place. If the country enjoyed an era of prosperity under the regime of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, between 1896 and 1911, it is due to the hon. Minister of Finance, the same person who, at present, is in our midst. From 1911 to 1921, the Conservative party was at the helm of the affairs of the country, with the result you all know. The country was beset by many evils. Not satisfied with having increased our national debt by hundreds of millions or having burdened the people with heavy taxes, they forced, through an infamous and anti-Canadian Act, our sons to cross the seas to shed their blood on the plains of Europe. While this was going on our Ministers—a few of their silhouettes I notice on the cold benches of the opposition—were scattering the public moneys in the name of freedom and civilization under the double cloak of war and the British flag.

On December 6, 1921, the day of relief came, forever honoured in the history of our beautiful country. The people, aroused and disgusted, drove from power these ravenous wolves so as to bring back to power the country's former benefactors.

Barely a few months have elapsed since the Liberal party, under the wise and progressive—not progressist—direction of its leader, the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, took hold of the administration of the country, that the clouds which darkened the horizon are scattering, unveiling a ray of hope, to the great satisfaction of the people of this country. There is considerable improvement in the financial situation, thanks to the wisdom, experience and ability of the hon. Minister of Finance. The period of deficits is coming to an end and would already be a thing of the past had we not inherited from the late regime the National Railways and Merchant Marine which alone absorb $100,000,000 of our revenues per year.

Thanks to the economy being now practised, before long the budget will balance itself and the taxes imposed through the necessity of the moment will, to the satisfaction of all, disappear. I deem it my duty to congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance for having made progress in that direction, in relieving us of certain taxes on the necessities of life, thus lightening the burden of the consumer, and allowing industries which employ a great number of hands, to better remunerate them. I wish further to extend to him our thanks for having suppressed the retail sales tax so as to collect it at the source of production and on imports.

Before resuming my seat, Mr. Speaker, there is one subject to which I want to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Finance: it is the income tax.

To be brief and so as not to take up the time of the House with useless repetitions, I shall simply state that I entirely approve the few suggestions which were put forth by the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères (Mr. Archambault). I favour giving an exemption of $500 instead of $300 for each child. I am in favour of exempting the head of a family of all taxes on a revenue of less than $5,000. I support the suggestion of allowing an exemption for all children who are going through a course of study. I would also like to see a tax on dividends drawn from all investments in companies, wholly apart from the tax already imposed on the general business of these companies. The husband and wife having property in common should each benefit of an exemption of $2,000; in a word, they should be looked upon as if they were separated as to property, according to the spirit of the Income Tax Act.

I feel confident that the hon. minister will give to these few suggestions his serious consideration and that a bill purporting to such an arrangement will meet with the general assent of this House.

One last word, Mr. Speaker, I have full confidence that the present government will know how to carry on efficiently the country's affairs. I confide in their sense of justice and patriotism and for those reasons, I shall vote against the amendment and in favour of the main motion.

In giving such a vote, I am absolutely satisfied that I will have done my duty towards my country and the electors that I have the honour of representing.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly not desirous of rising to make a speech at this late hour, but I have a duty to perform. I have the advantage of hon. members who have been in constant attendance in this House, in the fact that I have been able to go home and have a week's vacation on the farm. While that is an advantage, in that I feel fresh in comparison with some hon. members present, it is a disadvantage as well because what I have to say may be a repetition, as I was not in this House to listen to the speeches and I have not had time to read them. If, however, I wander far afield, I know Mr. Speaker will call me to order.

While I was in the West, news of the budget that had been delivered here had travelled that far, and the man or the woman is a rare bird, indeed, who is in favour of the budget as it was brought down this year. The western people are almost a unit, so far as I can see or hear, in condemning this budget that was delivered in 1923. This morning I received a resolution passed by the District Board of the constituency of Portage la Prairie, and I should like to read it to the House, if hon. members will bear with me. It reads:

PORTAGE LA PRAIRIE, May 19, 1923.

Mr. H. LEADER, M.P.,
Parliament Bldgs.,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Sir:

I am instructed by the district Board of the Constituency of Portage la Prairie to forward to you the following.

Whereas the national prosperity is mainly dependent on the development of those interests native to the country, and whereas a tariff based on the principles of protection bears unduly on those natural industries thus retarding production and the development of our natural resources, to the point that agriculture can scarcely maintain itself and is becoming completely demoralized, and whereas the present government gave definite promise in its platform of 1919 to remove the duty on at least the necessities of life and the implements of production. Therefore be it resolved that we recognize the tariff proposals of the Hon. Mr. Fielding as breaking faith with the people of Canada, and further we stand unalterably opposed to the principle of protection being recognized in formulating tariff proposals. And we further express our wholehearted approval of the amendment proposed by Mr. Forke, leader of the Progressives.

JAMES MCKENZIE.

Mr. James McKenzie is one of the old-time Liberals of Portage plains. I think I am safe in saying that on this committee of seventeen or twenty-one, I do not know which, not more than two members are not former Liberals; they all condemn the budget that has been brought down, and they are firmly of opinion that the Liberal party has betrayed the people of this country.

There are in the budget things that we could, perhaps, say a good word for. I should like to say—and when I say this, I know it will not meet with the approval of many of my Progressive colleagues—that as a good Canadian I approve the preference for British goods entering Canada via Canadian ports. The government might have carried out that part of their platform very easily at this time. I think they should increase the British preference to at least 50 per cent. They have a great opportunity in view of the fact that Britain has come to our aid and lifted the embargo in order to allow our cattle to enter the Old Country. The government might have reciprocated and increased the British preference to 50 per cent in accordance with their platform. My idea would be to work the duty off altogether and to admit British goods into Canada via Canadian ports duty free.

There is one phase in connection with this budget that I should like to see rectified, and that is as regards the stamp tax. Last year when the grain dealers were buying wheat from the Canadian farmers, in the settlement for grain they issued their cheques; they put stamps on them, and they charged the stamps back to the farmers. This was the cause of considerable annoyance and there was a great deal of opposition to it. In my own case I did not like it. It was not universal; they could not say that it was a rule of the Grain Exchange, because they violated that rule many times. The first car I sold to Smith-Murphy, they either forgot to charge the stamp tax back, or they did not think it worth while to do so. As regards the second car, in sending me back settlement, they charged me up with the stamps. I wrote them saying that I felt inclined to contest this right, and they wrote back claiming that they had every right in the world to do so. I went to a lawyer thinking that we would make a test case, and I was advised by the lawyer that unless I had plenty of money to spend, it would, perhaps, be better to drop the matter. That is rather unusual advice from a lawyer. I was advised to write to the law officers of the Crown in Ottawa. I did so, and after consideration on their part, I received a letter in reply stating that there was no doubt that the law called for stamps to be placed on every cheque, but that the question as to who should pay for the stamps was a matter of settlement between the parties interested. This simply meant that I had no redress in that direction unless I went into a lawsuit. I then took the matter up with the Board of Grain Commissioners at Fort William, and while I will not read all of the letter I received in reply, it says in part:

In reply to your inquiry of November 1st, I have to advise that the matter referred to therein does not come within the jurisdiction of this board.

What I should like to know is who has jurisdiction over this matter. If any organization or body in this country can issue a cheque, put stamps on it and compel the other fellow to pay for the stamps, that looks to me like special privilege. I should like to know if the Grain Exchange has this special privilege. If it has, we want to know that fact, and I do not think it should enjoy that privilege.

I should like for a few moments to speak about the cattle trade. I might say that I am a practical cattle raiser; I have put a good deal of money into the business, and I am desirous of raising for export the very best class of steers that I possibly can. We have hopes of increasing the revenues from our farm by going into the live stock business. It, however, rather takes the heart out of a man when he has reached that stage of investing his hard-earned capital in an industry and when he is producing what the market demands, to find some big interest step in and take the cream off. That has happened as regards our freight rates. The lifting of the embargo should mean a great stimulus to stock breeding but ocean rates are too high, and they are robbing the farmers of their legitimate profits. A lower tariff should be established and maintained by the action of the government. I see the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) is in his seat. I notice on reading Hansard that he says:

The reason I take this matter up now is because on several occasions there have been intimations of a more or less insinuating character made with respect to this matter. As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) came out frankly and intimated gross negligence on the part of the Department of Agriculture with respect to this matter.

I did say that, and I think I could prove the charge. The Minister of Agriculture made the statement that he had inquired of Sir Henry Thornton and had been told that it would take at least $32,000 to fit up each ship to take our cattle overseas. Let me quote from the Winnipeg Free Press of May 17:

But if Mr. Motherwell had this information, why did his deputy as late as December 13, 1922, make this statement to the members of the Western Canada Live-Stock Union—

Who met in Brandon last winter.

—"Canada owns a number of vessels and I have been trying to influence the department to put some of these vessels at the disposal of the cattle interests. I hope the government will make a move in the matter. These vessels are not very large, nor are they as seaworthy as they might be, but they could be utilized in the spring and fall trade."

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Dr. Grisdale, my deputy, made the statement, which he is reported to have made, in December, before Sir Henry Thornton was in charge, while Sir Henry Thornton's statement was made in March. That is the difference.

Mr. LEADER: Evidently the department had under consideration the question of fixing up the vessels to take care of the trade. As I said before, I think I could substantiate the charge I made in this matter.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think the hon. member meant it very seriously. It was just a little play in the game.

Mr. LEADER: I might point out that in a newspaper report it was stated that even the dumb beasts themselves objected to the attitude of the government, for the very first steer that landed on the other side upset the representative of the government.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Perhaps they had been celebrating.

Mr. LEADER: I happened to see a letter written by the president of the Scottish Farmers' Union—Mr. Elliott, I believe the gentleman's name is—in which he stated that $160,000,000 was paid for Irish cattle last year. I think that Canada might very well get a share of this trade.

Mr. PUTNAM: I do not think that there is necessarily a difference between the statement of Dr. Grisdale and that of the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. LEADER: If there is a difference, it is this, that the deputy did try to persuade the government as late as last December, and the government had cognizance of the fact, that we needed vessels. The Deputy Minister of Agriculture was trying to induce them to get those vessels ready to take care of the trade that would open up this spring.

Mr. PUTNAM: The minister said that they could be utilized. The Minister of Agriculture found out that they could be utilized but at great cost.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Will my hon. friend (Mr. Leader) be good enough to tell us wherein I was remiss in my duty in this matter? I know he does not want to be unfair.

Mr. LEADER: I have no desire whatever to be disrespectful, for I have every admiration for the Minister of Agriculture; but I rather think that he himself has been playing politics so far as this question is concerned. I see by Hansard that he made the statement that it was owing to the advertising of the number of cattle that we were going to ship overseas that the shipowners put up their rates. Well, if anyone did any boosting it was Mr. Duncan Marshall, the representative of the government, who went over to England and made the statement that at least 200,000 head of cattle would be shipped over this year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Where is your authority for that statement?

Mr. LEADER: It was in the Free Press.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: A bad authority.

Mr. LEADER: I think the Minister of Agriculture should quit playing politics in this matter, should put away all camouflage, and make an honest-to-goodness attempt to foster this great branch of the live stock industry.

I would bring to the attention of the House the question of the recent floods in Manitoba. This is almost an annual occurrence in my constituency, where the Assiniboine river overflows its banks. There have been some delegations here to interview the government and I have been in touch with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King, Kootenay) myself. A telegram was sent to me the other day concerning this matter, which I shall read to the House. It is from the secretary of the Elie branch of the United Farmers:

> A meeting was held to discuss flood conditions on May 12th 1923 at Dacotah Man. of farmers and even in spite of conditions of roads caused by flood the farmers of the district were well represented. After a general discussion of seriousness of flood conditions caused by over-flow of Assiniboine river the following resolution was passed:
> "Be it resolved that in view of the immense damage caused on the south side of the Assiniboine river, and this being the second flood in two weeks flooding thousand of acres each time the area covered being at least fifteen miles long and several miles wide, and this being a repetition of last year when land was covered with water after crop was in causing suffering and ruin to farmers, most farmers having to move out for first flood, having feed and seed ruined, then moving back and seeding, and then having the second flood, thousand of acres will not be reseeded this year, and in this instance the flooded condition being over seven miles from the river and this being only fractional part of damages, this meeting urges that the government do something to remedy the situation."

In regard to the condition of affairs out there, I am of the opinion, as I stated last year to the Minister of Public Works of the province of Manitoba as well as to the federal minister, that concerted action should be taken to meet the situation. This is a matter that calls for the consideration of the municipalities, which I think should work in conjunction with the provincial and the federal governments. I believe that they could arrive at some plan of concerted action that would provide adequate measures to cope with this annual difficulty.

I want to say a word in regard to the National Railways, which constitute one of the biggest items of our expenditure. The only solution for our railway problem is more traffic and efficient management. The people are realizing this and are giving the National Railways more and more patronage, while the employees are anxious to give good service so that the railways may pay. Going home a short time ago I fell in with a gentleman who was just coming back from England. I might observe, by the way, that I never miss an opportunity of seeking information in regard to our National Railways, and I got into conversation with this gentleman. He had been in this country for thirteen years and he told me that he was a booster for the Canadian National Railway system. He said that in Great Britain this government, as previous governments had done, was maintaining an immigration office to secure immigrants to Canada. When any immigrant went to the office he inquired how he would travel if he wanted to get to Battleford, Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton or any other centre in Canada. The immigration agent would inform him that there were two railway systems in this country, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railway, both first-class. The emigrant goes home and the next day gets a stack of circulars from the Canadian Pacific Railway glorifying that system. Of course, we admire them for this, because they are after the business; but the fact is that the emigrant gets not one word with regard to the Canadian National Railways. I am not criticizing our railways, but I hope that whatever I say in this respect, which is intended for the benefit of the system, will be taken into consideration and be accepted in the proper spirit, and that if there are any irregularities they will be rectified at once. Owing to a slight accident on the road we were three hours late getting into Winnipeg. This man had his wife and two daughters and an aged mother, eighty years old, whom he went to England to bring out to this country. We had to be transferred from the train we were on to another train over about a quarter of a mile of rocky country, and it will be readily understood what a trial this was for the aged lady. We were three hours late arriving at Winnipeg. The conductor of the train told these good people that as they were billed right through to Vancouver they would not have to be transferred to another car in Winnipeg and could go to bed. Arriving in Winnipeg orders were given to transfer them to another car, and this old lady, who had been in bed about two and a half hours, had again to be disturbed. There was another woman with three small children of four years, two years and three months respectively, and these, too, had to be transferred to another car. The confusion may be imagined.

Mr. GRAHAM: Will my hon. friend give me the date?

Mr. LEADER: It would be a week ago Sunday night. What I am trying to get at is that people will patronize the road that gives them service. When this man arrived in Winnipeg, he said, "I have been a booster for the Canadian National System, but I have been sold." He did not go so far as to say he was through with the system, but he was evidently very much disgusted. The conductors were not to blame, it was some one higher up. I do not want to get anyone into trouble, but I am anxious to see our railways given a fair chance. Some of the passengers on that train inquired if they had time to go down to a restaurant to get something to eat, and they were advised by some of the officials that the train would be despatched as soon as possible. They waited for a time, and then they were informed that it would not go out until twelve o'clock. When they got down to the restaurant they found it closed.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Montreal restaurant of the Grand Trunk closes at midnight.

Mr. LEADER: Perhaps that is customary; anyway it was not conducive to a good frame of mind among these people. I find the equipment of the Canadian National Railway is just as good as that of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the employees are just as anxious as their rivals to make everyone comfortable. In a word they are trying to get business for the people's system. And I believe that the people in general are beginning to realize that they must patronize their own road if they ever expect to have it on a paying basis. We admire the Canadian Pacific Railway, but we have got to give the public just as good service on our national system if we are going to get their patronage. I went to the trouble of finding out how many cattle have been shipped from Winnipeg since the British embargo was lifted, and how they were routed. I found that over twelve hundred were transported by the Canadian Pacific Railway and around nine hundred by the Canadian National. The Canadian Pacific are getting the business. I was told by a man who claimed he knew the facts that twenty-five carloads of Canadian cattle that should have been shipped over the Canadian National Railway were switched at the last moment to the Canadian Pacific Railway at Winnipeg. I am offering these criticisms not to knock our national railway, but to build up the system and see if we cannot convert these deficits into surpluses.

What I have now to say will interest the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock). Does he remember Riley's army? This has a vital connection with the revenue of our railways. Some members of the government have stated they are not in favour of public ownership, while other ministers have said, "We are willing to give public ownership of our railways a trial. It is a legacy bequeathed to us by the previous government, and we will do our best with it." Well, last year Riley's army marched down to Ottawa. They were transported back to Toronto not over the Canadian National Railway but over the Canadian Pacific. The Minister of Labour will correct me if I am wrong, but I understand a special train from Ottawa to Toronto costs $800.

Mr. MURDOCK: The gentleman is wrong.

Mr. LEADER: Can you tell me how much a special train costs?

Mr. MURDOCK: I think 150 minimum fares; but every passenger would have to pay the minimum fare, which, as I recall, was $7.85. That is what was paid by the government for transporting Riley's army back to Toronto.

Mr. LEADER: Am I right in saying that the amount paid the Canadian Pacific Railway was $1,428?

Mr. MURDOCK: I forget the exact figure. The question was answered in the House and the information appears in Hansard. There was a very substantial reason for sending Riley's army back to Toronto by the Canadian Pacific Railway—a reason which I am sure the hon. member would admit to be ample if he knew the facts.

Mr. LEADER: The point I want to make is that this money was paid to the Canadian Pacific Railway when it might have gone into the revenues of the people's railway. This system should pay very shortly if we all do our duty by it. We hear quite a lot about government interference with the management of the Canadian National Railways, but I do not see how we can give Sir Henry Thornton a free hand so long as we are footing the bill. That is why I am addressing these remarks to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham), who I hope will take them into consideration and see if he cannot prevent the repetition of such mistakes. Other matters have come under my personal observation, but I do not deem it wise to make them public here to-night. However, I shall be very pleased to have an interview with the minister and convey this further information to him with a view to getting things fixed up.

What I am about to say now will not be very popular. In view of the fact that our public debt was increased nearly fifty million dollars this year, and is very likely to be increased to about the same extent next year, I want to declare that the government plea for economy is not sincere. I will tell you why. I introduced a resolution some time ago, and hon. members know with what favour it was met. I do not say that opposition came all from the other side of the House. But I do know that the government are creating new offices and paying out high salaries, and if they were honestly anxious to economize they would not do this. I need mention only two specific cases—Mr. Duncan Marshall's appointment at a salary of $6,000 a year and expenses of $15 a day; and Dr. Pugsley's at a salary of $9,000 a year.

Mr. GRAHAM: Might I correct the hon. gentleman? I think he will find that the Hon. Dr. Pugsley's salary is not paid by the people of Canada.

Mr. LEADER: Then I do not know from what other source it can come.

Mr. GRAHAM: Alien enemies' property.

Mr. LEADER: I had quite an experience when I introduced my resolution for the reduction of indemnities and I am convinced that it is no use for a private member to introduce such a resolution. Economies along these lines must come from the government; they must have the endorsation of the government. Yesterday a Conservative member—I forget his name—and to-night the hon. member for St. Lawrence division (Mr. Marler), suggested that there was too much extravagance in the administration of the affairs of the country. The hon. member to my right declared that there were three or four cabinet ministers absent during the session at the very time their presence was needed in Ottawa, if it was ever needed here. But you are getting along quite well, and I think you can do it always. The United States only has ten cabinet ministers, and I do not believe they are a bit better than you people are. I think we could get along here with ten, too.

Mr. MURDOCK: My understanding is that the United States cabinet ministers do not have to attend sessions of congress until one o'clock in the morning.

Mr. LEADER: I am going to draw my remarks to a close—and perhaps that is the most popular thing I have said to-night. I want to say frankly that I met most of the ministers for the first time since coming here; I have had personal dealings with them, and they have always treated me with courtesy and have been willing to do anything they could for me. But I think we have too many of them; that is the only fault I have to find with them.

Mr. MURDOCK: Where would you start trimming?

Mr. LEADER: It might not be nice to say—you heard what the hon. member to my right said. While others have congratulated the Minister of Finance I would rather extend my congratulations to the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) who has shown by his speech and actions to-night that political morality is not dead.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What is the matter with the rest of us morally?

Mr. LEADER: I would like to congratulate the Manitoba Free Press, that journal that the Minister of Agriculture seems to take exception to. I want to congratulate the manager, whoever is in charge—I do not know who is. There was a time when I was not in sympathy with the doctrines taught by the Free Press or with the men who guided its policy. I understand that Sir Clifford Sifton is still guiding the destinies of the Free Press, and I want to take this opportunity of congratulating him for the stand he is taking for the common people of this country.

Canada, in common with other countries, is crying out for honest men to guide and guard her destiny, and that destiny is what God meant it to be—a great free British commonwealth, inhabited by a prosperous and contented people.

On motion of Mr. Casgrain the debate was adjourned.
